Mr. FIELDING. As these three items all relate to the same subject, it is convenient to treat them together. The papers which I have already placed on the table give, I think, all the information which parliament will desire, and for the moment I will not enlarge on the question. My hon. friends the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Agriculture both of whom are more familiar with the matter than I am, will be happy to answer any questions. With regard to the first item, relating to seed grain for homestead settlers in the Northwest, I may say that homesteaders are regarded to a certain extent as the wards of the country, in whom we have a special interest, inasmuch as the titles of their lands have not yet passed to them, and they are not in as good a position to give security as other persons who have received patents for their lands. Although these are three separate votes, and although one is for a loan to Saskatchewan and another for a loan to Alberta, it has been deemed expedient that the administration of this matter shall be largely in one hand. Regulations have already been made by the Minister of the Interior, confirmed by the Governor in Council, with regard to the distribution of seed grain to homesteaders. It is in contemplation that similar arrangements will be made as respects the distribution in Alberta and Saskatchewan for which the provincial governments will be responsible.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Have these regulations been issued ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. They have been approved by His Excellency and were laid on the table last night. The order in council authorizing these proceedings provides that the distribution of seed grain to homesteaders shall be subject to regulations to be made by the Minister of the Interior and approved by His Excellency in council. That regulation has been made. It is in contemplation however, that the regulations, while made originally for homesteaders, shall be practically the basis upon which the money which we loan to Saskatchewan and Alberta will be administered.

Mr. STAPLES. A few days ago, when this subject was up for discussion in this House, I gathered from the remarks of the minister that the provision now being made was going to be confined to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and I find that in the resolution the province of Manitoba had been overlooked. The other day I made the remark that if there were any homestead settlers in the province of Manitoba coming under the same conditions as those provided for in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, they had an equal claim. I am still of that opinion. While I am satisfied that there is not any great number of settlers in the province of Manitoba requiring this assistance, yet I believe there are some in the northern portion of the province. To my mind, this is a question which could well have come up in the Committee of Agriculture, and I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture how it is that although we have been in session two months, we have not yet had a meeting of that committee except the one to elect a chairman. I think it would be well for him to see that that committee is called together at the earliest possible moment. I have not had an opportunity of looking at the papers which have been brought down in regard to this matter, but I would like to ask what correspondence or what request has come from the different provinces for this assistance. I would like also to know if the province of Manitoba has made any request, and if so, what it is ?

Mr. FIELDING. The correspondence was printed and laid on the table several days ago. I presume a copy of it has not reached my hon. friend. With regard to the province of Manitoba, I quite agree that under similar conditions Manitoba ought to be treated in the same way as the other provinces ; but I think the Minister of the Interior will be able to show that Manitoba has not desired this.

Mr. FIELDING

Mr. BURROWS. I am sorry that I was not present when the discussion on this subject took place the other day. I was surprised to find that the members from the province of Manitoba, particularly the hon. member for Marquette, had not expressed the opinion that similar aid should be given to the farmers of Manitoba. Both Marquette and Dauphin contain districts in which there will be a great shortage of seed grain this year, and I think that provision should be made whereby the people of Manitoba shall have the same opportunity to take advantage of this provision as the people of the other provinces. I wrote to the Minister of the Interior with regard to the matter, and received a reply in which was inclosed a telegram from the Manitoba government stating that it was their intention to pass a Bill empowering the municipalities to deal with the matter. I am still of the opinion that the government should undertake, at least so far as the homesteader is concerned, to extend to Manitoba the same terms as they are extending to homesteaders further west.

Mr. LAKE. I think it would not be right that we should put this matter through in its entirety to-day. The House sat until half-past three this morning ; and although the Minister of Finance laid on the table the printed regulations, they were not distributed before noon. No time has consequently been given hon. members to study the regulations. Representatives from the Northwest have been in consultation with members of the government the last three weeks regarding this matter ; and before we agree to all the details, it is highly desirable that we should have more opportunity to study them. Another thing I learned to-day is that a very small number of copies of these regulations have been printed. It would be very desirable that a considerable number should be printed so as to enable members to get the opinions of their constituents concerning the details. It is desirable that we should decide upon the principle right away in order that the department might get the matter under way, but as regards the details we should have a number of copies of the regulations and have some little time to look into the way in which it is proposed to put them into effect. I would like to add to what one of the hon. members from Manitoba has said. My opinion, although it is the opinion of a man from another province, is that any settler, who may be called a homestead settler, should be permitted to come under the same heading as homestead settlers in other provinces. I presume that the Premier of Manitoba intended that the municipalities should deal with those cases where the people have the patents to their land and the municipality would be able to get proper security. But where people do not own their land, it would be naturally the function of this government to give the authority which would enable some security to be taken on those lands. I have given just a cursory glance through the regulations, and there are several points which ought to be thoroughly threshed out before we adopt them.

Mr. FIELDING. The whole matter is large enough to entirely justify larger discussion than we can have at present. The regulations can be the subject of consideration later on. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that the adoption might be put through subject to revision of the regulations later on. There has been necessarily some little time occupied in reaching the conclusion that this large amount should be asked for ; and if it is to be effective at all, we should have authority to proceed without delay. As to the regulations, they would be proper matter for consideration later on.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that the course suggested by the Minister of Finance and by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) might well be adopted. We might take the principle, and that would be authority for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of the Interior to proceed, but as regards the modus operandi, we should have time to study the regulations.

Mr. FIELDING. We are not asking the House to approve the regulations. They are on the table and will be subject for discussion.

Mr. SPROULE. I have here a bulletin showing the results of germination tests of seed grain. These regulations ought to have some regard for the experience of the department with these seed tests. Take, for instance, oats, the bulletin says the No. 1 germinated 72 per cent in ten days and No. 2 only 32 per cent in the same time. There is a big difference between 72 and 32 per cent. The regulations provide for the purchase of No. 1, 2 and 3 grade oats, but I do not think it would be wise to buy No. 2 and 3 for the purpose of seed. With regard to No. 1 and No. 3 Northern wheat, I do not understand why No. 2 Northern is not given in the bulletin. No. 1 Northern germinated in four days 99 per cent. No. 3 germinated in four days 98 per cent, but No. 2 is not given. I presume it would be between 98 and 99. No. 6 Northern germinated in four days 74 per cent and feed No. 2 germinated in five days 44 per cent. I assume that the latter would not be purchased for distribution as seed.

I wish more particularly to read a letter which I received from a farmer in the west. He says that the situation is very much worse than many suppose.

An hon. MEMBER. In what part of the country is it ?

Mr. SPROULE. He writes from my riding, but he comes from southwest of Saskatoon, which is a locality where it is claimed the frost did very litle damage. I saw splended samples of grain from that locality. He says :

In many places there is no grain that would do for seed, it being quite green when the frost came.

He goes on to say :

Every one has to get seed the best way they can, and there will be a very large percentage of the people who will not be able to get it.

He points out that this will be the result if the seed is only distributed at certain points far apart and he recommends a very large number of points. He says :

To my opinion, and it is the opinion of most people, there should be some arrangement to enable the people to get seed grain at any place where there are elevators. If each individual has to send away for his own seed, it won't do, and in many cases it will be necessary for the settler to get seed without cash until he threshes next fall.

He also urges that the seed ought to be provided very early so as to be ready to be sown in the spring at the earliest possible moment, as the difference of a few days may produce very serious results when it comes to harvest time and frost is threatening. I think this a very good suggestion. He says further :

In my opinion—and it is the opinion of people here—some arrangement should be made so that people will be able to get the seed grain at any place where there is an elevator or elevators. If each individual has to send away for his own seed, it will not do. And, in many cases, it will be necssary for the settler to get seed without paying money.

Even if a man is not able to give security, still means must be provided by which he can get the seed. He says also :

The repayment of this ought to be spread over at least two or three years.

If that is not done, it will be a serious disadvantage to many. He speaks also of a matter, which, I take it, he saw mentioned in the newspapers—that it was in contemplation to give this money to the banks and allow them to loan it to the farmers, taking security. He says that that would be absolutely ruinous ; that many people dislike to go to the banks for any accommodation. They are treated with so much red tape and tyranny that they would rather allow their ground to go idle than ask the banks for accommodation to enable them to buy seed grain. He suggests also that there should be a certificate with every sample of grain to indicate the percentage of germinating power so that if it is below the standard a farmer may know how much more he ought to seed in order to give him a return. Another point to which he draws attention is, that it is likely that much of this grain will come from abroad and that there is danger of importing with it a lot of weed seed. He thinks that, therefore, it ought to be cleaned as thoroughly as possible before it is given out for distribution. These are suggestions which the minister can keep in mind when perfecting the scheme for this seed grain distribution. I cannot speak of the scheme, for I have not had time to read the regulations. But if the minister gives us time to go over them we may be able to offer him some suggestion that will be of value. The vast importance of the subject calls for the best attention and greatest care on the part of the government so that this seed grain distribution may be attended with best results.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not intend to discuss the regulations at this stage. But I would simply remind the government of the importance of wasting no time. This is the 7th of February. In a month, or at the very outside, six weeks, from now, the farmers will be ready to seed their land. Now, even if this grain had been already purchased, and if it were now in hand, it would take at least three or four weeks to have it distributed. I would suggest that this work be expedited as much as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. They commence seeding, in some cases, about March 15.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. As a rule, the seed will be needed toward the end of March. On March 20 many of these farmers in the Northwest will be ready to seed. Last year a great deal of grain for seed that was shipped to farmers in the Northwest did not reach its destination until weeks after it should have been sown, notwithstanding that last spring was very late. The minister should not wait until he gets the grain in hand before arranging for facilities to ship it to the various points. Unless provision is made in advance to expedite the distribution this seed grain will be late all along the line.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. When this subject was under discussion before I stated that the northwest part of Manitoba was harder hit by frost than any other part. That includes a part of my constituency. Up to that time I had not received any letters calling attention to the fact that seed grain was wanted. Listening to the debates in the local House on the way down I heard the representative of one of the northwest constituencies state that there would need to be large importations of seed grain, though it was not implied that farmers were not in a position to purchase what they needed. When I spoke on this subject before, I said there was a law in Manitoba under which the municipalities were authorized to borrow money for the purchase of seed grain. But I have learned since that that law was a temporary expedient, intending to relieve a situation similar to that which has now arisen. Within the past week a Bill has been introduced in the Manitoba legislature conferring upon the municipalities of that province power to borrow to the extent of $10,000, expressly for the purpose of buying seed grain for the farmers of these municipalities. I am aware that there will be many municipalities that will not avail themselves of this privilege, though some individual farmers in those municipalities will be sadly in need of seed grain. Since I spoke on this subject I have received a letter from a gentleman in the northwest part of Manitoba from which it would appear that there are many farmers in that part of the province who are really badly off for seed grain. The letter is as follows :

Binscarth, Manitoba, January 25, 1908.

Dear sir,—I have noticed by the papers that the government are considering the advisability of aiding the farmers whose crops were frozen last year, and who are going to be short of good seed. This district has suffered heavily by the frost. I will state our own case—and there are lots of others just as bad. We came to the country two years ago, and bought a section of wild land, and have broken 320 acres on it. We also bought the horses and implements to work it, and put buildings on it. We have hardly the half of it paid for. Last summer we spent the last of our capital, and were dependent upon our crop. Well, the frost came and all the wheat we threshed was 270 bushels of what ought to have been a 6,000-bushel crop. We threshed also 1,300 bushels of oats, but it will take all that to feed our outfit until the next crop comes in. The oats will not grow at all, and the wheat, as you will see from the inclosed sample, is of a very poor variety.

He incloses a sample, and a very inferior sample it is.

Now, we have to live a year and seed 320 acres of land before we see any money. We have paid all moneys due the bank up to the present, but $50 is the limit of our credit there now, and I doubt if I could get that much unless I could pay it before the crop comes off.

I have tried to get money in Ontario, but so far have had no success and unless I get it somewhere that 370 bushels of bad wheat has to go on the land and our oat crop will be nil. If I sowed the whole 1,300 bushels of oats I would scarcely get a crop. Of course our land will all go in somehow, but if the spring is cold and backward, why it would be as well out, unless I get better seed. If the government takes this matter up it will be a Godsend to us and a lot of our neighbours. Their cases may be a bit different to ours, but there are plenty of them just as bad. Either seed or money, it matters not much which, repayable in two annual payments at a fair rate of interest would be a boon which a lot of farmers, who have worked mighty hard these last two years, would appreciate.

When this measure comes before the House again I hope you will see your way to support it; by doing so you will be helping quite a good number of your constituents in this corner of your constituency.

It would appear from this letter that there are many farmers in that portion of the province who are really in very bad straits for seed grain; and should the municipalities in which they reside not avail themselves of this provincial Act which would enable them to obtain relief they would not come within the scope of the Act. I think the government should make this relief extend to these people, especially to the homesteaders referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake). Of course the municipality would have no security in the way of lien on their land as they would have no title to it. I think the government should also provide for assistance in portions of Manitoba where assistance is necessary.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will this assistance be confined to those who are actually suffering for want of seed grain owing to the fact of their crops having been frozen last year or will it be possible for a man who may have obtained a fair crop to take advantage of this assistance, sell the grain he has obtained for seed purposes and use the money for some other purpose ? I think the government should guard against any abuse of this kind.

Mr. OLIVER. Section 15 of the regulations reads :

No aplication shall be received or accepted from any one applicant for more than 200 bushels of seed grain, including wheat, oats and barley. Every applicant shall be required to state the proportion or quantity of each kind of grain he may desire; provided that no applicant shall apply for more than 50 bushels of barley. Except as in this clause provided no seed grain shall be supplied to homestead settlers who had sown no crop in the season of 1907, nor to homestead settlers whose crop for the season of 1907 was marketable and gave a reasonable return, although not suitable for seed; provided, however, if it is found after all applications have been received that there is more seed grain purchased than is needed to meet applications for advances, sales may be made to such settlers for cash at the same prices as are charged to other applicants.

The intention is only to meet the needs of those who have suffered loss. The conditions in regard to the man who lost no crop are not changed by the events of last year.

Mr. SPROULE. $f he cannot obtain proper seed, he must suffer as others do.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. A homesteader who came in last year and broke up 50 acres may not be in a position to acquire seed, whereas if there had been an ordinary crop he would have realized sufficient to procure seed this year.

Mr. OLIVER. The idea is that we are as yet necessarily in the dark as to the actual needs ; and we know that the first need to be met is the need of the man who lost his crop. That is the need we set out to supply, and so far as we are able we will supply that need. When that need is supplied, if we are able to provide or sell seed to the homesteader who did not lose any crop, we will do it but we do not enter into any undertaking to do it for him as we do in the case of the man who has lost his crop.

Mr. STAPLES. Do you not limit the assistance to the homesteader who has not obtained his patent or recommendation for patent ? That does not cover the case raised by my friend (Mr. W. J. Roche) or many others who are in need.

Mr. OLIVER. These are the regulations under which seed will be supplied to homesteaders, that being done on the responsibility of the Dominion government, which alone is able to take security upon the homestead. In cases where the recommendation for patent has been given or in other cases of purchased land or land held under agreement of sale or otherwise, the provincial government takes the security and provides the regulations under which that grain shall be advanced.

Mr. LAKE. I thought the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said there would be regulations similar to these.

Mr. OLIVER. It is understood that the regulations in regard to homesteaders, over whom this parliament will have control, shall be applied to those who are not homesteaders over whom the provincial government shall have control ; so that there shall be, as far as possible, uniformity of regulations although there is the widest divergence between the two classes of security. In the case of the homesteader who has not received recommendation for patent this government is the only authority that can take security, but it can take no security from the man who has received his patent ; the provincial government takes the responsibility of dealing with him. Under the arrangement proposed, the provincial government borrows the money from the Dominion and agrees to repay that money to the Dominion ; but the provincial government, by resolution or order in council, asks the Dominion to administer the distribution of that grant to the people who are not homesteaders, under the regulations of which they will approve.

As to seed grain in Manitoba it will be remembered that with one exception the members from Manitoba expressed the opinion that there would be no need of extensive assistance in that province; and every one will agree that it is undesirable from the point of view of the province and of the Dominion that there should be such action as we are taking now if it can be avoided. It would be very much better, in everybody's interest, if it could be dealt with as a provincial rather than as a Dominion matter. We have gone on the assumption that the conditions in Manitoba were such as not to require extraordinary action, and we have dealt with the two provinces only which made very strong representations to us that there were needs that they were not in a position to meet.

Mr. BURROWS. Was there any representation made by the Manitoba government ?

Mr. OLIVER. No, but the two provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan made definite representations to us. The provincial government of Manitoba, of course, did not and neither did the representatives of Manitoba in the House ; therefore, we did not prepare to deal with the question in so far as Manitoba is concerned. Besides, I may say that the commissioner of immigration, Mr. Scott, during his visit of investigation in the west, had some conversation with the Premier of Manitoba and was informed by him that the province was able to take care of the requirements within its limits.

Mr. STAPLES. May I ask the hon. minister if this letter is in the correspondence ?

Mr. OLIVER. No, it is not, because this correspondence only deals with the transaction that we have in hand ; that is with the two provinces. We did not think that we would be warranted in introducing the name of Manitoba into this correspondence because we did not have before us any proposition to deal with Manitoba.

Mr. STAPLES. May I ask the minister if he will put all the correspondence on the table of the House so that we can see what the urgent reasons are and where they are from.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no objection to that, but, of course, there is a very tremendous mass of correspondence, and I would have thought the official expressions of the several governments would be all that the House would require to arrive at a conclusion. However, as it now appears from what has been said here that there is a requirement within the province of Manitoba or that there possibly may be a requirement in that province, I will say that in so far as this government is concerned, we are just as ready to take measures on behalf of those who have suffered misfortune in the province of Manitoba as in the other two provinces. Although we have not made any such provision here it will be a very simple matter, if the House agrees and if the provincial government of Manitoba also agrees, to make provision later on for meeting that case.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the minister what objection there would be to applying it to the province of Ontario and other eastern provinces where there is suffering ?

Mr. OLIVER. If representations are made by the provincial governments on the same lines as they have been made by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan I presume that the conditions would be dealt with in the same way. I am assuming that; I do not know. At any rate, as far as Manitoba is concerned I am perfectly satisfied that the government is quite willing to deal with Manitoba just as readily as with Saskatchewan and Alberta, but the government will be glad, the House will be glad, and the country will be glad if it is not necessary to deal with Manitoba in that way. Let me say further in regard to the province of Manitoba that if it is understood by the House that there is a need for homesteaders in the province of Manitoba to be dealt with a very trifling amendment will be required to the regulations, and supplementary estimates will have to be passed. That will be all; there will be no delay, no extra machinery and no trouble. But, if it is required or desired that this government should advance money which shall be used for the purchase of seed to be supplied to people of Manitoba who are not in the position of homesteaders we will have to have the co-operation of the government of Manitoba as we are having the co-operation of the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan. That, of course, must be thoroughly understood, but such, I understand, is a matter to be discussed with the government of Manitoba.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) has struck the key note. There is not a moment to be lost. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has promised to allow full latitude for discussion of the regulations and I would suggest to him that he start the machinery and get the grain moving at once. Therefore, pass the resolution.

Mr. FIELDING. Hear, hear.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. FIELDING. I would desire the House to wait for a few minutes and perhaps we will avoid the necessity of an evening session. I would also ask the cooperation of the House in taking the several stages necessary to give effect to the resolution which has been adopted. For that purpose I beg to move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING moved :

That towards making good the supply to be granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1908, the sum of $2,850,000 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that we will not have much of an opportunity of discussing these regulations or of making suggestions with regard to them that we may think it desirable to do, and if we go on and pass the Bill without giving it any consideration we will not have much latitude for further discussion. I think that we should have some opportunity of looking over these regulations carefully because I have no doubt it will be found that there are many suggestions that ought to be made, that are not made and which might be made by western men and others. We ought to have some additional scope for discussion before this is disposed of.

Mr. FIELDING. It is very important that we should get authority to buy the grain. Until we pass the several stages of this measure we have no authority to expend a dollar. The regulations however, are subject to the supervision of the House and if in the judgment of the House, it is advisable to amend them, I think that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) will be very happy to receive any suggestions because we are all after the same object. But, I think that the House will agree that it is desirable that we should take the several stages and get authority to buy the grain at once. I will ask the co-operation of my hon. friends in facilitating the passage of this resolution and of the Bill which is based thereon.

Mr. SPROULE. I agree with what the hon. gentleman says but by whom are these regulations to be made? I take it that they will be made by the Department of the Interior——

Mr. FIELDING. They will be made by the department.

Mr. SPROULE——and that we will have no opportunity of offering any suggestions in regard to them.

Mr. FIELDING. Inasmuch as they are to be placed before the House the hon. gentleman will have every opportunity of making suggestions with regard to them. The House does not adopt the regulations themselves but it gives the government authority to deal with them and to proceed with the purchase of the grain. The whole matter is as open as it can be.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that it is the aim and, of course, it is all right, but unless there is some general opportunity of bringing it up other than by means of a side issue on going into Committee of Supply or on some occasion like that when the attention of the minister will not be directed to it as astutely as it would if we were discussing the regulations here, I assume that we will not have an opportunity for that full discussion which is desirable. We might read them now, and make suggestions, they may be adopted if they are considered desirable or they may not as they see fit. We may live to learn that there are many things that ought to be provided for which are not provided for at all.

Mr. FIELDING. If the hon. gentleman can suggest any such, we could leave the matter open for discussion.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. We will be able to discuss the regulations.

Mr. FIELDING. The regulations are laid on the table like any other information and if the hon. gentleman should think they are not right it will be a proper subject for discussion. Anything we do now will not in the slightest degree restrict that right of discussion.

Mr. HERRON. I agree with what has been said by the Minister of Finance and I think it would be better that the House should agree to the principle on the understanding that we should have full liberty to discuss the details at a later date.

Mr. SPROULE. That is all I am asking.

Mr. FIELDING. I give my hon. friend that assurance.

Resolution reported, read a second time, and concurred in.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 94) to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending 31st March, 1908. He said: This Bill simply takes the resolution which has been agreed to and puts it in the form of a statute. It has been prepared in the usual form by the law clerk of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a first and second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the Bill is reported I wish to ask when it is intended this money should be repaid.

Mr. FIELDING. The order in council stipulates that the money shall be repaid by the provincial government by the end of the next fiscal year, which would be the 31st of March, 1909; it is a little more than one year.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That can be changed?

Mr. FIELDING. The regulations can be changed.

Mr. LAKE. Does that appear in the Bill?

Mr. FIELDING. The Bill simply appropriates the money, but the order in council stipulates the dates as respects the provincial governments and I think as respects the others.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that on Tuesday there will be an opportunity given for a full discussion of the regulations.

Mr. FIELDING. Or on any other day that may be mutually convenient.

Mr. HENDERSON. There will be no power to alter the regulations?

Mr. FIELDING. The regulations are made by the Governor in Council and, of course, if attention is called to any improvements that should be made, I am quite sure the Minister of the Interior would be happy to make them.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The condition upon which we are allowing this Bill to pass is that we will have an opportunity to discuss these regulations when the time comes, and not only discussing them, but amending them.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I cannot say that. The House cannot amend an order in council, but it may by expression of its views oblige the minister to amend. If you get a general expression of the opinion of the House on a matter of this sort which is non-controversial, I do not anticipate there will be any trouble about the regulations.

Mr. STAPLES. I do not desire to do anything to obstruct the passage of the Bill if the conditions are as they have been described by hon. gentlemen opposite, but it does appear that it is a pretty swift piece of work to vote this large amount of money in this way. It is my opinion that we are dealing with this a little too fast, and that the Bill should have further consideration before it becomes law.

Mr. FIELDING. I can tell my hon. friend that this very day representations were made by the parties who are in negotiation for the purchase of grain, but I have insisted that no authority be given until the House approves of the appropriation.

Mr. STAPLES. Why was it not brought down in December ?

Mr. FIELDING. Well, it is a thing that ought not to be done at all if we could help it, and it is only after long consideration that we have come to the conclusion to do it.

Mr. STAPLES. When did the first request come to the government?

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot tell.

Mr. STAPLES. We do not appear to have the necessary information.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the papers will show that.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens, P.E.I.). We are here legislating in this matter with extraordinary haste, and I venture to say that not half a dozen members in this House understand very much about what they are doing. Here we are voting nearly $3,000,000, and I think we ought to have a little time to consider the question. The price of wheat is not jumping very rapidly, and I don't think there is any very great haste to rush this bill through in this way. It would appear to the ordinary man that the government must have some inside information about a quick jump in the price of wheat so that they must buy at once, or else there is some other object in this haste. With all due deference, I think this Bill can well afford to stand over so as to let us have a full discussion of it. It is an extraordinary principle for the minister to lay down that we should vote the money first and then consider it aftewards. The minister says we should vote the money on the basis of this order in council, but they may change the order in council to-morrow. The minister simply tells us that everything is all right and that we should vote the money. Well, I have some little confidence in the government, not very much it is true, and it may be all right, but at the same time it is rushing the thing through too swiftly. It is not half an hour ago since we got this order in council placed in our pigeon holes, and have availed of the opportunity of reading it, and it appears to be all right, but on a further study we may find some very strong objections to it. The point is that after we have voted the money the order in council may be changed at any time. I am not against extending help to the farmers of the Northwest when they have had bad crops, but I think there is too much haste in rushing this matter through the House.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no doubt about it, the government are to blame in this case. They should have had this legislation down before, and have given us time during the last week to discuss this matter. But they confess the box they have got themselves into, and I for one feel that we shall have to extend a little grace to them this time, with the understanding that on Tuesday we shall be able to do all that we could really do to-day if we had hours for discussion, that is, present our ideas as to how these regulations may be improved, and with the same prospect of their being accepted as there would be if we presented them to-night. So I think we shall have to be charitable and let them get themselves out of the box they have got themselves into.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to say with regard to the regulations, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that they represent the joint views of the provincial governments and the Dominion government ; so that, while we have of course a perfect right to make alterations in them, any alterations we make will have to be acquiesced in by the provincial authorities, which will render the operation somewhat difficult.

Mr. LENNOX. I want to say that I have read the regulations, and I am sorry that the Minister of the Interior has had to make the statement he has just made, though it is better under the circumstances that he should have made it. While I am not familiar with conditions in the west, I am not satisfied with the regulations. I think they will require a good deal of amendment, and I understood from the Minister of Finance that this matter would be made more than usual an open question, and that the government would be ready to consider suggestions from this side of the House. We are all anxious to facilitate the passage of this measure, because it is very important that if aid is to be given it should be given promptly. But all the same I would be sorry to feel that we were committed to these regulations and that there was not a strong probability that the government would favourably consider suggestions for their improvement from all parts of the House, and receive those suggestions with a predisposition to meet the views of gentlemen on this side of the House, if possible. I believe many alterations will have to be made in these regulations, or they will not be satisfactory.

Mr. FIELDING. While I recognize the importance of this matter, I do not wish to press it if hon. gentlemen opposite wish it to be held over ; or I am perfectly willing to meet to-night to discuss it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. If the government will say that they are willing to accept suggestions for changes on condition that they are agreed to by the provincial governments, I think there will be no difficulty.

Mr. FIELDING. We shall certainly be glad to receive suggestions from our hon. friends opposite, with a desire to meet their views if convenient.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would the minister agree to extend the time for the repayment of the money by the homesteaders ? I think one year is too little; it should be two or three years.

Mr. FIELDING. That is certainly a fair and proper question, and while I would not like to commit myself in regard to it, I admit that it is a legitimate question for discussion.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. FIELDING. As we had a very late sitting last night, and as a very general wish has been expressed on both sides that we should not sit to-night, I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 10, 1908.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Munro Young McLean, Esq., member for the electoral district of South Huron ; introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. Geo. P. Graham.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved :

That Messrs. Lemieux, McIntyre (South Perth) Sinclair, Ralph Smith, McKenzie, Verville, Monk, Pringle and McCarthy (Calgary), be appointed the committee of nine ordered by the House to investigate the subject of old age pensions.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of the Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I would like, as a matter of privilege, to bring to the attention of the House the condition of the Order Paper. Owing to the adjournment of the House at six o'clock on Wednesdays, it has been impossible so far, and will probably continue to be impossible during this session, unless some change is made, to reach Public Bills and Orders. They are put down for Mondays and Wednesdays, but they are always preceded by notices of motions ; but as several pages of the Order Paper are filled with notices of motion, the Public Bills and Orders will not be reached unless they are allowed to alternate with notices of motion, or unless some other change is made in the procedure. Formerly they could be reached on Wednesday evening, but we have now no Wednesday evening sitting. I merely direct the attention of the leader of the House to the matter, with a view to some change being made so that Public Bills and Orders——

Mr. SPEAKER. This can hardly be called a matter of privilege.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I may say, with all due deference to you, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot get on with my Bills ; therefore I claim the privilege of calling the attention of the House to the matter. However, I take this occasion to give notice to the government that I will deal with it at the first opportunity on the motion for Committee of Supply.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ALEX. MARTIN (P.E.I.). I would like to remind the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that in January I put two questions on the Order Paper which he asked me to put as motions; one was made on the 15th January and the other on the 8th. I also called the attention of the Postmaster General to the question of daily mails in my province, and the question of the removal of the postmaster at St. Peters. There was also a return to be brought down from the Public Works Department.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will my hon. friend be kind enough to tell me what is the reference to my department?

Mr. A. MARTIN. The freights on the winter boats and the steamers from Charlottetown to Georgetown.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may tell my hon. friend that my department has a whole staff at present working in his interest. The information wanted concerning the postal service on Prince Edward Island covers many years, and we have ransacked the whole department in order to get it. The work is going on, and I hope shortly to be able to bring it down.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I had a motion on the same subject several years ago, and it is not necessary to bring down the same correspondence twice.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my hon. friend limited his motion to the last year or does it include several years before?

Mr. A. MARTIN. I think that the papers since the correspondence was brought down before would be sufficient.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to inquire of the First Minister when we may expect the report of the Commission on the Civil Service. It was promised long before this. I see a statement in the papers this morning that there are some differences between the members of the commission, and that the report may be delayed for a long while. If we are going to have any benefit of it, we should have it as soon as possible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I shall have to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the question. Perhaps he can give some information to my hon. friend to-morrow.

BANK OF WINNIPEG.

House in committee on Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Bank of Winnipeg.—Mr. Bole.

On the preamble,

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire again, as I have done in former years, to enter my protest against Bills of this kind going through in the absence of a member of the government who is prepared to answer for the committee and to give explanations. The Banking and Commerce Committee met and deliberated on this and other Bills on the same day on which an important meeting of the Railway Committee was held, which prevented a number of members being present. For my part, I am entirely ignorant of this Bill; but I understood that in former years the Minister of Finance had some decided opinions with regard to the chartering of new banks, and that he was going to insist very strongly, for example, on the capital of these banks being practically in sight. I think this Bill should stand until there is a minister in his place to give any explanation that is called for.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The request of my hon. friend is not unreasonable. Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance, whose business it is to look after these Bills, is not here to-day. Therefore I move that the committee report progress on this Bill, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERS' WIDOWS AND ORPHANS FUND.

House in committee on Bill (No. 23) respecting the Ministers' Widows and Orphans Funds of the Presbyterian Church in Canada—Mr. Bickerdike.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know who is the minister responsible for Bills that come from the Miscellaneous and Private Bills Committee, but I presume there is some minister able to explain this Bill. If not I must take the exception I have done before and ask that it be not proceeded with. This Bill will affect a great many people, possibly to their detriment, and we ought to have the reasons which led the committee to approve of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is no minister in charge of this Bill. It is a private measure, but it is only reasonable that somebody should be here to explain it. If the promoter of the Bill is not present, we shall have to let it stand.

Mr. SPROULE. In connection with the work of these committees, I desire to support the contention of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Henderson). It is improper that we should have two important committees sitting at the same time, as we have had this session and frequently last session. I refer to the Banking and Commerce Committee and the Railway Committee. Members who are on both committees can only attend one at a time no matter how much they may desire to attend both. It seems to me that some arrangement might be made beforehand by which we could avoid having these two committees sitting at the same time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does my hon. friend think that can be arranged? The Railway Committee sits almost every day of the week.

Mr. SPROULE. The Railway Committee usually meets on Tuesdays and Fridays.

The next most important committee is the Banking and Commerce Committee, and that might sit on some of the other days.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. That generally meets on Wednesdays.

Mr. TISDALE. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) is quite right. The two committees he refers to do not usually meet on the same day, but an important Bill came before the Railway Committee and that committee adjourned until Wednesday of this week. On Wednesday, I see by the newspapers, there is to be a delegation of insurance people who are to appear before the Banking and Commerce Committee. It would be most unfortunate if we had both these committees sitting on next Wednesday.

Mr. MILLER. I do not see how it is possible to escape some conflict between the two committees and avoid their meeting on the same day. The Banking and Commerce Committee meet on Wednesday and a large number of people interested in the Insurance Bill are to be present. There will doubtless have to be several sittings on this insurance matter and it will be necessary to hold meetings of the committee during consecutive days. Otherwise these gentlemen will have to return to their homes and come back again. I believe it is intended to have three sessions on Wednesday—morning, afternoon and evening. But it will be impossible to escape some conflict. There is also the Public Accounts Committee. It has been thought advisable to have the opinions of these insurance men taken down in shorthand, and the same shorthand writers are engaged on the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. While I agree with the point raised by my hon friend from South Grey (Mr. Miller), the point I raise is not directly along that line. In the Bill before us we are legislating respecting the rights of the widows and orphans of ministers, and the amendment proposed by the Bill has far reaching importance. Under the present law, the widows and orphans are entitled to a certain allowance out of a fund contributed by their husbands and fathers. This Bill proposes, under certain circumstances, to deprive these people of their rights to that fund. For example, if the widow of a Presbyterian minister should marry a man belonging to a different denomination, she would at once be deprived of the revenue to which she was entitled from the fund to which her husband had contributed perhaps for forty or fifty years. There may be good reasons for the change, but the chairman of the committee or the minister who attends that committee should be here to explain the reasons.

Progress reported.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Women's Auxiliary to the Missionary societies of the Church of England in Canada—Mr. Worthington.

LADY SCHOOL TEACHERS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. TAYLOR—by Mr. Lennox—asked :

Is it the intention of the government in any suitable manner to recognize the invaluable services rendered to the empire by the forty young ladies who volunteered and went to South Africa as school teachers?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Such is not the intention of the government.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—VOTES OF OFFICERS IN MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. W. J. Roche—asked :

1. Has the warden of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary the right or authority to oblige, under pain of dismissal, the officers of the penitentiary to vote for the candidate of his choice in municipal elections?
2. Has that superior officer authorization to give several days holidays to subordinate officers of that institution with instructions to work for the candidates of his choice in municipal elections?
3. In acting in this manner, has this officer overstepped his powers?
4. Has the said warden the right to openly meddle in politics?
5. Has he right to use his influence as warden to force the employees of the penitentiary to vote for his candidates?
6. What is the government's policy in this regard?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) :

1, 2 and 5. No ; and he has never done so.

3. The officer did not act in the manner described.

4. So far as the department is aware the warden has not done so.

6. No instructions have been issued to penitentiary officials in regard to participation in municipal affairs.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—HOLIDAYS FOR OFFICERS.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. W. J. Roche—asked :

1. Did the warden of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, on or about January 12, 1908, give holidays to one or more of the officers of the penitentiary?
2. If so, who are those officers?
3. What was the duration of the holidays?
4. What was the reasons therefor?

Mr. BRODEUR.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). Every official who had a right to vote was relieved from duty long enough to go and vote ; such absence did not exceed fifteen or twenty minutes in each case.

On the 13th and 14th of January, Rodrigue Desjardins, stone cutter instructor, who was a candidate at the municipal election, was absent one day and a half, and on January Guard Odilon Papineau was absent during the afternoon upon private business. These periods of absence were in each case deducted from the fourteen days' holidays the official is entitled to annually. These were the only cases of absence during 13th and 14 January last.

UNDER-SIZED LOBSTERS CAUGHT IN WATERS OF LUNENBURG, SHELBURNE AND YARMOUTH, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens) asked :

1. Have any reports been received by the Department of Fisheries from overseers or inspectors that small lobsters are being caught in the waters of Lunenburg, Shelburne and Yarmouth counties, Nova Scotia, and that same are being sold under measure at two for one? If so, what is the nature of said reports? and what action has the department taken in the matter?

2. Have complaints been made to the overseers and to the Department of Fisheries by persons other than officers concerning the illegal practices in said localities, with respect to the catching and sale of lobsters under size?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries)

1 and 2. The department is aware that the regulations respecting the size of lobsters are in some districts not strictly enforced.

The difficulty which usually exists in the administration of the lobster regulations has recently been increased by a change in the American laws, which permit the importation of live lobsters of smaller size than formerly, thus diminishing the supply available for the canneries. It is feared that the rigid enforcement of the size limit would prevent the canners receiving sufficient quantity of fish to carry on their business.

The matter is now engaging the attention of the department, and it is hoped that means may be found to harmonize the conflicting interests.

POST OFFICE IN SCOTCH HILL EAST.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens) asked :

1. Has a post office been recently established at Scotch Hill East, Pictou county, Nova Scotia? If so, when?

2. Who is the postmaster, what is the date of his appointment, and when did he commence the duties of his office?

3. Has a mail route to said office been established? If so, what is the route?

4. Has a mail carrier been appointed for this route? If not, why not?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General) :

1, 2, 3 and 4. No, in view of the fact that the department was unable to make any satisfactory arrangements for the service of the proposed office. The question of establishing the office is still under consideration.

FISHERY OVERSEERS IN LUNENBURG, SHELBURNE AND YARMOUTH, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. W. J. Roche—asked :

1. What are the names of the lobster fishery overseers or inspectors in the counties of Lunenburg, Shelburne and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and the dates of their respective appointments?

2. Have any complaints been recently received by the Department of Fisheries, that said overseers or inspectors, or any of them, have been neglecting their duties in permitting the catching of lobsters under size?

MR. CHARLES L. SMITH, POSTMASTER, WOODSTOCK, NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. CROCKET—by Mr. W. J. Roche—asked :

1. What is the salary of Mr. Charles L. Smith, postmaster at Woodstock, New Brunswick?

2. Has the Postmaster General's attention been called to statements to the effect that Mr. Smith has been taking an active part in the general provincial election campaign now in progress in New Brunswick, and that he was one of the speakers at a political meeting held at Woodstock in the interests of the government candidate in Carleton county on February 1?

3. Does the department allow its officers to take such part in either federal or provincial elections.

4. If not, what action has been taken or is it proposed to take in the case of Mr. Smith?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General) :

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—PRODUCTION OF ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

Notices of motion being called :

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER. I suppose we can go through the unopposed motions first; and, in connection with that, I would ask the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he has come to the conclusion to still ask Nos. 38, 39 and 40 to stand ? If they are to stand on the ground that they are to be discussed, it is quite probable that we may not reach them during the session, but, if they can be moved as unopposed motions, we can take them off the Order Paper. These motions are for original papers in each case.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When they are called I shall be glad to answer.

On the order being called :

For the production before this House of all original applications and tenders filed in the Department of the Interior in respect of timber berths Nos. 1031, 1118, 1114, 1097 and 1098, and that the same be laid upon the table of the House.—Mr. White.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will consider the application of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), as to this and will give an answer on Wednesday.

COASTING PRIVILEGES.

On the order being called :

That in the opinion of this House the government of Canada should take such steps as would secure for Canada the cancellation of existing coasting privileges now enjoyed by foreign countries, whether this privilege is granted by imperial treaty or by the courtesy of the government of Canada.—Mr. Black.

Mr. SINCLAIR. In the absence of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black), I would ask that this motion be struck from the list. The change asked for by this motion has already been granted by the government.

Order dropped.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

6. How many of these returns are still in the possession of the members, and how long they have had them.

7. The means usually adopted by the clerk of Routine and Records and the clerk of Current Sessional Papers to have outstanding returns retransferred to their possession.

8. The average cost to the country of preparing these returns by the various departments interested, during the above period.—Mr. Johnston.

G. T. R.—BELLEVILLE AND NORTH HASTINGS RAILWAY.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings) moved :

For a copy of all papers, writings and letters, between the government and the Belleville and North Hastings, or the Grand Trunk Railway, or any other railway, or any one, on behalf of any railway, relating to the granting and payment of the subsidies to the Belleville and North Hastings Railway, under 48-49 Vic., Cap. 59, and 49 Vic., Cap. 10, including the agreement executed by the railway company under which the subsidy was paid, and the cheque given in payment.

He said : Mr. Speaker I make this motion with sincere regret that at any time it should be possible to call attention of the House to such a state of facts touching one of the great railway corporations of Canada as it will be my duty in making this motion to present to the House ; and I also regret having to make such a motion at this particular time when the feeling of the country is as all know it to be. The motion is simply one for papers but of course it is in my mind that there may be subsequent action on the part of the government or of this House. The facts are briefly these: By an Act of the Ontario Legislature of 37 Victoria, a railway company called the Belleville and North Hastings Railway company was incorporated. Shortly before that another railway company called the Grand Junction Railway Company had been incorporated. The Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company was to run from a point on the Grand Junction Railway about ten miles north of the city of Belleville northward through the township of Madoc to a place in Eldorado called Moore's Mine. Both of those roads were built. In 1881 an Act was passed by the Ontario Legislature to allow the amalgamation of the Grand Junction Railway Company and the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company and these two railways were incorporated and became one under the name of the Grand Junction Railway Company. Years rolled on and the Grand Junction Railway Company, by an Ontario Statute of 45 Victoria, was amalgamated with the Toronto and Nipissing Railway Company the Whitby, Port Perry and Lindsay Railway Company, the Victoria Railway Company, the Toronto and Ottawa Railway Company, and the Midland Railway Company of Canada. All these railways were united and as the Act said :

From and after the passing of this Act the said companies shall form and be one company . . . . under the name of the Midland Railway of Canada.

So that in 1882 the Belleville and North Hastings road had first been absorbed by the Grand Junction road and the Grand Junction road and all these others had then been united, forming the Midland Railway Company of Canada. The Belleville and North Hastings Company itself had obviously passed out of existence.

By chapter 59 of 48-49 Victoria of this House a subsidy was granted to the Belleville and North Hastings Railway, which had not been in existence for a number of years :

For a line of railway from the village of Madoc to the junction with the Central Ontario Railway at Eldorado, a subsidy not exceeding $1,500 per mile, nor exceeding $10,500.

In the following year, another subsidy Act was brought down and by it $1,700 a mile in addition to the $1,500 a mile was granted to the Belleville and North Hastings railway for 7 miles of the railway from the village of Madoc to the junction of the Central Ontario Railway at Eldorado. Thus by these two Acts $1,500 and $1,700 a mile were granted to the Belleville and North Hastings road for 7 miles of railway from Belleville to Eldorado. In both these Acts a provision is made :

That the subsidies hereinbefore mentioned as to be granted to companies, shall be granted to such companies, respectively; the other subsidies shall be granted to such companies as shall be approved by the Governor in Council, as having established to his satisfaction their ability to construct and complete the said railways respectively.

The substance of that being that the subsidy is for a road between two places, but where the railroad company is named the subsidy is to be paid to that company.

We have here the case of a road having ceased to exist for several years and forming part of the Midland system and some years subsequently to its amalgamation an Act grants $1,500 for 7 miles of road and the following year another Act granting an additional $1,700 for the same seven miles.

It is very doubtful if the company put a dollar into the building of the road. As was the custom the municipalities subsidized the road very liberally ; all along the line every township contributed something and the county of Hastings gave $50,000. Then the local administration at Toronto assisted the road. I have a letter from the provincial treasurer saying that $66,000, being $3,000 a mile for 22 miles, which would include the 7 miles, was granted to the Belleville and North Hastings road. It seems the road was not completed as soon as it should have been and therefore the interest did not begin to run at the time expected and the company were given a present of the arrears. They were then paid by certificate, 40 certificates payable half yearly, the result being that Ontario paid $114,206.40.

So far I have nothing to complain of. The road had been built as far as Eldorado and two Acts passed by this House granted it $1,500 and $1,700 a mile for the construction of a portion of it. After the Act had been passed by this House application was made to the government for the subsidy. A motion was made some years ago in this House and a portion of the papers for which I am now asking were then brought down, so I can speak authoritatively when I say that in consequence of the subsidy Act passed this application was made.

October 31, 1887.

Sir:—Referring to the matter of a subsidy to be granted to the Belleville & North Hastings Railway Company for seven miles of railway from the junction with the Central Ontario Railway at Eldorado, I have the pleasure in making application for the same to hand you herewith map of the line as well as the profile, &c., &c.

The gentleman who made this application was William Wainwright, assistant manager, Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. The application was referred to the chief engineer and general manager of Canadian government railways, Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, he inspected the plan and specifications and on the report as brought down an order in council was passed on November 14, 1887, by which it is set forth that the subsidy had been granted by the two statutes :

And the minister is authorized to enter into a contract with the Belleville & North Hastings Railway Company for the construction of the said subsidized work, on the specification therein set forth.

So we have the order in council following up the statute authorizing the minister to enter into an agreement. There was some little discussion over the plans and specifications between the department and other persons, sometimes one and sometimes another, all officials of the Grand Trunk, and a contract was entered into on December 12, 1887. This contract is not between the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada and the government, but Between Her Majesty the Queen, acting in respect of the Dominion of Canada herein represented by Hon. John Henry Pope, Minister of Railways, of the first part, and the Belleville & North Hastings Railway Company of the second part.

That contract is executed in the name of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company, which had not existed for years, as the statutes prove. It was signed by Thomas Kelso, president, and to my own knowledge I can say that he had been the president when there was a company, and E. Donald, secretary. Whether he had been secretary or not I do not know. I do know that he was at that time a law clerk in the office of the solicitor of the Grand Trunk Railway and he is now the claims agent of that company whose name appears on all their literature, as one of the high officials of that road. He signed this contract as E. Donald, secretary of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company. That contract rested on the faith of two statutes providing that $3,200 per mile was to be paid, it contained the usual covenant on the part of the company—a company that did not exist—that

The company shall and will well, truly and faithfully make, build, construct and complete a line of railway from a point on the north side of St. Lawrence Street in the village of Madoc to the Central Ontario Railway near Eldorado, in the county of Hastings.

In addition to a clause such as the one I have read in which they agreed to construct the road, there is clause 6 :

That the company will upon and after the completion of the said line of railway and works appertaining thereto, truly and faithfully keep the same and the rolling stock required therefor in good sufficient working and running order, and shall continuously and faithfully operate the same.

Now, Sir, if ever a covenant was distinctly entered into, unquestionably it was the contract made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the name of this company that did not exist that it would not only construct the road but would faithfully and continuously operate it. At this time the road had been completed and that, if possible, makes the matter worse. The corespondence brought down some years ago shows that the government of the day was aware, as the Grand Trunk Railway was aware, that this road had been completed some years before and that, having been completed, seven miles of the road had been allowed to fall into decay. The Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company applied to the government—I would suppose—imposed upon the government, they believing that there was a railway—for this assistance to complete the road, to equip it with rolling stock and to get it in running order. The government of the day—I am advised by a member of the government of that day—consented to this grant on the representation that the road had fallen into bad repair, that it required repair, that it required rolling stock and that if this grant was given towards repairing this road for a distance of seven miles it would provide a connecting link with the Central Ontario Railway of Canada. So, after the contract had been made I see that a report was handed in by Mr. Collingwood Schreiber and I would like to call the attention of the government to some facts in connection with this report. It is as follows :—

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS,

Office of the chief engineer and general manager.

Ottawa, December 31, 1887.

Sir,—Mr. Ridout on the 21st instant, inspected the section of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway from the village of Madoc to the Central Ontario Railway near Eldorado with a view to the payment of subsidy.

This section of road it appears was built some nine years ago, but was allowed to fall into a dilapidated condition and became unsafe for traffic. A subsidy of a sum not exceeding $3,200 per mile nor exceeding in the whole $22,400 was granted to relay the track and bring the road up to a high state of efficiency, and with this in view a contract was entered into with the company.

The length of the section of road is 6 84-100 miles, the work it appears has not been carried out according to contract and much remains to be done to complete it as required by the specification. The amount of subsidy applicable is $21,888.

The value of the work remaining to be done....

This work is specified and it only comes altogether to $14,732.

I may here mention that no rolling stock has been provided, the company's engineer stating the Grand Trunk Railway have agreed to furnish the rolling stock and operate it, but so far as I can learn the company have furnished no evidence of this being the case, by filing with the department an agreement, and I think their attention should be drawn to this omission.

Then, there is a letter dated January 17, 1888, from Mr. Wainwright, assistant general manager and secretary of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which is as follows:—

Dear Sir,—In reference to the subsidy to be granted to the Belleville and North Hastings Railway, as provided by Acts 48 and 49 Victoria, chapter 59; and 49 Victoria, chapter 10, the Grand Trunk Railway Company have agreed to provide the line with the necessary rolling stock required to work it in accordance with the provisions of the contract entered into between the government and the Belleville and North Hastings Company and this will be supplied as soon as the railway is ready for operating.

So that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had agreed to supply the rolling stock for the Belleville and North Hastings Railway. It might well do that since the Belleville and North Hastings Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway were at that time one and the same company.

Mr. HAGGART. They had been amalgamated by Act of parliament.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Yes, years before. First, the Belleville and North Hastings was merged with the Grand Junction Railway Company and then these two companies were merged with the Midland Railway which was really part of the Grand Trunk Railway system. I find the certificate of Mr. Schreiber giving the estimated cost of the work to be done as $14,732. This is dated the 19th of November, 1888. Of that $14,732, $3,450 were for replacing timber box culverts with masonry. Although masonry seems to have been specified, as the cheque was given a few days afterwards, it is perfectly clear that up to the time the cheque was given, the road had not been furnished as required with the masonry and therefore from that $14,000 you had to deduct $3,450 which would make a little over $10,000 that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had to expend to enable it to put in its pocket $21,000. That letter of Mr. Wainwright, having provided for the rolling stock on the road, a letter appears from an engineer, Mr. Bradley, certifying to the road being in proper condition and then an order in council is passed on the 29th December, 1888, on the following terms :

On a memorandum dated December 27, 1888, from the Minister of Railways and Canals, respecting that under date December 26th instant, the chief engineer of government railways reported that the subsidized line of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway between the village of Madoc to the junction with the Central Ontario Railway at Eldorado, the subsidies for which authorized by the Acts 48-49, Victoria, chapter 9, and 49 Victoria, chapter 10 aggregate a sum not exceeding $3,200 a mile for a distance of seven miles or a total of $22,400, is in good running condition, and the amount of the subsidy actually applicable is $21,888 being for 6·84 miles, the rolling stock is provided by the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

The minister recommends that authority be given for the payment to the company of the said sum of $21,888.

That language authorized the payment of the subsidy to the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company, but not content with saying that such and such a sum might be given to that railway company, we have clause 3 saying :

The subsidies hereinbefore mentioned as to be granted to companies named for that purpose, shall be granted to such companies, respectfully.

Making, as it were, assurance doubly sure that the companies referred to were legitimate, genuine companies and would receive the money.

Mr. HAGGART. Had the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company any corporate existence at this time ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I cannot see how there could be any corporate existence when two Acts of parliament had wiped it out and the very language in the second Act which I read a moment ago and which I will read again appears to make it perfectly certain.

Mr. HAGGART. That is what I drew from the hon. gentleman's observations. He need not read it again.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The agreement between these two companies this Act of parliament validates in the following words :—

The said companies shall form and be one company, on the terms and conditions set out in the said agreement, and this Act, with capital also mentioned in said agreement, under the name of The Midland Railway of Canada.

All these statutes were Ontario statutes and that is, I presume, the reason the Department of Railways and Canals were not aware of all that had been going on, and they assumed that there still was a railway and when the assistant manager of a reputable corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway applied on behalf of that railway company it was a fair assumption that there was a railway and that he was acting genuinely. As a result of what I have detailed a cheque was issued and the government of the day apparently guarded itself, because I see the cheque is dated at Ottawa the 15th January, 1889, only a few days after the memorandum which required that $3,000 odd should be expended on masonry instead of woodwork. This cheque was as fol-:ows l—

Finance Department of Canada,
No. 9159.
Ottawa, January 15, 1889.
$21,888.
To the Bank of Montreal.

Pay to the order of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company twenty one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars.
(Sgd.) W. COURTNEY,
Deputy Minister of Finance.
Countersigned,
W. ALLAN,
For Auditor General.

I would like to ask who in the world had the right to receive payment for that cheque—a cheque given by the Dominion government in favour of a road that did not exist? Surely the moment that road ceased to exist no one had the right to endorse that cheque. I would presume that any man who undertook to sign his name for the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company to a cheque was doing something that was not regardful of the law and for which he might have been called to account. I find on the back of the cheque:

Pay to the order of the president of the Midland Railway of Canada, the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company.
Per E. DONALD,
Secretary.

This is the same E. Donald who was secretary of the company at the same time as he was a clerk in the office of the solicitor of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and who is now their claims agent. Then underneath that I find:

For deposit, Midland Railway of Canada.
J. HICKSON,
President.

Which is the same corporation as the Grand Trunk and was under the same system. Then at the top I find.

For deposit, Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.
H. LEAL,
For treasurer.

Mr. GRAHAM. You have got to the right place now.

Mr. FOSTER. It is easy to see where it went.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I think the original documents show exactly where the money went. I think there is no question that this House granted nearly $22,000 to the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company to secure the completion and operation of seven miles of railway which had already been heavily subsidized.

We find that the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada applied for that subsidy in the name of the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company; that they in their own name agreed to furnish the rolling stock; that in reliance on the agreement with the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company, the late government handed over a cheque of $21,888 payable to the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company; that that cheque was endorsed by a clerk, and was deposited to the credit of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that there is a real grievance on the part of the people in that part of the country; first, because, as taxpayers of this country they have contributed their share of the $21,888; then, as residents of the province of Ontario, they have contributed their share of the $3,000 a mile, which, with the interest, came to $114,000; then the county of Hastings gave a subsidy of $50,000 and the township of Madoc a subsidy of $37,000 for these seven miles; so that if we compute how much this Belleville and North Hastings road for a length of twenty-two miles, was assisted by the people of this country, we find that apart from the local townships other than Madoc it received $3,000 a mile for the whole distance from the province, $1,400 a mile for the whole distance from the county, $1,600 for the whole distance from the township of Madoc and $1,000 a mile from the Dominion, making altogether $6,800 a mile for the twenty-two miles. But if we take the seven miles of which I am now speaking, with regard to which this fraud has been perpetrated, the subsidies would be as follows: From the province, $3,000; from the county, $1,400; from the township of Madoc, $5,300, and from the Dominion, $3,200; a total of $12,900 a mile, or $89,600 for the seven miles. After all that money was paid by the people of this country the road was operated but a few days and then left to fall into decay. For years that $21,888 has been in the coffers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, while not a single car has moved over that line of railway. That fact in itself would be sufficient to irritate the people; but I will go further, and show how they have been treated by the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

To show how consistent the Grand Trunk Railway Company have been throughout, let me mention a little more legislation that took place in regard to that road. I have referred to the fact that an amalgamation of all these railways took place in the year 1882. In the agreement annexed to the Act of amalgamation—the Act refers to the agreement and ratifies it—it is set forth that the various roads making up the Midland system, the united capital of which amounted to $4,100,000—should be capitalized at $6,500,000—more than 50 per cent of water poured right in at once. It was provided in the Act:

That the directors of a consolidated company for the time being may at any time, and from time to time, as they shall deem expedient, issue, sell and dispose of said remaining shares so held in reserve, or they may be issued in payment for services rendered or to be rendered or for such consideration as to the said directors shall seem to the interests of the said company, and at such price or discount or consideration as they in their discretion and judgment may deem best, and they may accept from the subscribers for, or purchasers of such shares, such sum, consideration or service as they may think expedient, and the said shares so issued shall be deemed, held and taken to be fully paid up shares in the said consolidated company's stock, and the holder or holders thereof may or shall have and exercise all the powers appertaining to holders of fully paid up shares, the proceeds of or consideration for any such sale to enure to and to be applied to the general purposes of the company.

In the course of these proceedings we find the Grand Trunk, octopus like, grasping out and combining together a certain number of roads, whose combined capital stock amounted to $4,100,000, and by legislation, without another dollar of money being put in, having the stock watered up to $6,500,000. When the time comes for the regulation of railway rates by government, when perhaps the hon. member for South York may succeed in having the passenger rate reduced to two cents a mile, we shall have hon. gentlemen saying: You cannot do that. Here is a road capitalized at $6,500,000, and it has to pay its poor shareholders interest on its capital. As a matter of fact, if the various railroads which formed this combination cost no more to their shareholders than the Belleville and North Hastings—and I speak with knowledge, having been solicitor of the trustees of the bondholders—I doubt if there is any man in this House so poor that he could not build a railroad.

I have brought this matter up in order to call the attention of the government to it. I am not aware that up to this date any fault could be found with the present administration in connection with this matter. I am not aware that their attention has been called to it and that they have refused to do their duty. The attention of the Grand Trunk Railway Company has been called to it. Deputation after deputation has waited on the magnates of that road; but, despite the fact that the money of the people of this country, improperly obtained, has been for many years in the coffers of the company, the only satisfaction these gentlemen have given to the defrauded people of that part of the country is this: If you will put up the necessary money, they say, to rebuild and equip that road, we will make such reduction in freights that in time you will get your money back.

I am sorry that it has fallen to my lot to bring this matter before the House, because I recognize, as does everybody else except perhaps the railway magnates themselves, that a feeling of indignation and resentment—one might perhaps call it revenge—exists among the people of this country from one end to the other against the great railway corporations. The people, rightly or wrongly, I will not say which, have come to the conclusion that while these great railway corporations are exceedingly alive and active in the pursuit of grants and bonuses, they seem to be without any sense of responsibility or gratitude in return. The day is probably not far distant when the people of this country, exasperated beyond perhaps what they ought to be, will come to this House demanding more drastic legislation against the corporations than should really be given. It does not require a prophet to foresee that at no distant day the people will demand that we deal with the railway corporations as mercilessly and rigorously as in the past they have been generously treated. In this matter we have a double duty to perform, we have to protect the people against the arrogance and injustice of the railways and, on the other hand, we have to see that no act of confiscation is perpetrated by this parliament against any railway company. I feel particularly the responsibility of what I am saying, because I recognize that Canada is, and must be for many years to come, a borrowing country. Our industries cannot be developed except by means of foreign capital, and any one who wantonly does anything to impair the credit of this country and to deter foreign capital from coming here, is playing the part of an enemy of the country. Therefore, I should be sorry if anything I have said about the Grand Trunk Railway Company should be construed into an unfair attack on that corporation. I have tried to lay the facts fairly and honestly before the House, and I believe that if the day should ever come—and unless a change comes over the spirit of the railway corporations, it will come before long—even should public opinion compel acts of injustice to be committed against the railway corporations, the railway magnates, who treat the public with contemptuous indifference, will be more to blame than the public, who have suffered so long and pleaded so unsuccessfully for redress.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the power not given to the Railway Commission to compel the company to operate that line?

Mr. NORTHRUP. That is very doubtful. The difficulty is that the Grand Trunk Railway do not appear in the matter at all. If the Grand Trunk Railway had signed this contract, I would not require to come to this House. I could go at once to the commission, but the Grand Trunk Railway astutely avoided making itself a party to the contract. So that if I should go before the commission, I would no doubt be met with the question: What has the Grand Trunk Railway to do with this, the Belleville and North Hastings Company got the money ? I have not all the papers which were moved for some years ago, but sufficient have been laid on the table to justify my appeal to the government, and there are other papers not yet brought down which warrant my applying for them. I hope that my appeal to the government will be sufficient and that it will not be necessary for me to take any further steps in the matter. It seems to me that if the Grand Trunk Railway applied for a subsidy in the name of the Belleville and North Hastings Company—a company which did not exist at the time—and if the Grand Trunk Railway got the money and then failed to carry out the contract which it had deliberately caused to be entered into by a bogus company, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will bear me out when I say that no man, with a proper regard for honesty, would do, in his own private business, what the magnates of the Grand Trunk Railway have thought proper to do. It is a simple matter for the government to obtain justice. I would ask the First Minister or the Minister of Railways to demand a refund from the Grand Trunk Railway of the $21,000 it improperly obtained, with interest from the date the money was paid, January, 1889. If that money be given back, the road could be built regardless of the Grand Trunk Railway, for it is but a little road seven miles long. But if the Grand Trunk Railway will not pay the money back, let the right hon. gentleman say to them : I want that road operated. If he should say that, that road will be operated at once. If I had the power of the right hon. gentleman or the Minister of Railways, I could have that road operated within two weeks. All I would have to do would be to let the Grand Trunk Railway understand that it must come before the Railway Committee, when it has any application to make to that committee, with clean hands. But that if it should come before that committee, still retaining that $21,000 robbed from the people, no further legislation would be granted it. How long do you suppose it woud then take to carry out its obligations ? There need be no confiscation of railway property, no pretense of injustice, but simply the intimation that until the company did what was right with this $21,000, which it had improperly obtained, it would get no further legislation. I apologize for having detained the House at this great length. My only excuse is that this is a matter of great importance to that part of the country from which I come. You will understand how important it is to a little township like Madoc to pay $37,000 and get nothing in return. The Grand Trunk Railway runs from Belleville north twenty-six miles to Madoc and stops there, whereas if it were extended seven miles further to Eldorado, it would connect with the Central Ontario Railway and we would have a road running to Bancroft and thence to the Parry Sound Railway which runs to Ottawa.

The reasons these large sums were contributed by various municipalities and subsidies given by the government, when Sir Mackenzie Bowell was representative of North Hastings, was that there were valuable mines along the line of that railway which required development. I have seen within the last six months people who expressed their readiness to operate these mines just as soon as a railway was opened, but that is out of the question when there is no railway to carry away the ore. There were some people operating mines there when the road was first built, but a depression occurred in the iron trade which put Canadian iron out of business and the mines necessarily had to close down. But the value of these mines is to-day beyond peradventure. In the northern part of the county there have been wonderful discoveries of minerals during the past few years. There are large deposits of iron in the township of Mayo being worked to-day. One establishment has a contract to supply 250,000 tons a year, and the only outlet is down by the Central Ontario Railway. But if these seven miles were built to Eldorado, that would furnish another outlet. There are valuable and extensive marble and soladite quarries in the north, which would be opened up if these seven miles of road were built. I appeal to the government to see that justice is done that part of the country. I am not imputing the slightest blame to the government, but I appeal to them, as custodians of the public funds, to consider what their duty is, if the facts I have stated are true. If my statements are not true, let them be gainsaid. If the Grand Trunk Railway improperly obtained $21,000 of the people's money in 1889, why should it not be compelled to carry out the contract it caused to be made by a company which none knew better than it, did not exist. I leave the matter in the hands of the government. I trust the papers will be brought down and that the government will see that this grievous injustice, not only to the people of Hastings but to all the people of Canada be remedied and this corporation made to do what is right.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). I must congratulate my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) on the statements he has made ; and to emphasize his remarks, I would give another instance of breach of faith by the Grand Trunk Railway. In its original charter—that charter which gave it large subsidies practically from the government—there was a clause compelling it to give the people from Montreal to Toronto a penny a mile third class passenger service.

Mr. GERMAN. Order. The penny a mile service has nothing to do with the subject under discussion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I am citing it as another instance of breach of faith by the Grand Trunk Railway, and this is a most opportune occasion on which to draw the attention of the House to that breach of faith. That obligation this company has never complied with, and the consequence is we have had instead a three and four cent a mile transportation charge over that railway.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is hardly relevant to the motion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I think it is. I am simply citing another reason why this motion should be granted. My hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has appealed to the government to compel the Grand Trunk Railway to do its duty, and I want to show that not only has it been derelict in its duty in the instance he has cited but in other instances.

Mr. GERMAN. I beg leave again to point out that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the point is pressed I shall have to rule that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I shall have to bow, Sir, to your decision, but I propose to make my point in another way. I am pointing out that this company is guilty in other respects of what it is charged with in this instance, and in that connection I wish to say that not only has the government failed to enforce the law in the case cited by the hon. member for Hastings, but also in connection with the penny a mile service. And there are other instances of similar neglect on its part. I say it is incumbent on the government to secure some kind of redress. And I am glad to hear the suggestion to-day that the Grand Trunk or any other road that is delinquent in the performance of its obligations under the law should not be granted other legislation until it has complied with the law and with its solemn obligation in satisfactory fashion. They have disregarded their obligations in this case, as shown by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and they have disregarded their obligations under their very charter. I appeal to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and ask why they do not insist on the Grand Trunk fulfilling its obligation in both these cases? The government constantly argue that it is not their duty to compel performance of such obligation. I contend that it is their duty. I have given reasons more than once to prove that it was the duty of the Minister of Railways to insist on the performance of these obligations. That duty rests also on the Railway Commission. The excuse given for the government in these matters is that we have appointed a Railway Commission and clothed it with great power. But still nobody seems to have the duty of enforcing the law. Now, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the way in which they have solved this difficulty in the state of New York.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is for a return of copies of certain papers. It does not seem to me that on such a motion such matters can be discussed as those which the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is discussing.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who moved this motion showed that a duty rested upon the government and upon the Minister of Railways to have the law obeyed in this particular case.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) was merely explaining the facts in this case as a reason why the papers should be brought down, but a general discussion of railway matters is another thing.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. In supporting the contention of the hon. gentleman, surely I have the same privilege that he had of appealing to the government to do its duty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) says that he intends to bring up this matter on motion for Committee of Supply. That will give him his opportunity for discussion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. If the Prime Minister, or rather if the House, will pardon me, it seems to me that I am in order in going so far as the hon. member for East Hastings went in showing that the government ought to refuse further legislation to these people until they have fulfilled their obligations. Or, instead of that, the Railway Commission should compel the fulfilment of these obligations. On that suggestion I would point out that in the state of New York they created a railway commission——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is quite within his right in discussing reasons why this order for papers should be made, but he has no right to travel outside that and discuss matters that are purely irrelevant.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Is it not the proper practice in this House if a member wishes to bring any subject of importance before this House to move for papers and on that motion express his views? We find that course followed even when the member knows that there are no papers. This is one of the methods we have always adopted for the discussion of matters of importance. It seems to me that this should give us the right to travel just beyond the exact record in the discussion of whether papers should be brought down or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The point of order is taken and you have decided, Mr. Speaker, that it is well taken. All I can say to the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is that I shall be happy when he wishes it to give him an opportunity to bring up this question on motion for Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Under the ruling I shall have to accept that. But the question before the House, essentially, is the non-performance of an obligation by the Grand Trunk. I wish to emphasize that, and now would appear to be the proper time, but for some reason the delinquencies of this company are not to be discussed on this occasion when it is most proper. If the Prime Minister wishes to have this discussion to come up on motion for Supply I cannot object, but, while accepting the ruling of the Chair, it does seem to me that the case I wished to cite bears directly upon the motion of the hon. member for East Hastings. I suppose I am debarred equally from referring to the overcapitalization which was mentioned by the hon. member. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) would say that I am out of order there. But this overcapitalization of railways is a great and growing evil. Railway charges both for freight and for passenger must be reduced in this country. But when this is advocated, the answer always is: You are attacking capital. But the simple proposition is made here—and I have great pleasure in supporting it—that the Grand Trunk should be compelled to carry out its contract made with the Belleville and North Hastings Railway, and I say that it is the duty of the Prime Minister to compel that railway to fulfil its contract and so give a return for the money which was paid to it. As the hon. member has said, the law must be observed by great companies and small companies as well as by individuals. But, apparently, the rule to-day, according to the evidence placed before us, is that the Grand Trunk can defy the law when it suits them. It is defying it in this case. And I hope that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways and Canals will rise up and tell us that now that the matter has been brought to the attention of the government within two or three days the Grand Trunk will be compelled to give the people on that line the service to which they are entitled and to secure which for them the money has been paid.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), because I know something of the conditions existing along the railway of which he speaks, and of the feeling of the people there. The matter brought before the House now is not new. These papers were moved for some years ago, and practically all of them were brought down. The original sin seems to have been in granting a large subsidy to what my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) calls a bogus company. Well, if that is the original sin, I see before me the original sinners.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Sinners, or victims.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, the person who is a victim through incompetency is a sinner to that extent. I really agree with the hon. gentleman when he censures the lieutenants of his present leader, for there must have been gross carelessness on their part or they never would have given $21,888 to a company that had gone out of existence—according to his own statement—some years before. The charge made by my hon. friend is that the Grand Trunk, through a side door got a subsidy amounting to $21,888. That seems to be true so far as getting the subsidy is concerned. Then, another fact stated by the hon. gentleman is that they got it through a bogus company, or a company that had gone out of existence. Now, lest the public should think that my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) is censuring this government for carelessness, I would like to have it clearly understood that it is the late lamented government that he was censuring. I am surprised that my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with all his astuteness, as Finance Minister should have paid a subsidy to a company that did not exist. I am surprised that my hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Haggart), when almost on the heels of this transaction he became Minister of Railways and Canals, did not demand an investigation, or something of that kind, into the payment of this subsidy to a bogus company. This was back in 1887—twenty-one years ago; so this trouble is of age.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I am out of it. I was not Finance Minister then.

Mr. GRAHAM. But the payment was made a little later?

Mr. FOSTER. What date?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will give you the dates in a moment. Let me give a resume of the situation. I agree with my hon. friend that there ought to be some method by which the Dominion, the province or some other power would be able to make the railways who take Dominion or provincial subsidies or municipal bonuses carry out their part of these contracts. In November, 1887, an order in council was passed to allow the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company to enter into a contract for the construction of seven miles. As my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) says, by the statute they had received $1,500 a mile for seven miles and also $1,700 more per mile, or $3,200 all told. The executed contract was sent in, apparently, by Mr. Wainwright in December, 1887. In the same month Mr. Schreiber sends in a report saying that the road had been built some years previously and had been allowed to fall into decay.

Mr. HAGGART. Was this contract of 1887 made between the government and the company ?

Mr. GRAHAM. Between the government and the Belleville and North Hastings Railway Company—that was the company that my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) said did not exist.

Mr. HAGGART. The corporation did not exist at that time, I understood ?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. Mr. Schreiber, in December, reported that this seven miles had fallen into a dilapidated condition, and the subsidy was granted to relay the tracks and put the road in good repair. In January, 1888, a letter came from Mr. Wainwright, for the general manager of the Grand Trunk, addressed to Mr. Perley, the secretary of the department, stating, as my hon. friend has said, that the Grand Trunk would supply the rolling stock. If what my hon. friend says is correct, they were supplying rolling stock practically to their own road. In January following, Mr. Schreiber makes a report, giving reasons why the sum of $14,732 should be deducted from the subsidy. In December of that year—that is nearly a year following—an order in council was passed authorizing the payment of the sum of $21,888 to the Belleville and North Hastings Company, which money, I am told by my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) the Grand Trunk finally received. Now, it is said that this seven miles of road is not now used. My hon. friend says it was used only for a few weeks. Reasons have been given for that, and upon these my hon. friend touched—such as the falling away of the trade of the mines and so on. But the fact remains that some company got the people's money. I am not here to defend any company. We must all remember that we, the people, have made ourselves partners of the railway—partners as a Dominion through Dominion subsidies, partners as provinces through provincial subsidy, and partners as municipalities in granting bonuses. We get our share of the return in the form of good service, or we do not get it at all. I am heartily in accord with all that is said in favour of making the companies live up to their obligations.

Now, this government has had this matter brought to its attention before. In 1906, a complaint was made by petition, I think, from Madoc. A letter was written to the general manager of the Grand Trunk, and, if the House will permit me, I will read his reply. This is not my reply, it will be understood, but the reply of the general manager of the Grand Trunk to the complaint that this piece of road was not being operated.

Montreal, Quebec, October 16, 1906.

L. K. Jones, Esq.,
Secretary, Department of Railways and Canals, Ottawa, Ontario.

Sir,—Your communication of August 30 last relative to cessation of the operation of the railway line between Madoc and Eldorado, in the county of Hastings, Ontario, addressed to Mr. Wainwright, has been referred to me for attention. In answer thereto beg to state for the information of the department that in the year 1895 this same subject was discussed between the government and my predecessor, at which time it was represented that the building of this section of railway was one of those projects which results have not justified, the revenue resulting from the traffic thereon not being sufficient to pay but a small portion of the actual working expenses. Shortly after the date mentioned, I find that this company expended a considerable amount of money (exclusive of any subsidy) in rebuilding the line and relaying it with steel rails, and continued operation of the line until it was demonstrated to a certainty that it could not be made to pay expenses. From time to time during the last few years, coincident with the revival of business throughout the country, we have received inquiries as to the reopening of the branch and I have, for the encouragement of legitimate enterprise, offered to rebate the entire net earnings, in refunding the expense of repairing and making the line again fit for operation, on the basis of cash advances being made for that purpose.

Unfortunately up to the present such offers have not met with acceptance on the part of parties desiring the rebuilding of the line. I observe it is stated in the copy of the petition that accompanied your letter that the judgment of the petitioners is that a profitable business can now be done in the shipment of low-grade ores owing to certain discoveries which now permit such ores to be utilized. I am not personally aware of the facts referred to, but if it can be demonstrated to be a sound business proposition that a profitable business can be established on the line, I shall be very glad to consider the ways and means of again putting the line in operation on the basis I have referred to.

Until there is at least some reasonable certainty of the line meeting its fixed charges from local revenues the government cannot expect that this company shall be considered under the necessity of again demonstrating otherwise.

Yours truly,
CHAS. M. HAYS,
Second Vice-President and General Manager.

That letter is dated October 16, 1906. There is a grievance. No person is at all anxious to evade the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) that there is a grievance. Happily these grievances are not very extensive or numerous throughout the country. Two or three of them have been brought to the attention of the department and I say frankly to the House that although it may appear to my hon. friend easy to say that the minister could do it if he chooses. I say frankly to the House that up to the present time I have not been able to discover machinery by which these contracts can be enforced after the railways have received the money. If a portion of the subsidy was yet due the railway we could, of course, retain it, but the company having received the money, having complied with all the conditions under the contract, it is not so easy and I must say that I have not yet found a way by which we can compel these roads to carry out their contracts in this respect. I will say further that I will not be satisfied until I do find some way. I do not believe that a railway company has a right to take the money of the people of Canada and then not carry out its contract any more than it would have a right to take my money and not carry out a contract entered into with me.

Would the remedy suggested be a fair remedy? Let us take a concrete case. Take my hon. friend from Grey who wishes to have the Grand Trunk Railway extend a branch through his part of the country. The remedy suggested by my hon. friend is that I, as Minister of Railways, should say to the Grand Trunk: We will not allow you to build a railway through the county of Grey until you settle up in the county of Hastings. Would that remedy be fair to the county of Grey? It sounds well theoretically, but it is not practical to my mind. We ought to have a provision somewhere in the statute by which we could possibly give the railway commission power to deal with these cases. The Railway Commission I believe is the proper authority to deal with them. While we have found that there are grievances in several cases, that have come before the department, we have not yet found the remedy and the remedy has not been suggested in this House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. You would not allow me to suggest it. I have it right here.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend has so many right there, he gets them in the wrong place; he gets the right remedy in the wrong place.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. That is something.

Mr. GRAHAM. We are anxious to find a remedy so that this will not occur again. The people have a grievance not only on account of the subsidies voted by this House, but on account of the votes by municipalities throughout Ontario and in other provinces. Hon. gentlemen will remember having seen reports of one or two lawsuits where municipalities endeavoured to get back their money given in bonus to a railway corporation, but they have not been able to recover it. There is a weakness in the law somewhere that ought to be remedied, and I assure the House that I am trying to find out the method to remedy this grievance. If possible I shall have something further to say a little later on so that the Railway Commission or some authority may be given power to deal with such cases and compel companies to carry out their contracts with the people of Canada.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the minister know how long they operated the road after they got the large payment of $21,000?

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) says just a few days.

Mr. LANCASTER. I was wondering if the minister and the hon. member for East Hastings were in agreement on that, does the minister dispute the statement?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not in a position to dispute it. I know they are not operating now and have not been for some time.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (North Lanark). The extraordinary part of the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Northrup) is that a contract was made in 1887 by the government of this country with a company which had no existence.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is what he said.

Mr. HAGGART. Surely there must be some mistake about that, although the hon. gentleman fortifies his position by quoting two acts showing that this company could not possibly have had an existence at the time. More extraordinary still is the payment of a sum of money and the bond given in the form of a subsidy to this particular company which had no existence and the fact that the endorsation on the cheque by which that payment was made is by the company, signed by an officer of the company. Surely that is forgery; surely the officers of the Auditor General's Department or some one was very lax in the performance of his duty when it was possible at all that any payment could be made in that way. That is a matter which the government may, if they think it worth while, have the law department investigate.

As to the power to compel the operation of a subsidized road, if I remember rightly that particular question came up during the discussion of the Railway Act, the refusal of a railway to operate a line for which it had received a subsidy. I think we did give the power under the Railway Act to the commission to exercise that authority, even giving them the power to fix the dates on which the trains shall be run on the road in order to effectually work it. However, the minister says that there is doubt as to whether we did give that power to the Railway Commission. If so, it is the first time I have heard a doubt, but if there is such a doubt I am glad that the minister intends to remedy it and see that the power is clearly given them. I think they have the power now, but if they have not they should have it, for it is a monstrous thing that a railway receiving subsidies from municipalities and the governments of the province and the Dominion should refuse to operate the road. It is monstrous that they should be able to do as they seem to have done in this case, and say: unless we get more money from the government and the municipalities in order to put the road into working order, as the road is not paying well, we will refuse to operate it.

There ought to be a clause in the Act, as there is in the General Act, which we have adopted again and again in reference to railways—that if they refuse to operate or if they refuse to perform the conditions which are required of them—that is to keep their track in perfect order, and to pay their hands and employees upon the road—the government can take possession of the road, work it through the court for a certain time and then absolutely sell it. There should be power by which the government by itself or through the courts of the country, under such circumstances, could forfeit the charter and sell the road or transfer the charter and rights to a company which would operate it. We are all agreed as to that. We were agreed when the Railway Act was passed that one of the primary conditions of receiving a subsidy by any corporation would be that they would work the road. It would be monstrous if it were not so, as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) says, and if it is not in the Act it ought to be embodied in it. The idea of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which acquired the property of this company and which received subsidies altogether to the amount of $18,000 a mile writing to the government of the country and saying: We do not find it convenient to operate the road, we do not find it a paying concern, we have suggested conditions to the municipality which might result in putting it in working order, but they have not thought fit to make the advances necessary to do this as we are not in a position to do it and we will not do it. The company that wrote such a letter as that ought to be reminded of the power of the government, and should be told that if it is not in the law we will put it in the law to compel the operation of the road and we will take such means as will compel you to operate the road or forfeit your charter.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of very considerable importance and I am glad that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) has expressed a desire very clearly to exercise a remedy if he can possibly find one. It is not a question of who were the original sinners because the government, as soon as they are in that position, have to represent the rights of the people and it is their duty to carry out what is in the interests of the people. I am not prepared to admit at all without a good deal more information than I have today that there have been any original sinners in the sense of the former government. I understand that no great difficulty has arisen at all and I do not go as far as my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) in that respect. I think that the proper construction of the whole history of the transaction is that the Grand Trunk Railway Company has succeeded to all the rights and also to all the liabilities of the former company and it matters not at all, in so far as the remedy of the government or the Board of Railway Commissioners is concerned, that the transaction continued to be carried on for a time in the name of the original contracting parties. It is not of the essence of the transaction whether the government subsequently made a contract with a company which had become merged in another company, that is the Hastings company, which had become merged in the Midland company, or whether they contracted in the name of the Midland company; the result is the same, the substance of the transaction is the same and that is that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have taken to themselves all the rights and advantages which were enjoyed by the former company, and having done so, they have, as a matter of law, succeeded to all the obligations of the former company. What are the facts? We have the fact that the early company—the Hastings company—had become merged in the Midland company, and it appears we voted a subsidy to a particular railway and we voted it under the former name of the company. My hon. friend from East Hastings said that it was a defunct company. I do not think so, I think that we merely voted it to a company that had become absorbed in another company and that the company which had taken over the earlier company succeeded to the obligations and succeeded, by virtue of the vote of parliament, to the benefits of that vote. The Minister of Railways, the other day, said, in reference to the arbitration in which Mr. Schreiber is engaged, that we wanted to look at these matters as matters of equity and, as a matter of equity, there is no doubt at all that the people have a right at the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to have this line operated just as much as if the cheque had been issued to the Grand Trunk Railway. We have to ascertain the facts ; and the facts are that by a succession of statutes and assignments all the rights and obligations of these earlier companies have been vested in the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Grand Trunk Railway Company does not deny it. It is not questioned. It is not argued in any way that such is not the case. This letter which has been produced, dated at Montreal, October 16, 1906, and addressed to L. K. Jones, Esq., secretary Department of Railways and Canals, Ottawa, admits incidentally that they have to carry out the obligations of the parties who have gone before and whom they represent :

Dear Sir,—Your communication of August 30 last, relative to cessation of the operation of the railway line between Madoc and Eldorado, in the County of Hastings, Ont., addressed to Mr Wainwright, has been referred to me for attention. In answer thereto I beg to state for the information of the department, that in the year 1895 this same subject was discussed between the government and my predecessor, at which time it was reported that the building of this section of railway was one of those projects which results have not justified, the revenue resulting from the traffic thereon, not being sufficient to pay but a small portion of the actual working expenses. Shortly after the date mentioned, I find that this company expended a considerable amount of money (exclusive of any subsidy) in rebuilding the line and relaying it with steel rails, and continued operation of the line until it was demonstrated to a certainty that it could not be made to pay expenses.

The company does not here raise any point that they are not answerable to the government for the operation of the line because of the matters referred to by my hon. friend from East Hastings, or the matter referred to by the minister, or any informality in the granting of the money. I am not prepared to admit at all that this company should be allowed to merely refund that money. They ought to refund the money as the least they could do, but I think they should be compelled to carry out their part of the bargain. They take over an assignment of the business to be derived from all the assets of the earlier companies and they get subsidies of the moneys voted by parliament and by municipalities, in all, amounting to $90,000 without computing interest at all. They should be required now to operate that road just as certainly, to my mind, as if in their own name they had got that cheque. There is no doubt that they got the cheque. The transaction was carried through by one of their own employees, the cheque was issued to the Hastings company, endorsed to the president of the Midland company, a company they had been operating for years and which they subsequently took over and the cheque was deposited at the credit of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It is not denied that they have the cheque. To my mind all the government have to do is to apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners for redress against that company. A year ago we authorized the board to employ counsel for the purpose of prosecuting cases where necessary and advantage should be taken of that.

But the minister asks, what remedy have you ? I do not think there is any material difficulty, if these facts are called up, in the board compelling this railway company to act fairly by the people. That is the first proposition. What we want to get at is the substance of the transaction. When the subsidy was applied for, it was applied for by the Grand Trunk Railway Company ; when it was paid, it was paid to the Grand Trunk Railway Company as a matter of fact. Then the railway company, I submit, is bound to carry out its obligation to the people. If there is any doubt about that, what is the duty of the government ? It is to see that equity is done, that the people have their rights ; and nothing is easier than for the government to bring in a short Act, and put it through this House in the same rapid way that we put through the Distribution of Seeds Bill on Friday last, directing that this company shall operate that road. We do not want confiscation or any undue pressure brought to bear on any railway company ; but when you have the facts established that this company has succeeded to the rights and got all the money invested in this railway, and has that cheque yet unaccounted for, there can be no wrong in passing an Act which will compel it to take steps to put that railway into a proper condition and to put it into operation for the benefit of the people who have contributed these moneys.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think there is no doubt whatever that the intention of parliament, when the Railway Commission Act was passed, was to give jurisdiction to the Commission to deal with such matters as the one brought up by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), that is to say to compel railway corporations to perform the duties towards the public which parliament has imposed upon them. I did not understand my hon. friend to dispute that, but if I understood him aright, he thought no party in this case could be brought before the commission.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I very much doubt it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is disputed by my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). The railway was built by somebody, otherwise the subsidy cheque would not have been paid. I presume the subsidy cheque was paid to the party who built the railway. I am not concerned to defend the late departed government for their numerous sins of omission or commission; but I do not know till I hear further evidence that in this particular matter they were very much to blame, for I presume that the cheque was paid to the people who put in their money into the building of the enterprise. It may be, as is stated by the hon. member for East Hastings, that through a process of transactions the money finally got into the hands of the Grand Trunk Company; but it seems to me that there is force in the argument of the hon. member for South Simcoe that if after all the cheque was received by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, even though it was in the name of another company, and they have benefited from it, there is some way of bringing them before the commission. At all events, I should like to hear the opinion of my hon. friend from East Hastings on this point.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I certainly cannot find any fault with the attitude of the government on this matter. From one word which was dropped by the Minister of Railways he seemed to think that I had cast some reflection upon him. I was not aware of the letter to which he referred until he spoke; but I was careful to say that up to date no imputation could be cast on the present government, for so far as I knew the matter had not been called to their attention. As to the letter of Mr. Hays written in 1906, I can only say that if I were Minister of Railways and I appealed to a railway corporation to carry out a contract which it had made, and the only answer that I received was one from the manager, not saying we did not get the money, or, there has not been a fraud perpetrated, but simply we won't do it because it does not pay us to do it, that railway manager would rue it to the last day of his life.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the objection to bringing the Grand Trunk Railway Company before the commission?

Mr. NORTHRUP. There are two difficulties. It is not at all certain, taking the reading of the Railway Act as it is to-day, that it would cover this case, even if the Grand Trunk Company had originally built the line. Our first Railway Act has followed the English Act in this respect, and under that Act it has been decided that you could not compel a railway company to operate seven miles such as this. So long as they were operating it you could make them do whatever was necessary and right for the proper operating of it, but you could not compel them to operate. So it is perfectly clear that under the original Railway Act the Canadian board would not have jurisdiction. It is doubtful whether they would under the amended Act, although I am inclined to think they would. Our difficulty is that if we brought this matter before the commission, the Grand Trunk Company would say: We have nothing to do with those seven miles of the road; when we took that road over in 1893, we did not consider those seven miles at all; they were not being operated. As to whether the road had really been operated at all after this payment in 1889, I have here a petition—I do not know the date of it, but from the signatures I know that it cannot be more than two years old, as it is signed by the reeve and village clerk of Madoc. It is a petition addressed to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada. After reciting how the road came to be built and what subsides were given, it says: 'A spasmodic effort was made for running the road, which only lasted a short time, but has not been attempted since.' But it states above: 'It has ceased altogether for fifteen years.' So I think it may be taken for granted that the road was never operated. I have been informed by the mayor of Madoc that after the Grand Trunk got the subsidy, they only ran a freight train to Eldorado, and did not run a passenger train.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Would it not be proper for the Prime Minister to assume that the Railway Commission has jurisdiction and proceed against the railway company? Probably they would find that they have jurisdiction and can compel performance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend from East Hastings seems to have some doubt as to that. I understood him to say that the Grand Trunk corporation had come to be the owners of that railway only in 1893.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The amalgamation of all these roads into the Grand Trunk system took place in 1893, and all that system has since been known as the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada; but the Grand Trunk Railway Company had practically owned and controlled all those railways for years before.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And also received the subsidy?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I have read a copy of the cheque, and I have seen the original, with the words, 'Deposit to the credit of the Grand Trunk Railway Company,' and in conversation with Mr. Hays he admitted to me that the company had received the $21,888.

Motion agreed to.

THE PARDONING POWER.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto) moved:

For a return showing the number of imprisoned criminals released since the year 1896

by the Minister of Justice before the expiry of sentence, the names thereof, the term of sentence, the date of release, the reasons therefor, and the name of the solicitor who was interested in procuring the release.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any extended remarks in asking for this return. I wish simply to give two or three reasons why I think it would be in the interests of the House to have these papers brought down. Probably other members than myself have noticed and with some wonder, the often recurrent paragraphs in the papers as to the release of prisoners condemned to imprisonment as punishment for crimes of greater or less magnitude, some time before the expiry of the sentence to which they have been condemned. Of course, under the general order established by the Justice Department and the government, it is open to any criminal imprisoned in a penitentiary to earn years off his sentence by good conduct, and a persistent good conduct in conjunction with a fairly long sentence often shortens the term by a very considerable time.

To that, I think, no one objects. It tends to produce in the prisoner a real reform, by giving him the hope that if his conduct shows evidence of a disposition to turn over a new leaf, he will have a certain number of years taken off his term, and thus be enabled, much sooner than he expected, to begin a new life. But what does strike one is the very frequent cases of men who have been sentenced for fairly long terms for offences which are not at all venial and who are let out of prison within a very short time. That has become so frequent that you find the newspapers drawing attention to the fact that it has become a branch of the practice of the legal profession for some lawyers to use their influence with the government to get prisoners out of penitentiary long before they have completed their sentence. That is reprehensible in two ways. When an offender has undergone trial and has been convicted, the judge who has tried him and who has consequently every opportunity of estimating his conduct and the character of the evidence, is undoubtedly the one best fitted to determine whether the circumstances are such as to entitle the convict to some mitigation of his sentence later on. There may be an appeal on points of law or a petition to the Minister of Justice urged by a solicitor, who is pressed by the friends of the criminal to do the best he possibly can to get him out of confinement; but the Minister of Justice, or the cabinet, which decides on the report of the Minister of Justice, is, after all, far removed from the atmosphere of the trial, and therefore is not in as good a position to pass judgment as the magistrate who presided at the trial. I have been informed of cases in which the pardoning power has been exercised without even the formality being gone through of asking the trial judge for a report on the case. If that be true, that is certainly going very far. I should hope that in scarcely any case has that been done, because I do not think that any Minister of Justice or any cabinet should pass on a sentence without having a report from the judge who imposed the sentence. Very scathing articles have appeared in the press from time to time in this connection, and this reckless exercise of the pardoning power has come to be looked upon as a menace to law and order and an encouragement to the criminal classes, by removing from them the salutary dread of stern justice. I have some very flagrant cases in mind. I have one, the case of a man who, acting as a broker, undertook to sell on a commission the stock of a certain company. He did sell the stock and pocketed, not only his commission, but nearly all the money. He was tried and sentenced to the penitentiary. But he had scarcely found his way into the penitentiary when an influential solicitor took up his case, and in a very few weeks he was set free again. I remember that the opinion was expressed at the time that, as the facts of the case had been published in the newspapers, it would not be possible for this man to go into that business again, but this country is large and memories sometimes not very long. Within the last year or so this same man carried on the very same practice in another city in the Dominion far removed from the scene of his first offence. He was again tried and sentenced to a very long term of imprisonment. That sentence was reviewed and his term cut down, but he is still in prison. It seems to me that it is a very heavy responsibility for a Minister of Justice or a cabinet to interfere with the sentences of judges who have heard all the witnesses and know all the circumstances, and more especially to do so on extremely short notice, before there could be the least evidence that the prisoner had changed his views and had really decided to reform. It is a serious menace to society to let loose upon the public convicted criminals who have given no evidence of reform and who are likely to resume their old life. I have not mentioned any names, but no doubt the case I have mentioned is familiar to many hon. members who are listening to me, and I could cite other instances. I merely cite this to show the gravity of the question, and I hope that when the papers come down they will show that this sort of thing is not so rife as one would judge it to be from the paragraphs which from time to time appear in the newspapers.

I know I shall be met with the plea that these are matters of privacy, and that it is not customary to bring these papers down. Well, on the broad grounds of common sense and constitutional government, I think there comes a period when such a plea ought not to be urged. It is not impossible for a Minister of Justice to so abuse the pardoning power that parliament would be justified in insisting on a thorough investigation. Whether that time has come or not, I am not going to say; but if such a plea could be urged, we might be debarred from having any examination at all into what might be regarded by the public as a flagrant abuse. The too liberal use of the pardoning power may have a more baneful influence on the criminal classes than possibly we imagine. While I believe in tempering justice with mercy, it cannot have a beneficial effect on those criminally inclined to become convinced that, even if convicted, they can always have their terms of imprisonment very considerably shortened if they will only make use of certain lawyers who have a reputation for being successful with the Department of Justice and the government in their petitions on behalf of their clients. Especially is this the case if these lawyers should happen to be friends of the government, because that can give strength to the idea that if you only retain a lawyer who has sufficient influence with the party in power you stand a very good chance of having the pardoning power very effectively exercised in your behalf. That remark will hold with reference to any and every government.

The idea has got abroad—it has worked its way down deep into the minds of the people of every stratum in our society—that, if you want favours, you must approach the government through a friend of the government. Our whole system of patronage has taught that lesson too widely altogether in this country. And it will take a deal of a different kind of dealings to unteach that which has been taught. So, taking all these things together, this is not a right understanding of the exercise of the pardoning power. People read and think, and gather the lesson from each instance that arises. After all, the consensus of opinion of the people is pretty close to the line of justice; and if they see that this pardoning power is being badly used, they will form their opinion of our institutions of justice. And we here, conservators of public justice, whose duty it is to keep the sources of justice pure, must see that it is not well that there shall be any chance afforded for the formation of such an opinion as that of which I have spoken.

Now, I want these papers, and I want the reasons given; and I would like to be sure that I shall not be ruled out by the plea to which I have alluded, and which, in some cases, I quite acknowledge, may be a valid plea. However, we shall see what the Minister of Justice may say with reference to this matter.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I am glad, for some reasons, that this motion has been made. It gives me an opportunity of saying something with respect to this question, which, probably, I should not otherwise have had. But, except for that circumstance, I think it is very much to be regretted, in the interests of the men who are the objects of executive clemency themselves, that this motion should have been put upon the Order Paper. It is true that the motion asks for a return showing the number of criminals who have been released, since the year 1896, before the expiration of their sentences; but, in view particularly of numerous newspaper attacks which, in this connection, have been made upon myself personally during the few months that I have been in the position of Minister of Justice, I cannot but regard this motion as levelled directly at myself and my administration of the affairs of the department in connection with the exercise of clemency towards criminals. For that reason, I feel it, and I feel it the more because I stated in this House, within a few days from the time when I became Minister of Justice the principles which underlay the exercise of this power and which govern the administration of this prerogative of the Crown in Canada. And from that day up to the present time, I can conscientiously say that there has been no part of the duties which devolve upon me in the administration of the Department of Justice to which I have given more careful, more patient, more assiduous and earnest attention than the exercise of the pardoning power and the responsibility which rests upon me as the constitutional adviser of His Excellency in such cases. This is a branch of administration in this country which, if any branch of it ought to be absolutely free from the taint of party politics, this peculiarly should be; and I certainly, in my administration of the affairs of this department—as I believe every predecessor I have had in that office for the forty years of the life of the Dominion of Canada—have taken care to exclude absolutely and entirely every consideration of a political character, and of a personal character, and of every other character which might improperly influence the nature of the reports and recommendations which have been sent to His Excellency.

If this motion asked merely for a statistical return of the number of prisoners who had been the objects of clemency during any period of years, there could be no objection to it. But that information is already before the House; it is contained in the annual reports of the department and of the parole officer. I have only to refer hon. gentlemen who are interested to these reports for the number of prisoners released on parole from each one of the penitentiaries of the Dominion, the number released on parole from the Central Prison at Toronto, the Quebec jail, the Montreal jail, the Regina goal, the reformatory for boys, the Mercer reformatory for women, and the other jails and institutions. There is presented annually a complete statement of the number of persons who have been the subjects of clemency during the preceding twelve months. But this resolution asks considerably more than that, and is worded in a way which, unless it betrays lack of familiarity with the constitutional principles connected with the exercise of clemency. must be intended to convey an erroneous impression. It may be that, practically, the releasing of any criminal before the expiration of his sentence rests with the Minter of Justice of the day ; but it is not literally so, and, at the present time, at all events, and in the hands of His Excellency the present Governor General, the personal examination into the case of every criminal on the part of His Excellency is something that I think I am in a position to vouch for.

There are two separate and entirely distinct branches of the exercise of the prerogative of clemency. There is the exercise of the pardoning power by which the criminal is released unconditionally, and his sentence as effectually put an end to as though he had served his full period of imprisonment. That is the exercise of the royal prerogative entrusted to His Excellency as the representative of His Majesty and in regard to which the instructions given to His Excellency under the royal sign manual state the circumstances under and the manner in which it is to be exercised. Let me refer you to what I said on June 13, 1906, on this subject, a few days after I took the position which I now occupy. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, a few days before I spoke, under-the recommendation of my predecessor in the position of Minister of Justice, a criminal had been released in British Columbia and that the circumstances occasioned considerable public discussion and were brought to the notice of this House in a somewhat fiery speech by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Macpherson). I stated upon that occasion after referring to the particular circumstances of the case then in hand :

> In Great Britain, for the last sixty or seventy years, the administration of the prerogative of mercy has devolved upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who is considered as being directly and exclusively responsible for the same. In Canada, His Excellency the Governor General is, by his instructions under the Royal Signal Manual, authorized and empowered, as he shall see occasion, when any crime or offence against the laws of the Dominion has been committed, to grant to any offender, convicted of any such crime or offence, a pardon, upon receiving, in capital cases, the advice in that behalf of the Privy Council for Canada, and in other cases, the advice of one of his ministers. In cases other than capital cases, such advice has been in practice that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. AYLESWORTH.

And then I referred to the case then in hand and the circumstances under which the release of that prisoner had taken place. I pointed out then that so far as the pardoning of criminals is concerned, the unconditional release and the ending of the sentence which was fixed at the time of conviction by the court before whom the prisoner was charged, the exercise of that prerogative is by no means necessarily under the advice of the Minister of Justice. His Excellency is to act upon his own judgment but upon the advice of one of his ministers and that one, although in practice it ordinarily has been and no doubt will continue to be, the Minister of Justice, is by no means necessarily so. In this country we have and have had for the last nine years a system of a different character entirely, depending upon the statute in that behalf, the system of releasing the prisoner conditionally upon parole. He is not by any means pardoned ; he is still, in theory, in custody. He is no longer in close custody but he is liable to be returned to close custody upon breach of the conditions upon which he has ben liberated. His position, in short, is very much the same as that of a man upon bail, or a man under the old system of law which used to obtain not so many years ago, where every defendant was subjected to arrest upon the institution of civil proceedings against him, a man who had been released from his arrest in civil process upon bail. He was in custody of his bail, they were responsible for him, they must produce him, according to the condition of their bond, or take the consequences. He was no longer in close custody but he was none the less in custody. That exactly is the position of a criminal who, before the termination of his sentence, is released under our ticket-of-leave Act, and the exercise of the power of release conditionally under the statute is by the statute itself made to be a part of the duty of the Minister of Justice in advising His Excellency. As to that branch of the administration of clemency the Minister of Justice acts under the direct mandate of this parliament.

As I have said the two things are radically different, radically different in their application to individual cases. Some cases are not cases for ticket-of-leave, other cases eminently are. In some of the newspaper attacks to which I have previously referred, notably in one which appeared in the 'Citizen' of this city early in October last, it was stated in so many words that the exercise of the pardoning power since I had been Minister of Justice within the last year or two had come to be an abuse, that pardons had become under my administration of the department so frequent as to constitute an abuse and that in some cases it was the result of strong political influence. Now so far as concerns the charge of the exercise of, let alone the yielding to, political influence, I have to say that in the twenty months during which I have been Minister of Justice there has never been one single instance, there has never been one single hint, even, of political influence on the part of any member of this House or of any other person. In the next place, with regard to the charge that the number of pardons has of recent years or of recent months so increased as to become a scandal, I have to say that instead of the number having increased, the number has in fact slightly diminished. During the twelve months ending September 30, 1907, there were 137 prisoners pardoned, while in the twelve months before that there were 145 and in the twelve months before that, 146. I made inquiry as to those three periods at the time that this article to which I allude appeared, about the first of October, in the newspaper I have mentioned. I did not go further back, but the statistics are public property and any one may inquire as he pleases.

It may be, however, that the writer in the newspaper was confusing and not distinguishing between the cases of pardons and the cases of conditional liberation npon ticket-of-leave. With regard to the releasing of prisoners on ticket-of-leave, it may be that I have adopted a system differing in some respects from those followed by my predecessors. I am not aware whether that is the case or not, but I wish to state, for the knowledge of hon. gentlemen of this House, something of the principles upon which, in my effort to reduce to some kind of rule the disposition of applications of this character, the exercise of the prerogative in this regard has proceeded. In the first place I wish to say that very possibly it may be that prisoners get the opinion or it may be are told by some more or less designing person, that the intervention of a lawyer, of any lawyer will be of advantage to them. I have to say that so far as I am concerned, the intervention of a lawyer has been on no occasion any kind of advantage that I am aware of to any prisoner. Frequently petitions come which very commonly are prepared by some professional gentleman, not necessarily a lawyer, but no doubt by the prisoner or the prisoner's friends, going to some lawyer to obtain the preparation of the paper. But no petition is of necessity, in the least degree. Only to-day I received a letter from some person whose name I was not at all acquainted with, from the northern part of the county of Hastings, Ontario, asking me what steps he must take to endeavour to secure the release of a friend of his who was in prison. I replied to him in three lines that all he had to do was to send me the man's name and the place where he was in custody; and I say now that is absolutely as effective as all the petitions or all the intervention of any lawyer in this country or any politician, or any person, no matter who he may be. I have paid thus far exactly the same attention and I intend so long as I remain in the position I occupy to pay exactly the same attention in the case of any prisoner to the plea of the prisoner himself, if he chooses to write a letter or if he chooses upon the occasion of the visits of the inspector of penitentiaries to the institution in which he is incarcerated to state his case; and out of the thousands of applications which in every year are made for clemency there are dozens upon dozens, I think I might say there are hundreds of cases, in which the only applicant is the prisoner himself.

The course of procedure upon receiving an application no matter from what source it comes, is identical and the same. We have in the Department of Justice two officials, one our senior clerk, a gentleman who has been in that department for now more than thirty years, a chief clerk, a man of long experience, an able lawyer, and a careful man. In his charge particularly and in the charge of clerks under him, is the work of preparing the cases for examination and for report, because I may say to the House that the cases are not few in number; they reach in the aggregate over 2,000 every year. The average number of cases of application for clemency considered is from 40 to 50 each week. Upon an application arriving inquiries are made; a report is obtained from the warden or head of the penal institution in which the prisoner is. If that report shows that the prisoner has not been of satisfactory behaviour during his incarceration, that instead of behaving himself as he should, he has been a continual source of trouble, has been continually infringing the prison rules and committing breaches of discipline, that circumstance alone goes far towards being an answer to his application. The warden is furthermore expected to state, if he knows or can find out, whether or not it is the prisoner's first offence, whether he is an old offender who has served terms before in the same or some other penal institution; and if the return of the warden shows that a man is not then purging his first offence. that circumstance does not necessarily preclude the exercise of clemency in his favour but goes very far towards doing so. The warden is also asked and practically in all cases responds to the request to give his own personal opinion from his observation of the man during his period of imprisonment as to the likelihood of his being a creditable subject for the exercise of clemency, in his behaviour subsequent to his release. Next as a matter of absolute course, the judge before whom the prisoner has been tried, is consulted and asked his opinion. I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) in the observations which he made in introducing this motion stated that there were cases in which the power of pardon had been exercised without the judge before whom the case was tried having been consulted. I can only say that I am quite sure no such case has occurred since I have been administering the department unless it has been a case where immediate, instant action was necessary to save the life or in hope of saving the life of the prisoner.

It is not an infrequent thing, it is a thing which occurs once a month, perhaps, that the warden of an institution or possibly the sheriff of a county or some one in an official position will send a request for a prisoner's immediate release accompanied by the certificate of the surgeon of the institution that his life would be endangered by longer custody and that release immediately might perhaps save him. Cases of that sort are sometimes of apparently such urgency that if action is to be taken and is to be of any advantage to the prisoner there is no time to refer it to the judge. Unless in a case of emergency of that character, there has not, to my knowledge, been a single instance in which a report has been forwarded to His Excellency where action has been taken without the judge having been referred to and without the judge's report appearing among the papers. Now, the report of the judge is of necessity of the most absolutely confidential character. No judge would be willing to state his ouinion about the case of a prisoner if he thought the opinion might appear in the newspapers at any future period. The prisoner may have been a man of prominence in the community; the judge knows more or less about him or the prisoner may be the veriest scoundrel among the dregs of humanity. These are circumstances which must be known if a case is to be dealt with intelligently and of necessity the report of the judge under such circumstances must be treated as being of the most absolute confidential character. Indeed it has always been so regarded. As far as I am aware no Minister of Justice in this country has ever taken any position other than the one which I adopted on the occasion I referred to and which is thoroughly and fully borne out by all the authorities as the true constitutional position in that regard. I find this citation in Todd upon parliamentary government in England, page 561:

> It was said by Macaulay that he would rather entrust it——
> This prerogative——
> —to the hands of the very worst ministry that ever held office than allow it to be exercised under the direction of the best House of Commons.

And Todd, commenting upon that says:

> No interference by either House of parliament with the exercise of this prerogative is justifiable, except under extraordinary circumstances.

But, the confidential character of the report which the judge makes in regard to the prisoner is not peculiar to what the judge may say because there are other inquiries made if there seems any occasion or necessity for it. If there is any hopeful source of information indicated upon the papers, if the judge makes reference to some other official who might know something about the case, or if, for any other reason, it is thought that information which would be of value, can be obtained from any person of standing or prominence in the community, a member of this House, on whatever side he sits, a member of one of the provincial legislatures, a sheriff, or any person in a responsible position is communicated with and he is told in terms in writing to him that anything he chooses to say will be treated as absolutely confidential. It must be so when you consider what is being asked of a correspondent and what answer he very probably will make. There are therefore in the cases of those thousands of prisoners' files now lying in the Department of Justice letters and papers of the most confidential character which, certainly, I should not be willing to disclose and never would disclose unless absolutely ordered to do so by this House. I would hope that this House would not make such an order upon me. There have been in the history of the department but three instances, I am told by the gentleman to whom I have already referred and who has grown up with the exercise of this branch of the department during the last thirty-five years, in which this House has so ordered—capital cases, cases which attracted a great deal of attention and cases to which, by reason of their public character—one of which was the case of Louis Riel—a great deal of attention was directed and which the House thought were of that extraordinary nature which would warrant the House in requiring the papers to be produced.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. When you left the chair, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of the responsibility which rested upon the Minister of Justice in connection with the exercise of the pardoning or releasing power, and I wish it to be understood that I am not in any sense disclaiming the responsibility for every exercise of that power which has taken place since I became Minister of Justice. At the same time, I wish to explain to you the routine of applications for the exercise of clemency, in order that you may understand the extent, and the full extent, of the responsibility of the minister for the manner in which that power is exercised. As I have said, I accept the fullest responsibility for every case of release that has taken place during the twenty months that I have been Minister of Justice. In that time some 3,500 of such applications have been considered and passed upon ; perhaps as many as 500 prisoners have been released either conditionally or unconditionally before the expiration of their term ; and I am quite sure that except for the few weeks last fall during which I was absent from this city and this country, no single instance of the release of a prisoner has taken place otherwise than upon my personal recommendation and my personal examination of the papers. So that I take the fullest responsibility for whatever has been done in that respect. At the same time it should be understood just what the routine in dealing with these cases in the Department of Justice is. I have already described the course which is taken in every instance of making inquiries that are open to the minister from every source that seems favourable. We have the services of an active, intelligent and excellent parole officer to whom the cases are referred when it is thought that he can make inquiry into the antecedents of the prisoner ; and after all possible information has been gathered from every available source, the papers are examined by the chief clerk to whom I have referred, and who has had many years of experience in exactly this kind of work. No case comes before the minister for consideration except upon a report drafted by that officer or by the deputy minister, and with a recommendation either to exercise or to withhold clemency. Since I have been Minister of Justice—I cannot speak for my predecessors, but I presume that they followed the same course of practice—I have personally examined and have personally read every word of every file relating to every prisoner who has made application for his release. This involves in each case on the average a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes or possibly half an hour of work. That means a considerable amount of work in the course of a week, and much more in the course of a month or a year, when it is remembered that there are at least two thousand such applications every twelve months. If, as happens in the majority of cases, I see no reason to differ from the conclusion that is put before me by the deputy or the chief clerk, it is a mere matter of my expressing by endorsement my concurrence in the recommendation, and the papers proceed to His Excellency. But if it is a case in which anything has struck me in my perusal of the papers, leading me to think that perhaps clemency ought to be exercised, or the reverse, a conference is had on the subject with the officer who has prepared the report, and, after discussion, some conclusion is come to as to the recommendation which ought to be made to His Excellency. The papers are then laid before His Excellency, and I am in a position to state that the signification of approval on His Excellency's part is no mere matter of form with the right hon. gentleman who occupies that position at the present time. Not infrequently suggestions are made, or a personal conference takes place between His Excellency and the minister upon the subject of a particular prisoner, with the result that clemency either is exercised or is withheld. I think I am entitled in the circumstances I have described to ask the House, if credit is given to the minister for a desire to do his duty in the case of these prisoners—who are in many instances unfortunates, as well as in many instances actual criminals—I say I think I am entitled, if I have the confidence of this House, to ask hon. gentlemen to believe that the recommendation for the withholding or the granting of clemency is made with as much care as in the ordinary course of business affairs it is possible to devote to what is certainly a very important matter. The responsibility for the recommendation, whatever it is, rests on the minister, and, as I have said, I take it. Except in capital cases, the relations between His Excellency and the minister who is advising in matters of clemency is a personal one. It is not a responsibility on the whole government as such, as no other minister than the particular one who is advising His Excellency is acquainted with the circumstances of the case. But certainly in the system which at present prevails, and which I have no doubt has always prevailed since these matters rested upon the recommendation of a responsible minister, every safeguard I am able to suggest to myself to ensure the care and attention which ought to be given to these cases is thrown about the course of business upon which the advice and recommendation is given.

The question then is whether this House ought in the circumstances to exercise the power which I fully concede it possesses to order a return of the character which is asked for by this motion. I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen to the wording of the motion. It asks not only that the number of criminals who have been released since the year 1896 before the expiry of sentence should be given, but the names of such prisoners. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to enter into the mind of the hon. gentleman who framed this motion, but it is not possible for me, thinking about it to the best of my ability, to divine what reason there can have been for asking that the names of pardoned prisoners should be made public. If it is thought about, is it not cruel to propose such a thing. There have been in the course of eleven years probably some thousands of prisoners released by the exercise of clemency. It is proposed that the names of all these should be published and put upon the records of this House. I am not able to understand any possible advantage to any person that there could be in such a proceeding. It is the theory of the law—it is more than a mere theory, it is an actuality—that a man who has served his sentence in full has atoned for the crime for which he was sentenced. Not many years ago a case very well known among lawyers occurred in England where, in a newspaper quarrel, one editor referred to a rival as a felon editor, it being the fact that the editor so referred to had some years before been convicted and sentenced to punishment in some penal institution, and had served his term. The man so referred to brought an action for libel, and it was adjudged by the courts that to apply to him the term of a felon was as grievous a libel upon him as if he had never seen the inside of the walls of a penal institution. He had served his term, he had purged his offence, he had atoned to the laws of his country for the crime he had committed, and he could no longer lawfully be spoken of as a felon. Notwithstanding that a man may have been pardoned or may have been at large during a portion of his term, he has as completely wiped out the offence in the eye of the law as if there had never been the exercise of any clemency in his case, and he has served the full term of sentence which the court imposed upon him.

And such men, although they have been the recipients at the hands of the representative of His Majesty, of the grace of pardon or the exercise of clemency, are now —after years have passed and after they may have to some extent regained their lost position in the eyes of their fellow men —to have their names brought before parliament and published broadcast throughout the country, and they are to be branded as men who have served their term in the penitentiary or who were set at large by grace of the Crown. It would be a piece of needless cruelty to expose these men to the odium of such a proceeding, and I should hope that this House would never—unless the best of reasons were shown—order any minister to publish such a return. And this motion asks for not only the names of all persons who have received clemency at the hands of the Crown but the reasons therefor and the names of the solicitors interested in procuring the release. I have already indicated the necessarily confidential nature of the reports of the judges or other authority, which are asked for and received by the minister when considering cases of this character. It is manifest that, however confidential such reports may be, the report of the minister upon the whole case, sent to and acted upon by His Excellency must be equally confidential. I am not for a moment denying that this House has the power to order the production of such returns or to order a statement or a copy of any part or of all these reports which have been made since 1896, but I am asking ought that to be done? Is there any reason given for doing it? Why should it be done when, in the nature of things, these reports are personal to the individual, when they describe the circumstances of his offence—when they give everything in the man's past record which aggravated it or extenuated it. As I have already indicated, the whole course of procedure, both in England and in this country, has been opposed to any such course. In Todd upon parliamentary government in England, at page 415, discussing this question, I find he uses the following language :

If the Queen's ministers possess the confidence of parliament, it is inexpedient and unwise, as a general rule, to interfere with their decisions in regard to the details of administration except in cases wherein it may appear that the public interests have been injuriously affected by the action of the minister.

On page 417, referring to the powers of the House, he says :

But it is evident that these extraordinary powers of interference ought not to be invoked except upon special necessity. As a general principle, parliament should confide in the discretion of the responsible advisers of the Crown who are the trustees of the Royal Prerogative for the rightful administration of the same. So long as parliament continues its confidence in the ministers, it ought to be willing to leave the exercise of the prerogative in their hands, unfettered by restriction in regard to its exercise and should ordinarily refrain from interfering.

In this House,—as I said, Mr. Speaker, before you left the chair at six o'clock—I stated on the 13th June, 1906, the general principles which I understood obtained in England and in this country with regard to this particular matter. I concluded what I then said in these words :

In the view of His Excellency's advisers, it would be, as a general principle, unusual and inconvenient to lay before parliament the ground upon which that discretion proceeds, which dictates leniency or severity on the part of the responsible advisers of the Crown. The course generally practised in the past has been in accordance with this principle, and it is considered that in the particular case no special reasons exist for departing from the general rule.

It has been said here that the impression prevails that political influence dictates the action of the minister in this regard. I may say, with reference to that particular case alluded to in the citation I have just read, that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McPherson) accompanied by one of his colleagues from British Columbia, came to me personally and asked me to see the papers, and I begged them to withdraw their request. They did not see the papers, and papers, which were of a confidential character, have not ben shown in any instance, since I have been Minister of Justice.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. minister will allow me, I can tell him that I have been invited into the office and examined the papers on more than one occasion, under the administration of some of his predecessors.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I understand my hon. friend to say that some previous Minister of Justice had invited him to see the papers and that he had seen them. I have not a word of criticism to offer on the course taken by any of my predecessors. I can only say that unless the case were of a very unusual character, if the hon. gentleman or my closest political friend came to me and asked to see a file I would try to disuade him; and I am not sure that, in any case, I would consent.

I have already pointed out that this motion asks a great deal. It asks to have made public that which is in itself of a most confidential character. No judge expects that what he says about an individual, if he speaks his mind, is going to be shown to any one, and it may be, to that particular person's intimate friend. No judge would act with the same freedom if he thought that his reports would be, under any circumstances, made public. But I fully acknowledge the power of this House to order the production of papers in any particular case, if it thinks proper. I am only arguing, as well as I can, against the principle of doing it, unless the circumstances are of a most exceptional and unusual character.

I said before you left the chair, Sir, that, so far as I am aware, and so far as is reported to me by gentlemen of long experience in the department, there have been only three instances since confederation in which that had been done. One was the case of Louis Riel—a state case. The other was the case of the man Shortis, at Valleyfield, in which there was a great deal of public feeling. The third was also a murder case, and all three are instances, not of an ordinary prisoner regarding whom the exercise of clemency had proceeded on the recommendation of the minister, but of capital cases in which the whole council sat and acted.

In referring to the terms of the proposed resolution, there is just one other circumstance to which I wish to advert. The motion asks for the names of the solicitors interested in procuring releases. As I have already explained, in the majority of cases that have come up for consideration, no solicitor has been in any way concerned. I think I am safely within the mark in saying that eighty, and more likely ninety out of a hundred applications, are applications made by some member of the family, or by the prisoner himself, or some person other than a solicitor. A large proportion of the applications are the personal applications of the prisoners made verbally to the inspectors. On visiting any penal institution, the inspector, before he leaves, appoints a time when he will see any prisoner who comes before him with complaints. The inspector notes what takes place and reports to the minister. There is no visit of an inspector to a penal institution which is not followed by applications for clemency. Many are made personally by the prisoners, and in each case the appeal receives absolutely and exactly the same consideration, the same fulness of inquiry that it would receive if made by any solicitor in the land.

It is impossible for me to prevent the interference—if I may use the word without intending any reflection—of a solicitor in such a matter.

I do not know that I desire to prevent it. If the father of the prisoner, or the prisoner himself, has means and wishes to engage a solicitor to prepare the papers, that is his own affair. I can only say, as I have said before, that I can assure any such person that there is no need for the services of a solicitor, and that his case is not in the least degree advantaged by any such services so far as I am able to see. I have been told, in some instances, that large fees have been exacted from poor people, ill-able to pay these fees, by solicitors who ought to have been above any such conduct, as a condition of their preparing and presenting the papers supposed to be necessary for an application of this character. If such things have taken place, I can only say that I lament them as thoroughly as any man can. These are things which might well be brought to the notice of the law society or the courts controlling the action of such solicitors. It is something in regard to which I am powerless; it is something in regard to which I have no knowledge other than that such statements have, in one or two—perhaps in as many as three or four—instances been made to me. But I have done everything I could, in the way of answering letters and advising people who have written to me with regard to applications for clemency, to dissuade them or point out to them that there was no necessity in the world that they should engage the services of a solicitor in connection with their application.

Now, in regard to the number of cases in which action has been taken in the last twenty months, I have just a word further to say. On an average, I suppose, there are six or seven, possibly ten, applications made to every one of them that is successful. Applications are renewed after the lapse of a few months by, or on behalf of, prisoners of long terms. These things are of continual occurrence. But in the possibly ten per cent, possibly twelve, or maybe fifteen, per cent of the total number of applications which succeed there has not been, so far as the pardons are concerned, any increase; on the contrary, there has been a slight diminution in the number during the months which have passed since I became Minister of Justice. There is this further to be remembered in that connection. In the session before last parliament passed a statute to provide for the deportation of undesirable immigrants. A certain portion, and by no means an insignificant portion of our convicted criminals in this country fall within the description of that statute. A man, let us say, has been in this country for only a few months when some crime is committed, and the man is sentenced to a longer or shorter term of imprisonment in consequence. It is impossible to apply the provisions of the ticket-of-leave Act to such men. The ticket-of-leave Act, as I have previously explained, requires the freedom of the criminal to be accompanied with conditions. One of the conditions, a very useful one, is the reporting to police authorities periodically; but, in any event, it is a condition of the ticket-of-leave that the criminal who has been released upon ticket-of-leave shall remain in Canada. He is still to be in custody; he is still under our control; and he may not depart from Canada without forfeiting his ticket-of-leave and his right to be at large. Of necessity, therefore, in every case of the deporting of an undesirable immigrant, who has been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, the only form that the exercise of clemency can take is that of unconditional pardon—the prisoner is pardoned and immediately taken out of the country in custody until he is beyond the limits of the country. This statute, and the administration of the statute, during the last nearly two years, has measurably increased the number of prisoners who have received pardon. But, notwithstanding that considerable increase, their number for the last twenty months stands substantially less than during the preceding like periods, as I have already pointed out. I take no credit to myself that it happens to be so—it is but the happening. I state the fact, however, in answer to the charges that have been made, that during the last few months, during the last year or more, there has been an abuse of the pardoning power. Then, with regard to the exercise of the duty which is imposed upon the Minister of Justice by the statute of this parliament known as the ticket-of-leave Act. That statute was passed for good cause; that statute was not intended to be a dead letter; that statute was passed with the deliberate object by parliament that the power it confers upon His Excellency, under the advice of the Minister of Justice, should be exercised in proper cases. There has not been any increase in the annual number of the cases in which tickets-of-leave have been issued since that statute was enacted in 1899 in any degree out of proportion to the annual increase in the prison population. There is one difference of circumstances which I adverted to before the House rose for recess, that I should explain, and which possibly may have served to increase the number during the last year or eighteen months. We have a statute under which good behaviour on a prisoner's part, industry and adherence to the rules of the institution, entitles him, if he is a prisoner serving in a Dominion penitentiary, to a remission of a number of days, fixed by statute, in proportion to the length of the sentence he has to serve. By remissions, if a man's conduct is exemplary and unexceptionable, he serves a sentence of seven years in five years and six months, if I remember well. The shorter sentences do not receive, even for the best of conduct, so great a period of remission. But there are days of remission, and careful account of them is kept in the records of each penitentiary with regard to the conduct of each individual prisoner. There is no such provision in the case of such institutions as the Central Prison at Toronto, in which the prisoner may be serving a sentence of anything less than two years. The great majority, I suppose, of the prisoners in the Central Prison at Toronto are sentenced to twenty-three months, or two years less one day. For any term less than two years the prisoner may be sentenced to the Central Prison, or a similar institution in the other provinces, instead of to a Dominion penitentiary. Such prisoners, no matter how good their conduct, get no remission by law. It is not for me to criticise, and I do not, for a moment, question the propriety of the legislation which makes a distinction in that respect between our long-term prisoners in the penitentiaries and the shorter-term prisoners in Central Prison and similar institutions. But since I have been Minister of Justice—I do not know what the case was before—it has become a not infrequent thing for the warden of the Central Prison at Toronto to report specially by letter to me the case of some particular prisoner whose conduct may have seemed to him to deserve some special recognition. I happen to have the advantage of an intimate personal acquaintance with the gentleman who is now warden of the Central Prison in Toronto. He is a man for whose good judgment, and for whose good intentions, I have the very highest respect; and when he writes to me, as he has not infrequently done, in the case of this, that or the other prisoner, saying this prisoner's conduct could not have been better, or his industry more thorough, if he had been working here for wages, and I recommend that he receive, as a consideration for his good behaviour, a remission of one or two, or, it may be, three months, at the expiration of his term—I have always regarded such recommendations as very strong foundation upon which clemency might, without impropriety, be exercised. In every instance where that has taken place, as in every case that has come up for consideration, the convicting magistrate or judge is referred to. The circumstances of the offence are inquired into. These are circumstances which, in the nature of things, a warden of the Central Prison may not be in a position to know about personally.

And if as the result of the inquiry the case does not seem on the whole to be one in which, notwithstanding the recommendation of the warden, clemency ought properly to be exercised, I have placed myself in communication again with the warden, explained the circumstances and asked whether or not knowledge of these facts and the views of the trial judge or trial magistrate would modify the opinion he had formed. These are instances not without considerable number which go to swell the aggregate released upon ticket-of-leave, and there is the further circumstances that I alluded to before six o'clock and which I want more fully to explain. The case of long-term prisoners in the penitentiaries, who have made repeated applications for clemency without success is one that calls for special consideration and special care. You may have the case of an old offender, a man who has been convicted it may be half a dozen times, and you say at once that clemency has no place for such a man ; he is an habitual criminal and he should serve out his full term. But here is another way of looking at the matter. Such a man is generally experienced enough to know that it is to his interest to behave himself while in prison ; such a man very frequently receives full remission and upon the records of the penitentiary he is without a single black mark. He may be the kind of prisoner who will serve a seven year term in five years and six months. Such a man may perhaps fall to be released say 18 months before the expiration of his full term. He may make an application for clemency at the expiration of five years ; he has but six months to serve and will then go scot free without condition. I have thought—it has been an idea entirely of my own, and I am trying it as an experiment, I am trying to watch whether or not it will work well—I have thought that in the case of such a man, by giving him say three months in addition to the remission which he has earned and letting him go at large at the expiration of five years and three months, instead of five years and six months, you might be doing a good thing for the individual and a good thing for society in this way : If he serves the full period of five years and six months he goes free unconditionally; he is beholden to nobody, he is under no kind of supervision or restraint; he is as free as though he had never been incarcerated at all. But if he goes at large three months before that sentence would expire with the remission which he has earned, he goes for the remaining one year and 9 months, the full term of his original sentence, under the restraint of a ticket-of-leave. He must report to the police, he must produce his ticket-of-leave when called upon. If he does not behave himself, if he commits any wrong, he is liable to have that ticket-of-leave cancelled and to be sent back to the penitentiary to serve the full period without any regard to the remission he had earned. In several instances, especially during the last twelve months, and as my experience in the administration of this very difficult part of the duties of the Minister of Justice has extended, I have acted upon that principle. I have not yet heard of a single instance in which the experiment has not been successful. True there has not been time enough, true our experience has not been extensive enough to enable any one to judge with accuracy if that is a safe principle to go upon, but it struck me that it would be in the interest as I have said, both of the individual and of society to have that man under the restraint of a ticket-of-leave for a longer period rather than to have him go absolutely free after holding him for a few months additional of the term of his sentence.

It is a question of course just where to draw the line, just how much to give the man, for it has happened in several instances where there would be only a couple of months, say two months before his sentence with remission would expire, the old offender has been knowing enough to say : No, sir. He would rather remain and serve out his sentence with remission earned and go without restraint in a couple of months. If, however, the additional period of liberty for him is large enough, he takes it, and, whether thankfully or not, he finds himself under the restraint of a ticket-of-leave not merely for a few months of his time but for the period of the remission as well. Cases of that kind increase the total of cases in which clemency is exercised but with the increase I have adverted to the fact remains that except in proportion to the extent to which the prison population is increasing in this country the number of prisoners released either conditionally or unconditionally is not increasing.

There is no general rule that can be applied with uniformity in the determination of the proper course which ought to be taken in these cases. Every case must of necessity stand upon its own particular circumstances but as a sort of working rule to be observed so far as possible, I have laid down for myself in my own mind and have communicated to the officials who are acting in the working out of these applications, the general principle that under ordinary circumstances and unless some good reason to the contrary appears, a prisoner ought to serve one-half his time. I do not for a moment mean to say that this is applied with uniformity. There are cases not infrequently arising when to apply such a rule would defeat the whole purposes of the statute authorizing the conditional release of offenders; but I have endeavoured in a sort of rough way to lay that down as a kind of working rule for myself in my own mind. I am told in the department that this is a considerably greater portion of the sentence than previous Ministers of Justice have thought was a sufficient portion for the prisoner to serve and that the rule had rather been that if one-third of the time had been served, the case was one which at all events could be considered and if favourable circumstances appeared might be favourably considered. I mention that circumstance simply because it accounts for the fact that even with the substantial increase in the number of cases in which clemency has been exercised that I have adverted to, even with the operation of our Deportation of Undesirable Immigrants Act and with the other cases I have spoken of, the long term offenders who are repeaters and the other circumstances I have mentioned, still the total number is not increasing year after year except in proportion to the increase of prison population.

Individual cases arise which are of particular note in some particular locality which have excited particular attention there and which therefore are seized upon by those in the locality who do not agree with the action of the Crown in the premises, as cases for criticism. A case of that character has been adverted to this afternoon. I am not able to hear across the floor and was not able to hear what was said, but I am told that the case spoken of, was that of a broker, whose name the hon. gentleman did not care to state, unwittingly perhaps demonstrating by his own unwillingness, natural and proper unwillingness, to state the name publicly, the impropriety of making such an order as he asks here, that the names of all persons pardoned be published. This case is one that I do not in any degree identify by the circumstances reported to me as having been given in regard to it. I feel satisfied, however, that although there have been probably as many as 500 cases of release since I became Minister of Justice, that case is not one of them. I may be mistaken, of course I cannot pretend to carry all these cases in mind, but I feel satisfied this is not one which came under my personal notice. At all events, whether or not it was a case in which I myself acted, I am unable to discuss it because I know nothing of the particulars. I point to it, however, as illustrating the criticism of the administration of this department which is made. Some man who has been in prison is seen at large, in the streets it may be of the town from which he came. The local newspaper takes the matter up and the local newspaper does not agree with the action of the Crown, or if you please, of the Minister of Justice, in the matter. Editorial articles appear and they are copied here and there in other newspapers and there is quite a newspaper noise about the release of some particular individual.

Well I can only say in regard to such cases that it has seemd to me,, in reading these criticisms from time to time in the newspapers, that it would have been better if the people who had written in regard to them had made themselves acquainted with the circumstances before they wrote whatever they may have so penned. It is impossible in the nature of things for a newspaper writer, or for any person who has not had before him the reports of the judge or other officials and authorities who are commuicated with, and, it may be, the private letters of people in the vicinity explaining the circumstances and giving their views in regard to the case—it is impossible. I say for those who have not had that material under careful consideration to be in a position to come to a proper conclusion as to whether or not it was right to have exercised clemency in an individual case. I can only refer to such cases in the general way in which I have done, and say that it seems to me that no other system is possible than some such system as is now in operation in this country. It may be said that it would be better that there should be a board of pardons. Some advocate it. I have had delegations of earnest and right-thinking people who are interested in the welfare of prisoners and who have urged upon me the propriety of introducing legislation into this parliament to establish a board of pardons. I must say, after such consideration of the subject as I have been able to give it and with a great deal of anxious thought in regard to it, that, while it would be to me personally and to any Minister of Justice a most welcome relief to have so responsible a duty taken off his shoulders, to have such a very considerable drain upon one's time taken away from his working hours, I do not believe that such a system would be any more satisfactory than the present one. It always depends upon the individuals whom you have as constituting your board of pardons. The Royal prerogative of mercy is one of the grandest of the royal prerogatives. We are here in a monarchial country, we are all here—at least, I make this statement as representing my own feelings and I have no doubt those of many others—as ardent believers in the monarchial system as the best form of government, and I have no wish to curtail in the least degree the few remaining prerogatives of the Crown. The exercise of the prerogative of mercy on the part of the Crown on the advice of responsible ministers seems to me, if you have the proper minister and if you have, as you are always bound to have, a proper representative of the Crown, as near the ideal system of exercising the prerogative of pardon as man can devise. We have here that system in daily, practical operation. It is a legitimate subject for criticism in this House. I do not for a moment deprecate criticism, but I do earnestly deprecate the proposition that there should be made public the things which this resolution calls for, or that there should be manifested, unless sound reasons for it are given, that absolute want of confidence in the administration of that branch of the Department of Justice, which, it seems to me, this resolution necessarily implies. I have already spoken in a general way, and I do not want to enlarge upon it except to refer again before concluding to what was said by the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion, as to the impression, which I understand, he considered was abroad that friends of the government were appealed to in order to secure favours of this kind. I merely want to say in that regard that in the short experience I have had in the Department of Justice I have had the pleasure of personal interviews or of letters from quite as many men—members of this House who sit upon your left, Mr. Speaker, as from members who sit on the right—in regard to applications of this character. I have made absolutely no difference whatever in the way I have received either such gentlemen or such representations in whatever shape they came. I have with absolute freedom written as I would to any friend to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House in regard to cases that have arisen in their own constituencies and in regard to which I had no doubt they would have personal knowledge. I have received their confidential replies, and I have acted upon them with exactly the same feeling of safety and reliance that I would adopt in acting upon the views, or recommendations of any man in whom I had such degree of confidence as to believe that he would not mislead me in an important matter of this character. I can say without fear of any successful contradiction that there has been no manner of political influence at all exercised or attempted to be exercised in the case of any application for clemency that has come under my notice during the time that I have been in the department.

In regard to this motion I would hope—I do hope—that the hon. gentleman who has introduced it, after such discussion as may take place in regard to it, can see his way to withdrawing it from the consideration of the House. If it cannot be withdrawn then if it can be so modified that it should ask for mere statistical matters and that it should not ask for the names of the persons pardoned or the reasons therefor, apart then from the unpleasant insinuation which is contained in the asking of the names of solicitors who have been interested in the applications or as to the releasing being the personal action of the Minister of Justice, I should have no objection at all to the motion passing. But, if the motion is pressed upon the House in its present shape I can only say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members of this House, that it would seem to me nothing else than an expression of want of confidence in the Minister of Justice and I can view it in no other light. So long, it seems to me, as this House has confidence in the person who occupies the position of Minister of Justice it ought to trust that minister to administer this branch of the department without fear, favour, partiality or affection.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). If no one else is going to speak I have a few words to say before the discussion closes. I was at a loss to understand the somewhat excessive warmth and heat with which the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) commenced his remarks. He seemed to feel as though this was a motion, as he said, levelled at himself, and he has ended by declaring that the motion, as it stands, implies a want of confidence in the Minister of Justice and so, I suppose, in the government. For neither of these assumptions can I see the least reason in the world. The Minister of Justice may not believe me, and there may be some gentlemen on the other side of the House who may not believe me; nevertheless, I say, Mr. Speaker, that when I made this motion and when I spoke to it this afternoon I had not the faintest or the remotest idea of importing into it anything of a partisan character at all. I did not mean it for an attack upon the government or for an attack upon the Minister of Justice. I am quite willing to allow hon. members and the public to read the remarks I made here before separating for dinner and to judge whether or not I did not treat it in as fair and cool a manner as I thought it should be treated. It was within my own judgment that I penned this resolution and that I brought it before the House. I intimated the reasons for it not once, nor twice, but scores of times. During the past year or year and a half. I have read paragraphs in the newspapers—leaders in newspapers and seen discussions in the public press on the point which I have brought up here to-night as to whether or not it was not too great an exercise of the pardoning power, as to whether too great an exercise of the pardoning power was not weakening, to a certain extent the foundations of justice in this country. I shared that opinion to a certain extent—to an extent at least which impelled me to try and find out, as no man can find out from statements now and again read in the newspapers, as to how many were being pardoned and to what extent the pardoning power was being used.

Am I wrong, Mr. Speaker, in wanting to know that? Are the people of this country not entitled to have these indicia by which they can judge for themselves as to how the system of jurisprudence which we have in this country is being carried out? It is not a reflection on a minister, it is not a want of confidence in a ministry, if such thoughts arise and such criticisms are made on a matter on which the fullest information possible should be got. I leave myself in the judgment of the House as to whether I am correct in that or not. I am not going to inflict on the House a tithe of what I have spoken of seeing in the papers; but I am going to give one example from a Liberal Conservative paper, one from an independent paper and one from a Liberal paper, as illustrations of the discussion that has been going on. I take the following from a Liberal-Conservative paper:

The use of the pardoning power has in the judgment of many, including not a few friends of the present Minister of Justice, degenerated into an abuse. The pretense that clemency is only exercised on petition signed by those familiar with the facts, and after a report by the sentencing judge or magistrate has been received and considered, does not satisfy the public.

In another part of the same paper, after referring to an article in the 'Globe' newspaper, this paper goes on to say:

To ask these questions is to suggest their answers, and they have not been put a moment too soon. Society must be protected against the undermining process which has been going on so surely in recent years. If sentences are to be revoked after heavy expense has been incurred in running to earth the guilty parties and bringing out such evidence as constrains a jury, sworn to give the accused the benefit of any doubt which his counsel may be able to create in his favour, to render a verdict of guilty, then, we say, there will be a disposition to avoid the expenditure of effort and money to bring the guilty to justice. The 'Globe' is apprehensive of such a result.

That is from the Ottawa 'Citizen,' a Liberal-Conservative paper. I next give an extract from the Hamilton 'Herald,' an independent paper, and, so far as I have been able to read it, a very good type of independent paper. It says:

There has been a great abuse of the pardoning power, especially in the past couple of years. Prisoners who have been tried, found guilty and sentenced have been released from prison after serving only a portion of their sentences, not because they did not get a fair trial or that there had been any miscarriage of justice, but friends of the convicted prisoners get up petitions on their behalf which are signed by 'influential' citizens, politicians and people of all classes. They do not take the trouble to inquire into the circumstances and ascertain if the person imprisoned is deserving of clemency; they simply sign the petition to please somebody else. They do not stop to consider what effect it would have on the community if law and order did not prevail.

Well, after the petition has been largely signed it is forwarded to the Minister of Justice, then the member representing the place where the prisoner comes from proceeds to get busy. The convicting magistrate is, out of courtesy, asked to make a report on the case, but very little attention is paid to it unless it happens to be favourable, when it is used as a defence by the department in case its action is questioned.

It would be interesting to know just how many prisoners have been pardoned in the past few years. And in how many were there just grounds for a commutation of the sentence? We do not argue that the pardoning power should be abolished, because there may be cases where prisoners have been unjustly convicted and where there has been a miscarriage of justice. In such a case, if the prisoner proves his innocence, the jail gates should be opened, the man liberated and every effort made to amend the wrong done him. But only in such cases should the pardoning power be exercised. The convicting magistrate or judge is in a better position to make the 'punishment fit the crime' than is the Minister of Justice, who is not conversant with the facts, except as they have been presented to him. He does not know the circumstances under which the sentence has been imposed. Releases as the result of petitions are so common nowadays that people are beginning to lose respect for the administration of justice; it is becoming a travesty. A prisoner says: 'O, let him send me to jail; I'll get out in a short time.' And if this man happens to have a 'pull' he does get out. There is no evidence that he has repented or that he intends to turn over a new leaf; he is just released as a matter of 'policy.' But the poor fellow, without 'influence' and friends has to serve out his term, although a loving and unhappy wife and a devoted mother may be counting the days when he is to be released.

The next article is from the 'Globe' newspaper, and is as follows:—

Is it true that the sense of justice is beginning to sag in Canada? Is there a growing tendency to compromise with crime, to arrange beforehand as to judgment and sentence, to make legal technicalities supreme over the demands of justice, and to count law and life as matters of less than absolute authority? Does social standing, or money power, or political influence enter as an element into the administration of justice or the punishment of crime? Questions such as these are raised and pressed home by recent instances which neither the authorities of justice nor the Canadian public can afford to underestimate or dismiss. The raising of such questions involves scrutiny of the temper and attitude of every officer, attorney, magistrate and judge, and of the provincial and federal departments of justice under which they serve. It is worth while putting such questions squarely, sternly, for if the sense of justice weakens, or if adequate punishment does not follow crime, there can be neither strength nor dignity in Canadian life.

I present these three articles as samples of the kind of discussion which is supervening upon the talk and current ideas that have been floating around in this country with reference to this matter. Would the Minister of Justice say, because the 'Globe' or either of these other papers discussed the question and said that it was perfectly proper that all departments should be held to their task even up to the highest, the federal authority, in order that these matters might be put right and the sense of justice should not be weakened or dimmed in this country, that they are pressing a motion of want of confidence against himself or against the government? None of these papers, I believe, have that in mind; but as great public journals they are obliged to discuss the current issues of the day, and this is a matter which has pushed itself into the public eye and has been widely discussed in the press of this country. My own view was exactly the same as that of these papers. I had an impression that in these latter days in Canada, as most certainly in the United States, we were verging towards laxity in the administration of the law, and maybe an over and not very wise charitableness sometimes, which led to the condonation of crimes and to the releasing of prisoners, and various other influences brought to mitigate sentences—a condition of things which was not healthy for the body politic, and against which discussions of this kind are the very best possible antidotes; and I determined that when we came to the House I would bring this matter up and have it placed as fairly as I could before the House, and I would get as much data as possible in order that the public mind might be set at rest as to the technical or mechanical phase of the matter at least. That is why I brought it up, and I do not think my bringing it up should be interpreted by the Minister of Justice as being something personal levelled at himself. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will take my assurance, that there was nothing of that kind in my mind at all. He says that he feels it personally. Now, a man who takes a public position is bound to stand criticism, and he must not think, because the department over which he presides is criticised and sharply criticised, that in every case it is a personal matter. Why, public men would have no rest, night or day, if they supposed every criticism, good, bad or indifferent, which was levelled against the ramifications of great departments of government were always levelled personally against a minister. My hon. friend must try to thicken his skin a little so as to avoid this oversensitiveness. If he does not do it by his own operations, perhaps external operations will do it for him in the course of his political experience until he begins to see that in nine cases out of ten it is the department itself and the general conduct of business which is the subject of criticism, and not the minister—always placing on the minister, as the presiding genius and master of the department, the responsibilty for everything.

I thought the hon. gentleman did not treat a modest youth like myself with that thoughtfulness he should when he intimated that the wording of the resolution argued very little knowledge of the course of the Department of Justice in the exercise of the prerogative of pardoning, or else was intended to create an erroneous impression. With his permission, I would say that I have a cursory knowledge of the steps taken in all these cases, but nevertheless I am exceedingly obliged to the hon. gentleman—as no doubt the House is also—for the long disquisition which he gave us into the minute details in this connection; and the very fact that I gave him the opportunity of giving the House this long and minute disquisition ought to entitle me to his gratitude. Very admirable indeed it was in many respects, but possibly not altogether necessary for the purposes of this motion.

He deprecated what he termed the insinuation of mine that political influence at all swayed him. Well, I think I can appeal to any one who will take the trouble to read 'Hansard' to-morrow that I made no implication of that kind, but stated simply what was an absolute fact. I said that, owing to the depth and breadth of the feeling throughout this country regarding the influence of patronage, it was the popular impression that if you wanted anything from the government, whether by favour or by right, it was necessary that you should approach it through one of its own friends, and thereby put in operation the power of influence or what is popularly called 'pull.' I said that I did not apply that remark to any particular government, but to both parties and all governments, and such opinion will always prevail in this country until we root out some day hereafter—I hope not very long hereafter—that very vicious system of patronage, to which so many abuses can be traced.

The resolution is not at all as sweeping as the Minister of Justice would have the House think of it. It may be a little more sweeping than I had intended it to be. By the words 'the number of imprisoned criminals released' I did not mean that we should go into the whole extent of the ticket-of-leave system inaugurated a few years ago. What I had reference particularly were the cases of release by pardon and not cases under the ticket-of-leave system, because under that system the release is only conditional, and the prisoner released may be brought back to prison if the reports of the parole officers are unfavourable. So that, so far as that is concerned, my resolution is probably a little wider than I intended, if the minister puts that interpretation upon it.

With reference to the names, I acknowledge at once that there is a very well grounded objection to publishing the names of those who became criminals and were registered as such and afterwards were pardoned and given an opportuniy to renew their lives. It is humane, charitable and proper that as little as possible—and if possible nothing at all—of preceding history should be brought to light again, and I had no idea at the time that the names would be published throughout the country. But of course if a return comes down, it is not necessarily published. It goes first into the hands of the clerk, then into the hands of the member who moved for it and is always accessible to the other members of parliament, and, as a rule, it is accessible to the gentlemen of the press. So that it might be possible for the press, if they were so minded—though I cannot see why they should be—to publish the names. But under all the circumstances, and after the explanation of the Minister of Justice, I would not feel now like calling for the names. There are two or three cases which I may bring up again, but, in accordance with the suggestion of my hon. friend, I would heartily concede, for the present at least, to drop that part of my resolution and leave the names out. I would be the last man in the world to attempt to revive, in the case of these unfortunates who go into the broader life again with the idea of rebuilding their character and making homes for themselves, anything that would be the least detrimental to them in that laudable purpose. The term of the sentences, the dates of the releases are not excepted to, as I understand. They are simply statistical.

Now, as to the reasons therefore, I have been a cabinet minister myself; I am quite well conversant with the mode of proceeding. The whole of the minister's objection amounted to this, that we ought not to have these confidential reports brought down to parliament. I never asked, and had not the least intention of asking, for them. I still hold to the right of parliament in certain cases—and they must be special cases—to have the whole record down, and that has been done in several cases. What I had in mind was that, as a source of information to the people, we should have the number of sentences and the number of pardons and the reasons for these pardons. Those reasons will suggest themselves to the minds of all members. My hon. friend has himself mentioned several. There is good conduct, certified to by the warden of the penitentiary or prison, as a sufficient reason. It would be quite sufficient to give as a reason, 'good conduct, or good conduct on the recommendation of the warden.'

Mr. BRODEUR. But when it would be based upon the report of a judge?

Mr. FOSTER. I would not ask for the judges' reports in all these cases, and I have not done so. A good reason might in such a case be given. For instance, that the trial judge had reported new facts, and that on these new facts, accompanied by a favourable report of the judge, the remission was made. That is an easy reason to tabulate. Then there might be a case in which the judge reported that an unreasonable public opinion had unduly influenced the jury and that, when the coolness of impartiality had succeeded to the warmth of prejudice, that fact should be made a legitimate excuse for the exercise of clemency. I am not a lawyer, but I think you could get a new trial on an allegation of that kind. Or it might be that in the first trial all the facts did not come out, or that new facts came to light afterwards; and that, being sufficient for a new trial, would be a good case upon which to make a remission of part sentence. Extraordinary provocation is another. Previous good character is another. Many crimes are committed in the heat of passion. What you may call temporary insanity takes possession of the individual and the crime is committed. Some people say that no man is normal when he commits a harsh or cruel crime, but that, for the time being, he is, to that extent, insane. Any one can see how dangerous is the pressing of a plea like that. But it is certain that case after case arises where a man of absolutely good character and straight life, in a sudden burst of passion, commits a crime. For this crime, he is sent to prison. It may be true that his good character cannot be taken into consideration by judge or jury at the time as a reason against allowing justice to take its course. But this good character, joined with good conduct while in prison, may be a strong reason for remission of sentence. These reasons naturally suggest themselves to the minds of all hon. members. That was the kind of reason that I wanted, and I hope that the Minister of Justice wil disabuse his mind of the idea that I wanted all these confidential reports of wardens and judges and parole officers, and all these secret bits of family history to be brought down and exposed to the gaze of the House and the public. The name of the solicitor, I think, I should have. The Minister of Justice has given me three good reasons why this part of the resolution should be adopted. He says that it is perfectly proper for the right kind of solicitor to interest himself in the right way in making out the papers and forwarding the petition for leniency or remission if he believes it to be a good case. I entirely agree with the Minister of Justice in that; and, in such cases as he has referred to, the solicitor cannot object to having his name mentioned in connection with the case, the other reason he has given was that, in ninety cases of a hundred, no solicitor intervenes. If this be so this part of the resolution will not trouble him. The third reason is the best of all. The Minister of Justice has said that it had come to his ears that lawyers had, in certain cases, demanded exorbitant fees of criminals or the friends of criminals, either on the ground that they had influence or for some other reason. I think I took down accurately the words of the minister. He said: 'Large fees have been accepted by solicitors who ought to have been above such things.' And he went so far as to say that, in such a case, the solicitors should have been reported to the law society and dealt with by that society. If the knowledge that the solicitors' name in these cases can be brought down will prevent a repetition of what has taken place over and over again—the exaction of high fees from the friends of poor unfortunates on the idea that the person who exacted them had peculiar talent in managing these cases, or had peculiar influence with the government for the time being in power—it would be a meritorious and advantageous thing to bring down these names. If it would act as a deterrent then let the solicitors' names be brought down.

I thought it right for me to make these explanations, and to put my action exactly where I wanted it. I would strike out 'the names thereof.' As to 'the reasons therefor' I have explained that, and I do not think any one can obect to it. But, if I have not made it perfectly clear, I may add a word about it. The reason I asked for these is plain. If, for instance, there is a return brought down of say five hundred cases, and no reasons for remission or pardon be given the return is obviously incomplete. If these reasons be given, I fancy they will naturally divide the cases into six or eight groups. If no reasons were given, it would lead to an increase of the feeling which is betrayed in the quotations I have read. The people would see a case given, but they would have to imagine the reason for the remission or pardon. I should think there would be no difficulty in bringing down the information. In these explanations that I have given, I think I have met the suggestions of the Minister of Justice. If, with these emendations, the motion be adopted, and I get the information, I think probably the object in view will be gained. My desire has been, in the first place, to get the statistical information so the country may see what has been done in the way of remissions and pardons. I would like to have the reasons in each case—though, as I have explained, I certainly do not ask for the private reports or anything of that kind. Then, the terms of sentences should be given, the date of the release and the name of the solicitor interested in procuring the release.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If I may be permitted, I may explain to the hon. genman (Mr. Foster) that it would be difficult to give the reasons for the remission. In many instances, the case has been referred to the judge, the judge has given his report, and the endorsation is simply 'granted' or 'refused' without reason given.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not ask that the confidential documents shall be brought down. In such cases as that referred to, no reason would be given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. gentleman, then, wants the reasons as far as practicable.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, make it read 'the reasons therefor as far as practicable.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then, the motion should be amended to read:

For a return showing the number of applications for release——

Mr. FOSTER. No, I do not want the number of applications.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think it would be well.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, yes, that would make it fuller. It would show the proportion between applications and releases.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (reading):

—the number of applications for release of prisoners and the number granted since the year 1896 by the Minister of Justice before the expiry of sentence, the reason therefor as far as practicable, and the name of the solicitor who was interested in procuring the release.

Mr. FOSTER. And it should include 'the term of sentence,' and the 'date of release.' The Minister of Justice made no objection to these.

Mr. SPROULE. That would not cover, as I understand it, the cases of those who had a portion of their sentences remitted—those who had their sentences shortened.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think it would.

Mr. SPEAKER. 'The number granted' would include those granted in whole or in part.

Mr. BERGERON. But 'the reason therefor,' I understand, is struck out?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want him to bring down the judge's report.

Mr. BERGERON. In the case of Shortis I made a demand in the House for all the papers connected with the commuting of the sentence, and the House ordered all the papers brought down and they were brought down. One report of the judge was strictly confidential and the judge had asked that his report should not be placed before parliament, but still it was brought down because the House ordered it. Every report was brought down.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In what year was that ?

Mr. BERGERON. In 1894 or 1895. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper at that time was Minister of Justice. I simply mention that to the House that no objection was taken to the production of these papers even in confidential ones.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) I think was not here when the Minister of Justice stated that there were three cases, those of Riel, Shortis and another in which all the papers were brought down. These were very exceptional cases and the exceptional circumstances made it advisable ; but as a rule the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) agrees that the confidential report of the judges should not be brought down.

Mr. BARKER. Might I suggest that the words 'as far as practicable' perhaps hardly express the meaning intended. I would say 'as far as expedient.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would agree to the suggestion.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. As my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has conceded that it would not be wise or proper to lay down the practice of publishing the names of persons who had been pardoned or released should be given to the House and the country, so also I think it would not be wise to bring down the names of the solicitors as that would be only one step from giving the names of the prisoners. If the solicitors' names were given the names of the clients could easily be inferred.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all, if you apply them to numbers.

Motion as amended agreed to.

ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS RE TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle) moved :

To lay on the table of this House for inspection the original applications and tenders in respect of timber berths numbers 1220 to 1226, 1238 and 1272.

He said : In moving this resolution I merely wish to state that I want the originals because I cannot do justice to the case without them. I have not the information in the copies which the originals could give me.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend was not in the House to-day when I asked the First Minister what he proposed to do with reference to those four motions. The First Minister said he would keep the matter over and give an answer on Wednesday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I wanted to give an answer to my hon. friend as to whether they should be taken out of the paper and considered as motions without debate ; but my hon. friend is quite within his right, he can move his motion if he wants to.

Mr. LAKE. I need simply add that I have never moved for any return in this House which I did not consider it necessary I should have to enable me to carry out the duty which I owe to my constituents.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The position I took on this matter to-day was that a motion of this kind would not be granted as a matter of course but had to be accompanied by sufficient reasons to justify the unusual procedure. We are now familiar with the subject. The reasons given by the hon. gentleman are sufficient, so far as I am concerned, to justify the motion. I would beg to amend it however by adding the words :

Said papers not to be part of the archives of this House, but to be returned by the clerk to the Department of the Interior after inspection.

Motion as amended agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington) moved :

That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that a commission of enquiry be forthwith appointed to investigate the needs of Canada in respect to technical education, and to report on ways and means by which these needs may be best met.

He said : I may inform the House that this resolution has been endorsed by some of the most prominent bodies in the country. I have the honour of bringing it before parliament at the joint request of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, an association representative of a very large proportion of the skilled labour and mechanics of the country, and of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, an association which embraces in its membership a large proportion of the industrial employers of this country. Both of these bodies have given a great deal of time and thought and consideration to the subject and both have endorsed it. It has also been endorsed by some of the leading educationists in Canada, men who are at the head of our universities, and by over thirty of the leading boards of trade and chambers of commerce, representing the chief industrial centres in Canada. I mention these matters at the outset in order to show the House that the question of technical education is a very live question in Canada to-day. The shrewdest men in the country are occupying their time in considering the question, and I think it is generally felt that the time has arrived when some definite action should be taken in regard to it, or at least some extended inquiry should be had to see whether or not a system of technical education can be adopted in this country. I would have preferred had some one more familiar with the whole subject been asked to move the resolution. I am aware that there are hon. members of the House who are very familiar with the general question and also with its details; I hope that before the close of the discussion some of these members will give the House the benefit of their experience.

I beg to place on the records the formal resolution of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada in regard to this matter It is :

Resolved, that inasmuch as the natural resources of Canada in its rivers, in its forests and in its farm lands—are of immeasurable extent and commercial value, and are urgently calling for the best and most approved means of development and utilization; and whereas the present methods of production require further scientific stimulus—more especially in the mechanical branches—of a broadly national character, through a proper and special educational system; be it resolved, that this Trades and Labour Congress of Canada place itself on record as in favour of the establishment of industrial technical schools throughout the Dominion, and it is hereby an imperative instruction to the executive of this body to use its best efforts, at an early date, in urging the importance of the subject upon the serious attention of the Dominion government with a view to the establishment of such a system of special education throughout Canada.

The workmen of Canada are strongly of opinion that the welfare and development of Canada demand some large scheme of technical education. It is not a matter alone for the welfare of the workmen or of the employer, but of the whole Canadian people. We want Canada to be foremost in the arts and manufactures, and we are just at that stage of industrial development when the institution of technical schools would be of most value.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association passed the following resolution :—

Be it resolved, that the Dominion government be requested to appoint a commission to report on the best method of establishing a comprehensive national system of technical education to provide Canadian industry and commerce with trained assistants from amongst the Canadian people, and thereby aid in developing Canadian industry, and do away with the present conditions of affairs, which compels employers to go abroad for men to occupy the more responsible and more remunerative positions in Canadian enterprises.

As a sample of the resolutions passed by thirty boards of trade and chambers of commerce, I beg to quote that passed by the Halifax Board of Trade, which reads :

Be it resolved, that in view of the facts that the foremost nations of the world have definitely proven that the technical education is the greatest weapon of modern industrial warfare, and that Canada's immense natural resources should be intelligently and efficiently developed by the most modern methods, and whereas, Canada owes it to Canadians to furnish them the technical training adequate to carry on such development, that the Dominion government be requested to appoint an able commission of investigation to ascertain the best measures for establishing technical education in this Dominion of Canada.

I quote these resolutions in order to show that the demand for a system of technical education in Canada is by no means local or sectional but is entirely national in its character. Great changes have taken place during the last thirty or forty years in educational methods in many of the older civilized countries of the world. Notably has this been the case with Germany, France, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Great Britain and the United States. These countries no longer content themselves with the old scholastic routine but they are annually spending vast sums of money upon technical training. They are putting forth great efforts to reconsider their methods and systems of education with a view to the peculiar surroundings of their people and with a view to the immediate needs of the people in the hope that it may assist the people in gaining a livelihood and assist the nation in maintaining its place in the markets of the world. It is a question which has all the elements of a great national, commercial and industrial problem, and it is in that view of the matter that it is now brought before this House. The demand for technical education from the manufacturer arises very largely no doubt from the fact that in recent years he has felt himself handicapped in procuring highly skilled labour in sufficient quantities for his purpose. He has suffered from the disadvantage of having to compete in the markets of the world with his manufactured product against countries where there is a large supply of technically trained artisans. The demand for technical education on the part of the workman arises no doubt from the very laudable ambition which he has to perfect himself in regard to his own trade or his own craft, in order, perhaps, that his work may become less laborious and more remunerative and that he may be enabled to fill a higher position than that which he now occupies.

Perhaps the most formidable question which will present itself in regard to this matter is to ascertain in precisely what way the parliament of Canada can take action in reference to it, having regard to the somewhat positive language which is used in section 93 of the British North America Act. It provides :

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education.

Section 91 of the same Act provides that in matters of trade and commerce this parliament will have jurisdiction. Should the objection be raised that parliament cannot entertain this question on the ground that section 93 places it within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces I might say that the first answer to such an objection would be that the term 'education' as used in the 93rd section of the British North America Act must be construed in a popular sense and it does not mean industrial training or instruction. It may be said that all instruction is education. The master instructs the apprentice in the workshop and the journeyman instructs his helper at the forge. That instruction is educational in a sense, but no one would argue that that is the kind of education that is intended to be meant by section 93 of the British North America Act. The term 'education' as used in that section means the ordinary course of learning which is afforded to a youth in this country whereby he obtains a scholastic or academic training which will give him a certain amount of culture and refinement—training in the arts and sciences, in classics, and languages, in literature, mathematics and kindred subjects which will perhaps give him a greater appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of citizenship and a better capacity for the enjoyment of life. Such, I maintain, is the generally accepted meaning of the term 'education' and I submit that it is in that sense that it is used in the British North America Act. Technical education is an entirely different matter. Technical education is a matter of economics rather than of scholarship. It is a matter which will yield a monetary return rather than a return in culture and refinement. Such then is the broad distinction between 'education' as used in the 93rd section of the British North American Act and technical or industrial training and if possible, just to make the distinction more clear, to make the proper line of demarcation between the ordinary scholarship and industrial training better understood, let me give the House briefly a statement of the various subjects and branches of learning which are comprised in the curriculum of the ordinary technical institute. I do this because I know that not only in my own case but in the case of many other men with whom I have spoken on this subject a great deal of ignorance prevails. We have a very vague, general and visionary knowledge of what is meant or intended by the term 'technical education.' In the ordinary technical institute the following will be among the subjects which will be taught: There will be a department of physics embracing such subjects as light, heat, sound, electricity and magnetism ; a department of hydrostatics, dealing with liquids, gases, hydraulic engines and machinery; a department of mechanics, treating of force, motion, gravation and kindred subjects ; a department of chemistry where chemistry will be taught in all its branches embracing theory, practice and research; a department of mathematics so far as required for practical aplication to the various branches of scientific work; a department of freehand drawing and industrial design; a department of machine construction and pattern making ; a department of building construction including strength and value of materials; a department of architectural design and decoration, a clay modelling department and generally very full special courses in mineralogy, metallurgy, geology and engineering in all its various branches. Taking such a list of subjects and comparing it with the ordinary subjects which are taught in our instutions in Canada, one can readily see that there is a broad distinction between ordinary education as we understand the term and industrial training with which this motion has to do.

As a second answer to any objection which might be raised to the constitutional right of this parliament to deal with this motion I think one can safely argue that the whole question of industrial training is so intimately associated with the general trade and commerce of this country, subjects over which this parliament has authority, that it will have such a direct influence upon both the quantity and quality of our manufactured product, that it will bear so directly upon our national resources as regards their development, manufacture and transport, and it is so intimately connected with the general trade and commercial progress of the country that we may fairly say that it comes within the authority and jurisdiction of this parliament.

But, there is another ground upon which I think this parliament might well deal with this question. We have only to look and see how the question has been dealt with in other countries where the system of technical education has been so successfully maintained, and if the House will pardon me I would like for one moment to consider how the matter has beeen dealt with in the German empire. I am aware that the constitution of the German empire is not identically the constitution under which we live in Canada but I would like to refer to the manner in which the question is treated there. In that country where it has been successfully maintained it has been the result of united effort—effort of the individual, effort of the municipality, effort of the state, district or canton and effort of the federal or central authority. In no country in the world that I am aware of has the federal authority assumed the whole burden and responsibility, but it has been aided and assisted by private subscriptions and private endowment. Germany is the great progenitor, the great originator of technical or industrial training. As far back as 1825 the first technical institute was established at Carlshrue in Germany. This was followed by another at Munich in 1827; by another at Dresden in 1828 and by another at Stuttgart in 1832. These institutes were the pioneers in this great work, but the work has grown to enormous proportions in Germany so that at the present day in the German empire is to be found the most complex, the most complete and the most elaborate system of industrial training that exists in any country in the world. Their system embraces all grades. They have their primary system, their secondary system, their advanced system and their technical universities. In the most important of the German industrial schools are found what are known as industrial continuation schools. These are the schools which the pupil enters after he has passed the common schools and the manual training schools. They have in Germany no less than 2,200 of these industrial continuation schools, attended by 320,000 pupils. The requirements for entrance into these schools are the completion of a common school course and several years of practical experience in a particular trade or industry, at least to the completion of apprenticeship. This is important, for this reason. The Trades and Labour Council have pointed out that they do not desire in this country the ordinary manual training school, which has the effect of turning loose an army of youthful, half-finished mechanics, who have not had any training in practical work to compete with the skilled labour of the country.

After the industrial training schools come the high grade technical schools, with specialized courses, of which there are in Germany 524, and the special courses in them are as follows : 25 in mechanics 58 in mining, 53 in architecture and construction, 10 in metallurgy, 117 in textiles, 24 in woodcarving, 27 in industrial art and design, 41 in navigation, 52 in fresh water navigation, and four in shipbuilding. All these classes are very largely attended. To give an idea of the course of instruction in some of these specialized schools, I may mention that the course in the building trades schools includes the subjects of stonecutting and laying, brick making, plastering, carpentry, scientific construction, uses, strength and value of materials, designing, modelling, ornamentation, interior decoration, heating ventilation, road and bridge building, drainage and irrigation.

The textile schols in Germany, which are the most numerous and perhaps in some respects the most important, have a special course of instruction which covers the whole process from the lowest grade of primary weaving to textile mechanical engineering, as taught at no less than eight of the best known German universities. Their course of instruction includes, weaving, spinning, bleaching, dying, machinery, properties of fibrous materials, manufactures of every description of woven and spun material.

They have also their art trade schools, where special instruction in industrial art and design is given. These schools are devoted more to what is known as industrial art, where the ultimate aim lies in the direction of technical efficiency rather than of artistical finish, and the course of instruction includes, drawing, modelling, ornamentation, painting, furniture, designing, wood-carving, pottery and leather cutting, in addition to those there are the technical universities, there being 9 general technical universities and 3 technical mining universities. All these institutions are maintained by the whole empire, and the government of the empire acts as a sort of supervising body over the whole system.

Now, how is the cost of all these institutions made up ? Partly by tuition fees, 23 per cent ; partly by municipal school funds and private contribution, 49 per cent ; and partly by state aid, 28 per cent ; showing that in the empire of Germany the great work of technical education is considered to be not by any means a local or municipal affair, but to a very large extent a matter of national importance.

It is viewed in the same way in the United States, where as far back as the year 1862, an Act was passed known as the Morell Act, whereby it was provided that every state which would establish a college where a course of agriculture and a course of mechanical arts would be taught, should receive a large land grant from the federal government. New York state received over 800,000 acres, Pennsylvania, 700,000, Ohio, 400,000, and other states lesser quantities. This Act was supplemented in 1890 by another Act of the Congress of the United States, whereby it was provided that each state which would establish a college for special courses in agriculture and mechanical arts, should receive a financial grant from the federal government of $15,000. to be increased at the rate of $1,000 a year, until the sum annually granted reached $25,000. Under this Act the federal government of the United States paid out last year directly to technical institutions in that country no less than $2,500,000 and the total amount paid by the United States since the inception of the scheme has been $31,000,000, of which $15,000,000 has been in cash and $16,000,000 in land. The United States has, under that system of federal assistance, established something like sixty technical colleges. In 44 of these, courses are provided in mechanical engineering; in 38 courses in electrical engineering; in 37, courses in civil engineering; in 21, courses in mining engineering; in 6, courses in architecture; in 4, courses in metallurgical, railway and technical engineering. The total cost of these technical institutes in the United States runs into an enormous figure annually. I have not the total cost, but I find that the proportion borne by the various people who contribute to their maintenance is as follows: 12·8 per cent in fees of pupils in attendance, 12·3 per cent in endowments, 26·4 per cent in state and municipal grants, 40·8 per cent in federal grants, and 7·7 per cent from all other sources. The fact that the federal government contributes a little over 40 per cent annually to the cost of the maintenance of all these institutes of technology, indicates the United States views on the question. Their constitution is in some respects similar to our own. They do not view it as a municipal or state affair, but largely as a matter of national concern.

The same is the case in Switzerland, a country enjoying a constitution somewhat similar to our own, having its federal government with jurisdiction over national affairs and its cantonal governments with jurisdiction in regard to local affairs. Last year there was spent in Switzerland on technical education about 1,000,000 francs of which 75 per cent was contributed by the municipalities and cantons and 25 per cent by the federal government.

In Great Britain the question of technical education was a dead question until the year 1891. In that year the Manchester merchants became aware that their chief competitor in the textile trade of the world was Germany, which was fast overtaking them in the markets of the world. The Chamber of Commerce of the city of Manchester sent a commission to investigate the whole question of textile production and the whole question of technical education in Germany. Subsequently the British government sent a commission to inquire into technical education in Germany and another commission to inquire into the same subjects in the United States. As a result of the reports made by these commissions, the question of technical education has been taken up in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, and last year the Imperial government spent in England and Wales alone no less than £1,200,000 sterling for the maintenance of a system of technical education in the cities. There are now large technical institutions in Manchester, Bolton and Glasgow, and technical schools in many places, and I see by a recent article in the English papers that some English manufacturers are offering special rewards to their workmen to induce them to take courses at these technical institutions. There is no question how the Imperial government treats this matter. It treats it not simply as a matter of local conern, but as a matter of national concern.

Taking the example of these countries, where systems of technical education have been successfully maintained, I see no reason why the federal government in this country should not have an inquiry into the whole system, and if possible take a hand in the great work of industrial training that is going on throughout the world. It may fairly be said that the Canadian government has alrerdy done something in this direction. The Dominion Experimental Farm is nothing more or less than an institute of technology applied to agriculture. Experiments are there carried on, information is gathered, new subjects are investigated, and the information acquired from these experiments and from the investigation which goes on there, is distributed throughout the length and breadth of Canada. No one can deny the tremendous benefit which that has been to the agricultural classes and the country in general.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. gentleman regard it as properly within our constitutional right to start educational schools in agriculture, the same as the school at Guelph?

Mr. GUTHRIE. I was just going to refer to that point. The fact that the provinces have undertaken the work of technical education need not debar the Dominion parliament from engaging in similar work. It may be argued that every subject which is taught at an ordinary technical institute may now be taught at some one or other of the colleges and universities of this country, but the answer to this is that these colleges and universities have gone beyond what was formerly considered their sphere of education and have entered into the arena of technical and industrial training. And, as a matter of fact, these colleges and universities, few in number, are far beyond the reach of the ordinary apprentices and artisans in this country.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it be within the constitutional rights of this Dominion to start schools similar to the Agricultural College at Guelph, which come under the ordinary category of education assigned to the provinces by clause 93 of the British North America Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not know that any one would suggest that the Dominion government should actually engage in the work of tuition, but I shall come to what my hon. friend has pointed out a little later on, because I intend making a few suggestions as to what the Dominion parliament might do without engaging in the actual work of tuition. But I submit that the Dominion government are now engaged in a system of technical education regarding agriculture very similar indeed to the work carried on by the museums in Germany in regard to manufactures. Our Dominion government have engaged in technical education in the Royal Military College at Kingston, where there is a general engineering course, apart altogether from military requirements. They have also established at Kingston a school of navigation, which is purely technical education. They have established marine biological research stations at Gaspé and Georgian bay—purely technical work. They have given large grants to McGill university, through the Intercolonial Railway, for the department of applied science, which deals with industrial training. In all these matters the government have already endorsed the proposal I submit to some extent. I understand that there is no likelihood of any conflict of jurisdiction or of any objection being raised by any one of the provinces. The Manufacturers' Association have informed me that they have gone to the trouble of ascertaining the views of the various provincial governments in Canada, and that, without a single exception, they have received word from the premiers of the various provinces that they will welcome an investigation into this subject by the Dominion government. So that there is not likely to be any cleavage as between the provinces and the Dominion in so far as what is asked for in this resolution is concerned.

But it may be asked very properly, in what way could the Dominion government take up this work? That I submit is work for a commission to ascertain, and that is why we want a commission. But there are ways in which undoubtedly the Dominion government would have power to act. They could certainly act by granting financial assistance. They could establish experimental stations, similar to the Dominion experimental farm, where experiments might be carried on by experts in new and improved machinery, and thus ascertain its practical value; where experiments might be carried on in the smelting and treatment of native Canadian ore. They might establish bureaus for standardizing Canadian manufactured products, similar to those established in Berlin, Washington and Paris, where the standarrizing of the products of manufactures is carried on and where certificates are granted as to the genuineness and merits of these products. The certificates granted as to standard and merit by Berlin, France and Washington are accepted at their face value throughout the commercial world to-day. The Dominion government have established a Department of Mines, which is carrying on extensive experiments in the electrical treatment of ores; that work might be carried on to a much greater extent. There are, therefore, innumerable ways in which this government might, for the benefit of the whole country, go into this work by establishing industrial museums and experimental stations throughout Canada. I shall not say anything more on the subject, but shall simply put my motion in the hands of the House, and trust that it will meet with the approval of the government.

Mr. GEORGE SMITH (North Oxford). I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House at this late hour with any lengthy speech. I do not know that my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) referred to me as having any special knowledge on the subject-matter under discussion, although I was for a short time connected with one of the educational institutions in Woodstock where they have a manual training department. I refer to the Woodstock College. I may say that that department in no way interferes with the mechanics, as the Trades and Labour Council suggested. It is simply used as a means of education, and not as a training for mechanics, most of the students intending to go in for other than mechanical work. I may say that at the meeting in Woodstock last summer the Minister of Education for Ontario did make a reference to his intention to ask the Dominion government to supplement by financial aid the work of technical education. This age may be described as a competitive age. We have individual competing with individual. We have probably keener competition to-day than at any period in the world's history. We have not only the competition among individuals, but what I might call a titanic struggle going on in the world for commercial supremacy. We have nation pitted against nation. We have billion dollar trusts head on against billion dollar trusts. And that nation which trains its captains of industry, which has a sufficient number of trained special men capable of taking positions as captains of industry, will win out in the struggle. Who are the men that have done most to transform the world and make it what it is to-day? I think you will admit that they are the inventors, the thinkers, men like the Stephensons, Watts and Kelvins, in Scotland; the Arkwrights, Faradays, the Thompsons and the Bessemers, in England; the Virchows, Hoffmans and others, in Germany; the Pasteurs and the Berthelots, in France; and the Edisons, the Teslas, the Marconis and the Bells, of the United States and Canada. These men have done more than all the generals, the kings and emperors to transform the world. On the banners of the old Romans were inscribed the letters 'S. P. Q. R.'—Senatus Populus-que Romanus. We could inscribe the same letters on the commercial banners of the world to-day, but they would have a very different meaning. Their meaning would be 'small profits, quick returns.'

Coming back to Canada, if we had the industrial efficiency which the carrying out of this resolution would give us, we could, with our natural resources compete with any country in the world. The assistance this government can give would enable

Canada to hold her own and if possible win out in the struggle. Germany is a country of no great natural resources, with a comparatively small coast line, with armed enemies on either hand, and with a burden of enormous taxation to support its army and navy; yet, in thirty years, Germany has forged ahead and taken a foremost place among the nations of the world in point of industrial activity. She has, perhaps, surpassed in chemistry. Take the instance of Prof. Hoffman, of Berlin University. Prof. Hoffman discovered, by experiments with coal-tar products, a method of manufacturing aniline dyes. Great Britain had the dye trade of the world by the manufacture of dyes from the indigo plant of India. But Prof. Hoffmann discovered dyes that were superior, extracted from coal-tar products, and practically drove out the British indigo dye trade. Referring to Germany, the former Minister of Education in Ontario, Hon. Richard Harcourt, in an address in the Toronto Technical School said:

The Berlin Royal Technical College has 140 professors, 260 assistants, and 3,500 students. Engineering, chemistry and metallurgy are among the subjects taught. There are free museums, art galleries and laboratories. The manufacturers of Germany employ 4,500 chemists. Wurtemburg, with 2,081,000 inhabitants, supports the State University of Tubingen, one technical school, one textile and one mechanical school, one building-trades school, three weaving schools, 231 industrial improvement schools, 18 domestic schools for women, a commercial college and an agricultural high school. In one large manufacturing plant there are 150 expert chemists, nearly all holding the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

These facts have been recognized by the leading men of the world. Lord Rosebery and Mr. Joseph Chamberlain have recognized them. England, of late years, has righted herself, to a large extent, in the matter of technical education. Mr. Carnegie has recognized these facts. In the year 1901, he gave the enormous sum of $42,200,000 for higher education and for the establishment of public libraries—or $11,000 a day. Cecil Rhodes, in his will, recognized these facts. The Ontario government has recognized them by its notable expenditures for the school of practical science and the Agricultural College at Guelph, Dr. Dewar, the president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science at its meeting in Belfast in 1902, said:

He rebuked the nation and especially our manufacturers for their comparative indifference to the cause of education. He compared England and Gemany in the matter of technical education and their zeal in endowing scientific research. German manufacturers employ some 4,500 highly-paid chemists, or nearly three times as many as are in England. The Germans take advantage of the discoveries of our exceptional men, and their average men, by reason of their scientific training, turn them to commercial account. We have the brains, the raw material and the money, but we lack the diffused education among the people without which the discoveries of men of genius cannot fructify. The appalling thing, said Dr. Dewar, is not that the Germans have captured many industries which owe their existence to chemical knowledge, but that the Germans are two generations ahead of us in general training and specialized equipment.

As I have said, England has righted herself in the matter of technical education to a considerable extent of late years—in fact since that speech of Dr. Dewar—by the establishment of technical schools in different parts of England, and by the support given to such schools. Now, with reference to the public opinion referred to by the last speaker, I would say that, some thirty or forty years ago, there was a very considerable feeling against what they were pleased to call 'college-bred men.' You know the remark attributed to Horace Greeley. 'Of all horned cattle, preserve me from the college graduate.' I am satisfied that this sentiment is very materially changed. I have spoken to men who have visited some of the leading factories and industrial establishments in the United States, who have told me that they were amazed at the young college students who were placed at the head of large bodies of men in the conduct of these industrial insituations. John Foster Fraser, writing in the June, 1903, 'Eclectic,' re 'American Manufacturers,' says:

In going through American workshops I have been staggered at the mere boys who are managers and heads of departments, boys of 24 over several thousand men. No price is too big for a boy who has brains and adaptiveness.

Now, the resolution of the Manufacturers' Association, referred to by the last speaker, was, very probably, prompted by the experience of Mr. Clergue at the Sault. Mr. Clergue had to import experts in chemistry from Germany and Switzerland. But I am glad to be able to say that we are now turning out, at McGill and at the Toronto School of Practical Science, men who can take the positions referred to by the Manufacturers' Association. Again, referring to the prevailing opinion concerning higher education in the country—for it is necessary for the politicians, and for any government, to take stock in public opinion; we are here simply to carry out the public will—I may say that, in the district in which I live, I believe the average farmer thinks the government has done its duty when it has furnished free public instruction in our public schools. Professor Cattell, of Columbia University, combats that idea in the 'Popular Science Monthly,' of June, 1902. He takes the position that elementary education is chiefly useful to the individual, whereas higher education is chiefly for the benefit of the state, and gives reasons for his opinion. He says that in the United States, in the year 1902, the cost of sugar to the people of that country was $200,000,000. If the product had not been cheapened by inventions, by improved processes and better transportation facilities, it would have cost five times as much, making the cost of sugar for the people of the United States of that year, $1,000,000,000. The saving thus indicated would pay for all the higher education in that country from the year one until now. He further points out that the education of a single man who makes a scientific discovery with commercial applications would pay for the expenses of that institution from its inception. I believe there is a change in public sentiment in these matters to which I am referring. I observe it, for instance, in the case of the agricultural colleges. I can remember the day when, in the county which I have the honour to represent, they used to refer to the agricultural college as the 'school for dude farmers.' They ridiculed the institution, but they do not do so now. They are glad to go on excursions to the agricultural college, there to observe scientific methods and to adopt them because those methods pay. And, just as we find there is a change in that regard, I believe there is a change in public sentiment on the subject of higher education. We know, as has been stated already, that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. The United States have certainly done their duty toward agricultural institutions and state-aided agricultural colleges. I will read from the year book of 1902:

> One of the most interesting articles in the new volume relates to the results of experimental station work. Our agricultural experiment stations now form the most complete system of agriculture research in the world, and the results they attain are influencing our farmers to a large extent. There are sixty of these stations, employing nearly 1,000 trained, scientific and practical men——

Because, these institutions are not at all academic. The men employed to perform these experiments are practical farmers, men of good, sound common-sense and judgment.

> —and they are in operation in every state and territory, including Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico and the Philippines.
> Their annual income last year was $1,328,847, of which sum $720.000 came from the federal government and $608,847 from state appropriations and other sources. The stations have existed as a national enterprise for fourteen years, and the outlay for agricultural investigation in that time has been at the rate of only one dollar for nearly $3,000 worth of farm products, which cannot be considered an extravagant outlay.

Now, let us look at the work which some of these institutions have accomplished We can refer with pride to what has been done at the Guelph Agricultural College. I believe that Prof. Zavitz with his experiments in new grains, wheats and other grains, has benefited the agricultural population and added wonderfully to the wealth of Canada. These institutions in the United States have done a remarkable work, they certainly have justified one hundred times over, all the expenditure that has been made upon them. Take for instance the discovery made by the California station that the alkali lands of the south-west portion of the United States of America were not salt desert, that the white substance upon them was simply an accumulation of alkali caused by the lack of rain fall and that if there was sufficient rainfall this would be washed down and there would be the rich soil. That discovery being made they set to work and covered the land with a coat of gypsum, underdrained it thoroughly, and irrigated it with the water from the neighbouring hills so that now they have there probably the highest priced land in the world, devoted to orange groves and other productive forms of fruit culture.

Take the Babcock milk tester, an invention of the Wisconsin school, given like the other inventions of these institutions free to the world. That has been an immense assistance in the dairy business.

Take the new wheats that I have referred to. In the United States it is calculated that they have added to the production by the discovery of improved qualities of wheat five bushels to the acre or about 40,000,000 bushels in a year. This alone has more than paid for the expenditures on these institutions.

Then take the experiments conducted by Prof. Atwater of the Connecticut school to test the relative value of different foods. Oxen were put in glass cases and fed on certain varieties of foods; correct and accurate accounts were kept and deductions from these figures showed the scientific values of the different foods experimented upon.

Take the dry farming system called the Campbell system of dry farming, the introduction of which added largely to the values of the lands of the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company of which we have heard so much in this House.

Another matter to which I have given some little attention is the experiments with fertilizers. We find that the world's supply of nitrates is almost exhausted, and it is computed that in about twenty-five years the supply of guano from the islands of the Pacific and the rainless regions of Peru and Chili will have been exhausted. Necessity is the mother of invention. Scientists have set about the discovery of a supply of nitrogen. It is well known that the air which we breathe is simply a mechanical mixture of oxygen and nitrogen.

and these thinkers are endeavouring to discover a method of extracting the nitrogen from the air. At Niagara Falls the experiments have been carried on for some years by the Atmospheric Products Company. I have seen it announced that the discovery had been made of a method by which nitric acid can be manufactured commercially by electric currents being passed through the atmosphere in chambers, at a cost of 2½ cents a pound. In Norway, where labour is cheaper and they have apparently equally good water-power, they can make it at an even smaller cost. Sir William Crookes has also discovered a method in London by which it is claimed nitrogen can be extracted from the air commercially so that it can be used as a fertilizer. If that is accomplished it will revolutionize farming.

Surely the government would be justified in helping on such experiments or even granting a bonus to attain these ends, so wealth producing and so important to the country at large.

Take again the improvements that have been made in agricultural machinery. Let us look at the evolution of the reaper; starting with the sickle or cradle, you come to the first attempts at a reaper such as I know was manufactured by the man who is now the honourable senator from that district, I refer to Mr. Merner. In his early days he manufactured a reaper on which a man sat on a crotched upright seat with a fork and forked off the sheaf. The next stage of evolution was the introduction of the drop. It was found that you could only cut one round as the next time you passed around the horses would be stepping on and tedding the grain. The next invention was the rake, which raked off and elminated the employment of one hand for that purpose. Then came the attempts at the self-binders. First the attempts to bind by wire with the difficulties experienced in that, and then the evolution in the self-binding reaper with twine and the steel frame which we have to-day.

These things are all traceable to the inventor, to the man who thinks, the man who should be encouraged by this or any other government by reason of the immense wealth producing value of such discoveries. Take for instance the enhanced industrial efficiency of the machinery on the farm. I have here statistics which show that forty years ago it took three hours work to harvest one bushel of wheat. Now it takes only ten minutes work to harvest one bushel of wheat. Forty years ago it cost 17¾ cents to harvest one bushel of wheat, while to-day it costs only 3⅓ cents. See the enormous saving in industrial efficiency thus obtained.

A recent illustration of the value of such industrial investigation is to be found in the report by Dr. Haanel, published last year under the auspices of this government upon the question of electric smelting of ores. I commend the government for appointing a commission in December, 1903 to investigate the different mechanical processes for the smelting of iron and the making of steel in Europe. The commission visited France among other countries and the result of their investigations was the inauguration of an experiment at Sault Ste. Marie. Mr. Clergue offered the use of his factory and experiments were carried on. I quote but one sentence from Dr. Haanel's report at page 97:

> Electric smelting of iron ores in Canada in properly constructed ovens using charcoal or peat coke made from our peat bogs of enormous extent may be pronounced commercially feasible.

This is an important advance that may have a great effect on the future of Canada. I understand that the first electric smelting plant in Canada is being erected in Welland, Ont. I am not competent to go into the smelting business, but I would like to refer finally to Germany. As has already been said Germany leads the world in chemistry and in technical education generally. It has done so by reason of its system of technical education because technical education was found to be a medium by which the union between the scientist and the manufacturer was established. In the large manufacturing cities of Germany and the United States they employ expert chemists and manufacturers, tell them that they want certain problems worked out. They give them the data and they tell them that they want them to solve those problems. They are highly paid, they are highly trained experts, this work is done on a very expensive scale in Germany and it has certainly been found to pay the manufacturers notwithstanding the large expenditure in connection with it. I would like to read, in connection, a statement contained in Shadwell's work on 'Industrial Efficiency' issued about a year ago. Mr. Shadwell, after visiting Germany, writing on the progress in methods of manufacture, says:

> The industrial expansion of Germany presents another picture. It has been achieved by equally hard work, but the adventurous audacity and restless search for novelty of America have been replaced by steady and watchful effort. . . . The industrial population has not been left to carve out its own destiny, but has been guided and helped at every step. All sections of the community, from the throne to the workhouse, have contributed something. Laisser faire is dead; ordered regulation is accepted and applied with infinite pains by the legislature, government departments, municipalities and private citizens. It is seen not only in the scientific tariff, but in the careful and judicious factory code, and state system of insurance. The organization of traffic and transport by rail and canal, the fostering of the mercantile marine, the educational provision, municipal action and poor-law administration. So the edifice has been built up four-square and buttressed about on every side. It is a wonderful achievement in which every unit has played a part, and the spirit which has brought it about is the spirit of duty and work.

In conclusion, let me say that while I am not in favour of paternalism as a rule I would be in favour of the government, as it assisted in the discovery of proper modes of smelting ores, granting aid to technical institutions, to experimenters and to investigators in attempting to solve certain problems that confront us and which, if they are not solved, will cause us to fall behind in the commercial race. With Canada's great resources and with a technically trained body of workers Canada will take a foremost place amongst the nations of the world in agricultural, commercial and industrial pursuits.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford). Mr. Speaker, although the hour is somewhat late and the House is rather thin I desire to take the opportunity of saying a few words in support of the resolution that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has brought before us this evening. The House has stayed sometimes later than this on less important matters. The attendance of the House is not always a fair indication of the importance of the subject which is under discussion. I think that the hon. member for South Wellington is to be highly commended for bringing this matter to the attention of this House and for having made the very plain and lucid statement which he has presented for our consideration. I have had an opportunity of working in connection with this matter somewhat. For several years I have been a member of the technical education committee of the board of the city of Toronto, I have acted as chairman of that committee, and for these reasons I desire to say a few words in support of the course that is recommended in the resolution that has been placed before the House. It will not be necessary for me to go over the ground at all fully as the hon. gentleman has stated most of the important facts in connection with this movement. This is not a new movement that is brought to the attention of the House. This resolution was before the House last session and I promised at that time that if I had an opportunity I would like to say a word in support of it. As it is now brought forward I desire to say that it has my most hearty approbation. The objection that I understand is likely to be urged against this course is that this form of education properly belongs to provincial governments only. I think that argument has been very fairly well met by the hon. member for South Wellington. I think the government need not hesitate to take a step in this direction without fear of offending any of the provinces concerned. The provinces, as a rule, are jealous of their rights and I for one am free to say that I am strongly in favour of maintaining provincial rights believing, as I do, that they should not be infringed upon. But this is a special case, or it is a special subject and as such it is necessary to give it special treatment in order that this movement may be a success. As far as this resolution is concerned, it only asks that we should name a committee or commission of inquiry to thoroughly investigate the subject and to ascertain what is best to be done under the circumstances. That is a simple matter which need not occasion a very large outlay at any rate at the start and it would certainly be better that one full inquiry should be made by this government than that all the several provinces should set out to make this same inquiry. There is economy in such a course. One general committee or commission of inquiry for the whole Dominion would certainly be better than appointing a committee or commission from every province. Therefore, I think it is beyond peradventure that the provinces will not be jealous of any such interference. I hold in my hand letters dated only recently from every province in the Dominion dealing with this question and one and all of these people I may say are in favour of the Dominion government taking the step that the hon. member for South Wellington asks should be taken in this resolution. I will not weary the House by reading these but I will just read the names of the writers of a few of them. The first is dated November 30, 1907, is addressed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and is signed by Richard McBride, premier of British Columbia; the second is dated the 9th November, 1907, is addressed in the same way and is signed by Alexander C. Rutherford, premier of Alberta; the third is dated the 25th October, 1907 and is signed by Walter Scott, premier of the province of Saskatchewan; the fourth is dated October 23, 1907, addressed in the same way and signed by R. P. Roblin, premier of Manitoba; a similar letter is signed by Hon. J. P. Whitney, premier of Ontario, dated October 23, 1907; another is dated November 1, 1907, and is signed by Mr. C. W. Robinson, on behalf of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia is represented by Mr. G. H. Murray, premier of the province and the late Mr. Peters signs it on behalf of Prince Edward Island. These various provinces of the Dominion of Canada without exception have fully endorsed this scheme and are prepared to admit that in so far as provincial rights are concerned they do not enter into the question from their standpoint. That, I think is pretty good evidence that the matter of provincial rights will not very seriously interfere with this great movement. The mover of this resolution has told us how far we are behind various other countries of the world which are foremost in industrial life. There is no doubt that in so far as technical education is concerned the German empire particularly stands first and foremost. Never has a country risen more rapidly in a commercial and industrial sense than the great nation of Germany. It owes its rise and progress almost entirely to the very methodical training that enters into all its seats of learning, its colleges and particularly its technical schools. Germany, if it does anything, does it well, does it thoroughly and in that respect perhaps the German empire stands first in having, during the last quarter of a century, emerged from the condition of an almost non-productive nation until to-day it stands as the most formidable rival of all the industrial nations of the earth. The United States makes a very good second; it has devoted immense amounts to education and has spent enormous sums in the advancement of technical training. In the city of Boston alone I think I am within the mark when I say that there are at least twenty-five technical and manual training schools and that in this city more is expended than in the whole Dominion of Canada for the same purpose. That ought to be sufficient to show us that these various countries with which Canada is entering into competition in some lines are thoroughly alive to the situation, and are spending millions of money to advance this particular object.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that by the federal or the state authority ?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. In some instances it is done by the federal authority or largely by the federal authority, and in other instances by the various states and provinces; but I believe the parental government, in Germany, Great Britain and the United States at any rate, contribute large amounts.

We have done something in this country along this line, even under the Dominion government. For instance, this country has established experimental farms, to which forestry and other departments have been added; provided for general engineering instruction in the Kingston Military College ; established marine biological research stations in the Georgian bay and at Gaspé, and at Kingston a school of navigation; given financial aid to industrial exhibitions, the Royal Society of Canada, art schools, a national art gallery, and the Canadian Mining Institute; established what may be called an incipient bureau of standards, having charge also of adulteration of food stuffs ; provided for special lectures on the metric system by a university professor, also special experiments in connection with electric smelting ; provided for the education of Indians, as well as education in the territories : made some provision for a national museum : through the Intercolonial Railway pays $2,500 yearly to the railway department of McGill University. In all these respects the Dominion government has made a beginning and none of these efforts have been resented by any of the provinces so far as I know.

Canada is endeavouring to compete with various countries, and is successfully competing in certain lines ; but we might compete satisfactorily in a great many more if we had a thorough system of technical training in the country. I sometimes hold the Finance Minister responsible when our industries do not prosper, and attribute the fact to the tariff; but I admit that the tariff cannot do everything. In the last analysis we must have competent captains of industry and up-to-date methods ; otherwise we cannot compete with foreign countries successfully. Economy of production, increasing the output and reducing the cost, are the first elements of successful competition. As the Canadian market is comparatively narrow in some lines which we are capable of producing, we must naturally look abroad ; and when we have to come into fierce competition with immense industries in the United States, Germany, Great Britain, France and all the other live nations of the world, we must have the very best means at our disposal and the very best available information. It goes without saying, therefore, that we must have a skilled body of artisans in this country. I am proud to say that on this question we have labour and capital working side by side. Technical education has ben endorsed by the Trades and Labour Council on many occasions, in resolutions which have been forwarded to the ministry. The workingmen of Canada, who are as intelligent perhaps as any band of artisans in the world, know that they are capable of still further improvement, and that that can be brought about only by the adoption of the best methods of instruction on the part of men who thoroughly understand the propositions which they lay before those whom they are endeavouring to instruct. We have not in this country at the present time,when all has been said, a thoroughly equipped technical institute. Surely it is time that, in a matter of this importance, we should make a beginning by having an inquiry. As a matter of economy such an inquiry can be best pursued by one central head representating the whole country. It may be that after this inquiry has been made, a national institute of technology will be one of the first requisites. I think it is a project into which this government might well embark. It would mark a new era in Canada's industrial progress. The manufacturer and the artisan are both alive to this great movement. This government has received from time to time deputations urging the necessity of this step, and if they accede to the request of my hon. friend who has proposed this resolution, which would be going only a very little way, they will be doing a great national good. It might be well to read a resolution which was passed by the labour convention in December, 1905:

Be it resolved, that the incoming executive be instructed to appeal to the federal and provincial governments to enact such legislation, and make such appropriations as will permit the mechanic and artisan of Canada the privilege of education on lines of electric and civil engineering, chemistry, wood-carving, modelling, &c. In spite of the fact that the Dominion government in the past has said that, according to the British North America Act, all education is relegated to the provincial governments, this matter is one of national import, and could be taken up under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and be well within their scope.

There is no jealousy in that resolution, and when I am advocating technical education, I do not wish to imply that it will turn out, and at the government's expense, what are called by some scab mechanics, who have had only a slight experience, to compete with those who have put in three years or five years at apprenticeship in some of great foundries, factories or shops. That is not what I understand is intended to be accomplished at all, but the object is to develop young men along the line of their inclination, and thus indicate to them what their calling in life should be. In my view, the main purpose of education is to give a young man that necessary training which will equip him for the battle of life. If you can give him polish as well, by all means give it; but above all, give him the skill to handle the tools of his trade and to develop the arts of the mechanic. This can be done by this government, and they will find that no objection will be raised by the mechanic or the artisan to schools of technology. I do not think that at this stage it is necessary or perhaps even desirable to expend any large sum of public money for this object. We should have first a thorough inquiry by competent men who have given a great deal of study to the subject. I do not profess to have given it anything like the study its importance demands, but I have had the honour of working with some who have given it a great deal of study. I might mention one,—Mr. J. D. Allan, chairman of the Technical Education Committee of the Toronto Board of Trade. He has visited various countries of Europe, as well as the United States, on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade, and often at his own expense, visiting many of the up-to-date schools of technology on both continents, and is I think as experienced on this question as any other man in Canada; and on many occasions he has expressed himself as being of the belief that it is the greatest educational need of Canada to-day. That is the practical view of a man who has given it very careful study. I for one will be only too glad to see in the near future a move made which would result in placing Canada a long way ahead of where she is. We often think that we are almost perfect, that we know pretty nearly everything, that we have splendid universities and schools.

Well, while I have not a word to say in depreciation of any of our great educational institutions, there is not one which gives anything like the thorough attention to this great problem which its importance demands. That is not only my own opinion, but that of all those who have travelled abroad and have seen what is being done in the great industrial centres of the world. In those centres they recognize that every inch in the way of competition must be gained by up-to-date methods and most thorough training and skilful work. Any man who is not thoroughly skilled in his profession to-day is not prepared to take the high place that he should in whatever walk of life he has entered; and it is to be deplored that on many occasions, in the past five or ten years, many of our great railway companies and industrial establishments have had, as a rule rather than the exception, to procure their engineers and other skilled men from abroad. That is not due to the lack of intelligence of young Canadians, but because our young men have not had the opportunity of acquiring the necessary information in these technical branches to qualify them to fill the most important positions. Take our Transcontinental Railway now being built. We have had discussions in the newspapers regarding the number of young men and others brought from outside countries to direct the engineering work on that road, and we have to deplore the fact that the engineers and others who have had to solve the great problem of laying out that line have been brought from the outside. When public money is being expended, it is good policy for the government to employ, as much as possible, our young men; and in order to be able to do this, we ought to have a national school of technology which will furnish us with young men properly equipped to hold their own against those of any other country. In order to accomplish this we should first appoint a commission of inquiry and then be prepared to spend the necessary money; for it is evident that until we have a thorough equipped, up-to-date school of technology, we shall never be able to meet the requirements of this great industrial nation.

It may be said that the comparison between agriculture and other industrial pursuits is not well taken, but there are many matters, even in agriculture, not thoroughly understood in Canada. Methods are being devised every day for cheapening products and increasing the output of an acre of land. So that a school of technology will be of value in agriculture as well as in manufacturing industries and the building of railways and other great works. There is a tremendous expansion in the development of the science of agriculture at present. The inoculation of soils and many other matters of that kind are being dealt with in a very skilful manner, and it is quite possible that a school of technology would result in a great amount of information and training which would benefit the agriculturist just as much as the mechanic. But whether it would or not, we have our national experimental farm, so that our farmers need not complain if we give our artisans the same chance that they are given. It must be remembered that we are to-day, to a considerable extent, an industrial as well as an agricultural people. We employ half a million of souls in our manufactories. Counting four to a family, that would mean a population of 2,000,000, or, taking an average of five in a family, that would mean that 2,500,000, or nearly one-half of our population, are looking to the various industries of this country, outside of agriculture, at present to provide them with a livelihood. Is it not, therefore, only right and proper that this government, having recognized the demands of the agricultural interest, should go a step further and give just as technical a training to our young men in other lines?

There is no need of endangering provincial rights. We have lost too much time already; we are falling behind in the race and though we think we are qualified to turn out many classes of goods to the best advantage, yet, if we go abroad and see what is being done there we will return home with the conviction that there are many things we have yet to learn in Canada. Lord Rosebery has for many years been delivering addresses throughout Great Britain endeavouring to arouse the people of that country to the necessity of acquiring technical education. His idea is that all they need is a high grade of technical training in Great Britain and that they do not need protection, but in that he has gone much further than I would go. I admit that a tariff cannot do all; we must have brains as well as a tariff; we must produce our goods in an intelligent way, and if we do that then with protection we are bound to succeed. I do not think any one will argue that goods should be protected that are not worthy of commanding a high standing in the markets of the world, and goods cannot be produced in the highest state of efficiency unless we have the very best skilled training the world can give. A college of technology would give to the skilled artisan, the skilled engineer, and all others engaged in occupations requiring technical skill, a training in the most recent development of industrial production. The world is not standing still; many new inventions have sprung into existence within recent years. Fifteen or twenty years ago we knew nothing of electricity but now new words have to be coined in our language to meet the requirements of that science. A technical college is absolutely necessary in order that our people should be trained in the latest developments in the science of electricity. Then in the near future it is expected that we will have aerial navigation and I understand that Doctor Bell has successfully experimented with a flying machine in Nova Scotia so that I may congratulate our friends from the lower provinces that they have and are in the lead in that invention. This is an age of rapid development, and it is developing more rapidly than we sometimes realize, and in order to keep up with the procession we must be put in a position to acquire the very best and latest knowledge that is obtainable. We cannot get that knowledge unless we have facilities for technical training of the very highest order. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that some of the monuments which this government are handing down to posterity I do not approve of, but I do believe that if they established a national technical school in the Dominion of Canada they would show their sagacity and would perpetuate their memory in a way that would merit the commendation of people of all political opinions. I cannot speak too strongly in support of this motion. I have studied the question some, and I have a mass of information concerning it here which I will not give to the House at this late hour, but I do wish to point out that the establishment of technical training in the Dominion has been endorsed by the board of trade of Toronto, by the board of trade of my own town of Brantford and by almost all the boards of trade of the different cities and towns in Canada. The Manufacturers' Association which is representative of the manufacturers of Canada has asked the government to take this step, the artisans of the country in meeting assembled have time and again passed resolutions urging the government to take action in this direction, and seeing that these organizations representing almost one half of the people of Canada, have urged the establishment of such training college I think the government should not hesitate. Now is the time to act; we have already lost too much time, let us lose no more, let this step be taken immediately. I have great pleasure in heartily concurring in the resolution of my hon. friend. He should be thanked by this House for having brought the subject up for discussion, and I regret that he has not had the encouragement to-night, by the attendance of members, that he should have on this great question. I am sure however that all the members of this House will be a unit in backing up any intelligent action that may be taken by the government in reference to this matter. I trust that in the near future we may have established a national school of technology which will be worthy of the industrial people of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Sproule the debate was adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What will be taken up to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. In accordance with the understanding arrived at on Friday afternoon, a motion will be made for Supply with the intention of affording an opportunity to discuss the question of the seed grain regulations. There is another matter which the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) mentioned in connection with the Railway Department, that he desired to bring up on Tuesday. The House will be moved into Committee of Supply for the discussion of these subjects, and in committee the estimates of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be taken up.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1908.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I beg to move that on Thursday next the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution, standing in my name on the Order Paper. His Excellency approves the substance of this resolution and commends it to the consideration of the House :—

Resolved, that it is expedient to make better provision for the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction within Canada in accordance with the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890; and also to provide that, by way of compensation for loss of salary or emoluments of office, there may be granted to each of the present judges in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court who held office on the first day of September, 1907, and to the Marshal of the Quebec Admiralty district, an annuity equal to two-thirds of his salary, to the registrar of the Toronto Admiralty district, the sum of $750, to the registrar of the Nova Scotia Admiralty district the sum of $1,000, to the registrar of the New Brunswick Admiralty district the sum of $1,500.

Mr. H. GERVAIS (Montreal, St. James). I think we ought to have the delay extended until the next week, as the Montreal bar is quite interested, and I would like to give it a chance to be heard from. It would not be possible for me to discuss this next Thursday. The Montreal bar is quite opposed to the principle of this resolution. The Montreal admiralty district has now more cases than all the other districts put together. The council of the Montreal bar is having to-day a meeting to protest against this would-be legislation. That proposed Bill, should it become law, would be detrimental to the maritime interests of Montreal.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is merely formal.

MANITOBA BOUNDARIES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend, the First Minister, if he can inform the House when the Bill for the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba will be brought down ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I am sorry that I cannot give any information to-day to my hon. friend.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to the fact that the return which was brought down on an Order of the House in 1906, sessional paper No. 113, for original tenders in the case of leases 1158, 1175, 1192, 1219, 1213, and 1232, and which seems to have strayed from the knowledge of the minister, has been all the time safely stowed away in the record department of this House under the care of Mr. Colwell, their proper custodian. I took upon myself, seeing that the Minister of the Interior would not, to look up this return, and I found there was one number, 1213, in which the original tenders were not brought down. I would ask my hon. friend if he would bring down the original tenders in that case so as to complete the record. I have great pleasure in telling him that he will find the lost articles in the record department.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). It is interesting to know where they are, but I have no authority to replace them in the department.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that the papers ordered with reference to the Hillsborough bridge and Haney claim have not been brought down, so that it is impossible for me to take that matter up to-day as I intended. I have received a note from my right hon. friend with reference to it. The other matter to which I refer, we shall defer until the next day in view of the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I thought we would be able to go on with the Hillsborough matter, but now find it impossible.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). I do not recollect that the papers were moved for.

Mr. FOSTER. They were moved for on the 22nd January, and I called attention to it the other day.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I moved for the papers two weeks ago.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), what is the authority of the latter for stating, as he did, in reply to a question in this House a few days ago, that certain expenses of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper in connection with the Behring Sea Commission in Paris had been paid by the British government. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper says the statement is quite unfounded, and I should like to know what authority the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had for making that statement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will call his attention to the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), and in his absence to the right hon. the First Minister, to the fact that the hon. gentleman has not brought down a single return asked for, by myself at least, during the whole session, and has pleaded on several occasions that he was hard up for time and clerks. On December 8, and December 18, and later on certain papers—not very important, many of them—were called for and the returns ordered, but I have not yet received a single one. Among these were papers with reference to travelling expenses which could be got up in fifteen minutes. The estimates of Marine and Fisheries are to be on this afternoon, and I will urge the hon. minister to have more expedition used in his department.

I. C. R. EMPLOYEES.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I wish to repeat a question which I put to the right hon. the First Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Railways, some time ago. I then read the following circular:—

Intercolonial Railway.
Office of the General Manager,
Moncton, New Brunswick, December 23, 1907.

Circular No. 381.

To employees.

The Minister of Railways, having been requested to allow employees of the railway to offer themselves as candidates for and to accept municipal offices, has carefully considered the matter, and his conclusion is, that, generally, it is not in the interest of the railway that this should be allowed and that only in such very exceptional cases as the minister may determine, the public interest can be served without the interest of the railway being prejudicially affected, shall employees be permitted to offer and accept such offices. This decision is based upon the usual policy of railways in such matters, such policy being considered on the whole as best adapted to serve the respective interests most concerned.

D. POTTINGER,
General Manager.

I understand that two employees of the Intercolonial Railway, Mr. Blair and Mr. Munro, have been candidates for councillor in the municipal elections in Stellarton. What are the exceptional and justifiable reasons in their case which enabled them to run in open violation of that circular?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I dispute the concluding remark of my hon. friend, that there has been a violation of the circular. The circular is a repetition of one issued before my time in the department. It will be readily understood that there are circumstances under which it is better for employees of what we might call public corporations not to take part in municipal affairs, the chief reason being that the holding of such office might interfere with the business of the railway, and another reason that it might interfere with the performance of their duties. There are places I am told on the Intercolonial Railway where really the men whom the people want are employed on the Intercolonial Railway. It is a hard proposition to say to any man that because he happens to be a carpenter or something on the Intercolonial Railway, or any other railway, he must therefore of necessity give up his citizenship. I hesitate to do that unless some harm is likely to come to the business of the railway. A cast-iron rule cannot be made without being unjust to the men and unjust sometimes to the locality. I do not want to be that. If it is going to interfere with the business of the railway or with the efficiency of the work performed by the employee, I say the employee should not take part in municipal politics; he should say whether he will work for the railway or for the municipality. But belonging to a municipal council does not take up so very much time, and I would hesitate to step in and say to any man: You must give up your citizenship because you happen to occupy some subordinate position on the Intercolonial Railway or any other railway.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the minister misunderstood me; I simply asked what were the exceptional circumstances in this instance which justified the action of these men?

Mr. GRAHAM. That circular, I presume, is by the manager, not by the minister.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes; signed by Mr. Pottinger.

Mr. GRAHAM. The real reason I imagine would largely be shown in the result of the election. These men were chosen by large majorities as really the men the people in that locality wanted to transact their business, as being best fitted to do so; and unless there is some reason shown or that they will neglect their duties, I do not think we are justified in depriving them of citizenship because they are working for the Intercolonial Railway any more than for the Grand Trunk.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the minister mean that the extraordinary reason arises after the election?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend says the extraordinary reason.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am quoting the circular.

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is 'exceptional.'

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend did not say that, he said 'extraordinary,' with the emphasis on the adjective.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will repeat the question with the word 'exceptional' substituted.

Mr. GRAHAM. I imagine that the majority was exceptional. My hon. friend knows the position I take without playing upon words. The Grand Trunk in my town allowed one of its employees to be for years a member of the town council and of the school board; and I repeat that I hesitate to forbid a man to take part in such work because he happens to have some employment on the railway.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CLAUDE MACDONELL. On Nov. 28, 1906, Orders of the House were issued for the following returns which have not yet come down:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents and other papers had or passing between the government of the province of Ontario and the Dominion government relative to the application of the Ontario government for a subsidy to aid in the construction by the Ontario government of the Temiscaming and Northern Ontario Railway. —Mr. A. C. Macdonell.

And also:

For a return containing a copy of the correspondence between the Imperial government and the Dominion government in regard to taking over the naval dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt.

On the 28th of January, 1907, returns were ordered regarding the merchant marine of Canada and for a copy of correspondence between the imperial authorities and the Dominion government regarding the establishment of a Canadian naval reserve. About a month ago I mentioned these returns, and the Prime Minister said he would look into the matter. I gave him the particulars of the returns, but they have not yet been brought down. I should like to have them at a reasonably early date. They were asked for over a year ago.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has inquired whether the return concerning the accounting of the books of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has yet been brought down. I have had inquiries made again, and find that it has been written and a comparison is now being made. It is a very voluminous report, but it will be ready immediately.

Mr. FOSTER. There are three or four others which are not voluminous.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have one here.

SUPPLY — POSTMASTER AT WOODSTOCK.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. OSWALD S. CROCKET (York, N.B.). I desire to call attention to an answer made by the Postmaster General yesterday to a question standing in my name on the Order Paper, with reference to which it seems to me there must be some mistake. The question was as follows:

1. What is the salary of Mr. Charles L. Smith, postmaster at Woodstock, N.B.?
2. Has the Postmaster General's attention been called to statements to the effect that Mr. Smith has been taking an active part in the general provincial election campaign now in progress in New Brunswick, and that he was one of the speakers at a political meeting held at Woodstock in the interests of the government candidates in Carleton county on February 1?
3. Does the department allow its officers to take such part in either federal or provincial elections?
4. If not, what action has been taken or is it proposed to take in the case of Mr. Smith?

The Postmaster General replied:

1. Salary and allowances, $3,376,96.
(Out of this amount the postmaster provides for the salaries of his staff and the expenses of his office.)
2. No.
3. No.
4. Answered by 2 and 3.

It will be seen that in answer to the second question as to whether the attention of the Postmaster General had been called to the fact that the postmaster had been taking part in an election and had addressed a political meeting, he answered: No. I may say that I myself addressed a letter to the Postmaster General on February 6, before I put the question on the Order Paper, inclosing a clipping from the Woodstock 'Press,' to the effect that the postmaster had addressed a meeting on behalf of the Liberal candidates at that town, and stating furthermore that I had received a letter from Woodstock reporting that he had done so, and asking me to bring the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General. I received from the Postmaster General a letter dated February 7th—Friday last—acknowledging receipt of my communication and referring to the inclosed clipping. And yet, notwithstanding that, the minister in the House——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket) please read the letter.

Mr. CROCKET. The letter is as follows:

Ottawa, February 7, 1908.

Dear Mr. Crocket,—I have your letter dated February 6, inclosing a newspaper clipping from the Woodstock 'Press,' in which it is stated that Postmaster Smith was the principal speaker at a government party rally, in connection with the provincial elections in New Brunswick.

In answer, I beg to state that postmasters are not allowed to actively engage in politics, and Mr. Smith will, therefore, be written to at once in regard to your complaints.

Thanking you for bringing this matter to my attention, I remain,

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) RODOLPHE LEMIEUX.

Oswald S. Crocket, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Notwithstanding that, the Postmaster General yesterday put upon record in this House an answer to the effect that his attention had not been called to this matter. It seems to me that this calls for some explanation.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). I do not think the two statements are contradictory at all. I received, the other day, from my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket), a letter inclosing a newspaper clipping which stated that the postmaster of Woodstock, N.B., had addressed a public meeting. The hon. gentleman did not call my attention, by stating that he knew the fact that this postmaster had taken part in a political meeting, but he simply sent this newspaper clipping. I answered promptly and said that, if it were true that the postmaster had taken part in politics, he had no right to do so, and that his attention would be called to the point. But, when the question is put whether my attention had been called to the fact that the postmaster had taken part in the public meeting, I answered that my attention had not been so called—that is, no complaint had been made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well, where is the contradictions? Did not I give my hon. friend the answer he wanted? He brought to my attention a newspaper clipping making a certain statement, and I said that, if the statement was true, the postmaster of whom the statement was made was in the wrong, and that I would tell that postmaster that he must not take part in political meetings. I think I was perfectly candid in my answer.

Mr. CROCKET. The question was not: Has the Postmaster General's attention been called to a fact, but has it been called 'to statements to the effect that'—and so on. So, the ground which the Postmaster General now takes falls away. His attention certainly was called to the statement made in the newspaper published in Woodstock. Notwithstanding that, the Postmaster General answered 'No.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. With your permission, Mr. Speaker: I am not accustomed to play upon words, and, even were that my custom, my knowledge of English is too limited for me to play upon words in that language. I might be able to play upon words in French, but not in English. If my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket) had complained to me personally that the postmaster at Woodstock had taken part in a political meeting, I certainly would have answered that my attention had been called to the fact. But a newspaper cannot call my attention. The clipping was inclosed in the letter sent to me, and I think I dealt fully with that clipping when I said that if the statements made in it were true, the postmaster was in fault.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the Postmaster General tell us what is the population of Woodstock, N.B., and what is the salary of the postmaster there?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I stated yesterday in my answer the amount of the salary of the postmaster. This postmaster receives a salary based on the revenue of the office. It is on what is called the 'semi-staff system'—out of the total amount, the postmaster pays his employees. This is the rule in many places.

Mr. BENNETT. Will there be an investigation as to the charge? And, if the postmaster is shown to have been guilty of addressing a public meeting, will he be dismissed from the service?

Mr. LEMIEUX. First of all, I have answered that there is no charge. Even my hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket) has made no charge. He says simply that he has received a clipping from a newspaper stating that the postmaster there had taken part in a political meeting—

Mr. CROCKET. And also a letter stating that he had done so.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the hon. gentleman sent me the letter? Has he even given me the name of the writer?

Mr. CROCKET. I stated that I had received a letter from Woodstock, asking me to bring the fact to his attention.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But I have no such letter and no such charge is made. If my hon. friend will send the letter, and will make a charge, an investigation will take place and justice will be done.

Mr. CROCKET. What I reported surely should be enough to put the minister upon inquiry and cause an investigation to be made.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). I think the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) takes a rather extraordinary position in this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh,

Mr. LENNOX. Surely the government is not going to take the position in every thing that we have to be constantly making charges in order to keep them up to the mark. Surely, the government, if they have reasonable ground to believe that some infraction of what is right has taken place will feel it their duty to inquire. In this case first, the minister has a statement forwarded by a member of this House. It is true this statement is in the form of a newspaper clipping. But that newspaper clipping is accompanied by a letter from a member of this House. This means, if it means anything, that the member who writes the letter desires to call the attention of the minister to the statement.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What was my answer ?

Mr. LENNOX. We will come to that. It means, too, that the member who writes the letter thinks there is something in the statement, or he would not forward it to the minister. The minister's answer is satisfactory for the time being. But, yesterday, the minister answers a question in this House in a way which, I am bound to say, is not satisfactory. And I am bound to say also that, if this be the measure of the reliance we can place upon answers which we cannot test, it is very unsatisfactory. In the majority of cases, we must take the answers as we get them, and we do not know whether they are correct or not. Here a newspaper, containing serious charges against the postmaster is forwarded to the Postmaster General, and within a day or two the Postmaster General is called upon to answer the question :

Has the Postmaster General's attention been called to statements——

Not to the fact.

—that Mr. Smith has been taking an active part in the general provincial election campaign ?

And the minister answers 'No.' Now, in addition, the hon. member (Mr. Crocket) states that he has a letter from the riding making a complaint to him of the circumstances. And the minister says to the House that no charge has been made, and therefore he will not have an investigation. I do not suggest that we should have a commission appointed, or anything of that kind but I do submit that, when statements of this kind are brought to the attention of the minister, he should not insist upon a formal charge being made, but should inquire into the matter. That is the least we should expect. I regret very much that the minister has taken the position, which, I think, has been taken here too often. I regret to hear again this taunt flung across the House, 'Make your charge.' We are not bound to be detectives and accusers on all occasions. We discharge our duty if we bring these matters to the attention of the government. The government ought to be able to find them out themselves, but they do not seem to be able to do so. We give them the information, and then in answer to our questions concerning the matter, they give us information that is faulty. And, when it is shown that complaints have been made by a member of this House, the minister tells us that no charge is made. He folds his arms and says : 'I will make no investigation.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. I did not say that.

Mr. LENNOX. He says that no charge is made and that there is nothing to investigate. I say it is not our duty to make a charge. An hon. member has brought the matter to the attention of the House, and it is the duty of the minister to be on the alert, to learn the truth of the matter, and, if it prove true, to see to it that the postmaster who is at fault shall receive the punishment which he deserves.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is exactly what I have done. I received a letter from the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) stating that he had received a newspaper, making the statement that the postmaster at Woodstock, New Brunswick, had taken part in a political meeting. I immediately answered that I would call the attention of the postmaster to the fact that he was not allowed to take part in political meetings. Now, the least we can do is to await the answer of the postmaster. As regards the answer that I gave yesterday, of course, perhaps I did not read the question very——

Mr. FOSTER. Carefully.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not carefully, but very closely. I simply took the question to be if my attention had been called to a statement made and I answered, 'Yes,' instead of 'no.' I thought that my hon. friend meant if any charge had been made against that postmaster. No charge has been made.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS IN MUNICIPAL POLITICS.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to this circular again because it is the second instance that we have had lately where, in my judgment, there appears to be a disposition to violate the amenities which should exist as between employees of the country and the people. It is only a few days ago that I drew the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to the fact that one Mr. Fitch, down in Nova Scotia, who is an inspector of fruit and who had a particular duty to do in that locality was running for the municipal council and was a very strong and active partisan as well. I then stated that, in my judgment, this man could not properly do his duty as between those who were friends of his and working hard for him and those who were opponents of his and working hard against him, because of the fact that he was obliged to perform a duty to the country which was to inspect the packing of apples belonging to both. It is not human nature to expect that he will be as friendly towards his opponents as towards his friends. It is not human nature to expect that he will not be more kindly disposed towards one than the other and in view of that fact I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he did not think it his duty, or the duty of his department, to instruct this man that it was not a proper thing for him to be running for public office in the locality in which he lived and in which he was to perform his duty as an officer of the government. The minister passed it over, I thought, with a rather insignificant or cursory reply in which he said that he did not think that there was anything wrong in it and that it was not his place to look after it. Now we have another example in the Department of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does my hon. friend say that the case to which he referred was in New Bunswick?

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) the right to speak twice on the same question?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, we are going into Committee of Supply and this is a grievance.

Mr. SPEAKER. On the former occasion the hon. gentleman merely asked a question on the orders of the day being called.

Mr. TALBOT. But the hon. gentleman's former speech was made on the same point.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all. I, simply to establish a basis for the question, was obliged to read this notice, and if the hon. gentleman had been paying any attention to it, should have recognized that. Here is a specific circular issued by the manager of the road on the 23rd of December, 1907, for some purpose or other. The purpose is disclosed in the circular. It reads :

To employees.

The Minister of Railways——

I assume that means the present minister because I think he was minister at the time.

The Minister of Railways, having been requested to allow employees of the railway to offer themselves as candidates for and to accept municipal offices has carefully considered the matter, and his conclusion is, that, generally, it is not in the interest of the railway that this should be allowed and that only in such very exceptional cases as the minister may determine——

Is it allowable. I put two questions, first, Did the minister determine that it should be allowable and upon what grounds, or what very exceptional circumstances were present in this case that justified these two employees of the Intercolonial Railway in running for office ? The minister seemed to pass it off in a somewhat indifferent way and did not think that it was a matter of importance for him to consider at all. But, I assume that he has considered it because of the fact that we have this notice, and I assume that there were very exceptional circumstances which justified it. In my judgment it is not a good plan. Take this particular case. There is a municipal council and there are two employees of the railway who are running for that municipal council. They might be prominent members of that council and cases might arise where the interests of the railway were at variance with those of the municipality. Does the minister then think it would be right to allow employees of the government or of the railway to run that municipal council ? He says that it is only in very exceptional cases that they ought to be so allowed. He has given no strong exceptions that exist in this case which would not apply in other cases and by which he might justify this departure from what appears to be sound policy. But, these two men have been allowed to run. I do not know whether they were elected or not ; presumably they have been elected and if so they must have been elected on the advice of the minister that there were exceptional reasons or circumstances in their case that justified them in offering themselves as candidates, as otherwise, he would not have allowed it. Then it is assumed as well that he did consider it. Did he consider these cases ? The circular says that it is only in such cases that they have considered that they are permitted to go on and stand for election to a municipal council. I think the minister has not given us all the information that he should in this case. I think he should give us more grounds as well why, as a matter of general principle, it is wise to allow employees of the government to run for municipal councils in their respective localities because there are questions which come up from time to time and, in my judgment, it would not be proper to have a council loaded up with the supporters or employees of a railway company where the interests of the municipality have to be considered by that council, and where, undoubtedly, the employees of that company would be most likely to give more consideration to the interest of the railway than that of the municipality. I think the minister should give us a further explanation of it in order to justify his action in allowing these two men to run for municipal office. It was either right or wrong. As a matter of general principle he admits it or he does not admit it. I rather understood from his remarks that personally he had no serious objection to it at all. It was because of the scarcity of men down there that he had no serious objection to it. If there were no serious objection to it why issue this circular and say that there are serious objections to it and that it is only where there are very exceptional circumstances that will justify it that it will be allowed. I think that he should tell us what were the exceptional circumstances in this case that did justify it.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker, whatever blame or credit attaches or whatever may be said of the judgment which is displayed in that circular, the responsibility is mine. One or two years ago this matter came before the department and after a great deal of study I concluded that, generally speaking, employees of the Intercolonial Railway should not engage in civic politics particularly where there was a conflict between their duties as employees of the railway and their duties as officials of the citizens. I can very well understand that it would be very reprehensible in the interest of the railway to allow certain officials to seek the popular franchise at the hands of their fellows. It might affect the discipline. If they held certain positions it might affect them in the discharge of the duty which they owed to the railway. There are other officials whose duty in no way conflict with their duties as civic officials.

Mr. SPROULE. Part of the duty of the municipal council is to revise the assessment roll. I do not know whether this railway property is assessable or not, but if it be, the duty of the municipal councillors would be to revise the assessment roll and perhaps to tax the railway.

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) was a lawyer he would know that the Intercolonial Railway is not subject to taxation.

Mr. BERGERON. Was that circular issued when my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) was minister?

Mr. EMMERSON. The rule was laid down by me some few years ago and it seems to have been renewed by the general manager as a reminder. The rule was in harmony with the rule adopted by the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I remember distinctly that an application came from Stellarton for permission for certain Intercolonial Railway employees to engage in civic politics, because the population of Stellarton is almost wholly composed of railway employees, and the citizens asked that certain of them should be allowed to take official positions. I looked into the question, and judging by the nature of the employment of the men, I concluded that the interests of the citizens would be advanced by granting the permission and that at the same time no injury could accrue to the railway. I assume that the gentlemen who are in question in this case are the same employees who are continuing in office. There have been some cases in the city of Moncton in which I refused this permission, because the employees who were sought to engage in civic politics had such a relationship to other employees that it would endanger the discipline of the road in my opinion and so I withheld consent. The same is true with respect to other sections of the Intercolonial Railway. It is my opinion a fair proposition to lay down as a general rule that railway employees shall not engage in civic politics, but there are circumstances under which it would be in the public interest as well as in the interest of the railway that permission should be given employees to accept municipal office. I followed that rule, and I do not think the present Minister of Railways could have any very strong reason for departing therefrom.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). The remarks made by my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) are no doubt very instructive from the standpoint of the public interest and from the historical standpoint as well. This circular may follow the lines of one previously issued by him, but it is dated the 23rd of December last when he had ceased to hold the office of Minister of Railways. No one is finding fault with the terms of the circular and no one denies that in certain cases government employees should have this permission. But it has been brought to the attention of the minister that in Stellarton or New Glasgow, I don't know which, two candidates for municipal office are employees of the Intercolonial Railway and the Minister of Railways is asked: What are the circumstances that place these cases among the very exceptional cases which are referred to in this circular? Surely that is a proper question to ask of the minister in charge of the department, but for some reason known to himself, the minister has not yet given an answer. The subject has been brought to the attention of the government on two or three occasions and during the illness of the Minister of Railways we understood the information could not be given, but now that he is present he should be prepared to give the information at once or to say that he will procure it at the earliest possible moment. It would save the time of the House if the minister would take that course.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). As the question of my hon. friend from East Grey relates to my constituency I wish to say a word. I might first point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) that a conflict between the interests of the railway and the interests of the municipality in reference to assessment cannot possibly arise along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, because all that property is the property of His Majesty and is exempt from assessment. I cannot fancy upon what principle the Railway Department should restrict the railway men in the smaller towns along the line of the Intercolonial from exercising to the fullest extent their right to represent the community in which they live in the municipal council. The department seems to have adopted some rule, following the example of the larger railway companies dealing with their employees, but personally I cannot see much reason for it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is in consequence of that rule the question has been asked.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I know. However, in the case of Stellarton there are conditions which not only warrant the minister in permitting these men to run as municipal councillors, but which would cause him to adopt a very unfair and improper course towards the railway men of that town if he refused permission. Stellarton has a population of about 3,000 and with the exception of the merchants in that community the population is divided betwen the employees of the Acadia Coal Company and the employees of the Intercolonial. The railway men living in Stellarton have good homes; they are splendid citizens, and altogether they are high-class men. To say that these men should be debarred from taking part in civic affairs because they happen to be government employees would be unfair under the circumstances. The Acadia Coal Company is probably the largest individual taxpayer in that town, and if the employees of that company are the only people to be permitted to occupy seats on the council board, the House will at once see that the railway men who have property interests would be put at a great disadvantage. There are, therefore, circumstances of an exceptional character existing in Stellarton. I see no reason at all why these railway men should not be allowed to take part in municipal affairs.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BERGERON. On the 16th of December last I put two questions to the Minister of Public Works which I thought could be very briefly answered, but he asked me to move for returns, which was done. The returns have not yet been brought down, and as the minister is not in his seat, I would like some of his colleagues to call his attention to the matter. They are very short and should have been brought down long ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What are they about?

Mr. BERGERON. About dredging in Quebec, in the river between Charlemagne and Terrebonne and in the Rivière la Graisse at Rigaud.

Mr. T. CHISHOLM. In December last I moved for a return in regard to fishing licenses in the province of Saskatchewan. This is an important matter to the people who are depending this hard year on the privilege of going out to fish, and I would ask the minister to bring the return down as soon as possible.

Mr. BRODEUR. The return was brought down yesterday.

SEED GRAIN FOR THE NORTHWEST.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, when the estimates to make provision for supplying seed grain to the settlers in the northwestern provinces were put through the House last Friday, it was done under somewhat unusual circumstances. Those estimates had been brought down at a very late period, and it was realized that there should be no delay in enabling the government to take the necessary steps to have the seed grain made available. The work of purchasing grain, testing its germinating powers, and making all the other arrangements necessary for the distribution would inevitably take considerable time and the gentlemen on this side of the House considered it advisable to allow the estimates to go through at the earliest possible moment. For that reason no discussion took place on the regulations for the distribution. Those regulations were brought down at the very last moment, and it was quite impossible for persons who then saw them for the first time, to acquaint themselves thoroughly with them in order to discuss the question intelligently. They thought it was essential to ascertain to whom advances were to be made, and the terms and conditions under which those advances were to be made. It was on the understanding that the regulations would be subject to full discussion in this House that the estimates were allowed to be put through so speedily. I have looked through those regulations during the last few days, and while I find that in many details they are open to improvement, there is one very important detail which I think this House should discuss at length, and in respect to which it should arrive at some decision. I refer to the provision that the money advanced for the purchase of this grain shall be repayable in one year. Before I sit down I propose to move that in the opinion of this House the time should be extended in order to make it three years. I do not intend to make this motion a vote of want of confidence, and I sincerely trust that the government will not consider it as such. Indeed, if the governement would agree to the suggestion I make, I would not be prepared to press the amendement to a vote. But this seems to me to be the only opportunity which is likely to be given to us under the circumstances of bringing this matter forward in a definite way, so that the opinion of the members of this House can be arrived at in regard to it. If the regulations had been in our hands for some time previous to the estimates being brought down, and those estimates had been laid before the House at an earlier day, no doubt we could have discussed this question to very much greater advantage in committee than it is possible to do under the circumstances at the present time. But the estimates have already been put through, so I find it necessary to take up the matter in this form at this stage. I wish to point out, first of all, that the prices of seed grain of all kinds are abnormally high at present in the west. In the latest papers which we have received from Winnipeg, I notice that the prices of wheat of the various grades mentioned in the regulations vary from ninety-three cents to $1.08 a bushel, and the prices of oats are relatively as high. If you add to these prices the additional expenses which are to be charged against the seed wheat, you will find that it will come to a very high price to the settler. According to the regulations you have to add to the cost, the storage, commission, insurance, sacking, freight and all other proper charges. The prices of grain at present are abnormally high, but there is no reason to suppose that they will continuue so high for any length of time.

Mr. CRAWFORD: Are those Winnipeg or Fort Williams prices?

Mr. LAKE. I think Fort William. They are given as the closing prices on the Winnipeg Exchange. If the prices should drop to the average or below the average, it will be found that the settler will have to repay in the fall two or possibly even as much as three bushels in order to cover the price of one bushel which he received. Further than that, if the yield be only the average or below it—because in those districts where there is necessity for seed grain, it was mainly due to the fact that it was owing to the heavy crop of straw on the ground that the grain itself was so badly damaged—if the yield in those districts should be the average or even below the average, it will be found a most serious drain on the resources of any farmer to repay the seed he has received out of his one year's crop. It will take the whole of his profits to do that. I have pointed out that it is the financial stringency which has existed throughout the Dominion which is responsible for the necessity of the government intervening in this matter. If there had been no such financial stringency, we should not have heard any thing about the necessity of the government coming to the assistance of the people of the Northwest and providing them with seed grain. The fact that there have been very good paying crops in the greater portion of the Northwest has in itself caused a very large demand for the repayment of the indebtedness of the Northwest to their creditors in the east. The remarkable speed at which new districts in that country have been opened up in recent years, chiefly by new comers, many of whom have very limited means, make it necessary that the development of the country must be carried on to a very large extent upon borrowed money. If you double the population in a certain area in two or three years, as has been frequently the case in recent years, and the crop on which everybody is depending should fail, not merely the farmers themselves but the business men of all kinds have to suffer and the financial conditions in that part of the world become such as to make it absolutely necessary that there should be some assistance from the outside. The fact that the pressure for repayment of the indebtedness of the Northwest has been greater this year than ever before has made it absolutely impossible for the people in those districts where there has been a failure of the crop, to help the new settlers as they have been accustomed to do in the past. Under these regulations, which provide for the repayment in one year of the seed grain advanced, practically one year's crop has to provide for two years' expense, and in the case of newcomers—many of whom have comparatively small amounts of land under crop—their position at the close of the present year will be pretty nearly as bad as it is now. In addition it is pretty widely rumoured that the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan propose to take chattel mortgages on the crop as security for the grain advanced to settlers who have patents for their own lands. These mortgages are payable out of the first crop. That is to say the crop is to be hypothecated before even the seed is put into the ground. I protest against any such intention being carried into effect, if any such intention exist. Such a course would be a heavy blow to the financial interests of the districts concerned. Not only the farmers themselves would suffer throughout the whole of this year and practically to the end of next year, but the business men, the dealers of all kinds, would be put to most serious disadvantage.

There are some other features of these regulations to which I desire to refer briefly although I do not propose to embody any suggestion in a motion. By regulation No. 15, it is provided that no seed shall be given where no crop was sown in 1907. I would point out that the financial stringency affects new homestead settlers to the same extent practically as those who have been longer in the country. The business men in the neighbourhood, and even the farmers, have been accustomed, when a new settler has shown himself to be energetic and industrious, to give him credit so as to help him out and see that he had good seed. But when there is no seed in those portions of the country and when the business men and the older settlers are hard pressed for money, they will be unable to do any thing for the new settlers. It seems to me that if the land is improved and ready for crop the government have ample security on the land itself for an advance of grain sufficient to sow it. The principal object of this expenditure for the provision of seed grain should be to ensure that no portion of land in the Northwest now ready for crop should fail to be sown for lack of seed. But I fear that object will not be attained if the regulation remains as it is, and if no one who had not a crop on his land in 1907 is to be allowed this advance of seed grain under the usual conditions. Of course it is provided later in the clause that if the government find they have a considerable amount of grain on hand after distribution, they may distribute it to these people for cash. We all regret that there should be necessity for the distribution of seed grain and that this distribution will be cited by people, who do not realize the terms upon which it is made, as a proof that there is necessity for the government to come to the aid of settlers through charitable motives. While we all regret that state of affairs, still good may come out of the matter, if it be looked at from a somewhat different point of view.

That the government are prepared to make this distribution to the newer settlers, those who have been only one or two years upon their lands, and to do this upon the security of the improvements, the settlers themselves have placed upon the land. I cannot conceive that any better advertisement could be made of the lands which we offer immigrants to the northwest than to say that the land is so rich that, after the government have made a free gift of 160 acres to any settler who comes in, and after that settler has put improvements upon the land, within one or two years that land has become so valuable that the government itself is prepared to advance sufficient money to enable the settler to carry on his operations in the way of putting in seed.

Then I desire to call attention to the other provision of the same regulation—that there should be no seed given to those whose crop last year was marketable and gave a reasonable return. Now, 'reasonable return' is a very elastic term, and I think it would be desirable that something more definite should be fixed by this parliament. I think the House will agree with this when I mention that the price paid for grain last year ran from 15 cents or less to 95 cents or over, per bushel. The yield varied in an almost equal degree. Then, with reference to rule 24. According to that rule, homesteaders residing outside of the local improvement district who wish to make application for seed grain shall make application to the Dominion lands agent, sublands agent, homestead inspector, immigration official or member of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police in the district in which the applicant resides. I have no objection to the application coming through these individuals, but the rule goes on further to provide that these persons shall adjudicate upon the matter :

—and such officers shall perform the duties assigned to the secretary-treasurers and the councils of local improvement districts and municipalities as herein provided.

That is to say one of these officers to whom application is made shall decide whether the application shall be granted or not. It seems to me that is putting the decision in the hands of a very large number of individuals, some of whom do not hold such high official standing as would warrant such an important matter being placed absolutely in their hands. I trust the government may see their way to modify that provision to some extent, or at any rate, will take some steps to make it absolutely certain that there shall be no cases of tyranny in regard to the distribution of this seed, that justice will be done to all who apply and that all cases will be thoroughly inquired into.

I have called the attention of the House to several different points in these regulations. I have already stated that with one exception—the term of repayment—I do not feel it necessary for me to put the matter in the form of a motion before this House. These other points may be left to the government who are, of course, responsible for the whole administration of this seed grain distribution. But I conceive it my duty to my constituents to press this particular question of the repayment of these advances. And, for that reason, I beg to move :

That all the words after the word 'that' in the said motion be omitted, and that the following be substituted therefor :

In the opinion of this House, the regulations respecting the purchase, sale and distribution of seed grain in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan should be amended by providing that payment for such seed grain shall be made in three years by three annual instalments, instead of in one year; and by further providing that any person desiring to make repayment at an earlier date may do so.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). In arriving at an understanding concerning the various provisions contained in these regulations, we were in consultation with the two provincial governments. The regulations, as they stand, are according to the views of these two provincial governments, as expressed by their representatives. This proposed advance of seed grain differs entirely from any advances previonsly made, in that, on former occasions, the only advances made by the Dominion government were to homestead settlers—that is to say to settlers who had not yet become entitled to a patent, and who were, therefore, not in a position to give sceurity to any other than the Dominion government. On this occasion, by far the greater part of the assistance to be given is to be given through the provincial authorities, and they are responsible. It was, therefore, thought desirable that, in framing the regulations dealing with homesteaders, it would be well to make the regulations conform, as nearly as might be, to those that would be found necessary in dealing with the settlers who are occupants of purchased or patented lands. The provincial government having to take security, may find it necessary to look to the crop for its security in the first instance. And, in discussing the matter with representatives of the provincial governments, they pointed out that, whenever owing to the circumstances in which they found themselves they were compelled to take security on the crop grown from the seed—that is, to take security which would terminate at the end of the growing season —it was hardly fair to them that the settlers with whom they were dealing should be in a position to put them at a great apparent disadvantage as they would be if the homestead settlers were given more than one year.

Mr. LENNOX. Would the minister kindly explain why the local governments have to take security on the crop ? I am not saying that it is not so, but I would like to understand why it is. I understand the local government would be lending the money or the grain to settlers who had already obtained their patents. Why could they not take security upon the land ?

Mr. OLIVER. In some cases of course they could, but unfortunately in a very large number of cases the occupants of the land are tenants or parties who have bought on an agreement of sale. For instance all the Canadian Pacific Railway land is bought on agreements of sale which run for ten years, so that a very large proportion of the land held under that tenure is not patented and therefore is not in a position for the provincial government to take a direct security upon it. There is also a system of purchase on what is called crop payment, under which the occupant of the land, the purchaser, pays from year to year out of his crop. He also holds under an agreement of sale and has no title upon which the provincial government can take security, and so while there are a number of settlers upon whose land the provincial government can take security and therefore do not need to look to the crop, with a very large number of these with whom they have to deal the crop is the only immediate security available. As I understand what they propose is to take a lien upon the crop and then after that make such further adjustment as may be necessary and possible in order to take the security upon the land. In those cases where they can, they no doubt will, but in many cases they cannot and if they are to get their money they must get it out of the crop. Unless they get their money they lose it, because they must pay this government anyway. It was therefore thought reasonable that their position should be considered to that extent and after all it is not so seriously unfair that the homesteader who, as far as this parliament is concerned, is borrowing the money from the government should be required to make reparation at the end of the crop year when he has had ample opportunity to turn that crop into money. Of course the history of such transactions in the past has been that inasmuch as the Dominion government holds an absolute security upon the land as against the settler, there is no necessity to press him for payment, and payment in the past has not been pressed for. A lien is taken upon the homestead and possibly the homesteader does not pay; the interest accumulates but still he does not pay and at last he becomes entitled to a patent and applies for it. When the patent is isued the indebtedness is set out upon the face of the patent, the patent is issued to him subject to that indebtedness but no attempt having been made to take drastic means to recover the money, whenever he desires to use that patent as a means of security for further advances of money from private individuals of course the first thing he has to do is to pay off the government's lien. That is the worst that can happen and that being the case the government has never in the past pressed homesteaders for a settlement, and I do not know that perhaps they can be expected to do so in the future. At any rate their circumstances are not the same as those of the provincial government which must get a direct security or they stand to lose the money in a great many cases ; and acting in conjunction with the provincial governments it seemed fair that we should take a position that would not be unfair to them.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. If the provincial governments saw fit could they not extend the time for another year, as the resolution now stands ?

Mr. OLIVER. The provincial governments can do whatever they please, but they have to pay this government at the end of the year and if they do not pay at the end of the year their agreement is that this government is entitled to retain the remaining amount of the indebtedness out of the subsidy. Therefore it is a business proposition that they must get their money from the people to whom the grain has been advanced, and I assume that it is also a business proposition that this government should get its money at the time arranged for.

My hon. friend referred also to section 15 which provides that advances are not to be made to those who have not had any loss of crop. My friend (Mr. Lake) thinks that this should not be.

Mr. LAKE. The part of the regulation to which I referred is :

No seed grain shall be applied to homesteaders who had sown no crop in the season of 1907.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the position of my hon. friend from a certain point of view. He recognizes that in coming to parliament for this very large advance on the terms and conditions proposed we felt that it was necessary that we should show a case that would appeal to the mind of those who were not directly interested in the supply of this seed grain, as well as to those who were ; and I am sure that as a matter of logical argument I am at a loss to offer to the House a good and sufficient reason why those who have not suffered any loss should have the advantage of these advances.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Supposing they give security for it, what difference does it make ? Were they not brought in by the government?

Mr. OLIVER. I can assure my hon. friend it makes no difference to me in the position I occupy and no person in Canada would be so glad to do it as I would.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Well, then, play the game.

Mr. OLIVER. But I am addresing a House composed of careful, cautious business men and if they would be willing to make the amendment, which I notice my hon. friend has not moved in this connection, I certainly will be very glad to accede to it ; but I must say that in presenting this rather large proposition to the House I felt it desirable that we should rest on as safe and logical a ground as we could find. It seems to me to be much more reasonable to ask the House to vote for such an advance in the case of men who having made expenditures in the expectation of a return had failed to get that return, and therefore were not in a position to carry forward their operations, rather than to ask the House to provide in the case of men whose condition had not been changed by the climatic circumstances of last season.

Mr. BRODER. The local conditions are changed surely ; they are not able to get seed grain from the neighbours, generally speaking.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, as I have already said, no person will be as pleased as I if the House will agree to advance grain to settlers in that condition, but it was modesty, Mr. Speaker, on my part and not good will towards the settlers that led me to agree to the provision as it appears in the regulations. It will be observed that in the latter part of clause 15 provision is made that grain may be sold to such parties for cash.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Where will they get the money to buy it ?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not prepared to say where they will get the money, but they will have just as much money to buy grain this year as they would have whether there was a crop or not.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, if it is their own crop they certainly will. They did not sow any crop ; they were not disappointed in getting a return so that whatever arrangements they have made in regard to finances to secure seed to sow I presume still hold good because they would in any case have to buy their seed ; they have an opportunity to buy it and if we have seed we will be glad to sell it to them.

Mr. TAYLOR. They may have worked for some farmers and not have received their pay.

Mr. OLIVER. I am glad to hear so many of our friends taking such a generous view and I can assure them that while I would very strongly urge that these regulations be passed in the form they are, because they are as agreed to with the provincial governments, if it should seem to be the humour or temper of the House to go a step further and to permit of advances to the class of settlers debarred under section 15, I would be very glad to make that proposition to the House at an early day and to ask that it should be agreed to.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Before the minister goes on I would like to draw his attention to two or three points here and to ask him what they mean. The first is section 21 :

The duplicate copy shall be retained by the secretary-treasurer and be by him submitted on a day fixed to the council of the local improvement district or rural municipality for its approval, modification or rejection.

I would like to know what that means. How can they approve it, modify it or reject it? Second, section 25, line 3:

The secretary-treasurer shall be expected to take the declarations therein provided, and to perform all other work required to be done.

&c. Has the secretary treasurer authority to take declarations? Then, the last two lines of section 27:

—as nearly as may be, in schedule 'A' of these regulations, but slight deviations therefrom shall not vitiate such security.

What is a slight deviation? Then we find that the oath set out in schedule A is to be taken before a commissioner for taking oaths. These gentlemen are not too plentiful in that country. Is the secretary-treasurer authorized to take these oaths?

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to deal with the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake).

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I thought the hon. gentleman was done.

Mr. OLIVER. No, there are some other matters that he would like to have dealt with. I did not catch what he said or what his point was when speaking of the officials outside of local improvement districts who are authorized to supply forms and accept applications. Would he mind making the point a little clearer?

Mr. LAKE. The point I made was that they not only accept the application, but they also, apparently, as I read the regulations, adjudicate thereon. Some of these individuals do not, of course, occupy a very high official standing, and I think that very good care should be exercised to see that these decisions are not altogether final and that there is no hardship or injustice done to the settler.

Mr. OLIVER. There is necessary some provision to deal with applications outside of local improvement districts. There is no objection, I presume, to the forms of application being sent to the persons mentioned here or to their receiving applications, but what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle objects to is that they should have any right to revise or amend the applications.

Mr. BORDEN. Or reject.

Mr. OLIVER. Or reject. What we are doing in that section is——

Mr .SAM. HUGHES. Why not answer my question with regard to section 21 at the same time? The two run hand in hand.

Mr. OLIVER. That is what I am going to say. Our idea is that there should be as far as possible some person having knowledge of the facts to give his approval or to give his disapproval of the application. These two provinces are very large in extent. We send out these forms of application and we ask them to be filled in and sent to the central office. The person in the central office can have no possible knowledge of the merit of the application, and after discussing this matter with the provincial governments it was thought well by them, particularly that within local improvement districts, the council of the district, which would necessarily be much more familiar with the conditions of the district, would have the right to adjudicate, as you might say, upon the applications made within the district.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is just the point in regard to which I wish to ask the minister. What does the approval, modification or rejection mean?

Mr. OLIVER. It means this: Smith is a homesteader within a local improvement district. He wants seed grain; he goes to the secretary-treasurer; he gets an application form and that application form is filled out. One copy of the form is sent immediately to the central office so that we may arrive at a knowledge as quickly as possible of the amount of grain that is required. That is for the information of the purchasing agency. The other form is retained by the secretary-treasurer of the local improvment district and in due course a meeting of the council of the district is held and Smith's application as all others which have been filed, is passed upon by the local council. The local council will have more or less personal knowledge of Smith's circumstances and of the conditions prevailing there and will be in a better position to verify the correctness of Smith's statement than will the man at the central distributing office. If it should be so that Smith has made incorrect statements, or, in their opinion, has made incorrect statements as to the value of the crop that he grew, or as to the area of the land that he has under cultivation, the power lies in their hands to revise Smith's application and to cut it down if they think it is over the mark.

Mr. FOSTER. Or reject it?

Mr. OLIVER. Or reject this application.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Is every homesteader going to be at the mercy of these tu'penny ha'penny councils? If he has so many acres ready for seed grain why should he not get his grain?

Mr. OLIVER. Again I wish to say that this was a point that was very strongly insisted upon by the provincal authorities in regard to the land holders or occupants with whom they had to deal. So far as the homesteaders are concerned we do not have to have their applications passed upon by the council of the local improvement district, but it did seem to us that as the provincial governments felt that for their own protection it was necessary that the council of the local improvement district should pass upon the applications in regard to non-homestead land, it would not be unreasonable that they should also pass on the homestead land.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. If the words 'approval, modification or rejectment' simply mean to apply to verifying the statement of an applicant that he has so many acres ready for seed, and needs the seed, well and good. But if the words give them the right to say: We don't think that fellow Jones is entitled to seed, he is not a friend of ours that won't do and there must be no game of that sort.

Mr. OLIVER. What we are afraid of is that if we rest only upon the opinion of the central distributing officer who can have no personal knowledge of the facts, and he grants every application that comes in, we shall be accused of unduly abusing the liberality of parliament.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. All that should be required is that these people would give a certificate of the facts of the case.

Mr. OLIVER. On the other hand if we should undertake to cut down any applications we would be accused of acting unfairly for political or other reasons. We think that when we place the responsibility upon the local council elected by the people we are getting as near to a fair basis as we can, and we will possibly avoid accusations of political partisanship. At the same time it is a fair protection for the public treasury.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understand the criticism to be that there should be some limitation of the words 'modification or rejection.' No doubt it is intended that there should be, as the minister says, but it is not very explicitly stated and it may be felt that there is an indiscriminate power as to modification or rejection.

Mr. OLIVER. I admit that the section may not be fortunately worded in that respect, but the principle is as I have stated and I do not think there is any danger.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The principle is a perfectly sound one.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me to be fairly sound, and I do not think there is any danger of the attitude which has been suggested being taken by the councils, because they will be under instructions from time to time by the provincial governments, and whatever shortage there may be in the wording of any of these sections will be supplied by the prompt and direct supervision of the provincial governments over their transactions. What my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle contended was that the officer of this government who would have authority to certify applications outside the local improvement district, should not be given power of revision or rejection. That is a point which is quite arguable. All I can say is that the provincial government for its own protection desires to have the responsibility of some person who is familiar with the facts so that there may not be any undue demands for advances.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I presume the provincial governments will administer the greater part of the funds.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is it the idea that the regulations under which they shall act shall be promulgated by themselves, but shall follow the same lines as these?

Mr. OLIVER. The idea was set out fully in a revised edition of the papers which were distributed this morning. From these papers it will appear that it is desirable there shall be only one system of distribution and one set of machinery, as regards the homesteaders and the other settlers intermingle, and in order that there shall be an intelligent handling of the business, it is desirable that the regulations which apply to homesteaders shall to all intents and purposes apply to those who are not homesteaders. Therefore we have made our regulations for homesteaders conform so far as possible with the ideas of the provincial people as to the requirements of those who are not homesteaders.

Mr. FOSTER. They do not act outside of these regulations.

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. LENNOX. But they have to take a different class of security.

Mr. OLIVER. That is their own business and we have nothing to do with that. These regulations have nothing to do with the security they take; they must look to that themselves.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In a word, the regulations are exactly the same whether the grain is distributed under the administration of this government or under the administration of either of the provincial governments.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Plus the consideration that the security to this government is covered by these regulations and the security to the provincial governments will be covered by some additional regulations to be made by them.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I can understand it thoroughly now.

Mr. OLIVER. The machinery organized for the purpose of distributing to homesteaders is authorized by the provincial governments to distribute on their behalf, and therefore we have to have the regulations alike for all. The provincial people thought it was well that applications from outside of local improvement districts should be passed upon by a person with some measure of responsibility who might be supposed to have personal knowledge of the facts, and we agreed with them and sections 20 and 24 are the result. The principle is that there shall be some person who may reasonably be supposed to have personal knowledge of the facts and who it may reasonably be supposed will act without prejudice and will stand between the settler who wants the grain and the government which is distributing the grain.

Mr. KNOWLES. Do I understand that the objections by the local improvement councils, if objections there be, will be final, or will there be an appeal? Section 22 says that when all applications have been dealt with by the councils they shall be transmitted to the central office at Regina. It does not say 'approved' applications, but 'all' applications, and it might therefore be inferred that whether accepted or rejected they would eventually come before the central official, and so the decision of the local improvement council would not be final.

Mr. OLIVER. The idea agreed upon by the provincial governments and ourselves was that the decision of the improvement council would be final because it was thought to be the best information that we could get on the subject. They being on the ground would know the circumstances as neither the provincial government itself nor the representative of this government could possibly know them. Of course the provincial government and our own officers will be in close touch in this whole proceeding, and if it should come to our knowledge that the action of any such council was unfair or unjust, it would be quite in order and quite proper for us to take some action; but we have not contemplated that, and that was not our idea. Our idea was to take advantage of the local commissioner as far as we could, to have a close supervision of the applications.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I take for granted that the minister, in putting in these words was aiming to get some guarantee of the 'bona fides' of the applicant, and if the applicant is a 'bona fide' homesteader who has his land ready for seed, there is no possibility of rejection.

Mr. OLIVER. That is right.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Has the minister any information from the provincial authorities as to what proportion of these districts are organized into local improvement districts or what proportion are unorganized?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not able at the moment to answer my hon. friend's question; but there is no doubt that where there is any density of settlement there is an organized local improvement district. A large part of the province of Saskatchewan, of course, both south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and north of the Canadian Northern, contains practically no settlers, and of course is not organized in any form; but the body of settlement is fairly dense and compact and I think I am safe in saying is entirely organized. It is only the outlying parts that are unorganized.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Are the secretary treasurers authorized to take the declarations provided for in section 25?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. The local governments have agreed to authorize the secretary treasurers as commissioners to take affidavits.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Section 27 provides that slight deviations shall not affect the security. What constitutes a slight deviation?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think there is no objection to that. That is a common phrase where a bill of sale or a statutory form of deed is used. Without some provision of that kind, a slight deviation, like a mere clerical error, might affect the security. I think that is a wise provision.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentlemen acting in these cases are not learned in the law, and it has been thought that there might be unintentional errors, and that this would be a saving provision to make.

Mr. LENNOX. I notice that the vote appropriates a certain amount to go to the provinces and a certain amount to be handled by the Dominion. Does the Dominion government purchase all the grain required, or only as much as comes within the limits of the vote appropriated for the Dominion?

Mr. OLIVER. As soon as the Appropriation Act becomes law, the several provincial governments will pass orders authorizing the Dominion machinery which has been provided to purchase and distribute the grain for the settlers for whom they are responsible. They will give that order to us, and we will carry out their instructions, and the money for doing so will be provided from the funds loaned to them.

Mr. LENNOX. That is to say, the Dominion will make the entire purchase, and keep an account, and charge the portion which it supplies to each government?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. And it will do that at the actual cost price, I understand, without charging any thing for administration ?

Mr. OLIVER. In the printed papers which have been brought down to-day my hon. friend will find from page 31 to the end, the agreements made in that regard between the provincial governments and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CROCKET. Has the minister any estimate as to the number of farmers in the two provinces who will require this assistance ?

Mr. OLIVER. It is not possible to make an inteligent estimate of the number. Calculations have been made based upon areas of cultivation in localities where the grain is known to have been damaged ; but no person can tell, until we get the returns from the forms of application which we have sent out, how many people will desire to avail themselves of the proposed seed grain advances.

Mr. CROCKET. How do you arrive at the amount required ?

Mr. OLIVER. We have figured on the areas of cultivated land in the districts which have not produced seed suitable for resowing.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. In regard to the security, has the minister considered the plan adopted by the State of Minnesota and other states where the state sells binder twine to the farmers every year, and takes in payment the notes of those farmers, several farmers being required to sign each note ? These notes are held by the state, and the state has never lost a dollar. Would it not simplify the machinery and be a more certain guarantee of repayment if the government were to require a group, say of ten or more farmers, to go jointly on the security for the repayment of the loan ? In such a case, would not each guarantor see that his neighbour did his share in paying up ?

Mr. OLIVER. The suggestion is not one which appeals to my mind.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Think it over. It worked well in Minnesota.

Mr. OLIVER. It is hardly fair to require that a group of men shall be bound for the indebtedness incurred by one. If the ten men must go on a joint note and each one is indebted for the full amount of the note, that bears a very close resemblance to what is called kite flying in banking, and is not really good security.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would you not have the same security as now ? Have you not the homestead of each man as security, and the additional guaranty that each man will be interested in seeing that the others pay, and each man will be helping to assist his neighbour to obtain the seed grain he requires.

Mr. TURRIFF. We had a little experience along that line in one of our former distributions of seed grain. Some could not give security and got their neighbours to go as bondsmen.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I am not asking the neighbours to go as bondsmen.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is the same thing. They give a bond that they will be security for the payment of the neighbour's debt. Three men would go on the bond. One or two would pay off their indebtedness to the government but they would be still held for the indebtedness of the third who was either unable or unwilling to pay. In the end the matter was brought up in the House and the bondsmen were relieved of their indebtedness, and the man who received the grain and failed to pay was held alone for the liabiliy.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose the main object of the proposed assistance is that all the land capable of being seeded for next year's crop shall be seeded. Having that in mind, there does not seem to me a great deal in the point mentioned by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake), although he has not embodied it in a resolution, namely, that persons who have taken up land, say within the last six months, should have a share in the proposed distribution. Of course my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) put his finger on the strongest objection to that. He said that those people are in just the same position as if there had been a good crop last year. That is true in one sense, but having regard to what I understand are the local customs and situation of the western people, there are two circumstances, namely, the well known financial stringency and the consequent difficulty of borrowing money and also the crop failure of 1907 and the consequent inability to borrow grain from neighbours, which make the lot of the new settler harder than it would otherwise be. If it were not for these conditions, these new settlers would be able to go to a bank and get a small advance to pay for a supply of seed or they would be able to borrow the seed from their neighbours. It seems to me therefore there is a fairly reasonable case for including these men. After all you will not in all probability subserve the main purpose of this vote, which is to be repaid with interest, unless you vote that money under such conditions as will enable all western land ready for crop to be seeded. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) has given his reasons in this connection so fully that I need not dwell upon them further.

Then comes the other consideration, as to whether or not you will to a certain extent defeat the object of this vote in some cases and impose unnecessary hardship if you insist on repayment in one year. At present no one can give any absolute assurance as to what next year's crop will be. We all hope it will be an abundant crop, but it may be a medium or a poor crop. There may be in some parts a partial or even a complete failure ; and you must consider the circumstances that out of one year's crop, not only have these people to provide seed for two years, but for the sustenance of their families during two years, and, as my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) has pointed out, they will in addition be subject to the payment of a very much larger price than they would be called on to pay under ordinary conditions. Under these conditions, is it wise to compel these men to repay in full in one year ? I understand that in the distributions in Ontario in years gone by, there was never any attempt to obtain repayment in one year, and you are dealing in the west with conditions very similar to those which then prevailed in Ontario. Would it not be better to give these men, who have been face to face with adverse conditions during the last few months, a fair chance, and spread these payments over three years ? I think it would be wise for the government to take that course.

My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) has taken the opportunity of moving this as an amendment to going into supply. He is not moving it as a vote of want of confidence in the government, but is simply moving it now because he has no other opportunity of doing so. We have acceded, in the public interest, to the proposal of the government with very little discussion. We have done so because we all believe in giving assistance under present conditions to the men in the west who are building up that country. But we acceded to it on the condition, and on the understanding, that we should have ample opportunity to discuss the whole situation upon a motion to go into Committee of Supply and after these regulations had been brought down. My hon. friend from Qu' Appelle (Mr. Lake) has no other opportunity than that now afforded to make his motion and place himself upon record on the subject. He has expressly stated that he does not desire to make this motion as expressive of any want of confidence in the government, because he and all the hon. gentlemen on this side have acquiesced in the course the government propose, my hon. friend's only object in making the motion, being so to perfect the regulations that they may be wholly in the interest of the people of the west and of the public as well. For, the public interest after all, is very much bound up in the prosperity of the settlers of Alberta and Saskatchewan for the next three or four years. I should be glad indeed if the government would accept the suggestion made by my hon. friend, and would amend the regulations accordingly. In saying that, I do not overlook what the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) has very properly urged with regard to the position in which the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan will thus be placed. I concur entirely in his view that you could not very reasonably expect these governments to undertatke the distribution of seed grain upon the basis of payment in one year when this government was administering a similar fund on the basis of payment in three years. But I hope—and indeed I very little doubt—that the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan could readily find the means to provide some security satisfactory to them and such as would suit the conditon of repayment in instalments covering a period of three years. The hon. minister speaks of security upon the crop. Well, if next year's crop is of no value, if it turns out to be a perfect failure the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan will not have very much security. But if the crop is good, the settler will plant more land next year, and, with increasing hope and confidence, he will sow more for some years afterwards, and it does seem to me that, if the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan are inclined to regard as satisfactory their security on next year's crop, it might well take a lien upon the crop of three years. I cannot see that it will be much risk. Further than that, there are various forms of security which will be present to the mind of every hon. member, and the details concerning which could be worked out by the provincial government in each of these provinces. Of course, they accept a certain responsibility when they undertake the administration of this great fund. They must be prepared to discharge that responsibility, and to accept all risks that are incident to it; and part of the responsibility with which they should be charged in administering this great fund is to see that the public, whose money is advanced shall have reasonable security that the money shall be repaid with interest at 5 per cent, as the regulations require. So, I think the duty of dealing with the matter might reasonably be left to the gentlemen who are undertaking to do this business, acting on behalf of these provinces, and they might work it out to their own satisfaction. I have no doubt that, if this government takes that view, the provincial governments will be able to comply with the situation along the lines proposed by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle.

There is another point—that mentioned by my hon. friend from Victoria and Hali-burton (Mr. Sam. Hughes). I understand perfectly the intention of the government in framing regulation 21. I should be inclined to think the municipal councils would construe it as indicated by the minister, though, if a lawyer should read it in a very technical light, it might not be sufficient for the purpose. But, as the Minister of the Interior has said, we are not dealing with it from a strictly legal standpoint, and the common sense and good judgment of these parties will cause them to understand, no doubt, exactly what was intended by the regulation. But, it does seem that, when you authorize officers of this government to deal with the settlers and adjudicate upon their right to receive advances of seed grain, you are creating, to say the least of it, a rather delicate situation. I do not reflect upon any of these gentlemen. I do not know whether those who are to be called upon to make this distribution of seed grain include any of those upon whom animadversions have been made in this House from time to time; I pass that by. But I say that this regulation does create a delicate situation, and I should think that, if it were possible, where adjudication has to be made by such an official, that some appeal might reasonably be allowed to some higher official. I do not know how far that might be practicable. The time within which the work must be done is limited. I understand that many difficulties of administration will be encountered. I am only putting this forward as a suggestion which I would like the Minister of the Interior to consider. I understand that the farmers of the west who have come into contact with Mr. Castle, the purchasing agent, have very great confidence in him. I have heard at various times that he is regarded as a very capable man and a good officer. I am glad that the government have appointed him for this purpose. He is spoken of as a man who would have only one object in view, and that is to do his duty in a straightforward way, without regard to anything but the performance of that duty. If it is possible for Mr. Castle to hear appeals, or if it is possible to find some man who equally commands the confidence of the people of the west and to whom would be given some power of settling appeals in cases of dissatisfaction, I would regard it as a good move not only in the public interest but also in the interest of the government as well for it is obvious that they would not desire that any dissatisfaction should continue. If this could be brought about, I should be glad; but we must leave it to the discretion and judgment of the government.

I hope that the precautions which seem to be pretty thorough, to secure grain that is free from noxious weeds, will be carried out. I believe this particular matter is under the administration of Mr. Castle, and I have no doubt that the necessary precautions will be taken. It is of the utmost possible importance, as, I have no doubt every man from the west will agree. And I express the hope, in conclusion, that the government will see fit to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle, and will give persons in need of this temporary assistance opportunity to repay in three years instead of one.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The amendment of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) deals with one phase of the regulations, and that has afforded an opportunity to discuss the whole question, in accordance with the understanding arrived at several days ago. And, although this has served a good purpose, I hope that he will not consider it his duty to press this motion to a division. For, as I have said, he is dealing with only one phase of the regulations and the discussion here rather suggests that, while it is a very profitable subject to consider, it would hardly be the part of wisdom for the House to attempt to deal with the regulations in detail. For instance, several hon. members in the course of the discussion have suggested several points upon which they think the regulations may well be amended. All this seems to me to point to the conclusion that the proper course would be that there should be a full discussion of the subject, especially by hon. gentlemen from the west on both sides of the House who are familiar with the situation; that the matter should then be left to the consideration of the Minister of the Interior and his officials who might take up the suggestions made in the House and see how far it may be necessary to amend the regulations.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Or make a supplementary agreement.

Mr. FIELDING. Or make a supplementary agreement. My point is there may be a number of points arising out of the discussion on which it might be proper to make an amendment. That would be a proper course to take even if we were dealing only with the Department of the Interior and with the money of the Dominion government, but a further reason arises because we are acting in common with the provincial governments, not only for the portion provided by the Dominion, but also the portion furnished through the provincial governments, as they are to be administered under similar regulations. The provincial governments are necessarily, therefore, parties to the agreement, and I think it would be a pity if we should commit ourselves to the details of the agreement until a further opportunity has been had for a discussion of the matter between the Minister of the Interior and the gentlemen who represent the provincial governments.

If we were proposing by legislation to say that these moneys should be repaid in one year it might be necessary for the House to intervene and say that is a harsh procedure and that we should have said two or three years; but I call attention to the fact that in the resolution adopted and in the Bill passed by this House there is nothing in regard to the particular time in which the moneys shall be repaid. That is left entirely to be governed by the regulations, and it would be quite consistent for the Minister of the Interior at a later stage to amend his regulations, especially after having an opportunity to consider the matter with the representatives of the provincial governments. There is no reason to suppose that either the Dominion or any of the provincial governments will desire to act in a spirit of harshness towards any of the settlers who may receive seed grain. If next season we should have a good crop, as we all pray, there would be no trouble; every man who receives temporary aid would be in a position to return it; and if the crop should not be good, no one would suppose that the government of Canada or the government of any province would desire to press the people unduly. It is a financial transaction; we are lending a large amount of money under exceptional circumstances, which may not occur often and which make a very inconvenient precedent, so that it is very desirable that in taking this exceptional course we should surround the transaction with all reasonable precautions. It is the part of wisdom to say that the money shall be loaned only for a short time, and then, if exceptional circumstances arise which show that the people cannot repay it in that time, to leave that to be determined as it then would be in the light of the information that might come before the government. We have said, for example, that the provincial governments must return this money to the Dominion government within a little more than one year, and we have got them to agree that if it be not repaid within that time we have a right to levy on the subsidies payable to them, upon allowances or any money that we may have payable to the provinces. I think it is the part of wisdom in making such an unusual arrangement, in lending the credit of the Dominion to help out a provincial government—something I believe we have never done before—to surround the whole transaction with the best restrictions possible. Suppose the crop next season is bad; suppose the settlers cannot repay the advances to the provincial government, and that, therefore, the provincial government cannot repay this money to the government of Canada, is it conceivable that we would at once stop the whole subsidy of the province of Saskatchewan? Is it conceivable that we would do anything to stop the wheels of government out there? Surely that is a matter that can be safely left to the judgment of the government and of parliament.

I think in the proposal we have made asking the provincial governments to return the money in one year, it is only a reasonable and proper precaution, but we do that with the full understanding that if the provincial government should fall into difficulties we will have to help them out as any business man would help out a customer. In like manner, if the Minister of the Interior requires in his regulations that the money should be paid in the year, and if the homesteader cannot then make payment, if he makes an honest effort and by misfortune, by another bad crop, he cannot repay, who imagines for a minute that any Minister of the Interior would enforce the regulations in a harsh manner? Therefore, instead of the House undertaking by a vote to interfere with the details of this agreement, I think the proper course should be that we should have a free discussion, especially by hon. gentlemen from the west who are so familiar with that country; that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) should withdraw his motion and that the Minister of the Interior, in consultation with the provincial governments, should consider then whether it may be possible to make any further amendments to the regulations.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (West Assiniboia). I wish to say a word, not so much upon the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake), as upon the other point mentioned by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the expediency and wisdom of making an arrangement by which the new homesteader, the man who last year did not have a crop, might be assisted in the same way as a person who had been longer in the country. I find that I am of the same mind as the hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken. I would wish that always they might speak words of which I could approve as heartily as I do on this occasion. On several occasions I have brought this matter to the notice of the Minister of the Interior myself, and I think that my hon. friends from the west who sit on this side of the House and myself have done a great deal in our discussions with the Minister of the Interior in the last few days to bring him to the frame of mind in which he gives so ready an ear to the words of the hon. gentlemen opposite in that regard.

My reasons for supporting it, as I have on different occasions submitted them to the minister, are, in the first place, that the labour market this year in the west has been of such a nature that the new settler has not had that opportunity for making a few honest dollars to equip himself for going on his homestead in the spring as in ordinary years he would have. A very large proportion of our good class of homesteaders, hard-working, industrious homesteaders, go to the farms of men who have been longer established and engage themselves with these farmers for a period of months, and in that way have a few dollars laid by with which to buy seed and otherwise equip themselves for going on a homestead. This year the labour market has been such that there have not been the openings along that line that there would be in other years.

Another factor that has influenced other hon. gentleman from the west and myself to favour this view is that homesteaders in the west have been led to expect that they would participate in the same provision that has been made for the men who have been longer in the country. I am sure that since this matter has been mentioned in the House the western homesteaders have had no other idea, neither have I, but that they would have the same provision made for them as the men who have been longer settled there. It would be exceedingly unfortunate after the winter is nearly gone and the spring is opening if their plans were to that extent done violence to, if they find that they have been disappointed in this provision. As has been well said by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) the main object of the resolution now before the House and of the present discussion is to make provision by which the lands of the west will be put under crop for next season. It is not a technical matter, it is not a party matter; we are all of one mind that it is noncontentious and we are of similar views with regard to the expediency and wisdom of the legislation now before the country and the House. The common object is that for the benefit of Canada every possible acre in the west that is ready for seed should have seed planted, and I am sure that no one can gainsay that. The homesteader, even if he put in no crop last year, will need seed, and if it is not forthcoming his acres are just as liable to remain unseeded as if he had raised a crop last year. Whether he raised a crop or not is not an important circumstance.

I have no doubt that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) will take this matter into his serious consideration. I do not know how it can be arranged; I suppose a larger vote will be necessary to make provision for it, but I have only to repeat that I think it unfair and undesirable from the point of view of the interest of the homesteaders, and unwise in the interest of the country, that the original homesteader of last year who had no crop should be overlooked. In that way I am entirely in accord with the views expressed in this discussion by my hon. friends opposite. Regarding the motion to extend the time to three years I have this to say that no government will be unreasonable in demanding payment, and the homesteaders will get all the time he needs, therefore the motion is quite unnecessary.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that every hon. member of this House is most anxious that every acre of land in that western country which is prepared to be sown should be sown. I understood the minister to say that the regulations were prepared by this government and the provincial governments, that the three governments were parties to them, but I understand that of the money which we voted on Friday night part is controlled by the Dominion government and that the provinces have nothing to do with this part. I think the minister might say in reference to the part of the money that we control that payments should be made in one, two and three years. I would go further and say, let the provincial governments, administering the loan which is made to them, distribute the grain, and should there be a loss by reason of extending the time for repayment the Dominion government will assume that loss. Let them extend the time and we will take the responsibility of any loss that may occur. Liberate the provincial governments to the extent of saying that if they extend the time for repayment over three years we will stand whatever loss may occur. I am satisfied that the whole country would rather take this risk than see one farm unsown. I hope that the minister will get up and say: I will amend these regulations, in so far as the Dominion government is concerned, so as to provide that the homesteader will have one, two and three years in which to repay this advance, and I will ask the provincial governments to do the same. We, in administering one portion of this fund, will grant this condition, we should ask the provincial governments, in administering the other portion of the fund, to do the same, and we should say to them if there is any loss the people of Canada will stand it. I, for one, want to see the whole country sown. The men are there, the ground is prepared, and if they do not get the seed grain to sow the loss to the country will be greater than any loss which might occur by reason of the extension of time which I have proposed. We would rather trust them than take the chance of the farmers of the west being idle.

Mr. GALLIHER. If I understand the Bill aright its prime object is to provide seed for the farmers in the new provinces of the west. The Bill was brought down to provide seed because of the fact that there had been, in some portions of that district, a failure in the crops with the result that proper seed could not be obtained; in fact, I do not think that we would have this Bill before us if it had not been for the crop failing. If we had had a good crop in the west last year there would have been no

Bill such as this before the House for discussion. Therefore, the prime object of the Bill is to provide seed for those who were unfortunate enough not to have reaped the benefit of their sowing last year. While I do not wish to be understood as objecting at all to extending the benefits of the Bill further, namely, to those of our new settlers who did not sow a crop, I think there are one or two things that we have to consider in connection with it. Is the grant of money voted to be expended either by the provinces or by the Dominion sufficient to include this class ? If it is not sufficient to include this class then one of two things happen ; either we have to vote more so as to provide for this class or else some one in the class that it was originally designed to benefit will suffer.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The grant is based on the total acreage, I understand.

Mr. GALLIHER. Including those who did not sow a crop last year as well as those who did ? Then would not these latter come in under the clause which says that they can purchase ?

Mr. LENNOX. But they would have to buy and pay.

Mr. GALLHER. Yes, they would have to buy. There is that distinction. What troubled my mind was the question if the money was sufficient to include all these classes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Apparently it is.

Mr. GALLIHER. Then I do not see any serious objection. It is not going to discriminate against the particular class of people whose case it was originally intended to meet.

Mr. HERRON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my hearty approval of the general principle of this Bill, and to say that I am in accord with the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake). I am pleased to say that there is very little need for this supply of seed grain in the district in which I live. But, I think there will be considerable seed grain required in the northern part of the province. You must remember that there is a lot of good grain all over the country for both milling and feed purpose, but that, for some reason or other unknown to me, it has not the germinating quality that makes it fit for seed grain. I think that is going to be one of the very serious problems which will have to be solved in that country. A man might be in a position to buy seed grain if the grain was available in the country but he cannot get it because of the poor quality of grain that we have. That will apply, I think, with a fair measure of force, to the discussion that took place regarding a settler of the first year or the man who has just come to the country and prepared his land to be sown next year. It will be very hard on him if there is no seed grain in the country and he has made preparation for a certain amount of expenditure for seed grain but which, on account of the scarcity, has doubled or trebled or perhaps more than trebled in price as compared with what it might be bought for under ordinary circumstances. I think this man should be provided for in the same way as the man who has attempted to raise a crop and has failed. I understand that the provincial government will take a lien upon the crop of next year to secure the repayment of the moneys advanced for seed. Does not this House think that that will work a great hardship on many settlers, merchants and business men in the country? People who lost their crop last year have had to sustain their families and they have had to continue through the winter and to make preparations for the sowing of their crop next spring. Such people have had to look to some one for credit and they have got it from their merchants and neighbours. If a merchant, or whoever has been helping these people, finds that there is a lien upon that crop to the Dominion government in one case and to the local government in the other, do you not think that it is going to be a great burden or hardship on these people for the next year of two. I do not think under ordinary conditions these people should be expected to pay back this money out of next year's crop. The time limit is the 1st of March, 1909. I do not think it is too much to ask that this provision should be inserted so that the people may know where they are, and that they shall have the opportunity of repaying in three equal yearly instalments. I think it would help the people and the country as a whole, if the period of repayment were spread over a term of three years.

Mr. SPROULE. The security given for repayment is a chattel mortgage and by this you destroy all the man's security upon which he may raise money from other sources. Neither the banks nor individuals will lend a man money if they know there is a blanket mortgage on his crop, and so you deprive him of the means whereby he can get the money while at the same time you compel him to pay it back in one year. I think that is a great injustice. Where, in Manitoba and Ontario, we have formerly been obliged to help farmers under somewhat similar conditions the experience has been that the money was not paid back in one year, or in two years, or in three years, but in some cases it took eight or ten years. Can we reasonably expect that there will be some magic in the farmers' position next year which will enable him to do what experience has shown in the past he has never been able to do.

Mr. TURRIFF. If I thought for one moment that any farmer would be coerced either by the local government or the Dominion government to pay back the value of the seed grain I would be in favour of inserting such a clause as is suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Lake). But in our past experience it has always been provided that the repayment should be made early, and in no single case that I know of did any large number of the recipients of seed grain ever repay at the time arranged for. The settlers of the west, as elsewhere in Canada, understand very well that neither the Dominion government nor the local government will send a sheriff after them the moment the amount becomes due.

Mr. SPROULE. How do they know ?

Mr. TURRIFF. They know it never has been done and my hon. friend cannot point to a single case where any government ever took stringent measures to make settlers pay back a loan for seed grain. The money will be paid back just as quickly under these regulations, and no quicker, than if the period were extended to three years. As regards the taking of a chattel mortgage, it is a good deal better for the settler, if he has to give a seed grain mortgage on his crop, to pay only five per cent interest than to have to go outside the government and pay a higher rate, because he cannot get money from any one else at the present time at anything like that rate of interest. If he wishes to give an additional security on his crop he is always at liberty to do so, because the seed grain mortgage of the government will only be for the value of the seed put in the ground. Now, as to the officers of the government outside of local improvement districts having the right to approve or disapprove of the applications made ; these officers are around through the country all the time, I know a good many of them, and I am absolutely satisfied that their whole object will be to help the settler in every case in a legitimate manner. I do not expect there will be one single case of a man being turned down, except where he makes an application for more seed grain than he has land to sow. That regulation is necessary because I know in the past men have applied for and received more seed grain than they had land to sow, and used the seed for other purposes.

Mr. SPROULE. Did they make a declaration to that effect ?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Was it not absolute perjury ?

Mr. TURRIFF. I do not know exactly what declaration they made but I know that some got more seed than they were able to sow and disposed of it in other ways. I do not know who better could be got than the North West Mounted Police and the other officials who know the conditions of the individual settlers, and who I am absolutely certain will deal with the people in an absolutely fair and proper manner. I am thoroughly satisfied that no settler will be coerced even if it takes him three years or five years to repay. Past experience is that they repay only when it is very convenient for themselves, as they know perfectly well that neither this government or the local government will take stringent measures to force them.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Bank of Winnipeg.—Mr. Bole.

Bill (No. 23) respecting the Ministers', Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.—Mr. Bickerdike.

Mr. Henderson said : Since yesterday I have looked into this Bill (No. 23) and I am perfectly satisfied with it. I withdraw the objection made then.

Bill (No. 61) respecting Patents of Montague Moore and Thomas James Heskett.—Mr. Osler.

Bill (No. 60) respecting Patents of the Goodwin Car Company.—Mr. Osler.

SUPPLY—DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN.

House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fielding, that the House do now go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Lake in amendment thereto.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose this evening, there seemed to be a doubt in the minds of some of the members as to the class of security which would be taken for the advance of seed grain by the Dominion government, and there was considerable discussion regarding chattel mortgages. If I understood the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) correctly, he seemed to think that we, representing the Dominion government, were going to take chattel mortgages from settlers to whom advances were made. I wish to make it perfectly clear that the only security which the Dominion government is taking is a lien on the unpatented homestead, and that the only reason that the Dominion government is undertaking to make any advance for seed grain at all is that it is in a position to take that lien. If any one looks at the correspondence which has been laid before the House, particularly the communication addressed by Mr. George Harcourt for the province of Alberta and the Hon. J. A. Calder for the province of Saskatchewan, to the Minister of the Interior he will see that the position is very clearly laid down that the Dominion government is assuming a responsibility because it is responsible for the immigration policy and because it has the power to take a security on the unpatented homestead. Let me read an extract from that communication, in which these gentlemen say :

It may be argued with a good deal of force that the duty of handling the problem which is largely local in its nature should rest solely on the provincial authorities. Still it must be remembered that the vast army of homesteaders who have poured into western Canada during the past three or four years and who have not as yet secured the patents for their lands are, in a sense, wards of the Dominion government. Heretofore they have always been regarded as such and when they required assistance or relief it has been their custom to look to the Dominion authorities. To this extent therefore, it would appear to be the duty of the Dominion government to interest itself directly in the matter and thereby continue the general policy that has been pursued for many years. It must, therefore, be admitted that so far as homesteaders are concerned the Dominion should accept the whole responsibility.

The homesteader, however, is not the only person requiring assistance in the way of seed grain. Owing to a peculiar combination of circumstances which now exist for the first time in the history of western Canada, thousands of farmers who have their patents must also be temporarily accommodated with seed. Doubtless the responsibility of providing for these rests at the door of the provincial governments and that responsibility they are prepared to assume.

So that there is no doubt that the representatives of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan only came to the Dominion government for assistance because that government was able to take the security which the provincial governments themselves could not take. I think the principle is further admitted in the Act of the Manitoba legislature, chapter 154 of the Revised Statutes of Manitoba, which makes provision that municipalities may supply seed grain, and is along the very lines of the legislation which we are enacting to-day, only it is more local in its character, because while we are advancing money to the provincial governments for the purpose of providing seed grain, the government of Manitoba provided money for the municipalities to make advances. So that we may say that as time goes on and patents are issued, if a similar occasion arises the Dominion government will not be applied to for any advance to the settler direct, although they may be applied to by the provincial governments for loans of money to enable these governments to make such advances.

In former times the Dominion government made gifts by way of charity, not only to our own people but to people who suffered loss in other countries. They may do the same thing to-day or at any time; but when we are discussing a matter of business, when it is a question merely of an advance to help some of our own people who are expected to repay, the business principle seems to be admitted, namely that it is the provinces which should come to the rescue and not the Dominion government, except under the exceptional circumstances I have mentioned,

Let us look into the question of the proportion of interest in this matter as between the Dominion and the provincial governments. After the discussion we have had, hon. members will pretty well understand that the Dominion government is making provision only for those settlers who have not yet received their patents, and that the care of any other sufferers remains with the provincial governments. As regards the proportion of interest, if one consults page 22 of the correspondence, he will find there an estimate given by Mr. George Harcourt for the province of Alberta and Mr. J. A. Calder for the province of Saskatchewan, and it works out in this way. By compiling the figures, hon. gentlemen will see that the Alberta government needs for its own purposes, in supplying seed grain, the sum of $440,000, and the Dominion government will require to expend for that purpose in the same province the sum of $110,000, making a total of $550,000. That is to say, the Dominion government will require an expenditure of only one-fourth of the amount which the provincial government finds it necessary to expend for this purpose. With regard to the province of Saskatchewan, the figures are very similar. The Saskatchewan government requires for seed grain $1,825,000 and the Dominion government $475,000, making a total of $2,300,000 to be expended in that province. In other words, the proportion which it is estimated the Dominion government will require to expend as compared with the provincial government is very little more than one-quarter. To anyone, especially in the west, it is most apparent that, whatever conditions be attached to the distribution of seed grain, those conditions should be uniform in their character. Our settlers see very little difference between the man who goes to town, having recently received his patent and to whom the provincial government must make an advance, and the man who has not quite earned his patent; and they will discuss these matters and will come to understand them and help each other in the procedure. But if there are two methods or systems, if the provincial government is to have one procedure and one term and one method of giving the advance and the Dominion has another term and another procedure and another method, I can only see confusion for the very people they want to assist and a great deal of confusion among those who must administer the law. It seems to me that the view taken by both governments that the administration should be a joint one, is a wise view. It is wise for the reasons I have given and the further reason of economy in the administration. So that I do not believe there can be any doubt on the part of members of this House, especially on this side, that whatever may be the conditions of distribution, they should be uniform, as nearly as possible, and particularly so with regard to the greater features of the distribution. If we admit that, for the sake of convenience there should be uniformity, we should have to consider whether the views of the Dominion or the provinces should prevail. I pointed out only a moment ago that the interest of the Dominion government, as compared with that of the two provincial governments, can be estimated, as nearly as can be—and unfortunately we are dealing only with estimates in this matter—at about one to four. That in itself is an indication, but there is another reason why consideration should be given to the views of the provincial government, and that is the class of securities which it will be necessary for the provincial governments to take for their own protection. We want to make it very clear that this assistance is not given as charity. Speaking for my own people, I would emphasize this point that none of them wants any charity, and their desire is that whatever transactions may take place between the provincial governments and the Dominion government and themselves, should be on a business-like basis. Our hon. friends opposite have discussed this question of chattel mortgage security, not only as if that class of security were to be taken by the Dominion government but as if it were to be almost the sole security of the provincial governments. Let me point out further that, in my opinion, there will be comparatively little chattel mortgage securities taken. Let us examine for a moment the kinds of securities which the provincial governments may take, and which they always will take in preference to a chattel mortgage, because if they get a real estate security, it requires no looking after since it cannot disappear or be carried away. We have a large class of people who have received their patents and who can give a first, second or third mortgage on their lands. I think therefore that the provincial governments would be perfectly safe in taking such security ; and if they do take it, there is no necessity for their taking any other.

Others of our people have purchased lands, perhaps from private owners, perhaps from the Canadian Pacific Railway or some other land corporation of the west. It is a very usual thing for us in doing business in the west to take an assignment of a contract for sale by way of security, and to file a caveat in the registry office and secure our rights in that way. I should think that such a security, if there is any fair bargain of principal paid on account, would be a very fair security for the provincial government to take, and that there would be no necessity for chattel security. Then, the other security, which may be taken is a chattel security, and I presume that hon. gentlemen are right when they say that it is the intention of the provincial authorities of both provinces to take a lien on the crops. Now, we are objecting in this House to the provincial governments taking chattel security. Hon. gentlemen have discussed it, and I have discussed it, but I say it is not our business what kind of security the provincial government may wish to take for any advances which it makes. It may be a matter of interest to us, but, so far as our action goes, we can only refuse the advance to the provincial government which is further advanced to the settler. And I speak in these terms because I am discussing the matter as it would have been discussed had the vote not gone through. Now, if there is any question in the mind of any hon. gentleman with regard to the security on the crops of the settler to whom advances are made, I would refer him to the Manitoba statute, 154 of the Revised Statutes, section 16. I will read it :

> Any municipality, having accepted a promissory note or promissory notes in pursuance of the last preceding section or of any such Act as aforesaid shall have power to institute, maintain and carry on all actions, suits and proceedings necessary for the due collection of the said promissory note or notes or any part thereof; and, upon a copy of the said promissory note or notes being filed in the office of the clerk of the County Court for the judicial division in which the land on which the seed is used is situated, the same shall create a lien in favour of the said municipality upon all grain grown in said municipality by the person who has received such advance until the full amount of principal and interest shall have been repaid.

So that the statute of the province of Manitoba incorporates, as a matter of business, the very principle to which some objection has been made in this House. I thiuk it is a good provision. I think it is a provision which might well be considered by any authority making an advance for such purposes, and which has no better security to take. If it is thought that there is any harshness in the provisions of section 16 which I have just read, those who think so will be horror-struck at the provisions of section 18, which also I will read :

> At any time after a promissory note has been given to a municipality under this or any other Act as aforesaid, the municipality may declare the same to be immediately due and payable, whether the said note is due according to its tenor or not; and thereupon the said note shall be due and payable and the municipality may take possession of and forthwith, on one week's notice, to be posted at the place of seizure, sell the crop or a sufficient part thereof upon which the municipality has a lien for the amount of the said note, and may bring action in the proper county court, by writ of summons, attachment or otherwise within the powers of the said court, for the due recovery of the moneys payable under said promissory note.

Mr. STAPLES. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCraney) when that Act was passed ?

Mr. McCRANEY. It is contained in the Revised Statutes of Manitoba, and I see that the note under that particular section refers to 57 Vic., chap. 31, and to 1 Edward VII., chap. 46. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows better than I do when it was passed.

Mr. STAPLES. Is that Act now in force?

Mr. McCRANEY. I cannot say as to that. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. STAPLES. I think it was passed only for temporary purposes.

Mr. McCRANEY. I am not discussing the Act with regard to its enforcement, but with regard to it as a precedent. So it does not matter for my present argument whether it is in force or not. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples) were to point out a subsequent Act in which some similar provisions were not contained it might have some force. But I do not know whether it has been repealed, and, for the purposes of my argument, I do not need to inquire. I am simply pointing out that the Manitoba government thought it necessary not only to empower the municipality to take security on the crops, but thought it desirable at the same time to provide that, notwithstanding the due date of the obligation, it might be declared due by the municipality at any time. That is not an extraordinary provision. I think that in the west in all chattel mortgages we draw and all the lien notes we take we have a provision which is almost similar in its terms for declaring due the chattel security which is given before date of payment.

Now, with regard to the due date. The regulations state that this money must be repaid to the provincial government by the settler, and to the Dominion government by the settler, on March 31, 1909. The reason that occurs to me for that is that the Dominion government is making these advances repayable at the end of its own financial year, and, if it is doing that, it wants to get the security on the provincial subsidies on which it has taken a lien under clauses 3 and 4 at page 25 of the correspondence. It appears to be a very businesslike proposition that the provincial government, which has agreed to pay a very considerable sum of money to the Dominion government should require that the advances made by them to the settlers should be repaid at the same time.

Mr. STAPLES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCraney) is a lawyer I understand?

Mr. McCRANEY. Yes.

Mr. STAPLES. In what position would the province be in a case in which there was a mortgage on the land or a judgment rendered against any particular parcel on which seed grain was loaned? Would the seed-grain loan take precedence of the mortgage?

Mr. McCRANEY. I should hardly think that that would be fair to the person who has advanced his money. I would not expect that it would.

Now, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) suggested that the advance be repayable to the Dominion in three years, and that it was as easy to make a chattel mortgage repayable in three years as in one. The difficulty about a chattel mortgage is that it is not the best of securities, and in this I include securities by way of lien. Any person who is acquainted with conditions in the west will recognize that the western population is a moving population, and that we have not those settled conditions of residence that are to be found in the east. Our own district is settled very largely by people from the province of Manitoba. People are moving into Alberta in large numbers, and I have many inquiries as to the Peace River country. To count on any settler being for three years in the same place is taking a hazard that, living out there, I would not want to take, and I believe that to have a security which would not be due before three years would not be acting in a businesslike manner on the part of the authority which makes the advance of the money.

With regard to clause 15 of the regulations, I sympathize very much with the position which hon. gentlemen have taken. So far as I am aware, there will be no need for government action in the supplying of seed grain in the riding which I represent, but I see by the newspapers which come from my riding that there are discussions as to the fertility of seed grain which is now in the hands of the farmers. In the Saskatoon 'Phœnix' of January 9, I find this statement at the end of an editorial :

Mr. W. Robertson of the Goose Lake district who has farmed for thirty-five years, between Canada and Dakota and has 800 acres to seed in the spring, said yesterday: This is a year I would not sow a bushel of grain of any kind without testing it.

Men who are making a success of farming are those whose methods are worth noting.

On the 18th of January this paper published this paragraph in an editorial :

It is gratifying to learn that large numbers of farmers are arousing themselves and awakening to the importance of the subject of their seed. Doubts have been sown in their minds regarding the fertility of the grain in their bins, and they are applying the test with varying results. These are most marked in the case of oats, which, as we pointed out recently, are more liable to damage from frost than wheat. A case came under our notice yesterday of a farmer who sent two samples of oats to Ottawa for inspection. They looked of good quality and were well filled. In his own mind he did not doubt when he sent them that they would pass muster, but what was his surprise to learn that of one sample only 16 per cent sprouted in twelve days, and of the other, 69 per cent. These were startling and go to prove how absolute is the necessity for a careful examination. If that grain which showed 16 per cent had been sown, only an odd head would have struggled up amongst the weeds and the farmer would have had some tale about his crop having dried out or of the weeds getting the start of it.

I point this out, because altogether apart from those who lost their crop last fall there are a large number who, having got a crop, are unable to use some of it for the purpose of seed, and for that reason I sympathize with the desire of some of those hon. gentlemen who would like to have regulation 15 so amended that some assistance could be given to settlers of that class. Of course, so far we are working only on estimate, and it is only after we get all this information for which the regulations provide, that we can arrive at any conclusion as to whether or not the amount we have voted is sufficient. I am very much in hopes that the reports have been exaggerated, and that the Dominion government and the two local governments will find that there is a surplus in their hands which can be used for purposes other than those for which the advance is actually made, and that it will be possible to supply seed grain to the class of settlers I have mentioned. I have thought that if provision is to be made for that, it should be the result of a further vote and further consideration after we get all the information, so that we will know just what we are doing.

Another point arises in connection with the provision that no seed grain shall be supplied to homestead settlers who have sown no crop. I sympathize with the view that those homesteaders should be supplied with grain if there is grain available. I think that under all the circumstances the settler should be supplied first who, having seeded a crop and done all he could to obtain a crop, has failed to obtain it; and I would point out that while I think it would be a good thing to assist those who had not sown a crop along with their neighbours, it would be creating a precedent that should not be followed. It is one thing for a government to assist a community where there have been climatic conditions which have brought about disaster and where the loss is considerable in its extent; but we might have a question raised at some future time as to whether the government should come to the assistance of those who have not sown, either from their neglect or from any other cause. I am only pointing out the danger which might arise from any such precedent being created.

In the course of my practice as a lawyer in the west I have had a good deal to do with seed grain liens which have been given by settlers on unpatented homesteads to the Dominion government. I have never known of the government pressing any settler; I have no recollection, in fact, of the terms of payment of the lien, because we never paid any attention to it. The farmer got his advance, he gave a lien, and the lien stayed on the homestead until the homesteader received his patent and either sold his farm or put on a mortgage when it was necessary to get rid of the lien. I think that in the future that will be the practice. I do not think it matters in the slightest degree what terms of payment we may put on the advance by the Dominion government to the settler; I do not think the advances will be paid when they are due, and I am quite sure that the government will get its money, every cent of it, because it has the very best of security. For these reasons, I will oppose the motion of the hon. gentleman that the time be extended. I think it is better both for the government and for the settler that if he is able the settler should pay back the loan as soon as possible; but so far as the settler needing to fear pressure from this government is concerned, I think that past experience will be altogether against it. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) stated that in the province of Ontario these advances which had been made by the government to citizens in misfortune had sometimes stood for seven and eight years without repayment.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say by the government; I said by the municipality.

Mr. McCRANEY. Very well, that will suit my purpose. You do not know as to how long the time of payment was?

Mr. SPROULE. Speaking from memory, I think it was three years.

Mr. McCRANEY. That a security which was taken by a municipality for three years was not paid for six or seven years, just shows that whatever be the term of the provincial government they will all act alike and whether they are given time or not they will no doubt be guided by the circumstances. I think for that reason we should adopt the regulations as they are and I have no doubt at all but that they will prove satisfactory to both provincial governments and to every one else concerned.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). Mr. Speaker, the hon. mover of this resolution (Mr. Lake) was appealed to by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) during the discussion as to whether he was willing to withdraw it or not. He did not give an intimation that such was his purpose. If it is his intention I have no desire to say anything but if not I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What would the tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks be ?

Mr. PATERSON. My remarks would be these ; it has been explained by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) that this is no measure to be taken as a vote of want of confidence in the government. There is a more serious consideration involved in this resolution, it seems to me, than that. It seems to me that this resolution implies a want of confidence in a very large portion of our western country and I think it is rather a serious matter that this House should give its endorsation to that. The very best advertisement that our western country has had has been the glowing pictures which, in a large majority of cases have been true, of teeming wheat fields, of golden wheat fields and of the large fortunes that have been made in a very short time. There is no advertisement more captivating. I would fain believe that it is to be the regular—almost, shall I say, the regular, for we have vicissitudes and fluctuations—result of the cultivation of our western lands. It is unfortunate that the exceptional circumstances last year produced the present condition of affairs. It is unfortunate because we wish to have that country settled. We are all one in that. We are all agreed upon this measure of relief, heartily agreed, I believe, under the circumstances, although we have to deplore the necessity of it. An arrangement has been made whereby a temporary difficulty, as I believe it to be, will be tided over that there may be seed grain supplied to the people who require it in our western provinces. I look upon it as a temporary relief. Nevertheless, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the railway companies that have lands to dispose of in the United States, that are fighting our agents who are seeking to get immigrants into the Northwest—perhaps there has been more prominence given to this than is desirable in the interest of the country and more than should have been given to it—will overlook that fact, that they will place before a man who may meditate coming to our country a gloomy picture, saying : That is a land in which special arrangements had to be made to supply the people with seed. I might answer by saying that it is a temporary state of affairs that might happen anywhere. But they may say : Ah, yes, the country will be all right. But, will it be all right ? Did not one of the members from that very part of the country, living there for years, whose interest it is to maintain the prosperity of the country, feel himself impelled in the House to move a resolution that they should not be required to pay this seed back, borrowed for a temporary purpose, out of the next year's crop, but that there would be a latitude given to them because of the necessity for it and that for three years they must toil and labour before they are able, out of their fields, to return the seeding for one harvest. That is a question that will be difficult to answer. That is a situation that I believe the people of the Northwest would not like to have presented to those who were seeking in foreign countries to hinder the development of this country. That, it seems to me is a circumstance so serious that I cannot help thinking that it would be a most unfortunate thing for the country now if such a suggestion should receive the sanction of hon. members from the Northwest and if members of the opposition should record their votes in that direction. That is what I want to say and I add no more.

Mr. LAKE. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and the hon. Minister of Finance have asked if, under the circumstances, I would not withdraw this resolution. I can only say that as the discussion has proceeded I have felt more strongly than ever that it is most desirable that this House should place itself on record on this matter. I think it would be a very great misfortune to the country if this payment is insisted upon within one year. The more the discussion has proceeded the more convinced I am of that opinion. I therefore feel that it would be necessary in the interest of my constituents that I should press that motion to a vote.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, before the motion is voted on, I desire to emphasize what has been said so well by others before me of the necessity of not pressing the unfortunate settlers of the west who have lost their entire season's work through frost and who are to be provided with seed grain by the loan which we have agreed to make with repayment within a year. I think it would be an unfortunate thing to lay down a hard and fast rule that this money should be paid during the first year. We have not heard from the government or from the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) or the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) any other statement than that the matter is to be left in the discretion of the minister to say whether any term beyond one year should be permitted or not. I think it would be a most unfortunate thing if such a condition should be left at the discretion of the Minister of the Interior or whichever minister has charge of this matter. I think that these people should know exactly when they receive the seed grain how long they are to be allowed to pay for it. I do not think it would be well that the agents of the government should go through that country and insist on the payment of the money within the short period of one year. We know very well that there is a great deal of business done upon credit in that country, and that the tendency is for people to practically mortgage even an abundant crop before it is reaped, with the object, I fear, not so much of paying their direct obligations as to invest more money in land. However, we must understand that these people will have the obligations of this and the past year to meet, and if they are to be called upon to pay for this seed grain in addition, I fear we are asking them to do more than we reasonably can expect they are able to do. I would prefer that no money would be asked from these people before two or three years, but others think it would be well to divide it into three payments, not equal payments, but the first a small payment and the second and third larger. I feel strongly that we should not make any hard and fast rule by which the government would demand the payment of this money inside of two or three years. As to the securities, I regret very much that that country is to be blanketed with so many chattel mortgages. We know that one of the most detrimental things to a man's credit is a chattel mortgage, and I had hoped the government would have discovered some other method of security than this costly system.

Mr. McCRANEY. The hon. gentleman understands that the Dominion government takes no chattel mortgage.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the provincial governments take the chattel mortgages, but the result of our policy is to bind the settlers to repay that money within one year, and I regret very much that some other system had not been discovered, so as to avoid blanketing Alberta and Saskatchewan with a huge chattel mortgage. There must be a very large number of farmers in these two provinces whose notes for $200 or $300 would be perfectly good without a chattel mortgage, and it is a hardship that these men should have a chattel mortgage recorded against them and their credit practically destroyed when there is no necessity for it. I think we ought to insist that the Minister of the Interior should stand up and give the House distinctly to understand that so far as the homesteaders are concerned the payment will spread over three years, and that the federal government will use its influence with the provincial governments to see that the settlers are not pressed within that time for repayment of that money. I shall have no hesitation in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria). It is ten weeks since the session opened and there is no information in possession of the government to-day with regard to this matter which could not have been in their possession at the opening of parliament. Hence, ten weeks of valuable time have been lost, and I have no doubt it will be two weeks more before the machinery can be put in force to give relief to the farmers of the west. The Minister of Customs said that if the period of repayment were extended to three years it would show a want of confidence in the people of the west, but to my mind the fact that we are advancing this money at all is a splendid exemplification of the confidence which the people of Canada have in the people of that western country. This advertising we have had of 'golden wheat fields' is all very true, and if the Minister of Customs had passed through the west last year he would have seen as fine wheat fields as the eye ever rested on, but examination would have shown him that the wheat was totally ruined in some places and in others partially ruined Of course, that was due to peculiar causes last year. In the first place the seed grain was not delivered in time owing to the partial breakdown of the railway systems because of the coal strike and the extremely inclement weather. The spring was very late, the seed could not be gotten into the ground in time, and as every one knows the season was the most peculiar that has been experienced in that western country for sixty years as the records show. The experience in the western states was similar, and in these states where they are accustomed to take three crops of alfalfa in a year, they could only get one. More than that, almost every state of the American union north of Mason and Dixon's line knows what it was in former days to have early frosts in the fall which retarded the maturing of the grain. Hence the conditions in our western provinces last year are thoroughly understood by them. I was glad to hear the Minister of Customs encouraging the Minister of the Interior in his efforts to obtain American settlers from the western states into our Northwest. If rumours are true, the Minister of Customs and some of his colleagues have not always lent a helping hand to the new Minister of the Interior. Of course, the old Minister of the Interior had a free hand, he was the boss and could do what he had a mind to, but when the new Minister of the Interior came in he had to lay his plans before his colleagues and not on all occasions did he meet with that hearty endorsation which he expected. However, I am glad to hear the Minister of Customs encouraging the policy of bringing in American settlers into Canada, because they are an up-to-date people and among the very finest people that can come to this country. As I have said, last year was an abnormal one in the west. It is true that not by any means even a large percentage of the people are in need of seed grain, but nevertheless there are enormous areas where there is no grain fit for seed. My hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. McCraney) has stated that his district requires no seed grain as they have grown plenty to supply themselves, but I can assure him that there are many hundred acres in his riding which produced grain last year which is absolutely unfit for seed. There may have been a few fields that would yield seed grain, but they are very few. In the older parts of the country, where the soil had been turned up to a greater extent than in the isolated districts, the grain was not caught by the frost and as in the case of Manitoba, we find that the settlers do not require assistance.

But there are thousands of settlers in that country who do require the seed grain, and these are the people the government should look after. The price these men will pay for the grain will be at least $1.25 a bushel, and many will pay a good deal more. That is twice as much as they will get for the grain they will market next fall. In other words, for each bushel of seed they get they will have to repay two bushels of grain. Therefore, it would be only fair to allow them two years in which to repay their indebtedness to the government. It should be remembered that there has been no work during the last year at which the settlers could earn an honest dollar, and they have been practically only marking time owing to the small amount of railway work in progress. Moreover, it is too often the case that the men who do the railway work are not the settlers who are going to build up this country, but labourers imported under contract, such as Chinese and Japanese, and exported when their work is over, taking with them money that should be left in the country to benefit the settlers and their families. I maintain that all the railroads in the west should be encouraged to employ homesteaders who cannot in their first few years, as could the settlers in Ontario, find employment in winter. The North Atlantic Trading Company has brought to our Northwest thousands of settlers who when they came had practically not a dollar; and these are the people who are expected to repay the government for their seed grain at the end of a year. They will do very well if they can make both ends meet at the end of a year without paying this indebtedness. If the Minister of the Interior or the Prime Minister will undertake to have the order in council amended to extend the repayment over three years. I am sure the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will be only too glad to withdraw his amendment.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Lake.

PUBLIC BILLS AND ORDERS.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). I wish to bring to the attention of the House the present state of the Order Paper. Under the new rules, public Bills and orders can only be called on Mondays and Wednesdays, and on those days only after the notices of motion are disposed of. This session, however, these notices are very numerous, and up to the present have taken up the whole time of the House on the days I have mentioned, so that there is apparently no prospect of public Bills and orders being reached this session. Under the old rule, on Wednesdays, public Bills and orders were the first thing, whereas this session, although there are now forty-one public Bills and orders on the notice paper, it is impossible to reach them. Yet many of these public Bills and orders are of more importance than the notices of motion. The Bills are supposed to be founded on resolutions which have passed the House, so that they should have precedence over the notices of motion. Again, these public Bills and orders, hitherto at least, have been the training ground for very important legislation, and many of these Bills, after they were debated in this House, were adopted subsequently as government measures. But if these Bills are to be now ignored, I do not know where the government will get their policy hereafter. I would therefore suggest that the leader of the House and the leader of the opposition should agree to some slight change in the present rule, and the one I would suggest is the following :

That rule 25 governing the business of the House from day to day be so amended that on alternate Mondays and Wednesdays after the first four weeks of the session, public Bills and orders shall have priority over notices of motion.

I am debarred from submitting this motion to the House, but I offer it as a suggestion to the right hon. gentleman. If he will only look at the Order Paper he will see how important many of these public Bills are. There are at least half a dozen of amendments of the Railway Act, there are also Bills for the amendment of the Criminal Law, the amendment of the Canada Shipping Act, the amendment of the Fisheries Act, the Immigration Acts and the House of Commons Act, and there is the Bill of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Alcorn) to amend the laws with regard to the conduct of elections. All through, these forty-one Bills and orders are the most important that have so far been brought before the House this session, and I therefore suggest that a change should be made in our rules in the way I have indicated. As far as I can gather, the situation was overlooked in this respect when the rules were changed a year or two ago. I am not able to say whether the subject was then brought up or not, but inasmuch as we have changed the rules, and that, owing to that change, this situation has been brought about, there should be some relief given, and I have much pleasure in sending over the motion I have read to the right hon. leader of the House for his consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think the rules of the House require any change. If my hon. friend will look at them, he will find that the orders of the day for Thursdays is first questions and then public Bills and orders during the first four weeks of the session. Some gentlemen have taken advantage of this rule ; and if my hon. friend will look at the Order Paper he will find that the first order of the day for public Bills is the third reading of a Bill to amend the Copywright Act. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) has a Bill of his own for third reading, and the next time the House reaches the order of public Bills, this will be read the third time. One of the Bills, a Bill of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), has actually gone to the Senate, and I think there are some members whose Bills were called once if not twice, and they were not here.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Yes, I was here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But this year there has been an unusual number of notices of motion. In former sessions, we usually disposed of the notices of motion in one day and then came to the public Bills and orders, but this session, owing to the unusual number of notices of motion, we have not been able to do so. If I can accommodate my hon. friend, I shall be glad to arrange a special day for him, and have public Bills and orders made the first order of that day, so as to give those who have such Bills an opportunity to reach and dispose of them.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I am not only speaking for myself but for other members.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will set a day apart next week for public Bills and orders.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When the question of the disposition of the Thursdays was before the committee which had under consideration the revision of our rules, it was suggested that Thursday should be made a government day altogether. Some gentlemen on the committee, however, did not see their way clear to consent to it, and as a matter of compromise it was finally agreed that, during the first four weeks of the session, public Bills and orders should precede government orders on that day. We did not quite anticipate as a result of beginning our work in the autumn that a portion of these four weeks is taken up by the Christmas vacation, so that the four weeks are not available in their entirety as intended. Perhaps some alteration might be made in that respect, so that members, who have Bills of a public character to propose, would have four clear weeks in which to bring forward their work. This session the House met on the 28th of November, and in something less than three weeks we adjourned for the Christmas holidays, so that there was a distinct loss there. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister might take into consideration the question whether that particular rule might not be amended in that regard.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Ocean and river service—further amount required for the construction of an ice-breaking steamer for Northumberland strait, $150,000.

Mr. E. PAQUET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I think it my duty to make a few remarks about the steamer 'Montcalm.' I am satisfied that the services of this ice-breaker are required in the interest of the trade of the city of Quebec, as well as of the districts of Quebec and Montmagny.

The agricultural and business progress of the county of L'Islet and of the surrounding counties is intimately connected with that of the city of Quebec, which is our market.

I made inquiries from several Quebec merchants, business men, and representatives of large commercial concerns, and I was told that the formation of an ice bridge in front of Quebec, inflicts on the city and surrounding counties a loss of $500,000 to $1,000,000.

Had it not been for the work done by the 'Montcalm' last winter, there would have been an ice bridge. Nobody can deny that.

I say then, that the presence of that steamer is necessary in order to prevent the formation of the ice bridge.

Merchants, importers and exporters, and shippers generally, have been discussing for a long time the possibility of winter navigation on the St. Lawrence. Everybody desired to have such a scheme experimented, and the government has complied with the request. The experiments of the 'Montcalm' have perhaps not been very complete, but I am inclined to think that winter navigation on the St. Lawrence is an impossibility. Underwriters would charge excessive rates on boats and cargoes, on account of the great risks.

The experiments carried on by the 'Montcalm' at Cap Rouge have not been conclusive. While they obtained some measure of success the steamer at times was powerless. However, I am satisfied that the 'Montcalm' would be of service in hastening the opening of navigation.

From a business standpoint, the 'Montcalm' has proved its usefulness in the maritime provinces, in opening the way to freighters.

As you are aware, the north eastern district of Quebec is lacking in railway facilities. In winter time, the north shore is absolutely without any means of communication. The Dominion government has never granted subsidies to that part of the country.

Would it not be just and fair to put these people in closer touch with the rest of the country, with the trade centres, not only in the interest of the people themselves, but in the interest of the trade of that district and the country as a whole? We ought to do something for that outlying country.

The 'Montcalm' can carry the mails in that part of the province of Quebec. She can be of help to the people, when famine threatens. We are helping the Japanese, helping our brethren in the west; why should we not do something for our brethren in the east.

I think I have shown how useful and even how necessary the 'Montcalm' is to us. In summer, she is looking after the lighthouses. Could not that service be done by a cheaper boat?

Mr. CROCKET. There is an account in connection with the steamer 'Curlew' concerning which I would like to ask a question——

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I may explain that the 'Curlew' is engaged in the fisheries protection service while we are dealing with ocean and river service. If the hon. member (Mr. Crocket) will ask his question when the officers of the fishery service are here, I shall be more certain of being able to give him an answer.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many ice breakers are there?

Mr. BRODEUR. The 'Minto,' the 'Stanley,' the 'Montcalm' and the 'Lady Grey.'

Mr. J. D. REID. I see on referring to the Auditor General's Report, that the 'Lady Grey' has been pretty well fitted up. Page P—28, under the account of Cuddy & Brodeur Company, Montreal, she has been provided with two brass cuspidors at $3.50 each and two others at $4; she has nickel bread trays at $2.50; a silver coffee pot at $9.40; 2 dozens teacups at $6; a coffee server at $8.50 and entree dishes, 2 at $10.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The item now under discussion does not refer to the 'Lady Grey.'

Mr. J. D. REID. She is an ice breaker—

Mr. BRODEUR. The 'Lady Grey' comes under the head of St. Lawrence ship channel, while we are at the ocean and river service.

Mr. J. D. REID. Yes, but I asked what ice breakers there were and the hon. minister gave a list including the 'Lady Grey.'

Mr. BRODEUR. But the expenditures of the 'Lady Grey' are voted under the head of the St. Lawrence ship channel.

Mr. MONK. We are discussing the item of $150,000 for the construction of a new ice breaker, and, surely, we can discuss all the ice breakers under that, no matter whether they are used in the St. Lawrence ship channel or any where else.

Mr. BRODEUR. The only icebreaker mentioned in the item under discussion is—

Mr. MONK. The one we are going to build?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. MONK. Yes, but we want to discuss those that are built.

Mr. BRODEUR. That does not come under this item.

Mr. FOSTER. There is only one resolution which has been divided up into several items for convenience.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The custom is that once the committee divides a resolution into different items, if one of these items has been passed that is the end of it.

Mr. MONK. Are we not on the item of $150,000 for the construction of a new icebreaker for the Northumberland straits?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. When did the first item pass?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The meeting before last, but I allowed discussion at the last meeting after it had passed.

Mr. J. D. REID. It was understood that the other item was to stand. Can we not discuss the other item on this?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. What progress has been made with the construction of the boat intended for this service?

Mr. J. D. REID. I would like an answer to my question before we go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This gentleman has the floor.

Mr. J. D. REID. I asked a question, and I think I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The rule in this matter is clearly laid down. I find in Bourinot:

> Sometimes there are a number of items in vote or resolution and then these may be generally discussed as forming part of a single question. Each item may then, if the committee think proper, be taken up as a distinct question, and so discussed and amended. The debate in such a case must be confined to the item, and when it has been disposed of, no reference can again be made to it when the subsequent items are under consideration.

If you divide a resolution into items, then when you dispose of one item that is the end of it.

Mr. MONK. You must first divide it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That has been done for the convenience of the committee.

Mr. LEFURGEY. If I understand it, that means that when one item is under discussion you cannot discuss one that has already been passed; but before the item as a whole is passed you can discuss any particular sub-item in that resolution, even if it has been passed. In connection with this vote for $150,000, I would like to ask just what position the construction of the new steamer is in and some particulars as to her size power, &c.?

Mr. BRODEUR. I gave the other day the information about these two ice-breakers, but I have no objection to repeating it. The vessel proposed to be built will be 250 feet long, 46 feet breadth, 27 feet deep, 18 feet draft, 1,800 tons and 6,000 horse-power. This matter has engaged the attention of the department for some time. Two years ago an English naval architect, recommended to the department by Lord Strathcona, was sent to Prince Edward Island to study the local situation and at the same time to give advice as to the construction of an ice-breaker. There are to-day two ice-breakers in service between the island and the mainland. It is considered, however, that these two ice-breakers would sometimes not be strong enough to cope with the situation; in fact several times they were caught in the ice, but it is thought that an ice-breaker of 6,000 horse-power will be able to cope with any situation caused by the ice of the strait; in fact when I was in England I was so advised by the representatives of the principal builders, such as Armstrong & Whitworth and Vickers & Maxim. I may say to my hon. friend from Kings, P.E.I., that notices have been published calling for tenders for this ice-breaker, and that it is expected that we will have several tenders, because several shipbuilders have expressed to me their intention of tendering, and as soon as these tenders are in we will award the contract to the one who may be entitled to it.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Are the plans complete for tendering ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. LEFURGEY. What tonnage did the minister say this boat was to be?

Mr. BRODEUR. 1,800 tons.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Some time ago a question was asked in regard to that boat and the minister said that if tenders were called for by the end of last month the boat would be ready by the first of next December. Now, I understand that a month has gone by, that the plans are ready but that we have not yet got the tenders. According to that they will not be called for until after the middle of winter and before we can hope to get this boat over another year of usefulness will have gone by. There is no doubt that we need a winter boat and that we need it right away. I cannot understand the failure of the department for two years to adopt a more vigorous course so that we might be absolutely sure that we would have this boat to take up the navigation of the straits next winter. As the hon. minister has consulted with shipbuilding authorities in England and, as I understand, has taken a trip to the Baltic to look at some vessels which are doing a similar service there, I would like to know if this boat is to differ in construction from the boats we have now down there—the 'Stanley' and 'Minto.'

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, there will be a difference between this boat and the boats that we have to-day in regard to construction. In regard to the new boat we have taken the advice of builders in England and Germany. I thought there were some builders also in Russia but there are none. The only builders are in Germany and England. They made some suggestions which were submitted to the naval architect and also to the admiralty. It is only within a short time that all the papers have reached the department. As soon as they were put in form and the specifications and plans prepared and printed they were sent out and tenders were called for.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The minister stated that the builders over in England advised him that a boat of 6,000 horse-power would cope with any condition of ice that would ever be found in Northumberland strait. I would like to know how these people ever had an opportunity of knowing what the conditions in Northumberland straits from year to year are. The Department of Marine and Fisheries, which has had control of the navigation of the straits for the past thirty years, does not know very much about the conditions of the ice down there, and a great many mistakes have been made and are being made in the handling of the present service. I do not understand how these people could give the minister any assurance that any boat we could possibly put on there will at times cope with the conditions in the Northumberland straits. There are times, when the ice is rafted to the bottom of the straits, that Pictou harbour is closed up so that it is impossible for any boat, no matter of what power, to cope with the ice conditions there. Of course, I am not saying that we do not need a boat. We do need additional transportation facilities because we have not sufficient to carry away the produce of the island at the present time. The summer boats, long past the time of their usual service, were obliged to continue the service with the winter boats this fall. While we need this boat it is only postponing the day when the question will have to be dealt with because some other means of transportation will have to be provided. It is necessary that every possible despatch should be given and in letting this contract, speed should be one of the determining factors, so that we may feel assured that we will have a continuous service from the closing of summer navigation next year and so that the people of the island may be able to get their products to mainland.

Mr. BRODEUR. In regard to the information which the builders on the other side may have given on this question, I may say that I had the good fortune to discuss the matter myself with these people. Perhaps my hon. friend may say that I am not myself aware of the situation in the straits of Northumberland, but I had with me Captain Brown of the 'Stanley,' Mr. Ferguson, engineer, and Mr. Thompson Smith, who had occasion also to meet some of these builders, and it was after the interviews that these different persons had and that I had myself with these builders that they assured me that a boat of 6,000 horse-power would cope perfectly with that situation. My hon. friend says that we should proceed as quickly as possible with the building of this boat. He is perfectly right. At the same time it is the opinion of the naval architect who is here just now that we should not go too fast because we might build that boat too rapidly to obtain the best results, and that it would be better to give more time and be thoroughly satisfied that we had a first-class boat. We are not only building for a few months or years, but we are building for many years to come, it is important that this boat should be a success and we have not spared any pains to make it a success.

Mr. BENNETT. What will it cost ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT. Approximately ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not like to say just now because tenders are being called. I do not think it would be advisable.

Mr. MONK. Where is it going to be built ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know ; it may be built in England, Germany or Canada.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. Where are the tenders being advertised ?

Mr. BRODEUR. In Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. MONK. In what papers are the tenders being advertised ?

Mr. BRODEUR. In Great Britain, in the Glasgow 'Herald,' in 'Engineering' and in the 'Standard, and in the 'Canada Gazette' and Canada.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. Does not the hon. gentleman think that in matters of this kind Canadian industries should be favoured to the extent or confining, at all events for the time being, the tenders to Canada? We have shipbuilding industries in Canada suffering for want of work and which are capable, I understand, of building ships of any kind and of the best quality. The steel shipbuilding industry of Canada is discriminated against. The Canadian ship builders have to pay duty on all material imported for the construction of ships, and they have to compete against ships built in the motherland which—including everything that goes into their construction and equipment, furnishings and all—are allowed to come into Canada free of duty. The British ship and her equipment comes in here free, but if the materials and furnishings in that ship were brought in separately they would all have to pay duty. That seems an injustice to the Canadian shipbuilding industry, and that is a matter which is being discussed very generally in Canada to-day. It is not so long ago since the shipbuilding industry of the maritime provinces was of very great importance, and when Nova Scotia ships navigated all the seas of the world. Since wooden shipbuilding has almost disappeared we have been establishing in Canada a steel shipbuilding industry which is struggling in the face of adversity by reason of the fact that the materials used in construction have to pay duty entering this country, while these same materials if put into a ship made in England are admitted free of duty. Does this not call for some remedy from the government of Canada ? Does it not seem to be fair that when the government is inviting tenders for the construction of ships the government should say to the Canadian shipbuilder : We will give you a rebate of the duty on the material which goes into the construction of the ship which you build for us. I say it is the duty of the government to consider this phase of the Canadian shipbuilding industry. Then there is another matter which equally deserves the consideration of the government, and that is in regard to the question of putting a duty on repairs made to ships in foreign countries. As the law is at present, a ship can go to a United States yard and can be repaired there and can float back to Canadian waters free of duty, but if an American ship is repaired in a Canadian yard the moment she goes back to an American port she has to pay duty on the repairs. You can buy an old hull for $40,000; you can put so-called repairs on her in an American yard, which practically means rebuilding, for the repairs may cost $100,000, and you can float the ship back into this country and all you have to pay duty on is the $40,000 original price. That is not fair to the Canadian shipbuilding industry. I say that the government has now an opportunity to do something for Canadian shipbuilding. I understand that this is not the only vessel that will be built for the different departments of the government, and it seems to me that some inducement should be offered to Canadians to undertake their construction. The growing traffic from the west should be carried through the great lakes in ships built in Canada, but unless the industry receives encouragement from the government that desirable end cannot be reached. We are told that the government is asking tenders for these vessels abroad as well as in Canada. The labour market in England is cheaper, they have free coal, they have free steel, they have no duty on anything that goes into the ship built there; that ship can be built in England and taken into Canada duty free, whereas if the material which enter into the construction and equipment were imported piecemeal a duty would be imposed upon it.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the hon. gentleman was in favour of the British preference.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. So I am, but there is a difference between the preference and the free list. There is nothing to hurt the preference in the suggestion I make.

Mr. SPROULE. But the present system is to give a preference which goes to the whole extent of removing the duty.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. You may put it that way if you like. Personally I would like to see a bar placed on seeking tenders in Great Britain with respect to all work that can be done in Canada, in order that the industry may be fostered. But if you are not prepared to go that far, I am suggesting a method by which you can aid the Canadian shipbuilding industry without affecting the preference in any way and without discriminating against Great Britain. I want the government to say to the shipbuilders of Canada: We will rebate the duty which you have paid on everything that goes into the ship which you are building for us. I say that if that policy were adopted by the government it would be a wise, and a fair, and a judicious policy.

Mr. SPROULE. What difference would there be between doing that and putting a duty on the ships when they come in here?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. We cannot put a duty on the ships.

Mr. SPROULE. Why?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am not familiar enough with the law to explain it just exactly to my hon. friend, but the Minister of Justice will tell him that under the British Merchant Shipping Act a duty cannot be placed on British ships. Is it not a manifest discrimination that the shipbuilding industry is the sole industry of our country which does not receive some measure of protection?

Mr. LEFURGEY. You have had petition after petition and resolution after resolution for the last ten years before this House asking the government to take some action in this matter and this is the first time we have heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. L. G. McCarthy) opening up, simply because the Collingwood ship yard is closing down.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The Collingwood Shipbuilding Company is not closing down. It is suffering under adverse conditions, but it is doing as well as it can under these conditions. Let me tell my hon. friend that I have moved in this matter year after year and time after time to the extent of making myself almost objectionable, and I think he will find that there are five or six members of this government who would rather not hear me talk about the shipbuilding business so often have they heard me speak about it to them. One does not have to go around the country with a brass band when he is moving in the direction of obtaining a reform which will benefit the industries of the country or of his constituency.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens). Between Collingwood and the St. Lawrence is there water enough in the canals to float a ship of 18 foot draught?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. No, but a ship of very large size can be brought through the canals, and in this connection let me tell the hon. gentleman what happened last year. The Canadian Pacific Railway, which probably has received as much assistance from this country as any other enterprise, wanted two ships for the lakes and they had them built in Great Britain. These ships were too large to go through the canals and when coming up the St. Lawrence one, if not both, were injured. The ships were cut in two at Quebec; they were taken through the canals to the upper lakes and when they got to the upper lakes one would imagine that a Canadian shipbuilding yard would be employed to put them together and to repair their injuries. But that was not done. These vessels were taken to an American shipbuilding yard, $50,000 or $60,000 were spent on them, and the ships were floated into Canada in the month of December absolutely free of duty.

Mr. SPROULE. Why was that done?

Mr. BENNETT. The fault of the government.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I do not know. It can be done under our law. I may say it is not fair or right, and is not encouraging to the industries of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Was it not because there were not large enough dry docks in Canada to put them in? Would the dry dock at Collingwood be large enough to take in one of these vessels? I understand that it is not long enough.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am astonished that the hon. gentleman, who lives only a few miles from Collingwood, should ask that question. If he would take the trouble to drive over to Collingwood and see the dock, I would not have to answer it.

Mr. SPROULE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have been there. I took my information from an item which I saw in one of the papers, and which I presume was founded on fact. It is no discredit to me, because I live close to Collingwood, not to know whether the dock was long enough or not.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am not casting any reflection on the hon. gentleman. I only say that it is astonishing that he, living so close to Collingwood, has not realized the extent of the development there during the last few years. The Canadian Pacific Railway ships should have been built there. The dock was more than long enough and the plant more than sufficient for the purpose. As a matter of fact, the plans and specifications for those ships were given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and were passed upon by the company, and then the company determined to have them built in Great Britain. I understand that the excuse that they gave was that they understood that they could not get them finished soon enough in Canada, and that they could get them cheaper in Great Britain.

Mr. J. D. REID. Why did not the hon. gentleman oppose that item in the tariff which allows ships to go to the United States to be repaired and to come back free of duty?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. There is no such item in the Canadian tariff. The law has been altered in recent years, and the duty on repairs has been taken off. There is no duty on ships coming to this country from Great Britain.

Mr. J. D. REID. I would like the hon. gentleman to explain why the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers went to Buffalo to be repaired. Was it not because the tariff imposed no duty on repairs ?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to finish the sentence ? My information is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not get the ships built as cheaply in Great Britain as they could have had them built in Collingwood, and did not get them delivered any sooner than they could have got them here. There is no item in the tariff that could be invoked in that regard. What the tariff has done in recent years has been to take the duty off necessary repairs, because it was supposed at that time that there was not plant enough in Canada to do the repairs.

Mr. J. D. REID. Why does not the hon. gentleman move to get that item in the tariff changed ?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I have been moving heaven and earth to get it changed, and I have been trying to get assistance.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is too subservient a follower of the government to get such a change.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is the last who should say that I am a subservient follower of the government. I have supported the government in many things because it has been right. If you want progress and development, you must support this government. It announces a policy of progress and development that appeals to any young Canadian, and that is the reason I have supported it on many occasions.

Mr. SPROULE. That is a great evidence of independence.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman has stumped in North Simcoe, but he has not yet defeated me. I invite him to come back.

Mr. SPROULE. The last time I spoke, the hon. gentleman's majority was reduced to sixty.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.). Would the hon. gentleman support a policy to bonus shipbuilding ?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. Yes, in a certain way. I am preaching that doctrine now, though not in the way of a bonus. I say that in regard to ships for the government, which could be built in Canada, the government should not charge a duty on the materials necessary to build those ships. I think you will have shipbuilding plants immediately springing up in the maritime provinces if a policy of this kind is announced. We have on the upper lakes most important shipbuilding plants, the magnitude of which hon. gentlemen cannot realize unless they see them. I say that the government should encourage the building in Canada of the ships and dredges they require for departmental service, and one way they can do it is by providing that the duty on the materials will be rebated.

Mr. BENNETT. Speaking about ice-breaking, might I ask the minister whether he has considered the question of putting on an ice-breaker at Port Arthur and Fort William?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes ; there is an item in the estimates providing for the breaking of the ice at Fort William and Port Arthur.

Mr. BENNETT. To build a vessel?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. BENNETT. It is high time that the minister looked into that matter. Will anybody believe that, although navigation was closed at Port Arthur nearly two months ago, there is some power behind the Throne which influences the Department of Marine and Fisheries? I am told by a gentleman whose reputation is undoubted that within a week, with the ice formed for eighty miles from Port Arthur, there is a firm, the main member of which is a son-in-law of the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee), keeping a tug boat there plunging up and down the river breaking ice at a cost to this country of thousands of dollars. Last year we paid over $20,000 to that concern for breaking ice there ; and to-day, will the country believe it—and I challenge the minister to deny it—although navigation closed aout December 1, there is a tug kept smashing up and down among the ice ; and the Minister of Marine and Fsheries is perpetrating this act of supreme folly at a cost of $150 or $200 a day. I ask the minister if that is not a fact ?

Mr. BRODEUR. If the hon. gentleman will wait until we reach that item, I will be glad to give him any information.

Mr. BENNETT. Surely the minister will not allow that statement to go unchallenged. Does he contradict it?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think we should carry on the discussion of these estimates in some regular way. If my hon. friend will turn to page 69 he will find an item to provide for breaking ice in Thunder bay and Lake Superior and other points. When we reach that item, we will discuss the question he has raised.

Mr. BENNETT. As a member of the House I am going to protest against one dollar being voted to this minister to construct a boat at any point if he is not prepared to deny that he is perpetrating this act of supreme folly. He knows it is so. How much has been paid up to date for that tug? Is it $150 or $200 a day, and that after navigation has been closed in the river for months?

Mr. BRODEUR. At the present moment that boat is not employed by the government.

Mr. BENNETT. Has she been within the last week ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. BENNETT. What time did she cease to work ?

Mr. BRODEUR. About the 17th of December. If she has been doing any work there since she has not been paid by us.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. We would make better progress if the discussion would proceed along some regular lines. I do not think the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) should bring up a discussion on the subject he has referred to at this point. What we are considering now is the construction of an ice-breaking steamer. It has to be a special steamer for a special work, and there is not a ship building establishment in this country that could construct a boat of that description.

Mr. SPROULE. Why ?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Because they have neither the machinery nor the facilities nor the experience. I question if there are many firms in the old country which can construct a boat of that description. The minister is to be much commended for the course he has taken in order to get the best steamer obtainable. We are building this boat, not for a few years, but for many years, to perform a very difficult service, and we want the very best we can get. While the calling for tenders may be all right as a general rule, especially in view of the fact that our opposition friends are very censorious and liable to see wrong doing where none exists, I believe it would be false economy in this instance to accept the lowest tender or to accept a tender from any except the best known and most reputable firms in the old country. It would be false economy to try and save a few dollars or a thousand dollars or even fifty thousand dollars in the construction of a boat for this work. The best that can be obtained will be the cheapest in the long run, and I believe that the country will sustain the minister in following that course. I would ask him now if he can tell us when the tenders are to be opened, and when the contract is likely to be made, because, if at all possible this boat should be ready for next winter's service. But I would avoid anything that would give us an inferior vessel. We have been waiting some time but no loss has been suffered, because I think the information obtained by the minister, while in the old country last year, when he had these experienced men with him, will enable the department to get the best boat that can be constructed for that service.

Mr. SPROULE. Had not the hon. minister better tell us first whether we have the facilities for building such a boat in Canada. It is claimed by many that we have,

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Most of us have a reasonable amount of common sense and I have a fair knowledge of questions of this kind. This is not a matter for experiment, and if my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) will listen to me perhaps I can give him some information. I am making a statement which, I think, is fairly reasonable.

Mr. SPROULE. No doubt.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. And I repeat that economy in this instance might be false economy. This is a service which must be kept up and which we are bound by solemn contract to keep up.

Mr. J. D. REID. Could not the Arctic' do that work ?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. My hon. friend is somewhat facetious. This may be a trifling and a laughable matter to the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid), but it is not so to myself and a few other people in this country. I would ask the hon. minister again when the tenders will be opened.

Mr. BRODEUR. My impression is that they will have to be in by the 15th of March.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the minister to say that no vessel has been breaking ice at Fort William since the 17th of December. Is that correct ?

Mr. BRODEUR. What I have said is that the government has not paid anything for breaking the ice since the 17th of December. It may be possible that some vessels are breaking the ice there.

Mr. BENNETT. In the employ of the government ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. FOWLER. I happened to be in Fort William yesterday, and a vessel was breaking the ice there and has been since the 17th of December. And my information from residents of Fort William is that every day she steams out about fifteen miles—although between the point to which she steams and open water there is at least fifty to seventy miles of solid ice. It may be that she is doing this for the fun of the thing, but she happens to be the same vessel that was breaking the ice in the fall. If she has got into the habit of ice breaking and cannot stop, that is a very remarkable circumstance. Of course we must accept the minister's statement and conclude that these people are doing this for the fun of the thing.

Mr. PARDEE. I have been listening to the remarks of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) regarding the tug breaking ice in Fort William harbour. I went to a gentleman who is interested in the matter, and made inquiry concerning it. I asked if it were the fact that the tug 'James Whalen' had been since December 17th breaking ice in Fort William, and he said it was a fact. He said also that it is not being done at the expense of the government, but at the expense of their own company, to try whether or not, by keeping the ice open as much as possible, they may not be able to get in earlier in the spring and go on with their dredging. So the government is not responsible for this work since December 17th.

Mr. BENNETT. I am charmed to know that Mr. James Whalen, the son-in-law of the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) is doing something of benefit to the country for which he is not paid by this government. Surely, something will happen to-morrow for that spontaneous act of patriotism on the part of Messrs. Bowman, Whalen & Co. Did the minister say that there was a contract for this work ?

Mr. BRODEUR. We had a contract, which was awarded after tenders had been called for.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the amount of the contract ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. What is she going to do for this $30,000 ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Break the ice in the early part of the season. This year it was December 17 when we found there were no more boats ready to leave the harbour, and so we decided to discharge her from working for the government. I suppose hon. members know the reason why we started this work. We were requested by the shippers, especially by those of Winnipeg, Port Arthur and Fort William, to keep the channel open as long as possible so that the grain of the west might be carried as late as possible by Georgian bay, Buffalo or Port Colborne. Some years ago, the work was undertaken by the government. At first, we used to pay a certain amount of money for each day of work done. We decided last year that it would be better to call for tenders and make a formal contract, by which they would keep the channel open during the fall as long as the Sault Ste. Marie canals were kept open. In the spring, they will have to do the same class of work.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask who is the member of the House interested in this company referred to by my hon. friend from West Lambton ?

Mr. PARDEE. Not a member of the House. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) wants to know, it was Mr. Charles Bowman.

Mr. BENNETT. We have heard of him.

Mr. PARDEE. You ought to hear more of him ; he is a good man.

Mr. BENNETT. We understood the hon. gentleman to refer to a member of the House.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I was glad to hear the hon. member for North Simcoe speak as he did of encouraging shipbuilding in Canada, though I am not able to think he was sincere when he spoke of the building of ice breakers.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY. This was only an 1800 ton vessel, and they build them four or five times as large as that.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I wonder the hon. gentleman (Mr. Leighton McCarthy) has remained so quiet in this House during the years of decline in the shipbuilding industry. This decline went on right under the government's eyes, and petition after petition, and resolution after resolution came in from boards of trade and other organizations, and this is the first occasion when the hon. gentleman has raised his voice on the subject. I am thoroughly imbued with the idea that some support should be given to the shipbuilding industry of this country. As the hon. gentleman said, we have seen the shipbuilding of Canada go down until from holding a place among the leading shipbuilding nations of the world, we have almost wholly lost that industry. I would almost go so far as to say that the government should have a bonus system for the promotion of shipbuilding. They bonus almost every thing else. Steps should be taken along the lines suggested by the hon. member, but we should give a bonus to shipbuilding as well. With regard to the vessel under discussion, I do not suppose that any member of the government would say that any of our ship yards are sufficiently up-to-date to build such a vessel in this country. I agree with the hon. member for Kings (Mr. J. J. Hughes) that the best builders should be given the contract for this vessel. The 'Stanley', which was built under the Conservative government was built in a good yard. This government gave us the 'Minto' which was built in an inferior yard with the result that, every year, she has made more or less extensive repairs. I believe $30,000 or $40,000 was spent on her after she came over to this side. I hope that the minister's confidence in his experts may be justified, but some of the experts he had on the other side are not such as to cause the people to become enthusiastic over their capabilities. I hope the minister has taken the best means in his power to make sure that when the boat is built she will be able to give the service she is supposed to give.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I have listened with great interest to this discussion, and wish to say a word in support of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Leighton McCarthy). I think some hon. members do not realize the progress we have made in shipbuilding in Canada. I was somewhat surprised, myself, on visiting Collingwood some weeks ago to find the splendid equipment they have—not only their dry dock, but machinery for turning out large ships. In proof of it all, there was a ship of over 3,000 tons, built last season, a splendid specimen of the ship builder's art. There is also a ship yard in Toronto where they have good appliances. My opinion is, and I submit it with all earnestness to the minister, that the government should give the preference to Canadian ship builders. It is unfortunate that our shipbuilding is disappearing year by year. If you look over the returns, you will find that we have this year fewer ships than last year; and if you go back fifteen years you will find that this is the story all through. There are many reasons for this state of affairs. I quite believe we shall not be able to start this business successfuly until something is done to rectify the present state of affairs. There are some articles that enter into the construction of a ship that are admitted free but very few. The large number of articles are not admitted free, but are heavily taxed, making it impossible for the Canadian shipbuilder to compete on equal terms with the shipbuilder in Britain.

When the vessel is launched on the ocean, she has to compete with all the world for business, and a handicap of so many dollars a ton means that she cannot earn dividends for her shareholders. Something ought to be done by the government, either in the form of a drawback, or in some other way, to give the Canadian ship builder a fair chance to compete.

I made inquiries of some builders as to the articles on which they are compelled to pay duty and I have a list here. Among the articles are iron castings, brass castings, common iron, bar iron, rivets, paint, pipe fittings, galvanized fittings, locks, screws, bolts and nuts, packing, babbit, electric wire, belting, leather, shafting, force pumps, ship supplies, side lights, life boats, and a large number of other articles that are heavily taxed. The result of this is that a Canadian shipbuilder is unable to compete for the building of ship for the Canadian owner or the Canadian government with British shipbuilders, and unless you put him on the same basis as other manufacturers and give a drawback equivalent to the duty he pays on his raw material, it is practically impossible for him to carry on his business to-day. If a boilermaker, for instance, is making a boiler for export he pays duty on the material he uses in its construction; but when he exports the boiler he receives a drawback of practically every dollar he has paid to the government in duties. Put the Canadian shipbuilder on the same basis and he will have a chance to live, because when his ship is on the ocean it is an export, it has to compete for trade with the whole world, and he should receive the same drawback as other manufacturers on their exported products. If we are ever to start shipbuilding in Canada we should give a preference in the case of ships built by the government to the Canadian builder. It may be that no Canadian builder is now ready to undertake the building of this ice-breaker, but this is a policy that the government ought to adopt in future cases. Permit me also to suggest that they should have a marine architect to draw the plans of the ships so that you could put an exact plan before the Collingwood, Halifax or St. John or New Glasgow builder, showing him what is wanted. Under the present system the contractor is asked to submit a plan but our people are not expert in that, it is difficult to get naval architects here.

Mr. BRODEUR. We have to prepare our own plans in this case.

Mr. SINCLAIR. We should have an architect in the employ of the department able to prepare all the plans, giving all details so that we could place before the Canadian builder exactly what is wanted by the government. This would give the Canadian a far better opportunity to compete for the business. I wish to support as strongly as I can the idea of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. L. G. McCarthy) that the Canadian builder should have the preference, even if the ship should cost 25 per cent more we should build it at home.

Mr. J. D. REID. Personally I am anxious to support any vote necessary to build the very best steamer that is required for the service between Prince Edward Island and the main shore; anything that can be done to improve that service should be done by the government and I believe every member in the House will support that. I believe that there are in Canada shipbuilding concerns that could build this boat; but as to building it on the upper lakes there is the serious handicap that after building her they would have to cut her in two and take her in sections down the lakes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What sized ship can pass through the locks?

Mr. J. D. REID. I understand she draws 18 feet and there is only 14 feet of water in the canals.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Does my hon. friend say 18 feet when empty ?

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister said 18 feet.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. That is in ice-breaking trim.

Mr. J. D. REID. I was assuming that she is longer than 250 feet.

Mr. BRODEUR. The draft is 18 feet loaded.

Mr. J. D. REID. What beam is she ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Forty-six feet.

Mr. J. D. REID. The width of the locks is only 45 feet.

Mr. BRODEUR. I was told by a Canadian builder that she could be built on the lakes and could pass through the canal if they could remove something from the sides of the ship to enable her to pass through.

Mr. J. D. REID. If she is not longer or wider than the locks I am satisfied she could be built in this country ; and so long as the price was not unreasonable I think we should build her. We have as good men in this country as on the other side. The difficulty in competing is owing to their cheaper labour, the freight on the material, &c. I do not believe our builders can compete in price but if possible we should give them a preference.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes) contended she could not be built here.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Did we ever build an ice-breaking vessel here ?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. That is no argument.

Mr. SPROULE. If we never start we will never succeed. I have at various times advocated the principle advocated by Mr. L. G. McCarthy to-night, and I have been surprised that he has so long hidden his light under a bushel and not let the people know where he stands. That principle has been advocated by gentlemen on this side for many years and one of the places we had in view was the shipbuilding yard in Collingwood, in the hon. gentleman's riding. We regard it as very important to establish the shipbuilding industry here and if we can build these ships in Canada it is our duty to give any reasonable aid we can for that purpose.

Mr. BENNETT. How many tenders were received for that $30,000 ice-breaking contract at Port Arthur ?

Mr. JOHNSTON.

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall obtain the answer but it would be better to leave that until that item comes up for discussion.

Mr. BENNETT. The officers are all here.

Mr. BRODEUR. They are outside, but I do not think it is fair to ask me to discuss this question at the present time.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. I think we are all glad that this item has been placed in the estimates. I agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that some encouragement should be given to shipbuilding in Canada. I know that an effort is being made in the maritime provinces to establish iron and shipbuilding industries. But I think that the conditions will not permit, in so far as I am informed, of the building of this ship to-day in Canada, although I believe that in future we should have our ships built in this country. We should have the best ship that can be procured no matter whether it is procured in England or Germany. I do not think we have in Canada a yard where a ship suitable for this purpose could be built. I know that the St. Lawrence canals will only admit of a ship passing down 45 feet wide. It is necessary that we should go to England where the builders are conversant with the conditions which have to be met. We should go to the best ship yard in the world, no matter which shipyard it is. I agree with the remarks which have been made in reference to encouraging the shipbuilding industry in Canada, and I think that a bonus should be given to our own shipbuilders to encourage them, because shipbuilding is an industry we desire to establish here. Too much money is sent away to the old country for ships, and I think that if some encouragement were given towards the establishment of shipbuilding yards it would be a great benefit to the country.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the minister positively assure the committee that there is no bargain or contract, implied or otherwise, with Whelan & Co. for the service of this company's tug since the 17th December?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have already stated and I will repeat that there is no contract covering that period. We are not bound to pay anything either directly or indirectly in connection with the work which may have been performed since the 17th December.

Mr. BENNETT. The question has not been discussed between the minister or any one on behalf of his department with the people who own this tug?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, it has never been discussed.

Mr. BENNETT. The statement made by Bowman & Whelan through the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) will go before the country, and it is to me a matter of the most supreme wonderment that these firms, Conmee & Whelan and Bowman & Whelan, should to-day, in the interest of the country and in the interest of themselves, be plowing up and down the waters of this harbour for a distance of 15 miles for the purpose of seeing whether or not dredging operations can be carried on during the winter months. We will have to wait until next session to see whether there is a bill in the meantime for this service. It will be very strange if there is not. If you refer to the Auditor General's Report of a year ago there will be found bills from these people for a similar service performed or alleged to have been performed years before, and when the Auditor General sat tight on them and would not allow them to be paid did these gentlemen prosecute their claims? Not at all; they simply dropped them. It will be a matter of wonderment if these gentlemen who are engaged in doing this work do not claim some compensation for their services. I will accept the statement of the minister that there is no bargain in connection with it that they are to be paid for any service performed by them subsequent to the 17th December and the minister says that there is not.

Mr. BRODEUR. I will assure my hon. friend once more that there will be no money paid for work performed since the 17th December.

Mr. DANIEL. The matter of shipbuilding and the want of encouragement on the part of the government in regard to the tariff are very important. It is a subject which has been brought before this House for the last year or two. I remember referring to it myself, instancing the case of a large vessel which had then only recently been launched at Collingwood or somewhere on the great lakes. At that time I had in my mind what the builders of the vessels had to pay in duties. I think the vessel was one of 10,000 tons and the amount that the builders had to pay in duties on the materials that were used in the construction of that vessel was enough to build a good sized vessel. There were some drawbacks, but the drawbacks were small in amount. That is a matter that the government should take into consideration. The shipbuilding industry has gone down in the last twenty years from over a million tons of registered shipping until last year when it was little more than about 600,000 tons. The industry is rapidly disappearing with the exception that the tonnage in the province of Ontario is holding its own and perhaps within the last year or two has slightly increased, but take it all over the Dominion, the tonnage has been gradually lessening from year to year. It certainly is time that the government made some arrangement whereby the duties on articles used in shipbuilding should be reduced or removed so that vessels constructed in this country could compete on a more even footing than they are able to do to-day with the shipping of the world. In regard to the ability of any shipbuilding yards in Canada to construct an ice-breaker I am not in a position to express much of an opinion, but from the fact that any vessel of that kind built in the great lakes will have to be taken apart or the canals through which it goes will have to be partially dismantled in order to allow a vessel of that size to get through it would appear to me, more especially taking into consideration the further fact that none of our people have so far attempted to build a vessel of this class, to make it advisable that we should go to the best shipyards available, even though we had to go outside of Canada to find them. As far as the matter of shipbuilding is concerned I agree with the remarks of the two or three gentlemen who have spoken, and I hope the government will take the matter into such favourable consideration that they will be able to arrange the tariff in such a way that articles necessarily entering into shipbuiding that are not produced in this country may be admitted free for that purpose. That will be at least one help towards stopping the great deterioration which is going on so rapidly with regard to our Canadian tonnage.

Mr. KEMP. There is no doubt that the Canadian shipbuilding industry has a very precarious existence at present. We can build vessels in Canadian shipyards with a capacity of 200,000 or 250,000 bushels of grain, and I have no doubt whatever that we could build this little ice-breaker here.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. 300,000 or 400,000 bushels capacity. The 'Midland Prince' was built in Canada, and I think she carries over 300,000 bushels.

Mr. KEMP. We can very well build this ice-breaker in Canada and give employment to Canadian labour. I notice that the Minister of Customs has been having quite a discussion with the member for North Simcoe, presumably about the shipbuilding industry, and he might give us the benefit of his views on the subject. Has the Minister of Customs any views on the subject?

Mr. PATERSON. I have spoken once to-night already.

Mr. KEMP. On this subject?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kemp) will understand my difficulty now.

Mr. KEMP. I sympathize with my hon. friend (Mr. L. G. McCarthy) if he cannot get a more satisfactory answer from the Minister of Customs than I can. Let me point out the development of Canadian shipping on the great lakes ; up to the year 1897 the capacity of grain-carrying vessels on the great lakes was 616,000 bushels in one trip, while now it is 6,250,000 bushels in one trip. This leaves out of consideration passenger and other vessels, and it shows what tremendous development is going on in the grain-carrying trade of the lakes. And while the shipbuilding industry is prospering on the United States side of the lakes, and while other industries than the shipbuilding industry are prospering in Canada, why is it that the policy of this government should single out that one industry and say that it shall not exist? There is a shipbuilding industry at Collingwood, there are shipbuilding industries in Toronto, there is one on Lake Erie, and they are quite capable of building fine vessels. Why does not the government patronize them? Something should be done by the government, and done at once, to help this industry in Canada. I cannot draw the Minister of Customs to give his views to-night, but I trust that on another occasion not far distant he will stand up in this House to advocate protection for Canadian shipbuilding, as he has for other industries. Now, the members from Prince Edward Island have demanded an up-to-date and efficient vessel for the service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and the contention is raised that the vessel which the government is about to have constructed will not at all answer the purpose. Is the government going to leave the people of Prince Edward Island to the resort of dog-trains to carry the mails in winter ? Is the government going to send down there a little bit of a vessel of 1,800 tons which, for the greater part of the winter, may be stuck in the ice of the Straits of Northumberland? Did I understand the Minister of Marine to say that he had visited the Baltic and had seen some of the Russian ice-breakers?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. KEMP. The minister must know that the steamer which he purposes building is not to be compared with the ice-breakers on the Baltic.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is no ice-breaker in Russia or on the Baltic which will be as strong as this vessel.

Mr. J. D. REID. And as large?

Mr. BRODEUR. The size has nothing to do with it ; it depends on the power of the engine.

Mr. KEMP. I find that the ice-breaker 'Yermak' is 305 feet long, 71 feet beam, 8,000 tons capacity, 25 feet draught, 10,000 horse-power, and that she will break through floating ice 14 feet thick without any difficulty. In view of this, would it not seem that we are spending money uselessly in supplying such a steamer as is proposed for the winter service in Prince Edward Island? If you are going to have continuous traffic between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, why not spend more money and do it properly at once, and not have the members from that province constantly rising to complain in this House of the ineffective service which you give them down there?

Mr. PATERSON. In order that I may not seem discourteous to my hon. friend (Mr. Kemp), I wish to say a word. He will understand that I cannot say what should be done or what may be done by the government, but I can say that this is a very important industry. However, there is in this, as in other things, a conflict of interests. The increased tonnage on the great lakes, to which he has referred, is no doubt accounted for in some degree by British vessels coming in here ; and under the Merchant Shipping Act, as I understand it, we have no power to tax a British ship. The hon. gentleman will remember that in 1902 an Act was passed by this parliament, on the invitation of the government, by which we made foreign built ships pay what is equivalent to 25 per cent duty on their value before they could take out a license and engage in our coasting trade. What I mean by foreign built ships is this : Formerly a ship would be built in the United States, would go to Newfoundland and take out a British register, then come to our waters and do our coasting trade without paying duty. The Act of 1902 put a stop to that practice. British registry is easy to get, but no foreign built ship can now come in under British register without paying 25 per cent. Then there were a number of orders in council passed under a supposed reciprocity arrangement, by which ships from Sweden and Denmark and other countries were granted the right to do coasting trade in Canada. For a long time it was thought that these orders in council had been passed under treaties made by Great Britain which we were not at liberty to disregard. After a long interchange of correspondence, we came to the conclusion that there were no treaties which prevented the cancellation of these orders in council, and a short time ago we decided that these orders in council should be rescinded from the 1st of January next. But conflicting interests again arise, and there are those who say that this is going to inflict great hardship on other lines of industries. I mention this only to show that questions of this kind require a great deal of consideration. Further than that, of course, I cannot be supposed to express even an opinion as to what ought to be done.

Mr. KEMP. Is not the situation in regard to the Merchants' Shipping Act a little different in respect to the great lakes to what it is in respect to the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of the St. Lawrence? We have built artificial waterways and paid for them out of the revenues of this country, to provide a means of getting into those great lakes. I would like the minister to give us his view on that matter.

Mr. PATERSON. The view of my officers who know more than I do on these matters, is that the Act does apply to the lakes. Whether the British government might not be willing for us to pass an enactment with respect to the great lakes, I could not of course say.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The argument of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) with regard to British ships is a good deal stronger with regard to American ships, which come over and engage in our coasting trade.

Mr. KEMP. I may mention that a fine ship, the 'Midland Prince,' which carries 300,000 bushels of grain, was built on the lakes for the purpose of business on the lakes. She cannot go to the Atlantic, and if she could, she could not do business there, because she is not suited for that trade. I do not see that we are under any obligation to protect British shipping on the great lakes.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I have long been in favour of a policy of shipbuilding in this country. I have advocated it from time to time, and I am glad to hear so many members express themselves in favour of that policy to-night. But if you want to establish a great shipbuilding industry in this country, you must do more than talk about it; you must be willing to pay for it, and make the necessary sacrifices to obtain it. I am in favour of encouraging the building of steel vessels not only on our inland waters, but on the Atlantic coast; and probably the best way to secure that is to go at it, not in any small way, but boldly; and as a first step to make an arrangement for the transfer from Great Britain to Canada of one of the great ship building concerns which has its headquarters at Belfast or on the Clyde or at Newcastle. It would cost some money, but it would pay this country well. If one of these great up-to-date shipbuilding concerns which has its architects and its skilled mechanics, would duplicate its yard at one of the ports of our maritime provinces, we could then make provision for the building of our own ocean liners in our own country. If there is one thing that is growing rapidly in this country, it is the ocean steamship business. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has embarked largely in that business, possessing one of the finest fleets on the Atlantic, and there are two or three other Canadian steamship lines, and I understand that it is the intention of the Grand Trunk Pacific to go into the same business. If we go into that business let us go into it wholly; let us not only have the steamships, but build them in our own country, with our own mechanics, our own steel, and all the materials made in this country. Canada is growing at so rapid a pace that she can well afford to bear the cost of establishing such an industry, and once it is established it will soon become one of the most profitable industries we have. If this country is to be an exporting country, sending its products to Europe, its future is largely dependent upon our being able to control not only our inland transportation, whether by rail or water, but our ocean transportation as well. There is only one way to do this, that is by a vigorous national policy, and the readiness to pay the cost, whatever it may be. Again, there is a great ocean trade in prospect on the Pacific coast, and there is no reason why we should not have a great ship building industry on the Pacific coast as well as on the Atlantic.

Mr. PATERSON. There is a yard there now.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Is there a policy to encourage it? It is absolutely useless to talk about it unless we are prepared to accomplish it. I am glad to see the Minister of Finance here to-night listening to this. I was surprised one night when I broached this question, to see that in ten minutes I had three ministers of the Crown approving of it—not directly, but by nibbling at it, and among them was the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. These gentlemen have been considering the question for years. I hope they will have the courage to tackle it. If they do, I believe the people of this country will be prepared to vote the necessary money to bring it about. We have found that we can manufacture in this country almost everything we require. A national policy can take twenty forms; but there is a way of finding the national policy for encouraging any kind of industry.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. What would you suggest?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I am not prepared to give the details now. For one thing I would give a bounty on the ships as built.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. How much a ton?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Whatever is necessary. This is my idea—to have a policy that will do the trick. That is what our national policy was. Put the responsibility on me, and I will find the policy in a very short time.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will it be on the gross ton or the net ton?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. You can have it any way you like. Will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say that he is a good enough national policy man to encourage a policy of that kind in this country? We could not only build our own ships, but we have the men in the maritime provinces who could man them. What better adjunct to the empire could Canada provide than not only transcontinental lines of communication by means of our railroads, but a ship building industry which would be available for the needs of the empire at all times.

Mr. PATERSON. In what way did the Finance Minister nibble at it?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. He came in and went away again, but I am in hopes that he will give us some idea of his position to-night. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) had the same effect on the Minister of Customs and we have had to-night quite an unveiling of the government's policy. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will tell us to-night that he is thinking somewhat along the same lines.

Mr. FIELDING. No doubt the Minister of Customs spoke wisely.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. But not too well.

Mr. FIELDING. He always speaks well.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I hope the Minister of Finance will tell us to-night that the capacity of this country is equal to the occasion and that in a very short time we shall have a national policy which will have for its object the creation and development of a great shipbuilding industry in Canada.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. In the year 1907, just closed, orders were placed in Great Britain for 19 ships at a cost of $3,000,000; of which about $2,000,000 would go in paying for labour, and practically all of these vessels were for the upper lakes. Have we no establishments in this country from which our shipping companies can purchase their ships? The government of Canada has built at least three, perhaps four dry docks, at a very large expense—at Kingston, at Lévis and on the Pacific coast—all of which ought to be used for shipbuilding and repairing. Unless the encouragement suggested is given, these docks will not give the value to the country they should give. If you give encouragement in the way of a duty on repairs, we shall soon have a plant capable of repairing the ships that come to these dry docks. What we want are establishments capable of doing this repair work. It seems to be the general opinion of members on both sides that the government should take immediate action.

Mr. J. D. REID. I agree with the hon. gentleman. The shipbuilding industry at Ogdensburg is very prosperous because Canadian vessels go there to be repaired and are not charged any duty on the repairs when they return to Canada.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. When was the change made?

Mr. J. D. REID. It was made by this government and the hon. gentleman supported them.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am right now.

Mr. J D. REID. But that was the time when the hon. gentleman could have expressed himself to some effect.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. There may have been reasons then which do not exist now.

Mr. J. D. REID. The Minister of Customs was here when that was done. It was about two years ago.

Mr. PATERSON. I really do not remember the change in that matter, but I do not say that there has not been any.

Mr. BENNETT. There was formerly a duty on repairs.

Mr. PATERSON. How far back?

Mr. BENNETT. I can tell of one case, in 1893, because a vessel went over there for repairs and was smuggled back after the repairs were made, but the Controller of Customs of that day, Mr. Clarke Wallace, seized the vessel and made her pay $2,000 or $3,000 duty on repairs.

Mr. J. D. REID. It is not many years since the change was made which enabled Canadian vessels to get their repairs done in the United States free of duty. I would like to ask the minister how long the 'Minto' was on her trip with the Governor General.

Mr. BRODEUR. About six weeks.

Mr. J D. REID. How many were on the cruise?

Mr. BRODEUR. I could not say, it was the Governor General and his party.

Mr. J. D. REID. How long did she run during the year ending 30th March?

Mr. BRODEUR. I gave that information at the last sitting, and the hon. gentleman will find details on page 14 of the report.

Mr. J. D. REID. I see $32 charged against the 'Montcalm' for a marble slab for a sideboard. Is there a sideboard on that boat?

Mr. BRODEUR. There is on all the boats.

Mr. BENNETT. Does she carry passengers?

Mr. BRODEUR. Occasionally. When engaged in carrying lighthouse supplies she has to carry the workmen and officers and the Marconi people.

Mr. TAYLOR. Last year we voted $150,000 for the construction of an ice boat. Was any of that money spent?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, this is a revote, and the tenders have only just been called for.

Mr. FOSTER. If the discussion is over with regard to that item, I have no objection passing it. But the first item was not passed, as the minister will see by reference to 'Hansard' giving the discussion when the matter was debated.

Mr. BRODEUR. It was the night before.

Mr. FOSTER. No. An item is not carried by the minister crying 'carried'. The minister said it was carried and I said it was not; the minister said again it was carried and I said again it was not. And Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) said whether it was passed or not we had better pass; and we did pass out.

Mr. BRODEUR. We spent two days on that. I understand that on the first occasion the item was passed.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, it stood.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister did not get any estimates the first day—that is sure. There is a great deal to be discussed on this item. For instance, there is the whole policy and expenditure of the 'Arctic'. Of course, if the House wants to sit we shall have to sit, but it seems to me we shall make as much progress by adjourning now. It is pretty near midnight.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not understand exactly the proposition made.

Mr. FOSTER. I am agreeable that the item we have been discussing should pass, but the item before that is not passed, and we want it to stand because there is a good deal to be said on it.

Mr. BRODEUR. Could we not take the item 'Examination of Masters and Mates'?

Mr. FIELDING. There are several items there that are not controversial.

Examination of masters and mates, $12,600.

Mr. WHITE. Before that item is passed, I would like to ask, with reference to an item at page P—29 of the Auditor General's Report—Thomas Donnelly, Kingston, $183.-26. Is Captain Donnelly still in the employ of the department?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. He is, of course, when there are examinations.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, he is no longer in the employ of the department.

Mr. J. D. REID. Is there not a school in which lectures are given——

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, but Captain Donnelly is no longer in charge.

Mr. DANIEL. Two years ago, there was always an examination held in the port of St. John, but, I believe, not lately. Why are not the examinations still held in St. John?

Mr. BRODEUR. I am surprised to hear that they are not.

Mr. DANIEL. Captain Douglas used to be here.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, I see by my notes that the position is now vacant.

Mr. DANIEL. And has been for some time.

Mr. BRODEUR. It may be so. The officer who takes this position must pass a very severe examination, and it is not always easy to find the man. I do not know that there is any reason for the vacancy.

Mr. DANIEL. I should think the minister would have no difficulty in making a suitable appointment. I have received complaints that persons to be examined had to go to Halifax or somewhere else for the examination, when, if there were no examiner at St. John, the examiners should have been brought to St. John, instead of compelling those who are to be examined to go to a distant part of the country. I believe that, according to the report of the Marine and Fisheries Department, examinations will be held there for certificates to qualify men for foreign sea voyages. But, as I understand it, every year or two examinations have been held in the port of St. John, and, as it is the great port of the maritime provinces, I do not see why it is omitted.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know the reason this vacancy has not been filled. My impression is that it is the difficulty of finding a person who can pass the examination. But I will inquire and will get the true reason.

Mr. DANIEL. If there is no one there fit to take such a position, why not bring some appointee from another part of the country so that the men could pass their examinations there?

Mr. BRODEUR. That is what we will do.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are masters' certificates granted to American citizens?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not unless they have been three years domiciled in Canada.

Mr. J. D. REID. I know that some American citizens have both Canadian and American certificates. If they can get a position on a Canadian steamer they are able to take it. Of course, the law is that no Canadian can hold the two certificates. It seems to me that it is unfair to our Canadian masters and mates that American citizens should hold these certificates. There are American captains on the St. Lawrence running Canadian steamers, though there are a good many Canadian masters and mates that would like to get these positions. It is unfair that the law should allow these men to keep these double certificates.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. That will work both ways as there are many Canadians holding American certificates on the great lakes. The question came up two years ago and it was thought better to leave it alone.

Mr. J. D. REID. On the St. Lawrence they compel the Canadians to become naturalized and live on the American side.

Mr. PARDEE. The owners of the vessels compel them to live there, not the law.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I would suggest to the minister that some means should be provided to afford instruction for seamen along the coast who are anxious to become masters and mates. In the town of Canso, in my own constituency, I am informed there are 30 to 40 young men who would be glad to take instruction in the evening and qualify themselves to pass the examination if they had an opportunity to do so at home. If the minister could arrange for the captains of the cruisers or other competent persons who are not very busy in the winter to lecture in certain places on the coast where a large number of young men could be got together, they could get the practical part of the instruction without going to the large seaport towns. They can get the theoretical training in the high schools, but they must in addition to the required years of service, have some instruction from competent men in the practical part of it in order to pass their examination.

Mr. FOSTER. How much of this was expended last year?

Mr. BRODEUR. In the nine months, $5,974.16.

Mr. FOSTER. How does the minister explain the increase?

Mr. BRODEUR. The increase was due to the printing of the certificates and a charge for lithographing. This was made necessary by a change in the law by the revised statutes.

Mr. FOSTER. But this is for 1908-9 this $12,600.

Mr. BRODEUR. The expenditure for the six months of this year to 30th September, 1907, was $5,381.22. I suppose the reason for the small expenditure in the year before was that the spring, when most of the expenditure is made, was not included in the last fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do you expect to expend in the other six months?

Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose all of the vote except perhaps a couple of thousand dollars.

Rewards for saving life, including life-saving stations, $31,600.

Mr. FOSTER. How much of that was expended? I see by the Auditor General's Report you spent $9,000, and how is it you take $31,600 when only $9,000 was expended in six months.

Mr. BRODEUR. For the six months ending 30th September we have spent $8,-759.40. You have here the same factor that a period of the year when large expenditure was made was not included in the last fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no possibility of requiring a vote of $31,600.

Mr. BRODEUR. We want to establish more life-saving stations. We will establish new stations and equipment on the coast of Vancouver island to cost $7,500; a new station and equipment at Southampton; a new boat house at St. Paul's island, and some other stations on Prince Edward Island and the north coast of New Brunswick.

Mr. J. D. REID. If we are going to do that, I think we had better go ahead and discuss the whole matter. I think it is most unfair for the minister to press this thing the way he is doing.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am not pressing anything. We have been discussing these estimates for three nights now.

Mr. J. D. REID. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. L. G. McCarthy) took up three hours discussing that shipbuilding business, and we could not get a chance to discuss the item.

Mr. TAYLOR. Let us rise; it is twelve o'clock.

Mr. FIELDING. Patience; we will adjourn shortly.

Mr. BOYCE. I would like to ask if the minister proposes establishing any life-saving stations on the north shore of Lake Superior, where there have been so many wrecks, and where life-saving stations are so urgently needed?

Mr. BRODEUR. The matter is under consideration. Perhaps with the amount which will be at the disposal of the department we will be able to establish one, but it is not formally contemplated by the estimate.

Mr. KEMP. Does the minister intend to improve the life-saving station at Toronto island?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. KEMP. Does he intend to spend more money on it and make it more efficient? We have had some pretty bad accidents there.

Mr. BRODEUR. I know there was an accident that happened a year or two ago, but it was not due to the fact that the station was not properly equipped. If I remember well the circumstances of the accident which the hon. gentleman is referring to——

Mr. KEMP. The 'Resolute.'

Mr. BRODEUR. The 'Resolute'—the crew of the life-saving station were endeavouring to save another vessel, and in fact this vessel did not show any distress signals. The boat sank in a few minutes, and it was absolutely impossible for the crew, being engaged in other work and the boat showing no distress signals, to go to their assistance.

Mr. KEMP. There are two entrances to the harbour, and the life-saving station is situated nearer the eastern entrance than the western entrance. In case of a storm vessels seek the harbour by either one of the entrances, so that accidents are liable to occur near one entrance or the other. It seems to be necessary to have a crew stationed on the island, where they can go to the assistance of ships in case of emergency.

Mr. BRODEUR. If we established two life-saving stations on the island, it would be quite a serious undertaking for the Canadian government. We have not established many stations throughout the country, but if we established two stations on the island it would cost millions and millions.

Mr. FOSTER. Cost what?

Mr. BRODEUR. Millions. If we were to establish two stations on the island we would have to do the same thing all over Canada. If on the Atlantic coast we had to establish a life-saving station every ten or fifteen acres, it would be expensive.

Mr. KEMP. I do not advocate that at all.

Mr. BRODEUR I think the hon. gentleman suggested we should have two stations on Toronto island.

Mr. KEMP. I think it is necessary.

Mr. DANIEL. Has the minister any information to give us in regard to the rewards granted for life-saving during the past year? What form do these awards take?

Mr. BRODEUR. In some cases we distribute medals, in some cases watches and in some cases money.

Mr. DANIEL. On whose recommendation are these rewards granted?

Mr. BRODEUR. They are granted on the recommendation of Captain McElhinney, the nautical adviser of the department, who investigates each case as reported by our agents, wharfingers, harbour masters and others, and presents a report, which report is acted upon.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the Finance Minister let us know to-night what he will probably take up on Thursday?

Mr. FIELDING. French treaty.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.05 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1908

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received, from the secretary of the Governor General, the following communication :—

Office of the Governor General's Secretary,
Ottawa, February 12, 1908.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon, at 3.30 o'clock for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. HANBURY WILLIAMS,
Colonel,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved that government orders be called, and that leave be granted to withdraw Bill (No. 10) to amend the Irrigation Act. He said : The reason for asking this withdrawal is that, upon consulting with persons largely interested in irrigation matters in the west, it has been decided to remodel the Bill and to include provisions not covered by the present amendment, and which it is found that it will be in the public interest to have inserted. On the withdrawal of this Bill, I propose to introduce an amended Bill.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This, I understand, is done because it is the convenient form of going on with the other Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 95) to amend the Winding-up Act. He said: This Bill is intended to shorten and simplify the winding up of companies under the Winding-up Act in cases of insolvency. The present machinery is rather inadequate in the opinion of many experienced liquidators in Ontario, the corporations and large firms into whose hands is committed the liquidation of companies in insolvency. The amendment is intended to provide that the liquidator—who has given security for the performance of his duties—may have the same powers as the administrator of an insolvent estate, that is, power to proceed with the liquidation of the estate and winding it up to a final conclusion, without being obliged to apply to the court from time to time. Under the provisions of the Winding-up Act, the liquidator is compelled to apply to the court in practically every step of the proceedings. If he desires to compromise a debt, even of so small a sum as $25, he has to apply to the court for authority to do so. In many cases the costs involved in taking such a step exceed the amount collected—very often two or three times over.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Cannot that power be given under the law?

Mr. MACDONELL. There is a provision under the Winding-up Act that authority may be given to the liquidator in the order appointing him to do this. But this is practically a dead letter, because the court, in making the winding-up order, it may be said, invariably, makes it in general terms, and in such a way as not to give the liquidator these powers. Whether the reason for that is the desire of the court to retain jurisdiction over every step of the proceedings or for the interests that may be concerned in the liquidation, I do not know; but the fact is that, a winding-up order has, in no case in the province of Ontario, contained the provision to which the hon. member (Mr. R. L. Borden) has alluded. The present Bill is designed to reverse the existing conditions—that is to give power to the liquidator to take the steps in winding up without applying to the court. He has not the powers now unless they are expressly given in the order; this amendment would give him these powers unless the order expressly declares that he shall not have them. The court will still have power, in proper cases, to put the clause in the liquidation order that the liquidator shall not have these powers. It will leave it in the discretion of the court to retain power to control the proceedings from time to time. This Bill, if passed, will immensely shorten the liquidation of large companies, and will cheapen the cost of liquidation by at least one-half. My hon. friend points out that the whole matter comes before the court at the conclusion, that the liquidator, when passing his accounts, has to account for every farthing of the estate and every step he has taken, and, as he has given security, it is safe to say that the interests of all parties will be amply protected.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. HONORE GERVAIS (St. James, Montreal) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 96) to amend the Criminal Code with regard to conspiracy in restraint of trade. He said: The section of the Criminal Code which it is proposed to amend by this Bill is section 498, which defines conspiracies which are declared to be criminal offences. But this article has a saving clause which reads as follows:—

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

The rigid, stringent and rigorous application of this article 498 has proved, in some cases, quite detrimental to some industries and to some associations of traders. The purpose of this Bill is quite simple: it is to put the wholesale merchant, the retail merchant, the trader, on the very same footing as the workmen or employee. That is, if this article 498, is not to be applied to workmen and employees, there is no reason why it should be made to apply to employers and traders.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. To whom will it apply?

Mr. GERVAIS. I may say that there is quite a difference between what is styled a trust and what is styled a commercial entente, for that kind of commercial entente or agreement has built the trade of Germany, Trusts may have been found detrimental to trade in some other parts of the world; but, later on, I think we shall be able to show the difference between a trust and the ordinary commercial entente. For, it must be granted that wholesale and retail traders, merchants and manufacturers should be allowed to come together to talk about the future of their industry and the maintenance of their interests in exactly the same way as workmen and employees are allowed to discuss their interests and the future of their trades.

Mr. SPROULE. You never find working men combining to interfere with or restrain trade. He cannot do it as the commercial man can.

Mr. GERVAIS. The government has always available weapons to destroy any undue, unfair or illegal combination in restraint of trade. I think it should not be made a criminal offence for three commercial men or any number of them to come together and discuss what should be done for their reasonable protection. That has been allowed in Germany and should be allowed in Canada. If these commercial combines are found to be detrimental to the interest of the country then this government or this parliament has all the necessary power to crush them or bring them to terms.

Mr. SPROULE. They are doing it under this very law that you wish to repeal.

Mr. GERVAIS. Not at all. I join issue about it with the hon. member for East Grey. For example some criminal prosecutions which have been started in Ontario have been looked upon as persecutions rather than prosecution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that this motion be adopted with this addition ? I think it would be better that the amendment should be handed in so that the clerk would be in possession of it properly.

Motion as amended agreed to.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenburg) moved:

That rule 38 of the House of Commons be amended by inserting after the word 'question' in the fifth line thereof, the words 'or of the intention of any member to discuss any definite or substantive matter on a motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair for the purpose of going into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means.'

He said : Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say concerning the resolution which stands in my name. The present rule 39 reads :

Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a Bill, resolution or address for the appointment of any committee, or for the putting of a question.

My resolution suggests the insertion of the following words :

Or of the intention of any member to discuss any definite or substitute matter on a motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the purpose of going into committee of Supply or Ways and Means.

The sole purpose of the amendment is to prevent the taking of the House by surprise. It constantly happens on the motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply or of Ways and Means, that very important questions are presented to the House with regard to which the majority of members are taken by surprise. It is of course an ancient right of the House to ventilate grievances upon a motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair, but it is a very ancient one, and while I would not like to see it destroyed altogether, I think it is only fair and reasonable that two days' notice of such an amendment should be given to the House. This notice will appear in the Votes and Proceedings and the whole House shall have ample knowledge of it beforehand. I suppose an intimation is given to the Prime Minister or to some minister of the Crown interested in a proposed amendment, but as a matter of fact such notice does not reach the majority of members. I do not think it would be a hardship upon any member to have to give these two days' notice ; it will not prevent discussion of any matter of urgent public importance under another rule of the House. Under the English rule no such amendment to Supply can be made without such notice. I find in Standing Orders No. 17, the following English rule:

Whenever the committee of Supply stands as an order of the day, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question unless on first going into the supplies on army, navy, or civil service estimates respectively, or of any vote of credit, an amendment be moved or question raised relating to the estimate proposed to be taken in supply.

From the manual of procedure which accompanies these Standing Orders, I think it is clear that on going into Supply in the British House of Commons the only amendment that can be moved is one relating directly to the supply which is to be asked for from the House. The justification I allege for this motion is that it would prevent the House being taken by surprise. I say it happens almost every day that the House is taken by surprise in a discussion of matters which are really important and of interest to every member, but as it works out the great majority of the members have no notice whatever. On that ground, and on that ground alone, I beg leave to move the resolution.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). It rather takes the House by surprise to have a proposal of this kind made. The rules of the House are not lightly dealt with in this way ; the universal practice is that so important a matter as an important amendment to a rule of the House should be submitted in the first place to a committee, considered by that committee and reported on to the House, when the House would take it into consideration. We revised the rules of this House two years ago, and in the opinion of the House there was no occasion at that time for any such far-reaching amendment as is now proposed. It would prevent the discussion of any grievance on motion to go into Committee of Supply unless two days' notice were previously put upon the order paper. That would be an abnegation of the practice that has prevailed for five hundred years in the British House of Commons and that has prevailed in this House of Commons ever since we have had parliamentary institutions in this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLean) speaks of members of the House being taken by surprise, but they need not be taken very much by surprise if they perform their duty and attend here. Surely matters of public interest can be discussed in this House without two days' notice on the order paper. The proposal would cut down to a very serious extent the privileges of this House, and I venture to say that in the end it would not be found to shorten the length of the session. I understood the hon. gentleman to refer to some English rule, but so far as the English practice is concerned, they go infinitely further than I hope we shall ever be obliged to go in this country. If we carried out the English practice to the full we would adopt the English system of closure, under which the passage of the estimates would be reduced to very little more than a farce. Often a sum of £10,000,000 is voted by the Commons of Great Britain after a discussion of not more than two hours' duration. We do not require any restriction of that kind in Canada, and it would be a most unfortunate thing to attempt to restrict discussion as the hon. member for Lunenburg proposes. There has been no very great evil attendant upon the practice of this House since confederation. Hon. gentlemen who desire to bring a matter of public importance to the House usually give notice in advance. That is certainly done when there is intention to move an amendment to the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply. I have always pressed upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the extreme importance of giving the government notice in advance of any amendment to Supply ; and apart from that, hon. gentlemen have, from time to time, given notice in advance of their intention to discuss important public questions. I decidedly object to the passing of this motion ; first, because according to the usual order of procedure such a proposal should be referred to a committee ; and, in the second place, because it does not seem to me that there is any abuse of the present practice which would justify us in making such a very important amendment to the rules.

Mr. G. H. McINTYRE (South Perth). I cannot say that I have given the question much consideration, and I would not address the House at all but for the fact that you, Mr. Speaker, announced me as the seconder of the motion. But so far as I have considered it, I have not found myself favourable to it. So that I must decline to take the position of seconding the motion. I have not felt that our experience has warranted us in calling for any such change. If our experience had shown it to be necessary, we might probably fairly do it. But I would hesitate very much, in the condition of parties in this country, to take away any of the privileges which now belong to an opposition. I think it very necessary indeed that all the parliamentary privileges they have should be ensured to them. The opposition of to-day may be the government of to-morrow; and the Liberals, who are in power to-day, may find the necessity of all these privileges in the future. So that for once at least I can agree strongly with the leader of the opposition, and I will ask my hon. friend to accept some other seconder for his motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is only two years since the rules of the House were consolidated after revision. The committee which was entrusted with the work gave it considerable attention, and, so far as I am concerned, I cannot say that this matter escaped my attention. But on the whole I think we ought to follow the practice which has prevailed, as the hon. leader of the opposition has just said, for more than five hundred years—the well-known constitutional practice that whenever the House is moved to go into Supply it is the privilege of any member to offer any remarks which he has to offer, whether they are good, bad or indifferent. Perhaps no very serious inconvenience would arise if a member were required to give notice of his intention beforehand, but there is this consideration not to be forgotten, that on the motion for Supply, not only important questions, but very often matters of public indifference, but yet of importance to the member himself, may be brought to the attention of the House, and on the whole I think it is well that every member of this House should have the privilege, whenever the Crown asks for a Supply, of standing up and presenting what observations he has to make. If the motion of my hon. friend had referred only to the moving of an amendment to the motion to go into Supply, there might be more force in his contention, but it proposes that notice shall be given of the intention of any member to discuss any definite or substantive matter. Even if the motion of my hon. friend proposed that no amendment should be moved to the motion for Supply without notice being given, I would not for my part be disposed to accept it at once. On the whole, as has been stated by the hon. member for South Perth, this is one of the valued privileges of an opposition. It may be, as he has suggested, that at some time there may be a change, and what is now the party of the government may become the party of the opposition, though I do not for my part anticipate any immediate change.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. You may be taken by surprise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have been told that before several times. On the whole, so far as the privileges of members are concerned, I think we had better stick to our rules. I may observe to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that in former years it was the habit of the opposition to give us at least one day's notice of their intention to move any substantial amendment. This year this practice has not been observed, not I suppose by intention, but owing to the pressure of business or otherwise. But if we are to observe the rules of the House, I think it is proper that ample notice should be given by one side of the House to the other of any intention to discuss any important question. On the whole, I do not object to my hon. friend bringing up his motion. It is perhaps as well that he has brought it up, so as to give hon. members an opportunity of thinking over it. But I would suggest that he withdraw it, and leave the matter for further consideration by hon. members on both sides of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I be allowed to say, with regard to the lack of notice by the opposition this session, that I think on two or three occasions there has not been the length of notice that I would have desired and that we have been in the habit of giving in the past. The difficulty has been that the terms of the motion have not been settled until immediately before the debate in one or two of these cases. That may be not a very good answer, as perhaps the proper course would be to postpone the debate until another day in order that notice could be given. I think the Prime Minister's suggestion in that respect is only fair, and for my part I will endeavour to see that it is carried out.

Mr. SPROULE. It is one of the valuable rights of this House, and one which should not be given up, that any member may bring before the House any grievance before Supplies are voted. This is one of the rights which no free parliament would ever desire to give up. But suppose it was contemplated to do it, that is to amend the rule as proposed, and suppose there were a hundred notices of matters to be brought up before the House went into Supply, in what order would they be taken up and how many would be disposed of at one sitting? There are many questions of this sort that might arise. I do not anticipate that there is any likelihood of the Canadian parliament or any other parliament of the British empire abandoning the right which every member possesses of ventilating grievances before the Supplies are voted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. While I do not quite concur in the reasons given by those who are opposed to the resolution, yet it is quite evident that I could not succeed in having it passed to-day, and therefore, in accordance with the suggestion of the Prime Minister, I beg leave to withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

OBSTRUCTION OF TRAFFIC IN HALIBURTON COUNTY.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria and Haliburton) moved:

For a copy of correspondence, plans, and other data in connection with the flooding of roads above the dam at Wilberforce, in Haliburton county, and the proposals, if any, for improving said roads and the bridge so as to prevent obstruction of traffic.

He said: In presenting a motion which on its face refers merely to a local matter, but which nevertheless concerns the Minister of Railways and Canals in connection with the agreement that was made with the province of Ontario in regard to taking over the head waters of the River Trent tributary to the Trent canal, I may be permitted to say a word or two. The village of Wilberforce is situated on the line of the Irondale, Bancroft and Ottawa Railway on the Burnt river in Haliburton. At that point there is a little lake, and the government officers in the interest of the lumbermen are in the habit, for the purpose of running the logs, of holding the water back by placing eighteen-inch boards on the dam. The trouble is that the roadway follows the banks of the stream, and for two or three miles above the village passes along the banks of the lake. When this board is placed on to raise the water, the roadway is flooded and travellers have to drive through the water. Foot passengers can pass through the fields, but when they come to the bridge there is a hundred feet or more at the end which is always flooded. In other words, the passage is obstructed along the roadway. There is a splendid place a mile or two above where a storage dam could be readily built. When this board is placed on the dam, the water rises and the logs cannot be brought under the bridge. Consequently the lumbermen take the railing off the bridge and passengers are liable to drop into twenty feet of water. Then when the water is lowered, the health of the locality is injured and there are always numerous cases of typhoid fever resulting.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did these things exist before or are they the result of the work the government is carrying on ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The government is not carrying on any work, and that is what we complain of. A government officer comes along and puts on the board, we claim he has no right to. In fact I do not think it will go on again because the people have been instructed, if it does go on, to take it off. That is the only way to bring this government to a sense of its duty. The Ontario government formerly controlled this work, but subsequently this government took it over and gave a guarantee that it would keep the work in proper repair and the roadway controlled by it. I am not sure whether it is the Ontario government which does the work at the expense of this government or whether this government does it directly, but the board on this dam causes great injury to the health of the neighbourhood, and there is ample opportunity to avoid this by building a storage dam in the valley further up. There is therefore no need whatever for this obstruction.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not quite catch whether this was something recent or which has been going on for years, though apparently this government has taken over that particular locality on account of the proposed work to be done in constructing the Trent Valley canal. I do not quite understand why an official of this government should put on this board.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Does the hon. minister not know that the waters are now under the control of his officials and that these government officials are looking after it ?

Mr. GRAHAM. We have government officials in more places than that, but I am not at the moment aware of all the places where they are occupied. The hon. gentleman made the statement that an official of this government put on that board, but I am not aware that that is the duty of any official of this government. In connection with many of these dams, we have had complaints from the farmers that their lands are flooded, and that matter is being investigated. But I understand the complaint to be that it is the mill owners who put on the boards, contrary to the terms of their leases. In one case, in the town where my hon. friend lives, there is a dam, and it is complained that the company, under a lease half a century old, has certain rights. The difficulty is that the company put logs on the dam in order to raise the water, and this it is complained is in excess of their rights under the lease. This is a matter that will have to be cleared up if we go on with the Trent Valley route. It is under consideration by the department, as we have a lot of correspondence relating to damages which are said to have arisen all along, and I presume the damages to a municipality come under the same class as damages to private individuals. I have no objection to bringing down the return and giving my hon. friend every information possible.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. It is an official of this government who put the board on, and there is no need for his doing this if this government would carry out the terms of their contract with the Ontario government and make the rapids below the dam floatable. There would then be no need for storing water in this little lake. As it is, since this government is not carrying out the terms of its agreement with the Ontario government, they resort to this expedient of storing the water for the benefit of the lumbermen. There should be no board whatever on this dam, and no one but a government official can put it there, and I do not think he will put it there again.

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot say what are the terms of the arrangement between the Ontario government and this government, and I would not like to let the remark pass that we are not carrying out our agreement, because that would be a very serious matter.

Motion agreed to.

TRENT CANAL—EXTENSIONS.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria) moved :

For a copy of reports, plans, surveys and other data, in connection with the proposal to construct a branch canal from Balsam lake, on the Trent canal, to the head of Gull River waters, in Haliburton county.

He said : I wish to take up for a few moments the attention of the House with regard to the building of branch canals, which the right hon. the First Minister was pleased to endorse last session. In a word, I refer to the Trent canal and the branch running to Haliburton. Last year the First Minister frankly admitted, after we had passed a vote for his little ditch to Newmarket, the principle of building branch canals. That is a canal which has no water supply. The supply at Newmarket is a little bit of a creek. Through the entire summer there is not sufficient water to work any canal properly. In the summer season I have drawn the attention of passengers from the train, as it passed along, to this little stream trickling down, and that thing is supposed to supply the great canal with water. It is said that the government are going to establish rain barrels in the locality of Newmarket to fill this stream and then divert the stream into the canal. The right hon. gentleman endorsed the principle of branch canals, and said he had the assurance of certain people that Haliburton county was not suited for farming but should be set apart for reforestation.

In other words, take the thousands of people living happily in those valleys and remove them to some other part of the world. I wish to point out that as compared with Arthabaskaville, which, I believe, is the county in which the first minister was born, this is a district of great fertility and splendid resources, as he could see by the smiling farms along the banks of the Gull river. I hope the right hon. gentleman will come and visit that country. I will take him for a trip and show him the happy homes of which I have spoken, and I am satisfied that he will come back much in favour of this canal. There are only a few works to be done—a lock and dam at Coboconk, a lock and dam at Norland, a trestle at Minden and a dam at Horseshoe lake, and sixty or seventy miles of splendid navigation would be open to the people of that country. At present, to reach the railway, from twelve to fourteen miles distant, they have to climb these hills—mountains you might call them—so that they are practically prevented from getting out the rich hardwood timber of that locality. Now, with regard to the reforestation. Notwithstanding the remarks made concerning the scarcity of forest products in Canada, I do not believe that the country is in such need of reforesting, in Ontario at any rate, as some people believe.

Mr. GRAHAM.

But if we are to reforest any lands, I could show the Prime Minister some areas in the older-settled parts of the country where one acre of reforesting would produce more than a square mile in the region tributary to this branch canal. All I ask is that the minister should bring down the papers, and if he will come to that country I shall be glad to escort him, either at election times or on other occasions— —

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not at election times.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes, at election times—I shall be glad to escort him if he will come. Then he will see the beauties of the canals.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is it that my hon. friend (Mr. Sam. Hughes) asks for?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I had the pledge of the Prime Minister last year that he would build the canal——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Where is the water?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The whole river is navigable, so far as supply of water is concerned, and there are many lakes. Why, there is water enough there to supply the Georgian bay canal. I do not think it necessary to go into that aspect of the case, because on other occasions I had the endorsement of the Prime Minister in this matter. The only question in his mind was whether it would not be better to reforest this country. He has been advised by some one to reforest the country, and now I want the correspondence in the case.

Motion agreed to.

EMILY LAKE—FLOODED LANDS—THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ROADS.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, owing to the waters of Emily lake and creek, in Victoria county, having been raised and so maintained by a dam at Bobcaygeon, now under the jurisdiction of this government, and the lands adjoining having thereby been flooded so as to render the roads impassable and expensive in construction, it is the duty of the government to assist the localities concerned at least to the extent of the extra cost involved in opening up and maintaining the said roads.

He said : This is another matter that may be counted trifling by the House, but it is one of the greatest importance to the people of the locality. For the information of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) I may point out that this is near the line of Peterborough county. There is a dam at Bobcaygeon, which dams back the waters of Sturgeon lake and also of tributary lakes on the same level. Emily lake is a small lake and a tributary to Sturgeon lake on the south side.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals.) Was that dam for the purposes of the lumbermen or for the purposes of power?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. We will educate the minister if he will come up to that country——

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sam. Hughes) does not need to wait for that. The minister is ready to be educated now.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Bobcaygeon is one of the great points on the Trent canal. The river there divides between Sturgeon lake and Pigeon lake, and the Department of Railways and Canals is building a splendid dam on one of these rivers and is going to repair the other this summer. The dam is under the minister's control and he is responsible for it. The waters of Emily lake are raised, and the lands to the south of it are flooded. For seven miles there is no way for the people on the eastern side of the lake to cross to the western side. Now, the custom of this government, not only in the province of Quebec, but in Ontario and every other province, has been, where injury is done to a highway through the action of this government, to put that highway in good shape again. There is a roadway running along the fourteenth concession of Emily township, but it is not available now owing to this flooding, and the people have to go around seven or eight miles to cover a distance which, had their road not been spoiled, would be only three-quarters of a mile. All they ask is that the roadway be left in the condition in which it was before the dam was built. They are willing to do the rest of the work themselves. This they are entitled to, and I am sure the government will grant it.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). In the case of other works undertaken by the Department of Railways and Canals, where roads made by a municipality are interfered with, it has been the custom for the government to make new roads, thus leaving the municipality in as good a condition as before. There is a case of that kind in my own constituency, one that is known to the Minister of Railways and Canals. The road through the village of Cardinal was changed by the new works on the St. Lawrence canal and the government built a new road on the other side of the canal, thus putting the people of the municipality in as good a position as before. Of course, personally I know nothing about the situation referred to by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes), but I understand that a work of the Dominion government has interfered with a road in the municipality referred to. If so, there is no reason why the government should not make that road or another as good. This seems to me a very small matter, and I cannot understand why it has not been done already. I therefore have much pleasure in seconding this motion and I hope that immediate action will be taken by the minister. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) who has brought this matter to the attention of the House deserves credit for doing so in the interest of the people of that locality.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) that a member who brings up the grievance of his constituents or any one else is performing a good service. I know the circumstances which my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) has mentioned in connection with the building of the canal and of roads. But this is not the only case, there are several cases arising in connection with the construction of that work just as there were in the construction of the Williamsburg canal. It is a matter for investigation and I assure my hon. friend that the department will of course look into these matters ; we must investigate them and where a municipality has been deprived of anything by the action of the government we must see that no injustice is done to a municipality by the government.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Or to an individual.

Mr. GRAHAM. Or to an individual. The government has no right to work injustice on an individual or a municipality or anyone else. I would suggest that as I have given him my assurance that this whole matter will and must of necessity be looked into as we construct the work, he should be satisfied to withdraw his motion.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I wish to bring up a matter that I do not believe has received due consideration by the federal authorities. Not only the land but the streams are vested in the province unless the streams are navigable. On many of these streams there are valuable water powers which constitute part of the assets of the province. From these water powers when developed the province would derive a certain revenue but when they are diverted or used for canal purposes by the federal government the province is deprived of that revenue and in some cases revenue is derived by this government. Has the government considered the right of the provinces in this water power and the justice of compensating the provinces for what they have been deprived of? I have always thought this was unfair to the provinces and that some compensation should be allowed the provinces for what has been taken from them.

Mr. GRAHAM. This raises a large question and it must be borne in mind that the construction of the canal in most cases greatly improves the water power or creates one where none existed.

Mr. SPROULE. The federal government gets the income afterwards, whereas before the construction of the canal the provincial government would get it.

Mr. GRAHAM. The federal government gets it because it spends a large amount in developing the power that was there before. If they took it from some one who had developed it and was utilizing it——

ROYAL ASSENT.

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows :

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I beg to inform you that His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires and awaits the attendance of your honourable House in the chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned :

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to report that when the House did attend His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, His Honour was pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills :—

An Act respecting the West Ontario Pacific Railway Company.
An Act respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.
An Act respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.
An Act respecting the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.
An Act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.
An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1908.

EMILY LAKE—FLOODED LANDS—THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ROADS.

House resumed consideration of proposed motion of the hon. member (Mr. Sam. Hughes) with reference to the flooding of lands adjacent to Emily lake and creek.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the request of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) I beg to withdraw the motion, knowing as I do, that when he undertakes to have this matter investigated he will carry out his promise. I might suggest to the minister that before he sends his engineer to look into this matter I will be very pleased to give him the names of some of the prominent residents in the locality who could possibly save the engineer a great deal of time by showing him exactly what the requirements of the locality may be. If the minister will be good enough to let me know beforehand I will send him a list of these names.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will my hon. friend drop me a note to-morrow putting in shape the matters to which he desires attention to be directed ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes.

Motion withdrawn.

PROPOSED DAMMING OF THE ST. LAWRENCE OPPOSITE CORNWALL.

Mr. H. GERVAIS (Montreal, St. James) moved :

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, writings, plans and letters between the government and the International Waterways Commission, on one part, and the St. Lawrence Power Company and the Long Sault Development Company of the other part, with regard to the entire damming of the St. Lawrence river, in the vicinity of Cornwall, together with a copy of all memorials, letters and resolutions of protest sent to the government by the Board of Trade of Montreal, the Chambre de Commerce, District de Montreal, the Shipping Federation of Montreal, the Dominion Marine Association, and others.

He said : Mr. Speaker, before this motion is passed I would like to say a few words. For the last two or three years there have been rumours in Montreal that some people either from Pittsburg, Montreal or Buffalo, were desirous of damming entirely the St. Lawrence river opposite Cornwall. I may say that the shipping people of Montreal were quite surprised to hear of such a proposal. The damming of the St. Lawrence just opposite the Long Sault rapids would mean the destruction of passenger traffic between Kingston and Montreal. For such a damming of the river would have as a direct result a delay of one hour a day to boats going down the river to Montreal and there would no longer be a daily service between Kingston and Montreal. I might remind the House that the number of passengers going down the rapids, during the months of June, July and August, exceeds 100,000. The damming of the river opposite that point would have, as I said a few minutes ago for its direct effect, the wiping out of our trade between Kingston and Montreal. No more rafts could go down the river except by way of some canal construction, but in such case with any length of delay for passenger and freight boats. Another result of such damming of the river would be to change the deepest channel from the Canadian to the American shore, and as a consequence the boundary line between the American side and the British side would be altered. Trade would also be taken from our shore to the American shore. I may say that I am moving this resolution at the special request of all those who take an interest in things maritime in Montreal and outside of Montreal. I know quite well, Mr. Speaker, that to permit the entire damming of a river channel the parliament of Canada, about twelve years ago, authorized the government to allow any company or any private individual to build up in any stream of Canada any kind of an obstruction. This was done for the veiled purpose of authorizing the Chambly Manufacturing Company to dam the Richelieu river. Well, that has been a very unsatisfactory experiment because the result of the damming of the Richelieu river has been that one individual has pocketed thousands of dollars to the utter detriment of the residents of Chambly, of Richelieu and of the public in general.

Mr. HAGGART. What Act of parliament is that ?

Mr. GERVAIS. It is an Act of parliament passed about ten or eleven years ago. I am not sure of the date.

Mr. HAGGART. I never heard of it.

Mr. GERVAIS. I will quote to you before a few minutes. It has been enacted that the Governor in Council may authorize a private individual or company to block or obstruct any stream within the limits of Canada without a special mandate from parliament. In this particular case, I consider that it would be an outrage to allow anybody either from the United States or Canada to obstruct the St. Lawrence river or to alter its course. I am not alone in taking this view. If this House will allow me I will now read several memorials, copies of which have been sent to me :

Montreal, as a man, is against the proposed damming of the St. Lawrence river near Cornwall. Anybody in Canada taking any interest in things maritime is also bound to condemn absolutely such a preposterous proposition.

The Shipping Federation of Canada presented the following memorial :

To, the International Waterways Commission (Canadian section) :

The humble petition of the Shipping Federation of Canada, a body duly incorporated by Act of the Dominion parliament, and owning or representing 443,274 tons of shipping, trading to the port of Montreal.

Showeth—

(a) That certain proposals have been submitted to you by the St. Lawrence Power Company, and the Long Sault Repids Development Company for permission to construct a number of dams across the river St. Lawrence at, and adjacent to, the Long Sault rapids.

(b) That the said proposal was discussed at a meeting of the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commission, and the respective interests in the City of Montreal, on November 6, 1907, and it was gratifying to this interest to learn that International Waterways Commission held the navigation interest to be paramount, and the commission would not approve of any scheme that would interfere with navigation.

(c) The said dams would completely block the river so far as navigation is concerned, and necessitate the vessels and rafts that use the river being diverted to the already congested canal, thereby seriously interfering with the present conditions of navigation.

(d) That any scheme that would place the control of the waters of the St. Lawrence river in the hands of private corporations would, in the opinion of this federation, be a giving away a national heritage. At present there is at times congestion in our canals, and to transfer the passenger boats and rafts, would further increase the present delays, that take place in getting the freight to the ports of Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, and other ports in the lower St. Lawrence.

(e) That the canal and river system we hold should not be interfered with, even to the slightest degree. We have 72¼ miles of canals extending from (but not taking in Sault Ste. Marie) by the Welland to the St. Lawrence, on which the government have expended eighty million dollars, and the total tonnage passing through those canals in 1903 amounted to over 1,600,000 tons, showing the magnitude of the commerce which is now using the canals, and seeking Montreal as an export point.

(f) That while 57,966,713 tons of freight were carried by Canadian railways in 1906, as compared with 16,356,337 tons in 1887, the betterment was but 254 per cent as against 287 per cent on the canals during the same period, which shows that the increased railway facilities, and the development of the country are tending to increase the traffic on the canals, and it is to the waterways that we have to look for the cheap transit of freight.

It is a well known fact that the water in the river lowers during August, September, October and November, at which time freights are getting heavier, and anything that would tend to hold back water at those periods would interfere with navigation, and seriously affect the heavy shipments during the fall.

That our exports mainly come from Ontario, Manitoba and the Northwest, even out to British Columbia, nor are we localized to our own country, but the United States also seeks this route, as one of the main arteries for their exports from the point of production to the point of consumption on the other side of the Atlantic.

The eventual growth of these exports we are almost afraid to quote in figures, when the immense area in Manitoba and the Northwest (estimated at 240 million acres) yet to be developed, requires a market for its produce. The mode of conveyance for the bulk of those products will be by our natural highway.

That in view of the foregoing your petitioners protest against any interference with the natural flow of the St. Lawrence river.

Lastly, in regard to the appointment of an engineer to report on the proposed scheme, the federation are of the opinion that while such report might be beneficial from an engineering point of view, no engineers' report can be conclusive and contain what the interference with nature may result in, therefore, the federation desire to be placed on record as declining to be bound by any engineer's report, either wholly, or in part.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

(Signed) HUGH A. ALLAN,
President.

(Signed) THOS. ROBB,
Manager and Secretary.

Given under the common seal of the Shipping Federation of Canada, this 5th day of December, nineteen hundred and seven.

The following is an extract from the address of greeting by the mayor of Montreal to the International Waterways Commission when sitting in Montreal, September, 1905, to consider proposed construction of a dam at the outlet of Lake Erie :

Your visit of Saturday last to our harbour, and your journey on the river between here and Quebec, will have given you some idea of the vast works undertaken by the Montreal Harbour Commission, at its own expense; and by the Dominion government, out of the national funds, in the interests of trade and navigation, and I am sure that you will have perceived how vital it is to the country in general, and the port of Montreal in particular, that nothing should be done that in the slightest degree would impair the usefulness of those harbour and channel works, or of the canal system above this port.

Large as is the trade of the port of Montreal, it is but small compared to what it must be when this great Dominion is more generally settled, and the development and improvement of our great river trade route is a duty that has always been foremost in the hearts and minds of the citizens of Montreal, and in later years of the people of the country in general.

Mr. Gear, president of the board of trade, in addressing the commission, referred to the value of the exports that passed through this port, to the many millions expended on our waterways and to the tonnage passing through them, with Montreal as the central point, and he said that if the level of the water was decreased by the smallest amount it would mean that the canals and waterways from here to the upper end of the Welland canal, to say nothing of the waterway down to Quebec, would have to be reconstructed. Last year (1904) American shippers supplied about half the grain exported from the port of Montreal, which showed the importance of this route, not only to Canadians, but to every resident in the northern states. When it came to a question of export, they had to consider the St. Lawrence route, which regulated rates, and almost every resident of the United States north of St. Louis and Louisville derived a benefit from our waterways.

Mr. Gear also said :

I have now only to protest as strongly as I can, on behalf of the board of trade and the commercial interests of the city of Montreal against the construction of any works whatever at the foot of Lake Erie which would in the slightest degree, even a fractional part of an inch, interfere with our waterways from the foot of Lake Erie to the ocean.

On the same occasion Mr. Hugh A. Allan observed that in the estimation of the Shipping Federation the proposal was full of serious danger to the enormous interests the federation represented. He referred to the vast amount which had been spent on the ship canal, to the number and tonnage of vessels entering and clearing last year from Montreal, Sorel and Three Rivers, and to the number of vessels trading on the lakes and rivers between Canada and the United States, and said :

During the last eight years the Dominion government had done so much towards improving the St. Lawrence route that the Shipping Federation looked forward to the time when there would be steamers in the Canadian trade equal in tonnage to those now running to New York. By increasing the size of the vessels, a greater proportion of the trade from the Canadian Northwest could be carried. With us, it was a question of inches with regard to the water level, not of feet.

Colonel Anderson, who represented the Marine Department of the government, concluded his representations as follows :

The importance of the St. Lawrence route to the future of the Dominion was paramount, and must be protected, so far as the Dominion government could do so.

Colonel O. H. Ernst, chairman of the United States section of the commission, speaking at the conclusion of the sessions, said :

I voice the opinion of my colleagues, American as well as Canadian, that to do anything in Lake Erie to injure the River St. Lawrence would be a crime against mankind, and to which I would never make myself an accessory. If I should aid and abet it in any way, it would be an act after which I should never draw an easy breath the rest of my life; it would be a nightmare from which I should never recover.

At the session of the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commission in Montreal, November, 1907, to consider the proposal to dam the Long Sault rapids, Mr. Robertson Macauley, speaking on behalf of the Cornwall Electric Railway Company, argued that the height of the water above the dams in the winter would seriously affect the power development of the town of Cornwall. The Board of Trade, Harbour Commissioners, the Shipping Federation and the Dominion Marine Association were all represented, and were unanimous in opposition to the scheme. Mr. Cuttle, speaking for the board of trade, said :

If this goes through, we may find the water down three or four inches. When these dams are put in it often happens that the same quantity of water does not flow over a dam as in the natural manner. We are given a fourteen foot channel by the government and it will be a serious matter to reduce it to thirteen feet and eight or nine inches.

Mr. C. J. Smith, on behalf of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, said :

The rapids of the rivers form one of the principal assets of the company, and the Long Sault Rapids are one of the chief of these. Their loss is not to be offset by any hydraulic works. Then, too, this would establish a precedent. The Long Sault rapids now, the Lachine rapids next. You would grant the right to exploit the Long Sault rapids, and the Lachine rapids would be obliterated. Then we would leave this country, and the loss would be greater than the St. Lawrence Power Company can recompense you. Further the St. Lawrence is now a navigable river, and once these dams were built it would not be.

Subsequently the Dominion Marine Association adopted a resolution protesting against the proposed works, which was in part as follows :

And whereas it has been declared to be the policy of the said commission to recognize navigation interests as paramount and to refuse assent to power development schemes which will prejudicially affect such interests;

And whereas the said proposals include the construction of dams across the St. Lawrence river from the south shore to the foot of Long Sault island, from the said island to Barnharts' island, and from that island to the Canadian shore, which dams will completely blockade the river so far as navigation is concerned and will necessitate passage up and down stream in all cases by way of locks;

And whereas vessels now enjoy the right of free navigation down stream in the channels north and south of Long Sault island and the south channel is also used for transportation down stream of rafts of timber of great value;

And whereas the enforced lockage of these vessels and rafts and the enforced construction of the rafts in sections of suitable size for lockage, as well as the delays to be suffered during the period of construction of the proposed works, would very prejudicially affect not only the immediate interests involved, but also all other vessels which have to share the facilities for lockage;

And whereas if the proposed works are built, the breaking of a dam or disabling of one or more locks, might completely bar all navigation for a considerable time, cut off the passage of rafts, and prevent even light draft vessels and barges from carrying the produce of the west down stream in the free channels as has been done in the past;

And whereas the St. Lawrence channels in question are part of the great natural highway from the great lakes to the sea, and it appears contrary to reason to oppose any obstacles or barriers whatever in the way of their free navigation, and utterly preposterous to subject these navigable waters, the heritage of the people to the direct or indirect control of private or foreign corporations;

And whereas it is particularly desirable to preserve intact and unimpaired and unimperilled all available water routes to the sea passing through Canadian territory, particularly in view of the other outlets from the great lakes by way of the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico and the New Erie canal to New York;

And whereas it is impossible to foresee what other conditions may prevail in the future in the light of which the allowance of the present proposals might be seriously regretted.

Now therefore be it resolved :

That the said proposals apart altogether from any engineering problems involved or any question of water levels or depths, are prejudicial to navigation interests;

That no additional or improved locks at this point of the character so far suggested can compensate for the disadvantages temporary as well as permanent, entailed in the scheme, or justify in the slightest the proposed interference with the free chanels;

That the Dominion Marine Association be placed on record as protesting absolutely against the proposed works.

The council of the Montreal Board of Trade memorialized the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commission, copy as follows :

The Montreal Board of Trade.

To the Canadian Section of the International Waterways Commission.

The Memorial of the Council of the Montreal Board of Trade.

Humbly showeth,—That your memorialists are greatly concerned with regard to the proposed works of the St. Lawrence Power Company and of the Long Sault Development Company, which works would involve the entire damming of the St. Lawrence river in the vicinity of Cornwall ;

That no matter what advantages in the shape of power and light may accrue, as the result of those works, to towns, corporations or individuals on either side of the river, your memorialists contend that the interests of navigation are paramount and that they should not be sacrificed for any cause whatever ;

That the navigable channel of the river is at the present time in Canadian waters and that the only canal (the Cornwall canal) is in Canadian territory, the United States having neither canal, nor navigable channel;

That under the proposed scheme Canada would lose entirely her navigable channel while the United States would gain the great advantage of a canal in its own territory, and your memorialists submit that this fact alone should prevent any and all Canadians from in any way favouring the scheme ;

That whatever minor benefits may accrue to Canadian interests by the construction of the proposed works your memorialists fear that the scheme is really in the interests of the Pittsburg Reduction Company whose power plant at Massona would be enormously advantaged by the increased head of water the proposed dams would give it;

That in the case of a mighty river like the St. Lawrence it is difficult, if not impossible, for engineers to forecast the actual effect of entirely damming its swift flowing waters, and that there is a general conviction among the riverside population above Cornwall that the proposed works would cause such an overflow into the surrounding country, as would involve damage to the extent of many millions of dollars and your memorialists believe that they would also render useless some existing water-powers in that vicinity;

That the proposed damming of the river channels would of course prevent all boats from shooting the Long Sault rapids, the finest rapids in the river, and that the delay which the passage through the canal would cause, would render it impossible for boats to travel through the Thousand Islands by daylight and reach Montreal the same evening, and thus two of the chief attractions for passenger travel on the St. Lawrence trip would not be available, with the result that the country would lose the large tourist traffic which is a source of profit to the river steamers and to the places visited ;

That while the promoters of the scheme claim that the interests of commercial navigation would not suffer were it adopted, as cargo boats do not run the rapids, the rafting business seems to have been ignored in this connection;

That it is estimated that the rafts which pass down the river each season contain over three hundred cribs of timber, and that were these cribs forced to pass through a canal instead of shooting the rapids much time would be lost, and they would moreover by blocking the canal, seriously interfere with other traffic;

That Canada has in the St. Lawrence waterway a wonderful avenue of transportation from the interior of the continent to the sea which serves not only to carry at a very low rate the commerce of our own country, but also that of a large section of the United States, and that your memorialists respectfully express their conviction that it is the duty of the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commission and indeed of all Canadians to see that nothing be done which might in any way interfere with the navigation thereof.

Signed on behalf of the council of the Montreal Board of Trade,

GEORGE CAVERHILL,
President.

GEORGE HADRILL,
Secretary.

Montreal, November 28, 1907.

I have received the following memorandum from the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company :

If this company's passenger steamers were forced to go through Cornwall canal instead of running Long Sault Rapids, by the building of the proposed dam, it would add from two to three and a half hours in time between Prescott and Montreal.

In order to run Lachine rapids the spare time at present during the month of August, when the heaviest passenger travel is on, does not exceed thirty minutes. It is plain from this that should the dam be built, the tourist route of One Thousand Islands and St. Lawrence Rapids would be a thing of the past, and the 80,000 to 100,000 passengers who take this trip annually to Montreal would find some other holiday trip, and give Montreal the go-by.

The time above-mentioned estimated as lost time by going through the canal, is a conservative one, as the timber rafts which are at present run down the rapids, would be forced to use the canal, to the disadvantage of all steamers and barges.

There would be a question as to what would be the result from running ice during winter, which would block at the proposed dam, and very probably drown out the low land above Dickensons's Landing, as well as seriously delay navigation in the opening of the season.

I have received the following letter from Mr. George Caverhill, of Montreal:

Mr. GERVAIS.

December 18, 1907.

Honoré Gervais, Esq.. M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,—Inclosed please find different reasons given by the Board of Trade, Shipping Federation and Dominion Marine Association, and several individuals, as to why the privileges should not be given to the St. Lawrence Power Company, and the Long Sault Development Company to dam the River St. Lawrence.

The whole matter of fact is that the Pittsburg Reduction Company want to get control of the St. Lawrence river at the expense of the inhabitants of the province of Quebec. We, as a province, cannot express ourselves too strongly against this scheme, as once the dam is built the damage will be done for ever.

Should you wish any further memos in connection with this, I shall be glad to get them for you, if possible.

As mentioned yesterday, my idea in getting you to intervene at the present moment is, that I do not want this to be delayed, as it might force the government to play into the hands of the Americans, and besides from the feelings of a great many people that I have spoken to about this matter, I know of no question within years that has come before the public that would lose our friend, Sir Wilfrid, so many votes as this would.

I remain, yours truly,
GEORGE CAVERHILL.

I have received the following communication from the Montreal Board of Trade :

The Montreal Board of Trade.
Montreal, December 18, 1907.

Honoré Gervais, Esq.. M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—By instruction of the president, Mr. George Caverhill, I beg to communicate copy of the finding of the report of La Chambre de Commerce du District de Montreal with regard to the proposed damming of the Long Sault rapids, which report has been sent to the council of this board by that chamber.

I am, dear sir,
Yours truly,
GEORGE HADRILL,
Secretary.

(Translation.) After having taken communication of the letter from Mr. Thomas Côté, secretary of the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commission, requesting our board to submit the name of some engineer who might be appointed to report on the subject, your committee beg to call attention to the fact that the question has already been considered by this board; that a special committee consisting of engineers who are members of this board was appointed at the time, and that a report of that committee was adopted on July 10, 1905, opposing the scheme, and that the information obtained by the board since that report was adopted is corroborative of the views and findings expresed in that report.

Your committee recommend in consequence that the board do state its formal opposition to the carrying out of any scheme having for its object the damming of the St. Lawrence in any part of its course, and that entertaining those views, the board cannot, in accordance with the request of the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commision, suggest the name of any engineer to be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the feasibility of such a work.

Your committee recommend, moreover, that the board do state that, being satisfied as to the harm which the carying out of such a scheme would inflict on the shipping interests, it protests energetically, in advance, against the granting of any such privileges to private companies.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are these memorials of recent date ?

Mr. GERVAIS. Yes. I understand also that an indignation meeting has been held in the county of Dundas to protest against such a proposal.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When ?

Mr. GERVAIS. A few weeks ago. I think I may say that the united voice of Ontario and Quebec is raised in protest against any proposal to dam the St. Lawrence river on its course between the Detroit river and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. For these various reasons I would ask that the motion be adopted.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). The question raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Gervais) is one of national and international importance, and, having resided on the banks of the St. Lawrence practically all my life it has a personal interest for me. The bald proposition to dam what is perhaps the greatest river in the world is calculated to give us somewhat of a shock. To imagine the St. Lawrence river without the Long Sault rapids is to imagine what seems to me an impossibility. For many years tourists from the American continent and from Europe have regarded the trip from Kingston, through the Thousand Islands, and thence down the rapids to Montreal and on to the old city of Quebec, as one of the most delightful in the world. Not the least of the delights of that trip is the shooting of the Long Sault rapids, with its long swells and sharp curves around the islands. When the proposition was first made to me as a member of the government to consider the damming of the river which would practically do away with the Long Sault rapids, I recoiled from it, and without committing myself very strongly I may say that my natural inclination is to recoil from it yet. Those who know the location well will know that the proposition is to dam the river and to make the Little River on the south side the navigable channel from the west. There would be no Long Sault rapids ; there would be no shooting the rapids in the future for the new proposition would mean navigating through a prosaic canal lock. The promoters of the project say it would improve navigation in that it would make a lake where the rapids now exist and bring about easier navigation for the boats which ply there. I am not quite so sure about that, but I am not going to contradict it in the light of the present information I have.

Mr. GERVAIS. Is it not true that the damming of the river and the substitution of a canal for navigation purposes would result in the flooding of the lands for miles and miles along the river.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will speak of that in a moment. It is said by the promoters of the scheme that it would improve navigation, and while I will not argue that, I do hint that I have my doubts. There are other things which may make the damming of the river a serious consideration. During the past few years there have been two ice jams on the St. Lawrence in that vicinity or a little west of it.

Mr. J. D. REID. You have one there now.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am referring to the country west of Cornwall and the present ice jam is east of Cornwall. The ice jam to which I have referred was caused by the swinging of a large bay out across the current to form a means of communication between the island and the mainland, and it formed an ice jam causing the water to rise for many miles to the west, flooding the streets and property at Morrisburg, and resulting in a great deal of damage. If anything like that should follow from the damming of the St. Lawrence it would be out of the question to consent to it. In addition to that, as my hon. friend (Mr. Broder) knows, those who have to travel in the county of Dundas could not travel on the first concession at all but had to go up and down the second concession, and sometimes they had to go through the third concession to escape the flooding of the roads. I believe the same thing has occurred on the American side. I am told that at the present time below Cornwall there is an ice jam which has caused a great deal of damage to the town. All these things have to be considered by the government from the standpoint of the best interests of the people. It may be possible to overcome difficulties of this sort, but they have to be seriously considered by the government of Canada. It has not been demonstrated to me that the results which would follow the construction of this dam would not be injurious to person and property, not to speak at all of the facilities for navigation. It is a matter of international concern as the government of the United States is interested, but I have been told..... and as to this I do not speak with authority.....that the United States government is favourable to this project and that part of the work has already been undertaken on the American side. As I understand it, the work can be done on either side of the river and it then can be united into one work ; the proposal being to take over the property of the Davis Company and to amalgamate it with this new power company.

Mr. GERVAIS. Is it within the power of the United States government to construct any work in a stream or river which is common to both countries ? Has the American government any right to build anything interfering with the navigation of the St. Lawrence river, which under the treaty of 1818 and under the prior treaty of 1783 and under the later treaties of 1854 and 1871, has been declared to most extent the exclusive property of Great Britain and to some extent the common property of both Great Britain and the United States. I submit that we should prevent anybody, even though they act in the name of the American government, from tampering in any way with the St. Lawrence river unless it is done under agreement between the governments of the two countries, in any case Canada being represented by England.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY. In considering the question of the hon. member (Mr. Gervais) the minister might also take into consideration the fact that on the Canadian side the St. Lawrence Power Company has already constructed works which supply power to the town of Cornwall and to the canal.

Mr. GRAHAM. On the south side of the river is what is known as the Little river which is practically all in American territory.

Mr. J. D. REID. Do you mean the South Sault ?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is designated to me as the Little river but it is probably what we know as the South Sault.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has there not been a large water-power developed at Massena on that Little river ?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is not what I was coming at, that they have developed what is called the Little river, which is on the American side. I am sure that nothing has been done that would interfere with the international relations between the two countries.

Mr. GERVAIS. Does the hon. minister admit the thalweg European doctirne that the natural boundary line between two countries separated by a common river is the middle of the deepest channel ? If so, what we call the Little river would be on Canadian soil, and the boundary line would be in the middle of the Long Sault rapids.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. gentleman's argument proves my contention. The main channel is north of the island, and this Little river is south. It was not the main channel at all that I was discussing. As I said before, this question of granting power to dam the St. Lawrence river may have a far-reaching effect. We have constructed the Sheik's Island dam, and a large amount of power has been developed from the canal by the St. Lawrence Power Company; but that Canadian proposition, carried out on the Canadian side, does not effect injuriously the navigation as it exists. I may say that the International Waterways Commission has been considering this proposition very seriously, and has discussed it with the representatives of the American government. I am led to believe that the members of the commission from the United States are somewhat favourable to the proposition. In fact, what the company communicated to the department over which I have the honour to preside caused me to think a good deal about the possible consequences. In order that the matter might be discussed intelligently between the departments, I asked the Public Works Department and the Marine and Fisheries Department to each name a prominent official of the department, and I named one of mine, to confer together as to what the effect would be on the interests of Canada as represented by these three departments. I am glad that my hon. friend brought this matter to the attention of the House, and I shall be glad to bring down all the correspondence.

Mr. HAGGART. Has the government parted with any of its rights or powers in regard to the Long Sault rapids ? Has it given the right to any individual or corporation to erect works ?

Mr. GRAHAM. None whatever.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask my hon. friend whether or not the government would have the right to do this without coming to parliament ? Is there at present any statute which confers on the government that power ?

Mr. GRAHAM. My opinion is that this company would have to get a charter from this parliament before it could start to do business by way of development.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Apart from that, the question is whether or not the government have power to confer upon any corporation —assuming that it already existed—by order in council the right to construct any such work.

Mr. HAGGART. They have.

Mr. GERVAIS. It has been done in the case of the Chambly river and it was not a popular move.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not being a legal man, I would not like to attempt to answer that. My own opinion is that it being an international waterway, a good deal more authority would be required than in the case of an interior water.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the minister be kind enough to have some inquiry made as to that in the Department of Justice? I would be inclined to agree with the view the minister has just expressed; at the same time, I think it would be well for the government to inform the House of the position in that respect.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will ask the opinion of the Department of Justice as to that. I was saying that I am glad that my hon. friend has brought this matter before the House. It is a matter that interests not only those who live along the St. Lawrence river, but every person connected with navigation or the carrying trade in Canada. It might possibly effect the work we have done on our canal, and what we are attempting to accomplish in the way of bringing the trade of the west down our own waterways to the port of Montreal and from there to the ocean. It is a large question, worthy of the consideration of this House, and of course, before anything could be done about it, it would have to receive the amplest consideration. I have received from many people protests on all these lines that I have mentioned—from those engaged in the carrying trade, those engaged in the shipping business, those living along the river whose property might be affected. I not only will have no objection, but will take pleasure in bringing down the papers asked for by my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the minister bring down also, without any formal motion, a plan of the river at that particular point, so that one could get a clearer idea of what might be proposed than could be gathered by merely reading a description of it?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will have that done.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. May I ask the minister if the final report of the International Waterways Commission is in yet?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think the report has not yet been presented.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). In view of the question asked by the hon. leader of the opposition, whether the government would have the right to do this work without coming to parliament, even if a proposition were made, and the government decided to grant any water power in that way, by building a dam at the Long Sault rapids, it should be submitted to the House. I know that locality, and I think it would be a monstrous proposition to attempt to dam the St. Lawrence river in the vicinity of Cornwall. In the first place, it would practically stop navigation. The Richelieu steamers going to Montreal all run the Long Sault rapids, and if a dam were built there, they would have to go by canal, so that they could not make the trip from Prescott to Montreal in one day. Then, there is a great deal of trouble in the St. Lawrence river every year on account of the ice jam, which is caused by a great body of ice coming out of the bay at Morrisburg and swinging across the river opposite Farran's point. This causes the river to rise at Morrisburg at least twenty feet, flooding almost the whole town. The government have to send men down every year from the Williamsburg canal to cut that ice jam out; they have been doing this for years. If the river were dammed at the Long Sault rapids, all the ice coming from Prescott and places east would be blocked at this dam. If this river is dammed, all the river from Prescott and places east would be blocked. I do not believe that the government, if they looked into it at all, would allow such a proposition to go through. So far as the dam at Dickenson's landing is concerned, that had nothing to do with the navigation of the river at all. It is just a few hundred feet across from the island to the canal, through which scarcely any water passes at all. The main channel is entirely separate and in addition this dam, made for the St. Lawrence Power Company, was to enlarge the canal. I therefore hope we shall have good opportunity of discussing the matter in parliament and let the people see what is being done. Let all those interested, such as the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company and others, have an opportunity to go into the matter, and I am satisfied the government will not listen for one minute to the proposition to dam that part of the river.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds). As representing one of the constituencies bordering on the St. Lawrence, I agree fully with every word which has fallen from the Minister of Railways regarding what people would say should this or any other government undertake to put a dam across the river at the Long Sault. That government would be damned for all time by the Canadian people. But I have often felt that we have a water-power, both at Fiddler's Elbow in the St. Lawrence and in the rapids of the St. Lawrence further down, particularly at the Long Sault, equal to the Niagara Falls, and I do not think the day is far distant when some inventive genius will devise a water-wheel undershot that will be able in these strong currents, without interfering with navigation in any way, to develop as much power at these points as can be developed at Niagara. By erecting an immense water wheel which the currents would catch, we would develop any amount of power, and I think that the day is not far distant when that will be done without interfering with navigation or the natural beauties of the river. I should oppose strongly any damming of the river at the Long Sault or at any other point where natural rapids are in existence to-day.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I know the locality in question, and I think it is the most beautiful spot in Canada. I am glad, therefore, that the government have not alienated any portion of it because I think they have full power to do so without coming to parliament. That is a power which, I believe, is vested in the government. I am glad to have the assurance of the Minister of Railways that he does not intend using that power without consulting parliament. This portion of the river might be utilized for power purposes without interfering at all with the navigation of the rapids. There might be a wing dam run out a little distance from the shore and an immense power generated from it. That would interfere seriously with the beauty of the place, and I do not think we ought to do anything with reference to these rapids on the St. Lawrence until the joint commission, appointed by this and the American governments, has reported. I have heard that the commissioners differ as to what are the respective rights on each side of the St. Lawrence, and that the British minister is coming to this city for the purpose of trying to make an arrangement in accord with some principle or plan proposed to him by the United States government for the settlement of our rights with reference to these waterways. Whether the division line is in the centre of the stream, whether we are entitled to all the flow of water on our side or only one-half, is a question which has yet to be decided. All these points of difference have to be considered by the joint commission and some agreement come to, but what I would like to say is that nothing for the present anyway should be done for the utilizing of these rapids. The locality is one of the most beautiful spots in America, and nothing should be erected on the shore in the shape of a dam or anything else which would mar its attractiveness. It is one of those places that should be left to nature. It is true we live in a utilitarian age and perhaps the generation of one hundred thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand horsepower would be productive of benefit which would compensate for the marring of the beauty of this place, but, in our time of life any way, we are not likely to benefit by these utilities, and I would like that this beauty spot should remain one of the places in Canada which we may be proud of.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). I am rather surprised at the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) that the power is vested in this government to deal with this subject without coming to parliament. My hon. friend did not state under what authority the government possessed that power, but that is a matter as to which we should have further information from the Minister of Railways and Canals. But apart from all the considerations that have been submitted regarding the importance of preserving the spot as one of great natural beauty, there is a further consideration that any water-power which can be generated there belongs to the people and should not be parted with except with the sanction and approval of the people's representatives in parliament. Therefore, I cannot too strongly state my own opinion that before any steps be taken, even should the government possess the power, the government should submit the proposal to parliament and invite the opinion of parliament regarding it. The Minister of Railways used language which, I understood to be an assurance that this course would be followed, and I trust there will be no departure from that policy, because the exploitation of great natural resources should be conducted in such a way as to be of the greatest possible advantage to the people as a whole.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). While this matter has been some time before the government, we have not up to this moment thought it advisable to do anything except refer the petition which was presented to us to the Waterways Commission. In September last—at all events before the Minister of Railways joined the government—we had an application from the promoters of this enterprise, but the matter seemed to me and my colleagues of such importance that we thought it best to take the views of the Waterways Commission. I am not aware that we have received a report from that commission, but I am informed that Mr. Gibbons, chairman of the Canadian section, went to Montreal to consult the various interests concerned in that city. The report I have, which is not an official report, is to the effect that all parties in Montreal were absolutely adverse to the granting of the application of the promoters of this enterprise. And, so far as I can see, on this side of the international line, all those who have had an opportunity of looking into the matter, whether from the point of view of utility or otherwise, have expressed themselves against it. I understand, on the other hand, that the project is favoured on the American side. But the government certainly will not take it upon themselves to deal with such a matter without giving the most ample opportunity for all parties concerned to express their opinion.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe). I was present at the hearing in Montreal before the International Deep Waterways Commission. The statement made by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), that all Canadian parties were opposed, is not quite correct, inasmuch as the town of Cornwall, both by its municipal corporation and its board of trade, sent delegations supporting the scheme and producing resolutions of the bodies they severally represented in support of it. The Marine Association were dubious as to what the effect would be, and the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation people were absolutely opposed to it, on the ground that it would obliterate the scenery of which the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has spoken in such fitting terms. And it was left in that way. The engineers of the International Deep Waterways Commission on both sides are investigating the matter, and, as stated by the Prime Minister, so far as I am aware, the report has not been made.

Mr. GERVAIS. I wish to quote the authority under which the Governor in Council may grant authorization to build dams and other works on any river within Canada. I refer to chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes, 'An Act respecting the protection of navigable waters.' Section 4 of this Act says :

No bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau shall be constructed so as to interfere with navigation, unless the site thereof has been approved by the Governor in Council, or unless such bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau is built and maintained in accordance with plans approved by the Governor in Council.

Let me also read section 8 of the same chapter :

Any local authority, company or person may proceed in like manner to obtain the approval by the Governor in Council of the site and plans of any work constructed prior to the first day of March, 1899.

It was first enacted by the 62-63 Victoria, chapter 32—that is, in 1899. For this enactment was necessary to give effect to the following clause of the Chambly Manufacturing Company's charter, Quebec, 61 Victoria, chapter 61, section 18 :

The company shall not erect any dams across the River Richelieu, nor do anything affecting the navigation of the canal, without the authority or consent of the government or of the parliament of Canada first obtained.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. To what does that apply?

Mr. GERVAIS. To navigable waters.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does that apply to international waters?

Mr. GERVAIS. Not to my mind, but according to the construction of some hon. members——

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I do not think it would.

Mr. GERVAIS. I think the international character of the waters would make a difference. England, I think, would have to intervene in this case.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). In the case of the Richelieu river, they had to go before the local government in order to get power to do certain works.

Mr. GERVAIS. Yes, but the Chambly river—the Richelieu river, as it is often called—is a navigable water. And it is all very well known, too, that the legislature of Quebec have granted certain rights on that river, provided they were confirmed by the federal parliament. But I contend that the provincial parliament was powerless to authorize the damming of that river. The company was therefore referred to Ottawa, and, in this parliament, the Act then existing was amended so as to empower the Governor in Council to grant the permission or confirmation desired. And that permission was in fact so granted. And that is the reason why the beautiful villages of Chambly and Richelieu have been deprived of the wealth with which they were endowed by nature—and all this for the benefit of a few men, under the fallacious pretense that it was for the benefit of the general public.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 28) to amend the Copyright Act —Mr. Macdonell.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Canada Shipping Act. He said : This Bill has been before the House certainly for three sessions, and, I think, for four. It has been discussed at length on these previous occasions, both in the House and in special committees to which it was referred. Hon. members are so well acquainted with its provisions that, unless specially required to do so, I shall not take up any great length of time in discussing it. The purpose of the Bill is to require that masters and mates of vessels trading upon the inland waters of Canada, or minor waters of Canada, on coasting voyages, shall be British subjects. The section of the Canada Shipping Act which I propose to amend is section 75, and I propose to amend it by striking out the words 'or other persons domiciled in Canada for at least three years.' I propose also to strike out subsection 2 of said section, as it will stand as mere surplusage if the first amendment is adopted. This would leave the section to read :

Examinations may be instituted in Canada for British subjects who intend to become masters or mates of ships——

And so on. The effect, it will be seen, would be that none but British subjects could become masters or mates. This Bill has been three times before special committees. The committee of last year gave great attention to the matter, heard a great deal of evidence and made a report. It is only fair to the committee to say that they made a report which they declared was without prejudice to the principle of the Bill, in case they thought afterward that the principle was not a good one. That is, they guarded themselves—so far as the committee can guard themselves, though the report looked to me like a contradiction in terms—by saying that their report was without prejudice to the principle of the Bill. The Act is not only one of retaliation against the United States, as has sometimes been suggested by gentlemen who came to the committee and asked to be heard as representing the vessel owners' association; the principle itself is good. The principle of the United States legislation, which requires masters and mates of vessels to be United States citizens, is a good principle. It is a good principle for any nation to have its merchant marine vessels officered by its own subjects. If I was a citizen of the United States I would support that principle, and because it is a good principle I advocate its adoption in Canada. It is true we are getting the worst of it to-day, and that it is to some extent a matter of retaliation, of putting up your own fence against your neighbour, because he has put up his fence against you; but, as I have said, the principle is a sound principle, and one which we should adopt.

Many memorials in favour of this legislation have been presented and will be found upon 'Hansard' of previous years. Resolutions have been presented from the Canadian Masters and Mates Association passed at different meetings of that association and in different years, favouring this legislation, and petitions have also been received from the masters and mates of different ports of Canada, from Toronto, Collingwood, Midland and, last but not least, St. Catharines. All of these memorials urge the government to do what is here asked in order to protect Canadian citizens who wish to remain British subjects, but who at the same time desire to follow the calling of mariners in Canada.

I have before placed on the records the American law on this subject which is to be found in the Act of Congress, approved on May 28, 1896, providing that after the first of January, 1897, eleven years ago, no person should be qualified to hold a license as a master or watch officer on a merchant vessel of the United States who is not a native born citizen of that country or whose naturalization as a citizen has not been fully completed. That of course necessitates his forswearing his allegiance to King Edward and to this country.

I understand that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur) is this year of the opinion that the Bill should pass and therefore I shall not detain the House, in order that it may be considered in the committee when any improvements that can be suggested may be made. In order to make clear to some gentlemen who had doubt about it last session and who said that the law was not always enforced in the United States against us, I have obtained the actual form to be filled out by any one seeking a master's certificate in the United States. The first form is the collector's certificate that the applicant has complied with the condition. The form to be filled in and sworn to by the applicant is as follows:—

District of.. .. ..
Port of.. .. ..
I.. .. .., master of the vessel called the.. .. ..of.. .. ..tons, do*.. .. ..that I am a citizen of the United States, having been† .. .. so help me God.

*Insert 'swear' or 'affirm.'

†Insert 'born within the limits thereof' or 'naturalized in the state of.. .. .., on the.. .. ..day of.. .. . .., 18.. .., by.. .. ..,' stating the Act or order of naturalization, and by what court or board.

By this form it will be seen that the applicant has to swear that he is a native born citizen of the United States or else to give the place and state in which his naturalization took place so that he can be identified. Thus it is plain that he must be a citizen of the United States. It works out in this way that a man who will forswear King Edward can get a job on either side. He can have his Canadian certificate because he does not have to be a citizen of Canada to hold it, and he can have an American certificate because he has become a citizen of the United States. Thus if he can swear that at any time he has lived in any part of Canada for three years, under the existing law he can get a Canadian certificate, while he can get his American certificate as an American citizen. As a matter of fact to-day the very best boats are officered almost entirely by citizens of the United States who are living——

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. To what places does my hon. friend now refer?

Mr. LANCASTER. To the boats going up and down the great lakes and the Welland canal.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. He is not speaking of the upper lakes?

Mr. LANCASTER. Not as limited to the upper lakes, but of the boats going through the Welland canal. I am told it applies there pretty generally.

Mr. J. D. REID. And to the St. Lawrence as well.

Mr. LANCASTER. Probably so. In any event I do not base my argument on the question of numbers; if the principle is good it should be applied if there are only one or two or half a dozen cases, the principle involved is that our merchant marine should be officered by men who owe allegiance to this country, to King Edward and his successors. It is natural to expect that if you protect Canadians in that profession more of our bright young men will undertake to learn it and will be able to obtain positions which in many cases are now held by aliens.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I desire to say, as I have said in the past three or four years that I am absolutely and entirely in sympathy with the Bill that the hon. gentleman has introduced. I asked a question in regard to one statement made by him because I thought he rather injured the case in making the statement so sweeping. I do not agree with him that so far as the upper lakes are concerned, a large majority of the best boats there are officered by American citizens. I do not think that any of the Canadian Pacific Railway boats are officered by American citizens. I am almost certain that there is not an American citizen in any of the Northern Navigation Company's boats sailing either from Collingwood or Sarnia. Nor do I know—I speak subject to correction by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that any of the freighters owned by the Midland Transportation Company are officered by American citizens. I think they are not. But, nevertheless, a grievance does exist and a grievance has existed by reason of quite a large number of vessels on the upper lakes being officered by masters and mates who are Americans. The grievance is well founded. Our neighbours to the south absolutely forbid any Canadians obtaining masters' or mates' papers in the United States. We have been speaking about this in regard to masters and mates, we were speaking about it last night in regard to shipbuilding and it is time that we did maintain Canada for the Canadians as against the restrictions which are put upon our Canadian fellow citizens in the United States. They will not permit any kind of an officer on their ships to be other than an American citizen. Their federal statutes lay it down constantly that you must be an American citizen before you will get a certificate either as master, mate or marine engineer, first, second, or third class and it even goes farther. If that is so and if it is wise legislation from their standpoint why should we not protect our Canadian mariners to the same extent? It is time we should say, I submit, that in Canada a man must be a British subject before he obtains a certificate either as master, mate or marine engineer. I am told that it is not workable, that it might prevent the Dominion Marine Association, which bobs up on all these occasions to protest against it—from getting the necessary men for their vessels, I do not believe it for a minute. It is not so. They will get all the men they want and there are just as good men in Canada for these positions as can be got from the United States. Unless you begin now to make good masters and mates of Canadian citizens you will never succeed. I do hope that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) is going to announce to us that he will adopt this Bill and that he will embody it in the law. I know there are some difficulties. The Canada Shipping Act, as it came from the commission which revised the statutes last year, is now a very complicated document, something that is very hard to understand and if you start to tinker with one clause you are very liable to get into difficulty in respect to another clause, but I do hope that his officers have by this time mastered it and that he will be in a position to announce to us that some protection will be given to our own Canadian citizens. We have been more lenient. We are told that legislation in this direction has been to enable a man living in the United States to come over here, work on our vessels and his work during the summer has been credited to him as domicile. Ordinarily of course, a man's domicile is where his family resides. He might leave his family in the United States, come over here and work on a ship during the summer and the place where he has worked during that brief period has been called his domicile. If he continues in that way for three years then he is permitted to obtain his certificate as a British subject. I do not think that is right. A British subject is a man who lives in this country and takes the oath of allegiance and I hope that the minister will extend the Act in that respect.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) have said. Last year I supported this Bill and I wish to support it again. I know for a fact that there are American citizens holding Canadian masters' papers who never resided in this country and who have no domicile here. They have simply claimed that the fact of working on a Canadian steamer was a fulfilment of the requirements of the law and thus they have obtained their certificates. I know men who are mastering some of our Canadian steamers when there are good Canadians who could fill these positions but who have to take positions as first and second mates on account of these other men having obtained the positions of master through the influence of friends connected with these steamers. I believe the time has come when we should look after our own Canadian people and I hope there will be no hesitation on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) in at once agreeing to this and seeing that the Bill is put through the necessary stages in order to make it law in time to take effect during the present season of navigation.

Mr. R. G. MACPHERSON (Vancouver). The amendment as suggested in the Bill brought forward by the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) has, I presume, a good deal of merit in it and I am not quarrelling with the Bill, or have I ever done so, although I have spoken several times upon this subject in the House and was also on a special committee to which it was referred. But I do not subscribe to the sentiment laid down both by the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara and by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) of Canada for the Canadians. I do not subscribe to that sentiment a particle. If you would say Canadians for Canada it will appeal more properly to the correct principle than the phrase Canada for Canadians. I think that a good deal of our smallness in a good many of these matters is due to the fact that we hear so many giving expression to the sentiment Canada for Canadians. It is well known that for many years in Canada trade and commerce did not flourish very greatly and our young men who followed the sea naturally went to the American side. For a long time they were enabled to carry on their business. I know men who for many years were operating on the American side on the Pacific coast as Canadians and who had charge of boats as engineers and captains. However, the law was more stringently enforced with the result that that cannot be done now. I do not believe in the theory that because Americans do these things we should do them. I think the proper principle should be applied and that is to make it as far as possible that young men will find themselves in the position that Americans find themselves in on the other side or in any other country; that is that they will not require to go from their own homes to get employment or to renounce their own citizenship as they have done in the past—and will have to do if they are obliged to take American boats on the American side. At the present time in British Columbia we have a good many men who are nothing else but British subjects but we have quite a number of men who are operating as captains, mates and engineers, and who are living in British Columbia—and I presume will do so—who have never taken the oath of allegiance. This Bill will make them fall into line and become British subjects. I do not believe it is a matter for retaliation at all but I believe it is a proper thing for us to declare that nobody shall be in charge of a boat, either on the high seas or the great lakes, who is not in possession of British papers, or such as will be agreeable to British law.

Of course they are now, if they are operating in our country, but it is much better I submit that we should have as far as possible British subjects upon our boats. Lately in the province of British Columbia a good many of our Asiatic friends have had no difficulty in getting masters and mates certificates, and I suppose when a thing touches one so closely as that he takes more notice of it. I want to say further, speaking of the examiners, that in my opinion many of them are very careless. Men who have been operating in British Columbia waters have no difficulty whatever in getting a certificate, and I think the examination should be made stiffer than it seems to be at present. A man goes in to be examined and a bunch of yarn is held up and he is asked : Is that blue or yellow or green in colour, and the whole thing is over in twenty minutes and the certificate is issued. I do not say that this has been going on with the cognizance of the Marine Department, but it has been going on just the same, and I think that more rigid discipline of some of our masters and mates would result beneficially for the merchant shipping of the Dominion of Canada. On these grounds I support the principle embodied in the Bill proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). This is not a question with which I am personally familiar, and I would not speak on it were it not for the fact that some of my own constituents have requested me more than once to support this Bill. I am heartily in accord with the principle incorporated in it; I believe in keeping as much of Canada and things Canadian for our own Canadian people as we possibly can; I believe that Canadians should be given an opportunity of engaging in profitable pursuits and callings in this country, and therefore I am heartily in favour of the Bill.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton). I am in accord with the principle of this Bill, but I wish to take exception to a remark made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when he advocated legislation providing that the holder of a Canadian certificate should not only be a British subject, but that he should be domiciled within the Dominion of Canada. Such legislation would in my opinion be very injurious and would not attain the object we are striving for. We must remember that all along the border (and not only along the border, but back in the country) there reside men who hold certificates as masters and mates, and first and second and third engineers of American boats. Although they are American citizens and have been naturalized for a very considerable time, yet during all the years outside of the sailing season they live in Canada, their families are here and their wages come to Canada and are spent here. That fact must be considered. Some years ago when the Lake Carriers' Association passed a sort of house resolution that no one should be master or officer or engineer of a boat. American boat, unless he were domiciled in the United States, when the rule went into effect a great many men, some of who lived in my own constituency and whom I knew, were compelled to take their families to the United States and live there although they had previously been residents of the Dominion. If we should legislate to say that a man who received a certificate from us must be both a British subject and be domiciled in Canada, it would be pretty sure to bring about retaliatory legislation in the United States. That would not be fair to these officers of American boats who are domiciled in Canada and whose families have always lived here. The clauses of the Bill have been thrashed out before special committees for several sessions, and it is the final conclusion of these committees and of the House that this legislation is good. However, it is the kind of legislation which we should be extremely careful not to make too stringent lest it may bring about retaliation from the United States. We must remember that if such a thing should happen our comparatively small marine fleet in Canada would be swamped by the United States with their tremendous tonnage, and that a great many men who desire to live in Canada would be cut off from employment on American steamers without their having an opportunity to obtain employment on Canadian steamers. To pass any legislation which might have such result would be very inadvisable.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenberg). I have a great deal of sympathy with the proposal of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), but there are considerations which apply to the maritime provinces and the Atlantic coast which prevent me giving the proposal my support. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend relates to inland and coasting trade waters of Canada. The inland waters of Canada mean: 'All the rivers, lakes and other navigable waters within Canada except salt water bays and gulfs on the sea coast, and including the River St. Lawrence between Father Point on the south shore and Point Orient on the north shore.' The resolution also refers to the coasting trade, and at present the coasting trade means a voyage between any port or place on the eastern coast of Canada or to Newfoundland, Labrador, St. Pierre or Miquelon, and along the American coast as far south as Cape Hatteras. A few years ago the coasting trade extended as far as the most southerly point of South America, but it is now restricted to Cape Hatteras. The chief reason which induces me to say that I am not prepared to give my adherence to this Bill is that in the maritime provinces it is almost impossible to obtain officers or men for our ships. Since the opening of parliament I myself have had three requests from my own constituents asking me to obtain from the Customs Department permission for vessels to sail from the port of landing without mates, because they were unable to get them. They made an honest effort to get mates, but they could not succeed. I know of the case of one brigantine which lay at Bridgewater, Lunenburg County, bound for South America, and in all the maritime provinces she could not obtain a qualified mate. I am aware of several other cases of the same kind. It is now impossible, and it has been impossible for years, to secure the requisite number of mates in the maritime provinces. Of course, the passing of this Bill may not make matters any worse in that respect, but still it is in the nature of a restriction. and while in the maritime provinces I have found a great deal of sympathy for the prinicple which my hon. friend has in mind, still the shipping men there are opposed to any idea of that kind. As a matter of fact, Canadian ships on the Atlantic coast are not manned by Canadians. I cannot tell the reason why, but it is a fact that a large majority of our mates and the great majority of our seamen are not Canadians, and consequently we are not troubled with any competition from the United States whatever. Upon the ground that it tends towards restriction and intensifies the present difficulties on the Atlantic seacoast, and particularly as it refers to the coasting trade, including trade on the River St. Lawrence with eastern Atlantic points, I desire to say that I will vote against this measure, notwithstanding that I have some sympathy with the principle of it.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). Mr. Speaker, the question which is now before the House is of some importance, for several reasons. I may say at first that I have found in the administration of the Canada Shipping Act that certain changes have been made from time to time which were not according to the general economy of the law, and I am afraid that the legislation now proposed by my hon. friend involves one more of those exceptions which should be considered very fully before they are adopted. We have two sections of the Canada Shipping Act referring to the matter dealt with by the Bill of my hon. friend, one in regard to the inland waters, coasting voyage and minor waters, and the other concerning 75, which are exactly the same. They provide that persons, to pass the examination for masters or mates, must be British subjects, or have been domiciled in Canada for three years. Perhaps it would be as well for me to read the sections :

74. Examinations may be instituted in Canada for British subjects, or for persons domiciled in Canada for at least three years, who intend to become masters or mates or second mates of sea-going ships, or who wish to procure the certificates of competency for sea-going ships.

75. Examinations may be instituted in Canada for British subjects, or for persons domiciled in Canada for at least three years, who intend to become masters or mates of ships trading on the inland waters of Canada, or on the minor waters of Canada, or on coasting voyages, or who wish to procure certificates of competency or service.

I have not been able to ascertain why we have two such exactly similar clauses in our legislation ; but it is probably due to the fact that amendments have occasionally been made in parliament, one amendment dealing with one subject, and another dealing with another subject, without their relation to the general provisions of the Act being fully considered.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. In the revision of the Statutes why was not that rectified?

Mr. BRODEUR. It could not be rectified, because the commissioners who revised the statutes had to follow as much as possible the old statutes. But I may say that I have been giving some consideration to this matter, and some day, when I have time, I will take up the question of having a shipping Act which will hold together. The present Act has in different parts various definitions of the same terms. There is no reason why the word vessel, for instance, should be defined in different ways in five or six different parts. This renders the administration and interpretation of the law somewhat difficult. As we see by these two sections, in order to become a master or mate, a man has to be a British subject or to be domiciled in Canada for three years. My hon. friend is proposing that in the case of inland or minor waters, on coasting voyages, the domiciliation clause should not apply. The question should then be put, why does my hon. friend confine his provision to the inland waters or minor waters ? If the principle is good in one case, why should it not be good in the other ? If it is advisable—I do not say that it is—that the domiciliation clause should be struck out with regard to the minor waters or inland waters, why should it apply to sea-going ships ?

Mr. LANCASTER. My reason is that I do not know the evil in sea-going ships as I do in others ; and, secondly, if the evil does exist, there can be no harm in applying the principle to that part of the country in regard to which it can legislate. The men affected by my amendment would undoubtedly be British subjects because they are Canadians, and would be working in the country that they would be subjects of. There is that distinction between the two classes. The one class of men are roaming all over the world on seagoing vessels ; the other class are living in Canada, and there is much more likelihood of their being British subjects, because they are working at home in a British country.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not agree with my hon. friend. A British subject does not mean necessarily a man living in Canada. He may be a person from India, or a man living in the British isles or in other part of the world which is the British Empire.

Mr. LANCASTER. But this is to apply to the man who earns his livelihood in Canada, no matter where it is.

Mr. BRODEUR. Why should we make a distinction between a man on a coasting voyage and a man on a seagoing ship ?

Mr. LANCASTER. The principle is the same, but the evil is not so bad.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know about that. For what reason do we require our ships to be manned by British subjects ? Because sometimes, in case of war, for instance, they might be requisitioned for, and the class of vessels that will most necessarily be requisitioned for purposes of warfare will be sea-going ships.

Mr. LANCASTER. It would depend on what nation the war was with. It would not be seagoing ships, if we were at war with the United States.

Mr. BRODEUR. In that case would it not be advisable that the vessels should have British captains ?

Mr. LANCASTER. I think so.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then it would be more important that the sea-going vessels should be under the command of officers who are British subjects. That is not what my hon. friend is proposing. He is proposing that the captain of a vessel, on a coasting voyage, should be a British subject, or a man who has lived in Canada three years before passing examination.

Mr. LANCASTER. That he must be a British subject.

Mr. BRODEUR. At the same time he is leaving out of the question the man who, in case of difficulty with some foreign government or in case of war, is in command of a ship which might be most likely requisitioned in such a case. My hon. friend is not logical. We should have a principle applicable to all cases, and not only to a special part of the country. That would be my idea.

Mr. LANCASTER. I agree to that.

Mr. BRODEUR. If we are to change the law, we should make the change of general application and not one which simply affects some part of the country. My hon. friend's proposition would render the application of the law very difficult. I have no desire to question his figures. Perhaps this is not the time to do so, but the evil on the inland waters is not so serious as he imagines. He remembers, no doubt, the evidence taken last year and the year before by the special committee to which his Bill was referred. There it was shown that in the last twelve years we issued certificates to 3,659 people on coasting, inland and minor waters. Out of that number only 79 were issued to people domiciled in Canada for three years, and out of those 79, only 14 were Americans. So that the situation is not so serious as my hon. friend claims. Another point to which I would draw his attention is this. Is he sure that we have the right to legislate in the way he proposes? The British Merchants' Shipping Acts of 1854 and 1894 deal with this question, and I might quote to my hon. friend from Abbott on 'Merchant Ships and Seamen.' There it is said :

It is also enacted that where the legislature of a British possession provides for the examination of and the grant of certificates to masters, mates and engineers, and the Board of Trade report that such examination as efficient as those in the United Kingdom, and that such certificates are granted on the like conditions as those under the Act, Her Majesty may by order in council, declare that such certificates are of the same force as if granted under the Act, and apply the provisions of the Act thereto.

Last year a Bill, which, I understand, has been amended in the House of Lords, was introduced by Mr. Lloyd George, President of the Board of Trade, in the House of Commons, and that Bill did not go so far as my hon. friend proposes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How far did it go?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not the Bill before me, but the note I have here is this : That on the 20th of March, 1906, the Hon. Lloyd George moved the second reading of a Bill prohibiting the engagement in British vessels of seamen with an insufficient knowledge of English. That is the only restriction. I do not think there is any restriction regarding masters and mates. Of course, the masters and mates have to pass an examination in English, but it was not provided that they should be British subjects.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that we cannot provide that they shall be British subjects?

Mr. BRODEUR. I question whether we can.

Mr. LANCASTER. Where is our want of jurisdiction?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have just quoted the clause of the British Merchants' Shipping Act of 1894, which provides that the British Board of Trade will examine our certificates, and if they find that our legislation clashes with theirs, they have a right to refuse assent to it. Suppose we pass legislation here which will be in contravention of that passed by the British parliament, and suppose an American goes before the British Board of Trade and passes his examination, he will be entitled to come here.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not on the inland waters of Canada.

Mr. BERGERON. On all British ships.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Might I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if we have not just as much jurisdiction to require that a person seeking examination shall be a British subject as that he shall be domiciled for three years in Canada?

Mr. BRODEUR. That Bill was submitted to the British parliament after it was passed and was assented to by the British authorities. But since then the British parliament has passed the new Act of 1894, which differs from the one we passed, and the British parliament has declared that its legislation shall apply to all British possessions. Can we repeal legislation with regard to Canada which has been passed by the British parliament? If the British authorities issue certificates, would not the holders of those certificates be entitled to take command of a British vessel here? Suppose an American passes his examination before the British Board of Trade, would he not be entitled to command any British ship? He passes his examination. Would he not be entitled to command any British ship?—because our ships are British ships. That is the situation that presents itself.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The logical conclusion of that would be that our present enactment with regard to domicile may have been repealed by the parliament under the legislation in 1894.

Mr. BRODEUR. That may be.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I should think it desirable for us to ascertain our situation with regard to that.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is precisely the position. The Deputy Minister of Justice, with whom I have discussed this matter, has great doubt whether many of the sections of our Shipping Act are in force. The British Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 was being applied to all British possessions. In 1867, by the British North America Act we were given the power to legislate with regard to navigation and shipping. We passed legislation from year to year, but all of that legislation, I think, was reserved for the assent of the British authorities. In England, also, they changed the law of 1854 from year to year. Consequently, the law did not at all agree, in some respects, with our revised statutes. The British parliament, in 1894, passed new legislation, repealing the Act of 1854. This Act of 1894 is different in many respects from our legislation. But this Act of 1894 also has been declared in some parts to apply to the British possessions. What about these clauses involving differences ? It is a most difficult and serious question, and one which, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has never been decided by the courts here. My intention is to deal with this matter. I had intended to deal with the particular case to which the hon. member (Mr. Lancaster) refers in a Bill to be presented this session. I will not say that I will adopt absolutely the principle laid down by the hon. member in this Bill. I think I will proceed in a different way, but, perhaps it will reach the end he has in view. But, before legislation is adopted, it will probably be necessary to refer it to the British authorities in order to have their assent. I am afraid that, owing to the conflict of certain provisions of the law, we have not the power to deal with the matter in the way proposed by my hon. friend. I have no objection to the Bill going before a committee under the circumstances. But I do not accept absolutely the principle of the Bill. I intend to introduce this session a Bill dealing with the clauses to which I have just referred.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough). If I understand the Bill, a foreigner would be practically shut out from becoming master of a Canadian ship. The present law provides that examinations may be instituted in Canada for British subjects or persons domiciled in Canada for at least three years who intend to become masters or mates of ships on the inland waters of Canada or on the minor waters of Canada, or on coasting voyages, or who wish to secure certificates of competency of service. That is, a foreigner domiciled for three years in Canada, if he can pass the examination, can obtain a Canadian certificate. But it is proposed by the present Bill to repeal the second subsection, which reads :

> Foreign subjects serving in ships registered in Canada, and trading on the inland waters of Canada, or on the minor waters of Canada, or on coasting waters of Canada shall be deemed to be domiciled in Canada while so serving.

Under the existing law a foreigner serving on a Canadian ship for three years is entitled, at the end of that time, to go up for his papers and become a British subject if he wishes. But, if you repeal this clause, a foreigner who wishes to become a master of a Canadian ship, must abandon his business as a sailor and come to Canada and live for three years to become naturalized as a British subject. That seems to be absurd.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not quite understand the difficulty.

Mr. SINCLAIR. At present, service in a British ship counts for residence in Canada. At the end of three years, the foreigner who has served on a British ship can become naturalized, because, as we all know, three years' residence is required for naturalization. But, the repealing of this clause would deprive him of the opportunity of putting in his term of residence by serving on a Canadian ship. Therefore, there would be no way for him, if he wished to become a master of one of our ships, except to give up his business as a sailor, and live on land in Canada.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If he is domiciled in Canada for three years, why should not he be naturalized ?

Mr. SINCLAIR. But how is he to obtain his domicile if he is obliged to give up his business ? A sailor may serve all his life on Canadian ships, but can never become domiciled.

Mr. LANCASTER. We do not require service from a man to qualify. He has to become a British subject.

Mr. SNCLAIR. And that requires three years' residence in Canada.

Mr. LANCASTER. Well, why should he have a special privilege ?

Mr. SINCLAIR. But, under the present law, he is counted as residing in Canada while serving on a British ship, and we are striking that out. But, apart from this, I think the Bill is undesirable. Of course, we all accept the principle of a preference for Canadians ; but, as the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says, this is imposing another restriction that will prevent our obtaining men to man our ships. I fear also it will be a cause of some irritation with our friends across the border. Many of the men of the province from which I come are employed in the service of ships in the United States. I believe that the majority of the captains of the fleet that sails out of Gloucester are Canadians. I am told also that many of them manage to get their certificates without actually becoming American citizens. There seems to be some method in the United States by which a man when he declares his intention to become an American citizen can after passing the required examinations obtain a certificate to serve on board an American ship. If that is true it is an evasion of the law; but time after time I have met men who are serving as masters of American vessels and who are still Canadian subjects, I have seen them come up at election times and take the oath, that they are Canadian subjects while they were acting as captains on board of American vessels. The statement they always made was that by declaring their intention to become American citizens they were allowed to go up for examination and obtain the American certificate. In the maritime provinces there is a very large number of men who are masters of American vessels and I do not think I have ever heard of a single American who has come over and taken charge of a Canadian vessel. Consequently the question is of no importance to the people of the maritime provinces so far as any invasion from the Americans is concerned ; the difficulty seems to be altogether in the uper lakes. If it is necessary to have some regulation on the uper lakes, I would ask the House to confine the legislation in such a way that it would not apply to the maritime provinces.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. On the constitutional aspect of the question referred to by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) it is undoubtedly true that the British North America Act gives to the parliament of Canada power exclusively to make laws with regard to certain subjects which would include the subject now engaging our attention, so far as the inland waters of Canada are concerned. There has been a great deal of debate as to the effect of that word 'exclusively' having regard to the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865, and I can well understand that as the imperial parliament has since 1867 amended the laws with regard to merchant shipping and expressly declared that those laws so amended shall apply to all possessions throughout the empire, the doubt suggested by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does certainly exist. It will be impossible for any one at short notice, or indeed perhaps after very considerable study, to attempt to solve that doubt. Perhaps it can only be solved by a reference to the courts and a determination by the courts, but it does seem of very great importance that we should know, in respect of enactments of this parliament concerning merchant shipping, whether or not they have been, in whole or in part, repealed by any recent enactments of the imperial parliament, and I would think it might very well be the duty of the government to take that matter into immediate consideration, and, if necessary, state a case, as they have power to do, for the opinion of the Supreme Court, in order that we may have that matter determined. Of course, another and possibly a better alternative is to examine the amendments effected by imperial legislation in regard to merchant shipping in Canada, to ascertain in what respects, if any, those amendments differ from our own legislation on the subject, and to determine, in the first place, whether there would be any practical difficulty or danger in bringing our own enactments into exact harmony with those of the imperial parliament. I suppose that would be the first consideration of all ; but if that harmony should not come to pass after the necessary examination and consideration by parliament, then it seems to me it would be undoubtedly in the public interest that we should know as soon as possible whether or not the imperial enactment does, pro tanto, repeal the British North America Act and take away our power to deal with these matters by our own legislation.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think the reference of which my hon. friend speaks would be with regard to some statutes which might affect the provinces. I do not know that we would have the right to refer to the Supreme Court the interpretation of a statute which might affect the legislation of Great Britain.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The point is whether or not we would have the right to submit to the Supreme Court the determination of a question which involves the construction of a statute of the imperial parliament.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think there would be doubt about that ; we would not have the right to refer an imperial statute to the Supreme Court ; we would have to refer some clause of our own Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I asked whether or not the hon. gentleman's doubt related to our right to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question whether or not our own statutes respecting merchant shipping had been repealed by an imperial Act. The doubt would arise, of course, for the reason that in doing so our courts would necessarily be obliged to construct an Act of the imperial parliament. It might be that a reference involving the construction of such an Act would not be within the meaning of the Act authorizing such references. Was there some further question with regard to provincial laws?

Mr. BRODEUR. There is no doubt that under the statute which has been passed concerning these references to the Supreme Court we have the right to obtain determination by the Supreme Court of the question of the validity of these provincial Acts or of Dominion statutes in their relation to provincial legislation ; but I would doubt very seriously whether it would be advisable that the Supreme Court should be called upon to decide as to the validity of a statute which would involve the consideration of the validity of a statute passed by the British parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is exactly what I meant ; because the validity of our own statute depends on the construction of an imperial statute, therefore we may not have the right to refer the question to the Supreme Court. I quite understand a doubt as to that. It might prevent the adoption of the course to which I have referred, in which case some other remedy would have to be found.

Mr. BRODEUR. It could perhaps be referred to the Privy Council.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It could be referred to the Privy Council. But it seems to me the first consideration would be to determine whether or not we could bring our own enactments into harmony with the amendments passed by the imperial parliament. If we could do that, there is no need of referring any question ; if we cannot, that question must be met in some other way.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Then you would have to be constantly comparing your Acts with those of the imperial parliament.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No, I would think in matters of this kind it would be the duty of the imperial parliament always to consult the government of Canada with respect to any amendments which concern this country. Constitutional writers, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and every lawyer in the House who has paid attention to constitutional law knows, affirm that there is a vast difference between the legal power to pass a statute or to perform a legislative Act and the constitutional right to do it. The King in Great Britain, as part of the imperial parliament, has the technical right, the legal power to disallow any statute of Great Britain. That power has not been exercised in Great Britain since the reign of Queen Anne, and it may be said to have fallen into desuetude. Other instances could be given but it is not necessary to do so. While the imperial parliament has the absolute technical right to repeal the British North America Act, pro tanto, in respect to legislation affecting this country, I would respectfully submit that it has not the constitutional right to do so, without first consulting the government of this country and ascertaining whether or not the proposed legislation will meet and fulfil the wants and requirements of the people of Canada; so I think it might well be stated to the imperial government that in respect of any proposed future amendments of the Merchant Shipping Act which concern or affect this country the government and parliament of Canada ought to be consulted in the first place before bringing about any such state of confusion as that which apparently does exist at the present moment. I would suggest that a respectful despatch along those lines would possibly prevent instances of this confusion being brought to our attention in future. The parliament of Great Britain gave this parliament, by the terms of the British North America Act, power exclusively to make laws with respect to this particular subject. That word 'exclusively' has been construed by some authorities as relating to the distinction between Dominion jurisdiction and provincial jurisdiction. Other authorities have construed it more widely. Whether that be the case or not, it is certainly only constitutionally right that we should be consulted before any Acts of the imperial parliament are passed which conflict with the opinion of the people of this country as expressed in their parliamentary enactments in regard to legislation of this kind affecting the inland waters of Canada.

Mr. LANCASTER. If no other hon. member wishes to say anything on this motion

I want to refer to a couple of points which were mentioned by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur). In regard to the number of persons who would be affected by this legislation he gave some statistics, and I wish to draw his attention and that of the House to the fact that the information in which these statistics are based has not quite the effect that one might suppose and perhaps the minister did not think of it in making his statement. The statistics stated how many were British subjects and how many were American citizens who had been certified by the officers of the department to the committee as having registered at the time they obtained their certificates, but the department did not say how many of these latter had since foresworn their allegiance to the King had gone from Canada, had become American citizens, had ceased to be British subjects and had obtained certificates in the United States. Nevertheless that applies to a great many of the figures that the hon. gentleman gave.

Mr. BRODEUR. If my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) will permit me to call his attention to this fact I will point out to him that this Bill does not provide for persons who, under the domiciliation clauses, have been permitted to pass the examination, have gone to the United States, taken their certificates, become American citizens and who continue to act as officers of Canadian ships. The Bill of my hon. friend would not interfere with this class of persons.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am not trying to interfere with what has already been done. I am trying to stop an evil. I do not want to take away what a man has obtained under the laws of the land, but I am trying to stop that evil before it becomes worse. Does my hon. friend want me to take away the certificate of a man who has obtained it properly under the law of the land? It was our fault not his. He had the right to get what he could under the law of the land as long as he did not break the law. But when the hon. gentleman acknowledges that this evil exists I do not see any reason why we should distinctly say that we will allow the evil to continue to exist for want of legislation to restrict it.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know whether my hon. friend has caught my point or not. Suppose this Bill were to pass as it is drafted there, it would not prevent a man who is a British subject coming and passing his examination before the department, then going to the United States, becoming an American citizen, passing his examination there, coming back to Canada and becoming a master or mate of a British vessel.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not if the hon. gentleman is going to stick to what he did two years ago when he defeated my Bill in regard to regulations to stop that. The hon. gentleman said that it was a matter of regulation and I gave in to him. Now, if the hon. gentleman is going to say that he is not going to make regulations to carry out the law what he says will be so. I was told two years ago that I should not meddle with the regulations, and that whatever provision was necessary for seeing that these people should conform to the law was a matter of regulation. I do not think I am asking too much now of my hon. friend if I ask him to make regulations to properly carry out the spirit of the law. One regulation would be that if a man does what he now suggests he shall forfeit the certificate issued to him. I think that is a proper regulation and one which might be made by the hon. gentleman. Of course, if it is to be a matter of statute I would certainly amend the statute so as to make provision to put a stop to that evil. Then I would be doing just what I was told two years ago by the hon. gentleman and others I ought not to do; that is, to do nothing more than to declare what the law should be and to leave it to the department to make regulations to carry out that law. That is all I have to say on that point.

Now, just one word as to the trouble which my hon. friend may see by a conflict of authority with imperial Acts. I wish to say that it seems to me that is altogether removed as far as my Bill relates to the inland and minor waters of Canada. I cannot see that there is any question of our right to deal with the inland or minor waters of Canada. There may possibly be some question of our right to deal with coasting voyages. Possibly my hon. friend's objection would apply to my Bill as far as it deals with coasting voyages. But I cannot see how there can be any conflict of jurisdiction as between Great Britain and ourselves in regard to the inland minor and inland waters of Canada. We surely have the right to legislate with respect to those waters. There is nothing in the British Shipping Act as I understand it, and I have read it several times—not as quoted in Abbot on Shipping—which indicates to me that there is any conflict of authority in so far as we are keeping within our own Canadian territory, and are confining ourselves to our minor and inland waters. I admit that the Bill as at present drawn covers coasting voyages, but in committee if that is stricken out the objection of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), of my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) and of the minister as to conflict of jurisdiction would be entirely done away with. If the principle is a good one, I think it should apply to everything, but I am not meddling with sea-going vessels or coasting voyages because they are not so much our business as the matter at which this Bill is more particularly aimed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. BRODEUR. I announced on the second reading of the Bill that I intend to bring in a Bill this session dealing with the question. This Bill, as I have already pointed out, will not cover only this particular case, but will be a Bill of a general nature. I might add also that my hon. friend's Bill will have no effect because, in spite of what has been said by my hon. friend, I do not think we have absolute power to deal with this question. It would be perhaps interesting to hon. gentlemen to place on record the opinion sent to the department by the Deputy Minister of Justice on January the 27th last.

Mr. LANCASTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRODEUR. It reads as follows:

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 9th instant respecting the amendment of sections 95, 96, 97 and 98 of the Canadian Shipping Act so as to make it compulsory that all vessels, whether registered in Canada or not, shall carry certificated masters, &c., I have the honour to draw your attention to sections 735 and 736 of the Imperial Merchants Shipping Act of 1894. Upon reference to those sections it will be noted that the legislature of a British possession has no power to repeal wholly or in part any provisions relating to ships other than those registered in the possession, and the legislature has power to legislate with respect to the coasting trade, but in both cases imperial approval must be had.

Under these circumstances I do not think that Canada could pass an Act legislating with respect to British vessels other than those registered in Canada except as regulating the coasting trade, and that in that case imperial approval would have to be obtained before the Act went into force.

E. L. NEWCOMBE,
Deputy Minister.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What kind of imperial approval is required?

Mr. BRODEUR. Approval from the British authorities.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The British board of trade?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think the Bill would have to be reserved for the assent of the Crown. Under these circumstances, and in view of the doubt as to our right to pass this Bill, I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) will not press it now. A Bill will be drafted by the Department of Justice which may probably deal with the question my hon. friend has raised, and we can leave his Bill in committee for the present.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then the minister will move that the committtee rise report progress and ask leave to sit again, so as to leave my Bill in its present position on the Order Paper.

Mr. BRODEUR. That would be satisfactory. I move that the committee rise, report progres and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LANCASTER. I might point out that the opinion of the Minister of Justice does not seem to deal with the principle propounded in my Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. The principle is the same.

Mr. LANCASTER. It may be, but the opinion of the deputy Minister of Justice excepts these boats which are registered in Canada, and the vessels we are dealing with this Bill would require to be registered within Canada so that his opinion would not apply here. I do not understand the deputy minister to say we cannot deal with boats on inland waters that are registered in Canada; on the contrary he says we can deal with them. The boats which this Bill would apply to are all Canadian registered bottoms. If they are registered in the United States this Bill would not apply. Is not the opinion of the deputy Minister of Justice applicable only to other matters than those dealt with in my Bill ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Can the Minister of Marine say if the Bill which he proposes introducing refers to other matters than those dealt with in the Bill now before the committee.

Mr. BRODEUR. The Bill will be somewhat lengthy and will deal with many matters.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Can the minister give us a general idea of what subjects will be dealt with in this Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. I cannot say offhand. I believe it will deal with pilotage, engineers, inspection of boilers, and deck-load line.

Mr. TAYLOR. And gasoline launches.

Mr. BRODEUR. Probably, yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would it not be complicated to deal with all these matters in the one Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. They are all dealt with in the Canadian Shipping Act now and the Bill will be an amendment to that Act.

Mr. SPROULE. I once heard the late Sir Oliver Mowat say, when speaking on the question of provincial rights that it was always a good policy to pursue, if there was any doubt as to your power to legislate, to go on legislating and then let someone take exception to it if they wanted to. Perhaps the Minister of Marine could adopt that policy in this case.

Progress reported.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose the French treaty will be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. LANCASTER.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And after that supply ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Marine and Fisheries ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

The House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 13, 1908.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

KANANASKI FALLS WATER-POWER.

Mr. J. D. REID—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

2. By whom is the land on both sides of the river for a quarter of a mile above and below the falls at present owned, and how was same acquired?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. No. Negotiations are, however, pending with the Calgary Power and Transmission Company, Limited, for the purchase of 1,000 acres of land at Horse Shoe Falls, which has been duly surrendered by the Indians for the purpose of sale, and which sale is to be carried out on the terms and conditions specified by the Indians in the surrender.

2. The land on both sides of the river for a quarter of a mile below the falls is part of the Stony Indian reserve, held in trust for the Indians. The land for about 500 feet above the falls on both sides of the river also is part of the Stony Indian reserve held in trust for the Indians.

VENTILATION AT THE MINT.

Mr. THOS. CHISHOLM asked :

1. Have any complaints been made as to the lack of ventilation in the annealing department of the Royal Mint?
2. How many men are employed in this particular branch?
3. What changes, if any, have been made in the annealing staff since the Mint commenced business?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) :

1. No. I am advised that ample means are provided for ventilation in the annealing department. Occasionally, in stormy weather or after the furnace has been standing cold for some time, fumes from the furnace have been driven into the room. This is a condition which may arise with any furnace. As soon as the flues become warm the fumes are drawn up.

2. Two.

3. One man has been discharged.

SALE OF INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. J. D. REID—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. Have any Indian lands in which the Canadian government has had ownership or interest been recently sold at or near New Westminster?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. No.

2. No.

DREDGING IN HOLLAND RIVER.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. Who has acted as inspector for the Department of Railways and Canals in the dredging operations carried on by the Lake Simcoe Dredging Company on the Holland river on Trent Valley canal system, and what has been his remuneration?

2. If an inspector acted, upon whose recommendation was he appointed?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. Dredging operation by the Lake Simcoe Dredging Company on the Holland river, Trent canal was looked after by the divisional engineer and his assistant.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CLOSED LEASES IN ALBERTA.

Mr. LENNOX asked :

1. How many closed leases have been granted in townships 12 to 19 in ranges 15 to 21, all numbers inclusive, west of the fourth meridian, in the province of Alberta?

2. What is the name of the grantee in each case, and (a) date of grant, (b) area of each grant, (c) the rent received in each case, (d) the date at which notice was given to the government agent not to accept entries, and date of receipt of notice by agent in each case?

3. What land within the general boundaries of these leases have been disposed of in any way before receipt of such notices by the agent, and the names of the parties to whom they were disposed of or allotted?

4. Have any protests or complaints against the granting of these leases, or the action of the department in reference thereto, been received? If so, from whom and on what general grounds?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). If by 'closed leases' is meant leases granted for a period of twenty-one years with no provision for cancellation, none have been granted in the tract in question.

TIMBER LICENSES UNDER MACKENZIE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. How many applications for timber licenses were received by the government of Mr. Mackenzie, what area in square miles did they cover, how many licenses were issued and what area did they cover, and under how many of those licenses were operations actually carried on, and what area did these include?

2. How many applications for timber licenses were received by the government from November 1, 1878, to July 1, 1896, and what area in square miles did they cover, how many licenses were issued and what area did they cover, under how many of these licenses were operations actually carried on, and what area did they cover?

3. How many permits to cut lumber were given to applicants as above in leases where licenses had not issued during each of these periods?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I would ask that this should stand as a notice of motion for a return.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands as notice of moton for return.

INVESTIGATION RE BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON—by Mr. Taylor—asked:

1. What was the amount of money expended for the investigation held by M. Dupuis, K.C., over William Charette, lockmaster on the Beauharnois canal?

2. Charette having been exonerated and reinstated to his position, is it the intention of the government to pay his salary, held over during his suspension?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. $578.60.

2. The decision of the minister was that he might be reinstated, but that under the circumstances he could not be paid his salary during the time of his suspension.

DREDGING INSPECTOR AT OWEN SOUND.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. Was one Telford, of Owen Sound, engaged as a dredging inspector at Owen Sound during the summer of 1907? If so, what was his remuneration?

2. If so employed, what dredging work was he superintending, and who was owner of the same?

3. Who recommended the appointment of said Telford?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) :

The department had no dredging inspector at Owen Sound during the season of 1907 by the name of Mr. Telford.

Mr. Maxwell Telford was appointed inspector of the revetment wall at Owen Sound ; salary $3.50 per day.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg to call the attention of the Prime Minister to part 3 of question 14 which has not been answered.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It would not be in accordance with the practice of the department to give the names of the parties who made the recommendation.

OWEN SOUND PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. Has the Department of Public Works decided to add a third story to the public building being erected at Owen Sound?
2. If so, were tenders called for same?
3. If not, who has contracted to perform the whole or different parts thereof?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for the Minister of Public Works) :

1, 2 and 3. The matter is under consideration ; plans are now being prepared to ascertain the cost of an additional story.

BUILDING INSPECTOR AT OWEN SOUND.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

1. Was a Mr. Forster appointed clerk of the works or inspector of a public building being erected at Owen Sound at any time?
2. If appointed, how long did he act, and were his services dispensed with? If so, why?
3. If dispensed with, who was appointed his successor, and on whose recommendation?
4. On whose recommendation were Forster's services dispensed with?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for the Minister of Public Works) :

1. Messrs. Forster and Clark were appointed supervising architects for the Owen Sound public building.

2, 3 and 4. Appointment made April 5, 1907 ; still acting.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). This should be a matter for a return.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands as a notice of motion for a return.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

River Jesus, by General Construction Co.
St. Placide, by L. Cohen & Son.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

On the orders of the day being called :

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) to make some explanation in regard to the re-arrangement of postal rates on newspapers and to give us a statement as to whether weeklies and semi-weeklies will be included in the re-arrangement.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). Mr. Speaker, I intended to give an explanation at the sitting of the House to-morrow in regard to the question. I am waiting for one of the documents which is missing just now in the department but I will be in a position to make a statement to-morrow.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN IN THE NORTHWEST—APPOINTMENT OF MR. R. E. A. LEECH.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) a question and in order to do so I will read a despatch that appears in to-day's 'Montreal Gazette' :

Seed grain loans—R. E. A. Leech, of Thin Red Line fame, to superintend the work—Distribution in March—Mr. Leech expects over 25,000 applications—Railways to assist in the work.

Regina, Sask., February 12.—(Special.)—R. E. A. Leech, the Liberal politician who was involved in the Thin Red Line outrage, has arrived in the city to superintend the work of the seed grain loans, to be made by the Dominion government. Offices have been taken, and a staff of forty will be engaged for the next three months. Included in the staff will be a grain accountant from Winnipeg and an accountant from Ottawa, and a clerk from each Dominion land office in the two provinces. Leech states that from 25,000 to 50,000 applications for seed grain are looked for. Actual distribution is expected to commence early in March, and the government estimates the following amount of grain will be handled :

Then he goes on to give the amounts for the two provinces. The despatch continues :

The railways will assist in the work by giving special rates for transportation and letting the local agents distribute the grain to the applicants and receive the necessary lien notes. The grain will be purchased under the supervision of Grain Inspector Horn and his assistants, and cleaned and bagged in Winnipeg and at other points where adequate cleaning facilities exist. With regard to the oats, Leech states that it will be necessary to import 500,000 bushels from the States and the Old Country, and steps are already being taken to that end.

I would like to ask the minister if this despatch in the main is correct and if Mr. Leech is the officer who will be in charge of the distribution or will he be connected with it in any way ?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). To a very large extent the despatch is correct. If I am in order, Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement in this connection.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the practice seems to be growing up of introducing and discussing matters of this sort at some length. A question is permitted at this time but not the introduction of matters that will lead to a discussion.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I read the dispatch in order to get the question in proper form and I am sure that the minister will not object to giving an answer.

Mr. OLIVER. The answer is that the despatch, in the main, as far as I can gather, is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the Minister of the Interior if the despatch is correct in reference to the man Leech ?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Leech is employed in that connection.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the matter with Wagner ?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know that there is anything the matter with Wagner.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I beg to call the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to the fact that a return was ordered on January 13 and another on January 20 with respect to the appointment of immigration agents and also with respect to the certificates appertaining to West Kent. I will be obliged if the minister will bring down these returns as soon as possible. I see that a return appertaining to the same subject, asked for a few days afterwards by an hon. member on the other side of the House, has been brought down.

Mr. OLIVER. The returns are being prepared with all possible expedition.

Mr. BARKER. I wish to call the attention of the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a return that was ordered three weeks ago—on the 22nd of January—relating to Mr. Haney and the Hillsborough bridge. This information is urgently wanted and I would like to have the return made.

Mr. GRAHAM. That return is being prepared just now as rapidly as possible. The order must have passed when I was not in the House and it escaped my mind altogether. We have had to get the information from different parts and it has taken some time.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) when the return was ordered about the middle of December in regard to the food supplied to the militia will be brought before the House.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I think the return is about ready. It is a voluminous return and required correspondence with every part of the Dominion almost. I think it will be ready in a day or two.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to an order for a return dated the 11th December, appertaining to the Meat Inspection Act. If this is going to be too voluminous I would not object to having that portion brought down which has reference to the riding which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. FISHER. I will look into the matter and if that is necessary I will inform the hon. gentleman.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when the several measures mentioned in the speech from the Throne will be brought down—one relating to telegraph and telephone companies and another relating to the boundaries of Manitoba. I already asked about that on a previous occasion. There is also the Bill respecting government annuities for the aged and the Bill to amend the Election Act. The other two that were mentioned in the speech from the Throne have been brought before the House—the Bills to amend the Insurance Act and the Dominion Lands Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Bill with regard to telegraphs and telephones is about ready and it is to be introduced, I believe, next week. The Election Bill is about ready and will be introduced at an early date. The Bill on annuities has been on the Order Paper for some time. Perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Finance can give us some information about that.

Mr. FIELDING. I expect to give notice of it on Monday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In regard to the boundaries of Manitoba, my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) is aware that the legislature of Manitoba has laid before the House a petition in which the position they had taken previously is considerably altered in regard to that and other matters, and I am not aware when the Bill may be brought down but it may be expected at no distant day.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. FOSTER. What about thte Civil Service Commission report ?

Mr. FIELDING. I have not been able to get any later information in regard to it. The chairman of the commission communicated indirectly with me a short time ago and said that it had been delayed. I will stir them up again.

Mr. FOSTER. Is their pay going on ?

Mr. FIELDING. I hope so ; I would not like to see men working and not getting paid.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE COMMISSION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there any further information as to the report of the Quebec Bridge Commission ?

Mr. GRAHAM. We expect that very soon, but reports of commissions seem to be things that you cannot really push any faster than the natural order of things.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We expected that they would be through a month ago.

Mr. GRAHAM. So did we.

SUPPLY—PROVINCIAL ELECTIONS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. O. S. CROCKET (York, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I desire to call attention to the improper and unseemly use which is being made of federal government patronage for the purpose of influencing the provincial elections which are now in progress in the province of New Brunswick. I regret very much that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) is not present in his seat and that he has deemed it to be his duty to abandon his important post at this time, to leave this House while in session, to engage in a provincial electioneering contest and to exercise all the power that he has as a member of this government in order to save from defeat an administration what has long since outlived its usefulness. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that when the Hon. Wm. Pugsley ceased his exploitation of the government of New Brunswick a few months ago to turn his attention to the larger opportunities which this government affords, that he left in that province a government so throughly discredited that very few who had formerly supported it would give it any countenance, and that men of capacity and reputation could not be induced to join it. Liberals and Conservatives alike I may say, who before the Pugsley domination and resultant demoralization gave that government a hearty support, turned away from it in reproach. The government which the Minister of Public Works handed over to Mr. Robinson, therefore found itself in great difficulty. In the first place the office of Attorney General which the Minister of Public Works vacated was hawked about the province from county to county and declined, so that in the end and after a hunt of 151 days it required the intervention of the Minister of Public Works to fill that cabinet vacancy. The result was that the Hon. Mr. McKeown who I may say, as a member of the legislature, some years previously signed a memorial and carried it to the lieutenant governor of that province containing three specific charges of malfeasance in office against the Minister of Public Works while holding the position of Solicitor General of that province, was induced to accept.

Mr. BENNETT. What were they ?

Mr. CROCKET. Mr. McKeown finally accepted the position of Attorney General, and it was a matter of general comment that the office of Attorney General with the prospect of so short a tenure was not sufficient to procure his acceptance, but that the intervention of the Minister of Public Works was necessary and that there was required in addition to the office an assurance of federal provision for Mr. McKeown in case of the inevitable defeat that the government of New Brunswick is up against at the prsent time. Now, it is not only with respect to Mr. McKeown that the patronage of this government has been used, but in order to provide the attorney general with a constituency it was necessary to procure a vacancy in the representation in the local House. The Hon. Mr. McKeown did not dare to face the electorate in his home and natural constituency but sought election in the county of St. John—a constituency which I may say was carved out some years ago for the express purpose of creating two safe seats for the government of that province. Doctor Ruddick, member of provincial parliament, was therefore appointed to a lucrative position under this government for the particular purpose of creating a vacancy for Mr. McKeown in that province.

Mr. FOSTER. What did he get ?

Mr. CROCKET. I believe he was appointed quarantine officer at the port of St. John at a salary of $1,800. Having completed the government in that way, the administration then found itself up against another difficulty. They had held on to office until the statutory term had practically expired so that a few weeks ago they found it necessary to prepare for the general elections and to issue the writs. Having done that they encountered further difficulties. So discredited was the government, so discredited had the Minister of Public Works left the government of that province, that it was impossible to procure candidates to stand for their unpopular cause in many of the constituencies of the province. Then again, the patronage of this government was called into play. Although in the last House the government held three seats in the city of St. John, it was found necessary, according to the open and public statements made in the press, in order to secure a ticket in that constituency to offer another federal office. It has been stated openly that Mayor Sears of the city of St. John is slated for the position of postmaster of St. John. In that connection I will read the following from the columns of the St. John 'Telegraph,' the leading newspaper in the province of New Brunswick, published in its issue of Friday, January the 31st :

The ticket and the bargain.

The nomination made by the government party in this constituency last evening represents a transaction in politics which all the right thinking people of this city should be quick to resent and to rebuke. Mayor Sears has repeatedly denounced the local government and said that he did not want a nomination, that he did not want to go to the legislature, but that he did want to be postmaster. He has said that he would not become a candidate unless he had satisfactory assurance that he would be made postmaster.

Notwithstanding that those were the declarations which Mayor Sears made openly in the city of St. John, it is a fact that he afterward accepted nomination, and the statement is openly and publicly made that he did so upon the condition of receiving an assurance of appointment by the federal government to the postmastership of that city. It seems to me that this is a most objectionable practice upon the part of this or any other government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does my hon. friend say that a candidate in New Brunswick has been promised that if he runs as a candidate in the local elections he will get the postmastership ?

Mr. CROCKET. I am saying that the public press in the city of St. John and throughout the province of New Brunswick has openly proclaimed this fact and that it is a matter of general comment throughout that province.

Mr. LEMIEUX. For the information of the hon. gentleman, and the information of the House and the country, I may say that there is no such promise and no hint has been given that any such promise will be made.

Mr. CROCKET. It is not necessary for Mayor Sears to have received his assurance from the Postmaster General.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Or from any one in the government.

Mr. CROCKET. Well, I think the Minister of Public Works is quite capable of looking after the interests of the party in that section of the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, not only in the city of St. John has this thing occurred, but in the county of York which I have the honour to represent in this House there has been a transaction, according to open and public statement, of a similar kind. Although the government held four seats in that constituency in the last legislature they found themselves in such a helpless condition that they could not within the borders of that constituency find four men to stand as their candidates. It was necessary therefore to go outside of the county of York and those who had charge of the provincial government campaign in that province went over to the county of Westmoreland and they brought from the town of Shediac the claims agent of the Intercolonial Railway, Mr. E. H. Allen. It has been known for some time that Mr. Allen had somewhat tired of that job and was anxious for promotion to something easier. He therefore would not accept nomination unless upon certain conditions, one of which was that he should receive a portfolio and become the Hon. Edward H. Allen. Another of these conditions, according to open and public statement—and this is in the mouths not only of the people of the city of Fredericton but throughout the whole length and breadth of the province ; that a supplemental condition was that in case of his defeat, which I may say is considered inevitable, that some provision shall also be made for him by this government and that the collectorship of the port of Fredericton should be held for him upon his defeat as the government candidate in that constituency.

These are two flagrant instances of the most unseemly use of federal patronage for the purpose of influencing provincial politics. In the county of Kent also a federal government employee, Mr. W. D. Carter, who held the position of Indian agent at Richibucto, has been induced to resign his position to accept a nomination as provincial government candidate. Not only of these officials and of these promises of appointment do I complain but in the district of Queens and Sunbury at the present time we have the federal government candidate, Col. Maclean, going about in company with an engineer of the Public Works Department, looking for sites for wharfs and other public works, and endeavouring to turn this work to the account of the local government candidates in that constituency. It seems to me that this is not only improper, but a highly unseemly use of fedarl patronage. Not only, however, with reference to these matters, has this government offended in an endeavour to control the government of New Brunswick but we find, by reference to the Auditor General's Report, that members of the local legislature are regularly fed by this government in violation of the statutory law of the province. Mr. A. B. Copp, the local Liberal candidate in the county of Westmoreland, and the Liberal organizer for the province, is down in the Auditor General's Report for the year 1906-7 for $1,086 for services performed for a department of this government. Mr. Copp, is a lawyer. It seems that he was appointed a commissioner to investigate certain charges against Captain Pratt, of the steamer 'Curlew,' and that he received payments in two years, one payment of $200 in the year 1905-6, and the balance in the fiscal year which closed on the 31st of March last. These are the items as they appear in the Auditor General's Report:

Copp, A. B.: Expenses in conducting investigation re Capt. Pratt, travelling expenses, May 23 to August 1, 1906, $221.34; attendance at inquiry, 36 days at $25; making a report, $50; stenographer's fees, $35; witness' fees, $71.15; stationery, $3; telegrams and telephone messages, $6.20; less charged in 1905-6, $200; total, $1,086.69.

It is not my purpose at the present time to criticise with due or undue strictness the scale of remuneration which was fixed for Mr. Copp; although, in view of the ringing denunciation in which Mr. Copp and his fellow Liberals in the province of New Brunswick indulged in reference to the payments by a former Conservative government of men of eminence and reputation in this country for investigations into matters of the most vital concern to the people of this country at the rate of $10 a day, I think it is not amiss to say that the scale that has been fixed for my brother Copp has been rather liberal. But it is not in that aspect that I propose particularly to criticise this payment to Mr. Copp. It is, as I have said, because it is an express violation of the statute law of the province of New Brunswick as tending to the destruction of that principle of which our hon. friends on the other side of the House professed when in opposition to be the guardian angels. Section 10 of the Election Act of the province of New Brunswick provides that 'no person shall be eligible to be a candidate or capable of being elected or returned as a member to serve in the legislative assembly of this province, or capable to sit and vote therein,' who holds certain offices specified in this section, and concludes as follows:

And no person holding or accepting any office, commission or appointment in the service of the government of the Dominion of Canada, with a salary or emoluments directly or indirectly attached thereto, by whomsoever to be paid or allowed, or howsoever payable, shall be capable of being elected to, or of sitting or voting in, the legislative assembly, while holding such office, commission, or appointment.

Notwithstanding the explicit provision of that section, we have the printed record in the Auditor General's Report of this government's complicity in the violation of the statute law of New Brunswick. Mr. Copp has been a member of the local legislature of New Brunswick for the last five sessions, and sat in the House after receiving these payments in violation of that statute. He is standing now as a candidate in the county of Westmoreland. Section 20 of the same Act provides:

No person disqualified by this chapter, or by any other law, to be elected a member of the legislative assembly, shall sit or vote in the same while he remains under such disqualification. If any person by this chapter is made ineligible as a member of, or declared incapable of sitting or voting in the legislative assembly, sits or votes therein while he is so incapable or ineligible, he shall thereby forfeit the sum of $200 for every day on whch he so sits or votes.

How significant is it of the faithfulness of the Liberal party to the principles which they so loudly professed when in opposition, that they have appointed as their organizer in the province of New Brunswick, for the purpose of directing a campaign for the triumph of Liberal principles, Mr. A. B. Copp, who stands convicted by the public records of a violation of the statute law of the province with reference to the independence of parliament. Not only has Mr. Copp offended against the law in this regard, but so reckless has the administration of the government of New Brunswick become under the present Minister of Public Works that Mr. Copp's name has appeared year after year openly in the Auditor General's Report as receiving large retainers from the provincial government for professional services performed for that government. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter which not only I and other members from the province of New Brunswick have a right to protest against, but which ought to receive the condemnation of this House. It is bad enough for us in the province of New Brunswick to recall the fact that under the administration of my right hon. friend the cabinet representation which that province enjoyed in the past has been cut in half; that he has refused to move in the direction of securing, not only to New Brunswick but to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the constitutional guaranty to which we are undoubtedly entitled against any further diminution of our representation here; that the right hon. gentleman and his government have appointed to the Senate, as representatives in that body from New Brunswick, two gentlemen who are known to be citizens of other provinces and therefore not qualified under the British North America Act to sit for New Brunswick. These things are bad enough but we have now to contemplate the fact that this government is undertaking to control the provincial and local affairs of New Brunswick by means of federal patronage. That is something which I apprehend the people of that province will not stand for at this time. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to take advantage of my position as a member of this House to enter my strongest protest in behalf of those whom I have the honour to represent, against this vicious practice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend has travelled very far afield indeed to find a grievance against the Dominion government. He alleges that the federal government has promised two offices to two gentlemen in order to induce them to become candidates. The first allegation was with regard to Mr. Sears, who, he says, was promised the office of postmaster of the city of St. John if he would become a candidate. My hon. friend is taking altogether too seriously certain statements made in the press of St. John. I do not know the name of the newspaper, but the statement is altogether devoid of foundation.

Mr. CROCKET. Will the right hon. gentleman say that there is no intention whatever to appoint Mayor Sears to any office under this government?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So far as I know and am concerned there is none whatever, and I have something to say in these matters. So far as I am aware, no promise or intimation of any kind has been made to Mr. Sears. The hon. gentleman has also told us that another gentleman whose name I could not catch was promised the office of customs officer at Fredericton. To this also I give the most unqualified denial. I never heard of it until this moment and there is not a shadow of truth in the statement.

Mr. CROCKET. It is true, is it not, that Dr. Roddick, of St. John, was appointed to the position of quarantine officer?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps, I do not know.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, he was appointed on the recommendation of friends in St. John.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John City). It is singular that although that appointment is made by this government, the Prime Minister has no knowledge of it. I have never been in a cabinet and do not know whether that is the usual practice or not, but I should suppose that the First Minister would have some knowledge of what is going on in the various departments.

Mr. FIELDING. Does the hon. gentleman think that the First Minister should remember the name of every officer appointed throughout Canada?

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all. I think that the matter which has been brought before this House by my colleague from York (Mr. Crocket) is one of extreme importance to the political welfare of our people. We are having now in the province of New Brunswick a general election for the provincial legislature. Every one who has given any study to the subject must have come to the conclusion that we shall never get really good government in this country except when the government of the Dominion and the local governments are on different sides of politics. Possibly the reason may be that when thieves fall out honest men come by their own. Evidently there must be some reason of that kind, although I am not making that reference in any offensive spirit, but we have found that it was not until the province of Ontario changed its government that we had any sort of attempt to look into the bribery and corruption which had taken place before the change of government in that province. I do not believe there is any one in this House who will refuse to acknowledge that there would not have been any attempt made to ferret out the frauds which were carried on unless there had been a change of government. So that it is very important that the Dominion government should keep its hands off local affairs. The Dominion government and this parliament have plenty to do looking after their own business. It is a menace to the welfare of the people to have the Dominion government and parliament interfering in the local affairs of the various provinces. The right hon. gentleman has said that Mr. Sears has no promise of the office of postmaster of the city of St. John.

I do not know what Mr. Sears, when he reads that to-morrow, will think about it. I think he will probably look up the Minister of Public Works, who I understand is down there, and want to know on whose word he can rely. There is no doubt about it. It is on every tongue.

Mr. Sears himself makes no secret about it at all. He says that he did not want to go into local politics but that what he wanted was office. He said openly that office was what he was after. There was a good deal of difficulty in persuading Mr. Sear to go on the local ticket; so that, though technically the First Minister may be absolutely correct in the statement he made, yet, notwithstanding that statement, it is only reasonable to suppose that the Minister of Public Works and Mr. Sears have a very good understanding regarding what will take place after the election. My hon. friend from York mentioned the case of Mr. Copp. Mr. Copp was a member of the local legislature. He was employed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to undertake an investigation down there into the case of an official of that department. I notice that in the payments read out by my hon. friend, one includes so much for stenographer. It happened that I was near the place one day where the investigation was being held, and I went in and was present for a time during the proceedings. Mr. Copp had no stenographer. He took down—I was going to say he took down the evidence; he took down something, and after the examination of the witness was ended, the witness was asked to sign the paper without having had a single word of what was written thereon read over to him. This is the investigation for which Mr. Copp was paid $25 a day. I am not a lawyer, but I do not think it takes a lawyer to understand that to ask a man to sign a paper the contents of which he does not know, is not the way to conduct such an investigation. I am not saying that Mr. Copp put down anything he ought not to have put down; but to safeguard his own position, I think the least he could have done would be what is done by others in judicial or quasi-judicial position—read over the statement to the witness before asking him to sign.

And then, we have Mr. Hugh McLean. He is a candidate for this House in Sunbury and Queens. According to the press of New Brunswick, Mr. McLean is in a position to cause seven new post offices to be established in Sunbury and Queens within the last week or two. I do not know whether he had any authority from the Postmaster General to offer post offices there. It may be the post offices were needed, and if so I make no complaints at their being opened, and probably some of them should have been established before. But it would appear that it is only necessary for a federal candidate to come along at a time when a local election is on to have these post offices established for no other purpose, apparently, than to influence the voters in that constituency to vote for the parties supporting this government. Such things are certainly a public scandal. They lower our political institutions in the estimation of every right-thinking person. I think that the least that this government could do would be not to allow candidates such liberty of action as they appear to have in this case.

With regard to the appointment of Dr. Ruddick, every body knows that he was appointed quarantine officer in order to give an easy seat to Mr. Keown, now the Attorney General. And this is the way this federal government is bartering these offices in order to exert influence in provincial affairs as it is now doing in the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). I shall only attempt to answer the hon. gentlemen who have spoken as regards statements that they have made concerning the Post Office Department. Within the last three or four days—I will not say that three different insinuations have been made—but on three different occasions my attention has been called to certain allegations. The first was that I had allowed the postmaster at Woodstock to take part in the local campaign in New Brunswick. This afternoon I am told that a promise was made by the Postmaster General, or by this government, to Mr. Sears, one of the Liberal candidates in the city of St. John, that, if he would be a candidate, he might get the position of postmaster of that city. And I have just heard the statement of the hon. senior member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) that the Post Office Department had opened, within the last week or two, six or seven new offices. Does he state that these offices had been opened in one constituency? Or did he speak generally of the neighbourhood of St. John?

Mr. DANIEL. Not St. John, but Sunbury county.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Five or six in Sunbury county?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes—Sunbury and Queens.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand that these statements are based on newspaper reports. Now, as regards Mr. Sears. Surely as head of the Post Office Department, and in view of the importance of St. John, I should know, first, if there is a vacancy, and, second, if any promise has been made regarding that office. I can declare to my hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) that this is the first I have heard of any such promise having been made. As a matter of fact, Mr.

Sears has never written to the department, nor has the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) ever mentioned the matter to me. The name of Mr. Sears has never, directly or indirectly, been brought to my notice. And nobody has the promise for that office at present. That is all as regards Mr. Sears and the St. John post office—and I suppose my hon. friend will be satisfied with this candid declaration of mine.

As regards the opening of new post offices in Sunbury: It may be that a number of new post offices have been opened in the province of New Brunswick of late. One must expect that, in a province like New Brunswick, in the course of a month or three weeks, or even of a week, a number of new offices would be opened. I do not think that five or six different offices have been opened of late in one constituency. My hon. friend must know that the department has strictly followed certain rules in these matters. I have followed those rules since I took charge of the office, and the same rules were followed by my immediate predecessors, Mr. Aylesworth and Sir Wm. Mulock. These rules have to do with distance between post offices, the number of families interested, the necessity for the service, and so on. I declare most positively that I have not departed from those rules. And if five or six new post offices have been opened in the county of Sunbury, which I very much doubt unless my hon. friend says that it is so——

Mr. DANIEL. Seven was the number.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And I understand the statement is based on newspaper reports? My hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) has no knowledge about the matter ?

Mr. DANIEL. No.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The report for the opening of a new office must be initialled by me, and I declare that I have not initialled such reports as alleged since my return from Japan, which is two days over a month ago. And, if these offices were opened more than a month ago, it could hardly have been on account of the general elections in the provinces, for, I understand, the local legislature was dissolved only a few days ago.

My hon. friend for York (Mr. Crocket) was very keen the other day about the postmaster of Woodstock. In answer to a letter which he had written to me, I told the hon. gentleman that I had informed the postmaster for Woodstock of the statement which had been sent to me by the hon. member. I warned the postmaster of Woodstock that if that statement was true he should immediately cease taking part in politics, as that was the rule of the department. I have this afternoon received a letter in answer to my warning, and the postmaster, Mr. Smith, declares that it is entirely false; that he has never made a public speech in the town; that he does not intend to make any, and that probably some people were led into error because the Conservative candidate bears the same name as himself.

Mr. CROCKET. I inclosed in my letter to you a statement published in the Woodstock 'Press' that Mr. Smith, the postmaster at Woodstock, had attended a political rally in the Liberal committee rooms and addressed a meeting of party workers.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have the letter here, and if my hon. friend will read it privately he will be satisfied——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not care to read it, because there are harsh words against the other candidate. I will trust my hon. friend's honour. I will send the letter to him, and he will satisfy himself that Mr. Smith has not taken a part in the campaign, but that the Conservative candidate, Mr. Smith, has been making speeches, and probably the public has been led into error.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the Postmaster General think that the Woodstock 'Press' would mistake Frank L. Smith, the Conservative candidate, for Charles L. Smith, the postmaster at Woodstock ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Even the press may be led into error.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there any denial in the letter that he has attended and addressed a meeting in the committee rooms?

Mr. LEMIEUX. He says he has not taken part in politics and has not addressed a public meeting. Surely my hon. friend will not object to a postmaster attending a public meeting.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Did he attend a committee meeting?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, he does not mention it; but I think the gist of the statement was that Mr. Smith was taking an active part in the contest and making public speeches.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Addressing a committee meeting is pretty good party work.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If he only attended a meeting, I do not think we could object.

Mr. GEORGE W. FOWLER (Kings, N.B.). If the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) is so innocent as to be willing to accept the letter received from Mr. Smith as a denial of the charge made against him by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket), I can quite understand how his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, has been able to impose on him and make him think that no promise has been given to Mayor Seers in connection with the postmastership of St. John. He has not become acquainted with his colleague the Minister of Public Works, or he would not be willing to stand up and say that no promise by any member of the government has been extended to Mr. Sears. I do not think the Minister of Public Works will be particularly grateful to the Postmaster General for making this public statement, which will no doubt appear in the press of St. John and be read by Mr. Sears; because, knowing the Minister of Public Works as well as I do, I am satisfied he has already assured Mr. Sears that he will get the appointment of postmaster of St. John, that the matter has been already arranged with the government and only awaits the mere formality of an order in council. So far as the denial of Mr. Smith that he took part in the election now in progress——

Mr. CROCKET. The letter does not deny it.

Mr. FOWLER. The letter itself is not a denial of that, so far as the statement of the Postmaster General with respect to the contents of that letter goes. Mr. Smith says he has not addressed public meetings. The assertion quoted by my hon. friend from York, N.B., was simply that he had attended committee meetings of the party and addressed them. Does the Postmaster General say that is not a serious interference on the part of a federal official? Is that not a very active part? Is it not the sort of committee work that wins elections even more than speeches from the platform, even such eloquent speeches as are delivered by my hon. friend, that master of eloquence, the Postmaster General? The work in the committee room is of far more effect, so far as getting votes is concerned, than even his speeches could be. Therefore, if he is so anxious that the officials of his department should keep out of politics, he should certainly reprimand and severely discipline the postmaster of Woodstock. We have also had denials from the Prime Minister in respect to promises to persons engaged in these provincial contests. We would put more confidence in these denials if it were not for history. We have heard similar denials before. At the last provincial election in New Brunswick there was some difficulty in getting a candidate to oppose Mr. Hazen in Sunbury. The late Hon. Mr. Blair, then Minister of Railways, felt it his duty to go down and take a very active part in that election, just as his successor, the present Minister of Public Works, is doing to-day. Mr. Blair, in order to get a candidate in the county of Sunbury, went to an official, the inspector of fisheries for a portion of New Brunswick, a Mr. Henry Harrison, and made an arrangement with him whereby Mr. Harrison resigned his office of inspector of fisheries to accept the nomination for the local legislature in opposition to Mr. Hazen, and it was on the distinct understanding that if he were defeated he would be restored to his office at an increased salary. This charge was made publicly and absolutely denied. What were the facts? Mr. Harrison was badly defeated at the polls, and within a few weeks of his defeat he was restored to his office as inspector of fisheries, the office in the meantime having been kept open, and his salary was increased by $200 a year. If it were not for that, we might place a little more confidence in the statements that are made with respect to these gentlemen, Mr. Allan, the late claims agent of the Intercolonial, and Mr. Sears, the prospective postmaster of St. John and present candidate in that constituency.

The case of Mr. Copp, a member of the local legislature, has been spoken of. I would call attention to what has been done for another member of the local legislature of New Brunswick, a gentleman named Ryan, who represented Albert in the last legislature and is now a candidate in that county. Mr. Ryan is a farmer. He is so described in the 'Parliamentary Companion,' and I know of my own personal knowledge that that is his occupation; but Mr. Ryan figures very largely in the Auditor General's Report, not as selling farm produce to the government or to the Intercolonial Railway, but as selling lumber. I find from the Auditor General's Report that since 1903, the year in which Mr. Ryan was last elected to the local legislature in that province, he sold to the government, according to the Auditor General's Report, the following quantities of lumber and ties:

Year.	Lumber.	Ties.
1903	$ 2,499	397
1904	2,235	4,122
1905	21,048	4,353
1906	69,368	3,375
1907	2,803	2,096

Now, Sir, the Intercolonial Railway has an officer filling the position, created by this government, of purchasing agent. This gentleman was supposed to be appointed for the purpose of purchasing supplies for the Intercolonial Railway. The only justification there could possibly be for his appointment and for the salary and travelling expenses which he received was that the middleman should be entirely done away and that these supplies should be purchased by the purchasing agent. But, the supplies apparently were not purchased by the purchasing agent. Instead of the purchasing agent buying these supplies Mr. Ryan, member for the provincial parliament for Albert county goes to the mill and as a middleman buys this lumber. If this purchasing agent had done so he would have been justified in his position, he would have saved to the country the commission which went to Mr. Ryan and he would have paid for the salary and expenses which he received. But, not so. Mr. Ryan, being a farmer, not owning a mill, having no interest in a mill of any kind, during the past four or five years sells to the government $112,296 worth of lumber and ties as a middleman. Then we have the case mentioned by my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket) of Mr. Copp receiving $25 per day holding this inquiry into the case of Captain Pratt of the steamer 'Curlew.' one of the fishery protection fleet. I have not the slightest doubt, Sir, but what that investigation was not at all hurried, because never before in the history of Mr. Copp's professional career had he received so large an emolument for a day's service as $25 and therefore I can quite understand that the statement made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) would be absolutely correct that he dispensed with the services of a stenographer and took the notes in long hand in order that the time might be lengthened as greatly as possible. It seems to me that in view of these facts the members from New Brunswick are justified in thus making a protest against interference on the part of the federal government with local matters in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). Mr. Speaker, I just rise for the purpose of making one comment upon what appears to be the present policy of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) as compared with that which was carried on by his predecessor, Sir William Mulock. In the year 1896, after the election in the county which I have the honour to represent, there was a young man, a very active, intelligent, bright young man who was the postmaster in the village of Beamsville where one of the candidates resided. This young gentleman was naturally a Conservative in politics. He had been appointed, in succession to another gentleman who had resigned, by the Conservative government, and he had given ample and perfect satisfaction to the whole neighbourhood as postmaster. But he expressed the opinion after the votes were all cast in 1896, after the polling was all over and the result was known, that 'Gibson was in the soup.' That was the interference in politics that he was guilty of in that election. He was removed. I do not think for that reason really, but because they wanted to give the office to a man of their own stripe of politics. He was accused of having been a violent partisan and, having denied it, an investigation was granted and for several days—I think I am correct for saying a week—at all events for a great many days, this investigation was held in Beamsville at great expense to this country. Efforts were made to give evidence to prove the violent partisanship of this young man, and all they were able to prove against him—if it was anything against him at all—was that after the election was over he had expressed the opinion that 'Gibson was in the soup.' So he was removed as being a violent partisan and as having been guilty of an interference in politics by the then Postmaster General. The present Postmaster General has asked us to believe that, down in the province of New Brunswick, when a man goes to a committee meeting and does his best to assist in the workings of the party to accomplish a political result—not addressing a public meeting, not allowing Conservatives and Reformers alike in the community to hear manfully from him what his views are about the public issues of the day, but going behind the closed doors of a partisan committee and assisting them in every way he can to further the candidature of one man —he is not guilty of any undue interference in politics, while a poor young fellow, who is appointed by the Conservatives, is condemned and put out of his postmastership notwithstanding that he has given ample satisfaction to everybody in the neighbourhood and notwithstanding that old Liberal after old Liberal came to testify to that effect in that investigation. He was held to be a violent partisan, unfit to hold the position of postmaster, simply because he had expressed the opinion that one of the candidates was in the soup. I am obliged to mention that to the House to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General and the right hon. the Prime Minister to the fact that if they expect this country to take any stock whatever in their statements about where they do or do not interfere with their officers they must be more consistent than they have been as has been demonstrated here to-day.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to hear the whole speech—the very moderate and mild-mannered speech—of my hon. friend from Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler), but I heard a few words in which he made certain references to gentlemen in the province of New Brunswick to which I certainly must take exception. My hon. friend seems to be very much alarmed as to certain elections which are being carried on in the province of New Brunswick. I had supposed from an interview with the hon. gentleman which I read in one of the Montreal papers that the provincial elections in New Brunswick were entirely settled, that he had disposed of them, that he had been there, that he had fixed the matter and that it was only a question of the detail of recording the votes with the view of having a Conservative government established in the province of New Brunswick. However, he seems to be very much alarmed lest possibly his utterances may prove false. My hon. friend has referred to Mr. Copp. I can only say that Mr. Copp holds a position at the bar of New Brunswick quite up to the standard of my hon. friend, and he has always received fees quite as large as the hon. gentleman. When he suggests that Mr. Copp has not received a per diem allowance of $25 he is certainly speaking without the proof. Mr. Copp was eminently fitted to fill the position which he was asked to fill and which he very worthily did, and I think he received credit from all interested for doing his duty in a very fair and impartial manner. Mr. Ryan has been referred to. He is a candidate in the county of Albert, a part of the constituency represented by my hon. friend. Mr. Ryan, it is true, is regarded as a farmer, but for many years Mr. Ryan has engaged in general trading business. He has done so for the past fifteen years, and he is still engaged, as a part of his business, in trading. Mr. Ryan has enjoyed some business transactions with the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend, I know, is quite familiar with that. I think that my hon. friend, although he appears here in this parliament as a lawyer, has been engaged, as a sort of side show, I suppose, in certain lumbering operations for some time in the west and in New Brunswick, and perhaps he is familiar with a certain lumbering operation in the county of Albert, near the town of Salisbury, in the province of New Brunswick.

My hon. friend himself has perhaps in an indirect way supplied the Intercolonial with certain lumber; he may not have done so directly but indirectly I think he has. I want to say from personal knowledge, that whatever contracts Mr. Ryan has had with the Intercolonial they have always been based upon open tender and contract. My hon. friend knows this full well and, he knows that certain friends of his, a certain gentleman in the city of St. John who was largely interested with him in certain lumbering operations, has enjoyed through Mr. Ryan as a commission man, certain contracts with the Intercolonial. But, I am bound to say, Sir, that these contracts have always been let after public competition. And why is Mr. Ryan assailed ? He is a very honourable man ; he is engaged not merely in farming but in other business. Is it any discredit to a Canadian farmer that he should engage in other occupations ? My hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) is a lawyer but he is also a lumberman and a dealer in land and he has many side issues, and no one will say that because he is a lawyer he has no right to engage in these transactions. Surely Mr. Ryan is not to be reflected upon in any way because of the dealings he has had with the general public, for as I understand it, Mr. Ryan tenders and receives contracts from others than the Intercolonial Railway. He has for a number of years enjoyed the confidence of the people of the county of Albert, and I venture to think that after the polling on the 3rd of March it will be found he has retained that confidence by a very large majority. My hon. friend has referred to Mr. Edward Sears, of the city of St. John, and Mr. Sears is a man who also has enjoyed the confidence of his fellow citizens. It appears that his party requested him to represent them in the coming elections, and because of that fact and because he enjoys the confidence of the citizens, an attempt must be made to belittle him in this House. My hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Daniel) has had something to say on this question, but I fear that his tenure of office as representing St. John in this House will not perhaps be very long. But because Mr. Sears enjoys the confidence of the people and because nothing can be said against his character, my hon. friend rakes up a side issue and he says that Mr. Sears was promised some office if he would accept the candidature of his party. Surely it is an honour for any man to be called upon to represent the city of St. John in any capacity. Mr. Sears has been mayor of St. John and I have no doubt he would be elected again if he sought the office, but his friends think he should be in the legislature and they have invited him to be a candidate. I am sure that Mr. Sears is quite as independent a candidate as ever was my hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) in any of his elections. It seems to me that it is carrying things very far indeed if men are to be attacked in this parliament simply because they enjoy the confidence of their fellows and are asked to represent them in office. Then, again, Mr. Harrison has been referred to. I do not know any of the circumstances of that case, but I do know that Mr. Harrison belongs to one of the oldest and best families in the province of New Brunswick. I know that he enjoys the confidence of the people ; I know that he makes a most capable official, and I know that nothing can be said against him officially or personally or in any other respect. I rose simply to protest against this method of party warfare. In very many instances in late years this parliament has been dragged down by the method of warfare pursued, and it seems to me that there should be an end to this dragging into the mire the status of public men without any cause or excuse. Mr. Sears and Mr. Ryan hold equally as honourable a position as does my hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) in the province of New Brunswick, and they enjoy at least an equal extent with him, the confidence of the people of that province and the constituencies they represent. I enter my protest against this method of warfare. If my hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) is sure (as he has said he is to the Montreal newspapers) that the Conservatives will win in the province of New Brunswick, I think he might have spared the House this—for my hon. friend in comparison with some of his other utterances—very mild and moderate denunciation. But I think my hon. friend is not sure about the Conservatives winning ; I think perhaps he feels that even his own position is not secure and that while he may boast now, later on he will be in sackcloth and ashes.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). One main question in this matter is as to the policy of the government in interfering in provincial elections.

Mr. EMMERSON. Do you remember a provincial convention at Moncton ?

Mr. FOSTER. I remember most of these conventions; that was a very good one so far as I recollect. The Prime Minister did not have anything to say on that branch of the question. I wonder if he remembers the doctrines he used to preach in this House and outside this House with reference to interference in provincial elections by the federal authorities. I wonder if he has forgotten the preachings he drew in from Edward Blake and Alexander Mackenzie and the stalwart fathers of the Liberal party in the years between 1870 and 1890, and to which he gave willing and public adherence. The doctrine laid down by Edward Blake and Alexander Mackenzie, and by the Prime Minister himself in another period of his political history, was : That there ought to be an absolute division between federal and provincial politics and that the influence of the one should not be used in the other. I think my right hon. friend will not challenge that assertion of the old doctrine of the Liberal party, or rather the doctrine of the old Liberal party. But the doctrine of the new twentieth century Liberal party under the guidance of the right hon. gentleman seems to be absolutely and radically different. When not long ago a contest for life and death was on in the province of Ontario and when according to the doctrine of the old Liberal party, professed by the right hon. gentleman, he should have kept himself and his federal patronage and interference out of the contest, he remembers that in the city of Ottawa at a public meeting at which Mr. Ross, the then premier, laid his case before the electorate, the right hon. gentleman went out of his way to put his hand upon Mr. Ross's shoulder and say to the assembled electors not only of Ottawa but of the province of Ontario : Here is my right hand ; don't let that be shattered in the province of Ontario.

My right hon. friend's memory goes that far. It probably goes as far as the late British Columbia election, in which after colloguing with several others, he called down his High Commissioner of the Yukon, one of his adherents, dragged him off his throne in the lone white country to the north, and sent him as his direct emissary, with directions to slaughter Mr. McBride and the Liberal-Conservative government and party in that province, and stood behind him with federal patronage and federal influence. Maybe he does not forget that in order to strengthen the Liberal party in that fight against Mr. McBride, he went on to the bench, and picked off a gentleman to represent his party, that that gentleman took the nomination whilst he was still conducting cases in his court, that he was defeated, and that, although it was stoutly denied then, he had prospects in view if he was defeated. Then the prospects were realized, and Mr. Henderson to-day sits on the throne in the great white country to the north as Commissioner and Governer of the vast domain of the Yukon. My right hon. friend does not disremember that. Why, Sir, the whole policy to-day of my right hon. friend and the twentieth century Liberals is to interfere in every possible way, by hook or by crook, with offices, patronage, promises or anything at all that will enable their friends in a local contest to hold their own, and thereby add to the federal power in the particular province. That is the policy of my right hon. friend. Which policy does he believe in ? He stood up and preached the other policy with the straightest kind of a face and with the most honest expression of belief in it ; to-day he preaches an absolutely different doctrine, and defends it as right and just. Which principle represents my right hon. friend's convictions ? Has he any convictions on this matter at all, or was he on that side of the fence before because he thought it would be to his party advantage, and is he on this side of the fence now because he thinks it will be equally to his party advantage ? And yet there is no line more definite than the line which separates federal from provincial matters, in our constitution and in our practical politics. The right hon. gentleman has gone so far that he has made it absolutely impossible to carry on a provincial election without lining up his followers and warping provincial issues by introducing federal issues into provincial politics. The best argument in proof of that statement is that vacant chair on the other side of the House. Where is the Minister of Public Works to-day ? Parliament is in the midst of its heaviest and hardest work, and the Minister of Public Works is not here. Questions cannot be answered, business cannot be carried on, and the reason is that the Minister of Public Works is away, not on federal business, but because he has gone down to the province of New Brunswick to set aside local issues and to import into that contest all that federal patronage, federal promises and federal influence can do to strengthen the Liberal government and the Liberal party in that province. My right hon. friend's government saved that party once. At the last local election in the province of New Brunswick that party was as absolutely beaten as a party could be until the Hon. Mr. Blair appeared on the scene with federal patronage, and with plenty of resources for carrying on the election, and so saved the local government. I believe that the opinion of the people of New Brunswick to-day, if it could run current and have its effect, is absolutely opposed to the local government as it is at present constituted. It has been a long time in power. The Minister of Public Works said something the other day as to how he had left that province. We shall have occasion to see how he left it. But one word expresses it—that the province to-day, by the reckless management of the Minister of Public Works and his friends there, is practically on the verge of a precipice so far as its financial condition is concerned; largely because of the fanciful, not to say unworthy, uses of public money made by the present Minister of Public Works and his friends while they were in the government; and yet the people of New Brunswick cannot be allowed to discuss and settle that question for themselves. Perforce this government must go down into that province, and, by the exercise of federal patronage and influence, try to keep a government in power there which is for other purposes than the purposes for which a federal government and party exists in this Dominion.

Now, in reference to these examples which have been brought out. The right hon. gentleman says that so far as he is concerned, and he will have some say in the matter, no promise has been made to Mayor Sears that he shall have a postmastership in St. John or any other federal office if he be not successful in the local election. While on that point let me say one word in reference to a statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. There was no need at all of his coming with such funereal tones to the rescue of Messrs. Ryan and Sears. One would think he was on the outskirts of a graveyard listening to an elegy—not one so high-toned as Grey's, but something presaging political death and decay. No one attacked Mr. Ryan or Mr. Sears as gentlemen. No one attacked them for selling lumber or receiving a postmastership—laudable ambitions, and business, in both cases.

That is their right, if they can get it and are qualified for it. No man is raising a word against either of these gentlemen. But the indictment is against this government, against the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) and against the federal party which leads these gentlemen to suppose that they will be looked after. But, says my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I will have something to say in that. My right hon. friend is about three months behind the times. Does he not know that the Minister of Public Works has arranged all that? Is he not aware that in the city of St. John the Minister of Public Works has selected himself, or caused to be selected, a patronage committee, made up of the heelers of the party in that city, and has handed over into the hands of that committee all the appointments to federal office from that district. Is he not aware of that? That fact has been publicly advertised and publicly stated by the Minister of Public Works himself. Why, my right hon. friend will not have anything to say in the matter at all. It is the patronage committee down in St. Johns which will settle that question, and when that committee has decided the Minister of Public Works will have only to hand their recommendations to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), and the latter will have nothing to do but fill the bill and carry out what that committee and his colleague have recommended. How innocent must be the Postmaster General to think that he will have anything to say in the appointment. Let the patronage committee down in St. John act, let the Minister of Public Works sign their recommendation, let the name of Mayor Sears be given in as postmaster of the city of St. John, and if there be a vacancy I venture to say that the Postmaster General will not refuse to give it to him. No promise made—of course not. When Mr. Derbyshire, a member of the House of Commons, philanthropically if not patriotically, resigned his seat in favour of the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), and when the charge was made that Dan Derbyshire was to get a senatorship as the price of his resignation, we had that charge indignantly denied. All through the Liberal press we were told that nothing of the kind would happen, but just as Mr. Harrison got back into office with $200 of an increase, so did Mr. Derbyshire get the senatorship after he had made way for the Minister of Railways. Does anybody of common sense not know that that was a bargain made and carried out, signed, sealed and delivered. Why then this assumption of innocence? It is simply a sale of seats; it is a counter by which political results are made to turn to the advantage of my right hon. friend and his party. It is a fact that Mr. Harrison—a very good man; no need to quote the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) of all men as sponser to Harrison's good character—but the fact remains that Mr. Harrison entered the contest; that he did so under the promise that he would be put back into his office at an increase if he failed; that he failed to be elected and that he was reinstated at an increase. These things, my hon. friend must know, are done in a different way from the way they used to be. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) will soon have another Bill to put his name to. When the patronage committee gets ready in Toronto and selects a proper person to be postmaster of that city, that office, which has been held vacant for months and months, and which is one of the most important in Canada, will be filled. When the patronage committee sends in its recommendation and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) countersigns it, the Postmaster General will have nothing to do but fill the bill. How can he get out of it?

He has the appointment in his hands, but he knows, as well as he knows anything, that provided they name a suitable man he cannot object. The appointment lies in the hands of his colleagues from Ontario, and the very moment the patronage committee decides and the ministers from that province confirm that decision, my hon. friend has no reason for not making the appointment and he will make it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It must be a suitable person.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not stated that Mr. Sears is not a suitable person for the postmastership of St. John. Not at all. That is not the question, but the question is a bargain and sale and the interference of the federal government in local elections. There is the condition of things into which my right hon. friend, who stated on that broad ground that local and Dominion affairs should be kept absolutely apart in political contests, lands to-day. There we find him to-day, an advocate and prime mover in the most inveterate and determined interference of federal patronage in the different provincial elections. Look at the appointment of Leech. It is fortunate for the Finance Minister that we were not told, before we passed the seed grain vote, that Leech was to be the distributor. If we had, I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, it would have been a long while before that vote would have passed. The appointment of Leech is sufficient in itself to show that this vote is to be used for partisan purposes. Why, in the Northwest ask any sensible man you meet who is not a dyed in the wool partisan, ask many who are, and they will tell you that nine-tenths of the civil service there are simply partisans working for the party interests of the government. Do you know what a gentleman from the Northwest told me the other day, and he is not an adherent of either political party, so far as I know? He said that he drove out eight miles to send a telegram from the government telegraph office. It was during an election and the operator could not be found. The operator had not been in his office for eight days, and the telegram, therefore, was not sent. Nine-tenths of your land and Indian agents and other officials are partisans who are taught to do in the first place what will be for the benefit of the party and then, after the party has been served, they can make a feint of doing something in the interests of the country. This man Leech, so far as the records show, did a most infamous thing, and did it as a partisan for partisan purposes. I would not trust him, with that record against him, anywhere, and have no doubt he will act in the same way regarding the sale and purchase of seed grain and its distribution to the people of the Northwest.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). When one hears the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) declaim about bargain and sale in connection with local elections in the province of New Brunswick, one would scarcely believe that when, a few years ago, there was a government in New Brunswick which was not a party government, but composed of leading men, men of good standing at the bar and in business, some of whom were Liberals and others Conservatives, that happy condition which was acquiesced in by all parties, was put an end to by the efforts of this hon. gentleman who is now so outspoken in denouncing any federal interference in local affairs. In 1899 this hon. gentleman, who then represented a New Brunswick constituency in this House, but who to-day sits for the division of North Toronto, went down to Moncton and sent out a clarion call to the Conservatives of New Brunswick to gather together, in order to do what? In order to do away with this nefarious coalition system. He went down and called upon them, with the eloquence for which he is so famous, to forsake the provincial government of that day and come forward as one solid phalanx of Conservatives in the province of New Brunswick. That was his call. And who responded to it? That call was responded to by a large portion of the Conservative party of New Brunswick—what was left of it. Up to that time the hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) had been a subservient follower of the local government. He had sung the praises of the late lamented Hon. A. G. Blair, and had often sung the praises, in most dulcet tones, of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson), who was in the provincial government at that time. He had stumped the country calling upon his Conservative friends to vote for H. R. Emmerson as Minister of Public Works of New Brunswick. But his federal leader comes down from Ottawa and says: This must cease. And from that time, though elected as a supporter of the local government, he became an opponent and has so remained. These are the sins of which the hon. gentleman is guilty. These are the results of his call in the city of Moncton to line up according to party standards. What complaint can he make if party lines are drawn in the province of New Brunswick? But to-day his friends do not even dare to draw party lines; the present leader of the opposition in New Brunswick, though at that time persuaded to adopt the policy of the hon. member for North Toronto and run provincial elections on Dominion party lines, is now going up and down that province preaching from every platform that he is not the leader of the Liberal-Conservative opposition, but the leader of a coalition opposition, and claiming that Liberals as well as Conservatives should support him. And why? Because he knows that he has not a single chance on earth to win the elections in the province of New Brunswick as leader of a Liberal-Conservative party; that his sole and only chance of winning is to gain the support of some of the Liberals of that province.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the way Ross talked in Ontario, and see what became of him.

Mr. DYMENT. And so did Haultain.

Mr. LOGAN. My hon. friend from North Toronto, I hope, will not worry too much over this matter; for, if these horrible things are being done, if provincial elections are being run on federal lines, it is done under his own advice. I do not think these hon. gentlemen should refer in such strong terms to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley). That gentleman is largely interested in the province of New Brunswick as an elector of that province, and he has a perfect right to go to New Brunswick at the present time, just as the hon. member for North Toronto, as a resident of the province of New Brunswick, had in 1899—'What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.' The hon. Minister of Public Works ought to take part in the elections for New Brunswick, because he is interested in that province. Now, I notice these hon. gentlemen opposite are very bold and brave to-day. A lamented politician of New Brunswick, a personal friend of my own, speaking of a member of this House from that province, said: He is the bravest man in the world when he is in No. 6. This hon. gentleman, it appears, was fond of saying what he would do to Hon. Mr. Blair when he came to this House. But Mr. Blair did come to this House, and this man who had been so brave was as dumb as an oyster. Ever since the opening of this session my hon. friends opposite have had the Minister of Public Works in his place, one of the most constant attendants upon his duties in the House of Commons. These hon. gentlemen are very, very brave when the Minister of Public Works is seven or eight hundred miles away. But he has challenged them upon the public platform and in the public press to ask him certain questions and to do certain things, and they have never dared to open their mouths. If they want to attack the Minister of Public Works, if they want to ask him any question, if they wish to call him to account for any charges he has made, why do not they call upon him when he is present? Why do they wait until he is in the province of New Brunswick before they make these statements concerning him?

I am very sorry—speaking seriously, I am very sorry—to hear the statement made by an ex-Minister of Finance that financially the province of New Brunswick is on the verge of bankruptcy. Is my hon. friend, for the sake of a little party capital, for the sake of gaining a few votes, ready to let such a statement go to the bankers and financial men of this and other countries on his authority as an ex-Minister of Finance? I read the other day of a loan made by the young and brilliant premier of that province, Mr. Robinson; and I think I shall be borne out by financial authorities in this country when I say that it was a most excellent loan under the present condition of the financial markets of the world. The credit of the province of New Brunswick is as strong as that of any province in the Dominion of Canada, and very much stronger than that of some cities I could mention, which are represented here by members who sit on the other side of the House?

The Minister of Public Works did not leave the province of New Brunswick in disgrace. He did not leave it having been banished by the electors of that province. He left the province of New Brunswick when the people of the city of St. John, Liberals and Conservatives, followers of the hon. member for North Toronto, put their names to a paper asking him to be the representative in this House of the city of St. John. Then, and then only, did he come to this federal House. How did he leave the province of New Brunswick? I will tell the hon. gentleman; he left the province of New Brunswick through the door of a constituency which had been Conservative by a majority of 700 three years before, and had so completely changed its political attitude that these hon. gentlemen did not dare to put up a candidate against him. My hon. friend should not be jealous of the way the Minister of Public Works left the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. LEFURGEY. He wanted to come in 1896 as a Conservative.

Mr. LOGAN. I deny the charge, and I will give my reason. In 1896, while the Conservative party was in power, they held out all kinds of inducements to this same gentleman (Mr. Pugsley). But, notwithstanding that, he came out as an independent and ran against the government in the city of St. John. He did not wait until the government had changed. He came out upon a principle and won upon it; and stands to-day high in public regard. And the government he supports stands high in public esteem. And, when the time comes for the people of the province of New Brunswick to pronounce on Mr. Pugsley as federal leader of the party in that province, it will be seen that public opinion is as strong behind him in the federal House as it was in the local legislature.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.). This seems to be a New Brunswick day. It therefore becomes my duty, as a young member of this House, and as one who has recently entered the House as a representative of New Brunswick, to have a word to say concerning the politics of that province. I was amused to find the hon. member for North Toronto, who has left the province of New Brunswick, rising here to take an active part in the discussion of this question. I am sure that when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) left here to go to the province of New Brunswick he left this city to meet his friends. I do not know whether the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), if he were leaving this city to go back to New Brunswick, would meet as many friends as would the Minister of Public Works. I was also much amused at the remark of the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) that there is only one civil engineer in the province looking after the public works. Must we, to please our friends of the opposition, stop the public works in progress in the province of New Brunswick because a local election campaign is being conducted in that province? I can tell the hon. member for St. John and the hon. member for Kings and Albert that they may well be uneasy as to the result of the election in New Brunswick. In my constituency we had the pleasure of a visit from the leader of the local opposition, who at first came as an independent man, but who, on his last trip, was a pretty good Liberal. He tried to find among the ranks of the opposition suitable candidates, but when he found it impossible to place a single candidate in the field, he was satisfied to accept the Liberal candidates.

The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket) stated that the Hon. Mr. Costigan, when he was appointed senator, was not qualified for the position. I must say as a lawyer that he knows when a man has a residence, dwells in a certain place and pays taxes on his property, he has a place of residence and therefore was qualified to be appointed to the Senate.

Several hon. members have taken advantage of the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) to attack him. Every one of these gentlemen has had many opportunities in the past to say to his face whatever they may have to say against him. But to-day when he was called to New Brunswick on political, public or personal business, these attacks are made behind his back. In the good old days when the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was Minister of Finance and represented New Brunswick in the cabinet, he was called to New Brunswick on several occasions. Was he not called there for the very purpose he now says the Minister of Public Works has been called? Perhaps it will best please the hon. member (Mr. Foster) if I say he was called on private business. I can assure these hon. gentlemen that for all their statements of affairs in New Brunswick—and they have gone rather far—they do not know half of what is going on to-day. I can tell my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket) that in his own county each of the four opposition candidates in the field has been promised a position in the cabinet of Mr. Hazen, if he ever comes into power. That applies to other counties and apparently if the opposition come into power there will be as many portfolios as there are opposition candidates in the field to-day.

REPORTS FROM PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I wish to direct your attention to a resolution that I propose to move dealing with the treatment the opposition has been receiving at the hands of the government representatives in the Public Accounts Committee of this House. The resolution reads :

That all the words after the word 'that' be left out and the following substituted therefor:

The Committee on Public Accounts is constituted for the purpose of affording full and free examination and inquiry into the receipts and expenditures of public moneys and the circumstances in connection therewith.

That in the public interest the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by the committee.

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence, or restricting inquiry should be subject to appeal to this House and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

It is a well known fact and need not be debated that the Public Accounts Committee is constituted for the purpose of examining into the public transactions of the government. In my experience the right of the minority of that committee to appeal to the House of Commons was never refused until this government came into power. Speaking subject to correction, I would say it had never been refused ; that is my information and in the short time at my disposal to look into the question that has been the result of my investigation. It is well known that this government has given cause for a very great deal of special work by the Public Accounts Committee. In every department of this government there have been great increases of expenditure and wherever the people's interests are at stake we find the middle man who holds such a prominent place in the heart of this government standing between the rights of the people and the government of the day. For that reason it has been necessary for the Public Accounts Committee, since this government came into power, to make a very thorough examination of some departments of this government. Commencing with the House of Commons itself we find that when the Conservatives were in power the expense of the Speaker's department of this House under the Hon. Mr. Ouimet who was Speaker for nine months and twenty-eight days, were $1,175.23. When my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this government occupied the position of Speaker for three years, one month and five days, the expenses of the department had increased to $9,899.80. In every department of the government we find similar increases as compared with the expenditures under the preceding government.

I do not propose to enter fully into the particulars but I will say that we have had wonderful developments from the investigations in the Public Accounts Committee during the last two years. We remember that a gentleman who appeared before that committee last year said that he had been supplying this government with large quantities of goods. In the witness box he admitted that he came from Montreal on learning that Mr. Foster was proposing to examine into his accounts. As soon as he read this in a Montreal newspaper he hastened to Ottawa and to the department to which he was supplying goods, and returned his cheque for some $600 as overcharges. This case and many others might be cited and it is no wonder that the people of the country are expecting great things from the Public Accounts Committee. Therefore I say that full freedom of investigation should be given and whenever the minority have not received their full rights in the committee we have a right as a minority to appeal to the House in order that this House shall have an opportunity to give to us the rights that will enable us to properly investigate these enormous expenditures.

For instance in the Department of Marine and Fisheries we had an investigation last year into the transactions of a gentleman named Merwin who was supplying large quantities of goods to the government. He supplied 15 articles which he purchased at the price of $11,838.70 and he sold them to the government for $18,012.50, making a profit on these fifteen articles of $6,173.70. He purchased a Stuyvesant pumping engine from the manufacturer in the city of Montreal for $335 and, without touching that article at all, without having a dollar invested in any kind of business except that of a middleman, he put in his invoice to the Department of Marine and Fisheries for $960, putting $625 in his pocket and making a profit of 187 per cent. On these fifteen articles to which I have referred the profits they have made range all the way from 26 per cent to 187 per cent. Therefore, I say that when instances of this kind are disclosed by the public accounts, when these facts are presented to parliament and to the people of this country, it is time that the minority had a full and unrestricted opportunity of examining into these transactions that come before us from time to time. We had an examination going on with respect to the Militia Department. It is well known that a few friends of the government formed a company for the purpose of supplying goods to the Department of Militia. The friends of the government from the city of Toronto and elsewhere formed themselves into a company. They supplied to the Department of Militia and Defence——

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Excuse me one moment. The hon. gentleman is making a statement; I suppose he wants to be correct. Does the hon. gentleman say that the company to which he refers was composed of friends of the government?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he is entirely inaccurate.

Mr. J. D. REID. Explain.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Is Sir Adolphe Caron a friend of the government? I was not aware of it.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend, I think is a little hasty. May I suggest to him that Mr. Hartley Dewart, who is a Liberal candidate in the city of Toronto, is a member of that company? I did not wish to mention Mr. Dewart's name but if he has any complaint to make he must charge it to my hon. friend, I did not propose to mention any names. But what I say is this: that this company was formed and I repeat the statement, by friends, although possibly not all friends of the government.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend says 'hear, hear.' I did not make the statement that they were all friends.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes, you did.

Mr. BLAIN. If I did I did not so intend it. What I wish to say is that the majority of the members of this company were friends of the government.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I do not admit that.

Mr. BLAIN. Well I will not stop to debate that point now.

Mr. FOSTER. It is safe not to admit anything.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That is your rule.

Mr. BLAIN. This company were not in existence until they had received a contract to supply 250 sub-target guns to this government. They had their company formed and did they put their money into the manufacture of this article as men usually do in a private way? Not a bit of it. They went down to Sherbrooke in the province of Quebec and made arrangements with a manufacturer established there to manufacture 250 of these guns at $64 apiece and then they sold them to this government for $250 apiece, putting the difference in their pocket. Does my hon. friend deny that ?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. May I ask my hon. friend a question ? Does he know that his friend Mr. Whitney pays that same amount without question and thinks he has a good bargain ?

Mr. BLAIN. I will not enter into a discussion of the conduct of Mr. Whitney's government but I wish to say that there are no statements or charges of this kind made against Mr. Whitney's government in Ontario. Mr. Whitney's government conducts its business without middlemen standing between the people and the government.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Where was the middleman in this case ?

Mr. BLAIN. Now then, leaving that for a moment, I wish to turn my attention to the Railway Department. What do we find there ? When this government wished to purchase a piece of land in the city of Moncton did they send their officers down there to purchase that land as they should have done ? No, they engaged a middleman and Mr. Lodge stood between the people and the government. Mr. Lodge purchased land in the city of Moncton for $5,075, sold it to the government for $13,880 and put $8,805 in his pocket, or a profit of 167 per cent ? Does my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) not think that there is a sufficient number of officers in each of these departments to make purchases without engaging a middleman ? When this government requires land in the city of Moncton, upon what principle have they the right to engage a middleman to make this purchase and allow that middleman to put these enormous profits in his pockets ? Why do not the government go about it in a business way ? They prided themselves as being a business government some years ago ; I suppose that is not in their platform now. Why do not the government send their own officers to purchase property and pay the money direct from the treasury of the country to the man who sells the land ? That does not answer their policy, because this army of middlemen that is to be found in every branch of this government must be taken care of, and so Mr. Lodge falls in for the enormous profit of 167 per cent upon land that he has supplied to this government.

I wish for a moment to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to a branch of expenditure that I think, should and, I have no doubt, has received the special attention of my hon. friend. The Quebec Bridge Company was formed for the purpose of constructing a bridge across the St. Lawrence river at the city of Quebec. Were the middlemen to be found in that? Oh, yes. The government of Canada, up to the close of last session had supplied $6,678,200 for the construction of that bridge. This government had also given a subsidy to the company of $379,353. The province of Quebec had given a subsidy of $250,000 and the city of Quebec a subsidy of $300,000. Where do we find the company coming in ? They came in at the last with a contribution of $65,000 to carry on this enormous work. The middleman stands here between the people and the government and in the contract that is made between this government and the Quebec Bridge Company we find that the company's interests are protected. If this should be a splendid investment, if it should turn out to be a success in the future then this company will have the right to put the profits to their own account. But, if it should be found to be a failure as it develops and is in operation the company have the right to come to the government and ask for their money back with interest. Is that the kind of a contract that the people of this country would endorse if they understood it fully ? I do not think so. Surely the friends of the government organizing themselves into a company, making application to the government for money to construct the bridge, appealing to the province and city of Quebec and receiving these enormous amounts and then putting their own $65,000 into this company should not have the right to draw upon the future development of Canada for the profits that are likely to accrue from this large investment of money. I do not wish to follow into other departments. I could go on for some time and give to this House examples of where the middleman stands. Therefore I say, with these few matters before us, and with the other investigations and examinations into public documents that we have had in the Public Accounts Committee, when we were told in that committee that there shall be enforced there the doctrine which the Minister of Finance laid down in this House, namely, that the minority have only such rights as the majority are willing to give them ; I say when that doctrine is introduced into the Public Accounts Committee which above all others is the committee constituted to make searching examination into the expenditures of the country, we have a right to appeal to this House and to place before the people of Canada the fact that the policy of this government is secrecy on every hand, and that the policy of the opposition is that there shall be full and thorough investigation into the public expenses so that the people shall know where their money is going, and what kind of a government we have in power at the present time which would deny the people that right.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). If the intention of my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) who has moved this motion were to obtain an amendment to the rules which have prevailed in this House, and so far as I know in all British parliaments, he certainly could not have taken a more unfortunate mode of carrying out his intention than that which he has adopted. If it is the opinion of my hon. friend, and of his friends on the other side that the rules which have hitherto prevailed have become antiquated and no longer answer the purpose for which they were framed, there is a proper method to have them amended, but, I think hon. gentlemen opposite will agree, that to move an amendment on the motion for supply is hardly the correct method to pursue. In the first place, it is not possible to offer any amendment to the amendment to go into supply, and the scope of an inquiry into the rules of the House is therefore necessarily contracted. An amendment to the motion to go into supply is also considered as a want of confidence motion and although I do not press the point, I think it must appeal to the sense of fairness and justice possessed by gentlemen on both sides, that if we are to revise the rules of the House this is not a proper way of doing so. Yesterday the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) proposed an alteration to the rules of the House, and as my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) knows the House did not see fit to accede to that motion as the House believed that the rules which now exist are adequate and ample for all purposes. My hon. friend (Mr. Blain) has laid the foundation for his motion upon the statement that the Public Accounts Committee is the grand investigation committee into the expenditures of the government. That is a truism which nobody will dispute. But if I understood him aright he stated that the Committee on Public Accounts was so constituted now that the minority could not get the information to which they are entitled, and he proceeded to give example after example of what he called reckless expenditure in department after department of the government. So far as I know, and I think I am right, the knowledge he has of what he calls reckless expenditure has been obtained in that very Public Accounts Committee, and therefore his motion destroys at the outset the foundation upon which his argument is based. The hon. gentleman told us of a certain middleman who, as he said, came up to Ottawa and the moment he knew the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was to examine him he went back to the department and withdrew some cheques. Where did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) get this information? So far as I know he got it in the Public Accounts Committee and therefore it seems illogical, that on information he obtained in that committee he should base his charge that the committee restricts investigation. As to whether or not the proposition made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) is reasonable and fair, I ask the impartial consideration of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. The motion concludes in the following words:

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry should be the subject of appeal to this House, and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of the proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

So far as I know, and I do not think the fact will be disputed even by my hon. friend, the minority has ample means to protect itself in the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. FOSTER. How?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. By following the rules which have invariably been followed in the Public Accounts Committee. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Foster) is an old parliamentarian and he knows as well as I do that under the government of which he was a prominent member the opposition of the day had no difficulty in protecting itself in the Public Accounts Committee. He knows very well also that since there has been a change of government and since he has been sitting in opposition, the minority has ample means of protecting itself in the committee, and of asserting its views and of bringing them before the House. The books are full of examples. We have only to look at our own proceedings and we will find a very notable example some years ago when there was an inquiry ordered specially by this House into the Drummond County Railway; the minority and the majority divided, the majority came to certain conclusions, and the minority to other conclusions, and both views were presented to the House by the report of the committee and were the subject of a long discussion in the House. Again and again it will happen that there would be difference of opinion in the committees, but I am not aware that under any circumstances the minority has put a motion before the committee and that the ruling of the motion did not form part of the record presented to the House. Let me quote Bourinot on this very point.

In 1898 the minority report was regularly moved as an amendment to the draft report which was adopted and appears in the minutes of proceedings; the proper course under such circumstances.

That is to say, that if a minority report is presented to the committee it forms part of the proceedings and is reported to the House and upon it the House can pronounce.

Mr. SPROULE. If the majority of the committee will not allow a report at all, what are you to do?

Sir. WILFRID LAURIER. I am not aware that the committee can have any discretion on the point. All motions made in the committee are matters of record.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then if they are matters of record the will of the majority or the minority have nothing to do with it, but the record comes to this House and when the record comes to this House it comes with the proposition made by the minority and the proposition made by the majority, and the House is seized of it, and the House may adopt or reject.

Mr. SPROULE. Let me ask this question: In a dispute in the committee between the two parties in regard to the asking of questions to bring out information, suppose the government party instructs the witness not to answer, and there is an appeal to the Chair as to whether he is entitled to answer or not, and the Chair rules that he has no right to answer, and the minority appeals from the ruling of the Chair to the committee, and the majority of the committee vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair, what course can the minority take if they are not satisfied except to ask that the matter be reported to the House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It may be that the majority may vote that the matter be not reported to the House now, but a report from the committee must be made to the House when the case is concluded, and the majority cannot prevent the minority then bringing the matter before the House and the House taking cognizance of it.

Mr. SPROULE. How is the minority to get out the evidence?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The evidence will be got out in this way: If when the case has been concluded and the report has been made to the House, the House disagrees with the majority of the committee, the case is sent back for further investigation. My hon. friend knows that this is what has happened on many occasions. Let me again call the attention of my hon. friend to the motion :

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restraining inquiry should be the subject of appeal to this House——

So far there is no objection. In a committee of the House, as in the House itself, men will not always agree, and there is a method of disposing of this question under the rules which now prevail. But what will take place if this motion is adopted ? This is what will take place :

——and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

Upon request by whom ?

Mr. SPROULE. By the party who desires to appeal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. One man would have that power, even if all the other members of the committee were against him. The moment a man was not satisfied with the ruling of the Chair or the decision of the majority of the committee, he could say, I want these proceedings to be reported to the House, and forthwith the matter must come before the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Cannot one member do the same in this House? If he is not satisfied with the ruling of the Chair he can appeal to the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is the present rule, and the rule is the same in a committee—there is an appeal from the ruling of the Chair to the committee. But my hon. friend wants to go further than that; he wants to give the power to a single member of the committee, even though every other member should be against him, of immediately stopping the proceedings of the committee, to have the matter appealed to this House. It would be impossible to carry on the business of the committee if such a rule were adopted. Why should not the rule which has always prevailed continue to prevail? The majority gives its opinion, and for the time being the minority has to yield. It is not pleasant always to be in the minority; I know that as well as my hon. friend. It was my misfortune to be in the minority in this House for many years. But a minority has always a means of defending itself by having its view presented to the country; that is its remedy in our parliamentary system, and the majority cannot deprive it of that remedy. But it is proposed now to have all the wisdom of the ages set aside and to have a new rule under which the proceedings of a committee may be interrupted in order that a question may be sent to the House to be determined on. The rule which has always prevailed is that a certain time, when the business before the committee is concluded, the matter may be referred to the House. I do not know what particular matter my hon. friend who moved this resolution has in mind, but I am satisfied that the moment the inquiry by the committee is concluded, it is in the power of the minority to have the matter referred to the House. If the gentleman who has the matter in charge has not availed himself of the opportunity afforded to him in this respect, that is no reason why we should go back on the old rules of this House and introduce a new rule which would work as I have indicated.

Mr. SPROULE. Let me ask my right hon. friend what would happen if that were done. Suppose an inquiry were held by a committee, and towards the end of the session the committee reported to the House. There would be no time then for the matter to be sent back to the committee to be taken up again, and we would not get out the information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am afraid my hon. friend wants to have a grievance. We have been only six or eight weeks in session, and if we are going to continue until September or perhaps November, there will be ample time for the opposition to get all the information they want. I appeal to my hon. friend as an old parliamentarian who has followed the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee as closely as any other man, if not more closely. It is always open to the opposition to have brought before the House any matter that has been before the Public Accounts Committee, such as whether certain questions should be put to certain witnesses or not. I think it is sufficient to appeal to the sense of justice and fair play of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in saying that this motion cannot be allowed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). It is common knowledge to every member of the House that a minority in a committee cannot present a report. There can only be one report of a committee. The hon. gentleman may shake his head, but a moment's reflection will show him that he is absolutely wrong if he says the contrary. In the Drummond County Railway case what was done was this: The minority report did not come to this House as such, but as a part of the proceedings of the committee, the whole of which were reported to this House. Every one familiar with the proceedings of the committee knows that it can only make one report, and the minority report comes before this House simply as part of its proceedings.

We do not want in the Public Accounts Committee any departure whatever from the wisdom of centuries, but a strict adherence to that wisdom and practice. What has been the practice which has prevailed in that committee ever since I have been a member? Up to the present I do not know of one instance in which the minority of the committee had been refused an appeal to this House except upon this occasion. I am not proposing to discuss whether the majority of the committee be right or wrong. That is absolutely beside the question. What I am asking is that we affirm the principle enunciated by this resolution, namely, that the minority of the Committee on Public Accounts should have the right to appeal to this House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Has it been the practice of parliament in the past to take an appeal on a vote of a committee?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not propose to waste time by going through all those appeals, but I might give one instance. In the case of Merwin, where the majority of the committee refused——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. That was a case where the witness refused to answer a question.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If my hon. friend will be good enough not to take the floor while I am addressing the House, he will be giving better evidence of courtesy. In that Merwin case, when the minority in the committee asserted their right to an appeal and that appeal was granted, the immediate result was that the witness answered and no appeal was necessary. That is a very good illustration of the advantage to the minority in that committee of an appeal. Look for a moment at the essence of things in that committee. On that committee sit a majority of men not disposed to investigate the public expenditures or revenues. We know that. I am not saying that this is more the case now than formerly. It may be or it may not, and I am not affirming the one or the other. But it is the natural condition of that committee to have a number of gentlemen not very much disposed to probe into the expenditures of the government they are supporting. Therefore. the active and effective work must always be done, and always is done, by the minority. But the right hon. gentleman says: It is all well enough to have an appeal to this House, but that appeal can only come at the conclusion of all the proceedings, when the minority report comes up to this House among the other proceedings of the committee. Does my right hon. friend not understand that to take such a position would be destructive of any effective work by the minority? Suppose you have a witness who has to leave Canada next week, and whose testimony is most vital and important. Suppose the fate of the government and public interests as a whole should depend upon the question as to whether the examination of that witness is to be permitted. We say that the minority are at least entitled to the advantage of publicity with regard to the exclusion of that evidence, and therefore should be permitted, as a matter of course, to appeal to this House from the decision of the majority in that committee excluding that evidence. But the right hon. gentleman says: No, you must let the witness leave the country; you must let the critical moment pass, and then six or seven weeks later, when the proceedings are closed, you may bring that matter up in the House, and it may be argued out and discussed purely as an academical question, the opportunity for obtaining the witness having passed away. Does the right hon. gentleman not see the absurdity of such a contention? Does he not see that the public interests require that the minority in the committee shall have the right of appeal? He says that in that case one man alone might have it. Certainly, whether the minority be composed of one man, or two men, or ten men. The right of appeal has always been recognized until this session—the right to appeal to this House, and then, by the publicity thus given, to appeal from this House to the country. What public detriment can there be from such a course? The right hon. gentleman can easily see that if we observe the contrary rule, public interest will in all probability suffer. But what public interest can suffer by conceding to the minority in that committee the right to appeal to this House against the majority?

I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant by some of his remarks. He said that we were attempting to subvert the rules of this House and of that committee. We are subverting no rules of this House, but are simply asking that, in accordance with immemorial usage, the minority in that committee shall have the right to this House and have the particular question determined. That is all. The right hon. gentleman knows that, so far as the rules governing that committee are concerned, they depend infinitely more on unwritten custom and practice than on any written rule. A question has been raised as to the exclusion of certain evidence. The majority of the committee has taken the view that strict legal rules of evidence shall be applied. In my experience on that committee, I never saw that rule observed, but whether it is right or wrong does not concern the present question. The question is as to the undoubted right of the minority to come to this House and have full and free discussion. The right hon. gentleman must understand that publicity is the chief weapon of the minority when out-voted in the Public Accounts or any other committee. If you deny the minority the right to come to this House and have spread on 'Hansard' the arguments pro and con, you take away from them, not only an undoubted right, but a great safeguard of the public interests. On that committee the critics are always in a minority and that minority must have publicity as its chief weapon with which to guard itself against any tyrannical treatment which may be meted out by parliament. Under the circumstances the right hon. gentleman should accept the resolution. What is the resoultion that the hon. member for Peel has placed before the House?

> The Committee on Public Accounts is constituted for the purpose of affording full and free examination and inquiry into the receipts and expenditures of public moneys and the circumstances connected therewith.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) finds no fault with that. We are all agreed on this point:

> That in the public interest the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by that committee.

The right hon. gentleman, if I correctly understand, finds no fault with that. But he criticises the concluding clause, which is as follows:—

> That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry should be subject to appeal to this House, and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of the proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

What detriment can be caused to the public interest by adopting that principle? The right hon. gentleman asks: Upon whose request is this appeal to be made? Upon the request of the men who are pursuing the inquiry in that committee and desire opportunity to make known any facts that they deem in the public interest. The debate in this House, after the report is made, depends upon the action of the member who moved for the appeal and who has the right to debate it on this floor. Under the circumstances, the government, in refusing the affirmation of this principle, is departing from a usage of the past, putting aside necessary safeguards and acting against the public interest.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, reading the extended accounts published in the daily press of the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee, I cannot but feel that no committee is today attracting as much attention as that committee. The reason for this is obvious. In the first place that committee has to deal with the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars, a great portion of which is alleged to be expended not only improperly but dishonestly. There is no use in mincing words, most of the examinations conducted in that committee are not along the lines of improper expenditures but of dishonest expenditures. It is in the interest not only of the public but of the government that these expenditures should be fully and fairly inquired into. The average citizen of Canada would imagine that when gentlemen representing both parties are gathered together in a committee of this kind for the purpose of such investigation their paramount object would be to see that the expenditure of the money of the Dominion is honest and above board. That, Sir, is a delusion and that delusion would be dispelled in the mind of any gentleman, not a member of this House, who visited that committee. Instead of its being an honest attempt on the part of both sides to unearth wrong-doing and bring it to the light there has always been on the part of some members of the committee a studied effort to suppress the truth. It is all very well to make such an accusation as that but it may be said to be more difficult to prove it; I shall cite one case in order to prove it, that is the case of the Collingwood Dry Dock Company. In a few words the particulars of the case were these. Under an Act of Parliament, persons constructing dry docks in Canada were entitled to a bounty of three per cent on the amount of their investment for 20 years. An official of the Public Works Department, Louis Coste, was assigned by this department to make an estimate of the value of the Collingwood dry dock; on that estimate the company were to receive a subsidy. This engineer who was engaged at a large salaray, I think $3,000 per annum, appeared before the Public Accounts Committee as a witness, and it will surely startle the public to know that he actually confessed under oath, and it was proved up to the hilt, that he occupied the dual position of being an employee of the company and also a servant of the people of Canada. His own evidence proved that Mr. Coste in the course of his duties as an engineer of the department had to go back and forth to the town of Collingwood in connection with certain harbour improvements; that he met a gentleman named Long, connected with the dry dock; that Long interviewed him to get information from him as to his ideas as an engineer upon the dry dock, and it was admitted in the committee that on one occasion Mr. Long offered him $100. That meant that Long did not think he was there in his private capacity as an engineer but he simply considered that he was doing something, to use slang expression, 'on the side' and for that reason he offered him $100. What did Coste do? With a full knowledge of the fact that the day would come in all probability when he would be called on to value this dock for the purpose of granting a bonus to the company, he declined the $100. From time to time while there Mr. Coste inspected this dock, he also prepared certain plans of the dock and when it came to a settlement he was not prepared to accept any $100 as was proffered by Mr. Long, but according to his own sworn testimony, he demanded and received $2,000 in cash and $2,000 in stock of the company. In order to gain, as the company evidently desired to obtain from him, an estimate of $500,000 as the value of the dock which would insure them a bonus of $300,000. Mr. Coste did certain acts that I will have to refer to, which should have been the subject of a full and thorough investigation by this committee, but which were not fully investigated.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. The hon. member is going into the matter of the inquiry into the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company.

Mr. BENNETT.

That inquiry was not completed last session and was never reported to this House by that committee.

Mr. BENNETT. Is this a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I wish before taking the point of order, to say that the matter of the Collingwood dry dock was a matter of inquiry before the Public Accounts Committee last year. During the last sittings of the committee it was agreed that other witnesses might be called at this present session and so far as I remember that evidence was not reported to the House. It is true the evidence was printed from day to day and that it now appears in book form, but I think it was not reported to the House. My point of order is that the hon. gentleman has no right to discuss the matter of the Collingwood dry dock because the investigation has not yet been completed and the result submitted to the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it to be said that the House of Commons will be estopped from doing its duty or referring to what took place in a committee that never reported? We frequently have committees that do not report, committees that have done work sessions before; and I think I am within the judgment of the House and the memory of many members in saying that we have never been denied the right to refer to what took place in these committees because these committees might never report.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think the point of order is well taken, because it is a well established rule that it is not permitted to refer in a debate to something that has been before any committee unless there is a report of that committee before the House. Suppose proceedings had been taken last session before a committee but that a report of those proceedings had not been made.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the minister say there is no report?

Mr. BRODEUR. I say if there has been a report; if there has been it is all right.

Mr. BENNETT. There has been.

Mr. BRODEUR: But if there is no report I claim that it is not.

Mr. J. D. REID. There has been a printed report of all the proceedings in so far as this matter is concerned. That report has been distributed to every member of the House.

Mr. BRODEUR. Has there been any report of the proceedings of the committee before the House? I maintain that if there has been no report of the proceedings of this committee no reference must be made to these proceedings.

Mr. J. D. REID. I claim that the report is before every member of the House because the proceedings were ordered to be printed and distributed among the members and therefore every member has these proceedings before him at the present time.

Mr. BRODEUR. But they have to be reported to the House by the committee.

Mr. J. D. REID. That may be a technical point, but I claim the proceedings of the committee are before every member of this House at the present time. They have been distributed and we are entitled to discuss them.

Mr. BENNETT. I think that if the hon. gentleman will hunt up the Votes and Proceedings he will find that they have been reported. I am surprised that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) should come to the rescue. He will have troubles enough of his own to attend to.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule, of course, is perfectly plain, that if a committee has not reported it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in the House. There seems to be a dispute as to whether the committee has reported or not. At the moment I cannot determine that.

Mr. BOYCE. I would remind the House that no hon. gentleman has suggested that the evidence has not been reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member who took the point of order raised the point expressly on the ground that the proceedings of the committee had not yet been reported to the House.

Mr. BOYCE. He did not say it.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is a question that I cannot determine offhand.

Mr. BENNETT. There will be Public Accounts to be discussed in this committee during the next several months that this House will be in session and among these will be the accounts of the Public Works Department. It will require a considerable amount of time to deal with the Department of Marine and Fisheries and I will promise the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that due attention will also be given to that department by the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. BRODEUR. I will be very glad.

Mr. BENNETT. The minister will not be so glad perhaps before he is through. As a matter of fact I think that the report of the case was made to the House; I am too much occupied at the present time to hunt it up, but I would suggest to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) that he look it up and if I am wrong I will desist. But, in the meantime I am pretty certain that the case was reported by the committee to the House. What was the proceeding in that case? Here was an employee of the government paid a large salary admitting under oath.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I do not wish to interrupt the discussion and I would have no very great objection to it myself were it not that it is so unfair, I undertake to say that there was no report made to this House last session. I would be very much surprised if I were shown to be mistaken. It was generally understood last session that the hon. gentleman from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) had abandoned his investigation because every allegation made by him had been disproved.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The position at the present is that the hon. member who has raised the point makes the statement that there was no report. I have not time to verify that at present, but in the meantime in default of something being shown to the contrary, I will have to assume that it is so and unquestionably, until the report has been presented, there can be no discussion of the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT. Since I am debarred on the present occasion I will refer to it at greater length when the estimates of the Department of Public Works come up. I think the House and the people of the country will well understand now the tactics that are being indulged in by the supporters of this government and by some of the ministers—I am glad to say not all of the ministers because there are some ministers who are not so shamefaced. They will not look at everything with partisan eyes and they are rather desirous of cleaning out the bad element from the party than retaining it. I was glad that there was no remonstrance from two of the senior members of the government against a full and fair discussion of charges against departments in regard to which we have sworn evidence printed in the reports. I am here to make this statement that the contents of this report will go out before the public——

Mr. FOSTER. Have gone.

Mr. BENNETT. Have gone before the public and they are well known in the riding and the surrounding ridings.

Mr. SPEAKER. I find that there was a report.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER (reading):

Mr. Geoffrion, from the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented the nineteenth report of the said committee, which is as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration the accounts, vouchers and other papers relating to a payment of $30,000 to the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, in connection with subsidy to the Collingwood dry dock, as set out at page V—246 of the Report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, and in connection therewith have examined witnesses under oath, and for the information of the House report herewith the evidence given to date by such witnesses and the exhibits filed during the said examination; and your committee recommend that the same be printed, and rule 72 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) owes an apology to the House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. In view of the report I must certainly admit that I was mistaken, but nevertheless I am very strongly of the opinion that the report was against the common understanding of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT. I will endeavour to resume although I was rather broken off in the line of argument that I intended to pursue for a few minutes. But, it is well that the country should know what the facts are. What are the facts in this case? There never was a case approached in the Public Accounts Committee with more hostility than was this case. Day in and day out these hon. gentlemen were there in number. Why should they not be there ? They were there because they knew that the case was of such a nature that they must endeavour to drive out what was bound to transpire by a perusal of the documents, or such of them as had not been burned, and that was the truth.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman must be careful not to impute motives to members of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not suggest that members of the committee burned them. They were very closely watched.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member, I think, did make reference to members of the committee. I so understood him.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not mean to suggest that the members of the committee burned them. What happened ? Here was a company with a large capital. Here was a company which was alleged to be spending hundreds of thousands of dollars. Will it be believed that that company came down and tried to buttress up and strengthen their position as to the way in which they had obtained this large subvention that they knew had been a subject of discussion from one end of this country to the other. The startling statement was made to the committee and the House that the books upon which they hoped to base their statement that they had expended half a million dollars had been burnt in an accident. Well, that is all very well, Mr. Speaker. That went for so much. But there was in that statement something which should have attracted the attention of every member of that committee. What else transpired ? Mr. Coste was placed on the stand and he admitted that not only had he received $4,000 of the stock of that company for services performed by him but he had actually been appointed a director of the company. Now nobody ever entertained the belief——

Mr. PARDEE. Did not Mr. Coste say $2,500 ?

Mr. LENNOX. He said $3,500.

Mr. GERMAN. He would have taken $5,500 if he had got it—a tory.

Mr. BENNETT. At page 58 of the report of the evidence taken before the Public Accounts Committee will be found this :

> Q. Now, how did they pay you that?—A. They paid me $2,000 in cash and they gave me $2,000 in stock, common stock.

That is what I said that he received—$4,000. That is his sworn testimony. Now, what happened after that ? Mr. Coste was next in order promoted to the directorate of this company. But, Sir, here is one of the main points of that whole case. There was standing to the credit of one gentleman on the stock list of that company large blocks of stock in trust, and I believe now that certain members of this House, and I have always been advised that a member of this House if not more than one member of this House, had certain holdings of that stock and that Mr. Coste had too.

Mr. GERMAN. Will the hon. gentleman state who they were ?

Mr. BENNETT. It was not the hon. gentleman ; he was not in it.

Mr. GERMAN. Who were they ?

Mr. BENNETT. Why, Sir, when we endeavoured to bring it out the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) was one of the first men to protest against it.

Mr. GERMAN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I never protested against any investigation in regard to Mr. Coste or Thomas Long, who are both Tory supporters of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BENNETT. If I had time to read this report through it would be found that in the forefront of the fight there was no greater blocker than the hon. member for Welland, and I commend him to read that report when he has more leisure than now and is perhaps in a better frame of mind. We endeavoured to direct the whole of our inquiry as to who the holders were of this trust stock but that was objected to, overruled, and out-voted. But we came to a most crucial point in the case after that. We had information from certain gentlemen who are directors in that company ; men who had put their hard cash into the company, men who stood to lose their cash in that company by reason of manipulation and schemes that had gone on in the company, and these men were supplying us with information and we were directing our inquiries along that course. Now what happened ? We were informed that Mr. Hyman, owing to the fact that representations had been made to him by prominent Liberals, was unwilling to accept the valuation that was being put on by Mr. Coste, and if hon. gentlemen will consult the evidence on that point it may be found in the report that Mr. Coste states himself that Mr. Hyman would not agree to accept the report that he, Coste, had made. Why ? Because he had been informed by certain men that there was fraud and evidence of fraud in connection with it. Nay more, and the evidence bears it out, for two years that subvention was held up ; for two years the Department of Public Works would not pay it over and in the meantime what was the pressure that was brought to bear. I am sorry two gentlemen are not in their places in the House to-night, but I cannot be responsible for their not being here. There was the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I make this statement and make it on the authority of a stockholder who saw the bills, that in one year the law firm of which he is a member received $8,000 in cash for fees out of this concern. And there was a letter on the file written by that hon. gentleman——

Mr. GERMAN. Did they not earn it ?

Mr. BENNETT. Well, some of the stockholders did not think so ; the ones who gave us the information. And the hon. member for Algoma East ; the firm of which he is connected had a holding of $50,000 of stock in that company and it was life and death to the company that they should get the subvention of $300,000 in cash. Hanging up in the balance was $300,000 in cash, to be given how? Upon the say of Mr. Coste. Now, how did the company expect to get that and what did Mr. Coste expect to get before he gave that certificate ? I will tell you what Mr. Coste expected to get. As I am informed and believe Mr. Coste expected to get $15,000 from that company before he would made his report, and we knew that a letter was written by Mr. Coste demanding from this company the sum of $15,000 before he would make a report that would drive the people of Canada into paying this company $300,000. Now if that was true that Coste had written this letter demanding (blackmailing or whatever you like to call it) of this company the sum of $15,000, was it not in the interest of the people of Canada that it should be known. What happened in the committee ? My hon. friend from Lunenburg and all the gentlemen were on hand on that occasion. And, Sir, that was the strongest part of the whole case and that is when their objections came thicker and faster than at any other time. At page 249 will be found the evidence, and although I have not seen the letter I know men who have seen the letter, and if the letter has not been destroyed very recently it was in existence only a little time ago. And I know more than that, I know where there is a photograph copy of the letter to-day that was written by Mr. Louis Coste. My friend from Welland says Mr. Coste is a Tory, but I notice the hon. member for Welland who has great works going on at Port Colborne has not moved to have that gentleman removed away from these works.

Mr. GERMAN. I certainly have and I tried to do it and I could not do it. I wish I could. He would not be there an hour if I had my way.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, hear the hon. member for Welland, this power behind the Throne ; this gentleman who can with a snap of his fingers step into a cabinet position any day he likes, hear this gentleman standing up and telling us that for upwards of ten years he has been striving to have Coste removed from certain public works on which millions of dollars have been expended in his riding and he is utterly unable to do it. Well, I do not think the hon. member for Welland has been trying his best. Now, Sir, to resume ; we came to a crucial point in that examination. We brought here as a witness a gentleman named Mr. Calderwood who had been manager of this company and had been the trusted confidant of all the shareholders, a man who saw the letter and had had it in his own hands and had had it handed to him by the director in charge when he said: What are we to do with this fellow Coste? This gentleman, Mr. Calderwood, was in the witness box, honest and straightforward, quite willing to testify and he could have told the story. Talk about quills standing up on the fretful porcupine, but we would have seen some quills stand upon the head of some gentlemen had Mr. Calderwood been allowed to tell all he knew. Mr. Calderwood was willing to give his evidence fairly and above board, and nobody could say otherwise, and I assert that Mr. Calderwood had seen that letter and knew the contents of it and that it was shown to him by the directors when this attempt was made to drag $15,000 out of their pockets before the report would be made by Mr. Coste which would entitle this company to the sum of $300,000. Let us go to the evidence of Mr. Colderwood at page 249:

Mr. LENNOX. I want to ask two or three questions. Have you got in your possession a letter from Mr. Coste, making a demand of three per cent on a half million dollars; that would be $15,000?—A. I have not.

Q. Have you a letter making a demand at all?—A. I have not.

Q. Have you ever had a letter of that kind? A. I do not think it is necessary to answer that question.

Q. Well, I think it is?—A. Well, I appeal to the chairman.

And the chairman said :

You are not obliged to say it.

That was the impartial judgment of the hon. member for Verchères who was chairman of that committee. The witness himself, mind you, did not say he would refuse to answer the question and the hon. member for Verchères interposed and said he was not obliged to. And then Mr. Lennox said : Why not ? and the chairman of the committee said : Because it is a personal affair between them. And that shows the limited vision of the hon. member of Verchères. Here was a company trying to get a sum of $300,000 ; here was an engineer of the department upon whose say it was a question whether they would or would not get that money or would get a smaller sum ; here was this same engineer making a demand from the company of $15,000 before he would give his report, and that grave and impartial chairman of the committee says : That is not a question in the interests of the people of this country at all. Then Mr. Lennox renewed his question :

Q. Have you ever had a letter from Mr. Coste making a demand of three per cent on $500,000 on the company?—A. I never have.

That was true ; he never had the letter ; it had been in the possession of the company.

Q. Have you ever had a letter from Mr. Coste making any demand upon the company? —A. I don't think it is a question that should be brought up here. I don't care about answering it unless I am compelled to by the chairman.

Mr. LENNOX. I an instructed you had. I am asking you if you had a letter from Mr. Coste making a demand on the company for money?—A. I have already said that I do not care to answer that question unless I am compelled.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not ready to direct the witness to answer that question. I rule that it is not relevant to this investigation.

By Mr. LENNOX Q. Now I want to go a little further than that, I will come back to that after I have cleared the ground a little. Mr. Calderwood, you probably know that Mr. Coste was settled with for a bill of $3,500?—A. I do not know.

Q. I am not speaking of that $3,500, that is what I want to call your attention to, that $3,500 which he put forward as a legitimate fee. I am speaking of a demand outside of that. Now, I ask you outside of that $3,500—you do not know anything about the $3,500?—A. That is correct—I beg pardon.

Q. About that $3,500 claim for professional services?—A. I do not know anything about that.

Q. I am not speaking about that. I am asking you, outside of that, did he write a letter making a demand upon the company for money?—A. I have already refused to answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the same ruling.

Mr. LENNOX. I will appeal from that ruling.

Now, what were we face to face with? We were face to face with a chairman whose idea of what was the duty of a government official was very different, I think, from that of most hon. gentlemen in this House apart from partisanship. This chairman thought it was perfectly right for the government of Canada to be paying a man $3,000 a year to act on their behalf in giving a fair and honest valuation of property on which they were to pay a subvention of $300,000, while at the same time this official was the recipient of a large grant of money from that company. One would be charitable enough to believe that my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and certain other hon. gentlemen on that committee would have seen the matter clearly, and would have said : Here is a case for honest investigation ; if we have an engineer to whom we are paying $3,000 a year and who is at the same time making a demand for $15,000 from this company so that the company may take from the pockets of the people of Canada $300,000, we are going to find out what sort of man he is, and let that question be answered. Well, what happened?

Mr. LENNOX. I will appeal from that ruling.

Question put and ruling of the chair sustained: Yeas, 13; nays, 5.

Mr. LENNOX. I move that this evening's proceedings and the evidence and the votes be forthwith reported to the House.

Question put; motion lost: Yeas, 5, nays, 13.

Now, I do not object to the hon. gentlemen voting for the last motion, that the whole affair should not have been reported to the House, because I should have thought that they would have been heartily ashamed of themselves for taking that action, and would not want it to see the light of day.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who were the voters?

Mr. BENNETT. Unfortunately, the names are not given here ; but I suppose they can be found in the records of the committee. Is not this a pretty state of things? Here were gentlemen sitting on that committee so politically blind that they could not see anything wrong in a man occupying the dual position of acting for the company and at the same time acting for the people of Canada. What is the use of appealing to a committee constituted like that? And so, perforce, we wanted to go outside of the committee and have the whole matter brought before the House, so that the discussion would be reported and find its way into 'Hansard,' and the members of this House would be ranged up and put on record on that question. If that had been done, though the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite are pretty solid most of the time, I believe that some of them would have said: We do not propose to vote to sustain that man in that position and pay $300,000 of the money of the people of Canada, after what the evidence has disclosed. So the thing was chopped down and killed in its infancy in the committee—and, as my hon. friend suggests, in its infamy, too. Now, the first two clauses of this resolution are not opposed, but the last clause is, I understand, opposed by the premier :

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry should be subject to appeal to this House, and upon request for that purpose, the necessary report of the proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

Now, I appeal to any fair-minded man whether that was not a case in which we ought to have been permitted to appeal to this House, and especially whether that question should not have been answered by Mr. Calderwood. I think it should, and that is all we are asking in this resolution. So far as the Public Accounts Committee is concerned, I can only say that in an experience of seeing witnesses examined in court rooms in the last twenty odd years, I have never seen more perjury or more flagrant perjury committed than I have seen in the Public Accounts Committee, and I make that statement without any reservation. So far as I am concerned, I would just as soon, for the sake of decency, that the witnesses were not called to the Book at all, but were allowed to make their statements not under oath. It has simply got to be a travesty and burlesque, and it would be better simply to rely on the daily accumulating evidences of deceit, fraud and dissimulation practised on the people of this country, by which a crowd, particularly that crowd of hungry hangers-on who have been driven out of the province of Ontario by the indignation of the people, are now festering on the government of the Dominion ; and this government will go down with that festering crowd hanging to them, just as the Ross government went down a few years ago. I had a good deal to say against the Ross government, but I have this to say, that the Ross government was as clear as the driven snow compared with the government of Canada as it is composed to-day.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland). Mr. Speaker, of course, we never take the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) seriously. He always says a lot of things that he does not believe, and he says a great many that he does not know much about. My experience has been that in so far as the Liberal government has ever got into difficulty at all, it has done so by reason of having Tories in its employ. Mr. Coste was an employee of the Conservative government for a great many years as chief engineer of the Public Works Department, and was continued in that position under the Liberal government—whether rightly or wrongly, I am not prepared to say. I know Mr. Coste very well, and I do not think he would do anything dishonest. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has made a charge against him which I do not think is borne out by the facts, even though Mr. Coste be a Conservative. Mr. Coste made a report on the value of the property which the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company own, and on that valuation the government paid the bonus which, under the law then existing, the company were entitled to receive. Mr. Coste made his valuation, and his evidence was before the committee and is before the House. He may have been wrong. I am not prepared to say whether he was right or wrong. I think myself that he perhaps valued the property to its full extent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN. I am quite willing to admit that he probably valued it to the full extent, but will hon. gentlemen opposite object to a valuation put on a public property by a gentleman who had been in their own employ twenty years or more ? Was not the then Minister of Public Works, Mr. Hyman, fairly and honestly entitled to rely on that estimated value? Mr. Hyman sent Mr. Coste to make a valuation of the property, and Mr. Coste, who had been the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works for years under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, went up and made his investigation and reported to Mr. Hyman. Was Mr. Hyman not entitled to accept that report as a fair and honest one? It may not have been honest, and I would not be surprised if it were not, because the Tories do a lot of things which are not honest—not in a financial way, but politically. I say that Mr. Hyman, the Minister of Public Works at that time, was fairly entitled to accept the report of Mr. Coste as a fair valuation on which the bonus should be paid, and I defy any of the hon. gentlemen opposite to controvert that proposition. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is a monomaniac on the question of graft; he thinks that everybody who has dealing with the government in any public contract or matter at all is in it for graft He may have been in for it himself.

Mr. BENNETT. I never was disqualified like the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GERMAN. I was disqualified for carrying out a promise to a man to whom I promised a job, and I am absolutely certain that my hon. friend will never be disqualified for carrying out a promise. I shall not detain the House further. Mr. Coste, having been engineer of the Public Works Department for years, the ex-Minister of Public Works, Mr. Hyman, was perfectly justified in relying on his report.

Mr. J. D. REID. What has that to do with his refusing to answer the question?

Mr. GERMAN. I have always thought it was foolish for anybody to refuse to answer a question in the Public Accounts Committee or any other committee. I am quite prepared to agree with my hon. friend from Grenville that every question should be answered, and that whenever you try to prevent a question being answered you get into greater difficulty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GERMAN. I am quite prepared to agree to that.

Mr. J. D. REID. Why did the hon. gentleman vote with that 13?

Mr. GERMAN. I did not vote with any 13. I may have voted with 12. The resolution before the House proposes that the minority should report to this House. Well, the minority can report to this House. I venture to say that the leader of the opposition will not deny that it is possible for the minority in any committee to report to this House.

Mr. SPROULE. How?

Mr. GERMAN. By resolution. By putting a notice on the Order Paper and bringing it up when the orders of the day are called. The minority is perfectly protected in the Public Accounts Committee and every other. I would like to hear some suggestion from hon. gentlemen opposite, other than the hon. member from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett)—I would like to hear any one of them give any possible reason why the minority in a committee should not be heard on the floor of parliament if they have any objections to the ruling of the committee. Looking at it from that point of view, I cannot see why this resolution should carry.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny). I shall not delay the House long, but I do not wish to give a silent vote. Two years ago when that—what shall I call him?—national curse, W. T. R. Preston, refused to answer in the Public Accounts Committee and the matter was referred to the House, I voted with the minority that he should be forced to answer. Without going into all the details which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has given, I think I may fairly say that I am in favour of the greatest freedom being given to hon. members to put questions in any committee. I do not think that in any committee of this House the rules applying in courts of law should be applied. These committees are not courts of justice, but are delegates of the House to investigate and report upon matters referred to them. At the same time the resolution submitted is rather a broad one. With the two first paragraphs nobody can find any fault, and I would be ready to accept the first part of the last paragraph. I should be ready to accept the first part, declaring that any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry should be subject to appeal to this House. I hope I shall never be found in any committee sustaining the ruling of the Chair, or voting with the majority to prevent any question being put to a witness or to shield the witness from answering. I have not been very long in this House, but many times I have sided with the minority of committees on this very question—voting that the Chair should not be sustained in ruling that a witness shall not be obliged to answer questions put to him for the good of the country. But the last paragraph of the resolution, I find fault with and cannot support. It reads :

> And, upon request for that purpose, the necessary report of the proceedings should immediately be ordered.

It would be very well to adopt such a resolution if we had not already, in our parliamentary procedure a remedy for the case. Every day, after the sitting of a special committee, there is a report brought to the House. The chairman of the committee presents that report to the House, and then it is open to any hon. member to move that the report be not concurred in. For instance, it was moved last year, by myself, I think, that the report of the special Committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in in the affair of Mr. Hyman's resignation. So, as we have the remedy under our present parliamentary procedure, I cannot see any reason why we should depart from the old rule. Especially is this true in view of the word 'immediately' contained in this part of the resolution. I think it would delay the progress of the committee to rise the moment a witness refuses to answer in order to report to the House. The committee can very well go on until one o'clock when it would rise naturally. The chairman brings the report of the committee to the House in the afternoon, and then the minority can move that the report be not concurred in. Then, as I have said, so far as I am concerned, if the motion is made that the report be not concurred in on the ground that a witness has refused to answer, or that the chairman has failed to direct the witness to answer, or has told him not to do so, I shall be ready to support the minority. I believe also that, if we look more closely into our parliamentary procedure, we shall find that, though it is very seldom resorted to, it is possible for a minority report as well as a majority report to be presented. I believe that such cases will be found in our records. Therefore, I am sorry I cannot support the resolution—

An hon. MEMBER. Sorry ?

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. Yes. I say I am sorry I cannot support the resolution because I agree in the principle that in the committees of the House the greatest freedom of investigation should be allowed, and that the rules followed in public courts should not be used in our committees because they are tribunals of an entirely different nature.

Mr. T .S. SPROULE (East Grey). I can scarcely agree with the conclusions reached by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Armand Lavergne). I have been in this House a good many years, and have never known or understood that it was possible for the minority of a committee to report. It seems obviously impossible, because if the motion is made to report, and the majority do not carry the motion, the report cannot be made. Therefore, we are taking the only means, so far as I know, available to us to ventilate our opinions before the House and the country.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will allow me, I will make my position clear. If a state of facts were distinctly reported, and the motion were made not to concur in the report, I should be glad to vote in favour of forcing the witness to answer. For instance, in the case of Mr. Preston and the North Atlantic Trading Company. There was a clear state of facts reported. But this resolution covers no special facts. I see no reason for departing from parliamentary usage in a proposal which is not based upon definite facts.

Mr. SPROULE. But let me explain why. When the motion was made in that committee to report the facts to the House, so that we could base a motion on that report, we could not get the report made. Therefore, we are estopped from referring to it in this House, and are obliged to resort to this device to bring the matter to the attention of the House and the country.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. If it were certain that that was the state of the case, I should support the resolution. But I understand that, when the refusal to answer was sustained by the committee, that would be reported and then a motion could be made that the report be not concurred in.

Mr. SPROULE. But the majority of the committee agreed with the ruling of the chair, and voted against reporting to the House, and so we are prevented from going further. This is the only parliamentary device that I know of by which we can bring the matter to the attention of the House and the country, and endeavour to correct what is, to my mind, one of the greatest evils in our parliamentary practice.

I would like to deal with this question briefly, by referring, in the first place, to the duty of a member of parliament. What is parliament for ? Who clothes us with authority to act ? If we are unable to act, why should we be thus unable ? We are here as representatives of the people, each of us elected by, perhaps, 25,000 people to do their work here, to assist in the legislation of the country and to promote good government. We are the representatives here of the people who own the lands, the mines and other assets of this country. They are the shareholders, as it were, who own this property, the government being trustees in the management of public affairs. The people have a right to know how their property is managed, whether a fair return is received for any property alienated, and also whether the money received for it is properly spent. One of our first duties, as the elected representatives of the people, is to inquire into the expenditure of public money. Coming here, we endeavour to discharge that duty, and, to that end, we commence an inquiry into public expenditures. Our first step it may be is to examine the files in the department, this being one of the convenient sources of information which we are entitled to have access to. It is the readiest, the quickest and most convenient way. We are refused that right, we cannot do it, we are told, Oh these are our private papers. Whose private papers ? might I be permitted to ask ? I thought they belonged to the people of Canada, not to the ministers or to the deputy heads of departments, the chief clerks or 2nd class clerks, who tell us in that austere way, Oh these are our private papers and we cannot allow you, who represent only 25,000 people, to read the work done here. Why are they private ? They are the transactions of the public business of this country and it is our duty to look after the interests of the people who sent us here to inquire into these transactions. We are stopped at the very threshold in the performance of our duties. I deny that they are private papers. I deny that any minister of the Crown has the right to refuse us permission to examine papers and files which belong to my constituents as well as to the constituents of any minister or to any civil servant who is doing duty for the country. The servant has become the master and therefore the representatives of the people are denied by a subordinate authority the legitimate right to perform their proper functions.

Then we put questions to the ministers of the Crown. But the ministers give only such answers as they choose, and we cannot go further and combat them and say that they must give different answers, containing more information than they choose to give us. I do not think a minister is doing his full duty if he withholds information ; but we are estopped there and we cannot get the information.

Then we move for an order of this House that a return may be brought down. We ask for the originals, because it is sometimes found that the copies are not true and complete copies, sometimes these papers are mutilated and sometimes only a partial return is brought down. So that, owing to the withholding of these papers, we cannot get full information in this way. This session we made a fight lasting for days and days upon this point, and we ultimately succeeded in compelling the government to abandon the position they took, that the opposition had no rights in the House except what the majority would grant them. In obedience to the force of public sentiment and opinion the government were obliged to give way; they partially complied with our request and brought down some of these papers. They are entitled to our gratitude for so doing, but they were doing no more than they should have done; we have received no more than we are entitled to of right as the representatives of the people. But we do not receive all the information there, we are not allowed to get all the information which would enable us to judge and to lay before the country a state of affairs that in many instances would immensely discredit this government if it was known by the electorate of this country.

Let us consider for a moment the purpose of the committees. At the commencement of every session of parliament, as soon as the address from the Throne is disposed of, certain committees are appointed. This year the appointment was made on motion of the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on the 3rd December. One branch of this motion was that a Standing Committee on Public Accounts be appointed. It was further resolved, on motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

> That the select standing committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

What was referred to that committee? On the 6th of December Sir Wilfrid Luarier moved that the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report laid on the table last session be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and afterwards the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report of the succeeding year were referred to that committee. For what purpose? For purposes of inquiry, to enable the representatives of the people to inquire into every item of expenditure in that report to ascertain if the public's money was properly, wisely and honestly spent and a proper return obtained for it.

We have now reached the stage where the committee is ready to commence their work. The committee is a creature of this House, and of course the creator must be greater than the created. The House has clothed the committee with authority to not only have the officers of the government brought before them, but any party who has had business connection with the government, to put them on oath and compel them to disclose information required by the committee to enable them to judge whether or not the money was properly expended. We endeavour to do that. This practice is an ancient one. It has been the common practice of this parliament from its earliest history to the present, and it has been the practice of the mother of parliaments. It is one of the undoubted rights of this House, and the procedure is well understood. It is sacred by virtue of its age if nothing else. It is one practice that must always be resorted to if members are to be enabled to do their duty. What are the functions of that committee? Bourinot says:

> They are empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, &c.

That is the function of the committee—to make inquiries. We are denied that right, and what are we met with? We start with the Auditor General's Report, which has been referred to us by the House. We move for all the accounts, papers and correspondence in connection with a certain item in that report. They are brought down in answer to a formal motion; we examine the accounts, and if there is anything that seems suspicious, or as to which we cannot get the information from the papers, we ask that officials from the department concerned be brought before that committee to give additional information, and these officers are brought before the committee.

These accounts are brought before the committee. We make such inquiry as we require to enable us to understand them, so that we may be enlightened. When we cannot get the information there we go farther and we have the parties who have been doing business with the government summoned to appear before that committee. They have been supplying the government, they have been purchasing agents for the government, they have been contractors for the government and we bring them before the committee and endeavour to get information from them. The first thing we do is to swear these witnesses. They are sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. We begin to ask such questions as we find it necessary to ask to elicit the information. Are we allowed to do our work as members of a committee charged with the responsibility of doing it should be allowed to do it? Not at all. How are we prevented? The first thing we are met by a number of lawyers on that committee checking us up every minute and saying: What you are doing is not warranted by the rules of evidence in court. I venture to say, as I have said fifty times over, that, as I understand the Public Accounts Committee, we are not to be circumscribed by the rules of evidence in court. How do the laymen of that committee know what rules of evidence are? Are the parties who are before us giving evidence that would result in hanging a man or sending him to penitentiary for life? Is it the prisoner at the bar who is being examined and who, according to all well understood practice, should not be allowed to convict himself? Not at all. We are inquiring into a business transaction. We ask a question and immediately we have some lawyer on that committee up. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) is up, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald is up——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. They do not stay up long if they are up.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, they are up; I object; I object! Then they tell you that before you proceed to ask a question you must make an allegation of fact, that you must make a charge, that this is not an inquisitorial examination. If it is not, what is it? What are we sent there to inquire into? Is it not eminently and pre-eminently an inquisitorial examination? Certainly it is. It is part of the duty of members of that committee. But, we are estopped from doing our duty because, forsooth, we are not lawyers and do not understand what the rules of evidence are. They say: You should not ask this man to produce a letter because you did not say so and so, and for that reason he should not produce that letter. You should not ask this man to answer a question as it might disclose some person's private business, then he refuses to answer the question. We cannot get the information out. We appeal to the chair to compel the witness to answer the question. The chair generally says: I do not think the witness should answer the question. That is the general thing. He seems to be disposed to rule that way. I assume he imagines he is right but he generally rules in that way. What redress have we as members of the opposition? The only thing we can do is to appeal to the committee that the ruling of the chair be not sustained and that the witness be instructed to answer the question. The committee, generally by a partisan majority, votes to sustain the ruling of the chair. Then we cannot go any further unless we appeal to the House. Having followed the regular course of taking an appeal from the chair to the committee, our next and proper and only step is to appeal from the committee to the House either for instructions or to say whether the witness should answer the question or not. We have no power to inflict punishment if he refuses but this House can inflict punishment. He can be brought before the bar of this House and witnesses have been brought before the bar in my presence before this and they have gone back and answered the questions which they had previously refused to answer.

Look at the inquiry with reference to the North Atlantic Trading Company. What were we confronted with there? Three hundred thousand dollars of the people's money was paid out to a company which had no existence in fact at the time that this large amount of money was paid. We desired to find out to whom that money was paid, for what it was paid and whether we got a return for it or not. We brought witnesses before the committee. We had Mr. Smart, who was formerly Deputy Minister of the Interior, and who refused to answer the questions. We appealed to the chairman. I think it was the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McKenzie) who was in the chair and we asked him if the witness was not entitled to answer the question. He said: Do you want my ruling? If you do I will very soon give it to you; he has no right to answer. He did not answer and we did not get the information. Mr. Smart told us that he burned the papers belonging to the department that contained that information when he left that office.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I asked the same question in the House a few days ago when some other hon. gentleman was making the same kind of statement. I would like to ask the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) if Mr. Smart did make the statement that he had burned any papers that were public documents or anything belonging to the department.

Mr. SPROULE. I said that Mr. Smart said emphatically in my presence, speaking of the correspondence that had been carried on in regard to this North Atlantic Trading Company which was represented to us to be a body corporate and politic and with whom he had made a specific agreement, that when he had left that department he carried away these papers and he also said that he had burned them.

Mr. MILLER. I would like——

Mr. SPROULE. I do not want any more interruptions from the hon. gentleman because I notice that is always a device resorted to for the purpose of checking up a man in his speech or argument that he is making and which he has a perfect right to make.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman——

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman has anything to say let him say it after I have done. I say that Mr. Smart refused to answer the question and I say that the chairman ruled he had no right to answer that question. Then Mr. Preston came before us we put a question, he refused to answer and the chairman sustained him. Then we desired to refer that to the House to get instructions whether that witness had or had not the right to answer, and we were refused the right to bring it before the House in proper shape so as to get instructions from the House or to get the authority of the House to compel him to disclose the information which he had refused to disclose to the committee. That is one case. Then we tried to inquire into the transactions of the Arundel Printing Company. We tried in regard to the ice breaker 'Montcalm.' We tried in regard to several in succession and in every case we were met by this same kind of obstruction that compelled us to fritter away time and prevented us from getting out as much information in ten days as we ought to get out in four hours. How can we, as representatives of the people do our duty here with this persistent obstruction. How long will the country tolerate this kind of obstruction when we are faithfully trying to discharge our duty to the people. How long will they tolerate it? Let the people of the country know it and I think there will be a remedy and that before very long. Then, we went on in that committee. We asked for tenders and we proceed to make an inquiry with regard to these tenders. We believe that these tenders are fraudulently put in. We find tenders sent from two different parties put in an envelope belonging to one of the parties and these tenders so arranged that no matter which one gets the contract both share in the profit. Will some one say that I am not justified in making that statement? Let me explain. In connection with the sale of binder twine belonging to the penitentiary, when these tenders were put in, one from the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London; one from H. N. Bate, of Ottawa, and one from Mr. Connolly, of Ottawa, what did the Minister of Justice find? The Hon. David Mills told me:—I felt perfectly satisfied that these tenders were fraudulent. I wired to Hobbs, of London: Send on your forfeit for the due fulfilment of this contract and come down and sign the contract and he said: So and so in Ottawa—I think it was Connolly—will sign it; it is all right; it is all the same.

Mr. Mills told me that Connolly put in one tender, Bates put in another, and Hobbs put in another, and that he felt perfectly satisfied that the whole three were collusive tenders. And yet if we desire to make an inquiry about that we are stopped from doing so in the Public Accounts Committee, and we are not allowed to tell the people of the country how much money they have lost on such transactions. In the case of the Collingwood dry dock, in the inquiry into the Public Works in all parts of the country, we are blocked from getting the information we desire. The departmental officers are brought before us but we are not allowed to get the information from them. These are the tactics which retard us in our business in this House almost every day of our lives. Every avenue which ought to be opened to us for inquiry as representing the people is closed against us. The last avenue, the Public Accounts Committee, is closed, and the friends of the government tell us there that we must be confined to the rules of evidence, that the witnesses need not answer questions, that we are asking about their private business, and that we have no right to know anything about it. At last we have been compelled to appeal from the committee to the House. We ask that the rights of the representatives of the people to examine witnesses into public expenditure be upheld. In the committee we are prevented from getting the information which it is absolutely necessary we should have. The House is the creator of that committee and we now ask the House to instruct its creature to give us our rights. Surely the House will not be so neglectful of its parental duty as to refuse to correct its child when it is doing wrong. The functions of parliament are paralyzed because we cannot do our duty in the committee and we are not allowed to carry on the work which our constituents send us here to perform. Will this House vindicate the rights of its members. The rights of the people in parliament have been won through centuries of struggle and are we to lightly abandon them now. Will we maintain these hard won rights or will we let them fall into desuetude? Whether we are laymen or lawyers in that committee should not we be allowed to get the evidence bearing on the public expenditure according to the best judgment we have. Are these obstructions to be continued in that committee? If so one of the most important functions of parliament is swept away and our constituents must come to the conclusion that the government shall be called to account for it. In the Public Accounts Committee, in the Agriculture Committee, in the Immigration Committee, in other committees we are denied our just rights. If we inquire how the public money has been expended we are told in the first place that the rules of evidence have to be complied with and in the second place that the witness need not answer questions for this reason or that. Another subterfuge resorted to is that witnesses are kept out of the country. I remember that once we did our level best to get Mr. Charlton before us to make inquiries into a very heavy expenditure of public moneys on a telegraph line which he was building in the Northwest. I saw Mr. Charlton day after day walking around the streets of Ottawa, and when we first tried to have him brought before the committee a letter was sent to him, but there was no information given to the committee as to whether he received it or not. Then a summons was issued and the summons was supposed to be served on him at once and I saw Mr. Charlton in the Russell house on the very day that summons was issued, but I was told that the summons was held, and Mr. Charlton suddenly decamped and at the next sitting of the committee we were told that he was on his way to the Northwest. From that day to this we never have had an opportunity of examining Mr. Charlton. The witnesses we desired to examine before the committees are spirited out of the city and out of the country and every device known to human ingenuity is resorted to to block us from getting information. If we try to find out how timber limits are handled or how grazing leases are granted, or how purchases are being made by the government we are stopped by every means possible. The government now employ agents to make purchases. They have a device known to themselves lately of doing business through some kind of bogus companies the personnel of which is not known. Friends of the government hide their identity behind the name of a company. At one time it is the North Atlantic Trading Company, the names of the members of which are kept a secret; at another time it is the Arundel Printing Company which got $60,000 of our money and we would not be told who composed that company. It was said to be a respectable company of printers, but later we found that the son of James Somerville who used to represent Brant, who had a little office in London selling Butterick patterns was the president of the company and his wife was one of the members and another member of his family was another of them and the three composed the company. But they got $60,000 of the people's money under the high sounding name of the Arundel Printing Company. We tried to find out something about the Robins irrigation deal and we were stopped there. We tried to find something about the Eastern Supply Company which is organized to buy supplies for the Intercolonial Railway and there we were stopped again. In some cases we have found that the parties who bought these supplies for the government have had 150 or 200 per cent commission on their purchases, when any officer of the department could have purchased them at wholesale price without getting any commission at all. But, instead of that we have been paying 150 per cent commission to one company alone on over half a million dollars worth of supplies purchased in two years. We tried to find out who composed that company, but we could not do it, because we were not allowed; we were obstructed and prevented in every instance. It is impossible for us to do our duty under these circumstances, and we want to ventilate this thing before this House and before the country. We want to find out whether this House will vindicate its own authority and compel these witnesses to give the representatives of the people the information they require. If this House will not do that, the country should know it. It is for that purpose that we bring the question here—to see whether this House will vindicate its authority and its own rights. If it will not, our last resort will be to appeal to the people. But until we do that we have to appeal to this House, as members of the Public Accounts Committee, and as representatives of the people, elected by this House for the purpose of inquiring into these matters to sustain us in discharging our duty to the people of this country, which we are endeavouring to do, however imperfectly, according to our best lights.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words with reference to this resolution, and particularly with reference to what I thought was a very fair admission by the Prime Minister:

> That the Committee on Public Accounts is constituted for the purpose of affording full and free examination and inquiry into the receipt and expenditure of the public moneys and the circumstances in connection therewith.

As I understand it, there is no disagreement as to the enunciation of that as a fact. If the Committee of Public Works has not that duty, it has none.

> That in the public interest the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by that committee.

That follows naturally on the first statement. If the Public Accounts Committee is constituted for the purpose of affording full and free examination and inquiry, then it follows that the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by that committee. Then, to carry out that object, is this a proper conclusion, or can a better one be found? Is this conclusion adequate or more than adequate? Does it go further than it ought to go? What it says is this:

> That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry——

If the committee is to obtain evidence for the purpose of examination and inquiry, then any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry—what do we say?—should not be allowed? We do not say that. We do not set a hard and fast line; but we say:

> —should be subject to appeal to this House—

—the House that constituted us, that created us, that gave us our duties; the House that referred the Public Accounts to us for examination. We say that in carrying out the purposes for which we were formed, if the majority of the committee, by the fact that it is a majority, excludes evidence or restricts inquiry, we ought to have the right to come back to the House that constituted us and adjudicate the matter and get its instructions, if the House has any to give. What more reasonable thing could be asked ? If we wanted to lay down a hard and fast line that the majority of the committee should not exclude inquiry or restrict evidence, we might say so, and we might be called arbitrators if we said so. But we do not. What we say is that if this bar is thrown across the track of the duties of the Public Accounts Committee, then we ask the liberty to lay the matter before the House that it be subject to appeal to this House. My right hon. friend believes that is allowed, and he admitted it to-night ; but he does not understand the workings of the Public Accounts Committee as well as some of us who have been on that committee for years. He says : We agree that if a majority of that committee, either with or without the ruling of the chair, exclude evidence or restricts or refuses a question to a witness, you have the right of appeal to this House to have the matter reviewed here ; but, he says, you are not to do that until the whole inquiry is concluded and the whole matter is brought back to the House. Now, is that at all a remedy ? That is what I want to ask my right hon. friend to consider. For instance, suppose I am prosecuting an inquiry on a certain contract. I summon my witnesses according to the best of my knowledge. I get them there ; I put a witness on the stand ; he is sworn, and I put my first question to him : Do you know anything about this contract ? He answers that he does or does not. My next question is one which goes into some circumstances connected with the contract which I think it necessary to ask about in order to elucidate the contract. He says, I do not care to answer that. I appeal to the chairman to instruct the witness to answer. The chairman says, you need not answer. I appeal from the decision of the chair. The appeal is taken to the committee, and the committee by a majority says the chair is right. Then I ask the committee, and my friends join with me in asking it : If that is your decision, you have blocked my inquiry ; grant me an appeal to the House, who sent us all here. What I want to show the right hon. gentleman is that if I were to wait until the inquiry is concluded, and I am stopped from prosecuting the inquiry at the initial stage of it, how can the inquiry be concluded ? It is impossible. The moment I ask my first or my second question, the committee stops me. I cannot go any further until I get that information from that witness. There is exactly the question which is before the committee to-day, and which I am not allowed to discuss here to-night. I am prosecuting an investigation. There are several persons and a great many circumstances connected with. I have subpœnaed a witness. That witness is ordered to bring papers and corespondence, and when I get him there I ask him if he has brought the correspondence. He says, No. Didn't you get some? I did, but I did not bring it with me. You were subpœnaed to bring it ? Well, I did not bring it. Did you receive a letter from so-and-so at a certain time ? I have no recollection ; I might or might not. If I read you the letter or telegram——

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I am taking a case that might occur.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. My hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not pursue that any further.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Will my hon. friend pardon me ? I do not think there would be much objection on this side of the House if my hon. friend did discuss it. My hon. friend seems to keep away from it.

Mr. FOSTER. Why, the very moment that I touch the fringe of it, I am met by an objection.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Only as a suppositious case.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall go no further on that line. The hon. gentleman sees how far I have got. The moment I go that far, the witness does not answer. The chairman of the committee refusing to make him answer, I appeal from the chair, and the committee sustains his ruling. But unless I am allowed to ask that question, my whole investigation has to cease. I then ask that I may be allowed to appeal to the House and carry my case from the committee to the creator of that committee. Unless I am granted that appeal and my appeal is maintained, I cannot go any further in the investigation. Why, the remedy which my right hon. friend proposes is no remedy. He says that by and by, when the whole thing is concluded, I may appeal to this House. But the thing is not concluded and I do not want it concluded until I can examine this witness and others on the same lines. Therefore I have no remedy at all, if the remedy the right hon. gentleman proposes is the only one. There is not a record in the Public Accounts Committee which shows that, in the case of such a request, we have ever been refused an appeal to the House. Why should we ? When we are in Committee of the Whole House and the Deputy Speaker is in the chair, and a question of order comes up, and the Deputy Speaker makes his ruling, any hon. member has the right to appeal to the Speaker and discuss the whole matter in the House. The House appoints a committee to do certain work. We, the minority on that committee, are trying to do that work. We are the only militant part of that committee, as regards the examination of accounts, and we are refused the right to put certain questions to a witness, and when we ask to be given an appeal to the House, we are met with an absolute refusal.

Mr. CROCKET. Does the hon. gentleman remember who it was in the committee that made the objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I quite remember. It was made by one of the ministers. The objection was made in this way. The minister rose in the committtee and said: This is impossible; we could never transact business if we are to allow you an appeal when ever you ask for it; the whole time of the House will be taken up in connection with these appeals. Well, the same thing was said with reference to original papers. If every original, they said, were to be brought down whenever required, all the original papers in a department could be brought down. How foolish that objection was is shown by the subsequent surrender. This is precisely a parallel case. If we have the right, before we vote supplies, to have the information, we have the right, after the supplies are voted and the money expended, to make the fullest and freest inquiry into that expenditure. We have the right to question whether any supplies at all shall be granted for the future. All we ask is common fair play and justice. We may not get that at the hands of the House; but if we get an appeal to the House, we get publicity and we get the chance to lay our case before the people who are the final tribunal. Will the hon. gentleman have some clerk of his go through the reports of the Public Accounts Committee from 1896 to 1908 and find out in how many instances any member supporting the government ever asked for papers to be brought down or an investigation to be instituted into any public expenditure. How many? I think you can count them on half the fingers of one hand. What does that mean? It means that investigation into the public expenses in the Public Accounts Committee is made by the members of the opposition alone. I doubt if you would have that committee called together during the whole session if it were not asked for by members of the opposition, and I am certain you would never have had an investigation into the Merwin supplies, the dredging contracts, or travelling expenses, or any other government expenditure, were it not for members of the opposition. The only active investigating force you have in the Public Accounts Committee is the members of the opposition. With that machinery the work of investigation is done, and it can at the best be done but very imperfectly on account of the opposition it meets with. Under every government, we have to rely on the opposition for investigating and criticising the public expenditure. The government makes the expenditure and their supporters endorse them, and the government supporters are not the ones who are going to institute an investigation into themselves. That must be done, if done at all, by the opposition. So that when you paralyze the opposition, that is tantamount to saying that you do not want and will not have any investigation into public expenditure by any committee. Can we afford to take that position? We cannot, and the opposition does not propose to dispossess itself of its rights and duties. We have work to do in the Public Accounts Committee and we propose to do it, and we propose to keep up the fight if necessary all summer and all autumn until we get a fair chance to carry out our duty of investigating into the public accounts. We would have no business sitting here if we did not do that. When we are refused that right in the Public Accounts Committee, that is bad enough; but when the majority in this House say: We will not only refuse you the right in the committee but will absolutely prevent your appealing to the House to see whether we are right or not, then the minority are uttterly helpless and the public interest is without any safeguard. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was absolutely wrong when he said that the minority in this House have no rights except what the majority choose to give them, his supporters are as much wrong in the Public Accounts Committee when they assert to the minority there: You have only such rights as we choose to give you.

Mr. FIELDING. Will the hon. gentleman deny that any member of this House can only have such rights as the majority gives him? Does he deny that?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman, as a Liberal, or one who professes to be a Liberal, will meet me on that ground, if he is willing to take that ground before the public, I am quite willing to meet him. If he wants to go before the people and say, We are the majority and the representatives of the minority in this House have no rights except such as we choose to give them, we are quite willing to meet him on that ground.

Mr. FIELDING. I said the other day, in answer to a question concerning certain motions, that any hon. member could only have such rights in this House as the majority afford him. Surely the hon. gentleman does not dispute that. If the majority exercise that right unwisely, there is the remedy in publicity. I repeat the statement I then made, no hon. member in this House can have any rights, in the procedure of the House, except what the majority in the House see fit to give him.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not care to discuss that question with my hon. friend. The majority might say: We have a greater number here than you people have, and we will pass a resolution that no member of the opposition shall speak a word in this House. Have they the right to do that?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. No public deliberative assembly could be conducted upon any other principle than that the wish of the majority shall prevail. If that majority acts foolishly, harshly, then the remedy is in public opinion. I repeat the statement that in this or any other deliberative assembly no member can have a right in the deliberations of the House except what the majority gives him.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad that the hon. member has come out even more strongly than before. It does not help his case.

Mr. FIELDING. Is it true?

Mr. FOSTER. The people will see what Liberalism we have in this twentieth century.

Mr. FIELDING. Is it true?

Mr. FOSTER. Absolutely not true. Why, the man who would say such a thing puts his foot on history, constitutional and otherwise. He would set at naught the long struggle for equal rights and free speech that has gone on among civilized peoples for centuries. We did not commence to live to-day. We do not get our rights because of the present votes which we happen to have the power to cast. Our rights are the outcome of centuries of struggle, of growth, of historical development; and it does not lie in the mouths of Liberals to defend a doctrine that is simply a declaration of tyrannical power. You might as well have Czardom; I would far rather have a Czar with one head than this many-headed Czar that is now proposed.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not see how that alters the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman is willing to take what he claims as the facts and make the canvass on that—come on.

Mr. FIELDING. I am willing; for the facts are there, and nothing can alter them.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) is cocksure——

Mr. FIELDING. I believe in what I have stated.

Mr. FOSTER. He is cocksure to-night, just as he was cocksure when he declared that the province of Nova Scotia should be taken out of this confederation, and he was the man to do it.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) frequently refers to that. Whatever I did in relation to Nova Scotia has received its vindication from the people of Nova Scotia from time to time. And, at least, I never had to leave my own province to find a seat elsewhere.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) is ready to appeal to very small and, I think, unworthy arguments when he finds himself in a corner. Just as good men as he, men who have sat close to him in this House, have been defeated in their constituencies. It is one thing to be defeated in a constituency and another thing to avoid defeat by questionable means. The man who is defeated is in a more honourable and praiseworthy position than the man elected by means he ought not to have used, such means as the hon. gentleman is said to have used in Shelburne and Queens.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman need not speak of what is said to have been done. The record of the court is there, and he can refer to that.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and the hon. gentleman refused to answer questions that were put to him——

Mr. FIELDING. I did not refuse to answer any question having relation to the election under consideration; and, when efforts were made to import other matters into the trial, the judge determined that it was wrong, and the court of appeal said that he was correct.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend relied on his counsel and refused to answer the questions. The record is here, and I could turn to it if there were time. But I am getting away from this Public Accounts Committee. I close my remarks by calling the attention of my right hon. friend again to the inefficacy of his method of relief. It is inefficacious because it stops inquiry, and makes it impossible for the person prosecuting the inquiry to go on with his examination. If I had three or four witnesses in a special case I must examine them largely on the same lines, but I must refrain from examining one of them because the majority has exercised power which I think is beyond their right; and when I ask the right of appeal to the body to which the committee is responsible, such a right of appeal as would be given in any of the courts of the country, the brute majority prevent the exercise of that right. All that this resolution seeks to gain is this right of appeal. The object is to make this House an open forum where we may discuss before the country whether the line of examination proposed in the committee was a proper one or not. But to keep the question within the walls of the committee room and give the committee's majority the power to refuse us the right to appeal to this House, our powers are checked and we are stopped from doing the work which, I believe, the people wish us to do.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenburg). At this late hour I shall not detain the House at great length in discussing this matter, which, after all, is an academic question. One not knowing the hon. member for north Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and listening to them for the first time, might leave this chamber believing that the majority of the committee, presumably supported by the government, had refused the minority access to the public documents necessary to the investigation of the Public Accounts, and that the committee improperly urged witnesses to refuse to give testimony. But, speaking as a member of the House of Commons, knowing these gentlemen, I have no hesitation in stating that, for my own part, I very much question their sincerity in making these accusations against the majority of the committee. I have heard these hon. gentlemen talk about the purity of the Conservative party. In fact the hon. member for North Toronto only a few moments ago had something to say about the by-election in Nova Scotia a year or two ago, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went back for re-election after being unseated. Listening to these gentlemen speaking about their own political purity and righteousness, the Lydia Pinkham righteousness that would boast itself as the cure of all political ills, one would think that they were not capable, either collectively or individually, of perpetrating any violation of the election law of this country. But I observe in the Montreal 'Star' of yesterday a despatch which shows that our friends are not just as righteous as they would have us believe. There is an election going on in the province of New Brunswick, concerning which we heard a good deal this afternoon, and this despatch from St. John refers to it:—

The 'Sun' this morning publishes an affidavit from Dr. George M. Pearson, of Sussex, to the effect that in response to appeals by Mr. George W. Fowler, M.P., he had consented to accept nomination on the provincial opposition ticket in Kings county, and began to canvass his friends for votes, but that some days later, three members of the party came and asked him to contribute $1,000 to an election fund.

This fund was going to the party of purity.

They told him one candidate had agreed to put up a thousand and each of the other two must do the same.

That would be $3,000 altogether. The affidavit continues :

Mr. James A. Murray became the candidate instead of Dr. Pearson.

This is very recent evidence of the fact that hon. gentlemen are not the political purists they would have us believe and so far as I am concerned I place no more credence in their pretensions to political purity than I do in their pretensions that the Public Accounts Committee have, in this or any other year, improperly obstructed the business of this country or improperly refused to anybody the right to place before the committee evidence that should properly be placed before it.

My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) referred to the investigation of last session into the so-called Collingwood matter. I took the objection that that evidence had not been reported to the House.

Mr. BOYCE. Very improperly.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I would not like to accept my hon. friend's judgment as to what is proper.

Mr. BOYCE. You apologized for doing it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. At the time the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) was able to present to the House the fact that upon the records it appeared that the evidence in this case was ordered to be reported to the House by the committee. I have since referred to the minute book of the Public Accounts Committee and I find that no such report was ordered by the committee, that there was no such motion and that these reports appearing as the report of the Public Accounts Committee in the Sessional Papers were altogether unauthorized. The only motion passed in the Public Accounts Committee was the following which was moved by Mr. Barker, on April 9 :

That the committee recommend that the evidence taken to this date be printed, whether the respective inquiries be concluded or not, and that rule 72 be suspended in regard thereto.

The same paper which contains his notice of motion sets forth a number of inquiries, namely, the Collingwood dry dock, the Ross rifle and sub-target matters and others I cannot fairly complain of, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce) or the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) for using the reports as they appear in the Sessional Papers, although they appear improperly, but still I wish to place this matter before the House according to the true facts in order to put myself right. Many gentlemen know that so far as the Ross rifle and the sub-target matters are concerned it was generally understood, in fact I believe it was agreed between the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition that these two inquiries should be left over until the present session.

This resolution is condemnatory of the practice of the Public Accounts Committee in receiving or excluding testimony. If the Public Accounts Committee properly excluded testimony then surely I am right and logical in saying that this resolution should not be passed, but if hon. gentlemen assert, as they do assert, that evidence is improperly excluded by the majority of the committee then it is a fair matter for question and examination as to what the duties of that committee are. I do not think it has been questioned that the duty of the Public Accounts Committee is to investigate the expenditure of parliamentary appropriations. The English House of Commons have a similar committee and the powers and duties of that committee are well stated in one of their standing orders, No. 7:

There shall be a standing committee to be designated the Committee of Public Accounts, for the examination of the accounts showing the appropriation of the sums granted by parliament to meet the public expenditures.

I submit that it is clearly evident, and it should not be necessary to make the self-evident statement, that the Committee on Public Accounts is simply to inquire as to the expenditure of parliamentary appropriations. There seems to be some confusion as to the duties of this committee and as to the latitude that should be permitted. I find that Bourinot's parliamentary procedure, third edition, edited by Mr. Flint, states in respect to the parliamentary committees:

It is a clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference.

The order of reference addressed to the Public Accounts Committee is to examine the public accounts; the Auditor General's Report for the preceding year is placed before them and all inquiry must refer only to such matter contained within the Auditor General's Report.

This principle is essential to the regular despatch of business; for, if it were admitted that what the House entertained in one instance and referred to a committee, was so far controllable by that committee that it was at liberty to disobey the order of reference, all business would be at an end; and, as often as circumstances would afford a pretense, the proceedings of the House would be involved in confusion. Consequently if a Bill be referred to a select committee it will not be competent for the committee to go beyond the subject-matter of its provisions.

I also find this statement in reference to the procedure :

Committees are regarded as portions of the House, limited in their inquiries by the extent of the authority given them, but governed for the most part in their proceedings by the same rules which prevail in the House.

Therefore, I submit, as I have already stated, that the inquiry of the Public Accounts Committee is restricted altogether to the public accounts. If hon. gentlemen could give us an instance where the Public Accounts Committee have refused the reception of testimony which would elucidate or explain in any manner whatever any public expenditure that would be a fair matter of complaint, but I say they are not in a position to point to a single instance, so far as I know, in the last four years at least, where the Public Accounts Committee refused a single word or line of testimony which would elucidate or explain any particular item of public expenditure.

Mr. SPROULE. Was that not the case in the North Atlantic Trading Company?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I say no. The committee travelled far out of its jurisdiction and received testimony which was absolutely unnecessary and absolutely beyond their power to receive, and it was only owing to the courtesy of the majority of the committee that such a volume of testimony was received as now appears on the record.

Mr. SPROULE. You have a strange idea of your duty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I do not propose taking the word of hon. gentlemen opposite when they say that evidence which has been in the past, and is now being refused, must therefore be important or relevant. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down referred to proceedings before the Public Accounts Committee and undoubtedly referred to the sub-target inquiry. He did not mention it, but stated circumstances which make it quite clear to my mind that it was that which he had in mind. The evidence which the hon. gentleman in that case wanted to obtain from the witness was correspondence between two members of the company.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. member should refer to what is going on in the committee and has not yet been reported.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. If the objection is taken, of course, I must bow to it ; only I thought that the House might permit me to refer to it to the same extent as it did the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). It was, after all, perhaps a supposititious case. But, let me suggest a case like this : A company is organized to sell an article—say a piece of ordinance to the Department of Militia and Defence. Suppose that a contract was made in 1904 and that the contract is concluded, suppose that the contract becomes the subject of inquiry before a parliamentary committee and that questions are asked as to correspondence or conversations between members of that company, a year or more after the contract is made and concluded.

Mr. BARKER. That is not the case.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know the case I am referring to.

Mr. BARKER. I know your supposititious case.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I submit that no fair reasoning man will say that before a committee of inquiry it is pertinent or relevant evidence to inquire as to any correspondence passing between members of that company a year or so after the contract is made. It is only fair and proper that there should be some restriction as to the admissibility of testimony. If hon. gentlemen were to have full fling in the Public Accounts Committee and were allowed to retail all their tittle-tattle and scandal there would be no end to the sittings of that committee, and I say it is only proper and it is the duty of every member of the committee to see that the inquiries are so restricted. Instead of hon. gentlemen opposite reprehending or censuring members of the committee who may be supporters of the government, it would be more proper and it would be perfectly correct, for members of the committee supporting the government to censure members of the opposition for the time they waste in that committee.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the hon. gentleman permit me ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Yes, I will not assume the attitude of the leader of the opposition ; I will permit you.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon ; I told him he was at perfect liberty to ask me any question, but when he arose in the midst of my speech and commenced to make comments upon it I reminded him that I had the floor.

Mr. BLAIN. What would my hon. friend think of a case where a witness is on the stand giving his evidence and a prominent member of the committee sits beside him and whispers to him all the time he is giving his evidence ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I have no reason to say what I think of such a case because I have not heard of it.

Mr. BLAIN. Such a case occurred in the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I have no knowledge of the case and I would not accept any statement of such a case unless I knew something about it.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman was present.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. The Committee on Public Accounts must have some power to determine what shall be the line of inquiry. Surely they must have some power to state what line of questioning shall be admitted, or what the limits of the testimony shall be. But I do admit that there are certain cases were the contention now put forth that hon. gentleman opposite have a right to appeal to the House may be perfectly justified. Just shortly before six o'clock the hon. leader of the opposition was making a statement and I asked him, very quietly and gently, I thought, as to the cases within his knowledge or experience in which appeals were taken from the rulings of the chairman of the committee or of the committee and I was, with a great deal of force and feeling, I thought, immediately referred to the Merwin case. The hon. gentleman, having made this answer, I thought that I was surely entitled to reply to him but he burst into a cyclone of fury and attempted to extinguish me because I ventured to make the statement that the appeal in the Merwin case was on account of the refusal of the witness to answer a question. I do admit that there are certain cases in which the minority should have the right to appeal to the House, or the committee—I should not say the minority. I suppose it is not strictly correct. In the case of a witness refusing to answer a question the practice is clear, although no procedure is laid down, that, upon the request of the committee, the refusal of the witness to answer the question should be reported to the House. I do not know of any case in which this has been refused ; at least I have no recollection of any at the present time. In the Merwin case, Mr. Merwin refused to answer a certain question as to the cost of an article. Some one moved that the question and his refusal to answer be reported to the House. The committee immediately consented and if you go back to the records of the committee you will find several cases reported to the House on account of witnesses refusing to answer questions. If a witness refuses to answer a subpœna, it is also quite evident that it is the duty of the committee to report to the House the refusal of a witness to answer the subpœna. That has often occurred and reports have been made to the House upon such cases. If the committee refused to subpœna a witness upon the request of one member of the committee I would think that would also be a fair matter for reference to the House. But, you can go through the records of the Public Accounts Committee, you can search the records of parliament as closely as you like, and, I submit, you will find no authority or precedent for the position assumed by hon. gentlemen here to-day. Why should the proceedings of the committee be reported to the House because a witness refuses to answer a question which may be absolutely silly and absolutely irrelevant to the question before the committee for inquiry ? Surely there must be some limit to it. If a witness refuses to answer a question which, legally or morally, is irrelevant and unnecessary to the inquiry, and that should be reported to the House, then, if any member of the committee chose to ask a witness what style of a coat he wears or what the size of his boots, it would be just as reasonable for any member of the committee to stand up and move that his refusal to answer these questions be reported to the House. I do not suppose that such a case would be likely to occur, but the reasoning is just as good in one case as in the other, and therefore the question gets down to this, that if a question is asked a witness which he refuses to answer or to which the majority of the committee take exception as being irrelevant, and which the chair rules irrelevant, and should not be answered, until hon. gentlemen show that the evidence which has been excluded is relevant and pertinent to the inquiry they have no right to come to this House and complain about the action of the committee. The cases which I have cited are fair cases for appeal to the House, namely, the refusal of a witness to answer a question or the refusal of a witness to answer a summons. The reason is obvious. The committee has no power over the witness. The chairman or the majority of the committee cannot compel a witness to answer and we must come to the House for authority.

Hon. gentlemen opposite pursue the same course about this matter as they do about their political purity cry. When they were in power I suppose they had a majority in the committees. They then did not take the position that private matters should be inquired into. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) practically shed tears over the fact that the Public Accounts Committee even took the ground that matters of a private nature should not be made public. I would like to give the House a few instances of the objections taken by hon. gentlemen of the party opposite when they were in power, in order to contrast it with the position they are assuming to-day.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. Wait until the member for East Grey comes back.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. On the 29th of July, 1891, one William Peart was being examined on certain affairs relating to the Department of the Interior and he was asked by Mr. Somerville then a member of the committee :

Q. How much money did Mr. Dewdney pay you privately?—A. I am not at liberty.
Q. You are at liberty to tell all you know? —A. I am not at liberty to give my private affairs in this way.
Q. Who told you that?

Here Mr. Foster objected.

Q. I want you to tell us who told you not to tell?—A. My private affairs belong to me.

The chairman ruled that the question should not be answered and on an appeal to the committee the ruling of the chair was sustained and I find that in that vote sustaining the ruling of the chair there appears the names of Mr. Foster, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Sproule. I believe this Mr. Sproule is the same gentleman who now occupies a seat in the House and he was then willing to say that private affairs should not be examined into.

Mr. J. D. REID. What was the examination about ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Matters relating to the Interior Department. On the 31st of July, 1891, Mr. Mulock asked a witness whether any contractors of the Langevin block contributed to the Langevin testimonial fund, and no objection being taken the chairman ruled against the question on the ground that it did not relate to the inquiry and the witness should not answer. I find that on that motion Mr. Foster, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Bergeron, and Mr. Haggart, voted to sustain the chairman.

Mr. TAYLOR. Quite right.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Let me give a few other cases. On the 8th of September, 1901, before the Public Accounts Committee one Mr. Thomas A. Scott was being examined under oath and he was asked whether the Dominion Type Foundry Company subscribed to the Dominion election fund. The Dominion Type Foundry Company were selling a good deal of supplies to the government at the time and no doubt to-day the member for North Toronto and the member for East Grey would say it was a very relevant question, but when that question was put Mr. Foster objected to it and the chairman ruled the objection was well taken, and on appeal being taken I find that Messrs Bergeron, Foster, Sproule, and Taylor, voted to sustain the chair. I find that on the same date a Mr. J. D. Rolland was examined and he was asked whether in 1887 and since he or his company or any member of his company paid to Mr. Dansereau or any person for him any money as a gift or otherwise, and here our historic objecter, Mr. Foster, struck in again, and objected to the question and the chairman ruled the objection well taken, and Messrs. Bergeron, Foster, Taylor, and Sproule stood by the chairman. On the 31st of July, 1891, Mr. Mulock moved that Mr. Joseph A. Charlebois be summoned to appear before the committee touching contributions of money to any newspaper in which Sir Hector Langevin had or still has a pecuniary interest. Objection was taken that the motion not being based on any item in the papers before the committee it was out of order, and the chairman ruled the point well taken and I find that Mr. Haggart, Mr. Foster, and Mr. Taylor, supported that ruling on the ground that the question did not relate to an item of the Public Accounts in the Auditor General's Report. Well, there are one or two other cases which perhaps I might give to the House. On August the 4th, 1891, one Mr. John Graham was giving evidence and he was asked whether the Postmaster General of the day had visited

Mr. Graham himself or whether Mr. Graham had any conversation with him as to the cause of Miss Graham's absence.

Mr. BENNETT. Why was the late Minister of Public Works absent from the country all last year ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I understand the late Minister of Public Works was absent from this country on account of illness.

Mr. BENNETT. Is that all ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I do not see what that has to do with these matters, but I notice that the same old objection was taken and sustained by the Chair, and that Mr. Foster, Mr. Haggart, Mr. Taylor and Mr. Sproule voted to sustain the ruling of the Chair. On August 14, 1891, one Mr. George H. Kernick, of Montreal, was asked to produce an alleged agreement made between Mr. Berthiaume and the New England Paper Company regarding paper to be supplied to the Government Printing Bureau. The objection was taken,—and the chairman ruled the objection as being well taken,—that these documents were not proper ones to place before the Public Accounts Committee but should be brought before the Privileges and Elections Committee or otherwise the Public Accounts Committee would be usurping the privileges of the Privileges and Election Committee. This document which was asked to be produced referred directly to a contract in which the government was interested. The chairman's ruling on that case was sustained by a considerable majority, and I find that Messrs. Bergeron, Foster, Haggart, Taylor, and Tisdale stood by the ruling of the chair on that occasion.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the hon. gentleman find in his research any case where the minority appeal was refused by the committee ?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I can find no case of an appeal being asked for upon a vote of the majority of the committee to the effect that certain evidence tendered was irrevelant and did not appertain to the inquiry ; not a single case. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say the whole question is whether the evidence which hon. gentlemen opposite state has been refused by the majority of the committee, is relevant or not. The Prime Minister put the matter very well this afternoon when he pointed out that in 1906 nearly 1,000 pages of evidence and last year 700 pages of evidence were printed. I say that if the Public Accounts Committee have erred at all it has been in the way of allowing too great a latitude in the mode of examination and in permitting testimony to be placed upon the records which did not relate to the questions before the committee. One word more ; it is a favourite matter of criticism against the Public Accounts Committee—and the member for East Grey referred to it to-night—that lawyers on that committee are constantly taking the objection that the evidence is not legal evidence. Now, I have been a faithful attendant upon that committee during the last three sessions of parliament and I do not believe I ever heard a member of that committee who is a professional man invoke the laws of evidence to prevent the reception of testimony. The exception taken is this generally,—and it is only a matter of common sense, and if the hon. gentleman for East Grey will exercise what amount of common sense he has, he will reach the same conclusion by the same process of reasoning which the professional gentleman would, namely, that if evidence does not strictly relate to the inquiry before the committee it should be excluded for reasons which are many and obvious. Concerning this whole question, I say that gentlemen who call themselves the minority are properly treated before the committee by that element of the committee which they call the majority. I say that no evidence which should be properly received is ever rejected ; no evidence which would go to elucidate or explain in any manner whatever the public accounts of this country as appearing in the Auditor General's Report and placed before the committee has ever been excluded. I say further that if the committee err at all, and I believe they do, it is in expanding the records by permitting all sorts of evidence to be received which has no relevancy to the inquiry, and I say in conclusion there is no necessity for the adoption of this resolution because the facts which are alleged to be the foundation of this resolution do not exist and never did exist.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) commenced his address by saying that he did not credit statements made by the members of the opposition. I think, after the exhibition he has made of himself to-night, he was the last man that should have made such a remark. When the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) referring to a case which he thought had been reported to the House, the hon. member for Lunenburg raised the point of order. You, Mr. Speaker, would not rule because you were not in possession of the fact whether the case had been reported or not. Then the hon. member for Lunenburg got up and made the statement on his responsibility as a member that the case had not been reported. Then my hon. friend from East Simcoe withdrew, making no further reference to it. But presently you, Mr. Speaker, having looked up the record, made the statement that the case had been reported, after the hon. member for Lunenburg had stated on his personal responsibility as a member that it had not been reported. He tried, in lawyer style——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Do you say that my statement is not true?

Mr. TAYLOR. I take the statement of the Speaker of this House, who raised the point without any member of the opposition having raised it, and I accept his statement and the record as being true. The hon. member for Lunenburg has referred to my name in connection with many votes of the Public Accounts Committee; but he cannot point to a case in the days of the Conservative government in which the minority were refused an appeal to the House—not one. I have been a member of that committee—and I think my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the right hon. Prime Minister are the only two other members who have been—from 1882 to the present time; and I challenge the hon. member for Lunenburg to search the records of that committee. Look at the case of Senecal, of the Printing Bureau; look at the case of Mr. Rykert, who represented Lincoln; look at the case of Sir Hector Langevin; and there were thousands of other cases. Sir John Thompson and others of the majority said to the opposition: We will take down the bars and give you a full and fair investigation. But how has it been in the Public Accounts Committee for years under this government? The hon. member for Lunenburg and other gentlemen I might name look as if they were sent there as paid agents to prevent the opposition looking into the mass of corruption which the Auditor General's Report exposes. Just as soon as the committee meets at eleven o'clock, one of these gentlemen will take the floor and talk against time until the adjournment, and the opposition have no opportunity of examining a witness or making a statement. As soon as one of these fellows gets tired, another gets up and pumps wind over a legal point and prevents investigation. It is my opinion and the opinion of the country that the government are afraid to have these accounts opened up. The Minister of Finance says the minority have [illegible] right in this House except such as the majority gives them. It looks like it. I want to say, as a representative of some 6,000 or 7,000 electors, that if I have only such rights in this House as the majority see fit to give me, I am one of those prepared to stay here till Christmas. I want to advise the premier to call off his dogs if he wants to get any supplies this year. If we are to be hounded as we are every day in the Public Accounts Committee by several lawyers sent there for the purpose, the right hon. gentleman will have to wait for his supplies. The Minister of Finance will admit that the opposition have some rights in the voting of supplies, and we are going to exercise them. So far as I am concerned, if the hon. gentleman is not going to give the minority fair-play in the Public Accounts Committee, then I can tell him that the supplies will not be voted for several months. He had better deal with the hon. member for Lunenburg, and two or three other hon. members like the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. L. G. McCarthy), who argued the other day about such evidence as we were tendering not being allowed in court. The Public Accounts Committee is not a court of law; it is a committee of inquiry, and it is our right to inquire into everything that is pertinent to the case submitted to us. None of the cases the hon. member for Lunenburg mentioned bore any comparison to any of the cases brought before the Public Accounts Committee either this session or last session. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, when in opposition, did not attend the Public Accounts Committee, but he sent a lot of stalwarts there, such as Sir William Mulock and Mr. McMullen; and everything was thrown open to them, and there was nothing done to prevent them making the fullest inquiry. But when they brought up matters such as the hon. member for Lunenburg referred to to-night, which were irrelevant, it was our duty to protect the rules of the House, and not allow private matters to be investigated. It was our duty not to allow men to be asked—perhaps some contractor or some member of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—if they contributed to a fund for Sir Hector Langevin. If our High Commissioner in England, Lord Strathcona, were brought before a meeting of the committee and asked if he had made a present of an automobile to the right hon. the premier, I would jump up immediately and say that that was his business, and he could give his money to the premier if he wanted to. That is the kind of case referred to by the hon. member for Lunenburg—whether a contractor contributed to a private fund for Sir Hector Langevin, as honest and upright a man as ever lived in this country; but because he was a poor man, not getting rich, like some of the men surrounding the premier to-day, his opponents wanted to bring men before the committee and make them tell whether they contributed to such a fund or not; and such questions were properly ruled out. I challenge the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to point to a case where that minority although they scraped every pigeon hole they could in order to find some charge against the government, was ever refused an appeal to the House. In every instance they were given an appeal the moment they demanded it. But, if they did not ask for an appeal, as in the cases cited by the hon. member for Lunenburg, it is simply because they saw in the committee that they had no case and were ashamed to ask for an appeal. The hon. gentleman cannot point to cases under the late government, as we can under this government, when session after session is occupied by lawyers addressing the committee and arguing as to whether a witness should be made to answer or not. Under the late government, when the Committee on Public Accounts met, witnesses were summoned and examined, and time was not taken up, as it has been by these hon. gentlemen last session and the present session so far, in making frivolous objections and preventing the evidence from coming out. I would advise the right hon. the First Minister to call off his bull dogs if he wants this session to close some time before Christmas.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE (West Algoma). When the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) rose to his feet, I expected, after the activity he displayed in the Public Accounts Committee, that he would attempt to justify the course he took there, but to my surprise and disappointment I found that he evaded the resolution before us altogether, and devoted all his energies to finding out whether the Conservative party in past years had, in some way or other, tried to block the evidence in similar instances. He began by reading something from the Montreal 'Star' in connection with the hon. member for Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) and relating to electoral corruption. Then he branches off to the Collingwood dry dock and Bourinot on 'Parliamentary Practice,' and then discussed what took place in the Public Accounts Committee in 1891. I would suggest that my hon. friend, from the conduct he has followed not only in the Public Accounts Committee but in this House, should be the very last one to attempt to argue against the adoption of this motion. His record is such that I think it would be exceedingly indiscreet on his part to put himself on record. As the hon. gentleman quoted so glibly an article from the Montreal 'Star' against the hon. member for Kings and Albert, let me give him the views of that journal with reference to himself. I find the following in the Montreal 'Star' of February 13 :

Grievances and Supply.

Sir Wilfrid was right in suppressing one of his more bumptious followers who thought that it would be a convenience to the government side if the historic right of parliament to discuss grievances on the motion to go into supply were limited to the extent of requiring two days' notice. That is, parliament could not by right express a grievance—no matter how urgent—until it were two days old, unless the government, against whom the grievance very probably would lie, graciously gave its permisison to voice its complaint.

My hon. friend is a very close colleague of the hon. Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Finance laid down the doctrine very positively indeed that the minority have no rights except what the majority gives them. His first lieutenant Mr. Maclean) is doing his best to disseminate that principle and put it into practical effect. He went into past history and endeavoured to give some instances of parallel cases in 1891, but the cases he cited were not parallel at all. In none of the cases he cited was there any request that the decision of the committee supporting the chair should be reported to this House. Therefore my hon. friend was trying to draw a red herring across the trail. But what is the position in which we find ourselves to-day ? The motion of my hon. friend from Peel has for its object the affirmation of a very desirable principle, the salient part of which is contained in the last paragraph, and that is the paragraph to which the First Minister dissents, namely :

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry should be subject to appeal to this House, and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of the proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

If the members of the committee, representing the government side of the House, are not desirous of suppressing the truth, why should there not be an appeal to the House. The hon. member for Lunenburg says that if a witness in that committee refused to answer, there should be an appeal to this House therefore, he admits the principle that in some circumstances there is a right of appeal from the committee to the House. But if the right exists under one set of circumstances, namely, where a witness refuses to answer, surely there must be a similar right where a witness is advised not to answer and is protected, in his refusal to answer, by the majority on the committee. Again my hon. friend says that if a witness refused to attend he could be reported to the House. But in that respect he is in conflict with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), who raised the point the other day that there was no jurisdiction in this committee to report to the House, that the decision of the committee itself was final, and that it had no jurisdiction to go any further. My hon. friend, however, is at variance with that doctrine because in three distinct cases he allowed that there is an appeal from the committee to the House.

And the principle being broken into, it must, in the ordinary course of reasoning, follow that any refusal by the witness whether countenanced or not countenanced by the committee ought to be and must be reported to the House. But I have been a member of the Public Accounts Committee and have occasion to resent very strongly the procedure followed. Take a case: A witness is asked a question. Of course, credit must be given to the opposition for honesty in their efforts to bring out evidence, and so it must be assumed that the question leads up to a certain point. It may be, as in a case within my own experience, the point to be led up to is the production of documents. But, so surely as that evidence appears about to reach a climax; the production of a document admitted to be in the possession of the witnesses, so surely will some hon. member of the persuasion of my hon. friend from Lunenburg rise and object that the evidence is irrelevant and that the production of the document should not take place, though the fact that it is in the possession of the witness is still admitted. Other tactics have been followed—for instance, warning and instructing witnesses in the committee. If the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) were to attend that committee as an interested listener, I venture to say that he would find the portions of this motion with which he says he is heartily in accord very widely departed from by his own followers, some of whom have spoken upon this occasion. With the statement that the Committee on Public Accounts is constituted for the purpose of affording a full and free examination and inquiry into the receipts and expenditures of public money and the circumstances in connection with it, my right hon. friend says he has no quarrel. But let him see for himself the workings out of the principle in the Public Accounts Committee and he will recognize the need for this appeal again and again. This amendment goes on to say:

That in the public interest the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by that committee.

Is the fullest freedom enjoyed when members interrupt witnesses who are themselves anxious to tell the truth? I have seen cases in the Public Accounts Committee where a witness has been asked a question and has declared that he had no objection to answering it, and yet a member of the committee has interrupted to say: 'I do not see why you should answer.' And when the witness has been asked again, even after a hubbub of objections in which he took no part, the witness said again: 'I have no objection to answer,' there came the same objection from a government member of the committee. And then a whispered consultation—can you believe it, Mr. Speaker?—a whispered consultation between the government member of the committee and the witness under oath; the necessity for two appeals to the chairman of the committee to prevent that conversation, and finally the witness, warned, made suspicious, made to believe that something dreadful hung upon the question which, until then, he had no objection to answer, not desiring to suppress the truth, timorous, and at long last, after waiting to see whether he had the gracious permission of the government member of the committee who had interfered and intimidated him, giving a half-hearted and reluctant answer to the question. That is a state of facts within my own knowledge, and it took place this very morning in the meeting of that committee. And the member who interfered with the witness was the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. A. Johnston).

Mr. SPEAKER. It appears that the hon. member (Mr. Boyce) is referring to a matter in a committee not yet reported to this House.

Mr. LENNOX. It will never be reported.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I was not paying great attention to the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Boyce). What has he got to say with regard to the hon. member for South Cape Breton?

Mr. BOYCE. It is very possible indeed under these circumstances——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. I submit that in all fairness the hon. member (Mr. Boyce) should answer the question of the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. JOHNSTON. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, an hon. friend has told me that the hon. member for Algoma has said that I indulged in a whispered conversation with a witness in the committee this morning. I wish to give this statement coming from my hon. friend (Mr. Boyce) a most positive denial. I did—when a question was put to the witness this morning, a question upon lines exactly similar to the question referred to by the hon. member for Lunenburg—I did say that that was a question that had absolutely no reference to the matter under consideration by the committee; I did say to the witness, that if he had no objection to answering the question, I saw no reason why he should not answer it. But when the hon. gentleman says that I indulged in a whispered conversation with the witness, I give that statement a most emphatic denial. And I leave it at that; any statement my hon. friend may make with regard to that matter will not disturb me in the least.

Mr. BOYCE. I can only say that I was examining that witness——

Mr. SPEAKER. I called the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is making reference to something that occurred in a committee that has not been reported. It is a rule, time and again enforced, that such a reference is out of order.

Mr. BOYCE. Then I will proceed with my remarks. I have just this to say that if a state of facts such as the instance I have given——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. What?

Mr. BOYCE. Such as I have referred to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. What is that?

Mr. BOYCE. I will take what the hon. member for South Cape Breton admits he did, and say that, that being the state of facts, which is a frequent——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Boyce) is continuing to refer indirectly to the same matter. That cannot be permitted.

Mr. BOYCE. I am not——

Mr. SPEAKER. Surely the hon. member will see that it can refer to nothing else.

Mr. BOYCE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will say that if such things had taken place at any past time in the Public Accounts Committee; if there had been any interference with a witness and interruptions of a witness and communications with a witness in that committee; if these interruptions had been objected to and yet persisted in; if my hon. friend from Lunenburg was present and participated in all this——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. That has never occurred in my presence in the Public Accounts Committee. So the hon. member's suppositious case is worthless.

Mr. BOYCE. I would remind my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that he is not allowed to refer to anything in a committee unless it has been reported. If such cases were of frequent occurrence, of what avail is the specious statement of my hon. friend that he desires the fullest and freest investigation into the public accounts in the Public Accounts Committee? Let him or those associated with him make that inquiry so full and be of such assistance to those prosecuting the inquiry that any refusal to answer relevant questions shall be impossible, and that all the facts concerning all public accounts under investigation shall be made public. Then this side of the House at least will be inclined to pay a great deal more attention to the ethics of my hon. friend's statement than we are inclined to now. My hon. friend has referred to misdoings and improper votes in the Public Accounts Committee during the Conservative administration, going back to 1891. When the Conservative administration was in power it did not hesitate to grant investigations into wrong-doings, whether by its own friends or by adherents of any other political party. When these investigations had been made the evidence was fully brought out, no attempt was made to stifle the evidence, the facts were reported and justice was done; the offenders were prosecuted, and in some instances were landed in the public prisons.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. They soon got out.

Mr. BOYCE. They may have soon got out. Can my hon. friend point to any case where one of the offenders against this government has been investigated or prosecuted or punished? No, the converse is the case. This government goes to the public jails to get some of their officials, they wait for them at the doors until they come out, then they appoint them and promote them, giving them increases of salaries. That is the contrast between the Liberal and Conservative administration.

If we are to have a Public Accounts Committee which is to do the work assigned to it, a committee that will afford full and free examination into the expenditure of this country, that will probe into every expenditure and expose extravagance and misappropriation of public moneys, that committee must be hampered in no way by any technical objections or by any technical applications of so-called law or usage, as indicated by my hon. friend. That committee, if it is to do its work, and if the right hon. gentleman is desirous it should do its work, should have its scope and sphere strengthened so that the full light of day should be let in on the matters investigated there, and that the public should be seized of the grave nature of the scandals which affect the public expenditures of this country.

Mr. GEORGE W. FOWLER (Kings and Albert). I should not have participated in this debate, but I understand that my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean) read an affidavit contained in the Montreal 'Star' which had some connection with the present local election in New Brunswick. I scarcely understand the relevancy of the selection which the hon. gentleman has read, but as it was permitted I suppose it will be quite in order for me to read from a newspaper published in New Brunswick an article relating to the course that is being pursued by friends of the hon. gentleman. The article is as follows:

Did Mr. Goodspeed put up the $1,000?

Admission of a serious nature made by government candidate—Money for votes, rum, &c.

How does Councillor Clarence Goodspeed happen to be a member of the government ticket in York county after the statements that he made before becomng a candidate?

That is a question that the electors of York county may well consider in connection with the splash and splurge which the organs of the grafters——

That is the government organs; it is unnecessary to say that, of course.

—are making over the fact that Dr. Pearson is not a candidate of the opposition party in Kings county.

The case of Councillor Clarence Goodspeed is one that all electors of York county may well consider and think over seriously.

Some little time before the convention of the government party in this county Councillor Goodspeed's name was mentioned as a possible candidate and he was asked by some of the party managers to become a candidate.

During the month of January, Councillor Goodspeed was in the city attending a conference between representatives of the provincial government and the municipality of York regarding the payment of some board of health bills and that day he met a representative of the 'Gleaner' on Queen street.

Councillor Goodspeed ws asked whether he was going to be one of the candidates and replied in the negative.

When pressed for a reason as to why he would not be a candidate Councillor Goodspeed stated very plainly and truthfully that if he was to be a candidate on the government ticket he would have put up at least $1,000 to be used for buying votes, rum, &c.

Such an admission on the part of Councillor Goodspeed would seem to be of a very serious nature.

Has Councillor Goodspeed put up the '$1,000 or more for buying votes, rum, &c.' ?

As I understand, the selection read by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. A. K. Maclean), no suggestion was made that this money was for other than legitimate purposes. It will be remembered that some time ago the member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) stated that he himself had been obliged to spend over $1,200 for legitimate purposes in his own county.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. He did not swear to nearly that amount.

Mr. FOWLER. That is what he stated in the House, and when he states it in the House it is equivalent to an affidavit.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. They do not hitch, though.

Mr. FOWLER. That is a matter for the hon. gentleman to reconcile with his own conscience. It was not stated in this affidavit that this money was for other than legitimate purposes, but in the statement which Mr. Goodspeed made he gave the reason for not accepting the nomination, stating that the $1,000 was for buying votes and rum in the election. I think that is entirely irrelevant, but I think it well to give both sides of the case, so that the House will understand that if there be any fault, it is certainly not all on one side.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, I shall not, at this late hour, detain the House long and shall not follow the last speaker on matters that do not pertain to the resolution now before the House. It is perhaps proper that, as chairman of the committee which is the subject of this debate, I should say something on this resolution, because naturally I am very jealous for the honour and reputation of that committee. On looking over the resolution, it seems to me that it unnecessarily reflects upon the committee which has charge of the investigation of the public accounts. The resolution appears to me entirely out of accord with the principle of parliamentary institutions relating to select committees. I am glad that the debate has come up. I have been groping for light and information as to the proper procedure which ought to rule in that committee. The result of my investigations is that the House has such confidence in the committee and in its character and ability, that it gives it an absolutely free hand, relying on that confidence, to investigate the matters brought before it.

In Todd's 'Parliamentary Government in England,' I find the principles relating to the appointment of such committees, and it seems to me that this committee has been appointed in accordance with the practice there laid down.

Such committees are usually appointed either at the suggestion or with the direct approval of the government, and are composed of a fair proportion of leading men from both sides of the House, including members of the existing and of former administrations, in order that, as a general rule, the balance of parties may be maintained, and the feeling of the House represented thereon. In the appointment of select committees, it is the usage that a majority of one should be given to that side which possesses the majority in the House itself. Men should be selected to serve on public committees who, from their abilities, experience, or the special interests they represent, are peculiarly qualified for such service.

I take it that this has been the rule which has been followed in the selection of the Public Accounts Committee. As I understand it, the leaders and whips of both political parties were those who selected those who, on account of their fitness, ought to become members of the Public Accounts Committee and it seems to me, that, where that has been done, where that committee has been approved of by both sides of the House, with the ability of the members composing it, something serious should be brought forward before any reflection is made upon a committee which has been entrusted with such important affairs. I believe that the committee which has been appointed does credit to those who are responsible for their appointment. I believe that there are on that committee men on both sides of the House who are there with an earnest desire to investigate and to arrive at the very truth with respect to the matters which have been referred to them. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) has said and, perhaps with a good deal of truth, although I think, subject to some qualification, that the majority of the committee are not disposed to probe into the expenditure. I do not entirely agree with that. I think that members on the government side are quite as anxious to know how the money of this country is being expended as the members on the other side of the House are. The truth is that we have so alert an opposition that members on the government side possibly are not so actively engaged in bringing these matters forward. True it is that members on this side of the House have not the information which members on the other side of the House have because we know full well that where there is a disappointed contractor or some other disappointed person he immediately carries all his complaints to the members of the opposition in order that they may make a point against the government, or some successful tenderer or something of that sort. There is another interest to be guarded. Although the interest of the majority may not be as active in investigating matters, there is another interest in respect to which the minority ought to be watched and it is their anxiety to bring out matters which may prejudice and which may throw obloquy upon the members of the government or those who are carrying out the government, and it is the duty of the majority on that committee to see not only that matters which reflect upon the government and those connected with the Public Accounts are brought out, but also to bring out matters which are in their favour. The formula is very well settled as to what is to be referred to this committee. I do not know what the intention of the first paragraph of the amendment is. I do not know whether it is intended by that to give the committee more jurisdiction than it has at the present time. The amendment proposed does not use the words of reference which are used and which have been used since confederation in referring matters to the Public Accounts Committee. The formula is very plain. The committee is appointed with power to examine and inquire into all such matters as are referred to it. Surely that is plain enough and if it is not intended to go any further I do not see what the object of the first paragraph of the amendment is. The second paragraph of the amendment is:

That in the public interest the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by that committee.

If this is taken literally I am absolutely opposed to it. I do not think it is intended to be taken literally, but that what is intended is that there should be free inquiry in matters which are referred for investigation. Otherwise, we could investigate the domestic brawls of people in Ottawa. I do not think that is the intention of the mover of the resolution. The intention apparently of some speakers on the other side is that the committee should be allowed to proceed absolutely without regard to any rules of evidence. As chairman, I would be very glad indeed if that were adopted, because there would be no necessity for ruling upon questions which are referred to the chair. But what a dangerous thing that would be in any community! What a dangerous thing it would be if, at the instigation of some malicious person, some person who might seek to discredit an individual, questions could be asked which would damage that person without the person giving the information being responsible for the statements which he made! What I think ought to be regarded in asking a question of a witness in that committee is, first, that it should be relevant to the inquiry, and, second, that it should be responsible evidence. Let me put this case: Suppose, for instance, a charge is brought against—I do not refer to any one in the committee because it might be said that I am referring to some question which has been brought up—but suppose a charge is made against some person, I will say, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Kennedy)—he is old enough not to object to his name being used—for alienating the affections of his neighbour's wife. I write to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) certain things saying that I know this charge is true. The hon. member for Leeds is put upon the witness stand and he is asked: Did you not get a letter from Mr. Clark saying that the hon. member for New Westminster had alienated the affections of his neighbour's wife? The hon. member for Leeds says: Yes, I got that letter on such an occasion. That goes on record. Here you have a statement put on record that the hon. member for New Westminster is guilty of a very serious offence and this statement is made on the evidence of the member for Leeds, who knows nothing about it. It is possible for some wicked and designing person to write a letter and for the contents of that letter, without having any responsible witness before the committee, to be made public and put on record to the irreparable damage of innocent people. That is what I object to and I, for my part, will be as astute as possible to see that hearsay matters which reflect upon people who have no opportunity of defending themselves are not brought before this committee in an irresponsible way because where they are not brought forward by a person who knows, but on a statement got in an offhand way, we have not the authority to receive such statements. It seems to me a most dangerous proceeding, and it is certainly one in which the rules of evidence ought to be strictly enforced. I have heard members of this House get up and make statements about business men outside, and I have been consulted by these men and asked if there was no process by which they could hold these members responsible for defamation of character. I have had to tell them that there was not, that by the privilege of parliament members could say anything they liked whether it was malicious or not. Such are the responsibilities of members of parliament and whether it is in parliament or in the committee I submit to the House that one of the most important things to be guarded against by the committee is the making of statements by irresponsible people who are not there to back them up and be cross-examined upon them. If the intention of that second paragraph in this resolution is that any question must be answered whether it is relevant or second hand, I certainly am very strongly opposed to it.

The third paragraph is one of a great deal of importance :

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry should be subject to appeal to this House, and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of the proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

I had hoped and expected that those who brought forward this resolution would have been able to show some precedent for the practice which they propose to adopt and which has never before been adopted as far as I am aware. No precedent has been given, and it seems to me impossible that with the confidence which is placed in committees such a precedent can be found. In the same volume of Todd's parliamentary government in England to which I have already referred, page 429, I find the following :—

Nothing is more remarkable than the tender forbearance with which the House of Commons treats its own select committees; though, if their proceedings were strictly canvassed, there are perhaps few parts of our system of government which can less support criticism.

In England, in the mother of parliaments, although the proceedings are very open to criticism, nothing is more remarkable than the tender forbearance with which the House treats its own select committees. Powers are delegated to that committee. The House says it has confidence in the committee because, better than the whole House together, it can transact the business. Men are placed on the committee who are most competent for that purpose and for that reason, and probably for that reason alone, no provision has been made in England or in any other country so far as I am aware by which there would be an appeal on questions of evidence from the committee back to the whole House. I do not know whether it would be a good thing to have such an appeal; I do not see what could be gained by it. How can it be expected that the whole House could intelligently discuss matters of that sort better than a select committee which is especially appointed for that purpose. There is bound to be more or less difference of opinion about rules of evidence, and I am sorry to think that my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) should reflect in the way he did upon the hon. member for Vercheres, a man of high standing both in his legal attainments and his integrity. Because that hon. gentleman's ruling last year, did not happen to suit a particular person he is made the object of attack. That is most unfair. Many a time have I had the experience of being overruled in court, and I have perhaps felt that the judge who ruled against me on some question of evidence was prejudiced or something of that sort. It is a natural feeling and it probably always will be the feeling with regard to those who disagree with you, but there must be disagreement on such questions, and I can say that my experience up to this is, that the rulings that have been given by the chairman have been given conscientiously and I think fairly. Something has been said about lack of courtesy to the minority, but my experience is that there is no foundation for that charge. We have been in session for nearly two months and I venture to say there have been more than 100 motions made for papers on almost every possible subject and from every department, and no matter what member of the opposition made the motion there never has been a single obstacle placed in his way to having all the papers brought down and the fullest information given. The only complaint hon. gentlemen opposite have to make is that in their opinion the committee has been wrong in regard to some of the rulings on evidence, but they have not told us of the rulings that have been given in their favour and let it be remembered that there are many rulings which do not please those in the majority. But if a ruling happens to displease those in the minority they stop the inquiry and at once rush to the House. It seems to me that is not respectful to the committee on which the two parties are represented in perhaps the same proportionate numbers as in this House. The hon. member for Toronto pointed out that from the Committee of the Whole there is an appeal to the House, but he did not tell us that is the only appeal there is. In an appeal from a Committee of the Whole the appeal is not taken to that committee but it is reported to the Speaker and then the appeal comes before the whole House. In that case there is only one appeal and it comes before the same tribunal. Now, in a committee the practice is the same as in the House of Commons. The practice in the House is that you appeal from the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to the members of the entire House. and by analogy if you appeal from the chairman of the committee that appeal should come before the members of the committee. Is there anything so important, that if there should be difference in committee about whether a certain question is admissible the time of the House should be taken up discussing it. The great burden of the complaint of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) in the Collingwood ship yard case was that a certain question was ruled out, but that case was reported and yet he does consider it important enough to bring it before the House and ask to have this House reverse that ruling or send it back for further examination. My experience of these matters is that although one question may be disallowed you can call other witnesses and you may get all the facts of the case, so that at the end of the investigation for the department to have for this service. But these boats and the engines for them are made in Canada. When the captain requires a boat, Canadians should have an opportunity to tender.

Mr. BRODEUR. Naturally, we would prefer to give the contract to Canadians. Now that we have this boat as a pattern, if it proves a success, Canadian builders can build on the same pattern.

Mr. BERGERON. Was it built on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BRODEUR. In New Jersey, and carried across the continent by rail.

Mr. BERGERON. Then, a boat could be built in any part of Canada, no matter where it was to be used?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. The intention of the department is, if possible, to have the boats built in Canada.

Mr. LAW. Is it the intention of the department to replace the present rowboats at life-saving stations with motor boats?

Mr. BRODEUR. That will be done gradually. It is an expensive change, and cannot be made all at once. But, as the boat we have put on the Pacific coast seems to be a success, I think it would be advisable to supply them to our life-saving stations as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CLEMENTS. In the city I represent, there is a concern with a great deal of capital behind it which manufactures engines for marine purposes, and also builds boats.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Having had a little to do with sending Col. Anderson to investigate motor boats and to give an order for the one referred to, I may be permitted a word or two. This boat was ordered by the Marine and Fisheries Department as a means of protecting life on the coast of Vancouver Island. This was due very largely to the deplorable casualty of the wreck of a couple of years ago which was discussed in this House, during which discussion some hon. members censured the government for lack of life-saving appliances on the west coast of Vancouver Island. The department took the matter up, the result being the ordering in Bayonne, N.J., from celebrated manufacturers there of this life-saving motor boat. Col. Anderson visited the United States life-saving stations on the Atlantic coast and examined their appliances and got into communication with the chief officer of the life-saving stations of the American government. On his advice, Col. Anderson recommended this style of boat as one suitable for the Pacific ocean. The contract price was a little over $10,000. No tenders were asked for—it was quite impossible to call for tenders in such a case. The boat has a 40 horse-power gasolene motor, which is hermetically sealed in the stern of the boat. The vessel is self righting and self-baling.

Mr. BERGERON. Is there a model of her here?

Mr. BRODEUR. The plans and specifications are in the department. Besides this gasolene engine, the vessel is equipped with a mast and sails and with ten pairs of oars. She is 36 feet in length and is made of mahogany as being the lightest and strongest material for this purpose. It is probably the most up-to-date life-saving boat in the world, having some improvements even over those used in the United States. Another reason why this boat was built in New Jersey is that the plans were those of the American government loaned to the Canadian government for this purpose. The superintendent of construction of the boat certified to the department that everything was right. The boat was built under the immediate superintendence of Col. Anderson and the chief officer of the American life-saving station. The boat has made 12 knots an hour. She made the trip from Victoria to Bamfield, a distance of 100 miles, in a heavy sea when very large vessels had to seek shelter. She will go out in any sea and keep up her speed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But will she come back, that is the question ?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes. She has been tested in every way, including being upset. The American government have since given an order for a duplicate of this boat to be used along the coast of the State of Washington, immediately south of Vancouver Island. The boat is, to some extent, an experiment, but she is placed in the very best place—Bamfield creek at the mouth of Barclay Sound, immediately contiguous to the place where many marine disasters have occurred within the last ten years.

Mr. CLEMENTS. If the boat is all that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Templeman) has said, the department did not pay too much for her when it gave $10,000? Of course, most of the motor boats made in Canada are for still-water conditions, and not for the conditions which this boat is designed to face. All I want to impress upon the minister is that he should not be prejudiced against Canadian makes and in favour of American. I speak particularly of motors. In Chatham we are making an engine which the best people in New York are anxious to get. Our motor is of the very best French pattern, a pattern which we spent a good deal of money to get ; and we think we are building the best motor in America. In these matters Canadians should be given a chance to tender.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is our intention.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I would urge the hon. minister to consider the advisability of establishing rocket apparatus along the coast. I have consulted with experienced seafaring men who have seen these appliances at work in Great Britain and in France, and their opinion is that ten lives are saved in that way for the one that is saved where the ordinary life boat is used. The life boat can only be used successfully where the wreck occurs on a sand bar or some distance from the shore, and where the boat can be launched in a harbour, cove or some sheltered place. It cannot be launched from a coast on which the waves are breaking. Along the coast line where the water is bold and where the ships are driven close to the shore, you can throw a life line to the ship and her crew and passengers can be taken off by that means much more expeditiously and effectively than by any other. That was done in the case of the wreck of the 'Mount Temple,' which was wrecked on the Nova Scotia coast in the early winter. Every person on board, women and children, was saved by means of a life line which was thrown to the ship. It was a remarkable achievement. This rocket apparatus is inexpensive and easily taken care of and it can be placed on a dray and carried quickly to any point. I am told that these appliances are used extensively in Great Britain and France and that in the English channel, on the Goodwin sands, a very dangerous place, the method adopted is for the life-saving steamer, having life-boats on board, to steam out and get to the windward of the wreck, and let the life-boats go down to the wrecked vessel. That is found practically the only way the vessel can be reached because the life-boats cannot successfully work their way through the breakers. If these rocket apparatuses are capable of doing the work claimed for them, and they proved very efficient in the case of the 'Mount Temple,' it would be well to have a number of them established along our coast where the water is bold and wrecks are likely to occur. They will be better than the ordinary life-saving boat. I am informed by sea captains that along the north shore of Prince Edward Island, when wrecks occur at all, those rocket apparatuses would be much more effective than the ordinary life-boat and very much less expensive.

Mr. BRODEUR. I had occasion to see some of these and I find that they are in great use, especially in the United States. I do not know that they are used to the same extent in Great Britain and France. The system of the United States is quite different from that in England. In France I believe there is a government subsidy contributed to a voluntary system, but in Great Britain the system is entirely voluntary and supported by private subscription. This rocket apparatus is more expensive than my hon. friend thinks. I had occasion to see some of them in the United States and they appeared very expensive. We have already some established in Canada. There are four places where we have those rocket apparatuses. The vote at the disposal of the department is not very large. It is just a beginning. No doubt the rocket apparatuses would be very useful but I could not promise, out of the vote at my disposal, to increase their number very materially.

Mr. SPROULE. Was any money voted for the purchase of these motor boats?

Mr. BRODEUR. The appropriation was for the life-saving stations generally. The amount voted last year was $31,600. Out of this amount, the expenditure for keeping up those stations has of course to be paid. Out of that vote we took the necessary money to purchase that motor boat, as we thought it very useful to make experiments with.

Mr. SPROULE. What was the cost of keeping up the stations?

Mr. BRODEUR. I see that the maintenance of existing stations is $12,000.

Mr. SPROULE. How many of them?

Mr. BRODEUR. In Ontario, at Cobourg, Collingwood. Goderich, Pelee Island, Port Hope, Fort Stanley, Toronto Island, Longue Pointe and Kincardine.

Mr. SPROULE. You have none at Lion's Head, Saugeen Peninsula?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. SPROULE. That is a very dangerous place, and several wrecks have occurred there. I brought this to the attention of the minister last session. They have neither boats nor anything else there in the event of a wreck. A good deal of shipping passes there and a good many accidents occur. Does the hon. gentleman say that the up-keeping of all these stations costs $12,000?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, that is the appropriation we are asking for out of this vote of $31,600. The vote has been spent during the curent fiscal year.

Mr. SPROULE. The boat was purchased out of that vote?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, out of the vote of $31,000.

Mr. BERGERON. There remains about $10,000 to the credit of the department?

Mr. BRODEUR. But we are going to establish some new stations, and out of the money appropriated for that purpose we took $10,000 for the purpose of purchasing this motor boat. The question was discussed two years ago, when the department was seriously criticised because there was no life-saving apparatus on the Vancouver island coast, and we have been providing for these stations, because I found that on that coast there were more wrecks registered than at any other place in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the minister not think that it would be wise to establish a life-saving station at Lyon's Head?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. I will get Captain McElhinney to make a report on that.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Is it the custom of the department to provide life-saving apparatus at large public wharfs or piers? Some time ago I brought to the attention of the department the case of the piers at Rondeau harbour, where hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent in dredging. The place is a summer resort, to which thousands of people come in the summer. The piers are very long and the water very deep, and drowning accidents occur every year. I would strongly recommend, not a life-saving station, but that some apparatus for the saving of life should be provided at that point.

Mr. BRODEUR. So far the policy of the department has not been to provide for the equipment of wharfs with life-saving apparatus. What we have been doing was to establish life-saving stations at points on the great lakes or on the sea-coasts where wrecks have occurred. It would be very expensive to provide life-saving apparatus for all large wharfs. In Montreal last year the harbour commission provided life-saving apparatus for the wharfs there at their own expense.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I quite admit the reasonableness of the city providing for its own vicinity ; but at Rondeau I do not think this could be done. I strongly recommend the minister to place some life-saving apparatus there.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it contemplated to establish more life-saving stations in the coming season?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have asked for reports concerning the establishing of new stations, and money not required for the up-keep of the existing stations will go towards the establishing of new ones and the purchase of some other boats, if the one we proposed to place on the Pacific coast proves to be a success.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the life-boat in connection with the whaling stations of which the minister spoke, available at all times?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the arrangement as to it ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Captain Balcom who has a whaling station there, when applying for a whaling license said he was willing to put at our disposal the life-boat he has in connection with his whaling boat with no cost to us. He keeps it for his own service, but it is at our disposal if it is required for a wreck. If he renders any service of course we pay him for that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the rate fixed ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, no rates have been fixed.

Mr. DANIEL. Why is part of the salary of the chief examiner of masters and mates paid out of this vote for investigations into wrecks ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Captain Demers, the chief examiner for masters and mates is also the assistant wreck commissioner, so one part of his salary is paid out of the vote for masters and mates and the other out of the vote for investigations into wrecks.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 69) to incorporate the Ruthenian Catholic Mission of the Order of St. Basil the Great in Canada.—Mr. Wilbert McIntyre.

HAMILTON RADIAL ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the Hamilton Radial Electric Railway Company.—Mr. Clarke.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. This is a very important measure and a large number of hon. gentlemen who desire to participate in the discussion are not here to-night. Furthermore the Bill was ordered to be reprinted owing to the large number of amendments made to it during the nine days that it was in the hands of the committee. The reprint has not yet been distributed. I think it is inopportune to proceed with the Bill, and I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CLARKE. I think the request is a very reasonable one. I would ask if the Bill has been reprinted. I think it ought to be before it is discussed in this House.

Mr. HENDERSON. The clerk intimates to us that it has been reprinted but not distributed.

Mr. CLARKE. It will be ready then for Monday ?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Not necessarily Monday, but possibly during the week.

Motion agreed to and progress reported.

SUPPLY.

The order for private Bills having been exhausted the House resumed in Committee of Supply.

Investigation into wrecks, $9,000.

Mr. SPROULE. How many wrecks were investigated last year ; what were the names of the vessels and where did the investigations take place ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Investigations were held in the following cases : Collision of the 'Cassandra' and 'John Lambart ; collision of the 'Sovereign' and 'Germaine'; collision of the 'Havana' and 'Prescott'; 'Mary' sunk at wharf ; stranding of the 'Montrose'; collision of the 'Prince George' and 'Lowwood'; collision of the 'Rosalind' and 'Senlac'; collision of the 'Wandarian.'

Mr. SPROULE. Where do these inquiries take place ?

Mr. BRODEUR. They take place generally near where the collision occurs. If an accident occurs in the lower part of the St. Lawrence the investigation would take place in Quebec; if between Montreal and Quebec, at Montreal; if on the Atlantic coast at Halifax; if on the Pacific coast, at Victoria or Vancouver; and if on the great lakes, at Toronto. We have in Montreal a court room established for that purpose.

Mr. SPROULE. Am I correct in understanding that six inquiries took place this summer?

Mr. BRODEUR. Eight.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. I think there are thirteen mentioned at page P—34 of the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. BRODEUR. I did not understand the last question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule).

Mr. SPROULE. How many of these examinations took place ? I understand that some took place in England.

Mr. BRODEUR. There was only one in England, the one into the accident between the 'Mongolian' and the 'Huronia.'

Mr. BOYCE. According to the return brought down, there were twelve wrecks in 1906 on the great lakes. The order of the House was that this return should show whether in each case an investigation had been held, also the loss of life. But this return only gives the number of casualties.

Mr. BRODEUR. I cannot understand why it does not give the other information.

Mr. DANIEL. At six o'clock I asked when the supplement to this report would be brought down, containing information we are asking for regarding these wrecks. The departmental report says :

A full statement of wrecks and casualties that have occurred in Canadian waters and to Canadian sea-going vessels in other waters will be found in the supplement to this report.

So far as I am aware there is no supplement.

Mr. BRODEUR. Perhaps I am responsible, not for that statement in the report, but for the delay. I find in several reports of the department that we have been mixing up one fiscal year with the other. Sometimes we took the fiscal year and sometimes also, in the same report, not the fiscal year, but the season of navigation. That made the report difficult to understand. I have given instructions that in the future the reports shall be for the fiscal year only.

Mr. DANIEL. Our period of navigation is all the year round as it is on the west coast of Canada. The period of navigation limited to summer months only applies to inland waters.

Mr. BRODEUR. In some places the season would be very late, until November. In St. John the navigation is always open. In order to prevent any misleading, I gave instructions that in the future the reports shall show the fiscal year and give all the casualties that occurred in that year. In this report, the casualties are given which occurred during the past season of navigation. It should be, however, a report for the last fiscal year 1906-7 and should be ready for the opening of parliament in November. The fiscal year ends the 31st of March, which would give some months to prepare the report and have it ready for the opening of parliament.

Mr. DANIEL. What about the supplement ?

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend will see that in the beginning of his report the deputy minister says :

I have the honour to report on the transaction of the Marine Branch of the department for the nine months ended March 31 last.

Often in the appendix we find the casualties which have occurred since. That creates confusion. The most regular way would be to have the report made for the fiscal year.

Mr. DANIEL. I think parliament should have a full report before it, so as to be able to discuss those matters intelligently. They are of importance to shipping, and the report of the department is not as complete as it used to be a few years ago. I do not think we can have too much information on these matters, especially where the department is developing a good many new patents in the way of aids to navigation which are of immense interest to those engaged in the shipping and fishing industries. I hope the minister will take the suggestion in good part and that in future he will give us fuller reports than we have received in the past year or two. We have not at the present time the particulars in regard to wrecks that we should have, and we are consequently not in a position to discuss the question.

Mr. BRODEUR. The brevity of the report is to some extent due to the custom of the department to present a report covering, not only the fiscal year, but the past season of navigation as well. Parliament now meets in November, just at the close of the summer navigation, and the information is not ready to present to the House. The officers have not received instructions to start at the beginning of each fiscal year the preparation of the report for the past fiscal year, and it is expected that in future that report will be ready to present to the House at the opening of each session. That change will, I think, meet the views of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. What has become of these American experts who were employed to reorganize the departmental system of bookkeeping; what are they doing?

Mr. BRODEUR. The report which they have presented shows that numerous payments have been made during one fiscal year which should have been paid in the previous fiscal year, and under the new system of bookkeeping the payments will have to be made during the current fiscal year, so that we will be able to tell at almost any day how the accounts stand.

Mr. SPROULE. We have paid $40,000 to these bookkeeping experts who have been working at it for the last two years, and it is time we should see some result of their labours.

Mr. BRODEUR. When the report, which is very voluminous, is brought down it will be shown that important improvements are suggested.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will there be any saving of money under the new system?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think so.

Mr. HENDERSON. That will be a most extraordinary thing in the Marine Department. A great many have suspicions that such a thing cannot be done.

Mr. BRODEUR. Don't rely on suspicions.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no doubt that a good system of bookkeeping would prevent a great deal of covering up, and would be likely to give us fair and honest statements of the accounts, a thing which is most desirable.

Mr. SPROULE. It is currently rumoured that these American experts have not made very great changes in the departmental system of bookkeeping. If their report is not brought down until next year, they will have been three years engaged on the work.

Mr. BRODEUR. They finished in the month of May last.

Mr. SPROULE. How long were they at it ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Five or six months.

Mr. SPROULE. How many of them were employed, and how much did it cost the country ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I cannot tell off-hand.

Mr. SPROULE. Have you no idea at all?

Mr. BRODEUR. I could get the information, but as it does not concern the matter we are discussing I have not got it with me now. I am glad my hon. friend takes an interest in this matter, and I would invite him to come some morning to the department and I will show him the old system of bookkeeping and the new.

Mr. SPROULE. We want the information in the House.

Mr. BRODEUR. I cannot bring the ledgers and account books before the House and explain them here.

Mr. SPROULE. For instance, in the report of the department Commander Spain says that a full statement of wrecks and casualties will be found in the supplemental report, but as a matter of fact there is no supplemental report. Then the reports and the accounts of the department are so muddled that you cannot tell what belongs to one financial year and what belongs to another. It will be a good thing if these experts succeed in simplifying the accounts of the department, because as they are now no one can understand them. The minister says they have been six months engaged on this work, but we have not yet seen any result from their labours, and we paid them $40,000, if not more.

Mr. BRODEUR. Less than that.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to know how much.

Mr. BRODEUR. If my hon. friend will be kind enough to wait until we reach the item on which this can be discussed, I shall be very happy to discuss the matter with him. The question of bookkeeping and the question of reports are two different things.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. minister told us that the experts had to do with the reports as well as the bookkeeping.

Mr. BRODEUR. I did not make myself clear if the hon. member understood me as saying that. I was saying that the reports laid before parliament last year covered not only the fiscal year, but the last season of navigation. That made it somewhat difficult to understand the situation, and I gave instructions that the report and the appendices should be for the fiscal year only, and that will be the case for the future.

Mr. SPROULE. It would seem to me that if the department cannot get out a more understandable report than this one, it would be well to direct the attention of the experts to that.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend does an injustice to the department, because if he looks at the report for last year he will find that Commander Spain reported on the season of navigation opening in the month of May or April, 1907, and closing in October or November. But in future, to avoid that confusion, the report will strictly cover the fiscal year.

Mr. SPROULE. We have here a list of casualties, most of them collisions, several of them on the great lakes. We have not any information yet as to what inquiries were made into these, what the findings were, and whether there was any available information obtained from these examinations. The navigation of the inland waters of Canada is becoming increasingly important every year, and to minimize the dangers as much as possible it is necessary to ascertain the causes of these accidents. The hon. minister has not given us information about any of them, so far as I know.

Mr. BRODEUR. When a judgment is rendered in a formal investigation, that judgment is published in all the papers. Of course, we cannot reproduce all these documents in the report which is presented to parliament; but the report gives the accidents that took place and those which have been investigated for the year to the 25th of October.

Mr. SPROULE. There were more than these.

Mr. BRODEUR. These were the only ones which happened in that period. The accidents mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce) took place in 1906. Only one accident which took place on the great lakes this fall has been investigated.

Mr. DANIEL. I take it that the minister does not hereafter intend to issue that supplement, but that what it contains will be included in the next annual report?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. My intention is that in the report which will be laid before parliament next year we shall have the results of all the investigations which shall have taken place during the fiscal year which began on the 1st of April last to the 1st of April next.

Mr. BOYCE. This return mentions the number of wrecks that took place on the great lakes in the year 1906 and in the fall of 1905. Among them were some very serious ones: the 'Monkshaven' on November 17, 1905; the 'Theano.' on November 17, 1906; the 'Golspie,' on December 4, 1906; the 'Monarch,' on December 6, 1906; and the 'Strathmore,' on November 8, 1906, I am uncertain from this return, which the minister admits is not complete, whether or not investigations were held into these five wrecks, and I would ask the minister to state who held the investigations, where they were held, and what were the findings as to the causes of the wrecks.

Mr. BRODEUR. There was an investigation in the case of the 'Golspie.' It appeared that the accident was not caused by any fault or mistake of the officer in charge of the boat, so his certificate was not cancelled. There was an investigation also in the case of the 'Monarch,' but Commander Spain says that although he tried to get proper witnesses he could not.

Mr. BOYCE. Was there any cancellation in that case?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. There was no investigation into the other wrecks referred to, except the reports handed over to the department by the shipping masters or the officers who made the report at the time of the accidents.

Mr. BOYCE. By whom is the information in the report as to the value of the boats wrecked furnished?

Mr. BRODEUR. By the owners.

Mr. BOYCE. I see here that the value placed upon the 'Golspie' by the owners was $20,000. Mr. Bennett suggested that the minister had paid an extravagant price for the boat when he leased her for two and a half months and paid $7,500 or almost one-third of her total value.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is true the 'Golspie' was chartered to supply the lighthouses on the great lakes. We experienced difficulty in getting boats to perform this service, and although we call for tenders we cannot obtain tenders. If a boat is regularly engaged elsewhere, and has to make this journey from Montreal to the upper end of Lake Superior, stopping at every lighthouse, she loses her business. In this case the season was advancing and we had to have the service performed. It must be remembered that this rental of $7,500 includes coal, crew, provisions, and everything so that it is not fair to say that $7,500 was paid for the boat alone when her value was only $20,000. It will be recognized that these lighthouses must be supplied; the hon. gentleman would consider it very bad administration if we left the lights without proper supplies for even one night.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister contradicted my statement that the reorganization of the accounting system of the department cost over $40,000. I have here the formal reply of the minister to a question by Mr. Foster upon this subject and I find from it that the sum total was $42,062.

Mr. BRODEUR. I must have been mistaken when I contradicted the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the minister's own return.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend will understand that some times one may mix these figures in speaking from memory. The statement in the formal answer would be correct.

Mr. SPROULE. I find in this report that a number of accidents occurred opposite the Lime-kiln crossing in Detroit. And I see that a commissioner has been appointed to hold investigations in all parts of the Dominion into shipping casualties. Who is the party who has been appointed, and also what reports has the minister received with reference to what took place in the Detroit river ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Some years ago the government of that day gave the Americans power to carry on dredging and set out lights on the Canadian side of the Detroit river.

Mr. BERGERON. A good thing. They were doing our work.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know that it was a good thing. We have national pride enough to carry on there works in our own waters. Certainly, so long as I have anything to say in the department, our policy will be that, if aids to navigation are required in Canadian waters, we will not invite Americans to do the work.

Mr. BERGERON. The minister (Mr. Brodeur) knows where this work was to be done. The channel is very narrow there, and it would be very hard to deepen the water to twenty-five feet on one side without working on the other also.

Mr. BRODEUR. But the Limekiln crossing is entirely in Canada. I do not want to blame the late government for giving this permission, but I think that Canadians should have enough national pride, where such works are to be done, to do those works for themselves.

Mr. SPROULE. But the present government allows the work to go on.

Mr. BRODEUR. We are bound by the order in council of the late government.

Mr. SPROULE. How long does it bind you ?

Mr. BRODEUR. As long as the work is not finished. They were permitted to dredge a channel and to light and buoy that channel.

Mr. BERGERON. And our vessels use that channel.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, but such a work should be undertaken by Canada and not by a foreign country.

Mr. BERGERON. What harm if the other country does the work ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) may think that we should put everything into the hands of the Americans——

Mr. BERGERON. No, I am speaking of this work.

Mr. BRODEUR. Well, what was the result ? They wanted to commission some patrol boats and to make rules of the road for those waters. Being given power by the late government to do this work, they seemed to think that, by and by, the channel would come entirely under their control.

Mr. BERGERON. Can the minister lay before the House that order in council ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly.

Mr. ALCORN. Surely, the government could rescind that order in council whenever they chose. There was nothing in it of the nature of a contract.

Mr. BRODEUR. But that would be breaking faith. Well, we decided to make rules of the road convenient for Canadian shipping. And, we have put out a patrol boat—

Mr. SPROULE. And violations of the rules of navigation on the part of Americans are reported to Washington, and on the part of Canadians to Ottawa?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. But the Lake Carriers' Association undertook to prosecute all American vessels that violated the rules of the road agreed upon between the Canadian and American government. This Limekiln crossing is under our control and we have our patrol boat. We have changed some lights this year, and the intention of the government is to take entire possession and control of this part of the Detroit river, as the Americans are doing with regard to some parts of the St. Mary's river or parts of the Detroit river that are in their territory.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not the government allowing the Americans to do work in the St. Mary's river ? It was some few years ago.

Mr. BRODEUR Work in their own territory.

Mr. SPROULE. No, Canadian territory.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think so. The boundary line in the St. Mary's river runs north of the islands. Perhaps, the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) thought the islands were in Canadian territory.

Mr. SPROULE. No, but passing that way on a trip, we saw American dredges working, and a gentleman who seemed to know all about it and seemed to be a friend of this government, said that the work was being done in Canadian territory at the expense of the United States, and he claimed great credit to the government for getting the work done without expense to Canada.

Mr. BERGERON. I should be glad to see the order in council which the hon. minister (Mr. Brodeur) refers to in this censorious way. It is a very narrow channel. I passed through it not very long ago.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is on the eastern side of Isle Aux Bois Blanc and is altogether in Canadian territory.

Mr. BERGERON. That may be, but I know it is very narrow and very shallow. Our Canadian boats passing through there draw generally about 14 feet of water, but in the olden times before the enlargement of the canals, boats drawing nine feet of water would travel over that place and, of course, at that time the river was deep enough. The American boats draw 24 to 25 feet of water—it may be that some of them draw more—and the American government found it necessary to facilitate the navigation of their own boats to deepen that part of the river. There was no harm in allowing them to do this work in the channel. I would like to have that order in council produced because, instead of criticising the former government my hon. friend would say that it was good policy to allow the Americans to make this channel. Any Canadian vessel drawing less water than the American vessels can pass through that channel which was built entirely by the American government and which did not cost Canada a cent. Instead of criticising the old administration the hon. gentleman ought to offer it his congratulations. This is the first time in ten years that any work has been done by the Department of Marine and Fisheries without costing Canada anything.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not agree with that policy at all. If there is any place in Canada where dredging is required we should not get the Americans to do that work. I am strongly of the opinion that in these cases the work should be carried out by Canada and not by a foreign nation. I do not think it is compatible with the dignity, honour and pride of Canada that such a thing should be done. Of course, there may be a difference of opinion on that question. That is the policy of my hon. friend.

Mr. BERGERON. No, I favour the very same policy as my hon. friend on the point of honour. We do not differ on that at all. I would be very sorry to see the Americans dredging the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec. But, if the previous government had not passed that order in council the American government might have made a channel 100 or 200 feet farther to the south or west. It would not have done us any good ; it would only have forced them to make the channel in a different place than where the natural channel was before, but by obtaining the permission of the Canadian government they were enabled to deepen the old channel for their own use. All they asked from us was permission to do that work and the request was granted upon the understanding that our own vessels should use the channel. I do not see anything to hurt the national honour in that. We can pass our own vessels through the channel. The work has been done by the American government and it has not cost us a cent.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend says that if the Americans were to deepen the River St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec he would object. Why should he object? The River St. Lawrence is open just as much to the Americans as the Detroit river is, and if there is an objection in one place why should there not be the same objection in another place?

Mr. BERGERON. The case is different altogether.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, it is not different. The permission seems to have been given or they have taken permission to erect on our shores lighthouses, buoys and aids to navigation.

Mr. SPROULE. When was that done ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Some years ago.

Mr. BERGERON. Then my hon. friend ought to see to it.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is what I have done. I have taken the precaution to see that the rules of the road are those suitable to this government. The patrol boat which directs the vessels where to pass the Lime-Kiln Crossing is a patrol boat flying the British flag and the buoys and lighthouses are going to be maintained by this government.

Mr. BERGERON. That is why I think it would be important to see the order in council. Permission was given by the Canadian government to the American government to deepen the channel and nothing else. If there is any infringement in the shape of buoys and lights it comes under the supervision of my hon. friend, and he should see to it.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the minister may amuse people who know something about it, but he certainly would not interest them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think we are wandering away from this item.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the minister ought to be put right. If not, he may fall into that error again.

Mr. SPROULE. I asked in regard to the wrecks that took place at Lime-kiln Crossing.

Mr. BENNETT. The facts of the case are these: Twenty years ago American vessels drawing 18 feet of water were going down to Cleveland with iron ore. How many vessels were employed on the Canadian side at that time? There were practically none but a few small lumber boats from the Georgian bay ports going down the river. The Canadian government, no doubt, were appealed to by the American government who said: Here, you do not require to have that channel deepened; if you permit us to deepen it we will do it. Do you imagine that the Canadian government would have been so childish as to have said that because we did not want it deepened ourselves we will not allow you to do it? Any man who knows anything about the shipping of the upper lakes knows that they had vessels drawing 18 feet of water on the American side. Does any one think that the government at that time was guilty of disloyalty to the country? The minister may amuse some people by talking as he has done, but it will not go beyond that.

Mr. SPROULE. I imagine that one of the very serious disadvantages of the work is that it prevents the possibility of the parasites who usually surround the government for dredging getting a rake off from it.

Mr. JACKSON. While we are on this wreck business I wish to make some little inquiry with reference to a wreck that happened on Lake Erie during the last summer. We were directly interested in that. I believe that the vessel that did the damage was one of our own boats. Has there been any investigation in reference to the collision of the government boat 'Vigilant' and the 'Nettie B'?

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that no investigation has taken place as yet. It was intended by the department to make an investigation, but the crew was away, and we wanted these people to give evidence so that it had to be postponed until they came back.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Has any of the crew of the government steamer been dismissed on account of this accident?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Have the government in any way made good the damage which was done to this schooner?

Mr. BRODEUR. The case is now before the Justice Department.

Mr. W. JACKSON. But this part that I have reference to must have come within the notice of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Is it not a fact that the government steamer was, after this accident, engaged in fishing the nets of this schooner?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, I remember the circumstances. I think that our boat, while she was lying in the harbour of Port Stanley, struck a little boat that was nearby. The preliminary investigation, the result of which we got in the department, showed that the captain said that he gave the order to go ahead, but whether the bells were working or not, the engineer seems to say he got a different order and he went astern instead of going forward.

Mr. JACKSON. I may tell the Minister of Marine that some of the officers on some of these government boats lack judgment, and it is just possible that some of them in charge of the boat in the harbour that day were not in their right frame of mind or else the accident would not have happened. There are some of the officers of that ship who have demanded an inquiry so that their skirts may be clear.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have heard that there was some man who was not absolutely in his ordinary frame of mind that day and I have given instructions that a complete investigation be held. If there is any officer guilty of what the hon. gentleman has referred to he will have to suffer.

Mr. W. JACKSON. By whose authority can one of these fishery cruisers be taken off her regular work to do work she is not intended for?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know what kind of work the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. W. JACKSON. By whose authority is that fishery cruiser taken off her regular work to go into the excursion trade or the political campaign trade? If that were done, by whose authority would it be done?

Mr. BRODEUR. No authority was ever given to the cruiser to go into the excursion trade.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries not aware that just before a by-election in Western Ontario, instead of that boat being used in the fishery service she was used in the campaign service conveying ministers of the Crown from one point on Lake Erie to another?

Mr. BRODEUR. I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Well, I can tell the minister that such is the case.

Mr. BENNETT. Who were the ministers?

Mr. W. JACKSON. The Minister of Justice and the ex-Minister of Public Works were two of a party of twenty-five or thirty who had the privilege of using that boat for that purpose. The trip was not advertised in the press or by posters, but as a matter of fact it was advertised among the party friends of the government that they could go on the boat.

Mr. SPROULE. That was the 'Minnie M' over again.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Yes, but this was on a larger scale. My statement is absolutely true, and when I had to make the same trip I was not extended an invitation to join the party but I had to take the overland route for it.

Mr. BERGERON. And cold water.

Mr. W. JACKSON. As a matter of fact the boat was engaged in a demonstration to boom the Liberal candidate in a by-election, and she was taken off the fishery protective service for that purpose.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister told us that the accident occurred because the steamer went backwards instead of forwards. It is wonderful what the force of example will do; the boat acted just as the government does.

Mr. ALCORN. On page P—31 of the Auditor General's Report there is a payment to Judge Auley Morrison, of British Columbia, for services in connection with an investigation into a collision between two steamers. What is the explanation of that item? We know that some three years ago a Bill was introduced into this House, by the then Attorney General, and passed into legislation, providing that the judges should be limited solely and entirely to their judicial duties, and should not be employed on any of these commissions. This would appear to be an instance of the government themselves appointing their own judge to hold an investigation contrary to the provisions of the Act passed on the suggestion of their own Attorney General.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know that the law to which my hon. friend refers goes as far as he says. The judges must undertake judicial work and I do not see any objection to their being called upon to exercise their judicial functions. If my hon. friend looks at the Shipping Act he will find that judges are empowered to hold these investigations.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens). That refers to judges of the Admiralty Division.

Mr. BRODEUR. It refers to investigations of this kind.

Mr. ALCORN. Under whose authority did Judge Morrison hold this investigation.

Mr. BRODEUR. The appointment of the government.

Mr. ALCORN. In what form was the appointment.

Mr. BRODEUR. By an order in council.

Mr. ALCORN. In effect that was by a commission.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. ALCORN. My recollection of the Act is that that is precisely what it is directed against.

Mr. BRODEUR. Not at all. If my hon. friend will read section 781 of the Shipping Act he will find that the minister may appoint any officer of the government of Canada or any judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec or any judge of the county court or any local judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ALCORN. Judge Morrison is none of these.

Mr. BRODEUR. He is a judge of the Admiralty Division. This inquiry is for the purpose of determining whether a man holding a certificate is guilty of negligence and if he is he is liable to have his certificate cancelled. It is very important that those who discharge these duties should be men in whom the public should have complete confidence, and I should think that no better men than judges could be found for discharging these judicial duties.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens). Does Captain Spain always have a judge with him in these inquiries?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. He is wreck commissioner and it is not necessary.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens). Was this a wreck investigation?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. Why was it necessary to appoint a judge?

Mr. BRODEUR. Because it is less expensive.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. You first said it was necessary, but I do not think that is correct.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is less expensive to appoint a judge in British Columbia to hold an investigation than to send Captain Spain from Ottawa.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What pay did the judge receive?

Mr. BRODEUR. $25 a day.

Mr. ALCORN. Does the minister say that Judge Morrison is a judge of the Admiralty Court ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, he was acting for Mr. Justice Martin.

Mr. ALCORN. Is he permanently appointed a judge of the Admiralty Court?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know.

Mr. ALCORN. If he is not and is appointed, as the minister says, under a special commission for the investigation of this particular case, I still think that is a direct contravention of the Act I speak of.

Mr. BENNETT. This seems to be a serious matter which has been pointed out by my hon. friend, that a boat which the people of Canada have paid for, and I have no doubt paid pretty well, should be employed by cabinet ministers to go around electioneering. I suppose the next thing will be the hiring of horses and carriages for the ministers to travel about the country in. I am sure that the minister is jealous for the reputation of his department and everything that pertains to it. Is the 'Vigilant' fitted with a piano?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know ; I was never on her.

Mr. BENNETT. Perhaps some of the minister's officers can tell.

Mr. BRODEUR. No ; I am told it is not.

Mr. BENNETT. Then the minister is falling behind in the procession ; because, when the late Minister of Public Works, Mr. Hyman, bought that palatial yacht, the 'Speedy,' with the money of the people of Canada, he had a piano put into her, and he stretched his legs under a mahogany table, in the company of his convivial friends, and sat in a mahogany arm-chair, and the guests sat in chairs costing the people of Canada $12 apiece. Perhaps we shall have occasion later on, when we discuss the estimates of the Public Works Department, to find out all about this. But in the meantime I want to admonish the minister that if he wants to keep up with the procession of the merry souls in the cabinet, he will have to improve the equipment of this boat.

Mr. HENDERSON. The strange part of the whole matter is that the captain of this vessel, an officer of this government, should have taken on himself the responsibility of taking the vessel out of its course——

Mr. BRODEUR. That is a question which will come up under the vote for the fishery service, and we will discuss it then. Let us confine ourselves now to the investigation of wrecks ; we are making good progress.

Mr. HENDERSON. I dare say the hon. gentleman is making fair progress, but this is too important a matter to be cast aside in that way. Since the matter has been spoken of, the people will be anxious to know at once by what authority the captain of this boat took her out of her course. Did the minister himself give instructions to these men who were going out to hold a political demonstration?

Mr. BRODEUR. I raise the point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The discussion has no bearing on the item before the committee. If the point is insisted on I have to sustain it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope we shall have an opportunity of referring to it again.

Mr. SPROULE. I have asked the minister two or three times who is the commissioner of wrecks.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have already said twice that he is Commander Spain.

Mr. SPROULE. How is he paid for that work?

Mr. BRODEUR. He does not get anything as commissioner of wrecks. He is paid as Commander of Marine Service.

Mr. SPROULE. We have not had much information yet with regard to the upper lakes. I asked the minister before six o'clock whether the government had done anything towards establishing or maintaining a wrecking plant on the inland waters.

Mr. BRODEUR. We shall reach that item in a few minutes, and I shall then have the information.

Mr. BERGERON. What was the object of employing Judge Morrison when Commander Spain could have adjudged that case?

Mr. BRODEUR. Because Commander Spain was here in Ottawa, and it was considered less expensive to have a man there ; and, if I remember rightly, the matter was a most pressing one.

Mr. BERGERON. Surely it is necessary for the judge to have technical qualifications?

Mr. BRODEUR. No ; he requires two assessors, two men versed in the merchant marine service, to sit with him.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the government doing anything towards lessening the loss of life and property on these inland waters?

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall be glad to furnish that information when we come to the question of wrecking plants or that of the maintenance of lights. I do not think we should mix up the discussion of different items, as it creates confusion.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not see how it can create confusion. We have asked as to the causes of these wrecks, but have had practically no information. We follow that up by asking what the government is doing to lessen these accidents, and we are told that we are not on that question. It seems to me that it is so closely allied to what we are discussing that it is quite in order to endeavour to ascertain what is being done in that direction.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend's inquiry would come more properly under the item 211.

Mr. SPROULE. I have scarcely asked a question to-night to which I have not had the same answer. I am always promised information on some other item.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have explained the investigations into wrecks, and now my hon. friend is inquiring about aids to navigation. We have a special vote for that purpose. When we come to that vote, we will discuss that question. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has decided not to let me pass an item but I cannot be expected, when a vote is submitted, to give information on some other subject.

Mr. SPROULE. I have never tried to delay the passage of an item one minute. I have asked how many wrecks took place, how many lives were lost, how much property was destroyed, what inquiries the department held, what was the result of each inquiry, and could not get any information. Then we got on to discussing some wrecks that took place opposite the Limekiln crossing and we did not get much information about those. We were told that the government have bought a life-boat for the Pacific coast, and I asked what was done for the purpose of providing help to disabled steamers and to save life and property. I inquired if anything in that connection was done on the lakes, but could get no information. I know that some years ago there was a wrecking plant up there, which got some little assistance from the government and I have asked whether there is any wrecking plant there now and whether the government is giving it any assistance, but can get no information.

Removal of obstructions in navigable rivers, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT. I notice in the Auditor General's Report, P—32 an amount paid of $3,900 for removing the wreck of the barge 'Tasmania.' How was that called for?

Mr. BRODEUR. I sent the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. I returned the memo. the minute it was sent me. All it said was that tenders were called for, but it did not say what was the mode of advertisement.

Mr. BRODEUR. When we call for tenders, we do so by advertising in the newspapers or by posters.

Mr. BENNETT. The memo. which was passed to me said that there were two tenders, one by the Reid Wrecking Company of Sarnia and the other by the Midland Towing and Wrecking Company. It looks very suspicious that down in St. Clair river, where there are so many powerful tugs, no one was interested in trying to get this contract, and it went to a company which sent a tug some hundreds of miles to do the work. It would be interesting to know whether a circular was sent to these two friends of the government alone or whether there was a public advertisement.

Mr. BRODEUR. I sent the paper over to my hon. friend and I cannot find it now.

Mr. BENNETT. I returned the paper, but that would not help the minister because it simply said that tenders were invited.

Mr. BRODEUR. That means public tender.

Mr. BENNETT. Has the minister the file there?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, the only information I have is what I sent to my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT. It seems strange that at the Detroit river, where there are large American tugs, none of these people would tender, and that persons should bring a tug from Midland away down there. It seems very odd that no one right on the ground should put in a tender. If there had been any more than the two tenders, it might have looked less suspicious, but when there are only two tenders, that looks very suspicious. However, I shall be content to let the item pass if the minister will permit me to ask a question, when he resumes his estimates, whether there was a newspaper advertisement.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. When the government removes a wreck from a river, is there any obligation on the owner of the wreck to pay the expenses ?

Mr. BRODEUR. That is in the law.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. Suppose the party refuses to pay, does the government sell the wreck ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, and the proceeds are given for the payment of the expense of removal and the balance goes to the owner of the vessel.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to call the attention of the department again to a matter to which I referred twelve months ago. There is a wreck at the mouth of Jeannette's creek, a navigable stream which is a tributary of the river Thames. It is the wreck of the schooner 'Defiance.' This wreck lies squarely at the mouth of the stream, and is impeding navigation there. I understand a report was sent to the department that there was no impediment to navigation. But I want to tell the minister, in all sincerity, that this is not correct. The expense of removing this schooner would not be great. I understand there is a resident of that district who would be ready to remove it at an expense that would not probably exceed $150 or $200. I hope the minister will have this obstruction removed.

Mr. BRODEUR. When did the wreck occur?

Mr. CLEMENTS. About three years ago. The schooner was loaded with coal.

Mr. BRODEUR. She is not obstructing navigation.

Mr. CLEMENTS. She lies at the mouth of the stream, and half the stream is obstructed by the wreck.

Mr. MORIN. In what rivers was work done last year?

Mr. BRODEUR. Detroit, Sarnia, Bay of Quinté and Saguenay.

Mr. ALCORN. What work was done in the Bay of Quinté ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The removal of a sunken vessel—the 'Dobie.'

Mr. MORIN. How much work was done in the Saguenay river?

Mr. BRODEUR. There was the removal of the 'Protector,' which lay sunk at the mouth of the Saguenay. The work was not properly in the Saguenay, but in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). In the Auditor General's Report the only item that I can find relating to this service is, 'Removal of obstructions, $7,377.20.' But last year we voted $22,000, and this year we are asked to vote $20,000.

Mr. BRODEUR. We are reducing our vote this year from $22,000 to $20,000. The main reason for asking an increase of appropriation last year was because of one work —removal of the 'Protector' in the St. Lawrence. This work alone cost about $12,800. The amount required varies according to circumstances.

Mr. BENNETT. What became of the barge 'Tasmania'? Was she blown up or was she handed over to the owners? If the department remove a vessel, the owners should pay for her.

Mr. BRODEUR. According to the law, the owner is obliged to pay for the removal of a wreck, but, as a rule, the owner does not do the work and we have to do it. Then the vessel is sold for the benefit of the department and to pay for the removal of the wreck.

Mr. BENNETT. Was anything realized from the 'Tasmania' ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). The minister has not explained where the rest of the money went over this $7,377.

Mr. BRODEUR. This was for nine months, and those including the winter months when least was done in removal of wrecks. It happens that that year little expenditure, relatively, was involved in the removal of wrecks, but last year in one case, that of the 'Protector,' we spent $12,500. There was a heavy tide, so that the men could work only at certain periods of the day.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). But if the money is not expended, should not the amount unexpended appear in the estimates as a revote ?

Mr. BRODEUR. If the money is not expended, it remains in the public chest.

Mr. SPROULE. Formerly there was a column in the estimates showing how much revote, if any, there was in each item. But these estimates do not give us that information.

Mr. BRODEUR. The rule concerning public votes is to vote as much as is expected to be spent during the year ; and if it is not expended within the year, it is revoted. In this case we are not doing the same thing.

Mr. SPROULE. Why?

Mr. BRODEUR. This is not a particular work being carried on, but is a general vote.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is not a revote for a particular piece of work, it is a general vote for removing obstructions in navigable rivers.

Mr. A. MARTIN. How much of that vote was not expended?

Mr. BRODEUR. In 1906-7, from April 1 to November 30, the expenditure was $7,-377.20. I have not the appropriation here. Last year the appropriation was $22,850 and we spent $22,698.58.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this not used for other purposes than removing sunken vessels, &c., from navigable rivers? My recollection is that there was an expenditure for removing obstructions from some rivers in British Columbia, I think to permit of the driving of logs.

Mr. BRODEUR. That was for spawning purposes, the removal of rocks and dams which prevented the fish from going up the rivers, to the spawning grounds. My hon. friend will find it in vote 116.

Tidal service, $30,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the explanation of the increase?

Mr. BRODEUR. The increase of $2,000 is to provide for increased salaries on the boat and to meet the increased cost of supplies. This work is under the control of Dr. Dawson, an eminent man, who has published reports of a very interesting character. Here is one which gives information connected with the ship channel between Montreal and Quebec. The work of the boat last year was mostly in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. DANIEL. What is included in this tidal service? I notice in the Auditor General's Report the expenses of the steamer 'Gulnare' are included in this? What did she do?

Mr. BRODEUR. Dr. Dawson has been studying the currents in the lower St. Lawrence. An examination of the currents has been made in the Strait of Belle Isle. New results have been obtained and the former information, obtained in 1894, has been carefully compared and incorporated. The tidal stations on the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic coast have been maintained as well as five stations on the Pacific coast and we are also having observations taken in Prince Rupert the terminus selected for the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. DANIEL. Are the tidal gauges self-registering and do you get daily reports?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, they are self-registering and we get daily reports.

Mr. LAW. I think the 'Gulnare was engaged last year in the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. BRODEUR. And it is proposed to send her there this year.

Mr. LAW. I am informed by the mariners of Yarmouth that the bulletins issued by Dr. Dawson have been very useful indeed.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is intended to continue that work down to the southern end of Nova Scotia.

Mr. DANIEL. For what service was the schooner 'Laura' employed? At page P—33 you will find that this schooner was chartered for the seasons of 1905-6 and 1906-7. She must have been a small schooner.

Mr. BRODEUR. That was before we got the 'Gulnare.' The 'Gulnare' was then at some other work and this boat was chartered for that purpose.

Mr. ALCORN. This does not appear to be a service which one would fancy would involve a large amount of public printing, but I see at page P-33 an item of $1,223.63 for public printing and stationery. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. BRODEUR.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is for the purpose of printing tide tables and reports which are distributed amongst mariners.

Mr. MORIN. Have you any of these tables to give away?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, we give them away to mariners.

Mr. MORIN. But to members?

Mr. BRODEUR. I will be very glad to supply members also.

Mr. SPROULE. I see that there is an increase of $2,000, and I do not think the minister has given us an explanation of this increase. I presume that there was the same number of hands on as were employed last season and the season before. Unless you increased the wages of the crew or something, as $28,000 was sufficient for last year, you would imagine it would be sufficient for the coming year.

Mr. BRODEUR. We have several persons engaged in the tidal service, and this is to make provision for giving them increase of salaries. We must provide for these engineers.

Mr. SPROULE. Hnw many are engaged in this work?

Mr. BRODEUR. There are three engineers and the crew of the vessel.

Mr. SPROULE. How many are there in the crew?

Mr. BRODEUR. There were last year the master, 1st officer, 2nd officer, 1st engineer, 2nd engineer, 3rd engineer, stewards, cooks, carpenters, quartermasters, firemen, seamen, tide watchers and watchmen.

Mr. SPROULE. There are fourteen in all? This was used to increase the salaries of the men?

Mr. BRODEUR. To increase the salaries and to pay for the extra cost of this vessel.

Mr. SPROULE. I was supposing that the same number would be on the year before when $28,000 was voted. Was not the full estimate of last year used in the work?

Mr. BRODEUR. I am informed by the deputy that Dr. Dawson is going west this year and will require another engineer to be left in charge of the work.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the question I asked. I asked was the full amount of the item that was voted last year expended?

Mr. BRODEUR. The deputy informs me that there was a small balance.

Winter mail service, $16,000.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. At page P—33 I find :

Detailed under Dominion steamers: 'Minto,' $2,635; 'Stanley,' $2,635, $5,270.

How does the minister come to charge that to the winter mail service, and what is it for? I cannot find it detailed under the head of the 'Minto.' What part of the item which should be charged to the 'Minto' is eliminated from that and charged to the winter mail service, and why?

Mr. BRODEUR. I will get the information.

Mr. A. MARTIN. While he is getting the information the minister might tell the committee if he has any information about the whereabouts of the 'Stanley' and 'Minto' at present?

Mr. BRODEUR. We did not get any information to-day.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Well, I have had a little bit of news.

Mr. BRODEUR. In the papers?

Mr. A. MARTIN. No. I asked the question in the House to-day where the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) was going to buy seed grain for the Northwest and he told me that he had proposed to purchase 100,000 bushels of oats in Prince Edward Island, but that the Intercolonial Railway would not undertake the carriage because the winter steamers were not performing their service.

Mr. BRODEUR. They were not performing their service?

Mr. A. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. BRODEUR. If they are not performing their service it will be only to-day. I do not think that my hon. friend has any information that so far they have not performed their service.

Mr. A. MARTIN. The information I had from the Minister of the Interior was that the Intercolonial Railway would not guarantee the carriage of these oats supposing they were bought in my province. I told him that the price of grain down there was a little lower than in most parts of Canada, and I asked him if he was going to buy any there. He told me that his difficulty was that the winter boats were not in a position to carry the grain, and that the Intercolonial Railway would not guarantee the carriage of it. Besides that I have information that these boats are not regularly performing the service. We have had no mail from Prince Edward Island to-day.

Mr. FIELDING. For two or three days during the past week we had no mails from Toronto.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Indeed?

Mr. BRODEUR. And they did not talk separation.

Mr. A. MARTIN. The Finance Minister did that. The very least information that the minister could give us is to tell us where these boats are. This is a very important service which is under his command, and I think he should have some information as to the whereabouts of these boats, whether they are sunk, or whether they are running or what they are doing.

Mr. BRODEUR. The only information I have in regard to these boats is what was published in the newspapers this morning. That the boats were caught in the ice.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (P.E.I.) I think the Minister of Marine should tell the Minister of the Interior that the boats are only temporarily in the ice, and that they will be able to transport the oats to the west. The farmers of Prince Edward Island have oats to sell, and there is no reason why the government of Canada should buy oats in the United States when Prince Edward Island can furnish better oats than can be found in Washington or Dakota. For the credit of his own department the Minister of Marine should take a trip over to the Interior Department and put Mr. Oliver right about that, and if he does so he will receive the gratitude of the men in Prince Edward Island who have oats to sell.

Mr. BRODEUR. We are making every effort possible to render the service by the 'Minto 'and 'Stanley' as efficient as possible. It may happen that they may be caught in the ice, but we are building a very much more powerful boat than either of these, and I believe it will perform the service under all conditions. My hon. friend knows very well that not only steamers but even trains are sometimes prevented from making their usual runs. Only a few days ago the trains between Montreal and Ottawa were cancelled on account of the heavy snow storm and it may very well happen that in Prince Edward Island the boats may be temporarily unable to perform the service.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (P.E.I.). The minister has misunderstood me. The Minister of the Interior told the House to-day that he would not buy the oats for the west in Prince Edward Island because the steamers were in the ice, and could not transport the oats. What I ask now is that the Minister of Marine should set the Minister of the Interior right on that point. I am not now complaining of the temporary interruption of navigation between the island and the mainland, but I am complaining that the department of the Interior has been furnished with incorrect information with reference to our winter service. I want the Minister of Marine to tell the Minister of the Interior that the steamers are now in a position to carry the oats.

Mr. BRODEUR. I will be very glad to tell the Minister of the Interior that we are doing our best to carry out the service to Prince Edward Island promptly. Probably the Minister of the Interior has taken his ideas from the fact that whenever there is an interruption in the service, my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island are ready to proclaim it to the whole world, and to announce that the province is going backwards. I think that does harm to the island. I do not like to give advice to my hon. friends, but I think it would be better if they would not so widely advertise the occurrence of these accidents. If I were to tell my hon. friend what we are doing about the service between the island and the mainland, I think I could show him that there has not been any prolonged interruption.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Marine is obstructing his estimates now.

Mr. A. MARTIN (P.E.I.). If the hour were not so late I might point out to the minister that if his government kept their promises with regard to the service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, there would be no necessity for us to remind him about it. To my mind, in order to remedy the grievance we suffer under we must keep it ever present before the minister and the government. There is no use for the minister or anybody else saying that the country does not know when these boats stop running, for it is proclaimed in the newspapers and by telegraph to every part of Canada when that occurs. Are we to sit silent here when the terms of confederation are not carried out? When the minister makes such a charge against us he is resorting to a subterfuge that I resent. I tell the minister that the people of Prince Edward Island are able to compete for the supply of part of that 600,000 bushels of grain that is required in the west, and the Minister of the Interior told us to-day that he cannot buy the oats in Prince Edward Island because navigation is interrupted. I do not think it becomes the Minister of Marine to tell us that we should be silent when the service over which his department exercises control is not performed as we were led to believe it would be performed. I won't take a reprimand like that from the minister or any one else in this House. There is no use in him telling us that he should cloak up this thing; for my part I will ventilate the grievance in this House until the remedy is applied and the minister had better understand that.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens). The minister has not explained the charge of $2,655 for repairing the steamer 'Minto' and $2,635 for repairing the 'Stanley'.

Mr. BRODEUR. The accountant of the department tells me that these boats are performing the mail service between the island and the mainland, and as the appropriation for Dominion steamers was exhausted, they took the money out of the appropriation for the winter mail service in which the steamers were engaged.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (P.E.I.). I do not think that is an explanation because you will find that out of the total expenditure $60,180.19 for winter mail service, there is deducted less charged to winter mail service $2,635, and $5,000 for the construction of lights. But in the detailed items for the 'Minto' these items do not appear and the only charges are those which were paid for the maintenance of the steamer. So far as I can see there is nothing charged in the detailed account of the 'Minto' for carriage of the mails. We have often asked in this House for a statement of what it costs to run the mails in the winter time but we have never succeeded in getting that statement.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend will find all these details of the expenditures of running the 'Stanley' on pages 25, 26 and 27. The $45,504.22 was not taken entirely from the vote for Dominion steamers; $2,635 was taken from the vote for winter mail service.

Salaries and expenses of cattle inspection, $3,600.

Mr. SPROULE. How does that come in here? Should it not be in connection with quarantine in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not exactly. It is for the purpose of seeing that the cattle are inspected on the boat, and especially that the boat has the proper equipment; so that it is a question of marine more than a question of agriculture, though it is for the protection of the cattle on the ship.

Mr. W. JACKSON. What are the regulations in reference to the space for cattle on ships?

Mr. BRODEUR. There are printed regulations. I shall be glad to supply my hon. friend with a copy.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Have these inspectors anything to do with the inspection of the food for the cattle?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Suppose there is a certain quantity of hay to go on for each bullock; the shipper of the cattle can put on more feed than that if he sees fit?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. How many inspectors do this work?

Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Delorme and Mr. O'Grady of Montreal. Mr. Buckley at St. John, Mr. Welsh at Charlottetown.

Mr. DANIEL. Does this inspection include all kinds of animals?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes; sheep, horses and cattle.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Do these inspectors have to say on what part of the ship these cattle will be allowed to be carried?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. We have absolute control in that respect and we have the right to determine what kind of accommodation they shall receive on the vessel and what space each shall occupy.

Mr. DANIEL. I notice that the only place that reports is Montreal. How is that? There must have been cattle exported from other ports.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, I will inquire how that is.

To continue subsidy for wrecking plant at Quebec, Maritime Provinces and British Columbia, $30,000.

Mr. BRODEUR. There are three places in Canada where we subsidize wrecking plants—one at Victoria, B.C., one at Quebec, and the other one on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. SPROULE. Who is subsidized in British Columbia, and where is the plant located?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is located at Esquimalt.

Mr. SPROULE. What subsidy do you pay?

Mr. BRODEUR. $10,000 at each place.

Mr. BENNETT. Who are the parties at the different points?

Mr. BRODEUR. At Quebec it is Davie and Son; at Sydney, the Dominion Coal Company; at Esquimalt, the Esquimalt Marine Railway Company.

Mr. SPROULE. Do they keep up a wrecking plant of their own and what kind of a wrecking plant have they?

Mr. BRODEUR. They have a complete wrecking plant composed of all the necessary apparatus, and they have to keep their boats always under steam. Every boat, before it is subsidized, is examined by our inspectors.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that the increasing navigation of the inland waters, especially Georgian bay, Lake Superior and Lake Ontario, would require some wrecking plant. That has been neglected very much by the government. Something ought to be done to assist in keeping up a wrecking plant or in subsidizing some individual or company.

Mr. BRODEUR. Where would the hon. gentleman suggest that such a plant should be located?

Mr. SPROULE. I would not, on the spur of the moment, give advice as to the particular locality, but I frequently talked the matter over with men engaged in the navigation of these waters, and the government should inquire and ascertain where would be the most suitable place.

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall submit the matter to the Dominion Marine Association. I was under the impression that there are several wrecking plants on the great lakes.

Mr. BENNETT. There are more big tugs on the upper lakes now than ever before.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think the hon. gentleman will find that there are four or five plants there distributed at different points. What would be the result if we were to subsidize one?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not aware that there are four or five plants there.

Mr. BRODEUR. So I am informed. There is one in Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT. One in Sarnia and one in Midland too.

Mr. BRODEUR. It would be rather serious to subsidize one plant because that would work to the detriment of the others.

Mr. SPROULE. Why is it we have to get American plants to do the work in those waters, if we have these wrecking plants of our own?

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall have the matter inquired into and consult the Marine Association.

To provide for the organization of a naval militia and expenses in using the cruiser 'Canada' as a training ship, $10,000.

Mr. BRODEUR. Some years ago we built the cruiser 'Canada' and we decided to have a certain number of young men trained on board that cruiser in gunnery exercise and seamanship. There are sixty-five including the crew. The intention of the government is to extend that service. When the boat we are building for the British Columbia coast is finished, we shall have her manned in the same way as the 'Canada.' We intend carrying out the same policy with regard to the 'Vigilant' and the 'Curlew' and in fact all the boats in the fishery protection service. In that service we have decided to have all the appointments made solely by promotion and merit. This policy has been followed in the appointments lately made. In order to bring discipline into the service, promotion should be made according to merit.

Mr. SPROULE. How many are now training on the 'Canada'?

Mr. BRODEUR. Sixty-five.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the training kept up the whole year round?

Mr. BRODEUR. During the fishing season they go around the maritime coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and during the winter they are stationed at Halifax in the dock yard. A year or two ago they made a trip to the West Indies.

Mr. SPROULE. Under what terms are they taken on and for how long?

Mr. BRODEUR. They are engaged during the pleasure of the minister. There is no length of service. The able seamen get $25 a month and the ordinary seamen $20 a month.

Mr. DANIEL. From the statement of the minister it is evident he intends using this appropriation, not for the purpose of training men to compose a naval militia, but simply for the purpose of manning the 'Canada.' He is simply speaking of the crew of that vessel. There appears to be no effort to have an organized naval militia, with officers of their own, drilled, uniformed and disciplined. It simply means, as I take it, from the description of the hon. minister, that he counts the crew of the 'Canada' as a naval militia, and he says he intends to add the crews of the 'Vigilant' and other vessels to the number. This is all very well if we knew just what he means by it. But if there is to be a militia, there must be some headquarters and some officer at the head of that branch or department, and there must be some organization. The minister has been voted $10,000 for the last two or three years, but we do not know what he has done with it. He has the crew of the 'Canada,' but they are simply paid the wages that come to them as a crew. The crew of the 'Canada,' under the minister's arrangement, would be a permanent force, but that is not my idea of what the minister would mean by a naval militia. I should think it would be persons trained and ready to be called upon when needed, and not a permanent force made up of the crews of these several crusiers.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Daniel) knows that this is merely the nucleus of our naval militia. The naval militia is based upon the fisheries' protection service. Some day, instead of having only special boats for the fisheries protection service, I hope to have the naval militia take part in that work. At the time when the 'Canada' was built, there was no organization except some boats like the 'Curlew' and the 'Vigilant' to patrol the coast. But it was thought we should have a boat on which a certain number of young men would be trained under the rules of the British admiralty. That has been done for the last few years with satisfactory results. I should like our organization to be made in such a way. Commander Spain has supervision over this naval militia, that is of the fisheries' protection service. In order to continue this organization, I started this year the idea that any appointments made to these vessels should be made from the ranks of the men who have been in the fisheries' protection service or in the 'Canada.' Some objections have been raised to the method of promotion, but I have stood firmly to the principle and carried it through. We are to build another cruiser for the service of the British Columbia coast. Other boats will be organized in the same way and on the same principle with a view to carrying out effectively this idea of a naval militia.

Mr. W. JACKSON. But you can only carry small guns. Is there a training in gunnery on these boats?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the treaty prevented that.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is a treaty governing the great lakes, but I was speaking particularly of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Mr. SPROULE. But there is a fisheries' protection service on Lake Erie and Lake Ontario.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, there is the 'Vigilant' there, and we have to observe the treaty.

Mr. W. JACKSON. What are the regulations for ordnance in the cruisers on inland waters?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not the treaty before me, but there are provisions concerning the guns to be carried on these boats.

Mr. W. JACKSON. The look of the 'Vigilant' has been spoiled by what has been done. Four heavy guns have been placed on her, two forward and two aft. On the old 'Petrel' we had only one small gun, which seemed to answer the purpose. As well as I can understand, there are not men on the 'Vigilant' who could handle the ordnance with which she is armed.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think that that is correct.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Let me make myself clear. Of course, the 'Vigilant' is possibly most of her time during several months of the year in the town where I live. I believe an instructor was on the boat instructing the men in gunnery after the guns were installed, but I am informed that when he left there was not a man on that government boat capable of handling one of those guns.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend is mistaken, because I know some of the officers have attended gunnery schools. The first officer, I am informed, has passed through the gunnery school.

Mr. W. JACKSON. Were the guns purchased to be placed on the 'Vigilant,' and what price was paid?

Mr. BRODEUR. I could not answer the first question—they were purchased some years ago. With the ammunition they cost $4,500 each.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the calibre?

Mr. BRODEUR. One and a-half pounds, quick fire.

Mr. W. JACKSON. I have heard it suggested that Canada was not within her treaty rights in placing such a heavily armed cruiser as the 'Vigilant' on the great lakes. Perhaps the minister would not care to answer that question.

Mr. BRODEUR. I shall read over the treaty, but I am quite sure that we are within our right.

Mr. DANIEL. I was glad to hear the minister's statement that he intends to introduce something like naval discipline on these fishery protection cruisers, and am only sorry that orders to that effect have not already been given. If the minister could let it be thoroughly known by the officers and men on these boats that they are under the command of the commanders of the boats and that it is to them only that they must look to for promotion, that their promotion depends entirely upon their efficiency and good conduct without any regard to political influence, he would be doing the best thing possible in the interests of the cruisers and of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there the same training in gunnery on all the fishery cruisers as there is on the 'Vigilant'?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any other training except gunnery?

Mr. BRODEUR. Seamanship also.

Mr. SPROULE. Are these men engaged as they would be on a regular training ship; are they engaged for a specific term?

Mr. BRODEUR. They are engaged during the pleasure of the minister. If an officer or seaman was not discharging his duties properly he would be dismissed. The seamen on engagement are required to sign declarations that the Act applicable to their engagement has been read to them and that they engage to comply with all the provisions of the Act during the pleasure of the minister.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Monday will be the regular private members' day?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 17, 1908.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

HAMILTON RADIAL ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the Hamilton Radial Electric Railway Company.—Mr. Clarke.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). As this is a very important Bill and as there are certain matters in connection with it which are now under consideration I would ask that it be laid over for the present. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LENNOX. I propose to take what may be considered in a certain way a preliminary objection, and probably it might be well if I brought it to the attention of the committee so that it can be dealt with, and it may serve the purpose the minister has in view as well. My point is that the Bill is not before the committee in a form in which the committee can deal with it. The preamble of this Bill has been amended in very important particulars. As the Bill was introduced the preamble set forth:

Whereas the Hamilton Radial Electric Railway Company has by its petition represented that it was incorporated by chapter 88 of the statutes of 1894 of Ontario, whereby, and by subsequent amendments of the said Act, the said company was authorized to construct various lines of railway from the city of Hamilton to different places in the province of Ontario as in the said Act and amendments set forth.

Up to that point there is no amendment made by the Railway Committee. The original preamble then continues:

And whereas the said company has been advised that, under and by virtue of the provisions of sections 306 and 307 of The Railway Act of 1888, and sections 91 and 92 of The British North America Act, 1867, its railway, on crossing the line of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at Burlington in the year 1897 became and has since been subject to the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada; and whereas applications have been made to the legislative assembly of Ontario for Acts extending the time for constructing the said company's lines of railway, and such Acts have been passed, but, as the said company has been advised, without authority or jurisdiction; and whereas the said company has by its petition asked for authority to carry out certain extensions and works beyond provincial jurisdiction; and whereas it is advisable that all questions as to jurisdiction should be set at rest, that everything done by the said company in pursuance of the several Acts relating thereto should be confirmed, and that the said company should be enabled to carry out its various enterprises.

The alteration in this part of the preamble affects the question that is now coming before us. Objection was taken to the part of the preamble which recited the crossing of the line of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at Burlington in 1897, and also to the statement in it that the Acts of the provincial legislature were without jurisdiction and also to the recital that everything done by the said company in pursuance of the said several Acts relating thereto should be confirmed. I moved that these different parts of the preamble should be struck out. Subsequently it was moved by the promoter of the Bill that the preamble should be amended. Not exactly in the lines that I proposed, but by providing as the Bill now provides :

And whereas doubts have been raised whether in and by virtue of sections 306 and 307 of the Railway Act of 1888 and sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act of 1867 the said railway company by crossing the line of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at Burlington in the year 1897 became and has since been subject to the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

It was altered in the respect that the reference to the company being so advised was stricken out and the expression that 'doubts had been raised' was substituted. Then the preamble was amended further by striking out the words referring to the Ontario amendments in lines 17 and 18. The words further down in the preamble were struck out as follows :

That everything done by the said committee in pursuance of the several Acts relating thereto should be confirmed.

These are very important alterations in the preamble of the Bill and as a matter of fact discussion of this question occupied three or four days in the committee. Now, I desire to call attention to the fact that the committee in making their report to this House have not complied with rule 106 of the rules of the House. The report of the committee is :

Your committee have had under consideration Bill (No. 25) an Act respecting the Hamilton Radial Electric Railway Company, and have agreed to report the same with amendments; all of which is respectfully submitted.

Rule 106 is as follows :

The committee to which a private Bill may have been referred shall report the same to the House in every case; and when any material alteration has been made in the preamble of the Bill, such alteration and the reasons for the same, are to be stated in the report.

I need not go into the reasons why that rule is framed as it is. The rule provides that not only the alterations shall be stated in the report of the committee, but also the reasons for making those alterations. Therefore I move :

That Bill (No. 25) be not now proceeded with, but that it be reported back to the House in order that it and the report of the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines thereon, be referred back to the said committee, with instructions to the committee to amend their said report by stating the alterations made by the committee in the preamble of the said Bill, and the reasons for said alterations, as required by rule 106 of this House.

I ask the minister if he will allow me to put this in so that we may have the point decided one way or the other.

Mr. GRAHAM. The chairman of the committee which made the report is not here. There is some force in the point raised by my hon. friend. I think that will perhaps fully justify my motion to let the whole matter stand for another time, when we can consider that point as well as some other things that I have in mind.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That motion will have to be made when the Speaker is in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM. The first thing we will discuss when we get into committee again will be the hon. gentleman's objection.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Speaker, I will move now, on the understanding that the minister does not want the matter proceeded with now :

That Bill (No. 25) and the report of the committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines thereon, be referred back to the said committee with instructions to them to amend their said report by stating the alterations made in the committee in the preamble of the said Bill, and the reasons for said alterations, as required by rule 106 of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. This will stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. LENNOX. I would ask the minister to let me know when this Bill is coming on again, as I would like to be here.

Mr. GRAHAM. It will probably be a week from to-day.

Mr. CLARKE. The point which my hon. friend raises could be considered to-morrow evening, during the hour for private Bills.

Mr. LENNOX. I am quite ready to have it considered now.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Minister of Railways has truthfully said that the Bill is an important Bill, and I would suggest that we have a few days notice of the time it is to be taken up. I understand that the present intention is to bring it on a week from to-day.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to meet the convenience of hon. gentlemen as far as possible. It strikes me that it will be better to let it stand for a few days, so that everybody may be in a better position to discuss it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. All I wish to ask is that we may be informed a few days in advance.

Mr. GRAHAM. Surely.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AND ELECTIONS.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram, which I wish to read :

Alphonse E. Leblanc, travelling passenger agent Intercolonial Railway, is out canvassing here for local government candidates, and has announced that he intends to open a committee room at Dupuis Corner and hold it open day and night until after election. Henry Leblanc is an employee of the Intercolonial Railway in audit department of general offices in Moncton; is also going out through Shediac and Dorchester parishes from schoolhouse to schoolhouse decrying and denouncing the opposition candidates.

I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if he will kindly inform himself as to these particular delinquents and answer to-morrow, and I hope his information will be that he has called them off.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will certainly make inquiries.

QUESTIONS.

TIGNISH HARBOUR.

Mr. LEFURGEY—by Mr. Blain—asked :

1. Is the government informed that the north block of the Tignish breakwater recently built needs repairing, and has the government any report from its engineers regarding the same?
2. What report has the government received from its engineers regarding repairs and extension of the harbour at Tignish, and what is the intention of the government thereon?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for Minister of Public Works) :

1. No.
2. (a) The resident engineer has asked for the sum of $500 for general repairs to breakwaters. Petitions have been received asking for an extension to the breakwater and the enlargement of the harbour, with respect to which requests the resident engineer reports that the additional desired accommodation may be obtained by the still further inward extension of the breakwaters. This would have the effect of nearly doubling the harbour space and afford good and secure shelter. The proposed improvement leaves no doubt that the space between the breakwaters would scour out so as to carry a depth of from four to five feet at low water, which will be sufficient for the class of boats usually making use of the harbour. The estimated cost of the work would be $20,000. (b) The matter is under consideration.

ST. ANICET WHARF.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. When was Mr. Dupuis appointed wharfinger at the St. Anicet wharf?
2. What revenues did the government receive from such date until now from year to year?
3. What were the expenses incurred in such wharf since then, each year, respectively?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries):

1. By order in council, 14th September, 1896.
2. 1897-1898, $22.53 ; 1898-1899, $74.63 ; nothing since.
3. There has been no expenditure for this wharf by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

MR. E. A. WALLBERG.

Mr. STAPLES asked :

1. Has the Marine and Fisheries Department made a contract with E. A. Wallberg for large quantities of reinforced cement ? If not, is it their intention to do so ?
2. Has it been arranged with the department or any official of the department to allow Wallberg to take out a patent covering some point in connection with this cement so that there can be no competition with him ?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) :

1. No. Mr. Wallberg's company has a contract for $6,095, on which $3,000 has been paid, to heighten the Heath point tower. The quantity of concrete is small, the locality and conditions being largely responsible for the price. Very little reinforced concrete work is contemplated for the coming season.
2. No.

FROZEN BONELESS MEAT.

Mr. J. D. REID—by Mr. Sam. Hughes—asked:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Agriculture been drawn to the following item in the 'Daily Mail' newspaper of January 27, 1908, printed in Manchester, England :—

FROZEN BONELESS MEAT.

Mr. John Burns advised to stop imports.

The local government board medical inspector, in a report issued to-day says :—

The unchecked admission of boneless scrap meat into the United Kingdom appears to constitute a definite risk to health.

Most of this meat, coming frozen in boxes, is from the United States, a little, but not of the lowest class, from the Argentine ; there is at times a small trade from New Zealand, but practically none from the continent. Boneless beef consists of 'chucks,' in practice trimmings from all parts of the carcase, a by-product of the canning trade. They are from animals of inferior quality. The exports are mainly in winter, because in summer they may go bad after leaving cold storage. The wholesale price is about 3d. a pound. The chief sale is in Glasgow and the north, the purchasers in London being pie and sausage makers. The importation, mainly by six firms, was in 1905, 2,722 tons. Similar pork and ham cuttings are variously known as 'box pork,' 'boneless butts,' or 'Boston butts.' Some of the trimmings may even be from tuberculosis animals.

Mr. Burns is enabled by the Public Health Act to deal with the matter, and the report says that the trade is so small that to prohibit all such imports would cause little trouble.

To guard further against the danger of tuberculosis from pork coming from Holland, Denmark, and other countries, besides America, it is suggested that only carcases should be imported containing the parts enabling inspectors to detect disease, and portions less than carcases only when bearing an official mark approved by the board, such approval depending on the guarantee supplied by the exporting countries.

2. Has there been any correspondence between the Imperial and Canadian governments with reference to frozen meats in boxes or barrels or packages ?

3. Has the government a system of inspection now in operation by which all frozen meats in boxes or other packages for export are duly inspected and properly stamped and certified before shipment ?

4. If not, is it the intention of the government to adopt such a system ?

5. Would any action such as proposed in this article, that such meats be prohibited by the British government, affect shipments of Canadian products even though duly inspected by Canadian government officials and properly certified to ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) :

1. The item substantially as quoted was published in the Canadian papers at the time of its appearance in England and was then read by the Minister of Agriculture.

2. No.

3. Yes. All meat food products prepared in establishments engaged in export or interprovincial trade are, under the provisions of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, subjected to thorough and careful inspection by officers specially trained for this duty. All such meat food products, as well as the boxes or other packages containing them, are duly marked before leaving the establishment in which they are prepared, and in case of products destined for export by sea, provision is made for the issue by the inspector in charge of the establishment of origin, of a certificate of inspection and approval which must be filed with the customs authorities before clearance can be granted to the vessel carrying such products.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. At the present this is a matter of conjecture, and in any case, rests entirely with the British authorities.

MAILS—PORT AU PIQUE TO CASTLEREAGH.

Mr. STANFIELD asked :

1. When was the contract for carrying mails from Port au Pique to Castlereagh, Colchester county, last awarded ?

2. How many tenders were received, and what was the name and amount of each tenderer ?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) :

1. 1st July, 1900.

2. Four. Abner A. Crowe, $65 ; Robert Collins, $80 ; James Leet (starting point Portapique), $94 ; Robert Gamble, $99.56. The first three tenderers not being in a position to carry out the conditions of the contract on account of their not residing at Castlereagh. the starting point, the contract was awarded to Robert Gamble.

GOVERNMENT COAL LANDS.

Mr. AMES asked :

In respect of the undermentioned coal lands leased by the government, who was, in each instance, the original grantee, what subsequent assignments have been reported, and who is the present owner or occupant:—South ½ section 10, township 10, range 16, west of 4th meridian; south half-section 2, township 10, range 17, west of 4th meridian ; north ½ section 33, township 9, range 17, west of 4th meridian ; east ½ section 35, township 9, range 16, west of 4th meridian.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). No leases have been issued by the government of any of the coal lands above described, but sales have been made of these four half-sections for coal mining purposes as follows :

South, ½ section 10, township 10, range 16, west 4th meridian. Coal mining rights sold to Alexandrina Aubin. No assignments recorded, so that the sale is still in the name of the original grantee.

South ½ section 2, township 10, range 17, west 4th meridian. Coal mining rights sold to John R. Haig; subsequently assigned to the Tabor Coal Mining Company, limited, who in turn assigned to the Canada West Coal and Coke Company, Limited (now the Canada West Coal Company, Limited). The present owners, therefore, are the Canada West Coal Company, Limited.

North ½ section 33, township 9, range 17, west 4th meridian. Sold to W. Probert and W. R. Stevens; subsequently assigned to the Independent Coal Company, Limited, and now stands recorded in the name of these assignees.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND BRANCH LINES.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens, P.E.I.) moved:

For a copy of all corrrespondence, telegrams, reports, memoranda, resolutions, and any other information in possession of the government or any member or official thereof, respecting the construction of branch railway lines in Prince Edward Island.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the attention of the House to a few words in regard to the construction of branch lines of railway in Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island is geographically situated differently from any other province in Canada. It also occupies a very peculiar position in regard to railway construction. Prior to its union with Canada the island was far in advance of any other section of Canada in this respect. The people of that province believed in railways, and comparatively had more railways under construction than any other part of Canada, as will be seen by reference to the statistics showing the number of miles then constructed in Canada. Two hundred miles of railway had been constructed at the cost of the people of the province before they entered confederation. While the rest of Canada had only one mile of railway for every 1,000 people Prince Edward Island had under construction a mile for every 480 people. But to-day the position is reversed, and for some strange reason which I cannot explain Prince Edward Island has fallen behind in the race. She does not to-day compare as favourably with the rest of Canada as she did before confederation. The situation may be partly explained by the fact that the railways which have been built since we entered confederation have been built largely at the expense of the federal government, while the 200 miles of railway under construction in Prince Edward Island at the time she entered the union was built at the expense of the province, and the province justly complains that railway construction there does not keep pace with railway construction in the rest of Canada. It is undeniable that confederation could never had been brought about without the construction of railways to bind the various provinces together. When the four original provinces were confederated Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would not have agreed to enter the union without the construction of the Intercolonial to connect the provinces so that they could have commercial relations with the rest of the country, and without such a link the union would have been of no earthly benefit, an amalgamation of those provinces would have been impossible. The result of this argument by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was that the Dominion government undertook the construction of the Intercolonial. Similarly, a little later on, when British Columbia entered confederation, that province would not enter the union until she had a guarantee of railway connection with the rest of Canada; she insisted, she drove a hard and fast bargain with the Dominion government of that day that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be extended to British Columbia.

Every hon. member can see that in my province the situation is different. That province at the time she entered confederation had under construction 200 miles of railway. The argument used by New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia would have been a just argument to be used by Prince Edward Island; but the Dominion government drove a hard and fast bargain with that province and saddled it with the cost of her 200 miles of railway. The cost to the province of this railway was $3,144,214. It was a very heavy burden for a small province of about 100,000 people to assume, and I have no doubt, and hon. members will agree with me that it was a huge mistake to burden that small province with the cost of these 200 miles. The fact is that ever since confederation the province has been losing the interest on that money.

In 1873, when Prince Edward Island entered confederation, according to the terms of union, a debt allowance was made to the province of $4,701,050. Accordingly Prince Edward Island would be entitled to the interest on the whole of this sum. But, there was deducted from that sum of $4,701,050 the sum of $3,144,738.11 for railway construction in the province. Any hon. member can easily see that Prince Edward Island was not dealt with at confederation in the same way as the other provinces. That province, at its entrance into confederation, was charged with over $3,000,000 which should have been assumed by the Dominion. The cost of those 200 miles of railway in Prince Edward Island, when we entered the union, should be assumed by Canada as part of the Intercolonial Railway in the same way as they did in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Hon. members may remember that it was said here a few nights ago by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) that there could have been no union between the upper and lower provinces without the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. The Railway Act, would never have passed in Prince Edward Island unless it had been conceded and agreed that branch lines should be built to extend all over the province. Small as the province is it is densely populated and there is no comparison between its resources and those of any other section of Canada. Knowing the advantage of railways the province, should never have come into confederation, without having been equipped with those branch lines for which we have been contending in this House for the last twenty or thirty years. There is no doubt that if the province had remained out of confederation these branch lines which we are asking for and which were promised before confederation would have been built by the local government as well as the main lines. But, we came into the union of Canada. It was assumed when we came into the union that Canada was not to engage in the building of branch lines, that the building of local lines of railway all over Canada should be assumed by the provinces because it was said this was the constitution of the country. Of course, it is the constitution of the country, but when the constitution stands in the way of some of the larger provinces then the constitution is said to be wrong and down it goes. You will find, Mr. Speaker, that when we went into the union the argument which was used against us, in order to keep the Dominion from paying for our road, was that it was a road of local importance only, and they quoted a section of the British North Amercia Act to prove their contention. If you turn to section 92 of the British North America Act you will find these words:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:
> Subsection 10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes: Lines of steam and other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others, of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

Those are the terms of confederation, but the constitution does not appear to be very binding sometimes upon some governments. The government says that the constitution is very sacred, and that you cannot change it, but, when it suits some of the larger provinces, it does not stand in their way very long, and this clause, which is part of the constitution of the country, did not stand very long in the way but was perfectly ineffective when railways were required to be built all over the country and subsidies amounting to $40,000,000 have been paid in consequence. My province did not reap one dollar of benefit from these large expenditures. Yet, the statistics of the Railway Department are used against my province in such a way as to lead hon. members of this House and the public generally to believe that in that province larger expenditures have been made than actually have been made. I do not suppose that I can refer to a former debate, but I can quote the words of the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson). A few evenings ago the hon. ex-Minister of Railways spoke as follows :—

There have been very large sums of money expended in Prince Edward Island for the construction of railways, I think some $7,000,000 was expended in the construction of railways in that province, and they have railways in every direction.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that $7,000,000 was expended by this government for railway construction in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. EMMERSON. I understand that to be the total expended on the island.

Mr. A. MARTIN. The total expended by whom ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total expended by the Dominion, or, if originally expended by the province, repaid by the Dominion.

These are the statements which we have to meet in this House, statements which are entirely erroneous and statements which are contradicted in one page of the report of the Department of Railways and Canals and carried out on the next page. I see the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) in his place, and I hope that for the credit of the department, of which he has just taken charge, he will remedy these discrepancies. If he turns to page 10 he will find this paragraph :

The total government expenditure on railways prior to and since confederation, July, 1867, up to March 31, 1907, amounts, on capital account, to $162,050,456.79, which includes the sum of $25,000,000 granted (from capital) to the Canadian Pacific Railway company for its main line. In addition there has been expended from the consolidated fund a total of $167,210,490.44, which includes $35,578,502.54 paid as railway subsidies in addition to the above to the C.P.R., making a total expenditure of $329,260,974. Of this amount the sum of $13,881,460.65 was expended on construction works prior to confederation on portions of what is now the I.C.R. system. This amount does not include the annual payment of $119,700 to the provincial government of Quebec, being interest at the rate of 5 per cent on the sum of $2,394,000 up to 1905 granted by 47 Vic., ch. 8 (1884), nor the annual payment of $107,730, being interest at the rate of 4½ per cent since and including 1905, on the said sum of $2,394,000, for the line of railway between Ottawa and Quebec which sum was transferred to the public debt as a liability, and is dealt with by the Finance Department. (See Public Accounts 1893-94, page 10, and 1906, page 79).

Of this amount—I want the Minister of Railways to note it—$13,881,460.65 was expended prior to confederation on the portion of what is now the Intercolonial Railway. I want next to compare that statement with the statement on page 127 of Railway Statistics, and when the Minister of Railways compares those two figures, and compares some other figures I will give him, I think I will be able to show him that the hon. members of this House are misled by statements contained in this report. At page 127 there is the statement that $7,307,299.21 was expended by the Dominion government in Prince Edward Island. I am going to show the Minister of Railways that that sum is partly made up by the Dominion government taking credit for what was paid by the province itself previous to confederation. Now, I want the Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister to rectify this. We have been asking this government to correct these figures from year to year, and yet here we have published a statement which misled the ex-Minister of Railways the other night. I remember a back-bencher handing him a railway report to bear out his statement that over $7,000,000 was spent in Prince Edward Island by the Dominion government. From that sum of over $7,000,000 I will tell you what you have to deduct, and I will prove it out of the railway report itself. The first amount you have to deduct from that $7,307,299 is $3,114,735.11 which was paid by the province previous to confederation. The next amount you find included in this $7,000,000 is the Hillsborough bridge. Well, every person who knows anything at all about railway matters knows that the province of Prince Edward Island agreed to pay the interest on one-half of the estimated cost of the construction of that bridge, and they are paying it. But in this statement in the report of the department the whole of the cost of that bridge is charged against the province. Why is there not a note to show that the province is paying the interest on one-half of what it originally was supposed would be the cost of construction? Does the Minister of Railways think it is fair to my province that an official statement should be put in the hands of members saying that $7,307,299 was spent in Prince Edward Island by the Dominion government? It is no wonder that some members on the other side of the House get a false impression from it. If $7,000,000 were spent in Prince Edward Island by the Dominion government, I think we would have nearly our full share, but when I am through with this report I will have proven that not one half of that $7,000,000 has been spent in Prince Edward Island by this Dominion government. The next amount you have to deduct from that $7,307,299 is $400,000, which represents one-half of the cost of the Hillsborough bridge, on which the province has agreed to pay interest, and on which it is paying interest every half year to the Dominion government. But I am not going to admit that even the balance of this $7,000,000 was expended by the Dominion government in Prince Edward Island. The Hillsborough bridge was to be built for $800,000 at the outside, but on account of the carelessness of the department and looseness in giving contracts that bridge is to cost $1,800,000, and you want to charge it all against the province of Prince Edward Island. For my part, I would only allow to be charged against the province the original estimate of what that bridge would cost, and if the contract was let fairly, and if the government had not interfered with the site of the bridge and changed it in order to suit the whims of some of their party in Prince Edward Island, that bridge could have been built for the original estimate of $800,000 made by the Public Works Department. But the government had a pet down in Prince Edward Island, and they changed the site of the bridge from one place to another, and the consequence is that the bridge cost a great deal more than it would have cost had it been placed where it should have been built. Then instead of having one and a quarter million dollars charged against the Murray Harbour railway they should have about the one-half of it charged against the railway. However, I am going to make a very fair allowance for these two sums, and I will say that there is an over-expenditure on that railway and on that bridge of $1,000,000. Now take these sums, first the $3,144,214 paid by the province for railways and add $400,000 the province pays on the bridge, and you will have $4,514,735 of expenditure attributable to the province, which would leave the expenditure in Prince Edward by the Dominion government at $2,893,554.13 in place of $7,307,299.21. But suppose I omit that one million dollars over-expenditure on the bridge and railway, there is still only $3,000,000 expended by the Dominion government in Prince Edward Island instead of $7,000,000. I ask in all fairness, I ask the Prime Minister and I ask the Minister of Railways to correct these mistakes in the report of the department, which are misleading to the members of the House and to the people of Canada generally. I will turn now to page 39 of the railway report, which bears out what I say. At page 39 the Minister of Railways will find that on the Prince Edward Island Railway the province expended prior to confederation $3,114,735. But that is not all. The Dominion government when they took over the Prince Edward Island Railway as a gift made a hard and fast bargain and said the province would have to equip the railway and add rolling stock to it, and when they added the rolling stock the expenditure on the railway by the province was $3,144,000 instead of $3,114,000. Turn then to page 47 of the railway report and see if you do not find a contradiction there. At page 47, under the heading of 'Recapitulation. Government Railways,' you find that the Dominion government expenditure prior to confederation was $13,881,000. Now, in that $13,881,000 is included over $3,000,000 expended in my province, and it is put here as if the expenditure was made in 1867, whereas the province of Prince Edward Island did not come into confederation until the year 1873. That $13,881,466.65 is made up as follows: In round figures, $3,000,000 spent in my province and $10,000,000 spent in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. But the expenditure in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was made about 1867 and the expenditure in my province was not made until 1873, whereas in this report, at page 67, the expenditure in my province is given as being made in 1867. I would advise the Railway Department in all seriousness to follow the example of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and, if they have not any experts in this country able to keep books, to bring some from the United States as was done by the Marine Department even if they have to pay them $100 or $200 a day as they did then and get their books into a condition in which the people can understand them. At present these reports are as contradictory as they can be; I might even characterize them as dishonest. But we have not only that to contend with. It is bad enough to have the report of the Department of Railways placed in the hands of hon. members of this House and sent broadcast over the land with the statement that $7,000,000 has been spent on railways in my province, but the same statement is repeated in the Year Book of 1905, the last I suppose which has been issued. On page 292 is a tabulated statement headed 'Expenditure for Construction of Government Roads to June 30, 1905,' and you will notice what are called government roads:

Intercolonial	$68,038,703
Cape Breton	3,860,679
Oxford and New Glasgow	1,949,063
Eastern extension	1,324,043
Drummond county	1,464,000
Montreal and European short line	333,943
Canada Eastern	800,000
Carleton branch	48,410
Prince Edward Island	6,719,529
Canadian Pacific Railway	62,785,320
Annapolis & Digby	660,683
Yukon	283,324
Grand Trunk Pacific	784,741
Governor General's car	17,956
	$149,070,394

Now, you may say what has that to do with branch railways in Prince Edward Island ? It has much to do with them. It has been said time and again across the floor of this House that a great deal of money has been spent in Prince Edward Island. Well, I think I have proven that those statements are incorrect, and that not half of the amount stated has been expended. Well, what do we want in that province? We want to have carried out the original scheme which the province had in view before confederation, that is, to get the province equipped with branch lines. This would involve not a very large expenditure. I have here a return, which was brought down to this House a few years ago, giving the account for surveys in Prince Edward Island in the year 1904, and there has been nothing done in regard to these branch lines since then. I want the government to prepare a comprehensive scheme for these branch lines, and take the question out of the muddle of party politics. The revenue of the late government was not large; it was not half as large as the revenue of the government today; yet that government proposed a comprehensive scheme which would have satisfied the whole province, and I would advise this government to follow their example and not leave this question of branch lines to haphazard, contenting themselves with having some surveys made immediately before election and as soon as the election is over abandoning them. In 1896 a Bill was prepared by the Hon. Mr. Haggart, then Minister of Railways, entitled 'An Act relating to Railways in Prince Edward Island.' This Bill was based on a resolution of which Mr. Haggart gave notice on the 21st day of April, 1896. That resolution is as follows :

Mr. Haggart moved that the House resolve itself into committee to-morrow, to consider following proposed resolution :—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to build and operate as part of the Prince Edward Island Railway the following lines of railway, that is to say :

(a) From Southport to Murray Harbour South, with cross line connecting with the Prince Edward Island Railway between New Perth and Cardigan stations, touching at or near Montague bridge ;

(b) From Souris or Harmony station to Elmira ;

(c) From a point between Loyalty junction and York station to Cove Head, and thence to Oyster bed bridge ;

(d) From Emerald junction to Stanley bridge touching at or near Clifton ;

(e) From Summerside to Richmond bay ;

(f) From some point at or near O'Leary's station, to some point on the western coast between Brae and Cape Wolfe ;

(g) From Wiltshire to Victoria.

Here is an estimate of what these lines will cost :

Length of Branches.	Miles.
(a) Belfort and Murray Harbour Ry...	60
(b) Elmira branch..	8
(c) Rustico branch..	9
(d) Stanley bridge branch..	7
(e) Summerside and Richmond bay.. ..	3
(f) O'Leary station branch..	8
(g) Branch from Wiltshire to Victoria...	10
Total..	105

Estimates of Cost.

47 miles of six short branches at $8,000 per mile..	$ 376,000
Three locomotives at $9,000 each, and five combined passenger and baggage cars at $5,000..	52,000
Sixty miles from Southport to Murray Harbour, including rolling stock, engine houses, &c., at $11,000..	660,000
Total..	$1,088,000

I am sure the Minister of Railways will be astonished when he finds that the estimated cost amounted to only about $11,000 a mile. Hon. members will remember that the term of parliament expired in that year by effluxion of time, and the government was held up and was prevented from having its estimates passed. And they were only able to pass a few of their estimates. The Bill introduced was this :

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Did the hon. member (Mr. A. Martin) say that a Bill was introduced ?

Mr. A. MARTIN. I said that the Bill was prepared on the basis of these resolutions of which the Minister of Railways gave notice.

Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

1. The Minister of Railways and Canals may locate, construct, equip and work in Prince Edward Island the following lines of railways, extensions or branch lines :—

(a) From Southport to Murray Harbour South, with a cross line, connecting with the Prince Edward Island Railway between Peakes and Cardigan stations, touching at or near Montague bridge.

This branch is pretty nearly completed. It must be built westerwardly from Montague to Belfast.

(b) From Souris or Harmony station to Elmira;

(c) From a point between Royalty junction and York stations to Cove head and then to Oyster bed bridge;

(d) From Emerald junction to Stanley bridge, touching at or near Clifton;

(e) From Summerside to Richmond bay;

(f) From some point at or near O'Leary's station to some point on the western coast, between Cape Rae and Cape Wolfe;

(g) From North Wiltshire to Victoria.

2. The said lines of railways, extension or branch lines should be part of the Prince Edward Island Railway.

3. For the purposes aforesaid ; the said minister and those acting under him should have and may exercise all the powers vested in them with respect to railways to which the Government Railway Act, chapter thirty-eight of the revised statutes applies, all the provisions of which Act should extend and apply to the lines, extensions and branches in the first section of this Act mentioned, which should be held to be constructed and worked under the said Act.

Now, I think that the government, instead of proceeding as they have done for the last ten years, coming down at every election with a survey here and a survey there, should adopt some comprehensive plan and carry it out on the lines of this resolution or something like it. What is it that we want in Prince Edward Island? I think that the construction of sixty miles of railway would satisfy all the wants of the province at present. I do not think that anybody in Prince Edward Island or out of it will question my statement when I say that the north shore of Prince Edward Island would be the finest fishing ground in British North America if proper facilities for carrying on this industry were provided. The north shore has had good harbours, but they are filling up with sand. Twenty years ago there were fleets of twelve and fourteen vessels sailing out of harbours where to-day there are not three. I am glad that the Prime Minister is in his place to hear what I say, because I would like him to understand the position in which those people are. At present the fishermen who spend the day fishing on the north shore of Prince Edward Island must spend another day in taking their fish from twenty to thirty miles to Charlottetown. Now, if there were railway connection with the north side of Prince Edward Island, this delay would be overcome and these very important fishing grounds could be worked at profit to the people. At present, it is not a lucrative fishery. The first step that the government should take would be to adopt some definite and comprehensive plan that would assure us of some practical result. There should be branches from New London and from Rustico and these should be the first branches undertaken. Then, on the south side, there is the branch from a point near North Wiltshire to Crapaud and Victoria. The government should take this matter up clear of party politics, so that we should not be led every election to fight over a few miles of railway here and there. I have returns here of all the surveys made in 1904; half a dozen of them—made to catch a vote here and there, and nothing done since. The same was true in 1900—and nothing done. I suppose the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows nothing about these things but he should see to it that this kind of thing is stopped. Whatever the government intends to do, let them come down with a scheme that will satisfy the province, and then let them say plainly what they will do one year, what they will do the next year and so on until the completion of the work. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was in Prince Edward Island a few years ago engaged in the tariff inquiry. He was acting Minister of Railways at that time. I believe that a committee waited upon him to urge upon him the construction of the branch line to New London. As a result of that meeting, leading men representing the two contending routes of the proposed road came to an agreement in order to bring about, if possible, the construction of the line. This agreement is signed as witness by Mr. A. B. Warburton, the candidate for Queen's county in the government interest:

Memorandum of agreement made this ninth day of January, A.D., 1903, between William Campbell, John S. Cousins, Donald Johnstone and Edward Warren, representing the Long river proposed route for the New London Railway, on the one side, and James Andrew Campbell, James M. McLeod, Leslie Woodside and George Simpson, representing the southern or proposed Emerald route for the same railroad; we mutually agree, for the present, to drop all reference to the route of the proposed railroad, and to unite in pressing upon Mr. Fielding, as a member of the government, and upon the government itself, that they place a vote in the estimates for the building of the New London branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway; such vote we request Mr. Fielding and the government to have placed in the estimates, for this session: In pursuance of that agreement, we mutually agree to press upon the government and the Department of Railways, to make it a condition of this vote that the government, or the Department of Railways, should send down a competent, independent engineer, who has not hitherto been over the route.

That is the trouble with the engineers when they get down there, some politician gets hold of his coat tail and pulls one way while the other pulls him the other way. When they were building the Belfast railway, I went to see the engineer surveying the route. I asked him which way the road was going. He said, 'I can't tell; wait till I have seen some of the government politicians, then I will tell you.' These people saw that what was wanted was an independent engineer.

——to thoroughly survey and investigate the bridges and rivers upon the proposed routes, so as to arrive at a conclusion as to practicability and feasibility, from a financial and practical standpoint, of the two routes, with a view to building the road where it can be built to best suit the people and the traffic of that section of country; such road not to be contracted for until such survey and report is made.

Dated this ninth day of January, A.D., 1903.

This agreement was evidently come to with the consent of the acting Minister of Railways of that time. It would require only a small sum to decide the question between the routes and make that survey. But, apparently, the whole matter has been forgotten.

Now, there is one other thing to which I wish to refer before I sit down, a matter in regard to which we are not making the progress that we should. Last year I asked the Minister of Railways what he proposed to do with regard to building branch lines in Prince Edward Island. He said that the government intended having some motor cars built, and that if these were successful they woud build all the branches proposed in that province. These motor cars were to have been tested on the Prince Edward Island last December, but we have not yet heard a word about them. But whether we get these motor cars yet or not, we are entitled to this expenditure. Prince Edward Island is in a very peculiar position. We have to pay our share of the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway in common with every other province, although the road, which goes through every other province, does not touch the fringe of our territory. All the other provinces have benefited by the construction of that road, which serves as a colonization road for the benefit of every province except our own. Then we are now building a transcontinental railway, which will not touch Prince Edward at all, but its share of the cost Prince Edward Island will nevertheless have to bear. That road will go through every province except our own. The same remark may be applied to the Intercolonial Railway. That road goes through Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, but does not touch Prince Edward Island. The government are now going to build the Georgian Bay canal and a railway to Hudson bay besides spending a $130,000,000 on the transcontinental. How much do all these expenditures on all these roads amount to? I have gone through the figures and estimates, and the amount I arrived at is over $600,000,000, not one dollar of which has been or is to be spent in Prince Edward Island. Nevertheless we have to bear one fifty-fifth of the cost, since we compose one-fifty-fifth part of the population of the Dominion. Prince Edward Island has therefore to contribute over $10,000,000 for railway construction in the other provinces, the interest on which is at least $300,000 a year. Yet although we have to pay this heavy taxation, the government cannot afford to build a few miles of branch railways in our province. In reply to our urgent representations, we are told that they have to look at big things and are too busily occupied with these to give any attention to small matters. I am still in hopes, however, that the First Minister will look through these railway reports; and when he sees how unjustly we have been treated, will see that some fair share of fair play is given to the little province of Prince Edward Island by the building of these branch lines.

Mr. A. A. LEFURGEY (Prince, P.E.I.). The subject which my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House is not only of importance to Prince Edward Island but to Canada at large, inasmuch as the development of any one province is of advantage to the Dominion as a whole. My hon. friend deserves congratulation on the manner in which he has put our case. He has gone into a great deal of detail regarding the construction of railways in Prince Edward Island from the day she entered confederation. He has pointed out that when we entered confederation, the cost of the Prince Edward Island Railway which amounted to $3,144,000, was charged up against our province. When we consider the heavy expenditures made upon the government system of railways, the Intercolonial Railway, in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Quebec, besides the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the subsidies in various other railways in Canada, we cannot but conclude that gross injustice was done Prince Edward Island in charging this amount against her when she entered confederation. It has been admitted by the ex-Minister of Railways on this side of the House that the $150,000 per annum, being the interest on this $3,144,000, should be returned to Prince Edward Island in the shape of expenditure on the construction of branch lines in that province, so as to compensate her for the loss in revenue caused by this amount being charged up against her. I have myself on several occasions brought this matter to the attention of the House. It certainly was never contemplated when the Prince Edward Island Railway was being built by our local government before confederation, that that railway was to be merely a trunk line of a few hundred miles without any feeders. On the contrary a number of branch lines were then in contemplation, and when the Dominion government took over that trunk railway as a government road, their intention certainly must have been to build branch lines to the outlying districts in order to supply feeders to the trunk line and thus follow the programme which was mapped out before confederation. This was recognized to some extent by the Conservative party building the branch line to Cape Traverse. In 1896 the Conservative government brought down a resolution for the construction of a number of branch lines and drafted a Bill to that effect, but that Bill, owing to the expiry of the parliamentary term, was never passed. The expression of the opinion of the House at that time, certainly on the Conservative side—and I have no doubt it had strong supporters on the other side—was that justice should be done Prince Edward Island by the construction of these 105 miles of railway. Since then we have had one of these branches built to Murray Harbour, but there are other portions of the island which are just as much in need of small branch lines for the convenience of the coasting districts, not supplied with harbours, and where harbours cannot be built and equipped except at great cost. There are a number of these sections which should be supplied with railways—the building of which would not only be an act of justice to the people of Prince Edward Island, but a paying investment as profitable feeders to the trunk line. Among these branches is one down to Crapaud by way of Tryon.

Another very important branch that I have brought to the attention of this House is from the main line near O'Leary to the west shore. A sum of money was put in the estimates in 1904 for surveys in this district, and as Mr. Martin has said, the government becomes active and seeks to spend such appropriations for surveys about election time, and, judging from the correspondence that has been brought down, with reference to the O'Leary branch, an effort was made to so expend it as to give the greatest benefit to the government candidate. Surveys have been made in this way at different times, and in different parts of the island, always on the eve of an election; and invariably after the election the question of branch lines for Prince Edward Island becomes a dead letter. I would sincerely hope that the government has some other motive in spending money and making these surveys than mere party gain, than fooling the people and using the money and the implied promise for election purposes. Their engineers must have found that these branch lines would traverse populous districts and would well repay construction. In addition to being a great advantage to the people who would be enabled to get their products to market. I hope that this session the Prime Minister will bring down estimates for the construction of these branches. He has the surveys in the department and he should bring down appropriations for the building of at least two or three of these lines. My hon. friend (Mr. A. Martin) has mentioned a very important one to New London, and there is also the one I have suggested, in the west part of the island from West Point to O'Leary. Both of these lines should be constructed at once.

The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) has advocated taking over the branch lines throughout the province of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia which are held by private corporations, and using them as feeders for the trunk line of the Intercolonial Railway. This is a correct policy and should have been followed from the inception of the Intercolonial Railway. But the situation in Prince Edward Island is such that a similar policy is even more necessary to secure the success of branch lines in that province. The Intercolonial Railway according to agreement was to be built only from Rivière du Loup to Truro, but as the country developed and we had to bring the maritime provinces into connection with the great west, the Intercolonial Railway was extended by successive governments to Sydney, to Pictou, to Halifax, to St. John, and into Montreal; and if this government had followed the advice of the Conservative party before the last election they would have extended it to the great lakes, and I hope that some time this will be done. Branch lines cannot be operated in Prince Edward Island economically and with profit to the people of the province unless they are built by the government and operated in connection with the main line. and with a proper system of this kind the Prince Edward Island Railway would be the greatest feeder to the Intercolonial Railway that you could hope to obtain. I believe that the Prince Edward Island Railway and the Intercolonial Railway should be operated as parts of the same system. Nominally I suppose they are, but it should be an actual union.

I hope that the right hon. the Prime Minister will carry out the intentions he so grandly expressed before becoming Prime Minister when he said that if he attained power Prince Edward Island would be connected with the Intercolonial Railway by a tunnel under Northumberland Straits. I shall not elaborate this scheme to-day as we will have an opportunity of discussing it more in detail at a later date; but I state with sound assurance that the construction of branch lines in Prince Edward Island and the connecting of the Prince Edward Island Railway by tunnel with the Intercolonial Raiway would be justified by the increased traffic that would be secured by the Intercolonial Railway and the increased usefulness and business of the Prince Edward Island Railway. At present the people of Prince Edward Island have to rely to a large extent on sailing craft and steamers to convey their products to their natural markets, and as we have only a few short months from harvest time until the close of navigation in which to place our products we are at a great disadvantage. Almost all of this would accrue to the benefit of Prince Edward Island Railway and Intercolonial Railway.

Our people suffer greatly owing to the high freight rates they have to pay on the railway. Our local rates are very much higher than corresponding rates on the Intercolonial Railway. I have here a table of the rates and I find that from Tignish to Charlottetown, 117 miles, the rates are higher than from Halifax to Amherst on the Intercolonial Railway, a distance of 138 miles. This will be seen from the following table :—

Class of goods.. ..	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
Tignish to Charlottetown, 117 miles..	32	26	24	20	16	14	12	13	12	10
Halifax to Amherst, 138 miles	29	26	22	18	15	14	11	12	11	9
Difference against P.E.I..	3	2	2	2	1	0	1	1	1	1
148 miles on Prince Edward Island Railway costs ..	34	30	26	21	17	18	15	14	13	11.
148 miles from Halifax to Sackville costs..	31	28	23	20	16	15	13	14	12	10
Difference against P.E.I..	3	2	3	1	1	3	3	0	1	1

This illustrates the disadvantages under which the people of Prince Edward Island labour in regard to the local haul. Besides that we have the intermediate haul across the Straits and the haul on the Intercolonial Railway. We have the three short hauls which make it almost impossible for us to compete in our natural markets.

From returns that were brought down, I find that the rate on grain from Montreal to Halifax is 9 cents per 100 pounds in carload lots, while the rate from Tignish to Halifax is in the neighbourhood of 26 cents per 100 pounds in carload lots. The natural markets of the people of Prince Edward Island are in the maritime provinces. Most of our products go to Sydney, Halifax, Sackville, Truro and Amherst, and other points along the lines of the Intercolonial Railway in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and it will readily be seen that the people of Prince Edward Island are up against a hard proposition when they have not only the stiff local rates on their own island, but these two additional short hauls across the Straits and over the Intercolonial Railway before they get their products on the market.

The hon. member for Queens has gone very thoroughly into this case and presented a fair statement of the situation with regard to the right of Prince Edward Island to some consideration in the matter of more railway facilities. I may say, that, while I do not wish to go into the figures, when we entered into confederation it was expected that certain sums were to be expended on the Intercolonial Railway, the canals and the Canadian Pacific Railway. These sums were expended and since that time Prince Edward Island has patiently contributed to the millions upon millions that have been expended in different parts of the Dominion although none of these great works have touched the shores or been of any direct advantage to Prince Edward Island. As the hon. gentleman stated, these sums total in direct payments $474,000,000 nearly, and if you add to that the expenditure of $150,000,000 on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the expenditures on great schemes like the Georgian Bay canal and other large works that are in contemplation you will have nearly $800,000,000 that Prince Edward Island has contributed indirectly to and will contribute to. We simply want a fair measure of justice, and I think the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would be perfectly justified in giving to Prince Edward Island at least 50 or 60 miles of branch lines to satisfy the present needs of the province.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, the fact that when Prince Edward Island entered confederation she was charged with the full amount expended upon railway construction in that province and that this amount is probably much larger, according to area and population than that expended by any other province, might, I think, establish a fair case for consideration as to whether or not that province should be reimbursed in some way for that amount, or for a portion of it at all events. Of course, we quite understand that the delegates who negotiated the terms of union agreed that this amount should be charged to the province at the time that we went into confederation, but, in all probability, they did not expect that such large sums would be expended for railway construction by the Dominion government in the other provinces of the Dominion. That, I believe, would be a fair subject for consideration. I think that every fair-minded man in this Dominion will admit that the government of the day should give to the people of Prince Edward Island all reasonable railway facilities for travelling and for marketing their products, and all fair-minded men who will consider the subject at all, will admit that the present government has done everything that could reasonably be expected from any government in that regard since it obtained the administration of affairs in this country. I did not intend to say anything that would partake of a political nature on this question, but I noticed that the hon. mover of this resolution (Mr. A. Martin) went out of his way, I thought, to make some party political capital and to unfairly and adversely criticise the present administration. Therefore, I think I am justified in placing the facts of the case as they appear to me before the House. Since the present government came into power they have practically reconstructed the old Prince Edward Island Railway. In addition to that they have built about 60 miles of new railway, whereas their predecessors built about 11 miles of new railway in 18 years. The present government, I say, have practically reconstructed the original railway; they have provided largely increased terminal facilities at Summerside, built new stations at Alberton and Tignish, largely increased the terminal facilities at Georgetown, extended the railway wharf, improved and enlarged it, built a new station and freight shed there, straightened the line in many places, taking the worst curves out of it, built the Belfast and Murray Harbour branch, the Montague branch, about 60 miles of railway, constructed the Hillsboro bridge, perhaps one of the largest railway bridges in the Dominion, built a new station at Charlottetown, and are building at the present time car shops, machine shops and a railway wharf and are enlarging and practically rebuilding the railway wharf at Souris. All these improvements have gone on and they represent an expenditure in all of about $3,500,000. My hon. friend was, I think, unfair in his criticism as regards the Hillsboro bridge, and he was unfair in his criticism a few days ago as regards the construction of the Murray Harbour Railway. He stated to the House this afternoon that the first estimate of that bridge was $800,000. That may be correct, but a far different bridge was built from the one that was first estimated upon —a far more costly and a far better bridge; in fact it was very difficult to make an estimate at all at that time and I think that when the first estimate was made it was not intended to have a traffic bridge at all but simply a railway bridge. Of that I am not quite certain, because I have not the papers before me, but this I do know, that the character of the bridge was materially changed, and that a very much better bridge was constructed than the one originally contemplated. My hon. friend was unfair in his criticism in regard to that.

My hon. friend who moved this resolution was unfair in his criticism of the present government in regard to the surveys that were made on Prince Edward Island by the government in the year 1904. These were not the first surveys that were made in that province for the construction of branch railways. I remember quite well that in the county which I have the honour to represent, a survey was made in 1882 for a branch railway from Harmony, or Souris to Elmira, and although the late government remained in power for fourteen years after that there was nothing more done in regard to the construction of that branch railway. We must also remember that notwithstanding the evidence that the present government gave of their desire to meet all the reasonable wishes of the people of Prince Edward Island in regard to providing them with railway facilities the majority of the people of that province. particularly in the counties of Queens and Prince, at the last general election disapproved of the policy of the government in that regard.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES

Mr. BLAIN. The general policy of the government.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Perhaps so; but the very section of the country through which the Murray Harbour Railway runs gave a considerable vote against the government candidate, thus clearly demonstrating that the people of that section disapproved of the government extending the railway facilities of the province. My hon. friend from Queens (Mr. Martin) who moved the resolution, referred to a Bill which he said the late government introduced proposing to build several branch railways in Prince Edward Island. He subsequently withdrew that statment and he said the Bill had been prepared but was not introduced, and that it would have been introduced if the resolutions which the then Minister of Railways put upon the Order Paper had been passed,

Mr. LEFURGEY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the hon. gentleman for Queens (Mr. Martin) made a deliberate statement to try and mislead the House with regard to that Bill?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I am simply stating what he said, and I do not know whether it was his intention to mislead the House or not.

Mr. LEFURGEY. You know very well it was not.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I am simply stating what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) said and the members of the House and my hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) can draw their own conclusions. The hon. member (Mr. Martin) said that the Bill had been introduced, and later on he said that the Bill had been prepared and would have been introduced if the resolutions which the then Minister of Railways put upon the Order Paper had been passed by the House. Well, you know there is a history about these resolutions and it is a strange history. As I have already said, the question of building branch lines of railway in Prince Edward Island and of giving greater railway facilities to that province had been before the people and before the government for a great many years. And in my estimation it was a strange thing that the then Minister of Railways should give notice on the 21st of April, that on the morrow he would move the House into Committee of the Whole on certain resolutions to build these branch lines of railway in Prince Edward Island. The notice was for the 22nd of April, and parliament expired by efflux of time on the 24th of April. After eighteen years in power the Conservatives gave themselves just two days to get the railway resolutions through parliament, and to found a Bill upon them which would also have to be passed. That is a strange thing; and it has always appeared to me to be a strange thing. And stranger still, when the morrow came the then Minister of Railways forgot all about his resolutions, or at all events he never mentioned the matter, and the next day was the 23rd of April, and there was no mention of it then, of course parliament expired on the 24th and that was the end of the resolutions. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been regaled to-day by the hon. member for Queens with the history of that still-born attempt to fool the people of Prince Edward Island in regard to the building of branch railway lines. It was perhaps the most transparent attempt ever made by a government to lead the people of a province astray in regard to such an important matter.

Now, Sir, I will freely admit that a further extension of the railway system in Prince Edward Island would be of great advantage to the people of that province, but I do think we can well believe that the Liberal government which has shown its good faith by what it has already done may be safely entrusted to complete the work it has nearly finished, and to build these few short branch lines that are needed to to complete the system. The present government has done so much in that respect, and has so often shown its interest in the people of that province in regard to this matter—and of course if there were other matters under consideration I might make out even a better case—I say the government has done so much already, that the people of that province may well trust it to complete the work that it has so nearly finished and that it was dealt with so energetically during the few years it has been in power. I do not believe that when the people of that province take this matter calmly into consideration they can come to any other conclusion than that this government will extend all reasonable railway facilities to that province so as to enable the people to market their products and to freely travel from one portion of the province to another. I myself give these reasons for the faith that is in me; I think they are good reasons and I think they will appeal to the members of this House and to the people of my province.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.) The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Martin) put his case very ably before this House to-day; he has given the full history of the construction of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and he has submitted the contention of the people for the construction of branch lines and the necessity for the same. It is not my intention to make any extended remarks now, but I cannot help referring to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Hughes). He accused my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) of attempting to make political capital out of the matter. Well, any one who heard the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) or any one who will read it, must conclude that it was a fair presentation of the case; that politics were not introduced, and that no blame was attached to any political party unless blame were deserved. Of course my hon. friend did not commend the present government because there was nothing to commend them for. If the present government, as the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) states, made improvements on the Prince Edward Island Railway it was only what the people of Prince Edward Island were entitled to. It was our just due; it was only our due. The statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) that this government practically reconstructed the Prince Edward Island Railway is not borne out by the facts. Before the present government came into power the heavy rails were laid by the Conservative government on that road, and the roadbed has not been changed since. It is true that some of the old railway stations were pulled down because they became unfit for use; that some of the freight sheds have been burned and new sheds built of necessity; and that a new station was built in the city of Charlottetown. But the old station was a wooden building erected in 1873; it was falling into decay and had become unsanitary and it was absolutely necessary that a new station should be built. Why should the government be commended for doing that? They were only doing their duty to the people of Prince Edward Island and in doing their duty I do not see how they merit any commendation.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Governments and men are to be commended for doing their duty.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.) I do not think there is any commendation necessary in such a case as that. I know that since 1882 there has been an agitation in the county which my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) represents and several demands have been made for a branch line to Elmira, and I believe that in the election contest of 1904 the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Hughes) stated that if he did not get the construction of a branch line to Elmira before the year was out he would resign.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. That statement is incorrect.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens). Well, it is so stated by the people who were present at the meeting at which the statement was alleged to have been made and I never heard it contradicted. The question before this House to-day is whether this government should build branch lines. There is no doubt, as has been stated by my hon. colleague (Mr. A. Martin), that fifty or sixty miles of railway would meet the requirements of the people of Prince Edward Island; that is all that is asked for by them from this government and this House. At present the lines mentioned by my hon. friends the senior member for Queen's (Mr. Martin) and the member for Prince (Mr. Lefurgey) are lines to New London, to Rustico, to New Glasgow, to Crapaud and to Eldon. These lines are necessary for the welfare of the people of Prince Edward Island ; and in view of the fact that a large expenditure is taking place to-day all over Canada, I think the people of Prince Edward Island are entitled to the construction of these lines at the hands of this government. They would be situated in very fertile portions of the province, where large crops are raised, and where to-day the people are under the necessity of hauling their produce from ten to twenty miles to market. The harbours along the northern portion of the province are not such as to admit of the people sending their produce by vessels. The fishing industry on the north side of the island is also greatly hampered by reason of the inability of the people to send their fish quickly to market. If they had railway communication, they would be in a position to send them to market on the day they were caught, and consequently to receive a very much better price for them than they do to-day. I understand that the government are giving fishermen in the province of Quebec every possible facility for carrying their fish to market, in the way of subsidies to steamers with cold-storage equipment, and when the people of Prince Edward Island ask for a small expenditure of a few thousand dollars for the construction of a few branch lines of railway in portions of the province which are thickly settled, they are only asking what they are justly and honestly entitled to.

A good deal has been said as to the expenditure of $7,317,000 in Prince Edward Island, which it was stated was too large an expenditure for so small a province. The statement made by my hon. friend from Prince showed that the statement in the railway report is incorrect. It included the sum of $3,114,000 which was paid by the people of Prince Edward Island before confederation ; and why this government insists on including this amount in the total expenditure by the government of Canada baffles me. This matter has been brought before this House on several occasions since I came here in 1904 ; and notwithstanding that fact, we find that it is still charged as made by the government of Canada on railway construction in the province of Prince Edward Island. I am not alleging any intentional wrong-doing on the part of the minister or his officials, but I cannot see how the Department of Railways can have proper book-keeping with a mistake of $3,114,000 standing on its books.

My hon. friend also pointed out in connection with the construction of the Hillsborough bridge that a certain sum of money, which was paid by the government of Prince Edward Island and interest on which is deducted from the semi-annual subsidy payable to the province, should be deducted from the $7,317,000. I think the Minister of Railways will agree with me that that agreement is in existence, and is probably in his department or some other, and it would be very easy for him to refer to that agreement and make the correction, and send out a statement in accordance with the facts. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes) stated that the Hillsborough bridge was a credit to the Department of Railways, and was a much better bridge than was at first intended when the estimate of $800,000 was made by the Department of Railways. I want to tell the Minister of Railways that that bridge cost a great deal too much money, and I can give him the reason. The superstructure came from the Miramichi river, having become too light for the traffic of the Intercolonial. Consequently the specifications for the substructure had to be changed, and two caissons had to be constructed where the original plan called for one. The superstructure was a weak structure. It had been in use some thirty years. The hon. member for Kings states that that bridge suits the purpose. What are the facts ? When a team is upon that bridge, no railway train can pass over it, as it is only wide enough for the train. It is true, two teams can pass, but when a train is passing over it the bridge must be closed to local traffic. I think it was never intended, when the people of Prince Edward Island agreed to pay $10,000 a year for a traffic bridge, that they would be given one of this kind. It does not suit the requirements of the people, or even the requirements of the railway, which is often hampered by local traffic being on the bridge when there is a train to pass over. It is also very dangerous to the public. People driving on the bridge are often surprised by the approach of a train, and have to fly for their lives, and horses are frightened. The substructure of the bridge is a very good one, but I venture to say that before very long it will become necessary for the railway company to construct a new superstructure. I hope the hon. Premier will grant the petition of the people of the north side of Prince Edward Island and will at once send an independent engineer, as was agreed when the Minister of Finance was acting as Minister of Railways, and that a policy shall be adopted for the construction of these necessary public works.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). One of the regrets of my short term of office is that I was unable to visit that paradise—as our friends from there rightly describe their Island—during the trip I made over the Intercolonial Railway. But I can promise that I will see that Island very shortly. There can be no doubt that it is not only one of the most beautiful spots on this continent——

Mr. FOSTER. Except Brockville.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course Brockville is always excepted. Prince Edward Island is also very productive. It is acknowledged to be one of the beauty spots of America, particularly in the summer, but the law of compensation works out there as elsewhere. People who are particularly blessed in one season are not as greatly blessed in another; and perhaps in other sections, where one particular season is not so enjoyable, the people are compensated by striking a good average all the year round.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). But the people of the Island are blessed in them all.

Mr. GRAHAM. I mean in the way of transportation. Anything my hon. friends think they should say on behalf of their province, I shall find no fault with at all. It is the duty of all representatives to bring up everything which they think is in the interest of their own locality. Sometimes I may object a trifle to the construction they may put on certain matters, but certainly in calling the attention of this House to any grievance from which they may think they are suffering, they are certainly performing their duty. I do not propose to go into the history of confederation nor do I believe it would be wise to do so. The fathers of confederation builded better than they knew; and I am content to leave the terms of confederation as they are, without any argument as to their wisdom or unwisdom. But this much I am sure we can all agree on, and that is that confederation was, to a certain extent, a compromise and that, when entering it, every province had to give up some little thing. Some perhaps may have had to give up more than others but all had to give up something which they considered was their right in order to bring about that confederation of the various provinces into one Dominion, of which we are all so proud to-day. Prince Edward Island had to make concessions when she came in later and as had Ontario and Quebec. But, although I am fresh from the provincial arena myself, I do not like to see displayed that spirit of provincialism, of which my hon. friend in particular who has just taken his seat (Mr. McLean) has given evidence, by wanting to compare what some other provinces are getting with the benefit one particular province is receiving.

Mr. LENNOX. Why not?

Mr. GRAHAM. Because I like to consider this country as a whole. My hon. friend says why not? But if we take his view, we can all start rehearsing our provincial grievances and indulge in a good deal of fault finding which would not be beneficial from a national point of view, but would bring us back to the starting point just before confederation and bring to life again those old grievances of by-gone days which we thought dead and buried.

Mr. LENNOX. Is it not good evidence to show that one province is not getting a fair amount as compared with the others?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think the principle is a good one. If we are to argue that certain sections or certain classes or certain provinces are getting certain things which others are not getting, we are raising a point which should not be raised. There can be no objection to the representative of any province drawing attention to what he conceives to be any disability under which his province is suffering, but I draw the line at making a comparison to show that any one class or province is getting something which another is not getting. We can all agree that every portion of confederation is as fairly treated as it can be, not by this or some other government, but by the Dominion as a whole. If each one were to take up the condition of his own province in confederation, I could have a pretty good case, on some points perhaps, with regard to the province of Ontario, but one of the duties I have tried to perform, since I came into this House and into the government has been throughout the province of Ontario to call attention to the viewpoint of the other provinces on some questions. Particularly on the question of the Intercolonial Railway, I have tried to point out to the people of Ontario the point of view taken by the province of Quebec and the maritime provinces with regard to the construction and operation of that line. If we try to understand each other, there will be but little friction as between the provinces. What has the government done for railways in Prince Edward Island? Without saying anything at all detrimental or uncomplimentary to any other department, I think my hon. friend will find that the information given by the Department of Railways and Canals is pretty reliable.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). Will the hon. gentleman turn up his own report, page 137, and tell me how reliable the statement there made is?

Mr. GRAHAM. I was just coming to one statement, which may not be on that page but is on one of the others, to show what I mean. Up to two or three years ago, there was not the same system in the department of furnishing statistics as exists to-day. But I think that my hon. friend, if he will look carefully into the reports to-day and go into the details will find out that the information given is fairly accurate.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). How is it then that the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) did not understand his own report, and I do not believe that the present minister will put on it the same construction as did the ex-minister.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend makes a statement of fact with which of course I cannot agree. My recollection is that in the report the total cost—not what Canada has spent on the Prince Edward Island—but the total is something over $7,000,000. Now I am going to please my hon. friend for two or three minutes, if that be possible, though I think that if we built branch lines through every concession in Prince Edward Island, that would not please him so long as that were done by this government. Suppose I say that the expenditure was some $4,000,000 odd on the construction of that railway.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). I do not think you would be correct.

Mr. GRAHAM. The total cost is over $7,000,000, but I think he put it at $4,000,000 or thereabouts. Those were his figures and I hope he will be pleased with them. I am not saying that they are accurate and he does not seem to think that they are; but taking my hon. friend's own figures, $4,000,000, or in that neighbourhood—I find that the total cost was $7,000,000 and something over—that brings me to this point, the total expenditure—estimating cost of construction at $4,000,000 on the Prince Edward Island Railway—has been $12,041,628.11 since 1875.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). $12,000,000 ?

Mr. GRAHAM. The total expenditure on the railway for construction and working expenses since 1875 has amounted to over $12,000,000. Now, the revenue has been something over $5,000,000 leaving a deficit of $6,738,000. I am pointing this out not to convince my hon. friend (Mr. A. Martin) that there is anything wrong with Prince Edward Island, but to show him that the Dominion of Canada since 1875, has spent upon the Prince Edward Island road $6,738,000 more than it has received.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). How much did it spend on the Intercolonial?

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, a great lot of money. We will discuss that when the subject is before us; but in the meantime the hon. gentleman must not find fault if I stick to his own text. The working expenses of the the Prince Edward Island Railway, outside altogether from construction, since 1875 have been $7,848,000. There has been a revenue of something over $5,000,000, leaving a deficit on working expenses, aside altogether from construction, of about $2,500,000. Nor is this to condemn Prince Edward Island, but to point out to my hon. friend and the country that he has a wrong conception of the case when he says that the Dominion has not been doing anything for the transportation facilities of Prince Edward Island.

Now, the hon. gentleman spoke rather harshly of this government—and he does not generally speak harshly of anybody. He condemned us for not spending more money. It will be interesting for my hon. friend (Mr. A. Martin), as well as for the hon. gentleman beside him (Mr. A. A. McLean), who intimated that this government had not done much for Prince Edward Island in the way of construction to know that, in the eighteen years following 1878, the amount expended in construction on the Prince Edward Island Railway was $340,650; and in eleven years since 1896 there has been expended $3,550,000. This is not a question of how many curves were taken out or about the way in which the roadbed was left, it is simply the broad fact that, in the eleven years of its administration, this government spent ten times as much on the construction of railways in Prince Edward Island as did the friends of these hon. gentlemen during eighteen years.

Mr. HAGGART. Does not that $3,550,000 include the deficits year by year on the road?

Mr. GRAHAM. This is the amount spent in construction. and has nothing to do with the revenue of the road. I am pointing out exactly what has been done.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister (Mr. Graham) must be mistaken. That includes all the deficits.

Mr. GRAHAM. No, certainly not.

Mr. HAGGART. But $3,550,000 and $700,000 would be $4,250,000, which, according to the figures given, would be almost the whole amount. It must include the deficits.

Mr. GRAHAM. No. But then my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) is so accustomed to deficits. There is not a deficit on the Intercolonial, but there is on the Prince Edward Island road, and I am going to point that out to my hon. friend. But the difficulty is, and the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) has seen it, as we all see it, that in improving the railway facilities of Prince Edward Island—leaving out altogether the loss of interest—the country has paid a very large sum. Last year, I think, the deficit on the Prince Edward Island Railway was something like $67,000. One hon. member from Prince Edward Island this afternoon spoke of the high rates on the railway. But even with these high rates that he has quoted—and I have not had time to verify them, but I do not question them at the moment—we have not been able to make the railway meet the expenses by something like over $60,000. It is a matter to be considered by the House as well as by the government how much more money we ought to expend in extending railway facilities. The improvements and extensions that have been made have not reduced the deficit, if I remember the figures correctly. Of course, investigation ought to be made—perhaps has been made—and, so far as reasonable, we ought to afford railway facilities to the people of Prince Edward Island. But that province is under the disadvantage, as I have already said, of being an island with comparatively small population. How far we ought to go in providing railway facilities it is for the House and the government to decide. I am glad the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. Martin) has brought this subject to our attention. I will not deal with his pre-election suggestions, for the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) would not want me to deal with them. We can make these charges back and forth, but they will not build branch railways, and that, I take it, is what my hon. friend (Mr. A. Martin) is after. The taking over of branches does not apply alone to Prince Edward Island, but to New Brunswick and Quebec as well, not only taking over branches, but building them ; and, if we take over branches, it will be necessary to build branches elsewhere. This is a large question, and worthy of the attention of the House ; and I intend some day to have something to say upon it. For the present, I assure the hon. gentleman that the government has full sympathy with Prince Edward Island—values it as one of the members of the confederation—and is willing to do anything reasonable to meet the wishes of the people of that tight and prosperous island.

Mr. LOUIS LAVERGNE (Drummond and Arthabaska). I have heard with interest what the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) says about the willingness of the government to do everything reasonably possible for Prince Edward Island in the way of building branch lines. I think that Quebec is entitled to consideration in this regard. For instance, a branch line is very much needed from St. Leonard junction, on the Intercolonial Railway, to make a connection with the Maine Central. This branch would be sure of a great traffic to the United States, and would afford a shorter line for freight and passengers than the present route.

An hon. MEMBER. What county is that in?

Mr. LOUIS LAVERGNE. It would be through Arthabaska, part of Nicolet and part of Wolfe. I confess that I am looking out for my own riding, as the hon. members for Prince Edward Island are looking out for theirs. My riding has a population about half as great as that of Prince Edward Island. That branch line would leave St. Leonard and would cross the rest of the county of Nicolet, run through Arthabaska and into the county of Wolfe. It would traverse a country with a great deal of timber and with lands well cultivated by prosperous farmers. The lumber traffic from St. Leonard and all along this line would be very considerable, and would be of great benefit to the Intercolonial. It would also save a great deal of distance in hauling passengers and freight, because if they are to be carried by the Intercolonial now they must go by way of Montreal and so to the United States. I am quite sure that the government, if they are willing to build branch lines in Prince Edward Island, will be prepared to consider the proposition I am making for this extension of the Intercolonial Railway. It is really an extension of the Intercolonial Railway, because it will connect with the branch to Nicolet, a large town on the St. Lawrence, at St. Leonard junction. This would be an extension passing through large towns and running to Dudswell junction, on the Quebec Central, where a connection would be made with the Maine Central going to the United States.

I cannot too strongly impress on the minister the importance of this branch line, and I hope he will see his way clear to at least make an examination of that part of the country and that he will appropriate the necessary money for the building of the railway as a branch of the Intercolonial Railway. It is a railway which ought certainly to be built. It would be an advantage to the chief town of the county, Arthabaskaville, and the whole district. Arthabaskaville is the town of the Prime Minister of Canada and the building of this railway would be a compliment to him. I see the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) laughing, but I am serious in speaking of this matter. Surely this will be granted to me, especially when the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I. (Mr. A. Martin) has some idea of getting money for his island. My case is perhaps stronger because St.Leonard and the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, and Wolfe vote straight for the government and I think if anything is to be given I should have it before the hon. gentleman.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). My hon. friend from Queens (Mr. A. Martin) was perfectly right in his statement as to the reasons which induced the late government to introduce the resolution which they introduced in 1896. An inquiry was made into the financial position of Prince Edward Island and a comparison made with that of New Brunswick when that province entered confederation and the consensus of opinion on both sides, at any rate the conclusion which influenced the government, was that Prince Edward Island had got the worst of the bargain by about $100,000 or $150,000 per year. To recoup Prince Edward Island for that lost income these resolutions were introduced in reference to the branch lines. My friend from Prince Edward Island says that the resolution was that 'to-morrow' they will move the House into committee. That is the form of all resolutions ; owing, however, to the unfortunate state of affairs which occurred in 1896 we could not carry any resolutions nor even move them, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that when a Conservative government introduce resolutions and makes pre-election pledges to the people they in all cases carry them out. Nothing could be worse than for a government to introduce such a resolution as was introduced in 1896 and, having been successful at the polls, completely ignore the resolution and not carry them into effect.

The Minister of Railways says that all of the provinces parted with a good deal in entering confederation. None of us stood for our extreme rights; we parted with some of the rights which we had for the purpose of forming confederation, if it could be done. Unfortunately in reference to financial affairs, the maritime provinces never thought that the matter had ever been settled; they have introduced resolutions in reference to the terms on which Nova Scotia and New Brunswick entered into confederation and immediately before the holding of elections in these different provinces the amounts were readjusted, larger sums being given to these provinces in consideration of a mistake having been made in their financial arrangements at the time they entered confederation. It was perfectly natural that the Prince Edward islanders should complain of the arrangement that was made in their case. I went into the financial position thoroughly at the time and my conclusion was that Prince Edward Island in entering confederation, made a worse bargain by between $100,000 and $150,000 a year than Nova Scotia or New Brunswick did. It was to remedy that to that extent that this arrangement in reference to building branch lines in Prince Edward Island was proposed.

As to the expenditure on the Hillsboro bridge, as I remember, the proposition first brought down to the House was that the bridge was to be built for about $600,000. This afterwards increased owing to some changes in the plans made in order to utilize the old Miramichi bridge iron. The piers were too far apart, having been designed, in the original plan, for a new bridge. The Miramichi bridge which was used was perfectly good for the traffic that it would have to carry, but its use increased the expenditure on the structure to an extent larger than I think is justifiable. When the plans and specifications were brought down by the Railway Department the estimate was too inaccurate; there should have been a closer estimate and when an estimate of the increased expenditure was brought down it should have been sufficient to cover the whole work. Unfortunately this was not done and the occurrence of such a thing in the department should not be lightly passed over by the House.

I am convinced that if the Conservative government had been returned in 1897 they would have carried out their election pledges. Nothing could be more disgraceful or dishonest than for a government to propose resolutions to grant money to a particular part of the country immediately before an election and having been returned to power to refuse to carry out their pledge. So far as I am concerned, I can assure my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island that if I had been continued at the head of the department I would have seen that at least my promise to the people of Prince Edward Island was carried out.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, previous to six o'clock we had a pretty full discussion of this question. I paid particular attention to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) and although he has not stood exactly by his report he was not generous enough to acknowledge that his figures were incorrect. I would like, as he has undertaken the duties of this position, to put this matter in a strong light so that next year, when he issues his report, we will find no such statement as the statement I quoted on page 127. To disabuse his mind and the minds of hon. members present I wish him to turn to the Public Accounts of 1873 where this question in regard to the expenditure of Prince Edward Island on its railways is fully settled. In the public accounts for the year 1873, when my province came into confederation, you will find in part IV, page 14, this statement:

> By amount province entitled to upon entering into union as per imperial order in council, $4,701,050.

That is the debt that the province was allowed on entering confederation. I have not the minister's attention, I see, and I am afraid he will repeat some of the mistakes in his report next year but he will note what I say about this capital which was placed to the credit of the province. I want to call to his attention that he can read on the other side of the account the amounts that were charged against the province for this railway construction which was not completed until 1876 and the statement is as follows: I have quoted the account showing that there was $4,701,050 to our credit. In 1876, when the account was closed, all we had to our credit was $831 out of that $4,701,050. How do you account for that? You account for that by the fact that $3,144,000 is charged against the province for its railway construction. The debt of the province at that time was only $754,000. Add these sums together and deduct the total from our capital and you will see that in place of our getting interest on this large sum of money we only drew interest on less than $1,000,000. We lost the interest on $3,144,000 since the day of confederation, of our union with Canada to the present day. I want the minister to understand what that means. What is the yearly interest on $3,144,000? The interest is $157,000 a year. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) said that he came to the conclusion in 1896 that the province was not fairly treated and that what the province lost in interest—$157,000 a year—should be made up in some way or other and he concluded that the best way to make it up was to equip the province with the branch lines which it proposed to build before it entered into confederation at all. I am going to remind the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals of something else. The minister made a statement which somewhat surprised me. He is now in his position, I do not think that he is very well acquainted with his department yet, he is not acquainted with the details of the railway report and he is not acquainted with the working of the Prince Edward Island Railway. If he were he would not make the statement that he made to this House this afternoon. He said that the branches that had been built had not diminished the deficit of the Prince Edward Island Railway. If he turns up the report of the Prince Edward Island Railway he will find since these branches were built the deficit has decreased from year to year. I asked him the other day to give me a separate statement of the earnings of the last branch that was built. I knew that this was a good feeder to the main line and I knew it was decreasing the deficit of the main line. He did not give it. Yet the minister made the statement that the building of these branch lines had not diminished the deficit of the Prince Edward Island Railway. I want to made another statement and I would like to have his attention. I do not wish to share his attention with the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston). The system of making up accounts on the Intercolonial Railway is a system that is not carried out by any other railway either in Canada or in any part of the world. I make the statement deliberately that the system adopted by the government in making up the accounts in regard to the Intercolonial Railway does not hold in regard to any other railways in Canada. Why do I say that? If you desire to find out what the Intercolonial Railway is doing, what is the first thing you have to do? The first thing you have to do and which every other railway does is to charge the interest on the capital expenditure. Do you have your accounts made up in that way? All you do is to place your revenue on one side of the account and the expenditure on the other. But where is there any record of the capital which the country has invested in the road? You do not know anything about that. How does that operate against my province? If you charged interest on the expenditure of the Intercolonial you would have to charge interest on the whole of it. But, when you come down to my province you cannot charge the interest on the whole expenditure because the province paid for this railway and in accounting for the revenue and expenditure of the Prince Edward Island Railway there is $157,000 a year which you would have to give the province credit for. I say deliberately to the minister that if he kept the accounts the same as every other railway in Canada does and charged interest on expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway the Prince Edward Island Railway would stand in a far better position than the Intercolonial Railway.

The minister added that there were deficits on that road amounting to $2,000,000. But he should have stated that the people of the province paid to this government as interest on this expenditure $157,000 a year amounting in all since confederation to $5,549,000. So that if $2,000,000, as he said, was sunk in railways in Prince Edward Island, the province has $3,000,000 to its credit. I want the minister to think that over. I know it is very hard for him, having been brought up in narrow gauge politics, to understand these matters in a more extended sphere. The minister says I did not give the government credit for what they had done. I am not here as a defender of either party in regard to branch lines in Prince Edward Island. I am here only to represent the people and their views and expectations. But I will give the government credit for this, that they carried out to some extent the policy of their predecessors by building sixty miles of railway on one of the branches which I advocated here in 1896, and which the late government at that time proposed to build. But what did they do? They ran that road here and there, as the Liberal politicians wanted them to do, with the result that it does not to-day serve the country as it was expected to do, and they did not complete the branch they began. The scheme at that time was to connect the Murray Harbour line with Montague and extend it west into the heart of Belfast, the hon. member for Kings knows that, and unless he advocates the completion of that scheme, and advocates it strongly, he will be in danger of losing his seat. I believe the hon. gentleman said in my absence to-day that I wanted to make political capital out of this matter. He is the gentleman who has been making political capital out of these branch lines ever since he has been in politics. I understand that in his last election, wherever he appeared he said that unless he secured a branch line to be built to Elmira or somewhere else within a year, he would resign his seat.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I must say to my hon. friend that he has made an incorrect statement—that I made no promise of having a railway built in the way he states.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens). I guess you are a little afraid of making it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. If my hon. friend wants to act honourably, he had better withdraw that statement.

Mr. A. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman got up to say something, and never said it, at least I did not hear him.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I stated that the hon. member for Queens had made a statement which is incorrect so far as I am concerned, and he goes on and repeats it. If he wishes to act fairly in the matter, he should withdraw the statement.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Of course, Mr, Speaker, I will accept the hon. gentleman's denial, but I got the statement from his own constituents who were at the meetings. I never attacked the hon. gentleman, and if he made an unkind attack on me in my absence, it compels me to retaliate. Of course, the hon. Minister of Railways is not responsible for the over-expenditure on the few miles of railway the government built in Prince Edward Island a few years ago, but I wish to tell him that the work is not complete. The hon. member for Kings will, I think, bear me out in that. The branch line from Montague to the main line and to Eldon is not complete as a feeder to the main line. Not having been here when the hon. member for Kings spoke, I do not know whether he said a word about that or not ; but I think he will bear me out in saying that the line then built is not a complete line. So far as this government have built that line I give them credit. I remember standing up in this House to advocate it for four years. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I wish to emphasize the statement which I made in the early part of the debate, which the Minister of Railways has not contradicted, that his report is fallacious and misleading, and places an argument in the mouth of every hon. gentleman in this House who is opposed to the construction of railroads in Prince Edward Island. The Minister of Railways, in the first part of his speech, spoke as if he were going to do something. I hope it will be something more than was done in 1904, when the government made a few surveys, and afterwards went back on them. We have not tested the present Minister of Railways very much, but if I am to judge him by his predecessors, I would not expect very much of him. But I have some great hopes of the Premier of this country. I know that he is surrounded by some colleagues who are of no great assistance to him, and he finds it very hard to maintain the position he would like to maintain. I have great respect for him, though he has not shown the prudence of Sir John Macdonald in surrounding himself with wise and good men on whom he could rely ; but I hope the Minister of Railways is a great improvement on his predecessors. I believe in the Prime Minister's sense of justice to my province, and I hope that the Minister of Railways will see that the misleading statements in his report are corrected. I do not wish to trespass any longer on the time of the House, and I thank hon. gentlemen for their attention.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a short explanation ; I know I am not allowed to make a speech. I know that my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. A. Martin) wishes to be fair and correct in every statement he makes in this House. My hon. friend the other day made the statement that the Murray Harbour Railway had cost

---

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, the hon. member for Queens has the right to close the debate, and unless this is a matter of privilege——

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. It is an explanation of what I said this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member's statement has been misunderstood, and he wishes to make an explanation, he may do so.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I wish to give my hon. friend an opportunity to place himself right before the House. He made the statement that the Murray Harbour Railway had cost $31,000 per mile. At that time I had not the papers——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that can hardly be permitted at this stage.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I only desired to give my hon. friend a chance to put himself right before the country, but if he objects I will not proceed.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I don't know what the hon. gentleman wants.

Motion agreed to.

SUBURBAN MAIL DELIVERY.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved :

That in the case of cities where a free mail delivery is established, such free mail delivery should be extended to all contiguous districts, which though situate outside the municipal limits proper, are immediately adjacent thereto, so as to render such delivery easy of execution ; and that it is particularly desirable to apply such a system, in the vicinity of Montreal, where a dense population and large industrial interests, situate outside the municipal limits, but in reality forming part of the city for all practical purposes, are entitled to such free delivery.

He said : This motion, sir, is one of very considerable interest to the outlying suburbs of Montreal. As hon. gentlemen are no doubt aware, Montreal, the most populous city in the Dominion, covers a relatively small area. It is surrounded by municipalities, the annexation of which to the city has been the policy of Montreal for several years past. These municipalities are identified with Montreal in every respect excepting as regards municipal administration, and although annexation must necessarily come about in time, even with the best intentions of all parties interested it may take some years to accomplish. The municipalities that immediately adjoin Montreal are extremely anxious that the system of free postal delivery which exists in the city should as far as possible be extended to them, and in many instances that can be done without any considerable increase of cost. There is no doubt that if done it would be greatly to the convenience of the people living in these adjoining municipalities and it would no doubt promote the development of industries. Some of our very large industrial establishments, either for the purpose of obtaining exemption, or diminution of taxation, have located in these outlying municipalities and it would be a great convenience to them if free mail delivery were extended outside of the strict, and in the postal sense imaginary, line of division which at present in many instances prevents that free delivery. I would not in the absence of the Postmaster General have taken up this subject had it not been that the principle has been already successfully applied to many of these outside municipalities, and what this motion asks for is merely its extension where it can be conveniently done without any very great additional expense. Take for instance the case of the town of Lachine, which for many years past has endeavoured to obtain free mail delivery. During the twelve years that I have represented my electoral district which is now partly within the limits of the city of Montreal, I have repeatedly tried to obtain this free delivery outside of the immediate limits of the city where it could be done conveniently and without too much expense. I saw in it not only advantage to my own constituents, but an advantage to the Post Office Department itself. I believe that the postal system as it is administered to-day in the city of Montreal could be improved. I have nothing whatever to say against the officials from the letter carriers up to the postmaster of the city, but I do believe the system requires improvement as I shall endeavour to show when the House is considering the appropriation for that service. I believe that if certain remedies were carried out the postal revenue of Montreal would increase by twenty-five per cent within a very short time. The fact is that although the city of Montreal is the largest centre in the Dominion its postal revenue is only $660,000 a year as compared with a revenue in the city of Toronto which is nearly $300,000 greater. Of course a closer examination of the figures might show that the municipalities immediately surrounding Montreal go to increase considerably the revenue from the city. However with all that, it would fall below the postal revenue of Toronto. I believe that if we had in the city of Montreal and vicinity that administration of the postal service which they have in the larger English and American cities, the postal revenues would be doubled before long and everybody would be better accommodated. Returning to the case of Lachine, I wish to give the House a few figures, and I shall include in my statement the town of Lachine proper, that part of the town which is called Lachine Locks, and where there are very large industrial establishments ; Blue Bonnets which immediately adjoins Lachine, Montreal West adjoining that again, and Summerlea which for postal purposes is practically identified with Lachine. The revenue of these five post offices is as follows :

Lachine	$1,845 41
Lachine Locks	2,453 88
Blue Bonnets	938 98
Montreal West	349 65
Summerlea	82 80
Total revenue	$5,670 72

The expenses of these post offices is :

Lachine	$ 556 50
Lachine Locks	516 00
Blue Bonnets	330 30
Montreal West	121 50
Summerlea	22 50
Total	$1,545 80

To this must be added some trifling expenditure for heating and other minor details which I have not calculated. But let us look at the amount of business done in money orders at these post offices and we find it exceeds that of most of the larger cities of the province of Quebec outside of Montreal, Quebec, and at most one or two others :

	Money orders.
Lachine	$11,319 42
Lachine Locks	23,489 52
Blue Bonnets	12,771 55
Montreal West	784 56
Total	$48,365 05

This shows that in the town of Lachine and in the circumscription or locality to which my remarks have been confined, there is a revenue now of $6,000, and a revenue increasing yearly at a very great rate. And the amount of money orders is $48,365.05, exceeding that of nearly all the cities in the province of Quebec, outside of Montreal and Quebec. It exceeds the revenues respectively of Three Rivers, St. Hyacinthe, if I mistake not, and every town of like proportion. In view of this very considerable volume of business, the town of Lachine about a year ago petitioned the government for a free delivery system such as exists in Montreal and other adjoining municipalities. I have said that the principle of free delivery system has been established outside the limits of Montreal and I am bound to say that, in that respect, the present Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) has proved more liberal than his predecessor, because in every instance which I formerly presented, Sir William Mulock and his officials objected that if free delivery were established outside the limits of the city there would be no limit to its extension. By this motion I merely claim that the principle which the Postmaster General has already sanctioned should be extended where it can be established without any great additional expense and with very great convenience to the ratepayers. The principle has been extended to Mile End, a town outlying the city of Montreal. Mile End has a revenue much smaller than the locality I have referred to. Its revenue is only $3,140.61; its money order business amounts to only $14,789, yet the free delivery system has been extended to that town and to Maisonneuve and other towns outside Montreal, where the revenue is $3,595.41, and where the money order business only amounts to $10,434.16. That was done at the instance of my late lamented friend Mr. Prefontaine, who stood in a better position towards the government than I do.

Mr. GALLIHER. What is the population of Maisonneuve?

Mr. MONK. The population of Lachine and the immediate locality in its vicinity, which I have comprised in one district, is about 12,000 or 13,000 souls; the town of Lachine proper has some 10,000 souls, and there are 3,000 at least in its neighbouring locality. I do not know what the population of Mile End is exactly, but I think it would amount to about 12,000 and the population of Maisonneuve is considerably less.

Mr. GALLIHER. In view of a case of my own which I have presented to the government I wanted to know what the population was.

Mr. MONK. Perhaps my hon. friend may not have travelled very extensively through the electoral district to which I have referred, but I do not think there is any city in his constituency approaching the size of Montreal.

Mr. GALLIHER. I do not wish to be understood as criticising my hon. friend at all. What I am anxious to know is why my request was refused for the town of Nelson, if the population of these places my hon. friend has mentioned is below that of Nelson and the revenue much below as well.

Mr. MONK. I cannot say why my hon. friend's request was refused. I would presume that it was unjustly refused as mine was. It is possible that although he may have the required population, perhaps he has not the pull, or perhaps Nelson is not situated, as these towns are, in the immediate vicinity of a very large city where the machinery is provided for free delivery. Sir William Mulock always objected that if he granted free delivery to one town of 15,000 inhabitants he would have to grant it in every other town of like size. My answer to that was that in the case I put he would be simply extending free delivery from Montreal into its suburbs, from which it is separated merely for municipal purposes, and that for postal purposes it should be considered as one and the same locality. The principle has been further extended to the town of Westmount, which does not give a very much larger revenue than the localities which, for the purpose of my argument, I have grouped under one head. The revenue in Westmount, where there is a population of 20,000, is only $6,223.03. I am quoting from the last departmental report. The money order business of Westmount is but $19,498.94, whereas there is a very large postal and money order business in the localities to which I am now referring.

It may be said that Lachine is more distant from the city of Montreal than these localities to which I have referred for the purposes of comparison. But that distance is not a real distance. The gap of vacant land between Lachine proper and Montreal is very small and is rapidly filling up. Farm land there is changing hands every day, and there is every prospect that, with the immense industrial development that is going on in that locality, in a wonderfully short time the whole gap will be filled up, and Lachine will, for postal purposes, form part of the city of Montreal. Moreover, this improvement, if it can be carried out without great additional expense, will largely contribute—and the government should use its best endeavours in that direction—to hasten the development which must necessarily bring with it a very large increase of postal revenue. I mentioned that the matter had been taken up by the town of Lachine. On May 1, 1907, the town council passed a resolution, which I will read in support of this motion. The resolution is in French as follows :

Lachine, 1er mai 1907.

Lecture est donnée d'une requête signée par un grand nombre de citoyens de cette ville, ainsi que d'une requête des membres de la société dite " Sons of England Benefit Society," priant le conseil de ville de Lachine de faire des instances auprès du gouvernement du Canada pour obtenir la nomination de facteurs pour la distribution des lettres et toutes matières postales à domicile dans cette ville,—exposant que cette chose est devenue d'une grande nécessité en cette ville vu l'augmentation rapide de sa population, et que d'autres villes de moindre importance que Lachine ont déjà été favorisées de cette amélioration.

Il est alors proposé par l'échevin A. Emile Sarra-Bournet, appuyé par l'échevin Octave Saint-Germain, qu'il soit résolu : que ce conseil concourt entièrement dans l'opinion des susdite pétitionnaires et qu'il prie l'honorable ministre des Postes de bien vouloir accorder la nomination de facteurs pour la distribution des lettres et matières postales à domicile dans la ville de Lachine ; et que copie de la présente résolution soit transmise à l'honorable Rodolphe Lemieux, directeur général des Postes, pour favorable considération, ainsi qu'à monsieur Louis Alphonse Boyer, de Montréal, en priant ce dernier d'appuyer cette requête auprès du département.

Adopté.

Certifiée pour vraie copie.

Lachine, 6 février 1908.

(Signé) H. ROBERT,
Sec.-trésorier de la ville de Lachine.

I may mention that the M. Boyer mentioned here was the candidate on the government side in the division at the last general election. Now, I may be asked: How can this reform be accomplished? It is a very easy matter. If the department really put in execution the principle which the motion invokes in this instance—the constituency which I represent goes all around the city of Montreal, and to-day a portion of it is included in the city, and there are other instances, though I have taken the strongest one—it can do so with a very trifling expense. It could, I presume—though I am not a technical adviser on that point—proceed by suppressing the present post offices and keeping the post office in Lachine as a centre of distribution. This government has built large post offices in different parts of the city of Montreal and outside the city of Montreal, at Mile End, to serve as centres of distribution. It has in the town of Lachine a building amply sufficient for all such purposes. The department would economize the salaries of all the other post offices which I have just mentioned. It would have to establish, in the localities covered by this redistribution, two deliveries a day and two collections a day, a certain number of postal boxes, as in the towns of Westmount, Mile End and Maisonneuve. Three or, at the most, four letter carriers with the chief in charge of the central distribution office would do the work and save the salary of an assistant. The expenses at present amount to some $1,500 or $1,800. I really believe that, if the matter were well looked after and entrusted to a careful man, the whole reform could be carried out admirably with an expenditure of $2,000. The revenue, no doubt, would at once increase. The development of the locality would be assisted and the ratepayers would be satisfied. I would like to mention in this connection that the population of the town of Lachine is a very rapidly growing factor. Between Montreal and Lachine, and in the town of Lachine, a large number of very important industrial establishments are growing up. We have the Dominion Bridge Company and the Dominion Wire Company. A locomotive works company has just purchased a large tract of land, and contemplates erecting the largest industrial establishment of that kind in Canada. There are other establishments which it is needless for me to mention. Viewing the growth of industry in the town of Lachine by the value of products, we find that in 1901 the output was of the value of $2,909,847, and five years later, in the year 1906, it had risen to $4,309,749, an increase of $1,399,912. The head of the very important canal navigation, the Lachine canal, is there at Lachine ; it is the stopping place of many steamers coming down the lakes. And there is, back of the river front proper, a very large garden produce development. The large increase of the city of Montreal has induced many of the farmers there to go into the development of truck gardening, and that represents a marvellously increasing traffic. Under these circumstances, I believe that this extension recommends itself to the government and to the attention of the Postmaster General, and I hope that hon. gentleman will give it his very earnest consideration in the very near future. I believe that possibly there are objections to rural mail delivery as ordinarily understood. It has been advocated during the present session, and I voted for the measure because it has been tried in progressive countries, and I do not see why we should not try it here.

In the meantime, it seems to me of the utmost importance that where we do give free delivery in the large centres which are daily developing, we should at least extend that system as much as possible, and not differentiate between one electoral division and another. It should not be the misfortune of the electors of Jacques Cartier that they have not elected a supporter of the government. If in the representations that I have just made to the House and that I have made time and again to the Post Office Department my claims are well founded, it seems to me on the contrary that in the interests of the revenue of the department itself as well as the city and whole island of Montreal, the government should, irrespective of politics, extend the principle, which is a good principle, as far as possible.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, the constituency of South York, which I have the honour to represent, is situated very similarly to Jacques Cartier ; it surrounds the city of Toronto just as Jacques Cartier surrounds the city of Montreal. Some time ago the town of North Toronto, the town of East Toronto, and portions of Deer Park and other places contiguous to Toronto applied for free delivery and the government has seen fit to extend the system to some of those places. West Toronto now has an excellent free delivery system and is the largest suburb contiguous to the city. The system has also been extended to East Toronto, a town contiguous to the city at the east end. A similar system was a few days ago instituted in Todmorden and Doncaster, contiguous to the city, but up to the present no free delivery has been established in North Toronto. North Toronto is not quite contiguous to the city as there is another small suburb between it and the city, but that suburb is now passing into the city and North Toronto will then be contiguous to Toronto and therefore entitled to this free delivery. I have here a copy of a resolution which has been forwarded to me from the council of North Toronto exactly on that line, asking that a free delivery system be extended to that town. All of these places are surrounding Toronto, and the greater portion of South York are of this suburban character; they are largely occupied, as Jacques Cartier is, by market gardeners, milkmen, all in active business, and large manufacturing concerns so that they are, as a matter of fact, an integral portion of the city of Toronto. The business of these places is connected with the city, the people who live in the suburbs are in active business in the city and if there is to be, as there is, free delivery in connection with the cities, the surrounding suburbs of the cities which are integral portions of them, ought to have free delivery in the widest sense. The government have fairly met the views of some suburbs and I think the Postmaster General, when he looks further into it, will see the justice of the claim of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and of the claim I am now making for a wider enforcement of this principle. I believe the department is now working on the principle that metropolitan postal districts ought to be created in connection with large cities, especially Montreal and Toronto, and that all these suburban districts should be in charge for delivery purposes of the postmaster of the city; that he should take charge of the suburban delivery and the collection of the mails in those suburban districts. When this is done, not only will the convenience to the public be increased but I agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in saying that the revenue of the Post Office Department will be greatly augmented. The additional cost will be comparatively small. It requires in some places only two or three carriers as the other organization necessary is now in existence in the city. I believe the official who has charge of the city postal free delivery is in favour of it, and that all he wants is a little more encouragement in the way of an appropriation for this purpose. If it is done, as I think it ought to be done, it will greatly benefit the business of these places and will cost the government very little.

To pass from that, I would make the suggestion to the government, in connection with the rural mail delivery which has been mentioned by my hon. friend, that there are mail routes in South York where from $400 to $500 a year is paid to a courier to carry the mail bags to three small post offices. I believe the people in those localities would be prepared to supplement that $400 or $500 provided by the government with $400 or $500 of their own, making $1,000. That $1,000 would pay a courier to maintain a horse and rig of his own and he would on every week day not only carry the mail to these small post offices but he would become a rural mail carrier, and for that $1,000 he could give a very much better house delivery service than is now given; he could give as good service as is given in the cities. Undoubtedly in these places where the people would be willing to supplement the government grant for the courier, a very much improved system of mail delivery could be established without any great increased cost to the government.

I trust, with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), that the Postmaster General will take up this matter of extending the rural mail delivery around the cities of Toronto and Montreal at least, and if there are any other cities similarly situated that they will be treated in the same way, because municipal bounds do not necessarily limit the business that is concentrated at our cities. The city is always larger than its municipal bounds, especially now that factories requiring large areas for their works, and that large bodies of workingmen are gathered around these factories. These districts ought to be provided with the same postal facilities that are enjoyed by the people of the city proper.

Mr. WILLIAM GALLIHER (Kootenay). Mr. Speaker I do not wish to be understood as at all objecting to the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) although for purposes of my own case, I may have to express a different view on one point. Shortly before the new year, I made application for a free mail delivery system for the city of Nelson, and I was informed by the department that the standard that had been adopted as the requirement for the establishment of a free mail delivery system was that the population should be at least 12,000 and the postal revenue of the city $20,000. In one respect we fill the bill; the postal revenue of Nelson has reached the $20,000 mark. Our population has not yet quite reached the 12,000 mark, but, I take this view of the matter, Mr. Speaker, that the reason for fixing a standard to be guided by in granting applications of this kind is to provide against the very large expense of conducting or operating free mail delivery. A city which produces a large revenue, although it cannot come up to the standard of population, is entitled to a great deal of consideration, because any extra expense which may be incurred by free mail delivery would be provided for by the greatly increased revenue. Take some of the places which have been mentioned by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), such as Westmount, Maisonneuve and Mile End ; I noticed that in some of these places, although the population was up to the requirement, the revenue was far below it. I do not take the same view that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, or the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) does, that simply because these places are situated in proximity to a large city they are therefore entitled to consideration in that regard. I think that where the revenue of a city comes up to the standard of $20,000 —I am speaking now of the revenue outside of post office orders, and in the city of Nelson post office orders will amount to a very large sum during the year—even if the population chances to be somewhat below the requirements that city certainly is entitled to equal, if not much greater, consideration than a place with a larger population but with very much less revenue. Where the revenue is $20,000 in a city and the population is a little less than the number required there should be a free mail delivery, or where there is a population of 12,000 or more that surely ought to ensure revenue enough to warrant them in getting it even supposing at the present time they are a little below the $20,000 mark. Although you say that they shall have 12,000 of a population and $20,000 of a revenue, if 7,000 or 8,000 of a population can produce a revenue of $20,000 I think such a city is just as much entitled to free mail delivery as if it had a population of 12,000, for the simple reason that the people there are producing additional revenue to pay for the cost of free delivery.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. How would the postmen get up the mountain at Nelson ?

Mr. GALLIHER. Well, we are pretty good mountain climbers in that section of the country. However, if the department have adopted a hard and fast rule fixing the standard at 12,000 for population and $20,000 for revenue, while I do not agree with that proposition, yet I think it should be impartially observed in regard to all. There is not the same excuse for refusing my request as for refusing that of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. I cannot say that mine has been refused because I am not a supporter of the government. If a place with a revenue of $6,000 is granted a free mail delivery, although the population may be greater than that of Nelson, I cannot see why, when we produce the full revenue of $20,000 required, the city of Nelson, even though it may have less than 12,000 population should not have free mail delivery. The only reason that can be given to my mind is the one urged by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and the hon. member for South York that they are in close proximity to large cities. That is all very well. But all towns cannot be in close proximity to large cities, and if the enterprise in those towns produces the revenue required I would say that they are entitled to every consideration and that there should be no discrimination in regard to them. If you give it to one you should give it to all others. Where a place comes up to the standard of $20,000, as far as revenue is concerned, even though it falls below a few thousand in population you should give it free delivery. That is a fair proposition and it is on that ground I would like to see my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) take the matter into consideration. Our revenue in Nelson has been growing steadily from year to year ; it has not all come up in a minute ; it has been growing from $10,000 to $12,000 to $15,000 until it has reached $20,000, and I ask the earnest consideration of the Postmaster General in that regard. It may be that since the Postmaster General has assumed office no place that has not reached the standard both as to population and revenue has been considered. If that is the case I have no reason to complain because then all places must have been treated alike. But, if every one has not been treated alike I claim that where a city has reached one of the standards, whether it be that of population or revenue, it is entitled to the same consideration that any other city similarly situated receives.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, I have to express my regret that my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) is not in his seat to give my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) the answer to which he is entitled. I know that the question of improvements in the distribution of mail matter is in the hands of the Postmaster General and that he has contemplated some changes in that direction. If he were here I do not know how far he would take exception to or agree with the resolution of my hon. friend, but I think that he would not be disposed to take any very serious objection to it because, I think, the resolution of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier expresses what is already the practice of the Post Office Department. The resolution of my hon. friend reads as follows :

> That in the case of cities where a free mail delivery is established, such free mail delivery should be extended to all contiguous districts, which though situate outside the municipal limits proper, are immediately adjacent thereto, so as to render such delivery easy of execution.

In so far as I understand the argument of my hon. friend the very principle which he now advances is already in practice in the Post Office Department. My hon. friend recited as instances the towns of Lachine, Mile End and Maisonneuve. But, my hon. friend must admit that there is no parity whatever between the cases of Lachine, Maisonneuve and Mile End. The towns of Maisonneuve and Mile End are both contiguous, in the terms of the motion, to the city of Montreal. The line of division between Mile End and Montreal is not visible to the naked eye. This house is in Maisonneuve and the next house is in Montreal. The same thing is true of Mile End and as was stated a moment ago by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) in these modern days the limits of cities always extend beyond the municipal boundaries. It is the case with Maisonneuve and it is the case with Mile End also. If you take Notre Dame street you will walk from Montreal to Maisonneuve and you will never know when you have passed from one municipality into the other. If you take what was formerly St. Lawrence Main but what is now called the Boulevard St. Laurent you will walk from Montreal into Mile End and never know where you crossed from one municipality into another. But, that is not the case with Lachine at all. There is a distance of seven miles between the limits of Montreal and the limits of Lachine and if I am correctly informed there are one or two towns between the city of Montreal and Lachine. St. Paul I think is one, and I think Côte de Grace is another.

Mr. MONK. There is only one municipality between the city of Montreal and the town of Montreal West which is the first mentioned by me.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The town of Montreal West may have been annexed recently, but until then it was another municipality between Montreal and Lachine. Now, I do not at all speak with the idea of controverting the position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) on this matter, and I merely wish to explain that what has been done in Maisonneuve and Hochelaga could not have been done under the present arrangements in the case of Lachine. It is not because the county of Jacques Cartier made the mistake of electing my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) against Mr. Boyer that the town of Lachine did not get a free mail delivery. With all due respect to my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), may I be permitted to say that the town of Lachine has been already punished enough for that mistake, and it would not be fair to punish it any further. But the merits of the Lachine case were not the same as those of Mile End and Maisonneuve. If a free mail delivery has been given to Maisonneuve and Mile End it was because they were contiguous to the city of Montreal and are practically part and parcel of the city where a free mail delivery exists.

Mr. GALLIHER. What about Nelson?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, Nelson is somewhat distant from the city of Montreal and if you were to establish a free mail delivery in Nelson you would have to establish it from the very commencement, whereas in the case of Maisonneuve and Mile End you have only to extend the delivery from the city of Montreal. However, before the session is over, the Postmaster General will, I think, submit a new policy to the attention of parliament, and by means of which he intends to improve the postal facilities which now exist. I suppose under such circumstances my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) will have no objection that I should move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. MONK. I accept the suggestion of my right hon. friend with the prospect that if the principle is adopted by the government it will do its best endeavour to extend the free mail delivery system to the places I have named. I have been asking for this reform for about twelve years, and at my time of life an adjournment of the debate might be serious.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will deal with it without regard to the political proclivities of Lachine.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

TECHNICAL STUDENTS ON GOVERNMENT WORKS.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved :

That in the execution of public works requiring some technical knowledge, the government should, as far as possible, utilize the services of young men engaged in the pursuit of technical studies in our Canadian institutions, so as to permit of their applying with profit, during their vacations, the knowledge acquired by them during the period of tuition.

He said : This is a motion which I did not expect would be called to-day and although I have not been able to give such time as I would have liked to preparing the argument in its favour, I think it better to submit it to the House now as it is a question of importance, and as it is merely a suggestion which I hope will be adopted by the government. I trust it will be possible for the government to put the suggestion into effect during the coming year, when, so far as I can see from the estimates brought down, there will be a much larger expenditure of public funds than we have hitherto had any example of. I think the suggestion in my motion will commend itself to the favourable consideration of this parliament. We have a country of immense natural resources which are being discovered every day, and the magnitude of which at the present time astonishes the world. To develop these resources we have a great scarcity in Canada of men who are well up in technical science, and with the small capital at our own disposal, and with the very large capital which is coming into the country from abroad, we are obliged to witness the painful spectacle in mining and milling and construction works generally of foreign technical experts being imported to superintend them. This is no doubt the reason why the subject of technical education has within the last few years invited such a large share of attention from the people of this country, and that we are all so anxious to see its extension and development. I am not able to submit to the House any special statistics as to the state of technical education in the other provinces of the Dominion, but I know that in the province of Quebec the subject is engaging our most serious attention. Until within the past twenty years that branch of education did not receive in our province the attention it had received in other countries. Thanks to the munificence of some public-spirited citizens in Montreal we have seen in late years very great development in the science branch of McGill University, which has been equipped, I am told, in a manner unsurpassed in any part of the world. A recent disastrous fire has destroyed the science building, but the energy which has characterized that institution and its supporters in the past has enabled the McGill University to place its science branch on a footing equal to if not superior to that which it had attained before the fire. In Laval University, in which I have been for many years interested, we have been obliged to proceed a little more modestly and slowly, but we have made most praiseworthy efforts to develop, in a very rich soil indeed, the study of technical science, so that we may be able to meet the constantly increasing requirements of the country in that regard. We have a polytechnique school attached to the university in which there are a number of students under very devoted and excellent teachers, qualifying for a technical career. The question raised by this motion is whether the government which expends such a very large sum of money on public works can do anything for the encouragement of scientific study and for the help of the students. If it can do anything it is clearly the duty of the government to do it. It is a moot question in my mind as to whether the Dominion government cannot itself do something for technical education, but that is a very large question which it is not necessary to discuss in connection with this very modest motion of mine.

But it is a question. There is no doubt that in the scheme of confederation what it was intended to give exclusively to the provinces was that kind of education that was then contemplated—elementary education, to which I might add superior intellectual education in a general sense. But could we not, for instance, do something to help the cause of agricultural education ? I see no reason why we should not. We have jurisdiction in agricultural matters, and it seems to follow logically that we could help that special branch of technical education. Other examples might be given ; and, as we seem to have been given, in the distribution of powers, the control of industry and commerce, it is worthy of consideration whether we could not legitimately, and acting within the bounds of our constitutional powers, do something for technical education. If we established for instance, here in the city of Ottawa, or anywhere else, a great institution of technology, such as exists in various parts of the United States, where they produce wonderfully beneficial results, we would be doing an excellent work; and I have no doubt, that with a small percentage of the moneys that are utterly wasted in our administration of the public revenue, so far as I have been able to observe that administration since I have been in public life, we could do an immense good to the country. But here again I am going beyond the purposes of this motion. What do we do in that part of the administration of the public funds which consists of building wharfs, canals, railways, public buildings, dams and other works, the supervision of which is presumably confided to a superintendent or a foreman ? As a rule, the money used in that connection, so far as my observation goes, has been up to the present used for the purpose of rewarding political followers. The superintendent of construction of a public work is—I do not say invariably, but generally—a political heeler, and he does very little work, scarcely ever goes upon the work, draws a salary of two or three dollars a day, which he seldom or ever earns, and his supervision amounts to practically nothing at all. If you open the Auditor General's Report, you find that some important public works has beeen superintended in its construction by a man who has some local political importance, and has perhaps once or twice or three times during the course of his supervision gone down of an afternoon and smoked a cigar on the work. He has made no report to the government ; he has drawn his salary, and that is about all. I say that in this as in many other respects, we can, without spending an additional dollar reform a very great abuse and render a great service to the cause of technical education—how ? These works are generally executed during the summer months. Most of these young students are capable, talented fellows, who are very often prevented from continuing their studies through lack of funds. If they had the means during their holidays of earning a little money, they would turn that money to excellent account. It would enable then to continue and terminate their studies to qualify them for the career they desired to enter, and moreover it would check the abuse to which I have referred, and which ought to be stamped out. It would enable the government to obtain from these young men already under training and qualified to a certain extent, valuable reports as to the progress of the works being executed ; and probably we would see fewer buildings tumbling down and fewer wharfs tumbling into the water than we have seen in recent years. By adopting the suggestion contained in this motion, we would be serving very useful and patriotic purposes. In order to effect that, all that these important spending departments of the government would have to do would be to place themselves in communication with the head masters of these schools. There are two in Montreal. I have referred particularly to the condition of affairs as it is in that city, where I live, and in the institutions with which I am connected. But I have no doubt, as a university man, and a man connected with education, that similar conditions exist in every other province. If the public work were executed within the province, the government would probably receive the recommendations of the principals or head men of these technical schools, so that a certain number of lucrative positions during the summer would be placed at the disposal of these students, who would thereby acquire practical experience in their work, and a small proportion would be enabled to earn a little money to help them continue their studies. I know of no small way—small in a certain sense—in which the government could be of greater use to the great cause of technical education than by carrying out this suggestion. That suggestion has been adopted in many other countries. I have not the statistics at hand; but it is well known that in many of the states of the union, in some of the federal departments of the United States, in Switzerland, I believe in France, in Italy and in other European countries the services of technical students are utilized in the manner I have indicated, and surely, if that is done in other countries, where the natural resources are less extensive and where the works to be executed are of less importance, I venture to say that this country, which is a young country, should grasp the opportunity of carrying out this suggestion.

But it would have to be done absolutely regardless of politics. It would have to be undertaken as a serious, earnest effort for the advancement of the great cause of education. If into the carrying out of that suggestion the government were to import the miserable system of patronage, which is the bane and curse of this country at present, it would be better to abstain from the experiment altogether. They have got rid in Britain of that tremendous inconvenience of political patronage, and they are getting rid of it in the United States. In the United States, in department after department, the system is being improved and the old system of spoils for office is being abolished. Are we going to take a similar step in that direction or are we going to apply that principle of patronage to the case now before the House for consideration? I trust not. I trust that in the distribution of these small positions of employment for the advancement of education and the help of students the government will not for an instant consider political leanings. That would be a great disaster and a retrograde movement. I regret that I have not some statistics to show with what success the system I advocate has been adopted in some foreign countries, but I hope that the government will nevertheless give to it its earnest consideration and make an effort to carry it into practice.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I did not know that this resolution was coming on this evening, but I wish to say a few words in its favour. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) a good one. We have at Queen's College at Kingston, and in fact in all these colleges, young students who would be very glad indeed to have assistance of this kind during their summer vacations, and I am quite satisfied that their services would be of great advantage to our public works. In my own constituency we have a work under the charge of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. On that work there is no doubt technical knowledge required. We have there the acetylene gas works, and I do not believe that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) has a man of experience engaged on that plant. At all events, I do not know of any one around these works who knows anything about acetylene gas or ever made it a study. And I am quite satisfied that if the minister would employ some of these students who have studied up that subject on these works that would be of great advantage. But what is the practice to-day? Whenever any of these acetylene gas propositions are before the minister some young man is placed in charge who has never had any experience whatever in the working of acetylene gas. We have had several disasters resulting from that practice. I remember one at Kingston, where the steamer 'Scout' was blown up and several men killed, and these acetylene gas buoys are all prepared in the town of Prescott. Another was sent to Owen Sound, and a man given charge who had no experience. As a consequence, one of these buoys was blown up, another steamer sent to the bottom and one or two people killed. There was another blown up at Port Arthur and one or two men killed, and another at Halifax. If the minister had employed some young man who had taken a course of study in one of these colleges, that student would be of great assistance in a plant of that kind. But whenever there is a vacancy he applies to the Liberal executive committee, and will employ any man who has the endorsement of that committee, even if he has never seen a gas buoy in his life. This is a most important matter for the Department of Ma d Fisheries.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Would you recommend a student of a university to be put in charge of an acetylene gas plant?

Mr. J. D. REID. I would prefer such a man rather than take some young man who had never seen a gas buoy in his life, and had practically never been inside of any mechanical establishment or a college of any kind, and who never had any training to fit him for such work. Before a man is placed in such a responsible position he certainly should have some technical education. That is not the case to-day. The man appointed to-day in the establishment at Prescott is simply the nominee of the Liberal executive of that town. While I am on that point, I might say that the predecessor of the present minister acted differently. He had men sent there from other parts of the Dominion, who, I think, had some technical education. But since the present Minister of Marine took charge the Liberal executive there have appointed one of their own number who is practically in charge of these works in Prescott.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will my hon. friend tell me who that man is?

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister will have no difficulty in ascertaining his name. He is practically in charge of the works. He took part in a pubic meeting.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) must know the name of the man to whom he alludes.

Mr. J. D. REID. If the minister cannot find out the name I will tell him at a future time. This man instead of looking after the acetylene gas business is looking after the political end of that organization. The whole thing is now turned into a political machine, and this, as I understand it, by direct instructions of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I myself saw this man, at the last municipal election, march the whole lot of men down to vote simply as he directed.

Mr. BRODEUR. What is his name?

Mr. J. D. REID. If the minister cannot find out his name I will tell him at a future time.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There is no such man as he refers to in charge of the works at Prescott.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, he has all to say there so far as the department is concerned. The commissioner who had charge previous to the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries taking office did manage to appoint men from different parts who looked after the work properly. But since the present minister took charge this man to whom I have referred carries on the whole affair simply as a political machine. You can see him in elections, municipal, provincial or Dominion, marching the whole gang of 100 or 125 men down to vote as he directs. If they had young men there who would attend to the acetylene gas business and let politics alone it would be better for the country and would save the lives of men who otherwise may be blown up by the explosion of these gas buoys. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he thinks it right that this man should be there nominally to carry on this work for the department, but really to manage these men as a political machine.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member (Mr. J. D. Reid) think that this is pertinent to the motion?

Mr. J. D. REID. If it is not, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it. I was simply illustrating how much better it would be to have young men of some technical education than men of the class of this man to whom I have referred. All along the St. Lawrence, we have not only the canal system, but public works in the shape of wharfs and other things. In my county they have appointed men as inspectors of masonry, as inspectors of timber work and as assistant engineers who have never been inside a college.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Does the hon. member (Mr. J. D. Reid) think that students should be appointed for that work?

Mr. J. D. REID. Certainly, it would be better to appoint a man of some education than a man who can hardly write his name and has had no experience in the work he is supposed to do. I can name instances of men appointed as inspectors of timber work and cribwork who never in their lives saw anything of that kind done. I can give instances of men appointed as inspectors of masonry who never saw masonry work done. On the other hand, I know young men in my county who have been attending Queen's College and who have had enough technical education to do this work much better than the men who have been appointed.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I am at a loss to understand why the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid), on a motion of such importance as this, proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), should make an attack upon the appointments of my department in the town of Prescott. It seems to me he does not bring to the support of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier the best arguments that he might have brought. If the hon. gentleman will look at the records of the department he will find many instances of students being appointed to positions which enable them to earn money during the summer months. We have some, for instance, on the hydrographic survey. Every summer on that survey we have students who are anxious to earn something for their education and at the same time get the benefit of the training and experience which the hydrographic survey gives. Others are employed on our dredges; our biological station also employs some of these young men and gives them an opportunity to study the life history of fish to greater advantage than under other circumstances. So my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) does not render justice to the department in this matter. He has seen fit also to refer to some man whose name he has not been willing to disclose, leaving me at a loss as to the man referred to. There is no new man in charge of the service at Prescott, unless he refers to Mr. Stewart who came last year from Halifax. I do not know whether he is the man to whom my hon. friend refers. He is connected with the buoy service and has most to do with it. I am exceedingly surprised if it is to him my hon. friend refers, but if he does not refer to that man I do not know——

Mr. J. D. REID. It is a man who has lived in Prescott all his life and occupies one of the most prominent positions there, a member of the Liberal executive——

Mr. BRODEUR. What is his name——

Mr. J. D. REID—and one of the highest men there. The Minister of Railways knows to whom I refer.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know at all. I know a man named Stewart.

Mr. J. D. REID. He is not the man.

Mr. BRODEUR. He is I think in charge of the buoy service. He has a great deal to do with that branch, he is not the head of the administration there. The man in charge of the lighthouse depot at Prescott is a graduate of the university of Toronto, Mr. J. F. Fraser, and his assistant is Mr. W. H. Noble, who, I think, is an engineer also, and if I mistake not he is not a friend of the government, while Mr. Fraser was appointed by the late government. These are the charges my hon. friend is making against the department——

Mr. J. D. REID. They have nothing to say now.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, they are in charge of the lighthouse depot there. There is also a young man who came from England, Mr. Boyle, the accountant, who has a great deal to do with the administration and practically, when Mr. Fraser and Mr. Noble are not there, makes the reports to the government. I do not know to whom my hon. friend is referring. I am afraid he does not know himself, and only wants to have a grudge against the department.

Mr. J. D. REID. The Minister of Railways and Canals knows.

Mr. BRODEUR. In every instance where it has been possible for us to use the services of young students in the hydrographic survey, or in dredging on the ship channel we have done it, we have endeavoured to help them. We cannot get students to take charge the year around of the buoy system, and besides I do not know that they would have sufficient experience to take charge of such an important work. Of course accidents have happened, but if my hon. friend consults the record and looks into the facts he will see that the accidents are not due to any lack of knowledge but, to a certain extent, to negligence or to failure to observe some of the instructions in connection with the handling of the buoy system, so that all of my hon. friend's criticism in that regard falls absolutely to the ground.

My hon. friend seems much scandalized because the lighthouse keeper at Prescott has taken part in municipal elections. What great crime is there in any public officer taking part in municipal elections——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that is——

Mr. BRODEUR. I am simply answering what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. SPEAKER. Still I think the hon. member travelled beyond the scope of the motion and I made the suggestion to him——

Mr. BRODEUR. I wished simply to refer to the case of the collector of customs in Montreal who has taken part in municipal elections. No one raised a fuss about that.

Mr. MONK. If a student is well recommended by his principal, is poor and is well qualified and there is a vacancy for him as superintendent or some such work will the government give it to him ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly. I will give him some work if there is work available, and that is what I am doing. My hon. friend knows Mr. Balète, the principal of the Polytechnic School in Montreal. I have consulted Mr. Balète very frequently to secure the names of young men, poor and deserving students, in order to give them work in the vacation when I could.

Mr. MONK. Irrespective of politics ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Irrespective of politics.

Mr. MONK. That is right.

Mr. BRODEUR. And I know as a fact that some young students have been employed in the service in that way who are not of the same political faith as the government. This should show my hon. friend that our effort was to help the poor students, and the government will always be ready to do that on every occasion that presents itself.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER (Dundas). I think the question raised by the resolution of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is one that deserves consideration; but it has its difficulties as I can see. It is not easy to use students for a short time in the summer after a public work has commenced especially as they have to go back to college before the completion of the work in the fall. In other words their services would be available for only a part of the time for which they would be required. I think it is best to attempt first to give employment to those who are fully equipped. We know to our sorrow that a great many young men who graduate from our technical schools find places in New Zealand, Mexico and the United States; in fact, many of the best equipped of our young men are enticed to these countries by larger salaries and better prospects and you cannot very well find fault with them for going. It seems to me that we should do whatever we can to encourage the acquirement of technical knowledge and so far as possible give employment to the man who is fully equipped. I know personally that quite a number of students have been assisted to positions by the government in the different departments and they have done creditable service, but it seems to me that we should seek to give employment to our young men after they are equipped, after they have come out of our colleges. It is well known that Canadian boys who came out of our technical schools stand high in other countries, that they are sought after and many are offered positions even before they graduate, so that in many cases we lose the services of our fully equipped young men. I do not think it would be wise, for instance, to put a student who has no practical knowledge of any public work, in charge of a public work or over men who are carrying out that public work; they ought to be attached to the staff of a man who has practical knowledge. What the student wants outside of his college, is practical instruction, he gets the theory in his college, and if he is put on a public work without previous experience he will be a failure; he should be attached to the staff of a man who has practical knowledge. In this way it is possible to assist young men.

This question has been raised in the Ontario legislature within the last day or two, whether or not it would be possible for the federal authorities to assist in technical education throughout the provinces. I do not profess to be in a position to suggest anything of that kind, but it seems to me that some system might be adopted by which we could encourage the acquirement of this class of knowledge throughout our country. We know that the professions are over-full and we lack men of that technical knowledge which the development of this country is calling for every day. It seems to me that this is a question that ought to be dealt with on a broad basis and in a technical way, to bring about the best results.

Mr. MONK. I do not think my hon. friend entirely understood the gist of this motion. I did not contemplate placing students in positions of responsibility in charge of public works, but where you employ a political heeler to stand around and smoke cigars and see a wharf being built, I suggest you might allow a student to get the privilege of superintending that work. He has had as much experience as that heeler ; it would be of service to him and of greater service to the country.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue). Mr. Speaker, from the speeches which they have delivered it appears to me that neither the hon. mover of the resolution (Mr. Monk) nor my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) thoroughly understands the gist of it. As to the resolution, it seems to me there can be no objection whatever, but when my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) proceeded to argue that students in their first, second or third year at colleges or universities, who have not passed through these colleges, regardless altogether of what their studies may be, should be placed in charge of construction of wharfs, masonry, acetylene gas plants and all these mechanical works carried on under the Department of Public Works and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, he took a position which was preposterous and extreme. The resolution indicates exactly what some departments of the government that can employ technical students have been doing for a number of years. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) may not know it, but it a fact that in the Geological Survey some thirty students are annually drawn from the principal universities of the country, nominated by the presidents of these universities, not known to the minister nor the director in charge of the Geological Survey, and these students go out with the parties, assist in carrying out the surveys throughout the country, spend the summer vacation and receive a salary—I do not know what it is, but it is sufficient to enable them to carry on their studies for the balance of the year. That work has been going on for a number of years. We have extended that recently, and for the last two years the presidents of Toronto University, Queen's University and McGill, have nominated a certain number of students in technical science, geology, mining, engineering and studies of that kind, for employment on the Geological Survey during the summer season. We employed about thirty students last summer, we will employ the same number this summer and they will all be nominated by the presidents regardless of their politics, because we do not know what the politics of the boys or of their fathers are. That has been going on for many years, and it has worked out satisfactorily. We are trying to help the students, we are trying at least to educate young men in geological science and mining engineering, so that when the government may require men of standing in those departments of science it will know where to get them. It has happened that we have already put on the survey a number of young men who have obtained their education in geological science at Toronto and Montreal. I think the resolution, as I said before, is quite acceptable to all departments of the government, but if the resolution is taken to mean that students are to be put in charge of masonry, acetylene gas plants and all those mechanical works, I repeat it is preposterous and extreme.

Mr. MONK. I would like to state to my hon. friend that while I am very glad to hear what he has just stated to the House, I was not aware that the number of schools that I referred to as polytechnic schools have ever had an opportunity of nominating any pupils for such work as students can do. I know several students who last year failed to obtain any kind of work during the vacation, although they were quite qualified for it.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There are more applications than vacancies.

Motion agreed to.

ABOLITION OF TOLL GATES UPON ISLAND OF MONTREAL.

On the motion :

That it is the duty of the government to enter into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec, with a view to removing all obstacles to the abolition of toll gates upon the roads of the Island of Montreal.—Mr. Monk.

Mr. MONK. I would be ready to proceed with this resolution as well as the following one, but it seems to me in the absence of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) it would perhaps be better to let it stand until he is here to give an answer on behalf of the government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Stands.

Motion allowed to stand.

IMMIGRATION BONUSES.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Cockshutt :

That in consideration of the great congestion that at present prevails in the labour market in many of the industrial centres throughout the country, it is highly expedient that assisted immigration, excepting only the agricultural and domestic servant classes, should immediately cease, and that no further bonuses shall be paid to individual agents or companies for sending or bringing in such immigrants. Further, that the time has come for the strict enforcement of the law that requires that only the financially, morally and physically fit shall be allowed to enter this Dominion as settlers, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Johnston.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on this question, I desire to say that while I am in favour of the motion it would better meet my views if it went a little farther than this one does. The House will be aware, I am sure, that I have been opposed to the bonusing of immigrants for a long time. I do not think it is necessary or in the interests of the country that we should bonus immigrants to come to this country, because instead of getting a better class of immigrants, we are liable to get a poorer class as the slick-tongued agent can go to a weak or worthless man and induce him to change his mind as to the place where he intended to go. People who are susceptible to such influences are the kind that we do not want in this country. The orders in council that have been passed lately look to me as if they pointed to some influence that the North Atlantic Trading Company still have with the government. On the 30th November, 1906, the contract with the North Atlantic Trading Company was cancelled, and from that time until the 19th February, 1907, there were no bonuses whatever paid, in so far as I can learn on European immigrants. On the 19th February, 1907, there was an order in council passed, of which I have a copy, giving a bonus of 10 shillings upon adults, 5 shillings upon children between the ages of 1 and 18, and 10 shillings upon female domestics. The rates under this order in council, as applied to all the different classes of people, are about the same as those covered by the contract of the North Atlantic Trading Company. This went on until the 6th January, 1908, and why the bonus should have been raised at this season of the year under the circumstances which exist in Canada at the present time, when the market is glutted with those who are living on the charity of our own people, is something that I cannot understand, and the action is one which cannot be justified by this government or anybody else. On the 6th January, 1908, I find that the bonus on European immigration was changed from 10 shillings for adults to £1, from 5 shillings upon children from 1 to 18 to 10 shillings, and from 10 shillings for female domestics to £1. In view of the number of immigrants that we have in this country who are in a serious position—because I do not think you could put it much milder than that—it was simply outrageous to pass this order in council holding out larger inducements for agents to persuade people to come to this country, where we have no employment to give them and when the country has no need for them. But that is not all. The government was not quite satisfied with the encouragement given to immigrants, and on the 8th of January, 1908, they passed an order in council saying that any person coming to Canada before the 15th day of February must be possessed of $50, and after the 15th of February until the 1st of April he must be possessed of $25. Why offer an extra inducement to bring people here and then place this barrier in the way of their coming in? And even that was not all, because they seemed to be right in the business at the time, and so they passed another order in council giving the Minister of the Interior power to prohibit people coming into this country if he saw fit, and that order in council said :

Immigrants may be prohibited from landing or coming into Canada unless they come from the country of their birth or citizenship by a continuous journey and on through tickets purchased before leaving the country of their birth or citizenship.

These immigration regulations seem to be a heterogeneous mass. In the first place the government increase the bonus to encourage people to come to this country, which I think was entirely unnecessary ; then they say the immigrant must not come to the country unless he has $50 in his pocket if he lands before the 15th of February and $25 if he lands between that and the 1st of April ; and then they say the immigrant must come direct from the land of his birth or citizenship. They also say in one of these orders in council that immigrants must come direct to a Canadian port except in winter time when they may come to the port of Portland, United States. Now we will suppose that a party of these immigrants to whom such great inducements are held out, decide to come to Canada, and half of them come to Portland, and the other half to New York, and the people that come via New York cannot enter Canada. Is there any sense in that ? I thought the government said we wanted immigrants in this country. I cannot see why if a Scotchman, or an Englishman, or an Irishman should decide to come to this country whether by way of Portland or by way of New York, or whether he lives in the United States, it makes the slightest difference what way he comes ; because what we want is men who will make good reliable citizens and not such as a great many of those who have been brought here in the past.

This government has been lavish in its expenditure on immigration. For the nine months ending the 31st of March 1907 they have spent in bonuses to steamship agents, selected by themselves, $92,614.69. Any person who has seen these immigrants will I think say that there are quite a large number of them who are not desirable and are not such people as would make good citizens and help to raise the standard of our citizenship. When we come to consider what this government has done in the way of spending money on immigration since it has come to power, it is simply astonishing. The Public Accounts show us that from 1897 to 1907 both years inclusive, this government has expended $5,832,573.63 on immigration and in the estimates for this year they have $920,000 for the same service, which is quite a considerable sum considering the state of the finances of the country and the large expenditures during the past two or three years. Therefore, if the money voted is spent next year the government will have expended on immigration $6,752,573.63. So far as I have been able to speak with the people, and I have been speaking to them on this question, I find that irrespective of politics the people in my section of the country are opposed to the bonus system and believe we are spending entirely too much money on immigration. I believe the feeling to-day is that we had better hold our hand until we can see what we can do with the people we have already here. In my section of the country the difficulty is this ; the farmer wants a man in the summer season for six or seven months or eight months at the utmost ; the farms in that section run from 100 to 200 acres and so the farmers have no work for a hired man in the winter time and they cannot afford to pay him anything like a reasonable salary then. I do not think farm labourers can make enough in the seven or eight months working time to keep them comfortably through the winter, and so I think it is a great shame that the government should hold out to these people the inducements they do. Only to-day it came to my ears that a man was working for a farmer out in the country from my town and he is very much dissatisfied because he was told before coming to Canada that there would be nothing to prevent him getting steady work at least $20 a month and board and lodging. He finds a very different state of things now. When this question was being discussed in the House the other day, the Minister of the Interior instead of discussing the question fairly read a lot of letters, and he seemed to be trying to justify as well as he could the extension of the bonus system to others than farmers and farm labourers, because he has extended it to gardeners, to stable men, to navvies, and to miners and perhaps to others. In my judgment the only reason why he has not extended it to mechanics is because of the trade unions, and the unions amongst railway men in this country, and the government are afraid to do so, but they come as near to covering every class of the community as they possibly dare. It is only because the labouring men and the carters and the gardeners have not unions that the government is giving bonuses on these classes of immigrants. The government pretends to be opposed to the Manufacturers' Association and they are trying to create that impression on the public generally, but why did the Minister of the Interior read these letters from friends of the Manufacturers' Association and why did he censure my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) because he inclosed a letter to the department from a gentleman who wanted to know where he could get help ? I think the government is doing in this matter what the Hon. George W. Ross of Ontario was accused of doing in the past—and a good many believe the accusation is true—Mr. Ross used to put a law on the statute-book and then he would give a wink to the officials not to enforce it too rigidly. You can find very strong evidence of that in the license law of Ontario. Many of the people think that since Mr. Whitney came to power he has passed an entirely new liquor law, when the fact is that practically he is only enforcing the provisions of the old law. To illustrate this I heard in my own town this morning two gentlemen who are very respectable people and who thought they could get a drink on the Sabbath day if anybody could, and they just thought they would test the thing, and they said they went to every hotel in the town but one and were absolutely refused. Why was that ? It is because the law is being enforced and because under Mr. Whitney the liquor sellers are not given a tip that they may sell liquor and there will be nothing done about it. Now, to my mind this immigration business is a very serious matter, for I believe that a large number of people are brought to this country whom we do not want here. I have in my hand a hospital report from Winnipeg, which was sent to me by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture in reply to a request for information, and I will read it :

Patients treated in the wards of the hospital who have been resident in the province less than three years, and were unable to pay for treatment: resident less than three months, 229, 4,803 days treatment in the hospital; less than six months and over three, 175 persons, treated 5,465 days; less than one year, 223, treated 5,405 days; less than two years, 254, treated 7,806 days; less than three years, 187, treated 5,569 days. Total number treated, 1,068, treated 29,048 days. Their nationalities were as follows: English, 349; Irish, 29; Scotch, 83; United States, 30; others, 577; total, 1,068.

In the newspapers we read of places like 'Shacktown' in Toronto, where 3,000 people who have lately come to this country are suffering severely for the common necessaries of life, and we have a report that in the city of Toronto alone 100 infants have died of starvation. Whether these statements are true or not, they are in the public prints of the country. If they are not true, they ought to be contradicted ; and if they are true, they indicate a deplorable state of things in this country, which this government ought to take into their serious consideration, instead of doubling the bonuses to people in foreign countries and sending twenty-two special agents to Great Britain and Ireland to try by every possible means to induce people to come to this country by telling them of the great things they can accomplish if they come here. We have a country quite as good as any other country in the world ; but we cannot accomplish impossibilities, and we ought to be content with a little slower progress rather than to rush things at such a rate as to cause so much suffering and public expense. When the Doukhobors were brought at great expense to this country, we paid $5 a head for every man, woman and child of the whole outfit ; and they came in such a destitute state that this country had to provide $20,000 to keep them over the first winter. We were told time and again in the Committee on Agriculture by the then deputy minister that we had a lien on their land, and that that money would all come back. In this connection I may say that I do not know what the matter is this year —we have not had any meeting of the Committee on Agriculture, except one to appoint a chariman ; although last year we talked the matter over and came to an understanding that at another session we would meet earlier, before the other committees met, and would do a great deal of our business before the other committees got busy ; but, for some reason unknown to me, we have had only one meeting of that committee, although we have a farmer for Minister of Agriculture and I believe a farmer as chairman of the committee ; and still the interest of the farmers seems to be totally neglected. There was an interview with the present Minister of the Interior, in April, 1907, or 1906, by Mr. Reiban on behalf of the Doukhobors. He said :

Before the Doukhobors came to Canada the government of this country knew very distinctly the Doukhobors had desire to live in villages and to cultivate all their lands in common, and the government agreed to it; and they hold original letters from government officials to this effect; and we are surprised why government was expecting that Doukhobors will live individually after they have been informed that they exist in common, and if Doukhobors had known the conditions which they are proposing to them now, they would not have come at all.

If the government had been honest with them and told them the conditions, we would not have had them in this country at all, and we would not only have saved our money, but got rid of an element that is to my mind very undesirable. I have had occasion two or three times to express my views on this matter and therefore it is not necessary to go very far now. Another gentleman who addresses the Minister of the Interior says :

So far as we know, all conditions which were promised by the government to the Doukhobors were changed altogether. We have a letter from the Minister of the Interior written to the Doukhobors in which he explained the conditions under which the Doukhobors have been accepted in Canada. In this letter he explained very clearly the Doukhobors may live in villages if they desire, and instead of cultivating each homestead separately, they can do it in one large block near the village.

Whether that is the case or not I do not know, but it does appear that that was the impression made upon the minds of the Doukhobors, and for that reason they came to Canada, as I fear a good many others have come, through misrepresentation. They utterly refuse to take out their patents for their lands, because they refuse to become citizens of this country and to live on separate farms. They want to live in communities. I have here an extract from the report of Mr. McDougall, who is the commissioner in the Northwest to settle the business. He says :

For instance, the following is a typical conversation between your commission and the community Doukhobors: How long have you lived in Canada? Perhaps eight years almost. Is this a good country? Oh, yes, a very good country. What do you think of our government? The government never did us any harm. Is our government better than that in Russia? Oh, yes, very much better. Have you had peace and freedom here? Oh, yes, the government never do us any harm. Why have you not joined this government? Oh, we cannot join any government in this world; God is our king. You have been more than seven years in this country; have you taken out any patents for these lands you are living on? Oh, no, we cannot get patents. Why? If we got patents, we would be subject to the government; we cannot do that. Why are you afraid to be subject to this government? Oh, they would make us fight, and we cannot do that. Do you know that unless you naturalize and become citizens of this country, you cannot secure patents for these homesteads you have entered for? Yes, we know that, but we cannot become subject to the government; God is our king.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that shows a very strong reason why we should not have brought these people to this country—because when they came to this country first, we gave them special privileges—we agreed that we would not make them fight. I am opposed to giving any special privileges to any foreigners. I believe Canada should be a country where all men will be treated alike, and I may say that I believe the legislation passed in this House should be for the whole of Canada not for any particular province of Canada. Now, I want to read a few extracts from a book called 'Russia's Strength and Her Weakness' by Wolff Brand Shelburne, which was published in 1904. It says .

Its population is by no means homogeneous. One-third of the whole does not even speak Russian, and both religious and race strife are rampant.

While neighbouring Protestant or Catholic countries have only from 58 to 65 non-labour days in the year, orthodox Russia enjoins on her peasantry 94 of them.

And these are the people we are paying $5 a head for to our immigration agents —$5 per head for every man and woman and 5 shillings per head for every child. I go a little further and find this passage :

It is stated that on an average the Russian peasants to-day do not labour 150 days out of the year.

Surely that is not the kind of people we want in Canada. If a man wants to make a good living in Canada he will have to work more than 150 days in the year. All the people I know, who have been in any way successful in this country, have worked a good many more days than that. I once heard a wholesale merchant in Toronto say that he never knew a man to succeed who did not work more than ten hours a day, and I think he was pretty nearly right. Most men who start early in life have to work long hours and have to be careful as well if they want to succeed. I have had some experience in that line.

In many districts the drawbacks of this description amount to a veritable curse. In the district of Ouglitch, province Yaroslav, that is in the very centre of the empire, the average portion of each peasant is to-day cut into thirty-six separate strips. In twelve per cent of the rural communities these narrow strips are of a width as low as three and one-half feet.

As I understand it, these people live in villages and have to go long distances to farm strips of that kind. Can any one understand why the government should pay $5 a head to bring farmers of that class to this country? Why they would not be looked upon here as farmers at all or as anything better than common gardeners. How a man can make anything at all out of these strips I cannot understand.

Between 1875 and 1895 this process proceeded at a particularly rapid rate. Within those twenty years according to the statements of M. Polenoff, Moscow, 1901, there was a loss of land per head of peasant population of twenty per cent in the central provinces, twenty-three per cent in the eastern, and twenty-four per cent in the southern districts.

Those must be pretty small farms, unless the farms were very large before, and judging by the strips into which they are cut, they could not be very large at the best. But I think I can show that these people have even worse characteristics:

No saint's day, no communal celebration of any kind, no social diversion, without delights of the bottle.

The real consumption, relying on these figures of vodka, beer, wine and other liquors sold by government monopoly is probably about three to four gallons per head. In a peasant family composed of seven adult male members the outlay on liquor is, of course, much larger, amounting to one-fifth or one-quarter of the total earnings of the family.

Would not that be a nice kind of an immigrant to bring to this country—a man who would spend one-quarter of his earnings in buying liquor. Instead of paying $5 a head to get these people we ought not to let them come in at all.

The Russian peasant has never been taught to work properly. He labours in a half-hearted way, lacks steadiness and persistence, he does not like to work for several days in succession, and never has ideas or purposes taking into account, conditions weeks or months hence.

He must be just a hand to mouth sort of man, and we have too many of that kind as it is.

The census of 1897 shows that in St. Petersburg out of 1,242,815 Russian subjects, 469,720 did not know their letters, or 37·4 of the total population. Of the 290,000 recruits yearly joining the army, forty-five per cent are ignorant of reading or writing. Among the older peasants scarcely five in a hundred can read a line. The female sex is hardly taught at all. The Russian periodical 'Nedya' (the 'Week') makes the statement that not more than one peasant girl out of every seven has even a slight knowledge of reading. In many villages there is not a single woman or girl able to read or write.

These are pretty hard statements if true, and I have no reason to doubt their truth because the man I am quoting from is a reliable authority who has published a book which can be seen by every one who desires to read it.

The great mass of the peasantry (and we must never forget that the peasantry practically mean the whole Russian nation) have not even to-day any general conception of state and government, not even the dimmest All things political in their minds embody themselves in Czar and Church, and blindly follow the lead of these two powers.

In Russia there are 44,000,000 Russians and 86,000,000 composed of 200 different tribes or non-Russians who speak 200 different languages and dialects.

It does seem to me that this class of people at least should be taken out of the list by order in council to-morrow or the next day, and we should discourage by every means possible their coming. The very fact that they are on the list leads me to suspect that the North Atlantic Trading Company has a finger in this pie. I cannot account for the right hon. the First Minister refusing to let the names of the members of that company be known. Is it because they are such criminals that they are afraid to face the courts? They have threatened suicide rather than have the names made published. And the right hon. gentleman is shielding those criminals. I would like to know what would be done with a man who helped a convict in a penitentiary to escape? Yet we find this government, when Mr. Preston refused to answer, calling on their followers to vote down a proposition that Mr. Preston be compelled to give the names of these people. The First Minister stood up in his place, called on his followers to vote the resolution down, and they followed him like sheep. It is hardly credible that you should find such unanimity in preventing the light being thrown on these transactions and the parties to them unless there be some other reason than a desire to do justice. We have not all the figures we would like to have with reference to immigration.

I sometimes look at the returns from the United States, and I find that they contain much information of value. I will not go into them very fully, but I may point out that they show the law of that country provides that, if a steamship brings to the United States a person with a dangerous, contagious disease, the existence of which might have been discovered at the port of embarkation, the owners of the steamship are liable to a fine of $100 for every such case, besides being obliged to carry the diseased person back to the country from which he came. In the year 1907, the steamship companies plying between other countries and the United States rejected no less than 65,000 people. If we had a similar law in this country, it would be of great help. Besides, their system of inspection is very different from ours. In these immigration reports of the United States, you will find that every immigrant must go through an individual examination by a medical officer and then go through another examination by an immigration agent. But how is it in our country? Dr. Bryce says that the immigrants are sometimes examined in batches of 1,000. Some days 7,000 are turned in upon him, so what can he do? On Ellis island, they have great facilities for handling immigrants. The average arrivals of immigrants have been 93,000 a month, but, notwithstanding this, the authorities will not allow more than 5,000 immigrants to be examined in any one day simply because they have not the facilities to efficiently examine more. We ought to be all the more particular in our examination, because we have no examination at the port of embarkation. I notice that Lord Strathcona states that he tried to have a clause added to the law passed last year authorizing the examination of immigrants before they went aboard ship, but he did not succeed. He also states in his report that magistrates in England will refrain from passing sentence on criminals if they will agree to go to Canada. Is not that a nice state of affairs, Mr. Speaker?—a man is brought before a magistrate charged with a crime, but, if he will consent to leave the country and come to Canada, sentence will not be pronounced on him, I think it is time to put an end to that sort of thing; and, if we are going to take people from other countries—as we are—we should be particular to see to it that they are the kind of people we desire to have in this country, and not any kind of riffraff that they may desire to send us. Now, here is the statement made with regard to the United States showing that of immigrants from Canada to the United States 2,773 debarred. What has become of them?

The report speaks of

The unusual increase in the number of aliens who, originally giving Canadian destinations, proceeded to the United States within one year from date of arrival in Canada. From 9,724 during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1906, this class has increased to 15,677 for the year just closed. This remarkable increase is partially explained by the fact that while less than ·60 per cent of those manifested to the United States at time of embarkation are excluded, more than 10·06 per cent of the 'one year in Canada' class find it impossible to meet the requirements of our laws when examined.

Now, I do not know whether that means that these 15,677 are left with us or not, but that is the way it reads—I have read all there is to it.

The average monthly arrivals at Ellis Island were 93,654. This monthly number equals the total annual arrivals in some of the past years, and when it is considered that each alien is given a separate and individual medical inspection, as well as an individual inspection by the immigrant inspectors, 9,293 of them were detained in hospital for treatment, 64,510 for special inquiry by boards appointed to conduct special examinations, and 121,737 to be called for by relatives, it will be realized that it has been a task requiring unremitting attention to ensure its proper accomplishment.

And when you consider that there were 1,285,949 immigrants entering in the United States last year, and that only 13,064 were deported, after the rigid examination of which I have spoken, it must be conceded that the class of immgrants that come to the United States is better than the class coming to Canada. I was a little curious, a couple of years ago to know whether the United States had ever been in the habit of appointing agents to work for immigrants to come to their country. I received an answer from the acting commissioner of immigration of the United States as follows:

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 8th instant, which has been referred to the bureau for attention. So far as I am informed, the United States never solicited immigrants, although no restrictive measures were enacted until 1875, prior to which time foreigners came to the United States at their pleasure.

You see we are going much further than the United States ever went, and, I think, without any very good reason. Our country is well advertised; we are giving 160 acres of as good land as lies out of doors to any man who will settle on it and work it. It does seem to me that this is quite inducement enough without paying a bonus, or, as the 'Globe' says, 'hiring people to come to Canada.' The Toronto 'Globe' is an organ of the government and one of its ablest, I think, and it has opposed this bonusing of immigrants for years. I have a number of extracts here, which, however, I will not take time to read. But there are some things I would like to put on 'Hansard.' The commissioner of immigration in the United States has issued a circular in which he sets out the undesirability of having people come to the United States who are liable to become charges on the public. I think his views are sound. I wish to give some statistics taken from 'The Immigration Problem' by Thomas Darlington, M.D., president of the Board of Health of New York.

Inspection of school children in New York city.

They are subject to a rigid physical examination. During the first three months of 1906, 23,733 children were examined and 17,362 were found to be suffering from some physical abnormality. Of this number of defectives, 12,170, or 70·1 per cent were of foreign birth. It is safe to assume that a large proportion of the remainder were of foreign parentage, for their names give satisfactory evidence of foreign extraction.

In 1905 the 88 children in one truant school in Manhattan were examined. Of these 77 were found to be physically defective; 74 or 96·1 per cent of these latter being of foreign birth. In 1900 about 40 per cent of the school children in the city of New York were foreign-born.

In 1902, taking the deaths from tuberculosis in the city of New York, between the ages of 15 and 44 years, native-born population, 2,167,-122; deaths during the year from tuberculosis, native maternal parentage, 637. Foreign born population, 1,270.080; deaths during the year from tuberculosis, foreign maternal parentage, 5,087.

These statistics show, I think, that if our immigrants are any thing like those going to the United States we are suffering and are likely to suffer a great deal more than any one has any idea of from the diseased class, and I shall show further on how this costs the people of the United States and how, in like manner, it must cost us if we are to continue our present system.

An investigation of 500 consecutive deaths of infants from diarrhœal diseases in New York city, shows that 120 or 25 per cent were of native parentage, while 325, or 75 per cent were of foreign parentage. These conditions exist although 63·5 per cent of the total population of New York are natives of the city.

There are in charitable and penal institutions of the country, including those maintained for the detention and treatment of the insane, 3,049,825 inmates. Of these, 11 per cent are aliens and 17 per cent naturalized foreign-born persons, making a total of 28 per cent, although the number of foreign-born persons in the United States is only 14 per cent.

Practically 33 per cent of the insane in the United States are of foreign birth. The New York State Lunacy Commission in 1904, reported that 60 per cent of the insane patients in New York city were foreign-born.

From 1885 to 1894 the total admissions to the hospitals for adults of New York city were 282,928; of these 63·7 per cent were of foreign birth.

During 1905 there were admitted to seven of the largest hospitals of the city 26,839 patients ; of these, 12,550 or 46·6 per cent were native-born, and 14,289 or 53·4 per cent were foreign-born.

The hospitals wholly supported by the city present even a greater problem, for the money is contributed wholly from city funds. In 1905, Bellevue and its allied hospitals treated a total of 35,199 patients; of these, 19,146 or 54·4 per cent were foreign-born. The appropriation for these hospitals for the year amounted to $648,480.76, so that $352,773.54 of the sum was directly spent for the care of sick persons of foreign birth. The maintenance of the cases of contagious diseases transferred from Ellis Island direct to the Kingston avenue hospital of the Department of Health of New York city, cost the government of the United States, during the year 1906, up to December, $84,340. This amount was nearly one-third of the total required for the expenses of the hospital.

This shows that with all the care exercised by the United States government in the admission of immigrants to their country, with their inspection on the steamboats and after landing, this enormous number of diseased and criminal immigrants and immigrants who subsequently go insane, enter that country. These facts are well worth the consideration of this House and of this country.

Cases treated in tuberculosis clinic, July 1 to December 31, 1905.

Number of cases pulmonary tuberculosis treated, 767.

(1) Native-born 236 or 30·8 per cent.

(2) Foreign-born, 531 or 69·2 per cent.

Foreign-born (a) disease contracted before arrival in United States, 27 or 5·1 per cent.

(b) disease contracted within one year after arriving in the United States, 23 or 4·3 per cent.

(c) disease contracted from one to five years after arrival in United States, 147 or 26·7 per cent.

From the standpoint of physical fitness we are in danger of becoming a degenerate nation.

Undesirable aliens.

(a) The illiterates.

(b) The alien of poor physique.

(c) Those suffering from minor physical defects.

I have here an extract from the report of Mr. Robert Watchorn, Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York, one of the experts in the service of the United States. I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Watchorn two or three times in Montreal and I was greatly pleased with his manner of doing things. The United States find that the immigrants do not go to the new parts of the country in many cases, just as we find in our country. The number of arrivals at ocean ports in Canada in nine months was 90,008. Of these, general labourers, their wives and children numbered 26,807, and mechanics, their wives and children, 24,414, a total of these two classes of 51,221.

Of farmers, farm labourers, their wives and children there were 18,193, and of more general labourers and mechanics, 33,028. How were these people distributed ? We find in the maritime provinces, 6,491 ; in Quebec, 18,063 ; in Ontario, 32,265 ; in Manitoba, 17,036 ; in Saskatchewan 4,257 ; in Alberta, 3,474 ; in British Columbia, 8,406 and in the Yukon, 16, or a total of 33,189. The balance stayed in the older provinces and I suppose a great many of them that we paid bonuses for and who did come to the country are to be found around the towns and cities looking for work and, I do not say, hoping that they will not find it. In the United States the same thing happens. Instead of the newcomers going to the newer districts, 386,244, or over thirty per cent, stayed in New York ; 230,906, or over seventeen per cent stayed in Pennsylvania ; 83,583, or seven per cent, stayed in Massachusetts and 70,665, or five per cent, stayed in New Jersey.

I want to read a little extract from the Toronto 'Globe' of 22nd November, 1905. That is quite a long time ago.

Canada cannot afford to lose her good name by rewarding her agents for practising deception, neither can she afford to longer appear before the world as forced to pay people to come and live within the boundaries, while the United States can force them to pay for the privilege of entering.

The United States charged $2 per head for every person who entered that country, but they raised it to $4 per head so that any person entering the United States now as an immigrant has to pay $4. I think the 'Globe' is quite right in its view in reference to our paying for getting people into this country.

During the year ending June 30, 1904, our government paid $102,663 in per capita bonuses to the agents and companies inducing people to enter the Dominion. Of this amount, $14,428 was paid on settlers from the United States. The list shows that one agent made no less than $3,107 by persuading people to cross the American boundary.

That is from the Toronto 'Globe.' I suppose hon. gentlemen will take that as gospel.

While the British immigrant costs $2 each with $3 and $4.86 for domestic servants, Icelanders cost us $4.86 each with children half price. . . . . The government should make a radical change and eliminate the bonus or commission system before more serious abuses develop.

I was looking up the other day the views of the Trades and Labour Council and I found that as far back as 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896 they were passing resolutions strongly condemning the system of granting assistance to induce people to emigrate. I will read one of the resolutions and that will do for the whole. This one was passed in 1893:

Resolved, that the expenditure of any public money, directly or indirectly for the purpose of assisting, bonusing, encouraging or decoying emigrants of either or both the classes mentioned, adult or juvenile, from abroad to Canada is unnecessary and unjustifiable.

A resolution to that effect was really passed every year, and I fancy they are doing it yet although I have not looked into the matter for a number of years past. I think that has been the history of this organization.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that increased bonuses are not necessary on account of any falling off in immigration. I find on page 8 of the report of the Department of the Interior, immigration branch, that during the nine months to the 31st March, 1907, the increase of immigrants over the previous nine months was 34,104. That would seem to show that there was no great necessity for the payment of an increased bonus. There has been a rather strained feeling in reference to the way in which this government have dealt with the British people. I had occasion a few years ago to point out that the government gave seven shillings for a British adult and three shillings and sixpence for a child, while they were paying the North Atlantic Trading Company one pound for every man, woman and child of the classes described, and the deputy minister of the Interior in the committee said that even if the child were born on the passage they were entitled to the pound. I find in the last report of the Auditor General, page L—24, that a bonus was paid of seven shillings for adults and three shillings and sixpence for children. At page L—25 you will find that they paid a bonus of twelve shillings for adults and six shillings for children and on the same page you will find that they also paid one pound for adults and ten shillings for children. Why all these changes should be made by a government which claims to be so stable is something that I do not know. I have some figures in reference to the cost of this service and I find that the government have been very lavish in their goodness to their agents. I find that in Montreal every year they give them uniforms of one kind or another. For instance, here is J. Hoolihan, agent in Montreal; he has a salary of $1,200 and in 1904 he got a uniform worth $27, an overcoat worth $27, trousers worth $7 and a cap worth $5.50; in 1905, uniform $27, trousers $7, and cap $15; 1906, two uniforms $54, overcoat $27, cap $5.50, and in 1907 uniform $27, cap $4.50. Here is James Doyle, clerk, in 1904 he got a uniform worth $25, an overcoat $25, trousers $7, cap $4.50; in 1905 uniform $25, trousers $7, cap $12.50; in 1906 two uniforms $50, overcoat $25, cap $4.50; in 1907 uniform $25, cap $4.50, and so on. This is how they treat their agents in the district of Montreal. The agent in Quebec, in 1905, got a uniform worth $25, an overcoat worth $30 and a cap worth $7; in 1906, two uniforms worth $70, an overcoat worth $30 and a cap worth $10; in 1907 an overcoat $30 and a cap $11.50. It is not necessary to go any further. I now wish to move an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) as follows: I beg to move seconded by Mr. Blain:

That all the words after the word 'thereof' in the said amendment be left out and the following inserted instead thereof:

The House is of opinion that Canada's policy with respect to immigration should include a more careful selection of the sources from which immigration shall be sought, a more rigid inspection of immigrants and the abolition of the bonus system except under very special circumstances and for the purpose of obtaining particularly desirable classes of settlers.

Mr. E. L. CASH (Mackenzie). I did not intend to speak on this question but when we find hon. gentlemen such as the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and the hon. member for Lennox and Addington (Mr. Wilson) speaking on the subject of immigration without being familiar with the exact conditions in the west, and making statements which perhaps may lead to a wrong impression, it is difficult for one to remain silent. The statements of some of these hon. gentlemen with respect to immigration matters in the west are somewhat on a par with the venture of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) who seems to think he possesses a knowledge of everything that goes on in that western country although it is said he has only made on trip there. As this subject will require considerable discussion and as the hour is late I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Public Bills and orders will be taken to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. I understand that by agreement they will be taken instead of government orders.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 18, 1908.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ST. CLAIR AND ERIE SHIP CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel) moved :

That Bill (No. 98) respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company be read the first time and be placed on the Order Paper for second reading on Friday next.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved :

That Mr. Turcotte, of Nicolet, be appointed a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals, the Committee on Private Bills and the Committee on Agriculture; that Mr. Lovell, of Stanstead, be appointed a member of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, the Committee on Agriculture and the Committee on Standing Orders; that Mr. McLean, of South Huron, be appointed a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals, on Private Bills and on Debates.

Motion agreed to.

IRRIGATION ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 99) to amend the Irrigation Act.

Mr. CASH.

Mr. SPROULE. Explain.

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill as now introduced is to replace one that has been already under discussion by the House. As the result of further consideration of the amendments then placed before the House on information received from parties interested in irrigation it was decided to make certain amendments or additions to the Bill as it then stood. There are only two changes that are of importance; one of these introduces the authority of the Railway Commission to decide all points of dispute which may arise between the irrigation companies and the municipal or provincial authorities; the other is to make provision which will facilitate the provincial governments in carrying on drainage works. The work of drainage is essentially the work of the provincial governments. Under the Irrigation Act all authority in regard to all water is taken by the Dominion government and in order that the provincial government may be in a position to carry on necessary drainage work it is required that the Dominion shall give permission under the terms of the Irrigation Act, and provision is made for that permission.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 100) to amend the Railway Act.—Mr. M. Martin.

LAND GRANTS TO SOUTH AFRICAN VOLUNTEERS.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved that on Thursday next the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution :

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to grant two adjoining quarter-sections of Dominion lands available for homestead entry to every volunteer who at the time of his enlistment for military service in South Africa under Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, in 1899, 1901, or 1902, was resident or domiciled in Manitoba, or in the provisional district of Assiniboia, Saskatchewan or Alberta, or in the Yukon Territory.

2. Resolved, that every such grant shall be subject to the conditions that the grantee, or his duly qualified substitute, shall select and enter for the said two quarter-sections in the Dominion Lands Office for the land district in which they are situated on or before December 31, 1910; that he shall perfect his entry by commencing actually to reside upon and cultivate the land within six months after the said day; and that he shall thereafter reside upon and cultivate the land for the period, and in accordance with the terms and conditions, prescribed by the homestead provisions of the Dominion Lands Act.

3. Resolved, that any person entitled, under the foregoing provisions, to select and enter for, either by himself or by his substitute, land as a homestead, may, in lieu thereof, if he or his substitute so choose, receive scrip for $160, which shall be received from the bearer at its face value in payment of any Dominion lands open for sale; provided that any person choosing to take scrip shall notify the Minister of the Interior of his choice on or before December 31, 1909.

4. Resolved, that every such grant of land or scrip shall be made by the Minister of the Interior, upon a warrant issued in favour of the volunteer entitled thereto, by the Minister of Militia and Defence, which shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, under section 94 of the Dominion Lands Act; and all such scrip shall be subject in all respects to the provisions of sections 94, 96, 97, and 98 of the Dominion Lands Act

5. Resolved, that the entries made and the patents issued under the foregoing provisions shall be exempt from all fees and charges exacted in the case of an ordinary homestead entry.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend the First Minister whether the report of the Civil Service Commission has been made? If so, how long since? And when will it be brought down?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). We have not received it. A short time ago I was told that we might soon expect it, but I shall have to make further inquiries.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AND ELECTIONS.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER. I would like to ask the minister for that interesting information concerning matters on the Intercolonial Railway which I brought to his attention yesterday.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I have made some inquiries and have not been able to ascertain if the two gentlemen named have taken any part in the election. I cannot give the definite answer my hon. friend would like in that respect, but have not let the matter drop and am making further inquiries.

HARLAKA JUNCTION RAILWAY CONNECTION.

Mr. J. B. MORIN (Dorchester). I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) whether he has had any success in obtaining a change in the time-table at Lévis between the Quebec Central Railway and the Intercolonial Railway so as to give passengers going west a chance to connect from one train to the other?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I have no further information to give my hon. friend. The deputy minister has taken the matter up with the Quebec Central Railway, and so far they have not come to any definite conclusion.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the attention of several ministers to delays in bringing down returns. I have done this several times already and have waited with a good deal of patience for some of them. I have not yet received the return ordered on December 8th with reference to accounting expenditure made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, nor the return with reference to the Marconi stations ordered on December 18, nor with reference to the expenses of provisioning government steamers ordered on the 20th, nor with reference to the travelling expenses at the Imperial Conference, nor with reference to the travelling expenses of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his private secretary from 1904 to 1907 ordered on March 22nd, nor with reference to the Pringle papers and the Yukon papers asked for on January 13th. It seems almost unaccountable that the accounting returns are not in, because the minister told me on two occasions they had been copied and were here. I certainly expected them before this. We must have them before we get through with the minister's first estimates.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I have brought down several returns the last few days. I think that some of these my hon. friend has mentioned have been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I went over all the returns in the Record Department, and none I have mentioned is brought down.

Mr. BRODEUR. I had given formal instructions to have the reports prepared as expeditiously as possible. The other day we engaged some more employees in order to facilitate the work. Some of those reports are very voluminous.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the date of the motion for the Pringle papers?

Mr. FOSTER. January 13. The same as for the other papers in connection with Mr. Congdon.

Mr. BOYCE. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) when we may expect the return ordered on the 18th December respecting certain timber berths ?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot reply at the moment, but I brought down a large bunch of returns to-day, and possibly the one my hon. friend is inquiring about may be included in that.

Mr. H. B. AMES. How soon may we expect the return moved for on the 16th December with reference to the purchase of the site of the new Montreal examining warehouse ordered three months ago?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It will be brought down to-morrow.

Mr. HERRON. When may we expect the return ordered with reference to certain government coal mining lands obtained by the firm of Hough, Campbell & Ferguson?

Mr. OLIVER. I beg to assure the hon. gentleman and other members that all the returns ordered are in the course of preparation and the work is being pushed on as fast as possible, but as such a large number have been ordered it is absolutely impossible to produce them in a short time. They have been under preparation for a considerable period, and in a very few days I hope to be able to satisfy the demands of all those now under preparation.

FLOOD IN BELLEVILLE.

Mr. E. G. PORTER (West Hastings). I wish to call the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister to a matter of very urgent importance in connection with the flood existing in the city of Belleville.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot do more than ask a question.

Mr. PORTER. That is all I want to do. I do not know if the First Minister is aware of the facts, and I shall make my statement as short as possible.

Mr. SPEAKER. It can only be put in the form of a question.

Mr. PORTER. I wish to ask the First Minister of he will see that an engineer of the Department of Public Works, or some expert in that department, is sent to Belleville as soon as possible to make investigation into the flood now occurring there in the River Moira? The necessity for that is very great, as a number of business houses along the banks of the Moira river are flooded out now——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Porter) will see that that is a matter of discussion and is out of order.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). A few days ago I asked the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), concerning returns brought down in answer to motions relating to dredging in Quebec. These notices appeared first as questions, but the Minister of Public Works asked that they should be put as motions, and they were changed. But the returns have not yet been brought down. They are only small returns and I would like to have them. The Prime Minister will find the matter referred to at page 710 of the unrevised 'Hansard.'

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I move that order No. 15 of Public Bills and orders be now called.

Motion agreed to and order called.

Second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act—Mr. Maclean (South York).

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act. He said: I desire in the first place to thank the government for giving me this opportunity to bring up a Bill that I regard as of considerable moment to the country. I beg to assure the House that, in consideration of this privilege, I will take as little time as possible in dealing with the question. If I deal in a general way with the Railway Act, it is not to expand the discussion but rather to condense it and make clear the changes in this Act that I propose. The Railway Act is, to my mind, one of the most important laws on our statute book. And it is growing in importance. The people take more interest in the Railway Act than they do in almost any other legislation. This is largely for the reason that it concerns every one of us. It concerns every industry in this country and every province of which the country is composed; and so far-reaching is it that I believe it will receive more attention hereafter than it has received in the past. It is a measure worthy the fullest attention of this House and of its committees, and of every one connected with the administration of the law. This law was passed several years ago. It was passed as a government measure, and is called 'The Railway Act.' But it deals, or now proposes to deal, with a number of corporations other than railway corporations. It deals with express companies; it deals—or shortly will deal—with sleeping car companies; it deals with telephone companies. It is in fact, and ought to be in name, a Public Utilities Act. The description of the Act in the statute book is very scant; it is not what I think it ought to be. In the United States they make a very accurate description of their laws so that the public can at once see what the object of the law of this kind is. For instance, in the state of New York, where they have one of the best railway laws in the world, I believe—and it only went into force last year—their law is described in these terms:

An Act to establish the public service commissions and prescribing their powers and duties, and to provide for the regulation and control of certain public service corporations and making an appropriation therefor.

It is apparent at a glance that that law not only gives powers but prescribes duties to these corporations. And it is this prescription of duties to railway corporations, which is so greatly lacking in our law, which it is the object of my amendment to effect. I would like to see the description of our Act recast somewhat along the lines of that of the New York state law or the Interstate Commerce law of the United States so as to set out what it has in view. I would thus describe our law, if it were made what I should desire to see it :

An Act to provide transportation facilities for the people of Canada; to regulate railway corporations and other public service corporations; to create a public service commission; to fix the charges of such companies, and to make provision for the enforcement of this law.

Now, the Interstate Commerce law of the United States establishes a commission, defines the duties of that commission, and prescribes what the railways should do in relation to the public. It also makes provision for the enforcement of the law, and makes an appropriation for that purpose and imposes on specified officers the duty of carrying the law into effect. In Canada, we have nothing of that kind under our Railway Act. Then, in this New York law, they have made provision which we ought to make for the protection of the public. They have two commissions in the state of New York :

Each commission shall appoint as counsel to the commission an attorney and counsellor-at-law of the state of New York, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the commission. Each counsel to the commission shall, subject to the approval of the commission, have power to appoint and at pleasure remove, attorneys and counsellors-at-law, to assist him in the performance of his duties and also to employ and remove stenographers and process-servers.

Then, the duties of the counsel are as follows :

It shall be the duty of counsel to a commission to represent and appear for the people of the state of New York and the commission in all actions and proceedings involving any question under this Act, or under or in reference to any act or order of the commission, and, if directed to do so by the commission, to intervene, if possible, in any action or proceeding in which any such question is involved; to commence and prosecute all actions and proceedings directed or authorized by the commission, and to expedite in every way possible final determination of all such actions and proceedings; to advise the commission and each commissioner, when so requested, in regard to all matters in connection with the powers and duties of the commission and of the members thereof, and generally to perform all duties and services as attorney and counsel to the commission which the commission may reasonably require of him.

To-day, in Canada, if any one wishes to vindicate public rights in connection with the Railway Act, it is largely a matter of his own initiative. He has no assistance from the state in vindicating the law, that the state enacted for the defense of the public. We can well afford to recast our law to make it somewhat similar to the law in the United States. Our general Railway Act for the introduction of which some years ago I give the then Minister of Railways and the government credit, does not define a common carrier in its application to that Bill. At the time I asked the then Minister of Justice and the then Minister of Railways to do this, and yet it was not done. Recently I found that the reason for its not being defined was that the government were afraid to define a common carrier because it would include other companies than railways and they supposed it would be wisdom or prudence in the first instance to apply only to railway corporations proper. As a matter of fact, our Railway Act to-day does not define a common carrier.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member think that this is pertinent to the Bill ?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I wish to show that the railway companies of Canada are not giving the public the service in the way of cars and other shipping facilities they ought to give, and I think I am within my rights and my logic in making this point. In the United States Act a common carrier is defined in the very first clause; the defintion includes express companies and sleeping car companies, and they also define a telephone company and all other companies supplying public services. I think the government when they introduce their own amendments to the railway law, should define a common carrier and make the law applicable not only to railway, express, and sleeping car companies, but to every individual or corporation engaged in any way as a common carrier, except where the traffic is absolutely by water.

If I may be allowed a digression, in the very first chapter of our statute-book it is declared that the interpretation of every law shall be more or less on the lines of the preamble, and it is because we have no preamble in our general railway Act that, in my opinion, a large measure of the injustice which has been done by the railways of this country to the people has arisen. In other words, the railway companies have never yet risen to the conception that while great franchises have been given to them a corresponding duty to the public has been imposed on them. That is very patent throughout the Railway Act. There is no declaration in our Railway Act that while the companies are incorporated and given these franchises, and in many cases great grants of money and land, corresponding obligations, complimentary to their powers and franchises are imposed on them to give a proper service to the public. In other words the Railway Act ought to set out that when the franchise is given to a railway there is a duty to the public to be performed by that railway, that the railway must give a suitable and adequate service to the public when it has obtained a franchise.

The necessity of such a preamble, is recognized in the charters of individual railway companies. For instance in the Grand Trunk charter the preamble sets out:

Whereas it would greatly tend to promote the welfare of the province——

—the railway is enfranchised. In the Canadian Pacific Railway charter it is set out that:

For the development of the Northwest Territory——

—the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was created and given all these great powers and franchises.

The Grand Trunk Pacific is created

For the purpose of affording transportation facilities for such territories and for other reasons.

But in the General Railway Act there is no duty imposed on the railways to give the public a proper service. This same absence of any declaration of duty characterizes the Banking and Insurance Acts. The granting of a charter to a bank is supposed to be for the purpose of having banking facilities afforded to the public; but I have known the general manager of a bank to say that they were not in any way obliged to provide banking facilities for the public. I do not mean, of course, that the banks should be called on to discount any man's note but I assert that there is a duty imposed to provide banking facilities. The same thing applies to insurance companies which should be required to encourage thrift and to look after the savings of the people, which come under their charge. But these obligations are not set out in any of these general Acts and as a consequence the railways especially, the banks, and sometimes the insurance companies have never risen to the conception that when they were given great franchises they were also charged to perform duties to the public. If these companies do not perform the duties to the public for the performance of which they were created—parliament must interfere, some one must interfere and compel them to render to the public the service for which they were enfranchised. It is hard for the public to get its rights when it has not the assistance of the government or of a department of the government—because these corporations have become so enormously wealthy and powerful. Some have behind them the interest on five hundred to a thousand millions of money, and this vast concentration of wealth and influence is arrayed against the individual, who cannot secure his rights unless they are clearly specified in the law. A duty rests on some one to aid him in securing his rights, whatever they may be.

I now come to the principle of the Bill which I have introduced. It has been pointed out by the critics of my measure that the word 'reciprocal demurrage' is a misnomer. Reciprocal demurrage, as understood by railway men, means that if a shipper agrees to pay demurrage after a certain number of days, he pays it; if a shipper unloads his car before the time agreed upon, then he should be allowed something on this account as against the other cases when he exceeds the time limit agreed on and has to pay demurrage. In that case the demurrage would be reciprocal.

But the term should be broadened, not very much, but broadened sufficiently so that if the railways can charge the public demurrage the public are entitled to take something from the railways in case they do not meet the requirements of the shippers as to the supply of cars or expedition in the transportation of freight. This lack of the railways to meet the requirements of the shippers of this country has to-day created a real grievance, and I will be able to show, by the letters that I have here, by my own experience and as a result of my own investigations, that the railways of Canada in past years have not accommodated the people with regard to the supply of cars and the transportation of freight. Moreover, I will be able to show, as every hon. member in this House knows, that industries have been ruined and that businesses have been almost wrecked because they could not get the railway accommodation that they required. Farmers have not been able to have their grain shipped and farmers and drovers have not been able to have their live stock shipped with the result that a genuine grievance in this regard exists all over the country. It exists not only in Canada, but in the United States and serious efforts are now being made throughout the United States by state legislatures at Washington and also in this country to have the law changed so that the public will get the service to which they are entitled. I want to tell the House something that is not quite a secret, but which it has taken me a good long while to find out, and that is that the two great railways that we have in this country—I refer now especially to the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway and to that portion of their business which lies in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec—which were enfranchised, which were created and which were bonused by the money of the people and municipalities of this country, give a preference to traffic which originates in the United States and which pays a lower tariff than Canadian traffic pays. This is a serious charge to make and yet I know it is true. The Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec devote nearly all their best equipment, their best men, their best engines and their siding accommodation to the rushing forward of through traffic that originates in the United States, and they almost neglect the Ontario and Quebec traffic. Whether that is true in the Northwest I cannot say, but I do know that these two great railways which were primarily created to serve the people of Canada devote their best energies and equipment and the services of their best men to forwarding the traffic that originates in the United States, while ignoring, delaying and unjustly treating the traffic which originates in this country. I know instance after instance where this thing has happened, I have had letters from all over the country to the effect that shippers could not get accommodation while traffic which had originated in the United States was going through the country day after day. I want to point to another thing that I found out in connection with these railways in Canada, and that is that they have not all the equipment not only in the way of engines and rolling stock, but they have not the siding accommodation and terminal facilities which they should have. Such terminal facilities, rolling stock and siding accommodation as they have are largely devoted to the handling of this foreign traffic while they are ignoring Canadian traffic. This is something which should not be. Yet these railways were given enormous subsidies and important franchises by the people of Canada. They have had their rights looked after in this country if anybody has, and yet they have neglected to cultivate Canadian traffic. Of course, it is easy for the general manager of a Canadian railway to go to Chicago and make an arrangement for the handling of so many cars a month. Our Canadian railway managers do that time after time. They go to Chicago, they make large contracts for the handling of American traffic, they devote their energy and equipment to the handling of this American traffic, and as a consequence Canadian traffic is ignored. There is not a member of this House, and especially a member who comes from the provinces of Ontario or Quebec, who has not had experience of the neglect of Canadian traffic and who has not seen American traffic being rushed across the country at a rapid speed. That should not be, and if we have a Railway Commission, if we have a Railway Act and if we have a Railway Department, the law, the department and the commission ought to see to it that Canadian traffic is first accommodated and that Canadian freight and passengers are justly treated in this respect. Not only do they give this preference in the way of rushing American traffic through our country, but they are guilty of another thing against this country; they give a preference in rates to American traffic. The farmer of this country to-day has to encounter not only the competition of the American farmer in the English market, but he is placed at a further disadvantage by the fact that the American farmer has his produce carried through Canada from Chicago to the Canadian sea-board at lower rates than the Canadian farmer is called upon to pay. While the American farmer can have his produce rushed through Canada the Canadian farmer is often blocked. Although the Canadian farmer has created these railways, has given them their franchises and their bonuses he gets the worst of the bargain. It ought to be set out in our Railway Act that these roads were created to supply transportation facilities to the people of Canada and that it is the duty of the Railway Commission and of the Railway Department to see that fair treatment is given to our farmers in this respect. Just to show that there is a substantial grievance all over Canada in regard to railway transportation and the lack of sufficient railway facilities, I wish to read a few extracts from letters which I have received. For instance, here is a letter from the Winnipeg Jobbers and Shippers Association, dated December 18, 1907 :

Dear sir,—We notice in this morning's papers a despatch from Ottawa, dated December 17, respecting a deputation of Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway officials who waited on the Minister of Railways regarding the proposed legislation for this session, when these gentlemen presented their objections to the amendments to the Railway Act providing for reciprocal demurrage, proposed by your good self.

This is the first that we have heard of your proposed Bill in connection with reciprocal demurrage. We might say that when the Railway Commission held a sitting in Winnipeg in July last, this matter was urged on them strongly by our association, the Winnipeg Board of Trade and other interests. From time to time practically all the organized bodies in western Canada have advocated and urged upon the Railway Commission the necessity of providing for reciprocal demurrage, and we feel confident that if your proposed Bill embodies the principles which have been advocated so strenuously in the past the different organizations will support your Bill through their representatives on either side of the House

Here is a body in Winnipeg speaking largely for the west—and later on I can quote the declaration of the farmers living further west—who have joined with the jobbers in declaring that we should have legislation in this country compelling the railways to give a speedy service for the transportation of their traffic and to supply shippers with cars. Here is a letter I have received from a gentleman living at Mile End, Que.:

I trust you will pardon the liberty I am taking in writing, but having noticed in the papers that you were bringing before parliament a measure for reciprocal demurrage in connection with the Railway Act, I take this opportunity of wishing you every success in your endeavours to bring the same to a successful issue.

I, for one, have suffered great inconveniences and loss at the hands of the railways during the past year, and have been called upon to pay demurrage upon cars that the railways have had in their possession for weeks at a time, but could not get delivery of them.

Any number of shippers throughout Canada have had their freight delayed for weeks and for months; goods have been refused, shippers have had the goods sent back to them, shippers have had their drafts returned because the goods were not delivered. Men have been ruined in business. Only last year I purchased certain goods from a manufacturer within 150 miles of Toronto, the man had the goods but he could not deliver them for six weeks because the railway company would not give him cars. That man wrote me he would be driven out of business. The railways to-day have put small manufacturers and small dealers in various parts of this country out of business because they would not deliver their freight for them. And yet, day after day, miles of cars, and the best engines, and the best equipment of these two great roads, and all their siding accommodation have been centralized on the handling of American traffic to the detriment and delay of Canadian traffic. It is a serious charge I make, but still it will be verified by the business men almost anywhere in Canada. That condition of things should not continue. I have here a Calgary paper which, reflecting the condition of things out there, last August, writes:

Merchants and shippers throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion have based their hopes on Mr. W. F. Maclean's new reciprocal demurrage Bill as an ameliorative for the car shortage problem. For the past year they have clamoured loudly for some form of mutual responsibility in the handling of freight cars. Boards of trade passed resolutions, petitioned the Railway Commission and the Dominion government. Stories of months of waiting for cars appeared in the public press, and then, like a bolt from the blue, came the welcome news of the introduction into the federal House of a Bill which was to prove a panacea.

I do not know that this Bill is to be a panacea; the main thing I wish to get at before parliament and the country to-day is that parliament can in some way cure this grievance. Parliament can make an inquiry and if it finds that the railway companies of Canada have not a proper conception of their duty to the Canadian public—and I maintain they never have had the conception that their first duty is to the Canadian people—then parliament can bring them to a proper sense of their duty and order that if they wish to handle this American traffic, and I do not wish to deny them the right to do it, they shall only do it after they have made proper provision for the wants of the Canadian people. The same question is up in the United States, and I have here a copy of a Bill which has been introduced in Congress to deal with it as a federal principle. It goes on the line that the only way to bring the railways to time is to fine them when they fail to provide shippers with cars and deliver freight at its destination within a reasonable time, and correspondingly to fine the man who wants the car if he does not load and unload within the time. An effort is therefore being made in the United States to bring about this reciprocal demurrage. Here is a letter from that important body, the Dominion Millers' Association, which has its headquarters in the Board of Trade Building, Toronto. It was written to me on April the 10th last:

I was about to inaugurate an energetic campaign in support of your reciprocal demurrage Bill, but I am informed that on account of the lateness of the session and the absence of some of the ministers that there is no possibility of the Bill passing this session. Please wire me on receipt if this is not correct as there is a meeting of the council of the board of trade to-morrow, and if anything is to be done in support of your Bill, action should be taken at once.

I, however, do not want to start action which would be useless and prevent other parties giving their enthusiastic support later on when it might be of great assistance.

The Dominion Millers' Association which handles millions and millions of bushels of the grain of the west, declare that they are prepared to join in an active campaign to compel the railways of this country to afford sufficient shipping facilities to the people. That is a declaration from a most important body, and other bodies all over Canada are passing resolutions of the same kind. The Winnipeg Jobber's Association writes me:

For your information we inclose copies of letters that we have sent to the different prominent members of the Grain Growers' Association in convention at Brandon to-day.

That was written on January the 16th of this year, and that convention of the Grain Growers Convention passed a resolution supporting this proposal, and requesting parliament to pass a law that would compel the railways doing business in the west to provide sufficient accommodation for the traffic of the west. Go where you will in this country, whether in the west or in the east, the railways are not supplying the accommodation to the Canadian people they ought to, and at the same time you will find they are giving a very good service to traffic that originates in the United States, and they are doing it at a less charge than they impose upon Canadian traffic. The situation is so serious that the duty devolves upon parliament of affording relief. Speaking of the west, I wish to hand in a document which I have received from the J. H. Ashdown Hardware Company of Winnipeg. I will only read an extract from a letter I received from the concern a few days ago. The letter says :

January 20, 1908.

W. F. Maclean, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear sir,—Your reciprocal demurrage Bill, which has already received a first reading, is a real necessity at the present time and promises to be of greater necessity as time goes by, because the requirements of this country (owing to the short season of grain movement from the west and the necessity of bringing supplies forward during the season of lake navigation) must be met promptly. The railway companies require a reciprocal arrangement which involves them in a loss of revenue to emphasize this necessity. This fact has been recognized in several of the states of the Union, which have adopted reciprocal demurrage as a measure of relief for car shortage.

If, therefore, it would advantage the country to have a legal arrangement which would compel the movement of cars a certain mileage per day, the only question to consider is what mileage will prove acceptable, how many miles can the railways transport cars per day and how many miles per day is necessary to provide for the conditions which have and will prevail unless prevented.

Your Bill provides for 50 miles per day, which might be considered reasonable for branch line service but is inadequate, as will be perceived at a glance, for main line service, because the time consumed between Montreal and Winnipeg would be 28 days and between Montreal and Vancouver 58 days.

During the season of 1906 delays to freight were constant, involving the whole country in a great loss, and at that time the question of reciprocal demurrage was under advisement by the hon. Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada.

We furnished statements showing time occupied in transit from the eastern manufacturing districts to Winnipeg and feel that we cannot do better than send you a copy of our reports made then, as they show conclusively that railway companies can transport cars 100 miles per day even during unsatisfactory weather conditions, therefore, there should be no objection to inserting 100 miles in your Bill for main line service in place of 50 miles, as it reads at present.

It appears no provision has been made in the Bill either to compel railways to interchange cars promptly or to place them for unloading within a reasonable time after arrival at destination.

We think the provisions of the reciprocal demurrage Bill should extend to transfer railway companies who are employed in the interchanging of cars in transit, before the journey commences or at its termination; 24 hours should be considered sufficient time for this purpose, with 24 hours additional in which to place cars upon private sidings. In the case of cars for unloading upon regulation team delivery tracks, the 24 hours allowed for interchanging should be sufficient to also convey the cars to such team tracks.

Yours truly,
THE J. H. ASHDOWN HARDWARE COMPANY, LIMITED, Per Denison.

at anything like the proper speed. People will not buy goods if they cannot be delivered more promptly; and unless the traffic is handled better, people cannot do business, and we are going to lose traffic. The province of Ontario could do an immense business with the western provinces in the supply of fruit and other productions if a better and quicker service were provided, and I believe the maritime provinces could regularly send their fish and other products to the west. It is the duty of the railway companies to serve Canadians and to serve them with despatch; but I do not believe there is a railway manager in this country who accepts the responsibility of the duty imposed upon his company co-extensive with the franchise conferred upon them. All these railway managers think their whole duty is to their shareholders, for whom they think they ought to make some kind of a dividend. So they ought; but they have a duty also to perform to the public, and that duty is to give to the public a good service. If you went to Mr. Hays or Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, or to any of the men under them, and said to them, it is your duty to give me this service, they would laugh at you; they would say, my duty is to my shareholders and to my board of directors. But I say that their duty, under the common law, and under the Railway Act, as it is or as it ought to be, is co-extensive to the public, and they are bound to provide the necessary cars and equipment for the proper handling of Canadian traffic. Here is a letter from a farmer, in which he says :

This shows that these railways are not moving farm products of the west to market

From my experience, I know it is essential for such an Act to be in force.

This demand exists not only in Canada, but everywhere else. I am going to refer to what has been done in the United States.

This law regarding demurrage which I have dealt with is taken largely from an Act that was introduced into the legislature of Michigan some time ago. That legislature did not accept the law which I suggest here to-day, but passed the following provision :

Every railroad shall, when within its power so to do, and upon reasonable notice, furnish suitable cars to any and all persons who may apply therefor, for the transportation of any and all kinds of freight in carload lots. Every common carrier shall have sufficient cars and motive power to meet all requirements for the transportation of passengers and property which may reasonably be anticipated. In case of insufficiency of cars at any time to meet all requirements, such cars as are available shall be distributed among the several applicants therefor, without discrimination between shippers or between points of shipment, whether competitive or non-competitive: provided, preference may be given to shipments of live stock and perishable property. The commission shall have power to make and enforce and shall make and enforce reasonable regulations for the furnishing and distribution of freight cars to shippers and switching the same, and for the loading and unloading thereof, and for the weighing of the cars and the freight offered for shipment over any line of railroad, and shall fix reasonable per diem demurrage to be paid for the detention of cars by shippers or consignee, and for the failure or delay of the railroad to move the cars the number of miles per day as ordered by the commission: provided, that the upper peninsula be exempted from the provisions of section eight of this Act, in so far as they relate to the fixing of per diem demurrage charges.

This is the first time that a railway commission has been given power to impose fines upon the railway company and upon the consignee if they do not unload the cars within a reasonable time. I have here a letter from the Michigan Railroad Commission, which says :

In accordance with your request addressed to the Secretary of State, we are handing you herewith a copy of the Railroad Commission Act; in section 8 of which you will find the reciprocal demurrage law of this state. The commisison did not take office until October 1, 1907, and have not as yet been able to take up this subject and hence no regulations have been issued under the provisions of this section. We shall be glad to give you any further information possible upon request.

I have heard since from the commission that they have actually got to work on the question, and that they are framing rules with the purpose of imposing fines on the railways for not providing accommodation for the public. The same duty has in a measure been referred to the Public Service Commission of the state of New York. This commission was appointed only one year ago, and one can see, if he reads the newspapers of the day, especially the New York press, that it is dealing with the grievances of the people against the public service corporations of that state—not only the local traction companies and the electric light companies, but also the railway companies. During the year that commission has been in existence it has done an immense amount of public service, and it has issued one of the finest reports on the railway situation that I have seen, a report which is worthy of the perusal of every member of this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What are its powers ?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Its powers are wide, though not so wide as the powers given to our commission. The Public Service Commission and the Inter-State Commerce Commission can only see that the charges of the railways are reasonable, and the courts decide what is reasonable; but in Canada the charges can be made by the commission itself without the interference of any other court. Apart from that, the powers given to the New York commission are very wide; and the Act which is the basis of that commission is the best drafted railway Act that exists anywhere to-day. Mr. Hughes selected the best men he could find for the two commissions. A majority of them only can belong to one political party. They are young, active, energetic men, and they have issued this report. It is the most instructive report on the railway problems of the day. They set out that they have looked into these grievances, especially the grievance of the public not getting a sufficient number of cars, and that in a very short time they hope to draw up rules which will secure adequacy and efficiency on the part of the steam railway service in the United States. That is discussed on page 22 of this report. If any one wishes to get a copy, all he has to do is write to the secretary of the Public Service Commission of New York State at Albany.

The commissioners say first of all that they must ascertain all the facts and examine them and then find a way of compelling the railways to give efficient service. But the great thing I wish to insist on is that in the United States that task has been undertaken. A commission has been appointed to perform it. That commission has been given wide powers and above all a sufficient appropriation together with the power to employ all kinds of assistance. They have the right to appoint counsel and do appoint counsel to enforce the law. There is a very strong movement in favour of railway reform in the United States to-day. The machinations of those corporations which control the local tractions of New York, by means of which the local tractions were exploited for over $5,000,000 and that amount of watered securities put upon the investing public have all been brought out within the year by one section of the commission. The other section have taken up those other grievances. They have the power and the determination—and I hope we have in this country the same power and determination—to bring about a complete reform.

I do not wish to do anything unfair to the railways of this country. I do not wish to see their dividends reduced. I would like to see them have reasonable dividends. I would like to see reasonable dividends paid on all investments in this country, but unless we follow the example of the United States, unless we impose upon the railway companies the duty of serving the public and appoint officers to enforce the law rather than leave its enforcement to the private shipper, nothing will be accomplished. Therefore it is incumbent on parliament and the Railway Department and the law officers of the Crown to provide a law that will be effective in removing these grievances. It is incumbent on parliament and the government to provide officers who will enforce the law, whatever it may be, and who will convince our railway corporations that their first duty is to provide the Canadian public with ample facilities for the moving of traffic both freight and passenger.

The railway companies have issued a pamphlet in reply to this proposal of mine. I am not going to read it or undertake to answer it. It begs the question throughout the whole of its argument. In other words, the corporations say that there is no necessity for any action by the Canadian parliament. That pamphlet has been circulated all over the country. But the answer to it is in the experience of every hon. member of this House and every business man in the country and every farmer and raiser of live stock. There is necessity for dealing with this question. The railways are not giving the public the accommodation to which the public is entitled, and as a consequence Canadian trade is not as prosperous as it should be. Our factories are not as busy as they might be because they cannot get railway accommodation, and in some cases because the railway companies see fit to give some of their shippers a preference over the smaller shippers. It is no doubt a substantial grievance that some of the largest shippers get something like car accommodation while the smaller cannot get the accommodation they require.

In order that I may be as short as possible, I shall, while discussing the general Act and the principles underlying it, discuss them in connection with the Bill which follows. I am inclined very much to look for some improvement in the law because of a statement made not long ago this session by the Prime Minister. He said that he was not quite a believer in public ownership, as applied to railways, but was a believer in the regulation of railway corporations. Well, the proposal I am making is on the line of increased regulation of the companies. It is on the line of the regulative Acts passed in other countries; and if the right hon. gentleman accepts the principle—and it is a good principle, and the outcome of regulation may be ownership, as I think it will be—I hope that parliament will find a way of regulating these corporations.

I wish now to come to one or two of the other points on which I propose to regulate these railways. I may be trespassing somewhat on the measures which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) proposes to introduce. He has been making promises throughout the country that he intends proposing something in the way of increased regulation of the railway. He has even gone so far as to say that he might extend the Intercolonial Railway, and he has certainly told the public that he has a Bill yet to come down from his department which will deal with these companies. I tried a couple of years ago to get express companies brought within the regulation Act and they have been brought in, and in a Bill which I have here I propose to include sleeper car companies.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is in another Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. It is a Bill that immediately follows, and if allowed to make my explanations now, that will save time later on. It has been said that, as a matter of fact, sleeping cars companies are covered by the Act, but I have seen a memo. from the Railway Department which says that sleeping car companies do not come within the Act. If there is any doubt about that it ought to be removed, and I have a Bill here which will apply the Act to sleeping car companies.

The next clause I come to—and it is one which calls for more support throughout the country than any other—is the clause providing for a uniform passenger rate of two cents a mile. That proposal was laughed at when first introduced in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is travelling outside his Bill. Unless with the consent of the House he is out of order.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. All I want is to facilitate business by discussing the two Bills at once and have them both referred to a committee. I shall only be a few moments. That proposal, while it was declared to be too sweeping, has vindicated itself. The two cent a mile proposition has been carried in legislature after legislature in the United States. The law has been enforced and wherever enforced, the revenue to the railway companies has increased.

The public have been accommodated, the rates have been reduced and the companies have made money. I have here letter after letter from municipalities in this country that have passed motions in favour of two cents a mile. In the state of Ohio, whose conditions are very similar to those of Canada, they have passed a similar law, and I have here the report of the Railway Commission of that state which shows that the earnings of the railways have been increased and that the railways would not change the system even if they could. In the state of Michigan—a case that was quoted against me a year or two ago—where the Grand Trunk has a large business, the two-cent-a-mile system has justified itself and has been applied to the whole state. And here is the 'Railroad Gazette,' the organ of all of the railroads of the United States and the leading railroad paper of that country. I have here the issue of January 31, which contains an article on the experience of the two-cent-a-mile rate on the New York, New Haven and Hartford road, a company which dominates all the New England States. The opinion expressed in that article is fairly represented by these two lines which I quote from it :

With every allowance on the plus and minus side. the increased revenue from reduced and uniform rates is peculiarly impressive.

To sum it up: Here is the testimony of the railroad organ of the railroads themselves; here is the report of the railroad commission of Ohio; here is the experience in the State of Michigan; here is the experience even in the southern states where the railways opposed the two-cent rate, and, after appeal to the courts, compromised by making it 2½ cents, and afterwards admitted the two-cent rate in regard to 500 and 1,000-mile tickets.

Mr. BELAND. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. F. Maclean) aware that only last month, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania voided a law prohibiting the lines in that state from charging more than two cents a mile?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I am quite aware of that. The effect of that decision is that time must be given for investigation. Under the constitution of the United States, you cannot pass a law which would injure anybody's interest. But in Pennsylvania, it is only a postponement for the time to enable investigation to be had and an accounting to be made. Still, I venture to say, the two-cent-a-mile rate will prevail, as a matter of fact in Pennsylvania. For we know that, already, the Pennsylvania road runs its lines in Ohio on the basis of the two-cent-a-mile rate. It is not fighting the law seriously, and, in a short time, the two-cent rate will prevail all over Pennsylvania. It is already prevalent practically all over the state of New York, rather by custom than by law, as I have already pointed out in the House. But the great, the dominating fact is that wherever the two-cent-a-mile rate has been tried, it has succeeded—traffic has been stimulated, the people travel cheaply, and are able to 'route' themselves as the saying is, and the railways have larger receipts and consequently are in a better position to pay profits to their shareholders. That is the sum and substance of the two-cent-a-mile agitation as worked out in the United States.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I shall have to rule that the hon. member (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is travelling outside the scope of the Bill. If he is permitted to do this, it can only produce a general discussion of railway matters.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I had about finished, Mr. Speaker. I have only two other points to deal with, but I will deal with them at another opportunity. I was trying, as I think is commendable in a member of the House who seldom takes up the time of the House, to cover the ground as speedily as possible and save the time of hon. members. I quite see the reason of your ruling—probably it would establish a bad precedent in the House.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, is evidently afraid of my long speech.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. It may be so. To close the discussion on this first Bill, I desire to say that it is manifestly the duty of the House to take up this question and to regulate the railways by imposing upon them the duty of giving a better service than they have given to the Canadian people, and, as a necessary step to that end, to increase their equipment, to increase their siding accommodation, and, above all, to pay attention to Canadian traffic. Of course, they may urge that Canadian traffic is sometimes massed in some seasons, and falls off greatly at other seasons. That is true in a measure. But the great point is that, at the time when the cars are needed, they are not provided in sufficient numbers, and that there is not a sufficiency of terminals and sidings. This is where the breakdown in Canadian railways takes place—insufficiency of terminals and sidings and of equipment. And it is time for the Canadian parliament to insist that these deficiencies should be made up and that Canadian railways should devote their best energies to the handling of Canadian traffic.

Whether it is wise to seek reform in the direction proposed in this Bill or not, of course, I do not pretend to say with authority. Seeking to effect a reform, I am under the necessity of proposing some substantial measure to the House. My proposal is to enact a law expressly providing a penalty for a road which refuses to supply within a reasonable time the cars that a shipper may require, and providing a reciprocal fine on the shipper who does not take advantage of the cars supplied him. It may be better to attempt this reform in the way adopted in the state of Michigan, by giving the Railway Commission power to impose this fine.

My main object is to bring on a discussion of the case with a view to effecting the desired reform. But if we do impose this duty upon the Railway Commission, we must certainly enlarge that commission, for our Railway Commission now is overworked. It cannot deal with complete efficiency with the questions that have already been referred to it; and, if we are to turn over to the commission the control of every public utility in the country, it will have to be considerably enlarged. It may be necessary to re-arrange the commission in two divisions as has been done in the state of New York. But, in some way, this question must be dealt with, either by parliament or by the commission. If the commission is to deal with it, the commission must be given high-class assistance, not only in the way of legal advice, but in the way of expert railway advice—they must be able to call upon men who are learned in the movement of traffic and the requirements of the people in regard to shipping facilities. But, if we approach the question determined to find a solution, we shall certainly find it, and, finding it, we shall remove a substantial grievance under which the people now suffer. You hear of it every day. My main purpose is to have the matter discussed. I suppose that it should be sent to a committee. For my part, I should like to see a special committee deal with this question; but, of course that is a matter altogether in the hands of the government. But I do trust that parliament will take hold of the question and deal with it. There is nothing predatory, nothing revolutionary in such a proposal as this. But in some way the railway companies of this country have got it into their heads that if any one proposes to regulate them in parliament or suggests a law to regulate them he is to be treated as a pirate. I met a prominent railway man the other day, and he said: Hello pirate. I asked him what he meant and he said: You are attacking the railways and trying to do injustice to them. I said: All I am seeking to do is to compel the railways to do justice to the people of the country and to give them fair railway facilities at a fair price and in a speedy way; there is nothing unfair, there is nothing predatory in that, and I believe it is the view of parliament that something must be done and will be done to regulate this matter which is one of the substantial railway grievances of the people of this country.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington). Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) first introduced this Bill, I think in the month of December, I was inclined to think that there was some necessity for legislation of this kind in Canada, and that this matter was not perhaps completely covered by the legislation which we had on our statute-book. There is no doubt that, particularly during the last two or three years, there have been many complaints from shippers, from associations of shippers, from farmers' associations and others in regard to the scarcity of cars and the slow movement of freight. Many of these have come to my own knowledge; I have been consulted in reference to some of them. Since the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) introduced his Bill I have had occasion to look up the legislation which we already have on the statute-book in regard to this matter, and I have come to the conclusion that we do not require any further legislation, that we have now passed all the law that is necessary to give the relief which the hon. member seeks to accomplish by means of his Bill.

I wish to refer briefly to the sections of the Railway Act which I think fairly cover this whole question. The first of these sections is No. 284, which provides:

> The company shall, according to its powers . . . . (c) without delay and with due care and diligence, receive, carry and deliver all such traffic; and,
> (d) Furnish and use all proper appliances, accommodation and means necessary for receiving, loading, carrying, unloading and delivering such traffic.

Then subsection 6 of the same section provides:

> For the purpose of this section the board may order that specific works be constructed or carried out, or that property be acquired, or that specified tolls be charged, or that cars, motive power or other equipment be allotted, distributed, used or moved as specified by the board, or that any specified steps, systems or methods be taken or followed by any particular company or companies or by railway companies generally.

Then, by section 317, it is provided:

> All companies shall, according to their respective powers, afford to all persons and companies all reasonable and proper facilities for the receiving, forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from their respective railways and for the return of rolling stock.

And by section 318, subsection 3, it is provided:

> For the purposes of the last preceding section, the board may order that specific works be constructed or carried out, or that property be acquired, or that specified tolls be charged or that cars, motive power or other equipment be allotted, distributed, used or moved as specified by the board, or that any specified steps, systems, or methods be taken or followed by any particular company or companies, or by railway companies generally.

By section 26 and 28 of the Railway Act the board is empowered to make either general or special orders in regard to all these matters, and by section 30, subsection 2, the board is empowered to penalize companies who disregard their orders in this respect up to the sum of $100 in each instance.

I submit that under these sections of the Railway Act, as it stands in the statute-book of Canada to-day, the Board of Railway Commissioners has full power and ample jurisdiction to carry out all that my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) seeks to have placed in the statute-book by the Bill he has now introduced. There is this further fact that the Board of Railway Commissioners has already dealt to some extent with this very question. The matter came before the board in regard to demurrage properly so called; that is, in regard to that charge which railway companies impose upon shippers or consignees of freight in regard to delay in loading or unloading cars which have been placed at their disposal. The matter came up because railway companies arbitrarily fixed their own rates of tolls for delay in unloading cars. Complaint was made and the board then fixed the rate and the time limit within which cars should be unloaded. When the matter was being considered the question of so-called reciprocal demurrage was also argued before the board. Many associations and many shippers had made complaints to the board, and in January, 1906, the Board of Railway Commissioners made a formal report upon the subject. In that report they state that:

> In some cases parties have asked that the allowance of the charge be made conditional upon a provision for what has been called 'reciprocal demurrage,' or some penalty or charge for delay by railway companies in supplying cars, or in receiving, transporting, or delivering traffic. This latter subject requires more investigation and consideration than the board has yet been able to give to it.

The commissioners in their report proceed to say that the board have decided to promulgate a set of rules applicable to car service and the movement of cars. These rules were promulgated in January, 1906, although the question of reciprocal demurrage has never been fully dealt with by the board. The charges that are made by railway companies to-day are made under the rules which came into force in January, 1906, and were passed under the authority of the Railway Act by the Board of Railway Commissioners. The other question, that of so-called reciprocal demurrage, is still pending before the board. I had occasion within the past two days to ask the secretary of the board whether or not the commissioners had dealt with that question, but I was informed that the question was still under consideration and that they were waiting to see what the result of the present car service rules would be, after these rules had had a fair opportunity of being tested.

There is no doubt that during the past two or three years very serious difficulty has arisen through the scarcity of cars in this country, but can it be fairly argued, as the hon. member for South York has attempted to argue, that the railway companies are really to blame for the scarcity of cars which has been experienced in Canada? My hon. friend from South York argues that Canadian railroads have been placing their best cars, their best motive power and their best equipment at the disposal of American shippers to the disadvantage of Canadian shippers, and at the same time he argues and he well knows that in all shipments of American freight passing through Canada the Canadian companies are met by what is called competitive rates, and, as the hon. member himself states, goods are carried through Canada on a through freight rate from American points at a lower rate than the local rate on Canadian goods. If they do so, Canadian railway companies are actually discriminating against themselves in accepting American freight at all these points at lower rates than can be procured in their own country where there is a tremendous demand for all the cars at the disposal of these companies at higher rates of freight. I believe that the railway managers are looking after their interests and looking well after their interests and that they would not permit such an anomalous condition of affairs to continue for a moment if they could prevent it.

As a matter of fact it is to the interest of every railway company to see that every car it has is not only in service the whole time but is moved at the highest speed that it is possible to move it. Within the past two or three years the railway companies of Canada have put forth tremendous efforts and have spent a tremendous amount of money in the improvement of transportation facilities, in terminals, in switches, in sidings, in the reduction of grades and curves and in the supply of motive power and cars. I do not think that the railways can be fairly blamed for the condition of affairs which has existed for the past two or three years. The real cause of the difficulty has been the rather abnormal trade condition which has existed in Canada for four or five years past. Trade has developed and the country has opened up to an enormous extent, to an extent which was not anticipated probably by anybody. The railway companies have put forth their best efforts to keep pace with the growing trade but they have not been able up to the present time to keep pace with it, although I see it stated in the newspapers, not only of Canada but of the United States, that in all human probability there will be no difficulty during the present year from car shortage or from slow freight movement. I have consulted a publication which I think came out this year for the first time in pamphlet form called 'Railway Statistics of the Dominion of Canada for the year ended June 30, 1907' by Mr. J. Lambert Payne, controller of Railway Statistics—a very useful and a very able pamphlet which gives a great deal of interesting and valuable information. At page 20 of his report Mr. Payne says that the result of the new equipment provided by the railways of Canada

Is encouraging but puzzling. Comparing the returns for 1906 with those for 1907, the figures are as follows:

	1906.	1907.	Increase.
Locomotives	2,931	3,504	573
Freight cars	96,565	113,514	16,949
Passenger cars	3,319	3,642	323

This applies to all the railways of Canada. Then, it is interesting to note just what the increase in the number of cars has been during the past year:

In freight equipment the comparison by classes of cars yields the following result:

	Increase.
Box and stock	11,037
Flat	1,952
Coal	2,063
Refrigerator	262
Caboose	161
Other	1,474

The 'other' in the above list refers very largely to ballast, tool, tank, flanger and special cars.

There was a total increase last year of 16,949 freight cars over and above the number in existence during the preceding year and of these it is rather interesting to note, on page 22, that 13,352 have been constructed in Canada leaving 3,597 as having been imported into this country from other countries. There have also been constructed in Canada 397 passenger cars and 227 locomotives. Now, Mr. Payne goes on to point out in his report that every car and locomotive shop in Canada during the last year or two has been running overtime and to its full capacity.

Mr. TURRIFF. Does it give the number of cars that were put out of commission during the year?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Yes, it gives the percentage; I will come to that. Notwithstanding the fact that every car and locomotive shop has been running to its full capacity and notwithstanding the importation of 3,597 freight cars from other countries the railway companies have not been able, during the past two or three years, on account of the abnormal trade conditions, to keep pace with the demand for greater facilities for shipment. But, there are also pointed out in this report two causes which have operated against the railways in their efforts to supply sufficient cars—two causes which are given by Mr. A. F. Dillinger, who is described as the operating assistant to the traffic officer of the Board of Railway Commissioners. One of them has reference to the effect of the Lord's Day Act upon railway operations. Mr. Dillinger, in a report to the Railway Commissioners, states that:

The effect of the Lord's Day Act upon the handling of traffic by the company means a loss of 21 per cent of its capacity, leaving 79 per cent of the total capacity available.

Then Mr. Payne in his report, adds:

This estimate is sustained by the testimony of railway managers in common. Applying it directly, it may be said that the effect of this measure is the equivalent of putting 23,838 freight cars out of commission, since that number is 21 per cent of the total supply.

By the operation of the Lord's Day Act—an Act which received the very hearty, almost unanimous approval of this House—the operations of the railways are very seriously curtailed for one day in the week and, there being an absolute stoppage of a great deal of the railway traffic for one day in the week, it is difficult for the railways to keep up the continuous stream of traffic that they otherwise might if they were permitted to operate in all their branches during seven days of the week. The report further points out that:

The operations of the Manitoba Grain Act are also reported by Mr. Dillinger to have seriously hindered a satisfactory distribution of cars in the west, and the effect thereof has been sympathetically felt in the east.

Just a few words to show what the leading railways have done during the past year; I have not the figures for the year before, but I have them for the past year, and I propose to show what the Grand Trunk has done in the way of new equipment and in the extension of its line to enable it to better meet the requirements of the traffic of this country. Last year the Grand Trunk had in commission no less than 31,019 freight cars the list being made up as follows:

Freight equipment, December 31, 1906.
Box cars	21,432
Furniture	434
Refrigerator	588
Stock	1,392
Coal	2,622
Flats	4,551
	31,019

From January 1 to October 31, 1907, the company has built in its shops and purchased from outside firms the following new freight equipment:

New freight equipment purchased January 1, 1907, to October 31, 1907.
Box cars	1,250
Furniture	250
Refrigerators	400
Stock	500
Coal	1,000
Flats	1,550
	4,950

An average of twenty new freight cars for every working day of the period.

This represents an expenditure of about $3,796,000.

In addition to the above, 1,597 box cars and 719 flat cars were purchased by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company during the same period representing a further expenditure of $1,919,986; all these cars are in use as Grand Trunk equipment. The company has put into commission for the use of its traffic during ten months of the year, 7,258 freight cars, at an expenditure of $5,715,986

The Canadian Northern Railway has also made great progress in increasing its equipment; in fact its whole equipment dates back only one or two years. At page 85 the statistical summary will give you the figures as follows :

Canadian Northern.

Locomotives—
Passenger	42
Freight	137
Switching	7
Total	186

The following freight cars have been put in commission within the last twenty-two months :

Box cars	5,186
Flat	984
Stock	121
Coal	48
Refrigerator	52
All other freight	160
Total	6,551

It has also an equipment of 6,551 freight cars of various kinds all put in commission within the past twenty-two months. Turning to the record of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I find that the Canadian Pacific Railway last year increased its locomotives by the number of 185; tourist, colonist and baggage cars 194, freight and cattle cars (all told) 6,255. Taking the record of the Canadian Pacific Railway from 1901 to the present time we find that in the seven years they have increased their motive power by 588 modern engines and their equipment by 20,322 additional cars. This has been done at a cost of approximately about $35,000,000, and it does not include the vast sums which have been expended in providing additional sidings, reducing grades and curves; all done for the purpose of securing the more speedy movement of freight throughout their lines in this country. Under all these circumstances I do not think it can be fairly urged that the railway companies are very much to blame in regard to the scarcity of cars or the slow movement of freight. But if they are to blame, the proper remedy is not to be found in the Bill introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean). He proposes in his Bill that if a railway company does not place cars where it is asked to place them within 96 hours after receipt of the order, the railway company shall be penalized at the rate of one dollar per car per day it is in default. I am satisfied that the Bill as drawn is not the real intention of the hon. member; it is certainly very loosely put together, and as an example of this I would point out that there is no limitation as to the number of cars which a man may demand, so that if the railway company should be asked for 10,000 cars they would have to pay a dollar a day for each car they had not supplied within 96 hours. I am satisfied and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) has told us that his real object was to bring this question up for discussion in the House and he has probably achieved his aim in that respect. I submit that this House is not the proper place to deal with an intricate matter of railroad operation such as this. We have in the Board of Railway Commissioners three gentlemen very capable and very well experienced in these matters. They have the jurisdiction, and the whole case can be presented before them, the details inquired into, and expert opinion taken in such a way as cannot be done before a body such as this House of Commons which has neither the experience nor the organization to deal with this matter as well as the Board of Railway Commissioners. I submit that the proper tendency of legislation in regard to railroads is to increase rather than to curtail or limit the jurisdiction or authority of a board specially constituted for that purpose. I believe that while the discussion of the matter may be good, the proposal of my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) is not a good one and the proper course for the House to pursue is to leave the matter where it now lies, in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. KEMP. Can the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) tell me if the regulation whereby the railways are permitted to impose one dollar per day demurrage on the shippers is to be found in the Railway Act, or is it a regulation made by the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. GUTHRIE. That was a regulation of the railways but it was objected to and then the Board of Railway Commissioners in January 1906, passed what are known as the car service rules, imposing that penalty of one dollar per day.

Mr. KEMP. It is not reciprocal.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (Wentworth). I have not always been able to agree with my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) in his ideas regarding railway legislation, but on this occasion I heartily concur with the principle of his Bill. As I myself petitioned the Board of Railway Commissioners to put in effect this principle at their first meeting in Toronto in 1904, and it has since been urged by numerous influential bodies all over Canada. However, the Bill as we have it before us is rather loosely drawn and there are a great many things in the details of it with which I cannot agree, but with the general principle of it which we are now discussing I do agree. It cannot be denied that the shippers throughout Canada labour under a great grievance at present. That has not been denied by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who has been arguing the case against the Bill. There is first of all the grievance that a shipper of freight is unable to get a car sometimes for weeks and sometimes for months, and there is the second grievance that when he gets a car and it is loaded and starts on its journey it is often two or three times longer on the road than it ought to be under any proper business management of the railways. I have been shipping freight for the past twenty-five years and I purpose giving my own experience to show that such is the case. During the last ten years, in that part of each year when there is a great necessity for quick transportation of perishable goods we have been unable to get cars. In some years that has been felt to a greater extent than in others. Gradually growing worse, the past year has been the worst of all, and we have been unable to move perishable stuff to its destination before the frost came to destroy or damage, or deteriorate it very seriously. The reply of the railway companies as set forth in this pamphlet is that they are procuring cars as fast as they can, that every car in Canada is worked to its fullest capacity and that they are buying cars in the United States as rapidly as they can get them. That may or may not be so, but the fact remains that the companies have not got the cars, and the fact also seems to be plain that neither of the great companies operating in Canada is short of money. If they were serious about supplying cars to carry this traffic I maintain that they ought to have been able to secure them somehow or other. The statements in this very pamphlet condemn the efforts they have made in this direction. In the pamphlet there is a statement prepared by Mr. Chrysler on behalf of the railways of Canada showing the number of cars they have in service for every 10,000 tons of freight moved one mile. The period covered in this statement is four years and it shows the increase of the number of cars during that time. I find that during the four years the Canadian Pacific Railway has increased the ratio of the number of cars to 10,000 tons of freight carried per mile, eight per cent; the Grand Trunk 20 per cent; the Union Pacific 24 per cent; the Erie 25 per cent; the Baltimore and Ohio 50 per cent; the Alton, Topeka and Santa Fe 16 per cent; the Chicago and Northwestern 16 per cent; the Northern Pacific 14 per cent; the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific 14 per cent; the Illinois Central 20 per cent; the Chicago and Milwaukee and Central 23 per cent; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy 30 per cent, and the Great Northern 18 per cent. It will be seen from this statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway has increased the ratio of its cars very much less than any of the other railways which are referred to except two which I have omitted, namely, the Southern Railway and the New York, New Hampshire and Hartford.

I submit that they have not done their duty even in respect of providing sufficient cars for the rapidly increasing traffic. I do not wish to refer to my own personal experiences; but during last autumn, for six straight weeks, from the 15th of October until the 30th of November, I asked the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for refrigerator cars to carry fruit, the most perishable thing which could be shipped, to the Northwest. I required about twenty-five cars in those six weeks; but in all that time I got only one car. The result was that I was obliged to haul all the fruit a distance of two miles to the Grand Trunk station, and ship it by American roads via Chicago, thus giving employment to Americans instead of Canadians, though I always prefer to ship by Canadian roads if I have the opportunity. What is the remedy for this? There must be some unjust and unfair distribution of the cars. There cannot be a proper system in the management of the railway, because my experience is only that of every other shipper in the district. The Canadian Pacific Railway had plenty of refrigerator cars somewhere during those six weeks, for they were carrying on business; and where was there a place in Canada where such cars were more urgently needed at that time of the year? The plea of the railway companies is: Oh, you ought to distribute your shipments over a longer time; we cannot possibly provide cars for a rush season of two or three months in the year. That plea is not good. Nobody else in the country works on that principle. That is something like a farmer saying, at the time his crop is ripe, I cannot afford to keep three or four binders, because I have not work for them all the year around; I will only keep one, and keep that working till the whole crop is reaped. Every business in this country is operated on the principle of providing for the maximum load. Suppose the manager of a canning factory should say to a fruit grower: We cannot provide two hundred hands to handle the fruit at this particular time; you must distribute your fruit over the season, so that we can keep going all the year around, in January and February as well as in October. A man who said that would be looked on as a fool; or what would be said of an electric power company which failed to provide sufficient current at the peak of the load between 4 and 6 o'clock, at which time the greatest amount of power is required, on the plea that they could not afford to do it because much less is required at other periods of the day, and yet that is what the railway companies say in regard to furnishing cars. But is it a fact that there is much greater traffic in the months of October and November? In this pamphlet, prepared by Mr. Chrysler on behalf of the railway companies of Canada, the railway companies give a table showing the tonnage carried in all the months of the year, and that table absolutely contradicts their own theory. The highest tonnage was in October, being 1,917,000,000 tons; the next highest was in May, being 1,915,000,000 tons, practically the same as in October. Leaving out the two winter months, December and January, I find that the lowest figure for the ten months was 1,625,000,000 tons and the highest 1,917,000,000 tons, not a very great difference. The fact is that the tonnage of the highest month, October, is only 12½ per cent more than the average of the twelve months and only 7 per cent more than the average of the ten months, leaving out January and February, which are respectively 1,365,000,000 and 153,000,000, only about 20 per cent below the average of the year. What would the railways do with the traffic if we gave it to them during the winter months? They would say, we cannot handle it, because the roads are blocked with snow ; and yet they handle in those months only 20 per cent less than the average of the year. So that their plea that we want to crowd the traffic on them in two months of the fall is not justified by the facts which they themselves produce. It is the fault of the railways themselves if they have not enough cars. They have to-day all the cars necessary to carry the traffic if those cars were handled with the speed that a good business man would require. I want to give some absolute proof of that. I have in my hand a statement which I have prepared of all the shipments—not two or three picked out as unfavourable samples—which I made to Winnipeg during the autumn of 1906. There were fifteen or twenty cars, and the average time occupied by those cars in making the journey from the Niagara district to Winnipeg was over ten days. My hon. friend from South York provides in his Bill that a car must travel at the rate of fifty miles a day. That would be absolutely absurd. At that rate it would take twenty-eight days to go to Winnipeg and sixty days to go to Vancouver. In that respect I would expect the railway companies to snap up this Bill very quickly. There should be provision for different rates of speed for different classes of goods. Fruit, which is very perishable and deteriorates very rapidly, should be carried much more rapidly than other kinds of freight. I can give the numbers of these cars, the dates they left and the dates they arrived in Winnipeg, but I do not wish to detain the House, and I presume hon. members will take my word that this is the case. They ought to have made the journey in five days. The railway companies would probably say that this would be a tremendous rate of speed ; but it is only at the rate of eleven miles an hour. There should be one fast line running in each direction, carrying stuff at a reasonably rapid rate. All we ask is that a car should be attached to the first freight train moving out. If that were done, I venture to say that we would require only half the cars we have to-day to carry the traffic. In the autumn of 1905 the Dominion government offered to send a man to accompany five cars of fruit from the city of St. Catharines to the Northwest to make an experiment. The fruit growers selected a man, not to control the cars, but to watch the temperatures, and to try to get the fruit taken with the first train that moved out. Now, what are the facts? The first car, No. 41015, Grand Trunk Railway, left St. Catharines on October 4, 1905 ; it went by North Bay, as the previous ones did, which I have spoken about as all those did which left St. Catharines in charge of fruit growers ; it arrived in Winnipeg on October 9 ; the time occupied was five days and six hours, and it lost twenty-four hours en route waiting for connections.

The second car, the Hanrahan refrigerator, No. 1517, left St. Catharines the 6th October and arrived 11th October. This was also five days and six hours on the trip. The third car was a New York Central car, No. 40774. It left October 10th and arrived October 18. It was thus eight days on the trip. The fourth car, Canadian Pacific Railway refrigerator, No. 82400, left St. Catharines October 13th and arrived October 18th, exactly five days, notwithstanding delays in transit of considerable length. The fifth car, a Canadian Northern car, No. 16082, left St. Catharines October 18th and arrived October 24th, making five days and six hours on the trip. There were four cars that went through in five days and six hours and this gentleman who went through on them said they lost twenty-four hours on the road owing to unnecessary delays. But if they had gone through in one day less, that would be only the rate of speed at which the beef train goes all the time from Chicago to Montreal. And that train keeps to its regular time every day in the year. Our fruit from the district takes this train from Toronto to Montreal and goes through in thirty-six hours. At the same rate it would go to Winnipeg in five days or just the time the cars from St. Catharines took when a fruit grower was along to expedite the speed by seeing that the cars were not stalled at some junction point. What did this man do in order to get his car through with as little delay as possible? He went with the train, and when it reached Toronto I suppose he gave the conductor half a dollar and said : See that that car is put on the next train, and by means of that outlay of fifty cents he got his car on the first train that went out to Winnipeg. At North Bay

I suppose he gave another half dollar to have his car attached to the first train going to Winnipeg. He could not hurry the train, the train did not go any faster from Niagara to Winnipeg, but he could see that his car in every case got the first train, whereas the ordinary course is for cars to lose half to two-thirds of their time in transit by lying on side tracks or switches waiting for somebody to find them and send them on their journey. This is an outrageous condition whereby shippers are losing hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, and this might absolutely be prevented if the railways were conducted on sound business principles, and the cars moved along as they would be if some one was looking after them, and the railway companies would have plenty of cars to supply every shipper with all required promptly, without buying a car. Surely a remedy is required. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) says the remedy is in the Railway Commission. To a certain extent I agree with him. That was the argument put forth by Mr. Chrysler on behalf of the railways, namely, that the Railway Commission has absolute control and power, and will do what the shippers want done. Perhaps so, but they do not do it. I want to read a few extracts from the rulings of the Board of Commissioners to show that they do not do it, and do not intend doing it. They claim they have plenty to do without doing that, and that if we have any claims for damages against the railway companies we must fight them out in the courts. I do not pretend to say that the Commission are not going to make any regulations. They may do so. They have absolute power, under the Railway Act, to make rules and regulations and impose penalties. There are plenty of sections in the Act which give all the powers necessary but they take the position that they have nothing to do with past offences. It is their business to make rules and regulations and to arrange rates, but they have nothing to do with past offences. These must be taken to the courts. When some years ago there was a loud outcry for the appointment of a commission—an outcry from the boards of trade, the manufacturers and the farmers—what were the arguments used, and what did they want a Railway Commission for? The people wanted it for two things. One was to adjust the rates properly and the other to settle claims expeditiously and cheaply. If a shipper who has a claim against a railway company has to take that to the courts, he might as well quit. We have too many courts in this country. The farmer or shipper who has a claim against a company knows that if he wins in the first court, that is only the beginning of his trouble. His case is carried on to a second court and perhaps a third, and the poor man is worn out. Consequently, very few undertake to go into court against a railway company. That was one of the many reasons why the people wanted a Railway Commission. But the Commission absolutely divest themselves of the power to settle grievances of that sort. Let me give one or two cases in proof of what I say :

Re complaint Brown Brothers Company v. Canadian Northern Railway Company.

The complainants alleged that on May 2, 1906, they delivered to the Canadian Northern Railway Company at Warman, Alberta, two boxes of nursery stock, consigned to L. H. Daly, of Vegreville, Alberta, and that the shipment proved a total loss to them, occasioned by the neglect or refusal of the railway company to carry and deliver the traffic without delay.

It appeared from the answer filed on behalf of the railway company to this complaint that a period of fifteen days had elapsed from the time of receipt at Warman Junction until their arrival at Vegreville, a distance of 262 miles, and the railway company was advised that the board felt, under the circumstances, it should take into consideration the Brown Brothers Company's claim for damages, and that such steps should be taken as would prevent the recurrence of such delays.

Held, Chief Commissioner, March 12, 1907, that, under the Railway Act, the board has no power to award compensation to parties for delays in forwarding traffic, as the Act expressly provides that the remedy is to be had by action in the ordinary courts; that the function of the board is to require the furnishing or accommodation and the forwarding of traffic without delay, while the circumstances admit of the board interfering; but that, in case of a transaction which is closed, the board can only deal with it as showing the necessity for action to prevent such delays in the future.

Now, one of the main reasons for this Railway Commission is to deal with past transactions, but they absolutely denude themselves of that power.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does my hon. friend think that the Railway Board ought to have power to hear and decide a case of damages?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Yes ; the Interstate Commerce Commission has.

Mr. GRAHAM. Be careful.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I have here some reports of the Interstate Commission showing what they have actually done. This is the case of the American Fruit Union of Cincinnati, Ohio, against the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company :

It is further ordered that said defendant be, and it is hereby notified and required to cancel its rates upon strawberries under refrigeration, or to establish and put in force on or before said 15th day of September, and apply to the transportation and refrigeration in transit of strawberries in car loads, over its line of railway from said shipping points to said Cincinnati, a rate which shall not exceed 22 cents per crate of twenty-four quarts, with a minimum car load of 450 crates per car.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was too high a rate charged.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. It is a claim for damages because of the undue rates charged, and the ruling was this :

And it is further ordered that said defendant shall pay as reparation to injured shippers, upon shipments of strawberries that moved during the season of 1907, the difference between the unreasonable rate of 27 cents per crate and the rate of 22 cents per crate now declared to be reasonable and lawful.

That is one case. Here is another case, the case of E. W. Pressley versus the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railway Company, and St. Louis Southeastern Railway Company of Texas. The decision is :

Complainant is entitled to recover from the defendants the sum of $404.96 as reparation for unjust and unreasonable charges on specified shipments of cotton seed made under the rates complained of in the case.

Mr. LANCASTER. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. E. D. Smith) if these are penalties or are they of the nature of a decision of civil action for damages? Do they undertake to give the plaintiff a penalty against the railway company?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I think most of these are for unreasonable charges, but here is another complaint, a case in which a railway company shipped by the wrong route. They should have routed the freight in a certain way and they routed it in a different way. And the decision is :

It is ordered, that the defendant, the Northern Pacific Railway Company, be and is hereby directed and required, on or before the 1st day of January, 1908, to pay unto the complainant the Hennipin Paper Company, the sum of seventeen hundred and sixteen dollars and sixty-two cents ($1,716.62) as reparation for an excessive and unreasonable charge caused by misrouting six carloads of print paper.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. There is a case.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not wish to hamper my hon. friend (Mr. E. D. Smith) in his remarks, but to gain information. I have been studying the point, and I think he will see that there is a distinction there between imposing a penalty and compelling refund of an overcharge. This is a case where the freight was misrouted, and they charged the complainant too much. It is a case of overcharge and nothing else.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. The other cases I have are on the same line—unreasonable charges. But these are only a few that I happened to pick up. I do not know what the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be further than this. But if our Railway Commission has not this power, it ought to have it, otherwise what recourse is there for a shipper? Take that case of Brown Brothers to which I referred. They are turned down by the Railway Commission on the ground that the commission has no jurisdiction. They go to the courts with an action against the railway company. The first thing that confronts them is the Bill of lading declaring that the shipper takes all the risk, and this has been signed by themselves. The shipper signs—he must sign, unless he wants to pay 25 per cent additional—this Bill of lading declaring that the goods are carried at the owner's risk of deterioration. I had a case in which the railway company were twenty days carrying nursery stock from the Niagara district to Howick in the province of Quebec. When it got there, the farmers would not take it. They did not examine it, but it was away past the season and they concluded that it must be dead. So the shipment was a total loss. I appealed to the Railway Board, and their reply was that they had no jourisdiction. And, of course, the courts will give you no redress because you have signed a Bill of lading assuming all the risk. It seems to me that the Railway Commission ought to have power to deal with such a case. And if the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) does not provide for such a case, I trust that the government will soon introduce a Bill which will confer this power upon the Railway Commission and require them to exercise it. What would be the use of the Railway Commission making regulations with regard to the speed of trains if they have no power to impose a penalty? I submit that the object the people of this country had when they called for the appointment of a railway commission has been almost entirely frustrated if that commission has no power to award damages in such a case as that.

Mr. KEMP. Can the hon. gentleman (Mr. E. D. Smith) tell us what caused the delay of 20 days in the case of which he spoke ? What had the railway company done with the shipment meantime ?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I never learned that. There are other instances that I might give. Here is the case of a shipment made on May 22. One lot was shipped to Bowmanville, which is 150 miles from Winona. This was shipped with several others on car No. 300,478 for points east of Toronto. That car should have gone to Bowmanville which was the first stopping point It arrived in Bowmanville after fifteen days. All the parties for whom shipments were intended went to the station for five or six days and then gave it up. One man wrote that he had gone as late as May 13, the day before the shipment arrived, and refused to go any more.

Mr. BERGERON. What was the reason given by the company for that delay?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. They never gave us any reason. We never get any satisfaction from them. They put the whole thing upon the shipper, on the ground that he has signed the Bill of lading assuming the responsibility. We appeal to the railway company first—I appealed to the company in the case of the Howick shipment.

Mr. BERGERON. What is the risk—the risk of accident?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. No. they never claim that it is accident, but simply delay.

Mr. KEMP. How would a demurrage apply in case of less than a carload?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. My suggestion is that there should be a rate of speed for each class of freight, for carloads and for less than carloads; the higher the class of freight the faster it should go, and a carload should go faster than less than a carload. It would require considerable time and skill to work it out.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. It would have to be adjusted.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Yes. It seems to me that the Railway Commission should have power to make rules and regulations providing for the rates of speed of different classes of freight and fixing the penalties; or else the board should have power to punish the companies for undue delay, the commissioners themselves being the judges as to whether there is undue delay or not.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How could it be worked out? You might have a good many different rates of speed, but only a limited number of cars on a train. I appreciate the suggestion, but I do not see how it is to be worked out practically.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. It would do no harm if the lower class freight were carried at as rapid a rate as the best.

Mr. GRAHAM. That might be all right in the case of one car but not in others.

Mr. LENNOX. A great deal of the delay is due to leaving off the cars at stations.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Between such places as Toronto and Winnipeg, there ought to be a fast freight service. Every car of perishable stuff ought to go on that train. If there were not enough cars of this freight to make up a train, it would do no harm to put on cars with a lower grade of freight.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. They should not be allowed to drop a car wherever they like and leave it there.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Cockshutt) suggests: What if the locomotive would not be able to haul it? I do not think there is a sufficient quantity of perishable stuff going from Toronto to Winnipeg or on any other line to require more than one train at any time. If there were it would not be difficult to form a second train. I would not ask any unreasonable treatment of the railway companies; they should be given plenty of latitude, but at present there are undoubtedly grievances. For instance in the Winnipeg case that has been mentioned, when a man accompanied the shipment the cars went in five days six hours. We should not be compelled to lose the goods by having a car on the road an unreasonable length of time. I could give scores of cases where cars were on the road so long that it was a wonder that the goods did not rot. In one case they were out so long that the mice destroyed them. A car of sugar left Halifax on the 5th of February and arrived at Hamilton on the 18th of March. Two other cars left and arrived on the same day. For instance, five cases of jam left Winona September 19, had not arrived in Toronto November 2. Ten cases left Winona September 2, had not arrived in Toronto October 18. Forty-one cases left Winona September 30, had not arrived in Toronto November 2. Toronto is fifty miles from Winona. A box of nursery stock shipped from Winona April 18, arrived in Little York, a suburb of Toronto, April 30. Four or five days should have been sufficient. Thousands of cases like these can be mentioned. It seems to be absolutely unreasonable, and the remedy lies clearly and plainly in the imposition of penalties by the Railway Board. The railway companies say: It is all very well to talk about imposing penalties, but we are doing the best we can. I think I have shown that they were not doing the best they could. Does anybody suppose it should take 20 days for boxes of goods to go from Niagara to Howick in Quebec, or 15 days from Niagara to Bowmanville? I have cited a few cases were it has taken 10 and more days to go from Toronto to Hamilton, when the journey should be made in two hours. The fact is the average of shipments, car load and less carload, take from two to ten times as long en rotue as they would if they went on the first connecting train from each junctional point.

The railway companies urge in this pamphlet and their argument against the shippers is that they unduly waste cars by holding them longer than the 48 hours allowed for unloading, paying $1 a day for demurrage, because they find it cheaper to pay $1 a day for a car than to provide storage themselves. I for one would be very willing that the railway should be permitted to charge $2 or $3 per day for the detention of a car after a certain length of time. The 48 hours is long enough, and if the car is kept longer it would be quite right to charge more provided we have some reciprocity, provided the railway companies agree to give us cars within a reasonable time and to forward the freight at a reasonable rate of speed. The railway companies sometimes seem to have no concern, however, about the useless detention of cars. I shall give an instance. Last fall I had two cars of sugar shipped from my hon. friend's factory at Wallaceburg to Niagara and after about a week's delay I wired him to know where they were. He traced them and found they were in Hamilton and had been there four days. I called up the railway agent at Hamilton and asked him where the cars where. He said : I do not know anything about them. I then called the agent of the connecting railway and he said: They are held here pending a little dispute with the other railway about rates. I asked the difference in the rate, thinking it might be worth my while to pay it rather than have the cars further delayed. He said the amount was 60 cents; he had held several cars of sugar there four days for a matter of 60 cents. They were evidently not hard up for cars, although that was right in the fall when every one wanted cars.

This question has become very widespread and some remedy must be provided. My hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) quoted resolutions from trade associations and boards of trade from all parts of the west asking for relief. I hold here a resolution adopted by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, one of the most powerful organizations in this country, was adopted in September, 1907. That resolution reads:

'Whereas the investigations which have been and are being made by the Railway Commission undoubtedly establish the fact that the railways have totally failed to supply sufficient equipment and adequate and proper facilities for the handling of the business of the country; and,

Whereas, the Railway Commission has authorized certain regulations, which provide for the charging of additional tolls to the shippers or consignees when cars are held under load or awaiting loads beyond the free time allowed; and,

Whereas, the car service rules, authorized by the board for certain exceptions, but in case of a dispute invariably cast the burden of proof upon the shipper or consignee, while the arbitrator is appointed by and under the control of the interested railways; be it

Resolved that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association now in convention, respectfully petition the honourable the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada to provide and put in effect without delay some plan for penalties against railway companies, for failure within a reasonable limit, first, to supply empty cars; second, to haul loaded cars to destination, or, third, to place cars for unloading after arrival at destination, so as to secure to the public a prompt and adequate service within the meaning of the Railway Act; shippers to be given the same protection by the board as is afforded to the railways; the arrangement to provide for an equitable adjustment of demurrage charges by an independent body.

This question has become almost a national one. Every shipper in this country feels that a frightful injustice is being perpetrated and that penalties must be imposed upon railways for failure to do their duty. As the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has said, I do not for a moment wish to be thought to have any animus whatever against the railways. We all know and agree that they are performing such a service to this country as no other corporations in the country can perform, but at the same time these corporations have charters from this parliament, they are the creatures of this parliament, they have received enormous subsidies and bonuses from the people, and their charters provide that they must serve the public and serve it properly. They are not in the same position as a private company ; there should be some reciprocity and while the shippers are penalized for failure to do certain things the railway companies should be penalized for failure to perform their part. I submit that is the only way in which we will ever get justice from any railroad. Practically every law on the statute-book provides a penalty for its infraction and the only way in which you can expect to get satisfaction in this regard from the railway companies is to impose a penalty for failure to do certain things. So long as the Board of Railway Commissioners go on making rules, and stopping at that, we will never get better satisfaction than we do to-day. What do they propose? That if a shipper has a grievance, if he has not cars, he shall apply to the Railway Commission; that the commission has power to order companies to supply cars. What would occur if every shipper did that ? Suppose that every shipper needed cars and knew that he could not get them within a month unless he did something desperate, and wired to the Railway Commission, what would be the consequence? The Railway Commission would require about 200 more clerks. The clerks would have to divide the cars among the 500 shippers applying, but this is something which the railways could do more efficiently and quickly than it could be done by a round-about method such as an application to the board. The proper people to distribute the cars are the railway companies and if they do not distribute them as rapidly and as fairly as they should there is some reason for their not doing it; they are the people who are responsible and who should be punished. A penalty should be imposed upon them by the Railway Board. I submit that a case has been made out. This matter must sooner or later be settled and the sooner it is settled by way of penalty the better it will be for the trade and commerce of this country because we are losing hundreds and thousands of dollars annually through the delays in the transportation of perishable goods.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (East Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House and the country will feel that it is under a very considerable debt of gratitude to the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) for bringing up this question and also for the moderate and reasonable manner in which he has placed it before the House. I wish now just to say to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) and the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) also, that there is no question whatever but that the opinions which have been enunciated to-day by the hon. member for South York and by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) are opinions that are largely held by every class of people throughout the Dominion of Canada. The people are beginning to realize at last that the railway corporations have had and have to-day too much authority, that they are and have been conducting the carrying business of the country with too high a hand, that they have been paying no attention whatever to the shippers and the consignors or to anything but their own convenience. The instances that my hon. friend from South York gave are all true enough. We, in the west, know of many other cases and it is not only in the west but in other parts of the country that these cases arise. A year ago there was a case right here in Ottawa that came under my own personal observation. A shipper in Ottawa sent two cars of freight to Montreal. It only took two or three days for the cars to reach Montreal, the consignee was notified that the cars had arrived and in one case it was eighteen and in the second case it was twenty-one days after the cars arrived in Montreal before the railway company were able to or did place these cars on a siding where the consignee could unload them. If the consignee had been one or five days late he would have been charged demurrage and rightly so. I quite agree with the last speaker that if the consignee does not unload his freight in proper time he should be charged demurrage, and I think that if a higher demurrage were charged it would be a great deal better because then the consignee would take good care that the cars were not delayed. But, if you are going to charge the consignee demurrage because he does not unload a car as quickly as he should what about the railway company that keeps the consignee waiting from 10 to 20 or 30 days ? Should not the railway company be also made to pay the consignee for the loss that he has been put to ? I think that is only a fair arrangement. There is no doubt whatever but that that is coming, that it is coming in the very near future and the government will have to take the matter up and deal with it. I have not given the matter sufficient consideration to be able to say with any definiteness whether the proposition of the hon. member for South York is the very best proposition, but it is certainly along the right lines and something will have to be done in the very near future. Take, for instance, a shipment of wheat in the west; last fall we had unfortunately a light crop and in a great many cases there was not much of a demand for cars, but in any part of the country where there was a fair crop it was almost impossible to get cars. In the southern part of my district there was a very light crop and therefore the demand for cars existed only at a few points instead of at every station as would have been the case had we not had frost. But at one station in that southern country were over 40 orders for cars on the book at one time. These people were waiting for cars and were not able to get them. The way it works out is something like this: A farmer places his order for two or three cars. He has perhaps two, three, four or five cars of wheat on hand that he wishes to ship and it is probably a month before he gets his cars. Then he gets a car, loads it with wheat and sells the wheat for a certain delivery. What is the result? There are cases by the score, yes, by the hundreds, where, after a farmer had loaded his car and has got his bill of lading from the station agent the car is put in the siding and in many cases is not hauled out of that siding, for two, three and four weeks, standing there right on the siding at the station where it was loaded, or possibly being taken a station or two away and tied up for two, three or four weeks. He sells his wheat in time to make November delivery, the wheat is not taken down to Fort William or Winnipeg and therefore he cannot make his delivery. The result is that he suffers a loss of any fall in the price of wheat that may have taken place in the meantime. The same thing occurred in the shipment of cattle last year. I know of one particular case in which a friend of mine in Alberta had a bunch of fat steers that he wished to ship. He ordered the cars beforehand for a certain date. He drove these cattle into the market town and waited there for six weeks herding them around the station. He could not get a single car. The result was that he had to drive his cattle back to his ranch and last winter out of the 4,000 head of stock that he drove into the station and had to drive back again, because the railway company did not supply him with cars, three quarters of the number were lost because the winter, as we all know, was an exceptionally severe one in that country. That man lost about $2,000 or $3,000 in actual cash through no fault of his own but through the fault of the railway company in not supplying him with cars. These are instances that could be multiplied and these are instances which I am sure will show to the Minister of Railways and Canals that action and strong action is necessary in the very near future. If our Railway Commission has not power to deal with these matters at the present time this government and this parliament must clothe them with the necessary power. I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that if this work is handed over to the commission it will be necessary to very largely increase that commission, to increase the strength of it and to get the very best and ablest men in the country on that commission, to divide it up into several sections and to divide up the work so that it will be able to keep pace with the work. It may cost a few thousands of dollars, it may even cost $25,000 or $50,000, but, I do not care so much what the cost of the commission may be, because it would be a mere bagatelle as compared with the cost of the lack of a commission or some other authority to deal with these and kindred questions affecting the transportation of the country at the present time. I will venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the west, taking the wheat and cattle shipments alone for last season, there was more direct loss made by the farmers than would pay for the cost of a commission, or, for that matter, for the cost of ten, fifteen or twenty-five commissions. It is hard to figure out just what the loss was. In the early part of the season we had a big price for wheat and if the farmers had been enabled to get cars to send out their wheat the result would have been that they would have got from 30 to 40 cents a bushel for their wheat more than they eventually did get on account of their not being able to get shipping facilities at the time they needed them; so that, the question of the cost of the commission would be a very simple matter as compared with the cost of the lack of a commission or some other authority or power to deal with this question.

One of the great difficulties in the way of quick transportation in the west is not only lack of cars but more particularly lack of engines. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) read a list of the increases the railway companies have made to their rolling stock during the last few years, but I know that one of the high officials of one of the railway companies stated last year that while they were adding twenty-five new cars a day they were sending thirty old cars to the scrap heap. Of course last winter was exceptional, and the loss of rolling stock on the railways was greater than perhaps ever before, but nevertheless we should remember when we hear of these increases of rolling stock that it takes a great deal of new rolling stock to make up for that which has become useless and goes out of service. Every day on the branch lines in the west we can see old engines which are not able to carry heavy loads, trying to move the freight. Over and above all that there is a serious lack of facilities in the way of repair shops and siding space. Let me give an example. A car had been consigned to a certain Saskatchewan town and the owners of the freight were anxious to get it, but that car was lost for several months. The railway company had tracers out, but in the end it was found that it had been ninety-two days side tracked in the railway yards of the very town it was consigned to. For lack of proper siding accommodation the railway companies are not able to handle their cars to advantage.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

HAMILTON RADIAL ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

On the order,

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 25) an Act respecting the Hamilton Radial Electric Railway Company (reported as amended) —Mr. Clarke.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I would like to bring to your attention for your ruling——

Mr. SPEAKER. I must leave the chair for the House to go into committee, and a point of order cannot now be raised.

House then went into committee.

Mr. GRAHAM. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

On the question, when shall the report be received,

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in regard to the motion made yesterday, that the fifth report of the Railway Committee should be referred back, for the reason that it does not conform with rule No. 106 of the rules of the House of Commons, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, for a ruling upon the question as to whether or not the report is in order. The point I wish to lay before you is——

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, is this in order ?

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no motion. The question is, when shall this report be received and the committee have leave to sit again ?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I think the hon. member will have to give notice of his intention, and bring it up to-morrow on the order for motions.

Mr. LENNOX. The motion I made yesterday was not received, and the speaker announced that it should stand as a notice.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that, until the motion of the hon. member for South Simcoe comes up in the proper form, the objection which I understand the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is about to raise cannot be entertained.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Speaker, the matter was spoken to yesterday in the committee, with the deputy speaker in the chair, and he announced that it would have to be referred to the Speaker of the House, and I desire to bring it before you.

Mr. FIELDING. The motion will come at a later stage, and then my hon. friend's objection might be properly taken.

Mr. LENNOX. I read the motion yesterday, but the Minister of Railways did not desire the matter to be proceeded with, owing particularly to the absence of the chairman of the committee, and in deference to his suggestion I did not insist on the motion being proceeded with, and the Speaker announced that the motion which I read should stand as a notice; and the understanding come to yesterday was that two or three days notice would be given by the Minister of Railways before this matter would be proceeded with in any way.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Am I right in understanding that the hon. gentleman's motion has not yet been made?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that is the position of the matter; and until that motion is received, the objection which the hon. member for South Wellington desires to raise cannot be entertained. It will have to remain in abeyance until the motion is formally made.

Mr. LENNOX. I think that my motion should have been received yesterday, but it was not.

Progress reported.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. W. F. Maclean (South York) for second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. TURRIFF. Mr. Speaker, when you left the chair at six o'clock I was endeavouring to point out that one of the reasons for the difficulty in the west over the transportation problem was the lack of railway facilities. It is well known that all the railway companies in that country are very lacking in the necessary facilities for carrying on a large traffic. In some seasons of the year there is no difficulty; but during the winter it often happens that some little thing goes wrong with an engine, and it has to be taken two or three hundred miles to be repaired. The railway companies will have to be given to understand that they do not own and rule the whole country, but that as public carriers they have undertaken certain obligations, and will have to live up to them in the future a good deal better than they have done in the past. I am certain that the people will not tolerate very much longer the condition of things that we have had of late years. It is all very well for the railway companies to give reasons, in the pamphlet they have issued, why this reciprocal demurrage should not be enforced against them; but I cannot see that they have made out any kind of a case. I am well aware that they have a good deal to contend with owing to the rapid development of the country; but they have undertaken to do certain things, and they have not been doing them. If the railway companies—I speak more particularly of the west—would endeavour to thoroughly equip and maintain and operate the lines which they have instead of attempting to jockey each other for the sake of getting advantageous positions, it would be better for the country. Their efforts at the present time are expended, not so much in the interest of the settlers as in their own interests, one railway company trying to get ahead of another, such as building railways where there are railways already, for the purpose of cutting off traffic from a rival company. I could point out in my own part of the country a railway which was built for eighty miles paralleling another railway, while other parts of the country were suffering for the lack of railway facilities, and farmers were compelled to haul their wheat thirty or forty miles to market. I do not intend to take up that question to-night, but I intend to ventilate it before this session is over. That is one reason why the Railway Commission or the government should give these railway companies to understand that they will have to live up to the obligations which they have entered into, or else the government will know the reason why.

As to whether we have the necessary authority in the present Railway Act or not, I do not pretend to say. I do not believe we have. or if we have, the Railway Commission evidently does not think so, because the hon. gentleman who spoke just now (Mr. E. D. Smith) pointed out certain cases in which the Railway Commission decided that they had not the necessary authority to give justice and satisfaction. I believe it will be necessary for the government to give the commission additional powers, or, if they have these powers, make that thoroughly clear and see that the commission carry them out. I quite agree with the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) when he says that the initiative should not be left to every shipper or everybody who suffers an injustice to get up a case against a railway company, because the railway company can carry the case to the Privy Council and thereby tire out any ordinary man. For those reasons it would be necessary to give additional powers to the commission and see that the commission is so increased in number and strength that it will be able to give thorough and prompt attention to all the different claims that come before it. I believe that the appointment of that Railway Commission was one of the best things done in the interests of the people for many years. The commission are doing good work but they are only human and are consequently unable to do all the work that comes before them now. And as every little while we put additional work on that commission, it will become necessary to increase its number and put it in a position to handle the work.

As to the best method of dealing with the railway companies, the only effective way is to fine them heavily every time they do not live up to their charters. Under their charters, they get large subsidies, so that this country has practically built our railways. Not one of these railways would be in existence, in all probability, had the government not given them valuable assistance both in land grants and guaranties and cash subsidies; and we have the right to insist that they live up to a certain degree at all events, to the obligataions they have undertaken. They have not done so in the past. The country has been too lenient, but is wakening up and will insist in the future on the railways acting differently. And the railways will do so without trouble if we simply let them know that we are in earnest. Let me draw attention to what occurred here last year. In the early part of last session, two of the big railway companies came to the commission and wanted it to confirm a four-cent per mile passenger rate in the province of Saskatchewan. The Railway Commission refused but offered to confirm a 3½-cent rate. On discussing the matter with the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. McIntyre) and other members from the west, it was decided that we would take the matter up in the House, and my hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. McIntyre) put a notice of motion on the Order Paper. The matter went on for a time, and then the railway companies came to the Prime Minister and wanted that notice of motion done away with. He said the motion would have to take its course and be discussed. What was the result? Rather than have a discussion over the railway rates, they agreed that in sixty days they would accept an order of the commission reducing the rates east of the Rocky Mountains to three cents a mile. And the result has been that in Alberta and Saskatchewan, on every mile travelled since then, we have had a three-cent rate per mile instead of the four-cent rate they wanted to charge. Not only that but throughout Ontario and Quebec, the rates were reduced one-quarter to one-half cent. All through the country the ordinary rates charged by the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and other railway companies were three cents, in one or two cases three and one-half cents and three and a third cents, and in one or two cases, on branch lines, four cents. All those rates have been reduced to three cents in consequence of the action taken in this House. That makes me certain that if the government tell the companies they may do certain things, they will do it. If they do not, punish them heavily by fine. That is the only way you can punish a railway company. When they are so ready to charge demurrage on a car, and rightly so, when a consignee does not unload it on time, the government should see that they are made to pay for delay, not only in furnishing a car, but in delivering it after it is loaded. We would not then have them leave a car of wheat standing three or four weeks on a siding after it has been loaded, so that the farmer, who has a bill of lading, is not able to draw a dollar on it, or sell that wheat, or if he has sold it, lose 10 cents to 20 cents a bushel, through the price having gone down and he not being able to deliver. It would be an easy matter to work out the suggestion that the railway companies should have to deliver certain classes of freight in a certain length of time. That can be easily worked out once the railway companies learn that they have to do it; but so long as you let them go on as you have been doing of late years, they will not try. They have not been punished and will not make any particular effort. That is an additional reason why this matter should be taken hold of. If we provide the necessary machinery to get after the companies, when they do not live up to their agreements, we shall have very few complaints in the future.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. Just to show the high handed manner in which these corporations treat the public, let me point out that a couple of days ago I got from one of my constituents in the shipping business a copy of a circular letter from the London Flour Trade Association of London, England, in which that association pointed out that, under the present bills of lading, under which flour has to be shipped from this to the old country, it is practically impossible to build up a trade. This is more particularly a steamship matter and has only a side relation to the subject under discussion. But it goes to show that these shipping corporations think only of themselves and not at all of the trade or the convenience or good of those engaged in the trade. I hope that the government will take hold of this matter with a strong hand, and deal with it in a most thorough and far-reaching manner, so that in the future there may not be the same ground of complaint that we have hitherto had in the west and throughout the Dominion.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris). I do not think there has been any question before parliament this session so important as the one we are now discussing or one more worthy of the patient attention of this House. Nor has there been a question under discussion this session which affects more individuals than this one does. Speaking particularly of my own section of the country, this is a matter that affects very seriously the shipping of grain. Had I not a great many letters and resolutions of important bodies relating to this matter, I should not speak on this motion. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) says that we already have all the law that is necessary on this question. All I have to say is that, if we have all the law that is necessary, it is about time that somebody put that law into action. A law that is a dead letter is of no practical service. Any person at all acquainted with the shipping of grain from the west knows what it may mean to the shipper to have his car delayed for a number of days. As we come near to the close of navigation, say the middle of November, if a farmer is able to secure a car for November delivery, it is of the utmost importance that that car should reach Port Arthur or Fort William before the end of the month. It makes a difference, very often, of from 8 cents to 14 cents a bushel on his wheat. I wish to read a letter I received the other day from a man who had three cars of wheat loaded on November 15. Now, certainly fifteen days was sufficient time to take a car of wheat from Glenora, which is on the Canadian Northern, to Port Arthur. There was time enough, even under the very low limit of 50 miles a day named in this Bill. And, in passing, I may say that I am very much surprised that the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) should think of providing that a railway should be allowed to carry freight at so slow a rate as fifty miles a day. It is about 500 miles from Glenora to Port Arthur. It should not take more than three days to make that trip. This question has been put before the House very clearly, and the instances given by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) and also my hon. friend from South Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith), who is a practical man and has had great experience in shipping, are very important. But I desire to add another instance by reading this letter :

> But the moving of the cars after they were loaded was very slow. Three cars that I had to do with myself were loaded on the morning of November 15, and were taken out of Glenora station that morning. They did not get into store until the 9th, 11th and 14th December.

The wheat, in these cases, was sold for November delivery, and there was time enough for them to reach Port Arthur long before the end of November. And Mr. D. D. Campbell, a gentleman appointed by the government in the interest of the farmers did his utmost to find out where the cars were. Here is a letter written by Mr. Campbell to Mr. Wilson, the gentleman from whom I received the letter of which I have just spoken :

> It looks as though we are going to be beat to get these two cars to their destination in time for the November delivery. I have been in hopes that they had gone out by Emerson and that the returns would arrive here in time to be turned over. I have asked the car service agent several times to have them traced up and brought forward, but, up to the present, there is no word of them. We must insist on reciprocal demurrage.

That 'reciprocal demurrage' does not seem a very apt term there. However, I must say I am not very particular about terms. The point I want to see provided for is that the railways be bound to carry these cars to their destination within a reasonable time, and, certainly, a reasonable time from Glenora to Port Arthur is not thirty days, nor fifteen days—it should not exceed five or six days at the outside.

> —as that is nothing but just, and it is the first thing that will keep the old date cars moving. If the company had to pay yourself $10 each it would help in a small measure to make up your loss. But I think if it was in force your cars would have been at their destination long ago.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Can the hon. gentleman (Mr. Schaffner) say what was the loss to the shipper in that case?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. He does not state his loss, but it must have been considerable. When wheat is sold for November delivery, but not delivered, it may not be saleable until next spring. Now, had the case of which I speak occurred a year ago, I should not have stood up here to find fault, for I think that the railways then were up against a very hard proposition, and I think they deserve great credit for the manner in which they carried on their work under the difficulties of snow storms and cold that faced them. But there was no such excuse this year. We have had an exceedingly mild winter in the Northwest ; there has been very little snow, and the railway that will take three cars of wheat and occupy a month in carrying them from Glenora to Port Arthur, depriving the shipper of 13 cents or 14 cents a bushel, is not doing its duty to the shipper. I sometimes think it rather strange that so much is being turned over to this Railway Commission; it almost looks as if, very soon, there will be no need for parliament. But, certainly it is a splendid commission, and I am willing that this matter should be referred to them. I know the farmers throughout Manitoba are determined that something should be done to compel the railways to carry cars to their destination in something like reasonable time. There does not seem to be much trouble this year in getting cars; the trouble is after they are loaded in getting them carried to their destination. As I have said, the farmers of Manitoba and the Northwest feel keenly on this subject. At a meeting of the grain growers of Manitoba, in the city of Brandon on January 15 last, the following resolution was passed :

Whereas farmers are charged demurrage when cars are not loaded promptly; therefore, it is resolved that railway companies should be charged demurrage when cars are not supplied within a week after being ordered, and also when they remain standing on track more than forty-eight hours after being loaded, and also when a car is taken out it shall proceed at an average of not less than 100 miles per day to destination. Provided, that this provision shall be waived in case of car shortage being declared by Railway Commission.

That is all I wished to say. The matter has been fully and ably placed before the House by the gentlemen who have spoken, and I merely wished to place myself on record as favouring this Bill, and read the letter and to place the resolution of the grain growers before the House and country.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). I heartily support the principle of this Bill. It has been said that the Bill is loosely drawn; I shall not argue that question with gentlemen some of whom have had greater experience in the practical working of such matters than I have, but it would have occurred to me that the Bill had been drawn with a great deal of care. It deals with the question of reciprocal demurrage and there seems to have been an intention to secure reciprocal justice in its framing. The mover has said he did not wish the House to be committed to the wording of the Bill, what he and all of us who wish the Bill to receive a second reading, desire is that we should commit ourselves to the principle of the Bill and should seek to obtain, by some means, a remedy for a grievance which undoubtedly exists. It has been suggested that we have a railway board and that therefore we need do no more. I have great respect for the railway board and more particularly for the work they have done; I recognize that they have performed a great service, but I do not think we can ask the railway board to do everything for us. I endorse the statement of the hon. member for East Assiniboia that we must attach a penalty if we want to force the railways to live up to their obligations. We should not be unfair to them, but experience shows that we must have a strict rule, a stringent law, to compel their obedience, and the only way we can effectively appeal to a railway company is through their pockets; if we can so arrange matters that it will not pay them to do injustice to the shipper they will not do injustice, and I am quite sure that we have not taken all the steps that are necessary to secure full and complete justice to shippers.

There seems to be no dispute as to the principle of the Bill except on the part of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I assume that as the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has not spoken and acted as our counseller and guide in this matter, he is waiting until we express ourselves, and that he will concur in the majority opinion voiced by the House to-night. I assume that this matter will be referred either to a Committee of the Whole House, to a special committee or to the Railway Committee. While as a rule I approve of public Bills being discussed on the floor, in Committee of the Whole, as the principle here involved is to some extent a new one in our legislation, I recognize that it may be well to have it discussed in a committee other than in a Committee of the Whole, where all parties concerned, the merchant, the farmer, the actual shipper and the railways concerned, will all have an opportunity to place their views fully before the members, and all will be able to decide from their representations what is in the best interests of the country.

I was greatly impressed by the speech made by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) not simply because it was a very able speech, for his speeches in this House are always instructive. I know no man who has a more convincing manner or a more thorough grasp of any subject he discusses. I have no doubt that the instances of abuse he has brought before us have greatly impressed the House and have shown the absolute necessity of doing something more than has been done. He mentioned one case of freight being carried 216 miles in fifteen days or not quite fifteen miles a day, and another case of a shipment from Winona to Bowmanville, 150 miles in fifteen days, exactly ten miles a day. As the hon. member for West Assiniboia has said, it is often a case of jockeying between the railway companies rather than of endeavouring to serve the public. Mr. Smith spoke of the delay of a shipment of sugar at Hamilton for four or five days while the railway companies were jockeying over 60 cents, with probable loss to the shipper. I wish to see justice done to all concerned, and to have this matter fully discussed before some committee.

In the discussion so far we have had one discordant note, in the very able speech of my esteemed and learned friend, the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). He announced that he had looked carefully into this matter, and when he made that announcement I knew that we would have a large amount of information placed before us. I did not, however, quite anticipate that we would have the earnest pleading on behalf of the railway companies which that speech contained. The hon. member said he had examined section 284, subsections (c) and (d) of the Railway Act. Well, he had not to go very far to look for it because it is set forth on page 6 of the 'Argument against the proposals as to penalties for delay in supply of cars,' contained in Bill (No. 6) by F. H. Chrysler, K.C., made on behalf of the railway companies. Then he proceeds—and I propose to follow exactly in the line that the hon. member for South Wellington took—to refer to section 317. I find that set out in the Bill of my hon. friend as a section which he proposes to amend, and when I turn to page 7 of the railway case I find it is also the next section mentioned there. Then he proceeds to discuss section 318; I turn to the case and I find again that this is recorded on page 7. He mentions sections 26 and 28 and I again turn to the case and find them recorded on page 7. He also mentions section 30 and I find it recorded on pages 7 and 8. Then the hon. gentleman tells us about the action of the railway board and that again is perfectly correct according to the railway case, because I find that all set out on pages 8 and 9 of the argument of the railway case. I was wishing all the time that I had been as industrious as the hon. member for South Wellington; I admired and envied him as he told us of the vast amount of increased equipment that had been secured by the railways and I wondered how one head of reasonable size could contain all this information. It was only when I turned accidentally to pages 14 and 15 of the railway case that I realized where that vast amount of information had been obtained. In a word, the hon. member for South Wellington is to be congratulated upon the faithfulness with which he has presented the railway case. Although we might go to the Railway Commission and have a full discussion there, I doubt if the question could be more strenuously argued than it was argued by the hon. member for South Wellington. One argument that was presented by the hon. gentleman deserves to be referred to. In his endeavour to show that the argument of my hon. friend from South York as to discrimination by our railway companies against Canadian freights and in favour of freights originating in the United States could not be well founded, he said: why the railways are carrying these freights upon lower terms than they are carrying freight originating in Canada. It is so, but they get large blocks of freight, vast quantities in a lump, they secure this freight in the United States and they prefer to have it and let the Canadian shippers suffer for the time being. The railway company seems to argue the matter out in this way: There is competition, perhaps, from the starting point in the United States: we have to secure this freight now or not at all; we will secure it now and let the Canadian freight wait until a more convenient season. So, there is an abundance of authority for the statement the hon. member for South Wellington made that the railway companies are looking after their own interests and that they propose to look after their own interests. Do not think for a moment that I do not recognize that the railway companies do a service to the people of Canada. They do but we must have them on the best terms that we can get. The hon. member for South Wellington has not to go farther than the city of Guelph and he has not to go beyond the first railway station in his own riding to realize that every person who has any considerable amount of shipping, aye, and the farmers who have only a little amount to ship, have suffered more or less in the way that has been referred to this afternoon. I have heard it everywhere. I heard it in my own riding. I know of men gathering cattle together at a certain point for shipment on the railway but when they get them to that point there are no cars waiting for them. They wait from day to day until they get tired and then they have to drive these cattle back again and wait for quite a while perhaps before they can get cars. These instances are occurring all over the country and we must do something in order that the people shall have reasonable facilities. We must adopt some method by which, whether through the railway board or otherwise, we shall be able to have a reciprocal duty and a reciprocal burden cast upon the shipper and the carrier. What I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, is, that we should have a general law throwing the obligation upon the railway company. Instead of saying that the farmer or the shipper shall have to apply in every case we should make a general law to control general cases and let sectional cases be provided for by the railway company taking the initiative and making a move to have them brought within the exceptional provisions. Section 30 of the Railway Act recognizes that principle but it is not often enough enunciated in that Act. The latter part of section 30 provides that:

> And the board may exempt any railway, or section of a railway from the operation of any such order or regulation, for such time or during such period as the board deems expedient.

You cannot make any law that may not require under certain circumstances to be subject to exception. Make a law which will cover the generality of cases and then leave the onus upon the railway company of applying to the railway board under any particular exceptional circumstances, The necessity of action in this direction is enunciated in a statement, referred to by the hon. member for South Wellington, of the railway board as follows :

In some cases parties have asked that the allowance of the charge be made conditional upon a provision for what has been called 'reciprocal demurrage,' or some penalty or charge for delay by railway companies in supplying cars, or in receiving, transporting, or delivering traffic. This latter subject requires more investigation and consideration than the board has yet been able to give to it.

I think the hon. member for South York has, upon this occasion presented a matter to the House that involves the remedy of a very serious evil and the very great hardship that is felt by shippers throughout Canada, and I think it is also recognized that he has presented it in a very moderate and impartial way—impartial in the sense that he has not pushed the matter to the extreme but has endeavoured to present both sides of the case—the interests of the shipper and the interests of the transportation companies as well. I therefore have very great pleasure in supporting the principle of this Bill and I hope that it will receive not only now but during this session a very large measure of attention, so that the people of the country having occasion to use the railways shall not have the inconveniences that they have suffered in the past.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words before this Bill is read for a second time.

I may say that last session, on the 12th April, I had the honour myself to introduce a Bill to amend the Railway Act precisely in the direction of what concerns this question of surcharge and asking that it be made reciprocal. This is a subject that has a lively interest for the farmers and traders of all Canada, and particularly those of the county which I have the honour to represent. But this was at the close of the session, and as the hon. the Prime Minister was obliged to be absent on account of his visit to England, the leader of the House, the hon. the Minister of Finance, asked me kindly to leave the Bill over until the next session, for the hon. the Prime Minister had promised that there would be no new legislation during his absence. Notwithstanding this, my Bill was given a first reading and then held over for the next session.

This year, at the very commencement of the session, the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) introduced a Bill that differed somewhat from mine as far as the first clause is concerned, but copied in substance from the one which I introduced last year. While I am in favour of the principle of this Bill, I cannot, however, support the first clause, which does not seem to me acceptable, because it is not practicable. In fact, any individual might demand from the railway company five cars at one station, five others at another station and make the same demand further on, and the company would be obliged within eighty-six hours to place all such cars at that person's disposal. I believe this is not practicable. I am not a lawyer, I am a farmer and trader, but this is what I would like to have embodied in the law. I believe that if we could obtain from the railway companies the supplying of cars in certain proportions—here, for example, is a station that gives about six or seven hundred freight cars per year, this would give a fair average of fifty cars per month for twelve months—it would suffice. If the companies were subject to a fine when they would not supply the estimated average, the effect would be a remedy for the present state of things.

I asked a railway agent why it was that we could not get cars, especially in October and November. Because, he replied, the companies sent the largest number possible westward so as to get the freight which pays better, created by the moving of the crops in that part of the country. This may be true, but, on the other hand, the older provinces should not be forgotten.

I am not jealous of the progress and prosperity of the west, nor of the advantages it possesses in this regard, but it seems to me that the population of the older provinces should not be neglected by the railways. It is important for us to be able to transport our goods at the suitable time in order to secure the best possible prices while the market is favourable. In Montreal we have a large market for our hay, and being near at hand that market is very advantageous. Moreover, Montreal being at the head of navigation, we could, by sending our hay there, have it forwarded to Europe and benefit by that trade. In May and June the freight rates to Europe are low, and that is just the best time for us to export, because hay being a product difficult of transportation it cannot be profitably forwarded when there is an abundance of other products to be transported, for the rates—on account of such abundance—are higher. I say that the railways should treat more justly the older provinces, which have bled themselves to help in the construction of those railways, and not send all their cars out west to the detriment of the east, as is done to-day. Remember, I am not at all jealous of the west, but I claim that in return for the sacrifices we have made the provinces of the east should be more fairly treated.

Now, I come to the question of the fine imposed on the exporter when he does not load the cars within the given delay. It often happens that cars asked for are not supplied until quite a while after. Frequently it happens that a car is asked from an agent when the weather is fine and it is possible to transport the products that are to make up the load ; but if the cars are not supplied until fifteen days or three weeks have elapsed, it is quite possible that the weather may then be unfavourable, or that the roads have become so bad that it is impossible to load the car that has been placed at one's disposal. He may have to take two or three days more than the prescribed limit, and when the farmer has finally completed his loading and goes to the agent for a way bill the first news he gets is that two or three dollars more, as a surcharge on account of delays, are demanded of him—all on account of a delay for which he is in no way responsible.

This happens to us—we traders—to put in such like claims ; but often five or six months go past before such claims are regulated, and I may say that many farmers lose from two to three dollars in this way, because they are not forewarned in time. I say that if the railway companies have the right to charge from two to three dollars of surcharge for such like delays, I cannot see why the law does not oblige them to pay equally a surcharge tax when they hold back cars for ten or fifteen days and thereby make it impossible for the consignee to load them. The Bill I introduced last year contained a disposition to this effect, and for that reason I favour to-day the second reading of the Bill of the hon. member for South York. Still, I believe that in Committee of the Whole certain amendments should be made thereto.

In regard to the scarcity of cars many things have been said ; it has been said that there are not enough cars in the country. I believe that such scarcity is principally due to the fact that in the large centres sufficient facilities for the unloading of goods on the arrival of trains do not exist. I do a considerable hay trade with New York and Boston. I have visited these two cities several times. Each day about 150 carloads of hay come into the stations there ; that is to say, all they can unload in a day, and the other cars await their turn outside the city. Thus there is never any over-crowding. In the city of Montreal it is altogether different. Last year I myself forwarded two cars of hay from St. Constant on the 3rd January, and these two cars reached Montreal on the 14th February. Yet there is only a distance of twenty miles between the two points. It is evident that this system of delivery is very defective and often ruinous.

According to my hon. friend's Bill the railway companies shall be obliged to have their freight cars cover a distance of at least fifty miles per day. Well, then, what are we to think of my forwarding of last year of which I have just spoken, which, for a distance of twenty miles, took from the 3rd January to the 14th February? The clearest result was that I lost two dollars per ton on account of the fall in market prices. I cite this case, but I could mention hundreds of other like ones. It is the same for all products exported from my section, but the market fluctuations are felt more in the case of hay.

I do not wish to detain the House any longer, and, as I said a few moments ago, I intend to vote for the second reading of this Bill ; but I trustfully hope that certain changes will be made in the first clause before it is finally passed.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I do not rise in the hope that I can present any additional facts to the House in support of this measure, but because I believe that the general sentiment of the people in my section of the country and, indeed, throughout Canada, is in favour of some such Bill as this. Painful experience has taught them that a remedy is needed, and they look to parliament for that remedy. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) is entitled to the gratitude of the people of this country for his strenuous effort to remove this grievance and for the Bill he has presented, which I venture to think will meet with the approval of a large majority of the members of this House. The Bill seeks to provide that when a shipper applies to a railway company for a car he shall be furnished with it within a time specified in the Bill, and in my judgment the time provided is reasonable. If, however, it is the opinion of the House that the time specified is not reasonable, it is the duty of the House to amend the Bill in that respect. It is said that a law without a penalty is of little avail, and so the Bill seeks to provide a penalty for non-compliance with its provisions. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who by-the-by seemed to me to be what we call a corporation lawyer in this House pleading for the corporations as against the interests of the people—perhaps I am going a little too far in saying that, but the tenor of his remarks in connection with this Bill seemed to be but in one direction, and that was that we had law enough on the subject already, and that the Railway Commission had power to do all this. The hon. gentleman said we had plenty of law and I felt like replying that we had plenty of law but that we had not enough justice. Well, if the present law does not bring justice we want something behind the law which will enforce the law, or else we must amend the law so that the people may get justice. It may be that the provisions of the Railway Act if enforced would remedy some of these grievances, but there seems to be no one whose special duty it is to enforce the law and punish its violation. The Bill also provides that in the event of a shipper not loading a car within a reasonable time after he receives it, he also shall be penalized. I think that is correct. If you penalize a public carrier for not doing a certain act it is equally correct that you should provide a penalty for the shipper who also neglects to do his duty. There is no injustice done to the railway company, there is no injustice done to the shipper if each is punished when he does not live up to the law. The Bill further provides that the railway company must forward a car of freight to its destination at a certain rate of speed, and deliver it within a reasonable time. It is provided that the railway shall carry freight at the rate of 50 miles a day, but in this age that movement is altogether too slow, and I assume that if the Bill ever goes through, the clause will be amended so as to make the railway company carry freight at the rate of at least 100 miles a day. I also agree with the provision of the Bill which provides for a demurrage charge if a car is not unloaded with due promptness after its delivery. When a shipper gets a car he ought to avail himself of the earliest opportunity to free it so that others may have the advantage of its use. There is a provision in the Bill also that the railway company shall place a freight car where it is convenient to load or unload. That is a good provision. I was told a few weeks ago by a gentleman who last year took settlers' effects to the west, that he was subject to great inconvenience because the railway company placed his cars in such a position that it was impossible to get any where near them with teams or unload his stock. He remained for two days trying to get that car properly placed so that he could unload it, and at last he was obliged to bribe an employee of the railway company whose duty it was to place that car in position. This gentleman told me he reasoned with them, he tried to show them the unfairness of it, but they were indifferent to his appeals and the car remained there until at last by coaxing and bribing them he succeeded in getting them to place the car in a position where his stocks and effects could be unloaded. Should that be the treatment accorded to a man who is going into that country, every moment of whose time is valuable and to whom every hour of delay causes loss? Why should it be that the railway company which takes a large charge out of him for the transportation of his effects should be indifferent to his wants and should subject him to that delay. When we give special rights to common carriers in this country it is implied that one of their duties is to give facilities to the public to carry on their business and if they fail in that duty they should be punished. We have numerous examples in this country of the hardships inflicted on the people by the railway. You could not take up a newspaper last fall without seeing that they were crying out for more cars, more cars in the west and more cars in the east, and that business people could not ship lumber, or cordwood, or stock, or grain, or merchandise because they could not get cars. This shows there is something radically wrong with the railway companies.

Surely they are building more lines of railway than they can properly operate. If so, it ought to be their duty to provide rolling stock sufficient for the lines they have in existence at the present time. During last fall and winter, in the part of Ontario where I live, there was a great demand for the frozen grain of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I am within the mark when I say that hundreds of carloads of that grain could have been sold at a profitable figure if cars could have been got to bring it to Ontario. Application was made over and over again to the railway companies for cars and for information as to what it would cost to bring it down, but it was impossible to get information from the railway company or from its agents. They would not quote a rate nor promise to provide cars nor tell within one month or six months when a carload purchased in the west would reach Ontario. That frozen grain was demanded for feed, and in order that the farmers of the west should get the best price for it, it was necessary that it should be delivered in Ontario at the time it was needed; therefore every day's delay meant a reduced market and a lower price for the farmer of the west. Only one or two carloads reached the station in that district, where there should have been twenty-five or thirty or forty; and these carloads were shipped in the west weeks before they reached their destination. Any one who bought a carload of grain could not tell when it would arrive—in December, January, February, March, April or May. What was the use of trying to buy it? There was no use whatever, The people wanted it; their stock was famishing in many instances for want of it, but they could not get it. Is that the way the people are to be used by the railway corporations to whom we have given such large subsidies and so many rights and privileges? It may be said that they could not tell when the cars could be delivered. But there should be an obligation resting upon them, whenever they take up a car, to carry it on and on from day to day at a reasonable rate of speed until it reaches its destination. Sometimes a car is not hauled more than twenty miles before it is shunted to a siding, and some other car is taken in its place. I am told that the employees of the railway companies are bribed to leave off cars and take up others. I have been told by men who have found it very difficult to get their cars carried along, that they have watched these cars and that time after time they have had to bribe the employees to prevent their cars being shunted off. The train would start with a locomotive capable of carrying a certain number of cars, and at the end of a run, when a new locomotive was taken on, presumably one of equal power was taken.

It was not because the engine was not capable of hauling all the cars that some of them were shunted off; but, for some unknown reason, after they were carried twenty or thirty or forty or fifty miles, they were shunted off and other cars were taken on. Is that not an unjust discrimination against the shipper? It is, and every one who has been observant of the complaints made from every part of the country, from the west, the north and the south, within the last year or so, must have reached the conclusion that there should be some stringent law requiring the railway companies, when they take up a car of freight, to carry that car on and on day after day until it reaches its destination, and to carry it at a reasonable rate of speed. It may be said that unforeseen accidents will take place, which no company can provide against. But this Bill provides that in that event no injustice shall be done to the railway companies. The last clause says that when the removal of freight is suspended for unavoidable accidents, or the act of Providence, the time lost shall be added to the free time allowed to the railway company and shall not count. No shipper expects railway companies to do what is impossible. Every one understands that accidents will overtake railways as well as individuals, and is willing to allow for them. But it is because of unreasonable delays, which no accidents can account for, that the people desire some law to control the railway companies more fully than they are controlled to-day. It may be said that the railway companies cannot forward freight at a regular rate of speed? Can't they? The Grand Trunk Railway serves Armour and Company, of Chicago, the large meat shippers, so well that their train goes through almost at the same hour every day. If they can do that for the rich man of Chicago, surely they can do it as well for the Canadian, who has given them large subventions and greater support than the people of Chicago have given them. If they can do it for the people of Chicago, they can do it for the people of Canada. If they can, they should be compelled to do it. If they will not do it, punishment should be inflicted on them for non-fulfilment of their duty. These demands come from every class of the community. They come from the merchants all over the country who have lost the sale of goods because before the goods reached their shops they had become unseasonable. Some men have been put into bankruptcy by reason of the railway companies not supplying the goods of merchants at the proper time. The demand comes from the grain shippers, both in the east and in the west. The millers of the east have been clamouring all last fall and this winter for the grain of the west, but they cannot get it. A gentleman who ordered western grain about the 8th or 9th of November last fall told me that it had not reached our station two weeks ago when I was home. Will any one pretend to say that it required between three or four months to bring a car of grain from Manitoba down to Ontario? That is not shipping at all Instead of that one car being landed, there might have been a hundred cars and there ought to have been, and I have no doubt whatever that had they been landed and purchased at the price at which the grain could have been purchased in the west they could have been sold in Ontario at a considerable profit. The farmers who have to use the railways are clamouring for better service in the shipment of farm produce. That cry comes from the cattle shippers as well, in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have known instances in which the railway companies have been notified days in advance that cars were required. The farmers were notified to bring in their cattle and the cattle stood in the yards two or three days waiting shipment. The shipper had to haul feed to them and was often obliged to bring the cattle home again or put them out with some farmers and keep them there for days until cars were forthcoming. In what condition would cattle be which were taken out of warm stables and compelled to tramp around fields in inclement weather? Their weight would be reduced and their market value seriously impaired, and the shipper and the farmer have to suffer the consequences. The appeal for a change comes as well from the settlers going out to the west. There is scarcely a man who takes out settlers' effects who does not complain seriously of the inconvenience to which he was subjected in loading and unloading these effects and the delays he was put to, which would not be the case if the cars were hauled forward at a reasonable rate. The complaints come from the fruit men and we have had the actual experience of these men given us this day by my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith). The loss does not fall upon the fruit grower alone but on every fruit trader, as well as every fruit raiser in the country and those who consume the fruit as well.

But, it is said, we have laws under which we can enforce damages. But there seems to be nobody to enforce these laws. That is not the duty of the Railway Commission. They are not public prosecutors. Neither a farmer nor a shipper is able to fight a railway company, so that there must be some stringent law enacted under which a heavy penalty will be enforced if railway service is not properly given. The lumbermen and the manufacturers are also complaining. They have sent numerous petitions to this House drawing attention to the losses they have sustained owing to the want of proper transportation for their products. All these great interests are suffering every day. What is a parliament for if it is not equal to the occasion and able to provide a remedy? Parliament should provide a remedy and enact a law that will inflict severe punishment upon these corporations. For these reasons I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, and with proper amendments the clauses should prove satisfactory. They are calculated to meet a few of the grievances of the shippers and the sooner we provide a remedy, the better not only for the people who use the railways but for the railway companies themselves.

Mr. JOHN CRAWFORD (Portage la Prairie). This is not the first time this session that I have had something to say on this very important question—possibly the most important to the people of our western country at present. In the early part of the session, I took the position that the lack of proper transportation facilities caused us greater trouble and loss in different ways than anything else. Since then I have not changed my views because I am not aware that the situation has improved of late to any extent. My remarks in the early part of the session seem to have brought the situation more clearly home to our Railway Commission than it ever was before. To give you an idea of how it has been dealt with, I think it would not be out of place for me to put on 'Hansard' the action of the Railway Commission. Following up my remarks in the House at that time, the chairman of the commission wrote me on December 10, as follows :

I have been reading in 'Hansard' the report of the speech made by you in the House of Commons on Friday last, and am glad to learn that the situation in the west is so satisfactory.

That has reference to the condition of the farmers and not to the railways.

The particular reason for which I write you is to refer to the delays in transportation mentioned by you. Our operating assistant is at present in the Northwest for the purpose of getting full information as to the transportation conditions during the busy grain shipping season, and I would like very much to have him inquire into all instances spoken of by you, and ascertain, if possible, the reasons for such delays.

Would you kindly give me as definite particulars as you can—places, dates of shipment, and names of shippers? Where these are not known, the names of your informants or such other facts as will enable our official to trace up the cases? I would like specially to have him placed in a position to trace up the cases where cars have been left standing for a considerable time. We often hear statements of this kind, but have never yet got at the circumstances or located the real source of the delay.

In reply I practically repeated the statement which I had made in the House, with a few additions. I find that the investigation which took place, on account of the information I furnished at that time, fully bore out my statement, but I would like to call attention to the fact that the reasons given here so many times for the delays in transportation, do not altogether apply to the lack of power or the lack of motive power but to other reasons. The report is dated January 24 and is as follows. It is from Mr. Dillinger to the commission:

In accordance with instructions received from the board in connection with the complaint of Mr. John Crawford re car shortage and delays to cars, I went to Neepawa and Eden and secured the following check of cars in Neepawa yard from October 5, 1907, to January 1, 1908:—

Fifty-four out of 78 days in which time there were 13 Sundays and 2 holidays, making this check complete with exception of 9 days missed during the three months. No check taken on Sundays. The accumulation of cars started on October 25 when there were 26 loads on hand up to and including the 27th; 55 on 28th; 58 on 30th; 63 on the 31st, which was the highest reached until November 19.

I may say that one of these cars, loaded on October 26th, reached Winnipeg on November 29th, and the returns for that car of wheat arrived at Neepawa on January 4th, 1908—about seventy days between the loading at Neepawa and the return from the out-turn of the wheat at Fort William.

On November 2, this number was reduced, on the 6th to 35; and on the 7th to 28 loads; on the 9th increased to 52; reduced to 40 by the 11th; and still 40 on hand on the 12th. On the 14th increased to 70; reduced to 62 on the 16th; increased to 80 on the 17th.

Here I would draw your attention to this fact: at that time I was in communication with the Canadian Northern Railway management at Winnipeg; and in reply to a letter I wrote on the 15th, the traffic manager makes the statement on November 21st :

The grain shipping necessities of both points are being carefully looked after by our operating department, and I am advised that a supply of empties was delivered to the Neepawa section on the 19th inst. to ease up the situation.

And again, on November 22nd, he writes :

I am advised by our divisional superintendent at Dauphin, that the situation at Neepawa has been relieved.

The report goes on :

Ninety on the 19th; 92 on the 20th, and this number was reduced to 26 by the 23rd. There were 25 on hand on the 26th and 7 on the 27th. At no time after November 29th were there 28 loads of grain on hand at any one time, and this number was for only two days.

This check shows there were from 28 to 83 cars on hand for four days, from 70 to 92 cars for ten days, and this number was reduced from 6 to 28 cars, the latter number only on hand two days. This record can be relied on as I myself took it from their daily car check book.

Granted that no preference switching was done, and it is altogether likely that there was none when the yard was so congested, there were at no time 60 cars in the Neepawa yard for over ten days; at the same time there may have been a car or two that remained for a much longer period.

The next sentence relates to a matter of which I complained very much some time ago. This particular car was one of my own :

For instance, C. N. 522 loaded by Mr. Crawford, remained there for 29 days before being moved, and agent was unable to give the cause other than that this car was shoved back on siding by trains putting other cars ahead of it and was allowed to remain there. As this is a reducing point, this could easily occur unless the man in charge of the station yard checking was especially vigilant; but there is no excuse or reason why this should happen in such a winter as they have had, there being no weather conditions to interfere with the movement.

There were 417 cars loaded with grain at nine different stations that passed through Neepawa, and were billed by the agent at Neepawa during the month of October, November and December, of which numbers 232 originated in Neepawa—72 in October, 124 in November and 36 in December. As there is only about one car per day made empty at Neepawa that can be used for grain, and none at any of the other small stations west and north of Neepawa, all cars loaded with grain had to be brought in from the east empty. There were at least 400 cars supplied for grain, not counting those supplied for brick and wood.

At Eden, one of the points complained of, there were 57 cars supplied for grain, practically all of which were taken in empty. During October, 31 cars were supplied, during November 11, and during December 13; and from the attached list, you will see the dates by whom they were loaded. There was a shortage of cars at this point, and no doubt more grain would have been shipped had cars been supplied; but at the time of my visit, January 9, no shipping was being done and all orders on the books were filled.

At all other points near Neepawa, the supply of cars for grain has been the best for years. There are very few complaints from farmers re supply of cars; but there are vigorous complaints from all parties interviewed as to the long time it takes to have the Canadian Northern Railway deliver cars to Port Arthur.

I need not read the whole report. Further on it states :

I also interviewed Mr. John Fraser, of Eden, who also claims there was a shortage of cars during the month of November, but as no one seemed anxious to ship, no one suffered much. He states that the cars were moved fairly well from Eden when loaded.

Here is part of the report which bears out the statement that at least some people suffered :

The two cars mentioned by Mr. Crawford as having been ordered November 13 were supplied December 24. That is, it is pretty near a month and a half after the cars were ordered when they were supplied.

Mr. CRAWFORD.

The Manitoba Milling Company, who have an elevator at Spring Hill, shipped from there this season 26 cars for farmers and 5 for themselves, and they have at present 6,000 bushels in the elevator which they do not want to ship. They closed down on December 20. Mr. Crawford put two cars in the Springhill elevator, starting November 20 and finishing November 28. He shipped from said elevator this season 6 cars, the last two being shipped December 20. There is no wheat in this elevator now for Mr. Crawford.

The other cars spoken of by Mr. Crawford as being at Spring Hill were shipped one from Franklin and one from Orrville. Mr. Davidson, manager of the Manitoba Milling Company, who furnished me this information, claims that on the whole the farmers were well satisfied with the supply of cars furnished, but he complains of the delay in transit. He also states that the siding at Halsboro was full of cars for some time.

I understand that the cars were pulled out of Neepawa for a distance of three or four miles and then shoved on another siding and held for weeks and weeks at a time.

This was a fact, and was caused by cars being taken there from Neepawa on account of the congestion at that place.

At Neepawa, I interviewed Mr. J. T. Yates, grain buyer, who up to January 8 had shipped 183,000 bushels of grain, shipping 16 cars from Spring Hill, 120 from Neepawa and 6 from Halsboro', and he claimed he had no difficulty in getting cars.

Everything goes to show that it was not a car trouble that we were up against in that part of the country.

In fact, the supply was much better than in former years and none of his cars were held over one week at any point of shipment after being filled, and he has no hesitation in saying that the supply of cars for all parties has been infinitely better this year than in previous years. But all shippers complained bitterly of the length of time it takes to bring cars to Port Arthur.

Delay in moving of the cars has been a greater cause of trouble than the shortage of cars.

Mr. Yates gave a list of 24 cars with the dates they were billed, and up to January 8 he had had no report of the out-turn at Port Arthur. I took this matter up with the manager of the Canadian Northern Railway, and I attach a list showing dates lifted and tracing of cars from Neepawa to Port Arthur, with dates unloaded into elevators. Out of these 27 cars, one car was destroyed east of Winnipeg, two cars were held at Winnipeg for repairs 19 days, and the remaining 24 cars took from 8 to 43 days to make a trip of 555 miles, Neepawa to Port Arthur. One car taking 8 days, one 43 days, 11 cars taking from 8 to 19 days and 13 cars taking from 20 to 43 days, or the whole shipment of 24 cars averaging 21½ days to make 555 miles, or 25·8 miles per day. Of these 24 cars, 5 were held 14 days, 6 held from 24 to 26 days at a point east of Winnipeg, one car 39 days at Winnipeg, and one car 29 days at Neepawa.

I also attach a list of cars given me by Mr. D. D. Campbell, of Winnipeg, the party referred to by Mr. Crawford in his letter, in which 7 cars took from 10 to 30 days from Neepawa to Winnipeg, a distance of 117 miles, or an average of 15 days per car for the 7 cars, or 7·8 miles per day per car; and 4 cars from Berton to Winnipeg, a distance of 94 miles, took from 13 to 21 days, or an average of 17 days per car, or 5½ miles per day.

From conversations I had with a number of people, I find there are many complaints re delay in transit to cars of grain, and I had quite enough evidence to convince me that there was a great delay in the movement of cars; and I have no hesitation in saying that this delay is directly chargeable to the want of system in the handling of cars by the Canadian Northern Railway as they have sufficient motive power to handle these cars if they are properly looked after.

You will note from statement attached, a delay of from two to six days at Port Arthur in unloading these 24 cars mentioned. This was caused by the large number of grades of wheat to be handled, thus making the handling much slower than it would have been with good grades of wheat; and I do not think this could have been improved upon under the circumstances.

After obtaining this information, I took the matter up with Mr. McLeod, the general manager of the Canadian Northern Railway, personally, pointing out the long delays in transit and the lack of system in handling the traffic. He at once arranged to appoint a man whose business it will be to systematize the handling of traffic, keep proper records, check same and report direct to the manager. With this arrangement there is no reason why these delays should occur in future.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) A. F. DILLINGER,

Operating system, Board of Railway Commissioners.

It will be noticed that Mr. Dillinger attributes the trouble not to lack of cars or engine power, but to the lack of management on the part of the railway company. This does not agree with the view that most of us have held, but Mr. Dillinger is positive in his statement. This report emphasizes the advantage which is being derived by the country by the operations of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It will be noted that when Mr. Dillinger took this matter up with the management of one of the railway companies, steps were immediately taken to improve the operating system. The whole question is a serious matter to Canada and it has agitated the minds of the people to an unusal degree.

As to the remedy to be applied, I am not prepared now to say that it should take the form of this specific piece of legislation, or that we can, through special legislation, remedy the evils which now exist. There is no doubt that the railway companies should be compelled to afford proper service and that by their charters that duty is laid upon them. For instance, I find in the charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway it is provided that after they get the road in operation:

The company shall thereafter and forever efficiently maintain, work and run the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The construction that must be placed on the wording of that clause is that they must properly work and operate the road and furnish reasonable accommodation to the country. There can be no two opinions as to the meaning of the clause, and that is the meaning of the charter granted to any railway company in Canada. The charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway continues:

Upon the reception from the government of the possession of each of the respective portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the company shall equip the same in conformity with the standard herein established for the equipment of the sections hereby contracted for, and shall thereafter maintain and efficiently operate the same.

That clearly fixes what is expected of the railway company. They are expected to give the people of Canada reasonably efficient accommodation. It is up to us to determine the best means to bring that about, and, as I have said, I do not know whether the best means will be through this special legislation or not. It does not matter what legislation you place on the statute-books unless there is provision for proper machinery and equipment for the enforcement of that legislation, the legislation must be useless. We must have some machinery to see that the railway companies carry out the intentions of their charters. The passing of a special Act like this, unless it is followed up with the provision of machinery, will be useless. The individual shipper or combination of shippers, the farmer or merchant cannot possibly fight against a railway company and force the company to give justice; parliament must provide the machinery for that purpose, and I think that the proper method of dealing with these important and difficult questions is through the medium of the Railway Commission which we have created. The creation of that commission was one of the most useful acts of this government. If the Railway Commission are now overloaded with work, we should increase their numbers, and if their powers are not sufficient to enable them to force the railways to properly operate their systems, we should increase their powers. It is up to us to see that the railway companies carry out what it was intended they should do. I think, in connection with the report I have just read and other workings of the Railway Commission, that they have shown that they at least have some power and that they have done a great deal of good at different points throughout this country. I have been at some of the meetings where they met some of the railway companies and I have noticed that a word from the chairman of the Railway Commission goes a long way. The railway companies do not want to get up against the commissioners and they will do almost anything rather than have the board order them in any special or specific way. I do not know that I should take up more of the time of the House, but I think a discussion of this kind is good. A great many of the people of the country are interested in such a discussion and they are not only interested in it but they expect some definite and positive action to follow. I know what is agitating the minds of the people of the west particularly. I see that it is agitating our eastern friends more or less, and it is evident that we will have to do something and do it soon.

I do not know that I am in favour of a two-cent rate. I think there is very little objection to the existing rate but I would rather see, instead of reducing the passenger rates throughout the country, a reduction in freight rates. I think it would do more good to the general public than a reduction in passenger rates. My position is this : I want to see the railway companies make some money. I do not want to see them haul goods at a loss. We, first of all, want a good service but we want to get it at as reasonable a rate as we possibly can. The first thing is to see that our country is well served and the next thing is to see that we get that service at a reasonable rate.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (Leeds). Mr. Speaker, I have just one word to say to my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) who introduced this Bill and it is to offer the suggestion that he make what I consider a very desirable addition to his Bill, when it goes as I presume it will, before the Railway Committee or a special committee. I agree with the principle of the Bill but in my opinion it does not go far enough. It provides altogether for the shipper but there is another class in the community who have just as substantial grievances as the shippers have; these are the manufacturers and they are both receivers and shippers. I think the Bill ought to be amended to protect the consignee. Several cases have come under my own observation. I have had a great deal of experience in this matter and I presume that every manufacturer in the country has. We purchase a carload of goods at a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway in Canada and make a through rate to be delivered at our own town, the car comes on, we have the bill of lading signed by the Canadian Pacific Railway but the Grand Trunk takes hold of the car, hauls it from the point of junction to its destination and then perhaps demands $10 or $20 more than the through-freight rate. You have no recourse if you are in a hurry for your goods and if you put in a claim it will take two or three years to have it adjusted. Last April we had a number of cars come in. The cars were shipped in December but did not reach us until April and then they sent in three or four carloads a day. They claimed demurrage, but I would not pay it because of the fact that we could not unload that number of cars. In April three carloads of goods came in with overcharges beyond the bill of lading amounting to $103. I refused the cars. The officials of the Grand Trunk telegraphed to Montreal and they wrote back to us asking us to accept the cars and they would see that the overcharges were adjusted, but I have not received my rebate yet. The matter has not been adjusted. About six weeks after that a carload came in with $200 of overcharges. The goods had been sent from Tennessee on one of the American railways on a through bill of lading, the Grand Trunk took hold of the car at Chicago, or some other point, and there were $200 of overcharges by the railway that had hauled it that far. The Grand Trunk Railway billed it to our door with these overcharges. I refused the car and the agent took the car down to the station and advised the people at Montreal. They wanted me to pay the overcharges and put in a claim. I refused to do that, so they unloaded the car at the station and after waiting a month or so we got the matter settled and word came from Montreal to the railway officials to deliver the car. They wanted us to take delivery at the station, they having unloaded it there. I refused to do it. They wanted $12 to pay for the unloading and $12 to pay for hauling it up to us. I refused it and finally the Grand Trunk came down and threw off the $200 overcharges. Another car came in a few days after which they claimed weighed 66,000 pounds. I knew the car would not weigh over 40,000 pounds and I therefore refused it. After several days advice came from the Grand Trunk head office asking us to have the car sent up to Brockville to be weighed on the scale there. They had no weigh scale at Gananoque although they produced the receipt of their weighee at a point where they had a scale certifying that the weight was correct. They wanted it to be sent to Brockville to be reweighed on the condition that if it were not more than 1,000 pounds short I was to pay the freight down to Brockville and return and if more the Grand Trunk would pay it. I refused to accept it on these terms. I suggested that they put it on the scales at our door and have it weighed by one of their own men and I expressed the belief that they would find out if they did so that the weight that I had mentioned was correct. They finally unloaded it at the station and weighed it and found that the weight was 44,500 pounds although they charged me freight for 60,000 pounds. This case is not adjusted yet although it is six weeks since the car came there. So it goes. I draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) and of my hon. friend from South York to the fact that a railway company should, at the point where it takes the bill of lading from another company, see that the proper charges are made and they should deliver it on the through bill of lading signed by the railway over which the goods have been originally shipped to you. Many manufacturers in this country have claims amounting to $2,000 or $3,000 against railways standing for from one to three years unadjusted. I brought this matter to the attention of the Railway Commission last year but they have not done anything with regard to it yet. I think the time has come when the Railway Commission should make a rule that the railway company receiving goods from another railway company should see that the charges are correct and that having seen that they are correct they should deliver the goods and not hold them impounded as some of them do for one or two months. I think the Minister of Railways should see that the law should be so amended as to meet the cases which I have cited and that the Railway Commission should see that it is enforced.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). Mr. Speaker, this discussion has certainly been not only interesting, but it has been very instructive to myself and, I imagine, to a good many hon. members of the House. It is said that the prosperity of a country can be judged by the ease with which the people can move to and fro and by the facilities afforded for carrying the products of the people from the place of production to the place of consumption with speed and in good condition. That is the object, I believe that the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have had in view. That is the reason why the Dominion of Canada has done so much to assist in the building of railways and, I might also add, in the construction of canals and waterways.

Transportation, by rail and by water, may be called the foundation of commerce. Without railways our products would bring us only the price we could get for them at a market within wagon hauling distance from the point of production; indeed we would have no markets if we did not have transportation. The assistance given to railroads in Canada has not been for the purpose of assisting the railways but for enabling those who produce goods to send them to the markets of the world and get the highest market price. Every day saved in the moving of a product to market means an enhanced price for that product. Every facility that can be afforded to place a product in the market in a condition as nearly as possible equal to that in which it leaves the point of production adds so much to the price of a commodity. In dealing with the question of transportation we—the people—cannot disassociate ourselves from the transportation companies. I repeat what I have already said in this House, that there is nothing to be gained by arraying ourselves against the men who have invested their money in these large enterprises, and I am glad that the debate to-day has been along thoroughly practical lines and free from any tendency to attack the investors in these enterprises. We—I again speak of the people of Canada—are co-investors with the owners of the railways. Up to the 30th of June last we had paid from the federal treasury $128,827,649 in cash subsidies, the provinces have given $35,123,130; the municipalities have given $17,346,633, in all $181,298,413. But more than that has been done for railway transportation; the Dominion and the provinces combined have granted 52,183,063 acres of land in aid of railway construction. Even that is not all, although it is a good deal for six and a half millions of people to have done. In addition, the people of the Dominion and of the provinces have built and are operating 1,890 miles of railway at a cost of $101,000,000. Further, I think it is reasonable to mention it, there have been guaranteed bonds of the different railways to the extent of another $100,000,000. And so you see we, the people of Canada, are co-investors with the railway companies in the transportation problem, and we are interested from the cash standpoint as well as from the standpoint of producers or consumers. We want to be fair to those who have invested their money in railway enterprises and we have been fair. Sometimes, and in some directions, we perhaps overstep the bounds of what might be called practical, in attacking people who have invested large sums of money in certain enterprises, apparently only for the reason that they have been somewhat successful. Selfishness is selfishness wherever you find it, and in all the speeches delivered to-day there has been, may I say, a line of selfishness in that we want to get all we possibly can in the way of transportation; the basic idea of the discussion is that we may benefit ourselves and those around us. We are then all more or less selfish; the man who ships is anxious to get his product to the market though his neighbour is sidetracked; the consignee is anxious to get his goods even though his neighbour's carload is left on a siding. It may be that railway companies are more selfish than we are, because they are the concentrated selfishness of several men combined, but however that may be we have to discuss these things in a practical way and to try to arrive at some wise conclusion. Let me point out, and perhaps some of us do not think of it, that so far as railways are concerned Canada is one of the best served countries in the world, for we have more miles of railway per head of population than any other country.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Too many and not enough service.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, if there is a proposition to construct a line through South York I do not think my hon. friend will oppose it, nor will any other hon. gentleman oppose the construction of a railroad through his constituency.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) said this afternoon that mile after mile of railway had been built last season paralleling a road already in existence, and that the construction of that railway did no good.

Mr. GRAHAM. That may be, but I think I might hazard the opinion that the railway was not opposed when it was proposed. It all shows our selfishness again; we are willing to restrict every one but ourselves. But the gist of the whole thing lies just there; our territory is large, our population is comparatively small. We have more miles of railway per head of population than any country in the world, but the area of our country is so immense and we are so scattered over it that it is impossible to afford each person the railway facilities he might wish for, or, if it is not impossible it is more difficult than it would be in a thickly settled country. The railways of Canada have a large amount of capital invested in them, amounting to $1,171,937,808, and last year they hauled 163,866,135 tons of freight, and their gross earnings all told amounted to $146,738,214.68. Now, my reason for referring to that is not only to show the investment but to lead up to another fact that about one-sixth of the population of the Dominion earns its livelihood from the transportation facilities which exist here. We are interested in the success of the railways from a commercial standpoint, we are interested as a people from the cash standpoint because we have contributed largely to them, and we are further interested because of the fact that transportation facilities afford a livelihood for about one-sixth —some people say one-fifth—of the population of the Dominion. Now, Sir, a good many things have been said, and I have no fault to find with anything that has been said except perhaps a little undue criticism of the member for South Wellington. He was trying to point out as I understood him, not that he was against the railways carrying out their share of the duty they owe to the country, as they ought to, but he was trying to point out that it was his belief that there was already in the Railway Act sufficient power to compel the railways to do their duty. In this connection he called attention to the fact that there had been hundreds of thousands of dollars expended in the past year in the purchase of cars and locomotives, and equipment. I do not know exactly where the fault lies, but I do know there is a grievance and I want to state frankly that the government admits, sees, and realizes fully that there is a grievance on the part of shippers and consignees in connection with the transportation facilities afforded. The Railway Commission last year sent out several questions to the railway companies along this line, and if the House will bear with me, I will read these questions.

1. Have you a sufficient supply of motive power?
2. If not, how many additional locomotives do you require?
3. Have you an adequate supply of freight cars for your traffic?
4. If not, what is the approximate cause of the shortage?
5. How many freight cars used in your service were destroyed, worn out, or otherwise disposed of during the year ended June 30, 1907?

It will be interesting to the House to learn that there was only one railway company in Canada which admitted that it had any shortage, and that was the Intercolonial Railway. Not that the others had not the shortage, but the Intercolonial Railway, with its usual honesty, answered the question fairly; also probably because the Intercolonial, through the department, was coming to this House to ask for appropriations to enable it to overcome that shortage.

Now, there are two or three comparisons made by the compiler of railway statistics between the United States and Canada as to car shortage. In the United States there are 8,810 cars of all classes for every thousand miles of railway; in Canada last year there were 5,218 cars for every thousand miles of railway. That looks as if we had a much shorter supply of cars than the United States; but, making a fair comparison of our population with theirs, I believe we have as many cars for the purposes needed as the United States has, and perhaps more. Another comparison was this: in the United States the average haul for a freight car was 888 tons, while in Canada it was only 594 tons. That might be accounted for in this way. On their double track or four-track routes some of their cars of later design may be larger than the old cars; but the fact remains that they did make their freight cars haul more tonnage than ours.

I wish to discuss for two or three minutes the question of the statute as it now stands in reference to the Railway Commission. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Sproule) might possibly say that I got it from the argument of the companies, but I assure him that I read the statute before the company had an argument, in print at least.

Mr. SPROULE. You surely did not read Mr. Chrysler's argument, which seemed to be the brief which the hon. member for Wellington had.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will not say that any portion of the statute is misquoted in that pamphlet, will he ?

Mr. SPROULE. I did not look over it.

Mr. GRAHAM. If I did not read it and my hon. friend did not, we are not in a very good position to discuss its contents. Now, I am free to admit, as I have said, that there is a grievance. There are two sides to the question, however. Having the control of a railway in the department over which I preside, I come into conflict with difficulties every day. It is a fact that many of the men who complain the loudest about the shortage of cars are the biggest sinners themselves in keeping cars when they get them. Cases have been brought to my notice of men using cars for storage purposes instead of the purpose for which they were designed.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. They are fined by the railway companies if they do that.

Mr. GRAHAM. But they try to escape if they can, and I do not blame them. I have found that the railway companies have been pretty lenient about taking to court a question of demurrage.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I have not found it so.

Mr. GRAHAM. Then my hon. friend has been possibly more of a sinner than I have been. There are, as I have said, two sides to the question, and we want to discuss it from the standpoint of fairness, justice and above all practical results. If there be a grievance, which we all admit, then there ought to be a remedy for that grievance. What is the remedy ? It will be agreed, I think, by my hon. friend from South York, that reciprocal demurrage, as applied by statute, is merely experimental as yet. He stated the cases of the State of Michigan and the State of New York. But no person on this continent, I think, really knows yet what the final result of a reciprocal demurrage law placed on the statute-book will be. We in Canada are hardly in the same position as they are in the United States. Every State of the Union can make its own law in reference to demurrage. One State may have a law applicable to this question, while the next State may not. Consequently those who ship in one State may be in a better position than those who ship in the next State. But that only robs Peter to pay Paul, and does not bring about the result for all the people which the needs of the country demand. In Canada we are in a different position. The provinces do not deal with this matter, but the Dominion as a whole has to deal with it.

We have heard a good deal from the west, and I admit that the grievances there are material and substantial, and that some remedy for them must be provided. Possibly the fact that railway competition is very slight, or absent entirely in some districts may account for the apparent neglect of the railways.

There are circumstances, too, over which the railways have no control. Let me point out one particular phase. It has been said that some cars have been placed on sidings. I have seen that done many times myself. For instance, in the case of a snow blockade the demand of the public is that the passenger traffic must be moved no matter what happens to the freight traffic, and the freight cars are placed to one side in order that the passenger traffic may be carried through. But that is only exceptional. I think the dates mentioned by some hon. gentlemen had reference to a time when the snow blockade was such that practically no freight traffic could be moved.

Now, the desire of the government is to get at some general line of action that will meet the grievances, although we cannot hope to bring about a remedy that will be universal so that some grievances will not exist. My hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) whose remarks I very much enjoyed, and from whose practical talk I received a good deal of practical information, will agree, I think, that the Railway Commission ought not to be made a court for the settlement of claims for damages. There is a definite line between imposing a fine or penalty and finding an amount of damages, which I think must be a civil action. I believe that throughout the Dominion of Canada, I might say throughout the continent, no more popular step has been taken than the establishment of that Board of Railway Commissioners. I believe further, and I think my hon. friend from South York will agree with me, that the powers conferred on that board are equal to if they do not exceed the powers given to any other board anywhere. I believe further that our board has done excellent work. I believe the result to the people of Canada cannot be estimated in dollars and cents, because in many instances they have prevented grievances, or circumstances that would have developed into grievances if they had not been prevented.

That board is being overworked. There can be no question about that. Some hon. gentlemen have contended that complaints have been made which have not been attended to promptly. Others say that the board does not feel itself empowered to do certain things. Let me say that there is not a body of men in the Dominion who have worked harder than the members of the Dominion Railway Board. Since that board has been established it has become so popular that many things have been referred to it; and while we have not increased the number on the board, the number of their duties has been and is constantly increasing. The correspondence that comes to the railway board in little things, little complaints, which perhaps they do not deal with frequently, has become enormous. To their former work several things have been added —the express companies and other things. I want to say frankly that I propose in a few days to introduce a Bill which will increase the membership of the Railway Commission. I hope that the board thus increased will not only be able to catch up with its present work but to undertake new work. In that Bill I may say, without giving away any confidences, that we propose to place the telephones and telegraphs under the commission. But I want to go further and say to my hon. friend from South York (W. F. Maclean) that this matter, dealt with in the Bill now under discussion, has not been neglected. I suppose that no question has been so thoroughly dealt with by magazine writers in the United States as this question of reciprocal demurrage. These articles have convinced me that the writers themselves have not really come to any definite conclusion as to the best way to bring about the result aimed at. They all agree that the American railways are not performing the duties they should on behalf of the public. But how to get the railways to perform these duties in the most expeditious way did not seem any more clear to me after reading these articles than before. I have read a good many articles and have discussed the matter with a good many shippers, and some railway men, and with men like my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who is not only a shipper but a receiver to a large extent of goods coming over the line, and I have tried to get their ideas of the best way to work out a solution of the problem. They all agree that the railway companies owe something for the privilege we have given them. We have given them franchises and subsidies and other concessions; and while I do not agree that the Bill of my hon. friend is the best way of working out this problem, I admit that we must take the position that there are reciprocal responsibilities as between the railway companies and the public. How to get the railway companies to perform their responsibilities fairly and justly to themselves and the people of Canada is the problem. Is it by an inflexible statute, which says absolutely that the day a car is ordered, or a few hours after the day the car is ordered, that order becomes a contract under which the railway companies are bound, under penalties, to carry out certain things —is that the better way? Or would the better way be to use the Railway Commission, as it will be enlarged, to work out the problem, having due regard to what the conditions of the various parts of the country are, and then devise a method by means of which the railway companies will be compelled to give the people fair and proper transportation facilities?

The question has been raised that the present Act does not give the board that power. I am not going to argue that question. I have read all the sections of the Railway Act, and it struck me, as a layman, that they have pretty large powers at present; but after discussing the question further with some men of legal attainments, they pointed out that there did not seem to be a provision which would give the commission the power definitely to compel the railways to do certain things or subject them to a penalty. If that be true—and I have come to the conclusion that it is—I want to say frankly that I propose to place a clause in the Railway Act, by a Bill which will be introduced in a very few days, not only enlarging the commission and referring this question to the Railway Commission, but giving it the power it needs to deal thoroughly with this matter. That it strikes me from a practical standpoint, will bring about the best results. If we had somewhere a statute which had produced the results we are trying to obtain, in a country like Canada, with a similar population, extending over a very large territory, we might follow that statute. But up to the present the question of reciprocal demurrage from a practical standpoint, is only in the experimental stage. We have taken the wise course of naming a commission to work out these difficult problems. Having appointed that commission, having found it very useful, having seen the necessity of increasing its membership, and believing that the commission will bring about practical results, it would be foolish for us at present to depart from the line we have chosen. We ought rather to use our own machinery, strengthen it by legislation if necessary, and work along the lines we have chosen ourselves, and I believe the result will be better than if we placed on the statutes an inflexible law by which we would be rigidly bound.

I asure my hon. friend that this matter is not looked upon lightly. It is one of vast importance to the people and of great interest to the railway companies. We have given these companies large amounts of money and concessions and they cannot get away from their responsibility to give us in return the facilities we require for carrying our goods and which we expected to obtain when we gave these concessions. There is no difference of opinion as to the existence of grievances and the necessity of remedying them. I trust my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) will see that we are in earnest and that, while we may differ from him about the best solution, we are endeavouring honestly to bring about such a solution. If my hon friend is satisfied that the government is prepared to do that he might withdraw his motion—though I do not want at all to press that upon him.

However in the meantime I want to assure the House that the matter will be dealt with in the way I have suggested.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). There can be no doubt whatever as to the great importance of the question of transportation to any country, nor can there be any doubt that in a country, situated as Canada is, that question is perhaps of greater importance than it can be anywhere else. The reasons are obvious. We have an enormous country and a sparse population scattered all over. We have resources of almost infinite scope which require to be developed. Any one of us can, therefore, see in a moment that the problem of transportation, not only within Canada, but from Canada to foreign countries, is one of the greatest we have to consider. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) has said that railways, so long as they are in private ownership, must be regulated. There can be no two opinions about that. They must be regulated because corporations which undertake the duties of transportation undoubtedly take upon themselves great responsibilities. The hon. minister has referred to the large subsidies both in money and in lands which have been granted by the people of this country in aid of these corporations. That, no doubt, is a subject which it is proper to consider, but in my view, the responsibility of any one of these corporations to the people of this country would be just as great if it had not received a dollar of subsidy because any corporation undertaking to exercise a public franchise, such as that of a common carrier, takes that franchise not only for the purpose of making a reasonable profit on the capital invested, but primarily, I would say, to discharge a duty which, after all, is a national function and not a private function. So far as these matters are concerned, I do not think there can be any doubt as to what principles we should proceed upon. The only question that remains is as to the best way of working out the development of these transportation systems in the interest of the people, having due regard, of course, at all times to the invested capital, because it will be the worst possible service to this country to take any step that could be regarded as unjust to men who, under the laws of this country, have invested their capital in good faith for the purpose of affording means of transportation to the people of Canada.

Now, it has always seemed to me in dealing with the regulation of these companies, in bringing about a system which should necessitate the proper discharge of their duties to the public, we may, by legislation, lay down what may be called certain guiding principles. But so long as we are to persevere in the policy of regulation by railway commission, we must, to a very great extent, leave the details to be worked out by that commission. It is absolutely impossible that men assembled in this parliament should undertake to deal with these details which, by the terms of our Railway Act, have been, and still are, entrusted to the Railway Commission of Canada. Therefore I entirely concur in what the Minister of Railways and Canals has said in the line of what I have been advocating in this House for the last three years—that the Railway Commission must be reorganized, that its personnel must be increased, and, if any powers are lacking, those powers must be conferred by further legislation.

Now, the Railway Commission of Canada is undoubtedly the most important tribunal to the people of Canada to-day. I, for one, do not doubt that, even constituted as it is at present, and with the powers which it has at present. The Railway Commission of Canada has been overworked for years. I pointed this out to the government last session and the session before that, and, I believe, the session before that also. I understand that there are thousands of tariffs in the office of the Railway Commission which the members of that commission have not yet had time even to read. much less revise or deal with, and the first and most important duty of this government is to reorganize that commission, to increase the number of its members, and to so constitute it that it can overtake in the early future much of the work that has, of necessity, been neglected in the past. And, in that connection, I would say to the Minister of Railways and Canals and the members of this House that there is no matter of more urgent moment to the people of this country, that there is no matter that will redound more to the credit of the government if the duty is properly discharged, than to see to it that the men who are added to that commission should be men of the highest ability and character, men in whom the people of this country shall have the greatest confidence. The Railway Commission can do work which this paraliament cannot possibly do ; it can deal with matters which this parliament cannot possibly deal with in an adequate manner. But it can only do that work, it can only discharge those duties if its membership is of the character to which I have just now alluded. A friend of mine on this side of the House told me that not long ago he went to one of the states of the American union and was brought in close touch with the members of the Railway Commission of that state. He was astonished in the first place at the ability, experience and business capacity of these men, for they were the very ablest and most representative men that could be found in that state. But he was still more astonished at the earnestness and industry with which these men had devoted themselves, without compensation, or for merely nominal compensation, to the discharge of the duties devolving upon them. They had gone into the subject thoroughly, taking up the problems which our Railway Commission will have to consider, but which the time at their disposal has not yet enabled them to deal with, and they were dealing with the railway question in that state in a most thorough and able manner. This must be done in Canada, if the Railway Commission is to discharge the duties for which it has been established.

You must have a certain driving force behind that commission. Section 28 of the Railway Act has been referred to. This is a very important section, and one which, for the present time, does not seem to have been utilized to any great extent. It provides :

> The board may, of its own motion, or shall upon the request of the minister, inquire into, hear and determine any matter or thing which under this Act it may inquire into, hear and determine, upon application or complaint, and with respect thereto shall have the same powers as, upon any application or complaint, are vested in it by this Act.

So it is not necessary, even under the law as it stands at present, that the Railway Commission should wait for any complaints to be made to it. But if the commission does wait for complaints in respect of matters that should be remedied, it is open to the Minister of Railways and Canals to take up any grievance, and it then becomes the imperative duty of that commission to investigate and inquire into that matter and find the proper remedy. Section 28, as I have said, does not seem to have been very much utilized. The Railway Commission has been overworked in attending to matters, I presume, as to which there was complaint. The Minister of Railways and Canals, up to the present time at least, has not found it necessary, apparently to avail himself of the provisions of this section and to call, as he is entitled to call, upon the Railway Commission to deal with matters of public interest which concern the country as a whole.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) will agree with me when I say that I have brought quite a number of things to the attention of the Railway Commission within the last two or three months.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am very glad to hear it. Of course naturally I would not know very much of the work that the Minister has done ; indeed, in the remarks I made, I was referring more especially to former ministers, because I brought that section to the attention of the government and the then Minister of Railways on more than one occasion. The scope of the Railway Commission will, I think, probably be very much extended in the future, as we come to better understand the powers vested in the commission and the benefit that can be derived from the proper exercise of those powers. I should not be surprised to see in Canada a governmental inspection through the Railway Commission on every railway. Suppose a railway company is carrying on its passenger service in such a way as not to give reasonably good accommodation to the public. why should it be necessary that some individual should have to take it upon himself to bring his complaint before the Railway Commission. Under a system of inspection the Railway Commission will become advised of such matters of neglect and without complaint from any one, call upon the company concerned to remedy the matter. I have seen some things in the country in the past year which seemed to me to call for redress. What is every one's business in the end becomes no one's business, and for lack of some system of inspection and oversight, of the kind I have suggested, these evils continue from day to day and from year to year, creating in the minds of the people of the country more dissatisfaction than the railway companies have yet realized.

Further I believe that the powers and jurisdiction of the Railway Commission in other respects, have not perhaps been realized. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) made a very important contribution to this debate to-day ; he put the matter from his standpoint in a very forcible and convincing way. Among other things he referred to the difficulties which face any man who believes himself to be entitled to compensation from a railway company, particularly to the difficulty that one meets by reason of the waiver clauses in the bill of lading he is forced to sign, which leave him without redress unless it may be in cases of very extreme negligence. The Railway Commission of Canada in respect of matters of that kind have complete powers, because section 340 contains this provision :

> No contract, provision, by-law, regulation, declaration or notice made or given by the company, impairing, restricting or limiting its liability in respect of the carriage of any traffic, shall, except as hereinafter provided, relieve the company from such liability, unless such class of contract, condition, by-law, regulation, declaration or notice shall have been first authorized or approved by order or regulation of the board.

So far then as bills of lading are concerned, the Railway Commission to-day possesses complete jurisdiction to eliminate from them any such unreasonable provision as the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) has pointed out to the House.

The suggestion has also been made that the present Act does not provide for penalties; but section 427 of the Railway Act provides :

Any company, or any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person, acting for or employed by such company, that does, causes or permits to be done, any matter, act or thing contrary to the provisions of this or the Special Act, or to the orders or directions of the Governor in Council, or of the minister, or of the board, made under this Act, or omits to do any matter, act or thing, thereby required to be done on the part of any such company or person, shall, if no other penalty is provided in this or the Special Act for any such act or omission, be liable for each such offence to a penalty of not less than twenty dollars, and not more than five thousand dollars, in the discretion of the court before which the same is recoverable.

2. Such company, director, officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent or person shall also, in any case, in addition to any such penalty, be liable to any person injured by any such act or omission, for the full amount of damages sustained thereby.

This is a very comprehensive provision in the first place as to the penalty which the Crown may exact for breach of the Act, and secondly as to the redress to any person who may be injured in any respect by failure to observe the Act or regulations. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the Railway Commission as at present constituted and with the additions spoken of by the Minister of Railways and Canals affords very fair protection to the people of this country and can be made to afford an almost perfect protection provided the requirements of the Act are carried out, and the board is so constituted that it is able to discharge all the duties imposed upon it by that Act. I doubt if we could find a better method of regulating the railways of Canada than we would have if this is properly carried out. From time to time with increased experience no doubt the Act can be improved; and the result of such discussions as we have had today will undoubtedly be to make that Act more perfect than it is at present.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). I am heartily in sympathy with the principles enunciated in the Bill which is now under discussion. This is not a new question with us in the west; I remember in 1902, introducing a resolution in the legislative assembly there in which attention was called to the many difficulties in connection with transportation from which we are still suffering and speaking of it then as an old question, as indeed it was. There has been no amelioration in the condition since then, and for my own part I think very stringent measures must be taken in order to bring about some bettering of the conditions under which we are labouring in the west. A wealth of illustrations have been brought forward to show the difficulties under which the people in the west are suffering from the present lack of transportation facilities, so at this late hour I need not go into further details or give further illustrations. In regard to the shipment of grain from the Northwest there is a special provision by an Act of this parliament; the Manitoba Grain Act tacitly admits that there is no positive necessity upon the railway companies to supply all the cars required for the shipment of grain at the time they are required. That tacit admission, as I consider it to be, is one that should not be made, and I trust that if the proposals of the Minister of Railways are carried into effect, as I have no doubt they will be, the augmented board will immediately take into consideration the fact that it is incumbent upon the great transportation companies of this country to supply transportation as and when it is needed. I understand that an additional commissioner is to be appointed to the Railway Commission, and that further powers are to be given to that commission which will enable them to deal thoroughly and completely with such questions as this. I hope we shall not have to wait for another five years, as we have waited since that Railway Commission was appointed, until some definite and drastic action is taken to see that the legitimate needs of the shippers of this country are met.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. JOHN HERRON (Alberta). Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to go over the ground that has been so ably covered by the speakers who have preceded me in this debate, but I wish to state that I have received a great number of complaints in reference to this question from boards of trade, town councils, farmers and merchants throughout my riding. From my own observations and as a result of what I have heard I wish to say that I am in favour of the principle of the Bill. I will just mention one instance which has come under my observation to show the disadvantage at which shippers are placed by the failure of railway companies to provide cars when they are required. In one case within the last few years a number of cattlemen ordered cars for the shipment of cattle. They drove their cattle to the shipping point, 70 or 100 miles away from their homes, but the cars were not on the ground for them. They were put to a great deal of expense in holding the cattle there for a number of days waiting for the cars. A great snowstorm came up and they had to hold these cattle there for three weeks around the railway station herding them night and day at an expense probably of $1,000. In the handling of the cattle they probably lost 100 pounds weight, and as these cattle were sold according to the weight which they showed in Winnipeg it would therefore be a loss of about $3 per animal to the owner. I think that instances of that kind are very serious. These men have no redress under the present law from the railway companies. If railway companies can charge a man who orders cars demurrage, I do not see why shippers who are put to this enormous expense should not be entitled to some redress from the railway corporations. Another instance that might occur and often does occur is this: A farmer who happens to live 15 or 20 miles from a station wishes to ship hay, or grain, or any other kind of produce in a car. He orders his car for a certain day. Expecting to find the car on a siding he goes into the town only to find it is not there. He has to return home and perhaps make a second trip one or two days later and this perhaps goes on for a week. The car may arrive just after he has left the station, and he is, under the law, charged with demurrage on his car. These are instances that are occurring regularly in the outlying portions of the Northwest and for these reasons, not to mention others, I am in favour of the principle of the Bill and I will be prepared to support it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I am more convinced than ever that it is the duty of parliament to lay down the principles which must guide the Railway Commission in the application of the railway law to this country. I do not believe it is the duty of parliament to turn over to this Railway Commission the settlement of a question of this kind. I believe it is the duty of parliament to say that the commission are in some way empowered—and to say it distinctly in legislation—to impose penalties on a corporation that refuses to perform the service for which it was enfranchised. I think we will have to make additions to the railway law in parliament and not merely leave it to the commission to frame regulations. I believe that the whole tendency of the great body of legislation that is now being proposed all over the United States is in the direction of laying down the principles which must govern railway commissions in dealing with this question. Therefore, I cannot agree with the statements that have been made here to-night by some of the speakers that all of the protection necessary to the people is in the Railway Commission as at present constituted. The great fact is that the grievances are in existence to-day. The great fact is that hon. members here to-night have furnished the evidence to parliament that these grievances exist and the people to-day, I believe, expect of parliament that these grievances shall be removed by legislation and not by a reference to the commission. The people of Canada will never accept the doctrine that the functions of parliament must be turned over to a railway commission. The people of Canada do not believe that the great grievances that they may have are to be cured by reference to some other body. The cure of a fundamental grievance of the public, whatever it may be, is in the direct action of parliament in laying down great general principles. So, while I welcome this discussion and am rather pleased with the way in which the subject has been dealt with in the House I still maintain that the people look to parliament for the cure and that they do not look to the commission. I am quite willing that the debate should be adjourned. I will wait with interest to see what proposals the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), on behalf of the government, makes to this House in this connection. But, whatever they may be I wish to tell him, and I wish to tell the House that there is only one way that will meet the case and that is by parliament intervening and providing a direct remedy for grievances such as have been stated here to-night and such as are felt by the people of this country. The grievances are still with us. Their removal is not quite in sight and their remedy will not be effected until direct legislation dealing with them is passed by parliament. That seems to me to be the real expression of opinion as it has been made here to-night. Men have come here from all over this country, grievances exist all over, enormous sums of money are being lost, the public are being inconvenienced, great hardship is being suffered and a commission of three, or five or seven men will not quite effect the cure. The cure, I say, must be in legislation, and while I await with some interest what the Minister of Railways and Canals may propose to bring down, and while I am quite willing that the debate should be adjourned, what shall happen to my Bill and what other steps I shall take in regard to it must remain unsettled at the present moment. But, I am quite willing that the adjournment should take place, and I am quite willing that the minister shall have every opportunity to bring down his proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TURRIFF. With the consent of the House I would like to take up item 13 in the public Bills and orders for the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. J. D. REID. I think that my Bill should also be taken up. I am willing to refer it to the Railway Committee without any discussion. It is Bill (No. 90.) There would be no discussion upon that Bill, and with the consent of the House, I would ask that it be taken up.

Mr. FIELDING. The motion of the right hon. the Prime Minister was not to take public Bills and orders generally but to take the particular Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not think there is any objection to my Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman from East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has a Bill on the Order Paper which comes before my hon. friend's Bill, and if we are to take public Bills and orders generally he would have precedence.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. As a matter of fact what was promised last night was that public Bills and orders should be taken up.

Mr. FIELDING. So I understood.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When the Prime Minister made his motion he did not carry out what was obviously the understanding, but I did not object at the time because the subject proposed for discussion was a very important one and I supposed there had been some arrangement of which I was not aware.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I had no arrangement.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When my hon. friend from South York spoke last week he spoke not only on his own behalf but on behalf of others who desired to have a day fixed for public Bills and orders. The Minister of Finance said last night that this would be carried out, and I was a little surprised when the motion was made to-day. It will be necessary for us to have public Bills and orders on some other day because the understanding made with the House last week ought to be carried out.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think that the Prime Minister meant to depart from the understanding.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I presume not.

Mr. FIELDING. With the consent of the House there will be no objection to proceeding with public Bills and orders, and they can be taken up in their order.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The only understanding I had was what took place across the floor and my understanding was that public Bills and orders would be called.

Mr. FIELDING. The Prime Minister probably understood that but did not quite express it in his motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion of the hon. member for East Assiniboia ?

Mr. J. D. REID. We have passed that.

Mr. TURRIFF. No, my Bill is the first on the Order Paper.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentlemen who have the two first orders on the paper are not present and therefore the first order to be called is the Bill of the hon. member for East Assiniboia. I am quite indifferent as to the procedure.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The gentlemen who have the first two orders in their names were present this afternoon when they should have been called in the regular course on the understanding which was made.

Motion (Mr. Turriff) agreed to.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (East Assiniboia) moved second reading of Bill (No. 4) to amend the Railway Act. He said : The Bill I have the honour to move provides that a railway shall be commenced and at least 10 per cent of its mileage completed and in operation within two years after the date of the granting of the charter. If 10 per cent is not considered a proper amount I would be quite prepared to have that amended in the Railway Committee. The Bill also provides that in the third and fourth years an additional 10 per cent shall be completed and put in operation. I can quite understand that in the case of railways 500 or 1,000 miles long, 10 per cent may be too much to be completed within two years, and in the case of very short railways of say up to fifty miles possibly the requirement of 10 per cent may be too small. However, I wish to see this amendment to the law because at the present time and for years back we have been incorporating railway companies one after the other which pay little attention to the construction of the road. They come here year after year and get charters by the dozen, or get one charter covering a dozen different lines running into the hundreds and even the thousands of miles and they do very little towards building the roads they get charters for. The result is that we have them coming back year after year asking extension of time for building roads that were chartered ten or twenty years ago and on which nothing has been done. I believe that one result of this Bill if passed into law would be that we would have fewer charters applied for by persons who have no intention of constructing in the immediate future.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would it prevent charter mongering ?

Mr. TURRIFF. I do not know if it would prevent charter mongering altogether but it would have a tendency in that direction. The present law provides that a road must be commenced within two years and completed within five years, and the practice of my part of the country is that a road is commenced within two years by grading half a mile or a mile of track and then it stands for three years without anything being done. At the end of five years the company comes back to parliament and gets a renewal of the charter. If it were provided that they should complete ten per cent within two years and they failed to do so it would be necessary for them to apply for a renewal every two years and that would be a check on them. The present law works out in actual practice that a company gets a charter and does nothing towards the construction of its road, but it holds this charter as a club over every other interest, and the moment another company undertakes to get a charter and starts to build a road the first company starts to build a little piece to keep out the bona fide railway. The amendment I propose would have a tendency to prevent that. Settlers in my constituency have grounds for complaint in this matter. I have said before and I repeat it, that at the present time railway companies appear to be devoting a good deal more attention to building roads which may cut out competing roads, than to constructing railways in parts of the country which are in need of transportation, and which would benefit the settlers. In most cases we grant the larger amount of assistance required for the building of these railroads, and I think this parliament has the right, and it is its duty, to exercise a great deal more authority over the construction of roads in the future than it has done in the past. I think it is the duty of the government and of this House to see that railroads are built in those portions of the country where they are most needed, in order to give facilities to the settlers, instead of permitting the railroads to build lines paralleling existing lines and for no other purpose than to get the start of a competing railway that is already serving the district. In my part of the country there are several districts where settlers have to haul their wheat from twenty-five to fifty miles. It is absolutely impossible to grow wheat profitably under these circumstances; so that the settlers are simply marking time until they can get railway facilities to enable them to farm on a larger scale.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Might I ask my hon. friend what part of his riding is fifty miles from a railway ?

Mr. TURRIFF. On the Canadian Pacific Railway Sault line, running from North Portal to Moosejaw there are settlers who draw their wheat to Estevan.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not in the hon. gentleman's riding.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is just outside of the riding I represent; but in the riding for which I was nominated last fall, and which I propose to represent in the future, there are settlers who have to draw their wheat from forty to fifty miles. However, it makes no difference whether they are in the riding I represent or in that represented by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) the fact remains that they are very much in need of railway facilities. If the Canadian Northern or the Grand Trunk Pacific were in there, the Canadian Pacific Railway, I am quite certain, would find no difficulty in extending their road. At present they say they cannot do so, and they have made no provision, in their estimates of work for this year, for building any lines in that part of the country. In the southern portion of my district, although it is an old and thickly settled part of the country, and has been settled for the last twenty-five years, and there are a large number of farmers who farm from 500 to 1,200 acres, there is no railway, and these people have to haul their wheat sixteen miles. The Canadian Pacific Railway has a line built from Deloraine westward, called the Wascada branch, which they undertook a year ago to extend some twenty miles further, but complained that they could not get the teams necessary to do the grading. The settlers made an arrangement with the company to put on 200 teams, but after a good deal of correspondence between them and Mr. William Whyte, the second vice president of the company, the arrangement fell through. The company made the excuse that they could not get steel rails or ties, and this year Mr. Whyte writes to them that the company have not been able to put anything into their estimates for the completion of that road. It seems to me that that is very unfair, because I am certain that if any of the other companies had a charter and showed any intention of building a line in that part of the country, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would find themselves able to extend the line without delay, and would have no trouble in getting men and the necessary material. They have no difficulty at all in getting money for such purposes. I may say that it is a very level part of the country, and the building of the railroad would not be at all expensive. This extension has been promised time and again, and unless something is done to make the railway company live more up to their undertakings, I do not expect that we shall have much redress in the early future. That part of the Wascada branch was chartered in 1900 for 100 miles. In 1902, 37 miles was built, but since then nothing further has been done. What we want is an extension of 20 or 30 miles further. At one time the company proposed to build a line from North Portal that would serve the same purpose. Either of these extensions would be satisfactory to the people residing in that part of the country. There is another road in that part of the country known as the Lauder-Broomhill branch. That was authorized in 1900, and since that time there has been twenty miles built two or three years, but it is not in regular operation. In the fall a certain number of trains are run to take out the wheat; but I think that in that case also the company should either be compelled to go on building the road, completing a certain portion each year, or the charter should be forfeited, and other companies should have an opportunity of getting a charter and building a railroad in that part of the country. What is particularly wanted is a branch line extending westward from the town of Estevan, and another branch extending westward from Weyburn. If these two branches were built, they would afford some redress to the settlers in that part of the country and add considerably to the receipts of the railway. The country is losing a good deal because of the neglect to build these roads. A year ago, when there was a considerable blockade in that part of the country, from one town alone in the southern portion of my district there were 150,000 bushels of wheat drawn across the line and shipped through the United States. When that is done a great deal of money is expended across the line. So that not only do our Canadian railways lose the hauling of the grain, but our merchants lose a considerable amount of trade that should naturally belong to them. The time has come when more definite action must be taken, and I would ask the government to give me some assistance in having this amendment put through. If they do not give me any assistance, it will be difficult for me to get it through.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Or perhaps carry that constituency.

Mr. TURRIFF. Possibly. I was going to point out that when we have one railway company working against another, there is a possibility of getting something from the Railway Committee, but if you have the three great railway corporations working on the same side, it is a pretty difficult matter. This amendment, however, seems to me so fair and reasonable that there ought to be no difficulty felt by hon. members generally in giving it a fair support. Since I introduced the Bill I have had a number of letters, not only from the west, but also from the east, commending the course I have taken and pointing out numbers of cases down in the eastern country also where charters have been kept alive ten or twenty years and nothing done. It would be a move in the right direction if, whenever a company got a charter, it was compelled to build a certain portion of its line within two years.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Has my hon. friend's practice been in accord with his preaching? Has he always fought in the Railway Committee to prevent the renewal of these charters?

Mr. TURRIFF. My course in the committee has perhaps been less inconsistent than my hon. friend's, but on several occasions I have endeavoured to get something of this kind put in railway charters. The objection, however, was always taken —I do not remember if my hon. friend was one of those who raised it or not—that in doing this we would be discriminating against one particular railway. Therefore I have deemed it better to bring in a Bill that will apply to all charters.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Was not the hon. gentleman very ardent the other night in putting through the extension of a charter for a company whose first charter was granted away back in 1885?

Mr. TURRIFF. No, I was not very ardent in getting any of these Bills through, but I knew from past experience in the Railway Committee that there was no use trying to get any special legislation for one particular company, and that it was necessary, therefore, to bring in a Bill that would apply to all companies alike. And as my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) seems to be in sympathy with that legislation I hope he will give it his support when it goes down to the Railway Committee.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). I wish just to say a word in favour of the Bill brought in by the hon. gentleman from East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). No doubt the present situation is unsatisfactory. The Railway Act is supposed to provide for the commencement and completion of railways within a certain limit of time, but that provision has proved entirely ineffective. There can be no difference of opinion as to the harm done by having the country blanketed by charters which are not likely to result in the building of railways, and many of which were probably obtained purely and simply for the purpose of selling them and preventing other railway companies getting charters over the same country. That has resulted in some cases in preventing railway construction altogether in parts of the country where railways have been a pressing necessity for many years past. I quite agree with the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) regarding the absolute necessity for the extension of some of the lines to which he has called attention. and in addition to those he has specified, I would mention one or two of the branches of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The rumor has gained currency that the Grand Trunk Pacific have no intention of proceeding with their branch lines until they have completed their main line through to the coast. I trust this is not the case. The agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific was dated the 18th February, 1904, and they have had four full seasons to carry on their work. The only result they can claim for those four years is that they have been able to run a few freight trains over a small portion of their comparatively easy prairie section, and they have scarcely begun the more difficult portion of their western section. How long shall we have to wait before the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific is completed? Are these people in the Northwest, who have been relying on getting the branches promised by the Grand Trunk Pacific, to wait until the whole line is completed to the coast? That is a question to which we ought to have some answer. The Grand Trunk Pacific have blanketed a good portion of the prairie provinces and people have been going in and settling in remote districts in the expectation that these districts would soon be furnished with railway accommodation. Some assurance should be given these people that these lines will be built in the near future. There are two lines to which I would like to refer specially. One is the Regina to Brandon branch, which would serve a section of country that has been overlooked, and I think principally because of the very fact stated by my hon. friend just now, namely, that one company came in to build where another had a charter already. The consequence was that the second company jumped in about the same time and they ran parallel lines within two or three miles of each other for a great distance. Now it becomes necessary, in order to fill up one of the gaps, that the Grand Trunk Pacific should go through.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would not that line parallel the others?

Mr. LAKE. It would not parallel it at all closely, and it would serve large sections which at present are a very long distance from a railway. Then there is the branch from Yorktown to Regina. Mr. Morse and Mr. Hayes were both in communication with the people in one of the districts through which that railway was expected to run. They obtained statistics from the people which showed that practically 2,000,000 bushels of wheat would be marketed within ten miles, either side of the survey which would be tributary to this new line. They sent delegates to Montreal to interview Mr. Morse and Mr. Hays, and were assured that the branch would be built in time to take out the crop of 1908. Some of the farmers living along the line have actually promised free grant of the right of way on condition that the line should be completed during the course of the present year. There seems to be absolutely no prospect of that at the present moment. I most earnestly trust that some steps will be taken which will compel these companies, when they have charters, and in some cases, have actually blanketed the country with charters, to go on and build these railways and not simply hold the charters as a means of keeping out other people who would build. I am heartily in favour of the principles of the Bill, though I think some of the details may be improved in committee.

Mr. LAKE.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would like to point out, if I may be permitted, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lake) proves absolutely what I said a few moments ago. While we insist that railways ought to be better equipped instead of building new lines, yet when it comes to our own territory, it is the new lines we want.

Mr. LAKE. We could have done without one of the parallel lines to which I have referred.

Mr. GRAHAM. We will not go over that, but it brings out the point we had a few moments ago that we look at our own surroundings rather differently from the way in which we look at the surroundings of other people. I have no objection to the Bill going to the Railway Committee to be threshed out there. This question has been before this House for some time, I suppose, as it has been before the provincial legislature—how far should we go in allowing companies to get charters for building lines of railway and hang on to them without doing anything in the way of building? It is a question of a good deal of interest, and whether this Bill would assist in settling the question I am not prepared to say at this time. It may mean that, instead of coming back every five years, the railway people will come back every two years for the renewal.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). I am prepared to say something definite on this subject if the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is not. The member who introduced the Bill fails to put his finger on the sore spot, and of course, he fails to meet the difficulty. The difficulty cannot be met by changing section 150 and substituting a ten per cent clause. The amendment we require is an amendment of the policy of the government. So long as we follow the practice of allowing gentlemen to come in from time to time. as often as they like, for renewal of charters, and grant them these renewals without any reason—certainly without any substantial reason—being given, we shall not cure the difficulty by simply putting on them the duty of constructing ten per cent within two years instead of keeping the old provisions that they shall begin the road within two years and complete within five. One is just as ineffectual as the other. What we really want is for the Minister of Railways and Canals to decide the principles upon which charters shall be renewed from time to time, to lay down a definite policy that will be, in the main, observed. Leave the Act as it is, and do not tinker with it if you are not going to improve it. It is now provided that construction shall begin within two years and be completed within five. How do you advance by simply making it obligatory to build ten or fifteen or even fifty per cent? But, if the government would lay down a definite policy, we should know when we go into the Railway Committee what to expect, to see maintained and acted upon. If we on this side were a majority, we would lay down a policy. But we are not the majority, unfortunately for the country, and cannot lay down a policy effectively. Let the hon. minister formulate a policy and live up to it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria and Haliburton). Railway charters are obtained for a number of purposes. Some are obtained honestly with the intention, on the part of those who obtain them, of actually building the line. Others, as my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) who introduced this motion knows, and has had practical experience, I think, in connection with them, are gotten to sell. Others are gotten to prevent companies already in existence, and that would build from coming in; and others to prevent the sale of the bonds of the company that proposes to build. If his Bill would stop the last three, the hon. gentleman would deserve great credit. But suppose this Bill is passed; a railway company fails to build; its representatives will walk up to the Railway Committee and my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) if it suits his locality, will be the first to shout 'carried,' as he has done before. This is an absolutely useless piece of legislation. I remember a case of a charter being obtained with the honest intention of putting the railway through. A little village that happened to be the terminal of the road raised a row, and was as enthusiastic as my hon. friend is in demanding that the road be built. The assessed value of the entire village would not build half a mile of the road, and the road was about one hundred miles long. Now, it takes money to build a railroad. There are many places where roads are desired, but where settlement does not warrant their construction at present, and, until it does, it is not very likely that people will risk their money in building a road that looks as if it will not pay. One or two of the lines referred to by my hon. friend would pay, and I have no doubt that, as soon as it is possible for the railways to get to work on them, these branches will be built. Along by Oxbow, I remember, a few years ago, a plan was arranged whereby the people could ship by the Sault line, and the grain go forward in bond. That had the tendency to spur up the railways in that locality. I have not followed the matter and cannot say at the moment how it came out. But, as I have said, if this Bill were to pass in its entirety and if, in two years, the railway fellows came back asking for an extension of time, my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) would be one of the first to shout 'carried.'

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.—COAST VOYAGES.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Lunenburg) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 12) to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. A. K MACLEAN moved:

That Bill (No. 12) be not referred to the Committee of the Whole, but be referred to a Select Committee composed of the following members:—Messrs. Daniel, Finlayson, Hughes (P.E.I.), Lewis, Pickup, Stanfield and Sinclair.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT—ENGINEERS.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 17), to amend the Canada Shipping Act. He said: This Bill has been before the House for a considerable length of time. I first introduced a Bill similar to it in 1903. It was not then pressed; it was printed and widely circulated for the purpose of obtaining the views of the various mariners in regard to it. I again introduced it in 1904, but it did not pass that year although it was pressed. I again introduced it in 1905 and pursuant to the suggestion of the minister in 1904 it was referred to a special committee who took a large amount of evidence from the various officers of the department, representatives of the Dominion Marine Engineers' Association, and representatives of the various steamboat companies. After taking that evidence the committee did not report and the Bill did not come before the House again. In 1906 it was again introduced and again referred, at the request of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to a special committee who took further evidence but again the committee did not report. The Bill has since been modified in form and substance. As a result of the evidence taken before the two special committees the officers of the Dominion Marine Engineers' Association interviewed the officers of the Marine Department, and as I believed, and as they reported to me, they reached a compromise arrangement with the officers of the department whereby the Bill in its present form was to be accepted by the department. I introduced it in exactly this form last year on that assumption, but I was amazed to find after it had been introduced that some misunderstanding had arisen and that the officers of the department were not prepared to report to the minister what the officers of the Dominion Marine Association had reported to me they had agreed upon. It had reached the stage when it was about to be considered when the Minister of Marine departed for England and consequently it was not passed that session. I again come before the House with the Bill in its present form, asking that it be passed. It is simple in its verbiage, although it is somewhat far-reaching in its effect, having regard to the law as it at present stands. It involves in the first instance the question of whether or not the certification of marine engineers is good in principle or not. Originally this principle was adopted as being a good principle so long ago as 1868. The preamble of 31 Victoria, chapter 65, reads :

For the greater security of life and property on board steamboats navigating the waters of the Dominion of Canada or owned or registered in the Dominion of Canada and departing from or arriving at any port or place in the Dominion of Canada——

Laying down that which is afterwards enacted as being for the greater security of life and property.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Did that refer to passenger boats?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. To passenger boats and all kinds of steam vessels.

Section 27 of that Act reads :

It shall not be lawful for any person to employ another as engineer or for any person to serve as engineer on any steamboat unless the person serving or employed as engineer is licensed by the said board.

The practical effect of that Act was that none but certificated engineers could lawfully be engaged upon Canadian vessels. That remained the law for fourteen years, from 1868 to 1882, when another Act was introduced, 45 Victoria, chapter 35, and again the preamble of that Act says :

For the greater security of life and property on board steamboats navigating the waters of the Dominion of Canada or owned or registered in the Dominion of Canada and departing from or arriving at any port or place in the Dominion of Canada——

While the preamble of the Act is the same, it created a great number of exceptions. It changed and altered the law by enacting that the following exceptions to the Act of fourteen years previously should prevail, that a certified engineer was not necessary :

1. On steam yachts used exclusively for pleasure.
2. On tug boats.
3. On freight boats under 150 tons gross.
4. On boats used for fishing or the carrying of fish under 150 tons gross.
5. On steam dredges.
6. On elevators or vessels of like kind.

These exceptions are contained in section 477 of the Act. The effect of that is that only passenger boats and freight boats of over 150 tons gross must carry licensed engineers.

My first contention is that there is no reason for that, that if the preamble of the Act of 1865 and of this Act of 1882, is correct, and it is the principle that the enactment is for the greater security of life and property, then there is no justification for these exceptions. I took the trouble after seeing this large list of exceptions to look up 'Hansard' to find if reasons were given for this departure from the policy that had existed for fourteen years. Would you believe it, Sir, there is not one word of explanation from the minister of that day explaining that this Bill which he then introduced made this alteration in the policy which had prevailed for fourteen years or that it had the effect of making the exemptions which I have enumerated. There may be some reason for it. It does not appear on 'Hansard' at all events.

Now, this remained the law until 1898 when a new steamboat inspection Act was passed practically creating the same exceptions. And again, in 1903, we legislated, by 3 Edward VII, chap. 66 in respect to this matter when the parliament of Canada again created practically the same exceptions. But hon. gentlemen will find, if they look at that Act, 3 Edward VII chap. 66, that the legislation is practically the same although it extends the department's jurisdiction so as to cover naphtha and gasolene launches. The effect, however, in so far as it appertains to steamboats is to exempt, first, pleasure yachts without hire or remuneration (2) all tugs (3) freight boats under 150 tons gross (4) steam dredges, and (5) floating elevators or vessels of a like kind. Then, in the revision of the statutes, by chap. 113, which is the Canada Shipping Act, the Steamboat Inspection Act and several other Acts are embodied in the Canada Shipping Act. Section 556 of that Act is the clause, I think, which deals with this question. It is somewhat anomalous and ambiguous in its terms but I believe that the department have construed that it has made no difference in the law. At first sight it appeared to me that it had changed the exemption in reference to tug boats and that it only exempted tugs under 150 tons gross. But, I believe that the department have construed the Act, on the advice of the Department of Justice, the department holding that it has made no alteration in the law. The revised statutes therefore leaves the law practically as it was and the exemptions under it are : Steam yachts used exclusively for pleasure or private use without hire or remuneration (2) all tug boats, (3) freight boats under 150 tons gross (4) steamboats used exclusively for fishing purposes and under 150 tons gross (5) steam dredges (6) floating elevators or vessels of a like kind. Is it right that that should be so? If we have regard to the original principle involved —that is the greater security to life and property—why should these exemptions exist ? I have yet to hear the reasons for it. There certainly were no reasons given in 1882 and I again ask if it is for greater security of life and property what reasons can be given for these exemptions ? It is perhaps right—at least I am so informed by the Marine Engineers' Association and the officers of the department—that some exemptions should exist and as a result of my inquiries and as a result of the meeting by the Marine Engineers' Association and the officers of the department it was determined to put into this Bill that exemptions should be made of all boats of 10 nominal horse-power if a single steam cylinder, or 18 horse-power if double cylinder.

Mr. W. K. MACLEAN. Why do you take the horse-power instead of the tonnage ?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am not particular provided you can get the tonnage to fit in. I believe that can be done. I believe that the officers of the department are making inquiries and endeavouring to arrive at a fair basis upon which these exemptions can be made, but the people on whose behalf I have introduced this legislation seem to think that this is the fairest and the most equitable way of providing for these exemptions. I am not wedded to it and if any practical way in which the steam tonnage can be specified is agreed upon I have no objection.

Mr. GERVAIS. What about floating elevators ? Is there any good reason why they should be subject to employ licensed engineers ?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am coming to them. That will also exclude pleasure yachts of ten nominal horse-power—of a single cylinder or eighteen if a double cylinder. But even then, if you are going to protect life and property, why should pleasure yachts of a large size go into crowded waters where large freighters and passenger boats are lying without properly certified engineers being employed on them? If an explosion took place would not that be as likely to injure the property of others as well as the people who are on board? I can see no good reason then for this exemption which has been handed down from year to year by the various statutes which have been enacted. Then as to tugs, that has been the most important grievance of the marine engineers. During the years since the alteration of the law tugs have grown into very large steam vessels as everybody who has anything to do with the upper lakes knows. These tugs have increased enormously in size and a good many of them are as large as the freight carriers on the lakes. They are all exempt of every size and character. Can any one conceive of any reason why they should be? I must confess that I have never been able to do so. They are in constant use for the purpose of towing larger vessels in the crowded harbours, they are used for towing barges, for dredges, for floating elevators, and if an explosion took place upon any one of these tugs on any of our waters the loss would be tremendous not alone to the tug but to those boats, elevators or barges, which might be floating at their side. Therefore, I say I cannot understand why this exemption should exist. And again on these barges, dredges and elevators about which these tugs are working there are very frequently employed thirty, forty or fifty men. Both in the interest of life and property it seems to me that if you require the certification of engineers at all it should apply to tugs.

Then, let us look for a moment at the absolute incongruity of the law in so far as tugs and freight boats are concerned. A freight boat is exempt only if it is under 150 tons gross. Will any one tell me why a tug boat which is over 150 tons gross should not come within the law when a freight boat does? I made the statement a moment ago that tugs had greatly increased in number on the upper lakes, and in fact I include all of our inland waters from Montreal to Fort William. The tugs on the lakes during the last ten or twenty years have greatly increased both in size and number. I find on looking at the figures for the year 1903—the last year for which I have a return—that in the inspectorate of Mr. Dodds, who has to inspect the boilers and machinery of all vessels, he inspected 138 passenger boats, freighters, tugs, barges and dredges. Of that number there were 80 vessels of various kinds and 58 tugs, among others the 'Winslow,' 353 tons gross; the 'Balize,' 250 tons gross; the 'Boscobel,' 617 tons gross, and 'Saginaw,' 357 tons gross. Will anyone tell me why these tugs should be exempt? If they were freighters, and some of them are larger than freighters, they would not be exempt. In McKeen's inspection there were 146 of all kinds of boats except tugs, and 126 tugs, amongst them such as the

'Magnolia'	367
'Metamora'	239
'Reginald'	187
'Harrison'	150
'Onaping'	256
'Traveller'	438
'Charlton'	389
'Keoughe'	225
'Wenonah'	161

In the Montreal division inspected by Laurie there were 73 vessels of every other kind and 60 tugs, such as:

	Gross tons.
'Hamilton'	320
'J. L. Murphy'	173
'Mansfield'	169
'Bronson'	285
'C. B. Powell'	272
'Fraser'	320

'Albert'	269

I have yet to learn why these tugs should be exempt while freight boats of a smaller size are not exempt. I also have yet to learn a reason with any logic in it why freight boats under 150 tons gross should be exempt if the principle of security of life and property is to be invoked at all. And as to steamboats under 150 tons gross, used exclusively for fishing purposes, why should they be exempt? Carrying fish is the same as carrying any other freight and why should fishing steamboats be exempt? I do see a possible reason why a tug used for taking up nets and only for that purpose might not be required to carry a certificated engineer, but I am informed that practically no tugs are employed for that purpose of more than 10 horse-power with a single cylinder or 18 horse-power with a double cylinder. My hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Gervais) spoke of floating elevators, dredges and vessels of a like kind. These elevators and dredges are in the harbour and if they are in the harbour of Montreal they are in a very congested harbour and their boilers are liable to explode unless the engineers are competent men.

Mr. GERVAIS. None have yet exploded.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. That may be, but if you apply the principle of the greatest security to life and property you invoke a certificated engineer whether it is on a floating dredge or an elevator or a tug or anything else. If the principle is right, why not apply it to the fullest extent; it works no hardship and it is thoroughly in line with the idea of protection to life and property.

Mr. GERVAIS. I would commend to the hon. gentleman the maxim 'de minimis non curat lex.'

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I did not catch what my hon. friend said.

Mr. GERVAIS. I quoted in Latin the legal maxim, that the law does not concern itself with very small matters.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I do not know how far the province of Quebec has gone, but in the province of Ontario they have gone so far as to require a certificate from stationary engineers and there is no exemption.

Mr. GERVAIS. It is the same in the province of Quebec.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. If you apply it to stationary engineers why not apply it to floating elevators if you want to protect life and property? It seems to me to be more urgent that you should require a certificate from an engineer engaged in a boat upon the sea or upon the inland lakes than from a stationary engineer. Now, in the United States they have been very particular to protect their own. We saw that the other day when the question of masters and mates was discussed, and we see it with still more force in the case of marine engineers. Under the Canada Shipping Act at present, engineers from the United States can and do come over here and work on our numerous tugs, barges and floating elevators, and freight boats under 150 tons gross, to the exclusion of our own men and we make it very easy for them to get a certificate because they leave their families in the United States and work during the summer months here and being domiciled in that way in Canada for three years they can get a certificate. I do not think that is right. If we look at the American statutes we find they do something for the protection of their own. Section 4131 of the Federal statutes of the United States reads :

> And all the officers of vessels of the United States who shall have charge of a watch, including pilots, shall in all cases be citizens of the United States. The word officer shall include the chief engineer and each assistant engineer in charge of a watch on vessels propelled wholly or in part by steam, and after the 1st of January, 1897, no person shall be qualified to hold a license as of commander or watch officer of a merchant vessel of the United States who is not a native born citizen, or whose naturalization as a citizen shall not have been fully completed.

That was amended to read : That the last clause of section 4131 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read :

> All the officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States, except that in cases where on a foreign voyage or voyage from an Atlantic to a Pacific port of the United States any such officer of any vessel is for any reason deprived of the services of an officer below the grade of master.

So that by the statute of the United States practically no man can work on an American vessel unless he is an American citizen. I say to the department, to this government, and to this parliament, that while there may have been in the earlier days of Canada some reason for not putting in force a similar national law in this country, Canada is to-day past that stage, and is large enough to protect itself; and if the United States thought it wise to protect their mariners in that way, it is time for us to wake up and extend the same protection to Canadian citizens. The evidence which was given by the officers of the Marine Association is part of the record of that committee, and I might be permitted to read a few lines to show what these men feel in this regard.

Mr. BRODEUR. Before my hon. friend leaves that part of the subject, will he be kind enough to tell us whether the laws of the United States require tug boats to have certificated engineers?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I have not data in regard to that, but my information is that they do.

Mr. BRODEUR. Without any regard to the tonnage of the vessel?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I am unable to give my hon. friend the information; but they practically require a certificate for everything. Mr. Kronk in his evidence says:

Surely owners of steamboats will not place dollars and cents before life. The unqualified incompetent engineer is the most expensive to him in the end. We have wise laws and regulations to safeguard the travelling public; why not grant the same protection to the labouring man? Is his life worth any more to his family in holiday attire than in his blue jeans? For on some of these wrecking tugs as many as thirty men are sometimes employed, and from four to twelve on tugs and barges; that is, barges, I mean to say, under 150 tons gross tonnage. These may run without licensed engineers, but must have a licensed captain. Are the captain's duties of any more importance to the owner, or the lives of the crew any more dependent upon the captain than the engineer? You need more than a mere machine to answer bells. We believe a qualified and competent engineer to be a valuable asset to any steamboat owner, and that the man who has not proven his ability and shown proof of his experience has no right to be entrusted with the care and management of boilers and intricate machinery, much less the lives of human beings. We know that engineers on the railroads serve a certain length of time preparing themselves thoroughly and pass an examination before they can have charge of an engine, whether freight or passenger. Surely it is just as important that the steamboat engineer should serve time and prove his fitness by an examination before an inspector? There is also another phase of the question that seems to have escaped the eye of a patriotic Canadian steamboat owner, namely, that even on some of our largest tugs alien engineers are pulling the throttle, while no man who is not a citizen by birth or naturalization can run the smallest craft propelled by steam in the United States.

Then, Mr. Milne spoke as follows:

Americans can come to Canada and take charge of our boats and run them without their certificates, without any question at all, not even being required to take the oath of allegiance in any shape, whereas engineers of the present day are all sworn—you are all aware of that—and held responsible, while these men come in and run without a temporary certificate even. They come here and have their families living across the stream, run for a certain length of time on our tugs and ask for an examination, and Mr. Adams cannot refuse it. That section that I have referred to reads as follows:—

But such applicant, if not a British subject, shall only be entitled to a certificate, if in addition to the qualification required by this Act, he has been domiciled in Canada for at least three years, and foreigners serving as engineers in ships registered in Canada shall be deemed to be domiciled in Canada while so serving.

I cite these short paragraphs to show how the men themselves feel on this matter. One word as to the nature of the Dominion Marine Engineers' Association. It has been said that that association is in the nature of a union, and that it has formed an alliance with the Dominion Trades and Labour Council. That is not so. It is altogether a separate and distinct association. These men are banded together for their own interests. They meet either once a week or once every two weeks. They are an educated body. They have councils situated in different parts of the country where they educate young men in marine engineering. That is the first idea of their association. Then, they are banded together for obtaining legislation in their own interest and for their mutual good generally, and it seems to me that they ought to be encouraged and protected. The effect of this Bill is to bring the law back to what it was in 1865 and for fourteen years afterwards which there was no reason given for changing. It is for the greatest security of life and property that certificated engineers should be employed, and I hope the principle of this Bill will be given effect to. I realize now that it will necessitate a change in the penalty clause of the Act, and we will amend it in that respect when it reaches the committee. The two clauses of the Bill are simply to put the law back to where it was, to remove these exemptions, and to require Canadian vessels to carry certificated engineers. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. GERVAIS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let the Bill be read a second time now, and the hon. gentleman can discuss it in committee.

Mr. GERVAIS. The discussion cannot take place to-night. it is too late as I would like to give at some length the reasons why I object to the theory of this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gervais) objects to the principle of the Bill?

Mr. GERVAIS. I do. There are strong objections to the passage of this Bill. Some of my constituents, like the Montreal Grain Elevating Company, have strong objections against this Bill.

AVERAGE PRICE OF SCHOOL, TIMBER AND COAL LANDS.

Mr. LAKE asked :

What was the average price per acre obtained by the government from January 1, 1906, to December 31, 1907, for (a) school lands, (b) timber berths, (c) coal lands in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, respectively?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior):

(a) Manitoba, $11.37; Saskatchewan, $20.96; Alberta, $11.41.

(c) Manitoba, $7; Saskatchewan, $7; Alberta, $7, for coal rights only.

RECEIPTS FROM LANDS, MINES, MINERALS AND TIMBER.

Mr. LAKE asked:

How much money and scrip has the government received on account of the lands, mines, minerals and timber, in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, during the following periods: from July 1, 1896, to June 30, 1905, and from July 1, 1905, to December 31, 1907?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, in regard to this question I would ask the hon. member (Mr. Lake) to amend it, if it is possible, so as not to require a separate return for the several provinces, and I would also ask him to change the question to a notice of motion for a return.

Mr. LAKE. If the minister could give that information approximately it would suit my purpose, but I would like, if possible, to have a separate account for the different provinces.

Mr. OLIVER. It is quite possible, but it involves a very much larger amount of work to make the separation than it does to make the return without the separation. If the hon. gentleman insists, of course we can make the separation, but it will take a very much longer time—I think, out of proportion probably to the purpose it will serve. But, in any event, I will have to ask that the question stand as a notice of motion for a return.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands as a notice of motion for a return.

AREA OF DOMINION LANDS DISPOSED OF.

Mr. LAKE asked:

What is approximately the total area of Dominion lands disposed of by the government in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan between July 1, 1896, and June 30, 1905, distinguishing between lands for agricultural purposes, grazing, irrigation, timber and coal; and also from July 1, 1905, to December 31, 1907?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I would ask that this stand as a notice of motion for a return.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). This motion, Mr. Speaker, calls for a very full return. I have no objection to it on that score but I would like to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. D. Ross) that there will be very great difficulty in making up a return by provinces that will be thoroughly correct. I propose to let the motion go but there will be difficulty in making a precise statement as to the receipts of the different provinces. For example, the motion calls for the revenue contributed by the province of British Columbia. I suppose that all that a return would show would be the revenue collected at the different customs ports in British Columbia. That probably would not be a fair statement of the revenue collected. However, if it is understood that the motion shall be passed subject to the difficulties of complying with it I have no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. And to the precedent.

Mr. FIELDING. Well, it is a troublesome one.

Motion agreed to.

MONTREAL TURNPIKE TRUST.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved :

That it is the duty of the government to enter into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec, with a view to removing all obstacles to the abolition of toll gates upon the roads of the island of Montreal?

He said : Mr. Speaker, I am ready to proceed with the two motions standing in my name, of which this is one, and I have but a few remarks to offer in support of both of them. The first enunciates, Mr. Speaker, the duty of the government to enter into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec with the view of removing all obstacles to the abolition of toll-gates on the island of Montreal. I have already, Mr. Speaker, on several occasions, since I have been a member of this House, representing the county of Jacques Cartier, referred to the intolerable nuisance which results from the maintenance upon the island of Montreal, of the obsolete system of toll-gates and I have been encouraged to persist in my endeavours because my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if I mistake not, when he was in opposition, in the hour of promises and pledges, held out to the people of my county, that, with the assistance of the then leader of the opposition in the province of Quebec, the late Hon. Mr. Mercier if he were returned to power and still more, if my right hon. friend were returned to power, the old Tory institution of toll-gates and toll-bars would be swept away in a very short time. I had always expected that the right hon. gentleman would make it a point to redeem that promise when he came into power and when he possessed, as he does, the key to the situation, being the largest creditor of the corporation, holding all the bonds of that corporation and having it in his power to cancel them as they should undoubtedly be cancelled in order to facilitate the removal of that institution. But the right hon. gentleman in this, as in some other instances, since he has attained power, seems to have forgotten, in the enjoyment of the fruits of office, the pledges he made to electors before he resumed the reins of office. As my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) says, toll-gates still exist not only on the island of Montreal but on other islands and even on the mainland in many places. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) was one of those also who, in those days, promised the abolition of toll-gates and declaimed against their abuses. But the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) was revolutionary. He wished to physically remove them—not to await the ordinary action of the administration but to have them swept away immediately.' Nothing has been done and I am now obliged to have recourse to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who is very cold, I notice, in regard to the claims we are making surrounding this long standing abuse. In two words, Mr. Speaker, because I do not wish to detain the House, the result of the present system is that the roads are badly kept. The turnpike trustees have not sufficient resources to meet the increasing demands, and the wear and tear upon those old highways is so much greater than it was when this system was instituted, I think, nearly seventy years ago. They have not the resources, the roads are badly kept, farmers suffer and all those who drive out upon the highways around Montreal that are under the control of trustees suffer likewise. It prevents the repair and the opening of new roads because the turnpike trust have control of the highways. They are interested in preventing the multiplication of roads. Everytime additional roads or cross roads are opened they are obliged to place new toll-gates, or, in some instances, what they call check-gates. This means an increase in expense without any increase of revenue, and the result is opposition and delay with regard to the opening of new roads in the territory immediately surrounding the populous city of Montreal where we ought to be opening new roads and avenues and dividing up lots continually. The farmers suffer from this. If the surrounding municipalities desire annexation one of the difficulties in the way is the existence of these toll-gates and the obligation is imposed upon the municipalities that desire annexation of making arrangements previously with the turnpike road commissioners.

The nature of the corporation is in itself objectionable, because it is non-representative ; the majority of the trustees are named by the Dominion government, who are the holders of the bonds, the minority is named by the provincial government, the corporation itself is organized by the local government and regulated by provincial statute, its meetings are not public, it publishes no reports, it does not call for tenders for work to be done on the roads ; the whole system is obsolete, having been created long before the existence of our present municipal code in Quebec. Everybody nowadays knows that the toll-gate system has been almost universally abolished, and in that respect we have been set a very good example by the province of Ontario, both as to the improvement of their roads and the abolition of the toll-gate system. The difficulty is just this—my right hon. friend is in power here and his friends are in power in Quebec, and when we go to the Quebec government for relief we are told to see the great chief at Ottawa who holds the key of the situation. And when we apply to the Dominion government they seem bashful about taking action. We know that the provinces, as a rule, are not slow to apply for assistance to the federal government, but this case appears to be an exception. I have moved in this parliament on several occasions in regard to the matter, and when I tell the Dominion government that these bonds are worthless, and that there is no possibility of recovering upon them, that the tolls do not afford sufficient revenue to pay the expense of keeping the roads in order, that interest on the bonds has not been paid for more than ten years and that there is no prospect of its ever being paid, my right hon. friend and his colleagues tell us that they cannot interfere. They tell us that the Turnpike Trust is a municipal corporation under the control of the provincial government, and that the action must begin with the provincial government. Hence we are sent from Caiaphas to Pilate and with the usual result, that when we come to Pilate, in the person of the Finance Minister, he washes his hands of the whole thing. Surely the city of Montreal and the island of Montreal has furnished enough money since confederation to the Dominion exchequer for railways and other public works all over the country ; surely, in view of the fact that we are the large furnishers of the Dominion treasury, we are entitled to some consideration. Under these circumstances, on behalf of the farmers who suffer and to whom the system has become obnoxious, and who know that it would only require a little joint effort by both governments to remove the difficulty, I have moved that the Dominion government itself, the Department of Agriculture, my right hon. friend, on account of the pledges he gave, should enter into communication with the local government. If Caiaphas will not confer with Pilate, Pilate must confer with Caiaphas, and I think the approach should be made by the Dominion government. I have therefore moved that the Dominion government, the bondholder who controls this Turnpike Trust and names the majority of its members, should either itself or through the majority of that board enter into communication without delay with the local government. There is this advantage, and perhaps it is the only advantage, that the local government is a friendly government to this government, so that part of the difficulty is removed in the way of doing something useful for the farmers and those who live in the municipalities immediately surrounding Montreal. No doubt the Dominion government will want to know what is the financial condition of the corporation, and whether there is any possibility of receiving interest on the bonds. And in that respect the government should name a commissioner to take these matters into consideration. The late Mr. Préfontaine took a warm interest in that question ; he was a minister of the Crown and member for Maisonneuve, and he was most fully aware of the nature of our grievance. I had correspondence with him on the subject. I have a letter from him in which he expressed his willingness to name a commissioner, but he held that such commissioner should also inquire into the toll-gate system around the city of Quebec. Strange to say, there are toll-gates also around that ancient city, and Mr. Préfontaine wished to join both issues in the same inquiry. I held that both inquiries should be distinct, as I did not see what the toll-gate system in Quebec had to do with the toll-gate system in Montreal, and while the correspondence was pending Mr. Préfontaine left for Europe and never returned alive. Mr. Préfontaine was aware of the necessity for inquiry, and I can send his letter to the Minister of Finance if he desires. The Dominion government has power, under chapter 104, to inquire into any matter of public interest, and surely this is a matter of public interest. My right hon. friend thought it was of great public interest when he was in opposition, and when he declared that toll-gates should be abolished by any Liberal government that had the power to do so. I urge again that the Minister of Finance should appoint a commissioner, so that when the time comes to decide the question he will have the report of the commissioner on the financial condition of the Turnpike Trust showing that these bonds are worthless, thus enabling him to say that the people in the district affected should be allowed to adopt the modern system of administering roads, and that the vicinity of a large and populous city like Montreal should not be plagued with these toll-gates.

My hon. friend need not go far to find such a commissioner. There is Mr. Kent, a friend of this administration, who is a competent man in every way, who knows as much about the system of roads in the vicinity of Montreal as I know myself. There is Mr. Alexander Desmarteau, also a friend of the administration, who has travelled on these roads time and again, who is a skilled accountant and fully competent to make that inquiry. We have an interest of over $250,000 in these roads, and surely it would be proper for this government to pay $300 or $400 or $500 in order to ascertain exactly how it is that for ten years we have not received any interest on our bonds and that there is a continual complaint as to the grievances that exists. The president of the Turnpike Trust, Mr. Trenholme, is a man in whose judgment in regard to the remedy to be applied I would place implicit reliance, but I presume that, being himself a member of the trust, he might not be considered competent to act. I have given the government the names of three gentlemen who are friends of this administration and who would be able to conduct the inquiry. Under any circumstances, is it not the duty of the government to ascertain why these bonds are not being honoured? Under the previous regime the interest was paid regularly. Is it not the bounden duty of the government to have the matter looked into, not by sending an employee of the department to look over the books during a few hours, but thoroughly, with the necessary powers to summon witnesses, to hear the grievances, and to decide what remedy might be applied.

It seems to me that the government should assent to the adoption of both of these motions. The first one merely puts on the government the duty of opening negotiations; the second simply asks the government to seek information by a commissioner. Both of these motions are reasonable, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is pledged to their acceptance and to remedy the grievance which I have brought to your notice.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend opened his remarks by stating that on a certain occasion I had declared to the electors of the county which he has now the honour to represent, that if at that time I had the good fortune to be returned to office I would find a way to abolish the toll-gates on the island of Montreal in co-operation with the then leader of the opposition in the Quebec legislature, Mr. Mercier. Now, my hon. friend has a good memory, but, without any boasting at all, I think I have a better one, and I will at once give the reason why. I never was in the county of Jacques Cartier except on two occasions—in the year 1896, at the time of the general elections, when I addressed a meeting, unfortunately not with much success, and in the year 1895, when there was an election between Mr. Charbonneau and Mr. Décarie. I do not remember that I spoke on that occasion about the toll-gates at all. My hon. friend says I did, and he is very positive. I do not think he was present on that occasion, but one thing I am sure of, that I could not have said to the electors of Jacques Cartier that along with my late friend Mr. Mercier I would find a means of abolishing the toll-gates, because unfortunately Mr. Mercier at that time was in his grave. My hon. friend has forgotten that, and therefore I say that I have a better memory than he has, and I would advise him to have his memory or the memory of those who have informed him better instructed. I doubt if I ever did use the positive or emphatic terms which my hon. friend attributes to me. With this question, however, I am familiar. I have heard it discussed by my hon. friend many times, but I have always been under the impression that he was not so anxious to remove a grievance as to have a grievance against the government which he could parade before the electors of Jacques Cartier. It has always seemed to me that he was trying to say something that would enable him to go before the electors of that good riding and tell them: See what I have done for you; I have brought this question before the House, and brought it in vain. If my hon. friend had been as anxious as he professes to be for the removal of the toll-gates on the island of Montreal, which I agree with him are a nuisance, it seems to me he would have taken other means than those he has taken. He asserts that it is the duty of the government of Canada 'to enter into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec with a view to removing all obstacles to the abolition of toll-gates upon the roads of the island of Montreal.' Now, what has the government of Canada to do in this matter? The government of Canada is simply the holder of the bonds. But there is another question to be determined. The roads to which he alludes, and which are the subject of this motion, are now under the guardianship, operation and maintenance of the commissioners of toll-gates. There is a preliminary question to be decided: If the commission is abolished who is going to have charge of these roads? That is a question to be settled by the electors of my hon. friend and the government of the province of Quebec. As soon as they have agreed that the roads shall be maintained by someone, whether it be by the government of Quebec, the city of Montreal or the electors of my hon. friend, they can come to us, and I think they will find us pretty liberal and well disposed to hear them. But my hon. friend knows as well as I do, and better, that the difficulty is not here, but amongst his own people. I do not know whether my hon. friend ever told the electors of St. Laurent or of Cartierville or of the other localities affected, if the toll-gates are removed you must take these roads under your own charge. This is the first thing he should inform them, and not lead them to believe that the roads would be maintained by the angels, by the government of Quebec or by the government of the Dominion.

My hon. friend is far more eloquent on this question in the House than he is in his own county. The difficulty is not with the Canadian government so that there is no need for his using so much eloquence here. Let him put his own house in order before he comes to this House and then we will be disposed to listen to him. I beg to move in amendment:

That all the words after the words 'of the government' be erased and the following substituted 'to receive all the overtures that may be made by the government of Quebec with a view to removing all obstacles to the abolition of toll-gates upon the roads of the island of Montreal.'

Mr. J. E. LEONARD (Laval). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but the words that have just been uttered by the First Minister remind me the promises that he has made at Ste. Rose when the general elections were on. The hon. First Minister has just said that he had never promised to the people of Jacques Cartier and of the surrounding parishes of the city of Montreal to remedy the grievance complained of. I will remind my right hon. friend that on nomination day, at Ste. Rose, when he was surrounded by all the head staff of the Liberal party, he allowed the then candidate—now the Honourable Judge Fortin—and he also approved what he said, that if the county of Laval would elect his candidate, and that if he would himself come into power, he would remedy immediately the grievance of which were suffering the ratepayers of Laval and Jacques Cartier. More than that, on the 8th of January, 1902, when I had the honour to be candidate for the county of Laval, the hon. the First Minister thought that it would be useful to his party if he would come and support my opponent, Mr. C. A. Wilson, lawyer of Montreal, and, in the presence of the First Minister, Mr. Wilson declared, that he had the promise of the hon. the First Minister that the grievance of which the people was complaining would be remedied, if he was elected member for Laval. I do repeat it, the hon the First Minister was present and he approved what Mr. Wilson said, if not in open words, at least by his silence and by the warm support which he gave him in this election.

This question, Mr. Speaker, is much more important than some people may think. I have right before me a letter which has been written to one of my constituents on the 10th of February, 1908, by Messrs. Laurendeau, Pelletier & Pelletier, attorneys for the Turnpike Trust. As my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier said, all the surroundings have been, since a few years, divided up into building lots. More than that, the city of Montreal has extended its limits in taking a part of the counties of Laval and Jacques Cartier. The owners of these lands, after having divided them into building lots, have naturally opened streets, which have been registered and all that for the benefit of the buyers of these lots.

For instance, you have Mr. George Muir and others near Montreal, who have divided their property into lots, have opened streets and given to the city of Montreal a part of these streets. The farmers of the county of Laval and of the county of Jacques Cartier are obliged to travel by the roads under the control of this commission or by the streets recently opened by Mr. Muir and others, his neighbours. Well, here is a letter signed by Messrs. Laurendeau, Pelletier & Pelletier :

Montreal, 10th Feb., 1908.

Geo. Muir, Esq.,
Ahuntsic, P.Q.

Dear Sir,—We are directed by the trustees of the Turnpike Trust to take against you legal proceedings in order to compel you to close the road which you have opened on your property and by which people are allowed to pass and to evade the payment of the tolls on the turnpike roads. We are directed also besides that to claim from you the sum of $150, for fine incurred up to this date.

On default of an immediate settlement, we will be obliged to prosecute you.

Your most obedient servants,
(Signed): LAURENDEAU, PELLETIER & PELLETIER.

This is the state of things. I understand that the First Minister may be somewhat embarrassed. I understand also perfectly well that he is absolutely incapable to remedy that state of things, but why did he give us to understand on the public platform and elsewhere that the promises made by his friends, silently approved by him, that if ever the Liberal party would come into power he would remedy the grievance of which were suffering the people of the county of Laval and other surrounding counties. We have then the right to come to-day before this House and to say to the hon. the First Minister and his friends that it is now their duty, and principally the duty of the First Minister who is the head of the government to take immediately the necessary steps to remedy this state of things, and to have the courage to fulfil the promises made publicly, promises that the ministerial candidate was using to fight his opponents.

The means proposed to this House are very easy. We do not intend to make any political capital out of this question. I see the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) smiling, I may however tell him that such is the case, and that if the Liberal government of to-day succeeds in remedying the grievances of which we are complaining, I believe that he will have in this way the best means to defeat me at the next elections. Taking this view of the situation, it is not certainly in my own personal political interests to try, as I do, to obtain justice from the government, but the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) as myself look more after the interests of our constituents than of our own personal interests. And even, if we were incurring the risk to put into the hands of our opponents a powerful weapon which they could use against us, we would rather secure to the people the best advantages possible.

What we want the government to understand is that they should put before this House a correct statement of the finances of the Turnpike Trust, which, as my hon. friend of Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk) says controls so entirely our roads that no care is even taken to maintain the roads as they should be, as everyone who travels over them knows very well. This government should oblige this trust to give us better roads. Would it not be only justice to the farmers who are obliged to pay the tolls levied by this trust?

We want to have a statement as to the standing of this commission and as well we would like that the government would say to the Commission : We are ready to relieve you of your debt as represented by your debentures, which are not bringing us any revenue, because you are not even paying the interest.

But nothing can be done ; not only this Commission is not forced to keep the roads in good repair, but it is used to help the Liberal party. As an instance during the general elections of 1900 the payment of the tolls at La Longue Pointe were suspended for about ten days, that is to say, eight days before the polling day and two days after. That was done at the request of Mr. Fortin, the Liberal candidate.

Mr. BELAND. (Translation.) Are you in a position to prove this statement?

Mr. LEONARD. (Translation.) Yes, I can prove it, because I never assert anything which I am not able to prove.

Eight days before the polling day the tolls were abolished, but two days after the gates were re-established, and since then the farmers have been obliged to pay the tolls. That is the reason why we want these gates to disappear. If the government who is the creditor of that trust, and who cannot collect the money which is owed to them and not even collect the interest, desires really to control that trust he should accept this motion. It seems to me that he should try to be acquainted with the facts exactly, and the standing of the Trust ; and when the government will know all about it, it will be easy to convince himself that the debentures which he has are absolutely worthless, and then he could abandon them without making great sacrifices. It would be a noble action on his part and which would not entail no loss to the country. Then the federal government would be in a position to go the provincial government at Quebec and say to them : Abolish these gates.

Now Mr. Speaker, the right hon. First Minister says that the member for Jacques Cartier makes lots of noise and lamentations on the position of these poor farmers. But he says that my hon. friend has forgotten to say who will take charge of these roads. Well, I will say to the hon. First Minister that if he undertakes to abolish the toll gates between Ile Jesus and island of Montreal, the farmers of the different parishes will agree to maintain and will maintain the roads in a better condition than they are presently. The hon. First Minister answered to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier in putting to him another question. I don't think it is the proper way to look at a so serious motion as the one proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. If the hon. First Minister is really anxious to be acquainted with the present situation of the farmers concerning these turnpike roads, he should accept this motion and grant an enquiry. Let the government appoint whom he wishes to make the inquiry, provided they are people willing to do their duty, we will be satisfied, and then the First Minister will not be obliged to ask the members of the left what means they suggest to remedy to that state of things.

I have reason to believe that the farmers of the counties if Jacques-Cartier, Terrebonne and Deux-Montagne are willing to assume the cost of maintenance of these roads, and for myself I am in a position to say that as soon as the government will abolish the numerous toll-gates around the city of Montreal that the ratepayers of the county of Laval are willing and ready to maintain in a good state of repair and traffic all the roads leading to the city.

The right hon. gentleman has proposed an amendment which to my mind does not mean much. He moved that the words 'to enter into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec' be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor, 'receive all the overtures that may be made by the government of the province of Quebec.'

If I am well informed the Quebec government is the friend of the government at Ottawa. If I am also well informed, the Quebec ministers travel twice a week between the ancient capital and Ottawa in order to settle the present friction between the members of the Liberal party in Quebec. It looks very much as if no one of the provincial ministers enjoyed the confidence of the Liberal party in Quebec, and that they were obliged to come to the first minister at Ottawa to apply the remedy to the incurable friction in the provincial Liberal party.

Mr. TALBOT (Bellechasse). (Translation.) They are not ordinary frictions.

Mr. LEONARD. (Translation.) No, they are not, and my hon. friend from Bellechasse knows it perfectly well, because his friend the provincial member for his county will soon disappear from the political stage.

Mr. TALBOT (Translation.) I do not know anything about that. It is the first time I hear the thing mentioned.

Mr. LEONARD. (Translation.) In short, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the time has arrived that this inquiry should have been instituted by the government. The time has arrived to remedy the grievance which has existed for so long time and to fulfil the promises made to the electors of the counties surrounding Montreal. If the government is willing, the matter will be soon settled, and myself will have no more any ground for the complaints we are airing since a so long time in the House.

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in answer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Léonard). It must be admitted that everybody in the province of Quebec regret that this last vestige of the feudality, the toll-gates, still exist in that province. In fact it is the last remembrance of the old times, for, only a few years ago, we had them in the city of Montreal.

This famous question was brought before the courts, and thanks to the judgment delivered by Hon. Justice Taschereau, now Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals, it was suppressed for ever. Unfortunately the toll gates are still in existence on the island of Montreal. But that island is not the only place where the toll-gates exist. There are some around Quebec, every body would be pleased if this vestige of old times would disappear.

Complaints are made that the Turnpike Trust does not keep its roads as well in as good repair as they should be, and the hon. members for Laval and Jacques Cartier are urging the abolition of the toll-gates. No doubt that those living in these counties want to have good roads, but the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), has forgotten to tell us by what he would replace the present system. This is not the first time that he raises this question in this House. More than once, during the last twelve years I have been here, I have heard the hon. member for Jacques Cartier pressing the matter before the House, but has never suggested any practical solution of the problem. He did not even let us understand that the ratepayers of the county of Jacques Cartier were ready to make some sacrifices in return for the abolition of these toll-gates. I doubt very much if the hon. gentleman would propose clearly to take the burden of the maintenance of these roads, if such a proposal would be favourably considered. I will ask the hon. member if he is ready to abolish these toll-gates, and let the cost of maintenance of the roads fall upon the city of Montreal and the surrounding municipalities. I doubt very much that the ratepayers would support such a proposition.

Mr. LEONARD (Translation.) I have already told it to you a minute ago.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) That is true. Mr. Léonard went further than the member for Jacques Cartier. These gentlement would like to look into the accounts of the Turnpike Trust.

I do not know what those accounts are nor have I ever had the opportunity of noting in what way they are kept.

Any farmer, any market gardener would rather have good roads attended to by the commission than the quagmires which would probably exist should these roads be attended to by every one concerned. After all, it is not for the federal parliament, but for the provincial legislature exclusively to deal with this question, and the hon. members for Jacques Cartier and Laval are well aware of it. The hon. member for Laval who has taken part in many campaigns during the last ten years in his county should know that this question of turnpike roads has been debated there practically ever since confederation has been in existence. I remember, for instance, that from 1881 to 1886, before the regretted Mr. Mercier got into power, there were several by-elections in the county of Laval. At that time the Liberal party supported Dr. Gaboury as a candidate and asked that the turnpikes should be abolished. The Conservative party was all-powerful in the province of Quebec at the time, they could take action but they never thought fit to apply to the Quebec legislature for the suppression of those turnpikes. Later on, in 1886, Hon. Mr. Mercier became prime minister, which he was up to 1891. I remember having taken part in some elections in that county. It was then the Conservative candidate, Mr. Leblanc, now the leader of the opposition in Quebec, who blamed the Liberal government for not abolishing the turnpikes. After 1892, Mr. Leblanc who had become an important member of his party—he occupied, at that time, in the legislative assembly of Quebec, the same position as you occupy here, Mr. Speaker—while he had credit with his party, made no move towards supressing those turnpikes. And the Liberals in the county of Laval who were then on the opposition side, accused Mr. Leblanc of not keeping his promises. This shows that the question is exclusively within the purview of the provincial legislature and that it is the candidates for the Quebec legislature who are, in turn, accused of lacking good faith.

My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, who is an authority in constitutional law, does know that this question is one exclusively for the provincial legislature to consider; but he likes to come before the House—as the hon. Prime Minister has said—in order to pick up a grievance against the government in view of the coming elections.

The hon. member is much of a Norman, and consequently he is very cunning. Whenever a question comes up which might affect the county of Jacques Cartier in some degree, we are sure to hear him protest in behalf of the franchises and privileges of his county. For instance, while I was absent these last few days he raised the question of the postal delivery in the town of Lachine. My hon. friend knows very well that Lachine is far distant from Montreal, and is by no means entitled to this postal delivery. Still, in order to make capital stock for himself, of no low standard after all, he has brought this question before the House. Now, the voters in Jacques Cartier are intelligent and they read the papers, and so they will surely say: Why, just see what a vigorous fight our member is making in our interest.

But my hon. friend has shown himself to be still more of a Norman. There is not far from the county of Jacques Cartier an Indian reserve by the name of Caughnawaga. Those Indians work in the industrial establishments of that county. The law forbids the innkeepers to sell the Indians intoxicating liquor. Well, in order to please those innkeepers, my hon. friend proposed to amend the law so as to wipe this this restriction off the statute.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I do not think this question has anything whatever to do with the motion now before the House. Consequently, the hon. minister is out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) I have no hesitation in admitting at once that the point raised by my hon. friend is well taken, and I come back to the question.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) The Indians are behind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) We shall speak of the Indians at no greater length.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Nor shall we speak of liquor.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) As a conclusion, I second the amendment proposed by the hon. Prime Minister, and I still maintain that the object which the hon. member has in view is to create an imaginary grievance so as to be able to say to his electors : Just see all I have asked the government, and I could not get it. I met with no success as to the postal delivery, as to the suppression of fines imposed upon the innkeepers who sell liquor to Indians, or as to the suppression of turnpikes ; although I have upheld your rights with energy for twelve years, the government always turned a deaf ear.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government was unwilling to run after their debtor and say : We release you of your debt. For what is the hon. member asking after all? He proposes by his motion that the federal government should have a conference with the provincial government and say : We know that the Turnpike Trust are unable to pay their debt, so we will release them of it. Frankly, is not the means suggested by the hon. Prime Minister more rational? The federal government knows perfectly well that the trust do not pay their interest, but it is not for the federal government to make the first step. Even if they did release the trust of that debt, is it decidedly sure that the provincial government would be satisfied? In fact, the Turnpike Trust derive their powers and their charter from the provincial legislature and not from the federal government. What authority have we over them that we might abolish them? The question is only too clear, and I think my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier should withdraw his motion.

Otherwise, the people in Montreal are well aware of the fact that every one having a right to vote in the county of Jacques Cartier and having a grievance, whether against Peter, John or James, is sure to find an echo on the floor of the House of Commons.

I have quoted a few moments ago the several occasions upon which my hon. friend has addressed the federal parliament in order to voice the complaints, imaginary or real, originating from the county of Jacques Cartier ; but I believe that in this particular circumstance, my hon. friend should accept the amendment suggested by the hon. Prime Minister, who has granted a good deal so far by giving his word to the effect that the government is ready to receive any proposition, to listen to any advances, which the Quebec government might happen to make.

Mr. L. ROBITAILLE (Quebec county). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in case the proposition made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier might be voted upon, I wish to give some explanation. Last year, when a motion similar to this was presented before the House, I said a few words in favour of it. The reason I gave at the time was that this was a part of my programme, as the question seemed to be a pretty important one as far as my electors were concerned. I think the hon. Postmaster General will remember having heard it discussed during the campaign which took place in the county of Quebec.

As the hon. Postmaster General said a moment ago, this question is rather within the purview of the provincial legislature, and I am satisfied of the amendment presented by the hon. Prime Minister.

However, I may say to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that should the Conservative members of the Quebec legislature stick to public interest in the same degree as he does here himself, they would have ample information to gather as to the method adopted by the Ontario government in macadamizing and metalling the roads since it has abolished the toll-gates.

I think the provincial government offers the municipalities, through its Minister of Public Works, a bonus equal to half the amount of what it costs to keep the actual roads in good order, and besides half the amount of what it costs to build the new roads.

I must declare that, in case the present motion should be voted upon, I will support the amendment proposed by the hon. Prime Minister, for the following reason : In the course of last summer my electors were made aware of the position I took last year when I supported the motion presented by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. Whether right or wrong, I do not know, but they seemed to be pleased with the present system. Now, my policy is that I should follow the opinion of my electors. I think, then, that by giving the vote I am about to give, I comply with the desire of the majority of my electors.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. En français.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the majority of the House will understand me better in this language, so perhaps I may be pardoned if I speak it. It would seem to me, in looking over the amendment proposed by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that there is an appropriateness which, at first glance, one might not recognize. I think I would like to move an amendment to the amendment, if the rules of the House permitted. The Prime Minister proposes to amend the original motion so as to make it read :

That it is the duty of the government to receive all overtures that may be made——

I presume by the government of the province of Quebec.

—with a view to removing all obstacles to the abolition of toll-gates on the roads of the island of Montreal.

In the first place, one naturally asks : What are these 'overtures,' which, according to the Prime Minister, it is the duty of the government to receive? I have the dictionary before me that I may be sure to correctly understand it. I find that 'overture' means 'an instrumental prelude to an opera or ballet.' Well, if the people of the island of Montreal are satisfied to take this method of approaching their mightiness, I suppose we should offer no objections. 'To remove the toll-gates.' But I may be told that this is not the only meaning of the word and is not the one intended here. Another meaning is this, 'an intimation of willingness to make terms ; tentative proposal.' For what purpose ? 'To remove the toll-gates.' If I were proposing to amend this resolution, I would greatly extend its importance. I would propose not merely to remove the toll-gates in the island of Montreal, but to remove the toll-gates around the parliament buildings at Ottawa. For it is generally believed by the people that the parliament buildings are all surrounded by toll-gates which prevent the people reaching the departments unless they are prepared to pay a high rate of toll. It is true that those who pay that toll may be recouped by the public, but the toll must be paid. Why should we not do away with these toll-gates, even though we should not have the 'overtures' in concord of sweet sounds which make people happy and ready and willing to give away everything that belongs to others? If the motion be amended so as to provide for doing away with the toll-gates around these departments, I shall be glad to hold up both hands in favour of it. It would be a notable reform if, for instance, people could get into the Department of the Interior without paying tolls ; if they could get contracts for public buildings or for dredging without paying toll. But these toll-gates are on every avenue leading to the public departments. Even though the removal of these toll-gates should involve some expense, it would result in a saving to the country in the end. Many will view with hope the fact that the government are desirous of receiving overtures. But they seem to be always ready to 'receive overtures'—I have no doubt that every one who gets something from the departments knows that long ago. We have heard, for instance, of their 'receiving overtures' for the sale of liquor in the Yukon. One gentleman told me that he was invited to pay $20,000 for the privilege of taking whisky into the Yukon. Well, if the government are ready to 'receive overtures' to do away with these rascally toll-gates around these departments we cannot too soon begin upon those 'overtures' ; for, whether they be musical overtures or not, it will be music to the public ear to hear such a movement in progress.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Translation.)—Mr. Speaker, the hon. Postmaster General, who has just taken his seat, has stood here as the authorized representative of the government in the district of Montreal. The position he has taken is hardly in keeping with the statement made formally by his colleague and neighbour, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur), who never missed a single opportunity of denouncing the system of toll-gates. He has stated time and again that one of the first duties of the government, should his party get into power, would consist in changing this system. I hope the Minister of Marine will say a few words about this matter, and so much the more so, that, if what rumour says is true, the Minister of Marine and the Postmaster General, who are sitting side by side, are not on those good terms that one would like to witness in a government well organized. These rumours are, no doubt, unfounded, but if under the circumstances, after the hon. Postmaster General, who represents the remote county of Gaspé has spoken, the Minister of Marine remains silent, the rumours which have been circulated for so long a time about the uneasiness that prevails between them will be justified in public opinion. We are entitled to an expression of opinion from the ministers on a question which seems to them of minor importance, but which for us is material, and I blame the Postmaster General for having dealt with it in a light manner, for it appeals to a large extent at this moment to the market gardeners and to the farmers of that district. When the hon. Postmaster General said that we were asking the federal government as a creditor to run after his debtor in order to tell him that they released him of his debt, and when I saw the hon. Prime Minister laugh as he heard these utterances, it seemed to me that he himself did not look upon that question as being so important as it is.

We have here some other gentlemen who are interested in the solution of that question and should the tame amendment proposed by the Prime Minister be adopted, we would not have gone any further than we were at first when this discussion was started. The county of Two Mountains is just as much interested as are the counties of Laval and Jacques Cartier. The member for this county knows that we are not dealing with this question here laughingly. It is a serious one; it has been presented with eloquence by the member for Laval. In asking the government to abolish these toll-gates after fifteen years sufferings, are we making a blunder? Is that the opinion of the member for Terrebonne whom I now see at his seat and whose electors are also interested? I see the member for the county of Hochelaga (Mr. Rivet) also at his seat. Does the town of Westmount, whose interest in this question amounts to more than $7,000, does that hon. member believe that in asking for an inquiry in order to ascertain as to whether we should not obtain from the federal government that they should give up their claim, we are acting unthinkingly? Is that his opinion? What does the member for l'Assumption think of it? He whose electors are just as much interested as my own, since they often come to Montreal and have to suffer from what the Postmaster General has called a feudal institution which should have been abolished long ago.

Even the member for Vaudreuil is interested in this question, for during certain seasons of the year his electors happen to pass in the roads affected by the toll-gates which I am now complaining of. When we ask that the federal government should intervene and that an inquiry commission should be appointed, do these gentlemen think that such a request in not in conformity with the public interest? Is that anything unfair and which should not obtain their support? The Postmaster General said that we could refer the matter to the provincial government. Does he know that when we apply to his partner, the Hon. Mr. Gouin, Prime Minister of Quebec, he refers us to the federal government, which the hon. Postmaster General represents here?

It is thus that we are sent from Caiphas to Pilate, nobody caring to assume the responsibility of fulfilling the promises made.

In 1902 the hon. the Prime Minister attended the nomination meeting alluded to a moment ago by the member for Laval. He had come to support his candidate, Mr. Wilson. At that meeting I myself heard Mr. Wilson speak in support of the very policy which the Prime Minister has just declared that he would not approve of in my county or in any constituency in the neighbourhood of Montreal. Under the circumstances, the premier's amendment does not appear to me serious.

We ask him to enter into negotiations with the Quebec government, a government which he controls, of which he is the main adviser, and he suggests an amendment declaring that if the provincial government comes to him he will be willing to hear their statement of the case.

And my young friend from the county of Quebec (Mr. Robitaille), whose riding is likewise afflicted with turnpikes, considers this a wise and reasonable solution. I notice in my colleague from the county of Quebec a change of mind which I regret. The scales have fallen from his eyes. He has travelled on to Damascus and he has seen light; perhaps he has seen something else. But we, Mr. Speaker, who have received no such electric shocks, and are still in darkness, persist in believing that it is unnecessary for the federal government to declare by an amendment that if approached by any government on a question of public interest, they will consider the overtures they may make. We are of opinion that the matter should be taken more seriously.

The hon. the Postmaster General does not appear to be as conversant with the subject as his colleague, who controls more directly the patronage of the district of Montreal, and whom, I hope, we will presently hear. He said that the farmers preferred the present system. What does the learned minister know about it? He reminds me of McDuff, of Shakespearian fame, whose children had been murdered by Macbeth. Somebody suggested that he should wreak vengeance on Macbeth. How can I, he exclaimed, Macbeth has no children? There are no turnpikes in the learned minister's riding, he can therefore afford to treat lightly what is to us a serious matter.

Does my hon. friend, does the right hon. Prime Minister suppose that the farmers of Laval, Jacques Cartier, l'Assomption, Terrebonne, Two Mountains, Joliette and Hochelaga are not intelligent enough to understand that if these turnpikes disappear they will be obliged to make some other provision for the maintenance of the roads?

Why should the Postmaster General insist upon my telling him how this would be done if the turnpikes were abolished? Oh, he says, they do not explain this to the electors. Well, it is unnecessary to point out to the people of Jacques Cartier that if you abolish one source of revenue it must be supplemented in some other way. The Postmaster General may be sure that the electors of Jacques Cartier are quite as intelligent as his own, and they fully understand that one source of revenue disappearing some other plan must be devised to meet requirements.

Hon. RUDOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). (Translation.) Will my hon. friend allow me to put a question?

He says that the electors of his county are as intelligent as those of Gaspé. How does he explain that Lachine hotelkeepers cannot distinguish between an Indian and a white man ?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Have I understood aright what my learned friend has just said ? Is it possible that in this House, in the presence of the representatives of the country, he dares to state, to the shame of the electors of Jacques Cartier, that Lachine hotelkeepers cannot distinguish between a white man and an Indian ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) My hon. friend stated last year that the law should be amended for that reason.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Let me assure my hon. friend that he is mistaken. Hotelkeepers of Lachine and of all other localities in my county are quite able to distinguish between a white man and an Indian.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us close this debate in a grave spirit. The question is more serious than the government believes. In the immediate vicinity of Montreal, at the division line between the counties of Jacques Cartier and Laval, the commission has placed a turnpike on the Sault road. They had no right to do this, their action is a violation of the Montreal City Charter and of the law. This is the grievance of which my hon. friend from Laval has spoken, and it is within the power of the federal government to apply an immediate remedy. As the member for Laval has explained, several of his electors are suffering from this state of things. At Côte Saint Laurent, tolls are being illegally collected from farmers and others, and those who pass without paying are sued. It is a flagrant injustice. The government has a right to control this commission and the Finance Minister might make immediate use of his powers to put an end to the abuse.

The Prime Minister's amendment seems to me rather a joke. I hope the House will adopt the two motions submitted by me. The right hon. Premier remarked that several years running I have taken up the time of the House with this question. It rests with him that I should not do so in future ; let him put an end to the grievances complained of. If the government will do so, they may acquire in these counties an influence which may be useful to them.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, after the pressing appeal made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, it is a pleasure for me to say a few words upon the motion now before the House and which reads as follows :—

That it is the duty of the Government to enter into negociations with the government of the Province of Quebec with the view of removing all impediments to the abolishing of turnpikes on the roads of the island of Montreal.

It may be useful briefly to explain the situation with respect to these turnpikes. They are, I believe, administered by a corporation owing its legal existence to the provincial government. At a time when the trust was composed of friends of the member for Jacques Cartier, the federal government was requested to take over the debentures then issued. It follows that today the government is simply in the position of a creditor holding debentures.

Who are the parties chiefly interested in this question ? The municipalities through which these roads run. If they believed that these roads were too burdensome, they would be the first to complain and to request the provincial government to take steps with a view of abolishing them. I am not aware that the municipalities concerned have taken any such action. If turnpikes were abolished on the island of Montreal, the parish of St. Laurent, for example, would be obliged to maintain the roads within its limits. As the people of St. Laurent are not the only ones who use these roads, as they are also used by the people of Montreal, those of the counties of Laval, Two Mountains and elsewhere, the latter, under the present system of tolls, contibute something towards their maintenance. Does my hon. friend suggest that the municipality of St. Laurent should be burdened with the whole expense of maintaining these roads ? I can well understand that the municipality is not over anxious to take steps towards assuming alone an expenditure now divided among the people of Montreal, Laval and Two Mountains. I do not therefore believe that the suggestion of my hon. friend is in the interest of the parish of St. Laurent nor of the municipalities of the county of Jacques Cartier, situated near Montreal, as it would oblige them to pay more than they do at present. The matter is quite clear.

My hon. friend has stated that the methods of the trust are not of the best and that money is spent uselessly. We have no proof of that. On the contrary, I am informed that the administration is very economical. The trustees' chief difficulty is that they are unable to raise the rates of toll, in order to pay interest on their indebetedness.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Does the hon. minister suggest that the rate of tolls should be raised ?

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) No, on the contrary. But my hon. friend contends that we should insist upon the payment of interest on the money due to us, which would bring about an increase in the rate of tolls.

My hon. friend asks that the turnpikes be abolished. But what persons would then be obliged to contribute towards the maintenance of the roads ? The burden would fall entirely upon the municipalities through which they run. Their case would be that of the parish of St. Laurent. Is it not better that the roads should be maintained by a commission as they are to-day, without payment of interest upon the debt, and the expenses paid by means of tolls collected from the people of Montreal, Laval and Two Mountains who use them? The moment the turnpikes were abolished the parish of St. Laurent would lose just so much revenue. Is that the proposal made by my hon. friend ?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I understand that my hon. friend is in favour of continuing the present system.

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) I say that the proposed change would not be in the interest of the parish, and the municipalities appear to be of the same opinion, as they have not requested the government to allow them to take over the roads.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Municipalities in Jacques Cartier county have repeatedly requested the abolition of turnpikes.

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) Am I then to understand that these municipalities are ready to take charge of the roads ?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) They ask that the turnpikes be abolished, the government remitting the debt.

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) My hon. friend well knows that abolishing the turnpikes is not the only question: there is also the maintenance of the roads. Who will maintain them, who will fill up the ruts and holes ?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) What did the hon. gentleman promise at a time when he sat on the opposition side of the House ?

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) The promise I then made is contained in the Prime Minister's amendment. We are awaiting overtures to study the question.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I think the Postmaster General's argument this afternoon was more effective than yours.

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) I was absent at the time, as I believed that the hon. gentleman would not proceed with his motion; the thing has happened several times before.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I was ready every time it was called and I defy the hon. minister to prove the contrary. It was called the day before yesterday; as the hon. the Finance Minister was not present, I did not press it.

Mr. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation.) My hon. friend is mistaken. The motion has been called every Monday and Wednesday since the month of January. At all events this is not a point of much importance.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) It is of great importance, as my hon. friend says that I was not here.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Well, I will take my hon. friend's word for it. Unfortunately, I was absent this afternoon when the motion was called. I was obliged to leave the chamber to confer with the people from Jacques Cartier on certain questions, and now my hon. friend finds fault with me. I cannot be everywhere at once.

To return to the question, the member for Jacques Cartier would have the turnpikes abolished. But that is not the whole question. Who is to take charge of the roads ? My hon. friend would leave their maintenance to the municipalities, I suppose.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) My motion is before the House; why does not the hon. minister discuss it?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) No, no. My hon. friend wishes the government to negotiate with the provincial government. Suppose his motion was carried, what would we have to say to the provincial government? Would he wish the whole burden of maintenance to be placed on the parish of St. Laurent, whereas it is now divided among several localities.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Well, as the hon. minister asks me, I wish you to begin negotiations and I will then submit my plan.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) My hon. friend is not reasonable. Since several years he has been giving special attention to this question, he has been in close contact with the parties interested, and now he says to us: Begin negotiations and I will afterwards tell you how to proceed. Well, I wish him to state whether the municipality of St. Laurent should or should not be called upon to pay, in order that we may know how we stand. If his plan is a good one, why does he not explain it ? The postmaster general described the situation correctly when he said that we are the creditors ; should we go to the debtor and inquire: what do you want us to do for you ? That is not what is generally done. Any proposals should come from the interested parties. None are more interested in this case than the municipalities. They therefore should suggest plans for the maintenance of the roads. If the people from Laval and other counties cease to pay anything, then the people of St. Laurent must pay all ; I fail to see that there are any others.

Under the circumstances, it seems to me that the Prime Minister's amendment is the only one that can be considered, and I believe that on reflection, my hon. friend will come to the same conclusion.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) What remedy would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) As I represent the creditor, I think the debtor should make a suggestion.

Mr. LEONARD. (Translation.) How did the hon. minister intend to make provision for this expenditure, when in 1892, '93 and '94 he promised to settle this matter if returned to office?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) We are ready to receive overtures. I do not recollect having ever discussed this question on the hustings, except once when I met the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. The plan which I suggested is the same as that which I now submit.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, since the hon, member for Jacques Cartier wishes to know what are the views of my constituents in regard to his motion, I shall be glad to satisfy him as to that, and also as to what are my own views, if the House is called upon to give a vote on that question. My answer is recorded in the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the House.

Farmers in the county of Laval, Terrebonne, Two Mountains and Jacques Cartier, who are called upon to pay the tolls exacted by the Turnpike Trust, would hail with pleasure the abolition of these tolls, a relic of the feudal system, as the Postmaster General so aptly termed them.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I understand that the hon. member is in favour of the Lemieux wing ?

Mr. ETHIER (Translation.) I am not aware that any such thing exists for the time being; but my hon. friend thinks he has in hand a fine opportunity of making some political capital with an eye to the coming election; for he does not let a single session pass without unflinchingly bringing before the House that question of the turnpike roads. Drawing on his talents as a professor, well versed in consitutional law, he ventures to move, with wonderful fearlessness that the Dominion government should enter into negotiations with the provincial government, with the object of finding some means of doing away with these turnpikes. Whenever the hon. member is called uopn to state what is his plan for the settlement of this question, he answers: I have a plan, but I keep it in my pocket, and in due time I shall let the country have the benefit of it. Well, I wonder if he really means it. Is such a stand in keeping with the high position the hon. gentleman occupies in his party? Is a public man warranted in thus keeping under cover a device which he refrains from showing to the government? He has referred to the existence of factions; let him cast his eye around him and he will discover any number of factions. Let him spend some time in Montreal visiting the various Conservative clubs, made up of heterogeneous elements, and he will find out as much as he wants about factions.

It seems to me that the hon. Postmaster General has well answered the contention set forth in this motion. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier seems to have completely lost sight just now of provincial rights, those rights which he so often likes to talk about and to uphold. That trust is constituted under a provincial charter. Should the Dominion Government now attempt to abolish it, would not those hon. members on your left, Mr. Speaker, exclaim: Why not strike at the root of the evil? Why not go to Quebec and call upon the creators of that trust to effect the required changes?

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier stated that a turnpike had been set up at St. Laurent, although the trust's charter, its constitution and the law forbade it. If the trust has exceeded its powers and taken advantage of the willingness of the ratepayers to submit to such tolls, there is a remedy to that, which the law provides. This question should be taken to the local legislature and not brought before this House. Why such persistence in calling upon the Dominion parliament to correct these grievances?

My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier will not make known his remedy; but after considering his proposal, I venture to say that a worse state of things would prevail if the House complied with his request.

The electors of the counties of Laval and Two Mountains are not alone in contributing toward the maintenance of these roads. The citizens of Montreal contribute more than one-half of the cost, their numbers being so much larger than those of the farmers who proceed to town once a week to sell their products.

Supposing that system was done away with, who would be called upon to settle the current debt, the floating debt, and who would look after the maintenance of those roads? What assurance have we that they would be in as good condition as they are to-day? Is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier in a position to lay before the House a single resolution from a municipal council requesting that these turnpikes be done away with?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Then you are in favour of keeping the turnpikes?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) My hon. friend's question is the best proof that he is trying to make political capital out of this. Is he in a position to show to the House a single resolution of the council of the county of Jacques Cartier? I do not think so.

And the hon. member for Laval, who, with a disinterestedness worthy of a great cause, he being the secretary of the county of Laval, ventures to ask his constituents to take charge of those roads wholly at their expense; is he, as well, in a position to lay before the House a single resolution of the council of that county approving the stand taken by the member for Jacques Cartier?

Laval and Jacques Cartier are not the only two counties under the control of the trust. I understand that there is a similar organization in Queebc, and that in some other localities tolls are exacted on bridges.

I say that we should call upon the Turnpike Trust to repay the amount they owe to the government, instead of offering to cancel their obligations; and it may also be appropriate to call upon the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to lay on the table of the House that admirable plan which he refuses to exhibit, that unspeakable boon which is to be such a solace to his constituents. Under those circumstances, I consider myself in duty bound to vote in favour of the proposed amendment.

Mr. GUSTAVE BOYER (Vaudreuil). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, evidently the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has some hidden design. He even seems intent on playing some prank on the hon. member for Vaudreuil, whom he invites to take part in this discussion, although his county is not in any way concerned in it. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier might as well have called upon the hon. member for Beauharnois to express an opinion on the subject. I am not any more desirious, just now, than I was a moment ago of taking part in this discussion, so ably carried on by the hon. Postmaster General, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and other hon. members; nor shall I take up the time of the House in expounding the reasonableness of the amendment moved by the right hon. Prime Minister.

On the other hand I do not wish to make any show of indifference, whenever the name of the county of Vaudreuil is mentioned in this House.

The doing away with the road tolls, that is with the turnpikes, is a question which is of no interest whatever to my constituents, and my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier as well as my hon. friend from Beauharnois are perfectly well aware of it.

These hon. members have of late inquired in this House as to the dredging carried on at various places in the county I have the honour to represent. Now, let me tell them that since the government has repaired our wharfs, dredged the channels in our rivers, and even through some of our villages, we are in a position to ship and receive various products and goods along our waterways, as well as along the railway lines which the government subsidized. The government, which I take this opportunity to thank, has followed a wise policy.

Driving to Montreal is for my constituents a thing of the past. But, if we were obliged during summer to use a horse and vehicle when on a trip to the metropolis, we certainly would not object to paying certain tolls to those who provide us with macadam roads.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier deems it desirable to do away with turnpikes and the accompanying tolls; and on the Prime Minister inquiring how he would make up for the loss of revenue resulting therefrom, he replies, rather childishly, that the loss would have to be made up from some other source. Now, I fail to see how the people would be benefited by such a change. Indeed, Sir, unless the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is willing to disclose to us the plan he claims to have evolved, and which may have its good points, I shall remain under the impression that he wishes to lay unduly on our shoulders a responsibility which should remain with the provincial government. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier causes me still greater surprise when he expresses his intentions of confiding to enterprise of almost private character what is better accomplished by public bodies. He poses nevertheless as a friend of the community. Last year again, in this very House, he proposed a Bill for the purpose of enabling the farming community to invest their savings and effect the sale of their products by means of co-operative effort.

We cannot expect to have good roads in the country until they are put under the control of corporate body. My hon. friend is perfectly aware of it. In the meantime, each citizen will be looking after his part of the road, as he pleases, and the municipal council will have no control over him except through its inspectors, who do not give much trouble to any one, including themselves, when it comes to enforcing municipal regulations. This has been so well understood by the ratepayers of the parish of Vaudreuil, in the county of Vaudreuil, that, for the last two years, through co-operative effort they have succeeded in macadamizing a good part of the roads within their territory. The promoters, men of good will intended thereby to set a good example for the remainder of the county. Let us hope that it will be effective. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is a recognized fact that the farmer single-handed is unable to carry out these improvements, and that he requires the stimulating influence of enterprising and public-spirited leaders to bring them about.

The metalling of the roads in Vaudreuil parish are an uncontrovertible proof of my contention. The insignificant expenditure entailed on the various interested parties would have been very much heavier, if the old system of every one for himself had been followed. Though I had no desire of getting away of the question now under discussion, it struck me that the suspicious proposal advocated by the member for Jacques Cartier cannot be entertained at a time when, in villages more especially, and even in country places, the tendency is to entrust municipal councils with the duty of maintaining highways. It is contended that with such a system roads would be kept in a more uniformly good condition, and that the collection of the taxes required for such work would be more properly and fairly effected. Although I am not ready to endorse such a scheme, I think it would give better results than the plan which my hon. friend for Jacques Cartier is unwilling to give out.

Mr. L. A. RIVET (Hochelaga). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to incur the displeasure of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier by refusing to take a hand in this discussion as other hon. gentlemen have done. This is not a new question, as for the last twelve years, particularly at every session, it has been brought before the House, in some shape or other, suggesting the same arguments, presented in almost the same language. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has resolved this year, as usual, to take up the time of the House with this everlasting question, and he has deemed it advisable to mention my name in the course of his remarks. Well, I may state that the county of Hochelaga is in no way interested in this matter, except, in, so far as the city of Westmount would be in debt to the amount of $7,000 to the Turnpike Trust.

There are no turnpikes in my constituency. However, before advocating their abolition, I would like to ask what steps would be taken to provide for the maintenance of roads on the island of Montreal? The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who has denounced this system with such vigour and in such indignant tones, should know that these very roads have been instrumental in bringing market gardening in the island of Montreal to that enviable degree of prosperity which it enjoys to-day, and that without them the city of Montreal would not have been benefited thereby in such a large measure.

I do not claim for my part, to be satisfied with the turnpike system; but so long as no other means of providing for the maintenance of the roads has not been laid before this House, I, like other hon. gentlemen, shall vote in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the House.

Just now, there exists not only in the county of Jacques Cartier, but in other counties as well, a strong feeling against this system of turnpikes; but that is not a sufficient reason why the Dominion government, who have no jurisdiction in the matter, should interfere.

House divided on amendment (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Motion as amended agreed to.

MONTREAL TURNPIKE ROADS.

Mr. MONK moved :

That it is the duty of the government, pursuant to chapter 104 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, part 1, to institute an inquiry into the situation of its claim upon the Montreal Turnpike Roads, now bonded to the government of Canada, in order to pave the way to provincial legislation, looking to the abolition of toll-gates on the island of Montreal.

He said : The remarks I have already made apply to this motion. If the government were disposed to accept this motion I would save the House any further remarks.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) by long experience knows that if he is right he can always expect the government to accept anything that he wants. On this occasion we think he is right and therefore we accept the motion.

Motion agreed to.

TRIAL AND CONVICTION OF FREDERICK BLUNDEN.

Mr. H. A. WARD (Durham) moved :

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, documents and papers, in relation to the trial and conviction of one Frederick Blunden, for cattle stealing at Macleod, in the province of Alberta, in 1904.

He said : Mr. Speaker, if any explanation is necessary as to the reason why the papers referred to in this motion should be brought down, I may say at the outset that from information in my possession from reliable sources in the Northwest I am led to believe that, in the conviction of Frederick Blunden referred to in the motion, that there has been a very grave miscarriage of justice. This man was convicted at Macleod in 1904. His conviction was the outcome of the trial of a man named Train who was tried at the same place a short time previously for cattle stealing. Train was shadowed for two days previously to his apprehension by the Northwest Mounted Police and when he was discovered in the act of killing cattle he said that the cattle were his own. When it was pointed out to him by members of the Northwest Mounted Police that the brand Y.T., which represents cattle belonging to Mr. Lane of Calgary, was on the cattle he said that he had made a mistake. There was no word said at the time or for two months, I understand, afterwards, implicating the man Blunden, but after two months incarceration in jail, this man gave out to the police, I suppose, that he had bought these cattle from Blunden and on the evidence of Train alone who was promptly allowed to go by the judge, Blunden was convicted of cattle stealing and sent to the penitentiary at Edmonton for ten years. From the information in my hands I believe that fresh evidence has come to light and that the members of the Northwest Mounted Police who were interested in the trial were or are now in possession of evidence showing that this man is entirely innocent. It seems, therefore, very little to say that there has been a miscarriage of justice and I think it is only reasonable that the papers should be brought down and that we should know exactly on what evidence this man was convicted. I understand that a very large number of the residents about Macleod and other portions of the Northwest have signed the petition which has been sent in to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) but which has not been acted upon in any way. The impression throughout the country, in so far as I can learn, is that this man has been unjustly treated. I understand that no pardon is asked for in this petition, that no pardon is asked for by the friends of this man who is incarcerated at the present time, but that simply in the light of new evidence which has come out he should be given a new trial which the people there are confident will result in his acquittal. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, move the motion which stands in my name.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). Mr. Speaker, the case of the man who is mentioned in this motion is simply one of several cases, more or less of a similar character, the files in respect to which are in the Department of Justice, and an ordinary application for some interference with the action of the court. Not long after I took charge of the department the case of this particular prisoner was brought to my attention by letters, some from himself, some from other members of his family and some from persons writing on his behalf. The claim was made that there had been a very great miscarriage of justice in the case of this particular man, which had been considered on more than one occasion by my predecessor in office. A copy of the evidence, taken in shorthand at the trial had been procured, and was upon the files of the department accompanied by petitions, by voluminous correspondence, and by the contentions in writing of the solicitor or barrister by whom the prisoner had been defended. The claim was made that this case ought to receive, at the hands of the Minister of Justice, a new trial. The assertion was very roundly made by those who were interested in the prisoner's case, as it has been made to-day, that there had been a gross miscarriage of justice in the case of this particular man and that the judge before whom he had been tried did not appreciate the evidence, did not give effect to the evidence for the defence, but received the evidence for the prosecution and acted upon it entirely contrary to that which was just and right. Under these circumstances it was, of course, a matter of duty that I should read and consider with all the care I was able to give to it the evidence which had been presented. I have read that evidence, every word of it, and I have read it more than once. It is voluminous but it is the ordinary evidence, if I may so describe it, that one might expect to find given upon a trial of this character. There is as well, among the papers in the case, the report not only of the judge before whom the case was tried, but that of another judge of the court, who, on a subsequent occasion, tried the man, Train, whose name is mentioned in connection with this prisoner, Blunden, and upon whom Blunden seeks to cast the responsibility for the offence for which Blunden has been committed. The contention, I may say, on Blunden's part has been that undoubtedly the cattle which are in question were stolen cattle but that the offence was committed not by him—Blunden—but by Train. The report from the judge before whom Train was tried is also upon the files and it was obtained because of the special contention which Blunden was making or which was being made on his behalf, in order that the fullest knowledge could be had of the facts of this case.

Mr. LANCASTER. Was Blunden tried by a jury or by a judge alone ?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. It is some months since I looked at the papers and perhaps my recollection is not quite perfect but it is that both of these men were tried, with their assent, summarily, or by speedy trial without the intervention of a jury. I may not be accurate in that regard. The necessity, as I tried to explain at considerable length in a discussion which took place in the House last week upon a motion, for a return of a general character—the necessity of maintaining the confidential nature of reports from judges, I think, must be admitted. In this particular case the views of each of these two judges were expressed with absolute freedom in these reports in regard to both Train and Blunden, in regard to their trials, in regard to the estimation in which they were held by their neighbours and in regard to the circumstances of these particular charges : they are of an absolutely confidential nature and I would urge upon the hon. member who has introduced this motion that he should not ask that such documents should be made public or that the contents of them should be given to the world. In regard to the evidence at the trial there is not the slightest objection on my part, and there cannot be on anybody's part, that it should be brought down as a return if my hon. friend thinks it is worth the expense of being copied. The copy which has been sent to the department is upon the files and I should not have the slightest objection to my hon. friend or to any person perusing that evidence which was, of course, given in open, public court, and no more have I any objection in the world to all the correspondence which I have written or which has been written by my predecessor in regard to this case being put before the public. I seek, however, to protect—and I hope my hon. friend will be willing to protect, from publicity, the reports of the judges in so far as they are of a confidential character and all the confidential papers in connection with the case. It is not, of course, for me, I think, to express, or to form, any opinion as to whether the judges before whom these cases were tried came to a proper conclusion or did not do so. It was a case, in so far as Blunden's trial was concerned, in which the evidence was somewhat contradictory, in which Blunden himself went into the witness box and was subjected to cross examination by the crown prosecutor. Any one can form his own conclusions upon the evidence. I cannot pretend to say that I have not formed an opinion upon the evidence, and I have expressed that opinion in some of the letters I have written to members of Blunden's family or to persons interested on his behalf. But, I might point out that it is not, as it seems to me, my duty or my right to review in any way the work of the court upon the trial of this or any other prisoner whether the decision is given by a jury or by a judge. It is in this case—pre-eminently it is in this case—a question of fact. It must generally be so, in the case of the trial of an accusation for an offence against the criminal law, and the determination of that fact depends very generally upon the particular witness or set of witnesses whom the judge or the jury, whoever is the tribunal determining, believes to be telling the truth.

This case was one of that character. It was a question for the judge (if there was no jury as I think there was not) to determine whether he believed the account of the matter given by the witnesses for the prosecution or the contradiction given for Blunden by those who were testifying on his behalf. In coming to a conclusion upon any question of that character it is perfectly manifest that the judge, or the jury, who see and hear witnesses giving their testimony—and probably have some local knowledge of the character for truthfulness of the witnesses who are testifying—are in an infinitely better position than any other person can ever be to determine upon which side the very truth of the matter lies. And accordingly this application coming before the Department of Justice, originally at any rate in the shape of an assertion by the prisoner of his innocence on an application that a new trial should be ordered by the department, the minister who preceded me, (and I concur entirely in his view,) took the position that we could not properly interfere otherwise than upon an application for clemency; that he could not properly review the work of the trial judge or jury, and that he could not undertake to say that those witnesses, whom the trial judge or jury believed, were not those who were speaking the truth and that the truth lay on the other side of the case altogether. That was something that no minister was in a position properly to do and I declined to do it or to interfere upon any such grounds. That having occurred more than 18 months ago, since then applications to reconsider have been numerous and the case has been reconsidered on several occasions. I have on more than one occasion gone through the evidence to make sure that there was nothing I had overlooked unwittingly or that might probably change my view of the position in which the case stood. The sentence is certainly a considerable one and it may be a case in which it would be quite proper to recommend the exercise of clemency, but up to this time no such application has been made. On the contrary, the position taken by those interested in the prisoner is that it would be improper to ask, or to accept, clemency because that would imply that the decision of the tribunal was correct, and the whole contention on the part of the prisoner has been that the Minister of Justice ought to intervene and retry and decide that the judge or the jury before whom the case was originally tried had all gone wrong. It is upon that footing entirely that the case has been presented, and that manner of presenting it is one with which I certainly cannot concur. I would urge then that my hon. friend should modify his motion by inserting after the word 'papers' the words: 'so far as the same are not of a confidential character.' If that modification is acceptable to my hon. friend I have not the slightest objection to bring down a copy of all the papers, including the evidence, and including all the documents that have passed from the Department of Justice in the matter.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I should think that the motion means that as it is at present, and the only question remaining is as to what are confidential documents. Are we to understand that the reports of the judges in these cases have always been considered confidential to the extent that they cannot be brought down to the House ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think I recollect a case in which the judge's report was not so regarded. It was the case of a boy who had been convicted in the county of Colchester, N.S., and Mr. F. A. Laurence who has been lately appointed to the bench of Nova Scotia was the Crown prosecutor, and he was exceedingly astonished and exceedingly angry at the conduct of the government in that case. I think the judge's report was brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In that case I think the boy was pardoned absolutely.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Speaking from memory, the facts of that case were that an Armenian peddler was found dead, and the boy who was in the vicinity was put on his trial for murder or manslaughter, and based his defence entirely on an alibi. The prisoner after conviction, I am not sure whether it was before he was sent to the penitentiary or not, made an affidavit prepared for him by his counsel upon instructions in which he declared that he had shot the peddler but that he had done so accidentally. And without sending the case back for a new trial, without subjecting him to any cross-examination, and without even waiting for the report of the trial judge, the government opened the penitentiary doors and set that man free. That seemed to me to be a very extraordinary case, and if the Minister of Justice followed that precedent he would not have very much difficulty in dealing with the present case. I merely mention this to show that the report of Mr. Justice Ritchie was in that case laid before the House and was not regarded as confidential. It may be that there are good reasons for regarding such reports as confidential but at first blush these reasons do not present themselves to my mind. I am ready however to be convinced. In the present case, as I understand from the presentation of it made by my hon. friend (Mr. Ward) the prisoner stoutly declares his innocence and does not want any pardon, because he says he is not guilty. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Ward) if he asks for a new trial in the courts or for a hearing before the Minister of Justice.

Mr. WARD. A new trial in the courts.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would infer from the remarks of the Minister of Justice that such was not the case. This man has brought to the attention of the government, as I understand, some new facts which were not brought out in the trial and he asks, not that he shall be pardoned because he declares himself to be innocent, but having regard to the new facts which he says he can disclose, he asks that the Crown shall give him a new trial in the courts. That is all he does ask, under all circumstances it seems to me it is not a very unreasonable request for this man to prefer. I would ask the government to take it further into consideration. It is rather an unusual case that a man should reject absolutely the idea of receiving a pardon and should want to demonstrate his innocence in the courts. If there be anything at all in his assertion that he has new facts to disclose and additional evidence to offer, it seems to me that it may be a case deserving of the consideration of the government. I do not understand that the former statute which provided for a new trial in such cases has been repealed. Therefore there is no difficulty, so far as the power of the government is concerned, and this case seems to present unusual aspects which do call for the intervention of the Crown.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I might recall, if I may be permitted, a discussion which took place a few days ago on a cognate subject, in which the practice of the Department of Justice in this country and the practice in Great Britain was reviewed. The Minister of Justice stated, I believe without contradiction, that the reports of judges in cases similar to this one are always made by request of the Department, whereas in capital cases the judge is always bound to make a report of the proceedings to the department. The Minister of Justice did not contend the other day, nor does he to-day, that in all cases, with absolutely no exception, these reports are confidential, but I am not aware that, outside of capital cases, any report of a judge has been brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There does not seem to be much distinction.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In a capital case the judge is bound by law to make a report to the Department of Justice. In other cases, if an application for mercy is made, invariably, even in minor cases, the opinion of the judge who tried the case is sought and has always been treated as confidential by the department.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They are in the same category except that in one case the judge is bound by law to do what in the other case he does at the request of the Department of Justice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What a man does by law he does under the sanction of the law and takes the consequences, but in a case of this kind the opinion of the judge is asked simply because he is conversant with the facts and the practice of the department, and also I understand the practice in England, has been to treat that as confidential. In capital cases, however, the Minister of Justice, I understand, does not claim that this confidence is absolutely sacred. There are occasions when it is imperative to bring down the report of the judge. He cited the Riel case and the Shortiss case. There was another case in which the rule was departed from, and the report of the judge was brought down. I forget the name, but I remember the circumstances very well. The body of a man who had been shot dead was found on a country road. The contents of his basket had not been touched and his pockets had not been rifled, so that there was evidently no motive of profit. The man was not known in the locality to anybody, and therefore the motive could not be revenge. A boy of sixteen or seventeen years of age was placed on trial, and was convicted on circumstantial evidence. He was the son of a fisherman, and it was shown that he had taken one of the small leaden pellets used by fishermen to sink their nets, and the wadding of the gun was a weekly newspaper published at Boston and sent to the boy's father every week. The circumstances showed clearly that the boy had been guilty of the killing and he was convicted by the jury. His counsel did not avail himself of the provision of the law which allowed the boy to give evidence. After he had been convicted, the Minister of Justice and those responsible for his life were curious to know what could have induced the boy to commit such a crime. He made a confession to his pastor—I think he was of the Methodist persuasion—to the effect that he had taken one of the pellets off his father's nets and put it into his pocket in case he might shoot a bear. He thought he saw a bear, but when he came near it he saw that it was a cow, and in his excitement he forgot to uncock the gun and in trailing it after him he shot the man, who was at some distance. He was sure that no one had seen him, and he thought that his best defence was to deny. But after the trial he made this confession to his pastor, which had all the characteristics of truth. Therefore it appeared that while he had shot the man he was not guilty of murder, and therefore he was given a full pardon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What I suggested was that the unusual considerations which the right hon. gentleman has mentioned were considerations for the jury, not for the government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If they had been presented to the jury, well and good, but they had not been presented to the jury. Under the circumstances, we laid the whole of the papers before the House. With regard to the present motion, the Minister of Justice, I think, has made a very fair suggestion, that the motion be amended by inserting the words 'not confidential' after the word 'papers,' and when the papers are brought down my hon. friend will see whether he should persevere in his demand for a new trial.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln). I do not know much of the details of this case, but I can hardly agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) in the position he has taken. If he is not certain whether this man had a jury trial or not, and if this man still protests his innocence and asks for a new trial before a jury, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) is taking a very serious responsibility in refusing that appeal. I understand him to say that he does not believe in having cases re-tried before the department or having the department interfere with the decision of a court and reversing it. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in that view, but the department is not asked to try the case. And the fact that this man although he has been in jail three years, is not asking for mercy, is rather in his favour. I have more sympathy with the man who, although he has been in jail three years, still protests his innocence and asks for a jury trial, than I would with a man who asks for clemency. The fact that this man says that he did not steal those cattle and wants to have the evidence threshed out again before his neighbours in that part of the country where he was supposed to have committed the offence, ought to tell in his favour, and I think that the hon. minister (Mr. Aylesworth) is taking an arbitrary stand when he says that this man must acknowledge his guilt and ask for clemency before anything will be done for him. Every man is entitled to a fair trial. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) says that this man got it, as far as he knows. But what harm would be done if this man were given a new trial before a jury? It is said that new evidence has come forward since his conviction. If so, he should get the benefit of that evidence.

A word as to the confidential or non-confidential character of the reports of judges. I have had experience in cases of this kind during some twenty years, and my experience is that what a judge has to do in public is better done than what he does in private. Judges are human, and they will say and write things confidentially that they would not publicly. I am not at all inferring that they will not, when making confidential reports, say what is true, but what I mean is that they would be more careful when their reports are public and consequently open to criticism. I am not quarrelling with the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in the distinction he draws between a report solicited and one which is not solicited. But why should a report on a capital case be not confidential and a report on another case be confidential? Is there no other reason than that the one is unsolicited and the other is not? They both come under the duties of the judges. The statute requires a judge to make a report in a capital case. It also requires him, when he is asked for it, to make in a report in a case which is not capital. In both cases his opinion is given on the question whether the man should be set at liberty or be given a new trial. If what he says in a capital case should not be confidential, I cannot see why the same rule should not apply to his report in a non-capital case. In the present instance ten years sentence was imposed upon this man; and I think that what ought to be done, even if this amendment be accepted, is to give the judges to understand that when they report in any criminal case, whether that be a capital case or a minor case, their reports shall not be confidential.

Mr. W. A. GALLIHER (Kootenay). I do not know the merits or demerits of this particular case in question, but I wish to make one or two statements regarding the matter. For some years I lived in the section of country which my hon. friend (Mr. Herron) represents, and during that time I acted in a great many cases as crown prosecutor.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Were the prisoners always acquitted?

Mr. GALLIHER. Possibly. My hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Herron) will agree with me that a great many of the offences tried, during my time at least—that is between 1888 and 1896—were for cattle stealing or cattle killing, and my hon. friend will bear me out when I say that it was very difficult to obtain a conviction against the parties accused. And although my hon. friend the leader of the opposition jocosely referred to the fact that possibly all these men were acquitted during my term as crown prosecutor, I might say, without being egotistical, that I believe I was the first crown prosecutor in that section who actually did secure a conviction for cattle stealing. In any event the manner in which their cattle were being rustled—that is stolen or killed—sometimes by Indians and often by white men,—became a very serious matter to the ranchers. The law was then—and I presume, while administered by the Dominion government, continued to be up to 1904, the date at which this man was tried—that in cases where the value of the property stolen did not exceed $500, or it may have been $300, the case was not one for trial by jury. It was not a case in which the prisoner could exercise any option at all. He had to be tried summarily before a judge. That was the law all the time I was there. So, as to the fairness of this prisoner's trial, I presume that he was tried under the law as it existed, and before a judge but without a jury. As I say, I have no remarks to make as to the justice or injustice of the sentence, except the remark in passing that a sentence of ten years does seem severe. I think this case was tried by a certain judge and that it was the first case of cattle stealing brought before him, and that this sentence had a very salutary effect throughout that ranching country. Of course, that does not alter the fact that the man may have been innocent. I am simply stating a fact concerning the condition of the country, which, I am sure, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Herron) will agree with me in saying did exist at that time.

Mr. JOHN HERRON (Alberta). I have had many letters from my riding with reference to this case within the last two years. The man's brother and some other relatives have been requesting me to take the matter up with the Minister of Justice, and I have had similar requests from all kinds of people in that neighbourhood. I remember the trial, and know all the circumstances surrounding the case at that trial. Many people in that section of the country think that that man was very unjustly punished, and have been asking for a new trial. I presented their request to the Minister of Justice on one or two occasions, but without much hope of a new trial. I believe this is a case in which injustice has been done to a prisoner. I have been told that there is new evidence to be brought forward. I think the government will be doing justice if it gives the matter further consideration and grants the new trial.

Mr. GALLIHER.

Mr. WARD. I am satisfied to accept the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth). At the same time, I would like to ask him if he would allow me to look at these judges' reports. He offered, in his previous remarks, to allow the whole file to be examined, but if he would allow me to look at these reports it might assist in the determination of the matter. I need not quote the section of the Criminal Code to my hon. friend—as I am sure he is aware of it—to show that he has the power we are asking him to exercise and to grant a new trial before a judge and jury. After I had concluded my remarks here this afternoon a sworn declaration was handed me, made out as late as the 13th instant, in connection with this case, saying that there is new evidence. The evidence goes to show that this man Train was seen with a bunch of cattle, I think, on the day previous to that when the mounted police discovered him in the killing of them. He was seen driving them between two points, and, as I understand, this declaration says that these points were from the direction of the cattle of Mr. G. Lane, of Calgary. In the face of these declarations, and of other new evidence coming up, I think it is only right that the minister should take into his most serious consideration whether a new trial should not be granted. And I shall be very glad to go over this declaration and other facts that I have in my possession with him with that end in view. Therefore, I accept the amendment of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Ward) has expressed a desire to see personally the reports of the judges in this case. I have no objection except on the ground of the effect which the publication of such a report, even to one individual, must have upon the minds of the judges themselves. It is a favour on the part of the judge to make a report in a case of this kind. We ask him to do us that favour, and, of course, to report confidentially. If it should become the custom to make public these reports by bringing them down in this House, the judges would either decline to make these reports altogether or they would take great care to say nothing in any report that they would object to having published. In that way the reports would cease to have value. Now, the judges know that they are speaking confidentially and are free to express their opinions about witnesses and others as they never would do, and never could be asked to do, if the reports were to be made public. I am willing in the present case to show the reports to my hon. friend, but I must ask him to treat them as absolutely confidential.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). Perhaps it might be advisable to amend the Criminal Code, and impose upon the judges the duty of making these reports. I do not see why such a report should be asked as a favour from a judge of the land. The change I suggest would not interfere with continuing to regard the reports confidentially, should that be considered the best course, as I think it is. But it certainly does seem a little anomalous for the government, the Crown, in whom is vested the pardoning power, to have to ask a judge as a favour that which it should be free to demand from him as a right.

Motion as amended, agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MR. R. A. E. LEECH.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice to the government that at an early day, on motion to go into Supply, it is my intention to move a resolution condemning the appointment of Mr. R. A. E. Leech as superintendent of the distribution of seed grain in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

At six o'clock the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1908.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 101) respecting the Fort William Terminal Railway and Bridge Company.—Mr. Macpherson.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT—MANITOBA APPEALS.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 102) to amend the Winding-up Act. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to amend the Winding-up Act to make provision as to the court before which appeals should be taken in the province of Manitoba. In the province of Ontario, and in the province of Quebec, there is an Appellate tribunal, the appeal is to the Appellate Court. In the province of Manitoba, although the Court of Appeal has now been established the appeal remains to the court en banc. This amendment is introduced at the instance of the Attorney General of Manitoba in order to confer Appellate jurisdiction upon the Court of Appeal of the province of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read first time.

2. What action does the government propose taking in the matter?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General) :

1. Yes.
2. It is impossible for this department to consent to any arrangement, which would put the American weekly papers on the same footing as dailies. The daily papers have been found by experience to be unobjectionable, but, owing to difference in classification, the United States department allow many weeklies in their mails, which are not newspapers, but are practically advertising matter, and which this department could not allow in the Canadian mails. To allow the weeklies in would be to open the gates to the mass of worthless advertising matter against which this department felt compelled to take action a year ago, and which, owing to the action, has been cleared out of the Canadian mails entirely.

The publishers of Canadian weeklies can, however, send their newspapers to offices in the United States, where they may be mailed to their destination at the rate of one cent per pound.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

FRENCH COPY OF DEBATES—DELAY IN DELIVERY TO MEMBERS.

Mr. H. S. BELAND (Beauce). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the adjournment of the House with a view to discussing the question of the issuing of the French speeches within twenty-four hours of their delivery in this House.

You will remember, Sir, that at yesterday's sitting a number of speeches were delivered in French, that part of the debate having ended about five o'clock in the afternoon, which sitting, in accordance with the rule laid down for Wednesdays, was adjourned at six o'clock. Now, if hon. gentlemen will refer to yesterday's 'Hansard,' page 3570, they will find the following entry:—

Messrs. Ethier, Boyer and Rivet having also spoken in French, the report of their speech will appear in the next issue.

Now, I contend that such an announcement is the indication of an intolerable state of things, requiring the application of some prompt and effective remedy. We had always understood that French and English were on the same footing, and that the report of the House of Commons' Debates was to give out simultaneously the speeches delivered in both languages. I say then that we should endeavour to find out the reason of the existence of such a state of things with a view to correcting it. What is the reason of the delay in the present instance ? Does the fault lie with the Printing Bureau; is it so poorly equipped, so short of help that it finds it impossible to issue the French copy of the Debates within twenty-four hours ?

Does the fault lie with the staff of shorthand writers ? We have two French stenographers, and I have reason to believe that, in the present instance, they have very well done their work and forwarded, from time to time, as required, to the Printing Bureau, copies of their extended shorthand notes, in such a way that it would have been possible to include them in the morning's issue of the report, which comes out, I believe, about ten or eleven o'clock. So the fault does not lie with the staff of reporters, and we have to look for it somewhere else. The last folio was forwarded to the Printing Bureau early this morning, notwithstanding which, this morning's 'Hansard' is minus the speeches of Messrs. Ethier, Boyer and Rivet.

It is quite clear then that the reporters are not responsible for this delay ; they have done all that it was possible for them to do. I realize that there are only two of them to report the speeches delivered in the French language, and should subsequently that number be found inadequate, it may be incumbent on us to increase it. I understand, however, that the English-speaking typographers are unable to set up type for the French copy, while the French-speaking typographers do both French and English work. Hence the delay, when the latter are not numerous enough to cope with the work in both languages. I say that such a state of things is absolutely intolerable, and should be brought to the attention of the proper authorities, in order that steps be taken toward its improvement. If the number of French-speaking typographers is insufficient, it should be increased, so as to give complete satisfaction to members who prefer to express themselves in French, as they have the perfect right to do.

If this was the first occurrence of the kind, I would not have moved the adjournment of the House to discuss the matter. But on a previous occasion, the exact date of which escapes me, the issuing of a French speech was very much delayed for the same reason.

Therefore I think it is my duty to move the adjournement of the House.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE (Montmagny). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if I am allowed, I wish to say a few words in support of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland). The hon. member's complaint is perfectly well founded, and voices, I believe, the feelings of the French members of the House, and those of the English members as well.

I am informed, from a reliable source, that the extended shorthand notes of the French speeches delivered yesterday in this House were forwarded to the Printing Bureau quite early. The two French stenographers having stayed up through the night to extend their shorthand notes, should not be held responsible for this delay. If there is any one to blame, it is the Printing Bureau.

Besides, as stated by the hon. member for Beauce, this is not the first time that we are met with a similar difficulty. A couple of years ago, I believe, when the question of the autonomy of the Northwest provinces was being discussed, a day or two elapsed before the report of a French sitting was issued.

My hon. friend from Beauce is unwilling or unable to point out a remedy. He is content with stating that the fault rests with the Printing Bureau. Now, to my mind, the remedy is easy enough to apply. A year or two ago, I requested the House to appoint a French-speaking superintendent at the Printing Bureau. True, a Mr. Draper was appointed, but he should be looked upon as an English-speaking superintendent. The Printing Bureau is a sort of state department, the same as the library, and it should be under the control of two officers, one to look after the French printing and the other after the English printing. If I remember well, the appointment of Mr. Draper was recommended by the Debates Committee.

We have had last year, that unfortunate matter relating to the Revised Statutes of Canada, the French edition of which is yet unfinished, since its index is not yet published, although a whole year has almost elapsed. It seems to me it would be a small matter, indeed, to appoint a French superintendent. As to the printing of the French Hansard, this also is subjected to unaccountable delays. As much as five weeks will sometimes elapse before it is distributed to us. The people of the province of Quebec as well as the French speaking population of the other provinces suffer a serious prejudice. It seems to me it is incumbent upon the debates committee to interfere. The government itself should take immediate steps, in seeing that a sufficient number of French printers are employed, so that the work is proceeded with as expeditiously and intelligently as is done for the English language.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two-Mountains). (Translation). I am personally interested in the question which has just been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend for Beauce (Dr. Béland). I had not intended to bring about this discussion, but since I am offered an opportunity to do so, I will join in with the hon. member for Beauce, and with the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. A. Lavergne) in supporting the remarks they have just offered on this subject. Mention was made of the Debates Committee, of which I have the honour to be a member for some years past. That committee as was stated by the hon. member for Montmagny, recommended a couple of years ago, the appointment of a French superintendent at the Printing Bureau, to look over especially the printing of French documents. A similar question was also raised before the committee, as to the employment of French printers in sufficient number to ensure a quicker and better, and more effective service. We had come to the conclusion that the number of French printers was inadequate, and that the English printers were unable to perform the work required for the printing of the French documents.

My hon. friend for Montmagny has also alluded to the translator's staff and to the delay incurred in the distribution of the French 'Hansard.' It is true that we often receive that version two or three weeks after the distribution of the English revised edition, but I want to tell the House that the fault does not lie with the translators, who are placed under the control of the Debates Committee. These translators, eight in number, invariably do their work within the twenty-four hours, which follow the reception of the English unrevised. It often happens that the sittings of the House are unusually long, and that their work piles up at the rate of upwards of 50 pages. In every case each man takes his share, and works till morning, if necessary, in order that the French copy shall be sent immediately to the printer. It follows logically that the translation is not the cause of the undue delay incurred in the distribution of the French 'Hansard.' Just as in this particular case, I insist upon stating that the French reporters are not to blame for the delay, because the last copy from the shorthand notes was sent to print this morning at 7 o'clock. These reporters worked all night transcribing their notes, so that the 'Hansard' should not be delayed. How is it that when the House sits till three or four o'clock in the forenoon? the English unrevised is invariably distributed about 11 o'clock in the forenoon? There is unquestionably something defective in the management of the Printing Bureau. Some reform there is urgently needed. I, for one, don't see why two or three French speeches, covering hardly three or four pages of the 'Hansard' should have been left out, when all copy had been sent to print before 7 o'clock in the morning, especially when we get every day and without any such delay, the English unrevised, which covers 15 to 20 pages.

It is time that this question should be settled once for all. In fact, were we to speak French in this House two or three times a week as was done yesterday, the same thing would happen over again, and we would be placed under the obligation of waiting days and days before being acquainted with these French speeches, which can no longer be tolerated. I will say one word in conclusion about the manner in which the following notice was inserted in the 'Hansard':

Messrs. Ethier, Boyer and Rivet, also addressed the House in French. The report of their speeches will appear in a later edition.

I wonder if the printer that got up this thing, makes a specialty of this style of notices, but to my mind it is of very bad taste. It seems to me he could have devised some other linear drawing for framing this addenda.

I hope some good result will ensue from this debate and that such delays will not occur again in the future, also that the report of the French speeches will be printed concurrently with the English speeches.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation). I join in with my hon. friend to ask that this grievance should be remedied by the proper authority. I desire to make a remark which seems to us of some importance. The French members do not enjoy the privilege of questioning the witness in their own tongue, before the various committees of this House, whether the Railway Committee or the Banking and Commerce Committee or Public Accounts Committee. They would not be understood. Every committee should be provided with stenographers and translators, which would allow French members to speak their mother tongue. I have nothing to add. I hope due regard will be given to the desire so earnestly expressed by the French Canadian members of this House. I hope the hon. Prime Minister will see his way clear to grant our request. I have enough confidence in him to think that he will heed the movement undertaken this day, and that he will be able to give satisfaction to all the members for the province of Quebec.

Mr. J. C. WALSH (St. Ann's, Montreal). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I wish to add one word to what has just been stated.

As an English-speaking member of this House I must state that I have a real grievance vs. somebody, and here is the reason why: Although my riding is not immediately interested in this matter, there came from one of my constituents a request for a copy of the speeches delivered yesterday by my French colleagues, and I was unable to comply with his demand. I was compelled to write that I could not be agreeable to him for the time being as I did not have at hand a report of those speeches.

As I stated before, there lies a real grievance. I do not wish to blame any one in particular, but I do not think that the fault lies with the French reporters who are, I must say, very intelligent and very painstaking. Besides the objection raised by our French-speaking colleagues I believe that we the English-speaking members are bound to protest against this state of affairs.

A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but as the hon. member for Montmagny (A. Levergne) mentioned the name of a gentleman with whom I am personally acquainted, I mean the appointment of Mr. P. M. Draper as superintendent at the Printing Bureau, I wish to make a few remarks on the subject matter. In the first place, I must state that Mr. Draper is not superintendent of the Bureau, and I will say moreover that the fault does not lie with him if the French printing is not delivered as expeditiously as would suit the hon. members of this House. I am aware of the great difficulty, which has almost always existed, of taking on French printers at the Bureau. It is usually contended that there is no vacancy and insufficient work. The present discussion proves the necessity of increasing the staff of French printers. I am also aware of the fact that some of the chief officers of that institution do not pull together and that that state of things should be brought to an end as soon as possible, not only in the interest of the French language, but of the English language as well.

The head of that department is the Hon. R. W. Scott, and he is very hard of access to the members of this House who may have grievances to lay before him. But I have great confidence in the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who will undoubtedly lay our claims before his colleague. I hope a quick remedy will be applied to the state of things now prevailing at the National Printing Bureau, and if French printers are needed they will be easily secured as I know of thousands who are actually idle.

The Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is a very regrettable matter indeed which the hon. member from Beauce (Dr. Beland) has brought to the attention of the House. Three of the French speeches delivered yesterday have not been recorded in 'Hansard' with the balance of the report of that sitting. The responsibility must lay on some one and this must be found out as well as the cause for this unusual state of things. It must be found out whether or not the French reporters sent their copy to the Printing Bureau in the proper time, and for this matter the Debates Committee of the House is the proper channel to investigate. On the other hand whether or not the Bureau is at fault lies with the government to elucidate. If I am not mistaken, it is contended that the copy from the shorthand notes was delivered this morning at 7 o'clock. In this case, it would be hard to hold the Printing Bureau responsible for the delay, since the 'Hansard' is supposed to be distributed in the House at 8 o'clock a.m., so that members coming here may peruse it between 9 and 10 o'clock. At all events, I am pleased that the question was raised before the House, and the government will spare no pains to see if the National Printing Bureau is at fault.

J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Debates Committee, I must thank my hon. friend from Beauce (Dr. Beland) for affording us an opportunity to bring to the attention of this House the defects which exist, and which must be remedied, spare no pains to see if the National Printing Bureau is at fault.

It happens that these speeches are sometimes printed after the others and here is the reason for this delay: We have only two French reporters and, as in yesterday's case, for instance, despite their skill and competence, they were almost physically unable to send their copy to print at an earlier hour than they did. I got this information from one of the English reporters on 'Hansard.' I do not mean, however, by this remark that their number must be increased. As to the appointment of a French superintendent at the Printing Bureau, I must say that the question was raised more than once before the Debates Committee. But this committee, Sir,—and I call more specially the attention of the right hon. the leader of the House to this point—does not seem to enjoy enough powers. It sat very little in the past three years, except for the appointment of its chairman. Its reports were few, and the reason seems to be that there exists a misunderstanding between the Debates Committee and the Committee on Internal Economy of this House. This difficulty should be settled as soon as possible.

Now, I notice that there are numerous complaints vs. the manner in which the French 'Hansard' is handled. The French version is only delivered to us two or three weeks after the debate has taken place; it follows that this publication is almost useless. Thus the speeches delivered on February 6, on an important question are not yet published in French. If the report of the House lost much of its importance in late years, it was owing to the fact that we have departed from the real object of the 'Hansard,' of the 'Hansard' such as we understood it when first established, that is the publication from day to day of the speeches such as they were delivered. This version was only revised for the purpose of correcting fault in grammer.

You would be surprised, Mr. Speaker, if I were to lay before you some of the alterations tendered in to-day to the printer under the name of corrections. Entire pages are added, while whole half pages are struck out, and later on, on reading the bound Hansard there will not be a true report of the utterances delivered in this House. Time is required to make these changes and the result is that the revised edition only comes out eight or ten days later. The translation is made from this revise, and this explains how it is that the French 'Hansard' is only published two or three weeks after the speeches are delivered. I hope the government will see fit to lend a helping hand to the Debates Committee in bringing about the reforms which are so urgently needed.

As has just been stated by my hon. friend from Two Mountains (Mr. Etheir) who is also a member of the committee, we can almost do nothing, having been deprived of most of our powers. Whether it is due to the chairman or to other members, the Debates Committee seldom puts in a report, and at all events, the matter is worth while being looked into.

I must offer my thanks to the hon. member for Beauce. It is fair that such questions as these are brought from time to time to the attention of parliament, in order to fix responsibilities.

STEAMSHIP SUBSIDY TO FRANCE.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House will on Friday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution :

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to enter into a contract for a term not exceeding ten years with any individual or company, for the performance of a steamship service between a port or ports in Canada and a French port or ports, on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council deems expedient, and to grant therefor a subsidy based upon a minimum service of eighteen round voyages a year, and a subsidy therefor not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, and so in proportion for a more frequent service.

He said : His Excellency having been informed of the subject-matter of this resolution commends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

THE FRANCO-CANADIAN TRADE TREATY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding for the first reading of Bill (No. 57) respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the President of the French republic.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John). Mr. Speaker, we have frequently heard the statement that there is no sentiment in business, but certainly in a matter of this kind I can very well realize that there may be some sentiment, because we have here a rapprochment with a country with which a large number of the members of this House are closely identified, whose language they speak and in whose history and traditions they are warmly interested, so that naturally among one section of the members of this House there would be a sentiment in favour of any treaty with France. I can appreciate any such feeling, for I know that under similar circumstances I would probably be imbued with the same feeling.

Apart from any sentimental feeling, when we come to consider the business aspect of this treaty, to consider it as a bargain which has been made between France and Canada, one can hardly examine the treaty without coming to the conclusion that it should be called rather a convention or treaty to facilitate the imports of French products into Canada than a reciprocal arrangement whereby the products of each country would find an equal advantage in the ports of the other. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) himself has practically confessed to that condition of affairs, because he has told us that the benefits which may accrue to Canada would appear rather in the future than at present. That is how I think it strikes the statesmen of France themselves, because in the few reports that I have seen of the transactions in the French Chamber of Deputies of France the only criticism made of this treaty was that possibly the lower tariff on the item of boots and shoes might cause the importation into France of such a large quantity of boots and shoes as to imperil some of the manufactories of those articles in France. We can hardly consider that as a strong objection, because the duty on boots and shoes under the French general tariff is to-day only about 10 cents a pair, and the value of shoes imported by France from Canada last year was only $441. This is hardly worth considering, so that if we take into consideration the fact that this is the only criticism made by French statesmen upon this treaty, we may take it for granted that those who negotiated this treaty on behalf of France are certainly very well satisfied with the bargain they have made.

Our imports from France last year for nine months to March 31 were $6,679,349, while the exports to France from Canada for the same period were $1,409,572. Taking that average for the twelve months it would make the imports for the year $8,905,798, while our exports would only amount to $1,879,429. If we are to accept the statement that was laid before this House during this session, that the amount of imports over exports was the amount of profit made on these exports in foreign countries, these figures would indicate that we have been doing a very flourishing and successful trade with France, a trade which has given us great profit, a profit to the extent of 500 per cent. I think the statement I have just made is sufficient to show that that theory will hardly pass muster as a correct theory with regard to the effect of excess of imports over exports. This treaty is calculated to increase the great disparity which now exists between our exports to France and our imports from France, for the very reason that we have been giving to France special terms, much better terms than are given under the intermediate treaty on these very articles which France is especially adapted to produce, which she manufactures and exports to a very great extent and which we may call specialties of that country. Of what do they consist? They consist of such articles as fish packed in oil, sardines, sparkling and still wines, pharmaceutical and chemical preparations, proprietary medicines. On pharmaceutical and chemical preparations, proprietary medicines, laces, embroideries, velvets, silks and ribbons, which the French people manufacture and sell very largely, France is given a large reduction in our tariff rate. Then, French books of fiction are accorded a reduction of 40 per cent and French magazines get a reduction of 50 per cent, while I cannot find any mention of books in schedule A, so that we do not know on what terms Canadian books and magazines are admitted to the French market, although I suppose we must infer that they are given no special privilege. As opposed to these special terms which are given to France on her own particular industries and manufactures, the principal products of Canada which are the products of the farm —live stock, poultry, wheat, grain of various kinds, cattle, horses, the products of the fisheries, fresh and dried fish, and the products of the forest—are not given any privilege which is likely to develop trade in them between France and Canada. On wheat and other grains we have absolutely no advantage given to us; they are subject to the French general tariff which applies to every nation in the world in the same degree that it applies to us. We are, therefore, absolutely cut out of this treaty as regards our principal lines of export. On horses over five years of age a duty of nearly $30 is exacted in France, and on colts the duty is about $10. The tariff exacted by France for Canadian cattle is nearly 2 cents per pound live weight.

An hon. MEMBER. Is that the minimum?

Mr. DANIEL. That is the minimum. The French tariff on steers and bulls is from $18 to $20; on preserved meats in tins and extracts of meats it is 2½ cents per pound including the tin. Although we exported no cheese to France last year the duty remains at over 2 cents per pound; on butter, 2 cents per pound; on fresh fish, 2 cents per pound, while on dried fish, strange to say, the duty is 4 cents a pound, which one would think is almost as much as the article is worth. The duty on cowhides is over 2 cents a pound, and it is 11 cents a pound on the uppers of boots or shoes, not varnished. Therefore, so far as these agricultural products are concerned, we get practically no benefit because the duties that still remain are so high that I do not see where we are going to reap an advantage. Speaking of the duties on sparkling and still wines having been reduced, I might recall to the memory of the Minister of Finance that when in the debate on the address the leader of the opposition stated that the duty on champagne was reduced the Minister of Finance told him he was mistaken. I have not seen any correction of his assertion yet made by the Minister of Finance, but there is no doubt in the world that the 30 per cent ad valorem duty was taken off under this special tariff, and I think I am correct in saying that the duty on champagne was reduced by that much. With reference to proprietary medicines, we imported them from France last year to the value of about $40,000. On our side we have not the privilege, if it may be considered a privilege, of exporting one single dollar's worth of proprietary medicines to France nor will France allow any of these medicines to enter her country. In that respect France shows more concern than does Canada for the health and pockets of her people, for I might direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that under this treaty that well-advertised remedy which is said to have saved the valuable life of that well-known statesman, the Hon. John Costigan, will be absolutely prohibited from entering France, and its operations, if I may use the term, will be confined to the senators and people of Canada. That seems an anomaly since our Canadian statesmen advertise it as one of the greatest remedies under the sun.

Mr. FIELDING. It is so good that we must keep it as a monoply for ourselves.

Mr. DANIEL. As to absinthe, which receives special favours in its admission into Canada under this treaty, I wish to refer to it because I believe it to be a very deleterious article and one which this government might very well refuse to admit into Canada under any circumstances whatever. The 'New Universal' encyclopedia describes absinthe as follows :

A liqueur much used in France, prepared from alcohol mixed with volatile oil of wormwood, oil of anise and other ingredients. It has peculiarly intoxicating effects which are due to the oil of wormwood, the state resulting from the use being very different from the result of alcohol poisoning. Trembling, vertigo, fearful dreams and epileptiform convulsions are among its severest consequences. Absinthe drinking is among the most dangerous forms of stimulation yet invented, the more so because its immediate consequences are usually more agreeable than those of alcohol.

I think the government might draw the thin red line through that word to the advantage of the country, saving our people from one other means of getting headaches, and weakend nerves, opportunities for which we have already in plenty in this country without importing another one from France.

There is another matter to which I shall only refer in passing, because it will probably be dealt with more at length later on; that is, the effect which the reduction of the duty on light wines will have on the wine industry of this country. I understand that one-third of the whole product of the grapes in Canada is turned into wine; my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) who comes from a part of the country where grapes are largely grown, says that the proportion is even larger. The reduction of duty on light wines will certainly have a deleterious effect on this industry.

Another important feature of this treaty is that the importations into this country from France as well as the importations into France from this country must be direct. There are some who do not take a favourable view of this feature; but to my mind that is the one respect in which the two countries have come out equal, the one gaining no advantage over the other—the only point in which our side have not lost, but simply held their own. I imagine that France insisted on having all importations from Canada go direct, or otherwise be subject to an extra tax; so that our negotiators could do nothing less than say in reply, if that is the case, we will give you certain reductions and certain privileges in our market provided French goods also come to us direct. It has been objected that if that happens there will be no competition in the winter time and no competition by sea. So far as the railways are concerned, if these products come by way of the Intercolonial, we have already heard time and time again that there is no railway in Canada on which the rates are so low as they are on the Intercolonial. I had the opportunity a year ago of showing that the rates from St. John say to Toronto were less than the rates to the same place from either New York or Boston. So that so far as railway rates are concerned, there is nothing in that argument. With regard to the rates by sea, as the steamship lines are subsidized by the country it appears to me that the government will have full control over the rates, and will be able to put an embargo or any undue enhancement of them.

As regards other objections, such as probable delays from snow storm, I think they need only to be mentioned to be thrown aside. A couple of years ago there were heavy snow storms on the line of the Intercolonial Railway; last year the railway lines in the Northwest were blocked by heavy snow storms; this year the province of Ontario has had a similar experience, such places as Toronto and Ottawa having been for days without a train in or out. These climatic occurrences are to be found in all parts of the country, with about equal frequency.

Another objection made was that perhaps resentment might be occasioned by discrimination. Well, Sir, you cannot have a tariff without discrimination; tariff means discrimination. But to my mind the tariff is not a discrimination against any other country, but is a discrimination in favour of our own. Under these circumstances, if discrimination so called is made, I do not see why it should not be made in favour of our own country. Take the example of the great country to the south of us. When the United States commenced housekeeping it consisted of a few states, scarcely more in number than we have of provinces at the present time. These states had a smaller population than we have at present and they were scattered, each having its own individuality, with desires adverse from those of every other state. What was the action of the United States? Among the first things they did was to put an extra duty of 10 per cent on all goods brought into that country in foreign bottoms, no mattter where they came from. That duty was put on in the latter part of the 18th century, and remained on the statute-book down to a very few years ago, if it is not there still. I could very well understand that at a time like that those interested in importing into the city of New York might very well say: this will not do; we are not large enough; we have no lines of our own; we should wait until we are larger and greater. But that course was not taken. The duty was put on, and that policy has continued from that time to this. So that at present there are plenty of lines running into the United States, and they have, by their policy of protecting all their interests—their agriculture, manufacturing, shipping interests and their ports—made themselves such a powerful nation that they have become in a sense the wonder and admiration of the whole world. Out of their great superabundance they are able to go into the markets of the world and compete on even terms against the greatest free trading nation in the world. We can therefore take as example that country, which began largely as our own did, which is similarly situated, and which notwithstanding the various and conflicting interests of its many component parts, has always acted from a national standpoint, has always protected its own interests, and has consequently developed into a powerful nation. The United States have had a single eye to their own interests regardless of the interests of any other country. Away back as far as 1823 they took it into their heads to impose an import duty of $3.75 per ton on French goods brought in French bottoms into the United States. They did not ask France what she thought about it, nor did France ever pass any resolution of non-intercourse on that question. Coming down to later times, it is not many years ago since the United States acquired Porto Rico. When they did so they brought Porto Rico under their navigation laws. By doing this the United States cut off a very large part of the shipping business of our maritime provinces, but they did this without consulting our interests. Take the law which they passed, and which came into effect on the 1st July, 1906, with regard to the Philippine Islands. I would here take the oportunity of reading the principle clause in this statute, so that this House may understand how very stringent it is :

> Be it enacted that on and after July 1, 1906, no merchandise except supplies for the army or navy shall be transported by sea under penalty of forfeiture thereof, between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States: But this section shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel between any port of the United States, and any port or place in the Philippine Archipelago, provided, that no merchandise other than that imported in such vessel from the same foreign port which has been specified on the manifest as for another port, and which shall not have been unloaded, shall be carried between a port of the United States and a port or place in Philippine Archipelago.

Another clause in the same statute provides :

> That after July 1, 1906, no foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, either directly or by way of a foreign port, under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

There you have a coasting voyage of about 7,000 miles, and that is the way the United States looks after its shipping interests and the interests of its ports ; and I do not know that the United States ever found it necessary to find fault with any other country for following its example. It is of equal importance that we should give every possible assistance we can, directly and indirectly, to our shipping interests. That interest is to-day a declining one. In 1874 we owned 1,158,363 tons of shipping. That went on increasing until 1879, when it reached the amount of 1,332,094. After that it began to diminish and has kept diminishing, until, in 1906, all the shipping we had under our register in Canada was 654,179 tons. That record carries its own lesson. While wooden hulls have had to give way to steel and iron, that is not the sole reason of the decline. Another reason is that the building of ships has never received that encouragement from this government and parliament which it should, and which it will be necessary for it to receive if it is ever to amount to anything and if we are ever to increase our tonnage either on our great lakes or on our sea coasts. Another indirect advantage of benefiting our shipping interests would be the assistance we would thereby give our own ports. I do not see any argument that can be made for assisting by our tariff foreign ports and railways when we have ports and railways of our own. So that looking over the whole treaty, and taking everything into consideration, we must come to the conclusion that France has got very much the better of the bargain. France reaps a large and present advantage, while we have to look to the future for anything we may get. There is nothing in the treaty, so far as I can see, to cause us to congratulate ourselves on getting anything out of it at present. At the same time, I make this reference to direct importation, either into our country or into France, because I think it well to emphasize the importance of doing all we can for our own vessels and railways and ports. In the short history of Canada it has already been demonstrated that free open ports all the year around are of vital interest to any country, and more especially to this ; and I have no doubt that, as the years roll by, history will repeat itself and show us again that the possession of these ports is vital to our very existence as a nation. One of the best means to build up these ports is by increasing their business. In this respect, Canada has simply held its own, while, with regard to the other matters, I think the gentlemen of France have got the better of our friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur). But perhaps the next time he may do a little better for Canada.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto). The details of this treaty are a mere matter of working out, but I wish to deal generally with the salient features which, it seems to me, are well worthy of comment. In the first place, it appears to me that very much of the benefit to the people of this country through the small preference which has been accorded to certain products of Canada will be neutralized because of the onerous conditions which attach to certain main features of the treaty. The margin of preference accorded to French products is very small, almost infinitesimal in some cases, and were it not for the important features of the treaty, I do not know that the people of Canada would be very much concerned in it. It appears to me that what the manufacturers, merchants, shippers and other business people, as well as the public at large, most require is performance and stability of tariff arrangements. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will agree with that—that what those engaged in manufacturing, or those of embarking in manufacturing, most need is a tariff not liable to be altered except on certain occasions and on certain well understood principles. When the tariff now in force in Canada was going through this House, it seemed to me that it was calculated to cause a feeling of unrest in the manufacturing and business community because of the variety of tariffs. We have the preferential tariff; we have the intermediate tariff; we have the general tariff. And now, under the operation of this treaty, we are to have a new tariff applying to a certain number of articles, which articles are taken from the general tariff and put in the schedule of this treaty, and it is provided that France should be entitled to the benefit of this particular preferential tariff with regard to these select items. All this makes the tariff less permanent. But, not satisfied with this, the promoters of this tariff, add a schedule—schedule 'C' it is called—which I think, is called a special tariff, and which provides special duties on certain enumerated articles—ten in number, I think. So, we have the new tariff applied to a certain number of things and we have the further special exceptional tariff provided for in schedule 'C,' which, to my mind, is more important than all the items contained in schedule B or the general preferential tariff, because contained in schedule 'C' are a number of items now being manufactured in Canada which are accorded a special reduction according to the provisions of that treaty. In addition to the uncertainty thus created, because of these exceptional tariffs, we find the effect of the treaty is to introduce the favoured nation clause, so that some thirteen countries can claim the same benefit that France takes under the new tariff as well as under the particular duties provided for in schedule 'C' of this treaty. Surely this must have the effect of unsettling trade conditions in the country. Where the same article is accorded different treatment when it comes in from any of thirteen different countries from that which it is accorded when it comes in from any other part of the world, and different even from that accorded under the British preference, you create insecurity which, sooner or later, must have a serious effect upon the industries of the country.

We find that the application of the general intermediate tariff is a matter of order in council—it is an order in council tariff. As pointed out by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) the wonder is why it was not applied to France by order in council. The government does not see fit to do it in that way, but that does not alter the fact that this is an order in council tariff. I think that the benefit to be secured by the people through this tariff, especially by the people living in the western portion of the Dominion, is not at all commensurate with the disadvantages which the unstable condition of tariff involve. I do not think the treaty under consideration is calculated to secure the stability and permanence of tariff which is so important in the interests of the people.

I regret that I cannot agree with my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) with regard to the port feature of this tariff. Before I make a few remarks on schedule 'C,' let me point out that paragraph 8 of this treaty provides as follows:

> To enjoy the benefits of the aforementioned tariff advantages, products originating in France, Algeria, the French colonies and possessions and the territories of the Protectorate of Indo-China, shall be conveyed without transhipment from a port of those territories or from a port of a territory enjoying the preferential tariff or intermediate tariff into a sea or river port of Canada.

Now, that certainly confines the benefit of this tariff to importations coming in at a sea or river port. I have seen, within a year, vessels unloading at the harbour of Toronto that had shipped their cargoes in the old country. There is a growing trade on the great lakes—especially now that vessels upon the lakes are being increased in size—direct between the ports on the lakes and the ocean ports in Britain and continental Europe. I cannot think that it was intended by the promoters of this treaty to shut out imports that might come direct from a French port to a port in the great lakes; but, as the treaty is drawn, such imports would certainly be excluded from its benefit. Now that we are deepening our canals, now that we are spending so much upon our highways, now that there is so much talk of the Georgian bay canal and further improvement of the St. Lawrence route from the great lakes, there should be no exceptional treatment in favour of sea and river ports. Whatever advantage is given should be extended to all ports, whether on the sea, on rivers, or on the great lakes of this country. I apprehend that that feature of it will be important, and as I read paragraph 8 the preference cannot be accorded to any goods that have been transhipped from a port enjoying the preferential tariff. I may be wrong on this but I would ask information from the minister. Take for instance a shipment of goods going from any French port to Liverpool, according to my reading of Article 8 of the treaty, if the shipment is transhipped it is debarred from the privileges of this treaty.

Mr. FIELDING. I think my hon. friend is mistaken. Goods may be shipped directly either from a French port or from a port enjoying the preferential tariff. Take, for instance, Liverpool, the port mentioned by my hon. friend. French goods going from France to England may be transhipped or even stored there if their identity is preserved. If there is proof of origin, they could be sent from English port to Canada by a hired steamer.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. That is not the language.

Mr. FIELDING. I think it is.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Nothing can be plainer than the language of paragraph 8 :

To enjoy the benefits of the aforementioned tariff advantages, products originating in France, Algeria, the French colonies and possessions and the territories of the Protectorate of Indo-China, shall be conveyed without transhipment from a port of those territories or from a port of a territory enjoying the preferential tariff or intermediate tariff into a sea or river port of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING. 'Or from a port of a territory enjoying the preferential tariff,' that is England.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. I quite concur in the construction the minister puts on the words he cites, but I use the words in the treaty, 'without transhipments.' If the goods are transhipped they are not entitled to the benefits of the treaty.

Mr. FIELDING. I entirely disagree; I think the language is just the opposite.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. If they are transhipped they lose the benefit.

Mr. FIELDING. If they are transhipped after they leave England.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. At any time, there is no restriction on the word 'transhipped.'

Mr. FIELDING. That was not the intention, and with all due respect to my hon. friend, he will see it does not bear that construction.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. I have read it over as a lawyer, not as a business man, and it seemed to me that that was the strict meaning of the words.

As to the port-to-port features of the treaty, I submit that this is not the time to enforce this policy nor are the goods which will come under the provisions of this treaty such goods as should be subjected to the port-to-port requirement. We have neither ocean nor land transportation facilities sufficient to give proper competition or a proper service to enable this policy to be successfully applied. I am informed that there is now but one line from France to Canada, running between Havre and St. John. Two boats of this line land at St. John in seven weeks. I understand that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries proposes to further subsidize some alternative route, either from Havre or another French port, which shall be more frequent and faster. We have not now adequate transportation facilities from the winter ports in Canada to the western sections of the country to justify that policy.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this government is now subsidizing a line from France?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. This line is subsidized to the extent of $120,000 a year. The service, however, is admittedly wholly inadequate; it is practically a monthly service. That service may be improved, but even if it is, I submit that we would still not have proper facilities for the carriage of freight between France and the western portions of Canada. There will not be sufficient transportation facilities to give competition or an effective and efficient service for the western part of Canada until the National Transcontinental Railway is completed. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), speaking last session in reference to a similar proposal, moved by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), plainly said that the time had not come for the application of a port-to-port clause regarding the preferential tariff. The application of his remarks is very wide, and in order that I may not misrepresent him, I shall quote an entire paragraph. At page 4326 of 'Hansard' he said :

But I look upon this motion as a completion of the policy which we inaugurated four years ago when we resolved to construct another transcontinental railway from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. When this railway is in operation, as by the terms of the contract it must be in operation in the month of December, 1911, then will be a fitting time to adopt this policy. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would not be disposed to agree altogether with the motion of my hon. friend if it is intended to apply it in the month of May, 1908: it will, however, fittingly apply in 1911 when the transcontinental railway will be completed.

Before moving an amendment the right hon. gentleman completed his remarks by saying :

But the proper time would not be in 1908, the proper time would be when our new railway is in operation.

The right hon. gentleman gave very cogent reasons in his speech for not adopting that clause a year ago—want of proper competition, proper facilities and so on. I apply all he said then to the existing condition to-day in regard to the French treaty. The service is inadequate both by land and sea. It does not afford that competition which the public are entitled to get. It seems to me that whatever benefit is going to be derived from the reduction of duties on goods imported from France, that benefit in so far as people living in Toronto and the west are concerned, will be reduced to a minimum and I prophesy that merchants in these localities will not take advantage of this treaty. The goods and articles which are coming in from France are the very last things which should be restricted in the manner in which this treaty restricts them by a port-to-port clause. We all know that the bulk of the importations from France are goods of a fancy nature, millinery, gloves and articles of fashion which are in fashion to-day and in a month are not in fashion. We know that wholesale millinery men and dealers in goods of French manufacture and origin bring their goods direct into this country ordering them by telegraph, and receiving them by express. The millinery openings are in the spring of the year. Shipments of these light goods from France come in the winter season and they have to be quick in their transportation, otherwise the season is lost. A week or ten days make a very great difference to the merchants in respect to these goods. Merchants in the west, who deal in French goods, will continue to bring them in by New York, they will pay the extra duty and they will get no benefit from the reduced duty. They will continue to pay the ordinary customs rates because they cannot get their goods in sufficient time. We cannot pretend that in this country we are as sure of winter transportation from St. John and Halifax as we are from New York. We know that the American, the White Star and other lines will ship goods from Paris to New York at the same rate that lines running to Canada will ship them at from Liverpool to Montreal, St. John or Halifax, so that, by getting the goods direct through New York you are getting them at the same rate but with greater expedition. We all agree with the desire to make our ports national ports. We all agree with the desire to make all the avenues of trade and commerce that serve the people of this country Canadian avenues. While I am not arguing against this condition of affairs for ever I say that to-day is not the time to put this imposition upon these goods, because we do feel that these are the very last goods which should be so handicapped or upon which this restriction should be so imposed. At the present time we have only one line of railway practically serving the ports of St. John and Halifax. The Intercolonial Railway, I suppose, is a competing line in a sense but in this House the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself referred to this as being a one line condition until the transcontinental railway is completed. There are merchants in portions of the country where they do not have these two great lines passing by their doors and where they are not able to get shipments over them. The Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway are the two lines having connection with these ports but in western Ontario the Canada Southern occurs to my mind which traverses the whole southern peninsula of Ontario and that is a line which has no connection with a Canadian seaport. It does not seem to me that an unfair discrimination will exist against those who were shut off from a line having direct connection with a seaport town.

I desire to refer for a moment to some opinions, better than my own, because they are the opinions of men who are to-day in business which are affected by this treaty. I have here a letter from what, in my opinion, is the largest wholesale dry goods house in Toronto. The writer says :

> The proviso that the shipment must be directly from a French port to a Canadian port will, for the present and until there is a more frequent shipping service do away with a great deal of the apparent benefit of the treaty.
> We also at present bring many lines f.o.b. Liverpool. This advantage will be done away with under the treaty.

That particular gentleman takes the same view of the treaty that I have taken to-day although without any conference with him. That has reference to the language of article 8. I have a letter from one of the largest shipping houses in Canada with agencies abroad, both on the continent and in all the large cities in Great Britain.

After referring to the disadvantage of the present treaty the writer says :

> In addition to this, there is the great delay to wholesale houses, particularly the millinery men, to which I have already alluded, and I feel satisfied, and my opinion has been strengthened by conversation with wholesale millinery men, that rather than run the risk of having their goods unnecessarily delayed during millinery openings, they will feel inclined to bring their goods via New York ports and pay the additional duty.

With the permission of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) I will read a part from a letter from this same gentleman addressed to himself protesting against this clause of the treaty. This is a part from a letter addressed to the hon. minister on the 15th of January last. Speaking of the port feature the writer says :

> This is commendable as inducing trade direct to our own country but at the present time shipping facilities being inadequate, it would be deferred until such time as a first-class steamship service could be inaugurated between France and Canadian seaports. As you are aware the present facilities are quite inadequate to cope with the situation and the expenses of transporting French shipments via boat or by rail to Liverpool or London are such that an increased cost of four or five per cent would be added to the present rate of freight, and already the terminal facilities at Montreal and Quebec are being taxed to such an extent, particularly last summer, as to cause the greatest delay in handling these, and I am fully satisfied that the wholesale millinery houses throughout Ontario would rather pay the full rate of duty than run the risk of having their spring and fall shipments delayed by the slow steamers direct, or the chance of missing connections by having them brought via London or Liverpool.

This firm handles the shipping for a large number of importing houses and this is the opinion that the writer expresses for the firm and for himself.

Mr. PATERSON. Has the hon. gentleman any objection to giving the names of his correspondents ?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. No I have no objection. This firm is W. Wingate & Johnston (Limited). Mr. Kerman who wrote the letter is the managing director of the company. They have agencies at London, Liverpool, Southampton, Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield and Paris, and their Canadian office is at Wellington Street East, Toronto.

Mr. PATERSON. Is it a shipping firm ?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. A shipping firm.

Mr. PATERSON. A forwarding firm—not traders ?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. No, but Mr. Kerman states that he has had interviews with traders and merchants whose goods he handles.

Mr. PATERSON. What were the other names, if you have no objection, of the parties whose letters you read before ?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. I do not care to mention these names. Now, the information which I have received on this question has come to me entirely voluntarily on the part of those who sent it, and so I did not seek information from the Toronto Board of Trade, but I understand that a memorial has been sent by that body to the Minister of Finance protesting against this feature of the treaty.

Mr. FIELDING. The statement of the hon. gentleman is perhaps correct. I received several communications on the subject but I cannot recall at the moment from whom they were received.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD. I have been told by the officers of the Toronto Board of Trade that they have memoralized the government in that direction.

Mr. FIELDING. It is correct if they say so.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Now, this is a matter of national importance and one which should not be viewed from any local standpoint. I do not think that the port of St. John or the port of Halifax or the port of Montreal should be alone considered in this matter, which after all is a question of the greatest good to the greatest number of the people of our whole Dominion. It is from that standpoint I wish to treat it. I have a letter here from a Montreal importer which says :

As Canada is presently situated, to my mind the application of the principle referred to, namely, that the benefits of the treaty shall only apply upon products carried by a direct line between a French and Canadian port, is not sound. To say the least, it is premature and against a satisfactory working out of the very object sought by the treaty itself. If we had a reasonable amount of competition in this direct carrying trade it would appear to me very differently.

The time is not ripe for insisting upon this direct shipment feature of the understanding. Sentiment is no justification for taking away from trade any legitimate advantage of competition.

The establishment of one line from a port in France, or to a port in France, is to my mind practically the establishment of a carrying monopoly.

It is I think unnecessary for me to dilate on this question, because every hon. member in this House knows that where carrying facilities are restricted to one or two lines of steamers, a carrying monopoly is almost invariably the result. We all know that the steamship companies will charge whatever the traffic will stand, and the general opinion is that the steamship line, or the two lines which in the future may be plying direct from France, will take practically the whole benefit of the French treaty by their increased transportation rates. As I have said, the experience is that the carrying companies will charge what the freight will stand, and the freight will stand just about the difference between the old tariff and the new; and so the steamboat companies will exact practically all the benefit that the purchasers of these goods in Canada might otherwise derive.

Mr. LOGAN. That argument would not apply if the interpretation of the Minister of Finance is correct that the restrictions will not apply to goods shipped via an English port.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. I contend that even if the Minister of Finance is right in his statement, the freight—and I have the facts here to show it—the freight from French ports to Liverpool is as great as the freight from Liverpool to Canadian seaports, and even if the carrying companies are allowed to tranship at Liverpool they will charge as much from French ports to Liverpool as from Liverpool to Canadian ports. Therefore, our importers will have the increased rate to contend against even if they are accorded the privilege of transhipping at Liverpool. When the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) spoke on this question, he told us that from 75 to 80 per cent of the Montreal merchants were opposed to this proposition, and if the Montreal importers and shippers and merchants are opposed to it, how much more numerous will it not be on the people of the west. I am well within the mark when I say that the majority of the goods that are affected by this preference and which will be bought by Toronto merchants, will be bought as they have heretofore been bought and without any attempt to take advantage of this treaty, because the burdens of the port-to-port clause are equally as great as the benefits of the reduced rate.

Mr. PATERSON. Has any one written to the hon. gentleman stating that he would rather do without the treaty at all if this clause remained in it.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Yes, and I have read two such statements to the House. In the first complaint I read, one was particularly directed to the point just mentioned by the hon. minister, and the other contained this statement which is entirely apart from any transhipping arrangement:

The proviso that the shipment must be directly from French port to Canadian port will for the present and until there is more frequent shipping service do away with a great deal of the apparent advantage of the treaty.

Mr. PATERSON. Do away with a 'great deal of the advantage of the treaty;' that is the expression used there.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. When this treaty was discussed by the House some time ago it would appear from the statements made by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur) that this particular feature was designed to give certain advantages to people living in eastern Canada. I regret that the negotiations of the treaty should have been approached in that spirit. I would rather hope that there was no intention to sacrifice the interests of the west, and that the treaty had been entered into with a bona fide desire—mistaken though it be—to benefit all Canada rather than any particular place in Canada. It would appear from the statements of the Minister of Marine however, that the treaty was apparently designed to benefit the port of Montreal, because in an interchange of remarks with the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) at page 1460 'Hansard' the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) said:

I am sorry to find that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were trying to obtain opinion in Montreal against this policy one which was calculated to benefit Montreal especially and all our river and ocean ports. I take it that my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) has been trying to discover objections, and I am surprised that a representative of Montreal should endeavour to make a case against a provision which was designed to benefit Montreal especially.

Later on he said:

Well, I am interested to learn that my hon. friend has been trying to get the people in Montreal to pronounce themselves against this treaty, or that clause of it which is designed to be so beneficial to Montreal.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) was one of those who negotiated the treaty, and it would appear from this statement of his, to put it mildly, that there was a direct intention to benefit the port of Montreal without considering the claims of the people who live further west and who have not the advantage of living in a seaport. The hon. gentleman must remember that although we do not all live in seaport towns we should be entitled to equal rights. I had hoped that no intention would have entered into the minds of the negotiators of the treaty to advance the interests of people living in a certain section of the country to the detriment of the interests of others; the Minister of Marine went further; he was speaking of the clause in the customs tariff which permits the government to pass an order in council restricting the goods under the British preference to those entering by Canadian ports—that is the amendment moved by the Prime Minister last session, to the motion of the hon. member for Cumberland, and the Minister of Marine said:

It is true this clause of the Customs Act has not yet been put into force, but we expect that it will be put into force before long.

The hon. minister, speaking for the government, says that it is the intention of the government to put into effect before long, which I assume means at an early date, the clause that at present is in the tariff permitting the government, by order in council, to restrict the importation of British goods to Canadian ports. The Prime Minister last session stated most emphatically that the country would not be ripe for the enforcement of that clause until 1911, because the transportation facilities would not be completed until that year; but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries states this session that that clause will be enforced before long. I am dwelling upon this, because it seems to me that it would be most unwise and injurious to the country as a whole if the government, without consulting parliament or the country, should bring into force by order in council a provision requiring all goods coming from Great Britain to enter by Canadian ports in order to enjoy the advantages of the preferential tariff. It appears that we have an order in council tariff, and now we are about to have order in council rates. What security will the merchants of this country have if a tariff can be enforced against them over night and the channels of transportation can be opened or closed over night? I think the merchants of this country would regard such an act with disfavour and alarm; and in view of the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that that provision will be enforced before long, I desire to bring this matter to the attention of the House and the country. I hope the government are not going to use this French treaty as the thin edge of the wedge. I do not think the merchants of Ontario and the west are very much concerned about the change of 2½ or 5 per cent which this treaty makes, but they are concerned about this from-port-to-port clause as possibly the preliminary to applying a similar clause to goods coming to Canada under the British preference. In this respect Canada is very differently situated from France. France is so much surrounded by water that she has many harbours on both the Mediterranean and the British channel, and it is very natural for her to insist on her ports being made available for all her importations. Canada is very differently situated, and it makes no difference to France whether we insist on this provision of the treaty or not. Indeed, she would prefer not to have shipments of goods from France confined to enter by Canadian ports, because if importers were free to bring French goods by New York or other American ports as well as by Canadian ports, there would probably be a larger sale of these goods. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that the United States had insisted on this from-port-to-port clause. In that respect, however, the United States are very differently situated from Canada. They have a much greater line of sea coast than we have, and their ports are not subject like ours to the rigours of winter. For these reasons, I think the benefits which we are to derive from this treaty will be more than counterbalanced by its drawbacks and disadvantages. I quite concur in all that has been said about the importance of opening up trade connections with other nations of the world; and there is perhaps none with which we have a greater desire to trade than France, with which both Canada and Great Britain have much in common. At the same time, we are doing business in our own shop, for our own advantage. Again, it would be a very serious matter for our merchants to be deprived of the bonding privilege in the United States. It is no answer to say that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and that if we lose our bonding privilege in the United States they lose theirs in this country. I do not think such a policy of retaliation would be wise or prudent in the estimation of this House or of this country. The bonding privilege is of great value to us, as it is to the United States. I do not wish to stretch that consideration too far; it is only an incident, while the other considerations I have urged ought to be sufficient to induce the government to reconsider this article of the treaty. In this matter the Minister of Marine and Fisheries seems to think that the interest of Montreal is the only one to be considered; but the west is growing more rapidly than the east, and its interests should be seriously considered. If it is intended to keep this from-port-to-port clause in the treaty, then I think the provision should be extended, not only to ocean ports and river ports, but to ports on the great lakes. We hope and believe that as a result of the large expenditures that we are making to open up our great avenues of transportation will result at no distant date in direct communication between our great lake ports and the seaports of Europe, so that vessels may load at Port Arthur, on Lake Superior, and pass directly to the ports of Great Britain and other European countries.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). Mr. Speaker, I think the greatest necessity for this parliament to-day is to appoint a commission to report upon the expedition of business by the different railroads of this country. If we had such a commission it would be shown to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. A. C. Macdonell) that goods can be shipped even from the old port of Halifax over the government system of railroads, which the hon. gentleman to-day has passed over rather cavalierly, to the city of Toronto in as quick time as they are being shipped from the city of New York to Toronto. After the most careful inquiry, I have come to the conclusion that it is a great fallacy to suppose that the people of Toronto have a fast freight service from the city of New York. Last session, in a few remarks I made on a kindred subject, I showed that the actual time of transporting from Halifax to Toronto goods which had come by the steamships 'Virginian' and 'Tunisian' was some hours shorter than the time from New York to the city of Toronto. And after all, this restriction, if you must call it such, only applies during a few months of the year. It only applies after the St. Lawrence is closed, because up to that time you do not have this long haul from Halifax to Montreal. The very goods my hon. friend mentions, namely, millinery goods, are largely imported during the fall months for the fall openings and would not be carried from St. John and Halifax, but would go direct to Quebec and Montreal. My hon. friend says we should legislate for the whole country. But that is what the government has done. This treaty will benefit the national life of the country. It is a declaration to the French republic that we have ports in Canada and do not require to depend on American ports. I quoted in a former debate the statement of an English exporter who explained, that although he had been ordered to ship the goods to Canada in December via a Canadian port, he had sent them by New York because, he wrote, all the Canadian ports were frozen up. That is an impression which has to be removed. Last year we incorporated in our tariff, on a motion I had the honour of making, that goods from the motherland, in order to enjoy the preference, should be brought through Canadian ports, this provision to take effect at a time to be fixed by order in council. We did not bring that into force at once, but left it to be brought in force by order in council. It establishes, however, the principle that imported goods, to get a preference under the Canadian tariff, should be brought in by Canadian ports. Surely we were not going to incorporate that in the preferential tariff dealing with the motherland and then deal with a foreign country and not incorporate the same principle? I do not want to localize this matter. It is of no more benefit to me than it is to a resident of Toronto that this clause should be in the treaty. It may benefit St. John, Halifax, Montreal and Quebec, but I represent none of these constituencies. But in as much as it benefits Canada as a whole, and I represent a Canadian constituency, I desire to support the government in incorporating this principle in our treaty with France. But whence comes the objection? Can this be the old Conservative party, whose slogan used to be Canada for the Canadians, which objects to this treaty? Apparently their policy at present is Canada for United States ports. What does the bringing in of goods to this country by Canadian ports mean? It means the building up of our ports; it means additional traffic for our railways; it means better transportation facilities; it means increasing traffic to our great government railway which costs us so much every year for its maintenance. This is a national question, and the opposition should be the last in the world to combat the idea of Canada for the Canadians and Canadian ports for Canadian trade. That is the policy of this side anyway. I promised my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who is going to follow me, that I would not take up much of the time of the House, because we are unfortunately both compelled to be absent this evening. I shall, therefore, not extend my remarks and shall merely conclude by saying that the arguments of my hon. friend, at the very best, can only apply to the small amount of goods imported during the winter months from France, and that will only affect two or three cities in the whole Dominion. Apart from that, this treaty is beneficial from a national standpoint, a railway standpoint and a national port standpoint. I would like very much, if I had the time, to go into this question of the transportation of goods over our railways from the east. I propose during this session to ask the Minister of Railways to either refer this to the Railway Commission or appoint an independent committee of this House to gather the evidence and show how quickly goods can be brought to the interior of this country from its extremities on the east.

Mr. KEMP. What do you want a committee for? We are bringing goods by St. John at present.

Mr. LOGAN. Why then does the hon. gentleman object to the present treaty? He seems to be satisfied with the transportation via the city of St. John, so that this part of the treaty does not affect my hon. friend so seriously after all. There exists a misconception regarding transportation facilities from the east to the west. I support this treaty because it embodies the principle I have always contended for, the principle of legislation for the whole of Canada, of encouraging a Canadian spirit, and developing trade through Canadian ports.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). I do not propose to follow my hon. friend in the discussion of the resolution which he introduced some four or five years ago and which, I think, was unanimously passed in this House, but which has nevertheless not yet been put in practice by the government. If that policy is so extremely important and valuable to the interests of the country as a whole, how does it happen that the government, which my hon. friend supports through thick and thin, has not yet seen fit to put it into effect?

I would not desire to take any part in this debate before considering the Bill in the Committee of the Whole House except for the somewhat curious statement made both by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister outside the House and by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) within the House as to some remarkable advance in respect of treaty making powers which has been wrought by the negotiation and consummation of this treaty. The right hon. gentleman at Toronto in October last used this language:

> It has long been the desire of the Canadian people, if I mistake not, that we should be entrusted with the negotiation of our own treaties, especially in matters which affect trade. The long looked for reform has at last come to be a living reality, and as I told you a moment ago, without revolution, without any breaking of the old tradition, without any impairment of our allegiance, the time has come when Canadian interests are entrusted to Canadians. Just within the last week a treaty has been concluded with France which affects Canada alone and which has been negotiated by Canadians alone. True it has been done with the full assent of the British Crown, the full assent of the Foreign Office, who have interposed no objection at all, but on the contrary have told us 'it is a matter which chiefly concerns you, therefore take the management in your own hands and have the treaty which you want to have.' The treaty has been completed. It is not for me to say what it has been or what it is, but I think I can say it will be found reasonably satisfactory for the producers and for the farmers of Canada and for the manufacturers of Canada also.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took in this House an even more extraordinary view. It can be found in 'Hansard,' but I have not now the time to quote it. He took the position that a revolution in respect of our treaty-making powers had been effected and something had been accomplished which never had been before. I should think that hon. gentlemen on that side would not be very proud of their treaty-making record. Four of them went to Washington, with one British ambassador. They failed in their negotiations, broke off these negotiations, referred back to the foreign office in Great Britain the subject of the Alaskan boundary which they were not able to deal with satisfactorily. An arrangement was arrived at under which an arbitration was held, and after it had been held, they themselves were the first to condemn the British government with respect to the appointment of arbitrators. If any territory has been lost to Canada since 1867, it has been lost under the administration of these hon. gentlemen, and every foot of territory added to Canada since that year has been added when they were not in power.

Let me point out to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that, when he speaks of this long-looked for reform of 1907, he uses language remarkably inconsistent with that which he uttered in this House in the debate on the address in 1903. For, on that occasion, he expressly stated that our political relations with Great Britain and the empire needed no improvement, that they were all that we could wish; and in the same speech he expressely stated that we had not the treaty-making power. I have his words under my hand, but I have not time to quote them in full. But, if those words meant anything, they meant that we had not the treaty-making power and did not desire it. But now, it would seem, according to the right hon. gentleman, a great reform has been accomplished. Well, let us see. That reform seems to have been accomplished in this way: my hon. friends the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) went to Paris and negotiated a treaty under the superintendence of the British government. After the negotiations had been completed, the results were referred to the British government and the Board of Trade, as every treaty negotiated by Canada in the past has been referred. Why, as ar back as 1865, practically the same procedure was adopted, except that, in those days, Canadians were not, as they afterwards were, nominated as plenipotentiaries on behalf of Great Britain to negotiate treaties. Any one curious in these matters may refer to a despatch of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Colonial Secretary in 1865, in which, after dealing with the negotiation of treaties between dependencies of the empire and foreign countries, he laid down certain rules. I merely give an abstract of the letter, but the whole can be found in House of Commons papers, 1873, volume 49, page 42:

Her Majesty's ministers will assist colonial delegates, having first examined their instructions from their government.

This assistance will be rendered through British ambassadors.

The same procedure will be followed as is adopted in negotiating commercial treaties on behalf of the United Kingdom.

Proposals must be submitted to the British government, and especially to the Board of Trade, to ascertain how far any such proposals might be made to foreign countries consistently with the general treaty engagements of the British Crown.

These are the principles laid down in 1865, and they have not been altered very much since, except that as far back as 1873, when Sir John Macdonald went to Washington, Canadian plenipotentiaries have been appointed to conduct such negotiations. The whole subject is dealt with in Todd on Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, pages 268-269. At page 268 I find the following:

Sir Charles Tupper was appointed in 1883, also in 1888, co-plenipotentiary with imperial representatives to conduct negotiations with Spain, likewise in the latter year to negotiate with the United States; and again in 1892-3 to regulate commercial relations between Canada and France respecting customs tariffs.

Now, let us look at the illustrations for a moment. In Spain, in 1888, Sir Charles Tupper was co-plenipotentiary with Sir Clare Forde. He conducted the negotiations with the Spanish government himself. He was in the United States in 1888 with Mr. Chamberlain and Sackville West; in France in 1892-3, he negotiated the French treaty. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) declared that some revolution has been wrought as Sir Charles Tupper did not conduct those negotiations alone, while the negotiations for the treaty under discussion were conducted by the Canadian representatives alone. I would point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) that Sir Charles Tupper did conduct the negotiations alone, so far as diplomatic service was concerned. The only assistance he had was from Sir Joseph Crowe, commercial attaché. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not seem to understand very well the status of a commercial attache, or what position Sir Joseph Crowe held on that occasion. What status did Sir Joheph Crowe have? That of a diplomat?

Mr. BRODEUR. I simply took the report made by the Marquis of Dufferin, in which he stated that the negotiations had been conducted by Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Joseph Crowe.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In the first place, Sir Joseph Crowe, let me inform my hon. friend who does not seem to be aware of the fact—was commercial attaché for the whole continent of Europe, except Russia, having headquarters at Paris. But a commercial attaché is not a diplomat, and does not take charge of the legation or embassy. I made inquiries on this subject, and I must say I am astonished that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur), particularly after the diplomatic experience he has had, does not seem to be aware of the true position of affairs. In the absence of an ambassador, the next senior diplomat is in charge of the embassy. He is nominally the counsellor of the embassy. The naval and military attachés and the commercial attaché also, are merely technical officers, and, unless specially ordered by the foreign office, would never be in charge of an embassy. The secretary of an embassy might be ordered to perform the duty of commercial attaché temporarily, and, of course, in his capacity of a diplomat, but not in his capacity as a technical officer, he might find himself in charge of an embassy in the absence of his senior diplomat.

So, except in the case where the secretary of the legation happens to possess technical knowledge and to perform also the duties of a commercial attaché, he is not promoted to the charge of an embassy and has no authority to take charge of an embassy except by direction of the foreign office. As my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) reminds me, the Marquis of Dufferin was then in Paris. Sir Joseph Crowe was commercial attaché at Paris for the whole continent of Europe, and was not filling a diplomatic position in the negotiations, but was merely assisting Sir Charles Tupper with his technical knowledge, just as the officers of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries assisted them on the occasion of the recent negotiation of the treaty we are now considering—and just as the expert officers from this side, no doubt also gave their assistance to Sir Charles Tupper on the occasion when he negotiated the treaty in 1892-3.

Now, with respect to Sir Charles Tupper's negotiation of this treaty, the documents in possession of this government will show that an order in council was passed on March 27, 1879, as follows:

The Committee in Council have had under consideration the circular despatch from the Rt. Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies under date of the 21st January, 1879, inclosing copies of an announcement which has been published in the London 'Gazette,' relative to the notice given by the French government to terminate the commercial treaties now in force between Great Britain and France.

The Hon. the Minister of Finance, to whom the said despatch with inclosures has been referred, reports that he is informed that a fresh treaty between these countries is now being negotiated and it appears to him, therefore, that it is extremely desirable that steps should be at once taken to secure the consideration of the interests of the Dominion in any agreement which may be arrived at, and therefore recommends that Your Excellency be requested to inform the Colonial Office of the desire of the Canadian government in this respect and to endeavour to obtain the consent of Her Majesty's government to the appointment of a Canadian commissioner in connection with these negotiations.

That was in 1879. The reply to that appeal from Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, to the Marquis of Lorne under date January 26, 1879, was as follows:

My Lord,—I have been in communication with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, upon the subject of the report of the Privy Council inclosed in your despatch, marked 'confidential,' of the 27th May, in which your ministers express a wish to send a commissioner to this country in connection with the negotiations for a fresh commercial treaty with France, when such negotiations shall be resumed.

In reply, I have to inform you that it is not thought desirable to appoint a Canadian commissioner to take part in the negotiation of the treaty, but that if your government desire to send a person enjoying their confidence to advise with Her Majesty's government or with the British ambassador at Paris on any questions that may arise during the negotiations, Her Majesty's government will be happy to give attention to his representations.

That you will observe was in 1879. The British government, in taking that position in answer to the order in council of this government, were in effect reaffirming the position and practice laid down by the Foreign office as far back as 1865. When a departure from that practice was afterwards made there was to a certain extent a revolution with respect to treaty making powers, a new principle was then established in respect to the part which Canada should take in the negotiations of commercial treaties, but that departure was made in 1884 and not in 1907, and it was not secured by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), or the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur).

That was the condition in which this question stood when Sir Charles Tupper was appointed as High Commissioner for Canada. When he was instructed by the government of this country to open negotions with Spain, Sir Charles took up the matter with the colonial and foreign offices and was able to convince the imperial government of the wisdom of granting to Canada the right to negotiate commercial treaties with foreign countries. The foreign office sent a letter to the colonial office, dated July 26, 1884, from which the following extract is taken :

If the Spanish government are favourably disposed, the full power for these negotiations will be given to Sir Robert Morier and Sir Charles Tupper jointly. The actual negotiations would probably be conducted by Sir Charles Tupper, but the convention if concluded must be signed by both plenipotentiaries and must be entered into between Her Majesty and the King of Spain for the special object of regulating Canadian trade with the Spanish territories specified in the convention.

It was then that a departure was made from the old practice. When these hon. gentlemen state that they have effected some new departure in 1907 they are simply stating that which, upon a calmer view of the circumstances, they will find to be absolutely unfounded and supported by any illustration or instance they can bring to the attention of this House.

In a letter to Sir Charles Tupper, dated September 24, 1884, Sir John A. Macdonald said :

You certainly have scored a great point in securing your being united with the British ambassador, not only in the negotiations but the completion of the treaty.

Sir Charles Tupper made a full statement on the subject in 1887, and any hon. gentleman who desires to be acquainted with the facts may refer to the 'Hansard' of that year, Vol. 1, page 396. From that time to the present the question of Canada's right to negotiate commercial treaties has been unquestioned. Canada has been allowed to negotiate its treaties; but when it comes to the execution of a treaty, it must be in the name of the British Crown, which is the Crown of Canada as well as of the British Isles, and for that reason, in 1893 as well as in 1897, the treaty was a treaty between the Crown of Great Britain and the president of the French republic.

In 1893 in like manner Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper were jointly appointed by Her Majesty plenipotentiaries to negotiate a treaty with France in relation to trade between that country and Canada. The Marquis of Dufferin assured Sir Charles Tupper of his readiness to aid him in every way, and said that Sir Joseph Crowe, an accomplished commercial attache of the embassy, would afford every assistance, and Sir Joseph did afford Sir Charles valuable assistance. It was very necessary for Sir Charles Tupper to have assistance of that kind because he was not as much at home in French as in English, while Sir Joseph Crowe was thoroughly acquainted with French.

I would like to allude in this connection to certain portions of the correspondence and to the parliamentary documents brought down which were not brought out very clearly by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) in dealing with this matter. He quoted various extracts to show that Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Joseph Crowe jointly negotiated this treaty. I have already made it abundantly clear to the House that Sir Joseph Crowe held no diplomatic position; while he might assist Sir Charles Tupper in the negotiations he had not treaty-making powers. If the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) will look at the sessional papers of 1893 ; Nos. 28, No. 11 he will find the correspondence. The sessional paper to which I particularly allude is No. 51 to 51-C and I am quoting from page 21 :

At the third meeting the French commissioners replied to the observations and proposals put forward by the Canadian commissioner in the course of the first and second meetings.

It is not Sir Joseph Crowe who put forward the proposals; he was there to assist the Canadian commissioner, and it was the Canadian commissioner who put forward the proposals.

Similarly in his report dated January 6, 1893, to Sir John Thompson, then Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Charles Tupper used this language :

I cannot conclude this communication without saying that while the negotiations have been carried on entirely by myself on the part of Canada and by (naming the French commissioners) on the part of France, I have received the most cordial support and assistance from the Colonial and Foreign Offices in London and from His Excellency the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava. My obligations are especially great to Sir Joseph Crowe, First Secretary and Commercial Attache of the Embassy, who has given me the benefit of his valuable advice and wide experience in such questions, and who has constantly associated with me in my intercourse with the French negotiators.

Sir Charles Tupper in saying that simply anticipated the words of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance who said in respect of the present treaty :

It is my duty and pleasure to say that each one of these distinguished members of the imperial government and the officials in the several departments gave us their most hearty and most cordial co-operation. We can say the same for His Majesty's ambassador in France, Sir Francis Bertie, and Sir Henry Austin Lee, as the commercial counsellor.

Because Sir Henry Austin Lee, as commercial counsellor, assisted these two hon. gentlemen as plenipotentiaries, is it any the less true that they negotiated the treaty? They do not make that claim, and why should they make the claim that because Sir Joseph Crowe, commercial attaché, assisted Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Charles Tupper did not negotiate that treaty? He negotiated that treaty in 1893 exactly in the same way as these gentlemen negotiated this treaty last year. It is no new departure. It is simply an adherence to the principle for which Sir Charles Tupper contended, and which he had established after he became High Commissioner in 1887, the principle which recognized the right of Canada in future to negotiate her own commercial treaties, reserving supervision to the British Crown in order that its own treaty arrangements might be observed, and which recognized as well, of course, the well understood principle that these treaties must be negotiated in the name of the British Crown. In this particular case what happened?—that these gentlemen conducted the negotiations. They were there, in the first place, without any formal authority, as plenipotentiaries. They went there in July, and they did not receive any authority as plenipotentiaries until the 8th of August. Negotiations had been going on for two or three weeks before any formal authorization from the imperial government was given to them. After the negotiations were concluded what happened? In a letter, dated the 22nd August, 1907, and addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the hon. Minister of Finance says:

Sir,—Referring to the interview with which you were good enough to favour me in London a few days ago, in connection with the commercial negotiations between the representatives of the French and Canadian governments, I have the honour to inform you that, although definite conclusions have not been reached respecting any of the questions under discussion, such progress has taken place in the negotiations as leads us to believe that within a few days we shall be able to submit for your aproval a draft of a treaty.

Exactly as Sir Charles Tupper had submitted the draft of a treaty for the approval of the British government in 1893. In a letter of the 14th August, two days afterwards, addressed to Sir Francis Hopgood, Colonial Office, London, the hon. Minister of Finance used this language:

Dear Sir,—Under arrangements made some time ago between Sir Edward Grey and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, my colleague Mr. Brodeur and I, with the co-operation of the British ambassador, Sir Francis Bertie, have been conducting negotiations with the representatives of the French government with the view of enlarging the scope of the present treaty respecting the trade relations between France and Canada. While the negotiations have not yet been completed, they have advanced far enough to lead us to believe that within a few days we shall be able to prepare a draft treaty which will be acceptable to the French government and which, subject to the approval of the imperial government, the Canadian government will be willing to adopt.

Exactly the same practice as was followed in 1893 in the case of Sir Charles Tupper. What was the answer from the Foreign Office? The answer from the Foreign Office, under the hand of Sir Edward Grey and under date of August 28, 1907, addressed to the hon. Minister of Finance, was as follows:—

Sir,—I was gratified to learn from your letter of the 22nd instant that progress has been made with the commercial negotiations between the representatives of the French and the Canadian governments. On receipt of the draft treaty which you hope to be able shortly to submit to me I will at once refer it to the Colonial Office. It must also be shown to the Board of Trade.

There will be no delay on the part of this department, and I will request the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the President of the Board of Trade to expedite the matter as much as possible.

As soon as their approval is received, your full powers will be sent to you.

I am sir, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) E. GREY.

This is the remarkable revolution which has been heard of all over this country. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House criticised us for saying something about this treaty before the Bill came before the House. Do they not realize that they themselves, before a word of this treaty had been communicated to parliament or to the public, went around the country heralding the extraordinary results and advantages which were to accrue from that treaty? I hope there will be great advantages from this treaty, although, up to the present time, I have not heard very much from the other side of the House which would lead me to that conclusion. I will reserve my remarks in regard to the merits of the treaty until we get into Committee of the Whole House, but let me say that the position of the government in regard to it has appeared to me to be rather remarkable. One would have supposed that when negotiating a treaty of this kind some estimate would have been made as to what the advantages to our trade will be. One would have supposed that the government would say: We will increase our trade with France by $1,000,000, or $1,500,000, or $2,000,000; or that such and such articles will be exported to France in very much greater proportion in future than they have been in the past. Instead of that, the only argument put before the House up to the present time that I have been able to understand or appreciate is simply the argument that we will have the advantage of the minimum French tariff, and that it is a very great advantage in itself whether or not it leads to the export of a greater quantity of our goods in future than has taken place in the past. I trust indeed that our trade relations with France may be improved. The relations between that great country and the British empire are most excellent, and I for one rejoice at that fact, and trust that they will continue so. I desire that our trade relations with France shall be improved. I hope that this treaty may improve them, and when we get into Committee of the Whole House, we will, perhaps, on certain aspects of that treaty, be able to obtain from the government more definite information than we have had in the past. At the present moment I only desire to disabuse the minds of hon. members of this House and the minds of the people of this country of the idea that there was any wonderful revolution wrought by these gentlemen or that they accomplished anything extraordinary in regard to the French treaty. There has been no revolution. The revolution, if you can call it a revolution—I would prefer to call it an advance or a departure—the departure which was established and which gave to Canada more powers with respect to commercial treaties than she had possessed before, was due to the courage, the genius and the perseverance of that great statesman, Sir Charles Tupper. It was he who made that new departure, which gives us to-day in Canada the right to negotiate our own commercial treaties, although every treaty is signed, and must be signed, in the name of the British Crown.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (Wentworth). This French treaty is an important matter for this country, and I take a great deal of interest in it, not only as a member of this House, but as a resident of the district which will be most seriously affected by its provisions, and which is the centre of that great industry which is to provide the eggs to make this omelet. The French treaty may be viewed from different standpoints; we should consider its sentimental value if it has any; the material advantages and disadvantages which it possesses, and its moral advantages or disadvantages also, if any. We are all agreed that the ties which connect a large portion of the population of this country with old France are and ought to be of the most kindly character, and that any treaty or any convention or any act of the government which tends to foster the friendly feeling which does exist and always should exist between Great Britain and France should meet with the approval of every Canadian. While that is true, a trade treaty must be looked upon from the point of view of its material advantages or disadvantage. I can easily conceive that a commercial treaty framed on sentimentality might in the end be of very great disadvantage to either one country or the other, because the feeling of disappointment or bitterness engendered by the material losses which it caused might go far to offset any of the assumed sentimental advantages which might accrue from it. The material advantages of this treaty may be divided into two parts: first, with regard to how it affects the revenue of this country, and, secondly, with regard to how it affects the commerce and industries of Canada. There can be only one opinion as to its bearing on the revenues of our country, because the truth is that we lose from $5 to $10 on our revenue for every $1 which the French republic loses on hers. Of course, as the Canadian government has a superabundance of money and has nothing to do with it, there might be no objection to the treaty on the score of its bad effects upon our revenue, but with the enormous undertakings which we have on hand, with $100,000,000 yet to spend upon the Grand Trunk Pacific and with the fact staring us in the face to-day that we are paying 7 per cent interest on borrowed money, and that we are trying to negotiate a loan at a higher rate of interest than we have paid in the past, it seems to me it is bad policy to throw away millions of revenue especially when we consider that, generally speaking, under this French treaty the duties are to be lowered on articles which are chiefly used by people of wealth. It is of course impossible to estimate accurately what the loss of revenue will be, and I do not know on what other basis we can proceed to the calculation than on the basis of our present trade imports and exports. The effect of the treaty may be to increase our imports and exports or it may not, and indeed our experience under the old French treaty has been that in the case of many of the articles included in that treaty and in which we expected to do an increased trade, the imports and exports were not enlarged to any appreciable extent. It is not fair, therefore, to assume that because the French republic agrees to reduce the duty upon a certain number of articles that these articles will be exported from Canada in greatly increased quantities. As I have said, our experience of the old French treaty has been that during the last 10 or 15 years, outside the item of lobsters, which is included in this treaty, the greatest increase in our trade with France was in agricultural implements which were placed upon the maximum tariff. Therefore the only fair way to estimate our gains and our losses is to take the volume of the present trade and base our calculations on that. In the following table I enumerate only a very few items and the figures given will show the loss of revenue upon these few items.

These combined only amount, on the imports from France, to $2,472,890, and on those from other foreign countries to $1,853,890. Our total imports from France last year were $9,145,885 and from other foreign countries, $4,366,089. It will be seen that these items cover only from 25 to 30 per cent of the articles affected by this treaty. It is true that on the remainder of the items, which come under the intermediate tariff, the reduction of duty in most cases is less than it is under this special tariff; nevertheless, as they comprise from two-thirds to three-fourths of the total trade, the loss to the revenue will no doubt be very considerable. Now, what is the price that France pays for this loss to our revenue, running into millions of dollars? The items which we exported to France last year, and which go in under the minimum tariff, include practically all the articles we export to France. On these items the loss of revenue to the French republic under the new treaty will be about $125,059.53. I say about, because it is absolutely impossible in some cases to tell exactly what the loss is, because the duties on goods going into France are estimated by weight, and on many of the items, such as agricultural implements, we have no data by which we can ascertain their weight or what kind of implements they were. So we have to make an estimate, and I think my estimate is a very liberal one. On agricultural implements I put it at 12 per cent. I do not think it is as high as that, not more than 10 per cent or probably less; but on the basis of 12 per cent the reduction of revenue to the French republic on agricultural implements on account of this treaty is only $46,292 for nine months. For that reduction the people of Canada are paying over half a million dollars on the selected list of articles, and an enormous amount more on other lines. So that from this point of view it seems to me that this treaty has been an unfortunate thing for Canada. I do not think it should have been thought necessary for us to forego this large amount of revenue in order to get the extremely small advantages which we secure by this treaty. In regard to our exports to France, we are gaining under the new treaty extremely small advantages over what we enjoyed under the old French treaty. Under the old treaty most of the items which we now export to France went in at the minimum rate, as they do under the new treaty. The largest item which we export to France is lobsters—$545,000 worth in nine months. Under the old treaty they went in at the same rate as they do now, so that we have gained nothing in respect to our largest item of export to France. The next largest item is agricultural implements, of which we exported to France in nine months $385,770 worth. These go in under the new treaty at a reduced rate of duty, and this, so far as I can see, is the main advantage we secure from that treaty. The next largest item is cattle, of which only $112,255 worth went into France at the minimum rate of two cents a pound; and it is not reasonable to suppose that a very large trade can be built up with France in cattle in view of the fact that France is itself an agricultural country and grows within its borders in ordinary years everything it requires for home consumption. The next largest item is wood pulp, which goes in at the same rate as under the old treaty, so that there is no gain in that. The next item is fresh apples, which go in under the same duty as before. The remainder of the items are small, not aggregating more than $15,000 or $20,000. So that it may fairly be said that whatever concessions we give under this treaty, whatever disadvantages we get from it, whatever price we pay for it, we are paying for the privilege of getting the Massey-Harris Company's implements into France and other foreign countries. When we turn to the foreign countries affected by this treaty, we find that this feature is very prominent. Our exports of agricultural implements to those foreign countries amount to one half of all the items we export to those countries, having for nine months last year amounted to $465,535. The total exports of agricultural implements to both France and these foreign countries in the nine months amounted to $851,305 out of a total export trade of about $2,000,000, or almost half of our total exports. No one in this House, I am sure, has any regret that the Massey-Harris Company or any other Canadian company manufacturing agricultural implements are able to export them to foreign countries on favourable terms. If we are going to have millionaires, I would rather have them in Canada than in any other country; but when we remember who pays for these, it is well worth our considering whether we can afford to negotiate a treaty the chief advantage of which shall be still further to enrich the multi-millionaires of this country at the expense of the hardy working people engaged in the various industries which will be benefited by this treaty.

Let us for a moment consider the disadvantages which are going to accrue from this treaty to the industries of this country. I find that one of the largest items of our imports from France is canned vegetables—$65,000 worth. Surely the farmers of this country can provide all the vegetables required for canning purposes in this country. Every dollar's worth of these goods that come into this country is going to that extent to take away from the profits and advantages that accrue from a market at home to the farmers of the Dominion of Canada. More than that, these imported vegetables from France—and I think included in that item are probably canned peas—are coloured, disguised and adulterated in many cases to a degree that makes it impossible for the Canadian products to compete with them on fair and equal terms; and if this treaty goes into effect, I sincerely trust that the government will take the most stringent means to prevent the introduction into this country of canned vegetables, or canned articles of any kind —canned fruits are probably included under this item—that will not pass the test of the Adulterated Foods Act of this country. I have small hopes that that will be the case. We have on our statutes a very fair adulterated foods Act but it is absolutely a dead letter. The only result of that Act is that bulletins are issued frequently, printed at the expense of this country, and filed away, and anybody who wants to see them can do so. Further than that, I fail to see what benefit this country is deriving from the Adulterated Foods Act. On the shelves of every grocery store are articles of food adulterated and no steps are taken to prevent their sale and if those canned vegetables that come from France are treated with the same deference as are other canned vegetables, they will be a great detriment to the Canadian industry of canning as well as to our farmers.

The next item of importance is one which the treaty will damage to a serious extent—the wine industry of this country. The grape growing industry of Canada has become one of very large proportions. During the last few years it has increased very rapidly. In 1903 we had 14,000 acres of grapes planted in Ontario, and it is now estimated that we have an acreage in all probability, of 18,000 or 20,000 acres. These on an average turn out from two and a half to three tons per acre. Various estimates are made of the products. Let me give an extremely conservative estimate. Let me say, for instance, that we have only 14,000 acres of grapes in bearing at present and that the total yield does not exceed 40,000 tons. What are the results? The fruit growers, who have studied the question very thoroughly, have estimated the product at 60,000 tons. But estimating the products of our vineyards at 40,000 tons and the loss at $10 a ton, the amount of loss it is fair to assume would accrue would be $400,000. It must be borne in mind that the price of the grape is set by the price the wine manufacturers pay. These manufacturers consume about one-third of the crop, and the price they pay for that one-third establishes the price for the whole product. During the past season grape growers got the enormous price of one cent and a half a pound, or $30 a ton, which is the best price they have had for many years. At that price grape growing is profitable. I can remember when the price was as low as $12 a ton, but there was then an absolute loss. The industry is now on a good paying basis and is capable of indefinite expansion, but there is no gold mine in it even at $30 per ton since a poor crop occasionally comes along, and as it takes $30 every year on an average for expenses per acre, it will be seen there is no great room to reduce the price and carry on this industry profitably. We have the soil and the climate and can grow to perfection all the grapes this country can possibly require even with a population of from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000. But that industry will receive a blow from this treaty which will set it back for years to come. The duty on French wines, under the first treaty, was reduced. The thirty per cent ad valorem on sparkling wine was taken off and it was also taken off on non-sparkling wine below twenty-six degrees. Our wine manufacturers were able, even with that reduction, to go on paying our growers a satisfactory price, but now when we have this sweeping reduction of thirty per cent ad valorem taken off the non-sparkling wines, which is the kind produced in Canada—those above as well as those below twenty-six degrees proof spirits—and in addition, what is perhaps the most dangerous item in the schedule, namely, ten cents a gallon off the small amount of twenty-five cents a gallon on wine which is of a degree below twenty, that is a reduction which is going to have a very serious effect. That is the degree of strength which the wines made in Canada are nearly all composed of, so that a sweeping reduction has been made on the very article that is made in Canada and which comes into competition with the imported article. If the ministers had agreed to take the duty off some other grade of wine, that would have been better. Or if it was absolutely necessary to secure a freer entry for Massey-Harris agricultural implements, they could have compensated for this by giving a further reduction on some article which did not affect an important industry in this country. But to have picked out such an important industry as this and then selected the very item of all the items in that schedule of wine, that most seriously affects the fruit-growers, seems to me an offence absolutely unpardonable. I estimate the loss at $10 a ton in this way. It takes about, I understand, ten pounds of grapes to make a gallon of wine, and the wine manufacturers estimate the manufacture in this country at about 2,000,000 gallons of wine. That 2,000,000 gallons of wine will be reduced in value ten cents a gallon which amounts to $200,000, that is estimating the quantity of grapes which the wine makers use. But upon the total product of the vineyards, that would amount to $800,000. I do not therefore estimate, when I put the loss at $400,000, that the grape growers will be asked to pay the whole loss. Possibly the wine manufacturers may be able to stand part of it by reducing their profits. Possibly the consumers may find it absolutely necessary to pay the grape growers a portion of their loss, because if the grape growers reduce the price of the grapes by the total loss, which will be $20 a ton, they will bring the price down to such a point that consumption will increase to such an extent as to have the effect of raising the price. Therefore, a fair estimate would be that the grape growers will sustain a loss of $10 a ton of $400,000. That is a big price to pay for the entry of our agricultural implements into a foreign country at a reduced rate. Let us see how the case stands as regards our agricultural implement manufacturers, because if they gain enough by the change, I shall be satisfied. But what is the amount they will gain? The export to foreign countries for nine months is, as I have said, $465,000 and to France $385,000. A fair estimate of the advantage to our agricultural implement makers in their trade with France will be $46,000 in nine months, or, say, $60,000 in a year. What is it in respect of foreign countries, I cannot estimate not knowing the difference between the minimum and maximum tariffs of these countries. But, assuming it to be as great—though I feel sure it is not—as in the case of France, the total advantage to our agricultural implements would be not more than $150,000 a year. Thus you will see that the gain to our agricultural implement makers is offset nearly three for one by the loss to the growers of grapes of Canada. This is the greatest objection I have to this treaty—that it strikes at two of the natural industries of this country, industries that are carried on with great advantage to the people. It will deal a very severe blow, if not a death-blow, to one important industry, causing a loss which will amount to many times over any gain than can possibly be got through the existence of this treaty.

Now, I know it will be a great advantage to Mr. Harris, who is going to contest the constituency of Brantford, to have this amount of money conveniently drop into his pocket. I know that Mr. Harris will be able to put up a stronger fight than he otherwise might against my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) beside me. Notwithstanding this enormous advantage on the part of his opponent, however, I feel sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) will come back after the next election to represent still the good city of Brantford.

Mr. PATERSON. Will it not help the Cockshutts as well as the Harrises ?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I am told that the Cockshutts do not export agricultural implements to France.

Mr. PATERSON. Do they not? I think you are mistaken.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. There is another feature of this matter that has struck me with great force, that is, how it came to pass that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) did not raise his voice in council against the introduction of these adulterated wines. How does it come that he, the presumed champion of the prohibitionists, sat in council and permitted the admission into this country of these wines at these enormously reduced rates? I marvel that his voice was not stronger in the council. We have always thought of the hon. gentleman, especially when he was down in Stanstead at the last election, as the champion of prohibition. But he sits in council and permits his fellow ministers to open the flood-gates to allow the importation into this country not only of wines, but adulterated brandy—for, I understand, that one of the items permits the importation of adulterated brandy at reduced rates. Even had he been willing to admit pure brandy we might not have been so much surprised, but when he allows the adulterated article to come in at a reduced rate, our surprise can hardly be expressed.

So whether you look at it from the point of view of the loss of revenue or the disadvantage to the industries of the country, or from the moral standpoint, this treaty stands for condemnation. So far as I am concerned, if I have the opportunity, I shall vote against it, holding up both hands. Evidently the Canadian representatives went to France determined to bring back a treaty. When the astute diplomats of France found them in that frame of mind, they soon came to the conclusion that if they treated our representatives nicely, dined them and wined them and took good care of them while they were there, they would be properly able to skin them before they came back to this country. And I am bound to say they did. It will cost us $10 of good Canadian money for every dollar's worth of goods we get under it. This is said to be the first treaty ever negotiated by Canadian plenipotentiaries. Well, all I can say is that if this is a sample of the treaty that Canadian plenipotentiaries are going to negotiate in the future, I, for one, will be in favour of having our treaties negotiated by British plenipotentiaries.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). I think it a great pity that one or other of the ministers who had so much to do with the negotiation of the treaty have not said anything with regard to what has been set forth by my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith).

Mr. LENNOX. They said it all outside.

Mr. LANCASTER. But this is the proper place to say it, if they have anything to say. I am bound to say that my hon. friend from Wentworth has been very moderate in his denunciations of this treaty in the interests of the fruit growers of Canada. Coming as the hon. gentleman does from a county whose main industry is fruit growing, he is very moderate indeed. I should be inclined to go further than he does and say more emphatically that the fruit growers of the Dominion of Canada are practically paying for the sake of having this treaty. At present the bulk of the fruit growing industry is in the Niagara district and the counties of Essex and Kent. But having some knowledge of the province of Ontario, I venture to say that, if this industry were properly taken care of, if it were given any such chance as other industries are given, the whole of southern Ontario in a few years would be employed in growing fruit, including semi-tropical fruits, such as grapes and peaches. Some reason ought to have been given for this enormous payment, as it were, made by the fruit-growers of Ontario that these plenipotentiaries might come back here with a treaty —some reason should be given why this industry should be called upon to pay the piper. It is very well to say that we want a treaty. I do not know that we want a treaty if it is not going to do us any good. Of course, we want to be friendly with France and with every other nation, but a good neighbour is one who will do his duty to you and does not demand that you should give up your rights for him. Our first duty in treaty-making is to ourselves. In the 'Times' newspaper of London, England, in the issue of February 7, I find the following, headed 'The Treaty with Canada':

The report on the Franco-Canadian treaty of September 19, presented to the Chamber of Deputies by M. Jules Siegfried, member for Havre, in the name of the Customs Committee, has just been issued as a parliamentary paper. M. Siegfried concludes in favour of the ratification of the treaty, as it leaves France free to do as she likes in the revision of her tariffs.

That is what the London 'Times' understands the French people believe the effect of this treaty to be. If we have not bound France at all, why should we be tied by France? Even if we have made a bad bargain, we do not know if we can hold them to it.

He has no doubt that the new arrangement will develop trade between the two countries. French exports will be stimulated by the lowering of the duties on French products. On the other hand, many Canadian products will profit by the French minimum tariff,——

My hon. friend (Mr. E. D. Smith) has said what these Canadian products are—that they are practically confined to one industry.

--but France has agreed to no permanency in the rate of this tariff. M. Siegfried does not believe that the increased sale of Canadian products in France can do any serious harm to French agriculture or industry.

Taking it on the whole, I think he has well said that he may well congratulate himself, and that the increased sale of Canadian products 'can do no serious harm to French agriculture or industry.' Mr. E. D. Smith has given statistics with reference to the importance and extent of the grape growing industry in this country. I have here one of many petitions sent to the Minister of Finance in this matter by local and provincial fruit growers' associations. This is from the Fruit Growers' Association of the township of Louth, in the county of Lincoln. I understand that Mr. Smith has a whole bundle of such petitions, all practically to the same effect, and for the benefit of the House I propose to read this petition from the township of Louth as a sample of the opinion of the fruit growers. The resolution reads:

At a meeting of the Louth Fruit Growers' Association, held in the Grange Hall, Louth, on Saturday, January 11, and at which a large number of fruit growers were present, the following resolution was introduced and passed unanimously:—

Moved by Frank Blaikie, seconded by John H. Brodrick,

Whereas, the members of this association and who are large producers of grapes and who have invested a large amount of money in the planting and cultivation of vineyards to meet the extensive and growing demand for their product by the wine manufacturers for the manufacturing of wine, have learned with alarm of the proposal to allow the entry of a class of wine that will come in direct competition with the standard of wine produced in this country at a greatly reduced duty, and feeling strongly that the business of grape growing in this country is being jeopardized thereby; humbly pray that the clauses referring to the reduction of duty on light French wines be not ratified.

(Signed) A. CRAISE,
President.
A. C. GREGORY,
Secretary.

To the Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Minister of Finance,
Dominion of Canada.

To show the Minister of Finance that there are no politics in this matter, I may say that the mover of this resolution is a Liberal of the old school who says what he means, and the seconder is an old Conservative of the same character. The president of the association is a Liberal of the old school and the secretary a staunch Conservative.

The people of southern Ontario have made grape growing in that region practically what wheat growing is in the Northwest Territories. Destroy the fruit growing industry in southern Ontario and you will reduce the value of the holdings of these people by from 50 per cent to 75 per cent. I have lived in that district for some twenty years, but I can remember farms that were worth at that time $50 to $60 an acre that are now worth $200 an acre because of the grape growing industry, and my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) says that the same thing applies on the north side of the lake. I apprehend that although the Minister of Agriculture is still in the cabinet, we are not going to have the use of wines in Canada prevented. We must take it for granted that we are to have light wines, and if we are to have them every effort should have been made to assist the people of Canada to grow the grapes and manufacture the wines. The class who will lose most heavily by reason of this treaty are the owners of the soil, the growers of the grapes. As Mr. Smith has said, the grape grower must sell from one-half to one-third of his product to the wine manufacturer. If he grew only the one class of grapes, they would all ripen in the same week and he could not market them in a businesslike way, so he must grow a table grape for general sale and a large proportion of wine grapes for sale to the wine manufacturers. If you prevent the sale of grapes to the wine manufacturer, we would have to use, to a great extent, imported grapes, as the grower would be forced out of the growing of certain varieties. No one seems to have thought of the Canadian grape growing industry in connection with the negotiating of this treaty. It may be that the juice of the French grapes was so good to these gentlemen when they were engaged in the negotiations that they thought that no grape in Canada would have juice worth considering. Had they inquired as to the money invested in the industry in Canada they would have found that there are to-day many people earning their living in that line of industry, with a probability of twice as many unless their business is interfered with as this treaty interferes with it.

Why should we give up $5 to $10 of revenue for every dollar lost by France, and at the same time take that $5 or $10 practically all out of one industry? As Mr. Smith has said, the loss of revenue will be approximately $350,000, and this loss will be at the expense of one Canadian industry. Let them grow wheat in the west, where they can grow it well; let them grow apples in northern Ontario; let them carry on mixed farming in northern Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and other sections; but when we have a part of Canada—the southern portion of Ontario—where people can make a living on fifteen or twenty acres by grape growing, whereas formerly they required to use one hundred acres to make an inferior living, why should that state of affairs be interfered with simply, as my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Smith) states, for the sake of making a treaty with France? Why should it not be considered that the grape growers and the wine-making industry deserved protection and consideration? There is no answer given, there is no reason assigned for it, and I can only assume that the matter was entirely forgotten. Now, I hope it was not because neither of the two gentlemen who negotiated the treaty was an Ontario man. I apprehend that they are Canadians, that they endeavoured to do what was best, but they might have taken that into consideration, or they might have asked somebody to give them advice in regard to what the effect upon the province of Ontario might be with reference to this matter, and if they thought that there was some reason for making this great sacrifice at the expense of the fruit growers, they could certainly have given us that reason. From the fact that they have not done so, I apprehend that they did not think of it at all, and that therefore the treaty was framed in that way just for no other reason whatever than the hurry and necessity of making a treaty of some kind.

There is one thing that I can suggest. I know it will be said: Well, the bargain is made and this talk of yours and of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) is useless except in so far as you are using it as a condemnation. But, there may yet be some chance to cure the matter by adopting a proper inspection and putting a strict and rigid construction upon the terms of the treaty. If they were to put upon the words they have used in this statute a very extreme construction, or if they were to apply a rigid inspection, it might yet remedy part of the evil. They might say that some of the wines that might come in under this treaty are not within the meaning of the language used. What I mean is that there will be a lot of contaminated, badly made wines, not the pure juice of the grape, such as is produced in Lincoln, or Welland, or at Pelee Island, or at other places in southern Ontario, which will be brought into competition, under this treaty, if it is construed at all liberally towards France, with a lot of very dangerous—I might say poisonous wines, taking the place of and putting out of business the honest wines of Canada. I know that you cannot undo the bargain you have made with France. It is not like a tariff matter where you could move to take the matter out of committee and consider it, as you did in regard to the duty on fruit last year at the instance of my hon. friend from Wentworth who gave you such excellent advice as to the way in which you were going to injure fruit growers in the matter of the tariff. The government might take it out of committee and consider and change it if it were a matter of tariff, but I know they cannot change the wording used because a treaty has another party to it who has to be consulted and I apprehend, that, having made a treaty and such a good one for the French nation France will not agree to change it. But there is a chance yet. If this government wished to do some measure of justice to the grape growing industry of southern Ontario let them put such a construction upon the language, without changing the language of the treaty, that these wines which would otherwise come into competition under this treaty, with the native manufactured wines of Ontario, would be kept out to a great extent. If you are not careful in the way that you do construe it, if you do not put some strict and rigid construction on these words, you are going to have a most dangerous kind of cheap wine come in here, not pure, no virtue in it, except that of cheapness which is not a virtue unless it is pure and you are going to put it out of the power of Canadians to buy their own pure, cheap wines and make them buy adulterated wines from France which are not good for them besides which they are putting out of business their fellow citizens of Ontario who can furnish them with a pure article and at the same time prosper, as they have a right to prosper, in their own country. I therefore urge upon the government that as they have apparently—accidentally, if you like—carelessly—perhaps I should not say so—at all events, in some way which is at present not quite understandable—done this injustice to the grape growers and the wine manufacturers of Canada, they ought to at least do all they can, by the construction that they put upon the language governing the introduction of these wines which are to be allowed in here at the reduced rates of duty which have been mentioned by my hon. friend from Wentworth, to keep out as far as possible these wines that come into competition with people in Canada engaged in the grape growing industry.

I am not going to take up the time of the House with any more extended remarks upon the matter. It is a very serious matter indeed to the industry I have mentioned. I can only deplore, with my hon. friend from Wentworth, that some consideration was not given to their rights at the time the treaty was made and I am sorry to say that I think the government will find, when the voters in these parts of the country get a chance to say anything about it at the polls, that they will indicate their view when they mark their ballots, in a way that will not be very complimentary to the government unless they do find some way, either by construction or inspection of the wine brought into Canada, to remove the injustice which they have done to this native industry.

Mr. J. C. WALSH (Montreal, St. Anne). Mr. Speaker, I heard my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) a few moments ago, read an extract from the 'Times'. This statement was supposed to have been founded upon a report made by Mr. Siegfried. I have that report in my hands at the present moment. It is a report made in the name of the customs commission charged with the duty of examining the Bill concerning the French treaty. The particular item to which my hon. friend has referred is to be found at page 20 and it reads as follows :

To resume, whilst giving our minimum tariff on a certain number of articles, we preserve absolutely the right to modify our general tariff and our minimum tariff if we deem it advisable, it being well understood that we shall always accord to Canada on these articles the conditions that would be extended to a favoured nation.

It adds, and that is what my hon. friend did not add, that :

Canada shall enjoy the same privilege.

My hon friend has not given the House a complete statement and his source of information has not been correct. The statement was of a nature to lead this House into error had it been accepted without any contradiction.

Mr. LANCASTER. I read all that is in the 'Times'.

Mr. J. C. WALSH. It will teach my hon. friend that the sources of information should be diligently sought for in order that no question may be raised as to their authoritative character. I do not accuse my hon. friend of bad faith—far from it—but I mean to say simply that his statements are not correct as I have shown here by quoting from page 20 of this report. To go farther, Mr. Speaker, I would like to give some additional extracts from this report made by Mr. Siegfried.

Our exports are principally expensive goods and goods of a light nature, such as books and paper, fruit, chemical products, gloves, skins and other things, whereas the importations from Canada are of a totally different nature, consisting of stuffs largely in a raw state and not highly finished in the process of manufacture.

This gentleman further says :

The convention of 1893 has certainly served its purpose and we should not do it the injustice of forgetting the circumstances under which it rendered us service. We cannot expect a treaty which has only ten articles in its schedule to exert any great influence on the commerce of the two countries, but we must remember that if such a treaty did not exist we would have to arrange some other one.

The hon. gentlemen of the opposition who have spoken, have every one of them, asserted that this treaty is one-sided and that it gives advantages to France without securing any quid pro quo for Canada. But the hon. gentleman who makes this report to the French chamber says :

Therefore, from the standpoint of the tariffs, the arrangement now under review gives advantages to France ; and yet it has been the subject of several criticisms.

It will therefore be seen that this same treaty has been the subject of like criticism in France from the French point of view, that it has received in this House. But, my hon. friends opposite have not been sincere in their remarks; they denounce this treaty in every possible fashion but they have offered no suggestion for its improvement, and indeed each one of them contradicts the other which may tend to show that they are not consistent in their criticisms of the treaty. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) told us this afternoon that the schedule did not matter to the people of the west, but the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) took a great deal of time and pains to explain the difficulties which the schedule would give rise to and to what extent it was injurious to this country. My hon. riend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) told us that the port of St. John would benefit by the treaty and that the clause concerning direct shipments was a good one, but the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) took an entirely different view.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not refer to the port of St. John; the French Canadian line does not come to the port of St. John but to Halifax.

Mr. J. C. WALSH. But my hon. friend was in favour of giving the advantage to our own ports.

Mr. DANIEL. Oh, yes.

Mr. J. C. WALSH. That is sufficient for my argument which is that my hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) was favouring the clause providing for direct shipments while my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) was opposed to it. In view of this, I think one can fairly charge these hon. gentlemen with not being sincere. Now, as to the contention with regard to the diplomatic standing of Canada in arranging this treaty, that after all is more or less a matter of procedure, and has nothing to do with the material advantages which we may gain from the treaty itself. The point in reference to that was raised by the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who though he saw in the acts of the ministers who negotiated the treaty an effort to gain some personal or political kudos, and he alleged that treaties had been similarly negotiated at other times, to which the ministers of the Crown answered that this French treaty marked an epoch in the history of our diplomacy. I need not go into the merits of that argument, it is sufficient for me to know that we have a treaty which I believe will benefit Canadian trade. I need only cite the Montreal 'Gazette' to show that the trade of Canada has increased in ten years from $234,000,000 to $571,000,000; we know that our country is making wonderful progress; we know that our fertile plains are being settled and cultivated, we know that production in agriculture and manufactures is increasing and we know that we need markets for these products. It is natural that we should look to France under conditions such as these. We had certain commercial treaty relations with that country before and we knew that the existing treaty was obsolete. We believed indeed that the old treaty restricted us where we should not be restricted; we found that under it we had not been accorded the favoured nation clause; that we did not stand on an equal footing with France as regards this question of direct shipments; that they could raise their duties while we could not do so, and we found also that thirty other nations had obtained certain concessions from France which we were not possessed of. It was natural then that Canada should look to the markets of France for the disposal of the products of her fisheries, of her agriculture, and of her industries. France is receiving imports to the value of 285,000,000 of francs every year. The United States had sent to France $25,000,000 worth of exports including such things as agricultural implements, wheat, carriages, bicycles, fruit, furs, sewing machines, typewriters, leather, lumber, and many other things which we have to sell, and it was a natural thing that Canada should seek to get some of the French trade in these very articles which she has to dispose of. We went to France and we obtained favoured treatment on a limited number of articles, but that is all we required, for we were not in a position to export any other commodities. As a matter of fact some of the hon. gentlemen opposite have been criticising the ministers for having allowed too many articles to be placed on the schedule. It is true that my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) said that the previous treaty with France was obsolete and that it would be necessary to remedy it, but still in his criticism of the new treaty he refrained from suggesting a single article which it would be desirable to include and which was not included. The hon. gentleman seemed to think he had discharged his full duty by simply finding fault. And these hon. gentlemen opposite have been stating that we have received no special favours from France, while as a matter of fact the gentlemen who made their report to the French chamber did not see that there were any advantages either on one side or the other. Let us consider exactly what we ought to obtain in a treaty such as this. On the articles included in it France has given us her minimum tariff and she has given no better to any other nation, while on our side we could not afford to give our lowest tariff which is the British preference. Can we complain that France has given to us just what she has given to other countries with which she has made commercial treaties? Let us remember that if by any chance France was to give Canada a special favour she would be compelled to extend that special favour to the other nations with which she has these treaties, and in the end Canada would enjoy no stability in her relations with France because every year her tariffs with respect to other nations would be changing and we never would know exactly where we were.

My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and many other hon. gentlemen during the course of this debate have dwelt upon the unfavourable balance of trade between Canada and France which exists in this country. Their objection is based on the mercantile theory of the middle ages, which consisted in the belief that the most successful trade would show, after many transactions, a money return due from the foreign country to the exporting country. This theory prevailed when money was considered to be wealth. Nowadays, what difference does it make whether we pay for our imports in money or in products, since that money is derived from our export of products? I see no disadvantage in an unfavourable balance of trade, because I deny the statement that we can derive no advantage from things which we obtain and that it is only the things from which we part that we may derive an advantage; for as soon as our importations exceeded the proper amount, there would be a scarcity of money in this country, our money having to be sent abroad to pay for them, and this scarcity of money would in turn produce a fall in prices, and discourage further importations. Again, let us take the alternative. If prices were low, money being scarce, other countries would buy from us and this demand for our products would cause prices to gradually rise again until there would be an equilibrium.

There are many indirect advantages to be derived from this treaty. It will stimulate dormant energies in our people, and lead to the investment of capital and the development of inventiveness. It will bring them into close touch with other nations, by which they can always learn something of advantage. The hon. member for North Toronto takes exception to the fact that we do not know who our competitors are in the French market. It seems to me that that is of very little consequence. All we desire is to get in there. We know that there is a certain amount of money waiting for us in that market. When we know that we are going to be placed on an equal footing with thirty-five other nations, and that there are purchasers there to buy the goods we bring, it matters not who our competitors are. Again, what matters the difference in tariffs as between Canada and France? Granted for the moment that the difference between our intermediate tariff and our general tariff is somewhat large, and that the difference between the minimum and the general tariff of France is exceedingly small, my hon. friend from North Toronto endeavoured to show that we gave France a great reduction in our tariff. What matters it if we reduce our tariff here? It makes absolutely no difference to France whether we reduce our tariff or not, for the simple reason that as soon as we get into the market of France on the same footing as other nations, we will not be competing with France, but we will compete with other nations, and then it becomes a question of the survival of the fittest. As regards France, it makes no difference to her whether our scale of duties is lowered or not. We protect our own producers, and we protect British producers by the preferential tariff. France cannot compete with them nor with us in our market; but France competes with other nations, and the rate of duty makes absolutely no difference to her.

Some exception has been taken to certain articles and clauses of this treaty. It was only natural for the ministers to provide for possible trade in the future in a treaty which was probably to last for the next ten years. Some of our hon. friends have referred to our exports of different articles, and have contended that the treaty gives us no advantage with respect to them. Horses and cattle were mentioned, although horses are imported into France to the amount of 11,000,000 francs, and cattle to the amount of 9,000,000 francs. If we do not send many horses and cattle to France now, why should we not hope to do so later? Canned meats were mentioned, and the only reason given why they were not exported in larger quantities was that our transportation facilities were not sufficient for this class of goods. That is not a fault in the treaty, but in our system of transportation, which may be remedied. Fish was also mentioned; but we send fish from British Columbia to Boston; why should we not send it also to France? France has no fish, while we have the finest fish products in the world, and why should we not hope later on to build up a trade in fish with France? The same is true of cheese. There may be difficulties in regard to that. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) referred to cheese as a product which could not be exported to France at present, and I find from the compilation of the Montreal 'Gazette' that the reason for that is that we cannot keep up with the home consumption. We may be able later to export coal, when we have sufficient labour to produce it. Then, with regard to agricultural implements, notwithstanding the statement that it may be advantageous to the Massey-Harris Company to send these goods to foreign nations, it is advantageous to Canada also, and we hope we shall continue to have that advantage. Reference was made to fruits and to the fact that we have not adequate facilities for exporting them, that we need more ships with cold storage compartments, and so forth; but we ourselves import fruits from Italy which we can use to advantage, and the United States sent last year $200,000 worth of fruit probably greater distances than we would have to send ours; and our fruits would be sent by a more northern route. Reference is also made to our grain. We have the granary of the world; we are in a position to supply all other nations; and because there happens to be no difference between the two tariffs of France on grain, I see no reason why grain should not be provided for in the treaty as a measure of precaution.

My hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Smith) attacked the ministers for reducing the revenue and tried to show that this country is going absolutely to ruin because as he claims something has been done detrimental to our wine producing interests. Well, I think my hon. friend is wrong in his premises. He might just as well attack the government for having granted the British preference, which has made still greater reductions in our tariff and which has by no means been followed by the ruin he anticipates from the present instance. We have had the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) and the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) endeavouring to show that because the duties have been lowered on certain classes of leather from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent, on ribbons from 35 per cent to 25 per cent, and on millinery, our manufacturers in these lines are going to be ruined because they will not be able to withstand the foreign competition, but after dilating on this question they proceeded to argue that no such result could possibly follow because the clause in the treaty requiring direct shipments to come through Canadian ports was absolutely going to fetter this trade. Well, the view I take is that it is not ourselves but the other fellow whom we are fettering. Our ministers, although they were not asked by the French ministers to insert that clause in the treaty, took a page from the French book and had it inserted. In this they did simply what the United States continually does as regards direct shipments to its ports whenever possible and what the French government also does in like circumstances. I should say that it is rather to the credit of our ministers that they had sufficient foresight to take a page from the book of France. Our hon. friends took up the position that because we made this restriction in favour of our own ports, we should be met with reprisals. Again they took the pessimistic view. Perdition and ruin were facing us on every side. They say that the United States will undertake reprisals, but if they do, it can only be because they stand to lose by this clause, and what they are going to lose we are bound to gain. Besides reprisals are of two sorts. We may injure the United States directly or indirectly. A man in business who enlarges his own trade is no doubt thereby doing some injury to his neighbour who is competing against him in the same line. But he is not thereby attacking his neighbour. He may draw trade away from him, but he is not attacking him directly, and no man has reason to find fault with another for trying to increase his own business. That is all we are trying to do. If incidentally we happen to injure our neighbours the United States, we are sorry for them, but the gain we experience will no doubt to a certain extent alleviate that sorrow. No doubt, however unsatisfactory that may be to my hon. friends opposite, their loss will be to our advantage. But how can my hon. friends maintain that this clause affecting direct shipments is going to divert trade from its natural line? I should say that it will have just the opposite effect. Why, this country is spending millions yearly to send our trade down the St. Lawrence and through our ports in the lower provinces, and in doing this we claim that we are sending it along its natural lines. It matters little to me what port our policy may benefit so long as it be a Canadian port and so long as our trade is thereby sent through our own arteries. How can my hon. friends reconcile the position they take on this matter with their support of steamship subsidies? It would be foolish to pay these subsidies unless for the purpose of bringing trade through our own lines, and if thereby we are diverting it from its natural channels, our hon. friends should oppose any policy which will promote the development of our own railways and our own waterways. But the fact cannot be denied that our St. Lawrence route is the most natural and the most feasible route and that everything that we can do to prevent trade from being diverted into foreign routes is to the advantage of the country at large. Let us then do all we can to have our imports and exports pass through our own Canadian ports and thus follow the example set by the United States with regard to their own ports. But my hon. friends say that we have an insufficiency of carriers and they ask how then are we going to handle this trade. It seems to me that they are putting the cart before the horse. It seems to me that the first thing to do is to supply the trade and then we may rest assured that the carriers will follow. It is not a question of building carriers before we have freights in our ports to warrant the expenditure on their construction. What country is going first to build carriers and then wait for freights? The cargoes must be on our docks and then the carriers will come to take them away. In fact when there is an insufficiency of carriers, that indicates that our commerce is increasing, and instead of being an argument against taking every step to still further increase it, it ought to be an argument to the contrary. Let the trade grow and we can make our minds easy about the supply of carriers. To my mind this French treaty is a very hopeful beginning. It will give us an opportunity of building up a very profitable trade between two countries, and I think it is a source of congratulation for every Canadian that our ministers, although they were dealing with keen-witted Frenchmen, were able to meet them on their own ground. We must not always consider outsiders abler than our own men. I do not deny that distance lends enchantment to the view; I do not deny that a country with a greater population may be expected to produce a greater number of great men than does Canada. But Canada may fairly expect to develop men as great as those in other countries. In fact, she has already done so. Where, for instance, shall we look for a greater inventor than Bell, to whom we owe the telephone? There is no reason to belittle our own men in order to give greater prominence to those at a distance. Especially is such a thing to be deprecated when it takes the form of such attempts at belittlement as that of hon. gentlemen in this House when they speak of pæans of praise, and jubilations of the party press from coast to coast, and the floating of red bunting. The red seems to have aroused these gentlemen to increasing anger. But what seemed to worry these hon. gentlemen most was the acclamation with which the people greeted these ministers when they returned. The people instinctively felt that the position of Canada had been improved, and their insight into the real facts of the case enables them to turn aside the point of a specious argument, such as those we hear from critics of the government in the discussion of this treaty.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, Canada, that immense country separated, on the one hand from Great Britain by the expanse of the Atlantic, and on the other from Japan by the waters of the Pacific, possesses the greatest agricultural, forest, mineral and maritime resources. The peoples who have built up confederation descend from the two most illustrious races of the Christian era, and have achieved unexpected success in Northern America. We have established and developed our transportation system in order to increase our home and foreign trade. Under the vigilant and fostering eye of Great Britain, we have conquered the right to regulate our custom tariff, and, in a certain measure, to conclude our own trade arrangements. We are anxious to open up new channels for our trade, new markets for our products. I have considered with care the recent Franco-Canadian treaty. That trade convention is not perfect, but I believe its effects will be to develop in quite a large measure our trade relations with France, our old mother country, whose noble deeds are recorded on every page of modern history. That new tariff will favour the opening up of new ocean routes, as well as the coming in of French capital and French immigration. France has granted trade facilities to many European nations; but on the free soil of America, Canada has been one of the first to enjoy the privileges of the French minimum tariff. I am happy, moreover, to acknowledge the striking recognition of our fiscal autonomy implied in the concluding of this treaty. Between the years 1608 and 1760, the French Canadians were intimately associated with the commercial glory and the financial calamities of France. Between the years 1760 and 1845, the Canadians were practically cut off from any intercourse with the French nation. In 1845, F. X. Garneau published his history of Canada, an imposing monument in honour of the French Canadian nationality. In that philosophical and historical work, the author made known our origins, our feelings, our energy, our fight for political freedom, our business talents, and made a deep impression on the minds of French thinkers, writers, economists and statesmen.

Messrs. H. Martin, Ampère, Rameau were moved at reading this great historical work of Garneau, and visited Canada. But it was thought desirable to strike the minds of French business men as well, in order to bring about closer trade relations with France. Accordingly, in 1855, Canada sent representatives to the Paris universal exposition, where we obtained awards worthy of a great nation. Let me quote the following words from C. Robin :

From a business standpoint, Mr. Taché, the representative of Canada at the Paris exposition, has very ably set forth the advantages which both countries may reap from the establishment of continued trade relations, and that campaign will bear its fruits. The fine products exhibited by Canada are sure warrant of that.

The French authorities were desirous of knowing what were our resources, our various products. They lost no time in sending to Quebec Mr. de Belvèze, commander of La Capricieuse, for the purpose of establishing trade relations between France and Canada.

The outcome of Mr. de Belvèze's mission, writes Turcotte, was the establishment of a general consulate in Canada and the amendment of the French tariff so as to permit the introduction in France of lumber and ships from Canada. In 1859 the Baron Gauldrée-Boilleau came to Quebec in the capacity of French consul general. Heretofore, France had not been in the habit of buying Canadian products, and the small quantities of goods which she supplied to Canadians reached us in a roundabout way.

Mr. H. Fabre, our representative in France, wrote on the date of October 1, in the ' Paris-Canada ':

The first attempt at trade conventions between Canada and France date back to 1858. A draft treaty was then worked out between Mr. Gauldrée-Boilleau, consul general of France, and Mr. Galt, Minister of Finance, and is thus contemporaneous with the establishment of the French consulate of Canada.

Sir A. Chapleau made a special study of our financial and trade relations with France. He substantially contributed to the successful conclusion of the commercial treaty signed in 1893 and ratified in 1894. That treaty was an important one. Mr. Fabre writes :

On taking Mr. Galt's place as High Commissioner of Canada in England, Sir Charles Tupper resumed the negotiations which brought about the treaty of 1893-94, still in force. Those who might be tempted to find that treaty rather narrow should not forget that at the time it was not possible to obtain more, and that, after all, it was a decisive step in the direction in which the present negotiators, Messrs. Fielding and Brodeur, have achieved complete success.

However, that agreement of 1893, concluded and ratified by statesmen of whom our country is proud, could not be of very great benefit to our farming community. In fact, under that agremeent only such farm products as had already undergone some manufacturing process could be exported, such as canned meats, condensed milk, preserved fruits.

A few weeks ago, the 'Bulletin de Paris' devoted to Canadian trade and progress a valuable page wherein our business activity was expounded. I shall quote the concluding lines of the article :

The share with France takes in this Canadian commerce is unfortunately not in keeping with our past relations with that colony, which at one time was ours. The bulk of Canadian exports to France consists in lobsters, agricultural implements, apples, live stock and peas. On the other hand, fine woollens, silks, diamonds in the rough, gloves, fancy canned goods, jewellery, automobiles, make up the bulk of our exports to Canada. It is still therefore the luxuries which we are the most likely to supply ; but greater efforts would be needed, and particularly more advertising, to enable us to obtain in Canada that hold on the trade which the sympathies of its inhabitants would ensure to us.

I shall now quote a few figures relating to our trade with France. They illustrate the headway made since 1894 :

Our total trade with France—
1898	$ 5,000,613
1906	9,788,078
1907	10,903,671
French exports to Canada—
1898	$3,975,351
1905	7,059,139
1907	9,145,885
Canadian exports to France—
1898	$1,025,262
1906	2,120,091

The recent treaty grants the privileges of the French minimum tariff to several Canadian farm products :

Live cattle, horses, meats, fresh and salted, eggs, cheese, butter (salted), honey, lobsters, potatoes, fruit, vegetables, forage. Among the forest and mineral products which are to be admitted under the French minimum tariff, we may mention rough lumber, square lumber of a certain thickness, splints, ores, sewing machines, agricultural implements, river boats of all sizes, of wood, manufactures of asbestos, mica in sheets or flakes, articles in mica.

What are the products which we export in large quantities? I shall mention the following :

Fiscal year, 1906—
Live stock	$ 1,306,448
Cereals	44,845,783
Hay	1,529,941
Metals and ores	35,013,945
Butter	7,045,539
Cheese	24,433,169
Eggs	495,176
Wood and manufactures of	43,331,511
Agricultural implements	2,495,104

Among the products which we exported to France in 1906, I note the following :—

Live stock	$164,330
Cereals	224,022
Metals and ores	372,601
Agriculural implements	293,536
Wood	97,670

For many years past France has adopted a national protection policy, and under the treaty ratified in 1894, we did not have access to the French market for the sale of our products of the farm, forest or mine.

France is one of the greatest commercial countries in the civilized world, and I have reason to believe that this new treaty will open a new era in the history of our trade relations with the old mother country. Our farming, lumbering and mining industries have unlimited possibilities before them in our young country. Our forests are well wooded, productive, and the object of a good deal of interest. Canada is also well provided with mineral wealth.

Statesmen in France and Canada, as well, have endeavoured to overcome all difficulties, and to pave the way for a commercial agreement, by means of mutual concessions advantageous to both countries. Thanks to the energy, the capabilities and the pregnant activity of the Canadian nation, thanks to the favourable treatment which will be extended to our products, thanks to the fine quality, variety, excellence and beauty of our productions, we shall surely find a large outlet for our goods in France, where, in 1901, imports aggregated 4,714,000,000 francs. Let me mention what the purchases of France amounted to from various countries, in 1901, according to la 'Revue Statistique,' of Paris, issue of September 22, 1902 :

	Francs.
France's imports from the U. S.	481,000,000
" " Germany	417,000,000
" " Belgium	386,000,000
" " Great Britain	667,000,000

Why should we not have our share in that trade ? In 1903, France imported from the United States 2,910,367 dollars' worth of agricultural implements, while, in 1906, she imported from Canada only 293,536 dollars' worth. In 1903, France imported from the United States 2,132,366 dollars' worth of wheat, while, in 1906, she imported from Canada for only 244,022 dollars' worth of cereals. Thanks to the favourable treatment which our goods will enjoy under the new treaty, we will be in a position to compete with the United States on the French market.

In 1901, the imports of France from the Argentine Republic amounted to $71,000,000. Why should not our exports to France reach that figure ? Our agricultural and forest wealth is on a par with that of the Argentine Republic. I have enough faith in the capabilities of the Canadian people to be satisfied of our aptness to compete successfully with the people of South America on the French market.

Among other French products which will be admitted under our intermediate tariff, I notice medicinal preparations, patent medicines and articles for antiseptic surgical dressings. In 1906, these imports reached the amount of $227,432. The farming community and the labouring classes will not reap much benefit from the reduced rate of duty granted on imports from France. In order to show the usefulnes of this trade convention, let me quote these words of Mr. H. Lorin :

Bordering on the United States we have Canada, a country in which France should take a special interest among all others in North America, since within its limits the descendants of the French settlers of the eighteenth century have attained prominence, and are the only prolific race in that country barring the Irish. As a matter of fact, out of a total of 5,000,000 people in that country, about 2,000,000 speak our tongue and still keep a fond remembrance of the old mother-country. Such a community seems to offer very favourable conditions for our economical expansion.

I attach the greatest importance to article VIII of the convention :

To enjoy the benefits of the aforementioned tariff advantages, products originating in France, Algeria, the French colonies and possessions and the territories of the Protectorate of Indo-China, shall be conveyed without transhipment from a port of those territories or from a port of a territory enjoying the preferential tariff into a sea or river port of Canada.

To enjoy the benefits of the aformentioned tariff advantages, Canadian products shall be conveyed without transhipment from a Canadian port or from a port of a country enjoying the French minimum tariff to a port in France, Algeria, the French colonies and possessions and the territories of the Protectorate of Indo-China.

That clause, which has been so warmly discussed, is necessary, in my opinion, to ensure the future developement of our country. Let me quote the following words :

By allowing French goods shipped to Canadian ports to come under the favoured treatment clause, the Canadian shipping industry will be stimulated, new ocean routes will be established between France and Canada, we will become more independent of the United States from a commercial standpoint, and the prosperity of our Canadian ports will be ensured.

Such is also my opinion. The development and improvement of our means of transportation between France and Canada will be the necessary outcome of that treaty.

I am in favour of article VIII of that treaty, but in order to increase our trade with France, this government, the boards of trades and exporters will have to develop transportation facilities between France and Canada. Our government will assist in the development of the Franco-Canadian route by granting a contract to companies intending to promote our trade.

We have made great sacrifices for the purpose of improving our seaports, as well as our great national highway, the St. Lawrence. Our signal system has reached a high point of perfection, and the number of lighthouses has been increased. In order to better ensure the safety of navigation on the St. Lawrence, powerful lights and gas buoys have been provided. A requirement that should now be looked after, is the building at the foot of the old city of Champlain of deep water wharfs with all modern facilities. The government, on the other hand, should not delay building at St. Joseph de Lévis a dry dock to meet the needs of the shipping community. I must congratulate my friend from Lévis on his efforts towards insuring the success of this national undertaking.

The unceasing efforts of business men both in France and Canada will henceforth be the only condition necessary to bring about satisfactory results. The enacting of the preferential tariff clause in favour of British goods seems to have had considerable effect on the development of the Anglo-Canadian trade. To meet the requirements of our trade with England, new means of transatlantic transportation have been provided and developed. Let me mention here those magnificent steamers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which are a credit to the business capabilities of our young Dominion. I am in keeping with the teaching of our past history when I say that the granting of a favoured treatment to imports from France will have the effect of considerably increasing our trade with that country.

Then again, the increase of our trade with England and the development of the transportation facilities between Great Britain and Canada have had the effect of bringing here a larger number of immigrants from the mother country. In 1902, we received 14,739 immigrants from the British Isles; in 1906, that number had reached 91,263. In my humble opinion, an increase in the number of French immigrants will follow the development of the trade between the two countries. French Canadians are anxious to induce French capital and French immigration to come to this country. Extensive commercial intercourse is a valuable aid towards this end.

Our commercial agents in France should be more active. They should establish in the cities shops for the distribution of our products of the farm, the forest and the mine. These products should be distributed broadcast throughout the French country districts. When the French people are better acquainted with the fine quality and the great variety of our products and our resources, they will be more inclined to invest their money with us. The Banque Nationale has just established a branch in Paris, a fact which is very encouraging.

Mr. H. Fabre often writes in the 'Paris-Canada' concerning the increasing interest taken in the affairs of Canada by the various classes of French people. A broader insight into the resources and the economical conditions of Canada will do away with many prejudices concerning our country. We are going to effect a radical change in the French manner of thought, and presently desirable French immigrants will come in larger number to try their luck with us on this Canadian soil. They will lend us a hand in the development of our young Dominion, in the working out of our agricultural forest and mineral wealth. They will be animated by a broad spirit of humanity, and will respect as we do the representatives of the various races who come here in search of liberty and comfort.

A few weeks ago the 'Orange Sentinel' protested with violence against the coming of French immigration to Canada. According to that paper, there is a conspiracy on foot to settle in the new western provinces groups of French and Roman Catholic people. I regret that such an appeal should have been made to religious and racial prejudices; I regret such utterances, which are of a nature to sever or relax the bonds of the 'entente cordiale' between England France and Canada.

France should be proud of our efforts to become more prosperous and powerful. Canada should rejoice at having an opportunity to improve its trade relations with a people whose progressive spirit has startled the world. The sons of old Gaul and those of Great Britain have built up on the shores of the Atlantic and on those of the Pacific, in the valley of the St. Lawrence, about the great lakes and through those immense western prairies a superb monument; the Dominion of Canada. And it is now incumbent on us to complete it, with the help of the younger generations of these people and that of desirable immigrants. That building has justice and liberty for its foundations, and these have been cemented with the blood of French Canadian heroes and of English-speaking loyalists.

It is natural that I should have a special liking for Frenchmen. In that old mother country, where the highest degree of civilization has been attained, we are in a position to obtain immigrants of the agricultural class, strong, vigorous, virtuous, industrious people, who will be devoted to Canadian interests.

Let me in conclusion quote these words of Mr. Fabre:

> Is it not towards France that we should first of all turn our eyes when desirous of developing outside relations? Had we made another choice we would have seemed lacking in deference toward her; and she, by rejecting our offer, under the circumstances, would have shown herself untrue to all her traditions. Sentiment, old country remembrances, cannot but make themselves heard above all other appeals in the course of such negotiations, and to-day, owing to the 'entente cordiale,' we are at liberty to conlcude all nature of understandings.

Mr. H. S. BELAND (Beauce) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the remarks I wish to make to the House concerning the French treaty, let me heartily congratulate the hon. member on the eloquent speech he has just delivered on that subject.

Hon. gentlemen in this House who have criticised the stipulations of the French treaty, underrated their probable effects and sought to diminish the importance of such an achievment in the minds of the House and of the country at large, have all agreed on two points. They contended in the first place that in the matter of our right to negotiate our own commercial treaties, we had not made any advance; and in the second place, they expressed the opinion that the practical results would be nil.

They thought fit to contend, in the first place, that the negotiations which went on in August and September last, between our Canadian ministers and the representatives of the French government, have in no way differed from those carried on in 1893, and in which Sir Charles Tupper played a part. They thought fit to contend that in connection with the conclusion of the former treaty with France, the Dominion government had been left as free as on this last occasion from any interference on the part of the home government.

However, only those utterly blinded by prejudice will deny that on this last occasion the right of Canada to regulate its own tariff has been more fully and more plainly recognized. It is only by degrees, I will admit, that this change has been effected; but the great move, the decisive step, was taken when the Laurier government, in 1897, set forth their policy of preferential trade with England.

The mother country, once this bold move had been made by Canada, found itself obliged either to offer to the colony preferential treatment for its products in the British market, or else to admit practically that Canada was free to look elsewhere for preferential treatment.

England being, as we all know, a free trade country, most foreign products, whether manufactured or not, are admitted without paying any customs duty; and to meet our proposal of preferential trade, she would have been obliged to impose duties on imports from foreign countries, while Canadian products would have continued to come in free.

It is not my intention just now to discuss, but merely to state, what was the course followed under the circumstances by the mother country. In a question of such great import to her from the economic standpoint, England carefully refrained from modifying in any way the policy adopted and followed by her from time immemorial. Of course, a very strong feeling was given expression to in official and governmental spheres of the mother country in favour of granting greater liberty to Canada as regards the regulation of its tariff. And that feeling developed; it asserted itself when the time came for Canada to enter into negotiations, with a view to concluding a trade agreement with France, in August and September last.

Now, what occurred in the course of these negotiations? The mother country, through its ambassador at Paris carefully abstained from taking any active part in them, and let our representatives, that is the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to see without any outside interference to these commercial interests which were specifically our own.

I cannot help wondering, Mr. Speaker, why hon. gentlemen on your left, endeavour to shut their eyes to this remarkable development in our colonial existence, which, in my humble opinion, is the confirmation before the whole world, of the idea set forth the other day by the right hon. leader of the House, in the midst of speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen on the other side: That Canada is a nation. I contend that our friends on the other side, in endeavouring to belittle the true meaning of such an event, are not playing the part of loyal Canadians.

It would be useless and childish to contend that the negotiations, in 1893, were carried on exactly on the same lines as in 1907. The letters written by Lord Ripon, Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper himself, are proof to the contrary, and show clearly and peremptorily that, in 1893, the negotiations were conducted by Sir Joseph Crowe, who represented the British ambassador, and who was constantly present while the negotiations were going on. On the contrary, in 1907, Great Britain's ambassador, at Paris, was content with introducing our Canadian representatives to the French government and henceforth did not put in an appearance until called upon to put at the bottom of the treaty the seal of the imperial government.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side have also thought fit to belittle the possibilities of an extension of our trade resulting from such a treaty. It is not my intention to present any elaborate disquisition on the purely commercial aspects of the convention; but simply to draw the attention of the House and of the farming community, whose representative I am more particularly in this House, to the benefits which are bound to accrue to the latter from the stipulations of this new treaty.

On looking more closely into these stipulations, we notice that most farm products will henceforth be admitted into France at a reduced rate of duty. Among these products some will be particularly favoured. For example, salt meats, canned meats, live stock, poultry, cheese, butter and wheat will, under that arrangement, be exported to France in much larger quantities.

It should not be forgotten that France buys from foreign countries every year about 2,000,000 dollars' worth of live stock, 600,000 dollars' worth of poultry, 2,000,000 dollars' worth of salt meats, 9,000,000 dollars' worth of cheese and 37,000,000 dollars' worth of wheat. It is only reasonable to suppose that, being henceforth on a footing of equality with the most favoured nation on the French market, we shall have a larger share of those purchases.

Let us take cheese particularly. The Canadian farmer sells that product principally in England, and it may be well to note that we are supplying already four fifths of the cheese imported into Great Britain. In other words, the British market is far from being unlimited, and it may not be very long before we have to busy ourselves finding out some other outlet, not merely from the fact that we are already supplying England with nearly the whole of what she imports, while our own output is increasing all the time and the population of Great Britain remains the same, but also, and above all, because competition is getting keener from year to year.

The high prices now paid for cheese are a strong inducement to other countries, which have not until to-day engaged in its manufacture on a large scale, to do so. They are now about to compete, or getting ready to compete in that field with older producers. Should the British market fail us, wholly or in part, should the British consumer no longer buy from us four-fifths of his imports of cheese, but only, say, two-thirds of it, the French market will be open to us, and there might we send that important product. What I have said concerning cheese is also true, although to a less degree, concerning bacon, butter, poultry and live stock.

My intention in beginning these remarks was merely to call the attention of the farming community to the advantages that they will probably—I might say surely—derive from the new treaty, but I cannot resume my seat without briefly alluding to a list of products that will hereafter be admitted on the French market with a rebate of about 30 per cent, I mean asbestos and its products.

I was particularly happy to hear the other day the hon. member from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) expressing his opinion that these products would be largely benefited by the dispositions of the new treaty.

The richest deposits of asbestos are to be found in Canada ; they are in full operation in the counties of Beauce and Megantic, and more particularly in the townships of Broughton and Thetford. These deposits are reputed to be inexhaustible. I am confident that before many years, thanks to the wise enactments of the commercial agreement now under discussion, a wonderful industry in these products will be established in this country. Then the thriving and hardy population of these townships in Beauce and Megantic counties, with the thousands of others attracted in the region to participate in the development of that great industry, while enjoying the means of providing for their families, will have a further proof of the solicitude of the Laurier administration for the farmers and labourers of this country.

Certain newspapers and even members of this House appear to see in this treaty a new impetus to French immigration. The only immigration from that source that would be highly desirable would be that of the French countryman. But the French farmer or countryman, does not emigrate, or hardly does so.

In the first place the population of France being stationary—if not on the decline—the people there does not feel the necessity of sending the overflow of its population to foreign countries. Secondly, the French peasant excels in the practice of two very valuable qualities : frugality and thrift. He is easily satisfied and is not possessed of adventurous dispositions. Added to that, that with the one exception of Japan, from what we were told the other day by the Postmaster General, France is peradventure the country where the love of the native land has sunk its deepest roots in the hearts of her inhabitants—a sentiment that will prompt a Frenchman to live in straitened circumstances, even in poverty in his own country, rather than enjoy ease or even luxury abroad—and we will have the reason of the limited resources of French immigration. And, as I am reminded by the Postmaster General, there is also the conscription. More than that, the aim of the French government is to direct towards French colonies all French emigration, limited as it is. At all events, more intimate commercial relations and a direct service by steamers between the two countries cannot but have a stimulating influence on French immigration to Canada.

Another more tangible consequence of the new treaty will be, I have no doubt, to strengthen between the two great elements of the population of this country the bonds of cordiale entente that exist on the other side of the Atlantic between England and our old mother country.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford). It is almost a matter of form to discuss the new treaty which has been negotiated with the French government; as the Minister of Finance has stated it is unalterable and therefore it may be futile to point out the defects in it. It is unfortunate that in these matters we should be tied down before we have an opportunity of looking into what has been accomplished. The House is now called upon to ratify the treaty which these hon. gentlemen have negotiated at great expense, and which has been heralded throughout the country as a great achievement. No perceptible advantage to Canada has yet been shown. It is, of course, very difficult, in examining the schedules before us, to ascertain what the results will be; we will have to await developments of trade, both export and import, before we can very well see just what has been accomplished; but I think it is plain to all that injustice is going to be done to some industries. That cannot be gainsaid and I think the Minister of Finance has admitted that in his remarks. We have been told that we are receiving advantages on 153 articles and giving advantages on 110. That sounds very well until you come to examine the articles concerned, and then you see that, after all, numbers count for little. If you examine the 153 articles on which these hon. gentlemen claim they have obtained an advantage, you will find that the chance for doing business in 75 per cent of them is infinitesimal; in fact, I question if more than 10 per ceut of the articles enumerated will lead to any great development of Canadian export trade. It is true that we have to-day a government who value a dollar bought as much as a dollar sold. The wonder is that they should have taken any care to get us any advantage on any particular articles, holding that view. If export trade is of no advantage, why have they gone to the trouble of even naming the 153 articles in which we are supposed to do an export trade. If you look at the figures of the trade of Canada with France, as set forth at page 40 of the further memoranda in connection with the convention of 1907, you will find nothing very encouraging in our present trade with France. Take, for instance, the last five years given here, the trade was as follows :

Year.	Exports of goods, Produce of Canada, to France.	Imports from France.
1904..	$1,539,462	$6,206,525
1905..	1,479,999	7,059,139
1906..	2,110,444	7,667,987
1907 (12 mos.)	1,746,184	9,145,885

It will be seen from these figures that we are buying from France at the present time between $4 and $5 for every $1 we are sending there. This is naturally to be expected with a government that places so little value on exports that they negotiate a treaty which promises to make this difference even greater than it is now.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) mentioned one item, omelets. He told us that some eggs must be broken for every omelet. That is apparently a truism, but what we on this side of the House object to is that he breaks the egs and has no omelet. There is no omelet visible at the present time and the eggs as usual have been taken out of Ontario's basket. It is strange that the Finance Minister particularly should single out Ontario when there is anything to be given away—and he seems to have a special grudge at my good city of Brantford. A short time ago a cutlery industry went down that could have been saved by a little encouragement in the tariff; later on binder twine also got a whack and now it is the wine industry. The question is asked: Where was the Minister of Customs? I am sorry to say he is not taking much interest in what affects Brantford or he would have put in a word as he well could and should.

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend is forgetting that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) said that the only article in reference to which Canada had secured any advantage was the article of agricultural machinery, made by the Massey-Harris Company of Brantford. He forgot about the Cockshutt Plow Company and all the other industries there, and yet the hon. gentleman is complaining.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. If the hon. gentleman wants to make a speech he can have the floor shortly. I will take up the point to which he refers before I conclude. In the meantime I wish to point out that the Finance Minister has singled out an industry in Ontario of considerable importance, which has its headquarters in Brantford. He said it was an industry of very small moment if it was one at all. I think he minimized it more than was justified by the facts, and I venture to say that if he does any stumping in the Niagara district of Ontario and all through western Ontario, the advantages he has secured in the French treaty will not be one of his main arguments to induce voters to cast in their lot with this government.

I propose to give a few facts and figures in connection with the wine industry. I am not myself a great wine consumer nor do I recommend others to consume it, but if gentlemen do drink wine they may as well use Canadian wines, all things being equal. I am not advocating the cause of the wine-growers nor am I here by request of the wine-growing industry or the fruit growers, but I have here a statement which will convince the Minister of Finance that this is not such a small industry as he presumed it was when he said the wine industry was a very small one. The document speaks for itself, and which I shall read.

Memorial from the wine growers of Canada—Presented to the government January, 1908.

The Wine Growers' Section of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, comprising among their number practically every wine manufacturer in the country have learned with alarm of the proposal to reduce the tariff under the new Franco-Canadian treaty on certain grades of French wines. As the proposal, if adopted, can only result in serious if not fatal injury to an important branch of native industry, the undersigned beg respectfully to submit for your serious consideration the following facts:

A young and growing industry.

There are in Canada at the present time about a dozen important establishments engaged in the production of wine from the fresh grape. A conservative estimate of the capital employed places the amount of $1,000,000 besides several millions invested in vineyards, with hundreds of growers interested in the production of grapes for the wine industry.

Its relation to the fruit growers.

Grapes are one of the most profitable crops fruit growers can raise; first by reason of the fact that they are practically a sure crop every year (not being nearly so susceptible as other varieties of fruit to extremes of temperature and to excessive moisture or dryness), and second, by reason of the prices they command. Fifteen years ago Concord grapes could readily be bought at $12 per ton. To-day they are regularly worth $25, though during the past year they have sold as high as $35, and choice Catawbas and Delawares as high as $60 per ton.

This steady advance in price is due in a very large measure to the demand created for grapes by the wine manufacturers. The establishment of wineries at different points throughout the fruit areas has opened up profitable markets for the farmer at his very door and has at the same time enhanced the value of his vineyards. With a protective duty of 2 cents per pound in his favour he has been encouraged to increase the acreage under grape cultivation until to-day there are said to be about 20,000 acres under grapes in the province of Ontario, worth at the very least $400 per acre. It is safe to say that fully 80 per cent of the product of this acreage is used for wine purposes. The enterprise of the Canadian wine manufacturers has, therefore, been a boon to the Canadian fruit grower. Together they have developed in a comparatively few years an industry of no mean importance, and one which is capable of far greater expansion if accorded a fair protection against the giants of specialized production in France.

Handicaps to Canadian wine industry.

That it needs protection and needs it badly is apparent when one considers the handicaps under which the Canadian wine industry has to labour:

1. The southern grape grown in France contains so much saccharine that the wine made from it does not need to be sweetened artificially. The northern grape grown in Canada has much less saccharine, and this deficiency must be made up by adding sugar in the proportion of a pound and a half to two pounds for every gallon of grape juice. Including the duty this means an item of from 7 to 1 cents per gallon in the cost of production which is forced upon the Canadian while it is spared the Frenchman.

2. When it is a case of fortifying the wine the Frenchman has a tremendous advantage. In France and all other wine producing countries except Canada the wine producer is allowed to fortify his wine with spirits free of the revenue charge, whereas the Canadian producer has to pay the full revenue charge on all the spirits he uses for fortifying.

3. Productive labour is fully 50 per cent cheaper in France than it is in Canada. This means a further advantage possessed by the French manufacturer.

4. The production of wine in France being many hundred times greater than it is in Canada, the French manufacturer can afford to take a very much smaller margin of profit.

Competition under the proposed treaty.

Under present condition French wines can hardly be said to come into competition with native wines in the Canadian market. The French still wines now being imported are dry wines, known as clarets and sauternes, whereas 95 per cent of the product of Canadian factories is a sweet wine. Very little of the latter runs as high as 20 per cent proof spirits, and the specific duty of 25 cents per gallon on everything up to 26 per cent proof has been sufficient to retain the home market in sweet wines for the home manufacturer. But if, as is now proposed, the duty on French wines testing up to 20 per cent proof is lowered from 25 cents to 15 cents per gallon, and sweet and artificial French wines are allowed to come in at the reduced rates, practically all the wine made in Canada will immediately be subjected to competition which it cannot for a moment withstand. Enjoying, as he does, so many advantages in other ways, and with a through freight rate from Havre to Toronto equal to the rate from Toronto to Montreal, the French manufacturer will be able to market his wine in Canada at a price lower than the Canadian manufacturers' cost of production, and still make a profit.

Conclusion.

Without hesitation we submit that the proposed tariff will deal a serious if not fatal blow to the Canadian wine industry, and with it to the grape growing interest with which it has surrounded itself, unless it is limited in its application strictly to natural wines made from the fresh grape that have not been artificially sweetened and fortified.

Now that is, in brief a statement of the case from the wine growers standpoint. I wish to point out that when the hon. Minister of Finance affects the wine industry he affects not only the men engaged in that industry with the large amount of capital they have at stake, but he affects every fruit grower in the province of Ontario. He is going to injure not only that immense and increasing industry, one in which a large number of fruit growers are interested, but he is going to do something which will affect every farmer more or less in our district because they all grow fruit to a greater or lesser extent and whatever adversely affects the price of grapes will be reflected upon small fruits such as peaches, plums, pears and everything of that sort because the more the price of grapes is reduced so much more will the consumption be, and the tendency will be to buy grapes in preference to peaches, plums and other articles because the competition would be so keen that grapes would be the very much cheaper article of fruit. Therefore, it will not only reduce the price of grapes but of all small fruits. They are naturally very much liked and we are blessed by providence with having in Ontario one of the best grape growing districts in the whole world. There are no grapes that I know of grown outside that have the quality of those grown in the Niagara district particularly and what applies to the Niagara district applies all through from Niagara to Detroit with greater or lesser force. Where the Finance Minister affects one industry he affects the price of fruit from top to bottom and every fruit grower will be more or less affected by the reduced price at which grapes will be sold. This is a very serious consideration and I infer that my hon. friends, who had a very good time in France, if we read the reports correctly and who spent a large amount of money in negotiating this treaty, will have comparatively little advantage to show for it in actual results. I venture to say that if this had been a Nova Scotia industry instead of an Ontario industry the hon. Minister of Finance would have hesitated to sacrifice a capital so great as that engaged in the grape growing industry or a capital so great as that engaged in the wine industry. But it is the custom of this government to hit Ontario—it is strong and able to stand it—to hit them hard and to hit them hard every time. That is what is being done by this government in regard to the Niagara river which they propose to take out of the hands of the Ontario government where it has been for thirty years and place it in the hands of the government down here. That is what is being done in regard to the militia policy which seizes upon a large amount of land in Ontario and takes it without 'by your leave'. In whatever way you look at it the province of Ontario can go to the dogs as far as this government are concerned as long as other provinces will stand at the back of the government. Then the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) said that in negotiating the treaty they had special regard to the port of Montreal. I have no spite against the port of Montreal, I have many friends there, we look upon Montreal as the banner city of the Dominion, but when the minister makes the statement that they had special regard for one city of the Dominion in making this treaty I think he went a good deal further than was judicious and that he made a remark that will not be favourably received throughout the Dominion of Canada. Montreal is a great city, we are all proud of it, but we are not willing to acknowledge that it is the whole of Canada and he should not be permitted to sacrifice the interests of Ontario or any other part of Canada for the sake of Montreal. I do not know whether the minister intended to convey that idea but that is the way the remark sounded to me when he said they had special regard for the port of Montreal in negotiating this treaty. I do not see why Montreal should be singled out for such a preference. This treaty is supposed to be in the interests of the Dominion. But when you look at it you find that the industries that are hit by it are those in Ontario. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has said: Well the Cockshutts will be favourably affected at any rate. I do not know that that will take anything off the edge of my criticism of the treaty. Whether my personal interests may be affected or not I am not prepared to say. They may or they may not.

But when it comes to a matter of principle, I am not prepared to say that I would ask the wine industry or any other industry to be sacrificed because agricultural implements are going to be admitted into France on a little more favourable terms than they were before. I trust I am not so mean-spirited as to ask that the advantage be given to an industry in which I have an interest to the detriment of other industries which are to be made the eggs in the omelet, as the Minister of Finance put it. Let us look at the items in the Canadian schedule to see what our chances of doing business with France in these articles are. One of the very first of these items is horses, and on horses France exacts a duty of thirty dollars per animal, and you can imagine how many horses worth one hundred dollars we will send to France if we have to pay thirty dollars duty on each. Then, on every ox that goes to France there is a duty of twenty dollars, and it will be seen that, both in the case of oxen and horses, the French tariff is prohibitive. There are possibly half a dozen or a dozen items out of the whole 153 on which we can hope to get any advantage in the French market. My hon. friend from St. Anne's (Mr. Walsh) told us amongst other things on which we would get an advantage in exporting to France was clover seed, but I happen to know a little about clover seed, and I can tell him that we are to-day importing clover seed from France. Under the benign influence of the Minister of Agriculture and his Seed Bill the export trade of Canada in clover seed has become almost nil, as I pointed out would be the case when the Seed Bill was before the House; and to-day, instead of exporting clover seed, Canada is importing largely from the United States and from across the ocean. Ontario grows nearly all the clover seed grown in the Dominion, and as Ontario has to supply the wants of the other provinces before she can export, there is very little chance in the near future of her doing business with France in this article. I am free to admit that agricultural implements appear to have received an advantage under this treaty, and it may be that the Massey-Harris and other large firms will be able to increase their output. They are entitled to that, and I do not begrudge it to them, but I do not think that the Minister of Finance is justified in going out of his way to hit any other industry for the benefit of the agricultural implement industry. For my part I will not forego the grand principle of 'Canada for the Canadians' for the mere sake of giving an advantage to that industry or to any other. Now, if you look at schedule 'B' which contains the French articles on which Canada gives an advantage, you will find they are of a very different character from the articles on which Canada receives advantage, and that they already come into our market in considerable quantities. They include canned meats, canned poultry, game, extracts of meat, fluid beef, soups of all kinds and cheese, an immense quantity of which of the higher grades, such as Roquefort, we now import from France. And, although I have not the figures before me, I venture to say that in the matter of cheese, which is one of the main products of Canada, we are probably to-day importing more from France than we are exporting to France. Then, in the case of preparations of cocoa and chocolate, it is well known that the higher qualities of these articles are made in France and that Canada is a large importer of them. Then comes item 72 of the schedule, 'garden, field and other seeds,' and that item is of considerable importance, because there is included in it alone probably two hundred or three hundred various kinds of seeds that are to be admitted into Canada at reduced rates. In like manner, with regard to items 78, 81 and 82, some of our Canadian industries are going to suffer. Take item 78, 'florist stock, including palms, ferns, rubber plants, gladiolus, cannas, dahlias and peonies'; that will hit the constituency of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), where there is a very important flower growing industry. In item 81, 'trees, apples, cherry, peach, plum, quince and all kinds of small kind of fruit trees'; that item in the treaty is going to be an injury to the nursery raising business of Canada, which has been so successful for the past twenty-five years. The cheap labour of France and their method of raising this nursery stock will make them successful competitors with the local nursery concerns. Thus I might go on and take almost every item in that list in schedule 'B' and point out that every one of them refers to an article in which France will do a trade with Canada. To-day we take four dollars' worth of imports from France for every dollar's worth we export, and the result of this treaty will be that in the very near future we will be taking ten dollars' worth of imports for the one dollar's worth we export. There is nothing very smart about that. Anybody can give away a thing, but it takes statesmen and diplomats to negotiate a treaty that will be of advantage to a country. I fear that this government, with the halo that came about them in allowing them to negotiate a treaty, have been so charmed with the new toy that they have rushed ahead and given the French people almost everything they wanted. The French people have a historic reputation for being fair in trade and an old Chancellor of the Exchequer of England away back in the good old days when Great Britain was protectionist once wrote:

> In matters of commerce the fault of the Dutch
> Is giving too little and asking too much;
> With equal advantage the French are content,
> So we'll clap on flat bottoms just twenty per cent.

If the French are content with equal advantage, why should you give them a great deal more? There is no gainsaying the fact that on ten items of this list of 110 they will do more exporting to Canada than Canada will do to France on all the 150 items. With regard to lobsters, of course the hon. gentleman had a view to the fishing industry down by the sea. But France was already taking nearly all the lobsters we had, I think rather more than we wished to spare, because we have hardly enough for the home market. I see that lobsters are about the largest item that we export to France to-day, amounting to about one-third of the total export of $1,500,000. France is taking our lobsters without any concession; therefore I contend that that item is of no advantage to us whatever. When you examine the various items of this treaty you will find, almost without exception, that they are not going to be of any great advantage to Canada. Except in agricultural implements and in one or two farm products, there is not one in regard to which we have any chance of enjoying any particular advantage in the market of France. Of course, it is too late in the day for us to cry about this, for the Finance Minister tells us that these items, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, cannot be changed no matter how disadvantageous to us we may think them; but I think the Finance Minister should not readily sacrifice an industry so important as that to which I have referred. If nothing else can be done, the least that can be expected now is that the Finance Minister will allow the spirits required for the fortification of these wines to come in free of duty. At present, as is pointed out in the document which I have read, our wine growers have to pay the ordinary duty on these spirits, whereas in all other countries spirits used for the fortification of wines are admitted free. I trust that the Finance Minister is going to take that into consideration. I have heard, not on the floor of this House, but in rumours, that such is his intention, and I think that the very least he can do is to give the wine growers of this country an assurance that that will be done in the near future. It is the only salvation, apparently, that is going now to be extended to them. I understand that the province of Ontario last year, according to the government returns, grew no less than 30,000 tons of grapes—the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) said 40,000 tons—and the crop was said to be an excellent one. We have nearly always a good crop of grapes in Ontario, no matter what the season is. The document I have read places on these an average value of $40 a ton, which means a total value of $1,200,000 for the grapes at first hand. If you affect the price of these grapes to the extent of $10 a ton, which is a very moderate estimate, the loss on this one item will amount to $300,000 per annum, and this loss will be borne by the fruit growers, who have already great disadvantages in the way of transportation and other things to contend with. This one act, therefore, is going to hit a large section of our population in western Ontario, and the Finance Minister should not belittle an industry which is looked upon in our part of the country as one of the very best and as deserving every encouragement at the hands of this or any other government. The fruit growers look upon it as a legitimate enterprise. It is one of the oldest in the world, and I do not see why it should be singled out for competition with France, which stands foremost in the manufacture of wines, in order that foreign wines may come in and supplant our native wines in our own market. But on wines above 26 degrees proof I understand that 30 per cent comes off in addition to the 10 cents per gallon. Whether that is the case or not, it is evident that the wines manufactured in Canada are going to be very severely hit by this treaty, and, as the wine-making industry is one in which the province of Ontario is very much interested, and in which my own town has a large factory and much invested capital, I thought it only right that I should place before the Finance Minister the facts and figures which have been given to me and which I believe to be reliable. As I understand that the various items embraced in the schedules will come up in committee later on, and there will then be an opportunity to deal with them in detail, I will not discuss them further at this late hour of the night.

Before taking my seat, I wish to refer to the matter of transportation. I took occasion during the debate on the address to speak on the subject, and I do not know that I have since modified my views from anything I have heard. Under the British preferential tariff goods are free to come in by United States ports as well as Canadian ports. Although the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) introduced a resolution, which received the approbation of the government, in favour of requiring these goods to come in by Canadian ports in the future, that has not been done. I suggested that we should begin with the mother country, and give her the first advantage, if there is an advantage. I do not want to be ungenerous in any respect to our provinces down by the sea. I have always been willing when in trade, in which I was engaged for many years, to give the preference to our Canadian ports. I always almost entirely gave these ports the preference. I think that Canadian merchants should bring in their goods by Canadian routes. We cannot hope to have first-class steamers unless we patronize our own routes. What is the use of calling for fast steamers if Canadian passengers will give the preference to the American lines by way of New York and Boston? We should on every occasion always endeavour to travel and send our goods by our own Canadian lines. But it appears to me that the negotiators of this treaty went a little fast when they put in this as one of the conditions of the treaty. It does not affect Canadian steamship lines and Canadian ports alone but our railways through every section of our country. I am especially in favour of encouraging Canadian railways. When I made the statement in this House that I did the other day, an hon. gentleman opposite said I was advocating the interests of American against those of Canadian ports. Not at all. I would like to see all our goods sent by Canadian ports, but this treaty will operate unfairly against Canadian railways, at present enjoying a profitable trade via American ports. I cannot therefore approve of that particular feature in the treaty. Whether or not the freights will be materially affected will be of very litle moment because I am confident that our imports from France are going, under this treaty, to materially increase. There are very large items in which we will see a large increase of imports into Canada. If that be the case, it becomes us to say whether or not this treaty, which has been negotiated amidst such a flourish of trumpets and in such a blaze of glory, is going to do what is expected. I am confident that there are items in it which certainly could have been very much improved; and if we are going to negotiate other treaties in the future, we should have trained diplomats sent out to represent us. I am very sceptical regarding the ability of this government to negotiate treaties after the experience we have had of their negotiations with Japan. I see the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) smiling, but he must know that in this respect they have not been a success so far, and that that treaty which they negotiated with Japan will be a source of trouble to Canada for a good while to come. We let that go through far too easily, and that is one reason why we should not be too quick now and why we should hold up this treaty until we understand it thoroughly. We do not want any clause such as that which was sneaked through in our treaty with Japan. I must say that I am not in accord with my hon. friends on the other side when they attack that old institution the Senate even if it does knife the Conservatives every time. It is an old established institution of whose utility I have never had any doubt if it will only use the power at its disposal. One of the worst day's work the Senate ever did was when they passed that Japanese treaty. If the clause in that treaty, which has created so much trouble, had been examined in the light of the facts which have since been disclosed, we would not have had the feeling that is now rampant in British Columbia. We would have had that treaty fairly examined and found out what was the matter with it, but there was only one man in this House who saw the danger, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Kennedy) and he did not point it out as strongly then as he has done this session. All he did was, in a conversational way, to carry on a dialogue across the floor with the First Minister, and we let that treaty go through. I myself did not catch at the time the point that the hon. gentleman was making. I therefore am averse to our letting any more treaties go through before we understand them thoroughly. The negotiations carried on by this government with foreign governments have not been hitherto so successful as to warrant our asking for more powers in the way of treaty making at present. What we require is a skilful, trained diplomatic corps to represent us abroad. We have not in this country the trained statesmen they have in France. There they have men who are on the qui vive on every point and who have decidedly outwitted our hon. friends opposite in this French treaty. As far as I can judge they have by it got from $5 to $10 from us for every dollar we get out of it. The future alone can tell who will be right, and this treaty is to be on our books for ten years, but I make the prophecy that for every $1 we get from that treaty we will pay $5 to France. Of course my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) does not agree with me because in his opinion, every dollar we buy is as good as every dollar we sell. But in that I do not agree with him; and I think that the people of this country, if this government goes on in this reckless fashion it is now doing, will come to the same conclusion. We had $121,000,000 against us of a balance of trade last year. The hon. the Minister of Customs said that $9,000,000 of that consisted of settlers effects, but that leaves $112,000,000 to be accounted for. That is a pretty respectable item to be grappled with. Only five short years ago there was a balance in our favour of exports over imports, whereas to-day we have a balance of $121,000,000 against us, and this new treaty will further increase that great discrepancy. And it does not comprise alone France, but thirty-five other countries are going to reap somewhat similar advantages. When you figure up the advantages this government are getting, as compared with what we are paying, we shall see that we are getting by far the worst of the bargain. The articles of the treaty and its schedules do not justify the great acclaim with which our ministers were welcomed back to this country. They were received with the blowing of trumpets and the waving of flags, but I think the people will soon begin to realize the false step we have taken. I am sorry to see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) beautifully sleeping while I am depicting the glories that hailed him when he came back to our shores. I am willing to let the future decide as to whether the treaty will be of advantage or not, but so far as Ontario is concerned, a valuable industry is going to be sacrificed and a number of others badly hit, and the advantages we will derive will be scarcely perceptible. It woud have been much better to have continued under the old treaty, doubtful as that was, until we got something better than what has been brought down by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). As this matter is apparently to go into Committee of the Whole, I will not speak at length or attempt any close analysis, but will deal only with general considerations. The remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite have been mainly in the direction of fault-finding in relation to this treaty ; they have not stated what they intend to do in the matter. If they are to take a course at all approaching the logical course, they must vote against the treaty.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. May I ask the hon. gentleman if there is anything we can do? The Minister of Finance has told us that this is inevitable.

Mr. PATERSON. If the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Cockshutt's) arguments have convinced the majority that this is a bad treaty, it is the easiest thing to vote it down.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. We can't convince that majority.

Mr. PATERSON. That is the hon. gentleman's misfortune. But nobody can prevent him casting his own vote in accordance with his speech ; and we will watch and see what he does. Of course, the provisions of the treaty made in this way cannot be altered, but the whole was made subject to the ratification of the parliament of Canada for the very purpose of allowing my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) and those like him to pronounce their verdict, not as the hon. gentleman has done by speech only, but in a more effectual way.

I do not know that I should have spoken but for the fact that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) went so far out of his way to drag in the name of a gentleman not concerned in this matter at all——

Mr. COCKSHUTT. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) put in another name.

Mr. PATERSON. Whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockshutt) put the hon. member for Wentworth up to it or not I do not know, but——

Mr. COCKSHUTT. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) insinuate that I——

Mr. PATERSON. I insinuate nothing.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I thought the hon. gentleman's statement covered an insinuation. I can only say that I have had no word with my hon. friend (Mr. E. D. Smith) on the subject at all.

Mr. PATERSON. That is well. It would have been very inconsistent in the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockshutt) if he had had. I did make reference to a firm which bears his name, but with which, so far as I know, he is not connected or very slightly connected. But if these hon. gentlemen are to emphasize the case of agricultural implements and to drag in the name of one firm, stating, almost broadly, that the Minister of Finance had negotiated a treaty for the benefit only of the Massey-Harris people, I thought it was unworthy of him, and especially to bring in the name of a gentleman who is nominated as an opponent of my hon. frend from Brantford, and to speak of this treaty as putting money into his pocket that would enable him to make a stronger run in the constituency. I interposed to point out that the agricultural implement industry, which, everybody seems to admit, will be benefited, is one of the largest manufacturing industries of this country. It is by no means confined to the Massey-Harris concern. There is a firm in Hamilton probably employing more men than the Massey-Harris people employ. There is an industry, as I suggested, bearing the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Cockshutt's) own name, which also is interested. In my own town there are other plough manufacturers. There are the Frost & Wood people; there is another firm in Ingersoll, and others in other places. This manufacturing industry, besides supplying our own wants, exports half a million dollars a year. And because one of the political opponents of hon. gentlemen opposite is connected with this industry, they make this discussion an occasion of insinuations against him. The hon. member for Brantford said that under this treaty, negotiated by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), who comes from Nova Scotia, everything was given away so far as Ontario was concerned, and that had not the Minister of Finance been from Nova Scotia such a treaty would never have been made.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. That is not the remark I made. I said that this large industry, the wine industry, would not have been sacrificed as it is.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, perhaps I may put it this way—that if the Minister of Finance represented an Ontario constituency he would not have made this treaty.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. That would be more like it.

Mr. PATERSON. That is a sectional view—not only a mistaken, but a hurtful view. But it is also an inconsistent view, considering that the hon. member for Wentworth declared that the only Canadian industry to be benefited under this treaty is an industry which is located in the province of Ontario. What is the use of confining the consideration of the matter to asking whether we have a foreign trade in this or in that? The way to consider this treaty is upon the broad basis of whether Canada will be in a better position with the treaty, or whether she will be in a better position without it. If it tells for the interest of Canada, it should be supported; if it tells against the interests of Canada—'greatly to our detriment,' as the last speaker (Mr. Cockshutt) said—it should not be approved by this House.

Now, we want to do a foreign trade, for, in many things, we not only have enough to supply our own market, but we have a surplus for sale abroad. France offers a market of over $300,000,000 for goods on which we gain concessions under this treaty. What are these concessions? They run an average of from 25 per cent to 33 per cent off the French tariff. On the other hand, we give them concessions on some articles, the average of which I believe will not be above 12½ per cent to 15 per cent. In respect of these articles in which France offers this large market, Canada is put in the same position as the most favoured nation with which France deals; and if they give more favourable treatment than at present to any other nation, that more favourable treatment is at once to be extended to Canada. So that, in the competition for this $300,000,000 of trade Canada has a fair field as against the world. It is up to the Canadian manufacturer, the Canadian farmer, the Canadian producer, to do the work that will secure that market.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose that of that trade $100,000,000 was in cattle, what good would it do the farmers of Ontario if the duty on cattle were still high enough to exclude our cattle from that market?

Mr. PATERSON. But cattle are being imported into France.

Mr. SPROULE. But if we cannot reach the market with the cattle——

Mr. PATERSON. But, for instance, here are the figures which show that 164,000 dollars worth of cattle over a year old were imported into France.

Mr. SPROULE. How many horses would we send in at $30?

Mr. PATERSON. How do others do it if we cannot?

Mr. SPROULE. But if the duty against us is still sufficient to shut us out——

Mr. PATERSON. But the Frenchman might make the same complaint about the duty you have against him.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister (Mr. Paterson) said that there was a reduction of 50 per cent on their duties, whereas we made from 12 per cent to 15 per cent. They must have got the best of it.

Mr. PATERSON. If they took off 33 per cent and we took off 12 per cent, they get the best of it. Is that what the hon. gentleman means?

Mr. SPROULE. But the hon. minister means 33 per cent off the duty, not that the article is admitted at a rate 33 per cent lower.

Mr. PATERSON. I mean that in both cases the reduction of duty would be about one-third on the average. On some things in the French tariff it is 50 per cent and on some less, 25 per cent or 20 per cent. The average difference would be about one-third off their duty.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much would that be off the duty on the article?

Mr. PATERSON. Whatever the duty happened to be it would be one-third less.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. What is the average duty then on dutiable goods?

Mr. PATERSON. I cannot tell that, but I believe that the average duty on dutiable goods would be as low as ours. But I speak without full knowledge in that matter. The point to be considered is that under this treaty you have secured a chance for $300,000,000 worth of goods that are purchased by France of which I believe $150,000,000 of like products and manufactures are produced in this country. You may have all the market you want at home, or you may have a part of your market in England, Germany or the United States, you go where you can do best with your goods, but where you were at a disadvantage was that other countries could send goods into France at one-third less than you could. That has been wiped out and Canada is to-day on a par with other nations.

Mr. BLAIN. What articles does the hon. gentleman expect Canada can export to France under the new treaty?

Mr. PATERSON. Trade will have to be developed; we can tell that in time. I expect we will do a great deal by and by.

Mr. LENNOX. In the sweet by and by.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, in the sweet by and by, in the products of the farm and of the manufactories. I believe that we will ship fruit to France, the product for which hon. gentleman say we are destroying the market.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. What kind of fruit?

Mr. PATERSON. Pears, peaches and apples.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Does the hon. gentleman know that France is the very heart of the pear industry and that the French are entirely exporters of pears?

Mr. PATERSON. Does he not know that they also import these fruits?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Not pears.

Mr. PATERSON. Do they not? Look again. Evidently the hon. gentleman was wrong in some things; let him examine the French imports and see whether they do not import a great deal more of these articles than we import.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. If they do, it is not from western countries, not from countries in the same zone; they may from countries further south.

Mr. PATERSON. Did the hon. gentleman expect that Canada could go over there and obtain lower rates than any other country had got?

Mr. E. D. SMITH. No, but the minister said he expected we would export pears to France. I said that France exports pears to the very markets that we do.

Mr. PATERSON. Very well, you will meet them there. It would not be a heavy item, but I say in a general way I would not be surprised to see our fruit go into the French markets.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. He said pears, which is absurd.

Mr. PATERSON. I mentioned different kinds.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. What other kind?

Mr. PATERSON. I am not answering questions now. If the hon. gentleman would bend his energies that way—and he has been an exporter—probably he would be able to find out that there is a market there for him.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I have not been able to find it out yet.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman behind him lectures us because we have not a German market for apples.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. He is right.

Mr. PATERSON. He is right? There is the same thing in France and we have the French minimum tariff and can send the goods there.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Would the minister say the tariff is any better than it has been for the last 15 years, since 1893?

Mr. PATERSON. I might say by way of parenthesis that I was amused to hear the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) reading over the items on which we have lowered the duty, many of the articles being articles that have been coming in for the last 15 years at the same rate under the old French treaty.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. I have looked up the returns and I find table fruits, apples and pears, 3,500,000 francs.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Will the hon. gentleman say how many of these were pears and where they came from?

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman said there were no pears, but this shows there were.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I did not say 'no apples.'

Mr. PATERSON. When there is the whole question of a market of $300,000,000 why should our time be taken up with bickerings about pears? What has that to do with it? Take the broad general principle. There is $150,000,000 of that $300,000,000 of articles either produced or manufactured in Canada, and if we have a surplus of them and France is the best market we can send them to France and send them in on as good terms as any other nation. We could not do that by 33⅓ per cent until this was accomplished. Hon. gentlemen say: Where is the duty on grain, on wheat, flour, oats, peas, barley? There are large importations of these into France, they say, but there is only the maximum tariff. True, but do hon. gentlemen not see that the United States may go to France and make an arrangement that they could have a minimum duty on wheat, oats, barley, and all that our farmers produce. If they did that and we were under the maximum rate we would have no chance in that market, but if Uncle Sam goes to France to make a bargain and succeeds in getting a reduction on the products of the forest, field and manufactory, we get whatever he gets, or what any other nation gets, and there is the wise thing. Hon. gentlemen opposite laughed when this convention was first introduced and said: Oh, you have enumerated articles there on which you are to get the minimum tariff, but there is no minimum tariff. They laughed as if that was something absurd. There is not a better feature in the tariff than the very fact of putting in these articles with that clause in the treaty which provides that if France grants lower rates of duty on any article mentioned there Canada is to have the same duty. It was statesmanship; it was foresight. If the ministers had viewed it as hon. gentlemen opposite do this would not have been done, and not doing it would have been a very great blunder indeed. I ask that this question be looked at in a general way. The government, or rather these two gentlemen, have negotiated a treaty which places us on the best footing in the market of $300,000,000, of which at least $150,000,000 are articles produced and manufactured in Canada. Whether our manufacturers and our producers will bend their energies towards that market depends upon themselves. The government has done its duty; it has placed them on an equal footing with every other nation, and for my part I believe that Canadian brain, Canadian muscle and Canadian energy will take advantage of that treaty and there will be a largely extended trade with France.

Mr. J. A. DUBEAU (Joliette). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this late hour to delay the House very long; but I cannot let this discussion come to an end without saying a few words on the French treaty which the government has submitted to this House for ratification.

I have taken great pleasure, indeed, in listening to the sincere, as well as energetic remarks uttered by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) on this question. He has been sincere enough to state that he had reason to believe that this new treaty was going to open a new era of prosperity in the history of our commercial relations with the former mother country. On the other hand, I was rather surprised when, immediately after him, I heard the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) stating that there was nothing new in this French treaty. My hon. friend from L'Islet deserves congratulations for his statement—and I quote his own words—that under the kind protection of England we have conquered fiscal and commercial liberty. I altogether agree with that statement. The negotiation of this treaty I consider as an assertion of our autonomy in commercial matters and an evidence that Canada has really become a nation. The desire expressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier a few years ago to the correspondent of the London 'Daily Mail' that we should be allowed to negotiate ourselves treaties relating to Canada only, has evidently been complied with without any revolution, even without any special legislation, but by virtue of that authority so forcible in British countries, precedent. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, at the time the treaty was negotiated between France and Canada, Sir Francis Bertie, British Ambassador and plenipotentiary in Paris, circumscribed his action to his introducing the Canadian ministers to the official representatives of the French Republic. He did not attend to the negotiations, but simply signed them when once they were concluded. Canada has every reason to be satisfied with the treaty concluded by Messrs. Fielding and Brodeur with the French government, because that treaty is a great deal better for Canada than was the one concluded, in 1893, by Sir Charles Tupper and the British Ambassador in Paris. In fact, under one clause of that treaty we were bound to extend to France, without any kind of return for the same, all of the advantages to be conferred to every other nation we might eventually enter into negotiations with. Under the old treaty the balance of commerce was really too much against us. Our exchanges were in the proportion of four to one in favour of France. Last year our exports to France amounted to $2,000,000, and our imports from that country were $8,000,000; therefore, the difference was too great. Our farm products, which represented the greatest part of our exports, were not benefited by any perceptible advantage. Hereafter, our farm, fishery, forest and mining products will be admitted under the French minimum tariff.

We are obliged to put France in the same position as the most-favoured nation, but, on the other hand, she is bound to confer the same advantage unto us. In order to get the benefit of this treaty, French goods have to be shipped directly and so must our goods get into France through a direct route. Direct transportation being made compulsive tends to afford protection to our own ports. As our exchanges with France cannot be carried through American ports and get at the same time the benefit of this treaty, we may entertain hopes of seeing new steamship lines established between France and Canada or foreign steamship companies come back to our country. The 1907 treaty will be a great deal more favourable to Canada than was that of 1893, which covered only 29 items, many of them being of very small importance to us, while the list of items included in the new treaty is a great deal longer. France extends her minimum tariff to at least 152 Canadian products, and Canada is admitting under her intermediate tariff 98 French products, besides ten other items coming under a special tariff. In order to allow you to fully appreciate the treaty recently concluded between France and Canada, I may be permitted to quote the opinion of the Retailers' Association of Canada which, in an address tendered to the hon. Minister of Marine, on the 5th December, 1907, stated through its secretary, Mr. J. A. Beaudry:

We have looked into this treaty and may state without any uncertainty that when put into practice it will bring forth the anticipated results and that its effect will be the promotion of our trade, as 'it will facilitate the sale of Canadian products in France,' and encourage the consumption in Canada of products that do not come into competition with our national industries.

Now, here is another opinion about this Franco-Canadian treaty; it is given by one of the most prominent importers in Canada, by a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, ex-Mayor Laporte of Montreal, a member of the firm of Laporte, Martin and Company, who stated on the 3rd December, 1907, that the new commercial treaty between Canada and France will be most profitable not only to our country, but to France as well. Here are his own words:

I would not be surprised, in fact I expect, as a result of this treaty, to see 'the volume of our exports doubled within two years.'

Such was the opinion expressed about the new treaty by the ex-mayor of Montreal. On the other hand, this treaty was met with a kind welcome from leading papers. The 'Globe' said this:

The benefit of the intermediate tariff is extended to 98 items of French trade. These items are so diversified that the results to be derived from the treaty will be felt by all classes in Canada. Canadian consumers will be benefited by the full advantage of the changes. The reductions obtained on the French tariff will be of considerable advantage to agriculture and other productive industries in Canada.

'La Patrie' had this to say:

The French goods enjoying a preference are not such as we generally produce ourselves and cannot, therefore, come into competition with our own inland trade. This convention shows a very great improvement as against the 1893 treaty. Perfect reciprocity in commercial preferences is clearly expressed this time. It approves also section 8 respecting direct transportation of products.

'La Presse' approves more particularly section 9, which provides that the working of the tariff will be under the supervision of agents appointed by the Canadian government instead of British consuls and agents. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted this treaty has been concluded, as it is intended, first, to bring about a considerable increase in our commercial relations with France, and contribute towards the development of the 'entente cordiale.' And this last result is not the least in importance, because if there is a country in the world where the 'entente cordiale' is greeted with rapture, of course, it is Canada. The hon. ministers who have negotiated this treaty deserve our congratulations and, I repeat, I have been delighted when the hon. member for l'Islet stated that our Canadian statesmen had endeavoured to remove the difficulties, to clear up the roads in order to give our country the benefits of an advantageous treaty.

Mr. J. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a few words on this important question of the French treaty, especially at this late hour of the night. I shall not go back into the details already given by hon. members who have spoken before me, particularly by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). However, there is one question that is rather important because it has been discussed by every member of the opposition, and it is the only one I intend to consider for a few moments.

My hon. friends opposite cannot or will not understand that this treaty has been concluded in such conditions as to mark a great step toward the solution of the problem of our commercial autonomy, and the conclusion evidently to be drawn from that fact is that, according to their pretension, such is not the case, and from their persistency in ringing the changes about the same thing, that if on the contrary such is the case, it is a far-reaching accomplishment the benefit of which must go to the government. For my part, there cannot be any doubt as to the affirmative. Admissions have been made even by hon. members opposite that were such as to remove any doubt on that point.

I have listened attentively to the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), and I think I have understood from his statements that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. W. S. Fielding) and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. L. P. Brodeur) had been appointed by the imperial government as the only plenipotentiaries for the negotiations of this treaty. And it is the fact that they have been the only ones invested with such powers that marks a great step towards our commercial atuonomy, because it was the first time such an event occurred—and I say this with all due deference to my hon. friends opposite who, in their sustaining of the contrary, quote the case of the treaty concluded in 1890 when, they say, Sir Charles Tupper was the only one invested with full powers. Unfortunately for them Lord Dufferin's report to Lord Roseberry and a letter from Lord Grey to the Marquis of Ripon prove quite the reverse in giving evidence that the negotiations of that treaty were also participated into by another plenipotentiary, Sir Joseph Crowe, who was an Englishman. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in stating that we have witnessed this year an important event we have reason to be delighted as Canadians. To what I have said shall I add the testimonial of Conservative papers which, on the coming back of the hon. ministers, acknowledged the fact asserted by myself, namely, that the special circumstances under which the negotiation of the 1907 treaty were carried, do constitute an act of commercial autonomy.

I can even borrow from my hon. friends opposite the corroboration for my statements. In a great speech delivered in this House on the 5th December, 1907, a speech my hon. friends have set much importance upon, the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. T. Chisholm) said as reported in page 264 of 'Hansard':

For almost the first time in the history of Canada, we were in a position to discuss a question of this kind properly in this House. Formerly, when treaties were made between Canada and foreign countries, we always had some British nobleman, or some great jurist or other prominent Britisher, as part of the commission. Now, we have had a treaty directly negotiated by two of our own ministers, two of our experienced ministers, and two men in whom I myself would have had considrable confidence. They must, I think, receive credit for all that is good in this treaty; but, for once, we have them in the position that they must take the blame for all the bad points in it. Formerly, when a treaty was negotiated the members of the government, whether Conservative or Liberal, have been able to put the blame for the faults of the treaty on the British member of the commission,—he was made scapegoat for any mistakes, while the government always took the credit for the good points in the treaty.

Now, in these matters the government must get the credit for all the good points of the treaty, and must for once take blame for all the bad points.

It could not be put in a more explicit way, and these words show the accuracy of our statement that this is the first time Canada is allowed to negotiate with foreign countries. In his speech, the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Chisholm) seems to have threatened the government with heavy responsibilities, but I think the government can easily face those responsibilities, especially when we take into account the immense benefits to be derived by the country from this treaty as compared with the treaty concluded in 1903.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. We will proceed with the same measure.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, February 21, 1908.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse). With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to an article which I saw in yesterday's evening 'Citizen' on the third page and which is repeated in this morning's 'Citizen' on the ninth page. It reads as follows:

Colonel Talbot too had 75 applications for coal lands in the Northwest.

Before the Public Accounts Committee Mr. H. H. Rowatt, chief clerk of the Interior Department, was examined by Mr. Barker as to grants of coal areas to C. F. Caldwell and others. It appeared that Colonel Talbot, M.P., had secured a number of grants for various parties, and witness understood that he represented the German Development Company. Colonel Talbot in all put in 75 applications.

The balance of the article does not concern me. I have only this to say that in that word 'too,' in the heading I see a little bit of malice. I do not know how it came about. I am not going to weary the House by discussing the article or the intention of the article. It is not often that I ask favour.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. gentleman is speaking to a question of privilege?

Mr. TALBOT. Yes, it is a question of privilege. It is not often I ask any favours from my friends on the opposite side of the House but in this particular instance I would consider it a very great favour indeed if they would investigate the whole matter and give me also the privilege and advantage of being heard as a witness. That is all I have to say and I would appreciate it as a great favour if my hon. friends would simply do that for me.

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Brandon). Mr. Speaker, I have a word to say on a question of privilege. My attention has been called to an item in the 'Montreal Star' of last evening. It reads as follows:

Edmonton, Alberta, February 20.—In addressing a public meeting of Conservatives last night, Dr. H. L. McInnis made public the names of the officials of the Imperial Pulp Company, of Winnipeg, which came into the limelight at Ottawa in connection with the recent timber limit exposures. The president resides in Edmonton, but Mr. McInnis would not reveal his name. The managing director is Hon. Clifford Sifton; the secretary, William Sifton; and the secretary-treasurer, a Miss Jones, a stenographer in Toronto. The doctor, in the course of his address, gave instances of graft in the disposal of timber limits in the west.

I find in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of this morning what is practically a reprint of this item. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not the managing director or an officer of the Imperial Pulp Company and I never have been. I am not a shareholder or a stockholder in the Imperial Pulp Company and I never have been. I have no interest directly or indirectly, by myself, or by, or through anybody else in any shape, form or manner in the Imperial Pulp Company.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH moved :

That the order for the introduction of a Bill to amend chapter 28 of the statutes of 1907 in amendment of the Railway Act be discharged.

He said : The proposed amendment will come properly in a Bill on the subject to be introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham).

Motion agreed to.

THE PLAINS OF ABRAHAM.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next to consider the following proposed resolution :

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the sum of three hundred thousand dollars ($300,000) be appropriated towards the preservation, in a suitable manner, of the historic battlefields of Quebec, in connection with the tercentenary of the said city of Quebec.

He said : His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, approves of the same and recommends it to the attention of the House.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AND INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

On the orders of the day being called,

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Before the orders of the day are called, I would ask the Minister of Railways if he has any information to give to the House with reference to the Leblancs and their alleged interference in the provincial election in New Brunswick.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I may say that I have some news, if not information. I wired, as I promised, to the general manager of the railway and I was informed by him that one of the Leblancs, the travelling agent, who lives in New Brunswick, had been in that province over Sunday and had returned to his work in Quebec. I received another telegram from the general manager saying that the other gentleman, Leblanc by name, was absent from duty, but he did not know where he was or if he was working in an election. I wired to the general manager to inform the Intercolonial Railway employees, including Mr. Leblanc, that while they were all at perfect liberty to use their franchise as citizens with the utmost freedom in whatever way they wished, we did not want the employees of that railway to take active part in election contests, either Dominion or provincial. I have not heard from him since.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend will not lose sight of it.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to a return brought down in answer to a resolution of the House with reference to cold storage at St. John. A number of important letters have not been brought down, some 10 or 15 I should judge from what information I have, amongst them is an important memorandum said to have been entered into between Mr. Macoun and Mr. Williams, of St. John, at the dictation of the Minister of Militia and Defence. That was sent to the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) inclosed in a letter, but it was not brought down. It is a rather important part of the papers and I would like to have it looked up. The other letters are more or less important, but I could get along without them. At the same time I wish to give notice that on the first opportunity I shall bring this up in the House.

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). There never was such a memorandum entered into by my instructions. The statement is utterly foundationless. I never saw such a paper and never gave any instructions for such a paper to be made.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a difference of testimony.

Hon. SIDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). I would ask the hon. member to say what letters he means?

Mr. FOSTER. Chiefly letters that passed between Mr. Williams and the late Minister of Railways or that department.

Mr. EMMERSON. No public letters passed between us.

Mr. AMES. I would ask when we may expect the various documents in connection with timber limits ordered on February 10.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). The documents in question have been with the Secretary of States for some time. I have been expecting them every day.

Mr. AMES. May we expect them on Monday?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot answer that. We receive an order from the clerk of the House and until we receive that order we have no authority to take action in regard to documents. As soon as we receive that order the documents are sent over to the Secretary of State and in due course are forwarded by him for presentation to the House. These documents are all ready for presentation and it is merely a matter of routine being gone through.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox and Addington). An order was passed on December 11 for papers in connection with the salary and travelling expenses of the Governor General and the general expenses of government house. I believe this comes under the Public Works Department.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). So far as returns called for from the Public Works Department are concerned, instructions have been given to hurry them along as rapidly as possible. The returns called for are very voluminous and we have no room in the department for additional clerks; we are employing only the regular staff and I am getting the work done as rapidly as possible.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. One would think these returns ought to come down with some relation to the order in which they were passed by the House. It is a long time since this was passed, and it should have been laid on the table long ago.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Would the Minister of Public Works hurry a return with reference to the Office Specialty Company? It is only a short matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Instructions have been given to prepare the returns in order. One was ordered by the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Algoma, which I am informed will take one clerk one whole year to prepare.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works might give a short return of progress from the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say to my hon. friend that everything is going exceedingly satisfactorily.

THE FRANCO-CANADIAN TRADE TREATY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 57) respecting a certain convention between His Majesty and the President of the French republic.—Mr. Fielding.

Mr. BERGERON. I think the Minister of Finance was asked, that the French measurements which are expressed under the French decimal system in the treaty should be given in our system of measurement so that we might be able to make a comparison.

Mr. FIELDING. I think every request that was made has been complied with except that we should express the French duties in ad valorem, and which request we were not able to comply with.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one request which does not seem to have been complied with and that is for the average ad valorem rate of the French minimum duty on all imports under the minimum schedule

Mr. FIELDING. That is not available; there is no French blue-book which gives that information.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not possible to have the importation of all articles into France under the minimum tariff and the duties collected on those articles? If we had this we could make out the average duty ourselves.

Mr. FIELDING. I gave instructions to have that prepared if possible, but I understand a distinction is not made in French customs returns between the minimum and general tariff. The total duties collected are given but they are not divided in the manner suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER The information is so obvious that it is almost impossible to think it cannot be obtained.

Mr. FIELDING. The French method of levying duty being entirely different from ours the question of ad valorem does not arise. They make no distinction between the minimum and the maximum.

Mr. BERGERON. In item 128 schedule 'A,' referring to woods in the rough, the expression 'sixty centimetres' is used. If this were put in English we could understand it.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend will find that his desire is met if he looks at the pamphlet entitled 'further memoranda.' I will send him over a copy.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are we to go over the treaty clause by clause? We will have to do it some time and perhaps it will be convenient to do it now.

Mr. FIELDING. There is no objection to reading the treaty clause by clause if that is required.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER then read the treaty.
