DOMINION OF CANADA

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION—TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT

2-3 ELIZABETH II

BEING THE 96TH SESSION FOR THE PERIOD 1867-1954

VOLUME IV, 1953-54

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TWENTY-FIFTH DAY OF MARCH, 1954, TO THE SIXTH DAY OF MAY, 1954, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

EDMOND CLOUTIER, C.M.G., O.A., D.S.P.
QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY
OTTAWA, 1954

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 25, 1954

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXPLANATION OF CHANGE IN AMPLIFYING SYSTEM

Mr. Speaker: I think I owe the house an explanation as to why there is on the floor of the house at this moment what is called in technical terms a roving microphone. It is merely a duplication of the microphone which is suspended in front of the minister and through which he would speak if the floor microphone was not placed in front of his desk. This is merely an experiment for today.

Hon. members have complained about the insufficiency of the amplifying system. On March 12 the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) asked that something be done about it, and I promised him, and the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) and others who privately have made requests that I look into the matter, that I would do so. On Monday last Mr. Guy Fountain, the president of the Tannoy group of companies, was in Canada. I had a conversation with him and he sent me an explanation of what the system means. I think there are some misapprehensions as to what this system really is. Perhaps hon. members think too much of this system as a loudspeaker system; that it amplifies the voice, the moment the speaker utters words, to every part of the house including the territory surrounding him; but that is not so.

Around the speaker there is what is called a muted zone. A few members sitting around the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), for instance, would hear nothing else but the natural voice of the minister. We had an instance of that the other day when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) pointed out to me that he could not hear anything while the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was speaking. If hon. members will look at the chart —and I have asked the Tannoy company to prepare a printed chart so that we can circulate it among hon. members in order to inform them—they will see exactly what their position is.

When the Prime Minister speaks through the second microphone to my right his words are carried to all hon. members except to those sitting around him, and the hon. member for Bellechasse, being in that muted zone, would not hear anything through the loudspeaker placed on his desk; whereas the voice of the Prime Minister would be carried through the amplifying system to the distant corners of the house.

With the permission of the house, I should like to read the prepared statement of Mr. Fountain. I quote:

> The Tannoy installation provided to improve acoustics and enable free debating to be enjoyed with greater clarity and audibility comprises several important features and performs certain extremely useful, but limited, functions.
>
> Unlike most "microphone systems" where the person using the microphone is on a rostrum, stage, or in a strategic visual position, and where only one microphone point exists with an array of loudspeakers operated from this microphone, the facilities in the House of Commons are designed to enable any member of the house to get up spontaneously and from his own desk address the whole house and be heard by all members in the house, regardless of where he is normally located and whether or not he is addressing his remarks in any particular direction. This versatility is achieved only by permitting certain restrictions, and calls for the constant operation of a control panel by a skilled engineer and his standby.
>
> The devices which hang down on wires from the ceiling are the microphones, and the small cylindrical features on the members' desks and behind the seats in the galleries are the reproducers. They can scarcely be called "loudspeakers", since they are not intended to make a person's voice appear to be louder than it is.
>
> The microphones are devices which, whilst they can discriminate, within a controlled zone, in the amount of sound they pick up from any given direction,—in other words, they can pick up in a forward direction, but not necessarily in a rearward direction—they cannot, at any time and under normal circumstances, discriminate in the type of noise or sound to which they are sensitive. That is to say, if they hear a person speaking, they will also hear the noise of a dropping book or rustling paper, or any other extraneous noise, and these noises will be amplified proportionately with the person's voice. They will also pick up, in addition to the orator's voice and local extraneous noises, reproduction from any loudspeaker sufficiently loud in the vicinity of the microphone. It is for this latter reason that the whole of the system was divided up into zones, which are individually and electronically controlled by the operator in the following manner:
>
> When a member of the house rises to his feet, the suspended microphone nearest to him is made "live" and sensitive, and simultaneously the remaining microphones are reduced in sensitivity. In addition to this, the small speakers on the desks in the immediate vicinity of the orator are muted, and are not permitted to radiate any amplified speech. The reason for this is twofold: Firstly, if they are left switched on, their output could easily be sufficient to operate the microphone as well as the House of Commons—Amplifying System

orator's own voice, which would result in a "howl"; and secondly, there should be no need for other members with normal hearing, sitting in the immediate vicinity of the orator, to require any reinforcement since they would, under normal circumstances, hear him direct without difficulty.

It will be seen, therefore, by such switching, the sensitivity of the microphone in use can be increased to enable the orator's voice to be suitably amplified for the energizing of the remainder of the remote speakers.

When a member who has been speaking concludes his speech and sits down and another member in another part of the house gets up, the Tannoy operator follows the movement visually, and by an ingenious but complex switching arrangement, the operator merely depresses a small switch controlling the zone in which the new member is speaking, and this switch has the effect of unlatching all the previous connections electronically, and setting up a precisely similar set of operating conditions in the new zone.

It will be seen, therefore, that much depends not only on the desirability of a member to speak up and speak so far as possible towards his nearest microphone, but in order to enable the engineer/operator to switch in the appropriate microphone in the member's zone as quickly as possible, he should see him rise to his feet, preferably pausing for a moment before speaking. Such a procedure gives the engineer/operator more time (a) to identify the member and his zone, and (b) to do the necessary switching (which is almost instantaneous) which will ensure that the microphone in that particular member's zone is made live, and the necessary muting completed. It will be seen that if a member who intends to speak commences his statement whilst he is actually rising from his seat, it is quite conceivable that the operator will not have seen him start to rise, nor be aware of his intention, until the member may have actually spoken two or three words.

A plan of the house is being produced upon which will be delineated the areas and zones which have their individual microphones and control systems. This should enable members to determine for themselves, by simple observation, not only which is the nearest microphone in their zone and to which they should address their remarks as often as possible, but it will indicate whether or not the speakers provided on their desks are operating or whether they are muted when a given microphone is selected.

The engineers will be very happy indeed, at any time, not only to explain to the members or those interested how the system works, but to give advice which would enable both the intelligibility and efficiency of the system to be improved.

As soon as these charts are available, one of which I have before me, copies will be distributed to hon. members. It was discovered that facilities exist underneath the table for the installation of a roving microphone, such as the Tannoy company have installed in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom. When the president of the company informed me of that I suggested that, perhaps, if they had the equipment we might see what would happen if it were used in connection with speeches of hon. members seated in front rows on both sides of the house. The microphone which is now in front of the minister is merely, as I said, a duplication of the suspended microphone, which is now dead. The minister will be speaking through the floor microphone in front of him, and we will see what happens.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I was the one Your Honour named as having complained regarding the facilities. I was of the opinion that the system was not working as completely as it was thought it would when it was first installed, and that is why I raised my voice to make a complaint. However, I am sure Your Honour has the matter under consideration; and we will see what happens.

Mr. Winch: Speak up; that is all that is wrong.

Mr. Goode: No, it is not a matter of speaking up.

INQUIRY AS TO BROADCASTING OF DEBATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration as the minister in charge of house procedure. Will the matter of having these house microphones connected to the C.B.C. be considered—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Castleden: —so that such debates as we are going to hear today may be broadcast to all the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend's question was answered by the reaction of hon. members. In any event, the method of dealing with debates here comes peculiarly under the supervision of Mr. Speaker, in this particular instance aided by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters).

COMMUNICATIONS

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when the discussion took place concerning the transfer of the government telephone and telegraph services in British Columbia to the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraphs I was able to deal with the effective date of the transfer, together with certain of the conditions under which employees of the government would be treated, in so far as the sale to the British Columbia Telephone Company was concerned.

However, with reference to the transfer to Canadian National Telegraphs I was unable to give any information to the house, because the departmental officers were in Montreal discussing the arrangements. These have now been completed and, in my opinion, they are as satisfactory as they were with the British Columbia Telephone Company. For that reason I am sure the house will be interested in knowing what are the terms of the transfer.

The plans of the Canadian National Telegraph Company for operation of the services which it is taking over, in conjunction with their present operations, would allow them to conduct the full operations with substantially fewer personnel. However, in an effort to be fair to federal employees, the C.N.T. has undertaken to provide employment to all present employees who have three years' service with the federal government and who have not reached the age of 65. In the case of those who have less than three years' service but who have not yet reached 65, the company is hoping to find alternative employment inside or outside the company.

Out of a total of over 60 individuals, five have reached the age of 65 and another 17 have less than three years' service. Those who cannot be absorbed will receive a month's notice as of April 1 and that includes mainly operators, messengers and clerks. I understand a few of these have been found, or will be found, other work, in some cases with the company. The situation is changing from day to day as further cases are solved.

Normal business adjustments and re-arrangements may, in due course, involve further staff changes, particularly as service duplications are eliminated, but this is a longer term prospect and employees taken over will receive, in any case, equality of treatment with other employees, subject to the normal obligations of the company.

In the matter of wages, at two of the points where services are taken over C.N.T. union agreements will apply and employees will receive the standard negotiated wage rates applicable to C.N.T. employees. At other points the C.N.T. will continue the basic rate of pay presently in existence for federal employees.

In the matter of pensions, any employees taken over who have earned federal superannuation will, of course, retain this payable on reaching retirement age. In addition the C.N.T. pension plans will be made available to federal employees taken over, with the amount of the C.N.T. pension earned based on service with the C.N.T. subsequent to transfer. In addition, since there are eligibility conditions for the C.N.T. pension plan based on periods of service, as a special concession to federal employees continuous service with the government telegraph service will be counted as C.N. service to establish eligibility.

As far as seniority rights are concerned, at the points covered by union agreement, namely Quesnel and Williams Lake, federal staff taken over will be secured against displacement so long as they remain in those positions. Since seniority is only involved at those points covered by wage agreements, it is not a relevant consideration at the other points where services are taken over. At such other points personnel will receive the rights and privileges applied to comparable positions and services throughout the C.N. system.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 379, for the relief of Gerald Emile La Grave.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 380, for the relief of Rita Boucher Dufort.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 381, for the relief of Lucy Halga Saunders Gibson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 382, for the relief of Antonie Lutz Jedrzejewski.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 383, for the relief of Jessie Clarke Thompson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 384, for the relief of Dorothy Coughtry Paquette.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 385, for the relief of Isabel Ruth Smith Newey.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 386, for the relief of Eugene Clifford Carbonneau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 387, for the relief of Jean Antoine Francois Armand.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 388, for the relief of Maria Clara Anita Cauchon Quirion.—Mr. Hunter.

QUESTIONS

C.B.C. ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What was the cost of producing the printed edition of the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953?
2. What printing firm received the contract?
3. Were tenders invited, and, if so, was more than one submitted?
4. On what basis was the contract awarded?
5. How many copies were printed, and how many distributed?

Mr. McCann:

1. The complete price was $5,630, including art work and engravings.

2. Might Directories Ltd., Toronto, Ontario.

3. Yes; four quotations were received.

4. The tender was awarded on the basis of the corporation's specifications and requirements.

5. 6,000 English and 2,500 French. These have all been distributed except about 200 copies of each edition required to meet casual requests.

C.B.C.—EMPIRE AND COMMONWEALTH GAMES

Mr. Fulton:

In connection with the contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the British Empire and Commonwealth Games Society:

1. Was any effort made to deal separately with the rights to make films for theatrical exhibition and the rights to make films for TV purposes?

2. If not, why did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation decide to interest itself in acquiring monopoly rights to make motion pictures for commercial theatrical exhibition?

3. Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation intend to enter this field?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes. The first offer of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was for sound and television broadcasting rights only.

2. The corporation found that the British Empire and Commonwealth Games Society was offering world radio, television and film rights as a unit, and felt that it should bid for this in competition with private advertising interests in order to assure good sound and television broadcasting coverage in Canada and other commonwealth countries.

3. No.

HERRING FISHING—INVESTIGATION OF SUBSIDY

Mr. Bell:

1. Has the government investigated the possibility of a subsidy for the smoked bloater (herring) fishing industry?

2. If so, what were the details of the forms of subsidy investigated at both producer and exporter levels?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes.

2. The question of assistance to the smoked bloater industry has been under investigation by the fisheries prices support board for some months. The problem arose out of a substantial carryover from 1952 in the hands of private and co-operative exporters.

In order to clear these stocks and permit a more satisfactory outlook for the fishermen in 1954, the government has authorized the fisheries prices support board to offer to purchase, on or after June 30, 1954, up to 150,000 boxes of choice quality bloaters of 1952 production or standard quality bloaters of either 1952 or 1953 production, at 80 cents per box for choice and 55 cents per box for standard. A firm must elect to come into the scheme before April 15, 1954, at which time the product will be inspected. No bloaters then below standard quality will be acceptable under the scheme. Any bloaters so acquired by the board will be the property of the board and will be disposed of outside commercial channels.

In authorizing this action, the government made it clear that, in future, the industry will be expected to adjust production to demand and to carry on its business without price support.

SALMON FISHING—INVESTIGATION OF REDUCTION OF SEASON

Mr. Bell:

1. Has the government investigated the possibility of a reduction in the Atlantic salmon fishing season this year?

2. If so, what are the estimated salmon losses to Saint John harbour fishermen for the reduced seasons investigated?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes.

2. Because of year to year variance in time and size of salmon runs no estimate can be made of differences in catches resulting from any relatively small changes in dates of fishing seasons.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the published statistics on unemployment, will the minister say just what steps are proposed by the government to remedy this situation?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thought that question was quite thoroughly explored during the recent debate on unemployment in this house.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would like to ask a supplementary question. Did I understand the minister to say that the government does not propose to do anything?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), but I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Did the Minister of Justice, in his radio broadcast from Winnipeg last night, when he stated that 5 per cent of unemployment was agreed to be a good thing, speak for the government?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in my radio address last night I suggested that a great authority in the United Kingdom, Lord Beveridge, said that 3 per cent unemployment was proper, that it was equivalent to full employment in Great Britain and the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour had indicated that anywhere from 3 to 5 per cent might be a corresponding percentage for Canada. I agreed, by implication, with both these labour congresses.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. When the minister says 3 per cent might be the proper amount of unemployment, what does he mean by "proper"?

Mr. Garson: In relation to the context to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) alluded, Lord Beveridge's statement was that that would be the degree of unemployment in Great Britain which would indicate full employment and that there was not a shortage of labour.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO FIGURES RELEASED BY DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Might I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, arising out of the answer given by the Minister of Justice a few minutes ago and which could be misunderstood. Is it correct that the last figures released by the minister's department indicate that approximately 10 per cent of the working force of Canada are at present unemployed?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the normal monthly release which was published yesterday indicated, as explained during the debate, the two sets of figures related to unemployment. One set consisted of those prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics showing those without jobs at a given time; the other set of figures showed the total of those at a given date listed in the national employment service offices across Canada as applying for employment. As I recall it, during the debate the announcement was made that the dominion bureau of statistics figure was 280,000 in round figures and that the other group of figures totalled 524,000 for January. The corresponding figures issued yesterday for February were 312,000 in the first instance and 559,000 in the second.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REFERENCE TO FILM "SASKATCHEWAN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege and I bring this matter to your attention because I feel an answer is called for from the ministry. I have already spoken to the appropriate minister about this matter. Last night I attended a film entitled "Saskatchewan", which is represented as being based upon historical facts. The story, besides being full of historical and geographical inaccuracies, is an insult to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a force in which I once served and of which all Canadians are justly proud. This film is also an affront to the memory of certain great Canadians who, by their tact and good judgment, averted Indian warfare in western Canada. The whole sickly story is a travesty of the true facts and therefore its showing is highly undesirable because it distorts, for young Canadians, a glorious chapter in Canadian history.

At no time in the long record of the mounted police did troops of that force engage Indians in murderous battle, killing large numbers of natives, nor did mutiny or insubordination exist in that force. On the contrary, the relationship between officers, non-commissioned officers and constables has always been excellent. I therefore wish to ask the Minister of Justice if any public funds were expended in the production of this atrocious film.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be greatly relieved to learn that no public funds were expended in the production of that film. That is as one would expect, because we of course do not subsidize these Hollywood productions. I have not seen the film myself but I have received information from the commissioner which indicates that the remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) are correct. The film is quite inaccurate historically and as regards the location in which it was produced; and, as the hon. member has stated, what is even more important is that it does very much less than justice to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, whose great prestige has always been peculiarly based upon its long and honourable record of having enforced law and order, not by gun-play, as indicated in this film, but with the minimum use of force.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should say for the purpose of the record that I should have much preferred to have seen this question debated on the estimates of the Department of Justice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO UNDERDEVELOPED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the government. Is the government aware of the failure of the Galt Knitting Company after 74 years of continuous operation? In view of the external affairs debate today, will the government assure Canadian labour and industry continuous prosperity so as to enable the government to maintain aid, through taxation, to less favoured nations of the world?

Mr. Speaker: This question is so general in character—

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is possible to answer that question on the orders of the day. I think it would require more time than could be devoted to the answer to a question on the orders of the day.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to a statement in the press captioned "Newfoundland Fisheries under Ottawa Ruling", and asked for certain information on the new arrangement.

The statement to which the hon. member referred was based on a press release issued on Monday, March 22, by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). This release followed discussions between representatives of the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland concerning the marketing of Newfoundland salted codfish.

Under the new arrangements, particularly those respecting NAFEL, the proposal is that the Newfoundland salt-fish merchants at the beginning of the season shall undertake to pay minimum prices to fishermen and to agree on a system of profit sharing dependent on the final outcome of export sales. This will be an agreement between merchants and fishermen and does not mean floor prices in the sense that they would be guaranteed by the government.

The statement also said that prices would be reviewed by the fisheries prices support board at the end of the marketing year. This, of course, is in line with government policy and represents no change.

EXCISE TAX

SUGGESTED REMOVAL FROM CARBONATED BEVERAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received representations from bottlers of carbonated beverages calling for the removal of the excise tax from their product? If so, is the minister taking these representations into consideration in preparing the proposed new budget?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The answer to both questions is in the affirmative, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR CHANGES TO COVER SHORT DAY WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). Other members of the house have also asked me similar questions privately. His question was:

> . . . would the minister take into consideration making either appropriate changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act or appropriate changes in its present administration in order that industrial employees working on a short day week may receive full benefits under the act?

My answer is as follows. One of the principles on which the contribution and benefit structure of the Unemployment Insurance Act is based is that the insured person assumes part of the risk, and no benefits are paid for short periods of unemployment.

In carrying out this principle, there are two provisions in the Unemployment Insurance Act. The first is the waiting period of five days at the beginning of every benefit year during which no benefit is paid.

The second provision is that no benefit is paid for any period of unemployment of one day, or for the first day in any period of unemployment, consisting of two or more consecutive days, subject to the following exceptions:

(1) There will not be more than one non-compensable day in a week, and

(2) No non-compensable day will be charged in any week in which the claimant worked for three days or less for an employer other than his regular employer.

In the case of employees who normally work five days a week, and whose work week is reduced to four days, there is a loss of one day's employment each week and no benefit is paid. However, where two days' employment is lost in any week and only three days are actually worked, under the present provisions, the sixth day which is normally a holiday is treated as an unemployed day and two days' benefits are paid.

There is an anomaly, however, in the treatment accorded to a claimant who loses one day each week, and the claimant who loses two days every second week. This problem is being studied by the unemployment insurance commission, in an endeavour to find a solution which will conform with the underlying principles of the act and which will at the same time be equitable to the claimants.

CIVIL DEFENCE

CONTINENTAL TESTS—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, of which I gave him notice, or in his absence may I direct the question to his parliamentary assistant? With respect to the announcement by the United States civil defence administration to the effect that the first continental defence tests will be undertaken shortly, in which the United States and the ten provinces of Canada will be taking part, would the minister make a statement to the house on this important matter, and advise whether any public participation in the tests is contemplated?

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to indicate his intention to ask this question. I regret that I am unable to make a statement at this time. Bearing in mind the nature of this question and the fact that there is no apparent urgency, I would suggest that this question might be placed on the order paper.

CUSTOMS ACT

IMPORTATION OF SLINGSHOTS AND MALAYAN STYLE THROWING DAGGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. What representations has his department received recently from police authorities in relation to the importation of slingshots and Malayan style throwing daggers, and what steps does the department contemplate to curtail the importation of these weapons?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have not any knowledge of any such application as that to which the hon. gentleman refers. I shall look into the matter immediately and see whether it comes under the jurisdiction of the customs and excise branch of the Department of National Revenue.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

EXTENSION OF BASE AT STEVENSON FIELD—SALE OF HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to an inquiry addressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on March 12 which he said concerned 30 houses on Whytewold road in St. James, Manitoba. This area has been acquired by the Department of National Defence for the extension of the air force station at Stevenson field. When it was acquired there was a considerable number of shacks, shanties and some houses on the property. As a matter of fact I am informed there are about a dozen houses which are in a very dilapidated state. They are without plumbing and are a menace to health. Three of them are occupied. A survey is being made, and when the area is being cleared for use such of the buildings as appear to have any salvageable value will be declared surplus to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for sale and removal and the rest will be demolished.

POWER

INQUIRY AS TO DIVERSION OF YUKON RIVER WATER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a secret meeting between the premier of British Columbia and representatives of the American Aluminum Company and the Frobisher-Ventures Complex at which the question of the diversion of Yukon river water into Taiya inlet and into the Sloko river to the Taku inlet was discussed. Before the government of Canada cedes any water power rights to the United States government or any agency thereof or to the Aluminum Corporation of America, known as Alcoa, for concessions or grants of United States territory, will the matter be brought before the house, and has there been any change in the basic policy on the export of primary power from the Yukon?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I must confess that I know nothing about this secret meeting to which the hon. member refers. I am not in on that secret. There has been no change in the basic policy of the Canadian government with respect to the export of the primary products of its natural resources.

Mr. Adamson: The meeting took place on March 17 and was reported in the Vancouver Province.

An hon. Member: Not very secret.

POST OFFICE

ADDITIONAL CHARGE ON LETTERS RETURNED AS UNDELIVERABLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the government decided to impose an extra charge of 5 cents, in addition to the postage already paid, on letters returned to the sender as undeliverable? If so, why was the house not informed of this intention when the bill increasing postage rates was before parliament?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. I may say that an extra charge of 5 cents, in addition to the postage already paid, is not being imposed. Letters bearing the return addresses of the senders on the outside of the envelope, if undeliverable, are returned without charge to the senders. Letters which prove undeliverable at the address given, and which do not bear the return address of the sender on the cover, must be diverted to the undeliverable mail office and opened there in order that the name and address of the sender may be ascertained so that the item may be returned. There has always been a charge for this service. On and after April 1 it will be 5 cents, corresponding to the charge for a "forward" letter.

As for the second part of the question, I do not recall everything that was said on the occasion to which the hon. member refers, although I remember that he certainly covered a lot of ground. But I may say that I myself said at the time that the increase would be all along the line, and I think the principle was certainly contained in that answer.

HOUSING

PROTECTION OF HOMES OF UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. As many of the people who are out of work are buying homes under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, have the minister and the corporation given consideration to seeing that these people will not lose their homes while they are unemployed?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is a very sympathetic administrator of the terms of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Did the minister see the press report this morning indicating that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had said that these people would not lose their homes?

Mr. Winters: No, I did not see the press statement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to move:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

In the first place I think I should say, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of your clear and precise explanation I am not quite sure yet which of these mechanical instruments I am supposed to speak at. But I propose to follow the good Liberal middle of the course way, and I have no complaint against being an acoustical guinea pig on this occasion.

This resolution makes it possible not only to begin the work of the committee on external affairs but for a general discussion of international matters, and has customarily been used for that purpose. Today it has been thought desirable to alter the procedure in one respect so that after I have completed a fairly general survey the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) may deal with one or two matters concerning the Far East which have arisen out of reports of his recent journey to that area of the world. It was felt that members opposite would like to have a full statement of government policy on all these matters and that therefore it might suit their convenience, as, indeed, it seems suitable to us, that the Prime Minister should follow me immediately. Then the debate would take its normal course.

The first matter with which I should like to deal, and I think the house will expect me to, is the result of the Berlin conference, which was being held when we had our last discussion on international affairs on January 29. It will be recalled that the agenda of the Berlin conference was adopted quickly. It was a simple agenda of three items. The second and third items of that agenda were Germany and the problem of ensuring European security, and the Austrian state treaty. In respect of these two items, as the house knows, no progress was made at Berlin.

In so far as Germany is concerned, the Soviet delegation to that conference was unable to agree to the proposal for free all-German elections as the first step towards unification and a German peace settlement; while the western foreign ministers on their part were not able to agree to the Soviet proposal, which had been previously rejected, that a provisional all-German government should be set up on a basis of equal representation of the freely elected government of the German republic and of the communist regime in East Germany. The result was, in this matter, deadlock.

Similarly, in respect of Austria, when the western foreign ministers, in an effort to bring a peace treaty to Austria at last, accepted the previous Soviet proposals the Soviet delegation then introduced new and irrelevant conditions, with the result that in this matter too there was deadlock. So the peoples of Germany and Austria must have felt, as indeed we felt, disappointment and disillusionment over the negative results of these items of the agenda.

The first item of the agenda concerned methods of reducing international tension and convening a five-power conference. Under that item a decision was taken, as the house knows, to hold a conference in Geneva opening on April 26 to discuss the question of a Korean peace treaty and the war in Indo-China. I will deal with these matters more specifically a little later.

On January 29, when we discussed international affairs, I told the house that in my view, despite some minor concessions and some reassuring words from the successors to Mr. Stalin in the U.S.S.R., nothing that had happened up to that time gave us cause to believe that the basic objectives of soviet foreign policy had changed or that soviet leaders were, in fact, ready to accept a reasonable solution to major international problems. After a careful examination of all the reports of the Berlin conference dealing with Germany, Austria and the general subject of European security, it seems clear that the conclusion I put forward on January 29 holds true today. There has been no evidence of change in the basic foreign policy objectives of the Soviet union. At Berlin, Mr. Speaker, the same record was played, although it was played somewhat more softly and for that I suppose we should give thanks.

One of the foreign policy objectives of the Soviet union has been to split the European allies, and indeed other allies, from the United States of America; to crack the solid structure of western unity. Mr. Molotov at Berlin made it abundantly clear that this was certainly one of his principal aims. But we can all take satisfaction out of the fact that he failed in achieving that aim. Indeed, the Russian tactics served to strengthen, I think, the unified approach of the western delegation to international problems. The teamwork and the tactics of the western foreign ministers at Berlin, which were I think admirable in all respects, have quite possibly increased the sense of common purpose in the peoples of the free world. A stronger Atlantic community spirit might, I think, be listed as a positive achievement of that conference.

The attitude adopted by the soviet delegation, their refusal to agree to the unification of Germany with free elections or the peace treaty with Austria, has also served to remove—if we still had them—any lingering illusions about soviet policy. I suppose this also can be listed as a positive achievement of the conference. It is a melancholy fact, but a fact nonetheless, that in the world in which we live we must count as a step forward the removal or reduction of false hopes, because false hopes can be dangerous. Clearing the ground of illusions and facing the situation as it is makes, I think, more likely the formulation, and eventually the realization, of sound hopes and attainable visions of secure peace.

Since the Berlin conference some progress has been made by the countries of western Europe towards the establishment of the European defence community. In Belgium, for instance, the senate has approved a bill for ratification of the EDC treaty, which earlier had been passed by its house of representatives. In The Netherlands the final steps in the formal process of ratification have been completed. In the federal republic of Germany, parliamentary approval has been received for constitutional amendments which would put beyond doubt the right of the German republic to participate in western defence. In both France and Italy, however, formal parliamentary debate on the EDC treaty has not yet begun. We must hope that it will begin soon.

The Canadian government, as I indicated in my last statement, has welcomed indications that our friends in Europe intend to unite their forces in the interests of continental defence and continental co-operation. We have not taken the position that EDC was the only means to this end, but we have stated our support for EDC as a satisfactory arrangement and indeed as the only one which has been put forward officially. Furthermore, as a member of NATO with which EDC if it comes into existence will be associated, we have expressed our satisfaction that the creation of the European defence community will strengthen the North Atlantic community and integrate the defences of the whole North Atlantic area.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those are no mean objectives and perhaps it was unrealistic to expect their rapid realization. But surely we across the Atlantic have some right to expect that if the pace has been slow, it should be steady. Certainly, if there were any lingering doubts that we were on the right path those were dispelled by the example of soviet policy at Berlin. We in Canada have, I think, felt and demonstrated sympathy and understanding for those in Europe who have demanded full time for consideration of EDC. In view of their history we have understood their hesitation. But while recognizing the necessity, the very real necessity, for caution and prudence, we may feel also over here that there comes a time when in certain situations failure to act may in the long run prove to have been the most dangerous of all possible courses, and that the greatest probability of safety may lie in decisive acts of faith.

At the Berlin conference the U.S.S.R. has made it very clear that they oppose EDC because they see in it a strong obstacle to their own policy. Their opposition is, perhaps, understandable, though it is based I think on false fears and false assumptions. The European defence community has been devised from the beginning to contribute to the defensive collective strength of western Europe, with which will be associated the United States and Canada. The men in the Kremlin apparently feel that continued failure to ratify the EDC project would tend to serve their purposes of keeping free Europe weak and divided. I agree with them, and that is one reason why we must hope that EDC or something like it will soon come into existence.

The other item on the Berlin agenda which was dealt with has resulted, as the house knows, in the calling of the Geneva conference. I believe this conference can be welcomed. But again, we should have no exaggerated hopes of success. We must, of course, do our best to bring about that success. We must refuse to give up the struggle if we seem to be having difficulty in the first week or two. But it is not going to be an easy conference, and indeed it is not going to be a conference from which we can be sure of constructive results. For one thing, we shall have new membership at that conference in the personnel of the delegation from communist China.

The Secretary General of the United Nations, whom we were happy to welcome in Ottawa only a few weeks ago, had this to say in London at a dinner on March 18:

> Now, we are facing a new chapter in the Korean story. Next month in Geneva the nations who fought under the United Nations flag in Korea return to the conference table to seek peace. At this table the communist countries will be fully represented for the first time. The negotiations that will be undertaken in Geneva will be of extreme difficulty, yet it would be a serious mistake to allow them to lapse again should it prove impossible quickly to conclude that peace treaty.

He concluded this part of his remarks in these words:

> It is inherent in the United Nations' approach that the western world and the communist world meet regularly around the conference table.

I was asked on Tuesday by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) what would be our instructions as a Canadian delegation at this conference. Mr. Speaker, that can be stated in very general terms. We shall do our best to assist in the process of converting the Korean armistice, a somewhat uneasy Korean armistice, into a durable and satisfactory peace within the United Nations frame of reference which has been set down for this conference, and by which we as a government, indeed as a parliament, are bound.

The United Nations' resolution on this subject reads—at least the important sentence of it—that the objectives we are to seek are:

> Achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full restoration of international peace and security in the area.

These are the goals of the Canadian delegation to the conference, and indeed they should be the goals of each delegation whose right to participate at the conference stems from its military contribution to the United Nations' cause in Korea. I can see no obstacle that could not be overcome in the way of the realization of that resolution if there is good faith and good will on both sides; but that "if", Mr. Speaker, as we know from unhappy experience, is big enough to restrain undue optimism as to the results of the conference. Nevertheless, we shall do our part as Canadian representatives, I hope, to achieve a satisfactory result which may bring peace to Korea.

At the Geneva conference there will also be discussed the question of Indo-China. It was agreed on by the four foreign ministers at Berlin that this question should be discussed by representatives of France, the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R., the Chinese people's republic and other interested states. As hon. members know, the problem of Indo-China, where bitter fighting has been going on for eight years and is going on today, has never been submitted to the United Nations for consideration, and for that reason Canada has not been as directly concerned with this matter as we were with the aggression in Korea. Nevertheless, I am sure we are all conscious of the critical significance of the struggle in Indo-China as it affects the aspirations of the people of Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia in achieving and maintaining the independence accorded them by France, as it affects the security of the neighbouring countries in southeast Asia and as it affects the ability of France to make the maximum contribution to European and North Atlantic security and co-operative arrangements. And so, while we do not expect at Geneva to take any active part in discussions regarding Indo-China, we shall of course follow these talks with close interest and take advantage of any opportunity that may be afforded to us to help in bringing some satisfactory conclusion out of this particular matter.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, about which I think I should say a word or two. I meant to discuss this, as a matter of fact, when I was speaking in the house in January, but considerations of time did not then make it possible. I refer to President Eisenhower's proposals last autumn on atomic energy. During recent months, and indeed during recent days, a considerable amount of significant information has been made public regarding the terrible power of atomic weapons, particularly the new type of hydrogen atomic weapons which, and it is a horrible admission to have to make, have made the bomb that was dropped on Hiroshima and killed 60,000 people obsolescent. There is no need for me to try to impress on the house the fearful power of these weapons and the awesome responsibility toward all future generations, which their recent development imposes on humanity.

In the face of the dangers which these developments involve, it is vitally important that no genuine opportunity for international co-operation in this field should be missed. In this respect the Berlin conference was disappointing and the Korean conference at Geneva may prove to be so, too. But surely we must never abandon the effort and the hope that sooner or later sanity and moderation will somehow prevail, and that man will exercise control over weapons, the use of which may destroy his little world.

While there are, as we know from long experience, many and bitter difficulties in the way of solution of this problem of international control of atomic energy, President Eisenhower's proposal does gives us some hope that progress can be made. That proposal is in many respects a modest one. For that purpose, it may be easier to implement it. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when this proposal was first mentioned in this house—the proposal refers of course to the collection of atomic stockpiles of uranium and fissionable materials under an international atomic energy agency—the Canadian government announced its unreserved support for it. The Prime Minister referred to it in the house at that time as an imaginative and constructive approach to what is perhaps the greatest problem of the day, namely, the effective control of atomic energy and its development for welfare rather than for warfare. But I think it is important that our strong support for this approach should be accompanied by a clear understanding, not only of what the proposal is but what it is not. For example, it does not of itself offer a solution for the terrible problem of the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes.

But while it is a relatively modest one, therein may, as I said, lie its virtue, or at any rate lie the possibility of its early and general acceptance. Furthermore, it could, if it were adopted, be the starting point for further progress and for reaching more important forward results. At this point it might be useful if I just said a word on the procedure being followed by the United States' government in making arrangements for discussion of this proposal by the nations principally concerned. Obviously—at least it seems obvious to me—it is of great importance that the Soviet union should participate fully in these discussions; and for that reason Mr. Dulles, the United States Secretary of State, had been holding, as the house no doubt knows, bilateral discussions with the Soviet ambassador in Washington, and during the Berlin conference with Mr. Molotov, with a view to making satisfactory arrangements for further and more general progress.

These discussions have now advanced to the point where, on March 19, the United States government presented to the Soviet government a memorandum outlining its views as to how President Eisenhower's proposal could be most effectively implemented. While that memorandum was sponsored solely by the United States government, which arose out of those bilateral conversations, the Canadian government was consulted in advance about the terms of this memorandum.

After consideration we were able to say that we were in general agreement in these proposals to which we have been giving very careful consideration. And in that consideration we have had to face a number of difficult questions. For example: should the international agency suggested by the President hold in its own possession uranium or fissionable material to be supplied by contributing nations; if so, where? Alternatively, perhaps the agency might itself hold little or no material, and be in a position to draw upon stocks held by contributing nations up to the amounts pledged.

Another question to resolve is whether the proposed international agency should itself construct, own or operate atomic reactors, or whether it should confine its activities to arranging for the provision of the materials and technical assistance required by countries wishing to undertake this atomic development program for peaceful purposes.

A problem of importance concerns the proposed international agency itself. Should it be associated with the United Nations? In what way would it be financed? What would be the basis for determining who should be represented on it?

Hon. members will note that I have framed my remarks on these matters as questions without answers. We are seeking for these answers, in consultation with our friends. But I think in view of our experience over the years that so much in the way of international discussion of atomic energy has been bedevilled by propaganda and frustrated by political fears—in view of that experience I think it is wise in the early stages at least to have these discussions conducted privately and confidentially.

And that is what has been going on. In due course, if these bilateral discussions about which we are talking turn out to be successful, then the discussions can be broadened to include other countries importantly concerned. I think in the privacy of discussions at this stage, however, lies the best hope that the talks will be used for serious negotiation rather than for propaganda.

But the more we study this question of atomic energy and its use, without control, for destructive purposes, the more important of course become arrangements, and the necessity for these arrangements, for collective defence, for co-operation for peace among the free world.

The basis of the security which we are seeking in this field is of course international action—international collective action on the broadest possible front. Mr. Dulles himself, the Secretary of State, made that very clear in some very impressive words which appeared in an article which came out last week in Foreign Affairs, under his name. He wrote:

> The cornerstone of security for the free nations must be a collective system of defence. They clearly cannot achieve security separately. No single nation can develop for itself defensive power of adequate scope and flexibility. In seeking to do so, each would become a garrison state and none would achieve security.

And he went on to say:

> This is true of the United States. Without the co-operation of allies, we would not even be in a position to retaliate massively against the war industries of an attacking nation. That requires international facilities. Without them, our air striking power loses much of its deterrent power. With them, strategic air power becomes what Sir Winston Churchill called the "supreme deterrent". He—> —credited to it the safety of Europe during recent years. But such power, while now a dominant factor, may not have the same significance forever. Furthermore, massive atomic and thermonuclear retaliation is not the kind of power which could most usefully be evoked under all circumstances.

That is, Sir Winston Churchill.

And he concluded this part of his article by saying:

> Security for the free world depends, therefore, upon the development of collective security and community power rather than upon purely national potentials . . .

I am sure the house will agree that those are very wise words, indeed. Now the broadest base for the accumulation of this collective community power is in the United Nations itself. It is the only international organization we have which is universal in character. But now that very universality makes its deterrent value not as great as it should be, and makes it not very effective as an instrument for collective community power at the present time.

It can be effective, and it has been shown to be effective in Korea; and it could be more effective if we implement the "uniting for peace resolution" of the UN general assembly. But the fact is that, as the United Nations is now constituted, reflecting the cold war which is still raging, it cannot be a satisfactory and effective agent for universal collective security — not effective enough to remove our fears.

And so, as an alternative, we have fallen back on a regional basis for the collection of this community power; in the circumstances, an effective alternative through arrangements which include those states which are willing to accept firm commitments for collective action.

Above all, of course, there is NATO, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. This regional collective security as exemplified in NATO is based on two concepts—not one but two concepts—the first of which is the importance of local defence, and the second, the importance of retaliation, especially from the air, on enemy nerve centres from bases which may be far removed from attack. Both these concepts are, of course, essential to the effectiveness of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Mr. Dulles, himself, talking about this at a press conference the other day, and referring to the necessity for local defence, but also to its inadequacy in present circumstances, said:

> With the Soviet-Chinese-Communist world—with its 800,000,000 people occupying a central location; with its vast land armies—it would be utterly impossible to have local defences all around that 20,000-mile orbit sufficient to stop any blow that might come at wherever they might choose to make it. So that you have got to find some way whereby that type of local ground defence can be supplemented.

And he went on:

> Now that doesn't mean that you eliminate wholly, by any means, land forces—it means you do not necessarily make them your primary reliance because, as against the kind of danger which threatens, it is impossible to match your potential enemy at all points on a basis of man-for-man, gun-for-gun and tank-for-tank.

And so, local defence, while important, has to be supplemented by this other concept of retaliation. And yet, if we relied too much on that and depreciated the importance of local defence, that would be interpreted in many countries as meaning that some countries were expendable. And I doubt if we could maintain a coalition, even NATO, very long on that basis. Inevitably there would be a retreat to isolation. There would be a move towards what sometimes is called continental security, both in North America and —and this is sometimes forgotten—in Europe itself.

But security of this variety, continental security, is a delusion, because, and I think the house will agree with me, there can be no continental security without collective security. And there can be no collective security without collective arrangements for collective action. And no such action can be effective without close and continuous collective consultation. There are then, as I see it, two deterrents against war, and we must be clear about them both. Certainly I believe we are clearer now about the importance, the significance, and indeed even the limitations of the deterrent of massive retaliation than we were a few weeks ago.

There has been a good deal of talk in the last week or two here, in the United States, and across the seas, about this new defence strategy, or new defence concept, that is sometimes referred to as the "new look". It was also referred to by the vice-president of the United States in his broadcast a couple of weeks ago as a "new course". On the other hand, it was described by President Eisenhower, in his press conference last week, as "no new doctrine at all."

Whether it is new or old it is extremely important. In the words of Mr. Dulles, it means "local defence reinforced by mobile deterrent power". It means refusal to be tied to any rigid strategy, to any fixed planning, and it gives the nations of the coalition, it is hoped, more freedom of manoeuvre.

This old, or new doctrine, whatever you wish to call it, was dealt with in considerable detail by the United States Secretary of State in his speech in New York on January 12. He confirmed his views on this strategy at his press conference on March 17 in Washington when he said, and I quote from his remarks as reported in the New York Times:

> I have said that the capacity to retaliate powerfully and instantly is, in my opinion, the greatest deterrent, and that when you are faced with that kind of potential enemy, or with the assets that this potential enemy has, I believe that a deterrent of that sort is the most effective way there is of preventing a war.

So far as I am concerned I do not criticize the view that this kind of strategy is a valuable deterrent against aggression, and a shield for defence. In my speech in Washington last week I went out of my way to say that I did not criticize it as such because it might very well be the best deterrent against war at the present time. What I thought was important, however, was to clarify some of the ambiguities of this new strategy, and to make it as clear as possible to us all where we stood as friends and allies in relation to it.

Within the last few weeks some very important and reassuring clarifications have been made in Washington of what seemed to some of us to be obscurities. I believe that has been a good result. I know that personally I feel better after having heard some of these statements.

The sentence on which I concentrated my attention in Mr. Dulles' January speech, and it is a sentence which has become pretty well known by now, is as follows. I am quoting from Mr. Dulles' speech made in New York on January 12:

. . . before military planning can be changed the President and his advisers, as represented by the National Security Council, had to take some basic policy decisions.

Then he went on:

This has been done. The basic decision was to depend primarily upon a great capacity to retaliate, instantly, by means and at places of our choosing.

Some weeks afterwards the vice-president of the United States spoke over the air on March 14 and said more or less the same thing. I quote:

Rather than let the communists nibble us to death all over the world in little wars we would rely in the future primarily on our massive mobile retaliatory power which we could use in our discretion against the major source of aggression at times and places that we chose.

From Mr. Dulles' speech, from which I have already quoted, I picked three words which I considered as being of special importance. These words were "instantly" . . . "means" . . . "our choosing". When I spoke to Mr. Dulles in Washington last week about his speech he said that he did not quarrel with my selection of words, as they were indeed key words. But he was of the opinion that I had excluded the most important word. That word was "capacity". Dealing with that point on March 17 at his press conference Mr. Dulles said:

If you will read my address of January 12, you will see what I advocated there was a "capacity" to retaliate instantly. In no place did I say we would retaliate instantly, although we might indeed retaliate instantly under conditions that call for that. The essential thing is to have the capacity to retaliate instantly.

I certainly accept the importance of that word, but I would suggest that the word "capacity" means not only military capacity but political capacity and that, as Mr. Dulles pointed out so clearly in his article in Foreign Affairs, includes the necessity of co-operation with other countries, especially in such things as the use of bases.

Mr. Dulles has pointed out, as did President Eisenhower in his address to the United Nations, and this has also been emphasized by the Canadian delegation to the United Nations assembly, that this aspect of the question, namely collective capacity and facilities, is in fact a safeguard against rash or provocative action, if such safeguard were needed, on the part of any member of the coalition. For action could only be taken by a joint or collective agreement.

There is a second word to which I devoted some attention in my Washington speech, and that was the word "instantly". That word, in connection with the strategy we are discussing, involves no problem, as I see it, if there is a direct attack on your own territory, or indeed possibly on the territory of your neighbour, because then it becomes a question of self-preservation and quick, effective, and instant action is essential and would be taken by any country attacked. No one, I believe, would take exception to that.

But the situation is not always so clear as that, and not always so urgent. Sometimes we have cases of unclear or indirect aggression where the circumstances may be blurred and decisions cannot be so easily and quickly made. In that kind of situation a question at once arises as to the application of this doctrine. Against whom will the retaliation be made? Where, how, and when? The difficulty of course in getting out of that situation is that you cannot find any cut-and-dried formula to cover all these cases, and if you did have one you would not want to give it away by unnecessary publicity. Yet, having regard to that difficulty, there is the other difficulty, because this kind of blurred situation is exactly when co-operation and consultation with your friends is most essential and when it is of vital importance to act together as much as we can and plan as far in advance as possible.

Then there is the phrase "by means". That has been interpreted in certain quarters, and understandably so, to give some weight to the fear that the application of this kind of strategy might involuntarily convert small wars into a world war. The Secretary of State of the United States has been trying to clear up that misapprehension in recent days by emphasizing that "means" do not include any single means, let alone atomic means, that the means would have to be adapted to the circumstances and that there would be many occasions—indeed probably most occasions, even of aggression—when it would be unwise politically and strategically to use atomic means at all. Then there is this final word "our choice". Of course there were some worries about the interpretation of that word "our". Those who worried felt that they had some cause to do so because of the ambiguity of the language that was used and because it was felt—I think rightly—that if collective security is to work, the word "our" in that context must mean the free world coalition. Mr. Dulles, in his Foreign Affairs article to which I have already referred, agreed with this interpretation when he wrote:

The main reliance must be on the power of the free community to retaliate with great force by mobile means at a place of its own choice.

On March 19 this interpretation was made even clearer when Mr. Dulles appeared before the Senate foreign relations committee and was asked this question by Senator Smith of New Jersey:

As a result of your January 12 speech, that is when you first spoke of this capacity to retaliate, there have been fears expressed that the United States would not consult our allies in the event of an attack . . . These fears are based on the words in your speech "by means and at places of our choosing". Now I interpreted that when I read it to mean that you were referring to our choosing rather than to the enemies choosing. You would not say our choosing exclusive of our allies? I am correct in my interpretation?

Mr. Dulles replied in words which were very clear and to the point:

You are absolutely correct, Senator Smith. The emphasis upon "our" was in terms of the free world or whatever portion of it is operating in counter-distinction to the Soviet world. I was pointing out that if we only respond at places and by means of their choosing then we do not exercise a maximum deterrent power, and that the differences between "their" and "our" was in terms of the free world and its potential enemy.

Mr. Speaker, I think the effect of this exchange of views, this conference, these statements and these clarifications has been that we now have a fairly clear and reassuring idea of what this new strategy and this new planning for defence is. One thing this interpretation does make clear is that diplomacy and consultation, which is part of diplomacy, is under this doctrine not less important but more important than ever before. Any decisions must surely be collective, whenever that can be done, before action has to be taken.

The New York Times in an editorial on March 20, commenting on this aspect of the question concluded as follows:

In discussing bipartisan foreign policy here at home—

This is in the United States.

—the idea of "being let in on the take-off and not the crash landing" is often mentioned. That goes for our allies, and it ought to apply with special emphasis to Canada.

I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I say that we want to be let in at the take-off so that we can do our part to help avoid a crash landing. I think this is especially true in the relations between Canada and the United States where consultation and co-operation are very essential not only in respect of security matters but also in respect of economic matters and every other matter.

We had a very good illustration last week in Washington of the importance and the value of consultation on economic matters when we met in Washington at the first session of the Canada-United States committee on economic affairs.

We in this country have already built up with our friends in the free world valuable habits of consultation and co-operation. We know now that our fundamental interests are identical. There is, of course, a long way still to go. We must, for instance, increasingly apply the realization of interdependence to our economic policies as well as to our defence policies. In respect of consultation for defence, defence planning and all that kind of thing, I suggest that we should try to use the North Atlantic council more than we have in the past. We have a permanent council in session in Paris. It is meeting every few days and I think this council should be an effective vehicle for consultation in this field. Next month, on April 23, we are going to have a ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic council. The only subject on the agenda of that meeting is exchange of views on the international situation between the foreign ministers of the North Atlantic countries, all of whom will be there and all of whom will be discussing the subject that I am discussing now. That is the kind of subject that should, I think, be discussed at the North Atlantic council not only at occasional meetings of ministers but continually through the permanent representatives so that in that agency of consultation we can clear our views on defence and foreign policy.

We must also constantly seek not only to preserve but to widen and develop still further our attitudes and habits of confidence, frank discussion and consultation, restraint and tolerance. Notwithstanding the importance of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which I have just emphasized, this must be done on a scale which is not limited to the North Atlantic alliance but which is as broad as the globe. Indeed, our co-operation, our friendships must extend beyond our western civilization. Improving the economic and social conditions under which the major part of humanity lives will not ensure peace but it will make peace more likely. More important possibly than even economic aid is the opportunity for understanding and for genuine friendliness between the peoples of Asia in their hundreds of millions and those of the western world. These Asians will form their impressions of our civilization and values above all by what they learn and sense of our real attitudes. That is only one reason, I think, why all members of the house have been so happy over the magnificent results of the journey of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) into that part of the world.

I would go even further and say that our sense of understanding must even extend to the very people who we think threaten our peace. We cannot be soft-headed about this matter for power in the hands of irresponsible rulers could be dangerous to our peace. But while we need not be soft-headed, we should certainly be clear-headed. I agree that we must be careful and alert. But also we must not let fear freeze our diplomacy into immobility or fire it into panic action. The purpose of Canadian policy—and I do not think there is any division of opinion in this country about this—is not merely to build up military collective strength, important as that is. Our purpose is to work together with our friends in solving our own problems and also, if possible, to negotiate with those whom we fear, in solving those other problems which now divide the world. Canada is anxious to play its part also in this form of collective security, anxious to play its part in seeking, by negotiation, international solutions to differences, to seek them by negotiation from the strength, which we are now collecting, and with strength but also with wisdom, with a full realization of the calamitous result of failure, and in the hope that one day security will rest upon a stronger basis even than the certainty of massive retaliation, atomic retaliation if you like, against anyone who would break the peace; retaliation which would certainly annihilate the enemy but might also destroy ourselves.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find myself at this moment in a position where I have to ask your indulgence and that of the house for a few minutes to speak of at least one of the unfortunate results of my trip around the world that has been referred to in so generous terms by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). International affairs are of such importance that any imprecision or ambiguity in language used about any of their aspects is apt to have very unfortunate consequences. I have to appear at this time before my colleagues in the position of a repentant offender asking the indulgence of his colleagues for his regrettable transgression on the basis of a humble confession of his error or mistake or lapse and on the basis of his genuine desire to clarify the situation and to dispel any of the anxieties or undesirable consequences resulting from the interpretation of too loose language he was unfortunate enough to use.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I am sorry that any of the things I am reported to have said in the East about China have given concern and caused controversy in this country. I am not going to attempt to say that I have been misquoted. I know that the gentlemen of the press who were there were honestly doing their best to report accurately and objectively the many questions in many forms that were put to me, sometimes with almost machine-gun rapidity, at press conferences or at the airfields as I alighted from the plane or was walking towards the plane to re-enter it. I am sure that they did attempt to reproduce what they understood me to have given as my answers and what they understood those answers to mean. I must and I do take the responsibility for any misinterpretation or misconstruction that could be put upon them because of their imprecision or their ambiguity.

There is one thing, however, about which I do feel quite sure that there was an inaccuracy. There was one report that I had said that I was sure we would have to recognize the present government of China as the government the people of China wanted. I feel quite sure I never would use those words intentionally because I never had that feeling about the present government of China. But I must have used some words almost like them since so many of these reporters have come out with that as their version of what they heard and understood, that I felt we would have to be realistic and recognize the government of China "as the government the people wanted."

I should not have said "the government the people wanted". What I had in mind was that, in spite of our dislike of any form of communist or totalitarian government, we could not expect to have to deal with the kind of government, representing the people on the other side, we would like them to have, the kind of government we would want them to have, but that we would have to deal with the government they had as a matter of fact, the government that was in control of the forces that were participating in the happenings that were causing such tension and such anxiety in the international field. That is what I meant. That is what I should have said in words that could not be mistaken or interpreted in any other way because I think that with such a statement there would have been little or no concern and little, if any, controversy about it in this country or anywhere else.

I am not going to read to the house the many editorials that have been published, but I take one that appeared in the Ottawa

Journal of March 12, 1954, which, in part at least, I think would be fairly representative of what was and would be the feeling of the public generally in that regard. The editorial is entitled "About Recognizing China". It reads in part as follows:

A Tokyo dispatch now quotes Prime Minister St. Laurent as saying with respect to recognition of communist China that "it is only the common sense, realistic approach that allied countries eventually deal with communist China as the government in effective control of the China mainland."

This is better, more sensible, than what Mr. St. Laurent was reported to have said earlier at Seoul, namely:

"I do feel that some day we are going to have to be realistic. We are going to have to admit the present government of China as the government the people want."

I feel quite sure, in spite of my respect for the journalists who were there and who were doing their best to report what they heard and what they understood, that I did not put it that way because I never had it in my mind in that form. It was the contrary form I had in my mind, that in spite of our dislike of communist or totalitarian governments we could not expect to have the kind of government we wanted. It would be the kind of government—and I must have said this—that they wanted. I should not have said "they wanted". I should have said the kind of government they had actually in control of the forces we are opposing. The article goes on to say—and I think everyone would agree with this:

No country can ever know with certainty whether the government possessed by some other country is the government its people want. And the fact is that Canada now recognizes any number of countries without being at all sure that their government is what their people want. There is Russia, and Czechoslovakia, and Poland, and Spain; possibly others.

What Canada does, and must be compelled to do, and what all other countries must be compelled to do sooner or later, just because it is the only sensible practicable way, is to recognize the government of a country which is in effective control —which exists in fact.

I would not go quite that far because I would now be very chary about using the word "recognition". It has for so many different people so many different connotations. There is what is sometimes called the concept of legal recognition. Others refer to it as diplomatic recognition. I think perhaps it is better to use some other word that cannot have so many significations. When I was using it I was using it in its broadest sense, that we just had to avoid closing our eyes and had to see, to recognize, that the government that was in control, and with whom we had to deal if we expected to make any kind of arrangement that would be implemented, was the government that was in fact in control of the forces that we were opposing. But the article goes on to say:

We must and should recognize the present government of China, not because we approve of it, not because we do not detest and condemn some of the crimes it has committed, but simply because of the inescapable fact that it is the only government there—the only government exercising authority. Such recognition need not come at this moment;

With that, I fully agree. I would even go so far as to say, instead of "need", we might well say "should" not come at this time. The editorial continues:

—perhaps should not come while Red China remains an aggressor, nor until we see what emerges from Geneva. We must respect—certainly not flout—the opinion of our allies. But for heaven's sake let us not take the impossible position that recognition of China cannot come while China has a communist government—

Then, the article goes on:

It is a pity—

I think it is a pity.

—that the question of Canada's "recognition" of China should have come up in the uncertain way of press conference statements. Mr. St. Laurent doubtless was asked the question in a dozen ways, and it is understandable that, in the east, he desired to indicate Canada's open-mindedness on this vexed subject. But upon his return to Canada parliament should be given a clearer explanation, though the shadow of the Geneva conference will compel restraint.

Of course the shadow of the Geneva conference not only compels restraint but I think is going to be something more than a shadow. It is going to be something that will, to a certain degree, project light into the future. At the present time I was not expressing government policy, but I was expressing frankly my own feelings about it. I was really happy at having heard that there was going to be a Geneva conference at which the government which in fact controls the forces whose conduct has had such a disturbing effect on world peace would be represented and would be talking over the possibility of removing the uncertain conditions of this cease-fire with two impregnable lines of soldiers opposite each other in Korea. Perhaps the conference would be able to do something about the situation which is of grave concern to the whole world, that is the fighting that is going on in Indo-China.

I had the distinct impression that most of the embarrassment felt by French leaders with respect to the European army was a consequence of the drain upon their human and material resources as a result of the fighting going on in Indo-China. I felt that these questions that were being thrown at me arose out of this invitation that had been extended by the four great powers to the representatives of the only government that exists on the mainland of China to come to this conference. The invitation was coupled, of course, with a rider that it is understood that neither the invitation to nor the holding of the above-mentioned conference shall be deemed to imply diplomatic recognition in any case in which it has not already been accorded. But it does constitute an admission that that is the government that is controlling the forces that we have been resisting; that it is the government that can agree to and admit that we have demonstrated that aggression is not going to be allowed to be profitable and that they cannot impose their will upon the free world through aggression.

It may be that something more permanent than this cessation of firing across the no-man's-land between the two forces that are still there will come out of the Geneva conference. If that comes out of the Geneva conference, it may indicate that by negotiating with the same people other causes of world unrest and of uncertainty about the future can be eliminated. So long as that is the only government on the mainland of China, it is only through discussions with that government that any results can be achieved.

Now, when will there be sufficient results achieved to make it desirable to consider whether there should be what amounts to diplomatic recognition? That is something this government is not considering at this time. When I say "at this time", I am not using evasive language. I am not trying to have my language just comply with the facts. I do not mean just at this moment. Under present conditions I do not see any reason why we should consider diplomatic recognition of China. But those conditions may change and I think it would be most unfortunate, just as the editor of the Journal feels it would be most unfortunate, to tie ourselves down by declarations and commitments that would make it impossible for us at any time to come to the conclusion that even the diplomatic recognition of China would not be helpful to peace and security in the world. We are not in that position at the present time, and when I said there was no consideration being given by the government to that kind of recognition at this time I did not mean, as I saw suggested in at least one newspaper, that it was just something that had not yet come officially before the cabinet as a cabinet. I meant that I was not thinking of it and I did not know of any of my colleagues who were thinking in terms of diplomatic recognition of China under present conditions.

But I felt that none of us were thinking in terms that would make it impossible for us to make the right kind of a decision when, under changed circumstances, a decision had to be made. Of course, that decision would have to be made in such a manner as would not involve flouting the opinion of our allies. We have many allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and we have others whom we can, I think, regard as allies, in the United Nations. It would be something of world concern. I would hope the position taken by Canada would be a position that would be of benefit to the peace and stability of the whole world. We should not attempt to make decisions that do not have to be made. The position at this time is that we are not, under present conditions, contemplating diplomatic recognition of China. We have not, and I do not think we should say at this time or at any other time that there may not be a situation in the future when a government we do not like, a government the complexion of which is quite contrary to all our democratic ideals, and a government which according to the information we have obtained by hearsay—of course we have to rely for our information on what we get by hearsay—seems to have been guilty of many things that we would not condone, may nevertheless have to be recognized. There are other governments with whom we have at the present time diplomatic relations who, we think, have done things we could not condone. But they are the governments of those lands and the only governments with whom any dealings in respect of their populations can be had.

I think we all hope that there will be, even between these apparently incompatible worlds, the free world and the world made up of countries with communist regimes, some kind of a modus vivendi which will in fact allow us to live, and allow them to live. That would take place, without our interference, without our approval, without our responsibility in any way in the lands we regard as unfortunate, because they are under such regimes. If we do not look upon that as possible, we then have to look upon this state of cold war as something of very long duration, with always the possibilities of its flaring up into something worse than a cold war.

Once again I am sorry that I was not more careful in the language I used, and that it was the kind of language that could give rise to this concern and to this controversy; but as far as policy is concerned, I was not speaking about policy. And now I do venture to say that the policy of the Canadian government at the present time is to keep an open mind as to whether or not at any time, under any conditions which may develop in the future, there should be recognition of the government which at that time will exist as a matter of fact in China. That again is something that I should not have put in exactly that language. We should keep an open mind as to when if ever conditions may be such that it will be in the interest of peace and stability in the world to recognize diplomatically whatever government happens to be in control of the forces of China.

That I think is the preferable position; but in the meantime whenever there does appear to be an opportunity to remove some of the tension from the international situation by discussions, by meetings and by discussions like that which are called for April 26 in Geneva, I think it is only realistic to feel that the government which is in fact in control of affairs in China has to be there if there is going to be anything accomplished that will produce beneficial results.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? There was one other matter which caused some concern when he was overseas and that was the reference to the armaments and the supplying of military aid by the United States to Pakistan. There seems to be a conflict in the reports and the inference there was that the Prime Minister gave his approval to United States military aid to Pakistan.

Mr. St. Laurent: I refused to express any opinion. I said that as far as we were concerned no such question could arise, because we had pledged to the NATO organization everything we could do in the form of aid and forces to maintain peace in the world, and that no government that expected to remain the government of Canada should ask for more than had been pledged by us to the NATO organization. I did also say that I felt quite satisfied in my own mind that the aid provided, or that might be provided, by the United States to Pakistan was not designed to be used against India, and that I felt quite sure that had there been any impression that it was going to be used against India there would not be one per cent of the United States people who would have supported it.

Perhaps there is one other point. I do not know that it was raised in our press here—I have not seen it—but there was a question put to me about conflicting reports on something I said in Tokyo as to the neutrality of India in the event of a war there. What I did say was that I did not know whether, in the event of a war, India would remain neutral or not, but that if they did not remain neutral I would expect that they would be on our side rather than on the side of our enemies.

Now, there was another report, and it was an erroneous one, possibly made in good faith. My hon. friends here know the atmosphere of press conferences. It was reported that I said I did not think India could remain neutral in the event of war. No matter what I may have been thinking, I did not say that. I said that I did not know whether India would remain neutral or not in the event of war, but if India found that she could not remain neutral I would expect that she would be on our side and not on the side of our enemies.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In reference to the speaking appliance that is in front of me, I do hope that we in this parliament will not decide on broadcasting the sessions of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think we ought to have the debate drift toward that particular subject, and I would ask the hon. member to please co-operate in helping the engineers of the Tannoy company to see what the experiment is worth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think there would be very much debate on that subject, having regard to the reaction of the house.

I want to refer first to the debate that took place on external affairs on January 29 and which terminated at the close of the sitting that day. Because the debate terminated that day only six hon. members were able to participate in it. I do not intend to repeat the questions that were asked by me on that occasion, some of which were answered today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and some of which were not. The questions that were asked then were; first, what was the nature of the discussions, if any, that took place before the announcement by Mr. Dulles of the retaliatory policy? I think Canadians generally will agree with the attitude taken by the minister that we in Canada will not accept any policy automatically that another nation may enunciate unless we have been consulted. I believe that the minister's declaration that Canada is entitled to be consulted represents the attitude of the Canadian people. Canadians have a right to be consulted. The United States is in the position of a captain of a ship. As with a ship junior officers have the right to be consulted, and their views considered before decisions which may affect the crew as well as the captain are made. I think that with the rather lengthy summary by the minister of the effect of Mr. Dulles' speech on massive retaliation and in the explanation within the last few days, given by Mr. Dulles, many of the fears that were in the minds of Canadians have been removed.

Secondly, there was the question of the recognition of China, to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made extended reference today. With regard to the admission of China to the UN, or the recognition of China, I think it is well to look back to what was said by me in the debate in January as to the viewpoint of the Progressive Conservative party. I read from page 1595 of Hansard where I said, referring to China:

> Is she to be recognized? Certainly recognition will be hard to justify, however much it may appeal legalistically to students of international law, so long as the people's government continues its program of virtual annexation of North Korea, supplying arms in Indo-China and apparently doing everything it can to spread communism and disruption in other parts of Asia. While it is impossible to say with finality that China should never be recognized, a good case has not been made for recognition. I believe that if Britain and France had had before them in 1949 the situation that we have today, and the knowledge of events that have since taken place, recognition of China would, to say the least, have been delayed.
>
> Personally I believe that we should not recognize China at this time. To say that we will never recognize her is to look too far into the future . . . In 1945 or 1946 we might have said that we would never admit Japan to friendship, and that Germany would never again be welcomed back into the family of nations. Events change thinking, but with the world situation what it is I believe that Canada would take a retrograde step should the government feel constrained to recognize China at this time.

That was our attitude then; that is our attitude on this problem now.

Many Canadians were concerned by reports of statements the Prime Minister was presumed to have made on the question of recognition on his world tour. Those words of his, as reported, were incapable of any other interpretation than that given to them by Canadians generally.

Referring to a press report, I find this:

> "We are going to have to admit the present government of China is the government the people want."

Many Canadians took strong objection to that statement. The Prime Minister today has rather altered the interpretation of his remarks on recognition of Red China as spoken by him on two or three occasions during his trip. If his predecessor were in office, I presume, applying the words used on another occasion, the Prime Minister's stand today would be: Not necessarily recognition, but recognition if necessary.

I say to the Prime Minister, that in the words he was reported to have said he could not but have given encouragement to the forces in Red China. The expression of the hope that in the future recognition would be inevitable could not but have the effect of arousing hopes in the hearts and removing the fears of those in control in Red China that whatever their further aggressive action might be that ultimate recognition would be given.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Those words could not have failed to be effective in arousing hopes in Red China that, however unfair and unjust her aggression has been—and is—in Indo-China and elsewhere, ultimately recognition would be granted. And we cannot separate recognition from admission to the United Nations. For, after all, once recognition by Canada takes place, according to the juridical principles of international law, Red China will then be in a position where she will be able to demand admission into the United Nations, or at least anticipate the support of Canada for admission.

My belief is that no international thug should be allowed to shoot its way into the United Nations. Apparently, today the Prime Minister now has taken a stand that is more generally in line with the view that we in the official opposition have taken in the past and adhere to still. No one can say that never will any eventuality take place. As the Prime Minister said, every possibility must be exhausted to the end that peace be achieved. But certainly such possibilities should not contemplate anything in the nature of raising hopes in the hearts of an aggressor nation like China that ultimately out of victory may come admission to the United Nations.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) will deal with this question at greater length when he speaks in this debate. But the views that I expressed in a previous debate on behalf of this party in respect of the recognition of China have not changed, namely that we do not believe there is any case made out for the recognition of China. As future events occur, they will be dealt with as occasion arises. Sufficient unto the day—and we do not intend to hold out any hope to Red China that at some time in the future we will support recognition.

We believe that in a changing world there is no justification for dealing with future eventualities which may be years ahead of conditions prevailing now. We believe that no recognition should be considered, much less contemplated, by the Canadian people now.

I shall now refer to various matters raised by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I shall deal with them in the order in which he did as closely as I could follow them. Before doing so I wish to make reference to the Prime Minister's trip. I did hope that he would have dealt with the eastern situation; and I would hope that at an early date he will place before parliament his considered opinions regarding eastern questions in general rather than restricting his remarks to the question of the recognition of China.

In my opinion the pilgrimage of the Prime Minister was of unique significance. He went with the good wishes of the House of Commons; he has returned with the same good wishes. He met and talked with leaders in various countries of the commonwealth. He represented Canada, and placed before various nations of the world a concept of the responsibilities and mission of Canada in the world of today.

I think trips such as he took, and as have been taken by other prime ministers in the commonwealth, have an abiding effect in the world in which the major strategy of the U.S.S.R. is to undermine the objective unity of the peoples of the commonwealth, and to drive a wedge between some of them and the United States of America. Without regard to party considerations, when he pointed out the contribution of the United States of America, and when he endeavoured to counteract what has become a strong anti-American feeling in some parts of the world, he performed a service worthy of this parliament.

I refer particularly to the words he used when he spoke before the parliament of India and said:

> We who live alongside this great and dynamic nation know from our own long experience that the United States is the most unselfish country ever to play this role, and that it has no other ambition than to live, and let others live, in mutually helpful international intercourse.
>
> As their neighbours, we have special reason to know and appreciate the qualities of the American people. We in Canada see millions of good people who are working hard and unselfishly to build a good and free society in a world of peace. These people differ little in their essential qualities from the great majority of people in your country or in mine . . .

I believe that that message is necessary. Sir Winston Churchill expressed analogous views when he spoke in the British House of Commons on February 1. There are some "who are always looking around in every controversy...to find fault with the Americans".

That type of anti-American attitude is a detriment to the maintenance of world peace. I do not mean that we should agree with or accept everything the United States may do. Indeed, in so far as Mr. Dulles' declaration in regard to retaliatory action is concerned, that declaration, in my opinion, was dangerous in its implications, and I am glad to learn from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada has taken a firm stand against the automatic reflex policy that was enunciated by the Secretary of State of the United States.

Canadians will not consent to be committed to war on any snap decision made by another country. The Dulles' statement that communism should be met "instantly" with weapons at the place of choice seemed to me to be dangerous in its implications. However, these implications have been watered down by the President's statement that congress must decide, and by Mr. Dulles' statement at a recent press conference which interpreted the meaning of that policy. The secretary of state has said that consultation is necessary. We have learned that within the commonwealth, and that is something that must be learned by the free nations of the world, joined together in a common endeavour and in common ideals.

As the Prime Minister travelled throughout the commonwealth I am sure he must have been impressed by the tremendous power for good inherent in this commonwealth, by the bridgehead it constitutes in Asia against communism, and by the contribution being made by the United States of America in co-operation with the countries of the commonwealth in the preservation of peace.

I came on a constitutional document recently which represents a condition of affairs which is of interest. Our commonwealth is built on a concept of generations of political wisdom based on the trial and error of experience and culminating in the Statute of Westminster. Few Canadians—indeed few Americans, realize that in the year 1775, on July 3, the first pronouncement ever made in all history of the spirit of co-operation and unity with independence then contained therein the embodiment of the commonwealth principles of this day.

In the course of casual reading I came upon a document which was presented to George III in 1775. After the battles of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, a document was signed which, as Mr. Butler, late president of Columbia University, said, is not known to one out of every million inhabitants of the United States. That document represents the attitude of the American colonies. They sent representatives to Britain to present this document to George III. It is rather a lengthy document and I do not wish to quote from it, but in it they asked for the very principles which were ultimately achieved in the Statute of Westminster. They asked for the right to legislate for the 13 colonies without interference by the mother country; they contended that taxation should be applicable to the 13 colonies only if passed by their governments. That document was signed by 45 of the representatives who one year later signed the Declaration of Independence, with the exception of George Washington.

The British king refused to see these representatives and subsequently they went before the colonial office, but because it had not been presented to the king they refused to see the representatives of the 13 colonies or give any consideration to that petition. What these representatives, headed by John Hancock who was the first to sign, petitioned for is what has since been achieved within the commonwealth, under the crown: a unity, based on a common heritage, and a common dedication to democratic principles, and the acceptance of the principle that each of the member nations would be master in its own house. When considering the "ifs" of history, if that petition had been accepted the history of mankind might have been very different, for in the year 1775 there was embodied in that petition to the king the vital principles upon which the commonwealth is now based, and the principles upon which we are joined together in the common pursuit for freedom.

The Prime Minister in the statements he made, when speaking in India and in other parts of the commonwealth, asking that the United States be fairly judged, performed a function that only Canada could perform.

The Prime Minister made an explanation of some of his reported remarks during his tour. I hope he will explain what he had in mind when speaking in Bonn. He went further, I believe, than any prime minister has ever gone, and suggested that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries might join together in a political organization. I would ask the Prime Minister to advise the house and the country at some time during the debate what, if any, negotiations have taken place to this end, and what ideas he has as to the machinery of government which would permit political collaboration as between Canada and the other NATO countries. These are his words:

> More particularly, many of us believe the peoples living about the great basin of the Atlantic ocean might well seek the solution to their problems of economic betterment, political stability and self-defence in this closer integration of their national resources and of their machinery and government.

Parliament has discussed integration of economic resources and the pooling relationship of member nations in NATO. But until the speech delivered by the Prime Minister nowhere have I heard it suggested that the NATO organization might lead to political integration. I feel that his remarks are somewhat ambiguous in their nature, and deserve to be interpreted and explained so that we may understand exactly what are the implications in that statement.

I return to the matters dealt with by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He dealt first with the Berlin conference and pointed out his apparent disappointment at its failure to agree to do anything but disagree and to convene a conference in Geneva. I feel that Molotov, by the propaganda speeches he made, succeeded in part in achieving what the minister stated above everything else should be prevented, namely, the driving of any wedge of disunity between the members of the NATO nations.

Each of the free nations must realize that the price of survival for each of us is the unity of all of us. Today, according to the press, the effectiveness of the U.S.S.R. propaganda would appear to be achieved to a degree for France, reliant, powerful and vital at the Berlin conference, as represented by Mr. Bidault, being fearful of a rearmed Germany, is in a position where the European defence community treaty, which has been ratified in recent weeks by several countries, stands in grave danger.

The New York Times service today says that France's foreign policy in Europe and Asia appears to be stalled because the French government feels unable to bring the European army treaty to a vote with any chance of success and that the supporters of General de Gaulle, most of whom oppose the European army, have acquired a virtual veto power over any action that might be taken by the present government. France fears, and rightly, from the experience of eighty years and three wars, the rearmament of Germany. United States and Britain favour Germany entering the plan and in order to arrive at a compromise suggested that the rearmament clause should not come into effect until each one of the signatory nations had signed and agreed to the treaty.

Suggestions are being made—and I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs used words that indicate that alternatives are being considered—that there are alternatives to the EDC which are available and ready to meet the contingencies which will arise in the event that EDC is not ratified. The secretary of state said in effect that we hope ere long the EDC or "something like it" will come into existence. It might be well for the minister, when replying, to place before the house and the country something of the nature of the alternatives which will be available to the nations joined together under the European defence community if and provided that ratification by France and by Italy of the present plan does not take place. Two months ago the minister spoke with a degree of hope that the Berlin conference might achieve something worth while, but his speech today indicated the failure of that conference. It seems that in the last year there has been a softening of the probability of war in a defrosted stalemate of the cold war.

What is the alternative to EDC? The New York Times has referred to an alternative plan to EDC on a number of occasions, but that alternative has not yet been placed before this House of Commons. I would ask the minister to set out in detail the meaning of the words he used this afternoon wherein he indicated that if EDC failed, some alternative would be available.

I come now to the question of atomic energy. The minister's remarks with regard to atomic energy indicated that no decision has been arrived at; he posed questions that indicated that the whole question is in a state of "questions unanswered". All of the nations have expressed a desire to do everything possible to avoid the possibility of atomic war. The powerful potentialities inherent in the explosion that took place in the Pacific within the last few days, and which apparently frightened not only the peoples of the world but the scientists as well, demand action in connection with atomic energy.

I should like the minister when replying to answer certain questions. What are our international obligations at the present time with regard to extending present knowledge of atomic energy along the lines of making industry a partner in its development? What are the terms under which an atomic pool is to be set up? What agency is to control the atomic pool? Is that agency to be within the United Nations? Is it to be a veto-less agency so that it will not be emasculated before it is set up? Who is to determine the nations that are to contribute to that pool? Those are questions to which I think the people have a right to have answers even before the general set-up enters the blueprint stage.

Is Canada giving consideration to the British plan as an alternative to the Eisenhower plan whereby an international bank would be set up in which materials and scientists would be available in every country possessing fissionable materials and scientists? Would such an organization be set up separate from the United Nations or within its ambit? These are questions which today exercise the hearts and minds of men, realizing as they do the terrible possibilities of that new hydrogen bomb with the explosive capacity, according to press reports, of four million tons of TNT. Is the minister in a position to say the degree to which the U.S.S.R. has tentatively agreed with Mr. Dulles to certain principles being accepted and adopted to the end that mass destruction of mankind will be avoided and prevented?

One other question was dealt with in January to which the minister has made no reference and which I think comes peculiarly within his competence. It is one that has been spoken of spasmodically in the house, namely, to what degree is Canada willing to trade with the U.S.S.R.? The minister stated today that no possibilities for peace should be denied. I think that Canadians will be in agreement that the proferred hand of friendship in trade should not be turned down without reason. But the experience of the last few years is bound to raise in the minds of those to whom the hand is extended the fear that deception and fraud and not honesty are behind the moves being made by the U.S.S.R. in offering to trade.

There has been little change in the attitude of the U.S.S.R. in the last year. Many felt that after Malenkov came into power things would change for the better. Purges are taking place today on an even greater scale, so far as their leadership is concerned, than during the last several years of the Stalin regime. Stalin's summary of diplomacy still remains as true under Malenkov as it did when he stated that "sincere diplomacy is no more possible than dry water or iron wood."

The people in the western provinces and farmers generally in this country are asking what are the possibilities for agricultural trade. Some argue trade with the U.S.S.R. would afford a means of getting rid of our surplus farm products. What is the attitude of the government with regard to this question? Has the government ascertained, through its representatives in the U.S.S.R., that while industrialization has proceeded apace under the five-year plans agriculture has proven to be a failure? Collectivization in agriculture, according to opinion worthy to judge, has failed in the U.S.S.R. because the vitality of individual effort has been squeezed out by communization.

Records published within the last four or five weeks show that between 1945 and 1952 industrial production in the U.S.S.R. has multiplied. As examples of this, pig iron has increased from 9 million metric tons to 19·4 million; steel from 11 million to 27·3 million tons; coal from 14·9 to 26 million tons, and oil from 19·4 to 37·8 million tons. While all these advances have been taking place industrially agricultural production has fallen to a level below that of 1928. In the U.S.S.R. cattle production is at least 13 million head below what it was in 1928, and sheep production is approximately 80 million head less than in 1928. So diminished has agricultural production become that at the present time the U.S.S.R. is mobilizing manpower in order to farm an additional 30 million acres.

These statistics indicate that one of the reasons the U.S.S.R. is so anxious to trade is on account of the difficulties inherent in potential hunger in that country, for not only is production far below the 1928 level but the population during the same time has materially increased. I hope and trust that in return for the benefits of the present that are apparent in finding markets for surpluses Canada will not rush into trade with the U.S.S.R. and will give every consideration to the perilous possibilities inherent in contributing in meeting ferment in the Soviet Union to which the Kremlin has found no better answer than more repression and the tyranny of purges.

Summarizing what I have endeavoured to place before the house, I agree with the stand taken by the minister that no nation among the free nations should take a stand which will in any way detrimentally affect any of the other nations in the partnership without consultation, and without full consultation. Canada has a right to have an assurance from Mr. Dulles and the government of the United States more definite and more complete than the conclusions to be drawn from the words used by him regarding mass retaliation instantly to be applied, during the occasion of a press conference.

I think Canadians will expect that the minister at the Geneva conference will not in any way indicate to Red China the hope of early recognition, but will demand the fullest assurances that aggression will be banished by it. As to the question of trade, I fear that the economic advantages of the present will lure many to believe in the necessity or at least in the attractiveness of trade with the U.S.S.R. on the assumption that we can restrict the things in which we trade to non-strategic commodities. In my opinion there is no more strategic commodity in the world than the production of agriculture, for after all, as I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) found as he travelled in Asia, the H weapon of communism in Asia is hunger.

Finally, I think the house and the country will agree with the view expressed by him with respect to the need of extending economic aid. Canada's record in this regard under the Colombo plan has not been as extensive and complete as the challenge of the times demand. Twenty-five million dollars is scarcely in keeping with the challenging possibilities in Asia. Twenty-five million dollars is but a drop in the bucket. It is a token amount and does not indicate the necessary degree of comprehension of the possibilities of economic aid in halting the advance of communism.

So far as the other matters dealt with by the minister are concerned, several members of this party will speak, and in particular the Leader of the Opposition who will speak with the authority of his position. Let this be clear that upon one thing we are agreed, that this is no time to play with the problem of recognition of China. This is no time to give a fillip to communism in Asia by giving communism to believe that aggression will, if not rewarded, at least will be considered as worthy of recognition in the international world of the present.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this debate has given hon. members the opportunity this afternoon of hearing both the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and I feel that a debate of this description, when the external affairs estimates are being sent to the committee, serves a very useful purpose. In the debate which took place at the end of January various groups in the house were able to express some of their opinions. I am quite sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister are cognizant of these facts.

All parties in this house believe that we must continue to co-operate with our friends to promote collective security in every sphere possible. I join with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I am sure the Prime Minister as well, in saying that if we are to have collective security and are going to have collective action following that collective security, whether it be economic action or any other form of action, then that collective action must be preceded by comprehensive consultation.

It is for that reason that I think most people in this house and in the country who were following international affairs closely were alarmed at the statement attributed to Mr. Dulles. I join with others in saying that the clarification the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been able to place before the house this afternoon is encouraging and helps to remove some of the misgivings. It sometimes seems to me in dealing with our powerful neighbour to the south there are so many views expressed by so many different people it is difficult at times to tell what the view of the United States government really is. Fortunately, we have not the same system in our country. Here, we have collective responsibility on the part of the cabinet and consequently we know from time to time where the government stands on these important matters.

I, too, join with others in regretting that the Berlin conference was not more successful in bringing about a peace treaty for Germany and in bringing peace to Austria. I agree that it is essential that Germany shall sooner or later be unified. I agree also it could not be unified on the basis suggested by the Soviet union. One of the first prerequisites to the unification of Germany is that the German people should be able to choose their own government freely in a democratic way. I believe that goes almost without saying. I hope that the forthcoming conference at Geneva will bring some real results. My criticism of the government from time to time has been one that I am going to repeat this afternoon.

I feel that from time to time the government does not take a sufficiently positive attitude in connection with some of these matters. We seem to drift along. Before the first world war, and at least to some extent before the second world war, we rather blindly followed the foreign policy laid down in the United Kingdom. It seems to me we have got to beware now lest in our friendliness for the United States and our admiration for the people of the United States we allow ourselves to be in the position of a follower of United States external policy. I believe we have to beware lest we fall into that trap. It is so easy, with a country with contiguous boundaries and in some respects with the same kind of institutions and approaches to problems, to follow along rather than from time to time take a positive position and be outspoken. The Secretary of State for External Affairs did perform a useful service both to this country and the democratic nations when he spoke at Chicago recently and made the statements and the criticisms that he made there.

May I come at once to this question of the recognition of China. Hon. members know that in 1949, before the Korean aggression, our view was that we should have recognized the fact there was a government in control of the mainland of China. It was at that time the United Kingdom and India both recognized that fact. I was under the impression then we were about to do the same thing, but we did not do it. Then aggression occurred in Korea a few months later. I quite agree that when there was a Chinese army actively fighting in Korea the recognition of the government at Peking was out of the question at that time. Now, however, an armistice has been signed and we are going to negotiate with that government. We are going to negotiate with their representatives.

If I had been building up the case for the recognition of this new government of China, I could not have done better than the Prime Minister did this afternoon. He marshalled all the arguments in favour of the recognition of the government of China because as he said, whether or not we like that government —and I do not like its ideology—we have to recognize as a fact that is the government with which we have to do business. It does control the mainland of China. How it controls the mainland of China is a different question. From time to time we have recognized revolutionary governments. Some of them have been communist governments, and as an example I cite the government of the Soviet union.

You have a government in control of the Chinese mainland, with its teeming millions, with whom we are going to negotiate at Geneva, and yet we say we do not recognize the fact that government is there and in control. While I think we should make it abundantly clear that we do not agree with the ideology or the method of achieving power adopted by that government, nonetheless we recognize we have to negotiate with it and we recognize that government is a fact, whether or not we like it. Consequently, without approving of the government, its ideology or anything else connected with it, and having to negotiate with it, I think that by inference negotiation is a recognition of the fact that it is the government of the mainland of China. I thought this afternoon the Prime Minister built up a very strong case for recognition and then he rather shrugged his shoulders and backed away from it.

Let us hope that the danger of the extension of the war in Asia is lessening. Let us hope that the tension in the world has decreased. I believe there are signs that it has. It seems to me that anything Canada can do to reduce the remaining tensions, and they are many, we should undertake. It was for that reason that I rose this afternoon to ask the Prime Minister about the reported statement he had made concerning United States military aid to Pakistan. After all, the position in India was quite clear. Mr. Nehru and the government of India were alarmed lest this might be an armament of Pakistan that would cause greater tension between the two countries, though not necessarily leading to hostilities between them.

It seems to me we have got to pay all the attention we can to the opinion of some of these Asian countries. It is there we find the teeming millions for whose minds, and whose souls if you like, there is a struggle going on in the world today. Anything that the United States or any of the western powers do that alienates public opinion amongst these teeming millions in Asia, and perhaps particularly in India, is a danger to the future welfare of mankind.

I want to say a word about something mentioned by my hon. friend and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, namely, the alarm that has been caused generally all over the world by the events of March 1, when this great new hydrogen bomb was exploded in the Pacific ocean. Indeed, we are told that within the course of the next month or so it is planned to explode a hydrogen bomb with power some four times as great as the bomb that was exploded on March 1. Editorials are appearing today—one of them was mentioned over the air—in some of the great British papers as well as in Bonn and in France and in our own papers, pleading with the United States not to carry out that plan. Already the view is taken that the United States' scientists should know enough about this terrific weapon, which in the words of Mr. Eisenhower yesterday seems to have got out of hand, to be warned that dreadful results might follow the explosion of a bomb four times as powerful as the one that was exploded less than a month ago.

In the Globe and Mail of today there is a very significant editorial; in fact it is one of the strongest editorials in its language that I have read in any Canadian paper for a long time. While frequently I disagree with the editorials in the Globe and Mail, yet I feel that this editorial does bring before the government a problem upon which the government might feel constrained to speak, I mean to speak through the usual diplomatic channels to our friends in the United States. I say: "Our friends in the United States". I do not think that some of the people in the United States who are so outspoken and belligerent represent the people of the United States. In the main the people of the United States are, as the Prime Minister said in Pakistan, a friendly people, generous in every particular, and they are no more desirous of causing international tensions, difficulties and war than any of the rest of the peaceful nations of the world. We owe a great debt to that type of United States citizen, who from time to time has taken the lead in relieving distress here and there across the world.

I do not regard Senator McCarthy and some of the other people in the United States as representatives of that great country, but I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, since we have a long coast line on the Pacific we should be interested in what is going on in that ocean. I propose to read just a paragraph or two from this editorial to indicate the things that I think are pretty widely held, following the events of recent days and the explosion of this powerful weapon. This is what the editorial says. Incidentally, it is headed: "Not an American lake", and by coincidence, I am sure, the London Daily Herald, so the radio said today, has a front-page editorial headed with exactly the same words: "Not an American lake". The first paragraph reads:

> It is no doubt necessary and desirable that American technicians should discover by trial or error the explosive power of the latest type of atom bomb or hydrogen bomb. Science, if the invention of these new atrocities can be dignified by the name, must proceed without interruption even though it may cause discomfort here or there. Still, it seems reasonable to suggest that the American experimenters should pay some regard to the lives, health and livelihood of people who may be within range of their infernal machine, an antique phrase which has acquired a new aptness.

Then the editorial goes on to outline the effect of this new bomb upon Japanese fishermen in the vicinity, 70 miles away. Some stories tell us today that the lives of these men are in danger. After going on and outlining what happened to the Japanese the editorial says this:

> It is reported from Washington, and to a large extent confirmed by President Eisenhower himself, that something went seriously wrong with the Bikini experiment; that the results of the blast were much greater, and extended much further, than anybody expected. How long can the world tolerate these lethal antics?

These are strong words but they are words that are deserved. Then, after explaining that some warning was given to ships in the vicinity, it says this:

> Since when has the Pacific ocean become an American lake?

I am not going to read much more of it. It is all along the same line, and it ends up in this way:

> It is fantastic that in peacetime the United States should expect other countries to concede an American right to rope off a vast section of the high seas, in the Pacific or anywhere else, for the purpose of producing explosions.

The editorial also draws to our attention that even in the heyday of British naval power, when people used to sing with gusto: "Britannia, rule the waves", never did they try to rope off an area of the great oceans for any of their purposes.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government should make immediate representations to the United States, urging the United States not to undertake these experiments in the Pacific ocean. The editorial suggests that other areas of the world might be found; for example, the Antarctic region or the far-distant Arctic regions, and it says that perhaps it might serve some useful purpose in melting some of the ice in these regions. But in any event it is certain that the world is revolted by what has happened in the Pacific ocean and is alarmed lest a further experiment with dire results should be undertaken.

This brings to my mind the peril to the world that a new war would bring. That is why I suggested when I spoke in the external affairs debate in January that no matter how small the area of negotiation would seem to be that was possible upon which to negotiate with those behind the iron curtain or in the communist countries, we should negotiate with them. I was very glad indeed, although the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) spanked me for saying that on January 29, that the hon. member for Prince Albert made the suggestion in another form when he said that if the hand is stretched out we should grasp it to the extent that we can do so. That was a good way of putting it. I think we should.

As far as the areas of negotiation are concerned, they may be very small, but every small dispute that is settled may be a step toward a better understanding. Let us remember that over the centuries our forefathers faced situations of this sort. You have only to read the speeches in the Hansard of Britain, following the French revolution, to learn that very much the same kind of things were said then that are being said today in relation to recognizing and trying to negotiate with iron curtain countries. When Cromwell was in power in England, and executed a British king, some of the things that were said at that time by the countries adjacent to Britain of the regicide and of all that he stood for could be used today in this house very much along the lines that such words were used at that time.

So we must not forget that we have to view these events somewhat in the perspective of history. We have got to try to settle disputes; we have got to live with these people—or we have got to exterminate them, or they have got to exterminate us. I say we have to live with them. And, step by step, perchance, as in centuries before, gradually they may come to a more reasonable attitude and a more democratic way of doing things. We may be able to associate with them on a better footing.

I wanted to say those things this afternoon. Then, as I said a moment ago, we have to think of what war would mean to this country, if it came. We hear the belligerent statement made at times: "You must not deal with these people, under any circumstances; you must keep them apart." What is the effect of that? Well, the end of that, I suppose, is war. And if there is one country just now which has a stake in the peaceful negotiation and peaceful settlement of differences between these giants, if you like, the United States and the Soviet union—the two sides in this cold war—certainly it is Canada. We lie between them. With the dreadful weapons of war now available we know what the end would be of some of our Canadian cities.

This is not the place for me to question what means of defence we have. I do not know. This House of Commons does not know. We do know we are spending great sums of money on defence, but we do not know what those defences are. I am one who believes that under certain circumstances either the House of Commons or a committee of the House of Commons should sit in camera and be informed. I do not know whether we have an effective radar screen; I do not know whether we have effective interceptor aircraft. I know we have sent a lot of them overseas; but what have we here in Canada? What would we have if there were an outbreak of hostilities?

It may be said that I do not expect an outbreak of hostilities. No, I do not; but, like everybody else, I am human, and my judgment may be at fault. It has been at fault before, and it will be at fault again. That applies to every human being in the world; and we cannot pass up any opportunities to see that our country is properly looked after.

This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned the European defence community. I, too, am disturbed by some of the reports coming out from Paris respecting the political difficulties in that country, and the fact that the government is unable to get any decision one way or another from the legislative arm of government in that great country. But, Mr. Speaker, I have a very considerable amount of sympathy with France in the position she is taking at the present time. For after all we have to remember that in the 25 years between 1914 and 1939 or 1940, France was invaded twice by Germany. She was overrun twice; the flower of her manhood was destroyed in war. Her age-old monuments and many of her churches were destroyed; her countryside was ravished. Her people were brought into subjection by a powerful Germany.

I can understand the French position. I can understand the French, when they see these pressures put on them to co-operate and to allow Germany to rearm. I can understand their being in mortal terror of what may come to them in the future if Germany does rearm. And when we read, as no doubt they have read, that many of the leading nazis are taking active parts both in government and in urging rearmament in that country, we can understand why it is so difficult to achieve this European defence community.

I am personally of the opinion—in fact I believe I speak for my colleagues in this regard—that we cannot see an independent, rearmed Germany. We cannot see a German army, under a German general staff, not only because of the danger to France but because of the danger to the world—and because of our experience in two wars.

Of course we cannot forever expect the western powers to defend western Germany. If plans can be devised to integrate German manpower into a western army, but not under German military control or under former nazi officers or non-commissioned officers, then of course there is a possibility of finding a way out. But so far as we are concerned, there can be no question that we do not go along with the idea that there should be a German army, under German control, integrated into the European community defence system.

That, I think, is the fear of France. And I think France has another fear, too: that if you build up a German army in western Germany, the day may come when the army that has been built up in eastern Germany may join with the one in the west and, once again, we will see a powerful military machine in the very heart of Europe, ready to take sides, and, perchance, to take sides with the nation that will give the best deal, if that best deal would promote the interests of a new German nation. So when we are talking about the European defence community do not let us be impatient with France. Because, as I said, I have very considerable sympathy for the French point of view in this regard.

Then I should like to say just a few words about trade. Mention has been made of this subject this afternoon. I think whenever opportunities for trade present themselves we should take those opportunities, provided, of course, that it is not trade, from our side at least, in strategic materials. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Prince Albert at least by inference describe food as a strategic material. I would not deny the people of Russia food, if they were starving; neither would I deny food to the people of any other country. Food is a strategic material—and perhaps the hon. member meant it this way—in the sense that we should be using our great surplus of food so that it can be placed in the Far East, or elsewhere, to help assuage the hunger of the people in those areas.

But, in the connection in which it was used, it certainly gave me the other impression. I think whenever we can trade with China, or with the Soviet union, or with Czechoslovakia, or those other countries, we should do so. We trade with Spain, and Spain is a pretty complete dictatorship, achieved by revolution. There is very little freedom for the people in Spain, but we do not hear much about that. There is very little freedom of thought in that country under General Franco. But we trade with Spain. Indeed, we do not ask, in many parts of the world, when it comes to a matter of trading relationships, what kind of governments they have. After all, trade may lead us to a better understanding.

And I am not afraid of these people. I think that if democracy means anything to me, then it means that we have something better than communism can ever offer us. I am not afraid of it. I am not afraid when it is suggested that we get a few musicians in here to play their music in Canada. Surely to goodness we need not be afraid of a few musicians who would bring their instruments into this country. In Great Britain they are not afraid. Surely, with the same type of democratic institutions and the same type of democratic people, we do not have to be afraid of allowing a group of musicians into our country to play for us or to dance for us, or something of that sort.

Indeed, cultural relationships may assist very greatly in bringing about understanding, because art and music are not things of a national type. These are international things and perhaps we can speak, through music and art—

Mr. MacInnis: You know what the Scots did to the English with the bagpipes.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, of course, under our old Tariff Act the bagpipes were never regarded as an instrument of music; they were regarded as an instrument of war. At times, I believe, they were a very effective instrument of war. I see some Scotsmen in the house looking rather sternly in my direction. I can assure them that if I said anything offensive I quickly apologize and withdraw, because I have a very great admiration for my Scottish friends. After all, they have ruled my fellow countrymen for some generations and we have not done too badly under their rule.

But I wish to say, as I have so often said in the past during debates of this kind, that I believe the most potent weapon we could use in defeating totalitarianism, whether of the fascist or communist variety, is the weapon of technical and economic aid. I believe we can do more through these channels to raise the standard of living in many countries than we have done in the past. The hon. member for Prince Albert recognized this afternoon that poverty provides the seed-bed for communism, as it did for fascism between the two wars when fascism gained control in Italy and nazism gained control in Germany. They gained control in these two countries largely because of the mass unemployment, and the suffering and poverty which existed in these countries. History can repeat itself in many parts of the world, and in these countries again, not so much in Germany now, but particularly in Italy. And it can certainly repeat itself in the Far East.

I believe more can be done through the United Nations organizations in giving technical aid. I would like to see our appropriation much greater than it is at present. After all, the total appropriation for the United Nations technical aid is less than the appropriation we make under the Colombo plan. That is not a reflection on the United Nations, but I believe we are not appropriating enough even under the Colombo plan to do the kind of job we are doing.

I have said this so often that I hesitate to repeat it. But in this battle for the minds of men it is vital that human welfare and human freedom should be safeguarded, for in this battle the hydrogen and atomic bomb will not settle the matter, nor will it be settled on the battlefields of the world by armies with tanks. It will be settled ultimately to the extent that we can bring not only Christian principles to bear, but the principles of all great religions, the principle that this is a great human brotherhood and that it is our duty to raise the standard of living and to assist the welfare of mankind wherever mankind may be.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, do you wish to call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on January 29 I spoke at some length in the external affairs debate that was launched by the minister on that date. I then gave a fairly full statement of our position with regard to the important issues confronting Canada and the free world. Consequently I would not feel that it would be necessary for me to speak at any length tonight. Nor do I propose to repeat the things which I said on that earlier occasion. There are, however, some matters that have been raised by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) today, one by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and some by the leader of the C.C.F. with which I should like to deal briefly.

I always hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to speak on some of the complex international problems because most of us really know little about them except, of course, what we read in the papers and magazines; and if we followed them too closely I suppose we would find ourselves in the same kind of trouble as that in which the Prime Minister found himself, and more often. I look upon the views that we read in the papers only as the expressions of opinions of men. They are not supposed to be facts. One of the best evidences in the world that they are not facts is that I find them to be so much at variance with one another; and because they are at variance it is dreadfully hard to get at the truth. The situation is so confused and so full of emotional hysteria that one is apt to find himself blown this way or that by the winds of controversial doctrine into worse confusion if he is not on his toes.

We ordinary members of the house have not much fundamental and reliable information upon which to base judgment about some of the complicated phases of world affairs. We can hardly be expected to have those facts until we are given a chance to question the minister and his officials from the external affairs department who are called before us in the external affairs committee. That is why I welcome the reference of the departmental estimates to the committee. In that committee we have a chance to get some facts, explanations and expert opinions to go on. I only wish we could have these debates after we have finished with that committee. However, on an occasion like this when it was necessary to create an occasion on which could be made an important statement like the one made by the Prime Minister today, I cannot blame anyone for bringing on the debate.

The only alternative, of course, that we ordinary members have—and I say "alternative"—to the inquiries that can be held in the external affairs committee, would be to travel widely, to go to the countries involved in the world problems and have firsthand inquiry to find out for ourselves if we can. But we cannot all go on extended journeys. Consequently we are obliged to depend on the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his officials to give us as truthful a picture as they can of affairs so that we can form some kind of balanced judgment when it comes time to make decisions.

I listened attentively today to the minister as well as to the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the C.C.F. I am not being overly critical at all when I say this, but as I listened to the minister's speech I certainly could not help feeling that it was a very melancholy one. In fact, he used that very term to describe the outcome of the Berlin conference. There seems to be little light at the other end of the tunnel when the minister, to use his own words, feels it necessary to warn the Canadian people that it is a melancholy fact that in the world in which we live it is a step forward to remove false hopes. When we have to restrain undue optimism—and there again I think I am using a term that the minister used this afternoon—about a conference like the Berlin conference about which very few thinking people, if any at all, had any optimism, then I think that things are not very bright, to put it more conservatively than even my friend the leader of the official opposition would express it.

There seems to be little or no change in the basic foreign policy objectives of the Soviet union. The minister reiterated that statement this afternoon. On the earlier occasion I think he made the statement almost in the same words. As a consequence, I think we should never lose sight of that important fact. We should also never lose sight of the fact that the objective of the Soviet union is to confuse the nations of the world; to break up alliances of free nations; to turn allies against one another; to sow the seeds of suspicion, hatred, bitterness, strife, discord and hysteria amongst people everywhere and to promote conditions which would make it possible for them, when they think the time is right—and when I say "they", I speak of the communist imperialists—to walk in, take over and dominate the world by force. Let us never forget that purpose that was described to us by the minister on other occasions and reiterated this afternoon.

I think we must also always bear in mind the fact that there are in the world only about five million members of the communist party. Sometimes we overlook that fact. There are not more than five million, at any rate, if there are that many. They think they are working for communism. They are dominated, led and trained, not by communists but by diabolical fascist dictators who are nothing but imps of satan who have convinced their followers that men are gods and that, as gods, they can remake the world. That fact accounts for the zeal they portray. That fact tells us why they are ready to work twenty-four hours a day if need be in order to achieve their ends; and they do it in many countries, including our own. Just think of it! There are only five million communist zealots but there are hundreds of millions of freedom-loving people who are carrying the yoke of these evil men; and these hundreds of millions of freedom-loving people are living for the day when they can once more be free. Let us never overlook that fact.

This afternoon the C.C.F. leader said that we have got to live with the communists. I ask, "Is that right"? He says that the only alternative is to exterminate them or to be exterminated. In the light of these things, what should our policy be? Should it be our policy to resign ourselves to the hopeless future of trying to live with the devil himself? Or should it be to take the view that we must keep alive everywhere the spirit and the will to freedom and to look forward with faith and confidence to the day when the people of every subjugated nation will rise up and throw off the yoke of bondage.

Of course it would mean the extermination of the venal tormentors and betrayers of humanity. Certainly it would, but better a few men should perish than that the whole earth should waste. We have to keep that in mind. I have not heard any sorrow expressed over the fact that the present regime in China has exterminated so many helpless freedom-loving Chinese people. I have in my hand a copy of the March 20 issue of the Ensign and I should like to quote one or two extracts from an article entitled "Reds See China as Springboard" specially written for the Ensign. I particularly want to quote some words of Dr. Stephen C. Y. Pan, who is director of the institute of Far Eastern studies at Seton Hall College, New Jersey. I take it that a man who is director of Far Eastern studies in a university of the calibre of Seton Hall would know something about the Far East and would have some idea what he is talking about. At any rate, he said:

> The bamboo curtain is not too impregnable and those of us who have contacts inside China today do not have too much difficulty in knowing what is happening there, even if one cannot do much to help the people at the moment.

He went on to say:

> The reasons why it is obvious that big things are planned for the very near future in China are ten in number and are based on the most recent information from China itself.

Then he lists the ten reasons, but I am not going to weary the house by repeating them. I was more interested in two or three very short extracts concerning conditions inside China. He said:

> North America is still dreaming that time is on the side of the United States and Canada. It is definitely on the side of those who can use it and every indication exists that Moscow is using every second in really building up one of the world's most formidable military forces ever in existence in Asia.

He went on to say:

> To talk of a defection of Mao Tse-tung from Moscow is another dangerous dream and delusion. Mao has to go with Moscow because he has betrayed his people and therefore can no longer go with the Chinese. Besides, he is a sick man and of comparatively little importance except as a figure-head. The real power is the viceroy of Moscow in Manchuria, Kao Kang.

Then I should like to read the final paragraph, and I want hon. members to listen to it particularly. Dr. Pan said:

> Incidentally, the figure given by the United States state department that the communists have killed 15 million Chinese since taking over is an understatement. Why not take Chou En-lai's own figures? He stated last year that no less than 30 million "imperialists, landlords, counter-revolutionaries, spies and the like" have been liquidated. He should know.

I quote these words of Dr. Pan to indicate to the house the kind of liquidation that goes on within communist countries. When we think in terms of what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said this afternoon, that we have to live with them, I ask hon. members whether the alternative of liquidating those who are perpetrating this thing upon mankind or to be liquidated would be such a terrible future to contemplate compared with the future that these Chinese people have to contemplate. I repeat that we must keep alive the spirit of freedom everywhere, and by everything we do and say to hold out hope that one day men in these subjugated nations can again be free. We may have to bide our time in some respects, but the issue is as clear as day and the outcome, in my judgment, as sure as life itself.

There are flames that can lick the iron curtain and the bamboo curtain and any other curtain that may be put up by evil men. All men of good will readily admit that they are against grafters, gangsters and communists. They will admit that, but I say that it is not enough just to be against evil. I am with those who say that the only thing for us to do is to be for the answer to evil. If we are going to be for it we cannot just sit by and say: Oh well, we will have to live with it. Not by any means.

To me the answer is not one great big blazing action, such as might be brought on by atomic war, but many little actions, perhaps millions of them, fought on many different fronts usually by little fellows; the little, unsung, individual people like you and me who are given to faith and who think like giants. These are the people who are going to fight these actions. These are the people who are going to save this old world. If there is anything that we should remember at this time when we are talking about China it is what one old Chinese philosopher said, that if there is righteousness in the heart there will be beauty in the character; if there is beauty in the character there will be happiness in the home; if there is happiness in the home there will be strength in the nation; and if there is strength in the nation there will be peace in the world.

The Chinese philosophers can teach us a good many things. From them we certainly can learn that if we want peace in this old world we have to start right here in each one of us and each individual has to take his share of responsibility and do his best. The important best that he can do is to keep alive the spirit and the will to freedom and independence, not to talk as if we have no hope left.

Speaking of Chinese philosophers brings me to China and the question of the recognition of China. I felt sorry for the Prime Minister this afternoon. I think he was thrust into a very difficult position by the newspaper people who all too often thrust men into almost impossible positions by their thoughtlessness. I am not saying that they were entirely thoughtless in this case but they are not careful enough to get at the truth.

Mr. Fulton: I think it was the Prime Minister who was thoughtless in this case.

Mr. Low: I am not even trying to come to the defence of the Prime Minister on this occasion, but I am saying what I believe. As a consequence of quite long experience I believe that if newspaper people would make a little more effort to be accurate and truthful they could save these waves of hysteria and misunderstanding, but they are too anxious to get there first with the most startling and sensational. That is the trouble. I think we have to understand that.

I have expressed our view on the matter of recognition of the communist regime in China on several different occasions, and I am going to express it again tonight. I do not agree for one second with the leader of the C.C.F. party. He softened considerably in what he said today compared with what he said over the air on the 23rd of March. If we were certain that the people of China wanted the government they have it might put a different complexion on the matter. So far as recognition is concerned, I do not consider that it is recognition in any accepted sense of the word to negotiate with them as we must negotiate at the conference in Geneva.

Why, of course, we have to negotiate. In my opinion recognition means exchange of diplomatic representatives. It means allowing them to send their diplomats into this country and, if they wish, to set up consulates in every city, town and village from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, from which they can launch their nefarious practices of propaganda and espionage if they so desire. That is what diplomatic recognition would convey.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time may come, and probably will come, when we will have to recognize the government of China. I am not speaking of the present regime, although even if that regime were there and the people of China indicated that was the government they wanted and were determined to have, then of course I do not see that it would do any good for us to stand up in this house or anywhere else and say we would not recognize them. We have to be sensible about it in every respect. But certainly we should not at this time think of exchanging diplomatic representatives with them and giving them de jure recognition. I am speaking, I believe, for the group which I represent in saying that.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, one of the considerations that we ought to keep in our minds is that we owe something to the people of China. You know, for a great many years the people of China were our friends. I have strong feelings today they are still our friends, if they could get through to us and we to them. We did not do our duty by the Chinese people. We stood by while venal men pushed China into the control of the communists. In many ways we have condoned the actions of these men. Our newspapers, for example, have done their level best over the years, all the time that action of pushing China into the arms of communist Russia was taking place, to tell the people of Canada and the United States that Mao Tse-tung and his people were not communists but were merely agrarian reformers. They did their level best. Of course, everyone with a lick of sense today knows that is not true, and they have known it for some years. We still have some of these editorial writers, however, who act as if they do believe it.

In my judgment what we must do today is to make certain that by no action of ours do we contribute to the sense of hopelessness in these people in China, that sense of hopelessness that destroys the spirit and the will to freedom. I am satisfied that they will react to sympathetic understanding from us. They will react favourably to any help we can extend to them in even a small way. Some day they will rise and throw off their yoke. The seeds of self-destruction are inherent in evil things, and they certainly are in communism.

I was in Washington in early February, and listened to a speech made by Walter Judd, a member of the United States congress. He told of a journey he had just completed around the world. He had gone into practically every one of the Asiatic countries, and had talked to the people on the street wherever he could go. He brought back some very interesting convictions. He said that the Asiatic peoples expressed gratitude for the things the western world has done for them and particularly the many material things the United States has sent to them. However, they hesitated to accept other offers of assistance because they were afraid the West might want to help them to death, as they so often had.

Too often when we have moved in to try to help these people we have been like the camel who drove the Bedouin out of his tent; that is our trouble. As a consequence, these people feel they have been betrayed; they feel they have been let down. They are just a little wary of expressing faith in us and our good intentions. It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that so many times we in the western nations have used the peoples of Europe and Asia as pawns that they have lost faith in us. I say we must regain that faith by establishing that our word is as good as our bond and that when we undertake to do a thing we will fulfil our commitment 100 per cent. That is the only way we are ever going to regain their good will and their faith, and they must have faith.

I should like to say just a word about the Geneva conference. I do not know how much hope can be placed in it, but I am willing to put every bit of faith I have in the outcome. I do hope that something can come out of the Geneva conference, and particularly that things can be clarified. I sincerely hope that France will be able to go to that conference with considerably more strength than she seems to have now. If she is in a position of strength to negotiate, perhaps we might be able to see peace in Indo-China. We sincerely hope so.

With respect to the matter of the European defence community, the minister said this afternoon that the UN is not effective enough as a deterrent to aggression and as a consequence we have had to fall back on regional pacts such as NATO, EDC and others. I believe that is right. It is unfortunate that the UN has been ineffective as a deterrent to aggression. I believe such things as NATO and EDC are things we must support. Let us sincerely hope that EDC is ratified by France. There is one thing I should like to say by way of warning. As we develop NATO and EDC, let us never fail to keep in mind some of the dangers into which we, in Canada, can get ourselves.

Here is a situation that perhaps the minister can explain to us. This afternoon he did not say anything about the Middle East, and today the Middle East holds a tremendous amount of interest for the world. If he had time one could speak of the difficulties between the Arab world and Israel. Upon the outcome of that problem hangs some measure, it seems to me, of the peace of the world. The thing that is in my mind at the moment is this. Pakistan has been having trouble with India for quite some time over Kashmir. I understand the situation there is not quite as acute as it was, but it has been fanned into something like acuteness of late by the fact Pakistan has accepted arms and assistance from the United States. India does not like that. In order to strengthen herself Pakistan has recently concluded a non-aggression pact with Turkey.

Turkey is a partner in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I am just asking what would happen in case something flared up between Pakistan and India over, let us say, Kashmir, and Pakistan called on Turkey to fulfil her obligations under the non-aggression pact between them. If Turkey did, where would Canada be? What kind of decision would we have to make? We would be under the obligation of deciding at once whether we would abide by the terms of the NATO treaty and thus come to the help of our ally Turkey, and in that case probably be fighting our sister in the commonwealth, India, or whether we would forsake the NATO alliance and stand by India.

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Philpott: Surely he knows that one of the very specific terms of NATO is that the obligation under NATO is confined to territorial attacks in European areas of NATO, as the Prime Minister made very clear in India.

Mr. Low: I understand that perfectly, but do the people in Turkey, and do the people in Pakistan understand it? That is the question. To get them to understand is quite a problem. Those alliances within alliances have the habit of expanding, being misunderstood and being interpreted in different ways. I say that while I do not see any immediate danger, I am just pointing out by way of argument and warning what could happen if we continue to expand these intra-non-aggression pacts and all that sort of thing as a substitute for the United Nations. These are important things for us to keep in our minds. I just want to say at this point, also, as a substitute for the British commonwealth which has over the centuries been the greatest force for peace that the world has ever known.

I hope that it will be possible for EDC to be built up and to be ratified, because it is one of the only guarantees we have for western Europe to be able to defend itself against the dangers that threaten from the east. Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word about a matter that was raised in this house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He raised a question about the withdrawal of certain pamphlets that were put out by the United Nations in the province of British Columbia. He said that he was disturbed to see that one of the departments of education, that is in the province of British Columbia, had withdrawn from circulation among the schools the United Nations' association monthly bulletin. He continued:

> The bulletin, which has been circulated in all the provinces, including British Columbia, is now being withdrawn, according to a statement emanating from Victoria.

Well, as usual, some of the members of the press picked that out and played it up. One of them was a man by the name of John Stevenson. I do not believe I have ever seen the gentleman, but writing under the heading: "Ottawa Letter" in Saturday Night of March 6, he had this to say about it:

> Nor has the prestige of this party been enhanced by the silly performance of the Social Credit ministry of British Columbia, in giving vent to the party's traditional dislike of international organizations of all kinds by banning from circulation in the province's schools literature of Canada's United Nations association.

That is a fair example of what I was talking about a few minutes ago. Here is a man who did not take the slightest trouble to find out the truth. He did not make the slightest effort to get at the truth of the matter. He simply picked out something that he saw somewhere in the press and then wrote it up as if it were fact, and used some very strong words which were not true. I want to give the facts about this just to show how wrong these men were. I hold in my hand a statement of the minister of education from British Columbia who says that the——charge that United Nations bulletin banned in schools in this province is completely false. No such ban exists. During the current year ending March 31, 1954 educational estimates did not make provision for furnishing pamphlet to schools as in previous years but schools and teachers were advised of subscription rates and have been free to subscribe to this as they are to any other publication. Current estimates have been considered in the light of the United Nations association's request to make provision for bulletin during next fiscal year.

It is signed by R. W. Bonner, minister of education. I felt it was desirable to correct that unfair and incorrect statement on the floor of this house, and the statement in Saturday Night, and since it deals with the United Nations I felt that I was perfectly justified in doing so. I abhor these senseless attacks that indicate the writers do not take the trouble to get at the truth.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I just say one word in regard to assistance to people in other lands, to underdeveloped countries, to underprivileged peoples. I am in sympathy with the idea of enlarging as far as we can the contribution which we make. I have supported the contribution Canada has made to the Colombo plan and the Point Four program and the technical assistance program. I feel that these things are justified, but there is one thing I believe we have to keep in our minds. It is not the material assistance that we can give to the people in other lands that is going to count in the long run. The best help that we can possibly give to these people is that which will help them to help themselves.

What we have to do is to get across to these peoples the idea that what we in this part of the world enjoy today, we enjoy very largely as a result of the philosophy we follow. I am not speaking now of any particular political party's philosophy at all, I am speaking of the philosophy we follow as free people, the free enterprise type of philosophy that we have followed and are now following, however many its shortcomings may be. If we can get over to them that we do enjoy the material things we have and the standards of living we enjoy very largely because of the philosophy we live by, if we can get them to see that and to start following similar philosophies I am satisfied that they will in time, with some assistance in a material way from us, and some encouragement from us, be able to put themselves in a position to help themselves.

I am all for every bit of help that we can possibly get to them, but particularly that kind of help I have just mentioned.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say to hon. members that it was certainly a great privilege for me to be one of the alternate Canadian delegates at the eighth session of the United Nations, but I hasten to add that I am well aware it takes quite a bit of study and certainly a lot of experience and at any rate more than a three-months' apprenticeship in New York city to qualify for the title of amateur statesman. I did have the opportunity, however, of seeing at first hand just how the Canadian delegation operates, and I can report to you that, under the leadership of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), the delegation demonstrated the greatest possible co-ordination, co-operation and team spirit.

At all times and under all circumstances we worked together. I do think that this is the proper time and the right place for me to make a few observations about the leader of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Here in Ottawa we know of his ability; but I am afraid that there are a great many inside of Canada who do not know of the great regard in which he is held outside Canada. He is the only Canadian to have been president of the United Nations assembly and at the same time chairman of the North Atlantic council. But these two high honours, in themselves, do not it seems to me fully illustrate the magnificent job he is doing in conducting and in explaining Canadian foreign policy to other countries.

As the leader of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations, he not only gives active counsel and advice to the members of his own delegation, but I want to testify that his advice and counsel and direction are actively sought by delegates in other delegations. It is no flattery to say that he has a certain genius for finding a common-sense solution, for finding a formula, for arriving at a compromise in a tense situation.

As evidence of that I would cite the fact that the United Nations will not soon forget the great work he did—and largely personally—in the creation of the new state of Israel. The point I wish to make is that these useful behind-the-scenes negotiations bring a great deal of prestige to Canada. I think the time has come to say openly that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of this country have done more than any other Canadians to bring Canadian foreign policy out of the filing cabinet, and put it where all Canadians can see it.

It is estimated that the population of the world is approximately two and a half billions of people. If we are generous and give Canada fifteen million, I think we are somewhat struck by the fact that our international influence is out of all proportion to our numbers. In many respects, in the councils of the world we rate just as high as the United Kingdom and the United States. Why is this so? Well, one of the reasons is that the Department of External Affairs contains men who are trained in the intricacies of international negotiation. They have men of not only scholarship but men of action, and the two working together speak at the United Nations and elsewhere throughout the world sensibly and clearly on behalf of all of us. Because, in essence, our foreign service is really a form of defence. Oh, I admit it is less dramatic than the army, the navy or the air force; but it has tangible qualities, nevertheless.

Our foreign service is a defence against evil ideas which must be fought before they put on armour and before they take up guns. And the best place to do this fighting is at the United Nations. The main battleground where this war of ideas can be won or lost is in the assembly hall and in the various committee rooms of the United Nations.

What exactly is the United Nations? It is two things, it seems to me: It is the sounding board of world opinion, and it is the instrument by which the world seeks to survive. If one examines the preamble to the charter he will see it lays down two basic points. It declares that the peoples of the United Nations are "determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war" and "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights."

Some among us say that the United Nations has failed. But I would remind you that the United Nations was not born in Utopia, but in San Francisco in the year 1945, and at a time when human society was certainly in a most insecure position and certainly fearfully divided.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) made the statement to the effect that the United Nations is ineffective in preventing aggression. Well, I admit that the United Nations is not one hundred per cent perfect; but I would point out to him that the fighting between Israel and the Arab states was, at the very least, lessened, and that the occupation of Greece was prevented, and that the trouble between Pakistan and India, if not solved, was certainly eased. And, last, but by no means least, aggression in Korea was met, and is certainly halted at the present time.

I think we should not forget that the United Nations is only eight years old, whereas the problems it is tackling are almost as old as human life itself. It takes time for an eight-year-old infant to find a formula for relieving centuries-old conflicts and prejudices. I think it is remarkable that the United Nations has done as well as it has. We will not get rich quick in creating peaceful international relations. But we must keep our minds on the long pull; and perhaps in the long run we will get more peace than we think possible at the present time.

I think hon. members are entitled to ask me this question: And what of the cost, in dollars and cents? The total annual budget of the United Nations is approximately $41 million, and the Canadian share of this budget is 3·3 per cent or $1,350,000. That is to say, the annual cost of Canada's participation in the United Nations is about ten cents per Canadian, per annum, or the equivalent of two daily newspapers or one bus ride each year.

If you add to the United Nations the cost of the specialized agencies, such as the world health organization, UNESCO and ICAO—which is located in Montreal—the annual budget is approximately $80 million, and Canada's share is $2,650,000, or less than twenty cents per person, per annum.

May I ask you this question: Is that too high a premium to pay for a chance of security? Compare it with the cost of defence. One Sabre jet costs $300,000; one bomber costs $1,500,000; one escort destroyer costs approximately $14 million, or $1 per person per annum. Therefore, for the cost of one bomber we pay for our contribution to the United Nations and a chance at peace.

In wartime the sword is mighty, and certainly Canadians know how to use it. In peacetime, however, we want our problems discussed and concluded in a reasonable way under the rule of law, and not under the rule of force.

The United Nations provides a world forum where problems can be exposed and discussed, and arrangements or solutions attempted. Even Mr. Dulles, that frequently-quoted gentleman, said only the other day that but for the United Nations we would at the present time be involved in a third world war.

There are a few questions I should like to put. How many people in Canada appreciate the value of the United Nations? How many people in Canada know what goes on there? I am afraid the number is comparatively small. I am afraid that Canadians, as a whole, are unaware of the United Nations, although it is very important to them. And why? Because no one takes the trouble to tell them what goes on at the United Nations.

Let me give the house some examples: There is no permanent representative of the Canadian press at the United Nations. There is no permanent representative of any Canadian newspaper or periodical at the United Nations. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation covers the United Nations activities on a part-time basis and, on the whole, does a good job. We all know Peter Stursberg, Herbert Desaulniers and Walter O'Hearn who, up until recently, were there. These three gentlemen do a fairly good job—I should say they do a very good job—in so far as they are able, in reporting the activities of the United Nations over the radio and through comment in the press. But of the three of them, only two are left. I am here to say that, after having examined the situation slightly, I admit that in my view the C.B.C. could be more aggressive. I think they could bring United Nations programs more to the attention of the private stations and the Canadian people generally.

I am well aware, for example, and I am told by my C.B.C. friends and my friends who are connected with the press that Canadians are not particularly interested in the United Nations. Well, I put that to the test. At Christmastime, and since, I have been attending meetings of clubs and other societies, particularly schools, delivering speeches. And on every occasion, when the facts have been brought to the attention of the people concerned, they have shown a great deal of interest and that they are hungry for information. This makes it clear, to my mind, that if we go out and bring the facts to the attention of the people, in due course they will respond.

Surely that is the job of the C.B.C. and other organizations. Occasionally some other wealthy Canadian newspaper may send down a reporter or feature writer to New York for two or three days. But what are two or three days when one is trying to interpret the making of history? It is not sufficient time for the reporter or feature writer to get the background of the question under discussion, to meet the people concerned, to get the know-all, and to get the views of other correspondents and of the 60 other member nations.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

I can speak from personal experience because I was fortunate enough to be designated the Canadian representative on committee No. 6 which, as you know, is the legal committee. Hon. members will recall that the general assembly deals with its business under the heading of six main committees. These are: The political and security committee; the economic and financial committee; the social, humanitarian and cultural committee; the trusteeship, including non-self-governing territories committee; the administrative and budgeting committee; and finally, as I say, the legal committee.

Only to mention these names shows, it seems to me, the importance of the subjects discussed. I admit the political and security committee puts on the best show because there you see the clash of personalities and of nationalities, but I maintain that long after the effervescent activities of the political committee have faded away, the good that the United Nations will accomplish will be put down in conventions and treaties drafted and examined by committee No. 6. In any event the purpose of the United Nations, it seems to me, is to reduce tension, to iron out friction through discussion, to secure the rule of law in the relations between states, and not to resort to war.

Like the other delegates on the other committees, it was my job on committee No. 6, the legal committee, to speak on certain subjects of direct concern to Canada. For example, on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide, the revision of the United Nations charter, and the proposal dealing with arbitrarial procedure which, as hon. members will readily realize, is a new branch of international law under which two nations to a dispute resolve to arbitrate and refer their dispute to, shall we say, the international court of justice; also to discuss the interim report of the international law commission which was dealing with the regime of the high seas, which in turn can be broken down into territorial waters, the continental shelf, and fisheries.

I do not imagine that what I said at committee No. 6 will find any permanent place in any anthology of famous prose, but I do feel the question of, for example, the continental shelf and fisheries would prove of great interest to the citizens of Newfoundland, the maritimes, and British Columbia.

What of the exploration and exploitation of the continental shelf? Will we find oil, coal, and minerals in the subsoil? How far does Canada extend into the high seas? Who will regulate our fisheries? Should they be regulated at all? It seems to me that these are practical subjects of great economic import and of great interest to Canada, and if you multiply these few examples, along with those dealt with by the six committees and covering the whole range of the other subjects I have already mentioned, then it is perfectly obvious we are neglecting a very great deal of valuable information. Yet only one Canadian newspaper carried the slightest reference to any of these topics. Mr. Walter O'Hearn of the Montreal Star highlighted some of the implications of these topics, but for the rest, silence. Every day something like that is happening at the United Nations, something which concerns Canada directly. Why do we not hear about them?

I would be unfair on this point if I did not admit that the government itself must accept part of the blame for this shameful condition. The office of the consul general in New York city does lend its press attaché or information officer to the permanent Canadian delegation at times when the United Nations is sitting, but that poor information officer with two jobs, one at the consulate and one at the United Nations, is swamped with work and so the stuff gets out in little quantities and certainly too late.

Is it possible to improve conditions? I say it is. I say that in the first place the Canadian press should have a permanent full-time United Nations correspondent in New York city and he should be a Canadian. I say that the wealthy Canadian newspapers should also have correspondents at the United Nations. The system today is such that the news we get in our newspapers, at least it seems so to me, is largely a rehash of American news prepared for the American or British public and then sub-edited for the Canadian public with a new title and the first two paragraphs re-written. That may be an exaggeration but it certainly dramatizes the point.

It seems to me we know much more about what Mr. Cabot Lodge and Mr. Dulles say than what Mr. Pearson says, and I do not believe that is right. Let me give some evidence of that. In a dispatch from the New York Times service datelined United Nations, New York, February 17, 1954, and headed: "News Sources Are Criticized by UNESCO", the article states:

> UNESCO raised these prospects in a 232-page report, entitled "News Agencies: Their Structure and Operation," made public today here (New York) and in Paris. In it UNESCO maintained that the six "world" news agencies are not truly international since their financial support, their directors and most of their staff members are drawn from four countries: from the United States, in the case of the Associated Press, United Press, or International News Service; or from Britain, France or the Soviet union in the case of Reuters, Agence Francepress, and Tass.
>
> Referring to the personnel of such agencies UNESCO said "however impartial they may be, however strictly they may comply with the professional code of ethics, they will inevitably judge and present news from the viewpoint of the country of which they are citizens."
>
> Moreover, it declared, the current trend by news agencies toward a "free-for-all struggle" for the sale of news runs counter to the trend toward increased international co-operation in political, military, economic, educational, scientific and cultural matters."

Also, while in New York, I had a little memorandum prepared for my own use, because in dealing with the press one tries to be fair and to be accurate. That being the case I believe if I put this on the record it may help hon. members to understand the situation. This memorandum states:

> On the press side, I have been informed that no full-time Canadian correspondent is at present assigned to the United Nations. Canadian Press, until fairly recently, had as a member of its New York staff a young man who specialized in coverage of the United Nations and devoted most of his time to it when the assembly was in session. Recently, however, the news agency has not assigned a member of its New York staff to the United Nations on a regular basis. British United Press, the other agency serving Canadian newspapers, is not represented at the United Nations by one of its own correspondents. Canadian Press coverage is based on reports of the Associated Press, and British United Press reports are drawn from the service of the United Press. Until fairly recently, the Montreal Star maintained a correspondent in New York to specialize in coverage of the United Nations. He was recently transferred to Montreal and was not replaced. Other Canadian newspapers periodically assign writers to the United Nations on a temporary basis but none is represented by a full-time correspondent. Some use the special services of the United States and British newspapers for the purpose. No Canadian periodical maintains a full-time correspondent at the United Nations.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians are entitled to know from the great news agencies, co-operative or selling, what goes on at the United Nations. These reports should be written by Canadians for Canadians, reporting United Nations activities and decisions affecting Canada.

But if the newspapers have a duty, so has the government a duty to provide the facilities, the information and the help to the free press of Canada. I say that the information section of our Canadian consulate in New York city—and I mention New York city because it is the centre of the press, of periodicals, of communications; it is the largest centre for that sort of thing in the United States—should be reorganized in such a way that it could co-ordinate the news distribution of the Department of External Affairs in New York and in the United States, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the national film board, the travel bureau and in fact all the other government agencies. It seems to me to be incongruous that here we have a travel bureau spending millions of dollars in the United States on publicity, at the same time getting good co-operation because they are spending good money for it, while at the same time we have external affairs, who need a little bit of publicity, a little bit of contact, a little bit of help here and there, having a struggle to get it.

I see no reason why when you give out with one hand you should not receive back with the other. It should be a two-way trade. I think that if we had a senior man down there who could co-ordinate these activities our press distribution in the United States would be a great deal better than it is at the present time. I could develop that subject further, but I will not do so tonight. It seems to me that in the news distribution at the United Nations, the government itself has to improve its services, step in and take the lead.

To this end I suggest that the government should appoint a top level information officer to the United Nations permanent delegation. There is a precedent for this procedure. May I remind you that a great Canadian newspaper editor was chosen to fill just such a role for NATO in Paris. One should be fair and one should agree at this time that the Canadian Press is a news gathering organization and that even if it did have a correspondent at the United Nations he would have no time for interpretive writing. His job is simply to go out and get the facts.

It seems to me that a government top level information officer—and he must be top level; otherwise the reporters will not bother too much with him; and he will not have the authority with which to speak or the knowledge with which to speak—could do some of the following things. First, he could give the story behind the story to the press. He could arrange interviews for the members of delegations and for visiting V.I.P's. He could prepare background material. He could release bulletins, pamphlets and brochures so that the newspaper editor gets the full story at a glance. Hence when something of interest to Canadians takes place at the United Nations, this information could be put out in a brochure which would be timely and useful and would attract attention. If we make an effort to help the free press of Canada, it can be relied on to do the rest.

It seems to me that the great problem is how to get across to the Canadian public the magnitude of their stake in the United Nations. A basic factor of any foreign policy, in order for it to be enduringly successful, is that it must be understood and accepted by the people.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

Do Canadians know the full story at the United Nations? How could they, when nobody tells them? What is needed is full coverage of United Nations activities, particularly those activities which concern Canada. In wartime we had reporters and feature writers travelling all over the world, telling us what was going on at the fighting fronts. Surely today we can spare a few reporters at the United Nations in New York city for the purpose of telling us what is going on at the most important fighting front of all, namely the front where we are trying to prevent war.

In the United States in 1952 there was a sudden upsurge of interest in Canada. You read about it in magazines; you heard about it over the radio. In 1954 in Canada could we not have an upsurge of interest in foreign policy? We may be diffident about telling the rest of the world what we are doing but at least we could tell ourselves.

Make no mistake about it, the United Nations stands between us and international anarchy. The United Nations stands between us and the extinction of human freedom. Some of us have lived through two world wars; but if a third world war came some of us would get hurt and we might be back in the bow and arrow era. The United Nations is the place where millions of people, differing in a thousand ways, act through their various delegates to reach a common goal. That goal is survival. We want justice and security in international living. The United Nations provides us with our best chance of getting that.

It seems to me that Canadian foreign policy brings out this simple truth. We in Canada have created a foreign service to which our citizens can belong with honour. As a result, our external affairs are managed by well prepared, honest, astute and respected professional men and women who keep Canada's prestige at a high level throughout the world. I think it is time that the Canadian public were told what these men and women are doing from day to day and from week to week. I think specifically that it is time Canadians were told the story of our foreign service's important work at the United Nations.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the house has waited with keen interest for today's debate. That interest was largely attributable, I think, to the statement in relation to China that came, through the press, from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his world tour. As to the statements made in the house this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs

(Mr. Pearson) and by the Prime Minister, I think it is not unfair to say that the statement made by the Prime Minister in disavowing the interpretation put on his statement in the Far East has taken much of the interest out of this debate. One may say also that as to much of the statement that was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, one had the feeling that it was directed largely at Washington.

I must confess to not a little surprise and considerable regret that the Prime Minister, having now addressed the house twice on the subject of his tour of the world, including many of the important nations of the commonwealth, said not one word about the vital and beneficent role that the commonwealth is playing in the struggle for world peace today. Not one word was said on that subject. I must say that I for one was startled by that fact.

To what goal does Canada direct her external policy? Obviously, Mr. Speaker, if we are to give the answer in a word, that answer must be "peace". The goal is peace in a world which this very week has read of the explosion of a hydrogen bomb six hundred times more powerful than that bomb which claimed 60,000 lives when dropped on Hiroshima in 1945. Consequently in pursuing the goal of peace we must be realists.

There are three statements that the Prime Minister has made in various places in relatively recent times which I think are worthy of the attention of the house. In speaking at Midland on August 29, 1952, he said this:

> . . . whenever there is a big war, we cannot keep out. We are inevitably drawn into it. Consequently, we must do everything we can to keep peace in the world.

Then, on his tour he was reported from Rome on February 13 as saying:

> If we really want peace we must be prepared to undertake war to protect it.

On the same tour at Soest, Germany, he is reported as saying on February 11:

> "No potential aggressor must feel it healthy to start aggression", the Prime Minister said in a brief speech. "During my lifetime we have had too much war. We have learned that the only way to avoid war is to be prepared to wage it."

These indeed are strong statements made by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, but I do suggest that, if logically and sensibly interpreted and applied, there is realism in them.

In what I have to say tonight I should like to direct my remarks to four subjects: first, our relations with the United States; second, some aspects of our external relations so far as Europe is concerned; third, the same as far as Asia is concerned, and fourth, the subject of trade.

Our relations with the United States are of first importance. There are three matters in this regard on which I should like to dwell briefly. The first thing, I think, that we wish to make abundantly clear both to our American cousins and to the world, for it is just as important that the world should understand this as that our cousins south of the border should, is that Canada's foreign policy will be made right here under this roof. There were long years when the world did not understand, for instance, that Canada's foreign policy was not made at London but was made here. Now we seem to be in danger of having the world or at least some parts of the world think that our foreign policy is made at Washington. Sir, we must be very firm on this subject, and we must tell the United States and the world firmly and clearly that if there is to be any thought of committing this country in advance to any policies that call for collective support with Canada as a participant we must first be consulted and Canada must determine her course.

The second aspect of this matter is the way in which Canada seems to be coming into the role of interpreter of the United States in those quarters of the globe where the United States and her policy are not well understood. Indeed, the Prime Minister in at least a part of his tour, particularly in his visit to India, seems to have accepted the role of interpreter of the United States to that sister nation of the commonwealth. There is every reason why Canada, in the interests of world peace, should seek from her advantageous situation to assist the world in understanding the United States and her peaceful aims. Above all nations in the world we Canadians best know the United States. We know her generosity. We have had reason to admire her leadership in the world. When we look back and think how much the world suffered in earlier times for lack of United States leadership and how the whole course of history in the years leading up to 1939 might have been changed had the United States then been giving the leadership to the world she is giving today, we have a means of estimating the value of United States leadership to the world.

It is a fact that the United States is not popular in many quarters of the globe, even in quarters where United States aid has been most generously bestowed. In the days when Britain held the position of the world's most powerful nation there seemed to be a disposition to twist the lion's tail occasionally, and that now seems to be directed at the United States. It may be that mistakes are made at Washington. After all, this role that the United States has assumed is a new role for that nation. It is not to be expected that that role will be discharged without some evidences of immaturity at times. Certainly harm has been done by sabre-rattling speeches by some ministers at Washington or, if one may resort to more modern terms, we might talk about bomb-rattling speeches from that quarter. But admitting these factors the fact remains that hope for the peace of the world does now rest, to a degree without precedent in the world's history, on the leadership given by the United States.

We know that we can trust the United States. We know from long experience as her closest neighbour that we can put the utmost reliance upon the good faith of the United States. We have an opportunity to say that to the world today and to help the world to realize the peaceful aims of the United States.

May I say directly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I am sure the whole nation approved heartily the statement he made on behalf of the government immediately following the statement made by President Eisenhower in proposing control of the development of atomic energy, when the minister pledged Canada's unqualified approval of that statement.

The third aspect of the subject of our relations with the United States concerns relations between the United States and the United Kingdom. What hope is there for mankind, what hope is there for the peace of the world if the United States and the United Kingdom are not to work together side by side? What nation in all the world can provide, to use Mr. Churchill's expression, a more effective linchpin in that relationship than Canada? Well and truly did Sir Gladwyn Jebb, in his farewell speech at New York on his retirement as the representative of Great Britain on the security council of the United Nations, say on February 24, speaking of the United States and the British commonwealth:

> If we can stay together and pursue joint policies of development and peace, then the future is secure. If we drift apart, then the future belongs to international communism.

Canada stands right in the middle between the United States and Great Britain, and we must supply the effective cement by which these two nations shall be bound together to walk their beneficent path in the interest of world peace. There need be no fear of the intentions of Great Britain and the United States. This week Mr. Churchill has given the strongest expression of support of the United States policy of massive retaliation in the event of aggression by those whose intent is not peaceful. But he did say at the same time that the United States bases in Great Britain would not be used for retaliation in atomic warfare without the approval of the government of the United Kingdom.

I turn now to Europe. I say at once, although I do not think it needs to be said in this house, that whatever evidence there may be of changing tactics on the part of the masters in the Kremlin there can be no doubt in the mind of any one of us that the underlying and fundamental strategy of the Kremlin is unchanged. Surely we have learned long since, if we have learned anything, that we are not to trust what comes from the Kremlin. That man who, of all others in modern times, probably perpetrated the most mischief on the world, Karl Marx, said this a century ago about the Russians:

> The Russian bear is certainly capable of anything —as long as he knows the other animals he has to deal with are capable of nothing.

It will not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that we have from authentic communist sources something of the blueprint that they have been following ever since this blueprint was laid down for them by Lenin. In his collected works, volume 24, this statement appears:

> We are living not merely in a state but in a system of states; and it is inconceivable that the Soviet republic should continue for a long period side by side with imperialist states. Ultimately, one or the other must conquer. Meanwhile, a number of terrible clashes between the Soviet republic and the bourgeois states is inevitable.

Again, this quotation is taken from Lenin's book, "The Infantile Sickness of Leftism in Communism".

> It is necessary to use any ruse, cunning, unlawful method, evasion, concealment of the truth.

We have had many proofs, Mr. Speaker, that that blueprint is followed scrupulously by those who believe in and practise communism in the world. Note, Mr. Speaker, what Lenin had to say about the series of clashes. I suppose what we have seen in the unfolding of that fundamental strategy has been this; that where it has suited that strategy to resort to the hot war, the hot war was resorted to; where it suits that strategy to resort to the cold war, then the cold war will be the method chosen. The fundamental attitude is hostile towards all bourgeois states. Therefore, while we must never reject out of hand anything that appears to be a gesture towards better understanding or more peaceful co-operation that may come from the Kremlin, let us learn from the past and ever be wary.

Notwithstanding the way in which China and the Far East have been occupying a leading place in the news in recent times, Germany, I submit, still remains the most important of all areas of diplomatic conflict in the world. Here 1954 will be a decisive year. It will be a year for that reason of vast importance to Canada. Happily we see in NATO growing strength; we see substantial accomplishments, but we must not rest on those accomplishments. German rearmament was decided upon a year and a half ago. For this problem the solution offered was of a European army, with German units integrated into it. The feeling of the United States government is that the ratification of EDC on the part of all the nations concerned is imperative. The predominant feeling in Great Britain, and certainly the policy of the government of the United Kingdom, is to bring about that ratification of EDC and the setting up of a European army as soon as possible. In Germany lies the biggest untouched reservoir of manpower available to the free world.

The feeling in France is an understandable feeling. The spirit of nationalism is still strong in the French army. The memory of three invasions within the lifetime of some Frenchmen will never be effaced, and there is very great distrust there of the idea of a European army. Bear in mind, sir, it is not an allied army that is proposed. It is something quite different from any army that has ever existed before. The weakness of the French state today is attributable in part to the gigantic losses of France in both world wars, and to the way in which she is being bled of manhood and treasure in Indo-China as well as to the presence of a large number of communists in France today.

The most signal event in the history of Europe in 1953 was unquestionably the resounding victory won at the polls by Chancellor Adenauer, and with it the complete endorsement by the people of the western German republic of the whole idea of a European army and the German rearmament associated with it. We have the opportunity of judging how important to the western nations is the fulfilment of the dream of ratification of EDC and the establishment of the European army, when we see the stratagems and machinations that the Russians are resorting to in an attempt to prevent ratification of EDC at all costs. In recent months their tactics have all been directed towards restraining France from proceeding with the task of ratification. Now again, one can understand the feelings of the French in this regard. But, Mr. Speaker, the central issue in international affairs in 1954, so far as Europe is concerned, will be the question of ratification and the establishment of the European army. The Russians know it. Their whole tactics in recent times show how well they realize that if this important step is taken then their hopes of expanding the area of aggression and the march of the iron curtain westward are stopped in Europe.

If there are alternate plans, Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs seemed to permit himself to hint today when he said that EDC ought to be ratified or something like it, then he ought to take the house into his confidence in this matter. Here, we are dealing with something that is of primary importance to the peace of the world.

Today the Prime Minister told us almost nothing about NATO. Sir Gladwyn Jebb, in a speech from which I quoted earlier, said this:

> NATO is the shield and buckler of the west and without it we should lose all our freedom . . .
> If war should come it is in such organization as the NATO that our trust must primarily be placed.

That came from a man who has in recent years represented the United Kingdom on the security council of the United Nations. He was saying in the plainest terms that if war should come our hope of preservation must lie with NATO.

There was one statement that came from the Prime Minister's tour on which he made little or no comment today. This is a dispatch from Paris dated February 9:

> Although the discussion was held in the strictest privacy,—

That is a discussion between the Prime Minister and General Gruenther at SHAPE headquarters.

> —it was reliably reported that Canada's Prime Minister gave General Gruenther his solemn assurance that Canada would increase its contribution if the international situation should become any worse.

This afternoon the Prime Minister touched on this subject very briefly. He did not say that he was relating it especially to the report that emanated from Paris to which I have just now made reference. I do hope before this debate has run its course, either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make a clear statement on this point for the information of the house.

I turn now, sir, to Asia. Since the cease-fire our thoughts have been turning, it seems to me, more from Korea to China. Let us recall that all that has been accomplished in Korea is a cease-fire with a retirement of the forces to the rear of a widened no-man's-land and then an agreement, not then immediately entered into but since, for a conference on Asian affairs to be held at Geneva. In the meantime, sixteen nations including Canada have signed a pledge that if aggression should be renewed in Korea, they will stand together in resisting that aggression. They have put the following in their statement:

> The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea.
>
> Finally, we are of the opinion that the armistice must not result in jeopardizing the restoration or the safeguarding of peace in any other part of Asia.

It is a very strong pledge that the sixteen nations, including Canada, have taken in that regard.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs intimated today in this regard that Canada would probably be playing a rather minor part in the conference at Geneva. Be that as it may, sir, I hope—

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I said a relatively minor part in the Indo-Chinese part of the conference.

Mr. Fleming: That is what I was coming to, but I am glad to have that clarification from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Whatever part Canada does play I hope that there will be nothing done to weaken the application of the principle that in negotiations with these communists we must negotiate from strength; we must be canny; we must not be throwing away a single card now that we may have an opportunity to play later, and we must go into that conference determined to preserve the integrity of the principle that aggression must be shown before all the world not to pay. That is a lesson that has to be taught to those who are practising aggression and hot warfare in Indo-China today.

Now, sir, what of China—China that we used to think of years ago as a great peaceful nation, as peace-loving a nation as any in all the world? What a travesty of history that that nation of peace-loving people has now been turned into a red-handed aggressor, an aggressor which inspired and spurred on the aggression of the North Koreans in 1950, aided and abetted it and then finally itself marched into North Korea. It is a nation under a communist regime which has been branded by the United Nations before all the world as an aggressor, an indictment by mankind; a nation under a communist government that has today virtually annexed North Korea, that has virtually annexed Tibet, which, if it has its way will undoubtedly seek to work the same result in Indo-China; a nation which has been singled out by the United Nations for the passage of a resolution denying strategic materials to it, as a nation in whose hands any materials that can be used in warfare are not to be trusted. And it is the communist government of this nation that some would now have us recognize as the government of China.

Well, sir, let us turn back to the rule, which they say runs something like this: that where a government, regardless of how it came into being, does exercise control over a specified territory and conditions are sufficiently settled that it cannot be said that its authority within that territory is seriously challenged, then it is entitled to recognition. Sir, that, as I read the rules of public international law, is not an altogether correct statement of the rule. I suppose the leading authority on public international law is Professor Oppenheim of Cambridge. I have in my hand volume I, sixth edition, of his work on international law, where the rule is put at pages 126 and 127 in this way:

> When, however, the new head or government, be it a monarch succeeding another monarch, a president of a republic succeeding another president, a monarch succeeding a president of a republic, or a president of a republic a monarch, comes into power not in a constitutional manner but after a coup d'état, a revolution (which need not involve bloodshed), or any other event involving a break in legal continuity, the determination by other states of the attitude to be adopted toward the new head or government is often difficult. They are called upon to arrive at a decision on the question whether the new authority can be properly regarded as representing the state in question. In arriving at that decision, they exercise a discretion which, though necessarily wide, is not an arbitrary act.

I suggest that where discretion exists in this matter, under that statement of the rule of public international law, Canada ought to exercise her discretion not to give recognition to the so-called people's government of Peking.

There follows a review of the trends in relation to the recognition of new governments. There is not time at my disposal to review these. They follow in the succeeding pages, but it is a fair summary to say that there have been conflicting trends as to whether, in deciding to give or withhold recognition of any new government, a nation is entitled to ask itself if that government is capable of fulfilling the normal requirements of civilized international behaviour between states.

Does any opposition exist in China, any effective opposition to the present people's government? Well, if it does not, Mr. Speaker, we well know why. It is because that opposition has been exterminated in the most ruthless manner by the present government.

How did this regime come to be in control of the reins of power in China? It came not as a result of some innocent movement for agrarian reform as the communists sought to pretend—Canadian communists as well as others—in recent years. It came into power,

Mr. Speaker, because of aid from Russia. It was never a genuine movement on the part of the people, and on the hands of these aggressors today are stains of blood, including the blood of Canadians. It is to this regime that the C.C.F. party in this house asks the Canadian government to give recognition. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is a dreadful, a shocking proposition.

Sir, this is not the first time that the C.C.F. have advocated recognition of this present regime in China. As long ago as June, long before the cease-fire, while Canadians were withstanding the surge of battle, attacks by Chinese troops thrown in under the orders of this so-called people's government at Peking, the leader of the C.C.F. party, speaking at the meeting which nominated the present member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) in Toronto on June 9 of last year, advocated the recognition of this so-called people's government at Peking. Mao Tse-tung wants recognition; the U.S.S.R. wants recognition of the so-called people's regime at Peking, and they are using every stratagem and every device to bring about that object. Mr. Speaker, in that regard we would do well to recall these words from Lenin's book to which I referred earlier:

> It is necessary to use any ruse, cunning, unlawful method, evasion, concealment of the truth—

—for the purpose of achieving the ends of communism.

Sir, we welcome the statement of the Prime Minister today that it is no part of the intention of the government to give recognition to this regime at Peking. Undoubtedly the statement attributed to the Prime Minister in the press during his tour has done incalculable harm. It has received wide currency, and I think the Prime Minister will be the first to say, and I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be the first to agree, that commendable restraint in this respect has been shown in this house pending the return of the Prime Minister. I think they will agree that there has been on the part of the opposition commendable willingness to defer discussion of the matter until the return of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), when he could be present to take part in the discussion. But, sir, I hope that every effort will be made to see that the statement made by the Prime Minister today, in his effort to overtake the statement that was attributed to him in the press, will receive just as wide currency as that other statement which has done so much harm.

How shall we prove that aggression does not pay, if we allow this regime at Peking to shoot and bludgeon its way into polite international company? The cause of resisting aggression in Indo-China would be lost, at once. What is to be, then, the fate of Formosa?

And they quote recognition of the government in Spain. Well, I do not think anyone in this House of Commons has a lower opinion of the government in Spain than the member who is now speaking. But what happened in Spain, I suggest, is no precedent for a recognition of the regime in Peking. Franco never directed his army in any aggressive manner against us. He never was branded an aggressor in any indictment on the part of the United Nations. And the Canadian government waited just about fifteen years before deciding to exchange diplomatic representatives with General Franco's regime.

So I suggest that, in the light of that fact, we can afford to take our time in considering any question of the recognition of the regime at Peking. So far as recognition of that regime by Great Britain in 1949 is concerned, let us remember that that was before Korea. Had the Korean aggression occurred before Great Britain gave recognition to the Peking regime, I think it is very doubtful if they would ever have considered giving that recognition.

In any event there is not very much, in the way in which Great Britain has been treated since that time by the Peking government, that would encourage anyone else to recommend that course. They have had little except insults from the Peking regime since that time.

Let us not forget, also, that the Japanese government, the new government in Japan to which we are trying to give every encouragement, on June 19, 1952, decided to give recognition to nationalist China as the government of China.

And then, sir, so far as our recognition of the government of the U.S.S.R. is concerned, let us bear this in mind, that we took our time about that, too. The revolution in Russia occurred in November of 1917. It was not until March 24, 1924, thirty years ago yesterday, that the Canadian government informed the then newly-arrived soviet official agent in Montreal that it was prepared to recognize the U.S.S.R. The function of that officer was, to some extent, that of consul, but more largely related to trade. Nothing came of that suggestion.

It was not until March, 1942, that the governments of Canada and the U.S.S.R. agreed to exchange diplomatic representatives. It was on October 21, 1942, that Mr. Gusev presented his credentials as minister to Canada, and on March 10, 1943, that Mr. Dana Wilgress presented his credentials as Canadian minister at Moscow. It was in 1944 that the status of the two missions was raised to that of embassies.

But, sir, what are the consequences of recognition? Let us not forget how very important and far-reaching these are. Here is the way Oppenheim describes them at pages 132 and 133:

> Among the more important consequences which flow from the recognition of a new government or state are these: (1) it thereby acquires the capacity to enter into diplomatic relations with other states and to make treaties with them; (2) within limitations which are far from being clear, former treaties (if any) concluded between the two states, assuming it to be an old state and not a newly-born one, are automatically revived and come into force; (3) it thereby acquires the right, which, at any rate according to English law, it did not previously possess, of suing in the courts of law of the recognizing state; (4) it thereby acquires for itself and its property immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts of law of the state recognizing it and the ancillary rights which are discussed later—an immunity which, according to English law at any rate, it does not enjoy before recognition. (5) It also becomes entitled to demand and receive possession of property situate within the jurisdiction of a recognizing state, which formerly belonged to the preceding government at the time of its suppression. (6) Recognition being retroactive and dating back to the moment at which the newly recognized government established itself in power, its effect is to preclude the courts of law of the recognizing state from questioning the legality or validity of the acts both legislative and executive, past and future, of that government; it therefore validates, so far as concerns those courts of law, certain transfers of property and other transactions which before recognition they would have treated as invalid.

And, sir, in our time, added to these would be, of course, inevitably as the next step, admission to the United Nations. And if this communist regime at Peking is admitted to supersede the nationalist government of China there, it means that they step automatically into a permanent seat on the security council, and acquire the veto. And as the Russians have used the United Nations as a sounding board for propaganda, it just means double the voices of propaganda in that council.

I submit, too, that the Peking regime is not eligible to be admitted to the United Nations. Chapter II, article 4, of the United Nations charter makes this stipulation:

> Membership in the United Nations is open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present charter and, in the judgment of the organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations.

Can it be said that this people's regime at Peking represents a peace-loving state, when they have been denounced as aggressors? No; I submit to you that they are not eligible. And yet, if they were recognized, this inevitably would be the next step. For, if you recognize this people's government, what answer have you to them when they apply to supplant the nationalist government as the representative of China at the United Nations? It would be a triumph of aggression, a triumph of the aggressor who holds a pistol at the head of the United Nations.

And, sir, whatever may come out of the Geneva conference, let us have the assurance that Geneva will never be permitted to become another Munich.

I leave this subject of recognition of the Peking regime with this one remark: I accept what the Prime Minister said this afternoon; we are not making a judgment for all time. But we look at the existing situation and we are, I hope, making a clear and firm judgment on that situation as it exists today.

Finally, a word about trade. Trade can be an aid to peace. There is no reason why we should not, like Great Britain, trade with Russia on one condition, and that is that no strategic material be allowed to come into the hands of the Russians. We have noted what has been said at Westminster of late about the keen desire of the British government to extend trade with Russia, in the hope that that will help to bring about more peaceful relations. The statement was made by the Hon. Derick Heathcoat-Amory, deputy trade minister, in Great Britain only two days ago that the British market is "wide open to Russian grain, timber, metals and manganese ore." The newspaper article goes on to say:

> Speaking in debate on east-west trade, he said it would be "very helpful if larger quantities of grain could be made available."

Well, while I am sure we will have no wish to put any obstacles in the way of trade between Great Britain and Russia, which may make a contribution to peace, I hope we will not be slow or tardy in making a just claim, on behalf of Canadian grain producers, to the British market for our grain.

Finally, whatever may be said about trade in the world today, there must be no weakening in the proscription of trade with this aggressor government of China in the matter of strategic materials, or anything that could be of assistance to an aggressor nation. We must watch vigilantly any attempt to whittle down the category of strategic materials.

These are grave days in which we live. The time may come when we may look back on these days as those in which important decisions were taken which contributed much to better relations, and the building of sounder foundations for peace in the world. But, Mr. Speaker, in all that we do, let us be realists; let us keep our powder dry when dealing with those who, unhappily, respect only force.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments at my disposal before ten o'clock I would like to deal with some of the things we have heard about from the hon. member for Eglinton Mr. (Fleming). Naturally enough I do not share the horror with which he apparently views, not only the statement of the leader of the C.C.F. but also the statement which the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) made in this house this afternoon.

I was particularly interested in the hon. member's denunciation of the communist regime in China for its attempt to fight its way into what he termed "polite international company". It sometimes seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we use words in a very strange manner. I am not quite sure what the hon. member's definition of "polite international company" is. Possibly it includes Francisco Franco of Spain, with whom the hon. member for Eglinton seems to have affinity; perhaps it includes all the little squalid dictatorships of Central America; perhaps it includes Dr. Salazar of Portugal; and I presume he must also include in that polite international society that member state of the United Nations which is the object of his fear and enmity, the Soviet union and all its satellites in Europe.

I wonder whether he considers as one of the members of that polite international society the successor of a regime which shot its way into power, and whether the hon. member for Eglinton would not suggest that even at this late date we should perhaps withdraw recognition from the administration in Washington.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we have to be a little realistic about this thing. We have to recognize the facts of life, however unpalatable they may be, and I would suggest that the logical consequence of our hon. friend's thesis is that as there is no possibility of being able to sit down in peace and amity with the present rulers of China then, of course, the only alternative is to blast them out of existence. On that score, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member and all those who feel as he feels have been grossly negligent in their duty for several years past, because we were perhaps in a rather better position to blast them out of existence a few years ago and we neglected our opportunity.

I wondered, Mr. Speaker, particularly when I listened this afternoon to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), if other people had the same reaction that I had when we were made to realize the real extent of the change in world relationships which has taken place during my lifetime.

I can recall before the days of 1914 when there were in the world a number of states, some of quite modest power, which nevertheless were able to pursue a fairly independent foreign policy within fairly wide limits because of their ability to either add or detract from the strength of some existing power bloc. It was on their ability to upset or to maintain this delicate balance of power that these states, most of them located in Europe, were able at that time to pursue a relatively independent foreign policy. In those days a discussion such as we are having this evening taking place in the parliament of one of those nations would, I imagine, have been devoted very largely to the actual discussion of that nation's foreign policy, what course it was going to pursue, and what independent stand it was going to take.

All that world went down the drain when the Germans marched into Belgium in August, 1914, and today we have an entirely different situation, so different that if we are to have a realistic discussion of Canada's foreign policy we are obliged in actual fact to discuss not so much our own foreign policy but the foreign policies of the two colossal power blocs in the world. I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs illustrated that very well this afternoon, because you will recall, sir, that a very large part of his address was devoted to a discussion and interpretation and, shall I say, a dissection of the foreign policy of our great neighbour to the south.

I believe one might well say that in that situation the foreign policy of a nation such as Canada must concern itself not only with the overt foreign policy of our great ally, or the overt foreign policy of our great hostile antagonist, but must also, as far as we are able, devote itself to a dissection and analysis of the internal affairs within these countries which develop that foregin policy.

I believe one might say, Mr. Speaker, that the two recent addresses the Secretary of State for External Affairs made in the United States and to which he referred this afternoon were welcomed with a sigh of relief from every intelligent Canadian. Some of us may have felt that they came rather late on the scene. Some of us may have perhaps felt that they might have been underlined more decisively, but nevertheless I believe the general reaction was one of relief among intelligent Canadians that at last the government of Canada was preparing to do the only thing that is open to it in the present state of world affairs, and that is to attempt to influence the internal policies of the United States and its consequent external policy.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that it is ten o'clock and with your permission I will beg leave to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: After we have disposed of this debate tomorrow we shall take the Criminal Code.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 26, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SALE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE NEWSPAPERS IN CAFETERIA

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you personally and on behalf of several of my colleagues for the immediate attention you gave to my recent suggestion in regard to the sale of French daily newspapers in the cafeteria. These newspapers have been made available for several days now and I thank you for it.

(Text):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXPLANATION OF CHANGE IN AMPLIFYING SYSTEM

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will have noticed that the roving microphone which was used yesterday as an experiment has now disappeared. It has proven to the engineer operators and to all of us, I think, that whenever a member speaks he should direct his voice to the microphone nearest to him, and hon. members surrounding the member who has the floor should remain as silent as possible; otherwise the noise which is being made around the member who has the floor is picked up by the suspended microphone and that rather annuls the strength of the voice of the one who has the floor.

There may be other questions that hon. members would wish to ask about this system. I am not an expert. I have asked the engineer operators whether they would meet the members in order to discuss whatever points they may wish to have answered, and they have agreed, in the most co-operative manner, to be here on Monday between eleven and one o'clock on the floor of the house, and if hon. members wish to come down and ask questions about the system they will be pleased to answer whatever queries hon. members might make.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher) presented the first report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): I have the honour to present the fourth report of the standing committee on standing orders.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the intention of the hon. member to move concurrence in this report today?

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Speaker, we shall not be able to move concurrence until Monday.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF BUDGET TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) I should like to lay on the table the budget of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, for the year 1954, in accordance with the provisions of section 12 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, chapter 39, Revised Statutes of 1952, and of section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, Revised Statutes of 1952, and as approved by the governor general in council by order in council P.C. 1954-448 of March 25, 1954.

On behalf of the minister, I move:

That the budget of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

CAPITAL BUDGETS FOR 1953 AND 1954 AND OPERATING BUDGET FOR 1954

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): On behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), I am tabling, in accordance with law, the Trans-Canada Air Lines capital budget (revised) for the calendar year 1953; Trans-Canada Air Lines capital budget, 1954; and the Trans-Canada Air Lines operating budget, 1954.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

IMPLEMENT INDUSTRY—MEETING BETWEEN REPRESENTATIVES OF AGRICULTURE AND LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and to ask him the nature of the meeting which is to be convened next week between representatives of agriculture and of labour; the purpose of that meeting; and also the identity of those invited.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a conference has been arranged for next week under the sponsorship of the national advisory council on manpower. The object of the one-day conference is to discuss the problems facing the farm implement industry. It will be a meeting of three representatives of organized labour directly employed in the farm implement industry; three representatives of management in the farm implement industry; three representatives of organized agriculture; and three representatives of government departments, namely trade and commerce, agriculture and labour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the Department of Labour to provide for similar meetings for other industries affected by unemployment?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that this conference on Tuesday is by way of an experiment in regard to an industry in which it is possible to bring together easily representatives from the three groups related to the industry, namely management, labour and consumer. Obviously in the case of the textile industry, for example, it would not be so easy to do that and, consequently, before giving a direct reply to my hon. friend's question I would rather wait and see what comes out of next Tuesday's meeting.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED REAPPOINTMENT OF ECONOMIC COMMITTEE ESTABLISHED IN 1945-46

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I asked a question as to whether the government had made any decision as a result of the suggestion put forward by the premier of Ontario that the dominion-provincial economic committee be reappointed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), speaking for himself, said he had not been able to give any consideration to that suggestion. May I ask the Prime Minister if the government has been able to take the matter into consideration? If so, has any decision been arrived at?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been discussed in council and, of course, no decision has been arrived at.

Mr. Fulton: May I then ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the suggestion made by the premier of Ontario as to the purpose that might be accomplished by the reappointment of such a committee, the government will take it into consideration and announce a decision in due course?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, the matter will certainly be considered, but it would not be practical to consider it in all its aspects without the presence of the Minister of Finance. My hon. friend will realize that between now and April 6 the Minister of Finance has to deal with things which are perhaps not more important but which do happen to be rather more urgent in view of the fact that he has declared the budget will be brought down on April 6.

CRIMINAL LAW

PROTECTION FOR WITNESSES APPEARING BEFORE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that a columnist's article which attacked capital punishment has resulted in a Vancouver publisher, editor, and columnist being cited for contempt of court? If so, I would like to ask the minister, in view of that, what protection a witness speaking in a similar vein before the joint committee of this house on capital punishment would enjoy?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my attention has not been drawn to the article in question, and before expressing any opinion concerning it I would like to read that article and ascertain the facts.

ATOMIC ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT FOR POWER PURPOSES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) I would like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Has the federal government received any representations from the provincial government of New Brunswick in connection with the development of atomic energy for power purposes in that province?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister I will take that question as notice and try to have an answer brought down in due course.

[Later:]

EFFECT OF HYDROGEN BOMB EXPLOSION IN THE PACIFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is reported in the press today that serious results have occurred from a reported explosion of a hydrogen bomb in the Pacific. In view of that, I would ask the minister: (1) whether the minister is being kept informed by certain governments regarding the effect of the bomb, and (2) if there is any possibility of radioactive dust falling upon cities on the Canadian Pacific coast?

Mr. Coldwell: And (3), what is he going to do about it?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. The answer to it is as follows. Although the Canadian government has not been given any information by other governments, and in this case, of course, it would be the government of the United States, concerning the effect of the range of the recent explosion of this hydrogen bomb in the Pacific, there is regular consultation with the United States government on the effect of nuclear explosions generally. I am not, of course, in a position to give a dogmatic reply to the second part of the question, nor, I suppose, is anyone else, but from information available we do not anticipate concentrations which could possibly be harmful on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Knowles: And what is the answer to the third question?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the minister yet in a position to tell the house how soon the government's legislation amending the War Veterans Allowance Act will be introduced?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

CUSTOMS ACT

IMPORTATION OF SLINGSHOTS AND MALAYAN STYLE THROWING DAGGERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in answer to a question by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) I advised him I would look into the matter of slingshots and Malayan style throwing daggers to establish whether representations had recently been received from any police authorities in regard to their importation. Our records indicate that no such representations have been received of recent date.

These articles are normally imported by sporting goods dealers for sporting and game purposes. When imported for these purposes no special permit is required. Should the general use made of these articles indicate that these importations are generally being used for offensive or dangerous purposes the department would consider curtailment of importation by a permit system similar to that operated for revolvers and dangerous firearms and would allow importation only on production of a permit issued by the local authorities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, last night at adjournment time I was remarking that I felt all intelligent Canadians must have greeted the speeches made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in the United States recently with a great sigh of relief that at long last the Canadian government was taking some steps towards effecting a modification of some of the madder aspects of American foreign policy. Last night I was about to add that I doubted whether a reading of the speech made by the minister in this house yesterday would afford the Canadian people the same sigh of relief. Rather I am afraid they would heave a sigh of dismay and consider that we have gone back to where we started.

The minister attempted to explain away for us the statement of the United States Secretary of State, and I wondered whether he had borne in mind the fact that, since he spoke and since Mr. Dulles replied, Mr. Dulles himself had explained away his reaction to the minister's speech in the United States. Presumably we can now expect to have Mr. Dulles again explain away the explanation that was given here in this house last night of his speech. I must congratulate the minister, though, on his skill in dissecting and analysing the meaning of words. I wish that it were possible, by modifying our interpretation of words, necessarily to be able to modify the reality behind those words. But unfortunately we in this world do not fight with semantic weapons. If we did so, let me hasten to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I would most gladly enlist under the generalship of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

In the course of his speech the minister mentioned the Berlin conference and spoke in terms which were referred to by a later speaker as rather melancholy terms. Undoubtedly the results of the Berlin conference were extremely melancholy for those who felt that there had been some hope of reaching some sort of modus vivendi with the Soviet union on that occasion. Of course it is easy—and unfortunately the conduct and the manner of the Soviet union representatives make it all too easy—to place the blame for the failure squarely on the shoulders of Russia. But in pointing to the mote in the Soviet's eye I wonder whether we sometimes overlook the beam in our own. Just what was our spirit when we entered the Berlin conference? I want to quote, Mr. Speaker, from reports that appeared a month before the Berlin conference. In the Globe and Mail of January 15, 1954, there is a report from Bonn, Germany:

> The west German Bundestag moved today to change the constitution to speed German rearmament inside a European army.

Here is another report on the same day from the New York Times. It is headed "Bonn house gets three rearming bills" and the subheading reads "Moves to amend constitution; pass first reading despite opposition of socialists". It reads in part as follows:

> Despite Socialist objections, three bills to provide for conscription and rearmament in west Germany by amending the constitution were introduced today in the Bundestag.

I suggest that those two events in themselves gravely imperilled any chances whatever of a satisfactory result coming from the Berlin conference.

I notice that there are those who feel that there was far too much haste on the part of the western representatives at the Berlin conference in the rejection of certain proposals that were made there. I quote from Mr. Sebastian Haffner, special correspondent to the London Observer and the Globe and Mail, as quoted in the Globe and Mail of February 25, 1954. Mr. Haffner has this to say in part:

> Take, for instance, the ideas for an all-European treaty about collective security in Europe, which Mr. Molotov tabled on February 10. They were at once rejected out of hand by the western ministers as if it were possible to study all their implications and draw desperate conclusions from such a study within twenty-four hours!

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that every delegate to that conference must have known, before he entered the chamber, that the proposals that were made for the reunification of Germany and the rearming of Germany as a member of the western bloc could not possibly be accepted by the Soviet delegates.

Let us for a moment place the shoe on the other foot. Let us for a moment ask ourselves what would have been the reaction from the western powers had the Soviet union produced proposals for a free German election and for the arming of Germany after it was well known that the Soviet union had the means of drawing that armed Germany into a satellite group with herself. We know perfectly well that we would have rejected that proposal out of hand.

I suggest that the disastrous change in the viewpoint which has taken place in the western world since 1945 with regard to the rearming of Germany has been the major stumbling block to reaching an agreement with the Soviet union and its allies. There was perhaps one thing which might have united east and west with regard to Europe and that one thing was the justifiable fear of a rearmed Germany. But in spite of that, of course, we proceeded with plans for the rearmament of Germany and held up our hands in holy horror when the Russians told us that they could not possibly accept such an agreement. At Berlin no serious attempt whatever was made to reach some compromise solution that would safeguard both east and west. Moreover, not only was no serious attempt made, but there were deliberate attempts—such as those I have quoted from the Bonn Bundestag—to sabotage that conference before it ever took place.

I know quite well that to speak in this vein is to run the risk of being smeared as a communist and a communist sympathizer. It does not concern me greatly if I am so smeared, Mr. Speaker. I will say this. There is probably no one else in this house who has suffered so much at the hands of the misguided and evil characters whom the Soviet union uses as its stooges in Canada. I have no sympathy whatever with the form of government that now obtains in the Soviet union. Nevertheless, in spite of all that, I cannot forget—though certain members in this house appear to be able to do so—that it was not the Russians who destroyed six million Jews in Europe; that it was not the Russians who had the concentration camps with the crematories that were attached thereto; and that it was not the Russians who trampled roughshod over the free states of western Europe. I cannot forget that two generations of Canadians have given their lives in order to conquer this danger spot in the heart of Europe. I cannot forget, Mr. Speaker, that twice in our own lifetime from this particular part of Europe there has arisen the most dangerous threat to human freedom.

An hon. Member: Do not forget the Russians.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): My hon. friend says "How about the Russians?" Quite so; how about the Russians. But I want to remind him again that it was the evil forces in Germany, consisting of the most conservative element in Germany combined with the evil gangster element of a military caste, which attempted to dominate the world.

An hon. Member: With the help of the conservative element in Great Britain.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes, with the help of the conservative element in Great Britain.

Mr. Brooks: How foolish can you get?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The hon. member has apparently forgotten the £400 million loan made by the Bank of England to the nazi regime just after it obtained power, after having sabotaged the democratic Weimar republic. I think we cannot afford to forget that there are in German society dark corners from which emerge periodically in the world this dangerous element, or this dangerous combination. Today those forces are again rising to the top in Germany. We ourselves have some measure of responsibility for that fact. Some hon. members may have noticed that I placed on the order paper the other day questions regarding SS General Kurt Meyer. I did this in response to correspondence from Great Britain where responsible and important military officers who were entrusted by the British government with the task of collecting and collating the evidence against German war criminals have been greatly disturbed by Canada's acquiescence in the release of this man. Today in the paper I see we have gone a step further and that now German war criminals are to be released and their identity kept secret. Now, sir, that has been of course the course of action ever since the end of the war, and under the aegis unfortunately of the United States, we must say bluntly and plainly, the western powers have been led to consort with all the most disreputable and reactionary elements in Europe to the destruction of the element in that society which might have built a better world in the heart of Europe. I think there can be no doubt from a reading of German history that that policy has been disastrously foolish. We have only to take the period, that very short period alas, when the Weimar republic flourished and Germany had the only democratic regime that country has enjoyed. With a virtually disarmed country we had there a flowering of culture that has never been known in the history of Germany since.

It is, moreover, a betrayal of the German people themselves in my opinion that we should place arms in the hands of those very forces within their own society who have led them to destruction twice within our own lifetime. Let me quote for a moment from what Dr. Walter Hallstein, minister of state for foreign affairs, had to say in Foreign Affairs of June, 1952, with regard to the proposal at that time of a neutralist Germany. He said:

> A neutralist role would prevent Germany from establishing solid bonds with other members of a real community of nations.

What solid bonds with other nations would have been prohibited to a neutral Germany? Only one type of bond, military bonds. There would have been no obstacle to such a Germany joining the United Nations, and despite the doubts of our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) about the United Nations being too universal an instrument I submit that the United Nations is perhaps the best and only hope of a real community of nations. What Dr. Walter Hallstein wanted obviously was the power to enter into military alliances, the power perhaps to use the military power of Germany as it has been used before, to play off the east against the west.

We hear of course very mild statements today from the good Chancellor Adenauer of the peaceful intentions of the Bonn regime, but Dr. Adenauer did not always speak in such terms. Only last year Dr. Adenauer, in his post-election speech at Bonn on September 7, shouted triumphantly to his followers:

> We have always spoken of the reunification of Germany, but should we not rather speak of the liberation of our brothers in the eastern zone. Our aim must be the liberation of the 18 million Germans in the east . . .

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the attempts of the Bonn government to get rearmament are a warning signal for the world. Can there be any other purpose from the German point of view—the desire for armaments, the desire again to play that disastrous role of pitting the east against the west, the desire once more to take control of the continent of Europe and use it as a base for attack upon the whole world. I submit that we would be foolish indeed if we persist in this policy of arming Germany, which, all too clearly now to anyone who studies reports from Germany, is again falling into the hands of that evil combination that has been a disaster to Germany and the rest of the world twice in our lifetime,—

Mr. Gauthier (Porineuf): That is a very strong statement.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): —a combination which is perhaps exemplified as well as anything by such people as General Kurt Meyer and Mr. Alfred Krupp, a combination that is perhaps best exemplified by all the ex-nazis who are now being released and the Ruhr industrialists, the same people and the same combination that very nearly destroyed human freedom in the world. I cannot forget that today. I cannot forget that two generations from this country went to destroy that danger; and to see our government acquiescing in rebuilding that danger today is to see the betrayal of everything that two generations of young Canadians fought for.

In the house yesterday we discussed the question of Asia. We heard ringing denunciations from certain quarters in the house of the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), if it was a suggestion—I am not sure whether he retracted it—that we should at some time recognize communist China. With regard to the whole question of Asia I feel that we have been the victims of the most ridiculous and puerile oversimplification. We speak very boldly of the wickedness of the Chinese and their aggression in Korea. We do not look at that against the background of China which for centuries was the victim of white exploitation, which for centuries had to suffer humiliation at the hands of Great Britain and other western powers, the humiliation of seeing a large part of their economy placed in the hands of these foreign elements, the humiliation of seeing extraterritorial rights wrenched from them without any possibility of protest, the humiliation of seeing their entire economy used merely as a milch cow for western Europe.

Against that background I think that perhaps the Chinese action in Korea may take on a different light. I have always felt that it must be extremely difficult for any oriental to distinguish between those of our race who have exploited them in the past ruthlessly, cruelly and most dishonestly and those of our race who go to fight them under the bright banners of the United Nations. I feel, as many have felt, that in acquiescing as Canada did in the disastrous advances to the Yalu river in Korea we were in fact acquiescing in throwing away the very last chance we had that the Chinese people could be kept out of the clutches of the Kremlin. We threw them into their arms.

I am not sure whether it was yesterday but the Prime Minister did say at one time that we must consider the question of the admission of China to the United Nations and the recognition of China. I am going to suggest that we can view that perhaps in a more rational light if we do not use terms such as I have heard used on the floor of the house, used indeed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he spoke here in January, terms such as "the free world", "freedom-loving people", without specifying just what peoples are designated. I believe there is something a little intellectually dishonest in pretending that we can put into one bag as the free world such nations as Franco's Spain, Salazar's Portugal, such nations as Greece under a reactionary regime imposed upon them from abroad, such nations as the dictatorships of South America whose votes, incidentally, were the deciding votes in the United Nations that were supposed to be votes for a free world.

I feel that these oversimplifications are one of the dangers that face us today. What has Canada's role been in this whole affair? I was one of those who welcomed with great enthusiasm the speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the United States because I felt that when he made those speeches he went very far to redeem what had been, to put it as mildly as possible, a most embarrassing position for Canadians. Certainly I was embarrassed and I am sure a great many other Canadians were embarrassed when we read the report of a speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this house to the effect that, although the government to which he belonged considered that a certain resolution before the United Nations was ill-advised and ill-timed and not likely to contribute to world peace, nevertheless this government felt obliged to support it. As I say, I welcomed his recent speeches in the United States because I felt they had redressed our situation somewhat. What has Canada's role been? I think on the most charitable basis we can only say that it has been a somewhat shabby role.

We have left the other nations, who are not nearly as well equipped as we are, to stand up for principles of honesty and decency in the world. In our pursuit of peaceful relations and quiet agreement with our neighbour to the south, we have been led into some extremely dubious courses. We have voted against or have abstained from voting on such questions as colonialism, on such questions as the treatment of France's colonial possessions. We have done the same thing with regard to the native population of South Africa, and the menace to human freedom and world peace that it entails. These are the things that many Canadians see that make them slightly afraid, and ashamed of being Canadians.

I suggest, sir, that the time has come for calculated risks. There are times when caution is the most reckless and dangerous course to follow. I suggest that this is one of those times. Let us for a moment consider the recent developments in United States and British military policy, and see how they fit into our role in the world scene today. We are spending some $2 billion, presumably for defence, and yet every report from the United States and Great Britain suggests that the United States is now retreating, if one may use that word, to dependence upon peripheral strategy; to dependence upon the very thing of which Mr. Dulles spoke in the United States and to which our government took exception. They are depending upon the power to drop atom bombs on actual or potential enemies any time that they consider it necessary. I suggest, sir, in that case we may well question the value of many of our defence expenditures today. This afternoon I heard the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) state he had been investigating slingshots. I would suggest it might be a good idea for him to investigate some of our conventional weapons to see if they are very much more valuable in an atomic age. I would suggest a careful examination of this expenditure in the light of recent developments, and in the light of the recent horrors in the Pacific, because it might well indicate a large part of these expenditures are useless burdens on our economy. Such an examination may indicate that now is the time for decisive action, a reduction in our defence expenditures and the application of those funds to aid those parts of the world which may very well fall victims to communism through internal collapse and disorder.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) spoke of the necessity of a decisive act of faith. I could not agree more that we need some decisive act of faith, but not an act of faith in some power outside ourselves to save us from the results of our own folly and stupidity. We need faith that decency, courage, toleration and plain human kindness will promote a like response from those to whom we advance it. It is perhaps ironic that one who, like myself, has no religious beliefs should feel impelled this afternoon to bear witness to the conviction that the carpenter of Nazareth was not merely giving us counsel for moral perfection but giving us a practical prescription for human relationships and international relationships when he enjoined us to love one another and bear one another's burdens. The only sure foundation for stable human relationships is found in that doctrine.

I would say this to this government. The people of Canada are expecting you to give a lead of that sort today. They are expecting you to go forward and make that decisive act of faith. Let Canada go forward into the world with this as our slogan to that age-old query, "Am I my brother's keeper?", that we have only one answer, a resounding affirmative. Then, Mr. Speaker, you and I perhaps might be able to stand before the world and say with pride that we are Canadians. Otherwise, sir, if we are too cautious, if we are careful, if we think we can solve these problems by mutual destruction, then indeed the whole long course of human history from the caves of prehistoric days to the present has been, as someone said, a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I cannot rise in this debate to deal with the subject that is presented to us, Mr. Speaker, without referring for a moment to some statements that have just been made. I noticed the quotation concerning sound and fury signifying nothing, and that is what we have heard. But it goes farther than that. This hon. member has talked about the possibility of being ashamed of being a Canadian. May I say to the hon. members in this house, whatever basis we may have for differing as to the way in which Canada proceeds with its tasks, let no Canadian rise here and say he is ashamed of being a Canadian.

He poses a question for us, am I my brother's keeper? Let us examine that question. Let us ask him and ask others who pose that question, in the context in which it has been posed, what he thinks of those saintly Russians that he has pictured who have now enslaved a larger number of people than have ever been brought under a single slavery in the history of the world. Ask him that question and pose that same question to others who echo it in relation to the people in China today who did not come under communism through any peasant uprising, but as a result of an invasion of a Chinese fifth column, organized and dispatched on its task by Russian officers. Ask him what he thinks about the brothers, cousins, mothers, sisters, and relatives of people in this country now living beyond the iron curtain in Czechoslovakia, in Roumania, in Hungary, and think of the hundreds of thousands of people in this country of Ukrainian and Polish blood, whose relatives today are under that slavery. Ask him the question, am I my brother's keeper?

Yes, let that question be posed in relation to Belgium, with all its tradition of freedom and democracy. Let us forget no nation today under the communist yoke before we seek to pose the question, "Am I my brother's keeper?", if we are prepared to forget the hundreds of millions now under the vilest form of slavery the world has ever known. He did not need to remind us in this house that twice in a single generation the armed forces of Germany have been pitted against us in bloody war. There are too many men here in this chamber who felt the impact of that war to need any reminders of the realities of that terrible war.

There is no one I hope in this chamber today who is forgetful of the most frightful pages in the history of mankind when men, blind, insane, drunk with power, carrying to its ultimate insanity appeals to prejudice and race, exterminated people in Germany in their millions, in one of the most unforgettable and barbaric acts of mass murder one has ever known. We know that; and it is because of that we now can read in the pages of recent history what was done to seek to impress upon the people of Germany, as upon the people of Japan, that no longer in the international fellowship of mankind will murder and barbarism of that kind be tolerated.

Whatever legalistic arguments there may be about any details of the Nuremberg trials, we know that those trials represented an attempt to stamp out this evil thing. No matter whether all who should have been punished were punished, we know that the trials and the executions in Japan were for the same purpose.

In this imperfect world it is certain that many who should have been punished have escaped. This will not be the first time that the hand of friendship has been extended to those who have been defeated in war in the hope of bringing the people who have been defeated in that way into a fellowship and understanding that can be for the common benefit of all mankind.

The whole of our history, the whole genius of our society, is the attempt that has been made over and over again, and with considerable success, to bring into friendship and understanding those against whom nations have been engaged in bloody and terrible conflict.

No, it is unnecessary to remind members in this House of Commons that, twice in one generation, we have been engaged in terrible conflict with German armed forces. I can only repeat that there are too many here in this chamber who themselves took part in the combined effort to destroy those forces, to need any reminder of this kind today.

Then, let us look at the sympathetic attitude shown toward Russia by the speaker who has spoken to us in terms which, fortunately, in my recollection have not been used on earlier occasions in this chamber, since the departure of Mr. Fred Rose. Let us not use soft terms to describe this unqualified condemnation of the representatives of Great Britain, the United States and France who went to Berlin in the hope of achieving some measure of sanity in Europe, and extending that sanity to Asia as well.

What a strange and indefensible thing it is to hear these charges being made—here, in this chamber—against those who have been associated with us in the common purpose of the defence of freedom, and to hear these charges made in terms that, I am sure, will bring comfort to the representatives of the Kremlin who, here in Ottawa, are engaged in reporting any favourable things that they can send back to Moscow from here.

No, these remarks should not be overlooked, because the fact that they were made here today indicates why it is so necessary for us to keep clearly before the people of Canada exactly why it is that money is being spent on defence, and exactly why it is that young Canadians, at this very moment, are in Korea, are in Europe, are on the oceans of the world, ready to play their part if that ghastly necessity should ever arise to defend that freedom which is the priceless heritage of the democracy we cherish here in Canada under our parliamentary system.

Strange, indeed, that we should hear a defence of the Russian position at a time like this when we are about to be represented at Geneva, along with other nations who are going there, in the hope of presenting some ray of light, some prospect of freedom, to those now enslaved by the government of a nation which, itself, today might be enslaved had we not gone to its rescue in 1941 and 1942. Has anyone here forgotten the epic story of those ships which, from Canada and other free nations, through the frozen waters of the Baltic carried supplies to Russia in their desperate hour of need, so that the Russian soil and the people of Russia for whom we had friendship—no matter what their governments might be—should not be enslaved by that nazi system against which we were fighting at that time? Who has forgotten the story of young men, frozen to their death, not for the defence of Canadian soil but so that Russia might be saved from nazi invasion? Who has forgotten the young men in those ships which were under attack by air, by submarine, by surface ships and which were carrying the aircraft, tanks, trucks, and all those things Russia needed so desperately at that time to survive the full weight of the German onslaught, which then extended from the Baltic right through to the Black sea?

No, unfortunately it seems necessary to remind some people of those facts, and to remind them that one of the reasons that our freedom is in danger today is that the nation which we befriended at that time betrayed us after the war was over, extended its power into nations whose freedom we thought we were protecting, and today has enslaved some 600 million human beings. Nor is this the beginning of Russian dreams of conquest; nor is this the beginning of Russian dreams of power. How did Russia come to occupy the largest territory inhabited by any single nation? By conquest following broken promises throughout the centuries.

Ask any Ukrainian in Canada about the history of his country, and he will tell you why it is that the Ukraine came under Russian slavery 300 years ago. He will tell you of a tragic blunder exactly 300 years ago this year, when the Ukrainian government of that day, seeking to strengthen its position in relation to other nations, entered into an agreement of friendship with Russia. As with other nations throughout history, Russia then flooded the Ukraine with its armed forces, established its position and except for a short period following the first world war, the Ukraine has been enslaved by Russia ever since. Under different forms of government that has been the picture. Today the only difference is that a more Godless dictatorship, a more brutal form of slavery, a more heartless despotism, is in power in Russia than at any time in the past.

I was moved to make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, because of the strong words that have found their way into the pages of Hansard from the mouth of the speaker who just sat down.

Now, may I deal with the subject that is before us? We are dealing with no academic problems; we are dealing with no argument in mere terms of likes or dislikes; we are discussing the very possibility of survival as a free people. It is nothing less. It is in that light, it is with that approach that we should examine the situation now before us.

When we hear suggestions that it might be wise to reduce our armaments, when we hear suggestions that we could well rely less on military defence, surely we need only to ask one question: Where is there any evidence available that Russia has reduced its armed strength by one aircraft, one ship, one tank, one submarine or one man or woman in uniform? Nowhere. On the contrary, the boast has been repeated over and over again that their military strength is increasing all the time.

It is in the face of that military strength, of that brutal reality, that we should consider the problems now before us. It has been a refreshing incident of the parliamentary experience of those of us who have been here for a few years that almost without exception we have found common ground in regard to the policies affecting our international relations. At the time that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) left on his recent trip to visit so many countries around the world, he left with the genuine and wholehearted assurance of the members of this house that he could speak, and we hoped he would speak, on behalf of Canada and of all Canadians. We welcomed him back in the same spirit; we welcomed him back as the head of the government of Canada; we welcomed him back as the citizen chosen by the free vote of our people to speak with the highest measure of authority on behalf of Canadians outside of this country. Now it is necessary for us to examine the situation with which we are confronted.

Those of us who do not agree with any aspect of the position taken by this government, or any of us who are uncertain about the position of the government in regard to subjects in relation to which we have very strong and deep convictions, would be derelict in our duty if we did not speak with the utmost frankness in regard to those subjects. We had been led to believe that this motion to refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs would provide an opportunity for a statement on external affairs that would clarify the position of this government not only for the benefit of hon. members but for the people of Canada.

I must confess great disappointment in the statements made yesterday by the government. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) told us what had happened at Berlin. He told us of the failure of that conference except for the extent that the meeting at Geneva may be regarded as offering some hope. He told us also of the failure of that gathering to deal either with German unification or with a solution of the Austrian situation; and then he went on to deal with certain misunderstandings which had occurred as a result of a speech by Mr. Dulles some time ago. He pointed out the misgivings with which this government had heard of the announcement by Mr. Dulles of the assurance of massive retaliation in the event of circumstances arising which, in the opinion of the government of the United States, justified action of that kind. He spoke of the ambiguity of the words that had been used. He told us of the attempts which had been made to clear up the situation and to remove that ambiguity. He left us with the impression that massive retaliation would not occur without consultation.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe he can have quite accurately interpreted what was in his mind. If he had told us that there would be consultation in regard to the circumstances under which there would be massive retaliation, then I think it might conform with what we have been told by the President of the United States through press reports we have received. There is a difference, and a very great difference. The eventuality against which the massing of all this dreadful hitting power has been taking place is that frightful eventuality of attack, either on the United States or on one of the nations with which we are associated. Is it thinkable that if such an attack occurred those forces which have been assembled for the defence of freedom would be held in leash while there was consultation? It is unthinkable.

Is it within the realm of possibility that the government of the United States would permit bombing to continue, or atomic attacks from submarines or surface craft, continued day by day or even hour by hour, without action until there had been consultation? It is simply not a possibility. That was recognized only a few days ago in Britain when it was indicated quite clearly that there would be agreement as to the circumstances under which the bases in Britain would be used, but it was very clearly understood that retaliation would be immediate, massive and dreadful.

The fact is that we are perhaps nearer the hope of lasting peace today than we have been for a very long time. It is a terrifying thing to admit, but as we read of the ashes from the hydrogen bomb at Bikini blowing 800 or 900 miles still impregnated with the effect of that explosion, there must be in the minds of the men in the Kremlin, as of anyone else, how universal the destruction would be if the ultimate madness of war came once again.

There are many men in this chamber now who will remember how they were compelled to carry gas masks throughout the early years of the war. They were warned never to be without them. They knew that the enemy possessed, and that we possessed, gases of the most dreadful kind. That frightful weapon was never used. It was never used because it would have been so terrible on either side.

But here is something infinitely more terrible, so terrible in fact that it staggers the imagination. Only today responsible newspapers throughout the world are suggesting that great restraint should be exercised in the explosion of any more of these bombs. Editorials have pointed out that by accident someone may go beyond the controllable limit and thus send dangerous and deadly radiation throughout the greater part of the world. That is now a real and dreadful possibility.

One of these editorials in one of the most responsible newspapers published today pointed out that this presents the dreadful prospect that some madman, cornered and hopeless, might employ this dreadful weapon. That could be true. Certainly by every device within our power, certainly by every effort open to men of common sense and good will, we should be seeking to prevent that frightful possibility, which now unhappily is a possibility.

Anything I say will be said in the belief that what we do as a nation should bear that possibility in mind, and should keep that dreadful reality always before us in any decisions that are made. For that reason I wish to examine what was said yesterday, and what is still before us in regard to communist China and the conference which is to take place at Geneva.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) explained yesterday that under the pressure of questions by members of the press he thought he might have used words that did not exactly interpret the thoughts that were in his mind. No member of this house will show any disposition to question in any way the explanation he has given. Certainly there is not any member here who is unaware of the difficulties presented by the kind of questions that are presented under pressure as someone leaves an aircraft, gets off a train or arrives at his destination, when he is either at home or abroad. That explanation we accept without reservation. However, that does not dispose of the concern that is felt.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on an earlier occasion called our attention to the fact that the Prime Minister had used words similar to those which had been used on this occasion. It is true that those words had a distinctly different meaning in one particular aspect. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out to us that the Prime Minister last year had used words that did not speak of the government which the people wanted but which spoke of recognition in other terms. I am referring to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on March 8 last, as reported at page 2748 of Hansard. That was at the time a question had been asked with regard to these words which had been reported and which spoke of the government that the people wanted. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said this:

> That is a press quotation from the Prime Minister's statement in respect of the recognition of the communist government of China. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said almost exactly the same thing in Ottawa on June 12, 1953, when he spoke on the same subject. He said then:
>
> "We have got to be realistic on such problems and be prepared to deal with those who represent the nation over which they exercise authority."

Mr. Speaker, that statement has been given to us as one interpreting the position of the Prime Minister. But since the Prime Minister has left the matter—and I use the word in no way offensively—in the same situation as that in which Mr. Dulles' statement apparently originally was, namely in a state of some ambiguity, let us see what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been saying on this subject. He was noticeably silent on this subject yesterday, but he has not been silent on it recently; he has made a number of statements with regard to this subject. I therefore think it would be appropriate to examine what he has said, bearing in mind that this discussion arose in relation to Canada's position at the conference that is to take place in Geneva on April 26. Amongst other statements—and there were other speeches dealing with this subject—the Secretary of State made one dealing with it in Washington on March 15, one at Chicago on March 19 and one in Windsor on March 22. In Washington he said this, and I quote his words according to the press dispatch:

> There is no question of recognition while the Korean war is unsettled, . . .

In Chicago he said that we would be prepared to consider recognition—and I use the words in quotation marks that were in the report—"if there are no new aggressions". In Windsor—and again I quote the words exactly as they appear in the report—he said:

> If Red China adopts a conciliatory attitude at the Geneva conference in April, Canada might take a new look at the situation.

Then he added these words:

> "And remember, . . . that conference is to be about Korea."

Mr. Speaker, these statements are certainly not open to the same ambiguity as were those of the Prime Minister yesterday. I of course refer back to the words of the Prime Minister which were placed on record as recently as March 8 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They do not appear to be ambiguous, because the Prime Minister had said:

> We have got to be realistic on such problems and be prepared to deal with those who represent the nation over which they exercise authority.

In those words there is no question of consent; the words used were "the nation over which they exercise authority".

I should just like to place on record certain words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in addition to those I have quoted, from the press reports dealing with those speeches I have mentioned. In the press report of the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Washington on March 15, he said this:

> . . . one of these days there will have to be another look at the whole question, with a decision to be based on our national advantage and international advantage. That doesn't mean any probability of recognition at this time.

Then in Chicago on March 19, according to the Canadian Press dispatch of March 20, the Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say:

> There is a strong attitude against recognition of that (Red China) regime in the United States but we in Canada are a little more cautious. We feel that if there are no new aggressions in the near future we should take another look at that problem —a more realistic, less emotional look.

Then on March 22, just four days ago, in Windsor, according to another Canadian Press dispatch the Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say:

> "Realistic doesn't mean that we will recognize Red China tomorrow, or refuse to recognize her a year from tomorrow",—

That is the end of the exact quotation.

> —he said, commenting on a suggestion that recognition of the Peiping regime would be Canada's only "realistic" course of action. If Red China adopts a conciliatory attitude at the Geneva conference in April, Canada might take a new look at the situation. "And remember", Mr. Pearson added, "that conference is to be about Korea".
>
> If the Reds are willing to give assurances that their aggression in Korea is a thing of the past, and that they are ready to take an honest line in international affairs, he said, Canada must consider following Great Britain's lead in recognizing the Peiping regime.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada. These are the words of the minister charged with the first responsibility for external affairs. These are the words of the minister who speaks for the government and must speak for the government with regard to external affairs. Therefore, even though there be some ambiguity and even though there be some variety in the explanations of the approach, we have this definite statement as reported in the press. Of course I recognize that I am simply repeating a Canadian Press dispatch, and I would point out that these words in the dispatch are a summary of what he said:

If the Reds are willing to give assurances that their aggression in Korea is a thing of the past and that they are ready to take an honest line in international affairs, he said, Canada must consider following Great Britain's lead in recognizing the Peiping regime.

These words have a reminiscent sound. Who will forget that tragic figure, umbrella and all, getting off the plane which had returned from Munich? Who will forget that tragic and earnest figure, that sincere man, so hopeful that he had done something for peace, so completely dedicated to the task and yet so misled in what he had done? Who will forget the picture of Chamberlain getting off the plane on returning from Munich? Who will forget his words—"peace in our time"? Who will forget his assurance that Hitler had told him that he had no further desire for territorial aggression? Who will forget how short a time after that it was that the world was plunged into a bloody and dreadful war, not entirely without some relationship to the fact that the German government thought that there was going to be no stopping of the step by step appeasement of their further demands for still more territory?

No, surely so soon after the last war we are not going to forget that if there was one thing about which everyone was agreed in 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945 and in the years that followed it was that appeasement did not bring peace but was one sure way to invite a tyrant to start a war. That was what everybody said. We all said it and I think we all believed it. I believe it today and I think there are many others who do. I think that by every sign of encouragement offered either to the Kremlin or to their associates, from which they might be led to believe that further territorial aggression will be possible without any active measures being taken, we are indeed actually increasing the prospects of war.

I use the word "war" and not "aggression". It was cruel, terrible and bloody war in Korea, and it was the government of Mao Tse-tung which was responsible for that war. It was the troops of Mao who were fighting our young men only a few months ago. When we talk of recognition of the government of communist China, let us remember that we are talking of recognizing a government whose hands are still red with the blood of young Canadians and young men from other lands who went to Korea to defend a principle as well as a territorial area within that tragic peninsula.

Surely we do not need to be in any doubt about the fact that China will give assurances that it will not start any other aggression. Yesterday we had placed on the record the statements of Lenin and the advice given by the communist teachers that no deception, no dishonesty, no misrepresentation should be avoided if it will serve the purpose of communist activities. That was an instruction given to those weak-minded people who were inclined to follow the course of honour. These instructions were given to communists who had made the mistake of acting as decent men and women. They were told they must not be misled by any restraint of decency of that kind, that they must lie, that they must deceive, that they must misrepresent as part of the great world struggle of communism.

Certainly the government of communist China will give assurances that there will be no further aggression. One of the reasons I am speaking in this debate, on a motion that we all support, is to raise my voice, which I am certain is not a voice speaking alone, against any possibility of Canada saying at Geneva that there will be recognition only upon the basis of some assurance by communist China which has been declared an aggressor by the United Nations. That is the purpose of these statements. That is the hope with which we present our arguments, that they may have some impact on the thoughts of those who have the responsibility for representing us on that occasion. I most certainly am not in any way going beyond the bounds of the words used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when I say that the words attributed to him in the press reports to which I have referred leave a clear and unmistakable impression that as long as the communist government of China gives assurances that there will be no further aggression then Canada may take a more realistic and less emotional outlook.

Mr. Pearson: That is a completely wrong interpretation.

Mr. Drew: I am not incorrectly interpreting the report. I am certainly not incorrectly interpreting the report.

Mr. Pearson: It is a completely wrong impression.

Mr. Drew: I am certainly not giving a wrong impression of the words. I am giving the words themselves. Let me read the words again if there is any such suggestion. If the minister is not correctly reported then let him say so. He has not said so at any time yet, nor has he suggested it. These are the words attributed to him in quotes from his speech in Chicago:

> There is a strong attitude against recognition of that red China regime in the United States. But we in Canada are a little more cautious. We feel that if there are no new aggressions in the near future we should have another look at that problem —a more realistic, less emotional look.

Again I repeat, in view of the interruption, the statement attributed to him in the Canadian Press dispatch from Windsor on March 22:

> If the reds are willing to give assurances that their aggression in Korea is a thing of the past, and that they are ready to take an honest line in international affairs, he said, Canada must consider following Great Britain's lead in recognizing the Peiping regime.

If those are not correct reports, then by all means let him correct them. If they are correct reports, Mr. Speaker, they represent a position which I, for one, in this house personally hope with all my heart will not be expressed by Canada at Geneva on April 26. It is with that hope that these statements are being made. Nothing that has been said so far in this debate by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister gives us any reassurance in relation to those words.

What about Indo-China? There is no reference to Indo-China in this statement. Do these statements, by the exclusion of Indo-China, mean that so long as assurances are given in connection with Korea our government is prepared to consider recognition, even if the war in Indo-China continues? I hope there will be no suggestion of that. I hope it will not be forgotten that, distant though the relationship may be, there are young men from France fighting in Indo-China today who have blood relatives in Canada who have been fighting the same communist evil in Korea within these past few months. I hope it will not be forgotten that France, our historic ally throughout the great struggle of the past for the freedom we now seek to preserve, is engaged in a deadly and terrible conflict with armed forces which could not remain in the field for a single day if they were not supported and maintained by this communist government in Peking.

No, Mr. Speaker, I will welcome the assurance of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he said something that was not contained in this report. I will welcome assurances from him that when he emphasized the fact, and took pains to emphasize the fact, that the conference was only for Korea and that if there were assurances in regard to Korea recognition might be considered, the government of Canada will not go to Geneva and offer any hope to the Peking government that there can be any thought of recognition while this costly struggle in Indo-China is carried on with its support.

Let us remember also that when we talk about recognition we are not speaking about the fact that we recognize the reality of the existence of a communist government in Peking, as the Prime Minister said yesterday. Let us remember, when we talk of recognition in its diplomatic sense, we are talking about formal recognition of a government whose armed forces have been fighting against ours, which has been declared an aggressor and which is anything but a peace-loving nation by present standards.

There is another thing that has not been mentioned by the government but which was mentioned by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his very comprehensive and forceful examination of this subject yesterday. Recognition of the communist government of China means entry into the United Nations. Do not let the Secretary of State for External Affairs or anyone else in this house suggest it can be otherwise.

It cannot be otherwise, for one very simple reason. The United Nations charter was signed by nations. Men appended their signatures only as the individuals charged with the responsibility of speaking for a nation that was represented there. It surely is not without significance that when we look at the charter of the United Nations, signed with such solemnity in San Francisco on June 26, 1945, the first name to appear in the long list of signatories is that of China. It is not the nationalist government of China, not the Peking government, not the republic of China, but just China. Then are appended the names of those who signed under instructions of the Chinese government in those days. There can only be one China, just as there can only be one United States, one Britain, one France, one Italy and one of every other nation whose representatives signed there.

If we recognize China we recognize that government as the government of China, and who then can deny them access to the United Nations? Who then can say that they have not the right to be there as the representative of the nation which signed? We know that Formosa is only a part of China. We know that Formosa is only a small part of the territory embraced under the term "China". It is neither a practical possibility, nor is it contemplated that if there is recognition China will be denied admission to the United Nations. If there is anyone in any doubt, let him read the reports of the speeches of Sir Gladwyn Jebb and the Secretary General of the United Nations in London last Friday, where they, to my surprise, rather took some people in the United States to task for resisting the entry of communist China into the United Nations. Read the speeches and read the arguments, and you will find there is not any doubt that those who are talking of recognition are talking of the entry of communist China into the United Nations.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my remarks are directed not alone to any technical form of recognition, and I recognize that there are six distinct forms of recognition as put on the record last night by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) from one of the greatest experts on international law.

Let us not becloud this subject with any legalistic limitations. There may be six types of recognition, but the kind of recognition that is talked about and is thought about is the kind of recognition that would open the door to the United Nations building in New York. Therefore let us consider this subject on that basis, when we express our opinions now as to the course Canada should follow at Geneva on April 26.

Who are supposed to be members of the United Nations? There are terms of membership. Article 4 describes those who are qualified in this way:

> Membership in the United Nations is open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present charter and, in the judgment of the organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations.

Who, in their right senses, could suggest that China at this time is a peace-loving nation? Who, in their right senses, at this time could suggest that communist China can subscribe, in honour, to the obligations contained in the charter of the United Nations?

Oh, but it may be said, "What about Russia, which is a member of the United Nations?" Yes, Russia signed the United Nations charter in June of 1945, at a time when we were fighting in a common cause, at a time when Russia was receiving without stint from Canada, from the United States and from Great Britain, military supplies and equipment of all kinds to help them in that terrible struggle. Yes, Russia signed at a time that we had hopes—not justified by events, it is true—but nevertheless at a time we had hopes that Russia was prepared to act with some decency within the fellowship of the nations of the world.

There is a great difference between expelling a nation already a member, and permitting a nation to enter. Expulsion is practically an impossibility, in any event. But, Mr. Speaker, let us remember this, that if China is permitted to enter the United Nations, and Sir Gladwyn Jebb said it should be permitted to do, and as Mr. Hammarskjold indicated he thought it should be permitted to do—let us remember that not only does it become a member of the United Nations, but that it becomes a member of the United Nations with unique powers, authority and privileges. It becomes a member of the United Nations with those same special powers possessed by the United States, Great Britain, Russia and France, with the power of veto, and with other special powers giving it immense importance.

Could there be anything that would be more openly declared lunacy than for any person today to suggest that the United Nations is going to be an effective force for peace, and to stop aggression, if we invite into that special forum a nation which at this very moment is a declared aggressor and which has been waging bloody, cruel and frightful war? Not only has China been waging brutal, cruel and bloody war, but it has been defying those international rules which still have imposed at least some limits upon the horrors of war between decent nations.

Who has failed to read with sickening heart the stories printed about prisoners returning from Chinese prison camps, where murder, beatings, starvation and all the horrors referred to already, which came from that twin evil, nazism—who, I say, can read those and then talk about welcoming this nation as a fellow peace-loving nation at this time?

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why communist China should not become a member of the United Nations under present circumstances, and why it is folly even to be talking about the possibility of that occurrence. When Canada, along with the other nations that signed the North Atlantic pact, entered into that mutual arrangement for defence, they implied—if they did not state in explicit terms—that the United Nations was incapable, under present conditions, of acting to prevent aggression.

Everyone knows the procedure by which troops were moved to Korea, and how the United Nations was brought into it. But, Mr. Speaker, we all know that, through the ordinary machinery of the United Nations, that act which has been a great deterrent to aggression would not have been a practical possibility. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, carried out it is true within the structural framework of the United Nations Organization, as was ANZUS, recognized that if the free nations are going to be able to build up their defences against aggression, they must do it through some channel other than the ordinary machinery of the United Nations Organization. That does not mean that the United Nations Organization is not effective for many useful purposes. It does not mean that we should not support it in every way we can in the hope that through the years ahead it may become a forum for the reasonable discussion of international problems and for the advancement of the economic and social welfare of all people. In so far as effective defence against aggression is concerned, it has been necessary to follow another course.

In view of that fact, how can we justify any suggestion at this time of making the United Nations even less effective than it is today? What would happen would be that you would have Russia and China acting in unison to disrupt every effort at constructive development within that organization. You would simply double the trouble that Russia has already been able to make because of their special position. You would simply increase by exactly 100 per cent the measure of paralysis that has been imposed upon the United Nations Organization by Russia's planned sabotage.

No, Mr. Speaker, while this is not something in regard to which we are called upon to vote, let us hope that there will be a sufficiently emphatic expression here of a desire to see no compromise with this evil, that there will be no uncertainty at Geneva as to what the position of Canada is. It is my earnest hope that between now and April 26, when that conference begins, as a result of the discussion that has taken place here, there will be further discussion throughout Canada that will inform the government that the people of Canada want no compromise with the devil.

What a pitiful hope is that vain hope expressed in terms of such utter unreality that if only we should be kind, generous and gentle to Mao Tse-tung perhaps he will forget his associations with Moscow and will embrace our free nations in a formal fellowship which will pit him against Russia in their threat to the world. What a mad dream! What a dangerous dream! What a pitfall for nations which fell into that pit once before. Just let us remember certain things which indicate what folly it would be to embrace any such preposterous dream.

There is a vast difference between Yugoslavia and China, not in the principles to which they adhere, not in the form of government, but in certain geographic realities. I almost hesitate to use that word "realities" or "realistic", having regard to the context in which it has been used, because "realistic" has been used as "materialistic", but "realistic" nevertheless perhaps does describe the approach we should make to it.

Tito broke with the Kremlin not because he had broken with communism, but because he had certain ambitions of his own and because he had a very powerful mountain barrier between him and Russia, and because he had behind him the ocean where he could get supplies from those who, wisely or unwisely, were prepared to give them to him. Can anyone think for one moment that if Tito had been on the other side of a great ocean and had no prospects of military supplies and other help, he would have invited certain punishment that would have been visited upon him by Russia's forces at that time?

No, Mr. Speaker, there were many reasons why Tito took the stand he did, and we should welcome that, and we should hope that as the first step toward free government the same thing may happen in other lands. And I say "the first step toward free government", because it is my hope that under the influence of the outside world Yugoslavia may gradually emerge from communism into a better form of government that will bring freedom to its people. That is a possibility, once they are separated from the Kremlin. It is not a possibility as long as that slavery is a continuing reality.

Let us see what chance there is of a similar thing happening in the case of Mao. May I repeat something that needs to be repeated? Mao Tse-tung did not lead any agrarian uprising. He used so-called agrarian uprisings and he used everything else that would help his cause at different times; but the turning point in the career of Mao Tse-tung came after what is known as the long march when, having fought his way more than 5,000 miles across China, he found himself on the Soviet border, in valleys, under the shadows of the mountains where, with the assistance of Russian officers, Russian supplies and Russian equipment he could prepare the army that later invaded China.

We need not compare governments; we are not called upon to examine the merits or demerits of Chiang Kai-shek or those associated with him in Formosa in discussing this subject. There were times when there was not the same resentment against Chiang Kai-shek as is expressed today. Nevertheless, that subject does not come up in considering this question of admission of the communist government of China to the United Nations.

Every argument I make is as potent an argument if there were no government in Formosa, or if the government of Formosa were itself a vassal of the Kremlin. I am dealing with this simply on the basis of the admission of a government such as that headed by Mao Tse-tung. No; let us remember what happened. They organized, and this Chinese fifth column, well supplied, well equipped, well trained, invaded China, and they were able to set up a government in China because of the support of Russia.

Let us consider now what the likelihood would be of Mao Tse-tung divorcing himself from the Kremlin. I am sure that every hon. member of the house who saw the photographs of the recent parade in the great square at Peking saw that they were similar to the military parades across red square in Moscow. If they did, they saw a formidable display of tanks, mobile cannons, and armed might reminiscent not only of those parades across red square in Moscow, but reminiscent of the equipment which appears in those parades, because every gun, every tank, every aircraft, every truck, and every piece of equipment was the same as those that would be seen in the parade in Moscow, and for the obvious reason that they came from the same factory.

Let us look at it the other way, Mr. Speaker. What is going to happen if encouragement be offered to Mao's government? There will be some people who will rejoice because it was as recently as March 6 that a directive was issued to the communist party in the United States dealing with this and other subjects. That directive is similar to directives issued to communist parties in every country where there is a communist party, though not to communist governments for they do not require them. They issue other kinds of directives in those countries. But in every country where we so generously permit treachery of that kind these directives have been issued, and one of the things for which the communists are ordered to work is the achievement of recognition of communist China.

I do not suggest, Mr. Speaker, that just because it happens that they ask for that we should close our ears to any argument, but I must say that I for one am not particularly anxious to find myself engaged in a procedure which will bring comfort and solace to those men who are acting as traitors in our midst for purposes outlined by the Kremlin. Nor do I suggest for one moment that any hon. member opposite would have any such feeling. I am not so sure about the attitude of one hon. member who has spoken in this debate, but that, of course, is something for which he alone is responsible, both for the interpretation and for the words themselves. No, Mr. Speaker, this is a reality and we all have a duty to approach it in the sense of reality.

Let us turn to another aspect of the situation. One of the things that has been said is that if communist China gives assurances that we then might be inclined to follow the course which Britain followed. But let us not be under any misapprehension as to the course which Britain followed. Personally, I think it was a great mistake that they recognized communist China at the time they did, and that is not my opinion alone. It is the opinion of the present British foreign secretary. In fact he went so far as to say that it was terrible that it had been done at the time and in the way it was done.

Those who are inclined to blame Britain for what they did might well remember that this took place under a socialist government in Britain, and that the situation was one which was taken over by the present government of Britain. Only the present government of Britain is in a position to state what it would do, but in view of the statement made by Mr. Eden as long ago as January, 1950, I have little doubt that he would have taken a very different attitude had the opportunity been presented to him.

I spoke of the word "terrible", Mr. Speaker. What Mr. Eden was emphasizing was how terrible it was that there had been any lack of unity in details of that kind. I would like to quote from a statement he made published in the Daily Telegraph and Morning Post of London dated January 20, 1950:

> The Far Eastern policies of the Atlantic powers and their friends are in a rather dismal tangle. They all apparently intend the same thing, but they are moving at so different a pace that they are jerkily out of step. The recognition of the communist government in China provides a recent example of this inconsistency, though not the most important. A divergence of view and discrepancy in action between the British and American governments in this instance may even do good if they draw attention in both countries to the need to co-ordinate their policies without further delay. As regards the actual recognition, there is a fair field for argument on practical, as well as on legal, issues. The decision to recognize is no doubt eventually inescapable, but it is a real misfortune that in this, as in other Far Eastern matters, we should be acting piecemeal, both within the commonwealth and as between the commonwealth and the United States. The French, too, appear to be embarrassed by our timing.

Mr. Eden went on to point out the need for greater unity of action, and he emphasized that the problem was not merely military but economic. Of course, at that time there had been no attack in Korea. That, Mr. Speaker, changed the situation. There can be no question about that. But what Britain was out to do is another thing. However, Mr. Speaker, respecting as we do the motives of the government which took this action, and I respect the sincerity and high purpose of the government which made that decision, the fact remains that this decision is a decision for Canada. This decision is a decision for the government of Canada acting, to the best of their ability, as the interpreters of Canadian opinion and the wishes of our people. It is what is good for Canada, it is what is good for the future of our people and of all mankind.

Before I close these remarks let me deal with one other subject, because it is inseparably embraced in this whole problem. I refer to the question of trade. One of the arguments that has been put forward is that unless there is recognition we may deny trade with China which could be profitable to us. This widens out into the problem of trade with Russia. It would be well for every hon. member at this time and for every Canadian to review the history of trade with Russia between the two wars. I cannot recall any case where that trade had not turned out to our disadvantage. I cannot recall any case where the trade was not simply an extension of Russian policy to try to dominate the world.

Many hon. members here will recall what happened when the British market and then our own was affected by contracts for the purchase of lumber. Many people in this country whose work depends upon lumber—the cutting of lumber and the shipping of lumber—will recall that Amtorg made a contract in this country through its agent to sell lumber here at $12 a thousand and they had a proviso in that contract that they would adjust the price so that they would undersell any competitor under any new contract by $5 a thousand. The cost of cutting that lumber did not matter. That was a deliberate attempt to upset our economy in one aspect. So it was with pit props, so it was with pulp and so it was with other things that were sold not only to us but to the markets we ordinarily supply.

I am greatly concerned about the reports I read in the press of Britain talking about buying Russian wheat, Russian grain, Russian lumber and other things that we ordinarily sell to Britain. Mr. Speaker, this is an economic problem as well as a military problem. Russia's declared intention is to do what they can to upset the economy of the free world. That is what the communists are working for in Canada, in the United States, in Britain and in every country where they are today. What other purpose could they have? Let us remember that it has no relationship whatever to the cost of the wheat, the lumber, the pit props or the other things they sell. Do any of our people forget how the gold is mined with which they are buying things today? Do any of our people forget how the greatest part of the labour is found to cut the lumber that is sold here? Do any of our people forget how the labour is found to cut the pit props that destroyed our market and are destroying it again? It is slave labour.

Let us remember that there are fifteen million people being worked to death in the concentration camps of Russia. I hope that the hon. member who spoke in such soft terms of Russia this afternoon will remember that fact. There are fifteen million human beings, like ourselves—the number of people that live in Canada—being worked to death in the concentration camps of Russia which in no way differ, except in their size, from the concentration camps of Germany to which the hon. member very properly referred. That is where they find their labour. Are we going to stand by without any question and see our markets occupied by the product of slave labour? For that is what it is.

Then what about China? The British recognized China in 1949 and they have not been able to reach any agreement with them yet as to trade arrangements. That is a long time. They could have conveniently waited and not have suffered any disadvantage. There are a few things to be done before we talk about trading with China, instead of having mere assurances and promises. What about the $12½ million worth of ships which they stole? Hon. members have not forgotten the Ming Sung ships, I hope. More than assurances are needed. They are not only murderers; they are robbers.

An hon. Member: They go together.

Mr. Drew: Yes, they go together.

An hon. Member: They are in the same camp.

Mr. Drew: Yes; they are in the same camp. Those are the people in regard to whose activities some people are now expressing such mild and generous hopes.

Mr. Speaker, we do not need to sell our principles for a few dollars' worth of trade. We do not need to sell ourselves down the Yangtze river or any other river in the name of peace. We learned before that we do not get peace in that way. We learned before that the way to get terrible war is to encourage robbers and murderers to believe that we have not got the stuff it takes to stand up for our principles. Do not let anybody suggest that what I am saying is either warlike or encouraging war.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Listen to the fellow travellers laugh, Mr. Speaker. I repeat that if the people who spoke in this house and elsewhere, and from the very party whose new members find that suggestion somewhat amusing, meant what they said in 1940—and I believe they did—then they believe implicitly that the only way in which to preserve peace is to stand by your principles and to try to get the free nations to establish a pattern of principles that our opponents know will not be abandoned. That was what we said. That was the great lesson we said we had learned. Let us not forget it today.

Mr. McIvor: Five o'clock.

Mr. Drew: All right, Mr. Speaker; if you wish to call it five o'clock, I shall break off at this point.

Mr. Speaker: As it is five o'clock, the house will now consider private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

COMMERCE MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 198, respecting Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Eudes—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Name changed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: May we have an explanation from the sponsor?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: Are you the new member for Hochelaga?

Mr. McIlraith: No. I have not yet moved to Hochelaga, Mr. Chairman. I still have my own identity and still am very happy to have it, whatever some others may think of that identity.

The Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company was incorporated by private act in 1927. At that time the business of the company was that of a fire insurance company. Since that time it has added other types of insurance until at the present time about 60 per cent of its total business is fire insurance business and the other 40 per cent is divided among other types of insurance such as automobile insurance, sprinkler insurance, tornado insurance and so on.

The change of name proposed is to "The Commerce General Insurance Company". No objection was taken to the proposed new name either in the committee of the House of Commons or in the committee of the Senate, and there has been no objection by the superintendent of insurance who attended before both committees. There is of course provision in the bill for the corresponding name in the French language.

Mr. Macdonnell: When the sponsor says no objection was raised by the superintendent of insurance, can we take it that it is a little more than that, that he is satisfied that there is no conflict of names? In other words, can we take it that we are passing it with his full approval?

Mr. McIlraith: Oh yes, that is quite right. He does not originate the bill in any way, but there is no objection of any kind either on the part of other firms or because of any possible conflict in the view of the superintendent of insurance.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: There are several divorce bills on the order paper. Shall they all be taken in the same motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. W. G. Weir (for Mr. Hunter) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 379, for the relief of Gerald Emile La Grave.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 380, for the relief of Rita Boucher Dufort—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 381, for the relief of Lucy Halga Saunders Gibson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 382, for the relief of Antonie Lutz Jedrzejewski.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 383, for the relief of Jessie Clarke Thompson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 384, for the relief of Dorothy Coughtry Paquette.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 385, for the relief of Isabel Ruth Smith Newey.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 386, for the relief of Eugene Clifford Carbonneau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 387, for the relief of Jean Antoine Francois Armand.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 388, for the relief of Maria Clara Anita Cauchon Quirion.—Mr. Hunter.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: The business which was to be considered during this hour having been dealt with, the house will now revert to the matter under consideration prior to five o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in the remarks I have made I have in no way overstated my very strong and deep conviction that we are at a point in history very similar to that with which the free nations were confronted in the year 1935. Then people were ready to take assurances. In 1937 and 1938 the situation became still more critical. Finally, at the time of Munich, it reached its clearest expression when Czechoslovakia, brave, prosperous, free and democratic Czechoslovakia, was made a pawn and sacrificed to the vain hope of a peace that became less of a possibility because of that very act. It seems reasonably clear that if the nations had stood together without hesitation and had not relied on Hitler's assurances that he had no more territorial ambitions many millions of people who now lie in distant and, in many cases, unmarked graves, might be alive and enjoying the decent things that we ourselves share today.

I believe this is one of the most solemn hours in history. I believe that the Geneva conference beginning on April 26 can either be a second Munich or the glorious reassertion of the principles that were stated at Versailles in 1919 and abandoned, and the principles which at San Francisco in 1945 were incorporated in the United Nations charter and which we can still save. In addition, in the emphatic statements I have made against the recognition of China under present conditions and in the circumstances we see today, in the emphatic stand I have taken against the entry of communist China into the United Nations—that would come automatically with recognition and no argument will convince me to the contrary for the reasons I have stated and in the light of speeches to which I have already referred—and in the emphatic statements I have made about trade either with communist China or with Russia until there is evidence of a type of conduct and not mere assurances, I have sought to place before the house the things that I hope our government will not do. I have sought to place before the house the position that I hope they will take, and in saying that I know that I express the thoughts of those with whom I am associated. I wish to remove one uncertainty, and one alone, that may conceivably be raised at any time if anyone wished to try to interpret my words in that way.

No one can say that anything is forever in this very uncertain world. Only a few years ago we were fighting Germany and we were fighting Japan. A course of action was taken which, rightly or wrongly, was believed to be a course that would purge these countries of the people who had led them along the dreadful path they had followed. We are dealing with something very different here today.

The faith that most of us share in whatever manner we worship one God is a faith that always contemplates the possibility of a change in conduct, forgiveness and of the return to fellowship and decency of those who have offended against the laws of God and the laws of man. These same principles surely apply in the international field. Certainly we cannot contemplate the possibility of China, with its 400 million people, or Russia with its 200 million people and the many millions more who will be there in the years to come, being separated for all time from us or from ordinary, decent contacts. Surely our hope is that in God's good time, through evolution and changes which no one can envisage today, freedom will come to them, the kind of freedom that we wish for ourselves.

But no one suggests that we can establish that freedom by imposing our will on other people. It must come by steps which we cannot now foresee. However, this is something it seems to me we should remember. The question was asked earlier today, am I my brother's keeper? We thought we had answered that in September of 1939 when Canada, with Britain, France, Australia and many other nations took up arms, not because their soil was attacked but because of the principle that freedom is indivisible and that an attack on Poland involved a breach of the principle which we could not disregard.

What of those people now behind the iron curtain to whom I have already referred: the people of Poland, the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Roumania, Bulgaria, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, China and all the nations now enslaved? Have we forgotten them? No, there is no suggestion of armed forces moving into those areas to impose the will of the free nations. There could be none. But by other devices within our power we should offer hope and encouragement to them to let them know we have not forgotten them. We should let them know their freedom is in our thoughts by following a course of action that will not encourage, but will discourage, those who seek to impose communist slavery on another nation.

How could recognition of communist China and its entry into the United Nations or the wide open exchange of goods be interpreted as anything else at this time but an encouraging act by us which indicates we do not really care very much. What greater encouragement could there be to those gallant souls behind the iron curtain, who still within their hearts and minds keep alive the great flame of freedom, than to have it known, through the many channels it does become known, we have said in no unmistakable terms that our principles are not for sale, and that the free nations stand together behind the principles asserted in the covenant of the United Nations in 1945? At least that succours them in their hour of great trial. There may be some surer and swifter way of wrecking the United Nations than letting communist China enter, but I cannot think of it. I do not think anyone else here can.

I wish to make a positive proposal to the government to balance these other statements I have made. The second article of the North Atlantic treaty refers to the economic aspects of this great struggle. It says:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

I hope that at Geneva, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada will make a positive proposal that, along with the agreements that have been made under the North Atlantic treaty for military defence, there will also be positive and definite agreements that the nations of the free world meeting at Geneva —and they will have a chance of meeting separately at that time—will bind themselves together so that on any trading arrangement they may meet on common ground as to the kind of trading that should take place or can take place beyond the iron curtain. Let us go back to what Mr. Eden said in January 1950, in that wise and very thought-provoking speech of his. In that speech he emphasized the need for united action. He emphasized the need for understanding each other's intentions in this field. He said that there should be a concrete strategy in all this area between the powers principally concerned and their burdens, both in troops and political responsibility, fairly adjusted. He said that a common policy should be founded upon determination to help the people with whom we are dealing as well as ourselves.

Then, he pointed out that we should agree amongst each other as to the course we are going to follow in the economic as well as the military sphere. Surely that is reasonable; surely that is practicable, and at a time when I see reports of possible sales of wheat from Russia to Great Britain, at a time when wheat is lying, millions of bushels of it, on the fields of western Canada. At a time such as this no time should be lost in seeking such a common understanding so that along with our combined effort in the military field there will be a combined and sensible arrangement so that we shall not upset each other's economic affairs and so that, through common understanding, we may march forward together under that dream of peace which will best be served if we hold firmly to the principles we expressed in 1945.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, due to my lengthy journey to the Far East this is the first opportunity I have had this session to address the house. Perhaps therefore I may be permitted to congratulate you, sir, upon your election to the exalted position you occupy. May I join my tribute to those of many other hon. members and newsmen who have commented so favourably on the ability and fairness you have shown in presiding over our debates since your election to this office. Some say that, in a friendly way, you act with an iron hand in a velvet glove. However, all recognize the authority you have acquired, due to your sense of fairness and justice but, foremost of all, to the manifest competence you have in interpreting the rules of the house and giving the proper quotations in respect of precedents to substantiate your decisions. It must be helpful to you, sir, in your difficult task, to see such unanimity of appreciation of your competence.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, in this part of the house hon. members cannot hear what the hon. member for Bellechasse is saying. I wonder if he would mind using another microphone.

Mr. Picard: Well, I complained the other day because I could not hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I shall try to do better, and shall move to another microphone.

An hon. Member: Take the front microphone.

Mr. Picard: I shall do that. They are promoting me day by day.

I think most hon. members will agree with me that this debate was initiated by a most comprehensive statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and an exceptionally candid clarification by the Prime Minister of whatever he may have said abroad concerning our relations with communist China. The country at large will welcome both statements as a clear expression of government policy, that leaves no grounds for misunderstanding. And I have reason to believe that this policy is one which will meet with the approval of Canadian citizens.

Canada's position has often been expressed as that of a peace-loving country that has no desire of aggrandizement, but that is determined to assume its share in all the moves devised to guarantee the peace of the world, as it may be threatened at any time by any world powers.

The hopes of western democracies and their allies that the post-war period would be one that would bring about a brave new world, or "one world" as it was then hopefully popular to call it, have been too soon shattered. The blunt attack on South Korea has, fortunately, wakened the world to the gravity of the situation and the urgency to face the impending menace that hung over all of us. And I am of the opinion that the sacrifices made by all who shared in the opposition to the invaders of South Korea will be recognized by historians of the future as having been of invaluable importance in ensuring a more healthy state of affairs in the world. Had not the United States, Canada and many other countries in the United Nations taken the stand they did take, the whole of southeast Asia would have gradually been brought under the tutelage of the Moscow-Peking alliance.

Strange as it may sound to many I am one who today entertains hopes that as a result of the action taken by the United Nations, and our attitude on the Korean venture, there is a better chance for the world to remain at peace than there would have been if we had taken an attitude of laissez faire as some people suggested at the outbreak of the Korean war.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, in company with my wife during four and a half months I have visited all the free countries of the Far East and southeast Asia, as well as the three Asian members of the commonwealth, India, Ceylon and Pakistan. During the course of this trip I was privileged to have interviews with heads of states, prime ministers and/or foreign ministers of all the countries I visited, plus the administrative heads of Malaya and Hong Kong. I hasten to say that I have encountered few who were of the belief that there would be a war provoked in the near future either by communist China or by Soviet Russia if the rest of the world remains on its guard and maintains the present firm attitude. However, most of them recognize that any weakness or complacency on our part might give rise to a potential danger of war.

I believe, and this belief is confirmed by the opinions of many Asian statesmen I have met, that the consent by the communist group to the armistice in Korea as a result of a stalemate on the battlefield indicates a change in tactics, whatever may be the length of its duration. The effort, particularly in China, but also in Russia will, according to me, bear for some time to come on the consolidation of internal conditions, on the development of the country's resources, communications and economy, in the case of China; on the betterment of the standard of living in the case of Russia, while not lowering their present standard of armed equipment and carrying on their experimenting in other forms.

This new policy is evidently aimed at strengthening the regime internally. As a result of this, the world may enjoy a respite. If the western world is wise, wise enough not to be fooled by this apparent relaxation; if it remains ready and determined to face all and any eventualities, our generation may be spared a further conflict.

The most important thing to understand about Asia is that the period of colonial domination and of the exploitation of the peoples of other races or other customs is gone forever, and fortunately so. Asia has reached its majority; and it is in our interest and in the interests of the whole world, as well as the security of the whole world, to support her effectively in the elaboration of a system of government which will permit her to develop her resources for her own benefit, if we do not want her to join the communist bloc.

The dominant idea arising out of my observations is the evident current of nationalism which has spread throughout Asia, the anxiety of people to shake off all external domination and attain self-government, which is an accomplished fact for most of them, and takes the form of impatient aspiration by those who have not yet reached their full independence.

The recent emancipation of many Asian countries has been accompanied by difficult readjustments of their internal economies, by administrative problems arising out of the setting up of new mechanisms of government and new systems of civil service. As the nationalist trend took more and more importance and led to the liberation of many countries, the communist forces tried to ride the wave in order to further their own ends, but their strength evidently came more from the support they got from the outside than from the true aspirations of the people themselves.

The masses in Asia have lived for centuries under deplorable economic conditions as compared with those prevailing in Europe and America. It is natural that their new leaders want to improve their lot. It is also natural that opinions may vary as to the best means to bring about the reforms considered necessary to reach that end. There are in every country communist groups of different strengths and number who receive help and encouragement from communist China and Soviet Russia. Fortunately there are also strong and determined men who prefer the pattern of government of the western democracies and their economic and social policies that have given to the western world a standard of living that is higher than that of any other part of the world.

I am of opinion that any change toward communism in Asia will not come from the action of the masses or from any internal upheaval. If it should come it will be through invasion or through infiltration from the outside.

The relative success reached by a country under communist regime or by a country following our pattern of government in raising the standard of living of the masses may determine in years to come the orientation of the tendencies of Asian people toward one form of government or another. Perhaps I may be permitted here to give a sentence or two of the conversation I had with Prime Minister Nehru when I was in India. He candidly said—and there was no restriction to my quoting it or stating that he had said such a thing—that if we have peace for 20 years in Asia, in 20 years from now we shall be able to determine where Asia will go, whether it will stay with a form of government similar to that of the western democracies or whether it will turn to communism. He said after 20 years of peace one would be able to determine which of the two systems has given the two countries, India and China, a better standard of living; and if China, although it will have purged millions of people, and taken away private property and the liberties of the individuals, is given a better standard of living in 20 years than we in India shall have been able to give by keeping the liberties of the people, by carrying on the form of government we now have, he said, if China puts on a better showing in 20 years, our system may be superseded by another system. But he added he felt and was convinced that they in India would be able to bring about a better condition of life for the masses with the system they have and also keep the liberties of the individuals.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, it is so important that adequate help be granted to the less fortunate parts of the world that are still outside the communist orbit. This is why the help given by the appropriate organization of the United Nations or by the United States under the Point Four program or by the commonwealth under the Colombo plan, is so important and so vital to keep Asia outside the grasp of the communist world.

Although I started my trip from west to east and started in Japan it may be more opportune to speak first of the commonwealth nations. I was seven weeks in all in the three different countries of the commonwealth that are inhabited by people with a culture that is vastly superior to many. I refer to the great civilizations of India, Ceylon and Pakistan. But one must not forget when speaking of India and such countries that there is not only one angle to be considered, historical monuments of the past and politics of the present. India is a modern nation; it is becoming modernized gradually. It is highly industrialized. I do not think it is right to generalize but when people approach me they say: Is it not poor in India; is it not terrible in India? Well, that is far from being the fact, because India is becoming modernized and India's industry is taking great strides in its march to the future.

In the six thousand miles we covered in India I visited industries and saw industries in far remote places where I did not expect to see them. Although the improvement in the standard of living, according to statistics, is one per cent over the last five years, I have confidence that if the country carries on united as it is now and with a unity of purpose of action it will make great strides in the years to come.

These three nations are headed at the moment by men of great value, Nehru in India, Mohammed Ali in Pakistan and Sir John Kotalawala in Ceylon. I was privileged to have a long interview with Mr. Nehru and Sir John Kotalawala. Mr. Ali was out of Pakistan at that time. I had an interview with Sir Zafrullah Khan, the foreign minister. The impression I gained was this. We can entertain great hopes for our sister nations of the commonwealth.

I may say in passing that the Prime Minister's trip over there was looked forward to with great anticipation. They were anxious to see him, and if the only result of the trip to our sister nations of the commonwealth was that we showed we want to understand them, to fraternize with them and to know them better and that we consider them strong elements in the commonwealth, then the trip itself would have served a useful purpose. Judging by the accounts we have seen in the papers, the expectations were really fulfilled, and the message of brotherhood of man, of friendship of one part of the commonwealth to another brought by the Prime Minister, helped to strengthen, unify and consolidate the links between us and this important part of the world which is, after all, if we glance at any map, such a subcontinent that in itself it may balance—if it succeeds in its present adventure of trying to improve the conditions of the people through democratic means—the efforts of China to do the same under the communist regime.

Much has been said about the vagaries of world politics, and history provides us with examples of strange shifts of national feelings toward former enemies. None of this will appear stranger in years to come than the change of attitude of the western democracies toward Germany and Japan, the enemies of yesterday, whose then leaders ordered or condoned actions that were considered unforgivable for generations. Yet today we find ourselves courting those same nations and hoping that they will side with us in the eventuality of another conflict.

I have no time to go into the question of German rearmament or the situation prevailing in Germany, but I should like to say just one word about Japan where I was for three weeks. The most acute political question there at the moment is the revision of the constitution with the right to rearm without any control from the outside, and of course disguised under the veil of self-defence. How can we object to it if we ourselves say that we must help make secure the east for those who want to carry on with the system of government we have instead of their falling under the Moscow alliance?

We are faced with the same problem in Germany. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke a moment ago about China. The same may be applied to communist China in a way, although it may be argued that in China it is the present regime that committed the atrocities that he talked about, but yet we are ready in a minute to be friendly and to shake hands with the Germans and Japanese who committed the same atrocities in the last war.

Of course in Japan and Germany we are dealing with a new government, and after speaking to some of its members in Japan I have no doubt about their sincerity to determine whether democracy as exists here will prevail in their country. I hope I was mistaken but I have not come to the conclusion that it was yet part of the Japanese mentality. But I hope it will be proved that the constitution set up by General MacArthur will bring the Japanese to adopt the sort of democratic ideas that we have in this part of the world.

But I fear that there, as in Germany and in Italy, the former ruling cliques are ever ready and waiting in the shadows to see whether they can get a chance to come forward again. That, of course, is much less true of Japan than it is of Germany or Italy.

When we look at the lessons of history I do not think we would be condoning the actions some of these people have committed whether they be Japanese or Germans, by accepting them as our allies; yet is it not strange how differently we look at things when we need someone, and is it not strange how history demonstrates the practical attitude adopted by men when they find they are in need of the help of such nations as were their enemies?

Japan might very well be the first bastion of defence in the Far East and we have got to assist them to amend their constitution so that they will be in a better position as regards self defence, and so that if it ever becomes necessary they can assist us. I venture to predict the day is not too far distant when Japan will again become a world power industrially and even militarily, even although economic conditions are bad and they have lost their markets in China and Indonesia. They have had a very difficult time in restoring their economy but they are a hard-working people and, like the Germans, I do not think it will be long before they have fully recovered, with the generous help granted them by the United States.

Let us talk now of the line of defence in the Far East should there be any attack made by the communist countries. As I just said Japan is the first and northernmost point, then Okinawa, then Taiwan, then the Philippines. If the United States have come to the conclusion, as they apparently have, that any threat to southeast Asia may come from communist China it is reasonable that they should try to establish such a line of defence. It is understandable that they should help and contribute to the armament of Japan so that it may ensure its self-defence. It is not surprising either that they made of Okinawa the strong arsenal it is at the moment. I am not revealing any secret when I describe Okinawa as a stronghold and evidently the formidable base from which could start any retaliation in that sector, action as envisaged by Mr. Dulles. It is known that the Americans have spent hundreds of millions on its defences.

The next natural base is Taiwan. To leave an empty unused space between Okinawa and the Philippines would be unthinkable if we carry on from the same premise of the potential attack from the north.

How can the U.S. recognize communist China and yet maintain bases on Taiwan that is under the control of the legitimate government of China that was expelled from the mainland. If Taiwan is part of a first line of defence how can you turn your back to the Chiang Kai-shek government. When we come to consider the Chinese problem we realize that it is more complex than most people seem to realize.

One should not lose sight of the necessity of stopping bloodshed in Indo-China as it has been stopped in Korea and the only people we can talk to in this regard is the de facto government of the mainland, the one controlling the forces we have to fight.

The problem of recognizing China seems to be quite acute here. I did not think it would be considered of such serious importance as was demonstrated by the speeches from two parties of the opposition side of the house. I believe we must be somewhat more philosophic in looking at such things and we should take lessons from history. I do not believe we should sacrifice any of our principles, but, on the other hand, it may also be practical to look at these things from day to day and do what we can if we want to save lives in Indo-China.

If we want to prevent further bloodshed whether it be in Indo-China or Korea it is better to keep an open mind. The time may come some day and soon when we will have to talk to these people and face them across a green table.

We must however maintain a prudent attitude until we have evidence, if we ever get it, that communist China and Soviet Russia have changed their attitude as far as expansion abroad is concerned. I, for one, as I stated earlier in these remarks, am of the opinion that their present tactics appear to be different and that we may yet reach an acceptable compromise that will ensure a peaceful modus vivendi to southeast Asia.

No one should be too dogmatic about a complex situation resulting from the split of sovereignty over Chinese territories. The government recognized by most nations is still the one that was prevailing on the mainland until the communist victory, when it transferred its seat to Taiwan. The government ruling de facto on the mainland is the one that took power through the help of Japanese material handed over to them by Russia upon the fall of Japan, but no matter whether it was through the stupidity of puritanical American advisers who cut short all help to Chiang on the pretext that all was not well in the treasury of the Kuomintang administration; whether it was through the mushrooming strength of Mao whose victory over the war lords meant more men available for enlistment in his army; or more generals hastening to climb on the bandwagon while the going was good; whether it was due mainly to help from Soviet Russia or from the acquisition of Japanese materials which fell into the hands of the Russians after the fall of Japan and which they handed over to Mao.

On the other hand, you cannot turn around and say that the people in Taiwan are bandits and that you do not want to deal with them either. I venture to say, though it might not please everyone, that when the role of Chiang Kai-shek is considered by historians the complaints that some of his followers may have used public funds will be of small importance. He will be remembered as the man who unified China through the success of his many campaigns against the war lords, and the one man who really effectively set up a central administration at most points in that vast country except in those areas controlled by Mao's armies supported from Moscow.

I believe many hon. members in this house would be interested in a book written by Hollington Tong, a prominent Chinese writer who is now ambassador in Japan. It may be said that being a supporter of Chiang he is biased but I think it is a fair appraisal of the generalissimo and would enlighten many on this period of Chinese history.

Whatever weaknesses the Chiang administration might have shown in some parts of the mainland I believe Chiang will be recognized as the champion of a different approach to the organization of China, and one that may not have been as democratic as ours in practice, but one based upon a series of projected reforms that had to be continually delayed due to the interminable warfare with the communist armies. Now that he is doing that reform gradually in Formosa, you will say: "it means nothing, it is a small part of the country and he did not do it on the mainland when he was there". But how could he start doing it on the mainland when he had to fight all the time the communist armies over the northern parts of the country?

There are two main points of view concerning the recognition of communist China and its admission to the United Nations. The first is that of those who express wishful thinking or who will stand only on principles and do not want to admit the facts. That is a tempting attitude for good people and nice people to take, but is it a possible one to take for any length of time? You will say it is not right to deal with a bandit, a thief or a murderer or to enter into an agreement with him, that it is compounding a felony. That may be true, but the history of the world shows many such things that have been done, even by men in a higher place than that of ministers of state in a democratic country. They are those who oppose the admission of China or even its recognition. I have the text of a petition signed by prominent conservative Americans—they are mostly Republicans but there are a few Democrats—and sent to Washington opposing any recognition of China or displaying any weakness toward China. There are some things that may attract a lot of people to that school of thought. They say:

> Its admission would destroy the prestige and the position of the United States and of the free world in Asia. The countries of that continent which still resist communist aggression or infiltration would be discouraged by the cynical surrender of the free world to expediency and appeasement and the betrayal of the ideals of the United Nations. The Asian nations, in turn, would then make fatal compromises with the communist bloc.

That is all right. All of that is right, so it gives you ground to think twice before you go ahead. Another point that they make —one of the two points that I think are good—is this:

> The admission of the so-called Chinese People's Republic to the United Nations would encourage subversive totalitarian movements in the free nations of the world in the expectation that their success would be sanctioned by the free nations which still survive. Thus the danger of a new war would be vastly increased by the rewards offered to aggressors.

I have other such declarations. But, Mr. Speaker, there is also a second school of thought. Mao's government controls the forces who were helping the North Koreans and they are the ones who are helping in Indo-China. Therefore they are the only ones who could—if they should be sincerely willing to do so—ensure peace in the Far East since they have been supporting the offenders, and "supporting" is a mild word. This is a practical point of view and may be the only one to be considered in the last resort should they give any appearance of doing what I stated earlier I hoped, namely consolidating their own position internally instead of furthering communist expansion abroad.

What I have in mind is this. I do not think it is right for anybody at a given moment like this, when we are not faced with a decision, to come out categorically and say "We must recognize" or "We cannot recognize" and that the government must state its policy to date or what it will do maybe six months or a year from now. If you review the history of the world I think you will find that what I am saying makes sense. It has been proven time and again that you have had to negotiate with this or that nation, without liking it, but in order to prevent bloodshed.

I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) say that he wanted the assurance that there would be no recognition on promises; and he talked of bloodshed in Korea. There is also bloodshed in Indo-China, as he pointed out. Could it be possible that one day that bloodshed would be stopped by meeting these people—as we will meet them in April—across the green table? Could something be gained by it? That is the ultimate end. That is the ultimate aim we should have, namely to prevent a state of war from continuing and spreading. I would not say that the end justifies the means, although a lot of people have practised that policy, even in high places in the hierarchy of the world. But in this case it might be so, and it has proven good on many other occasions in the world.

I thought it was strange to hear the Leader of the Opposition at one moment comparing Churchill and his V-for-victory sign with Chamberlain and his umbrella. When the Leader of the Opposition spoke of this being another Munich and that we would see the gentleman coming back with the umbrella, I was surprised to hear the man who—and rightfully so—must admire Mr. Churchill, comparing him with the man with the umbrella. I want to refer to the statement, as it has been quoted by the Leader of the Opposition, as having been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and which commenced in this way, "If China by a conciliatory attitude at Geneva shows that there is a chance to bring about peace". I do not know whether or not he said it but in any event I do not think it makes such nonsense. I think we have to look at facts as they present themselves and to take all means at our disposal to prevent bloodshed.

The French are in a difficult position today. I was for some time in France. They are not so enthusiastic about it. Their principles are the same. As far as their material gains in Indo-China are concerned, they have been gone for a long time. It is not imperialist aims that keep them there. It is the word given to a number of people who have carried on, who have been loyal to them over the generations and who will not stand in such a good position if Ho Chi Minh wins. It is a sort of word of honour obligation under which the French have to carry on, and I do not think they are delighted to do so. I do not think that anybody should criticize the French for being awkward in joining EDC when their blood is being shed in Indo-China, when they are carrying on—and have been doing so up until now—all alone. These are all things that we ought to consider in a different and more quiet way.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Picard: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was far from finished covering the ground with respect to the Far East but as I see that I have very little time left I think I should jump a few nations and reach the Middle East. Last year, on February 13, 1953, I gave an account to the house of the trip I had made to the Middle East and some of the conclusions I had reached then. Of course I do not want to repeat that but there is one thing I should like to repeat. It is the importance of the Arab world today, their growing influence in United Nations affairs through their solidarity, and the advisability of Canada having diplomatic missions in such nations.

I understand that some of these nations are already represented by consuls or otherwise in Ottawa, and I just want to repeat what I said last year, that Canada should not hesitate to extend its diplomatic representation in that direction. Trade with these countries is getting more and more important. I might say that I have seen there that France and Great Britain have been replaced largely by the United States and that if we had missions abroad it might help our own trade considerably.

I think, as I have said before, that three missions are in order, one in Egypt, one in Israel and one in Beirut to serve Lebanon, Syria and Iraq. I might briefly tell the house of an incident that happened to me during the course of that trip. I met a German businessman who was on a two-day trip from Cairo back to Frankfurt just to check the prices that his firm had quoted on a contract and which he thought were slightly higher than those of a competitor. The Germans are getting in heavily throughout the Middle East at the moment, and I think it would be quite opportune if Canada decided to extend its diplomatic representation to the Arab countries as well as to Israel.

I know there might be many difficulties in the way. Although I think Cairo is the most important, some may think that until the situation is cleared between Egypt and Great Britain it might be better to wait. I have heard somebody say that if we go there and seem to side with the Egyptians it will not be so good for the unity of the commonwealth, and if we side with the British there is no use in going there now because it will not make us popular with the Egyptians. But one way or the other I still put this thought before the house and the government.

During the last lap of my trip I passed through Iran and I should like to give a more encouraging word of what I saw this year than was the case last year. I spoke last year of the deplorable state of affairs prevailing through the failure of Britain and Iran to come to terms. I think the situation is much more encouraging this year. I met the foreign minister, Mr. Entezam, and the finance minister, Mr. Ali Amini and the British chargé d'affaires, Mr. Dennis King. A better spirit is evident. We cannot overestimate, I think, the importance of a speedy solution of the oil problem. There is a decided improvement in the British approach and apparently a sincere desire on the part of the present government of Iran to come to terms. Each side seems prepared to consider the sensitiveness of the other and to deal tactfully in the effort to reach a compromise based, not on the sanctity of contracts no matter how unfair, as was the British attitude up until last year, nor on an arrogant and obstinate nationalism, as was Mossadegh's attitude, but based on equity and fairness and a reasonable and equitable share of the profits.

In conclusion may I repeat that the government's policy, as expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will, I have no doubt, have the approval of the people of Canada as a policy of open-minded realists unwilling to be swayed by emotional upsurges but also unwilling to take commitments one way or the other that may be unwarranted tomorrow. Canada must and will, under its present leaders, do everything to ensure its safety and the peace of the world, which does not mean only in the matter of preparation to resist any offensive but also in the field of diplomacy and human relations, as was so aptly done by the Prime Minister during his memorable tour around the world.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, no one surveying the international scene today can have many, if indeed any, illusions about the long-term future. In the long run I am pessimistic. In the short run, however, there have been certain significant changes which might be welcome. Since the death of Stalin there has been an obvious change in the policy of the Kremlin, and it is one which I think we ought to consider carefully. What it means I do not profess to know, if indeed it means anything. Nor for a moment do I believe that the long-term underlying policy of the Kremlin has changed one iota, but it is apparent that we have been given some extra time. That extra time we can use not only for our own defence but for the defence of the world.

The question is: What use are we making of that time which has been given to us? Today humanity possesses the most fantastic weapons of destruction. Perhaps their very fantastic nature makes for still greater security for all of us, for it is realized that the magnitude of devastation which could be wreaked upon the earth now is such that it makes war almost impossible to contemplate. That is the hope, and it is a hope which is shared in other quarters. I notice that Sir Winston Churchill, speaking in the British House of Commons last December, had this to say:

> I have sometimes the odd thought that the annihilating character of the new weapons of destruction may bring an utterly unforeseeable security to mankind. A war which begins by both sides suffering what they dread most—and that is undoubtedly the case now—is less likely to occur than one which dangles the lurid prizes of former ages before ambitious eyes.

I think there is conceivably some justification for his view and, as I said, we have been granted some more time. To what use are we putting it? I have the unhappy feeling that the government is squandering that time. There seems to be a lack of urgency for those things which today ought to be urgent. I want to deal with some of them, particularly at first with certain aspects of NATO. On the 4th of February, 1949, at page 239 of Hansard, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had this to say about the North Atlantic treaty:

> I feel strongly . . . that this regional association must be far more than a military alliance. It must make a collective contribution to the social and economic betterment of the peoples of its member states.

We believed that too and because we believed it we voted for the treaty. I am not so sure that that view is still valid. I am not so sure that NATO has become anything other than a military alliance, and if history is any criterion a military alliance is not the strongest or the best basis on which to build our security. But what has been done along these lines of economic and social betterment?

In the January issue of the monthly bulletin of the Department of External Affairs we are given a report of the North Atlantic council ministerial session which met in Paris last December. I only want to deal with the economic and the political aspects of this report, rather than the military aspects, which will be discussed in greater detail at a later stage in the session. The government's version of this report said, in part:

> The second conclusion—
>
> The first dealt with military matters.
>
> —was that the policy of the NATO countries in these circumstances must be to pursue the twin aims of building the defensive and economic strength and political unity of the Atlantic community, while at the same time seeking to negotiate on outstanding differences wherever possible . . .

That is a statement of policy and a statement of principle that is impeccable but in actual fact what does it add up to? How are we building this vitally necessary political unity in the Atlantic community? I am certain that we cannot build it by peripatetic cabinet ministers going to Paris, nor can we build it on the civil service in Paris, no matter how admirable it is; nor on the general staff, no matter how excellent it may be. I think the Department of External Affairs has been lax in not trying to convey to the people of Canada what NATO really can be, not what it is—God forbid. It is not adequate in any sense just now, but the department might convey what NATO could be from the point of view of the Atlantic community and in the larger sense of what it means to the security of all of us.

I have argued in this house on other occasions that it would be desirable to have an Atlantic assembly made up for the most part of representatives of the various parliaments who, perhaps during certain weeks in the year, would review the work of NATO. I think for the sake of NATO itself it is vitally necessary that such a review be undertaken. I do not like the idea of cabinet ministers controlling the destinies of NATO and not always reporting back to the house, because of lack of time or for some other reason. I do not like the idea of our policy being in the hands of men, no matter of what good will, who are essentially generals, admirals, air marshals and so on. I should like to see a more democratic control over the policies of NATO. That is why I have suggested this concept of the Atlantic assembly.

I noticed with some interest in one of the December issues of the London Economist there was an article arguing along somewhat similar lines to mine. It stated, quite significantly, that Canada was one of the nations that was dragging its feet in this matter. We are entitled to know whether there is any justification at all behind that charge. I am quite satisfied that it is not true of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The other day, having read some of the debates in the British Hansard, I put down a question on the order paper inquiring as to whether any invitation had been received from NATO for parliamentarians to go over to Paris to see what was going on. If so, I asked, what was the position of the government? Up to the present, I have received no answer. In due course, I shall undoubtedly get one.

If there has been such an invitation extended I should like to know what or who is blocking it. As I say, I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs would object to it. The other ministers who are primarily interested in NATO are the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Perhaps they object to this idea of members of parliament examining NATO. I am convinced that from the point of view of the general well-being of NATO itself it would be advisable to create some sort of assembly such as I have suggested as soon as possible. If NATO is going to be a success, then the Canadian people must know what NATO is doing, and what NATO hopes to do. I believe the best way of conveying that information would be through members of parliament.

Now, what about the economic and social picture? Again I refer to the same copy of the external affairs bulletin, but this time to page 4 where we are told:

> The broad lines of future NATO defence planning to meet the threat of aggression over an extended period were agreed. Member countries would have to be prepared to maintain a high level of military preparedness, while at the same time strengthening their economic and social structures.

As I have said, we in the C.C.F. argued even before NATO became reality that the very essence of such an agreement would be the economic co-operation which would result from it. We have seen lamentably little of such economic co-operation in the last few years. I am not quite certain as to the government concept of this economic co-operation. I know there have been some very distressing statements made by ministers of the crown, and not the least distressing was that made by the Minister of Finance at Couchiching, if the report in the Globe and Mail of August 14, 1952, is correct. The minister stated:

> If the European countries, six years after the war and with the aid they have received, are not able to make their economy viable we can't do it for them. Any nation can only survive as a result of its own efforts.

There is just enough truth in that to make it brutally unkind. If we have prosperity in this country, it is due in no small measure to the havoc and the destruction which has been wreaked in Europe as a result of war. There are many areas in Europe which have been devastated twice within the history of one generation. To expect Europe, immediately after the war, to become again an economically sound area, is to expect the impossible. Europe has to rebuild itself; Europe has to improve its standards of living if the member nations in the west are going to become allies worth anything at all to us. The standards of living are declining if one can take as a yardstick the wholesale price indices that one sees published in various countries.

There can be no security in NATO as long as the economies of our European allies are weak. Yet, what has been done in the nature of non-military co-operation? There may have been changes lately I do not know. But I do know the Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked that question some time ago by the then member for Melfort. This is what he had to say, and it is worth-while considering what he said on page 672 of Hansard in 1952 in the light of what the Minister of Finance had to say later:

> I cannot give any information in concrete terms as to what has been done in the field to which I just referred.

He was talking about the field of economic aid.

> Indeed, very little has been done in the field of non-military co-operation. I admit that, and I think we must all be disappointed that more has not been done.

We are not only disappointed, we are alarmed that more has not been done because we can see the consequences very clearly of what is going to happen to NATO if the economies of our allies crumble and weaken still further.

As the Minister of Finance said:

If the European countries, six years after the war and with the aid they have received, are not able to make their economy viable we can't do it for them.

What sort of aid have they been receiving? The aid they have been receiving under NATO looked like a substantial amount in the estimates each year and I have no doubt it has been substantial. When one analyses that aid a little farther we see we have been rearming our allies in Europe with equipment which we have had in storage and that was not being used; with equipment which conceivably could be secondhand and had been used; with equipment which possibly our own armed forces thought was out of date. Not only have we given our allies that sort of equipment but we have charged up a sum, the total of which I forget, but I do know there is a balance of some $300 million lying at the credit of an account in the Department of National Defence as a result of the charge being made for the arms which we have given to our allies.

I have argued previously on the basis that, economic defence being important as it is, we should consider using this $300 million for economic defence, rather than leave it in the particular fund in the Department of National Defence. Our allies in Europe have been given arms by Canada and by the United States. That perhaps may be the beginning of their troubles because our allies have to maintain those arms in an adequate state of repair. Our European allies have to make up for obsolescence, and eventually re-equip themselves. It must be admitted, their economy being in the position it is, that this will be a decided drain on them, with the resulting effect of a still lower standard of living.

That the government is concerned about the situation, I have no doubt. Again the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said this in November last year in New York:

Frankly we in Canada are genuinely concerned about the thin and rather brittle economic base on which this political and military co-operation has been built.

And I say he has every right to be concerned, as indeed all of us should be concerned. But why is this economic base so thin, why is it so brittle? The best answer was given in a dispatch from Ankara which appeared in the New York Times. Discussing the forthcoming visit of the president of Turkey to the United States, the report said:

The fundamental thesis of the Turkish authorities is that relatively small outlays of further American aid to stimulate agricultural and industrial production here would result in further significant increases in Turkish exports, with a corresponding increase in the country's ability to purchase military equipment with its own foreign exchange resources.

They contend that the mere provision of military aid under the mutual defence assistance program, while maintaining Turkey's military strength from day to day, fails to attack the basis of the problem of enabling Ankara to support its military establishment from its own resources without resorting to deficit financing.

That is true of Turkey. I am equally convinced it is true of many other European countries who are our allies. Military aid is not sufficient. They require some sort of economic aid. And yet, again, to revert to that dreadful speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) at Couchiching, he said, of our friends in western Europe: "We cannot expect them to become pensioners of Canada". They do not expect that. But what we have done to help them in the field of economic co-operation has been precious little. And, so long as that is so, NATO must remain something that is basically weak.

There is another area, in Asia, where our economic aid policy has to be considered. Throughout the last few years we have consistently attacked the government for its deplorable inaction, and just as consistently the government has defended itself. We have said that the provision of arms is no protection against hunger. Certainly it is no protection against ideas. The only way we can combat ideas is by showing those people that we have better ideas, and I believe we have.

The only way we can combat hunger is not by making guns available but by offering food to those who need it. Perhaps our greatest defence in Asia lies in feeding the hungry; and clothing the naked; and I think, in principle, that throughout the years the minister has agreed with us. Yet, very little has been done about it.

I would just like to remind the house of what the minister has said. He said things with which I agree completely, and which had our support, and which we accepted as government policy, only to find later that the government had done nothing to substantiate what the minister had said would be achieved.

On February 22, 1950, as reported at page 131 of Hansard, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said this:

The social and economic danger arises out of the fact that the people out there are learning that independence is not enough. The agitation for freedom has stirred up in them other desires; for improvements in their conditions of life; for a change from distress, privation and even starvation; for a change from a life expectancy of twenty years and an average income of less than $50 a year.

These people, the same as we do, have the desire to live; but they are condemned to die. And yet we sit here in this western world, particularly in this thrice-blessed Canada, where the hungry can see huge surpluses of food, and where they can see our selfishness. I am quite sure that this is not the sort of policy which is going to bring them to our side.

On November 15, 1950, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, speaking before the Windsor chamber of commerce and the Windsor United Nations Association said this:

> Starvation and distress have provided the climate in which the infection of Marxist communism could take hold. There can be no continuing tranquility in Asia until a start has been made in improving the well-being of its people. Food, shelter and clothing—these must be supplied at least in minimum quantities before there can be political stability. In this task help will be needed from countries in the West.

I am sure the minister was applauded when he made that announcement. He knows what the facts are, but he has not yet been able to communicate to the cabinet, of which he is a member, just how serious they are, from the point of view of our security. Then again, in the House of Commons, on October 22, 1951, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> Aggression is not the only enemy in Korea. There is the enemy of hunger, poverty and misery, the source and the strength of that communism which the Russians have used in other countries for their own unworthy purposes.

And yet, profoundly true as is that statement, what is our contribution in that fight? Well, on the basis of last year's figures it is about three per cent of the funds which are being subscribed for rehabilitation in Korea.

Speaking to the annual congress of the Co-operative Union of Canada, at Ottawa, the minister said on March 4, 1952:

> The basic problem of most of the peoples of Asia, however, does not concern the standard of living but how to maintain life itself. Nearly a thousand million Asians are trying to exist on a diet amounting to only 80 per cent of the pre-war level—the level of the "hungry East".

The minister knows the facts. Yet today these people are worse off than ever before, while at the same time we have more food surpluses than ever in the history of this country. And in North America we continue to pile up these huge surpluses.

Then on March 25, 1952 the then parliamentary assistant to the minister, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), uttered three most pregnant sentences when he said:

> We must acknowledge that there exist today hundreds of millions of human beings, especially in Asia and Africa, whose living conditions are not only deplorable; they are intolerable. It is imperative that we help to remedy this state of affairs. Otherwise, the democratic world will remain at the mercy of a real enmity kindled for political ends in these peoples who are starving for bread and enlightenment.

The then parliamentary assistant, who is now a minister in the government, never spoke truer words in his life. Yet, what is being done about it?

On several occasions in the house I have risen and spoken about United States foreign policy, because what the United States does can have a tremendous impact upon Canada. Where United States foreign policy was conceivably dangerous, we have said so. But I have never for one moment minimized the generosity of the people of the United States, and its quite startling contrast with the record of this government. The generosity of the United States people as compared with Canada is thirty times greater per capita than has been the generosity of the Canadian people.

The government talk about the Colombo plan. We have heard a lot about what is being done under the Colombo plan, but what does it actually add up to? One cigarette per Canadian every third day is the extent of the sacrifice we are prepared to undergo to fulfil these noble aspirations; and I speak in all sincerity of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said. One cigarette per capita every third day is the measure of our generosity, and yet we are told that the living conditions of these people in Asia are intolerable. We are told that unless we do something they are going to become ripe for communism. And yet, that is the extent of the help we are giving today.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has agreed in the past that one thing we could do would be to use to some extent the Colombo plan for feeding those who need food. I am not going to give the quotation which the minister gave in Hansard on October 22, 1951, but he agreed that the supplying of food to India would have the effect basically of strengthening the economy of that country. And these economic results accruing from the gifts of food are worth considering. Here I should like to quote two paragraphs from the report of the Colombo plan issued in New Delhi last October. On page 52, paragraph 12, we find the following:

> Pakistan was faced with two serious problems during the period under review, the shortage of food and the balance of payments deficit. The first was averted by assistance from outside. But for this assistance the position would have been very difficult. The development program would have received a serious setback if it had been necessary for Pakistan to provide foreign exchange from its own resources to buy wheat from abroad.

In paragraph 16 on the next page we find the following:

A high level of external economic assistance will be necessary to permit Pakistan to proceed effectively with its development program. The rupee proceeds from the sale of wheat have increased Pakistan's capacity to absorb foreign aid by making available additional domestic funds which will be devoted to economic development.

I stress the need for a high level of external economic assistance.

I now turn to the conclusion of the report and I find this:

Thirdly, the present flow of external financial aid must be continued and, if possible, increased.

If anyone is going to tell me that we cannot do something better than give $25 million a year to the Colombo plan I simply do not believe it. We are committed, at least through the words of the minister, to try to do something to raise the living standards of the less fortunate people of the world, in so far as our capacity permits it. This year we are going to give about $30 million in this sort of aid. Our budget for defence will be $2,000 million. The ratio is 3 to 200 or in terms of percentages, 1½ per cent. In view of what the minister has said, the proportion is utterly and completely illogical. I know we are subscribing a higher percentage than that of the total funds of the Colombo plan, but not much more than 3 per cent. Our share of the total UN budget is 3 per cent.

This coincidence of 3 per cent, running through these figures, is very interesting. Of the total budget for technical assistance our share is 3 per cent. Of the total budgets for United Nations specialized agencies our share is 3 per cent. As I have said already, our share of the Korean reconstruction agency will be 3 per cent. In view of what the minister has said I can only assume that this is a 3 per cent government with 100 per cent pretensions, and it is not good enough.

It may be asked, what can the government do? I think one of the best things they can do is to try and expunge some of the things which they have done in the past, and if the government are prepared to do that we in turn are prepared to forget it. One of the most important aspects of the cold war struggle today is the need for public investment in the underdeveloped countries of the world but I do not want to see it handled on a national basis. The only way in which it can be handled adequately and properly is through an international agency, and we have that agency already in the United Nations. If it is handled on a national basis then one comes up immediately against cries of interference. Handle it on a national basis and the recipient countries will not be prepared to take advice as readily as they would through an international agency such as the United Nations could provide.

We have got to have some sort of world authority to finance these public works, and the proposal was made at the last assembly that we agree to a special United Nations fund for economic development. It was suggested that that fund should be started off with a capital of $250 million. But what was the position of the government of Canada? Before we could do anything to assist this fund we must wait until we make some savings from disarmament. Again, we are prepared to follow others, but never to give a lead.

The President of the United States spoke very significantly last year when he said that any savings on defence expenditure should be used to help the underdeveloped countries. What the United States do is their business. What this government does is our business. As far as we are concerned this government is not doing enough, especially when its own delegate says in the UN debate that such a development fund can be established only when the time is ripe; and of course the time would be ripe only when we made some savings in disarmament. Was there ever a period when the time was more ripe than today, when we have the world in political and economic turmoil, when we have the crisis of the empty stomach extending over half the globe? Surely this is the time for action. It is high time that the government took the words of its own Secretary of State for External Affairs much more seriously than it has in the past.

I have complained frequently in the past of governmental schizophrenia in our foreign policy, and my complaint is amply justified. I am certain that one of the most productive things we in this country could do to advance the well-being of less privileged peoples would be to devote at least $100 million to starting off this special United Nations fund for economic development. The result of such a gift, I am convinced, would be almost electric throughout many parts of the world; for it would give hope to millions who now have no hope. It would mean that the government was beginning to take its responsibilities and its avowed and its stated policies more seriously than it has in the past. But until the government does exercise some such leadership, I regret to say that its stated words on the matter of policy mean nothing.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I feel impelled to take part in this debate because in such serious times as exist today each hon. member has a responsibility toward his people, toward the people of Canada and toward his own conscience.

The leader of this group has put on record, not only yesterday but in days gone by, the official position of this party in respect to external affairs and many other matters. I am happy to support and stand by every word my leader pronounces as Social Credit policy, and should I at any time in or out of this house discuss matters with perhaps a little different emphasis I do so as expressing my own personal views.

Before dealing with a few matters in respect to the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I wish to say a word about the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). I am not going to discuss the content of his speech, but I am interested for one particular reason. Some of us go through this country in an attempt to interpret the political policies of the various parties in this country. In this respect I wish to be fair with my friends in the C.C.F. party. Therefore I would like to ask the leader of that party if the speech we listened to this afternoon was a pronouncement of C.C.F. policy. The leader of the C.C.F. party is not in the house at the moment but there will be plenty of time for him to tell the house whether the speech we listened to this afternoon from the hon. member for Nanaimo is in reality C.C.F. policy. If he does not tell us then we can only interpret his silence as being in the affirmative.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs replies to this debate this evening or later on in this debate I would like to hear whether he agrees with that speech. The speech was a very colourful one in more ways than one, but I would like to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs say, "No, the position I take and the position my government takes is altogether contrary to the position taken by the hon. member for Nanaimo."

I would like to deal with one or two things which occurred to me as I listened to the speech made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He dealt with the forthcoming conference at Geneva and expressed the hope that some good would come of that conference. I believe he expressed the hope of everyone. But I would like to say this. I would like to know before that conference takes place what Canada's position is as regards whether we are going to grant any more concessions which will play into the hands of Russian imperialism. It seems that no matter what conferences have been held in the past the Soviets have come out on top and always with more than they entered the conference with, and the rest of the free nations always come out with less. Surely we should call a halt to this thing sooner or later, and as far as I am concerned the sooner the better.

The minister dealt with collective security and I suppose in these days when the world has become so small and nations so interrelated we cannot blind our eyes to what is generally known as collective security. But I would remind the house that the greatest demonstration of collective security which we have just observed in Korea failed. I do not mean by that that we should not adhere to collective security. The minister has himself pointed out that we cannot have continental security without collective security. I agree with that, and I believe we all agree with that. But the question which arises in my mind in this regard relates to the conference which was recently held for the purpose of formulating certain policies with respect to collective security for the North and South American countries. I refer to the conference held recently at Caracas. Canada was absent from that conference and some of us are not altogether satisfied yet as to why Canada was absent from that conference. If we are to have collective security for North and South America and that security is discussed at a conference, then surely Canada, which has become a strong nation today, particularly in its potential, should at least have had a part in that conference.

Another thought which came to my mind in regard to the minister's speech, and I cannot help mentioning this, is that it appeared to me that he played the double role of Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of National Defence. I am quite conscious of the fact that it is hard in these days to tell just where the responsibility of the Department of National Defence ceases, and the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs begins, or vice versa. But I mention this because I fear that we may eventually experience the sort of blunders which have been made in recent years by the state department of the United States, the blunder of interference in the military who in times of a shooting war are out to win.

The minister analysed at some length the speech made by Mr. Dulles consequent to the Caracas conference. I do not wish to be harsh but I must confess that the status of Mr. Dulles has been raised considerably in my estimation in the last few months, particularly since that conference, because

I believe he manifested some courage in what he said and attempted to do at the Caracas conference. I cannot help feeling that the minister may have slapped his wrist, and I do not believe Mr. Dulles' actions call for that sort of treatment, for if there ever was a time when courage and confidence are required at conferences it is today.

I would like to say in passing, Mr. Speaker, one or two things about the Prime Minister's speech. But before doing so I would like to compliment the Prime Minister for the very fine speech he made the other day when he returned from his world tour. I think everyone enjoyed that speech. The Prime Minister did not attempt to go into the various details of his conversations with various dignitaries and men holding official positions in various governments, but he gave us a very delightful review of his trip and I believe we all felt very happy that he was able to enjoy such a trip.

When he was speaking to us yesterday I thought we would have heard something more with respect to the things he discussed with other world leaders and a little bit more of what we might expect with respect to our relationship with them. Of course, I am quite conscious of the fact that, as he spoke with them, whatever he learned or whatever advice he was able to give results in government policy; and perhaps we cannot expect him to reveal to us at this time too much with respect to government policy as it may take place in days to come.

But there is one thing I would point out and it is this. Almost the entire speech made by the Prime Minister yesterday was confined to an explanation of his remarks to the press respecting the recognition of China. It is difficult for me to think that such mistakes were made with respect to any interviews the press may have had with the Prime Minister. I find it difficult for this reason. I am quite certain that the reporters wanted to report as accurately as possible; and I am quite certain that the Prime Minister is a seasoned "interviewee". When it comes to a question of the recognition of China, surely the Prime Minister should have watched his words most carefully. I know that the Prime Minister has said that sometimes these questions in press interviews are put to one with machine-gun rapidity, but that does not mean to say that they must be answered with machine-gun rapidity. When a question of such great importance as this was put to him it seems to me that he should have weighed his answer carefully, watched every word and determined that what went into the press was exactly what he said. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. If there was no intention whatsoever of recognizing China, it would not have been difficult for the Prime Minister, in answer to a question of that kind, to say "No", that is the answer, and put it down "n-o"; that would have settled it. But that is not what was reported and that is not what the Prime Minister said. Because he did not give a flat "no", complications arose.

The Prime Minister had talked with Mr. Nehru. We all know what Mr. Nehru's position is with respect to this matter. I am wondering if he did not influence the Prime Minister to the extent that he was toying with the idea, and nobody is going to tell me that the Department of External Affairs has not been toying with the idea of recognizing China.

Another thing I want to point out is this. The Prime Minister had a good deal to say with respect to what might be the meaning of the word "recognition"; and in amplifying that theme, he stated that at the present time the government had no intention of diplomatic recognition. However, he carefully avoided telling us one thing; at least, if he did not carefully avoid it, it is a singular thing that he did not tell us whether or not they would support recognition of China at the United Nations.

An hon. Member: Red China.

Mr. Hansell: Yes; Red China, if you wish to put it that way. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs replies, Mr. Speaker, and I am wondering whether he is listening to me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: We are all listening to you.

Mr. Hansell: He had better listen to this because we want an answer. We want to know whether or not when he goes to the United Nations he is going to acquiesce in the pressure that is put on there for the recognition of Red China in the United Nations. I think we should have an answer to that question when the minister replies.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I may not have a chance to reply for a very long time, I had better say at once that the answer to that question is no. I do not intend to acquiesce to that kind of pressure or indeed to the pressure of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Hansell: I am highly pleased with the answer and I think we all should be pleased with it. I will shake the minister's hand at any time on that answer. As to the second part of it, I do not know but I rather think he did acquiesce in what I wanted. I know that I am only a bit of a two-by-four and that my pressure is not very much.

An hon. Member: A splinter.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, no; the hon. member's pressure is very high.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hansell: Let us remember this, however. If there is enough pressure coming from a lot of little people, it makes a lot of weight just the same. We are delighted that the Prime Minister had a pleasant trip and has returned; and from the way the debate has now gone, I am quite certain that Red China is not going to be recognized, as far as Canada is concerned, in the United Nations.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know what he said if he did not say that.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention a few remarks that have been made by another distinguished gentleman who has travelled around the world on a similar mission to that on which the Prime Minister travelled. I refer to Senator Knowland, who is the leader of the United States senate. I want to give to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, one or two reflections by Senator Knowland given in an interview with the editors of U.S. News and World Report, a magazine that is indisputably one of the most authentic ones published in the United States today. This quotation is from a series of questions and answers in an article entitled "Nehru Doesn't Speak for Asia". The article is highly enlightening. I am going to read only a few extracts from it. Senator Knowland was asked this question:

Q. Do they criticize us—

Meaning, of course, the United States.

—for not wanting to admit Red China?

That is to the United Nations. This is Senator Knowland's answer:

A. Yes, I think it's been pretty clear from both the public statements and the private manoeuvrings of India's representatives in the United Nations that they think our policy is wrong, and they have a belief apparently that, by placating the Chinese communists, by appeasing them in this regard, they may then not press for further conquest in Asia. I think this is a mistaken policy because I think that the more weakness that is shown in the face of the communists, either Soviet or Chinese, the greater the demands will become upon ourselves and the rest of the free world.

Then there is this question:

Do you think you made any impression upon Nehru with your views?

[Mr. Hansell.]

For the sake of brevity I am going to abridge the answer, but it does not destroy its context. The answer is:

. . . I do think one great mistake that we of the free world would make in regard to India would be to consider that Nehru is the spokesman for all of Asia. I do not believe that this is a correct analysis of the existing situation in the Far East. Certainly Nehru does not speak for the Republic of Korea. He does not speak for Japan. He does not speak for free China on Formosa. He doesn't speak for Thailand, Vietnam, Laos or Cambodia and he certainly doesn't speak for Pakistan. All of those countries I visited . . . I don't believe that Nehru speaks for the Philippines either . . . Most of the leaders in Asia, those whose nations are outside the iron curtain and who are determined to remain outside the iron curtain, feel that the Nehru policy would ultimately be fatal to free institutions in Asia and would ultimately lead to all of Asia's going behind the iron curtain . . . I don't believe that it's realistic for Nehru to think that, if all the rest of the world went behind the iron curtain, the ruthless men in the Kremlin would respect his desire to be an isolated island of freedom in an otherwise totalitarian world.

In answer to another question he said:

But he apparently, for some reason, believes that this neutralist policy that he follows may ultimately cause the Chinese communists, and presumably the Soviet union, to postpone, if not completely eliminate, thoughts of further aggression. There are very few people in Asia who have had firsthand contact with the communists who believe that this is anything but a naive outlook when you're dealing with the Kremlin or with Peiping.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have something from a man of some considerable repute who travelled the world to talk with the leaders of some of the nations of the world as to the part that we of the West should play with respect to our attitude towards China and the Far East. There are many who are attempting to say that the Mao Tse-tung government will play its own role without any dictatorship from the Soviet. Here is a question he was asked on that point:

What do they think in the Far East about Red China's leader, Mao Tse-tung, becoming another Tito?

This is the answer:

No, they don't think that that is likely. The general feeling out there is that Mao Tse-tung is a willing and enthusiastic ally of the men of the Kremlin. He may be a junior partner, but they feel that his policies and those of communist China are going to parallel, in the foreseeable future at least, the policies of the Soviet union.

With respect to collective security on which the Secretary of States for External Affairs touched the other day, I should like to read what Senator Knowland's reply was because to my mind it is extremely revealing. I would not read these questions and answers if it were not for the status and position of Senator Knowland who, as we all know, is the leader of the Senate in the United States. With respect to collective security the question is:

Is there anything positive that might lead to peace in the Pacific area?

His answer is:

Yes, I think that as of today there is a very real opportunity to rally the free people of Asia who—all taken together, including India—still amount to several hundreds of millions of people. . . . But if we lose this opportunity of bringing about a real collective security in Asia, and the communists are able to start picking off these nations one by one, then I believe that we may have to face up to what Lenin predicted a couple of decades ago, when he said that the road to Paris was through Peiping.

The next question has to do with the value of non-aggression pacts, and this is his reply:

If these countries are left behind the iron curtain, what it means when a non-aggression pact is entered into is that it is going to be interpreted, by those people who desire to be free in those countries, that we have permanently abandoned them to Soviet tyranny.

I come now to the recognition of China, and in spite of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has assured us that he is not going to acquiesce in any way in the recognition of Red China in the United Nations, I do wish to put my own personal thoughts on the record.

Mr. Pearson: That was not what I said. I would not like the hon. member to misinterpret what I said. I said I would not acquiesce to any pressure at Geneva towards recognition at that time.

Mr. Hansell: Well—

Mr. Pearson: That was the question you asked me.

Mr. Hansell: That might put a little different complexion on my understanding of the minister's answer. We will make a note of that and take into consideration very carefully the words that he has spoken which impress me once again that I must put on the record what I feel with respect to the matter of the recognition of Red China at the United Nations. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on the record—I will read it if you desire but I know that time is short in tonight's debate—a resolution passed by the Alberta provincial Social Credit convention held in Calgary, Alberta, last November. It is a short resolution consisting of a typewritten page and it sets out their attitude towards recognition of Red China. If I may do that—

Mr. Knowles: Read it.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to have inserted in Hansard this resolution of the Alberta Social Credit convention?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hansell: Very well; I thought it would save a little time but I am quite happy to read it. It reads as follows:

Whereas in our opinion one of the greatest menaces to the peace of the world and the freedom of its people is international communism; and

Whereas we believe that recognition of the Red Chinese government by Canada and/or admission of Red China to the U.N. would give an impetus to the communist drive in Asia which would not again be stopped until all of Asia is behind the iron curtain and the hopes of all the people of Asia for a free and democratic life crushed to earth; and

Whereas by recognizing Red China we would in effect be condoning the enslavement of millions of people in Asia by their communist masters and discouraging any attempt by the people to free themselves by counteraction; and

Whereas North America, which is now menaced by the communist forces of the world, would then be in extreme danger because the tremendous resources and manpower of Asia would then be mobilized on the side of communism, and

Whereas the Red Chinese in the Korean war, in which they were clearly the aggressors, were guilty of vicious and inhuman atrocities including the torture and murder of helpless prisoners of war:

Therefore be it resolved that we express our unalterable opposition to the recognition by Canada of the Red Chinese government and/or its admission to the U.N.; and

Be it further resolved that the secretary be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the Honourable Mr. L. B. Pearson, minister of external affairs.

Now, that was a resolution passed by the provincial Social Credit convention in Alberta. May I now come to what the people of the Far East believe with respect to the recognition of China? In that respect Senator Knowland's interviews with leaders of many nations in the world—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it seems to me he has quoted the report of the interview given by Senator Knowland at length. If that is published in book or pamphlet form, perhaps he could give the reference and hon. members could secure the book and read it themselves. I say that because, as hon. members know, I stopped the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) the other day in the debate on the motion to go into supply, because in quoting at length extracts from newspapers he was infringing the rule that says an hon. member is supposed to make his own speech and not give the speech of others.

I have had occasion to stop the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), when he was quoting at some length a book having to do with the inquiry being conducted by Senator McCarthy. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) is quite in order when he quotes sufficiently to support the point he advances himself. For the last few minutes I have been listening intently to what he was saying, and on every point that he advanced he has been quoting from the interview given by Senator Knowland. He left those quotations for one minute to read a resolution adopted by the Alberta Social Credit league. I know that he wants to observe the rules, and for the purpose of preserving order in debate I thought perhaps I should bring this rule to his attention. See Beauchesne's third edition, citation 264.

Mr. Hansell: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am well aware of the rule that one should not quote at great length from any manuscript or any book. I will not do so. It was the last quotation I was going to make, by the way. I only thought it would be interesting perhaps to compare the remarks of the Prime Minister with the observations that were made by a distinguished gentleman from the United States who made a similar trip. I did not think I had quoted too much. However, you evidently think I have so I will not quote any more. What I was going to quote was this:

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: I am putting it in my own words. I am not going to read from the text. I could perhaps give members the citation so they can get a copy of the article if they wish. I do not suppose they will. It is the issue of October 30, 1953, of U.S. News and World Report. They can get it down in the reading room, if they wish, and it is very enlightening.

What Senator Knowland tried to point out here in connection with recognition of Red China in the UN is that it would destroy the confidence that the free peoples, or shall I say the peoples who adhere to the principles of freedom in the other parts of the world, have in the United States and in the other nations of the free world that should be battling their battle. That is the point he attempts to make. They would simply give up and say, well, the only thing we can do is to attempt to strike the best bargain we can with our victors, with our dictators. Now, that is about what he concludes. This goes not only for those in the Far East, but it goes for all these subjugated people in the rest of the world. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, there are millions of subjugated people in some of the nations even behind the iron curtain who are still praying and hoping that those of us who are still free will fight their battles in order to eventually free them.

During the debate this afternoon the leader of the official opposition mentioned that we know these enslaved people have not given up the struggle for freedom. Why, then, should we condone the further acts of their oppressors. They appeal to the world with the cry: liberty-loving people of the world unite in our struggle against tyranny. The time may come when they can arise, but that time will not come if we continue to give, give, give, one concession after another to the Soviet.

For example, despite the persistent efforts on the part of Russia to conquer the rich Ukraine, to which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) referred this afternoon, the Ukraine has resisted for almost three hundred years the aggressive and brutal penetration of that country. In spite of genocide, massacre and mass deportation, the Ukraine's stubborn resistance to communism restrained the red march in Europe for twenty bitter years. Our external policy must be such that we will not forsake nor forget them, nor forget Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Baltic countries and the other numerous freedom loving people within the Soviet union and within the world now engulfed by Soviet imperialism.

We in the free world claim to base almost our entire philosophy on the great principles of freedom and justice. We of the Social Credit movement believe in those high principles, and we champion and respect the sovereignty and the freedom of the people of all nations. A little while ago I said I thought it was about time we should call a halt to this matter of granting concessions to the Russians as they gather in conference. I shall ask this question, particularly with respect to recognition of Red China at the UN. What do the communists here in Canada want us to do? Of course, they want us to recognize Red China. What do our C.C.F. friends want us to do? The leader of that party has placed before us the fact he wants recognition of Red China; the recognition and acceptance of Red China into the UN. I sometimes wonder if they can be serious about this matter.

Is membership in the UN really to give Red China another reward for her war of aggression in Korea? That is exactly how it will be interpreted. The UN, so we have been led to believe and were told at its very inception, was to protect the peace of the world. Is it consistent that they should now admit an aggressor? Whatever nation offends against the ideal of peace should not only be refused membership in the UN but any nation that violates the ideal of peace should be expelled from the UN. As far as I am personally concerned, should the United Nations move to admit Red China, then Canada should immediately withdraw from the United Nations. Those are my convictions.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hansell: Has my time expired? I was only about half-way through, so perhaps I shall stop now. However, Mr. Speaker, I would say this, that while I have to stop because my time has expired I shall continue my speech on another appropriate occasion.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, roughly a month ago I objected to a debate continuing after hours. As this debate is a very important one, and there are many people in Canada who are following it and who would want to hear tonight what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has to say, I ask permission of the house to withdraw my turn in the debate in his favour, on the condition that his speech will not terminate the debate.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take away the right of the hon. member for Trinity-Conception to speak. But I want to make it perfectly clear that if he is not going to speak I shall take my place in the debate now. Therefore if the hon. member does wish to speak, perhaps he had better go ahead.

Mr. Stick: As I have not the unanimous consent of the house there is nothing left for me to do but to continue with my speech.

Once again we come to the debate on external affairs when the suggestion is made that the estimates of this department be sent to a committee for examination. Much has been said in the debate, to date. Views have been expressed in strong terms in one way or another. One could take exception to some of the remarks passed, and one could speak strongly about some of the views expressed in the house today.

I agree to a certain extent with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when he took exception to the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). But while I do not want to kick a person when he is down, I do want to say a few words about what the hon. member for Nanaimo has said.

He has stated in this House of Commons that he is a socialist; and may I say right now that he is entitled to his views in that regard. That is the working of democracy; and I claim the same right to speak my mind when I wish to do so. When I make that claim for myself I do not take away a similar privilege from others. However, may I say in all sincerity to the hon. member for Nanaimo that some of the views he expressed this afternoon are, in my estimation, rather dangerous.

May I read an extract from the New York Times which deals with socialism and sets out how communism works through socialism to destroy socialism itself. I quote this, a special item to the New York Times dated at The Hague, Netherlands, January 17:

> The communist parties of Western Europe are launching a popular-front movement proposing unity of action with the socialists.
>
> The latest in a rapidly developing series of appeals for common action has been launched here by Paul de Groot, general secretary of the Netherlands communist party. At the close of a meeting of party leaders, he called for "a broad basis for a new government, the unity of action of socialists and communists, as the nucleus for national co-operation with all others prepared for it".
>
> Reporting his speech, the party newspaper De Waarheid (The Truth) carried the banner headline: "Unity of Action of Socialists and Communists!"
>
> The communist call here is anything but an isolated measure. In France, Italy and Belgium the communist parties are making similar appeals —recalling the fact that between the two world wars and immediately after the second one the communists were taken into the governments of three western European nations.
>
> The communists made an unsuccessful attempt to promote a coalition with the socialists during the drawn-out French presidential elections last month. The candidate both parties supported was Marcel Naegelin, a socialist, who was defeated. In the subsequent voting for a president (Speaker) of the French national assembly, the communists backed the winner, Andre Le Troquer. Some observers in France saw in this achievement the confirmation of a new tactic.
>
> The Paris newspaper Le Monde, which commented, "The communists have returned to and are admitted in the political, parliamentary and electoral game", spoke of the "sketch of a cartel of the Left or a popular front on the political level."
>
> On Thursday the Belgian communist newspaper Le Drapeau Rouge (The Red Flag) reported the declaration made by the French communist party as it prepared to support M. Le Troquer: "The communists intend to show—once again—their desire to struggle with all their strength for the triumph of a policy of unity of action with the socialist workers." Le Drapeau Rouge suggested that in Italy also there now was a hardening or regrouping of all the popular forces desiring "progress and peace". On Wednesday the Italian communist leader, Palmiro Togliatti, told Premier-designate Amintore Fanfani that all parties willing to share the responsibility of government, including the communist, should be in the pending cabinet.
>
> In the field of foreign policy, and especially on the question of the European army, which would unite the national armies of France, Italy, West Germany and the Benelux countries, the communist appeal apparently will not always fall on deaf ears.

May I suggest in all sincerity, and with every respect for the hon. member, that this policy of the communist party in Europe could very well spread to Canada. And if we have very much more of the ideas expressed in the house this afternoon it may be that the hon. member is playing with fire; and if he does, he will probably get his fingers badly burned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for many months past we have heard not only from leaders in this country but from those in other countries that there is a lessening of the tension in the world, and that the danger of a third world war is receding. I have followed those statements by eminent statesmen, whom I do not need to name. I have been rather concerned with that view because, as I see it, the danger is that it may lessen our preparations for defence.

I do not hold those views, myself, because I have never seen any great lessening of the tension. I was glad to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for whom I have the greatest regard, make certain statements. I am not going to quote his speech, which I do not have before me, but I shall refer to notes which I took at the time, and will take the liberty of reading.

One of the first statements he made was that there was no progress at the Berlin conference; secondly, that there was disappointment and disillusionment over the lack of success in making a peace treaty with Germany, and particularly with Austria. He pointed out that the basic foreign policy of Russia has not changed—and with that statement I agree entirely. He said, further, that the United Nations is not an effective agency for security, and that is why we formed NATO. He said also that, in view of the danger which threatens, local defence is not sufficient. In other words that we must have collective security if we are to survive. He said that collective action is needed on instant retaliation.

May I comment on that last note which I took. Much has been said before by way of criticism of Mr. Dulles, Secretary of State for the United States, when he announced the policy of instant retaliation. As on a great many other occasions in the history of this cold war in which we are engaged, the people in this and in other countries took counsel of their fears and wanted to know from Mr. Dulles what he meant by his statement.

They wanted to know from Mr. Dulles what he meant by it. Anybody who knows the United States and the foreign policy of the United States knows this. It has no aggressive intentions against anybody. When he made that statement he implied, if he did not specify it at the time, that instant retaliation meant only if we were suddenly attacked. With that statement of Mr. Dulles I agree. All military experts here and abroad will tell you that if we go into a third world war we are not going to have a declaration of war; that it will come suddenly and possibly overnight. If we are going to call the United Nations into session to decide whether we will hit back and whether we are going to consult the United States and whether they are going to consult us, we may lose the war overnight. We have to be reasonable about this and use our common sense.

If the U.S.S.R. strikes at us suddenly, through the air, are we going to wait to know what Washington is going to do, or are we going to tie their hands by waiting and wasting precious time so that we shall be handicapped to hit back? Because the expert military opinion today is that whoever gets in the first blow, and the first heavy blow, has a very good chance of winning the war on that basis. I am with Mr. Dulles. If we are suddenly attacked, arrangements should be made so that the United States' hands are not tied and so that the strategic air force of the United States can hit back at once without any waste of time; otherwise time will play into the hands of Russia and not on our side.

It has been stated in this house on more than one occasion that the battle in which we are participating today is a battle for the minds of men and women. That is true. I subscribe to that statement and I have used it myself. If we are in a battle for the minds of men what are we going to do about it? How are we going to counteract it? It is recognized by everybody here that you are not going to defeat communism by war, and that war will not change the minds of men. If that is true, then we must look to some other way to change the minds of men. Furthermore, it has been said in this house on many occasions that economics cause poverty and distress; in other words, economics play a large part in the thinking of those who favour communism. To some extent that is true but not absolutely so.

It has also been said in this house on many occasions that we shall lose Asia because of the poverty and distress in the Asian countries. I said here a year or two ago that the difference between the east and the west, the Orient and the Occident, is not economic, absolutely. It is racial and it is time we understand what this racial difference means.

They have had poverty in southeast Asia for many years. Communist countries have put forth their views as to how they should better their conditions of life. In one country it is to share land; in another country it is to appeal to nationalism. What are we doing to counteract it? Well, we have the Colombo plan. Through the Colombo plan we are demonstrating our good will toward those countries in southeast Asia. We are showing them that we are desirous of helping them economically. That plan is working. We are all glad to hear the reports on the progress that has taken place during the last three or four years. Some hon. members say that we are not doing enough in that regard.

The Colombo plan is not going to change the minds of people in southeast Asia regarding communism. We must offer them something more than that. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that from my knowledge of the East —and I spent two years there, particularly in India, many years ago—the Orient does not change quickly. What was true when I was there is true today. The people of the Orient are waiting for a message of hope, as are the people in other parts of this world. Our diplomacy has failed to give them that message. What they need is something to counteract the subtle propaganda of communism which offers them hope in another form.

I stated here two years ago that the foreign policy of Canada should be peace through strength. That policy has been followed, but there have been some degrees of weakness. I do not think it is sufficient today to change the minds of men. I advocate now a policy of power through love, through strength. These may be only words. In other words, the power of love through strength is what the people need, and is the message which we must convey to the people of the Orient and to our own people. Nobody can tell me that men like Klaus Fuchs, Burgess and MacLean embraced communism because they were suffering from poverty. I think that is a sufficient explanation to show that poverty is not the full answer to communism.

May I demonstrate what I mean by what I said? If you followed the elections in Italy of some two or three years ago you will know we were all betting that that country would go communist. What happened? The people of Italy were swaying between two minds, and it was decided by the people there that they required a message. A clergyman preached love to those people. He explained what it meant. He explained the power behind it. It was that message of love preached to the people on the streets of Milan, Naples and the other large cities, which convinced a sufficient number of Italians so that Italy has been saved so far from communist domination.

I wish now to refer to the Prime Minister's trip to the Orient. If I can analyse and sum up his trip and the statements which he has made since he came back I would do it in this way. The Prime Minister found out on this trip that it does not matter what colour a man is; whether he is white, black, yellow or brown, he is a human being and he has the same feelings that you and I have. Kipling summed it up very well in a poem when he described the feelings of the wife of the common soldier and the wife of a colonel in these words:

> For the Colonel's Lady an' Judy O'Grady
> Are sisters under their skins!

The Prime Minister went to India and interviewed Mr. Nehru; he went to Pakistan and interviewed Mohammed Ali. He carried a message to them from this country and from the whole western hemisphere. It was received gladly. It was a message of good will and a message of love, if you want to use that term. But he did it through strength, because in India he was put on the spot when he was asked about the United States offering military aid to Pakistan, which was a very unpopular move so far as India was concerned.

What did the Prime Minister do? He faced up to the situation, and he told them of the friendship between Canada and the United States, and he was convinced that in giving military aid to Pakistan the United States had no thought that it would be directed at India. That was not the answer that the Indians wanted to hear; that was not what they expected. But they respect honesty and they respected the good will and the courage displayed by the Prime Minister in making that statement.

It has been said by the leader of the C.C.F. party here, who has on two occasions rather complained about the military aid of the United States to Pakistan, that there is uneasiness in India regarding it. Let us examine what that means. Will anyone suggest that Pakistan is going to declare war on India? Will anyone suggest that 70 million people are going to take on 360 million people? Pakistan has not the capacity to wage war on a large scale, nor indeed has India. In my opinion such an argument is utter nonsense and certainly not logical. When people make that statement in this house they do not complete the statement because President Eisenhower also offered military aid to India which India, being a proud nation, politely refused. What happened shortly after that? When news of the proposed Geneva conference was released the Prime Minister was asked what he thought. When Mr. Nehru called for a cease-fire in Indo-China he was also asked his opinion of that. Immediately and without any hesitation he backed up Mr. Nehru in his plea.

There you have a demonstration, if you like, of love through strength and the power of love through strength. In one case he spoke from strength when it was unpopular, and in another instance he spoke from strength when it was popular.

The Prime Minister sowed a seed in India and those of us who know India will realize that he sowed that seed in India through strength and not through weakness and we will all do well to follow up his example—nourish that seed and bring it to its full fruit.

The seed is sown; and what we say in this house and how we back up the Prime Minister's example will determine whether the people of the Orient accept that message in the spirit in which it was offered. It is the message which they were waiting for because it is a message of hope and not one of fear. Because of that it will succeed. It will convince the great majority of the people of the Orient today who are sitting on the fence that they should reject the embrace of communism and accept the free and democratic way of life.

What the world requires today is this message of hope. You can never get peace or keep peace through fear. We are spending $2,000 million on defence because we have to, and because it is necessary, but it is not the solution to the problem of whether we are going to have peace or war. It may deter nations against waging war but it will not prevent war.

I was interested in an article I read today in the Globe and Mail written by Drew Middleton of the New York Times service and datelined London, March 25. The article states:

> The terrifying hydrogen weapon may prove a deterrent to war because of its terrible destructiveness, Foreign Secretary Eden said tonight.
>
> This hope was offered the deeply concerned people of Britain by their foreign secretary toward the close of a Conservative party television program in which Eden spoke for the government.

If this means anything at all it means that our only hope for peace is through fear. But fear never brought peace to the world yet. We are living in fear and trembling today of what is going to happen tomorrow, the next day, or six months hence, and that fear is universal. But if we are to convince the people of the outside world as well as ourselves and destroy this fear, and if we wish to have a permanent peace, then we have to substitute something for that fear. We must substitute hope for fear and we have got to give the people of Canada and of the outside world a message of hope.

The only message of hope that I can suggest is that we urge the breaking down of all racial and religious barriers both in this country and abroad, and that we spread the good news of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. We should not only spread that message but live up to it and if we do that we will give the people of the world not only peace but the only lasting peace in this world, which is the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in this debate, mainly about the matter of consultation as referred to at some considerable length by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in the speech he made yesterday. I use the word in the sense in which it occurs to me in so far as foreign affairs are concerned, where, in the sort of world in which we live today, consultation has two aspects. The first is international—consultation between governments, and particularly between the governments of the western world in the North Atlantic treaty alliance, and secondly, national consultation, by which I mean consultation between the individual government and its parliament or whatever is the legislative body to which it owes responsibility.

I believe it is important for us to have a look at this matter of consultation in both these aspects, but I shall start with the second aspect which relates to consultation between our own government and this parliament to which it is responsible. Here we should have a look first at the extent to which this consultation has been going on in connection with the Geneva conference to be held on April 26, that is the extent to which we in this parliament are to be consulted and informed by the government about that conference.

As I listened to the debate it seemed to me that we are concerned here, and indeed all members of parliament are greatly concerned, with what the Canadian delegation may do at that conference in Geneva. The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) has expressed our reasons for this concern. Those reasons are based on statements made from time to time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as well as by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), which gave rise to some feeling of concern that our delegation to Geneva by some conceivable stretch of the imagination might be prepared to enter into some compromise or make some unfortunate deal with communist Russia and with Red China which could only redound to the disadvantage of the western world. We want to know what stand our delegates are going to take. What is going to be their bargaining position?

It is true that the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the course of this debate yesterday dealt with the objectives of the Canadian delegation in what he himself called very general terms. I would like to read from his speech as reported at page 3326 of Hansard:

> The United Nations' resolution on this subject reads—at least the important sentence of it—that the objectives we are to seek are:

And here he quoted the resolution:

> Achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full restoration of international peace and security in the area.

The minister went on to say:

> These are the goals of the Canadian delegation to the conference.

And a little later on:

> I can see no obstacle that could not be overcome in the way of the realization of that resolution if there is good faith and good will on both sides;

The minister went on to say that the "if" with respect to the communist delegation was a pretty large "if".

I wonder whether there is justification even for the hope which the minister expressed, and the wonder which I have on that score makes me concerned lest our delegation is prepared to make the sort of concession which we on this side feel would be highly improper for the Canadian delegation to make.

That is why we want to be taken into the confidence of the minister and of the government. We want a measure of consultation, a word which the minister himself stressed to such great extent yesterday. We want some consultation between the government and parliament as to what are going to be the terms of reference of that delegation. The minister said that our objectives are to achieve, by peaceful means, a unified, independent and democratic Korea.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me fair to say that our experience has proven that it is highly unlikely that you are going to get immediate agreement with Russia and with China on the restoring or the creation of a democratic government anywhere in the world, at least anywhere where the communist countries have any influence to prevent it. That is why I wonder whether there is even reason for the hope which the minister has expressed.

I think it would be an attitude of blind folly to say that we really hope we are going to get agreement with Russia and China on a democratic government, as we understand it, with regard to Korea unless we are going to make concessions which so far have not been indicated to us here. That is why it is proper and, in fact, essential that the minister should not content himself with the vague generality—"Oh, we are going over there to try to promote peace and democracy." Of course we are going over there to try to promote peace and a unified Korea. That is what we fought for. But how do we propose to try to get it? What bargain are we going to make? What bargain, if any, are we prepared to enter into in order to achieve it, or are we prepared to enter into any bargain? I think parliament is entitled to be consulted by the government and to be informed by the government on this point.

When he replies I can imagine the minister's saying, "Surely my hon. friend will hardly expect the Canadian delegation to show its hand and to reveal in advance to the Russian and Chinese delegates just what bargaining points we have before we get there". I suppose there may be some faint shadow of justification for that position, Mr. Speaker; but if we are not going to be told in detail what the Canadian delegation will be told, what bargaining attitudes they will take, I think we are at least entitled to insist that we should be told what they will not do and the points beyond which they will not go in the making of concessions, or in the encouragement of our allies in the making of concessions, to Russia and to communist China. It seems to me that it might indeed strengthen the position of the whole free world before the conference if there were to be a measure of consultation between the free western nations that have been fighting in Korea and an agreement as to those points beyond which they will not go in these negotiations so that the Russians and the Chinese would understand clearly before they go there those concessions which they need not even hope to be able to force from us.

Not only should that measure of consultation take place between those governments but it is my opinion that this parliament is entitled to be consulted and to be informed by the minister and by the government as to what that position is, what it is we have agreed that we will not do, or that we will not give up, at the Geneva conference. If we are to continue this so-called, and as I sometimes think inaptly described, bilateral foreign policy, I am convinced that we on this side of the house cannot for much longer be expected to support only what we are told about after it has been accomplished. If we are expected to support Canada's foreign policy—even in broad general terms—we should not be asked afterwards to assume the responsibility for it in the technical sense of that word, but should be consulted so that we will know in advance the direction or trend of government policies in these matters so that we can express our opinion on them, in order that if we are going to be asked to support a deal after it has been made, we may at least have some opportunity of indicating the direction or the general lines along which we think negotiations should be conducted.

It is all very well for the secretary of state to use words to imply, as he did yesterday, that the necessity of consultation extends only between governments. As reported at page 3331 of Hansard, he said:

> I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I say that we want to be let in at the take-off so that we can do our part to help avoid a crash landing.

Mr. Speaker, if that statement applies as between governments which are assuming a joint responsibility in the conduct of international affairs, how much more aptly it applies as between the government and parliament when the government is asking parliament to support it in the foreign policy that it arrives at. I can only hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will inform parliament as to the bargaining position in general which is going to be taken by the Canadian delegation so that it will be a case of letting us be in at the take-off so that we can do our part to help avoid a crash landing rather than not being in at the take-off but having to strap ourselves in to minimize, so far as possible, the effects of that crash landing which might otherwise occur.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Does he feel that, as a result of this consultation, the opposition will be willing to accept responsibility for the policy of the government?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, of course I could not answer that question until the minister takes us into his confidence and lets us know in what direction the Canadian foreign policy is tending—

Mr. Drew: And gets away from the ambiguity.

Mr. Fulton: —so we will know whether we should approve it. He cannot very well expect us to give him a blank cheque such as that for which he is asking in those words.

Mr. Pearson: I am not asking for anything.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has moved the adjournment of the debate, perhaps you will allow me to say just a word or two on this motion. It is ten o'clock. I realize that fact. I do not know a thing about what the list of speakers may be; that is, I do not know how many hon. members yet want to speak in this debate. However, it appears to me to be desirable that we hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) as soon as we can. Consequently I am going to make to you, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that we continue to sit and that we give the minister a chance to speak.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Low: I realize that it will take unanimous consent of the members of the house, first, to sit beyond ten o'clock and, second, to allow the minister to speak before the debate has concluded, so that other members who wish to get into the debate will have a chance to speak at a later time. I realize all that. Nevertheless I am suggesting that on both counts I am prepared to give that consent on behalf of my colleagues.

I also want to say this. To me it hardly seems fair that, on January 29, when we had our last debate on external affairs, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not have a chance to reply. It may be that matters will work out that way this time if he does not have a chance to speak tonight. I am therefore asking my colleagues in the House of Commons to give that consent on both counts so that we can hear the minister in reply.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any lack of desire on the part of any hon. member here to accord such facilities as might be required to deal adequately with this subject. However, there can be no blame attached to any hon. member in the house for the inability of the minister to speak on the earlier occasion or on this occasion, except to the government. This can go on next Monday in an orderly debate in the proper way as it could have gone on on the earlier occasion. As it stands at the moment I submit that this debate should proceed in an orderly way, and I would hope that it will proceed on Monday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order not related to the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition at all. The hon. member for Kamloops resumed his seat, having completed his speech—

Mr. Fulton: No. On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I complete my point of order without being interrupted?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot listen to two hon. members at the same time. I think I should continue to listen to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I was saying when I was interrupted, the hon. member for Kamloops resumed his seat, having completed his speech.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: He was then asked a question by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and he rose to reply. He had already completed his speech and I should not think he would then have the opportunity to make a second speech.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I could explain to the Secretary of State—

Mr. Knowles: He is new around here.

Mr. Speaker: —that when the hon. member for Kamloops resumed his seat it was because it was ten o'clock, and he moved the adjournment of the debate.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oh yes, he did. Just as I was about to put that motion the hon. member for Peace River rose and said that he was speaking to the motion of the hon. member for Kamloops to adjourn the debate. He made a suggestion concerning the business of the house, the routine as to this debate, and it had to do with giving the Secretary of State for External Affairs, by unanimous consent, a chance to reply now. With that the Leader of the Opposition indicated that he could not agree. Since there is not unanimous consent, does the Secretary of State for External Affairs wish to say a word on the suggestion that was made?

Mr. Pearson: With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River, I should like to say a word to the effect that some very important questions have been asked of the government today and they should have been answered today if that had been possible. I am very sorry that that has not been possible.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Fulton, seconded by—

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, so that there will be no misunderstanding, I am not absolutely clear in my recollection of this, but I do not think it will be found in Hansard that I said "I move the adjournment of the debate" before the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked me his question. My recollection of the sequence is that as I closed and was about to move the adjournment, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, "May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?" I said "yes" and resumed my seat to give him that opportunity. After the Secretary of State for External Affairs had completed his question I rose, replied, and then said "I accordingly move the adjournment of the debate". It is a pity that the Secretary of State does not listen more closely before he raises these puerile points of order.

Mr. Speaker: I stand corrected. In explaining the sequence I forgot the incident of the question having been asked and answered and then the motion to adjourn the debate being moved. May I put the motion now?

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, it has been agreed that on Monday we will take a motion to go into supply by the Minister of Finance which will not be opposed on the understanding that we do not enter any new departments. The procedure then will be that the Minister of Finance will ask for interim supply and when that has been granted we will take up the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister in a position to give us information as to the business for any further days next week, as he has sometimes done so helpfully, so that we might have a general view of the week?

Mr. Harris: In this particular instance I have no way of judging how long my hon. friends may take on the supplementary estimates. If I had I would be glad to forecast the rest of the week.

Mr. Green: If the supplementary estimates go through before ten o'clock what business will be taken up then?

Mr. Harris: If the supplementary estimates are completed before ten o'clock on Monday we will go on with this debate.

It being six minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 29, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT, AUDITORS' REPORT AND BUDGETS TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I desire to move that the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for the year 1953, tabled on March 15, the auditors' report in respect of Trans-Canada Air Lines for the year 1953, tabled on March 16, and also the revised budget for the year 1953, and the capital budget for the year 1954, and the operating budget for the year 1954 in respect of Trans-Canada Air Lines tabled March 26, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

AMENDMENTS CONSOLIDATING ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to withdraw the resolution relating to the amendment of the Atomic Energy Control Act standing in my name as item No. 6 under "Government Orders" on the order paper. I am now handing over to the Clerk for insertion in Votes and Proceedings notice of a bill which will be entitled "An act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act."

Mr. Drew: Will the minister explain the reason for this change?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The bill to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act as originally drawn required a resolution, as it involved expenditure of money. The bill as at present drawn does not require a resolution and the government has decided to withdraw the resolution and present the bill in the form as now revised.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and resolution withdrawn.

STANDING ORDERS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) moved that the fourth report of the standing committee on standing orders presented to the house on Friday, March 26, 1954, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE VOTING AGE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 390, to amend the Canada Elections Act (age of voters).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to reduce the age of voters under the Canada Elections Act from 21 to 18.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 389, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.—Mr. Decore.

QUESTIONS

BRETTON WOODS CONFERENCE

Mr. Hansell:

1. Who initiated the Bretton Woods conference?
2. Who invited Canada to send a delegation?
3. Did the Canadian delegation carry any instructions from the government, and if so, what were those instructions?
4. Who were the official members of the Canadian delegation to the Bretton Woods economic conference?
5. What was the position and considered qualifications of each one?
6. What are the names of all others who accompanied the delegation as advisers, clerks and any other occupation?
7. In what department of the government was each one employed?
8. What was the position and considered qualification of each?
9. What was the salary of each one employed?
10. What was the total cost to Canada of this conference?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. The United Nations international monetary and financial conference which was held at Bretton Woods from July 1 to July 22, 1944, was initiated by the government of the United States for the purpose of formulating definite proposals for an international monetary fund and a bank for reconstruction and development.

2. The invitation to the Canadian government came from the government of the United States.

3. Before the conference was actually held, an understanding was reached between the governments concerned that the delegates would not be required to hold plenipotentiary powers and that the proposals formulated at the conference would be referred to the respective governments for their acceptance or rejection. In the circumstances the Canadian delegation to the conference did not carry any formal instructions from the Canadian government. A statement of the Canadian position was contained in a speech by the Prime Minister on April 21, 1944, following a report of a committee of experts on the proposals to establish an international monetary fund.

4 and 5. Official members of the Canadian delegation were:

The Hon. J. L. Ilsley, K.C., M.P., minister of finance;

The Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, K.C., minister of justice;

Mr. D. C. Abbott, K.C., parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance;

Mr. Lionel Chevrier, K.C., M.P., parliamentary assistant to the minister of munitions and supply;

Mr. J. A. Blanchette, M.P.;

Mr. W. A. Tucker, K.C., M.P.;

Dr. W. C. Clark, deputy minister of finance;

Mr. G. F. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada;

Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, special assistant to the deputy minister of finance;

Mr. L. Rasminsky, chairman (alternate), foreign exchange control board;

Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre, financial attaché, Canadian embassy, Washington;

Mr. J. J. Deutsch, special assistant to the under-secretary of state for external affairs;

Mr. P. T. Tremblay, third secretary in the Canadian embassy at Washington.

6, 7, 8 and 9. Name, position, salary: Mrs. M. E. Unger, clerk grade 3, $1,721.04; Miss B. M. Eynon, office manager and general secretary, wartime prices and trade board Washington office, $2,300 (U.S.).

10. The only expenses incurred by the government were the travelling expenses of the various delegates. At this late date it is only possible to give the total of these travelling expenses for the civil servants who attended this conference. These expenses were $2,229.16.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

COAL AND GOLD MINES—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Purdy:

What was the amount of direct federal assistance paid or committed for in the fiscal year 1953 for (a) the coal mines of Canada; (b) the gold mines of Canada?

Mr. Prudham:

Amounts

(a) Assistance to coal mines, paid, $7,155,-104.00; committed, $1,847,662.00; estimated, $10,669,000.00.

*(b) Assistance to gold mines, paid, $11,-059,480.39; committed, $2,408,910.32; estimated, $11,000,000.00.

The above figures represent payments and commitments up to and including March 22, 1954.

*(b) Included in the $11,059,480.39 is an amount of $22,199.25 representing holdback payments for 1951 and $717,736.99 representing holdback payments for 1952.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS THROUGH CHURCHILL, HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN

Mr. Brooks:

How many bushels of grain were shipped through the ports of Churchill, Halifax and Saint John, respectively, during each of the years 1946 to 1953 inclusive?

Mr. Dickey:

Year	Churchill	Halifax	Saint John
1946	2,929,000	6,851,000	15,925,000
1947	4,976,000	7,008,000	13,671,000
1948	5,314,000	7,434,000	12,210,000
1949	5,528,000	9,346,000	14,122,000
1950	6,768,000	6,160,000	10,100,000
1951	7,278,000	5,548,000	11,958,000
1952	8,585,000	10,136,000	15,847,000
1953	10,784,000	13,815,000	22,247,000

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many prosecutions have been lodged in connection with alleged offences against the Export and Import Permits Act?

2. How many of the aforementioned prosecutions resulted in convictions?

3. What are the names of persons or companies so convicted?

4. What was the offence in each case and what penalty was imposed?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Twenty-six.

2. Seventeen.

3 and 4. Milford Oliver—exporting feed without a permit—fined $100.

Mark Benjamin—exporting hay rake without a permit—fined $50.

Laurent Lamothe—exporting hay rake without a permit—fined $50.

Gaspesia Lumber Ltd.—exporting lumber of quality and quantity other than specified in permits—fined $2,000.

Arthur E. Sabourin—exporting eggs without a permit—fined $50.

Percy Weissman—exporting tinplate to destination other than specified in permits—fined $1,025.

Willie Boudreau—exporting hay rake without permit—fined $25.

Oliva Grenier—exporting hay rake without permit—fined $25.

Joseph Finestone (first case)—exporting tinplate of quality other than specified in permit—fined $25.

Joseph Finestone (second case)—exporting tinplate to destination other than specified in permit—fined $125.

Sophy Segal, then carrying on business under the firm name and style of Canada Scrap Iron and Metal—exporting steel scrap in excess of permits—fined $600.

Colwood Accessories Limited—false information in export permit application; transferring a permit; allowing another person to use permit re nylon yarn—fined $1,750.

L. R. Shapiro, then carrying on business under the firm name and style of Lenex Corporation—allowing another person to use export permit re tinplate—fined $1,000.

Kent Steel Products Limited—allowing another person to use export permit re tinplate—fined $1,000.

Jacob Monster, then carrying on business under firm name and style of Wilmod Company—using another person's export permit re tinplate—fined $1,000.

Morris Gurvey, then carrying on business under firm name and style of M. Gurvey and Company—allowing another person to use his export permit re radio parts—fined $1,000.

Metropolitan Braids Limited—exporting nylon yarn without a permit and using another person's permit to export—fined $1,000.

LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. Knowles:

1. What length of service must a letter carrier have in order to be eligible for appointment as a supervisory letter carrier?

2. What are the duties of a supervisory letter carrier?

3. Is there a pay differential between letter carriers on regular walks and supervisory letter carriers? If so, what is the amount of that differential?

Questions

4. Do supervisory letter carriers have priority over other letter carriers in the choice of time for annual leaves, regardless of length of service?

5. Have any changes in respect of arrangements for annual leaves, as between supervisory letter carriers and letter carriers on regular walks been made at any time since February 1, 1954? If so, on what dates were such changes made, and what were the terms of such changes?

6. Has the Post Office Department received representations, at any time since February 1, 1954, from associations or organizations representing letter carriers, in respect of arrangements for annual leaves?

7. What were the terms of such representations, and what steps has the Post Office Department taken to meet such employee representations?

Mr. Cote:

1. There is no fixed length of service. Positions are filled by promotion wherever practical.

2. To act as relief carriers in the case of sick leave, annual leave or any other type of leave. To act as rotation carriers in connection with the five-day 40-hour week. To check letter carrier walks. To assist in the training of inexperienced help and to perform such other related duties as may be required.

3. Yes, at the minimum, $660, at the maximum, $300.

4. Yes, in some offices.

5. Yes, as outlined on March 17, page 3071 of Hansard.

6. Yes.

7. That selection of annual leave periods be on a basis of length of service irrespective of rank. This has been granted where the practical requirements permit as follows:

(a) If as many suitable supervisory letter carriers as are required, in each letter carrier delivery office, can be recruited without their being given priority for annual leave, this is to be done.

(b) In those centres where it is not possible to recruit the necessary number of suitable supervisory letter carriers without these employees being given priority for annual leave, then they are to be given this priority within the block of ten walks.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM AND IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What expenditures have been made on the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project, month by month from August 1953, to date?

Mr. McCubbin:

1953: August 31, $50,232.56; September 30, $45,849.70; October 31, $39,918.34; November 30, $54,555.81; December 13, $45,758.99.

1954: January 31, $31,291.65; February 28, $61.261.23.

Questions

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD—APPLICATIONS

Mr. Argue:

1. How many applications for loans were received by the Canadian farm loan board for the year ending March 31, 1953, by provinces?

2. How many loans were granted in each province for the year ending March 31, 1953?

Mr. Benidickson:

1.

Province	Number
British Columbia	370
Alberta	346
Saskatchewan	1,099
Manitoba	319
Ontario	1,169
Quebec	701
New Brunswick	191
Nova Scotia	83
Prince Edward Island	128
Newfoundland	0

2.

Province	Number of first mortgage loans disbursed	Number of second mortgage loans disbursed
British Columbia	127	10
Alberta	185	35
Saskatchewan	447	236
Manitoba	160	85
Ontario	318	60
Quebec	107	42
New Brunswick	60	7
Nova Scotia	39	1
Prince Edward Island	71	10

FEDERAL HEALTH GRANTS—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Tucker:

1. Has any assistance been given by the federal government to the province of Saskatchewan under the health grants program for the purchase of scientific, laboratory and other related equipment?

2. If so, what are the particulars of such assistance?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes.

2. A grant of $127,500.76 has been approved recently under the national health grants program for the university hospital at Saskatoon toward the provision of scientific and technical X-ray and laboratory equipment in order to establish suitable diagnostic services for the large portion of the province centring at Saskatoon.

*LOYALTY SCREENINGS—GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. Fulton:

On the occasion when the loyalty screening of government employees was first completed, were there any dismissals or transfers, and if so, how many, in the following departments or agencies of government: (a) external affairs; (b) national defence; (c) national research council; (d) Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (both domestic and international services); (e) national film board?

Mr. St. Laurent: The asterisk before this question indicates that the hon. member who set it down wishes to have it answered orally. The only answer I can make is that this government must take the responsibility of refusing to make a public record of the information requested by the question for the reasons given by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) in answering orally a similar question on March 3, as reported at page 2618 of Hansard.

EXPENDITURES FOR TOBACCO, ALCOHOL, ETC.

Mr. Nicholson:

What were the per capita expenditures in Canada in 1931, 1941, and 1951, for (a) tobacco; (b) alcoholic beverages; (c) cosmetics; (d) moving pictures; (e) education?

Mr. Dickey:

Estimated per capita expenditure in Canada

	1931	1941	1951
Tobacco	$10.79*	$15.03	$30.18
Alcoholic beverages	15.90*	20.68	52.24
Cosmetics and toilet preparations	1.54	2.08	4.41
Moving pictures (exclusive of taxes)	3.25	3.54	6.60
Education	13.95	11.28	35.33

* Estimate for 1930 used—national accounts, income and expenditure, 1926-1950.

MAIL DELIVERY CONTRACT—MONTPELLIER, QUE.

Mr. Dufresne:

1. Has the mail delivery contract for rural route No. 1, at Montpellier, county of Labelle, province of Quebec, been renewed?

2. If so, (a) to whom was the said contract awarded; (b) on what date; (c) for what amount?

Mr. Cote:

1. No.

2. (a) Ardoire Seguin; (b) January 19, 1954; (c) $1,050 per annum.

NOVA SCOTIA—PAYMENTS FROM ELECTRICAL, GAS OR STEAM CORPORATIONS

Mr. Balcom:

For the calendar year January 1, 1953 to December 31, 1953, what payment was made to Nova Scotia from money collected from corporations whose main business is the distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas or steam?

Mr. Benidickson: $173,482.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CABINET MINISTERS—COMPANY DIRECTORSHIPS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Are any cabinet ministers directors of any companies, corporations, etc?
2. If so, what ministers, what companies or corporations are they directors of, and at what date were any directorships presently held by such cabinet ministers assumed?
3. Have any cabinet ministers resigned any directorships since being sworn of the privy council?
4. If so, which ministers, on what dates, and from what companies or corporations?
5. Are any parliamentary assistants to cabinet ministers directors of any companies, corporations, etc.?
6. If so, which ones, and of what companies or corporations?

COAL CONSUMPTION—GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Hansell:

1. How much coal was used in government buildings during the last year for which figures are available?
2. How much of this coal was mined in Canada?

RADIO AND TELEVISION SETS—EXCISE TAX AND SALES

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. What was the total number of television sets sold in Canada during: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
2. What was the total amount of excise tax collected on these sets in: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
3. What was the total amount of excise tax turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the sale of these sets in: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
4. What was the total number of radios sold in Canada during: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
5. What was the total amount of excise tax collected on radio sets in: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
6. What was the total amount of excise tax turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the sale of these sets in: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
7. What was the total sale value of television sets sold in: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?
8. What was the total sale value of radio sets sold in: (a) the year 1953; (b) the first two months of 1954?

P.F.A.A.—PERSONNEL, 1953

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What are the names of each and every official and employee connected with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, and their respective occupations at the time of appointment, and the respective amounts of salaries and expenses paid each of them during the year 1953?

P.F.R.A.—PERSONNEL, 1953

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What are the names of all officials, servants and employees connected with P.F.R.A. and their respective occupations at the time of appointment and the amount of salaries and expenses paid to each of them during the year 1953?

P.F.R.A.—PERSONNEL, PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many officials, employees, etc., are or were there in the provinces of (a) Manitoba; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Alberta, in the P.F.R.A. administration as of (i) March 1, 1954; (ii) March 1, 1950?

P.F.A.A.—PERSONNEL, PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many officials, employees, etc., are or were in the employ of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration in the provinces of (a) Manitoba; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Alberta, as of (i) this date; (ii) March 1950?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CUSTOMS CHECK BRANCH—LETTER DIRECTING HIGHER RATE

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of a typical letter (or typical letters, if there are any significant variations in different letters written on the subject), dated at any time since January 1, 1952, written by the customs check branch of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue, to collectors of customs at customs ports, advising that a higher rate of duty, sales tax or excise tax is required, without necessarily giving the name of any firm involved in such correspondence.

CUSTOMS CHECK BRANCH—LETTER DIRECTING LOWER RATE OR EXEMPTION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of a typical letter (or typical letters, if there are any significant variations in different letters written on the subject), dated at any time since January 1, 1952, written by the customs check branch of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue, to collectors of customs at customs ports, advising that a lower rate of duty or the exemption from sales tax or excise tax is applicable, without necessarily giving the name of any firm involved in such correspondence.

Mr. Abbott: In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue I wonder whether my hon. friend would allow these motions to stand?

Mr. Speaker: Motions No. 1 and No. 2 stand.

POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES—NIGHT DIFFERENTIAL

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any correspondence dated at any time since January 1, 1954, exchanged between any organizations or associations representing post office employees, and the Postmaster General, the deputy postmaster general, or any other senior official of the Post Office Department, with reference to the question of the night differential for post office workers.

WHEAT

REQUEST FOR INTERIM PAYMENT ON DELIVERIES OF 1953 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has a representation been received from the government of Manitoba asking for an advance or interim payment on account of the wheat delivered of the 1953 crop; and is consideration being given by the government to granting such an advance in order to meet the costs that necessarily affect farmers during the spring period?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I recall no communication from the province of Manitoba; but I shall be glad to look through my files and, if I am wrong, I will answer tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the other question? Has the government given consideration to having the wheat board make an advance payment on account of the wheat delivered by western farmers of the 1953 crop in order to meet costs that will necessarily fall on farmers in the springtime?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The wheat board at the moment is in the process of paying out some $60 million, being the final payment on the crop of 1952; and it is felt that that cash in hand will be sufficient to take care of spring seeding requirements.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO RADIOACTIVE DUST—MELFORT, SASK.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence or, in his absence, to the associate minister. Can the minister confirm this morning's radio dispatch reporting that radioactive dust has fallen on the town of Melfort, Saskatchewan?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no; I cannot confirm it.

DEVELOPMENT FOR POWER PURPOSES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): On Friday, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) asked if the federal government had received any representations from the provincial government of New Brunswick in connection with the development of atomic energy for power purposes in that province.

The situation is that on February 17, 1953, the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the government's desire that production of power from atomic energy should be discussed with those who distribute power in Canada—the provincial power commissions and privately-owned power corporations. His remarks in this connection appear at page 2011 of Hansard. Subsequently, a letter was received from the power commission of the province of New Brunswick, dated February 19, 1953, asking whether or not this was a general invitation for participation. The reply to this letter was sent on March 5, 1953, advising the power commission of New Brunswick that the minister's remarks could be regarded as an invitation to those interested in participation, and certain information regarding the program to date was made available. It was suggested that the power commission of New Brunswick should select an individual to visit Chalk River so that the commission would be fully informed of developments. Through this means the province of New Brunswick will be able to participate in future development to the maximum extent which circumstances will permit.

SECURITY

LOYALTY SCREENINGS—GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): With reference to question No. 49, Mr. Speaker, to which the Prime Minister gave an oral answer, may I ask if he is aware of the fact that in 1950, as reported in Hansard for that year, information up to that time dealing with two of the agencies referred to in question No. 49 was given. If he is not aware of that fact, perhaps I can bring it to his attention. If he is aware of it, can he explain why the policy appears to be changed and that similar information on those two agencies with respect to the others should now be refused?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into the matter. I did not attempt to make any comparison between what the hon. gentleman says was done in 1950 and the position now taken. I can assure him that I will look into the matter and see whether or not there is any special reason.

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION OF TORONTO AREA SUBJECT TO DROP LETTER RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can he say what will be the area in Toronto which will be granted the drop letter rate when the new rates come into effect on April 1? Naturally I am particularly interested in the constituency of York-Scarborough in this regard.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I wish to thank my friend the hon. member for York-Scarborough for giving me notice of this question, which I am very glad has been raised.

In urban centres the drop letter rate includes the area served by letter carriers and where appropriate also includes the area served by dependent post offices within the municipal area under the jurisdiction of the city postmaster.

A municipality of metropolitan Toronto was established by provincial statute in 1953. This metropolitan area does not exactly coincide with the drop letter rate area, the boundaries of which are determined from a practical point of view to correspond with the actualities of the situation.

For example, at at least one point, the boundaries of letter carrier delivery have already extended beyond the boundaries of the metropolitan municipality.

At other points within the metropolitan municipality, there are areas which are comparatively undeveloped from an urban postal point of view.

It has therefore been deemed appropriate to define the area in connection with the municipality of metropolitan Toronto which will be considered as the drop letter rate area of the Toronto main post office.

The boundaries of this area are as follows:

On the south, lake Ontario. On the east, Pickering town line, north to highway No. 2A; thence by the Lansing cut-off to the proposed new highway running south of the Lansing road, as far as the Don river, thence north along the line of the Don river to Steeles avenue east; west along Steeles avenue east and Steeles avenue west to the Canadian National Railways, west of Dufferin street; south on the Canadian National Railways, thence west along Finch avenue to concession 1; south on concession 1 to the Richview side road, west on the Richview side road to Browns line; south on Browns line to the Queen Elizabeth highway, west along the Queen Elizabeth highway to Etobicoke creek, then following the line of the Etobicoke creek south to lake Ontario.

The boundaries of the drop letter rate area of the municipality of Toronto will naturally be subject to amendment from time to time as development occurs.

One of the main features is that the complete postal area will be under the jurisdiction of the city postmaster of Toronto.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $526,007,622, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $216,900, being one-quarter of the amount of item 431, a sum not exceeding $417,594.33, being one-sixth of the amount of items 197, 199, 202, 203, and a sum not exceeding $4,303,708.08, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 19, 37, 61, 79, 433, 434, of the said estimates be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955.

He said: Mr. Chairman, as was the case at about this time last year the proposed bill will provide, first, one-sixth of all items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1954-55; second, an additional one-quarter of one special item in connection with the international trade fair in respect of which most of the charges will come up for payment within the first two months of the year. That will release in all five-twelfths of that item. Third, there is an additional one-sixth of four special items, three of which are to cover the sessional expenses of the Senate and the House of Commons on which the heaviest payments fall due in the early part of the year. The fourth item is used initially to finance certain recoverable payments whereas provision for net expenditures only is included in the estimates. That item is item 197 relating to the unemployment insurance commission. This will release in all one-third of those items.

Finally, there is an additional one-twelfth of six special items for services with seasonal or other variable expenditure trends where heavier than normal expenditures are required in the early part of the year. This will release in all one-quarter of these items. I might add that these special items are the ones concerning which each year I have asked that an additional amount should be voted in interim supply.

The general proportion of one-sixth of all services plus additional proportions for certain special items is intended to provide for all the necessary requirements of the public service to the end of May. In no instance is the total amount of any item being released. The form of the bill is the same as the bill passed at this time last year. The passing of the bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for consideration from time to time throughout the balance of the session, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Knowles: The minister said that in no case was the total amount of an item being asked for in this interim supply bill. What is the largest amount in any case—five-twelfths?

Mr. Abbott: Five-twelfths, yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $526,007,622, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955;
2. The sum of $216,900, being one-quarter of the amount of item 431 of the said estimates;
3. The sum of $417,594.33, being one-sixth of the amount of items 197, 199, 202, 203 of the said estimates; and
4. The sum of $4,303,708.08, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 19, 37, 61, 79, 433, 434 of the said estimates; as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 391, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1955.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to clause 1, may I ask the minister if there is any significance to the fact that this act is to be cited as Appropriation Act No. 0?

Mr. Abbott: When the bill is given reading now it will be No. 1. This is a preliminary printing of course. We are doing this by leave, but it will be Appropriation Act No. 1.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—$216,900 granted for 1954-55.

Mr. Fulton: On this clause, I have a question which is not extremely important, but I should like to know how this thing works. As I understand it, under clause 2 we have voted one-sixth of every item in the main estimates. Then, under clause 3 we are asked to vote a specific sum not to exceed $216,900, being one-quarter of the amount of the item set forth in schedule A to the act. I take it from looking at schedule A that item in the estimates is No. 431.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Is it possible that by using the wording in clause 3 we have voted already one-sixth of item 431 and we are now voting an additional one-quarter?

Mr. Abbott: An additional one-quarter, and as I said the effect of this clause is to vote five-twelfths of the item.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

Schedule B agreed to.

Schedule C agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be read a third time now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: These are the supplementary estimates, and the first item is No. 547.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

547. To provide for the payment of compensation to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for under the above act and regulations thereunder, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $838.

Mr. Abbott: I was just going to point out, at the outset, that as usual in these supplementary estimates there are no new questions of policy. All of these items provide funds for which there was an item in the main estimates but for which inadequate provision was made in the votes. In other words, the policy has already been determined and this is to provide moneys where there has not been sufficient already voted.

Mr. Argue: If that is the case, I wonder whether the minister can explain why the first item states that it is to provide for the payment of compensation to owners of diseased animals which died or were slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for in the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and regulations. Perhaps the minister could say why this has not been covered by either the act as it existed before this session of parliament or the act as it now exists following the amendments that were made to the act during this session? The item is not very large, but here are a number of producers who have received compensation for animal slaughter, as it says, in a way unprovided for by the legislation.

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is, as it was explained to us in treasury board when this item came forward, that these were appropriate cases for compensation but for which, as the item indicates, compensation was not directly provided under the act. I have the names here of the persons who received compensation.

Mr. Knowles: Have received?

Mr. Abbott: Will receive.

Mr. Knowles: Which is it?

Mr. Abbott: There is no money voted. They will receive compensation totalling $838. There is a payment of $183 to a gentleman in Alberta. The carcass was condemned for t.b., and all the cases seem to have been either as a result of the animal having t.b. or what is described as a t.b. reactor, whatever that is.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I think it would be particularly appropriate if we had the Minister of Agriculture here to answer the questions on this item. The Minister of Finance is not able to tell the committee exactly the reason for these appropriations.

Mr. Abbott: I can give that information. Perhaps I should say that there is no discourtesy intended in the minister not being here. It has been fairly common for ministers not to be required to attend for these final supplementary items, because, as I say, the principle involved in each item has already been passed upon by the house. The votes are merely supplementary votes which have already been discussed. If the committee wishes I can give the names, the amounts and the reasons for the death of the cattle. It has never been the custom to debate again at this stage the desirability or otherwise of compensating people for diseased cattle. There is a similar item in the estimate which will be before the house within the next two or three weeks. That is my only reason for making that statement.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not think there is need for so much haste to pass these items that we cannot be informed as to the exact nature of the appropriations to be made. I, sir, would like to make some observations on the administration of this act and on the Department of Agriculture. I feel it would be quite appropriate and timely to do that because of certain information coming to our desks and through our research. I have a matter which I feel perhaps is urgent and important to the Department of Agriculture and to our people generally. While it is not my wish to hold up the house on these estimates, I do want to refer to a matter which, at least—

Mr. Abbott: Before we proceed with this, Mr. Chairman, I think it is important that we adhere fairly strictly to the rules on these supplementary estimates. I suggest the hon. member's remarks must be related, not to the administration of the Department of Agriculture generally or to the policy of the department but to the compensation paid for loss of livestock.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): If we are to adhere strictly to what the minister has said, Mr. Chairman, and you are in agreement with him, it is impossible for me to bring up the matter I had in mind. In view of that, I feel the minister should tell us exactly what the expenditure is to be under this vote.

Mr. Abbott: I shall do that. The names and addresses of the recipients and the amounts received are as follows:

Name	Address	Amount
Laurent Authier	Riviere Heva, Quebec	$33
Germain Beland	Ste. Jeanne d'Arc, Quebec	30
Bernard Brais	Iberville, Quebec	134
Alcide Laflamme	R-2, Stanstead, Quebec	92
Robert St. Pierre	L'Islet, Quebec	70
Rudulph Denzutter	Aylmer, Ontario	88
R. S. Sennett	Queensville, Ontario	103
Charles Davey	Boggy Creek, Manitoba	105
Richard May	Cremona, Alberta	183
		838

The particulars as to the cause of death and the reason that the animal was destroyed are given here as, carcass condemned for t.b. or t.b. reactor, died.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister now whether there are any hogs included in those figures, and if so what was the reason for slaughtering in that case?

Mr. Abbott: All cattle, Mr. Chairman, no hogs.

Item agreed to.

548. To provide for grants to fairs and exhibitions in accordance with the regulations established by order in council of December 22, 1952, P.C. 4602; for payments on account of agreements in force on December 22, 1952, with exhibition associations covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings—further amount required and to authorize grants to the exhibitions as detailed in the estimates, $108,000.

Mr. Tustin: In this item, which is grants to fairs, in the details on page 14 I find that the Prince Edward county agricultural society at Picton, Ontario, received $900. Immediately under that is shown the Ridgetown district agricultural fair, $2,500. I should like to ask the minister, Mr. Chairman, if these fairs are both B fairs, and if so why there is a difference in the grants. If that is not the case, has Picton been paid a portion of the grant that is being made to it?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I can explain the difference.

These grants, as my hon. friend knows, are made under regulations established by P.C. 4602 dated December 22, 1952, and commencing with the fiscal year 1954-55, Prince Edward county agricultural society, Picton, Ontario, and the Ridgetown district agricultural society, Ridgetown, are eligible for grants under those regulations. In view of the commitments made to both these fairs it is desirable to provide a grant not exceeding $900 for Prince Edward county agricultural society and not exceeding $2,500 for the Ridgetown district agricultural society in the fiscal year 1953-54. Authority is requested for payment of these grants for that reason. It is assumed from that explanation that there are already outstanding commitments in the case of both these fairs.

Mr. Charlton: With respect to item 548, would the minister give just a brief explanation of the $108,000 set aside for grants to fairs and exhibitions. Are there any large amounts?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I shall do that. Subsequent to the preparation of the estimates for the current fiscal year the policy regarding building grants was revised. Under the authority of P.C. 4602, of December 22, 1952, to which I referred a moment ago, the maximum building grant payable to exhibition associations was set at $20,000, payable according to the progress of the work instead of $100,000 payable at the rate of $10,000 per annum as provided for in the previous three-way agreement. As a result of this change in policy and of the receipt of applications not previously anticipated, the allotment for building grants has been depleted. Then, there are some details given as to how it will be provided. I have not here the specific details of the various fairs to which the whole sum of $108,000, will be apportioned. But it is the standard policy, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): If I understood correctly, the minister referred to a change in policy. I do not think hon. members would understand that change. Do I take it that there will be an increase in expenditures by way of assistance to class "A" and "B" fairs, or is it merely for the construction of buildings connected with the putting on of such fairs?

Mr. Abbott: The change in policy, as I said, was in the changing of the limit. There was a time when we were restricting construction expenditures because of the situation in connection with building activities subsequent to Korea. As I said a moment ago, the limit for construction grants was fixed at $20,000 instead of $100,000.

Item agreed to.

550. Agricultural lime assistance—further amount required, $85,000.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May we have the details concerning item 550, for $85,000?

Mr. Abbott: That is the standard subsidy which has been payable for years with respect to lime assistance, and it is available to all farmers who use it. It has been explained in the discussion on the main estimates every year. However, if my hon. friend wishes to have the full explanation, I am prepared to give it to him.

Lime is fundamental in maintaining the fertility of a large portion of farm land in Canada where the soil tends to become acid. Most of the soil in Newfoundland, the maritime provinces, Quebec, some districts of Ontario and the coastal region of British Columbia is of this type. Without adequate and continuous liming the productivity of such soil is relatively poor and farming becomes unprofitable. The provinces participating in the policy include Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. These provinces are subsidized to the extent of sixty per cent of the total amount expended by the provinces for any direct activity in increasing lime utilization for soil amendment purposes, subject to a maximum of $1.50 per ton on lime distributed in the province. This year the maximum subsidy increased from $1.25 to $1.50 per ton. This, with increased freight rates and the increased use of agricultural lime in Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario, renders the $500,000 voted by parliament for the fiscal year 1953-54 insufficient to cover the federal government's share under its arrangement with the provinces.

Of the $85,000 requested in this supplementary vote the provinces would be paid approximately as follows:

Newfoundland
Prince Edward Island	$12,000
Nova Scotia	13,000
New Brunswick	13,000
Quebec	26,000
Ontario	14,000
British Columbia	7,000

I do not have the figure for Newfoundland.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I understand that the total vote for the current year will be half a million dollars?

Mr. Abbott: It is $585,000 altogether. This is supplementary to the original vote of half a million dollars.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Has the government given consideration to extending the policy of assistance in regard to fertilizers? I might bring to his attention the fact that fertilizer prices have been increased in Canada to a point where, today, in western Canada, in the three prairie provinces ammonium phosphate fertilizer sells at $120 a ton. There is a real need either to have the government look into the fertilizer industry, with a view to bringing fertilizer costs down, so that we can have more use of them, so that the fertility of our soil will be retained, or the government should investigate the whole matter and undertake either to bring the price of fertilizers in line with farmers' costs of production, or extend the policy of subsidization.

I would bring to the minister's attention that this would not be the first time that governments have undertaken subsidization of fertilizers for the agricultural industry. In Great Britain they do it. And in many other countries. I suggest this is a matter which should be given attention by the government.

Mr. Abbott: I will see that it is brought to the minister's attention.

Item agreed to.

551. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage—further amount required, $139,600.

Mr. Castleden: Could the minister give the names of the smaller projects included in the amount of $81,000, as set out at page 15?

Mr. Abbott: There is the Hogue dam, $31,000; Neepawa dam, $25,000; and Pheasant creek, $25,000.

Item agreed to.

552. Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces—further amount required, $230,207.

Mr. Quelch: What projects was this money paid out for?

Mr. Abbott: This is supplementary to the big vote, and was paid out in connection with the Bow River project.

Mr. Knowles: How could it be paid out before it is voted?

Mr. Abbott: It may have been paid out, because in some cases we can provide for these items by a transfer of allotment. However, it can always be done by a supplementary vote. I think however that this has not been paid. It was a slip of the tongue on my part.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I would like to ask if any of this vote is for the Moosomin project?

Mr. Abbott: No, it is all for the Bow River project.

Item agreed to.

553. Estimated amount required to recoup the agricultural prices support account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural prices support board during the fiscal year 1953-54, including authority to credit to the account the net revenue received into the agricultural products board account from the sale of New Zealand meat received in exchange for beef shipped to the United Kingdom, $37,758,894.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister figures to show how much was recovered from the sale of New Zealand meat?

Mr. Abbott: The amount recouped on the bone in carcass New Zealand meat was $24,149,844.07. That was recouped up to March 31, 1953.

Mr. Fulton: Does that mean then that in effect the amount required to recoup the agricultural prices support account, to cover the net operating loss of the board, was $37 million plus $24 million, the $37 million figure being the net figure?

Mr. Abbott: There were different kinds of beef. The total quantity of the bone in carcass New Zealand beef was 70,252,935 pounds, and the estimated total loss to March 31, 1954, on that transaction, was $27,734,-579.52, and the total estimated loss to March 31, 1954, related to foot-and-mouth disease was $69,187,628.78.

Mr. Fulton: What I was trying to get at was this. The $37 million appears to have been arrived at by crediting the account with $24 million recovered from the sale of New Zealand beef.

Mr. Abbott: And other recoveries.

Mr. Fulton: And other recoveries?

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Argue: Has the board any meat on hand as a result of this transaction regarding foot-and-mouth disease, or does this clean up the total loss?

Mr. Abbott: This is the total loss. I still have to verify that, but the intention was to clean up the total loss this year. I make the reservation that there might be some minor items, but they would not be substantial.

Mr. Argue: The board has not any substantial quantity of meat on hand?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Bryson: Can the minister tell us how much money was paid out to compensate cold storage concerns for services rendered in connection with the amount paid under the prices support act?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I have no information as to that.

Mr. Bryson: I presume that this $37 million and some odd is over and above $200 million set out in the original fund.

Mr. Abbott: The $37 million recoup restores the original fund of $200 million as at March 31, including value of inventories on hand. As I pointed out a moment ago, the total loss on hogs and cattle related to the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak was just over $69 million. Last year we voted a substantial sum—I have not the figure before me—and this year we are voting this additional $37 million.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

National Gallery of Canada—

555. Payment to the national gallery purchase account for the purpose of acquiring works of art, in conformity with section 8 of the National Gallery Act—further amount required, $360,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to ask the minister a question on this item. It amounts to $360,000 for the purchase of works of art. Can the minister tell us what works of art were purchased—I presume they are paintings—and what schools and who were the masters concerned?

Mr. Abbott: If we have to get into the schools I shall have to get someone who is a little more expert than I am in this field, Mr. Chairman. I can tell my hon. friend in general terms what works of art were purchased, but if he is not satisfied with the information I shall be able to give him we shall have to let the answers stand and my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, will be able to answer him, since he is a devotee of and an expert in that field. I am sure his answer will be much more satisfactory than mine.

Mr. Knowles: Were these the paintings which appeared in the Montreal Gazette this morning?

Mr. Abbott: I do not read that section of the Gazette.

Mr. Knowles: They were on the editorial page.

Mr. Abbott: My colleague can answer the question.

Mr. Harris: The purchases are from different artists, all from one collection, however, and represent different schools of painting. I know some publicity has been given to these particular purchases, with opinions expressed in favour of them by persons with some art training, and criticism of them apparently by a well-known columnist.

Mr. Macdonnell: Was the last one without training? The minister said the previous one had art training, but he did not say anything about the other one.

Mr. Harris: I did not suggest that he did not have any. There have been remarks upon it in a distinguished newspaper known as the Times of London, and there are comments on this purchase. I only have this to say,

Mr. Chairman, that it is a continuation of the policy we announced last year at this time of purchasing from this particular collection representative paintings of various schools in order to have them in the gallery so that eventually—I do not say how long this may take—we shall have a sufficiently wide selection that one as a student of art could obtain an appreciation of art as it was practised in Europe at various times during three or four hundred years.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister agree to give us the names of the artists and the titles of the paintings concerned?

Mr. Harris: Yes. Well, the paintings are: by Quentin Metsys, The Crucifixion; by Mr. Beham, Portrait of a Prince of Bavaria; by Guardi, Santa Maria Della Salute and the Grand Canal Venice; by Nicolas Maes, Lacemaker; by Memling, Madonna and Child with Saint Anthony of Padua.

Mr. Nesbitt: Can the minister tell us how much was paid for each of these paintings?

Mr. Harris: It was a group purchase of the lot at the figure mentioned in the supplementary.

Mr. Nesbitt: Were these paintings purchased as representative of schools of painting that are not represented in the national gallery at the present time?

Mr. Harris: In two cases they are of schools that are not represented at all; and in the others, they are additions to the collection we now have.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the minister can tell us which two paintings are indicative of schools that are not represented at the present time? Are they Italian or Flemish schools of art?

Mr. Harris: I am told that the Flemish school has not been represented until the present time, and we are getting the Nicolas Maes "Lacemaker". I am also told that the Guardi one is the first of the so-called impressionist group in Italy.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I was on my feet before you called the present item, Mr. Chairman. I should like your indulgence and the indulgence of hon. members to refer back to item 554. I am sure we are quite happy to have the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with us. I know that none of us wants to prolong his statements on some of these matters. However, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister's department—

The Chairman: Has the hon. member consent to revert to item 554?

Mr. Abbott: As long as it does not become a habit with him, Mr. Chairman.

Indian affairs branch—
Education—

554. Administration, operation and maintenance —further amount required, $120,000.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I shall be fairly brief. I want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that in regard to the Indian reserve in my own constituency at White Bear reserve, we have a rather serious situation with respect to the Indian population. I have already taken the matter up with officials of his department, and I suggest that something be done about giving hospital and medical care to these people. The population there is rising to well over 500 and there definitely is not proper hospital or medical care for these people. I would suggest to him that he give the matter consideration, and when we come to the main estimates I hope that he will be able to give me a satisfactory answer that something definitely is to be done for the Indians on that reserve.

Mr. Harris: I shall be glad to draw the hon. member's request to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is in charge of that particular branch of Indian administration.

National Gallery of Canada—

555. Payment to the national gallery purchase account for the purpose of acquiring works of art, in conformity with section 8 of the National Gallery Act—further amount required, $360,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, on this item there is one further question I would like to ask the minister. As I understood the minister's remarks a few moments ago some of these paintings purchased under this item of $360,000 were representative of the Flemish school which had not previously been represented in the national gallery. A short time ago I made some inquiries at the national gallery and I have a list of the paintings purchased prior to the purchase of paintings of the Flemish school. Painting No. 3695 is "Judith with the Head of Holofernes" and there is another painting by Frans Floris, another by Jan Davids de Heem, and yet another. Certainly there are more than 20 other paintings belonging to the Flemish school and I wonder whether the minister was in error in remarks relating to them.

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member will understand that the Flemish school in the artistic sense extended over a lengthy period of time. There were quite a number of variations during that period and this particular painting relates to a period which had not been represented.

Mr. Nesbitt: That explains the matter, Mr. Chairman. What period does that painting relate to?

Mr. Harris: My information is that it relates to the late 1600's.

Mr. Thatcher: Perhaps it is because I am a socialist and have a socialist background and may not have a true understanding of the arts, but it appears to me that $360,000 is an awful lot of money for four paintings. I do not believe the people in my riding would be very enthusiastic about expenditures of that kind.

Mr. Abbott: A man cannot live by hardware alone.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister may be right, but if I thought my colleagues would support me I would move that this vote be reduced to one dollar. However, I have not consulted them and I will not follow that course on this occasion but I hope the minister will not purchase too many $90,000 paintings in future.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Department and missions abroad—

556. To provide for official hospitality—further amount required, $4,000.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister tell us what this $4,000 was required for? Perhaps I should say what will it be required for?

Mr. Abbott: This is an item in the estimates for external affairs which covers hospitality. In the course of this year that vote was overrun and we had to provide for an additional amount out of unforeseen expenditures to provide for official hospitality up to the end of March 1954. Total expenditure for official hospitality up to January 31, 1954, including the visit of President Eisenhower to Canada, amounted to $20,690 and the supplementary estimate is in order to reimburse the Department of Finance for the cash we had to take out of the miscellaneous minor unforeseen expenditure fund in order to meet these expenses. It is difficult to estimate with strict accuracy what may be expended for this purpose during the year. It is a relatively modest amount, I believe, considering the number of distinguished visitors we have in Ottawa these days. This amount of $4,000 is additional to the $20,000 considered in the main estimates.

Mr. Regier: Am I correct in understanding that all we spent on extending hospitality on behalf of the Department of External Affairs during the course of the year amounted to about $20,000?

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Regier: We spent $360,000 on four paintings and only $20,000 in acts of hospitality.

Item agreed to.

General—terminable services—

557. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, $500,000.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on this item I should like to ask whether this expenditure is made under United Nations direction?

Mr. Abbott: While the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees has funds on hand earmarked for its resettlement program it has no reserve for its program of relief for the 850,000-odd refugees that it cares for. The negotiating committee for extra budgetary funds has, therefore, been requested by the general assembly to seek the additional funds required from various governments and has called upon Canada to indicate the extent of its financial support for the agency's activities for the year 1953-54. Cabinet has now agreed that due to the present state of tension in the eastern Mediterranean area as well as for strategic, political and humanitarian reasons, Canada should make a contribution of $500,000 to the agency's 1953-54 relief program. The committee made the same contribution last year and it was estimated we would be making one this year but the amount had not been settled until, as I have indicated, this appeal was made.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if this item of $500,000 is related only to the Colombo plan or if it is extra. If there are extra amounts involved I think that should be known.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, this amount has no connection with the Colombo plan; it is extra.

Mr. McIvor: I think that is most commendable, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, in respect to the agencies carrying out the distribution of this assistance, I would like to know whether they are actually United Nations organizations, or whether they are private or civilian welfare agencies.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, possibly I can answer that. The agency is connected with the United Nations.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): One further question, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the other three votes. The first is assistance for reconstruction and rehabilitation in Greece. The next is to provide famine relief for Pakistan and the third is to provide flood relief for Japan. In all three instances which agencies will undertake the distribution of this assistance?

Mr. Abbott: In the case of Greece the supplies are made available to the Greek government. In connection with Pakistan the supplies also were made available through the government of Pakistan. As regards flood relief for Japan I am not too sure about that but I believe that would be arranged through the Japanese government or the Red Cross, but I am not positive.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I wonder if the minister could tell the committee whether or not the government is fairly certain that these supplies reach the people to whom we want to give assistance and that there is no black market in regard to the distribution of these goods?

Mr. Abbott: Our representatives in the countries concerned do their best to see that these goods involved in humanitarian enterprises in the case of Greece and Pakistan are distributed through the governments of these countries. I believe we must take it for granted that the relief is properly handled.

Mr. Noseworthy: Does this $5 million cover the cost of the first shipment to Pakistan, or does it cover the total amount of the shipments made to date?

Mr. Abbott: That represents the total cost of wheat shipped to Pakistan.

Mr. Stick: Is that $5 million to Pakistan part of the Colombo plan?

Mr. Abbott: No. The wheat was originally made available out of the Colombo plan vote and this vote is to reimburse the Colombo plan vote.

Mr. Argue: How many bushels of wheat does that cover and what was the price?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I have not that information here.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister of external affairs say whether the discussions which led to the granting of this gift were between Canada and the United States, or confined to Canada and Pakistan?

Mr. Pearson: Discussion was between the Pakistan and the Canadian governments on this particular matter; but we did, of course, know that similar discussions were going on between Pakistan and the United States for help in this same emergency.

Mr. Harkness: From what the minister has said, I understand that this wheat has already been shipped. Will he tell us when that wheat was shipped or, in other words, out of what group of statistics we now have as to available stocks, disappearance and so forth, did this $5 million come?

Mr. Abbott: It was in the spring of 1953. I have not the exact date.

Mr. Harkness: It is nearly a year ago now?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

The Chairman: Shall items 557 to 560 inclusive carry?

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Chairman. Have you called them as a group?

The Chairman: They have been discussed as a group.

Mr. Knowles: I was waiting until item 559 was reached, but since you are calling them as a group, I can make my comment now.

Terminable services—

559. To provide for a gift of wheat as a contribution to famine relief for Pakistan, $5,000,000.

Mr. Knowles: From what has been said already when we were discussing the previous items, I think it is clear that the committee is pleased to have the opportunity to vote this sum of money. We are pleased to know that it is an addition to what we are doing by way of aid to that part of the world under the Colombo plan and under United Nations technical assistance programs. This gives me the opportunity—if I might take half a minute to do so and since Pakistan is part of Asia—to commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the speech he is reported to have made over the week end urging the importance of our learning to live with and to get along with the peoples of Asia. As I listened to the report of the speech he made I felt it was one that he might well make at the next meeting of the cabinet.

Mr. Bryson: As a matter of information, may I ask the minister what agency is responsible for this barley-for-Korea drive that is going on in the city of Ottawa among the school children?

Mr. Abbott: What was my hon. friend's question again?

Mr. Bryson: What agency is carrying out and is responsible for the details involved in this barley-for-Korea drive to which the school children are being asked to subscribe 20 cents?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I do not know. I will make some inquiries and see whether I can find out. It does not come under this item in any event.

Items agreed to.

560. To provide for a gift of food as a contribution to flood relief for Japan, $50,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is that the total amount of our gift or is that supplemental to a larger one?

Mr. Abbott: No. That is the total amount.

Mr. Macdonnell: It does not seem to be a very magnificent gift. What was the total amount?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that either. This was the recommendation. This was a voluntary fund. It was not a government fund.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

General administration—

561. Departmental administration—further amount required, $5,800.

Mr. Noseworthy: I take it that this is a fairly general item, the administration of the Department of Finance, and I hope the matter I want to bring to the minister's attention is in order. First of all, I want to point out that the Department of Finance, through the Bank of Canada, is interested in our banking system and, through the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, is interested in gold mining. The matter I want to call to his attention is a report in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that when the strike at the Hollinger mine was settled there was an agreement to compromise on the question of the check-off to the extent that there was to be what was known as a bank check-off. Hollinger was to send cheques to the bank. The bank was to agree that any employee who so desired might have his union dues deducted and paid directly to the union by the bank. In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a report to the effect that while that practice was in effect before the strike, it has been discontinued since the strike ended and that none of the eight district banks have so far been induced to participate in that compromise agreement. I wonder whether the minister wants to comment on that matter, seeing it affects his department?

Mr. Abbott: I have not any information about it, but it has nothing to do with the administration of the Department of Finance. It is purely a matter of internal management of the banks, as far as I can see.

Item agreed to.

562. Comptroller of the treasury—central office and branch offices administration—further amount required, $220,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: One can quite understand that, in item 561, there might be a small amount like $5,800 required for further administration expenses, but I find it a little bit difficult to understand why the comptroller of the treasury should find that he needs a further $220,000.

Mr. Abbott: I can relieve my hon. friend's mind at once. It is entirely owing to raises in salaries, revision of salaries; and it covers only part of it. That is the complete answer. There was a little bit left in the vote, but the revision of the salaries requires this whole $220,000 and more besides.

Mr. Macdonnell: The only thing I can suggest is that if that fact had been stated, the minister would have been saved my question.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might help a bit here. A good many of these items scattered through the estimates are due almost entirely to the upward revision in the salary rates.

Item agreed to.

Administration of various acts and costs of special functions—

563. Superannuation and retirement acts, administration—further amount required, $132,404.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister what decision was reached with regard to the civil servants who had been in the old department of soldiers' civil re-establishment. As the minister will recall, there was quite a lengthy discussion last session, some of us contending that these particular officials were not receiving adequate consideration with regard to their superannuation. The minister promised to have each individual case looked into. I now find that in at least two of the cases I raised from Vancouver there have been adverse decisions, although the persons had been in the service for over thirty years. Will the minister tell us on what basis the department is acting in connection with these cases?

Mr. Abbott: From memory I am not able to do so today. As I promised when this main item was under discussion last year, the superannuation branch has made an investigation of each individual case of these employees who are affected and has made a report to me. As a result of that investigation the conclusion was reached that the contention of the vast majority of these employees that they were entitled to the five-year average and not the ten-year average—which is what it boils down to—for superannuation purposes, was not justified and could not be granted.

I have prepared a memorandum, which I have sent to a number of members who are interested in the question, outlining the particulars of the investigation which was made. I will come prepared to discuss it fully and in detail when the main item comes up in my estimates or if the question of superannuation is before the house at some other time. But I may say quite frankly that I had not come prepared today to go into that detail. Broadly speaking, I can give my hon. friend the general statement that only in a few cases was the conclusion reached that these employees were entitled to the five-year basis as against the ten-year basis.

Mr. Brooks: There is no intention then to make any amendments to the act?

Mr. Abbott: To cover them—no. The conclusion I reached, after studying the report I was given, was that they were in no different position from that of a great many other civil servants who are still subject to the ten-year average.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have a copy of the minister's letter and I am glad it can be discussed again because it does seem to me that these men are being made the victims of what I think is a more technical view than I would usually expect the minister to take. I take it we can discuss the matter later.

Mr. Abbott: I would be happy to do that. This has come up before. It came up ten or fifteen years ago. A ruling was made then and it has been adhered to ever since. I agree with my friend that it is a complicated situation, and in some cases there may be some apparent inequities. I shall be glad to discuss it when I am a little better supplied with my basic material than I am at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: I hope that the minister will also be supplied with basic material and a little more kindness of heart toward the question of the retired civil servants who are on low pensions when we reach the corresponding item again later in the session. I will not take the time of the committee now because we had a discussion of this matter on March 2. However, I do want to tell the minister that his statement on that day, which was interpreted by some as an attempt on the minister's part to close the door on this question, has certainly not satisfied those who are interested. When I refer to those who are interested I have in mind not only the superannuated civil servants themselves, particularly those in the lower brackets, but a great many others who are interested in them and feel that their case has not yet been accorded the justice it deserves. I appreciate the fact that the minister probably has not had a change of heart in the short time since the 2nd of March, but I hope that before the end of this session he will have that change of heart and will take a different attitude towards this problem.

Mr. Macdonnell: When the warm weather comes.

Mr. Knowles: It is a serious problem affecting a great many, and it seems to me that the good name of the government is at stake in its attitude towards its former employees. I hope the minister will be prepared to discuss this matter in a different vein the next time it is raised in the house.

Item agreed to.

564. To authorize and provide for adjustment payments in respect of subsidies previously paid and administrative expenses incurred by: (a) Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd., and (b) the Minister of Finance on behalf of Her Majesty, pursuant to the agreement entered into between the said corporation and Her Majesty on the 25th day of June, 1953, under the authority of order in council P.C. 1953-868 dated the 1st day of June, 1953, $310,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister give a word of explanation about item 564? What I should like to have is a word about the history of the corporation since the war. The last report of the corporation I have been able to get is that of 1946.

Mr. Abbott: The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, as my hon. friend will recall, was one of the agencies set up by the government in connection with the price control program to administer subsidies and the like. Since the end of the war it has been on a liquidating basis. It has simply been kept in existence in order to pay off outstanding claims. In June of last year an order in council was passed stating that the C.P.S.C. had fulfilled its purpose and it was directed to surrender its charter. All assets were to be transferred to Her Majesty and provision was made for the discharge of outstanding liabilities. The Minister of Finance was authorized accordingly to execute an agreement with the company which provided —I will not go into all the details—for the payment over of moneys to the crown and the crown was to dispose of these moneys first by paying all outstanding liabilities, second, by paying any claim that might be made by Joy Oil Limited, which was the largest claim outstanding and which was under litigation, and third, by paying the government the balance of advances to the company.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is it practically cleaned up?

Mr. Abbott: It is practically cleaned up. I think this will perhaps be as close to the final clean-up as possible. The Joy Oil claim has now been settled. There are sundry administrative expenses which have been incurred by the crown and the vote of $310,000 is required for the administrative expenses together with the Joy Oil settlement and to allow for any further minor payments that may come up during the current fiscal year, the year which will end in the next day or two.

To give an indication of the way the assets of the former corporation stand, of accounts receivable of $72,207.70, $4,027.78 has been collected, leaving uncollected accounts at $68,179.92. As the committee will appreciate, these accounts have been outstanding for a very considerable time, and I would not place a very high value on them.

Item agreed to.

565. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property—To provide for payments to municipalities in accordance with the Municipal Grants Act, and the rural municipal grants regulations established by order in council of August 6, 1952, P.C. 3729; and to provide for payments to municipalities under order in council of July 19, 1950, P.C. 3456, in respect of the cost of medical and hospital services and supplies furnished to federal employees and other persons specified therein—further amount required including authority to regard the admiralty properties in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, as federal property notwithstanding that formal transfer of administration has not been completed, $343,783.

Mr. Ellis: Would the minister outline the formula by which grants are made to municipalities under the Municipal Grants Act?

Mr. Abbott: I could do that, but I wonder if my hon. friend would be content to allow his question to stand. On the order paper I have a resolution preceding the introduction of a bill to amend the Municipal Grants Act which I hope we will be dealing with next week. I am going to make a rather full statement at that time both with respect to present policy and the contemplated changes. If it meets my hon. friend's convenience, I would prefer to do it then, but if he wants a brief explanation now I would be happy to give it to him.

Mr. Ellis: I think that will be satisfactory. I merely wanted the explanation before we came to the main estimates.

Mr. Abbott: I hope, if the house leader so arranges it, to reach the amendments to the Municipal Grants Act next week some time, and at that time I hope we may have a full discussion of the whole problem.

Mr. Ellis: That will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. Abbott: I should add that this vote is simply to implement existing policy.

Mr. Stick: There is a reference to "further amount required including authority to regard the admiralty properties in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, as federal property". What was the total amount paid for the admiralty properties?

Mr. Abbott: I will see if I have that here.

Mr. Stick: Will this finish the payments to Great Britain on that account?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I do not have that breakdown here but I will have it when we debate the main item. Total payments in St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1953-54 are $15,741, but I do not have the detail here as to how that is broken down.

Mr. Stick: You can give it to me some other time.

Mr. Abbott: I will do it when we are on the Municipal Grants Act.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to read the last part of this item. It reads:

. . . further amount required including authority to regard the admiralty properties in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, as federal property notwithstanding that formal transfer of administration has not been completed.

I am a little confused about that. I know that occasionally in this committee we have what is called legislation by item, but up to the present time I have understood that if there was doubt finally whether there was any authority for the item, which has happened on one or two occasions, once it was voted here that settled the matter anyhow. But does this mean that we are conveying title to property by item?

Mr. Abbott: No, that is under discussion. That admiralty property is property in St. John's, Newfoundland, which belongs to the British admiralty, as I remember it, and has for a great many years. We are occupying it and I dare say may be renting some of it. The purpose of this item is to make it clear that we can base our tax grant to the city of St. John's on that property as well as property to which we already have title. So far as that property is concerned, discussions for the transfer of title to the crown in the right of Canada are still proceeding, but we are using it.

Mr. Macdonnell: But it is your full intention to acquire it?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, it is understood we are going to acquire it. It is just that the legal details have not been worked out yet.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): As this is a supplementary item, what was the total amount?

Mr. Abbott: The total amount this year, including this item, will be $3,045,083.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Was there any payment to the city of London or the township of Westminster?

Mr. Abbott: I find London, section 6 grants, $7,726. I do not see the other, but I will check on that when we have the main bill before the committee. The grant to the city of London to which I referred was a section 6 grant, one of the transitional grants.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I notice that this vote in the supplementary estimates is for $343,000, and that under the vote in the main estimates this item amounted to $3,190,000, or an increase of $488,700 without the additional vote which we are now discussing. I notice, sir, that this vote is for grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property and to provide for payments to municipalities in accordance with the Municipal Grants Act and the rural municipal grants regulations. I should like to ask the minister whether or not this formula for grants was determined in consultation with municipal bodies or whether it was established at the discretion of the federal cabinet? Will the minister, in answering that question, also state whether or not the government intends increasing the grants or holding further consultations with municipalities. I know that municipal financing is in dire straits today, and all our municipal bodies are insisting that they have to have additional revenue in order to carry on municipal responsibilities.

Mr. Abbott: I know that the hon. member has a very valuable contribution to make on this subject, but as I indicated a moment ago in reply to the hon. member for Regina City I shall shortly be introducing a bill to revise the Municipal Grants Act and make it somewhat more favourable. At that time, I hope we shall have a complete discussion on these grants by the federal government to municipalities. At that time I shall come armed with all the ammunition I can get together to answer these questions.

The present vote is merely to supplement the moneys already voted in order to carry out existing policy which is set forth in two places in the Municipal Grants Act, and in the item in last year's estimates permitting grants to rural municipalities. The grants to rural municipalities are, as all these grants are, on an ex gratia basis to compensate for the loss to the municipality because of the fact that military establishments, which are completely self-supporting and require no municipal services, are located there. They may use the roads or something of that sort. I shall have complete information on that type of grant, as well as the other, when I discuss the proposed bill because I am incorporating that provision in the bill.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister if representations have been made by rural municipalities or other bodies for further federal assistance?

Mr. Abbott: I do not believe they have. The municipalities are the creatures of and dependent upon and derive their powers from the provinces. Any representations they have to make should be made to their respective provinces, and then if the province wishes to make submissions to the federal government, that is the proper way to do it. Speaking generally, I think it is not appropriate for the federal government to enter into financial negotiations with municipalities over which they have no control and over which they have no legislative jurisdiction.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Have the provinces on behalf of the municipalities under their respective jurisdictions asked for federal assistance under the Municipal Grants Act?

Mr. Abbott: Not so far as I am aware, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister one other question? When this matter is under further discussion and the minister, as he says, is more fully armed to discuss it, will that discussion include the question as to which assessment the government accepts? I believe at the present time the federal authority does not accept—

Mr. Abbott: Does not, and in future it will not accept. One of the fundamental principles of this is, and always has been, that the federal government, since the grants are ex gratia payments, cannot and does not intend to submit to having an assessment made locally. In point of fact, what has been done is that the valuations have been determined after discussion and consultation with the local authorities. Under the amended act, as under the present act, assessments will continue to be made by the federal government.

Mr. Knowles: I take it from what the minister just said we will be in a position to discuss this matter when the bill comes before us, but that the decision has already been made.

Mr. Abbott: The government is under obligation to make that decision, of course, because it is introducing the bill.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Is there any proposed meeting between the federal and provincial authorities in the near future at which this might be discussed?

Mr. Abbott: Where?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): A meeting between the provincial authorities and the federal authorities, at which municipal finance may come up?

Mr. Abbott: Well, the federal government is willing to listen to representations made by any provincial government. The door is always open. As a matter of fact, they are doing it most of the time, during my eight or nine years of experience on this job. The provincial governments, or most of them, are never reluctant to come forward and ask the federal government for money.

Mr. Adamson: Might I ask the minister if this includes any payment to the township of Toronto in lieu of the A. V. Roe Company?

Mr. Abbott: I could not answer that question offhand. I would appreciate it if we could defer detailed discussion of this question of municipal grants until next week, when I hope to have the new act under discussion. As the member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, I shall come better armed to discuss this question.

Mr. Adamson: That suits me. I have just come back from Toronto where the question of the taxation of the A. V. Roe Company is a very lively one.

Item agreed to.

566. To authorize the write-off to the consolidated deficit account of costs incurred in 1951 in engraving blank bonds in anticipation of a loan which did not materialize, $11,200.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister say a word about what is the make-up of the consolidated deficit fund? Will he tell us why this matter is coming up so late—years after 1951, and just how much there is, and if there are any other skeletons in the cupboard?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot give any blanket assurance that there are not other items or other matters in the cupboard or elsewhere that may have to be the subject of a vote such as this one. This is a write-off to the consolidated deficit account that will be incurred upon the destruction of blank bonds, and is necessary in order to delete the costs from the books and in order that the balance in the blank bonds reserve account will reflect the true asset value of the account. It is essential to have an item such as this, as my hon. friend will appreciate. These bonds were printed and charged to this account, this blank bonds reserve account. Now, it is found they are not needed or they are no longer needed, so we are asking for authority to write them off.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not want to ask for information which is available already, but was the abandonment of this loan advised at the time or is it a matter we might be informed about now?

Mr. Abbott: This amount of $11,200 represents the engraving cost of seventy thousand $1,000 coupon bond tints furnished by the Canadian Bank Note Company in 1951. There are fifty coupons attached and the bonds would be available only for replacement bonds of the long-term twenty-five year issue of January 15, 1953. The bonds are of no further use and the Bank of Canada has asked that they be allowed to advise the bank note company to destroy them.

I suppose that one may say, by hindsight, that it was unnecessary to order them.

Mr. Knowles: I believe we had an item similar to this a year or so ago.

Mr. Abbott: They are always coming up.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister not know in advance how many more he will be bringing in?

Mr. Abbott: I perhaps should, but they are only called to my attention from time to time. They are matters of administration, and when they are brought to my attention and it is suggested the bonds are no longer of any use, then we should have an item authorizing the write-off. That seems to be the appropriate thing to do.

Mr. Noseworthy: Does this mean that the government spent $11,200 in engraving bonds that were never used?

Mr. Abbott: That is just what it is, yes.

Item agreed to.

567. To authorize the write-off from non-active assets to the consolidated deficit account of the net trading loss in the securities investment account incurred prior to April 1, 1952 ($40,072.79), $1.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister say a word about the trading loss in the securities investment account? We are aware that the Bank of Canada deals in the bond market; but what is the securities investment account?

Mr. Abbott: This is the account in which the government purchases bonds for its own account.

In 1952-53, the amount of trading loss of $40,072.79 in the securities investment account was written down in the finance books to non-active assets and accordingly constituted an expenditure charge in arriving at the budgetary surplus or decrease in net debt for the year. The purpose of this dollar item is merely to provide the necessary authority to write-off this non-active asset to the consolidated deficit account; it will therefore not involve any effect on the budgetary situation for 1953-54, nor on the net debt. Since it has already been written into the net debt and appears on the balance sheet as a non-active asset—this, in short, will permit writing it into the consolidated deficit account section from the capital and other non-active assets section of the net debt.

Mr. Macdonnell: In other words, this is a hazard that you take when you invest your money and get a return on it, rather than let it lie idle?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Item agreed to.

568. Government contribution to the superannuation account in respect of additional liability consequent upon the salary increases effective December 1, 1953, $38,000,000.

Mr. Knowles: As I indicated a few minutes ago, it is not my purpose to initiate at this sitting a general discussion as to the position of retired civil servants. I do think however that another word might be said. Personally, I am glad to see the government taking whatever steps are necessary, such as this one, to keep the superannuation account in good shape, so that the good pension plan that civil servants working for the government now have will be retained in a proper position. But I think some day the minister will have to appreciate the position of retired civil servants who, when they learn that $38,000,000 is being found by the treasury for this purpose, will wonder why it is that some corresponding sum of money, or perhaps less than that, could not be found to relieve their situation.

The minister does not seem to feel the force of arguments of this kind; but certainly that is the way these people feel. They have served the federal government in the past and are receiving low pensions. I hope that one of these days, perhaps even before the present Minister of Finance lays down this portfolio, there might be an item in the estimates to cover the plight of these people.

Mr. Abbott: This item is merely to keep the fund solvent, not to add additional liabilities to it.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that. As I said earlier, I am glad to see the government taking whatever steps are necessary to keep the fund solvent so that the position of those who are now working in the civil service and in the public service generally will be protected. But I submit there is still an obligation to these other people, as well. As one of my colleagues suggested, let us keep them solvent too.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

569. Amount required to recoup the fisheries prices support account to cover net operating loss of the fisheries prices support board during the fiscal year 1952-53, $36,526.

Mr. Brooks: Would the minister give a breakdown of this item?

Mr. Abbott: The breakdown is as follows: Newfoundland shore-caught salted codfish support program, 1952-53, deficiency payments to producers, $37,903.52. This item also covers Labrador salted codfish support program, refund from board's agents, adjustment of total payments as of March 31, 1952, $1,658.68, and an additional deficiency payment to the producers of semi-dry cure of $280.29. That is a total of $1,378.39, and that makes a net loss on the 1952-53 operation of $36,525.13.

Mr. Brooks: Do I understand that that all goes to Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: And Labrador and, I believe, the north shore of Quebec. That is for salted cod.

Mr. Stick: Is that the final amount on the Labrador cure?

Mr. Abbott: That is the final, I believe so, yes.

Mr. Argue: When the administration is buying and selling the fish for which this subsidy is being paid, has it any control over the fishing operations that have resulted in the subsidy being paid?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps the Acting Minister of Fisheries could answer that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not, strictly speaking, the Acting Minister of Fisheries. However, so far as Newfoundland salt codfish is concerned, at confederation an arrangement was made for five years by which Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited, under term 22 of the terms of union, was given a monopoly of the export of salt fish. This company is under the control of the Newfoundland fisheries board, under an act of the commission of government—which I happen to have in my hand, by pure accident, at this very moment. So that there is indirect supervision now by the federal government through the Newfoundland fisheries board over these transactions. But these are deficiency payments direct to the fishermen, after the transactions were completed.

Mr. Brooks: Does it apply only to Newfoundland?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, there are other areas to which floor prices legislation applies.

Mr. Argue: Is there anything to prevent applying this type of legislation to the fishing industry in other provinces, or is there some special reason why it is applied only to Newfoundland?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Fisheries Prices Support Act applies to all the fisheries of all the provinces. But the way it was used in Newfoundland was to make deficiency payments after the transactions for the year had been completed. There has been fisheries prices support given in nearly every province, including that of the hon. member who has asked the question.

Mr. Argue: I should like to have this cleared up. Is it possible legally that the technique used in connection with Newfoundland fish could be used in connection with fish from other provinces?

Mr. Pickersgill: For the sale of them?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a hypothetical question. I do not think I can answer it.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot, either.

Mr. Noseworthy: Would the Secretary of State tell us to what extent the fishermen themselves benefit from the federal subsidy, and to what extent the benefits are received by the merchants selling the fish.

Mr. Pickersgill: This relates to something that happened two years ago: it is just to balance up the books. I understand these deficiency payments were made to the fishermen, and to the fishermen only—and made direct to the fishermen.

Mr. Stick: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

570. Combines Investigation Act—office for investigation and research—further amount required, $65,000.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I believe that today we need an extension of the act and the work carried on under its provisions. Today in the cattle trade the prices of hides are going down to ruinous levels, so far as the producers of livestock are concerned. Three or four years ago we were getting $16 to $18 for a cowhide. Today it is hardly worth shipping it out to the tanners. I hold in my hand two articles appearing in—

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, can we not deal with this when the Minister of Justice is here to speak on the Combines Investigation Act? This is to provide for what the item says, unforeseen expenses not known when the main estimates were put in.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I just want to say a word or two.

Mr. Abbott: Surely, it can be related to the item.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I want to put an argument before the committee to show that we do need an extension of the work of the combines investigation branch. I have already told the committee that we have a situation in regard to hides that shows that the prices are going down, and yet the public is still forced to pay an extremely high price for leather products. It is up to the government to look into some of these matters and not leave the field wide open so that there may be price fixing for long periods of time before anything is done about it. I refer particularly to the leather trades. Recently articles have appeared in the press —I have an item here about one saddlery firm which shows that the profits this year were 17 per cent over last year—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have let the hon. gentleman make his point, but I should remind the committee that we are discussing supplementary estimates, the items for which sufficient funds were not voted at the time that the main estimates for the year now closing went through. As hon. members know, there is not an item that will not be open for discussion when the main estimates go through and when the various ministers with their advisers will be present for questioning by the committee. I am going to ask the hon. member and other members of the committee to confine their questions strictly to the amounts we are now voting and not to amounts which do not appear in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, to maintain that we should have a wider attitude on the discussion. I have not said anything this afternoon and I doubt whether there is anything I want to say. I realize that the main estimates are still before us and that anything we have to say can be better said at that time than now; but I should not like it to be taken that we are restricted. We may be restricted to the item, but this item pretty well covers every other item under the Combines Investigation Act, under that branch of the Department of Justice. I do not think there should be any limit. I just want to make that point. As far as I am concerned personally, I am quite willing to let this item go through and say whatever I may have to say when we are discussing the main estimates.

Mr. Abbott: I do not quarrel with that position. I indicated that the main line of inquiry in the consideration of these estimates should be directed to why we require this extra money, because almost any major item involves the whole policy of that particular section, and perhaps we should have half a dozen debates on that during the year. I do not know. But it does not make for very orderly debate.

Mr. Thatcher: If the minister will permit me I should like to raise one question. I shall take only sixty seconds. I believe this particular item has to do with the hiring of legal counsel. Much of their work has to do with the law abolishing resale price maintenance, which was passed by parliament last year. Many people were a little bit afraid at that time. I must admit that I was one of them. We feared that abolition would permit an open door as far as loss leaders were concerned. However the Minister of Justice gave parliament the assurance that if loss leaders by departmental stores or by chain stores became serious, the government would take some action. I am not going into the question today, except to say that in my opinion the time for such action has come. Today in many fields of the retail business there are bankruptcies because of loss leadering by large companies. We also find that the quality of certain lines of merchandise manufactured in Canada has been deteriorated, so that manufacturers can compete as far as prices are concerned. The situation is sufficiently serious for the government to give consideration to implementing the pledge made a year or so ago, when price maintenance was abolished. If they do not, the smaller business people across the country, who after all are the backbone of many communities, will soon be in real difficulties.

Mr. Winch: I have a question to ask on this item. I understand that when an inquiry is made it is usually made by a royal commission, of course. A report is sent to the Department of Justice together with a transcript of all the evidence upon which the report is made. The government then has the report and the evidence, and before they do anything about it they hire outside counsel. I understand that the fees paid to these outside counsel run anywhere from $150 to $300 a day. At the same time the government has its own staff and all the information. Is it because of this practice of going out and getting outside counsel that this additional amount of $65,000 is required? Could we not, in the interests of a little economy, review that policy and still maintain efficiency?

Mr. Abbott: This additional amount to the extent actually of $51,500 is required because of fees and expenses of legal counsel, accountants, special assistants, reporters, special commissioners and witnesses arising out of rather numerous investigations and prosecutions which have taken place this year. It is the practice, as I understand it, to retain outside counsel to assist in these prosecutions and to advise in connection with them. Personally, I think it is desirable; but even if it were to be done by the government's own legal staff it would be necessary to increase considerably those staffs, because I know from personal experience that the lawyers in the Department of Justice are pretty well overworked as it is now. My own personal view is that nothing would be saved by enlarging the legal staff of the Department of Justice; that it is more economical and in some respects more satisfactory to retain outside counsel in each particular case.

Mr. Winch: If you increased the staff would you pay them the $200 a day that you pay for outside counsel now?

Mr. Abbott: I know what we have to pay to keep our lawyers and we are not keeping some of them; they are going outside. Probably we are not paying them enough.

Item agreed to.

General—

571. Expenses of committee appointed to advise on principles and procedures relating to remission service, $1,000.

Mr. Knowles: I have no objection to this item, but in view of what the Minister of Finance has said a number of times during the discussion of these items it should be pointed out that not all these items in the supplementaries were in the main estimates.

Mr. Abbott: No, there is the occasional one.

Mr. Knowles: About one-third of them thus far.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Knowles: This is an example of a brand new item.

Mr. Abbott: This is a new item because there was not a sufficient amount in the general vote of the Department of Justice to provide for these expenses; but the appointment of some of them to do this job requires no legislative authority.

Mr. Brooks: It is not a new committee?

Mr. Abbott: It is a new committee, yes.

Mr. Knowles: I have no objection.

Mr. Abbott: It was announced in the house.

Mr. Knowles: I just thought the minister should not argue against the debate that has taken place on several of these items.

Mr. Abbott: I would not have argued if my hon. friend had wanted to ask these questions. I repeat what I said at the outset, that most of the items here involve no new policy at all, and that is the case with this one.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—
573. Administration—further amount required, $571,625.

Mr. Knowles: What is the reason for this additional amount for the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Abbott: It is entirely an increase in salary costs.

Mr. Knowles: Is none of it involved in research on the possibility of increasing the rates of benefits paid under unemployment insurance?

Mr. Abbott: Not at all; all of it is a result of increases in salaries which parliament has authorized.

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the minister any figures to show what salaries are paid to the branch managers?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I have not here; I have only the totals.

Mr. Noseworthy: We shall be able to get that later?

Mr. Abbott: I have only the totals.

Mr. Brooks: I would like to ask the minister if there have been any increases in the staffs of the unemployment offices across the country.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: I understand there have been but I have not the details.

Mr. Brooks: This would be to pay for that, I presume?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

LEGISLATION

579. General administration—estimates of the Clerk—further amount required, $213,500.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister explain the reason for this somewhat extensive increase amounting to nearly $250,000?

Mr. Abbott: The additional expenditures are $200,000 for the publishing of debates. It may be that debates are somewhat more extended than they used to be. Office stationery, supplies and equipment amount to $13,500 making this total of $213,500.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Dominion coal board—
582. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $2,370,700.

Mr. Brooks: I would like to ask the minister whether this covers subventions and if he would give us a breakdown of the figures?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. The main estimates contain an item of $6,078,300, and the main supplementary estimates an item of $2,220,000 plus this item of $2,370,700. The total of $10,669,000 is broken down by provinces and I have the breakdown here. Nova Scotia, all rail, amounts to $541,000; transshipped $625,000—

Mr. Brooks: By that you mean subventions paid?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. That is the amount to be paid out of the treasury in connection with the movement of maritime coal. Water-borne costs amount to $4,596,000; water-borne audit adjustment $260,000; railway use $1,555,000; New Brunswick all rail $5,500; Saskatchewan all rail $185,000; under Alberta: Ontario west $42,000—that is the destination of the coal, of course—Ontario east $373,000; railway use $2,475,000; British Columbia, ships bunkers $1,500 and export $10,000; making a total of $10,669,000, an increase over estimates already authorized of $2,370,700.

Mr. Brooks: As I understand it New Brunswick gets $5,500 out of approximately $10 million?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Item agreed to.

National research council and atomic energy control board—

National research council—

585. Salaries and other expenses—further amount required including authority for additional expenditures from revenues derived from publications, laboratory fees, plant engineering, shop work and the conduct of its operations generally, $1.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister could offer a word of explanation. I believe these dollar items should be looked at more carefully than some of the larger ones. This item covering an amount of one dollar seems to be required for two purposes which I suppose could be a matter of 50 cents each. The amount is required for salaries and other expenses and for certain other transactions. I am sure the purpose of this is not to obtain a further amount of one dollar. If it were the minister could surely provide it from his own pocket. Perhaps the minister can explain.

Mr. Abbott: The explanation is that the amount of the estimates approved by parliament included an amount of $500,000 to be provided from revenue for salaries and other expenses. There now appears to be some question as to council's authority to make any expenditure from revenue. The purpose of this supplementary estimate is to obtain parliamentary authorization for the council to make expenditures for salaries and other expenses from revenue derived from such operations as publications, laboratory fees, plant engineering, shop work and the conduct of its operations generally in connection with the Research Council Act now under consideration which will become effective before the end of the fiscal year. This is clearly an example of the use of the one dollar item to which I do not share the objection raised in most cases. This is clearly a case in which that kind of item is fully justified.

Mr. Knowles: Without going into the question of legislating by this one dollar item, is it clear that the legislating being done under this dollar item is just for a temporary period?

Mr. Abbott: Just for this current year.

Mr. Knowles: Legislating by an item in the estimates for that purpose is approved by the Auditor General but he does not approve of it being done on a long term basis.

Mr. Green: What provisions are being made for similar expenditures from revenue in the fiscal year of 1954-55?

Mr. Abbott: As I indicated before, there is a bill now before the house amending the Research Council Act which will contain the appropriate provisions.

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy control board—

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (research program)—

586. Current operation and maintenance—further amount required, $265,000.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister explain the reason for this additional amount?

Mr. Abbott: This amount of $265,000 is made up as follows: the first item provides for expenses arising out of contributions to the superannuation fund under the terms of the Public Service Superannuation Act in respect of employees; the total amounts to $160,000. The second additional amount is required for the repair of the NRX reactor amounting to $105,000, which makes a total of $265,000.

Mr. Green: Will that complete the repairs to the reactor?

Mr. Abbott: I think so, Mr. Chairman, but I would not be quite sure about that because we usually try to get that in at the end of the fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

Forestry operations division—

592. To provide for contributions to the provinces for assistance in forest inventory and reforestation in accordance with agreements that have been or may be entered into by Canada and the provinces —further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Green: I wonder if we could have an explanation of the purpose for which this $100,000 is to be expended? What distribution has there been between the different provinces not only in regard to this item but of the corresponding item in the main estimates?

Mr. Abbott: The main estimates, as my hon. friend will recall, provide for a total of $1 million. On this supplementary estimate of $100,000 the note I have indicates that during the fiscal years 1951-52 and 1952-53 the actual payments made to the provinces for inventory and reforestation combined were short of the authorized ceilings by 20 and 16 per cent respectively. Having regard to this experience and in order to avoid the necessity of conferring with the provinces for the negotiation of new individual ceilings, the minister has approved inventory and reforestation programs submitted by the provinces for the fiscal year 1953-54, the federal share of which amounts to about 16 per cent more than the $1,225,000 authorized by treasury board and appropriated by parliament. A reappraisal of the cost of the current year's programs, recently made by the provinces, indicated some reduction in the total cost as compared with the estimates given in their programs. However, according to this latest estimate the appropriation may be exceeded by as much as $100,000. I have not a breakdown of how that is divided between the provinces but that could be obtained. In any case the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will be able to give them when the corresponding item comes up.

Mr. Green: The whole amount is to be spent for inventory?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, and reforestation.

Mr. Green: I believe in the original estimate the amounts were divided between inventory which got by far the largest proportion—

Mr. Abbott: I believe my hon. friend is right. The whole amount is for inventory this year.

Mr. Green: Then this $100,000 is for inventory only?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that is correct.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

593. Operations—further amount required, $1,100,000.

Mr. Adamson: I would like to ask the minister whether this amount relates to the post office and in what fashion?

Mr. Abbott: This covers the increased salary costs arising out of the recent salary revision made effective some time ago.

Mr. Adamson: Does it include the extra cost involved in the 40-hour week?

Mr. Abbott: No, this includes the higher pay scale put into effect on December 1.

Mr. Adamson: Does it cover the executive officers of the post office?

Mr. Abbott: All employees of the post office.

Mr. Knowles: I regret it is not possible for the Postmaster General to be present. Perhaps the items are being passed faster than he anticipated. I would not wish to detain him for any length of time but I should like to say just a word with respect to the operations of the post office, having in mind in particular that at long last it has been decided to institute the five-day 40-hour week about two days hence. As the Postmaster General is aware, from questions which some of us have put to him on the orders of the day and from questions which we have put on the order paper, some of which were answered today, a great many complaints are coming to us from employees of the Post Office Department. I take just this moment to make a further plea to the Postmaster General to the effect that the representations of the department's employees should receive greater consideration in working out the plans and arrangements for the five-day 40-hour week than appears to have been given. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction over certain details. For example, there is concern over the arrangements for annual leaves. There is also concern over the change being made so far as the night differential is concerned. Underlying all of these grievances is a basic grievance that these employees have, namely that the decisions are made at the top and are handed to them, and that their representations are not given the consideration which they deserve.

In the Department of Labour there is an excellent labour-management co-operation service. I think the services of that branch of the Department of Labour might be made available to the Post Office Department in order to help them work out these arrangements on a more satisfactory basis. I will not take the time of the committee to go into the matter further now but I plead for further consideration of the representations being made to the department by the post office employees themselves.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Architectural branch—

596. Maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds, other than at Ottawa, including repairs and upkeep, rents, furnishings, heating, etc.—further amount required, $270,000.

Mr. Green: I wonder if we may have an explanation of that item?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. This is supplementary to the big vote, the main vote of $18,998,865. A further amount of $43,000 is required for rents and $227,000 for light, power, water and other municipal charges mainly because a greater number of buildings are now occupied by government departments across Canada than anticipated at the time of the estimates and also because of the unexpected increase in some leases and regional increases in public utility service. This is the big operating vote, as my hon. friend knows, under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Green: I notice that the bulk of the vote, $227,000, is for light, power, water and other municipal charges. Are there any new types of municipal charges included in the vote? It seems to be a heavy supplementary vote for payments of that type.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. The total payments, as provided in the estimates, were $1,550,000. The supplementary vote required here is $227,000, or roughly 15 per cent.

Mr. Green: Is the department paying any new type of charges to the municipalities?

Mr. Abbott: Not that I know of. This covers general charges. They would be service charges. They would not be taxes, of course. They would be water rates or charges for light, power or something like that.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—

597. Quebec ($420, less the amount of $419 available from savings in other listed projects detailed in previous estimates for 1953-54 for this province), $1.

Mr. Green: This is another one of the $1 items. The description makes it appear as though there is $420 required to build a public building, that the department had on hand, in the Quebec vote for buildings, $419, so they now just want $1. That seems almost too good to be true.

Mr. Abbott: This is a real economy measure, Mr. Chairman. It was contemplated that a new public building would be erected in Huntingdon and an appropriate item was put in the estimates to prepare plans and acquire a site. Then on re-examination of the situation it was found that it would be satisfactory to extend the present building. The vote which was originally there to prepare plans and so on is sufficient to do that, but of course that does not authorize the doing of it. This item of $1 is to give statutory authorization to do that.

Mr. Green: The vote in the present fiscal year, I think, was $25,000.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Green: Just how do we get from the $25,000 to $420, then to $419 and then to the $1?

Mr. Abbott: The $1 is merely to give statutory authorization to use the $25,000 item for this extension. The $25,000 was an initial item of an estimated cost of $100,000. It now looks as though we shall get a satisfactory public building in Huntingdon for certainly not more than the $25,000 required for this extension. As I said, an amount of $25,000 was provided in the 1953-54 main estimates towards the cost of constructing a new customs building at Huntingdon, province of Quebec, at a preliminary estimated cost of $100,000. Subsequent to the request from customs for this new building, the Post Office Department advised that they would require an additional 1,071 square feet. Having this in mind, and the fact that the operating and maintenance costs on one building are considerably lower than on two, it was decided to construct an addition to the present public building to provide the necessary accommodation for both customs and post office.

Mr. Green: How much was this extension to cost?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I have the full data here.

Mr. Green: I still do not see how we get from $25,000 to the $420. The minister has not explained that.

Mr. Abbott: We will not get to the $420. The only explanation I gave was that the $25,000 in this vote for Huntingdon during this current fiscal year is not available legally for the construction of an extension to the existing building but only for the construction of a new building. We have started to extend the existing building and wish to use the $25,000 voted for the cost of that new building towards the cost of that addition to the building.

Mr. Green: Why did they put in this figure of $420?

Mr. Abbott: I thought we were discussing the $1 item.

Mr. Knowles: X minus Y equals 1.

Mr. Abbott: Here it is. The note is to this effect. When the estimates were being prepared, on March 1, 1954, treasury board authority had not been obtained for the new contract. It is therefore anticipated that the expenditure of $420 already made for survey and advertising will be the only charge against 1953-54 funds.

Mr. Green: Then the $25,000 has already been spent?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Green: How much has been spent? Is it the amount $419 or $420 or $1?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid that I cannot give that information at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: There is one other point. Maybe the minister cannot answer this either. How does he relate the $25,000 that was voted in 1953-54, this $420 we are talking about now and the fact that in the 1954-55 estimates there is an item for the Huntingdon public building of $150,000 which includes a $25,000 revote. Is it now sufficiently confused?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I think so. I think it must be, I am afraid I cannot answer the question at the moment. As I say, this is to enable the vote which was put in to authorize the expenditure on the new building to be available for the changed situation. I will have to get the details from the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Green: The minister suggested there might be some economy, and I was a little startled by that statement.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Green: I find in the 1954-55 estimates that the amount for this building has gone up from $25,000 to $150,000, so there is not very much economy. That includes a revote of $25,000.

Mr. Abbott: These estimates were prepared of course in the early part of the year. Tenders were received on February 10, 1954, the lowest tender being $116,000, and presumably that is what the extension to the new building will cost, including the additional thousand odd feet of space required by the post office, to provide accommodation for the customs department.

Mr. MacInnis: Is it not possible that the $25,000 included last year was not the full cost of the structure it was intended to build but an appropriation for certain preliminary work?

Mr. Abbott: I said it was not.

Mr. MacInnis: The $150,000 will come later.

Mr. Abbott: That is exactly what it is. I mentioned a moment ago that the $25,000 was put in last year as a vote on account of the preliminary estimated cost of $100,000.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): This is a rather unusual procedure, and I wonder whether the government is contemplating a similar procedure with respect to the proposed new post office and public building in the city of St. Thomas?

Mr. Abbott: We would not ordinarily have to do this where the plans are changed. It is in order to meet the strictly technical requirements of the original vote. We could have waited and put in a new vote next year. I suppose we could have paid nothing until next year, but some expenditures have been incurred on plans and advertising which should properly be charged against last year's vote. That is why the dollar item is in here.

Mr. Green: Then the mention in the 1954-55 estimates of a revote of $25,000 must be wrong. The estimates for the next fiscal year show that it is a revote of $25,000. That was the full amount of the vote for the present fiscal year. Apparently $420 has been spent somewhere.

Mr. Abbott: I am speaking from recollection of what happened when the matter was brought before treasury board, but as I understand it the vote of $25,000 was put in the estimates this year for a new building. No new building was planned. No plans were prepared for a new building. Nothing was done about it, but expenditures were incurred for the preparation of plans and the calling of tenders for an extension to the old building. That was done. There are some moneys owed for that. This dollar item will authorize the expenditure out of the $25,000 voted last year of $400 odd covering these costs, and that is all it is.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The minister did not answer my question. I said that this was a rather unusual procedure and I wondered if they were going to adopt the same procedure in the city of St. Thomas where there has been a bit of a controversy about whether they would use the old post office and old public building there or erect a new one on a site that has already been acquired.

Mr. Abbott: That would be a policy decision on which I would have no information at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Engineering branch—
Graving docks—

599. Prince Rupert dry dock and shipyard and appurtenant works—additional amount in excess of the sum of $110,000 already authorized by vote 343 of the Appropriation Act No. 3, 1953, for the payment of operating losses and essential repairs, all such payments to be made in respect of operations during the calendar year 1953—further amount required, $103,324.

Mr. MacInnis: Together with the $110,000 authorized earlier, this additional vote will mean a total of $213,324 for operation and maintenance. Does any revenue accrue to the government from the operation of this graving dock? Has the minister that information before him?

Mr. Abbott: I believe there is some revenue but I do not think I have the information here at the moment. The dock is operated by Canadian National Railways. It has been under a management contract from ourselves whereby we pay the deficit. I know the matter was discussed some time ago and an announcement was made by one of my colleagues not very long ago as to the temporary continuance of the operation of the dock. I do not think I have the figures here on what revenue was received. The deficit from January 1 to December 31, 1953, was $213,323.43. The main estimates provided $110,000 toward that deficit and the proposed vote here of $103,324 covers the difference.

Mr. Shaw: May I ask the minister why it is when the sum of $25,000 is appropriated and $420 is spent, the amount spent is not taken out of the $25,000 appropriation approved by parliament and then a revote put in of $25,000 less the $420? Why is that procedure not followed?

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that the strict language of the original vote would not have permitted this payment, that we have to have the dollar item in order to amend the wording of the original vote. That is all that vote is doing. It is amending the language—that was the information I was given—of the original vote. I am sorry now I ever did it because it would have been quite legal to pay the $420 out of unforeseen and miscellaneous, but being so scrupulous we followed this procedure.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if this mysterious $419—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In order that we may put ourselves in order, may I say that we have called and discussed item 599. Does the committee wish to go back to item 597?

Mr. Knowles: No. We can deal with the same point on item 600.

Item agreed to.

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended upon individual listed projects—further amount required—

600. Quebec ($17,000, less the amount of $16,999 available from savings in other listed projects detailed in previous estimates for 1953-54 for this province), $1.

Mr. Knowles: Here is another of these X minus Y equals $1 items, only in this instance instead of X being $420 X is $17,000. Perhaps the minister would give an explanation. Before he does so, may I say on this item what I rose a moment ago to say about the other one, that it looks to me as though the saving in the previous case of $419 was not necessarily out of the $25,000 and that in this case the saving of $16,999 is not necessarily out of one particular item but out of any number of projects listed under a general heading.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. Here is the explanation. Treasury board minute 464,852, dated January 22, 1954, approved entry into a contract with Captain J. Romeo Allard at $15,710, the lowest of three tenders, for the widening of a section of the wharf at Cross Point chargeable to the allotment of $42,500 for "Cross Point—extension to jetties." That would be a vote in the main estimates. The jetties referred to in the title of that allotment are actually wings of, and form a part of, the wharf which was to be widened. In view of the urgency of carrying out the widening during the winter months when the ferry service was suspended, there was justification for temporarily charging the cost to the unexpended balance of that allotment.

This item now requested in the further supplementary estimates is merely to cover any possible criticism with respect to the propriety of charging a widening of the wharf to an allotment worded "extension to jetties." You can see how scrupulous we are. The wharf at Cross Point has to bear very intense traffic on account of the ferry service between this wharf and Campbellton, New Brunswick. From the slipway to the shore end the structure is only 20 feet wide and the motorized traffic is congested near the slipway at each ferry boat trip by taxis and other cars trying to turn around or find a parking space. The widening was required to solve this problem and prevent accidents.

Mr. Brooks: I might say that the proper solution would have been a bridge.

Mr. Abbott: I thought the hon. member for Royal might say that.

Mr. Knowles: That is what this dollar item is for.

Item agreed to.

General—

601. To provide for the expenses incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence (formerly under Department of Resources and Development)—further amount required, $130,000.

Mr. Lennard: Why is this not charged to the Department of National Defence where it belongs?

Mr. Abbott: I think it is, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lennard: It does not say so here.

Mr. Abbott: It is probably another bookkeeping requirement. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation I do know charge the Department of National Defence for services that it performs, but it does not indicate here how that amount is recovered. I shall have to get that information and give it to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

604. Departmental administration—further amount required, $161,000.

Mr. Herridge: I must take this my first opportunity with you in the chair to say what a number of the people in my district have asked me to say. I represent the riding in which our deputy chairman first saw the light of day. On behalf of these old-timers I want to congratulate you on your appointment as deputy chairman. I recall one lady who said, "I was quite sure our Teddy would make his mark when he got to Ottawa."

I want to take the time of the house for a few minutes on this administration item of the Department of Transport, to introduce an important matter. I was going to do it when we were going into supply a few days ago, but I did not because I did not want to delay the debate on external affairs. It was suggested that I do not do so upon going into supply today so that these estimates could proceed. Perhaps if I take a few minutes at this time I shall have the good will of the house because I cannot wait to raise this matter until the regular estimates of the department are before the committee. I refer to a question that is vital to some three thousand of my constituents, to a lot of people in British Columbia, a good many people in Canada, and in fact a good many people in the United States who have been using the steamer service on the Arrow lakes during the summer months for many years.

The Canadian Pacific made the following announcement recently:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway Company will withdraw all steamer service on the Arrow lakes. The last trip from West Robson on April 23 and the last trip from Nakusp to Arrowhead and return on April 24. Effective on these dates all steamer service provided by the above company will be cancelled.

This will mean there will be no steamer service for a distance of 120 miles on the Arrow lakes between Robson and Arrowhead. This announcement was made without any consultation with the people or the district organizations concerned; the public were simply informed through this notice in the press and a letter to the chamber of commerce. It is very upsetting to these people I represent because it is a serious matter to them.

This company was incorporated by an act of this parliament in 1890, and sold to the Canadian Pacific later. The Canadian Pacific has operated steamers on these lakes since about 1896. In fact, it was the main route of the Canadian Pacific from the interior of British Columbia to the coast until the Kettle Valley railroad was built. If one peruses the minutes of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company up until the early twenties, one can see that the company made substantial profits out of the operation of this steamship service until that time. However, we admit that during the last years increasing losses have been incurred. Because of the changing circumstances a great deal of the traffic that formerly went up the lake is now going over the Kettle Valley railroad.

As a matter of fact, the company has discouraged traffic on this steamship service by failure to advertise. I know many people who tried to buy tickets for this service from agents in various parts of Canada, and they were told there was no service operating. The company in recent years has rerouted all the heavy freight, and instead of carrying it on the steamers have carried it on the railroad. This means a loss of credit to the steamers in question. I know that during the summer months last year this service was packed. Hundreds of cars, for which no reservations had been made, were turned away during the season and this happened at Nakusp, Arrowhead and West Robson at which points cars are taken aboard. This matter is of serious concern to the people I represent.

Strangely enough, while there has been an operating loss of something like $100,000 a year for the last two or three years, this loss has occurred in one of the best paying divisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Indeed, the plants of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company are situated in the district and according to the latest balance sheet of the C. M. and S. Company the Canadian Pacific will derive a net revenue of something over $10 million from this source alone. As I said, this service is of vital concern to many of my constituents, until other means of transportation is provided. It is essential to the settlers and the fruit farmers, who depend upon it for shipping fruit, in carload lots or less. It is important to the general farmers who ship carloads of hay and the dairy farmers who ship produce to Nelson, Trail, Revelstoke and other points. We have two summer resorts on the upper lakes. One is at Halcyon, which is fairly large with accommodation for fifty guests and to which there will be no steamer service and no access by road. The same thing is true of St. Leon, where there are a thirty-five room hotel, hot springs and resort facilities.

This steamer also provides service for the logging operations along the lake which, in the last year, produced timber products to the value of about $1 million and in doing so, created considerable rail traffic for the C.P.R. I have mentioned the farmers and the loggers, as these people are the real backbone of the community. As a result of this announcement on the part of the Canadian Pacific, the people in the district have been very agitated. I have received a lot of letters from individuals and telegrams and letters from various organizations concerned. The people from the whole length of the lake attended a public meeting at Nakusp, called under the auspices of the Nakusp chamber of commerce on March 22 of this year. At this meeting all the angles of the question were discussed.

The people want to be fair about this but, as a result of that meeting attended by some 175 delegates from all points between Castlegar and Revelstoke, this resolution was passed:

> That this meeting of 175 Arrow lakes citizens Deer Park to Arrowhead vigorously protest the discontinuance of steamer service on Arrow lakes. We respectfully request both federal and provincial government intervention and protest. We further request that the present lake transport service be maintained until an alternate satisfactory service is made available.

The resolution is supported by the West Kootenay central farmers institute; the associated growers of British Columbia, Kootenay section; the women's institutes of the district; all the co-operative fruit unions; by editorials and letters in the press and by dozens of letters that I have received. Yesterday I was informed that the government of British Columbia has also protested the announcement of the C.P.R. that the steamer service will be discontinued, and so informed the Minister of Transport.

It has been suggested that there will be a tugboat and barge service on the lower lake. So far as the people around the lower lakes are concerned, this is an entirely unsatisfactory arrangement, especially for handling soft and other fruits. When dealing with this question I want to emphasize to the minister, and I am sure he will bring my remarks to the attention of the Minister of Transport, that the people of the district speak with one voice because they are very concerned and united about this matter. In my opinion, the responsibility for the maintenance of the service should be jointly shared by the federal government, the provincial government and the C.P.R. This steamship line was incorporated under an act of this parliament in 1890, and the crews who serve on these steamers come under federal labour legislation and the board of transport commissioners has issued certain directives concerning the operations of these steamers throughout the years. In my opinion the provincial government is also the government responsible for providing road transportation. Road transportation has been promised by successive provincial governments in British Columbia to service this lake area so that the steamship service would not be so essential. In election after election, from the McBride government on, these people have been promised road transportation along the lake. I say the Canadian Pacific Railway is responsible partly because the steamship service was established as part of its national operations. It received land grants from the federal government in the area so that it could build its railway lines and establish this steamship service. The railway company also promoted the settlement of the district. As a matter of fact my family was one of the victims of that early settlement promotion. Land was sold to early settlers; in fact half the town of Nakusp was given to the C.P.R. This land was sold at high prices to pioneers in the early days of the century.

I say the company has a moral responsibility to the people directly concerned. It is all right to talk about losses; one might just as well talk of losses along the north shore of lake Superior, for which provision has to be made by subsidies from this government. However, the service to which I have referred is an essential one, and I feel sure other hon. members from British Columbia share my views in this matter. I feel sure they hold the opinion that this service must be maintained until an alternative form of transportation is provided.

I have hurried along in order not to take up unnecessarily the time of the committee in a discussion of this item. However I would urge that the minister's department take action before the order of the C.P.R. goes into effect. There should be a conference of representatives of the Department of Transport, of officials of the provincial government, which has indicated its interest by protesting against the decision of the C.P.R., and of the C.P.R. By consideration and co-operation they could work out jointly some scheme to continue the service on the Arrow lakes until some other satisfactory form of transportation is provided.

I have dealt with the subject hurriedly; but it is important and urgent for at least three thousand people whom I have the honour to represent. I do urge that the Minister of Transport take action along the lines I have suggested, because the people in the Arrow lakes district are certainly looking forward to the maintenance of this service until other satisfactory transportation is provided.

Mr. Abbott: I shall see that my hon. friend's remarks are called to the attention of the minister, who is now appearing before the railways committee.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, like yourself I am a native of the West Kootenay district and I endorse the remarks of the hon. member who represents that riding. In addition, the hon. member for Kamloops has asked me to express to the committee his support of the remarks just made. The service in question is vital to that part of British Columbia. I believe it might be possible for the government to work out some agreement with the province of British Columbia under which the two governments would arrange to subsidize the service to an extent sufficient to keep it in operation.

Some hon. members may think that this would be breaking fresh ground. However, I have here the estimates of the Department of Transport for the year 1954-55, and I find at page 568, in the vote for the Canadian maritime commission, an amount of $100,000 as a subsidy for a boat service between Owen Sound and ports on Manitoulin island and Georgian bay, Ontario. There is also a vote of $35,000 for a boat service between Pelee island and the mainland, again in Ontario. Then, in addition, there are votes for salt water services.

I have given two examples of subsidies voted for fresh water services; and I believe this service on the Arrow lakes in West Kootenay would come in the same category as the two services to which I have just referred. I would hope the Minister of Finance would discuss the matter with the Minister of Transport with a view to including a vote in the 1954-55 estimates which would result in the maintenance of this Arrow lakes service.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Abbott: I shall see that what has been said is brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter to be discussed not only by hon. members on the other side of the house. The hon. member for Kootenay West spoke to me about it this afternoon, knowing very well that I have used this steamship service on many occasions. I was astounded to learn from the hon. member for Kootenay West that the service was to be taken away from these people. I have travelled on that lake perhaps hundreds of times, and I do not know how the people affected will be able to get into or out of that locality unless something is done. I am pleased to know that the Minister of Finance is going to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport. I am sure however that it will be placed before the house again if something is not done about it.

Item agreed to.

Canal services—

606. To provide for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations (including St. Lawrence seaway investigations)—further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. Green: This item calls for a further amount of $200,000 for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations. I notice in the details at page 22 that all of the amount is for professional and special services. How is this money to be spent?

Mr. Abbott: Aerial surveys of the St. Lawrence river basin, $30,000; field surveys in the Cornwall and Lachine areas during the winter, $120,000, and a hydraulic model of the Galop section, the Cardinal-Iroquois area, to be constructed and housed by the national research council, $50,000. The total is $200,000.

Mr. Green: To what persons and firms are those payments to be made?

Mr. Abbott: I have not that data here. The aerial survey would be made by regular aerial survey companies. However, I could get that information.

Mr. Green: I would be grateful if the minister would.

Mr. Abbott: I shall do that.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the item might be allowed to stand in the meantime.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member could ask the same question when a similar item in the main estimates is discussed. He could place his views on record at that time. I could get the information and send it to him, if it is merely for his private information.

Mr. Green: Would the minister try to get it from the Minister of Transport? There are many questions to be asked him in respect of other items in his department.

Mr. Abbott: I understood there was one item in particular about which the hon. member wished to question the minister. As I said before, he is now attending a meeting of the railways committee. I would be prepared to let this item stand so that the minister could deal with it.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There is an item in the main estimates for the St. Lawrence seaway, and I have one or two observations to make.

Mr. Abbott: I think we will be having items in that connection in the main estimates for some years to come.

Item stands.

Marine service steamers—

607. Construction or acquisition of vessels and equipment, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $291,907.

Mr. Brooks: I notice that this item is for icebreaker service in the St. Lawrence and northern areas. What is the cost of the icebreaker service in the St. Lawrence river, and what is the main purpose in opening the river? Those of us who come from the maritime provinces realize that every day the St. Lawrence river is open before its normal time means a day less in the use of the winter ports of Saint John and Halifax.

Mr. Abbott: Coming from Montreal, the sooner the St. Lawrence is opened the more pleased I am.

Mr. Brooks: I do not see why we should spend this large amount of money simply to please the minister.

Mr. Abbott: But Montreal pays its fair share of the taxes to open the river, too.

Mr. Brooks: There is no question about that. Is there any other reason for these icebreakers being used? I understand it is on account of flooding, and I should like to have some information.

Mr. Abbott: That is my understanding. I cannot claim to be an expert on this matter of course. I understand that the operation of the two icebreakers in the river in the winter is to minimize the danger of flooding, particularly the Sorel islands and further down, and they cut a narrow channel and keep it open as far as Sorel, during most of the winter.

Mr. Brooks: The main object is not to steal business from Saint John and Halifax.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, just the reverse.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel service—

609. Contract dredging—further amount required, $1,899,989.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. This is the St. Lawrence ship channel dredging contract which runs over a period of years, I think it is five years, and is paid for on a progress basis. At the beginning of the year we included in the main estimates an estimated amount of dredging that would be done, and the amount in the main estimates this year was $2,500,000 under vote 462. The item here of $1,899,989 is to cover the cost of additional dredging performed during 1953, arising as a result of favourable weather and availability of the contractors' equipment. With this supplementary the total payment to the end of the current fiscal year under the existing contract, the 1952 contract, will be $7,533,290.

Mr. Green: That covers more than one year?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, yes, that covers the work done to date, on the five-year contract.

Mr. Green: What was the total paid for the fiscal year?

Mr. Abbott: The total paid for the fiscal year with this amount will be $2,500,000 plus this $1,899,989, $4,399,989.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

612. Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, deficit, 1953—To provide for the payment to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited (hereinafter called the company) of the amount of the deficit for the year ending December 31, 1953 in the operations of the company and the vessels under the control of the company, as certified by the auditors of the company to the Minister of Finance and approved by the Minister of Transport, $649,662.

Mr. Bell: Can the minister tell us how many ships are in active operation now and is it the intention to keep them in operation?

Mr. Abbott: The fleet now consists of eight vessels. The Lady Rodney and the Lady Nelson were withdrawn from service and sold late in 1952. My understanding is that it is the intention to keep these eight ships operating this year.

Item agreed to.

General—
614. To provide for reimbursement of the Department of Transport stores account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $12,275.

Mr. Green: I ask that this item be allowed to stand.

Mr. Abbott: All right.

Item stands.

Item 616 stands.

General—
Air transport board—
618. Subventions for air carriers, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $80,000.

Mr. Winch: In view of the fact that an additional sum of $80,000 is required for this service in British Columbia, can the minister give an explanation of the need for it, particularly since in the past twelve months another company has said they could put on another service without any subsidy?

Mr. Abbott: The minister will be here shortly. He is at the railways and shipping committee. Perhaps he had better deal with this. As my hon. friend has indicated, it deals with a supplementary payment to the Queen Charlotte Airlines Limited for subsidized services on the west coast of British Columbia. Perhaps the item can stand until the minister comes.

The Chairman: Item 618 stands.

Item stands.

Canadian maritime commission—
620. Steamship subventions for coastal services, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $144,971.

Mr. Green: There is a vote of $136,616 for the Newfoundland coastal steamship services. Just how does that vote arise?

Mr. Abbott: Since Newfoundland joined confederation the Canadian National Railways have undertaken reorganization of the coastal steamship service, that is the coastal steamships of Newfoundland. Subsidy contracts have been executed between the Canadian maritime commission and the Canadian National Railways based upon estimates of annual loss. In each of the five years since 1950, the Canadian National Railways have absorbed the loss which has been incurred in excess of the subsidy provided. This has been included in the deficit of the railway in respect of its operation in Newfoundland. It is now considered that this loss in excess of the subsidy provided, which is based upon estimates made prior to the year in which it is incurred, should be made up by an additional subsidy and provision made for it included in the further supplementary estimates. Due to increased wages and cost of materials, the loss on operation in 1953 exceeded the subsidy by the sum of $136,616, and this amount has been certified by George A. Touche and Company, the national company's auditors.

Mr. Green: Then this amount will be payable to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Green: And is that the total deficit for the year?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Green: On the steamship services?

Mr. Abbott: No; this is in addition to the subsidy originally provided.

Mr. Green: What was the original subsidy?

Mr. Abbott: That is provided for in the previous estimates, $1,766,500.

Mr. Green: That is the deficit.

Mr. Abbott: The total subsidy cost including the loss is $1,903,116.

Mr. Green: What was it in the previous year?

Mr. Abbott: I have not that figure today, but I will get it.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

War veterans allowances and other benefits—
622. War veterans allowances—further amount required, $550,000.

Mr. Knowles: Before this item carries I want to express the earnest hope that the government will soon bring in its legislation amending the War Veterans Allowance Act. I hope it is not presumptuous for me to assume that an amendment to that act is on the books for this session, for it is certainly long overdue. I am sure the committee is glad to vote this item and provide whatever additional money is required to pay war veterans allowances according to the present schedule. I am sure also that if the house as a whole were given the opportunity to do so, it would vote wholeheartedly for increases in the amount of war veterans allowance and for other changes, particularly with respect to the amount of permissible income. I am glad that a committee is to be set up. The notice has been on the order paper for some time and it has been made to stand.

Perhaps the reason for that is that something is coming in respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I urge the government not to delay any longer in connection with this important matter.

Mr. Brooks: For fear that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may get a copyright on this request that the War Veterans Allowance Act be amended to provide for an increase in war veterans allowances I should like to state also, as I have on many previous occasions, that I hope this will be given very serious consideration by the government.

Item agreed to.

War veterans allowances and other benefits—

623. Hospital and other allowances—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Lennard: What is meant by "hospital and other allowances"?

Mr. Abbott: The explanation I have here is that the item is required to provide for expenditures arising from the payment of allowances and provision of comforts and clothing to certain classes of veterans receiving treatment, examination or care under the authority of the veterans treatment regulations. It is part of a larger vote of $2,750,000, making a total vote of $3 million.

Item agreed to.

Canadian pension commission—

628. To provide for payment, in respect of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, of a monthly pension of $100 to Mrs. Annie Elizabeth Cronk, and to authorize the Canadian pension commission to pay thereafter to Annie Elizabeth Cronk an annual pension during her lifetime, in the same manner and subject to similar terms and conditions as if she were the widow of a soldier holding the rank of private who died while rendering military service in world war I, $1,200.

Mr. Knowles: I would appreciate it if the minister would explain this item. I do not rise to ask for an explanation in any critical vein. I know nothing of the circumstances of this case at all. It looks to me as though there must have been a deserving case that provision could not be made for in the normal way and for which special provision is being made. It may be that this is a precedent that might be useful on some future occasion. I would be glad if the minister would tell us what the circumstances are.

Mr. Abbott: The item is required to provide for payment to be made to Annie Elizabeth Cronk of a monthly pension of $100 during her lifetime.

Private Cronk received an eye injury due to the discharge of a blank cartridge in his face during active militia training at Niagara-on-the-Lake in 1905. He was subsequently awarded a pension under orders in council P.C. 42/2749 and 16/2857 dated October 23, 1936, and November 18, 1937, respectively, at schedule A rates, under section 49 of the Pension Act.

Private Cronk died on March 30, 1953 and the widow lodged claim for pension and burial grant. The Canadian pension commission ruled that there are no provisions in the Pension Act which would enable the commission to authorize a burial grant or an award on behalf of the widow in this case.

Treasury board minutes T.B. 461111 dated January 29, 1954, and directed to the Department of National Defence concurred in the proposal that a pension of $100 a month for life be paid to this widow effective April 1, 1953, subject to parliamentary approval.

Pensions of a similar nature have been paid in the past from the appropriation applicable to the Pension Act and in accordance therewith the Canadian pension commission were requested to place this pension in payment.

This provision is, therefore, required to cover the pension retroactive to April 1, 1953 and to authorize its payment hereafter as a charge against the appropriation for pensions for disability and death. I have not before me the full details which would have been available to the treasury board when they approved the recommendation, but as a rule approval is usually granted on compassionate grounds of a strong nature.

Item agreed to.

Canadian pension commission—

Terminable services—

629. Post discharge rehabilitation benefits, including the training of merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners—further amount required, $560,000.

Mr. Green: Can the minister explain this vote and in particular let us know whether any of it will be used for the training of merchant seamen? They are referred to in the description of the vote but from the details it appears to me they do not receive any assistance.

Mr. Abbott: The increased expenditure under this vote is to provide unemployment insurance contributions. There was an underestimate made when the main estimates were prepared. Various calculations were made as to the requirements to be met for payments by the department of combined contributions for employers and veterans in regard to the veterans unemployment insurance fund and they proved to be inadequate.

Mr. Green: Has there been any money paid out during the year for the training of merchant seamen?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I have not that information here. This item covers both merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could get that information?

Mr. Abbott: I can get that information but perhaps the hon. member will allow this item to pass and I will provide him with that information later.

Mr. Bell: I would also like to have information as to how many merchant seamen have been receiving benefits due to the scrapping of the fleet. Perhaps the minister will provide that information?

Mr. Abbott: I will see that that information is furnished.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Loans, investments and advances—

630. To provide, subject to regulations of the treasury board, for working capital advances in the current and subsequent fiscal years to posts and employees on posting abroad, and to authorize the creation of a special account in the consolidated revenue fund to which shall be credited expenditure made by and advances recovered from the said posts and employees, the excess of the amounts charged over the amounts credited to the account at any time not to exceed $1,000,000. Vote 655 of the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1952, is hereby repealed, $1,000,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this vote? It seems to set up one of these revolving funds which appear to be a new departure in government finance. We have had one other example of this during the present session and I would like to have an explanation from the minister.

Mr. Abbott: Vote 655 of the supplementary estimates 1951-52 set up an account to provide working capital advances, not to exceed $600,000, to facilitate the financing of external affairs posts abroad. The setting up of the account was an attempt to meet a very difficult financing problem in providing funds for posts abroad. The time lag between the receipt of expenditure accounts and the forwarding of the advances makes it necessary for a second advance to go forward before the first has been accounted for. Thus, at any point in time, there is a substantial amount of "in transit" funds. Before the device of the working capital accounts was introduced, the advances were made from a departmental appropriation and it was necessary for that vote to be much larger than the actual amount required to meet the total expenditure which remained as a charge to it when the books were closed at the end of each fiscal year. Similarly, serious bookkeeping difficulties were encountered in making advances from several votes and then distributing the expenditure among their appropriate allotments. By charging all advances to the special account, these difficulties were considerably eased. The department now finds that the present amount in the account is not adequate to meet the expanding needs. Factors contributing to this inadequacy are: (1) opening of new posts; (2) increase in amounts required due to general rise in prices; (3) increase in interest-free loans and security payments; (4) additional requests for expenditures by posts on behalf of other government departments; and (5) increases due to expanded program of furnishing and other capital items at posts abroad.

In view of the department's request, treasury board, under T.B. 463061 of March 5, 1954, approved the increase in the working capital account from $600,000 to $1 million and its inclusion in these further supplementary estimates. It seems to work out pretty well in departments which have expenses of this kind all of which, of course, are kept under strict treasury control.

Mr. Green: They previously had $600,000?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Green: Was there a vote of $600,000 in the regular estimates?

Mr. Abbott: It was set up in further supplementary estimates for 1951-52 as a revolving fund for which a loan of $600,000 was authorized in the supplementary estimates for 1951-52, which covered the amount of advances. The purpose of this vote was to consolidate that $600,000 with an additional $400,000 to make a revolving fund of $1 million.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Loans, investments and advances—

Customs and excise divisions—

632. To authorize and provide for the operation of a revolving fund in accordance with section 58 of the Financial Administration Act for the purpose of acquiring and managing material to be used in the manufacture of uniforms, the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed, $90,000.

Mr. Green: This appears to be another example of the revolving fund. Is this the first time the Department of National Revenue has had such a fund? If so, why is it necessary to have it?

Mr. Abbott: I believe this is the first time. My hon. friend will recall that the establishment of revolving funds generally was authorized under the Financial Administration Act and this is the first time they have had one in the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary for the Department of National Revenue to have this money in order to obtain clothing with which to manufacture uniforms? Why is that not covered by an ordinary vote in the estimates?

Mr. Abbott: The present practice is to purchase material for the manufacture of uniforms from the current fiscal year's allotment and uniforms cannot be made available for the start of the tourist season which is the heaviest time for customs officers. The requested revolving fund will permit the purchase of material the previous fall so that uniforms can be manufactured and made available early in the season. The procedure would be for the department to purchase the material from the revolving fund so that uniform quality, weight and colour can be assured. The material would then be sold to the manufacturer and the revolving fund reimbursed. When the uniforms are completed and delivered the complete cost of same would be paid from the allotment voted by parliament. It is really to provide a revolving fund so that they can maintain a modest inventory reserve of the correct weight and type of material required. I had the treasury board look into this matter very carefully when the suggestion came up and they informed me that in their opinion it was a sound and economic measure.

Mr. Green: I presume this is only the start of these revolving funds. No doubt there will be a demand from different departments for increases in their revolving fund just as the Department of External Affairs has asked for an increase of $400,000 this year. Is this, in reality, a new policy under which amounts of money are to be made available for the different departments rather than having a vote?

Mr. Abbott: No. It is only in the operating departments. In most cases the moneys have to be paid out of the appropriation. In the case of contracts for uniforms, contracts will be let for the uniforms required by the Department of National Revenue and there will have to be a vote in the estimates to provide for the total cost of these uniforms, but the $90,000 will enable them to acquire an inventory of cloth which will be sufficient to take care of, let us say, the cloth requirements for two or three months or something of that sort. They will purchase the cloth before the commencement of the season and turn it over to the manufacturer at the appropriate time when they let the contracts for the uniforms. The manufacturer will pay for the cloth but the department will have to get a vote from the house to pay for the full cost price of the manufacturer which will include the cost of the cloth as well as the cost of making it up.

Mr. Green: But in effect the setting up of these revolving funds means, does it not, that the money is spent before it is voted? It is spent by the department without having a vote for that purpose from the house.

Mr. Abbott: Subject to reimbursement. That is right.

Mr. Green: Then the vote is approved at a later date?

Mr. Abbott: In some cases that is true. It is a working capital advance. If you want to use the terminology of accountancy, it is a working capital advance to the department. That is what it is.

Mr. Green: Is similar provision to be made for the other departments?

Mr. Abbott: In appropriate cases; not in every department. A good many departments will not need it. There is another one coming a little bit later for the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Green: I know that. I have my eye on it.

Mr. Knowles: What will happen if the department sells the cloth to the manufacturer for an amount less than that which the department paid for it, or for an amount greater than that?

Mr. Abbott: As Minister of Finance I can say that whoever authorized that in the department would not stay in that position for very long.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Loans, investments and advances—
Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

633. To authorize and provide for the operation of a revolving fund in accordance with section 58 of the Financial Administration Act for the purpose of acquiring and managing material to be used in the manufacture of uniforms, the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed $450,000 of which $250,000 was provided under vote 547, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1953—further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item? It appears to be for the manufacture of uniforms. It permits an amount up to $450,000. Why is it necessary to have this change made in the manner of financing R.C.M.P. purchases?

Mr. Knowles: Maybe here is a case where you had the fund set up and you did not put enough into it. Is that the story?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe you sold the cloth too cheaply.

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry to delay the committee. I should have had this item taken when we had the Department of Justice before us earlier. Vote 547 of the main estimates which we had earlier this year authorized and provided for the operation of a revolving fund for acquiring of material to be used in the manufacture of uniforms; that is R.C.M.P. uniforms. Of course their requirements are very much greater than are those of the Department of National Revenue. The maximum chargeable to the fund was placed at $250,000 which has proved to be inadequate, and it is estimated that a further $200,000 will be needed in order that the revolving fund may be put into operation.

Mr. Green: Is the same system used by the Department of National Defence for acquiring uniforms?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot answer that question offhand.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister no further explanation as to why this amount proved to be inadequate? A moment ago when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wondered whether the $90,000 item might have to be supplemented another time, the suggestion was not taken too seriously; but here we have just this very thing happening.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate that I do not go into the detail of these amounts. I ask my officials who have charge of these matters to look into the cost of inventory requirements and advise me if the amounts requested are reasonable. The explanation which was given to me, and which I accept as being accurate is as follows.

The revolving fund, as presently authorized, is inadequate for requirements, and an additional amount of $200,000 should be provided in the supplementary estimates in order to bring the fund up to an amount which will permit normal operation during the coming year. With this additional amount, the total fund will be $450,000. Against this must be charged the present inventory value of $292,000 in round figures, leaving a balance available for purchase of materials of $158,000. This amount will not be excessive and is considerably below annual requirements.

Mr. Knowles: How do they get $292,000 of inventory when they had only $250,000 in the fund?

Mr. Abbott: I suppose they must have had some other vote that they could buy it with. This is a sound accounting and bookkeeping device to enable what are really operating departments to operate efficiently and smoothly and yet maintain the principle of parliamentary control. It is essentially a bookkeeping operation, of course, as the committee appreciates.

Mr. Green: I notice that the Associate Minister of National Defence is now in the chamber. Perhaps the Minister of Finance could ascertain from him whether this same system is used in purchasing uniforms for the defence forces.

Mr. Abbott: I think probably not. He tells me that, so far as he knows, it is not used by them. Of course, the requirements of the defence forces are on such a much larger scale and no doubt other considerations apply there. Contracts are let in very large amounts and, as the committee knows, mobilization stores of certain types of uniforms are provided; but so far as I am aware, there is not any revolving fund. It might be desirable to have one introduced.

Mr. Monteith: When this revolving fund is set up do you have to come back to parliament again in order to spend that money the second time?

Mr. Abbott: No. When they let a contract for uniforms, they have to pay for them out of a vote which is voted by parliament. But this revolving fund—taking the one which is now before us—would enable the R.C.M.P. to hold a continuing inventory of up to $450,000 worth of cloth; and they would have an asset to represent a loan which we make to them when acquiring that inventory. As they turn over the cloth to the clothing contractors to make it up into uniforms they get paid for the cloth and the moneys go back into the revolving fund. They must pay the uniform contractors the price of the uniforms, which price will of course include the amount he has paid for the cloth out of a vote which has to be authorized by this parliament. But we start them off with a loan to provide an inventory of $450,000 worth of cloth.

Mr. Monteith: When that inventory is used up that money can be spent again for more inventory without coming back to parliament?

Mr. Abbott: It is a revolving fund. The fund has been used to buy cloth. It is sold to the clothing contractor and the price goes back into the revolving fund. That is the essence of a revolving fund.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Canal services—

606. To provide for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations (including St. Lawrence seaway investigations)—further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. Green: On this item I was asking particulars of the payments made for professional and special surveys.

Mr. Chevrier: On this amount of $200,000?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: It is divided as follows: $30,000 for aerial surveys in the international rapids section of the river; $120,000 for field surveys and borings made in the Lachine section, the international section and the Cornwall section; and finally $50,000 for a hydraulic model of a section of the St. Lawrence which is also in the international section, that is the Cardinal-Iroquois area, which was constructed at the request of the special projects branch of the Department of Transport by the national research council. It was found advisable to have a model in case it should become necessary in connection with the development of the seaway. That model has been used and has proven its value.

Mr. Green: To what persons or firms were payments made?

Mr. Chevrier: They were made to individuals. In the case of field surveys, in the Cornwall and Lachine sections they were made to employees of the department, drillers, field men. Speaking from memory, I think there are about forty or fifty people employed by the public projects branch in the Lachine section and in the international section.

Mr. Green: Casuals?

Mr. Chevrier: Some of it is casual and some of it is professional. I would think there are four or five engineers employed in that area. They have charge of the borings. They have taken borings in the Apple Hill area. They have taken them in the Montreal area, in Laprairie basin, at Cornwall and at Cardinal. It has been necessary to let out a number of small subcontracts in order to assist the drillers. They would be perhaps $2,000 or $3,000. That is included in this.

Mr. Green: What about the aerial survey?

Mr. Chevrier: The aerial survey—again I speak from memory—was made by Photographic Surveys for the purpose of making a map of the international section.

Mr. Green: That is a private firm?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

614. To provide for reimbursement of the Department of Transport stores account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $12,275.

Mr. Green: This item has to do with the Department of Transport stores account. The minister will remember we had quite a discussion about his stores account three or four years ago. I wonder whether he could explain this item.

Mr. Chevrier: I remember the discussion that took place in the house quite well. Since then, however, the Financial Administration Act has been passed and that act provides that the minister of any department where stores become obsolete must, in order to dispose of them, get the approval of treasury board. In this item of $12,275 there is $9,535 representing obsolete stores. I might give two examples. In the case of the Trent canal the disposal of the tug Fenelon rendered obsolete certain spare parts. On the Cornwall and Lachine canals we have moved from manually operated gates to electrically operated gates, and it has become necessary to dispose of certain canal equipment and spare parts that are no longer of use.

At Gander—I move now to air services—it has been found necessary to dispose of certain English type motorcycles. Spare parts are practically impossible to obtain. There is also a large quantity of carbon paper that has deteriorated to such a state that it can no longer be used. Stocks of various departmental forms have become obsolete through revisions of those forms. Then there is also a list of hardware goods that have become obsolete; also oils, greases and things of that kind that have become stale and can no longer be used because they have been there for so long. Under section 60 of the Financial Administration Act it has become necessary for the minister to report these things to treasury board, and I understand that treasury board has approved of this.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation division—

616. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder—further amount required, $46,000.

Mr. Green: This item deals with control of civil aviation, including administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder. Apparently there has been some difficulty between Canada and Australia concerning the right of Canadian Pacific Air Lines to have a weekly service between the two countries. I had a press dispatch which seems to have become mislaid, but it was dated earlier this month and indicated that it was unlikely that an agreement could be reached with the result that C.P.A. would not be able to fly to Australia. Can the minister tell us what the situation is at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any decision that C.P.A. cannot fly to Australia. On the contrary, C.P.A. can fly to Australia. The only point was a greater frequency of the service. I did not expect this matter to come up and I must draw on my memory. My recollection is that C.P.A. was applying for a higher frequency of service.

Mr. Green: Once a week.

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is it. They are operating now on a temporary permit, and there has been no question of the Australian government not renewing the temporary permit. When C.P.A. applied through the Department of Transport for increased frequency I am informed that the government of Australia countered with a proposal for additional facilities in Canada. For instance, I think they asked for a through service to London via Montreal. That really is the state in which the matter stands at the present time. Canadian Pacific Air Lines is not affected in any way in its right to fly under the present schedule of service, but the additional frequency is being held up until attention can be given to the demand from Australia.

Mr. Green: The Australian air line flies into Canada twice a week, does it not?

Mr. Chevrier: I believe it does.

Mr. Green: Apparently C.P.A. is only allowed to fly to Australia once every two weeks and cannot maintain that operation unless it is allowed to fly every week. Is that not the position?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I would not say that. While C.P.A. would like to get greater frequency, I do not think they are too anxious about the whole position.

Mr. Green: The minister feels that some agreement can be worked out so that the service to Australia by C.P.A. will not have to be discontinued?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, I would hope that it would not. It is my strong hope it will not be discontinued and that it will be possible to find ways of increasing it.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Green.]

Air transport board—

618. Subventions for air carriers, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $80,000.

Mr. Winch: I asked that this item stand so that the minister could explain the situation with respect to the requirement of an additional subvention of $80,000 which I understand is for Queen Charlotte Airlines. I ask the question in view of the situation that has existed during the past year where Q.C.A. has had a virtual monopoly on certain runs and some other companies have said that they were prepared to go in there without any subvention.

Mr. Chevrier: Queen Charlotte Airlines has no monopoly. Last year and again this year Q.C.A. found itself in very difficult economic circumstances, and the government decided to come to its assistance rather than abandon some of the services that it was providing. For instance, if it were not for the subsidy which the government granted last year and the subsidy which is in the estimates this year it would not be possible for Q.C.A. to fly from Vancouver to Tofino on the west coast of Vancouver island, from Vancouver to Alert Bay and the Minstrel island area, and from Vancouver to Powell River. These are services which were considered essential by the government, and on the assurance from Q.C.A. that, with this additional subsidy, they would be able to provide the service we decided to put this amount in the estimates.

Mr. Green: Apparently the minister's department has authorized some investigation into the affairs of Queen Charlotte Airlines. I have here a press dispatch from the Vancouver Sun of March 22, a week ago today. It reads:

> Investigation of the operations of Queen Charlotte Airlines is being conducted by the Department of Transport and the Vancouver firm has been ordered by the government to "put its affairs in order".

The dispatch goes on to say that there has been competition from another line, Pacific Western Airlines, which does not ask for any subsidy, and it quotes the minister as saying, with respect to Q.C.A.:

> We told them to put their house in order on their profitable lines. Then we'll see what can be done to maintain service on their unprofitable lines.

The dispatch continues:

> The minister stated flatly that it is not the government's policy to subsidize air lines and he admitted that Ottawa has been embarrassed by the necessity to aid the losing air line.

That report may not be correct, but would the minister say something about it?

Mr. Chevrier: Part of it is correct, that part which says that we are conducting an investigation to ascertain which portions of this line are unprofitable and if there are services that are unprofitable. If there are services that are unprofitable they should be cut out so we would not have to pay the subsidy. In any event, I think it is essential we carry on this investigation while the subsidy is being paid to ascertain which of these services are necessary from a public standpoint, and which are not. Those which are not necessary certainly should not be subsidized.

Mr. Green: Is there to be a subsidy in the coming fiscal year?

Mr. Chevrier: This covers the present year from December 1953 to April 1954.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1954, the sum of $98,214,350 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 392, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1954.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be read the second time now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask if the bill has been printed?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I have a copy here. I thought I handed it to someone to give to my hon. friend. I believe this will be appropriation bill No. 2.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be read a third time now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on Friday evening at ten o'clock I was just dealing with some of the references made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to the need for consultation. I had made the point that consultation should involve more than mere consultation between governments to work out a course of action in external affairs, but that this parliament had the right to be informed by the government as to what its policies and intentions are in this matter; and in that sphere I had directed attention particularly to the question of the government's intention with respect to the Geneva conference. I had suggested that we are entitled to receive some assurance from the minister as to what the Canadian delegation at Geneva will do, and even more particularly what it will not do, in the way of making concessions to communist delegations.

I should like now to discuss this matter of consultation in its international aspects. I think that in addition to a clear explanation from the minister as to what the policies of the Canadian delegation will be at Geneva, we are also entitled to a clear explanation from the minister and the government as to how, in their view, the international consultation that he referred to as being so necessary, and to which he referred at such length, is going to be achieved.

I am not going to follow him in all the tortuosities of his interpretation and his misgivings, and his subsequent reassurance as to the meaning of a speech made on January 12 by the Secretary of State of the United States. I must say that to me, at any rate, it seemed that his belief that he had received an undertaking that there would be consultations is like a certain form of hypnosis, that is to say it was self-induced. I can see nothing in the various statements of the minister, and the subsequent statement by Secretary Dulles, which would entitle the government, this House of Commons or the nation to believe that it had an ironclad assurance any more after the minister had spoken in Washington on this matter of consultation than before he had spoken.

The minister himself has told us that he took exception to three words in the speech of Mr. Dulles, when Mr. Dulles was outlining what is sometimes called the new concept of defence policy. Those words were "instantly", "means" and "our choosing". Using those words in the full context of the sentence, we find it reads in this way:

> The basic decision was to depend primarily upon a great capacity to retaliate, instantly, by means and at places of our choosing.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs told us that in his view, after he had made his statement in Washington, all three of those words had been satisfactorily explained; so that he now felt, he said, very much reassured that American policy did not mean that there would be instant action or reaction on their part without consultation with their allies.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the minister was worried before he went to Washington, I can see no reason for his satisfaction now. The problem of course is, and always has been, one of consultation. Well, what did Mr. Dulles say about this matter of consultation which would justify the minister in that feeling of reassurance which he says he has? The minister did not summarize the effect of Mr. Dulles' subsequent reassuring words. As I recall them, it seems to me that the effect of what Mr. Dulles had subsequently said was something very much like this: Certainly, we will as a general rule consult you before acting in any international situation, and we will consult you wherever possible.

What other answer could be given? But I think we are entitled to ask: What sort of assurance is this? Here is one of the sentences used by the Secretary of State of the United States as quoted by our own minister at page 3330 of Hansard:

> In no place did I say we would retaliate instantly, although we might indeed retaliate instantly under conditions that called for that.

Well, that is just the point; what sort of assurance is that? What is the difference after that statement was made from what it was before it was made? In fact, it seems to me that it is pretty fatuous to say that we now have an assurance that there are ways of consultation, and that we have any right to be more reassured now than we were before. I think the fatuity that would there apply is made clear by the minister's own summary, as it is set out at page 3331 of Hansard, where he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I think the effect of this exchange of views, this conference, these statements and these clarifications has been that we now have a fairly clear and reassuring idea of what this new strategy and this new planning for defence is. One thing this interpretation does make clear is that diplomacy and consultation, which is part of diplomacy, is under this doctrine not less important but more important than ever before.

Well, the whole atomic age and the speed with which things move, as well as the terrible and devastating results of atomic attack obviously make consultation more important than ever before. Then the minister goes on to say:

> Any decisions must surely be collective, whenever that can be done, before action has to be taken.

Well, of course they should be collective. But the great question is—and it is the great and unanswered question; and until it is answered I cannot see how we can accept the minister's feeling of reassurance—when can that be done and what means are being worked out to ensure that it will be done? Until we have that answer it seems to me that a statement of that sort—"Any decisions must surely be collective, whenever that can be done, before action has to be taken"—leaves us perhaps even in a more uncertain frame of mind than we were in before.

The next question is: What decisions are meant? Is it decisions as to general objectives, or decisions as to methods of retaliation, or decisions as to circumstances under which any sort of policy or retaliation will be followed; what sort of decisions are meant?

Then the other great question is: When can and when will that be done? What measure of agreement between nations is there as to when it can and will be done? And so we are left with the essential problem on which I maintain we are entitled to be informed by the government: What does this government intend to do to assure that there will be brought into existence, if it does not exist now, adequate machinery so that there will be prior consultation, and that there will be agreed courses of action before those courses of action have to be implemented, in other words before the event of any Russian attack. Because, as I see it, there is not anything now in existence to ensure that there will be always that prior consultation and those agreed courses of action which can be set in motion immediately.

It seems to me that no country, least of all the United States, can contemplate the sort of delay that working out an agreed course of action might entail, after an attack against the West had been commenced. Therefore in the absence of evidence that there exists that consultative machinery now, which will enable us to arrive at an agreed course of action before attack, I cannot see any reason for reassurance, or any reason why the minister should be more satisfied after he was in Washington than before he went to Washington.

I should like the minister to tell us what is the Canadian policy, because certainly no country has a greater stake in this matter than Canada. What is the Canadian policy? What courses are we going to urge upon our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to make sure that that organization becomes and is used as a consultative machinery to enable us to work out those great courses of action in so far as that is humanly possible in advance of a Russian attack? I say, "in so far as that is humanly possible" because it seems to me that where it is not possible—and we cannot anticipate every potential attack that may be made and where it may be made and when it may be made by the Russians or by any other aggressor—there has to be good faith and not all this trouble and to some extent these unrealistic misgivings that our allies intend almost to react or to act without consulting with us. But in those acts which cannot be foreseen and where even general principles cannot be worked out in advance, then we do have to rely upon good sense and mutual understanding.

I should like to return to another aspect of this whole matter of consulting which seems to have worried the minister so much, but on which he has also left us, or in certain very important aspects of which he has left this house, this parliament, in the dark. I refer there again to the matter of consultation or information, if you like, between the Canadian government and the Canadian parliament. That it seems to me has become a very immediate problem in the light of the developments which have taken place in our foreign policy, and particularly in the light of the fact that Canada has now undertaken commitments under a treaty of alliance, which is a relatively new departure in this country. It is interesting to note that the minister made an implied condemnation of Mr. Dulles for what he said by almost a suggestion—that is, before it was satisfactorily explained—of a return to a continental security complex. Here I read what the minister said at page 3329 of Hansard of his statement on Thursday. After analysing what Mr. Dulles might have meant in his January 12 speech, he said:

> And yet, if we relied too much on that and depreciated the importance of local defence, that would be interpreted in many countries as meaning that some countries were expendable. And I doubt if we could maintain a coalition, even NATO, very long, on that basis. Inevitably there would be a retreat to isolation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this was by inference, as I read it at any rate, suggested by the minister as being a possible interpretation of Mr. Dulles' speech. The minister went on:

> There would be a move towards what sometimes is called continental security, both in North America and—and this is sometimes forgotten—in Europe itself.
>
> But security of this variety, continental security, is a delusion, because, and I think the house will agree with me, there can be no continental security without collective security. And there can be no collective security without collective arrangements for collective action.

Well, as I say, it is interesting to trace developments in this country, and it is interesting to contrast that with what was Canada's policy just four short years ago when, in the clearest possible language, the Prime Minister himself outlined the policy of continental security, that particular policy which the minister has said it would be so wrong for the United States or anyone else to put forward today. I am reading now from page 680 of Hansard for the second session of 1950. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that this session was called not very long after the outbreak of war in Korea, and the Prime Minister was discussing Canada's position with respect to sending forces to Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He said that what we were going to do was to make $300 million available. We were not going to make any commitments to send troops to Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization because he said:

> I say that because it seems perfectly obvious to me that if we are to get the greatest possible effective strength in Europe for the money and resources we devote to national and international security, $300 million spent on the equipping and arming of men already in Europe, men who are there, who have to be fed, clothed and lodged even if they are not armed, is going to provide much larger forces than the expenditure of the same amount of money in raising, equipping, arming, training, feeding, clothing and sheltering young Canadians who would, under the present condition of full employment, have to be drawn from the productive stream of this nation.

And the Prime Minister at another point on that same page said to an hon. member who had asked him a question:

I will say to him at once that the government of Canada at this time is not considering the raising of Canadian forces to dispatch to Europe as a deterrent to aggression in Europe.

So that we can say that just four short years ago no country was following more clearly and laying down more clearly a policy of continental security; that the job of European defence is a job for the Europeans. Surely, we shall help them with money and so on, but we are not going to help them with armed forces because their defence is primarily their own problem. And four short years later, not even four full years later, our Secretary of State for External Affairs condemns what he says is the implication in Secretary Dulles' speech of the return to continental defence policy.

It is interesting to see how far we have come in those four years along lines which I think we now all agree are correct; and the development which is important there is that we now have forces in Europe. We have a brigade group, we have an air division. The question now before us and the question with which most hon. members will agree with me is one that we are entitled to demand that this government should answer is: What happens under these conditions to the concept which has always been the accepted principle in Canada that there shall be consultation, not only between governments but between government and parliament before Canadians are permitted to act?

One recalls the history of discussions of this type. One realizes immediately that it has always been the accepted principle that the government will consult parliament, not only before there shall be declaration of war particularly but even before committing Canadian troops to military action. We can remind ourselves of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in March 1949, when he was discussing the North Atlantic treaty which had then just come into effect. At page 2098 of Hansard of March 28, 1949 the Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported to have said:

I need hardly add that if, in spite of our efforts to keep the peace, some member of this alliance is attacked and we are called upon to fulfil our commitments, this country, this parliament and this government will act with the necessary determination and dispatch. So far as this government is concerned, Mr. Speaker, in the face of a national emergency so grave as to call into force our commitments under this pact, it would immediately desire to consult parliament. This has now become a regular procedure in our history, and no one of course would wish to depart from it. No government could fulfil the responsibility which action under this treaty would impose without being certain of the support of the people of this country expressed through their representatives in parliament.

[Mr. Fulton.]

There we have the principle enunciated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the first discussion of the North Atlantic treaty that before committing our forces to action we would consult parliament. If that were not definite enough the minister repeated himself on September 6, 1950, at the special session, where his remarks are reported at page 351 of Hansard. May I just remind the house that article 5 of the North Atlantic treaty states:

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by article 51 of the charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

It was in the light of that commitment and speaking on this subject at a later date that the minister said as reported at page 351 of Hansard for September 6, 1950:

If there is an attack made on a member of the North Atlantic group, that is an attack on all the members of the group.

He was then asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

Including Canada?

And the minister answered:

Including Canada.

After some further words which do not change the substance of the quotation the minister said:

Parliament would then decide whether an attack had or had not been made on Canada. If parliament decided that such an attack had been made and we were at war, it is the custom of Canadians when they are attacked to fight back with materials and with men.

Then a little later he said:

I thought I had made that clear. An attack on western Germany which involved Canada by the decision of its parliament and its obligations under the North Atlantic pact would be met by materials and men.

What then is the position in the light of the fact that we have a brigade in Europe? Supposing the Russians attack in Germany or in Austria. What is the position? What is the relation between the government and parliament if that development should occur while Canadian troops are in Europe? Are they to wait there until the government consults parliament?

The minister has laid great stress on this matter of consultation in the international sphere, but he has left us in the dark on the question of national consultation. The minister said on Thursday last, as reported at page 3330 of Hansard:

> There is a second word to which I devoted some attention in my Washington speech, and that was the word "instantly". That word, in connection with the strategy we are discussing, involves no problem, as I see it, if there is a direct attack on your own territory, or indeed possibly on the territory of your neighbour, because then it becomes a question of self-preservation and quick, effective, and instant action is essential and would be taken by any country attacked. No one, I believe, would take exception to that.

What happens then in the light of those statements and in the light of the present position in Europe with Canadian forces there in an atomic age with the possibility of atomic attack? What happens to the principles enunciated in 1949 and 1950?

I conclude, sir, by repeating my position. This parliament is entitled to demand from the government a statement as to government policy on these issues. We are entitled to know from the government what they would do with respect to the matter of consulting parliament in this sphere in the event of an attack in Europe.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I believe this has been quite a useful debate and I believe it wise that hon. members should periodically discuss international affairs in the world today.

I read some of the remarks made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and I must congratulate him on his speech. The minister said as reported in this evening's newspaper:

> If the nations of the world engage in a third world war, civilization would be destroyed, external affairs minister Pearson warned Sunday. . . Mr. Pearson said that "horrible devastation" would be brought about by the new atomic and chemical weapons devised by men.
>
> "Should we ever get into world war III, there probably won't be more than a handful of people left", Mr. Pearson said.
>
> He referred to the hydrogen bomb explosion in the Pacific and said he was glad that the public was now becoming acquainted with the fantastic power of the weapon. "That one bomb in the Pacific was more devastating than all the bombs dropped on Germany and Italy during the last war."

The minister then blasted communism and used language similar to that often used in the house. He went on to say:

> "But we will never defeat communism unless we understand it. We must have faith and a positive approach. We have to confront communism with something stronger and more dynamic."
>
> There was little danger of communism triumphing in Canada, Mr. Pearson observed, so long as the people held to a "living belief". If they did not, the country would go by default.

Later on the minister added:

> "So often in the international field today, problems are not all black and white. They are often in terms of grey and it is hard to find what is right and what is wrong".

Tonight, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with that suggestion that everything is not black and white. If I thought world war III were inevitable I would probably be using the sort of language used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) in this debate. But I do not believe that we are going to have a third world war. I could be wrong; it is possible that we could have war, but I have no interest in being in this world if I am proved wrong. I believe that as long as there is a possibility that we can solve our problems peacefully we should refrain from using the sort of language used by the leader of the Social Credit party the other day when he took our leader to task. The hon. member said, as reported at page 3346 of Hansard:

> This afternoon the C.C.F. leader said that we have got to live with the communists. I ask, "Is that right"? He says that the only alternative is to exterminate them or to be exterminated. In the light of these things, what should our policy be? Should it be our policy to resign ourselves to the hopeless future of trying to live with the devil himself?

Later on he said:

> Of course it would mean the extermination of the venal tormentors and betrayers of humanity. Certainly it would, but better a few men should perish than the whole earth should waste.

Likewise, the Leader of the Opposition, winding up his speech on January 29, as reported at page 1622 of Hansard said:

> Let us prevent this supreme catastrophe but, Mr. Speaker, let our voices be raised in a way that will leave no doubt that in Canada we want no bargain with the devil.

In the home in which I was brought up I was taught that that was a naughty word, and I went to the library to find out what it meant. There were quite a few definitions and I shall not place them on the record, but those of us who have some respect for the teachings of our parents would, I believe, wish that hon. members should refrain from using that sort of language. We have a great many words in the English language and I think hon. members who wish to express themselves should be able to find other words.

I wish to place myself in line with the leader of the C.C.F. party and the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron), and to make sure I will be in good company I would like to call Sir Winston Churchill as our witness. I believe it is important that we should emphasize that the record in the present situation is not all black and white. We are not arrayed in snow-white garments and I do not believe the people behind the iron curtain should be described in the sort of manner in which they have been during this debate. Sir Winston Churchill said on May 19, 1953:

> It is the policy of Her Majesty's government to avoid by every means in their power doing anything or saying anything which could check any favourable reaction that may be taking place and to welcome every sign of improvement in our relations with Russia.

A little later on he said:

> It would certainly do no harm if, for a while, each side looked about for things to do which would be agreeable instead of being disagreeable to each other.

And a little later:

> We all desire that the Russian people should take the high place in world affairs which is their due without feeling anxiety about their own security. I do not believe that the immense problem of reconciling the security of Russia with the freedom and safety of western Europe is insoluble. Indeed, if the United Nations Organization had the authority and character for which its creators hoped, it would be solved already.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with Sir Winston Churchill, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) and the leader of this group, I think we should try to realize that we are confronting very complex problems and that we want to explore every possible avenue to solve those problems without resorting to war. Let me remind the house, particularly the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Social Credit party, of the words in the preamble of the charter of the United Nations:

> We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind, and to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small, and to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained, and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom, and for these ends to practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours, and to unite our strength to maintain international peace and security, and to ensure, by the acceptance of principles and the institution of methods, that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest, and to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples, . . .

I think one should not be branded as a fellow traveller or as using words that have not been used since Fred Rose was here when one suggests that Canada should be going "all out" to try to see if some method cannot be found to reconcile the differences which are very real between two giants, the one to the north and the other to the south.

I think it is a pity that Canada has not done as effective a job probably as has India in trying to bring together those great forces. I think it is unfortunate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was not acceptable as secretary general of the United Nations. I am sure that people in all parts of the world have great admiration for him. Partly because of the policy of his government I think Canada failed to take the sort of stand that should have been taken on a number of occasions and thus prevented the Secretary of State for External Affairs from having one of the most important positions in all the world. I therefore think, Mr. Speaker, that Canada should be working harder than we are to promote better international understanding.

I think it was the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) who suggested that the Leader of the Opposition should be supplied with an R.C.A.F. plane for a trip around the world. I should like to develop that suggestion. It is my opinion—and I made this suggestion before the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) left—that someone from Canada should visit the U.S.S.R. I must say that, after I made my remarks, I had quite a number of letters, and they were all of a complimentary nature. I am surprised that some people thought that all I had to do was to make the suggestion and that the Prime Minister would have changed his itinerary and included a visit to Moscow; but the arrangements were made. I am sure the Prime Minister did not resent my suggestion.

I think we are all proud of the fact that our Prime Minister has been such a good ambassador in so many countries, and I hope he will live long enough to have a visit to the U.S.S.R. But in the meantime I would suggest, in all seriousness, that an effort be made to send from the Canadian parliament a delegation to visit the U.S.S.R. I hope that Your Honour the Speaker would be persuaded to lead the delegation and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the C.C.F. group and the leader of the Social Credit group would be members of it. Then I think the women should be represented. We have three women on this side of the house. I think they should select one of their number and I feel that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) should be on it. Then we are fortunate in having in the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) someone who was born in Russia. Although he has not had a chance to speak the language for some time, I am sure that he could, without too much trouble, act as interpreter for the group. I make this suggestion in all seriousness.

I think it is a great pity that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been the only member of the Canadian parliament who has made an effort, as far as I know, to visit the U.S.S.R. since the war ended; and no one has ever suggested he was a communist because he had gone there or that his visit had converted him to communism. But I think the visit that was paid by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at least made a start in trying to convey to the people of the U.S.S.R. that all Canadians do not share the hatred that is expressed by some of our people who are most vocal.

I have over 2,000 people of Russian origin living in my constituency and I have no reason to think that their cousins, uncles or aunts who are behind the iron curtain are beasts or people who would not be reasonable. I am not suggesting that this delegation go there with the expectation that they would not return. I am sure they are all courageous people who would be prepared to take the risk, but I do not feel that there would be any risk at all. I think that Senator McCarthy would not be in a strong position in complaining about a group of Canadian members joining the communist party. I think that a visit such as the one I have proposed would at least indicate that Canada would like to find out a little bit more about Russia and would like to find out whether we could find a basis for agreement. I would not imagine that the Leader of the Opposition or the leader of the Social Credit party would make the sort of speeches that they made here, but if they felt like making them in Moscow I feel sure that they would find an interesting hearing. As I said, I throw out this suggestion for what it is worth. I hope that the committee that is going to consider these estimates will give consideration to it and that some time action will be taken.

I want to say a few words about the work of the United Nations, especially the specialized agencies. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) made an interesting speech the other night. I am sorry that there were not more in the house at the time to listen to it. He made in quite a friendly tone some remarks to which I think the minister and the department should pay some attention. He complained about the fact that we are giving very poor publicity in Canada to the work that is being done by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. He mentioned the fact that the C.B.C. has not a full-time person at the United Nations and that the Canadian press is not represented. None of the wealthy papers, or none of the syndicates in Canada are represented. I think we should not put the blame on the newspapers. I think it is a pity, though, that the work that is being done at the United Nations is not being relayed back to Canada as actively as it is being carried on.

I am happy to say that in Canada up to the moment there is not any active opposition to the United Nations. South of the border I found quite a number of publications at United Nations headquarters to answer the anti-United Nations propaganda there. Here is one that I brought back. It is entitled "The United Nations—Facts and Fallacies". It outlines some of the fallacies and gives the answers. Among the fallacies mentioned are:

> The U.N. threatens to destroy U.S. sovereignty . . .
> The U.N. charter threatens the destruction of our constitution . . .
> The U.N. is a nest of communist spies . . .
> The U.N. is controlled by Soviet Russia and communists . . .
> The U.N. dragged the U.S. into the Korean struggle . . .
> The U.N. can send American boys to fight anywhere any time . . .

Then there is this one:

> The U.N. does not name God in its charter, does not open its meetings with prayer, and is therefore atheistic.

Again:

> The U.N. costs too much. It is a heavy burden for the U.S. taxpayer to bear.

And so on.

I am very happy as I said that we have no organizations in Canada that are active in trying to get the Canadian government to reduce the very small expenditures that have been made for the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, but I would remind the minister that the hon. member for Mount Royal pointed out that we are only paying 10 cents per person per year for the work of the United Nations and another 10 cents per person for the work of the specialized agencies. That is not good enough. If we can spend $2 billion on our defence program I think we can spend more than 20 cents per person per year for the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The Canadian people are, I think, tremendously concerned about the fact that two-thirds of the people of the world are hungry all the time. We know that we have food and could produce more. We have the know-how, and we should be doing something to bring about a realization of the aims and objectives of the food and agriculture organization.

Speaking on the 10th of February, the minister made reference to the work being done by the specialized agencies. He told us about the amazing results achieved by the common hoe, of the farmer from Arkansas who obtained great results by introducing the hitherto unheard-of common hoe. Apparently 30,000 hoes were sent. Having spent some time at the business end of a hoe, I know that it is an effective weapon, but I think that anyone who can operate a hoe can in a reasonable period of time operate a tractor. I think that most people in this day and age, having had experience fighting weeds both with the tractor and cultivator and the hoe, will prefer to use tractors, discs, one-ways and cultivators to eradicate this enemy, the weed. But it is possible that having a hoe is better than having no hoe, and until we can get our tractors over there it is probably a very good thing to send a few thousand hoes. But I think that we should be spending more than 10 cents per Canadian per year to try to get the productive areas in the world producing food.

Then we have the world health organization. Half the people of the world are sick all the time. If we have the good fortune to choose Canada for our birth place we can hope to live longer. I think the age is going up all the time. According to the last figures I saw it was 64 for males and 69 for women. But in half of Asia you cannot hope to live beyond the age of 30. With half the people in the world unable to read or write they are not going to make very rapid progress in solving the problems of shortage of food and shortage of nurses and doctors.

Therefore I submit that the Secretary of State for External Affairs must get backing from parliament to make additional funds available, and Canadian delegates at the United Nations must be able to give more leadership with a view to tackling the problems of hunger, illiteracy and sickness throughout the world. I might add that in preparing my remarks for this evening I got in touch with the minister's office to try to get some up-to-date information as to just what Canada has done in the fields of technical aid, UNESCO, health and agriculture. I was very kindly referred to the Department of Agriculture which is in close touch with FAO in Rome. The man I spoke to in the Department of Agriculture was very co-operative but apparently he had a limited amount of time in which to do a great many jobs.

I had the same experience in the department of health. When I called the branch that is supposed to be responsible for UNESCO I was told that the man who really is in charge is spending his holidays preparing a report that he could not prepare in office hours in order to have something available on the work of UNESCO. All I wanted to find out was who are some of the Canadians who have gone overseas in the fields of agriculture, health and education. The men of the departments were all very apologetic but they were not able to supply the information. They really should have it but they did not. Before a condition of active opposition to the work of the United Nations and its specialized agencies develops, I think we should make information available to the Canadian public that will challenge their imagination.

For example, Dr. Harrington of the university of Saskatchewan had an assignment in Egypt for FAO and another one in India. On his return from these places I heard him tell a most fascinating story of these FAO projects in Egypt and India. By doubling the production of rice they are going to make some contribution to relieving a condition where two-thirds of the people are hungry every year. But apparently Dr. Harrington is not known in Ottawa. I think there should be some place in Canada where information could be made available to the Canadian public about work such as Dr. Harrington and Professor Hardy have been doing.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) had a very brilliant student in his university, the University of New Brunswick, who had a distinguished record in the air force and went to Ethiopia after graduation. I think it would be interesting to find out what he has done there but I cannot find out where he is living or what he is doing. I am sure this chap, who did such an outstanding job with the air force and at university, will be doing an impressive job in Ethiopia or wherever he is. I suggest that the minister should find the necessary funds to set up the kind of information service we had in Canada during the war when the work of the air force, the army, the navy and the industrial machine was made known to the Canadian people. We knew as we went along something of the things we were able to achieve collectively. Even though we are only making a modest contribution to these specialized agencies, I think it is a pity to make it so difficult for a member of parliament or anyone else in Canada to find out where Canadians are, what they are doing and what they are planning to do.

I conclude my remarks by quoting the concluding paragraph in this publication of the United Nations from which I read before. It reads:

> Never has a generation had such a challenge. Never has a generation had such an opportunity. It can be done. It will be done when we the people of the nations will it so and put into full action the basic purposes and principles upon which the United Nations is founded. We the peoples . . . determined, can have the kind of world we want.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that Canada recognize the present red regime in China. To see such a proposal in its true perspective it is necessary to know, to realize and to appreciate several generally not too well recognized facts which pertain to the situation confronting us. First, the coming to power of the red regime in China was the result of red conquest, not successful red revolution. There may be discussion concerning that matter, but I am prepared to take on all comers on that proposition any time they desire to come to the committee where we can get at each other. May I suggest that the main cause of disagreement in the country and in the house between the Social Credit group, for example, and the C.C.F., between the Conservatives and the C.C.F., centres right around that point.

The C.C.F. and the C.C.F.-Liberals seem to take for granted that what has happened in China was a successful revolution, and that the government which now controls China is a Chinese party which rebelled, honestly and straightforwardly, against the existing government, and unaided and of its own will and volition, supported by the majority of the Chinese people, succeeded in defeating the existing government.

Now, if that were the case the story would be one way. But suppose it were found that at every stage for twenty-five long years the Russian government was sinisterly behind the Chinese communist organization, and wherever the Chinese nationalists defeated the Chinese organizations, the Russian government came in to support them and give every advantage. Now, that would make a tremendous difference, would it not? If what happened in that case were found to be in the process of happening all over the world, it would be a very serious situation for everybody concerned.

Mr. Studer: It would be worse than that.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right. This is the first important fact to bear in mind. The second is that the red conquest of the mainland of China was but one more step in Stalin's twenty-five-year-long campaign against the stubborn and heroic resistance of the Chinese nationalist government of China, behind which nationalist government the overwhelming majority of the Chinese people were at all times solidly standing, right up to the very end, the close of world war II. Now, that makes another serious difference.

The third important fact is that this twenty-five-year-long red campaign was characterized by a bewildering combination of cunning, duplicity and treachery such as has accompanied all the moves of an utterly unmoral, unscrupulous, unrelenting and insatiable monster. A good many who laugh may laugh on the other side of their faces if that monster gets into Canada, as it is rapidly getting in. This insatiable monster is the Turko-Mongolian-red conspiracy which the free world faces today.

The fourth fact is that this twenty-five-year-long red campaign, and the final conquest of China is but one more move by this Turko-Mongolian conspiracy in a deliberate, century-long campaign, secretly and craftily designed many generations ago, to bring the whole world into abject and perpetual servitude to an absolute world government, the personnel of which will be clandestinely selected Turko-Mongolian reds or their dupes. Now, there will be those who will doubt that such a gloomy picture could have a solid basis in fact. May I draw the attention of such people to this exceedingly serious matter, in my mind: As we trace and study all the conditions in the United States concerning red spies in the administration, we find that these red spies are chased from one section to another of the administration until they are finally weeded out, and then where do they go? They go to the United Nations.

Mr. Philpott: Nonsense.

Mr. Blackmore: Once more—

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Blackmore: I could easily name them.

Mr. Ellis: Give us one name?

Mr. Blackmore: I have them right here and when the time comes and we get into committee, I will take on all the C.C.F. group, one at a time, on this proposition, and establish the proposition beyond any shadow of a doubt. I have the document right here which will establish the matter quite rightly.

Mr. Philpott: What is the name of it?

Mr. Blackmore: It is the report of an eminent body in the United States that everyone will accept once it is given. I do not propose to cover that tonight. I am speaking in purely general terms and our object is to determine whether or not, in the face of existing circumstances, Canada is wise in even considering the recognition of Red China.

The fifth extremely serious fact is that this twenty-five-year-long Red campaign and final conquest of China was decisively aided and abetted by the communist organization in the United States. Prominent among the communists and communist dupes whose efforts defeated Chiang Kai-shek was for example Lauchlin Currie. There is one of your men. He is not in the United Nations as yet, but he is on his way. As an example of the kind of thing that was done, this communist Lauchlin Currie signed an order, written on White House stationery, ordering that none of the mountains of captured guns and ammunition held in the possession of the United States be sent to Chiang Kai-shek and his friends in China. This was done in spite of the fact that General Eisenhower and his advisers ordered a vast amount of that material to be sent to friends of the United States in China. Now how many moves like that in the United States administration would it require to destroy all possibility of Chiang Kai-shek standing up against the innumerable communists who were pouring down from the north?

Here is another serious point. I give only one illustration, but I could give dozens of them if it were fitting to give them tonight. The sixth very important fact bearing upon this whole matter is that Russia and her satellites, her immediately prospective victims, as well as the whole of the free world, would immediately look upon Canadian recognition of China as another surrender to Russia and consequently another victory for Russia.

The seventh important fact is this: Bearing in mind what has been happening for thirty-five years now, any Canadian government official who can believe that recognizing Red China could persuade Red China to desist from further attempts at conquest must be regarded as naïve, if not puerile.

Contemplating these seven facts, one must, I submit, agree that under present circumstances for Canada to recognize the red government in China would be for Canada to give comfort to her greatest enemy, and incidentally the greatest enemy mankind ever saw on the face of the earth, and to scatter dismay among the world's millions of her friends and potential friends.

Once again may I say that if I am wrong in the assumption that there is a conspiracy of men working together consistently and determinedly and unscrupulously for conquest of the world; if I am wrong in that assumption, I say, then the validity of my whole position naturally would be weakened. But the evidence I have been able to gather in the last few years indicates beyond peradventure that I am right in my assumption.

Now, just to give a bit of the evidence: I know in this strange generation, in which everything is denied and controverted, it is extremely difficult to find witnesses, documents or authority that any considerable number of people will accept. Nevertheless we must try to find such documents—those of us who cannot go to every individual corner of the globe and acquire all the knowledge there is to be acquired. And we are all in that class. It is therefore of importance that we have some documents which might reasonably be accepted as authentic.

I wish to read to the house the last two paragraphs of an open letter dated August 31, 1953, for release on September 6, 1953, from the American China Policy Association, Incorporated, located at No. 1 west 37th street, New York 18, New York. These paragraphs are as follows:

> Is it true that some of the foreign service officers are still pressing for recognition of Red China, which we all know would mean Chinese consulates from Pearl Harbor to Boston, loaded with spies;

Then, second:

> our 80,000 Chinese non-citizens in this country delivered over to the ruthless power of Red China;

And, third:

> —and which would amount to notice to Japan, the Philippines, and the rest of Asia that they had best make their deals with Red China before it is too late?
>
> In short, Mr. Secretary, will the sound advice the president is sure to get from you, Senator Knowland, Congressman Judd, etc., be, as before " . . . challenged by reports from certain foreign service officers . . . praising the communists and recommending a course of action directly contrary . . ."?
>
> Very sincerely yours,
> George Schuyler, President
> American China Policy Association, Inc.

The general tone of those words seems to indicate that what I have said is probably based upon a considerable amount of solid realism. This letter was written to the Hon. Walter S. Robertson, assistant secretary of state for far eastern affairs, Washington, D.C. As I have indicated these paragraphs show clearly that the American China Policy Association believes that recognition of Red China would mean, first, the establishment of Chinese Red consulates in Canada, and I am applying this to Canada, just as the letter applies to the United States. It would involve Chinese consulates in Canada, each filled with swarms of the most evil enemies Canada could possibly harbour in her bosom.

There will be members like the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) who will wish to challenge the word "evil". I ask any member in the house if he could possibly apply any word other than the word "evil" to the communist agitators in Canada today. Get around where they talk; listen to the words they use; read the directives they issue. Evil just fairly exudes from every single word they utter, and the spirit with which they speak. There is nothing about them but evil. Why have a whole lot more of this same disreputable type of people who are at the present time such an unqualified curse to the United States; and to Canada, so far as they have become established in our country?

Secondly, these paragraphs indicate that the recognition of Red China would mean turning over to the unprincipled mercy of Red tyranny all of Canada's Chinese non-citizens. How many of these we have in Canada I am not sure; but just imagine turning over innocent men and women to a group of people as unprincipled as communists have proved themselves to be, at all points in the world to which they have extended their power. These people could be called to China and subjected to the utterly unbelievable tortures the communists inflict.

Again, recognition of Red China would mean giving notice to Japan, the Philippines and the rest of Asia that they had better make the best possible deal with Red China before it is too late. The news indicates today that dismay is being spread throughout Indo-China. Great numbers of people who up to the present time have fought courageously to withstand the communists are now becoming terrified and are thinking that if, after all, everybody is going to desert them, they might as well join the reds and escape as much of the punishment as they can.

The letter I have just read was written to the Hon. Walter S. Robertson, assistant secretary of state for far eastern affairs, Washington, D.C. And who are the members of this American China Policy Association who wrote the letter? I shall place those names on record. I am sure some will expect to hear Chinese names, but they will be disappointed.

These are the names:

President: George S. Schuyler.

Vice presidents: Alfred Kohlberg, Irene Kuhn, William Loeb, Dr. Maurice William.

Secretary and treasurer: Emma DeLong Mills.

Board of directors: Alfred Kohlberg, chairman; Marguerite Atterbury, Dr. Alexander Baird, John Earl Baker, Maj. Gen. David P. Barrows, William E. Bohn, Rt. Rev. John P. Boland, Edna Lee Booker, Dr. Karl Brandt, William Henry Chamberlin, Admiral Chas. M. Cooke, Jr.; Bishop Fred Pierce Corson, George Creel, Frank R. Crosswaith, Dr. Benedict J. Duffy, Jr.; Hon. George H. Earle, Max Eastman, Rev. James W. Fifield, Jr.; Geraldine Fitch, Varian Fry, Rev. J. C. Jensen, Lois Butler Jensen, Rear Admiral I. C. Johnson, Rep. J. Leroy Johnson, Rev. William R. Johnson, Rep. Walter H. Judd, William C. Kernan, Lucian S. Kirtland, Irene Kuhn, William Loeb, Edna Lonigan, Rev. Daniel A. Lord, S. J.; Dr. Frank L. Meleney, Emma DeLong Mills, Mrs. Victor Morawetz, Hon. James R. Nolen, Rev. Ronald Norris, C.P.; John O'Connor, John S. Potter, Dr. Roscoe Pound, Dr. Leland Rex Robinson, Mrs. Joseph Schumpeter, George S. Schuyler, Dr. Charles Ernest Scott, Dr. Aura Severinghaus, Margaret Proctor Smith, William H. Smyth, Freda Utley, Dr. Donald D. Van Slyke, Louis Waldman, Dr. Jerome P. Webster, Dr. Maurice William, Maj. Gen. Charles A. Willoughby.

Do not these people appeal to hon. members as being pretty solid and steady citizens of the United States? You find no Chinese names there. You certainly find no communist names there.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Blackmore: Because they simply would not be on this list. They would all be like the C.C.F.; they would be in favour of recognition. You could approach a C.C.F. person from coast to coast and you would find that he would want recognition of China. It is the way they think. May I point out that in that list is one Freda Utley who is the writer of "The China Story", which is one of the most realistic and thoroughly documented books to be found anywhere, which bears out in great detail the general statements that I have made here tonight.

In the course of my remarks later I propose to refer to certain contents of a letter by Mr. Walter S. Robertson, this very man who is now assistant secretary of state for far eastern affairs in Washington. He wrote the letter dated October 8, 1949 to Ambassador Philip C. Jessup of those days. I propose to select certain passages from that letter so that we might judge as to what that man thought of the recognition of Red China. By the way, Philip C. Jessup at that time was ambassador at large of the department of state, Washington, D.C.

Hon. members would naturally desire to know who this Walter S. Robertson had been just before he wrote his October 8, 1949 letter to the Hon. Philip Jessup.

Walter S. Robertson served in China for approximately eighteen months, first with the United States embassy as minister counsellor and second between the ambassadorships of General Hurley and Dr. Stuart as chargé d'affaires, all of this in China. He was then for ten months commissioner and chairman of the Peking executive headquarters. Here is a man who, if he had his eyes open and was honest, probably knew a good deal about China. Mr. Robertson's duties brought him into close personal contact with the highest government officials and with the highest communist officials. He was going back and forth between the two groups of men. Mr. Robertson's reactions to the chaotic scenes in China were at least based upon firsthand impressions. All that I have just given you is to be found in the second paragraph of the letter—which I shall not read to hon. members. It contains the facts which I have given concerning his eighteen months of experience in China.

What does Mr. Robertson think of recognition of China? May I read some very brief extracts from his letter which tend to indicate that. In the letter of October 8, 1949 at page 4, we find these words:

> I am strongly of the opinion that recognition of the communist regime would not be to the best interests either of China's suffering millions or of ourselves.

Further down at the end of the paragraph he uses these words:

> . . . if the communists were allowed to stew in their own juice for a time, they would, in my opinion, soon begin to be confronted with the same overwhelming economic and social problems which contributed so largely to the downfall of the national government.

Again he says:

> Recognition would bring re-establishment of trade and possibly economic assistance, both vitally necessary to the permanent maintenance of any semblance of economic stability. It would also bring tremendous prestige to the communist movement throughout Asia.

In the next paragraph he uses these words:

> Withholding recognition would seem to offer the Chinese people some hope of eventually escaping communist domination and control. And important from our standpoint, it would seem to offer the best hope of re-establishing American prestige and influence in the Pacific.

A final brief quotation closes the letter:

> Of one fact we can be certain. The leaders of the communist movement in China are zealous consecrated Marxists intense in their loyalty to Moscow and haters of everything we are and stand for.

If these words do not bear out exactly what I have said about the nature of the Turko-Mongolian conspiracy which confronts the world today, then I would be very much surprised. Hon. members can draw their own conclusions. Walter Robertson is a man who had been away from the United States long enough so that one would not feel that he was actuated by too much political animosity on one side or the other. I would imagine that you would be justified in trusting this man's words as those of a realistic, objective observer of conditions in China.

I now wish to raise another question. I do not wish to quote anything the minister said. By the way, I do not want to be hard on the minister. I realize that he is in about one of the most difficult positions a man could possibly be in, and I want to approach these problems with sympathy, but at the same time I must be as critical as he has a right to expect an opposition member to be, because that is the only way in which he can get support from the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: That is, in having observations which will point out anything that he may overlook in his earnest desire to solve the problem which confronts him.

I think the minister indicated in one of his talks recently that he had been greatly disillusioned. He had been an idealist; he had been hoping that by constantly extending the hand of fellowship to these communist people he could by and by satisfy them, by and by get them to the point where they would say: we shall try to be decent from here on. But he has discovered that notwithstanding his good will, notwithstanding his every effort—and I think every hon. member will agree that our Secretary of State for External Affairs has certainly done his best as far as talking reason, moderation and common sense to everybody connected with this is concerned—despite all of this the minister has just begun to realize what he should have known six years ago. It was not the minister's fault. I am not saying it is the minister's fault. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the things which I have said here tonight are based on information which largely came into my possession only within the last two years, things which I have discovered and which I had only just had an inkling of previously to that time.

I had thought at one time that perhaps if we gave the Soviets safe borders they would probably be content. They are always clamouring for "security on boundaries," but the more security of boundaries they obtain the more they want. I would not be surprised that if they got everything except the North American continent they would want to be given some bases in Canada as a means of security against the United States. Well, what can you do with people like that?

There is going to come a time when you have got to draw the line and say: Now, friends, thus far and no farther! Where are you going to draw that line, and when are you going to draw it? The minister realizes how dangerous the situation is in Indo-China today. He is fully aware of it. He probably knows things that we do not know because we have to rely only on the press, but certainly the story from Indo-China is anything but reassuring today. It is still serious and if the Russians continue—and it is Russia; let us not delude ourselves that it is China that is going into Indo-China; it is Russia using Chinese manpower—if Russia pursues her course and keeps on going down the direction she is going she will cut off from us many of the most vital supplies for the conduct of war. Everybody remembers what a dangerous position we found ourselves in in the last war with Japan. That country captured island after island after island, and thus we lost such things as rubber and other commodities which we basically needed. Everybody realizes that. Well, Russia is doing exactly the same thing; every square mile of that territory she brings under her control puts us to a great disadvantage and her to a greater advantage. When are we going to draw the line? We must draw it at some time; otherwise we are simply going to sit here trembling like a bird charmed by a serpent, waiting for the serpent to come up and accommodatingly swallow us.

Reference was made to the minister's remarks yesterday concerning the great hydrogen bomb. Well of course those bombs terrify; of course they do! If it had not been for the unbelievable spies in the United States and in Canada Russia would not have had those bombs today. It is almost certain that she has just as big bombs as we have, and maybe she is farther along in the development of the cobalt bomb than we are. Well, to use the common expression: So what! Are we going to sit quivering and give up everything our fathers fought and died for for thousands of years simply because it is possible that one of these bombs might be dropped and wipe us out of existence? If so, let us get together and send a gold-plated invitation to Russia and say: "Come on, brethren, we are not going to fight you. Come on over here and we will tell you where to set up your headquarters. We are not having any more of this, we know you have got us licked." I would ask hon. members, is that the way our fathers acted? Do you suppose that is the way our great-grandchildren should read of how we acted? We face a serious responsibility.

I am not sure whether it is fitting that I should go into this matter; but I feel I should. Let me point out that one man who seems to be realistic and competent in matters of military strategy emphasizes that the very best means of attacking Russia today is through Formosa and Korea. He points out that if we will pour our forces in behind Chiang Kai-shek and supply him with a vast amount of arms, ammunition, airplanes and all the other things necessary, he will fight his way on to the Chinese mainland. Chiang Kai-shek will be supported by tens of millions of Chinese who were his loyal supporters before he was driven off the mainland by United States communists working through the American administration.

If we support Syngman Rhee in a similar way he will renew his struggle with the northerners. He and Chiang Kai-shek appear to be the only men, as far as I have been able to find out, who have what it takes to stand up to the enemy. Both these men seem to possess that quality.

We all know perfectly well from the reports we received from General Van Fleet and General Douglas MacArthur that we could have defeated the North Koreans. There is no reason why we could not defeat them today if we gave Syngman Rhee our support.

When we recognize Red China we will put ourselves in a very compromising position. If we decide to fight later on, after Russia has another two or three hundred million additional people on her side, then we shall really be in a compromising position, because we should be fighting Red China which through our recognition of Red China we had signified as our friend and supporting Chiang Kai-shek, whom by the same action we had signified as our enemy.

I do not believe there is any military strategist in this house who does not see the possibilities in that situation. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes, and it will come, because we are not going to lie down —there is not a man in this house who will vote for giving in to Russia—when we decide, as we will decide, where are we going to attack? How are we going to attack? Are we going to endeavour to send our few boys against approximately 800 million Russians? Or are we going to endeavour to do what Russia does?

Russia does not win new states with Russians. She did not win China with Russians. She won China with Chinese working under Russian direction. If we are going to win China back we should win it back with Chinese aided by our own forces. If we decide to stand up to Russia where could we attack? I know there are a number of men in this house with considerable military experience, good strategists, and I would like to know where they would attack? Could anyone suggest a better method of attacking than the one through South Korea and Formosa which I have suggested? An attack which would enable us to use the enemy's men instead of our own? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this matter of future military strategy is one which must weigh heavily in our minds whenever we contemplate this question of the recognition of China.

There is another matter to which I wish to give some attention and that is the matter of Chiang Kai-shek. I do not wish to go into much detail concerning this man, but it is surprising to hear the kind of stories that are circulated about Chiang Kai-shek. There seems to be an idea in the minds of a great many people that Chiang Kai-shek was corrupt. As far as I can find he was not corrupt, but it seems to be supposed that because he was corrupt we were entitled to throw him off the mainland and let the communist government in no matter how corrupt it may be. That seems to be the sort of slant we find in the minds of a great many Canadian people. I talked with one the other day and he said: "I cannot be very enthusiastic about Chiang Kai-shek. He is a sort of rotter." Who told that person Chiang Kai-shek was a rotter? The communists in the United States.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes. What do we know about Chiang Kai-shek? I have already stated that Chiang Kai-shek was thrown off the Chinese mainland by a conspiracy in the United States. The public in the United States and Canada had foisted upon them a ruinous program in China. In regard to that matter I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members a very fine speech delivered by Senator Owen Brewster of Maine on June 5, 1951. That speech can be found in the records of the United States. The subject of the speech is "A Guide Book to Ten Years of Secrecy in our Chinese Policy." Why secrecy in dealing with China? That secrecy has spread from the United States to Canada.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. member's time is up.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Blackmore: It would have been rather more gracious on the part of the hon. member to let Mr. Speaker point out that fact.

Mr. Philpott: Others may want to speak.

Mr. Blackmore: I notice that the hon. member always gets up whenever I begin to speak about something which the hon. member does not want to hear. Here is a very fine book called "While You Slept" by John T. Flynn, published in 1951. From that book may I quote these very brief words:

> The only difference between Russia's war on China and her war on Korea was that in Korea we aided and armed the South Koreans to fight communism, while in China, incredible as it may seem, we actually told the Chinese government to do what Russia wanted—unite with the communists. When Chiang Kai-shek refused, we disarmed him.

I think that would be rather conclusive. That is from "While You Slept", at page 15.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has just expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall have more to say about this matter in the future. I want members of the C.C.F. to remember what I said about meeting them straight on when we get into committee.

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate with great interest. May I say how greatly I have been impressed by the high level which has been maintained throughout. I feel that everyone who has spoken in this debate has been fully conscious of the sombre background against which the debate is being held. I refer to the black cloud which arose in the Pacific on March 1, the time of the experiment with the hydrogen bomb. The lurid flash of that bomb illumined, as it were, the thinking of mankind upon the tremendous and terrifying situation in which we find ourselves. We realize, I believe, that for the first time in his history man now has the power to destroy himself and all his works. The seriousness of this situation has been reflected in the high seriousness and tone of this debate.

We are all conscious of the frightening tragedy that would ensue if the hydrogen bomb were used. I think we feel that at all costs we must avert the tragedy of a third world war. But if that tragedy is to be averted, the first essential, in my humble opinion, is that there must be clear and complete understanding amongst the governments and peoples of the free nations. It is for that reason that I should like to congratulate most heartily the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the signal service which he has rendered by inducing Mr. Dulles, the Secretary of State of the United States, to clarify that momentous statement he made on January 12.

I was greatly surprised to hear the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) assert in this house tonight that the speech made by our Secretary of State for External Affairs to the national press club in Washington and the statement that followed it by Mr. Dulles in his article in Foreign Affairs has shed no light on the original statement by Mr. Dulles. I certainly cannot agree with that estimate. That statement of January 12 by the United States Secretary of State I have described as momentous. I think it was momentous for several reasons. First, it gave a clear and unequivocal warning to potential aggressors; second, it seemed at first sight at any rate, to place great emphasis upon the utilization by the western powers of those resources in which they have the greatest advantage such as, for instance, their scientific supremacy, their technical know-how, their industrial skill; all of which may be regarded as offsetting the vast, almost unlimited manpower of the Soviet bloc. But nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, that statement inspired serious misgivings.

What were some of the causes of the uneasiness produced by the Dulles new look statement. First of all, of course,—as the Secretary of State for External Affairs clearly showed in his speech on Thursday in this house—there was the question as to whether there would be prior consultation between the United States and its allies before resort was had to this policy of instant and massive retaliation. Fears were expressed in many quarters that the United States might be lapsing into a policy of continentalism.

I have before me here extracts from Mr. Dulles' article in the April issue of Foreign Affairs, an article which followed the speech by our Secretary of State for External Affairs in Washington. I quote from Mr. Dulles' statement as follows:

> The cornerstone of security for the free nations must be a collective system of defence. They clearly cannot achieve security separately. No single nation can develop for itself defensive power of adequate scope and flexibility. In seeking to do so, each would become a garrison state and none would achieve security.

And Mr. Dulles went on to say this:

> This is true of the United States. Without the co-operation of allies, we would not even be in a position to retaliate massively against the war industries of an attacking nation.

Then he added a reference to the use of bases of the United States in foreign countries:

> The free world system of bases is an integral part of its collective security. At the recent four-power conference in Berlin, Mr. Molotov repeatedly attacked these bases as evidence of aggressive purpose. Actually these bases on the territory of other sovereign countries are merely a physical expression of the collective security system.

Then he went on to say this:

> They were constructed only at the request of the host nation and their availability depends upon its consent, usually as a legal condition and always as a practical one. The requisite consent to the use of these bases would never be accorded unless it was clear that their use was in response to open aggression, and reasonably related to its scope and nature. This gives assurance of their community function.

What Mr. Dulles said in his article in Foreign Affairs he restated, perhaps even more emphatically, in a press conference which he held in Washington on March 16. I quote from the report of that conference as it appeared in the New York Times of March 17. This is Mr. Dulles answering a question, and he said:

> It is, I think, well known that the bases which we have in foreign countries are in general not usable as a matter of law, and as a practical matter are not usable except with the consent of the countries where the bases are. For example, the bases which are available to our strategic air force in Great Britain are not usable as a base of attack except with the consent of the British government. The same is true in general with all our foreign bases. Therefore, it is implicit in our security system that it operates with the consent and acquiescence of the other partners who have helped to provide the facilities which create a sort of international police system.

Later in that same press conference when asked if there would be consultation Mr. Dulles said:

> Yes, there would certainly be consultation in most of the cases that I can conceive of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, admittedly Mr. Dulles' statement does not say that there will be consultation in every conceivable case, but it does say that there will be consultation in most cases and that there could not be use made of United States bases in other countries without the consent of the host country. That, I think, is important for us to know in Canada, particularly for those of us who live in parts of Canada where the United States has military bases as, for example, in Newfoundland.

Another question which the new look statement of Mr. Dulles on January 12 raised in the minds of many people is this: Would the apparent reliance upon massive retaliatory action necessarily mean a general war? Would it mean that whenever aggression of any kind, even of a small kind, took place in any part of the world retaliation would be atomic? Would the effect of this new look policy be exactly the opposite of the effect which the United Nations strove to achieve in Korea in 1950, namely, to confine and localize the conflict and to prevent the extension of a local conflict into a world conflagration? Here, too, I think the statement of our Secretary of State for External Affairs led Mr. Dulles to give us clarification because in that same article in the April issue of Foreign Affairs Mr. Dulles stated:

> To deter aggression, it is important to have the flexibility and the facilities which make various responses available. In many cases, any open assault by communist forces could only result in starting a general war. But the free world must have the means for responding effectively on a selective basis where it chooses. It must not put itself in the position where the only response open to it is a general war.

Again, he said:

> This calls for a system in which local defensive strength is reinforced by more mobile deterrent power.

He added:

> In every endangered area there should be a sufficient military establishment to maintain order against subversion and to resist other forms of indirect aggression and minor satellite aggressions. This serves the indispensable need to demonstrate a purpose to resist and to compel any aggressor to expose his real intent by such serious fighting as will brand him before all the world and promptly bring collective measures into operation.

He concluded:

> That does not mean turning every local war into a world war. It does not mean that if there is a communist attack somewhere in Asia atom or hydrogen bombs will necessarily be dropped on the great industries of China or Russia.

There, Mr. Speaker, is another very important point that has been clarified as a result of the questions put by our Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yet another misgiving has been removed by the same cause. One question which I think suggested itself to many of us after reading Mr. Dulles' January speech was whether the new look policy would involve United States withdrawal from western Europe, whether it would mean a retreat into continentalism. There is no need for me to emphasize how serious that would have been, particularly in its psychological effect upon the continental countries of western Europe, and more particularly France about whom I propose to say a little more in a few moments. But here again we have an assurance from Mr. Dulles as found again in the article in Foreign Affairs. He says:

> Moreover, the program does not mean that we intend to pull our forces out of Europe. It is, of course, essential that the continental nations themselves provide a harmonious nucleus of integrated defence. If they do so, the United States would expect to maintain substantial forces of its own in Europe, both in support of the forward strategy of defence and for political reasons.

I feel that assurance will have a useful psychological effect, more particularly in France where, as we know, there is even now very great reluctance to ratification of the EDC treaty. We were all glad, I know, to note from the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that substantial progress has been made toward the realization of that very important project, but we are all aware, as he himself pointed out, that there are still serious hurdles to be surmounted. Perhaps the crucial obstacle is France herself. We know that France fears the resurgence of German militarism, and I would agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that we have every reason to sympathize with France. We know that she has been invaded three times in the last eighty odd years by Germany, that she has suffered grievously at Germany's hands. It is only natural that she should suspect the consequences of German rearmament, but surely the choice is not a simple choice between German rearmament and no German rearmament.

Sooner or later German rearmament would, it seems to me, be inevitable. The vacuum that at present exists cannot continue indefinitely and the true choice seems to be a Germany rearmed within the confines of an international system, international control, and a Germany rearmed outside such a system as EDC. Nor should we forget that the author of the EDC project was a Frenchman, Mr. Pleven, and that the best minds in France have seen in EDC perhaps the only solution.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that without some such form of international co-operation in western Europe, the defence of the continent will remain very weak indeed. Anything that can be done, therefore, to reassure France and to make her more likely to accept the EDC program seems to me to be an important step forward.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to turn for a few moments from Europe to the Far East, and to join with other speakers from all parts of the house in welcoming the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Thursday with reference to the recognition of the communist regime in China. I believe, and I am sure that many will agree with me, that statement showed a most statesmanlike approach to this very delicate problem. Personally, I was glad to hear that at present there is no intention to consider or even to contemplate recognition of the communist regime in China. I feel that the communist regime, if it is to be recognized, must work its passage. The forthcoming conference at Geneva will, I think, be the first occasion upon which communist negotiators have sat down at a conference table with negotiators from the west. I believe we should perhaps regard that as a test of the good faith of the communist regime, not necessarily the one and only or final test but at least one test. I believe we should proceed in this matter with caution and make haste very slowly.

On the other hand I believe the Prime Minister was wise in pointing out that to adopt a never, never policy would not be sound. It would tie our hands diplomatically. It would not enable us to maintain a freedom of diplomatic manoeuvre. After all, in the changing circumstances of this age, no one can predict with certainty how far conditions may change in the years to come. For that reason, I think it is wise to maintain a flexible policy and to forswear a rigid course in these diplomatic matters.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I mentioned the Geneva conference. I feel that we are doing the right thing in being represented there. I hope that it may achieve a great measure of success. I am afraid that hope is more in the form of a wish rather than based upon fact and may contain a degree of optimism. I believe we should take advantage of every opportunity to negotiate, because eventually out of negotiations may come understanding and agreement. It may take time. It will take patience, but the alternative is so disastrous that negotiations must continue. Of course, I do agree with the sentiments that have been expressed in different parts of the house that in these negotiations we should negotiate from strength.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: We have been making good progress today, and I have hopes that we will do that tomorrow in this debate so that we might wind it up by five o'clock, after allowing ample time for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to fully answer the questions that have been raised during the course of the debate. If that occurs, we shall take the Criminal Code afterwards and will continue with it on Wednesday.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.57 p.m.

Supply

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production service—

Health of animals—

547. To provide for the payment of compensation to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for under the above act and regulations thereunder, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $838.

548. To provide for grants to fairs and exhibitions in accordance with the regulations established by order in council of December 22, 1952, P.C. 4602; for payments on account of agreements in force on December 22, 1952, with exhibition associations covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings—further amount required and to authorize grants to the exhibitions as detailed in the estimates, $108,000.

Marketing service—

549. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $63,083.

Terminable services—

550. Agricultural lime assistance—further amount required, $85,000.

Special—

551. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage—further amount required, $139,600.

552. Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces—further amount required, $230,207.

553. Estimated amount required to recoup the agricultural prices support account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural prices support board during the fiscal year 1953-54, including authority to credit to the account the net revenue received into the agricultural products board account from the sale of New Zealand meat received in exchange for beef shipped to the United Kingdom, $37,758,894.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

A—Department—

Indian affairs branch—

Education—

554. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $120,000.

B—National Gallery of Canada—

555. Payment to the national gallery purchase account for the purpose of acquiring works of art, in conformity with section 8 of the National Gallery Act—further amount required, $360,000.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

A—Department and missions abroad—

556. To provide for official hospitality—further amount required, $4,000.

B—General—

Terminable services—

557. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, $500,000.

558. To provide for aid to Greece for reconstruction and rehabilitation following earthquakes in the Ionian islands, $500,000.

Supply

559. To provide for a gift of wheat as a contribution to famine relief for Pakistan, $5,000,000.

560. To provide for a gift of food as a contribution to flood relief for Japan, $50,000.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

General administration—

561. Departmental administration — further amount required, $5,800.

562. Comptroller of the treasury—central office and branch offices administration—further amount required, $220,000.

Administration of various acts and costs of special functions—

563. Superannuation and retirement acts, administration—further amount required, $132,404.

564. To authorize and provide for adjustment payments in respect of subsidies previously paid and administrative expenses incurred by: (a) Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, and (b) the Minister of Finance on behalf of Her Majesty, pursuant to the agreement entered into between the said corporation and Her Majesty on the 25th day of June, 1953, under the authority of order in council P.C. 1953-868 dated the 1st day of June, 1953, $310,000.

Payments to municipalities—

565. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property—to provide for payments to municipalities in accordance with the Municipal Grants Act, and the rural municipal grants regulations established by order in council of August 6, 1952, P.C. 3729; and to provide for payments to municipalities under order in council of July 19, 1950, P.C. 3456, in respect of the cost of medical and hospital services and supplies furnished to federal employees and other persons specified therein—further amount required including authority to regard the admiralty properties in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, as federal property notwithstanding that formal transfer of administration has not been completed, $343,783.

Contingencies and miscellaneous—

566. To authorize the write-off to the consolidated deficit account of costs incurred in 1951 in engraving blank bonds in anticipation of a loan which did not materialize, $11,200.

567. To authorize the write-off from non-active assets to the consolidated deficit account of the net trading loss in the securities investment account incurred prior to April 1, 1952 ($40,072.79), $1.

General items of payroll costs including superannuation payments—

568. Government contribution to the superannuation account in respect of additional liability consequent upon the salary increases effective December 1, 1953, $38,000,000.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Special—

569. Amount required to recoup the fisheries prices support account to cover net operating loss of the fisheries prices support board during the fiscal year 1952-53, $36,526.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

A—Department—

570. Combines Investigation Act—Office for investigation and research—further amount required, $65,000.

General—

571. Expenses of committee appointed to advise on principles and procedures relating to remission service, $1,000.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

A—Department—

General administration—

572. Labour Gazette, authorized by Labour Department Act—further amount required, $20,000.

B—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

573. Administration—further amount required, $571,625.

LEGISLATION

The Senate—

574. To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment of indemnity relating to the first session of the twenty-second parliament, 1953-54, to members of the Senate for days lost through absence caused by public or official business, by illness, or on account of death. Payments to be made as the treasury board may direct, $10,000.

575. To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment to each member of the Senate who attended the first part of the first session of the twenty-second parliament which commenced on November 12, 1953, and ended on December 16, 1953, of an amount representing the actual transportation and living expenses of such member while on the journey between Ottawa and his place of residence after the Christmas adjournment of parliament on December 16, 1953, and on the return journey from his place of residence to Ottawa at the end of the recess which commenced on that date or at any other one time during that session, $5,500.

House of Commons—

576. To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment of indemnity relating to the seventh session of the twenty-first parliament and for the first session of the twenty-second parliament, 1953-54, to the members of the House of Commons for days lost through absence caused by public or official business, by illness, or on account of death. Payments to be made on the recommendation of the board of internal economy and as treasury board may direct. Each such payment to be deemed, for the purposes of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, to be part of the sessional indemnity of the member for the session in respect of which he received it—further amount required, $10,000.

577. To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment to each member of the House of Commons, who attended the first part of the first session of the twenty-second parliament which commenced on November 12, 1953, and ended on December 16, 1953, of an amount representing the actual transportation and living expenses of such member while on the journey between Ottawa and his place of residence after the Christmas adjournment of parliament on December 16, 1953, and on the return journey from his place of residence to Ottawa at the end of the recess which commenced on that date or at any other one time during that session, $20,000.

578. To authorize payment, during the present and subsequent fiscal years out of the unappropriated monies in the consolidated revenue fund, to members of the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, in respect of actual transportation expenses incurred by each such member for one journey for dependent members of his family from his place of residence to the most convenient railway point, and return, for each session of parliament (commencing with the first session, twenty-second parliament) attended by him, the estimated amount required for 1953-54 being $1,000.

579. General administration—estimates of the Clerk —further amount required, $213,500.

580. Estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms—further amount required, $6,000.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

A—Department—

Geological Survey of Canada—

Geological surveys—

581. Construction or acquisition of new equipment —further amount required, $18,600.

B—Dominion coal board—

582. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $2,370,700.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Pensions and other benefits—

583. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payment to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organizations —further amount required, $2,640.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Welfare branch—

584. Grant to British Empire and Commonwealth Games Association of Canada to assist in defraying expenses of the Canadian team, $10,000.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

585. Salaries and other expenses—further amount required including authority for additional expenditures from revenues derived from publications, laboratory fees, plant engineering, shop work and the conduct of its operations generally, $1.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ROARD

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (research program)—

586. Current operation and maintenance—further amount required, $265,000.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

587. Inspection, investigation and audit services —further amount required, $27,000.

Ports, outports and preventive stations—

588. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $303,000.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

(Formerly Resources and Development)

Northern administration and lands branch—

Northern administration division—

Northwest territories, including Wood Buffalo park and Eskimo affairs—

589. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—further amount required, $2,500.

Yukon Territory, including forest conservation—

590. To provide for a special grant to the government of the Yukon Territory to help defray the costs of the severe poliomyelitis outbreak in 1953, $43,282.

Forestry branch—

591. Branch administration—further amount required, $7,000.

Forestry operations division—

592. To provide for contributions to the provinces for assistance in forest inventory and reforestation in accordance with agreements that have been or may be entered into by Canada and the provinces—further amount required, $100,000.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

593. Operations — further amount required, $1,100,000.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Federal district commission—

594. To provide for maintenance and improvement of grounds adjoining government buildings at Ottawa—further amount required, $44,260.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY

595. Distribution of official documents—further amount required, $5,385.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Architectural branch—

596. Maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds, other than at Ottawa, including repairs and upkeep, rents, furnishings, heating, etc.—further amount required, $270,000.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—

597. Quebec ($420, less the amount of $419 available from savings in other listed projects detailed in previous estimates for 1953-54 for this province), $1.

598. Yukon and Northwest Territories, $100,000.

Engineering branch—

Graving docks—

599. Prince Rupert dry dock and shipyard and appurtenant works—additional amount in excess of the sum of $110,000 already authorized by vote 343 of the Appropriation Act No. 3, 1953, for the payment of operating losses and essential repairs, all such payments to be made in respect of operations during the calendar year 1953—further amount required, $103,324.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended upon individual listed projects—further amount required—

600. Quebec ($17,000, less the amount of $16,999 available from savings in other listed projects detailed in previous estimates for 1953-54 for this province), $1.

General—

601. To provide for the expenses incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence (formerly under Department of Resources and Development) —further amount required, $130,000.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

602. Departmental administration—further amount required, $15,700.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

603. Commodities services, including contributions as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $21,127.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

A—Department—

604. Departmental administration—further amount required, $161,000.

Canal services—

605. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $177,450.

606. To provide for expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations (including St. Lawrence seaway investigations)—further amount required, $200,000.

Marine services—

Marine service steamers—

607. Construction or acquisition of vessels and equipment, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $291,907.

Pilotage service—

608. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $12,848.

River St. Lawrence ship channel service—

609. Contract dredging—further amount required, $1,899,989.

Railway and steamship services—

610. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals deficit, 1953—additional amount in excess of the sum of $1,459,000 already appropriated, to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1953-54 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1953—further amount required, $143,855.

611. North Sydney, Nova Scotia—Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland, car ferry and terminals deficit, 1953—additional amount in excess of the sum of $1,870,000 already appropriated to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1953-54 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in the payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the North Sydney, Nova Scotia—Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland, ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1953—further amount required, $366,393.

612. Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, deficit, 1953—to provide for the payment to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited (hereinafter called the company) of the amount of the deficit for the year ending December 31, 1953 in the operations of the company and the vessels under the control of the company, as certified by the auditors of the company to the Minister of Finance and approved by the Minister of Transport, $649,662.

613. Maritime Freight Rates Act—additional amount in excess of the sum of $10,453,000 already appropriated for the payment to the railway companies operating in the select territory designated by the act, during the fiscal year 1953-54, of the difference occurring on account of the application of the act, between the tariff tolls and normal tolls under approved tariffs (estimated and certified to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian National Railway Company and approved by auditors of the said company respecting the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways, and in the case of other railways by the board of transport commissioners for Canada) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1953 (chap. 174, R.S.)—further amount required, $199,002.

General—

614. To provide for reimbursement of the Department of Transport stores account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $12,275.

Air services—

Telecommunications division—

Radio Act and regulations—

615. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—further amount required, $50,000.

Civil aviation division—

616. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations issued thereunder—further amount required, $46,000.

617. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $30,000.

B-General—

Air transport board—

618. Subventions for air carriers, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $80,000.

Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—

619. Administration, operation and maintenance —further amount required, $49,200.

Canadian maritime commission—

620. Steamship subventions for coastal services, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $144,971.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Treatment services—

621. Operation of hospitals and administration—further amount required, $749,615.

War veterans allowance and other benefits—

622. War veterans allowances—further amount required, $550,000.

623. Hospital and other allowances—further amount required, $100,000.

Miscellaneous payments—

624. Employers liability compensation—further amount required, $55,000.

625. To authorize and provide for payment to Pearl Margaret Putnam, widow of the late Ross Hartwell Putnam, of the benefits to which she would have been entitled under the Veterans Insurance Act had his application for insurance thereunder been formally approved, by the superintendent of veterans insurance, before his death, $10,000.

626. To authorize the write-off to the consolidated deficit account of the amount of $570,539.67, which was due in respect of pensions paid by the Department of Veterans Affairs to members of the R.C.A.F. who served in the R.A.F. in world war II, payment of which by the United Kingdom was waived in accordance with the provisions of P.C. 1953-522 of April 2, 1953, $1.

Canadian pension commission—

627. Administration expenses—further amount required, $15,000.

628. To provide for payment, in respect of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, of a monthly pension of $100 to Mrs. Annie Elizabeth Cronk, and to authorize the Canadian pension commission to pay thereafter to Annie Elizabeth Cronk an annual pension during her lifetime, in the same manner and subject to similar terms and conditions as if she were the widow of a soldier holding the rank of private who died while rendering military service in world war I, $1,200.

Terminable services—

629. Post discharge rehabilitation benefits including the training of merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners—further amount required, $560,000.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Loans, investments and advances—

630. To provide, subject to regulations of the treasury board, for working capital advances in the current and subsequent fiscal years to posts and employees on posting abroad, and to authorize the creation of a special account in the consolidated revenue fund to which shall be credited expenditure made by and advances recovered from the said posts and employees, the excess of the amounts charged over the amounts credited to the account at any time not to exceed $1,000,000. Vote 655 of the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1952, is hereby repealed. $1,000,000.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Loans, investments and advances—

631. To authorize and provide for an advance to the government of Nova Scotia in accordance with the terms of an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Nova Scotia to be entered into with the approval of the governor in council (in place of the agreement authorized to be entered into by vote 765 of Appropriation Act No. 3, 1953) in an amount not exceeding seventy-five per cent of the loans made by the government of Nova Scotia to fishermen for the purpose of replacing abnormal losses of equipment suffered by reason of severe weather conditions in the 1951-52 fishing season; the amount to be advanced not to exceed $106,500 of which $80,000 has already been provided under vote 765 of Appropriation Act No. 3, 1953, $26,500.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Loans, investments and advances—

Customs and excise divisions—

632. To authorize and provide for the operation of a revolving fund in accordance with section 58 of the Financial Administration Act for the purpose of acquiring and managing material to be used in the manufacture of uniforms, the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed, $90,000.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Loans, investments and advances—

633. To authorize and provide for the operation of a revolving fund in accordance with section 58 of the Financial Administration Act for the purpose of acquiring and managing material to be used in the manufacture of uniforms, the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed $450,000 of which $250,000 was provided under vote 547, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1953—further amount required, $200,000.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Loans, investments and advances—

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

634. To provide for purchase of land and permanent improvements; cost of permanent improvements to be effected; removal of encumbrances; stock and equipment; refunds to veterans (sections 11 and 21); and for protection of security under the Veterans' Land Act—further amount required, $500,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 30, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SUGAR

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling three copies, in English and in French, of the text of the international sugar agreement. Possibly I might make a short statement on this agreement.

Hon. members may be aware that Canada was represented at the United Nations conference on sugar which was held in London last year from July 13 to August 25 inclusive, and from which emerged an international agreement for the regulation of the production and marketing of sugar. Under the provisions of the international sugar agreement, governments which were represented at the conference may accede to the agreement by depositing an "instrument of accession" with the United Kingdom government. Sufficient governments, including the governments of the United Kingdom and of the United States, have now deposited their instruments of ratification or notified their intention to do so to bring the agreement into force from January 1, 1954. The agreement is to remain in force for five years.

My purpose in rising at this time is merely to inform the house of the intention of the government to participate in the international sugar agreement, copies of which I have now tabled. The government does not propose, however, to accede formally to the agreement until hon. members have had an opportunity to study its provisions and to offer any comments or submit any questions with respect to its provisions. This opportunity to discuss the sugar agreement will be afforded when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are before the house.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO SPEECH OF U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report from London that the foreign office had been informed in advance of the content of Mr. Dulles' speech, will he inform us whether similar information was communicated to the Canadian government with regard to the content of that speech?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker; we were not given an advance copy of the speech nor were we consulted about it. As a matter of fact, I do not think it should be expected that Mr. Dulles would consult us or give us an advance copy of his speech every time he makes one. However, Mr. Speaker, I think we would certainly expect to be consulted before the United States adopted any policy or accepted any obligations or commitments in the carrying out of which Canadian co-operation or participation would be expected or which would directly affect this country. I have had the advantage of reading the text of Mr. Dulles' speech, and I do not think those circumstances would apply to this particular speech.

[Later:]

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in order to make things even, following the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), may I ask this question? Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs send advance copies of his speeches to Mr. Dulles in his capacity of Secretary of State of the United States?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. That has not been my custom.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

ATOMIC ENERGY

HYDROGEN BOMB TESTS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Canadian government any information as to whether last Friday's hydrogen bomb explosion got out of control in the way that the one did on March 1? Can the minister say whether the Canadian government knows whether any further such tests are in prospect?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no information regarding the results of the explosion of the hydrogen bomb a few days ago. We know that there is to be another experimental explosion shortly. At the present time there is a qualified scientific official of the Canadian government in Washington where I have no doubt he will be given all the information available on the results of the recent explosion and plans for future ones.

PROTECTION FROM POSSIBLE DANGER OF CONTAMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I gave notice. It is in a way supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. What steps are being taken to protect the Canadian people from possible dangers of contamination by radioactive materials which might reach Canada from the explosion of bombs in the Pacific?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I shall take this question as notice.

INQUIRY AS TO RADIOACTIVE DUST—MELFORT, SASK.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question, of which I have given him notice. In his absence, I will direct it to the associate minister. Has the minister any statement to make following yesterday's press reports concerning the presence of radioactive dust in the Melfort area of Saskatchewan? Have representations been made to Washington regarding this matter?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his questions, Mr. Speaker. In reply to the first question I have no statement to make beyond this, that I am advised by our scientists that it is not at all uncommon to find traces of radioactivity in rain, in dust and in snow from time to time at various places across Canada. None of these traces has been found to be of sufficient strength to be in any way harmful, and therefore they have been regarded as without any particular significance.

I am not aware of any more of the circumstances concerning radioactive indications at Melfort other than those which I have seen in the press.

[Mr. Knowles.]

With regard to the second question, as to whether representations have been made to Washington, I think that it is evident, from the circumstances as I have outlined them, that no such representations were considered necessary.

WHEAT

REQUEST FOR INTERIM PAYMENT ON DELIVERIES OF 1953 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), may I say that the only letter that has been received from the government of Manitoba had to do with a question asked by Mr. Arthur Ross, M.L.A., with regard to supplementary payments on oats and barley. I was obliged to send the answer that I would have given in the house had a similar question been asked here, namely that government policy would be made known in due course.

DISPOSAL OF WESTERN WHEAT SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is one of importance and significance to the western wheat farmers. In order to give farmers a lead as to the position they might take with reference to this year's crop operations, can the minister say what are the prospects for Canada's wheat surplus being disposed of during the present year and to what degree the wheat on the farms in the western provinces may be expected to be sold or disposed of in the elevators before this year's crop is harvested?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question and I have prepared the reply in some detail. In dealing with this question I should first of all like to refer to the delivery position so far in the crop year. From August 1, 1953, to March 17, 1954, producers' deliveries of grain in the prairie provinces amounted to 403 million bushels. If allowance is made for delivery since March 17, the actual delivery figure now stands at approximately 410 million bushels. At the present time the general quota is five bushels per specified acre. In addition, there have been substantial special authorizations for the delivery of barley suitable for malting, and there is a supplementary oats quota of 12 bushels per seeded acre. Recently delivery quotas have been raised above the five bushels per specified acre level at a number of individual points.

With the excellent movement of grain from the Pacific coast ports this year, the five bushel quota has generally been provided for in the province of Alberta. In Saskatchewan, and to a lesser extent in Manitoba, additional shipments are required before the general five bushel quota can be implemented. The wheat board is acutely conscious of this problem and is working on a shipping policy designed to relieve congested points in Manitoba and Saskatchewan just as soon as physically possible. I might add, however, that there is one difficulty which cannot be underestimated. With only limited storage space throughout Canada, it is essential that only kinds of grain and grades of grain which are in demand can be moved to forward positions and this factor has and will continue to slow down the movement of grain from many areas in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. For example, the board has ample stocks of No. 2 northern wheat in eastern positions at the present time and any No. 2 northern wheat which is moved forward to terminal points must, for the time being at least, be treated as grain for storage. I might add that this problem is receiving the continuous attention of the board.

Since the turn of the year space has been appearing at some delivery points, particularly in Alberta. In order to make use of this space, the board commenced on March 17 to increase delivery quotas beyond the five bushel level. The increases have been in terms of either one or two bushels per specified acre dependent upon space available at the delivery points concerned. As soon as the quotas are increased above the five bushel level at individual points, these stations are cut off from further shipments except for shipments specially authorized by the board. This will have the effect of increasing car supply to areas of greatest need. At the present time delivery quotas have been increased above the five bushel level at slightly over 200 delivery points.

The question before us requests an estimate of delivery prospects for the balance of the crop year. This is a very difficult type of estimate to make because the quantity of grain which producers will be able to market in the prairie provinces between now and the end of the crop year depends almost entirely upon the volume of domestic and export sales, and generally the buying of grain today is on a hand to mouth basis. Therefore the delivery possibilities for the balance of the crop year will depend to a large extent upon day to day selling on the part of the wheat board. We know of course that there are quantities of grain which will leave Canada shortly after the opening of navigation. We have confidence that there will be worth-while buying of Canadian grain over the period of the next four months.

I would hazard a guess that in the crop year 1953-54 producers in the prairie provinces will market somewhere around 600 million bushels of grain which will be well above normal marketings based upon normal crops. If we attain this figure of marketing in 1953-54, the total volume of grain marketed from the bumper crops of 1951, 1952 and 1953 will amount to nearly 2,200 million bushels. This is a very large record of marketings over a period of thirty-six months.

Mr. Argue: With respect to the marketing prospects for this year, does the minister think that the quota of seven bushels, wherever it is in effect, may be increased before the end of the crop year, or is the target to get everyone up to a quota of seven bushels only by the end of the crop year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Seven bushels per acre, based on the specified acreage, is a very large quantity of grain indeed, almost the entire crop of last year. I would say that if we are successful in getting deliveries up to the seven bushel quota per specified acre everyone should be quite happy.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister realize that in many areas seven bushels per cultivated acre is less than half of the crop produced last year?

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister give us a breakdown of the 410 million bushels as to how much of it is wheat, how much oats and how much barley?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I could obtain that information. It will take time, but if my hon. friend wishes to have the question answered later I will be glad to bring down an answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a supplementary question based on the estimate that he has now made. Having regard to the potential sales domestically and in foreign markets of Canadian wheat, what is his estimate of the number of bushels of wheat that will be in farm storage at the time the harvesting of the 1954 crop commences?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have given my estimate of the probable marketings of wheat. The other figures having to do with the carry-over and the size of the crop are available. I could get the figures for my hon. friend or he could get them for himself just as easily. However, I shall be glad to get them.

COLUMBIA RIVER

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF DAM AT MICA CREEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Since press reports have indicated that plans to commence construction of the Mica creek dam on the Columbia river are practically cut and dried, may I ask the minister if the international joint commission has in fact made any decision on the matter?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. I had a reply but I do not have it with me. I will give it to him tomorrow, if he will accept my apologies.

FINANCE

CALLING OF THIRD AND FOURTH VICTORY LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance with reference to his statement of March 26 announcing the calling of the third and fourth victory loans, amounting to some $2 billion. Can the minister say anything further as to refunding plans?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate that any answer I might give would have market implications. The announcement will be made in due course.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the minister if he expects to be able to borrow at less than 3 per cent?

Mr. Abbott: That is another matter we will deal with in due course.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ACQUISITION OF ADDITIONAL LAND IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I sent notice of this question to the Minister of National Defence. I see he is not in his place so I will ask the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is it the intention of the Department of National Defence to acquire additional land east of Camp Gagetown, across the Saint John river, known as the Jemseg and Grand lake area, for an air base or any other purpose? As I say, I sent the minister notice, but possibly the associate minister has not had notice and I would ask him to take the question as notice and give me an answer as soon as possible.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I was not aware that notice of this question had been given, but it is my general understanding—I speak subject to correction if I find the facts to be otherwise—that there is no intention on the part of the department to acquire additional land across the Saint John river from the Gagetown site.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to have a definite answer. These people are very much concerned and we would like to have a definite answer whether or not there is any such intention.

HOUSING

PROTECTION OF HOMES OF UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): On Thursday, March 25, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Peterborough relating to temporarily unemployed purchasers of houses from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I gave a brief answer. Since then I have had queries from the hon. member for Welland and others and perhaps I should elaborate somewhat on the policy that is followed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in such cases.

As I indicated on Thursday, the corporation is sympathetic to the plight of purchasers who find themselves temporarily out of work. If a purchaser is in difficulty because of unemployment or other circumstances beyond his control, it is usually possible for him to work out an arrangement with the local office of the corporation to relieve him of his temporary difficulty. Unfortunately there are purchasers who disregard the reminder notices of the corporation. When this happens it leaves the corporation with no alternative but to advise the purchaser of the corporation's intention to take action to cancel the agreement. I might say that there are very few cases indeed where the corporation has to resort to legal action. In 1953, out of 30,500 agreements for sale there were only three properties repossessed by the corporation.

In the Crowland-Welland area, which several members have discussed with me, the corporation has sold 750 houses on a deferred payment plan. The term for repayment varies, but the average monthly instalment is approximately $28, which includes a provision for the payment of monthly taxes and as such must be regarded as being rather modest.

As I have indicated, where there is genuine distress arising out of unemployment the corporation will give every possible consideration to working out an arrangement suitable to both the purchaser and the corporation. Having regard to its responsibility for the management of public funds, the corporation does not follow a policy of waiving or postponing the collection of the monthly instalments on a wholesale basis. Each individual case is dealt with on its merits and only such measure of relief as the circumstances of each individual case may warrant is given.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): On that occasion I asked the Minister of Public Works if he had seen what the Minister of Trade and Commerce had said, that people would not be evicted from their homes—

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: I suggest that neither the hon. member nor anyone else has heard what was reported to have been said, because it was not said. I simply said the government was a good landlord.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): As I mentioned at that time, the statement appeared in the press of that morning and I have a copy of it here if the minister would like to see it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I suggest that what my hon. friend is reading is what the newspaper reporter wrote, and not what the minister said.

Mr. Fleming: Did the minister not make any reference to a moratorium on that occasion?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, sir, he did not. I said that in my experience with the government as a landlord it did not dispossess people who are temporarily out of work through unemployment in an area. I made it quite clear that if they were good tenants otherwise, temporary difficulty, in my opinion, would not be a cause for eviction.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

GENERAL STORES—OPERATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): On March 22, Mr. Speaker, a question standing on the order paper in my name was passed as an order for return. When can I expect an answer?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I shall have the matter looked into, sir.

CANCER

REPORTED NEW ANTIBIOTIC RESEARCH FOR TREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Yesterday I sent a notice to the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning a newspaper report of new antibiotic research work done in the United States for the treatment of cancer. Can the minister state if anything is being done in Canada in that regard?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The new antibiotic, Mr. Speaker, which is known as azaserine, has been receiving early testing on several forms of human cancer. This is a joint project of the Sloan-Kettering Institute on cancer and the Parke-Davis Company with headquarters in the city of Detroit. I think in view of the importance of this matter, it is not desirable I should say any more at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): This external affairs debate has centred largely around the question of the recognition of the communist regime in what is commonly known as Red China. This interest in the house has developed, I believe, largely because of the statements made by our own Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) while he was in the Far East. We were all somewhat startled to read what stand he had taken, and today I propose to quote briefly from three of the press reports of interviews given by the Prime Minister on this particular question.

The first is a dispatch contained in the Montreal Gazette of March 7 from Seoul, the capital of Korea. The heading of the article reads in this way, "Bound to happen sooner or later." Then the dispatch goes on:

> Prime Minister St. Laurent flew into Korea today from Manila after telling reporters there Canada must "sooner or later" recognize communist China.

There are two further significant paragraphs:

> Before leaving for Manila on the last lap of his global tour, Prime Minister St. Laurent was asked about relations with communist China.
>
> "We have got to be realistic," he said. "Sooner or later we would be bound to recognize the government that the people want."

That was quite a startling statement, but the Prime Minister repeated it when he was interviewed at Seoul. I have here a dispatch of March 8, the following day, which is entitled, "St. Laurent backs China recognition, world must be realistic on reds, says Prime Minister."

The dispatch reads:

> Canada's Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent declared today he believed all nations of the free world in time will have to be "realistic"—

And that word appears in quotation marks.

> —and recognize the government of communist China. Prime Minister St. Laurent, in Korea on a world tour, said, "I do feel that some day we are going to have to be realistic. We are going to have to admit the government of China is the government the people want."

And when he had left Korea and gone to Japan he was interviewed again. As a result we had a report in Canadian newspapers with the heading "St. Laurent Repeats 'Let's be Realistic'; 'Reds have Effective Control of China'." The article was from Tokyo and said:

> Canada's world-travelling Prime Minister spoke out again today on the controversial question of Red China, telling reporters at a press conference that, "it is only the common sense, realistic approach" that allied countries eventually will deal with communist China as the government "in effective control of the China mainland."

Now, you will have noticed that in each of those interviews the Prime Minister used the word "realistic"; he repeated that we have to be realistic about this question. Unfortunately however that is exactly what his own statements were not. I submit they were completely and utterly unrealistic, and for these reasons:

In the first place, recognition of Red China has been in recent months and is today the top communist objective. It was what one might have expected, as a result of the Prime Minister's interviews, that only a day or two later every member in the House of Commons received a letter from the Canadian peace congress which, as we know, is a communist organization in our own country. This letter was dated March 16, 1954, and was addressed "To members of parliament, on the occasion of the Prime Minister's return from his world tour". In it we find this significant sentence:

> At the outset we wish to state our full support for the Prime Minister's statement that the government of China is going to have to be recognized.

That was the immediate reaction to his statements by the communists in Canada.

He was also unrealistic because at that time there was propaganda being put out by communists all over the world about the Geneva conference which is to be held next month. The propaganda was that Red China must be recognized, and the fact that she was going to sit in on this conference showed that she was to be recognized. Yet, while this very question was in the forefront of international affairs, our Prime Minister, while in the Orient, made the statement that freedom-loving nations had to be realistic, and that sooner or later they would have to recognize Red China.

Now, on this question of what is to happen at Geneva: Just about two weeks before the Prime Minister was interviewed Mr. Dulles, Secretary of State of the United States, had taken great care to point out to his own countrymen and to the world at large that the fact that Red China was to be at this conference in Geneva did not mean that she was to be recognized. Incidentally Mr. Dulles said yesterday in the United States that the Geneva conference is not to be a five-power conference at all. Red China is not to be there as one of the five great powers.

I have here a report of his address on February 24. This report reads in part as follows:

> In a country-wide radio-television address, Dulles dismissed as "without basis" any fear that agreement to the April 26 meeting implies diplomatic recognition of Red China. The Chinese communists, at Russia's urging, will be seated at the Geneva conference, which will discuss the future of Korea and seek to attain peace in Indo-China. Dulles assailed critics who have contended the seating of Red China at Geneva means the opening wedge toward United States diplomatic recognition of the Peiping regime. Such criticism, Dulles said, tends to give the communists "a success which they could not win at Berlin."

He was referring, of course, to the previous conference. It continues:

> "The communist regime will not come to Geneva to be honoured by us but rather to account before the bar of world opinion," he said. The secretary said this was made clear in the Big Four agreement at Berlin last Thursday which proposed the Asiatic peace conference at Geneva in Switzerland.

Then, our Prime Minister was unrealistic because at the very time he was giving these interviews, only a few hundred miles away in Indo-China there was the worst fighting that has taken place in that war, which has now been going on for seven or eight years. French troops were and still are attempting to defend the fortress of Dien Bien Phu. A terrific battle was being fought.

It turns out too in the speech made yesterday by Mr. Dulles that, at the same time, Red China has been guilty of at least forty violations of the one agreement the freedom-loving nations of the world have with her, namely the Korean truce agreement. This must have been known when the Prime Minister was interviewed in the Far East. If he did not know of those violations he should have.

So I repeat that his statements to the press earlier this month were absolutely unrealistic. What has happened has one very salutary lesson for Canadians both in the House of Commons and out of it, and that is that in dealing with communists it is unwise to say that we will have to give, eventually, what they are asking for. To them—and, oh how often this has been proved in the last few years—to communists, that is only appeasement and an invitation to demand more.

It would have been far more realistic for the Prime Minister or any other minister to confine policy statements to the situation as it is today. That was what was done by the President of the United States—and I hold him out as an example to our own cabinet ministers. He was interviewed six days ago, and I have before me a press report of his statement. The heading is "Eisenhower Says No Change in U.S. Red Chinese Stand". It is dated at Washington, March 24, and states:

> President Eisenhower said today that as long as present conditions continue there will be no change in the United States' attitude toward communist China.

And that, Mr. Speaker, was all our Prime Minister needed to say when he was interviewed in the Far East. The full text of Mr. Dulles' speech of yesterday appears in today's New York Times. He took the same attitude when he said:

> Those responsible for United States policy must ask and answer—

And the question is put in quotation marks:

> "Will it help our country if, by recognition, we give increased prestige and influence to a regime that actively attacks our vital interests?" I can find only the answer "no".

I hope from now on members of the Canadian government will not make loose statements in respect of foreign affairs about what Canada "might" do.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, Red China has no claim whatever to recognition by Canada. She stands branded as an aggressor by the United Nations; she has broken the Korean armistice, we still have our troops in Korea prepared to resist further aggression, and she is carrying on bitter warfare in Indo-China today. Let no one be so simple as to believe that the fighting in Indo-China is not being directed by the Chinese communists, and that the troops there are not being supplied either by the Chinese or Russians with equipment and materials of war.

This position is obviously vastly different from when the Soviet was recognized. She was then not at war with anyone. The condition was completely different. In fact the condition was completely different when the United Kingdom recognized Red China in 1949. There were far more reasons for that step being taken in 1949 than there are for any such step being taken today.

In considering this question of the recognition of Red China, Mr. Speaker, we must remember that general recognition would constitute a tremendous victory for communism right across the world, not only in Asia but everywhere else in the world. I was struck yesterday by the report brought back to the House of Representatives in Washington by a foreign affairs subcommittee which had been visiting the Far East. They had certain recommendations to make to their fellow representatives. One of them was this:

> The United States should continue opposing recognition of Red China or admission to the United Nations. The subcommittee said it could not discover any benefit recognition would give the West; but that it would be a smashing victory for communism.

I believe that to be a correct statement.

Then, as Canadians, we must remember the position of Canadians of Chinese origin. We have many thousands of these fellow citizens of ours in British Columbia, most of them living in my home city of Vancouver. During the war years their young men enlisted and fought beside our sons. They played a noble part in bringing about victory. The parents at home subscribed to the Victory loans. I think the quota in Chinatown was always filled just as quickly as in any other part of our city. At the end of the war they were blackmailed by the communists in China; threatening letters were written to the effect that if they did not pay so much their relatives in the homeland would be liquidated. These Canadian Chinese went through that sort of terror for many months, and yet all the way they have stood firmly on the side of freedom, not wavering, have had no truck or trade with communists.

Today in Vancouver the consul of the nationalist government is a highly respected leader among the Chinese Canadians. You find him at all their functions, and their whole support has been given to the cause of freedom rather than toward helping the communist government in China. Just imagine what their position will be if Canada recognizes this communist government. There will be an ambassador here; there will be a communist consul in Vancouver and perhaps in other centres in Canada. What sort of pressure will then be put on the Canadians of Chinese origin? They will be in an impossible position. Not only will they be under terror, but so will their relatives who remain in China. We will have in effect communist beach-heads set up in this country, and that reason, if no other, should be sufficient to prevent the Canadian government from recognizing communist China.

Surely we must remember that communist promises have no value. I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), when he goes to Geneva, will not be led down the garden path of communist promises that they are going to be good boys in the future. From statements given both by him and by the Prime Minister earlier in the debate one wonders whether the government is not going to be all too anxious to listen to promises of that kind from Red China.

I turn again to Mr. Dulles' speech of yesterday when he dealt with this same situation so clearly. He said:

> It would be reckless for us to ignore the events of recent years which have filled our archives with vain promises. We are not in the market for more. It is now the policy of the United States not to exchange United States performance for communist promises.

I hope that will be the policy adopted by the Canadian government. Later in his speech he said:

> We shall not, however, be disposed to give communist China what it wants from us, merely to buy its promises of future good behaviour.

I ask the position of the Canadian government on the statement of policy made yesterday by Mr. Dulles. I was amazed earlier this afternoon to hear our Secretary of State for External Affairs say that Mr. Dulles' policy speech yesterday did not affect Canada, and there would be no question of Canada being expected to give any co-operation.

Mr. Pearson: I never said that.

Mr. Green: If that is the idea the Secretary of State for External Affairs has of Mr. Dulles' speech yesterday, all I can say is that he must have read it backwards.

Mr. Pearson: That was not what I said.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: Well, that was the implication in the answer given by the minister, and he can clear this thing up very easily when he closes this debate and can say exactly where the Canadian government stands on this new statement of policy which has been enunciated by Mr. Dulles; whether or not Canada approves of that policy, and if she does not approve of it all, let the minister say in what respects Canada does not approve, and give Canada's alternative policy.

And, Mr. Speaker, recognition of Red China would not end the menace in the Pacific. Recognition did not end the menace in the Atlantic. There we have had recognition of the Soviet by most of the nations for a generation. Soviet Russia was an ally in the war and is a fellow member of the United Nations, and yet we had to form the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Our Prime Minister on his tour went so far as to say there should be a broader integration among the nations that are partners of the North Atlantic treaty. By the way, the Prime Minister has not explained just what he meant by that statement. He should explain, or the Secretary of State for External Affairs should explain what is meant by that statement of our Prime Minister in western Germany. I have here a report from Bonn, dated February 11. The heading is:

> P.M. suggests much broader integration within NATO.

The article reads:

> Prime Minister St. Laurent, in the major address of his west German visit, last night suggested a concept of integration of the western powers much broader than the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or the European defence community.
>
> In a dinner speech, while a guest of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, before members of the west German cabinet, the Canadian leader put forward the idea of a political, economic and defence system of countries situated around the "great basin of the Atlantic".

A further paragraph quotes the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as saying:

> Perhaps the time has come now to consider whether some steps toward closer integration . . . should be taken within the larger framework of the North Atlantic community.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in his speech said that in the Atlantic we want collective action, and we want consultation. Apparently all these things are necessary in the Atlantic. But in the Pacific what system is there for united action? Such a system was not even mentioned by either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is no clear-cut policy. This subcommittee of the House of Representatives dealt with that too in their recommendations published yesterday when they stated:

> The United States and free world lack a "clear and firm policy" on Asia and should draft one quickly.

Asia today is the key continent. I have as an authority for that the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In 1950 upon his return from a trip to the Far East a report was issued the heading of which is, "Asia, not Europe, Key Continent Now: Pearson." The article continues:

> Freshly returned from the trip today, Mr. Pearson said there had been a shift in the centre of gravity in international affairs from Europe to the Far East.

He went on:

> Soviet imperialism, for the time being, seemed to be contained in Europe by two factors; the military alliance created by the Atlantic pact and the economic progress which had been attained. In the Far East, however, the Soviet brand of communism appeared to be making great progress, he noted. There was a danger it might overrun the whole of Asia. Its most dramatic success had been in China.

That was on February 10, 1950. Yesterday the same hon. gentleman was quoted as saying here in Ottawa in a speech on Sunday, March 28:

> Mr. Pearson said that in his view there was nothing more important in the world today than the 800 million people in Asia.

The Pacific area is obviously far more dangerous than the Atlantic and has been for some years. There has been a real war going on in the Pacific for some years now.

Red China and the Soviet are together in Asia. It is not a case of just the Soviet union. You have these two great nations together. Just think of the reserves of manpower available with which to make trouble in Asia. Red China is communist. We hear a lot of talk about this being an agrarian movement in China. I have here the latest publication of the "Behind the Headlines" series of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. In an article entitled "China under Communist Control" the author, Dr. A. Stewart Allen, who was a medical missionary with the United Church of Canada in China from 1929 until he was deported in 1951, and who should know what he is writing about, states:

> A large number of people still do not realize that the present changes there are not mainly the result of an agrarian reform movement, but of Russian communism which is the basis of the present government.

He goes on to describe how the Chinese have tried to indoctrinate prisoners and people there who are in their control. He states:

> In indoctrination classes it was very plainly stated that the Chinese plan is to assist in ushering in world communism. They state they have no need to worry about their northern borders which are friendly. But on all other borders, and especially to the south, they must assist in "liberating" their "friends" from their "colonial and oppressed status".
>
> Indo-China, Thailand, Malaya, Indonesia, Burma, India are all in the next line of threat from China.

In Toronto a few weeks ago, the date was January 25, Lieutenant General A. C. Wedemeyer of the United States dealt with the same question and he said in part:

> However, many of our leaders were influenced after world war II by communist propaganda to the effect that the Chinese reds were peaceful agrarians—democratic and friendly to the objectives of the west. We have been paying for that false judgment ever since.

He was addressing the Toronto board of trade. He pointed out that he had known Mao Tse-tung and Chou En-lai for some years before they came into power. He stated:

> They owe everything to the Kremlin, from which they received their training and support. They are still receiving liberal assistance from the Soviet union. So long as the communist oligarchy is secure in its rule of the Soviet empire, in my judgment, the Chinese reds would not dare desert it.

Canada, our own country, is directly affected. Canada is a nation on the Pacific. Sometimes people think Canada only faces on the Atlantic, but Canada also faces on the Pacific and the Arctic and we would be wise to remember that in this house.

If Japan or Formosa or the Philippines go red then the first line of defence for this nation will be on the west coast. Make no mistake about that.

If North America is ever invaded it will be from Asia, not from Europe, and it will be by the red Chinese. Let us not forget that fact either.

Earlier today we had questions about the results of the H-bomb tests at Bikini. On our west coast a few days ago they were using geiger counters to see whether a shipload of tuna fish caught by Japanese fishermen was radioactive. Our west coast is vitally concerned as regards the Pacific ocean and it should be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the Pacific is not yet an American lake.

These things affect Canada on the Pacific but very little has been done in that area to build a cohesive defence. The United States has a series of agreements. She has a defensive agreement with Australia and New Zealand known as the ANZUS treaty; she has another with the Philippines; and another with South Korea and she has a treaty of a little different sort with Japan. But Canada has been standing aloof in the Pacific. Canada has been following a no commitment policy in so far as entering into any defence treaty has been concerned.

Mr. Pearson: We have had 30,000 men in Korea.

Mr. Green: I am aware of that, but Canada has not seen fit to take any part in any of these treaties in the Pacific.

An hon. Member: Except in Korea.

Mr. Green: Canada should take a stand. Canada should have a policy for united action in the Pacific, a policy such that she will be consulted. We should be consulted about what is to be done in the Pacific, and we should have a policy of such a nature that the freedom-loving nations could work together in that area.

The present government has never agreed. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has rather pooh-poohed my suggestion along these lines now for several years. I suggest the time has come for Canada to take some action.

My suggestions have been that there should be worked out in the Pacific a defence pact similar to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and that in the meantime the ANZUS treaty could be extended to include some nations such as Canada and the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State for External Affairs replied with: "Oh, well, Canada has not been invited so how could we get in?" I am afraid Canada has never taken any steps to ask for an invitation. There has never been any suggestion from the minister or the Prime Minister that Canada was anxious to get in or that she would ever lift one little finger to bring about that result.

Senator William F. Knowland, the majority leader in the United States Senate, upon his return from a trip to the Far East last November made certain suggestions. I have here a press dispatch dated November 17 from Washington, in which he had some very interesting proposals to make. It reads in part as follows:

> He expressed the hope that the new Philippine president Ramon Magsaysay would call a conference of free "non-neutralist" Pacific nations as soon as possible to consider widening the old Australia, New Zealand, United States pact, which he said was too narrow a base, savouring too much of the outworn colonialism, to build a general Pacific security system on.

Then the report continues:

> Senator Knowland envisaged the conference as including, besides the English-speaking nations of the Pacific, the Philippines, South Korea, Japan, Formosa, Thailand, the Indo-Chinese succession states of Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam, and went as far west as Pakistan, where the United States is considering establishing American bomber bases.

He was asked about Canada, and whether he thought Canada should be a party. The report states as follows:

> Asked whether he thought Canada should be included in the proposed conference, Senator Knowland said:
>
> "If a conference of free nations were held certainly I would think Canada would be included."
>
> Canada, although a major Pacific power, is not a party to ANZUS or any other Pacific regional pacts created by the United States. Senator Knowland said he thought it was imperative to get the conference under way soon. "Time is of the essence", he said.

I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about that matter in the house in November. As reported at page 151 of Hansard he replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such negotiations taking place at the present time or of their imminent likelihood. I am aware that certain proposals have been made in Washington by members of the congress looking toward the extension of that pact. However, there have been no governmental negotiations as yet to this end.

Other suggestions have been made. Why would it not be reasonable and perhaps vital to encourage natural alliances of the Asiatic nations, to extend the ANZUS treaty, and to make a real attempt to build in the Pacific a defensive alliance? I should like to hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he answers, why it is not possible for something like that to be done. My suggestion may not be the best one, but we just cannot continue to have a vacuum in the Pacific. Something must be done to meet the situation in that area.

To me it is strange that the Prime Minister of this country, in thinking of the future in the Pacific, seemed to think that recognizing red China would end all the trouble. I regret that, while he was in the Far East, he did not direct his efforts to promoting a policy for united action by the freedom-loving nations in the Pacific area.

I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he replies, will be able to tell us that Canada is now adopting a policy which will bring about that end. We have waited all too long for leadership from the Canadian government with regard to Canada's interest in the Pacific. On this question we have had altogether too much soothing syrup from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I hope he will now tell us that, for our own protection and in the interests of our fellow nations associated with us in trying to save freedom for the world, Canada must adopt in the Pacific area a policy which is more realistic than any she has ever had.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the stands taken by my leader in connection with the question of the recognition of China, the question of technical aid and assistance to undeveloped countries, the extension of the Colombo plan and also urging every proper development of the trade and cultural relations of all countries. I endorse the remarks he made concerning the hydrogen bomb and his appeal to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to urge that no further bombs be exploded until we have an opportunity for consultation between the countries concerned.

When the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), I think it was, asked a question of which he had given notice—and I understand it was considerable notice—concerning the hydrogen bomb, I was rather surprised that the minister in question simply replied that he would take it as notice of question. Regardless of what has been said in this house by various speakers concerning the public concern over the future experimentation with the dropping of hydrogen bombs, I also notice that Washington just goes ahead and seems to do just what it wants to do, without any consultation or without informing us of what is being done. We hear about it afterwards.

I have been greatly interested to note that there is a sharp difference of opinion between the Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. with respect to this question of the recognition of China. In fact, our recognition of China has been taken, by the benches on the right, somewhat as a sinister affair according to some of the remarks that have been made by various speakers, particularly the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and, this afternoon, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). What interests me is that the Progressive Conservatives in this house apparently hold a quite different point of view on this question from that of the Conservatives in the British House of Commons. When this matter has been raised previously, as it was, I think, when the Leader of the Opposition was speaking, his answer was, "Oh, yes; Great Britain expressed those opinions prior to the Korean war". But that is not so. I want to quote briefly from an article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of Friday, September 4, 1953. It clearly indicates that the government of Great Britain today takes a very different point of view towards the recognition of China at this time from that which the Progressive Conservatives take in this house. Strangely enough, the C.C.F. group in this house are much closer to the Conservative government in Great Britain on this question than are the Conservatives in this house. I will quote briefly from this article. It is entitled "U.K. Wants China in UN When Time is Ripe" and reads in part as follows:

> Admission of Red China into the United Nations is advocated by the United Kingdom as a matter of practical diplomacy. In no way does it involve approval of communism.

That is our point of view. To continue:

> The British position is held despite the fact that London has maintained relations with the Red regime in apparently difficult and unrewarding circumstances.
>
> Recently Minister of State Selwyn Lloyd made a statement at Westminster which clarifies the United Kingdom attitude and touches upon the present situation in China. Excerpts follow.

These are excerpts from the minister's speech. And by the way, I should like to say that when it comes to a question of foreign affairs and I am in doubt I, as one of those who believe in building unity within the commonwealth, as does this party, would rather seek advice from the parliamentarians of Great Britain who have had such long experience in foreign affairs and have such great balance, than refer to Mr. Dulles day after day, after what he has done recently. Quotations from the minister's speech are as follows:

> The point of principle is made perfectly clear, that Her Majesty's government believes that the Central People's government should represent China in the United Nations.
>
> The issue, therefore, is one of timing.
>
> It is a matter for discussion, not necessarily for public discussion, but we have again and again indicated that as soon as the armistice occurred this was a matter which would have to be considered between us and our allies.
>
> I would say categorically that I regard the signing of the armistice as having advanced this matter.

While the Tories of this house are trying to push it backwards. To continue:

> It has certainly brought us one stage further forward.
>
> I will state all the points which seem to affect the matter . . . First of all, there is the question of the observation of the armistice agreement itself. It is an exceedingly complicated agreement. Speaking frankly there is ample opportunity for friction between the parties to it; we sincerely hope that it will be honoured on both sides in good faith, but there is a great deal of opportunity for friction, and we have to see how the situation develops.
>
> Then under the terms of the armistice agreement a political conference has to be set up, and until we see what progress is made at the political conference, with the very thorny problem of Korea, we cannot know whether the armistice is going to be permanent. We have to see how the political conference shapes.
>
> I do not say for a moment that we have to wait two, three or four years, but we have to see how the discussions take place, and whether there is really on both sides the degree of good faith which will make a success of the armistice. That will be shown in the course of the political discussions.

I submit that the attitude of the government of Great Britain is one of common sense. It does not approach the question having made up its mind prior to any meeting that China cannot be recognized. It is approaching the question hoping for good faith on both sides and as a result of that expression of good faith the recognition of China and admission of China to the United Nations. That is exactly the attitude of the C.C.F. group in this house, although some of our good friends to the right seem to consider that a rather radical suggestion.

I listened most carefully to the minister's explanation of Mr. Dulles' explanation, and while I fully appreciate, and I know the house appreciates, the stand the minister took in the speech he made in Washington, I must admit that when he finished I was just about as foggy as when he started. I am of the opinion that when Mr. Dulles made the first speech he intended to say what he did say and later tried to explain it away. My conviction is somewhat strengthened by reading a speech Mr. Dulles made at the American Legion convention last September which I think clearly indicates the frame of mind with which Mr. Dulles approaches these questions. He addressed the American Legion convention in St. Louis on September 3 last year, and with respect to relations with the world at large he went on to say:

> There is much talk these days about the increased responsibility that now devolves upon the United States. That responsibility is a reality . . . we do not now have to be constantly taking international public opinion polls to find out what others want and then doing what it seems will make us popular. Leadership won that way is shabby and fleeting. Our present duty is rather to adhere with increased loyalty to what, in our past, has been tested and found worthy.

Mind you, the past has been one of lack of consultation in these matters with the rest of the world.

> For more than a century our conduct and example won for us world-wide respect and prestige. That is the only kind of leadership worth having.

I think these remarks indicate Mr. Dulles' rather independent attitude toward this question of consultation with allies before making statements and important decisions. As far as this group is concerned, we are of the opinion that when Mr. Dulles made that statement he intended to frighten the Soviet union, but all he has done is to frighten most of his allies. We do urge that strong representations be made to indicate the repercussions in this country following a speech such as Mr. Dulles made with respect to massive retaliatory action and so on in case of certain circumstances.

In listening to the minister's speech I was interested to note that he made very slight, if any, reference to article 2 of the Atlantic pact. We have heard a great deal about that in recent years but as far as I am concerned I can see very little action and I strongly second the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) who, I think, made a most excellent contribution to this debate, particularly on that point. I was particularly interested in listening to Mr. James Minifie's remarks on "Mid-week Review" on February 11, 1954. I thought what he had to say concerning article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty alliance was very fitting so I sent for a copy of the script. I must give the C.B.C. credit. They did not have a copy here and actually sent to New York for it. I got the original script from which I have had a copy made. On that date Mr. Minifie made remarks which I thought were most fitting and which convey in a very few lines the sentiment of a goodly number of people, including the members of this group. He said:

> The NATO alliance was originally set up with a very definite restriction, it becoming a purely military organization. This was paragraph II of the North Atlantic treaty, which was inserted by Lester B. Pearson, Canadian secretary for external affairs.

I see the minister shaking his head. Is he denying a good thing?

Mr. Pearson: It was not the act of any one man.

Mr. Herridge: The minister took a leading part in proposing that section, I presume. I continue:

> It was heavily supported by the Norwegians, the French and the Dutch. Sentiment in favour of it was so marked at the first council meeting that Mr. Acheson directed that the minutes note that the sense of the house was that paragraph II be taken up at the next meeting. This did not happen. Paragraph II to all intents and purposes became a dead letter. It dealt with political, economic and cultural meshing of the members of the alliance. It was designed by the smaller members of NATO to prevent a feud which they already foresaw. This was the subordination by the most powerful members of the alliance—the United States and the United Kingdom—of everything to the military factor.
>
> The smaller members, and there are twelve of them, were deeply concerned over the peaceful development of the alliance. But this ran counter to the trend of the United States, which was more and more to prevent any sacrifice or delegation of national sovereignty. The ideal of the smaller members could be summed up in the words of Lord Acton, the great historian of two generations past. He said: "The process of civilization depends on transcending nationality," and he added, "The nations aim at power—the world at freedom". This, when you consider the heart of the matter is the basic difficulty which the grand alliance is now facing. It is the return to nationalism or to what Walter Lippmann recently described as "cantankerousness under the guise of patriotism".

I thought that was very well put and I hope when the minister replies at the conclusion of this debate he will inform the house what has been and is being done under article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty, or what is proposed.

I come now to a question on which I particularly want to say a few words this afternoon because I feel very keenly about the matter. What I have to say this afternoon represents the opinions of a good many veterans in my constituency and a good number of Canadians throughout Canada. I refer to the question of German rearmament, and I want to say that in this respect it is my opinion that history is clearly repeating itself. Two generations of youth of major countries have been sacrificed to repel unprovoked and brutal aggression on the part of German forces. The first world war was fought to make the world safe for democracy. At least, that was the slogan at that time. What was the result? Read the histories after the first world war. Read Ludendorff, and Field Marshal Kesselring, who completed his memoirs just last year. The former commanders of the German army were not long in making their plans behind the facade of the Weimar republic to build up the German general staff while they kept the facade of the republic going. For some years it was the German general staff and the German military clique, over the opposition of the democratic socialists who wanted to maintain and improve the republic, that planned a second venture in aggression and brought Hitler to power. At that time the German generals were assisted by the major industrialists who used the republic as a screen for their co-operation with the re-formed general staff and the final build-up of Hitler and the second world war aggression. I might say that the first memorandum with respect to the bringing together of the former general staff, which was supposed legally not to exist, and the working in co-operation with the major armament manufacturers, was actually drafted in 1924.

We had a second world war fought to defeat nazism and fascism and to build a world based on the principles of the Atlantic charter, in which a great many people lost their lives. So far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, the result is that the same old gang are getting into power again. The military clique in Germany is gaining power daily and the industrial leaders, many of whom supported Hitler, are now increasing in power. The very people who opposed Hitler, and were our allies in spirit although they could not take much action under the tyranny of the nazi regime, are being pushed aside and having less and less to say in Germany today. I get a lot of information from considerable reading, and from a good many relatives and friends who have a considerable interest in continental and international affairs.

What do we find in Germany now? Large numbers of former nazi officers are holding office under the present German government. I believe something like 46 per cent of the office holders in the present German government were former officers of the nazi regime, while many who opposed Hitler are ignored. To illustrate the sentiment that exists in my own district, I want to quote from the Nelson Daily News of Friday, April 24, 1953. This is a conservative newspaper, but it often takes a different view from that of my friends on the right as well as on the left. The leading editorial is headed, "A disturbing sign," and reads as follows:

> There are many more nazis in the west German foreign office at Bonn today than there were in Berlin under Hitler, according to Mr. William L. Shirer. Having lived in Hitler's Germany, this correspondent makes a good witness. He may be overstating the case to some extent, but unfortunately facts generally known tend to bear him out.
>
> Relatively few nazis were punished for their affiliations, and of the relative handful who drew prison terms, most have been released. These are considered to have atoned for their errors, and gradually have been accepted in post-war German life. But by and large they have not changed their beliefs or their ways.

That is clearly indicated if you read some of the German papers and find out their position on the situation now.

> This pattern is not peculiar to Germany. It has become apparent in Italy as well, although possibly on a less menacing scale. There fascism is impeded by governmental edict, but neo-fascist groups are operating more or less openly, and showing many of the old characteristics . . .
>
> The resurgence of nazi-fascist arrogance so soon after those movements were overpowered by force of arms is a disturbing sign. How to deal with them is a problem, but one lesson learned is that they will not be swayed or impressed by moral suasion.

That means they are not to be swayed or impressed by the use of the methods of democracy, by argument and moral suasion. We read in the papers of war criminals being released, returned to private life and being honoured by their fellow citizens in the various communities from which they come. In many cases also we read of their being at veterans meetings and being acclaimed as leading people so far as these Germans are concerned.

The bodies of war criminals, who were found guilty of atrocities and executed, are being exhumed and given what is termed a worthy reburial under official auspices. In many cases there is not any kind of repentance for crimes against humanity. The other day when the Leader of the Opposition was speaking he said he recognized the atrocities and the brutal aggression of world war I and the losses we suffered as well as the brutal aggression of world war II and the losses we suffered. But he went on to point out how necessary it was to have these allies. I want to say this, that the people with whom he wants to get chummy do not look upon these atrocities—I am talking of the generals now and not of many of the ordinary people—in the same way he did when speaking the other day.

I was reading Field Marshal Kesselring's memoirs recently and was struck by what he had to say in concluding the book. It is written in quite an objective way from the German field marshal's point of view. There is no sign of any wrong being done. He spoke of the partisans in Belgium and France, who were fighting for their country, and had to be sacrificed. This is what he says, and these are the people who will be our allies and be part of the European army:

> I did not lightly decide to write this book. In the end I made the decision in order from my observatory to contribute something towards a truthful record of a good piece of German history, to the raising of a monument to our magnificent soldiers.

That is just one quotation. I could give dozens of quotations. They show that there is not the slightest sign of understanding of our point of view. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that giving people of that kind command over an army, and integrating them into forces with which we wish to defend ourselves, is simply becoming allies of people who have no understanding of freedom or what it means. Their major objective in life is to retrieve their lost and tattered reputation by war conditions.

Now, what about the situation in the Far East? The dynamism of the nazi people, the industrialists and these military people, is spreading over the Far East. We have former nazi officers of high rank training these forces of Egypt. We find Dr. Voss, the former managing director of the Hermann Goering Works, is in Egypt arranging for the manufacture of arms. We find other German officers are now training the Syrian army. There are teams of bankers, technicians and businessmen flooding the eastern countries. We find Dr. Schacht—I shall always remember with pride that there was one Canadian who had guts enough not to shake hands with this infamous nazi, that is Dr. Schacht, when he met him in Indonesia. This action resulted in strong repercussions across this country. I have met hundreds of people who expressed their admiration for Dr. Keenleyside when he refused to shake hands with this behind the scenes nazi who was actually worse than Hitler, because Hitler was the front man but he was one of the engineers of the war, who was able to get his neck out of the noose later on.

This Dr. Schacht is now the financial adviser to Turkey and Greece, and some of these eastern countries. I want to quote from the New Republic of December 14, 1953. In my own opinion it is a most dangerous thing to consider rearming Germany because we will have a tremendous force in central Europe and, in time of crisis, we do not know upon which side they will fight. This is what the writer of this article has to say:

> Western authorities in Syria state categorically that there is a communist element in the German military mission there. The "reliability" from the west's point of view of the Germans in Egypt and elsewhere is anybody's guess. It is important to remember, however, in any discussion of this type, that—as post-war experience in Europe and the Near East has clearly shown—former nazi and fascist sympathizers take to collaboration with the communist far more readily, on the whole, than lifelong democrats, whether Conservative, Liberal or socialist.

Before concluding, I just want to deal with a couple of clippings I have here. I have a dear old aunt, Mr. Speaker, who has taken an interest in my spiritual welfare for 45 years. Because I am an Anglican, she has insisted on sending me the Methodist Recorder throughout that whole period. I just want to read from that paper because the editor is what I think would be termed a liberal, with a small "l". He writes on foreign affairs most intelligently, and he is listened to with a great deal of respect in Great Britain, like the former editor of the British Weekly. I want to quote from the editorial of October 1, 1953, because I think it is worth considering. It is headed, "A return to dictatorship". It reads:

> If the information coming out of Germany on the government's probable attitude to the press and radio is reliable, as it appears to be, these organizations may soon be working under a censorship not much less effective and stifling than that which existed in the palmy days of Hitler.
>
> The chancellor, Dr. Adenauer, is not yet reported to have agreed with the proposals—and indeed is said to have denied them—but it is clear that great pressure is being brought to bear upon him, though it is difficult to believe that a man who has proved himself to be so liberal-minded, and so doughty a fighter for freedom, will ever bring himself to assent to them. It would be more than that; it would be playing into the hands of an authoritarian party which would bring back some of the worst oppressions from which it was hoped that Germany had been delivered. It is proposed to set up a new ministry of information, but that is a very harmless title for a very dangerous experiment. It would control press and public relations, and all German propaganda, including radio, television and films. It would issue a "Government press summary" which press and radio would be obliged to quote without comment or criticism; control absolutely all foreign broadcasts, and prepare laws to make newspapers and radio organizations partly subservient to the government. The drafts of these laws indicate their intention. Newspapers would be silenced for periods up to six months for "opposing constitutional order". Editors and journalists who print what is called "distorted news directed against the state" would be fined 100,000 marks, and imprisoned for two years; journalists who came under the ministry's condemnation could be barred from practising their profession for five years. These phrases smack too much of the old dictatorship and of modern Russia and her satellite countries, to be read without apprehension. The vagueness of some of them does not make them more palatable. Almost anything, for instance, can be read into "opposing constitutional order". It was indeed a nazi expression that could be interpreted to mean just what the authorities wanted it to mean. If western Germany is contemplating the muzzling of the press, and the rigid direction of publicity, she would do well to think again. Few things would more quickly raise the suspicions of the free nations, give the communists an easier excuse for another accusation of the destruction of freedom, or do the Federal German Republic more harm in the eyes of that part of the world with which it has expressed its determination henceforth to ally itself.

I mention that because, regardless of the best intentions of the democratic elements in Germany, their best intentions will be pushed aside by the very people to whom I have referred—former generals in the nazi army, members of the former German general staff and those connected with former monopolies, as well as large industrialists.

I have here an article which appeared in the London Tribune of March 5, 1954, under the heading "Go to War With Russia, Says German Army Chief." I do not always agree with this newspaper, but I quote it because when it makes quotations from speeches or documents those quotations are absolutely reliable. It is a very trustworthy publication to quote from, so far as the facts are concerned. The article states:

> Herr Bodo Zimmerman, formerly General Zimmerman, and chief of operations to Field Marshal von Rundstedt, wants a German army. And he has a simple reason. He expects and wants a war.
>
> Recently Herr Zimmerman was appointed official publisher to the future German armed forces with the blessing of Dr. Adenauer's shadow defence ministry. He will soon be in business publishing manuals for the German army. He is waiting only for E.D.C. to be ratified.
>
> And these are his views recently given to a Sunday Express reporter and featured in an article by Milton Shulman which appeared in the early editions of last Sunday's Express. "As I see it," he said, "war is inevitable and the side which strikes first with all the force of atomic weapons will win. The future lies with whoever wages a preventive war.
>
> "The tension between East and West will continue indefinitely and will be broken only by war. It would be foolish for the West to sit idly by until Russia has accumulated the strength to defeat the West by striking first. That is why the West, if it is to defeat Russia, ought to launch a preventive war, using all the atomic weapons at its disposal".
>
> Others in Bonn have ideas about the proposed German army rather different from the rather comfortable notions propagated by Mr. Anthony Eden and Mr. Herbert Morrison in last week's debate.
>
> Reporting from the West German capital, Sebastian Haffner, Observer correspondent, wrote last Sunday: "There is now a tendency in German military planning circles to regard the modest figure of 12 German divisions laid down by the E.D.C. treaty as already obsolete and to think in far larger numbers. Very moderate and responsible governmental circles talk of 12 active and 12 reserve divisions.
>
> "There are, however, also some semi-official German military experts who speak in private of 60 German divisions, to be raised in a few years".
>
> Will not all these hotheads be held in check by Dr. Adenauer, hailed by Churchill as the greatest German statesman since Bismarck?
>
> Dr. Adenauer sometimes talks more tactfully today. Speaking in Hanover in December 1951 he said: "Our chief reason for wanting to enter the European army is to be able to recover our eastern territories".

I speak with some concern and agitation when we start out on the path of rearming Germany—12 divisions in western Germany and in the part controlled by the Soviets, perhaps 25 divisions. It solves nothing. We would just be reliving the history that followed two world wars. Actually we would be preparing the seeds for a third world war.

In conclusion I should like to recall an observation made by the late Field Marshal Wavell when visiting in Ottawa in 1949. Upon being questioned about the international situation he said, if I may paraphrase his remarks, that regardless of our fears of any other country or any other countries, in his opinion and as a result of his wide experience, the greatest menace to world peace in days to come would be a rearmed Germany.

I wish to express my unqualified opposition to proposals for the rearmament of Germany. I believe we would do far better to follow the advice given in Ottawa by the late Field Marshal Wavell—and when I say that, I am not speaking alone. I know I am expressing the views of many Canadians, including many Canadian veterans, who would consider it wiser to follow the advice given by the late Field Marshal Wavell than the advice we are receiving from some quarters concerning this question at the present time.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in the debate chiefly to make comments on some of the remarkable statements and misstatements made by members in the opposition.

I find myself in quite considerable agreement with the leader of the C.C.F. group in respect of much of what he said. With one of his suggestions, however, I must take very sharp issue, because it seems to me it would be most unwise to do as he suggested, namely to call off the experiments in connection with the dropping of the hydrogen bombs on the islands of the Pacific, and to transfer those experiments up to the northern Arctic. Of all the places in the whole wide world where there should be no monkeying around with any hydrogen bombs at the moment, certainly that place would be Canada's north pole territory. Because, after all, those boys might make another mistake, so that an explosion might go a little too far either to one side or the other of the pole. Then we would "have had it".

I must say that, while I admire as a person my good friend, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), I find myself in direct and complete disagreement with the ideas he utters in the house. I found some of them most remarkable last night—such as this one, for instance:

> Certainly, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes, and it will come, because we are not going to lie down —there is not a man in this house who will vote for giving in to Russia—when we decide, as we will decide, where are we going to attack? How are we going to attack? Are we going to endeavour to send our few boys against approximately 800 million Russians?

And so on. If ever I heard a declaration of war, that was a declaration of war last night. I ask hon. members how that statement will read today or tomorrow perhaps in the newspapers of Moscow, and whether that is the kind of statement that should be made by a responsible member of parliament at this critical stage of history, when every man of intelligence and good will should be devoting every whit of his energy to try and stop this frantic armament race which is now plunging the world toward universal disaster.

While I am on this subject of the hon. member for Lethbridge, I must say that these constant references to this sinister world conspiracy that he is always talking about, of the Turko-Mongolian conspirator, interest me. After all, in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which is our main hope of security and stability in the world, the Turks are one of our most prized and staunchest allies, and every such reference to a Turko-Mongolian conspiracy is certainly, whatever else it is, an indirect insult to these gallant allies of ours, the Turks.

Let me turn to more important matters. I must say that I was literally staggered the other day when my old schoolboy chum and football teammate, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), made such a colossal faux pas as he made in his reference to China and Yugoslavia. I must say that if it is true, as wise men have said, that no man's judgments are better than the information on which the judgments are based, well then, it is no wonder that the judgments of the Leader of the Opposition on international affairs are so far off the beam as they obviously are. Take this prize statement which appears on page 3377 of Hansard in his speech of March 26:

> There is a vast difference between Yugoslavia and China, not in the principles to which they adhere, not in the form of government, but in certain geographic realities. I almost hesitate to use that word "realities" or "realistic", having regard to the context in which it has been used, because "realistic" has been used as "materialistic", but "realistic" nevertheless perhaps does describe the approach we should make to it.
>
> Tito broke with the Kremlin not because he had broken with communism, but because he had certain ambitions of his own, and because he had a very powerful mountain barrier between him and Russia, and because he had behind him the ocean where he could get supplies—

I do wish that the Leader of the Opposition would go on that foreign trip and would take a trip to Yugoslavia, as I myself have had the great privilege of doing when I went myself to look over that country of Yugoslavia, and see whether, according to the evidence I could gather, they had had a real break with Russian communism; because, far from being, as the Leader of the Opposition so inaccurately said, protected by a great mountain barrier between Yugoslavia and Russia, Yugoslavia lies wide open to attack.

I myself have had the great privilege of going over almost every yard of the front line between the country of Yugoslavia and the country of Hungary. After all, I have had a little bit of experience in looking these things over, both as a participant, and as an observer in the war, and I must say that there is no country in all the world that is more wide open to invasion from the east than that same country of Yugoslavia, which was so unfairly belittled by the Leader of the Opposition in this particular reference. It is a country ideal for tank attack; and if the Russians ever should decide to attack Yugoslavia, with things as they are now in Europe, they could attack from the north through their occupied zone of Austria; they could attack from the northeast through their satellite state of Hungary; they could attack to the southeast through their satellite states of Roumania and Bulgaria; and they might even make a small attack from the rear through their satellite state of Albania. Therefore, surely it is incumbent on the Leader of the Opposition, in speaking of such an important thing as this, and such an important ally as is that country, to get his facts straight.

I went all over that country of Yugoslavia. I found a police state trying hard not to be a police state and trying hard to move over into a spirit that is something of the spirit of western democracy. I remember on a Sunday morning going up to this very Hungarian border with our military attaché in Yugoslavia and seeing whole cities out on gas mask drill and civil defence drill. I remember seeing whole fields of boys, twelve-year-old boys, out under instructors having live rifle practice. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that if ever it should come to pass, which God forbid, that we should have a third world war, and if the Russians or their allies should attack Yugoslavia, in my opinion, every man, woman and child in that gallant country would fight, and in my opinion we could have no more sincere ally, because no matter whatever else Yugoslavs are, they are determined to have their own national liberty and not to be run by any other country from any other source whatsoever.

May I now come to even more serious matters. I regard the statements made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), for whom I have not only respect but a good deal of affection, as very serious. It is quite an honour to the hon. gentleman, who has for so many years sponsored in Canada this idea of a bill of human rights, to be singled out and invited to go over to Jerusalem to give a series of lectures on the bill of rights. His colleagues in his own party and his colleagues in this House of Commons can be proud of the honour paid to him in that respect. But what were we to think last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, when that great champion of human liberties and civil rights in Canada stood up in his place as the official foreign affairs expert for the great Conservative party and made such an astounding statement as is to be found on page 3340 of Hansard:

> I hope and trust that in return for the benefits of the present that are apparent in finding markets for surpluses Canada will not rush into trade with the U.S.S.R. and will give every consideration to the perilous possibilities inherent in contributing in meeting ferment in the Soviet union to which the Kremlin has found no better answer than more repression and the tyranny of purges.

He goes on to develop that idea. If the speech means anything at all, the speech of the hon. member for Prince Albert means that Canada should not sell any food to any communist country. A little further down he said:

> In my opinion there is no more strategic commodity in the world than the production of agriculture, for after all, as I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) found as he travelled in Asia, the H-weapon of communism in Asia is hunger.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Prince Albert will live to be ashamed that he ever made such a foolish statement as that. I cannot understand how he could stand up in his place today and ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for further information about how we are going to sell our surplus wheat. We have a whole one year's crop of wheat that we have not begun to sell yet, and yet the most enlightened man in the Progressive Conservative party, some people say the only progressive one in the whole party, the one real known progressive in the party, stands up in his place and says that this great country of Canada should not sell food to any communist country. As a Canadian I say "shame", and as the member for Vancouver South, whose prosperity depends upon our shipping, I say that we certainly do not want any policy of "no truck or trade with the communists." We want a policy of peace with every country on earth. We want commerce with every country on earth, and I for one believe the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the Conservative party's spokesman on finance, was on much more solid ground when he made reference during this session to the need for trade between Canada and all countries on earth.

I was also surprised at the conflict and contradiction between the arguments of the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) because, speaking at four o'clock, I believe on Friday afternoon, the hon. member for Prince Albert suggested that Russia was in such a terribly bad way because of food shortage and famine. But speaking at 8.30 the same evening the hon. member for Eglinton raised a strong protest because the Canadian government did not protest more strongly because Russia was selling such immense quantities of food to Britain. The two arguments do not seem to fit together.

I must say I believe the most extraordinary argument of all was that advanced by the hon. member for Eglinton at the start of his speech when he made this statement, as reported at page 3355 of Hansard:

> I must confess to not a little surprise and considerable regret that the Prime Minister, having now addressed the house twice on the subject of his tour of the world, including many of the important nations of the commonwealth, said not one word about the vital and beneficent role that the commonwealth is playing in the struggle for world peace today.

If there ever was a remarkable spectacle, certainly we saw it in the attitude of the spokesmen of the Conservative party in this debate. The once great party whose stock-in-trade, whose most fundamental of all principles, was this unswerving loyalty to the British commonwealth, and whose motivating idea was "at Britain's side whate'er betide" will now, I believe, have to rewrite its principles and perhaps have it say "at Dulles' heel for woe or weal." That surely must be the case if we can judge by the remarkable statements emanating from a Conservative party these days, because if ever a great leader contributed something to the welfare of that thing we call the commonwealth, and if ever a great leader of a great country in the commonwealth did make a speech about it on the old biblical principle "let others praise thee and not thine own mouth," then it was surely the Prime Minister of Canada. The Prime Minister is a great builder of a new commonwealth and he does not need to come home and make boasting speeches about what he did or did not do, and he certainly does not need to make vainglorious speeches about the commonwealth.

When I hear hon. gentlemen opposite, who used to be so fervent in their concrete expressions of practical policies designed to promote the welfare of the British commonwealth, and when I contrast their expressions now, which seem far more closely tied in with the United States and not with the British line at all, I ask myself, "Do the modern Conservatives of the year 1954 know what this thing the commonwealth is?" One would never know, judging by the expressions we hear in this house. We hear Conservatives taking a line diametrically opposed to the line proposed by most of the members of the commonwealth.

We all know that this thing the commonwealth is a strange organization. A cynic and wit once said "God protects drunks, idiots and the British Empire," and I believe that, in the light of the history of the past ten or fifteen years, when the war came to an end and people were predicting the liquidation or dissolution of what we call the British Empire, it would have taken a bold prophet to see the rise of these great new democracies of Asia which between them vastly outnumber all the rest of the commonwealth put together.

I wish our friends of the Conservative party who used to be so fervent about the British connection would give some thought to the real commonwealth which exists in this year of 1954, and not to the old British Empire which passed away with Colonel Blimp and Kipling in the last decade of the nineteenth century. The real commonwealth which exists this year is based on what? It is based on Britain; it is based on Canada; and of course Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. But the vast majority of the people of the new commonwealth live in India, Pakistan and Ceylon, and when I hear hon. gentlemen making the kind of rash statements I have heard in this house in the past few days, that we should never recognize the government of China, which is in fact the government of China, then I think to myself, "I wish these people who are making these rash statements would go out and spend a few months in the countries which now constitute the new commonwealth. I wish they would spend a few months in India; a few months in Pakistan; a few months in Ceylon, Burma and Indonesia, and all of the new democracies in Asia."

Every one of these countries of Asia, which must be the anchor and the hope of any peaceful future in that part of the world, they would find without exception, wants the recognition of the real government of China, not because they have any love of communism, because in every single case every one of them has a fierce fight on the home front with their own local communists, but because it is in their interests that stability be established in that part of the world. It therefore seems to me that before people go off so much at half-cock and make these rash and ill-advised statements of the kind we have heard in this house over the past week, to the effect that we should not recognize China—and indeed one member went to the other extreme and talked openly of attack—they should consider the commonwealth as it is in fact and not talk of commonwealth loyalty in terms of theory.

Just one final word about the much-abused kicked-about thing we call appeasement. I confess that when I heard my old friend the Leader of the Opposition getting wrought up about whether we might possibly appease our enemy my mind went back to that very day when Mr. Chamberlain returned from Munich, because on that very day I was to speak to the Canadian Club of Edmonton. Two or three days later the gentleman who occupied the position now occupied by the Leader of the Opposition was to follow me on the same platform. When I rose to speak, Mr. Chamberlain had just returned from Munich waving his piece of paper and uttering these words: "Peace with honour, peace in our time."

After all, I was hired to give a speech on international affairs. When I rose at noon I said that it was not peace with honour, that it was not peace in our time and that within a very short time the certain effect of what was done at Munich would be a deal or, as I called it, a dicker between Russia and Germany, which came, as we all know, within a year. I will never forget the dear lady who was the chairman sitting there beside the lieutenant governor of Alberta. When I came to the end of the speech and the dear lady had to rise and say something to wind up the meeting, she audibly groaned as she rose to her feet, as much as to say "What can I ever say after that?" Then about three days later the leader of the great Conservative party in Canada, the then leader of the opposition, stood on the same platform and pretty well blasted everyone all over the map for daring to oppose Mr. Chamberlain's wonderful plan of appeasement.

I think there has been no more abused word that this word "appeasement". No other word has been so kicked around since as has been this word "appeasement". I took the trouble to go back and study history to find where this word and this process which has come to be known as appeasement was first used. I think I found it because I traced it back about six thousand years. If anybody can take it back any farther than that, I will yield my place right now.

You will find the first use of the word "appease" in the very first book of the Bible. It is found in the book of Genesis, in dealing with the story of Jacob and Esau. We all remember that Jacob, who was a very smart operator, had put over a very fast trick on his brother Esau and had cheated him out of property that belonged to Esau or should have gone to Esau. Jacob made his getaway and after a great many years was coming back to meet his brother Esau. But as he began to come back to meet his brother Esau he began to fear for his own hide; he began to fear for his own neck. If you look it up in the book of Genesis, you will find that Jacob devised a very clever plan because he said, "I must appease my brother Esau"; and he sent him a whole series of presents. If you take it that appeasement is making some kind of reparation for a dirty trick that you have played on the enemy, I do not think that appeasement is such a terribly bad thing. But I do not believe that it now applies because I do not know of any terribly dirty thing that we have done to the communists, the Russians, the Chinese or anybody else.

When appeasement came up in the late thirties and when, I am sorry to say, leading members on both sides of this house were at the beginning very strongly in favour of appeasement, appeasement became a sort of perverted process whereby you bought a little bit of time for yourself by selling out your poor relations to your enemy, as was done in the case of Czechoslovakia. But let us never think for a moment that there is anything similar or equivalent to that in facing the facts. There is no appeasement if we go down the road of working out and trying to get an honourable peace with those with whom, if there is failure to get that peace, we will be engaged in mortal combat within a very few years.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, have no idea whether or not we shall escape a third world war. I do not know. I would not bet any money on it. I think that the most likely outcome of the present armament race in which the great nations are engaged is a third world war. I cannot find a single case in history where an armament race ended in anything else but war. However, I know this. If through God's grace and our own intelligence we get a reprieve and if we call a halt to this mad and frantic armament race which is now speeding up to its last spasms, the world will have to take a different direction from that which has been indicated in some of the speeches made in this house in the past week. We shall have to sit down with the people that are and have been our enemies, and we shall have to try to reach a basis of live and let live.

Therefore if you ask me what I have to say about the question of recognition of red China, I say that it is not my responsibility to say anything about it this afternoon. I know this, though. It is wanted by all of our great partners out in Asia, on whom we depend and who are the real strength of this thing the commonwealth. After all, if we never agree on another thing, let us never forget that this thing called the commonwealth is still the greatest institution in the world today for the stability and security of all of us. It is greater even than NATO and all of these other organizations that you can talk about. Our partners in the commonwealth want the recognition of China on an honourable basis. I for one fervently hope and pray that in the next few months things will turn out so that it may be possible for us to take at least a real step, not only along that path but to work out a basis of honourable peace with our great neighbour across the Pacific, which is by far the mightiest nation in the whole world today, a nation which before the second world war bought 38 per cent of all the pulp produced by our biggest pulp and paper company in British Columbia, namely the Powell River Company Limited, and which could buy much more than that again if we had stable relations worked out. I hope and pray we shall go down the road which may lead to peace and not go down the road which, in my opinion, will certainly lead to war.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I rise only on a question of privilege. I want to make a reference to something that has been said merely for the purpose of keeping the record straight, without in any way attempting to conduct a debate about the statements that have been made. I only wish that my regard otherwise for the hon. member who has just spoken could carry itself to a similar regard for his memory. I would point out that there are sitting on this side of the house a number of hon. members who in the years immediately before the war demonstrated both their faith in the commonwealth and their belief in preparing for a war that seemed to be coming.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman's question of privilege arises out of something that took place during the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott)?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would not have risen if it had not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If so, may I say this. I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South and I do not think that any question of privilege could arise.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to enter into a debate with the Speaker but I am going to say emphatically that this is the first time I have heard any Speaker give a blank commendation of a speech that had just been given. I shall say no more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I say this. I merely carefully asked the Leader of the Opposition whether his question of privilege arose out of the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I have listened carefully to the whole of that speech, and I do not think that any true question of privilege can arise. I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to citation 193 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads in part as follows:

> Members often raise so-called "questions of privilege" on matters which should be dealt with as personal explanations or corrections, either in the debates or the proceedings of the house.

I feel that anything that was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South could only be refuted, if necessary, at a future stage in the debate. I do not wish in any way to make a blanket ruling in advance because I very carefully asked the Leader of the Opposition what his question of privilege consisted of.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to extend the debate beyond pointing out that I have already spoken and therefore cannot reply, and that you are denying me the privilege of making the comments that I proposed to make.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose following the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) in some of the statements he has made except to express my regret that he should quite incorrectly find fault with the official opposition for its stand as far as the commonwealth is concerned. He quite incorrectly stated that members of the official opposition used the word "never" in connection with the recognition of China. I do not recall that word having been used on this side at all. He also quite incorrectly said that some member of the official opposition suggested an attack on the communist countries. These statements were uncalled for and are not at all in accordance with the facts.

My purpose in rising at the present time is to direct my attention chiefly to one topic, the importance of Indo-China and its relation to NATO and the European defence community, and to support in that regard the stand taken by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I think in the course of this debate our attention has not been sufficiently directed to the trouble spots of the world. The debate has ranged very far afield, and quite naturally, the subject being very large. But I had hoped that more particular attention would have been drawn to the trouble spots of the world. I had hoped that when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) returned from his world trip he would have directed our attention to some of these trouble spots.

There have been other world travellers. It is only five or six months ago that the vice-president of the United States made his world tour and returned to report that "everything depends on Indo-China". When the Prime Minister returned his reference to that particular part of the globe was not very extensive. I note that on page 3333 of Hansard of March 25 the Prime Minister, in mentioning the grave concern of the whole world with respect to the fighting going on in Indo-China, said:

> I had the distinct impression that most of the embarrassment felt by French leaders with respect to the European army was a consequence of the drain upon their human and material resources as a result of the fighting going on in Indo-China.

I suggest it was not necessary for the Prime Minister to go to Paris to gain that impression. I think it has been well recognized for the last two or three years that the troubles of France in Europe and in connection with NATO have arisen from her difficulties in Indo-China. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is well aware of that problem and pointed it out to us last year. I wish that he had pointed it out as clearly again this year. Here is what he said just about a year ago when we had our debate on external affairs. His words will be found at page 1855 of Hansard of February 11, 1953.

> But in Indo-China which, in some ways, is the most important part of this southeast Asian area, bitter fighting is still going on to keep this territory under nationalist but out of communist control. In a resolution adopted on December 17, 1952, the North Atlantic council expressed its wholehearted admiration for these efforts and acknowledged that the resistance of the free nations of southeast Asia was in fullest harmony with the aims and ideals of the Atlantic community, and agreed that the campaign waged by French union forces in Indo-China merited support from NATO members. Indeed there is a close strategic relationship not only between events in Korea and in Indo-China, but also between events in Indo-China and in western Europe, because events in Indo-China have a very important bearing on France's contribution to the defence of western Europe.

A day or two later the Secretary of State for External Affairs, speaking again in the debate, had this to say, as found on page 1865 of Hansard:

> The latter problem of Indo-China, which we touched on yesterday and which is so important to the free world, was publicly recognized as such at the December meeting of the North Atlantic council; and I think it is at the root of French fears and hesitations in Europe at the present time.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you might contrast that attitude of 1953 with the attitude now in 1954. In the debate the other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs, dealing with the subject of the Geneva conference, had this to say as found at page 3327 of Hansard:

> At the Geneva conference there will also be discussed the question of Indo-China . . . this question should be discussed by representatives of France, the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R., the Chinese People's Republic and other interested states. As hon. members know, the problem of Indo-China, where bitter fighting has been going on for eight years and is going on today, has never been submitted to the United Nations for consideration, and for that reason Canada has not been as directly concerned with this matter as we were with the aggression in Korea.

Speaking of the critical significance of this struggle, he says further:

> . . . it affects the security of the neighbouring countries in southeast Asia and . . . it affects the ability of France to make the maximum contribution to European and North Atlantic security and co-operative arrangements. And so, while we do not expect at Geneva to take any active part in discussion of Indo-China, we shall of course follow these talks with close interest and take advantage of any opportunity that may be afforded to us to help in bringing some satisfactory conclusion out of this particular matter.

At page 3358, in answer to a statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the Secretary of State for External Affairs intervened to say:

> . . . I said a relatively minor part in the Indo-Chinese part of the conference.

My question is this: If in 1953 the situation in Indo-China and southeast Asia was of such vital importance to the people of the world and to the building up of NATO forces through France's contribution, why does the Secretary of State for External Affairs not take that attitude at the present time? He does not seem to me to take that attitude because at the Geneva conference we are going to stand on the sideline. If the opportunity is offered we may participate. Why do we not take an active part in the deliberations with regard to Indo-China? Is Indo-China not just as important now as it was a year ago? The whole thing, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out a year ago, is linked together. The drain on France's resources to support the war in Indo-China has restricted her power to participate in the formation of the European defence community.

Because France feels unable to participate to the full extent there, she is not so much interested in the participation of Germany. France has good reason to fear the build-up of the armed strength of Germany. The two are closely related, France's effort in Indo-China and France's contribution to NATO. Yet, we are committed to NATO; we are committed to act shoulder to shoulder with the other forces of the European defence army when it is set up, as the minister of external affairs pointed out in another address. Yet, what are we doing in order to ensure that France can play her full part in that organization of NATO on which we are basing all our hopes.

Now, could we not participate in this support of France on the same basis as the other nations, in order to get some sort of settlement in Indo-China, for our own self interest regarding NATO and EDC. Let us consider for a moment what the war in Indo-China really means. The forces involved are large. It has been estimated there are about 400,000 on each side. The casualties have been heavy. I do not know what they are at the present time, but a year ago the casualties to the French forces alone were 40,000 killed and 50,000 wounded. The struggle is in its eighth year. It was obscured for some considerable time by the Korean conflict, but has been on the same scale with regard to effort and casualties and it is of the same importance.

It was not brought before the United Nations, so says the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and because of that Canada has not been as directly concerned as Canada was with Korea. We recall that the Korean trouble came before the United Nations security council at a time when Russia was abstaining from attendance. What prospect would there be of getting a United Nations decision with regard to Indo-China unless similar circumstances prevailed? Merely because the war in Indo-China has not been brought directly to the attention of the United Nations, are we not directly concerned with it? What is the difference between the struggle in Korea and the struggle in Indo-China?

We thought that if the war in Korea was lost the future of the western world in Asia would be very obscure. Would it not also be difficult if the war in Indo-China were lost? Here is a suggestion with regard to that from that writer on international affairs, Joseph Alsop, writing on November 27, 1953 in the Montreal Gazette. In this article, which I will not quote at length, he states that in view of the aid which communist forces in Indo-China have been receiving from communist China, the struggle on the part of the French, Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia is made extremely difficult. Then he throws in the suggestion that if the communist forces acquire jet planes it would mean the end of French air power in Indo-China. He suggests that pilots are already being trained in China for that purpose.

Writing on January 14 of this year, the same reporter says this, and I shall quote directly:

> Indo-China has already taken on the role of an Asian Czechoslovakia—the position that cannot be let go without disastrous consequences. If Indo-China is allowed to fall, while the Chinese power build-up continues without interruption, we shall almost certainly have to make the kind of choice in Asia which his follies finally forced upon Neville Chamberlain in Europe. And even if this quite probably worst does not happen in the end, just where does the present picture in Asia show proof of a recaptured initiative.

The situation is obviously quite serious in Indo-China. It was pointed up last night by the speech made by Mr. Dulles. This is the statement in the Gazette for today:

> State Secretary Dulles said tonight the free world should take "united action" to prevent communist conquest of Indo-China and all southeast Asia.
>
> "This might involve serious risks", he said. "But these risks are far less than those that will face us a few years from now if we dare not be resolute today".

Then he goes on to say:

> "Communist control of southeast Asia could carry a grave threat to the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand with whom we have treaties of mutual assistance," he said.
>
> "The entire western Pacific area, including the so-called off-shore island chain, would be strategically endangered."

Then he goes on to mention the assistance it has been proven the communist forces in Indo-China are receiving from communist China. Surely all these things add up to the fact that southeast Asia is the greatest trouble spot in the world today and that we are in as great danger there as we were in Korea. There is no question that the success of the communist forces in Indo-China would leave a threat to other portions of southeast Asia and that area is the rice producing area of Asia and provides the greater part of that staple food.

There is no question but that pressure could be exercised without any resort to total war in the nature of a third world war on an atomic scale. Now, what is Canada's position with regard to this? I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville) moved the second reading of Bill No. 389, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation from the sponsor?

Mr. Decore: Some three years ago, Mr. Speaker, parliament passed an act to incorporate Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The purpose of the bill before us now is to amend this private act so as to increase the capital stock of the company from five million shares with a par value of one dollar per share to ten million shares of the same par value, and to add one million preferred shares at $50 par value for each share.

Now, it is hoped that this bill will be referred to the appropriate standing committee and hon. members will be able then to have more opportunity to become better acquainted with the proposed capitalization increase, the method of financing this gigantic project, as well as the program for the construction of a line for the servicing of all the towns and cities from the province of Alberta to the province of Quebec. This afternoon I can only outline to the house the general position of this bill and give a brief account of the progress made in the realization of this great national project.

This bill provides, first of all, for doubling the number of common shares, and it adds $50 million of preferred shares. This increase in capitalization is designed, first of all, to enlarge the structure of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in order that it may take over the project of Western Pipe Lines, as well as to finance and to build a pipe line from Niagara to Toronto pursuant to the agreement recently concluded. Of course copies of this agreement will be available to members of the committee.

I think all hon. members are aware of the amalgamation that took place between Western Pipe Lines and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines early this year under the guidance and supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Both these companies are now equal partners in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, with Western Pipe Lines as a wholly owned subsidiary. The combined group are dedicated to the building of the all-Canadian line first.

I understand there is an application to the conservation board in Alberta which is now being heard and considered by that body, and an early export licence from Alberta is anticipated. As soon as that is received, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will proceed to the board of transport commissioners with an application to construct the line. When that permission has been granted the company will then be in a position to enter into firm contracts for the sale of gas to the utility companies or boards in the towns and cities along the route. At the same time the company will negotiate contracts for the purchase of gas from the producers in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Then the company will be in a position to arrange financing, both equity financing and bond borrowing, and commence construction.

It is significant to note that parallel developments will take place, not only in the producing areas of Alberta and Saskatchewan but also in the eastern towns and cities where the gas is going to be marketed. In the producing areas gathering systems must be constructed. Production wells must be drilled in proven fields that now have only two or three wells. Treatment plants must be built in wet gas fields to recover the sulphur, distillate, propane and other by-products of gas production. At the same time, in the many towns and cities across Canada gas utilities must be organized or expanded to distribute the gas to the householders and industries in their areas. All told, this parallel development it is estimated will be more than twice the cost of the main transmission line.

The all-Canadian line is to be organized, financed and built independently of any probable subsequent export of surplus gas to the United States. Ample reserves of gas exist in Alberta and Saskatchewan today, I am informed, to take care of the needs of those two provinces as well as the needs of the trans-Canada pipe line for many years to come—more than enough to amortize the investment required. Every week brings news of additional discoveries.

I am sure the house will be pleased to hear that the apparent conflict between the trans-Canada project and the proposal to bring gas from Louisiana to Toronto has now been resolved. Under an agreement concluded last week, the line from Niagara to Toronto will be built by the Trans-Canada company and leased to the Niagara Gas Transmission Company, until the Trans-Canada line is built to Toronto. At the same time Consumers Gas will cease taking American gas and will take Trans-Canada gas. In this way the immediate needs of Toronto will be taken care of, and the market will be built up in preparation for the Alberta gas in two or three years' time. Of course company witnesses and copies of the agreement will be available before the committee, and we can go into detail at that time.

In conclusion I should like to say that the proposed pipe line from Alberta to the province of Quebec is another link in the binding together of this great nation of ours, Canada. The transcontinental railway was the first. No great development, least of all one of national importance, is achieved without the expenditure of tremendous effort. When the Trans-Canada pipe line is built and serving with fuel and energy more than 2,200 miles of agricultural, mining and industrial backbone of this rapidly developing nation, I think hon. members will have reason to feel proud of this achievement.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by saying that my colleagues and I support this bill which, as you know, is designed to revamp the capital structure of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines better to meet the need in carrying out a major, gas pipe line construction reaching eastward from Alberta. The company is the chosen instrument of the Alberta and Canadian governments to carry out the proposed pipe line project. It is of the private enterprise variety of chosen instrument—another reason we support it, for we do not think pipe lining is any business for the government to get into.

The new Trans-Canada company is a merger of the two former major competitors for the right to build a pipe line east from Alberta. In fact, you might call it a shotgun wedding, demanded by the Alberta government and supported by the federal government, through which two competitors had to kiss and make up, quit fighting each other, and proceed as a team to get a pipe line built.

One partner in the merger was Western Pipe Lines, backed by western Canadian interests. Its plan was for a 30-inch pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg, thence by 24-inch line to Minneapolis, where an established market waits. The plan, I may add, had more economic than political merit.

The other partner was the old Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, backed by the Clint Murchison interests in Texas. Its plan was for a 30-inch pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada, via an all-Canadian route, leaving out in the cold the United States mid-west market. The plan had more political than economic merit.

For several good reasons—some of which I have already hinted at, plus the vital fact that neither plan was big enough to take care of surplus gas being developed in the west—the two projects were merged into the new Trans-Canada company. At present the combined plan calls for a 36-inch pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg, the largest diameter gas pipe line in the world and capable of ultimately carrying about twice as much gas as a 30-inch. From Winnipeg a 24-inch line would reach southward towards Minneapolis, and a 30-inch line would reach east into Ontario and Quebec.

While I have no information from the company to support the statement, I would suggest that by the time construction actually gets under way it may be deemed advisable to expand the diameter of the pipe lines south and east from Winnipeg, to facilitate expanded sales not only in eastern Canada but also in American markets both mid-west and eastern.

As presently contemplated, the transmission system would start in the eastern border of Alberta, and would cost about $297 million. This is far from being a measure, however, of the over-all cost. In addition, there would have to be, first, an investment, probably running to over $150 million, by oil companies in western Canada for the drilling of gas wells, the construction of processing facilities and field gathering lines. Second, an investment ultimately reaching over $40 million, in an Alberta-wide trunk pipe line system to carry the gas from the fields to the eastern border of that province, where Trans-Canada would receive it. This Alberta gathering system would be privately financed and controlled permanently in Alberta under the Alberta gas trunk pipe line company act recently passed by the legislature. The principal owners will be gas producers. The interests of Alberta gas consumers and utility companies, the export pipe lines and the Alberta public will be protected by representation on the board. I believe, sir, that the only government investment will be $10 by the Alberta government for two voting shares, to be used by the two nominees of that government to the board of that company. This gathering system will of course ultimately serve gas to Alberta utility companies and to other export companies, in addition to Trans-Canada.

Other than the export pipe line, the other major items of related investment would include, first, a transmission pipe line from the Manitoba border to Minneapolis, to be built by Northern Natural Gas Company, the twin cities utility, to connect up with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines at Emerson, Manitoba.

Second, the construction of new and the expansion of existing gas distribution systems in the cities and towns to be served by the transportation system. This would require at least $100 million during the first few years alone. Finally, a direct investment by home, commercial and industrial consumers in appliances and other equipment with which to use gas. This also would require at least $100 million during the first few years alone. All these items add up to the staggering total of some $750 million. When we add to that the same kind of costs related to other proposed gas projects, to the Canadian and United States Pacific coast, to the inland empire and Montana, the total stacks up to around $1,250 million required to be raised and spent over the next five to six years, if the projects now contemplated are to be achieved.

We all know that money does not grow on trees; nor can we get it by simply rolling out printing presses. To get the moneys required for the projected natural gas plans there must be incentive provided, either through the basic economic soundness of the phase of the project in which the producer, the transmission company, the distributor, the consumer or investors are asked to put their money, or by such degree of government subsidies as might be needed to produce sufficient incentive.

Obviously, Canada's interests can better be served by the basic economic soundness of great projects like these related to natural gas, rather than by a policy of subsidization. Therefore, sir, it seems to me essential that in considering this particular bill we reappraise Canada's gas policy in an effort to achieve a maximum degree of economic soundness with a minimum of subsidy or even elimination of the need of subsidy. By "subsidy" I refer to all its forms; those borne by the taxpayer, directly or indirectly; those borne by the producers through lower prices for their products, and those borne by consumers through higher prices.

The first step in such a reappraisal should be acceptance by this government, by this parliament and by the Canadian public of the fact that an all-Canadian gas pipe line policy confined to Canadian routes and Canadian markets is not economically feasible. To carry out such a policy would impose a heavy burden upon taxpayers, producers and consumers, with the extent of the burden on the last two groups being determined by the portions levied upon taxpayers generally. It is a fact that none of us is a magician. We cannot merely by waving a flag, even the flag of Canada, make economic facts disappear; nor can we make them disappear by simply ignoring their existence.

I recall that last summer the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) visited Alberta and spoke about his government's decision in support of a strictly all-Canadian gas pipe line. He used these words:

> Eastern Canada is entitled to the benefits of cheap Alberta gas.

His use of the words "cheap gas", which I trust he would now put in the category of other words he recently was quoted as using in the Far East, naturally left a widespread impression in Canada that an all-Canadian line was economic, and that Alberta gas would actually be cheap in the east. Both impressions are erroneous.

I am confident that the Prime Minister spoke in good faith on the basis of information given him, as did others who spoke on the subject last spring and summer. The basis of his statement was perhaps the case presented by the old Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company, which was ably pressed by their press agents in eastern Canada for a lengthy period. The sound economics of that case were based, first, on a market build-up in eastern Canada on a substantially faster rate than such authorities as eastern utility companies thought possible; with a price to the utilities ranging from 55 cents to 57 cents per thousand cubic feet. Second, the sale of more than half of the gas transported to eastern Canadian industries at a price of 45 cents per thousand cubic feet, a price at least 25 per cent higher than other authorities believed the maximum competitive price to be. Third, purchase of the gas in Alberta at a price netting the producer about one-third less than the price proposed for the Winnipeg-Minneapolis plan.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited

I might add that representatives of the old Trans-Canada company, during questioning before the Alberta oil and gas conservation board a year ago, testified that the price to Alberta producers could be raised to a level at least equal to that offered by the proposed Winnipeg-Minneapolis line if the Canadian government granted concessions. As you doubtless know, the conservation board concluded that a case for the economic soundness of the project, on terms favourable to Alberta, had not been made. The Alberta government, after receipt of the board's conclusions which showed a large gas surplus available for export, directed the merger of the old Trans-Canada and Western companies.

It was last spring too that the Canadian Gas Association, made up of distributors of natural and artificial gas across Canada, passed a resolution urging the Canadian government to make a thorough economic study before finally setting a national gas policy. That association noted that it feared that the suggested all-Canadian pipe line would require payment of substantial subsidies.

Just over a year ago another study was made of the all-Canadian project on behalf of Western Pipe Lines by an internationally known engineering and economic firm, Stone and Webster. Let me quote certain of their conclusions:

> In early years, only a relatively small volume of sales could be guaranteed by firm long-term contracts with distributing utilities. This condition alone renders the large scale sale of securities impossible.
>
> We have nevertheless projected the operations of the pipe line for five years on an assumed financial plan and with the maximum level of revenues believed to be attainable. This projection indicates a lack of earning power in the fifth and prior years to support the financial program.
>
> We made a further test to determine the minimum revenues that would be required for any bare hope of financial feasibility. Competitive conditions preclude the collection of such revenues.

The report finally states:

> The most favourable of conditions have been assumed throughout our study. Less favourable conditions would result in an even poorer economic picture.

This is not the only information available as to the economic soundness or lack thereof of a strictly all-Canadian route and market pipe line. The objective comparative study of pipe line routes and market combinations made a year ago by Stanford University and the University of Western Ontario rated the strictly all-Canadian project the least economic of half a dozen alternatives.

The Bechtel Corporation, one of the world's great pipe line, engineering and construction firms, also made three independent studies last year. One of its conclusions was:

> It is believed that a natural gas pipe line to eastern Canada, originating in Alberta and with a designed capacity of 300 million cubic feet per day, would be so marginal as to be unlikely of private financing.

I have used these statements, not to condemn the idea of a great pipe line reaching from Alberta to eastern Canada but to emphasize the reasons for my belief that we must reappraise our national gas policy in the light of economic facts, and to try to work out a better method of achieving the great objectives of building up our proved oil and gas resources in western Canada, getting gas to as many Canadians as possible as fast as possible, and securing the long-term needs for Canada with the least possible burden upon the producers, consumers and taxpayers of Canada.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is a man of great talent, energy and bluntness. He has established a reputation for facing up to issues. I trust that he will, during this debate, face up in full to the facts regarding a Canadian gas policy. He did not face facts when he indicated to the press after the merger of the Trans-Canada and Western Pipe Lines companies that the line to eastern Canada had priority, that no gas would go to the United States until supply to our east was secured, and that gas would go to Minneapolis only on an interruptible basis. Surely he is fully aware of the various economic studies of the all-Canadian line to which I have referred. Surely also he knows that the tying in of Minneapolis improves the economics of an ultimate line to eastern Canada, and that the large financial investment required by the Minneapolis company in order to take Canadian gas dictates that it must be a firm, not an interruptible supply.

Surely the minister, unless he is prepared to considerably modify his gas policy, must have a different answer than a flat "no" to the three questions I asked him in the house on March 24. These questions were:

> Has the government made any commitments, verbal or in writing, for the provision of tax concessions, tax remissions, or any other form of subsidy in order to make financially feasible a trans-Canada gas pipe line in the form apparently desired by this government? If so, what are those subsidies? If not, does the government intend to extend such subsidies?

I recognize that the minister has already made some modification of his all-Canadian stand of a year ago. He has supported, as I did, the import of American gas to Toronto—subject of course to a cut-off when Canadian gas eventually reaches the east. Aside from getting gas to Toronto at the very least two years earlier than gas from the west, the resultant build-up of the top-class, top-price consumer markets—that of household space heating, water heating and cooking—will also improve the economics of the eventual pipe line from western Canada.

I might add at this point that not all the governments in Canada's east look at the gas problem through rose-tinted glasses. The Ontario government has been making its own economic studies in recent months. It wants to have access in time to gas from western Canada to help meet the expanding fuel needs of Ontario. But here is what Mr. Dana Porter, Ontario's attorney general and chairman of its gas survey, said in the provincial parliament on March 20:

> It is impossible to visualize gas coming from Alberta exceedingly cheap. If it can be sold at the equivalent price or slightly less than coal and oil now, and if it can be sold in large enough quantity, they might be able to pay for the pipe line.

Today, sir, there are four major suggestions on which, I believe, this government of Canada should clarify its position; steps that could be taken to establish a more economic national gas policy. The first of these is the building of a pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada in two stages instead of one, with the first consisting of a 36-inch line to Winnipeg with a 24- or 30-inch connection to Minneapolis. Sufficient gas would be committed on a firm basis to ensure capture of this market, provide a faster outlet than eastern Canada for the west's growing surplus, a satisfactory price to producers, and improve the economics of stage two, a line from Winnipeg to eastern Canada.

Secondly, enlargement of gas imports from the United States into eastern Canada to the fullest extent possible on a reasonably short-term basis to supplement the current imports to southwest Ontario, the coming imports to Toronto, and thus permit a rapid extension of gas service to more communities in Ontario and Quebec. The market build-up achieved would further improve the economics of the ultimate system from western Canada. Between them Tennessee Transmission Company and Panhandle Eastern Pipe Lines, one of which will reach Canada at Niagara, while the other already enters Canada at Windsor, have a gas transporting capacity of over 80 billion cubic feet yearly, not now committed to their American customers. Within a few years the growing demand of American consumers along these pipe lines should absorb a large part of this capacity. Meantime, why not use that American capacity to build up gas markets in eastern Canada?

Third, a reappraisal of the proposed routes between Winnipeg and eastern Canada. The south route, following the present interprovincial oil pipe line, is definitely the most economic. Compared to a line north of lake Superior to Toronto and doubling back to the Sarnia area where essential gas storage fields are located, the southerly system would cost as much as $35 million less. It would also be in a better position to expand markets in mass-populated areas in the United States. The all-Canadian route would make a difference of two to three cents per thousand cubic feet in transport costs, which would have to be assessed back against western producers in the form of lower wellhead prices, since competition with other fuels will impose a tight ceiling on the selling price of gas in the east. If it is established that national interest really requires the more expensive route, the added cost should be a charge against the nation as a whole, not a charge alone against the producers of the west and their provincial government partners.

Fourth, a getting together at top level of government officials in Ottawa and Washington in an earnest effort to work out a continental plan on gas that will provide Canadian-American co-operation to ensure the most economic matching possible of gas reserves to markets irrespective of their nationality, with equal security of supply provided to consumers whether or not in the country of origin.

Such a plan could speed the capturing by Canadian gas of essential markets in the Pacific northwest and thus permit the construction of Westcoast Transmission. It could speed the capture by Canadian gas of essential markets in the Rocky mountain and mid-west states, which would result in benefits by way of expansion of development of western Canada's still scarcely-tapped resources. It would ensure improved economics for a pipe line to eastern Canada by use of a short-term supply of American gas in our own east and it would open the door ultimately for sale of further surplus Canadian gas into the northeastern United States.

Mr. Speaker, these general proposals I have outlined I believe recognize the realities of gas reserve and market prospects in Canada and the United States. Western Canada, for example, has been expanding its proved gas reserves at a rate of over four trillion cubic feet a year. If incentives to explore—and by incentives I mean markets and fair prices—are provided, continued rapid growth of reserves is expected to continue for many years. I might say that every one to two years western Canada is discovering enough gas to supply one major pipe line project for at least twenty years. There is every reason to expect that ultimate reserves could be large enough to serve all markets, Canadian and American, within economic reach of our western gas fields for far more years than any of us needs to worry about.

The United States, while possessing far larger gas reserves than Canada, has a present and future gas market that is proportionately even larger. Its own long-term security of gas supply will be assisted, and not injured, by any steps the United States may now take to speed the growth of western Canadian gas reserves. Such steps could include opening the doors of nearest United States markets to Canadian gas, in solving the problem of eastern Canadian gas supply by a relative short-term dedication of American gas to Ontario and Quebec in sufficient volume to service the mass population region of our east, and provide a market build-up in readiness for an ultimate Canadian gas supply.

I believe that this general plan recognizes that a long-term commitment of sufficient American gas to supply all of eastern Canada would be less preferable to American consumers along the Tennessee Transmission and Panhandle Eastern pipe line systems, whose own gas hunger is expanding rapidly, than a short-term commitment that would be followed up by access in time to new Canadian sources of supply to their customers.

The plan outlined for solution of Canada's gas problem is, I believe, not only practicable but is economically sound, and I believe politically feasible. It would open markets faster, at the best possible prices, for western Canadian gas, thus stimulating western oil and gas development and speeding growth of proved oil reserves for the long-term needs of all markets within economic reach. It would get Canadian gas to British Columbia and the northwest United States in a hurry and at competitive costs. It would get Alberta gas to southern Saskatchewan, Manitoba and into the Minneapolis area at prices fair to both producer and consumer in a little over one year. It would get American gas into eastern Canada in large volume within a year. It would cut about $200 million from the immediate capital requirements for pipe line construction and it would make all the projects more economically sound. It would pave the way for an Alberta-eastern Canada pipe line connection a few years hence on a very much sounder basis than is possible today. It would raise the value of our western gas reserves by tens of millions of dollars. It would cut the cost to Canadian consumers, and to American consumers too, by more tens of millions of dollars. It would cut to a minimum, and perhaps even eliminate, the cost of subsidies to Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, the actual working out of details of such a long-range plan would naturally require a meeting of minds between the owners of existing pipe lines that would be involved and the backers of proposed pipe lines, as well as between the gas producing and distributing companies. It would require a meeting of minds between the various provincial governments concerned as producers of gas or consumers, and the Canadian government. Finally, it would require a meeting of minds at top level between the Canadian and the United States governments.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I read a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative party a week or so ago in Ottawa. This resolution passed by the Conservative association reads as follows:

> We support, generally, development of pipe lines and markets for western Canadian oil, natural gas and by-products on the soundest economic basis, with due regard to security of supply for Canadians; but to the extent that national interest may dictate market planning other than the most economic, we believe the nation as a whole should bear the burden, and that this should not be assessed only upon producers and consumers in western Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as various pipe lines bills have been brought before the house, we of this group have made it clear that in our view there are two principles that should be pursued. In the first place, it has been our contention that a Canadian pipe line should be built so as to serve Canadian needs and interests first. In the second place, we have made it clear that in our view gas and oil pipe lines should be publicly owned. We have presented that view to the house on several occasions in the form of amendments setting out both of those principles and we still feel that those principles should be followed.

When the bill incorporating Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited was presented to this house in 1951, second reading of that bill was moved on February 27 by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore), who is the sponsor of the bill now before us. It was my privilege on that occasion to speak for our group. I expressed our pleasure that the first principle I enunciated a moment ago was being implemented by the terms of the bill, namely that it was to be an all-Canadian pipe line; but I expressed our regret that the second principle to which we adhere was not being carried out.

[Mr. Nickle.]

It is still our view that this pipe line should be brought under public ownership. That was our view when we were somewhat at the academic stage with respect to the building of pipe lines in this country. As we approach the time when these long distance pipe lines will be built and when gas and oil will be transmitted through them, we feel even more strongly that these should be the subject of public ownership.

In closing his remarks today the hon. member for Vegreville expressed the view that once this pipe line was built the Canadian people would have reason to be proud of it. I submit that the Canadian people would have much more reason to be proud of a pipe line of this nature if it were owned by the Canadian people themselves.

So far as this particular bill is concerned, we will not raise any objection to the matter involved in connection with it and the other one related to it being studied by the committee to which this bill will be referred. I understand that an agreement has been reached between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, the Niagara company and the others involved. We hope that agreement will be very carefully scrutinized by the committee and that every effort will be made to make sure that the interests of the consumers of Canada are protected as well as they can be protected under a policy of private ownership. However, it is our view that this business calls for public ownership, and even as there have been some conversions in this House of Commons in the matter of pipe line policy we hope there will yet be a complete conversion to our policy of public ownership.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, we all listened with interest once again to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) expound his one-man policy for the development of the natural gas reserves of Canada on a continental basis rather than a strictly or partially national basis. He quoted many authorities and different surveys that have been conducted by engineering firms. He also mentioned the report by the Stanford research institute, and if I understood him correctly he implied that that report also stated that it was uneconomical to supply Alberta gas to eastern Canada. This report was prepared by the Stanford research institute for Imperial Oil Limited and the date is March, 1953. I would refer the hon. member for Calgary South and other hon. members to page 48. The first heading on this page is: "What is the market for competitively priced natural gas in Ontario and Quebec?" The report goes on to say:

An estimated market for 87 billion cubic feet of natural gas exists in Ontario and Quebec at a price competitive with alternate types of fuel. This size of market assumes the fifth year of operation of a natural gas pipe line able to deliver gas in sufficient quantity to satisfy demand as it develops. The competitive price of natural gas is found to be 65 cents per thousand cubic feet at the city gate, or $1.01 per thousand cubic feet delivered to the average user.

The next heading is: "What is the most economic source of gas for these markets?" The report reads:

The most economic source of gas for supplying eastern Canada approximately 87 billion cubic feet per year is the gas fields of southern Alberta.

There is an elaboration of that statement which I will not take the time of the house to put on Hansard. The next heading is: "What are the most economic outlets for Alberta natural gas reserves?" The report reads as follows:

The most economic outlet for southern Alberta gas is eastern Canada. The most economic outlet for northern Alberta gas is the Pacific northwest.

I put this on the record, Mr. Speaker, because from what the hon. member for Calgary South said the house may have gained the wrong impression about this report.

Mr. Nickle: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Nickle: Is it not correct that the average selling price in eastern Canada cited in the Stanford survey is 65 cents per thousand cubic feet which compares with a price of approximately 53 cents for United States gas at Toronto and 35 cents for United States gas now delivered to the Union Gas Company at Windsor? Would he explain just how the very substantial differential in price would be overcome, between 35 and 53 in one case for United States gas and 65 cents in the other case for Canadian gas?

Mr. Prudham: I am not aware that the price of Panhandle gas has yet been established.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we in the province of British Columbia are very much concerned about a national gas policy. I was very interested to hear the statement the minister read from the Stanford report that one of the best markets for northern Alberta gas is the Pacific northwest. We in the lower mainland of British Columbia feel that if we are going to have anything like a national gas policy this is the time to use our bargaining power with the gas interests of the United States. We feel that eastern Canada should not be permitted to import United States gas until such time as we have received a favourable decision and the Pacific northwest of the United States is permitted to import Canadian gas. If a trans-Canada gas pipe line is built to eastern Canada and Alberta gas flows east, and if a satisfactory decision is not reached in Washington, we are afraid that all we can hope for is that the southern states interests will export natural gas to the lower mainland area and all the rest of British Columbia will be left without natural gas. At no time in the years to come will it then be worth while for anyone to build a gas pipe line from northern Alberta to the lower mainland.

We believe that the only way we can have economical distribution of gas throughout British Columbia is if a pipe line is built from northern Alberta through British Columbia to the lower mainland and to serve the great cities of the Pacific northwest. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is a very capable businessman when it comes to the business affairs of the nation, and I hope he will not forget that one-tenth of the people of Canada live on the other side of the Rocky mountains.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

The house resumed, from Friday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Fairclough for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I assure you I will not be long because I would not want to be accused of talking out the measure. I would rather see a vote taken on it. I am sure that it will carry because I think there are very few male members of the house who would dare to stand up and say that they should have more money than the female members.

In my remarks today I should like to try to adduce a point in favour of the bill. I am going to start with the doctors, because in my own riding we have two lady members of that profession. I am sure that the people to whom they are administering would be happy to have me say that these female doctors are as good as the average male doctor in any other part of the country. Certainly, they fill a very important requirement in our area.

Then, we come to the teachers. Some people have said that teachers are underpaid in some provinces and female teachers are paid less than male teachers. This is not true of the teachers in Ontario because there is a law that all teachers start at the same minimum salary, whether male or female. Then, you go to the factory workers. I have been in a good many factories throughout this country and I say that there should be equal pay for equal work. Recently I made a trip to Montreal with a committee on defence production and I saw many girls working on small pieces of electrical equipment, winding little wires on little gadgets. I am sure that with their small hands and nimble fingers they were more adept at doing that job than any male could possibly be.

One of our writers, I think in a publication called Tempest, said that some of our secretaries were getting too large for their bloomers. Well, there would be just as much reason for saying that some of the heads of the members of the press gallery are getting too large for their shirts. Turning to the House of Commons, we all know that over the last few years the female member who has been here the longest has won her spurs and has proven herself as good as any of the male members. We can cross the floor of the house to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley). A few days ago she made a speech and proved to my satisfaction that she knew more about the mining industry than the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy).

All these people I have mentioned, all these professions and this labour, are receiving the same pay. Is there any member in this house who will stand up and vote against this motion under those circumstances? Is there any member who would stand up and say we should receive more salary than the female members of this house? The same principle applies to this bill and to every aspect you could mention of labour or the professions in this Canada of ours. I shall not talk this bill out, Mr. Speaker, but will provide the opportunity to have a vote on it now.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has said, I think it would be difficult for many of the men here to vote against the bill now before us. In fact, I believe you could sum it up by saying that there should be no relationship between the amount of money you receive and whether you wear your pants inside or outside.

The difference between the rates of pay for men and women has an historic basis. In the past women were not capable of doing the heavy work which represented such a large portion of the labour then required. As a result there was very little opportunity for them to find jobs to occupy. Today the situation has changed completely. There is a constantly lessening demand for heavy labour and there is a constantly increasing demand for light labour, highly qualified labour or labour dealing with technical skill requiring a certain amount of delicacy of touch. In this field women are certainly the equivalent of the men.

Now, one of the problems that is going to accompany the introduction of a measure such as this, and the gradual changeover which will result, is the difficulty of defining exactly what is an equal job. Industry and commerce will have to carefully study each job and do a lot of job evaluation and analysis because at this time we find people doing work which is approximately similar in nature receiving varying rates of pay. This is primarily because we have never sufficiently studied job evaluation and determined the exact skills required for the job.

Another point is—

Mr. Gillis: Why talk out your bill? Why do you not let it pass?

Mr. Hamilton: I am going to move the adjournment of the debate in a moment. Well, Mr. Speaker, since it is now six o'clock perhaps I should move the adjournment of the debate now.

On motion of Mr. Hamilton the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the house turned at five o'clock to the consideration of private members' bills I had at that stage reviewed the situation with regard to two main problems. I had been discussing the importance of that main trouble spot in the world, Indo-China, and the point that there effective resistance was being offered to communist attack and penetration in that area of south-east Asia. The second problem with which I was dealing was the importance of that struggle in relation to NATO, because France's commitments in Indo-China were preventing her from playing her full part in the European defence community; and I had pointed out that, without the organization of the European defence community, NATO suffers.

I had reached the stage in my remarks where I was going to suggest what Canada's position should be under those circumstances. I think it is perfectly evident that our interest is as great as that of any other nation in the resistance that should be offered to the advance of communism anywhere in the world. We cannot stand on the sidelines while communist attacks are taking place. We have had sufficient experience in the past to know that we cannot stand aside from world events, and the things that happen in Europe and Asia whether we will it or not will involve us in conflict. We had that experience in 1914 and in 1939 in Europe, and in 1950 in Asia.

We are fully aware that there is a world-wide threat of communism. Again the Secretary of State for External Affairs is very helpful to me, particularly in the speech he made a year ago. I have not been quite so impressed with his efforts this year. A year ago, as reported at page 1864 of Hansard, he had this to say:

> Meanwhile it is becoming increasingly clear that it is communist world strategy to attempt to drain away the strength of the western democracies by military and quasi-military action in the Far East and other places and by fomenting disturbances in the Middle East and in Africa. The communist threat then is on a global scale, and no exclusively regional approach to that threat will be sufficient. The policies required to meet it must be world-wide too. Asian problems are linked with European problems, as has been so clearly demonstrated in the case of Indo-China.

Well, I think it is perfectly clear to everybody that communism offers a world-wide threat. We must be on the alert against that threat everywhere in the world.

Again, so far as Canada's position is concerned, our interest in NATO is just as great as that of any of the other thirteen nations who are participating in that effort. We are just as much concerned as any nation in the world with the position of France in relation to NATO, and just as much concerned with the organization of the European defence community. And that, may I point out, has been delayed now for two years, due chiefly to the reluctance of France to enter fully into the scheme.

That reluctance is founded on a real problem, because of her commitments in Indo-China. I think we have not fully realized that fact. When people sometimes say, "Well, why does not France play her part in NATO and in European arrangements?" they overlook her very heavy commitments in Indo-China. Some people asked General Montgomery if NATO commanders could not go ahead without France, and of course he replied No, that France is essential to the defence arrangements in Europe. It is a country of approximately 43 million people with a fine record of service when it comes to warfare, and absolutely the central part of European defence.

Well then, if France is so important, what can we do to help her? I mentioned this afternoon the resolution passed two years ago at a conference of NATO powers suggesting that it would be in keeping with the objectives of NATO if NATO countries assisted France in Indo-China. Does France need any assistance? Let us consider the effort she is putting forth. France is reported to have 12 divisions serving in Indo-China. Taking Canada's population at 15 millions and comparing it with the 43 millions in France, and accepting the fact that in the matter of population our country is about a third the size of France, to make a comparable effort we would have to arm four divisions. Actually we have under arms about one division. One brigade is stationed in Korea, one brigade in Europe, and there are forces here in Canada.

Fortunately our men are not engaged in warfare, whereas the divisions of France in Indo-China are suffering a constant drain through loss of life and the wastage of warfare. When one considers the effort France is putting forth, he must ask himself what aid Canada can give. Can we give material assistance to France in Indo-China? The United States is doing it—I believe it is $400 million, increased this year to about $700 million or $750 million, to counterbalance the support communist forces in Indo-China are receiving from communist China and from Russia. It has been shown that their supplies are coming from communist China, from Russia and from Czechoslovakia. Could we give assistance by way of technicians to help the French in Indo-China? The suggestion was made last year by a member of this party that we could give assistance by way of transport aircraft. Could we give assistance by way of training native troops?—because it is important in the effort now being made in Indo-China, as it was earlier in connection with Korea, to train native troops to carry on the resistance themselves. The population of Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia, amounting to 28 millions, would provide available manpower if native troops were trained.

Should we give assistance along that line, or could we give more assistance to France in Europe? Can we make commitments there to indicate that we will not withdraw our troops so long as they are required in the NATO force in Europe? Should we provide more than a brigade? Should we raise our quota—again thinking in terms of aid to France?

I suggest those are matters that should be taken into consideration. I suggest further that we can aid France by taking our full part around the conference table at Geneva. I take issue with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he suggests that we would play a rather minor role there, in so far as Indo-China is concerned, and that we would be only observers. Why should we not play a full part by sitting down with other nations at that conference table and giving our support to our allies at the conference? Why must we stand on the sidelines? We are called upon, when world crises crop up, to play a major part. Canada has never been hesitant about that. We have stepped right out on the stage; we have never stayed in the wings when armed conflict has occurred in the world. Why should we not then play the same part at the conference table?

On occasion we are rather inclined to believe that as a small nation we cannot play a major part. But small nations in the history of the world have often played a decisive part in the course of events. We have only to look back at the small state of Athens when they opposed the great Persian empire; we have only to look at the small Roman republic which fought against the great Carthaginian empire in the three Punic wars. However, consider Great Britain with a population of between 8 and 10 million at the time of the Napoleonic wars. She stood up against the armed forces of Europe in a twenty-year struggle; or for that matter Canada's action in the Kaiser's war of 1914-18 and Hitler's war of 1939 to 1945, a small nation playing an important and in some instances a decisive part in those conflicts. We can supply not only munitions of war and food but fighting troops, which are not second-line troops under any conditions. They have always been first-line shock troops. Therefore a small nation is not necessarily prohibited from an active part either in war or in peace.

During the times of uneasy peace such as are prevailing now, and such as prevailed in the 1930's, Canada has not played its full part. I hope that we shall be more active at the conference table in international affairs. Small nations have shown what can be done under inspired leadership. You think readily of Smuts of South Africa, a small nation; but he was a commanding figure in international affairs in the first world war and subsequent to that. We think of our own Sir Robert Borden playing an active part, representing a small nation and playing an active part in the imperial conference during the first world war and at the peace conference that succeeded it. Therefore we can play our full part in the days of uneasy peace just as we did play our full part in time of war.

I therefore urge upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada be represented at the conference table at Geneva when this subject of Indo-China is under consideration for the reasons that I have already pointed out. It is our own interest. We want to assist France, because if we assist France, then France assists us in forming a barrier against any possible aggression in Europe and of course elsewhere in the world.

You may say we cannot afford too many more commitments; that we are sufficiently committed at the present time; but we have seriously to consider whether it is not more important to make commitments in order to prevent war than to be obliged, when war breaks out, to enter into the thing partially prepared. We have had that experience twice in our history. Let us not repeat it.

Finally, let me say this: Canada has a major part to play in the councils of the world. She has demonstrated in the past in warfare the part that she can play effectively. She should demonstrate now at the conference table that she can play just as effective a part toward the prevention of war, which is really our main objective.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, most of the debate so far has centred around the question of the recognition of China. I have no desire to enter into that dispute whatever except to note that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has, in addition to his many other virtues and functions, apparently entered upon the field of prophecy because I find that in speaking in Montreal on January 5, he had this to say:

> As I have said more than once, there is nothing more difficult for a political negotiator to retreat from than a bold, black headline!

In listening to the explanations given on that particular issue in this house I was beginning to believe these words. I am not going to enter into that particular dispute, because what I have to say this evening has to do with an entirely different matter. I should like to devote a little time to the question of self-determination of nations.

I should like to begin by referring to a document which has not been adopted officially, but which I believe was one of the most important statements of policy which was published during the course of the second world war, namely, the Atlantic charter as it was known. I should like to quote just a few paragraphs from it because I believe that Canada could very well adopt that statement of policy as its external policy today. I believe it contains almost everything necessary to provide us with a proper guide in our approach and attitude toward other countries of the world. According to this document, which was proclaimed on August 14, 1941:

> The President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, representing His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, being met together, deem it right to make known certain common principles in national policies of their respective countries on which they base their hopes for a better future for the world.

And these are the principles:

> First, their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorially or other;
>
> Second, the desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned;

The third one I consider to be most important for the purpose of what I have to say tonight:

> They respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them;

Other principles are outlined in this declaration, but for the purpose of what I have to say this evening these three will lay the base. As I said a moment ago I believe we can quite properly adopt this statement of policy as outlined in the Atlantic charter as Canada's foreign policy, because certainly if there is any country in the world that can subscribe to these first three principles that I have just placed on the record, it is Canada.

In addition to that, may I also point out that in the human rights commission, in its eighth session in 1952 the following principles were adopted. I shall read just a brief introduction:

> The commission adopted the following resolutions:
>
> 1. Article for inclusion in the international covenants on human rights.
>
> The commission on human rights
>
> Resolves to insert in the draft covenants on human rights, the following article on the right of peoples and nations to self-determination;
>
> "1. All peoples and all nations shall have the right of self-determination, namely, the right freely to determine their political, economic, social and cultural status."

I will skip the next paragraph which relates to another matter and go to the third which reads:

> The right of the peoples to self-determination shall also include permanent sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence on the grounds of any rights that may be claimed by other states.

That, together with the declaration contained in the Atlantic charter, sets out the basic principles in so far as we are concerned, and I believe I can speak for all of us. We believe every nation in the world should have the right of self-determination, to choose the type of government they wish to have, the type of economic system they wish to operate, and to be sovereign and free within their own boundaries.

Reference has been made by other speakers during this debate to certain countries behind what is known as the iron curtain. Among those to which reference was made was the country known as the Ukraine. This evening I would like to spend a few minutes in dealing with that particular nation. I wish to assure hon. members that in spite of the fact that, as most hon. members probably know, my racial origin is Ukrainian, I do not approach this matter from a narrow point of view. I hope I can approach it in a more or less objective manner this evening. What I have to say I do not say in a spirit of narrow partisanship, nor do I claim to speak on behalf of the people of Canada who are of Ukrainian origin.

I have no mandate to speak on their behalf. I speak as a Canadian citizen. I was elected to this parliament as a Canadian citizen and though I might speak with a certain amount of, shall I say, sentimental attachment, I think that it will be readily understood that I speak in much the same way as, let us say, a person of Irish origin would speak of Ireland even though he had never seen that country, or much in the same way a Scot would speak of Scotland even though he had never been to Scotland. I am one of those who has never seen the Ukraine, but I do speak with a certain amount of sentiment as one who has heard a great deal, not only from my own parents but from the people with whom I have associated, about the beauty, history, traditions and culture of that country. At the same time I want to reiterate that tonight I hope to approach this subject in an objective manner and I hope that is the spirit in which what I have to say will be accepted.

This will not be the first occasion, Mr. Speaker, on which reference has been made to the Ukraine by various hon. members in this house, but it is perhaps the first time during this parliament that this subject has come up for formal discussion. I believe it would help to trace briefly something of its history for the benefit of those hon. members who may not be familiar with this nation. Few people realize, unless they have taken the trouble to make a study of it, that the Ukraine was a nation in its own right as far back as the middle of the ninth century. That, to a country as young as Canada, is a good many years ago. Perhaps few of us realize that as far back as the middle of the tenth century Christianity had already been accepted officially in that nation. It had come in much earlier than that, and there is evidence to show that both the Roman and Greek influence in that respect was felt in that country. However, it was officially adopted in the year 988 by Volodimir the Great who then ruled that nation. The exact origin of the Ukraine cannot, of course, be categorically stated any more than can perhaps the origin of any nation in the world, but it is known that there was a great deal of Scandinavian influence in the formation and organization of that country as a national entity.

It is known also that from its very beginnings the existence of the Ukrainian state was not a peaceful one due to the geographical location and due also to the fact that it was an area of Europe which was immensely rich in natural resources. It was a continual temptation to other nations perhaps less favoured in their resources and climate, and the Ukraine was the object of invasion on many occasions. History has spoken of the many attacks which the people of the Ukraine had to repel from the east, and the many small and large wars which they had to fight in order to maintain their national sovereignty.

It is also interesting to note that the spirit of democracy—and I speak of democracy here in very broad terms because the concept of democracy is continually undergoing change and interpretation—in the sense that the people wished to be self-governed is deeply rooted in the very existence of the Ukrainian people. History shows that as far back as the year 1068 the people of the Ukraine were already sufficiently organized in a democratic manner that when they had to expel a ruler and replace him with another they did so by the democratic method of calling a meeting of the populace, taking a vote on the matter and settling it in that way. Many of their decisions were arrived at, even as far back as one thousand years ago, in much the same way as in the early days of England when these problems were settled by a town meeting sometimes called the "folk moot". The latter method was used as a rough and ready means of arriving at democratic decisions and nowhere perhaps is that more evident as regards the Ukraine than in the conduct of their military affairs.

Most hon. members have heard of the famous military organization known as the Cossacks who fought for many years on behalf of the freedom of the Ukraine. They were more than just a military organization for they helped to organize the social and economic life of the country. Perhaps it is little known that the military leaders who led the Cossacks were themselves elected by the members of that military organization. In other words, the spirit of self-government and of everyone having his say in the choosing of the ones who were to run the affairs of that country is deeply rooted as part of the tradition of the Ukraine.

Perhaps one of the most famous persons born in the Ukraine was their national poet, the man who popularized and perhaps dramatized the Cossacks and their work and method of doing things. The name of that poet is Taras Shevchenko. The 93rd anniversary of his death was commemorated a few days ago, not only all across Canada wherever Ukrainian organizations exist but also all over the world because Shevchenko, in spite of the fact that he died while still comparatively a young man, reached international fame. Here I would like to quote a few words about this great national poet from the pen of Professor Manning of Columbia University. Here is what Professor Manning has to say:

> He is one of the great poets of the 19th century without regard to nationality or language and his fearless appeal to right and truth and justice speaks as eloquently in the new world as it did in the old, or in the little village where he was born, the city to which he was taken or the treeless steppes to which he was exiled.

It is perhaps not too surprising that in spite of the great many difficulties that the Ukraine had in its early days it produced perhaps an unusual share of the world's artists, poets, and musicians. Perhaps the reason is that it was one of the most picturesque and beautiful countries in the world. Here again I have to rely upon those who have seen it. In order to get a more objective viewpoint I will quote from a Polish author who, about the year 1590, wrote the following words about the Ukraine:

> Ukraine is the richest land known. Its steppes are to be compared with Elysian fields. They are boundless, broken only from time to time by gentle hills, valleys and groves. Their aspect is fertile and lively. There is such wealth of cattle, game and birds that you might think it were the home of Diana and Ceres. Such quantities of honey are taken from the countless hives that you could forget the Sicilian Hela and the Attic Hymettus. Grapes grow there in plenty and the vine can be easily cultivated. Walnuts are in such plentiful abundance that the Ukraine might once have been an Italian land. It would be impossible to enumerate all the fishponds, lakes and rivers. But why should I vainly scatter magnificent descriptions when I might say in a word that Ukraine is the promised land that our Lord spoke of to the Jews, the land that flows with milk and honey. Once to have been in the Ukraine is never to leave it, it draws everyone as a magnet draws steel, on account of its many advantages. The sky above the Ukraine is smiling, its climate is healthy, its soil fertile . . .

Thus it goes on in a very flowery manner to describe this country. As I mentioned a while ago, its richness and beauty were at once the inspiration of the country and perhaps its greatest tragedy because its richness and its productivity were the attractions for these invaders, many of them almost half primitive, who came with nothing but greed and avarice and left nothing but ruin and desolation in their wake.

That was the early history of the Ukraine—turbulent, uncertain, full of struggles and yet at the same time developing a tradition of democracy, a love of beauty and culture. Then we come to the time that was referred to the other day by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), that of the treaty of Pereyaslavl of 1654, which—and I agree with the Leader of the Opposition in that respect—had tragic consequences. It was entered into with Russia in a spirit of brotherhood, friendship and the hope that they could live side by side as neighbours. But with all the good intentions on the part of the Ukrainians the regime in Russia pulled what is today known as a classic double-cross.

They betrayed the Ukraine and, instead of having peace and security, the Ukrainian people found themselves involved in intrigues and wars with their other neighbours. The result of the whole series of wars was that they lost their national sovereignty. For almost the next three hundred years the people had no country that they could call their own; they were divided first amongst one group of countries and then amongst another. It is interesting to note that in 1917, when the Russian revolution broke out in March in St. Petersburg, although for almost three hundred years these people had had no organized nation of their own or no national sovereignty, almost instantaneously they sprang to action and formed what was called the Ukrainian central council with the objective of winning back their sovereignty and independence. I think that fact indicates how deeply rooted in their consciousness and in their very existence was their love of their country, their love of freedom, and their desire to live as masters in their own house.

The rest is almost recent history known by most hon. members, and I will not carry on much longer except to say that in January, 1918, this central council proclaimed the independence of the Ukraine. Unfortunately, owing to the circumstances of the time, the nation did not long remain sovereign but after a few struggles again lost its sovereignty.

I have given that outline just as a background, as briefly as I could, because I believe it is important that we know something about the circumstances of the problem which I am discussing. The question that I started with was the question of self-determination. Here we have a situation where almost forty million people, with a national tradition, a culture and a language of their own, are today part of what is known as the Soviet union. Although the regime at Moscow on paper claims to have given the Ukraine a certain amount of autonomy and has even gone to the extent of having a representative at the United Nations, yet I think no one is kidded by those gestures. Any person knowing anything at all about the situation knows that under those circumstances the Ukraine cannot call itself a nation in its own right. No nation which does not have control of its own foreign policy, and control over its own armed forces, can say that it is a sovereign nation. So we have that problem before us. We have this nation of forty million people who are under the domination of a foreign power. We know—history teaches us this, if nothing else—that those people are waiting and hoping for an opportunity to have their independence again.

May I also point out that in 1918 when the Ukrainian Central Council managed to set up an independent Ukraine, they tried to have it recognized by the peace conference. When they appeared at that peace conference they were greatly disappointed to find that the powers-that-be of that time were not prepared to recognize them. The question that is now before us is this: In what way can we be of assistance to these people to regain their independence?

Here I should like to refer again to some of the statements made by the various leaders in this country. First of all, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), speaking in July of 1953 to the fourth all-Canada congress of the Ukrainian-Canadian committee in Winnipeg, referred to this question of Ukraine independence and pointed out that although he was sympathetic to that objective he did not believe anyone would expect Canada to enter upon a war of liberation in order to accomplish it. May I say that what I am saying about the Ukraine of course applies to other countries in the same position. The Prime Minister used the following words:

> A policy of liberation that would lead to a general atomic war could do no good to anybody.

In his address the other day the Leader of the Opposition also made reference to these various countries. I quote from his speech as recorded at page 3382 of Hansard, where he used the following words:

> What of those people now behind the iron curtain to whom I have already referred; the people of Poland, the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Roumania, Bulgaria, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, China and all the nations now enslaved? Have we forgotten them? No, there is no suggestion of armed forces moving into those areas to impose the will of the free nations. There could be none.

I have nothing to indicate the official position of the Social Credit group on that point, but so far as the government and the official opposition are concerned it appears to me that neither party is prepared to advocate anything like a war of liberation to win independence for these countries behind the iron curtain. That is quite understandable when one remembers some of the speeches in the debate in this house, in the British House of Commons and at Washington. When we know what could be involved in a third world war then we know that it could mean the loss of freedom even to those who now have it in an effort to gain independence for others. A third world war with the type of weapons now in existence is unthinkable.

Therefore we have to strive to find other methods, methods perhaps not as dramatic or heroic, perhaps not as quick of attainment, but methods nevertheless by which we can show that as a nation we do believe in the principles enunciated in the Atlantic charter, in the principle of self-determination adopted by the human rights commission, and that we do believe as a basic principle that all the people of this earth have a right to live as masters of their own lives.

That is why I hope that at every opportunity which presents itself this government —perhaps I should say this nation because governments change from time to time—will be ready to do everything within its diplomatic power to help countries such as the Ukraine and others to regain their independence and become sovereign nations in their own right. Opportunities will arise. I am sometimes laughed at by people who say that the age of revolution is over. Maybe I am just one of those idealists but I am one who believes that the revolution that started in Russia in 1905 is not yet over. I do believe there is enough of the spirit of freedom and desire to be free amongst the people within the borders of the Soviet union today that many of us will live to see the day when they will burst their prisons from the inside.

Perhaps in the long run that is the only way in which people can become liberated. We have seen some pretty tragic results from so-called wars of liberation in the past. I believe that the time will come when the people of the Ukraine and other nations now enslaved by the Soviet union will strike a blow for freedom. That may not be as fantastic as it sounds. With the type of weapons of war existing today it might be the only practical way in the long run by which to bring about a major change in the boundaries of those countries. Whatever the method may be by which these nations to which I have referred may find themselves in a position to take their place amongst other democratic and freedom-loving nations of the world, I hope that Canada will be aligned on the side of freedom. I hope that Canada will do everything possible from now on to bring some hope to these people and to let them know that we are with them. Much can be done in that respect.

I have mentioned one method. The international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is another. There is a Ukrainian section which broadcasts in the Ukrainian language. I hope the minister will take the time to look into that particular section and the international service of the C.B.C. generally in order to satisfy himself that we are doing everything possible to provide hope and information for these people who are not able to communicate with us. Without going into details, I may say to the minister that from what I have seen I am not particularly satisfied that we are doing everything we can. I believe some very important improvements can be made in that particular method of communication with our friends in other countries.

I also believe that a great deal can be done by letting it be known—this does not have to be a cloak and dagger affair—to all the peoples of the world that wherever people are striving for their national independence, wherever they want to establish their freedom as nations, wherever they want to set up a democratic way of life which is being denied to them by their masters, we are on their side.

I should like to refer hon. members to an article which appeared in the March issue of Reader's Digest. It is entitled, "Our Secret Allies" and is written by Eugene Lyons. Time will not permit me to refer to it at great length but I should like to quote one or two paragraphs to indicate what line it takes. It reads:

> Must the collapse of Bolshevism be preceded by a terrifying global war? Yes—unless we head it off in the only way it can be headed off, which is by winning the cold war. The indispensable first step toward that victory is a decision to win; the second is to make that decision known to all mankind, communicating it clearly, especially to the people of the Soviet empire.

The theme of the article is that perhaps the greatest and most powerful allies we have in a non-military sense are the people within these enslaved nations who are willing to risk their lives if necessary. Many people have risked and lost their lives for freedom in the past, and there are thousands who are willing to do so today but who do not want to throw themselves away even for a good cause unless they feel that there is some hope, that there are other people in the world who are with them at least morally. In other words, the people in these enslaved nations are our hope for avoiding a third world war. If they can do internally what would be done externally by means of war, if they can break down the prison walls which are holding them today, they will be perhaps the greatest single instrument in avoiding a global conflict. I hope we will make the fullest possible use of the allies we have in those countries.

I do not wish to pursue this subject much further. I hope that wherever it is possible the Secretary of State for External Affairs will use his diplomatic influence and that the government will use its diplomatic power to see to it that every encouragement is given to the people of the Ukraine in their fight for independence.

I do that knowing quite well that is not something which can be done easily, which can be done overnight or upon which we can expect the government of Canada to give us a firm pledge because there is a great deal involved in these matters. I do not want to leave the impression I am trying to force the government's hand or anything of that sort. I believe it is not too early for us, as a nation, to be prepared to be on the side of the freedom-loving people of a nation with a great tradition, and a great history whenever that opportunity presents itself again.

Let us not forget that the diplomatic blunder of 1918 in refusing to recognize the Ukraine as a nation is one for which we all, to some degree, have had to pay. Let us hope when the time comes again when we can have a friend in the heart of Europe instead of a potential enemy, we as a nation will take advantage of that opportunity.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): During the course of this debate, Mr. Speaker, members from different sections of this house have expressed both concern and disappointment over the recent failure of the Berlin conference, as well as the failure of the western world to come to some definite understanding with the rulers at the Kremlin. There is natural concern over the dangers and the possibilities of another world war, and especially the use and the consequence of atomic warfare. This concern, of course, is being shared by the people of Canada.

Even though nearly half of our total annual budget has recently been appropriated to national defence, and even though this is a great financial burden on the people of Canada, the people have accepted it because of our ardent desire for peace. Our participation in the Korean war, the presence of our troops today in Europe, our efforts at collective security are all for the purpose of deterring aggression and making it clear to the would-be aggressor that it would be very risky for him to start another war.

Of course we have learned the hard way, through history, that one-sided disarmament is certainly a definite invitation to aggression. Although Canada, together with other countries of the free world collectively, is spending huge sums of money on armaments for defence purposes in order to preserve peace, let me remind this house that today the Kremlin apparently has control of nearly one-third of the territory of the world and over eight hundred million of its population. Let me remind this house that the Kremlin has not only huge resources in manpower but has other resources as well for conducting a war. It holds strategic geographic positions in both Europe and Asia, and of course can rely on the help of fifth columnists in the countries of the western world.

As I say, we must be realistic and recognize these facts. The question therefore arises, has the free world and has Canada, in assessing the strength of Russian imperialism and world communism, also carefully assessed all its weaknesses? Shall it be the defence policy of the free world that, through alliances, collective agreements, we shall endeavour to match the Kremlin man for man and gun for gun in the event of a crisis? We certainly cannot match them man for man and I wonder just how far we can go in matching them gun for gun?

We do know that today the Kremlin has the ability to conduct atomic warfare. In the event of a crisis there are naturally certain advantages that are in our favour, but we must be compelled to recognize we have many disadvantages as well. It is for that reason we should explore every avenue open to us and be prepared to exploit any situation which may arise in our favour, especially in the event of a showdown.

As a result of what I have just said, I should like to make some suggestions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). The free world has gone to great pains to seek collective security, especially through the NATO plan. This, of course, is on this side of the iron curtain. How far have we gone in endeavouring to seek allies behind the iron curtain? Let me hasten at once to say that I do not want to be misunderstood. Of course, the free world is hardly in a position to enter into any understanding with the governments behind the iron curtain, such as the satellite countries or other peoples within the U.S.S.R.

What I want to stress is this. It is surprising that many of our leading international observers in the western world seem to be under the impression and to create the impression that the U.S.S.R. is a monolithic Russia and that the U.S.S.R. is made up solely of Russians who speak the same language, have the same traditions, the same culture, the same aspirations and the same history. There are others who, recognizing that there are other peoples within the U.S.S.R., are under the impression or create the impression that these peoples are happy to be joined in union with the Russians; that they have been happy formerly under the czars and they are now happy under red government domination. Nothing could be further from the truth, and history persistently points out to us that is not the case. This is exactly what the Kremlin wants the western world to believe.

I am not going into any extensive argument at this time on this question. I should like to draw the attention of the minister to certain vital facts about the U.S.S.R. The U.S.S.R. is an empire made up of many captive nations. There is only one Russian nation within the U.S.S.R. but there are fifteen distinct non-Russian nations within the country who have throughout the centuries sought their independence from Moscow domination. One of them, the largest non-Russian nation within the U.S.S.R., occupies a territory larger than that of France and has a population of nearly 50 million people. It is important also to note that the majority of the people in the U.S.S.R. are non-Russians. These non-Russian peoples cannot be regarded merely as ethnic groups within the U.S.S.R. in the same sense as the ethnic groups of Canada or the United States, who are proud to be known as Canadians or Americans and who are striving for a common cause.

[Mr. Decore.]

These captive nations have their own separate languages, traditions, culture and for centuries have struggled for liberation from the yoke of Moscow tyranny, whether it be under the czars or under the red government. Nor are these nations bound together by such common ties of affection and unity of purpose as we are within the British commonwealth of nations. On the contrary, these nations are being bound together by terror of the secret police, by concentration camps, by mass exilings and by liquidations directed from Moscow.

And so I say that we must be realistic and recognize these facts. And our foreign policy, I think, should be so directed. We should recognize who are the natural enemies of the Kremlin, and see if they are not the natural allies of the free world. It appears to me that the free world or the western world in many cases has failed to understand these dynamic forces of nationalism and self-determination which springs from the masses of the people, and which forces could be very instrumental in the overthrow of world communism and Russian imperialism.

Let me point this out, that although the Soviet government is basically the bitter foe of movements of national liberation, yet it is a fact that that government studies these movements with exceptional depth and uses them against the western world. The Kremlin uses arguments of national interest of peoples of Asia and Africa, and uses them politically and cleverly against us.

It is my submission that the subjugated nations within the U.S.S.R. together with the satellite states are the Achilles heel of Russian imperialism and world communism. I am not suggesting for one moment that we are now in a position to foment uprisings and revolutions of these subjugated captive nations within the U.S.S.R., and the satellite states. What I am suggesting is that, first of all, we should make a very careful study of all these peoples to whom I have referred —their way of thinking, their culture, their differences with the Russians, their aspirations, their desires—and above all, we should know their history, especially their history of movements of liberation.

Furthermore, let us not depend upon the Russians as a source of information concerning the history of these peoples, because it is a fact that the Russians have been and are today the greatest masters of the falsification of history, and especially the falsification of the history of these subjugated peoples. They have succeeded so well that many people in the free world seem to be under the impression that the U.S.S.R. is in fact a monolithic state. I say, let us endeavour to show these people now that we have at least some interest, that we are interested in what they are doing and in what they are thinking.

On February 2, 1953, in his speech before the United States congress President Eisenhower made this statement:

> Our policy, dedicated to making the free world secure, will envision all peaceful methods and devices, except breaking faith with our friends. We shall never acquiesce in the enslavement of any people in order to purchase fancied gain for ourselves. I shall ask the congress at a later date to join in an appropriate resolution making clear that this government recognizes no kind of commitment, contained in secret understandings of the past with foreign governments, which permit this kind of enslavement.

Almost at the same time the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, made this statement and gave this hope to the peoples enslaved by red Moscow, when he said, "The enslaved peoples should count on us".

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am not too clear as to the interpretation of these words, and especially their application in connection with present American policy. However Canada is playing an important role in international affairs. I believe we should take some initiative; and I would like to make this suggestion to the minister—in fact, I would urge that the minister give this matter careful consideration—that is, that a separate section be set up in the Department of External Affairs for the purpose of giving careful study to these different movements of the captive nations behind the iron curtain, and especially within the U.S.S.R.

This is important to us in the event of a crisis. Let us not make the same stupid mistake that was made by Hitler. There are many books being written today, and many have been written in the last few years containing statements by German generals and German leaders who say that Hitler did not lose the war with Soviet Russia at Stalingrad, but that he lost it near Kiev. When the Germans marched in, at one time over 600,000 soldiers laid down their arms and surrendered. The people in that area welcomed the Germans with bread and salt; they looked upon the Germans as their liberators.

But Hitler did not realize the significance of that. He started treating these people in the same brutal fashion in which he was treating the Jews, with the result that they turned against him. As I say, let us not be in that position; let us not make the same blunder. I know there is a school of thought with a strong following which says that if we favour this policy, if we show any interest in the nations within the U.S.S.R., we would be antagonizing the Russian people. Well, it is my submission that the Russian people as such are not interested in Russian imperialism —except for the upper strata—whether it be in the red or white ranks.

Let me say that the Kremlin, by exploiting the national aspirations of peoples, in Asia as well as in Africa, has caused the countries in the western world a great deal of embarrassment and difficulty. So why not turn the tables on them? I repeat: Let us recognize the natural enemies of Russian imperialism, and ascertain if they are not the natural allies of the free world.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is not the most agreeable occupation in the world to enter a debate that is reaching the close of its fourth day. Actually I was strongly encouraged only at the dinner recess by one of my colleagues with a great gift for clear and vivid expression not to speak at all. He said, "There has been too much talk on this already." I might have accepted his view were it not for the fact that I wished to say a few words for exactly the same reason set out by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who, in opening his speech the other day, said:

> I must confess to not a little surprise and considerable regret that the Prime Minister . . . said not one word about the vital and beneficent role that the Commonwealth is playing in the struggle for world peace today.

It is on that, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to detain the house for a very short time.

In spite of ourselves this debate has centred—I should not say "in spite of ourselves"; it is perhaps natural—largely around the two great monolithic centres of power. I am not overlooking what the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) said about the cracks in the power of the U.S.S.R., but the debate has centred around these two centres of power, these two great land masses. And I suppose we must face the fact that if it were not for the breadth of view which the United States has taken in these latter years we might easily have had a situation where these two great land masses retired on themselves, and we might have two regional states with all the dangers and temptation to rivalry and struggle that is involved in that.

Imagine, for example, if you can, the United States, without the expansive view that it has taken, as a great centre of capitalistic power centred in Washington, and on the other hand a great centre of state socialistic power based on Moscow.

Now, we know the United States; we know that they hate war; we know that they, like ourselves, wish to live and let live. They hate war just as we do; and although they have resorted to conscription, it is merely because of their great sense of danger and their great sense of world responsibility. The U.S.S.R. remains to us morally and intellectually an enigma. They use words in what seems to us a topsy-turvy fashion. I remember that friend of everyone who was in the house with him and whom we so sadly lost last autumn, Gordon Graydon, saying two things about the Russians that did more than anything else I have ever heard to make me understand in some vague way not what they were like perhaps but how different they were from us.

He said this to me: "We hardly realize how ingrained in our very fibre is the feeling that whatever the majority wants must happen; whatever kind of a gathering we are at, whatever is the subject of discussion, you get to the stage where this question is asked: What does the majority want?" Then he said to me a thing that I had never thought of before: "That is absolutely foreign to the Russian mind. There is nothing in them which responds to that." Then he added this curious irony. "They say we must proceed by unanimity, by agreement." Well, of course, the kind of agreement is a very strange one to us, but nevertheless, that is what Gordon Graydon said, and I think perhaps more than any of us—I'm sure the minister would not disagree with this—Gordon had the gift of getting on with everyone, even with the Russians.

He said another thing to me which was full of significance, and which gave me a glimpse of their mind. Perhaps more than anything else it gave me a glimpse of their utter incapacity for the great discovery which we have made, the greatest of all I think in our democracy, and that is tolerance. He told me that he had made friends with one of the Russians, and he said to this Russian after he had made a speech: "That was a good speech you made". And the answer was "Gordon—" everyone called him by his first name, and Gordon called everybody else by their first names; I have no doubt that if he had met the king he would have been calling him by his first name soon —"Gordon, you cannot be sincere when you say that was a good speech, because you did not agree with it."

Now, that, Mr. Speaker, seemed to me to give a glimpse, perhaps clearer than I had ever had before, of this strange mentality that cannot believe that you can disagree with a person and still respect him, and, what is more important still, work with him. This chamber in which we sit is an evidence of the greatest of all discoveries, I suppose, made by democracies, and that is that it is possible to be tolerant, it is possible to disagree and yet to work together; it is possible, as Churchill said, to believe that the things which divide us—and sometimes they seem pretty great—are less than the things which unite us.

Now, in this strange situation we find ourselves, with these two great centres of power, we go on with an uneasy modus vivendi, and we are looking constantly for some way of living together, if not happily at least peaceably. Sometimes we seem to be making a little progress, and sometimes we are not so sure, and if there were nothing but these two great forces in the world I confess that my hopes would not be very high and the situation would seem to be bleak indeed.

And it is in that atmosphere that we are when we are thinking purely of these two great centres of power. How could it be otherwise? We are always talking about war; we cannot help it. We are driven into it. We are talking about preparation and counter-preparation. Therefore it is hard for us in this atmosphere to look beyond; it is hard to have any other thoughts in our minds, and for that reason it seems to me that we ought to be as thankful as we can be and more thankful than we often are that there is the commonwealth; that there is this third centre of power in the world. It is not negligible, but we are apt sometimes to forget about it or to seem to forget about it.

Let us take a look at it, and at the importance of it. First of all, in the United Kingdom you have a power, not so great as it used to be, but with long experience, great knowledge and immense patience. You have in the dominions new and increasing centres of power, and though we sometimes overlook it, the commonwealth has in the last few years played a very important part. If we go back to the two wars, what was our part in it? Without flattering ourselves we can remember, as somebody put it, that we were 1914 and 1939 men and not 1917 and 1941 men. In other words, we gave the lead to this continent at a time when a lead was very important.

Now, let us take a look at this commonwealth with its world-wide interests—an association of nations belonging to every part of the globe, containing in it hundreds of millions of Asians, who are in it of their own free will, who remained in it when the time came that they were free to go where they wished. They remained inside the commonwealth and they have in this recent struggle played a part. If we are fair-minded we must concede that India played a part first of all in the negotiations which led to the armistice, and after all an armistice is better than fighting, and also played a part, I think a significant part, in the dealings with the prisoners of war. We remember how the prisoners of war used to be front-page news almost every morning. There is one menace which apparently has been put to sleep for the moment at any rate.

The commonwealth cuts across regionalisms. Like the C.P.R., it spans the world and helps to break down isolation. You might also say it is neither American, European, Asiatic nor African but world-wide. Its members are set in different continents but they belong outside, too. Australia is not merely a part of the southeast Asiatic region; it is a part of the commonwealth. South Africa is not merely a part of Africa; it is a part of the commonwealth. Canada is not merely an important part of the North American continent; it is a part of the commonwealth. Here I should like to read from one whose words were always listened to with interest, describing briefly the role of our own country, its purposes and its possibilities. I quote briefly from Churchill speaking of Canada's place in the world:

> The long unguarded frontier, the habits and intercourse of daily life, the fruitful and profitable connections of business, the sympathies and even the antipathies of honest neighbourliness, make Canada a binder-together of the English-speaking peoples. She is a magnet exercising a double attraction, drawing both Great Britain and the United States towards herself and thus drawing them closer to each other.
>
> She is the only surviving bond which stretches from Europe across the Atlantic ocean. In fact, no state, no country, no band of men can more truly be described as the linchpin of peace and world progress.

Then I come in this list to the United Kingdom, that much-enduring people good at need; often annoying, if you will, but who improve on acquaintance, always good in a pinch, and who have stood for freedom when no one else would do it except the other members in the commonwealth, and at a time when it was vital it should be done.

The commonwealth cannot be isolationist. Geography forbids; it is spread all over the world and its interests tend to world order. At the same time there is a tendency to the decentralization of power and toward local autonomy.

I want to say a word as to the vast importance of the Asian members of the commonwealth. It may well be that the hundreds of millions of Asians within the commonwealth may still bring us a rich harvest of good will, which we can hardly anticipate as yet, for they have contacts with the rest of the Asian world. I have already mentioned the useful part which India has been playing in world affairs and I want to say again that every member of the commonwealth is a member of their own free will—they can take down their hats and leave any time they wish. I have also pointed out that it helps to mitigate regionalism. Power split three ways is infinitely safer than power split two ways.

Now I wish to say a word as to a division of the world into two blocs and what that would mean to Canada if it were ever consummated. Just as Belgium used to be the cockpit of Europe we stand between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. and we could easily become the cockpit in the centre of a conflict. Without the commonwealth connection there would be little alternative but to become part of the hemispheric empire of the United States. But the commonwealth has always been friendly to the United States and indeed during two world wars helped to pull the United States out of continental isolation.

There was a time when there was a feeling throughout the commonwealth that parts of that commonwealth, other than the United Kingdom, suffered from some inferiority of status, that there was a touch of colonialism. However, Mr. Speaker, I know that we are all aware, and, every one of us, fully convinced, that that status is long behind us, and at the present time we are as free as the air, and free to do what we will. The commonwealth constitutes an example of world order on a small scale because, as I said, it covers the world. It has always stood for freedom and toleration and it has saved the world from what might have been world tyranny in both great wars.

That being so I found some disappointment in the words used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). These words have already been quoted but I should like to quote briefly again as reported at page 2394 of Hansard. During a statement made at Rollins College, Florida, the minister said:

> So we range ourselves on the side of freedom, under the leadership of the United States of America, and we will play, I hope, a good part in the long and unending fight for peace and a decent world.

I regret that at that time the minister should have thought it necessary to confine his remarks to the United States. We are, of course, ready to accept leadership from the United States, but I regret that he left it open to the interpretation that we do not regard the commonwealth as one of the great leaders with whom we are associated and whose example we should follow.

My own feeling, Mr. Speaker, is that we should be proud of our North American partnership; we should be proud of our commonwealth partnership, and we should be thankful that Providence has placed us in the position where we can play a great part in both.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) I do not wish to offer any apologies for lengthening the time for this debate. I am sure if my people back home wanted me to rise in this house and speak on any debate it would be on this one. I do not believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is overly anxious to end the debate. I have full confidence that he wants to have placed before him in as full a measure as possible what goes on in the minds of the Canadian people.

However, having said that in regard to the hon. member for Greenwood, I wish to underline everything else he has said. I was very pleased to see the Conservative party, through that hon. member, make some attempt to amend what I believe has been some of the harm they have done during the past few days.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I notice some inference drawn from speeches made by hon. members in this section of the house and the term "fellow travellers" was used in regard to these members. I would like to place on record that these things the Canadian people have been reading about in the newspapers about the evils of communism have been known to some of us for many, many years before our newspapers published what they considered to be news.

I have personally lived side by side with refugees from communism since the year 1923. In fact, our home was the home of a considerable number of refugees over quite a number of years and I regret to have to admit that the stories told by refugees in 1923, 1927 and 1947 are all the same. It is one and the same song of persecution beyond the point of endurance. I hope no one will ever attempt to label me a "fellow traveller". However, I also learned from many hundreds of refugees I got to know that Russia today has no more and no less of Christianity than she had before the revolution of 1917. I believe most hon. members in this house will agree with that.

The common, ordinary peasant of Russia today has to live under the most terrible conditions in exactly the same way as he had to live before that revolution. When we think of the Soviet union I do not believe we can lay all the blame for the conditions under which these people unfortunately have to live under the system of government they now have. There have been a lot of other forces at work. For confirmation of that other than from refugees one has only to read a few of the books of the great Russian writer Tolstoy. We realize that people there have lived under these horrible conditions for a long, long time.

I will admit that what our newspapers say about the slave labour camps in the rugged north of Siberia is only too true. However, slave labour camps were not invented by the communists. They were merely extended by them for they were favourite resorts to which these czarist rulers used to send their undesirables.

Another thing that does not fool me is the eternal attempt on the part of the communists to form a united front. I maintain that the great tragedy of Spain would possibly never have happened if a lot of the liberal-minded people had not been taken in by the communist offer of forming a united front. Whenever communists have formed a united front with liberals and with progressives, they have deceived and have managed to upset the arrangements. They have not kept faith. The same could be said of Czechoslovakia and their rape of that country. The condition maybe was unavoidable there. At this time I should like to endorse the statement that our Secretary of State for External Affairs made on Sunday last in referring to what happened in Czechoslovakia. The same story applies to the history of the Baltic states. I regret to say that the same story may some day apply to some of the states of India and to a great nation such as Italy. There is no such thing as forming a united front with any dictatorial political organization, be it of the right or of the left.

Where have we failed the cause of democracy? I think one of our earliest failures of the cause of democracy was when we let down the Weimar republic of Germany. That let-down was responsible indirectly for the rise of communism and nazism in Germany so that by 1933 there was nothing left for the German people but to choose what they thought to be the lesser of two evils. Another let-down in more recent years of the cause of democracy—and I am not too sure just what our share of the blame is—has been the actions in British Guiana. Surely a nation in South America that has been under British rule for as long as has British Guiana should not have found that the only alternative to the state of things as they existed there was a government that the government of Great Britain had to oust. Somewhere along the line we failed there.

I feel that we also failed as a western civilization in the countries of South America. I think it is a reflection on all of us in the western world that there are as many nations as there are now in South America under the armed heel of dictatorship. I think we have failed in Africa somewhere, in East Africa as well as in South Africa. Even today we still find in democracies a good measure of support for the cause of colonialism. When we think of Indo-China, let us ask ourselves why France is at war there. Is it because she wants to act as a bulwark against the advance of communism, or did the Indo-Chinese war originate because the people of France wanted to defend their interests there?

The statement has been made that Asia is the most important part of the world today. To that statement I should like to add that, from my observation, Asia today is the last hope for the white race. I feel that our history in Asia has been a most deplorable one. We have sent the missionary, and right beside the missionary went the exploiter. Yet we are greatly amazed when we find how little effect our missionaries have had in Asia over the years. We stand condemned in the eyes of the Asiatic world. I think there is a good deal of reason why they should condemn the white race. We are not only condemned in Asia but we are condemned in Africa and in South America. Just the other day I noticed a report on Canadian hospitals, and I noted there the great discrepancy between the type of hospitalization enjoyed by the white people in Canada and the hospitalization enjoyed by the Indians, the natives of Canada. Even here at home our skirts are not completely clean.

Today we are given a unique opportunity to salvage something from the wreck, if we will but take the lead and offer the hand of friendship to the people of Asia. After all the suspicion that they have for us, with just cause, if we are able to persuade them that we mean well towards them, we may yet hold our leading role in world affairs for a goodly number of years to come.

To me the surprising thing has been why we should suddenly worry about the fate of the peoples of Asia. We have gone along merrily for centuries and the white race has never shown any particular concern for the welfare of the peoples of Asia. Not so many years ago Asia was only a means of enriching our standard of living. I submit that the United Nations is our only hope. Acting as individual nations we are subject to suspicion by those Asiatic and downtrodden peoples of the world; but possibly through an international agency such as the United Nations, we shall be able to do some good.

Much has been said of totalitarianism. I should like to give another definition of totalitarianism, Mr. Speaker. A totalitarian government is only a manifestation of the evil. When we speak of totalitarianism, may I say that totalitarianism exists in some measure in each and every one of us, in every human being. It is a part of the evil of the world. It can maybe be illustrated by this idea: I know what is right and if you do not agree with me, therefore you must be wrong. Because I am right, I have the authority to enforce my will upon yours. You must conform to my will because I am right and, if you refuse to conform, I am fully justified in using every means at my disposal to eliminate such an evil influence that does not agree with me.

That idea finds expression in many ways, and one way is in form of government. If we were to abolish the government of the Soviet union today, very likely another similar evil form of government would take its place. I think the results of the first and second world wars should by now have convinced us of that. We thought we had rid the world of dictatorships but I do not think I am wrong when I say that in the world today there are possibly more dictatorships than there were back in 1939; and we recognize some of them as being equally vicious.

To my mind, it all comes back to a basic principle that we somehow will not adopt. The theory of authoritarianism at one time in man's history may have been useful. However, it was condemned for us, in the western world, as far back as 2,000 years ago. Yet we still seem to want to cling to it. Even in this house I notice that someone is advocating that our Criminal Code should be based on the Mosaic laws. I thought that was a very backward statement to make. Surely we had greater laws given to us 2,000 years ago, laws greater than the Mosaic laws which were meant to govern the affairs of men of an altogether different age, at a different stage of development and under different circumstances. How can we fight this evil of totalitarianism in the world? I maintain that we certainly will not fight it by such means as the rearmament of West Germany. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) whether the western world has ever proposed to the Soviet union that we will see to it that West Germany is not rearmed if they will see to it that East Germany is not rearmed. At the recent Berlin conference we offered a deal with respect to Germany. We wanted free elections in Germany and maybe we did not say it but what we meant by free elections was that a government freely elected would then be loyal to the cause of the west.

It is readily understandable why the Soviet bloc turned down that offer. I think we could very well make all Germany a buffer state that would forever be prohibited from having armaments of its own. We might follow that up by using our imagination for a change and saying to the Soviet bloc: If you people will agree to give sovereign power over the Ukraine to the United Nations we Canadians will also give our sovereign power to the United Nations.

Mention has been made of the agencies of the United Nations and how we are willing to support them. Many laudatory words have been spoken about the United Nations. I was especially happy with the speech made by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton). I think he made one of the greatest contributions to this debate. What is our contribution to the United Nations and its agencies? We treat it as a multimillionaire attending church service treats the collection plate when he hauls out a nickel and lets it make a big noise when it falls. As a nation we are not sacrificing at all for the cause of world peace through the agencies of the United Nations. The amount of $25 million under the Colombo plan is not a sacrifice for the Canadian people, and I think all of us here who know something of the size of our national income must admit that.

At home I think we must set our own house in order. I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he says that we must have a rededication to the faith that is in us. We must believe in the intrinsic basic sanctity of the individual. We must believe that no man has a fundamental right to be ruler over another man. That is the basis of Christianity. That is the basis of democracy. Then we must go on from political democracy to economic democracy because the other two are to a certain extent meaningless without making provision for the whole.

In view of the recent explosions of the H-bomb in the Pacific I think the time may not be too far removed when the Canadian nation and the Canadian government may turn back the pages of Hansard and look again at the philosophy put forward in this house by the first national leader of the C.C.F. party, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth. I think Canadians as a whole are beginning to realize that there is no solution through the use of armed force that will be of any use. It is admitted that a third world war will wipe out our civilization as we now know it. That fact has not yet sunk home, but I think when we really realize the significance of it we will turn back the pages and look up what J. S. Woodsworth had to say.

A lot of statements have been made which I will not call wild because they were sincerely meant. I know that every member of the house is sincere in everything that he says, but the philosophy of some of these statements seems to be that we have to be prepared to die for the things that are so dear to us. I should like to ask the house: Are we willing to die for a God who needs an H-bomb to defend Him? Are we willing to die for a political or economic system? Are these things worth blowing up the world for?

I should like to again express my pleasure at the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and I should like to add that not only the peoples of the British commonwealth but all over western Europe and Asia hundreds of millions of people will have nothing to gain by a third world war that some of our friends to the left seem to think is necessary. The people of Europe, of Great Britain and the rest of the commonwealth and of southern Asia do not want war. They are looking today for leadership to avoid war. I have said it before and I say again that these peoples say from the bottom of their hearts to the United States, which has an economic system that it seems willing to blow up the world to defend, and to the Soviet union, which has a vicious political system that it seems prepared to defend no matter what the cost: A plague on both your houses, we will have peace and prosperity.

I am fully convinced after listening to what has been said in the house that the Liberal government knows what is the right course to follow. I only hope they will have the courage of their convictions to act accordingly. Let us make the United Nations an instrument that will preserve the peace of the world. Give to the United Nations the military tools necessary but let us not sabotage it before it has begun to be effective in the world.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would feel remiss in my duty were I to let the current debate on external affairs come to an end without making my humble contribution and dealing particularly with two questions I deem especially important, the American nations organization, more often called the Pan-American Union, and our representation abroad.

May I be permitted first to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the manner in which he performed his task during his recent trip around the world. We can expect that from now on the voice of Canada will be particularly heeded in the international sphere; this will give more importance to our country which, moreover, seems called upon to bridge the gap between nations of greater importance which are proportionately farther apart on account of various ideological, racial, economical and historical factors. Thus is verified in the international field the truth of the popular maxim: "We often require the help of one smaller than ourselves." I see in that fact a wonderful opportunity for Canada to win the friendship of a number of nations in such a way as to get help in various fields, since isolationism is out of place in the present world.

Caracas, in Venezuela, was recently the site of an important Pan-American conference, but unfortunately Canada as usual was conspicuous by its absence. Our country has repeatedly been invited to send representatives to the Pan-American Union which includes every American country but ours. Canada sent observers to some of the conferences held by this organization, which at least augured well for the future. But, at this last conference, Canada was completely conspicuous by its absence, which is to be regretted, for, as an American country, Canada should first of all, in my opinion, study the problems facing the continent to which it belongs. Peace, good will and the struggle against communism, all matters which concern us and to which we devote our efforts and sacrifices, should in my opinion be of primary interest to us in relation to the continent where we live and of which our country is a part, whether we like it or not.

As far as I know, only one Canadian attended the Pan-American conference in an unofficial capacity; without an official mandate he could not speak for Canada, although, at Caracas, our voice would have been listened to even more than that of our immediate neighbour, for the good reason that no friction ever arose between our country and any of the Latin American countries.

On the occasion of the Caracas conference, the countries of America, anxious to share in the betterment of their own populations, decided to create an institute for inter-American economic co-operation, and asked three universities—two of which are Canadian, namely Laval University of Quebec, and St. Francis Xavier University of Antigonish—to send delegates among whom would be chosen the director of this institute. They have thus recognized the magnificent achievements of the co-operative movement in Canada, as well as the important place we have acquired in the eyes of our continental neighbours, and have shown by the same token the services which our country could render its neighbours by taking an active part in the Pan-American Union.

Last year, a group of Canadian businessmen, headed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), visited certain South American countries on a commercial and economic mission. Our country needs new markets and it would seem that we have interest in making bids for the markets of several countries at the same time. The Canadian mission did not fail to see the numerous possibilities for trade with these various countries with which we do not have enough relations.

By becoming a member of the Pan-American Union, I am confident that Canada, while making an act of faith in pan-Americanism, would consolidate and improve her foreign trade. I would also see in such a move a means of helping countries that seek our friendship, which would also benefit Canada herself. Moreover, all those Latin American countries have a culture similar to that of the French-speaking element of Canada. Since French culture has been and continues to be an asset to our country, I do not see why it could not be permitted to make its influence felt more fully abroad, which would tend to enhance still more the prestige of our bilingual and bi-racial nation.

If Canada deems it advisable to subscribe to the United Nations, to the Atlantic treaty and to many other international organizations whose aim is to maintain peace in the world, which is also Canada's concern; if, on the other hand, Canada thinks it advisable to have ambassadors in most American countries, then, I fail to see why our country would stand aloof any longer from the Pan-American Union, in which we are immediately interested and in which Canada, being both an important country and an American country, could play a very important part. As far as I am concerned, I will be doubly proud the day Canada joins the Pan-American Union, because we will then have paid more attention to problems in which we are interested from every point of view, to the problems of a continent of which our country is a part.

Coming now to the second part of my remarks, it seems strange to me that Canada has no diplomatic relations with the Vatican state, where all important countries feel that they need a spokesman, because the Vatican has long been a crossroads of international influences, because of the international influence of its head, whose authority is both civil and religious.

The great objection made to this representation generally originates with people who are unable to distinguish between the civil and religious aspects of a state which nevertheless has great influence and has done its share in the work for peace throughout the world.

A large number of countries, among which are some of the most influential and least Catholic of all, such as the United Kingdom, Japan and Turkey, maintain diplomatic representatives at the Vatican. I have not heard it said that this has been prejudicial to them or contrary to their interests since they have made no move to withdraw them.

For instance when a British ambassador presents his credentials to the chief of state of the Vatican, these letters are issued under the Great Seal of Her Majesty the Queen of England, head of the Established Church of England, but also sovereign of a temporal state called the United Kingdom, to His Majesty the King of the Vatican state, head of the Catholic Church as well as of a temporal state called the Vatican. I do not think that such an exchange of diplomatic representatives between two sovereigns, who are at one and the same time temporal and spiritual rulers, has led to any worsening of the relations between themselves or their respective states since, on both sides, this representation has been quite voluntarily maintained.

Therefore, I hope that the day will come when all Canadians, regardless of their religious convictions, will consider this matter objectively, so that our country may exchange diplomatic representatives with the Vatican. And I am sure that no Canadian of the Catholic faith would even be opposed to the nomination of a representative of another religious faith, since it will be a case of naming a representative to a temporal state as such and not to a religious leader.

I am one of those who believe that cultural differences have nothing to do with Canada's participation in the organization of American states, no more than religious antagonisms, in the matter of naming an ambassador to the Vatican. So I believe that Canada, by filling these two gaps, would make a great step forward in the international field.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member for Roberval adjourn the debate, or has he finished his speech?

Mr. Villeneuve: I have finished my speech, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Winch the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall continue this debate and when it is completed take the Criminal Code, with this reservation, that there will be a slight alteration in the sequence in which we take the remaining items so that the sections dealing with treason will be reached last rather than second last.

Mr. Knowles: Will the second last, then, be the sections having to do with mischief and sabotage?

Mr. Harris: I understood those were the last sections, and that they are just reversed.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 31, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HISTORIC SITES

ESTABLISHMENT OF "WOODSIDE" AS NATIONAL PARK

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have a short announcement to make regarding Woodside, the boyhood home of the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

The Woodside property includes the old residence and about eleven acres of wooded land in Kitchener, Ontario. Plans to restore the site were made by a group of interested citizens in 1942. It was not until 1950, however, that it was possible to bring these plans to fruition. In that year the Mackenzie King Woodside trust was established as a non-profit, non-political corporation with the purpose of restoring Woodside. Contributions were received by the trust from Canadians in many walks of life, and the trust has since carried out the physical restoration of the site at a cost of some $90,000.

Shortly after the work was started the directors of the trust approached the federal government with the suggestion that when restoration was completed Woodside be made a national historic park. This proposal was referred to the historic sites and monuments board of Canada. The board, after investigation, declared Woodside to be a site of national historic importance and recommended that it be taken over and maintained as a national historic park. The recommendation of the board was made in May, 1952. The restoration having been completed, it has now been decided to accept the offer of the trust and to take over the site as a national historic park as of April 1, 1954.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

CHINA AND EARTHENWARE—TABLING OF REPORT ON RESALE PRICE MAINTENANCE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I beg to table the report of the restrictive trade practices commission concerning alleged instances of resale price maintenance in the sale of china and earthenware.

TRADE

JAPAN—EXCHANGE OF MOST-FAVOURED-NATION TREATMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement to the house in regard to negotiations with Japan for the exchange of most-favoured-nation trade treatment. As hon. members are aware, these discussions have sought a treaty which would be mutually beneficial to both countries. An agreement on commerce between Japan and Canada was signed this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself and by the ambassador of Japan to Canada.

The Canadian government welcomes the signing today of the trade agreement with Japan which, when it is ratified and comes into force, should contribute to the prosperity and good trading relations of both countries. Japan is a great trading nation and last year was Canada's third best customer. The importance of the agreement, however, goes beyond commercial considerations, for the agreement should also contribute to stable and friendly relations between the two countries and to the peace and security and progress of the Pacific area. If the house so wishes, I shall table the agreement now and outline its principal provisions.

Under the terms of this agreement Canada and Japan will exchange unconditional most-favoured-nation trade treatment. The agreement also provides that neither country will impose or maintain restrictions or prohibitions affecting its trade with the other country unless similar measures are applied equally to all third countries. Similarly, in the allocation of foreign exchange and in the administration of foreign exchange restrictions affecting trade, each country will accord unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment.

In a supplementary exchange of notes which is appended to the agreement Canada reserves the right to establish special values for duty on any imports entering Canada in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or directly competitive products. In the event of such special values being applied, and in determining the level at which such values should be applied, Canada will take into account the prices of like or directly competitive products imported from other countries.

Under the agreement either country may temporarily impose discriminatory import and exchange restrictions, if such restrictions are required on balance of payments grounds. However, such restrictions must not discriminate between Canada and other dollar countries or other countries with convertible currencies. The government of Japan has also undertaken, subject to certain agreed exceptions, to accord Canada unconditional non-discriminatory treament in relation to any other country with respect to import and exchange controls on the following nine commodities: wheat, barley, woodpulp, flaxseed, primary copper, lead in pigs, zinc spelter, synthetic resins and milk powder.

The agreement also provides for non-discrimination in state trading practices. Both countries undertake to conform to internationally accepted fair trade practices, particularly in matters pertaining to trade marks, marks of origin and rights under patents. They also undertake to co-operate in the prevention of any practices which might prejudicially affect their mutual trade and to accord sympathetic consideration to any representations that the other country may make.

The two countries have agreed that the provisions of this agreement continue to be applicable in the event that the general agreement on tariffs and trade is applied between Canada and Japan.

As I have indicated, this agreement will enter into force on its ratification by both countries. A resolution for approval of ratification will be introduced in the house as soon as possible.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this treaty may I ask the minister when copies of the agreement will be made available to members? Is it a document of such length that it could be printed as an appendix to today's proceedings or is it one that will be printed in the ordinary treaty series? If so, could we have some assurance that the printing will be expedited so there will be printed copies available as soon as possible?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall inquire as to whether it can be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings. If not, I will see that printed copies are available as soon as possible.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister give the house any indication as to when it is proposed to submit the treaty to the house for ratification, in the light of its importance? I take it from what the minister has said that the treaty will not come into effect until ratified by parliament. Can the minister then indicate when it will be submitted to the house?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Under the British system the agreement has been ratified by signature on behalf of the government of Canada. However, approval of the house will be sought on the action that the government has taken. The ratification referred to is ratification by the Diet in Japan.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I take it from the minister's announcement that Japan agrees to buy minimum quantities of Canadian grain. If so, what are those quantities?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Any reference to minimum quantities of grain is, Mr. Speaker, apart from the treaty itself.

Mr. Argue: Will there be an exchange of notes or other steps taken in regard to minimum purchases of grain?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have already said we have assurances that are satisfactory to the Canadian government as to the future quantities of grain to be purchased by Japan.

Mr. Fleming: In view of what the minister has said as to the treaty having come into effect now, I go back to the question I asked and which he has not yet answered as to how soon it is intended to submit the treaty to the house, along with the proposed resolution to which reference was made?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I hope that the resolution can be put on Votes and Proceedings today, and as soon as the program of the house will permit I presume there will be a discussion here. That is for the house leader to determine.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, March 30, 1954

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, the 31st March, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General (Administrative)

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

AMENDMENTS CONSOLIDATING ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 393, to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This bill, Mr. Speaker, is primarily for the purpose of consolidating all the government's activities in the field of atomic energy into one organization. In that way our organization will parallel the atomic energy commission of the United States and the corporation that is responsible for atomic energy matters in the United Kingdom. There is to be some change in the relationship between the atomic energy control board and the corporations that carry out the actual operations of the board which I believe will be more easily explained when the bill is under discussion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

DREDGE "KING EDWARD"

Mr. Hahn:

1. Did the King Edward dredge do any work for the government on the Fraser river during 1953?
2. If so, is this dredge owned by the government?
3. Were supplies purchased in connection with its operations during 1953?
4. If so, (a) what type of supplies; (b) from whom were they purchased; (c) at what price?
5. Were tenders called for such supplies?
6. If this dredge is privately owned, what are the names of the owners?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4.

(a) Type of supplies	(b) From whom purchased	(c) Price
Fuel oil	Standard Oil Co.	$28,155.63
Diesel oil	See answer to No. 5	246.27
Gasoline	" " " " "	17.92
Rope	" " " " "	2,023.32
Grease	" " " " "	255.44
Lubricating oil	" " " " "	1,230.48
Galley coal ..	" " " " "	1,411.00
Galley sundries	" " " " "	722.96

5. Tenders were called for the supply of fuel oil only; other items were obtained from sources adjacent to the position of the dredge when they were required.
6. Answered by No. 2.

83276—223

Questions

MARGARINE AND BUTTER—COMPARATIVE FOOD VALUE

Mr. Poulin:

1. Is the nutrition division of the Department of National Health and Welfare in a position to give a scientific opinion establishing a comparison between the food value of margarine and butter?
2. If so, what in their opinion is the comparative food value of these products?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes, on the analyses of any given specific samples.

2. Both butter and margarine are variable products, partly due to variations in the natural products used, and partly due to the process of manufacture.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PAYMENTS

Mr. MacInnis:

1. How many persons were in receipt of unemployment insurance for the following months: (a) December, 1952; (b) December, 1953; (c) January, 1953; (d) January, 1954; (e) February, 1953; (f) February, 1954?
2. What amount of unemployment insurance benefits was paid out each month for the same periods?

Mr. Gregg: Estimated number of beneficiaries at the end of each of the following months (1) and amount of gross benefits paid in each of the following months (2):

	(1)	(2)
December, 1952 ..	164,159 ..	$10,926,557.00
December, 1953 ..	218,323 ..	16,882,107.00
January, 1953 ..	262,429 ..	18,434,646.00
January, 1954 ..	390,652 ..	25,149,945.00
February, 1953 ..	298,328 ..	20,596,120.00
February, 1954 —	Figures not yet available.

It will be noted that the number of persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits at the end of January 1954 was higher than the estimated number of people "without jobs and seeking work" from the dominion bureau of statistics' labour force survey for a number of reasons.

This latter estimate, which is based on a sample survey of the population, includes only people who did not work at all during the survey week and who were reported during the household interviews as seeking work.

The number of people receiving unemployment insurance benefits, on the other hand, includes most of these people and besides many others who were on lay-offs, due to bad weather, shortage of materials, plant breakdowns, etc., with instructions to return to work, who were working on a short-time basis or who had lost or found a job during the week.

Questions

JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE—DISPOSAL OF SURPLUSES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What decision, if any, did the joint economic committee of Canada and the United States, at its meeting in Washington, arrive at in regard to disposal of surpluses of (a) wheat; (b) other agricultural products, in each of the said countries at cut rate prices or on give-away terms to needy countries or peoples?

2. How much wheat did Canada sell to (a) Italy; (b) India, in each of the years 1946 to 1953 inclusive?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The communique tabled in this house on Friday, March 19, as recorded on pages 3146 of Hansard described in detail the discussions which took place in Washington on the 16th of March.

2.

	ITALY			INDIA
	Wheat	Flour * in wheat equiv. (bushels)	Total	Wheat	Flour * in wheat equiv. (bushels)	Total
1946-47	-	6,563,637	6,563,637	2,008,905	1,730,471	3,739,376
1947-48	11,904	1,828,598	1,840,502	-	3,508,889	3,508,889
1948-49	3,719,246	2,230,074	5,949,320	11,315,099	2,520	11,317,619
1949-50	617,775	71,703	689,478	-	239	239
1950-51	12,387,556	4,047,993	16,435,549	11,403,285	-	11,403,285
1951-52	10,961,011	2,572,511	13,533,522	18,141,164	90	18,141,254
1952-53	13,495,035	75,393	13,570,428	14,055,765	243	14,056,008

* Customs Returns

BASIS OF PAPER MONEY VALUE

Mr. Leboe:

On what value is our paper money presently based?

Mr. Benidickson: Bank of Canada notes are legal tender in fulfilment of any contracts made in terms of Canadian money. The Bank of Canada Act provides that these notes shall be redeemable in gold, in the form of bars. It also provides that the bank shall maintain a gold reserve equal to at least 25 per cent of its note and deposit liabilities and may in addition keep a reserve in certain kinds of foreign exchange. At present, the operation of these provisions is suspended, and Canada's official reserves of gold and foreign exchange are centralized in the exchange fund.

The total of Canada's official holdings of gold and United States dollars is published monthly, and at the end of February comprised $1,007·8 million of gold, and $845·7 million of United States dollars which are convertible into gold. Both the foregoing amounts are expressed in terms of United States dollars. At the end of February the Bank of Canada's note and deposit liabilities amounted to 1,506 and 837 million Canadian dollars respectively.

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION—OUTSIDE EMPLOYMENT OF MEMBERS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Are any members of the Canadian pension commission engaged in occupations outside their duties as members of the commission?

[Mr. Gregg.]

2. If so, what is the nature of and remuneration for such occupations, in the case of each commissioner involved?

3. How is participation in these outside occupations by members of the pension commission reconciled with the dictates of section 3 (12) of the Pension Act, chapter 207, R.S., 1952?

Mr. Bennett:

1. Yes. Dr. J. P. Laplante.

2. Adviser to the Ottawa General Hospital and in that capacity he has no executive responsibility. The commission has no record as to any remuneration.

3. Dr. Laplante's advisory services at the Ottawa General Hospital have not been held to be inconsistent with the performance of his duties as a commissioner, to which he gives full time.

VEGETABLE OILS AND VEGETABLE OIL PRODUCTS —IMPORTS 1952-53

Mr. Bryson:

1. How many pounds of vegetable oil seeds or vegetable oils imported into Canada in the year 1952-53 were used in the manufacture of margarine?

2. What other products were manufactured from vegetable oil seed or vegetable oils imported into Canada in the year 1952-53?

Mr. Dickey:

1 and 2. Information not available.

FARM LOAN BOARD—APPLICATIONS FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Michaud:

1. How many applications were received by the farm loan board from the province of New Brunswick during the last calendar year?

2. How many such loans were granted in the province of New Brunswick during the said year?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. 235.

2. First mortgage loans disbursed—84; second mortgage loans disbursed—14.

TARIFF BOARD—REFERENCES MADE BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many references to the tariff board have been made by the Minister of Finance since January 1, 1952?
2. What tariff items were included in each such reference, and on what date was each such reference made?
3. What decision has been reached by the tariff board in respect of each such item?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Four.

2. Reference No. 112: ethylene glycol and related products; August 29, 1952; tariff items 208h, 208t, 219e, 220a(i), 711, 791, 923.

Reference No. 113: clothespins of wood, or of wood and metal, and parts thereof; December 23, 1953; tariff item 506a.

Reference No. 114: ethylene glycol for use in the manufacture of anti-freezing compounds and ethylene glycol base anti-freeze; December 28, 1953; tariff items 208h, 220a(i), 711.

Reference No. 115: polyethylene resins and polyethylene films, sheets and tubing, etc., if necessary; February 5, 1953; tariff items 901(a)8, 902(e), 905(c)1, 905(c)2, 906(e).

3. Tariff board report on reference No. 112 was submitted to the Minister of Finance on May 1, 1953 and tabled in the House of Commons on November 25, 1953. The other references are under investigation.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

VEGETABLE OILS—SOURCES OF IMPORTS, ETC., 1952-1953

Mr. Bryson:

1. From what countries did Canada import vegetable oil seeds, or vegetable oils in the year 1952-53?
2. What kinds of vegetable oil seeds, or vegetable oils, and how many pounds of each kind were imported from each country?
3. What was the value of each kind of vegetable oil seed or vegetable oil imported from each country in 1952-53?
4. What was the tariff collected on each kind of vegetable oil seed or vegetable oil imported from each country?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—FEDERAL CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE

Mr. Hardie:

What has been the cost of construction and maintenance of buildings and equipment occupied and used as offices or residences in the Northwest Territories by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for each year beginning April 1, 1945 to March 31, 1953?

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—LIVING ALLOWANCES, 1953

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many government officials or employees, etc., in the year 1953, with salaries in excess of $4,000 per year, received living allowances or expenses in excess of $5,000 per year additional to such salaries?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have spoken to the hon. member, and I understand that what he meant by "government officials or employees, etc.," are regular servants of the government of Canada itself, not the people who are employed by crown agencies, but including employees outside Canada in embassies, trade commissions and so on. On that understanding, and if he would agree to have the year made the fiscal year rather than the calendar year, it would facilitate the answering of the question, and I would ask that it be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Then the question as modified is made an order for return.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CUSTOMS CHECK BRANCH—LETTER DIRECTING HIGHER RATE

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of a typical letter (or typical letters, if there are any significant variations in different letters written on the subject), dated at any time since January 1, 1952, written by the customs check branch of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue, to collectors of customs at customs ports, advising that a higher rate of duty, sales tax or excise tax is required, without necessarily giving the name of any firm involved in such correspondence.

CUSTOMS CHECK BRANCH—LETTER DIRECTING LOWER RATE OR EXEMPTION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of a typical letter (or typical letters, if there are any significant variations in different letters written on the subject), dated at any time since January 1, 1952, written by the customs check branch of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue, to collectors of customs at customs ports, advising that a lower rate of duty or the exemption from sales tax or excise tax is applicable, without necessarily giving the name of any firm involved in such correspondence.

SECURITY

LOYALTY SCREENINGS—GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I answered orally a question on Monday asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) he called my attention to the fact that in 1950 in two cases some information that would be of the kind referred to in question 49 was given, and he asked if there had been any change in policy.

There has been no change in policy. I promised to look into the matter. I have done so, and I find that there were two exceptions to the application of the general rule in 1950 for reasons or under circumstances which were quite fully disclosed to the house at that time, but the validity of these, as reasons for a distinction, the hon. member might wish to discuss. It would take some time to restate them now. Perhaps it would be more convenient if they were restated and could be discussed on the estimates of the department concerned.

TRADE

SUPREME POWER SUPPLIES LIMITED—EXPORT PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member was out aeroplaning so I have not been able to get in touch with him. Has the company known as Supreme Power Supplies Limited, of Mimico, been refused an export permit for Canadian transformers or other goods for shipment to South America or any other country? If so, what are the reasons for such refusal? The minister may take this as a notice.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take that question as notice.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT TO COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the reports coming over the wires in the last hour or so concerning the statement made by Lewis L. Strauss, chairman of the atomic energy commission in the United States at President Eisenhower's press conference today with respect to the recent hydrogen bomb explosions, could arrangements be made for a similar Canadian official to make a full report on these matters at a meeting of the external affairs committee?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It would not be possible for any Canadian official to make the same kind of report as that attributed to Admiral Strauss, for obvious reasons. But this matter can be discussed in its international aspects before the committee on external affairs—if and when we have that committee set up.

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION

POSSIBILITY OF DUCHESS OF KENT ATTENDING OPENING CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Has the minister heard the rumour that the Duchess of Kent will open the Canadian National Exhibition next summer? If so, is there any substance in that rumour?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): The Secretary of State has heard no rumours to this effect.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has he received any word whatsoever from the United Kingdom regarding the possibility of the Duchess of Kent opening the Canadian National Exhibition?

Mr. Pickersgill: When there are any announcements to be made about visits of members of the royal family they will be made in the usual way, and not be made in answer to questions on the orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The old steamroller on information.

ARMED FORCES

PRECAUTIONS TO PREVENT ENLISTMENT OF MENTAL DEFECTIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. I must apologize for having given him such short notice. In view of the recent conviction of a Canadian soldier reported to have the mental age of ten, can the minister tell the house whether the Department of National Defence takes any precautions to prevent mental defectives from enlisting in the services? Is there not something better that Canada can do for these unfortunate people?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) having just returned after several days absence, and as I received notice of the hon. member's question just before entering the house, perhaps I might be permitted to deal with it.

I would say in the first place that each of the services has established through a set of mental and physical tests a general system of examination of recruits to give effect to a policy of enrolling the right type of service personnel. Whatever those standards may be, I can assure my hon. friend that they are such that those who pass them must be far beyond the mental age of ten. The tests are carefully worked out and have resulted extremely well in most cases. Of course there will always be borderline cases wherever the line is drawn. Some borderline cases turn out very well, and some not so well. This is one of the unfortunate ones.

I would like to add that I believe the average type of Canadian citizen enrolled in the services, whether he has served in Korea, in Europe or here in Canada, has achieved excellent results and has given an excellent account of himself.

As to the second question, my reply would be that I think most hon. members and the public generally agree that the standard of assistance accorded to our unfortunate citizens here in Canada is probably higher than in any other country of the world.

TRADE

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING LIMIT ON DUTY-FREE PURCHASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance arising out of a news report of this morning. In view of the proposal by President Eisenhower that duty-free tourist purchases in Canada be increased from $500 to $1,000, is the Canadian government prepared to increase the value of duty-free goods that Canadians can purchase in the United States?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am afraid my hon. friend will have to restrain his curiosity until next Tuesday night.

FISHERIES

DISCUSSION OF EXPORT AND MARKETING PROBLEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would he care to make a statement as to the purpose of the convening here in Ottawa tomorrow of officials representing the fisheries of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec, as well as fish exported from Newfoundland.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there were other applications by representatives of the fisheries for a meeting with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). My own meeting is concerned with an organization in Newfoundland known as NAFEL. That is the organization which has charge of the exporting of Newfoundland salt cod to foreign countries. We are going into a discussion of marketing problems for the next twelve months, and the meeting tomorrow is for that purpose.

Mr. Bell: May I ask a supplementary question? Will there be any fisheries officials from any of the other provinces, besides NAFEL?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): So far as I know, no other officials have been invited. If they are here they will perhaps be admitted. But invitations went to NAFEL only.

[Later:]

DIVISION OF PINK SALMON RUN—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the Minister of Fisheries if he would inform the house as to the progress that is being made in connection with the international proposed division of the pink salmon run, concerning which he made an announcement in Vancouver last week.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): No progress has been made. We have made inquiries and had discussions with the United States but as yet there has been no definite progress in setting up a commission similar, for example, to the international sockeye salmon commission.

WHEAT

GRADES REQUIRED TO FILL PRESENT DEMANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the minister's statement yesterday with respect to the disposal of western wheat, wherein he stated that the wheat board is at present going to call for No. 2 wheat, would he inform the house what grade or grades of wheat are needed by the wheat board to fill present sales demands, and what percentage or quantity, and how substantial is this demand?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the requirements at the seaports vary from week to week and from month to month, depending upon the nature of the sales. Last fall there was a shortage of Durum wheat at the seaports, and also a considerable shortage of oats at the lakehead. I know we are always being asked for offerings of Durum wheat, and No. 3 northern has been popular. But those are matters entirely in the hands of the wheat board. Bulletins are put out to country elevators giving certain shipping instructions for particular grains and grades of grain.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reference to the interim payment of approximately $60 million which is now being paid by the Canadian wheat board to producers. Can the minister state what will be the approximate payment to individual farmers?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It depends a good deal on whether we are talking about a large or a small farm; but if the farmer would multiply the number of bushels of wheat that he delivered last year by 11 cents he would approximate very closely what is coming to him.

GRAIN

DISPOSAL OF WESTERN SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday at this time, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I made a statement with respect to the marketing of grain in western Canada. Arising from my statement, certain questions were asked by hon. members and I undertook to provide further information.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) asked for the breakdown of the 410 million bushels which I stated had been marketed by producers from August 1, 1953, to date. The breakdown is as follows: wheat, 265 million bushels; oats, 65 million bushels; barley, 66·5 million bushels; rye, 6·8 million bushels; flaxseed, 6·7 million bushels, making a total of 410 million bushels.

The hon. member for Prince Albert asked for an estimate of the number of bushels of grain which will be in farmers' hands when harvesting of the 1954 crop commences. Questionnaires completed for the wheat board by elevator agents and others indicated that there would be some 900 million bushels of deliverable grain this year, including 209 million bushels that were in farmers' hands in western Canada on August 1 last. If the total marketing figure during the present crop year of 600 million bushels is achieved—that is the figure I used in my statement yesterday—there will be approximately 300 million bushels in farmers' hands on the prairies on August 1 of this year. This will compare, as I have said, with 209 million bushels last year at the same time and represents, I think, a good performance, considering the obvious accumulative effect of three successive bumper crops.

(Translation):

ST. JOHNS ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

QUESTION AS TO STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). It is supplementary to the other questions I have asked him regarding St. Johns Military College.

I have already asked the minister if the five professors hired for St. Johns Military College were bilingual. The minister first replied that there was no truth in my assertion.

An hon. Member: Your forty minutes are up.

Mr. Dufresne: Later, I placed two other questions on the order paper in connection with the same matter and the minister replied that they spoke only one language. Therefore, this afternoon, I would like to know which of the two answers I should accept.

Mr. Speaker: Let me say to the hon. member that the next time he asks questions on the orders of the day, he might perhaps dispense with summing up the questions he has already asked. I would like the hon. member to co-operate in this respect.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I am surely not objecting, but I thought it necessary to give a brief summary in order to get a definite answer to the question I asked this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. minister going to reply?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have already given a correct and full answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). However, I might add that it is not always possible to say whether a man is bilingual or not; he may be more or less. All five may speak French, but they do not teach in French, just as the ten French-speaking professors do not teach in English.

Mr. Dufresne: I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. He said that it is not possible to ascertain whether a person is bilingual or not. May I ask the hon. minister to tell me what was written in the application forms sent by these five professors to the Department of National Defence? Did they state that they were bilingual?

Mr. Speaker: Order! I think that the hon. member could carry on his investigation by placing his questions on the order paper.

(Text):

COLUMBIA RIVER

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF DAM AT MICA CREEK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked me a question whether the international joint commission had made any decision or recommendation concerning the Mica creek dam project in British Columbia. The reply is that no report has yet been made by the international joint commission and, in fact, the commission's engineering board has not yet completed its study of the Columbia river basin. Such a study may not be completed for another few years. Included in the studies made, as part of the reference on the Columbia river basin made to the international joint commission in 1944 by the United States and Canadian governments, is the proposed development of Mica creek dam.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ACQUISITION OF ADDITIONAL LAND IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Can the Minister of National Defence give me a definite answer to a question I asked yesterday, which was dealt with by the associate minister?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I have been endeavouring to rise to tell the hon. member for Royal that the tentative reply I made yesterday I have confirmed, namely, that there is no intention on the part of the Department of National Defence to acquire additional land east of Gagetown across the Saint John river.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF SERVICE CHARGE BY BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister asked the appropriate officials of the combines investigation branch to look into the concerted action of the chartered banks in increasing their service charge on cheques to 10 cents, to determine whether such action, under which all banks have arrived at the same figure, is contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question, which reached me only after a late lunch, just before I came into the house. The answer to my hon. friend's question is no, for the reason that the director, where he thinks consideration or action is warranted, is accustomed to proceed without specific direction by the minister.

GRAIN

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE OVER C.B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. My question arises out of a report in today's Gazette regarding a speech which the minister made in the program "The Nation's Business" carried by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It quotes him as having said—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —if the farmers want cash—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member put his question without quoting the minister?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Is it the policy of the government, as announced by the minister, to recommend, if the western farmers want cash, that they feed their surplus grain to livestock? If so, does he not feel that it might undermine the price structure of the livestock industry in Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In order to inform my hon. friend just exactly what I did say I shall send him a copy of the speech.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate which is now before this house, it is not my intention to be unduly repetitious nor to speak upon any of the subjects which have been discussed here during these past few days. It has been a lengthy debate but, in my opinion, it has been a most useful and worth-while one. We have heard discussion and statements from the government and from members of the opposition on such matters as the Berlin conference, the projected Geneva conference, and arms to Pakistan; arguments for and against the recognition of Red China; and academic discussions on communism and anti-communism. All of these things are of the utmost importance and the discussion was worth while. However, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at all on all of those matters, important as they are. I do not profess to be an expert on foreign affairs and so I shall leave all those discussions to those who are experts or who profess to be. There is, however, one phase that comes under this debate upon which I feel impelled to speak. In doing so, I admit I am not doing it because I am a scientist; I am not. I am doing it because of the crucial and critical matters that have been drawn to the attention of the peoples of the world, in particular in the last few weeks. I refer to the matter of the hydrogen bomb.

It has been intimated clearly upon more than one occasion by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that he intends to speak and that he looks forward with anticipation to the remarks which he will make at the close of this debate. I fully realize that he will undoubtedly be commenting upon many of the things that have been said by the various speakers during the past few days and will undoubtedly be answering a number of the questions that have been hurled at him. But my purpose in rising at this time is to tell the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I think he would be seriously derelict in his duty or in his responsibility if he were not able, when he speaks, to take the House of Commons and the people of Canada into his confidence and give all the information possible as to the situation with regard to the hydrogen bomb; the policies as far as he knows them that are now in existence involving the experimentation in the use of that bomb; and, of more importance, the proposals which the minister may have or, I think I will say, should have as to the stand which Canada should take in this critical period of our history.

There are undoubtedly millions of people in this world who believe in the statement that a deity created the world in six days and rested on the seventh. There are undoubtedly many more millions who do not take that view but who accept the view of scientists that through the process of evolution over millions of years the world as we know it came to its present form. I am not going into any academic discussion of how the world came into being. But the fact is this. Over untold millions of years there has been in existence this world, but we are now in the position, in the year 1954, where all the evidence makes it completely conclusive that, unless there is some sanity in the parliaments of the world and unless we arrive at sanity between the nations of the world, man in his stupidity can in the matter of minutes or hours definitely destroy mankind and perhaps the world itself.

Admittedly we are a small nation but we are an important one. In my humble opinion this house could do well by spending a little bit more time to see whether it would not be possible for us to arrive at policies and conclusions whereby the Secretary of State for External Affairs or perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) could give a militant, sane and dynamic lead to the other leaders throughout the world as to what should be done in view of the situation as it is understood by the people since the explosion of the first hydrogen bomb on March 1. It is no exaggeration to state that if we have such people who can release the spark, another war might start. It was only the spark of the shooting of one man of royalty that, officially at least, started the first world war. It was the lunacy of one man in Germany, with his dreams of power, that caused the actions that set off the spark which started the second world war. Who knows what may start the third? If it does start, the evidence is conclusive that it means the end of mankind.

We have the remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the Ottawa Catholic youth organization, as reported in the press only a few days ago:

> If the nations of the world engage in a third world war, civilization would be destroyed, . . .

That is our own Secretary of State for External Affairs. In this morning's Globe and Mail we find a statement attributed to one who should know. I refer to Defence Secretary Charles E. Wilson of the United States. Here is what he has to say, as reported in the paper:

> Defence Secretary Charles E. Wilson said today the unbelievable power unleashed in test H-bomb explosions this month dwarfed the atomic bomb just as the A-bomb dwarfed TNT bombs of the second world war.

Mr. Holifield, a member of the United States congress and a member of the congressional atomic energy committee, who saw the March 1 explosion, has this to say, as reported in the same paper:

> Holifield, who saw the effects of the titanic March 1 hydrogen explosion, told the house, however, that "civil defence against atomic-hydrogen attack is a delusion . . . mass extermination of millions in any or all nations can occur during a week end."

And further:

> Holifield said complete military defence against supersonic planes or missiles with atomic-hydrogen warheads is impossible and non-existent.

Mr. Wilson said further:

> Wilson was asked at a news conference whether the U.S. intends to use the H-bomb if it is involved in another war. He replied: "Don't you think it would be foolish to spend billions unless you are prepared to use them under some circumstances?"

I think you will understand, Mr. Speaker, the reason why I feel so intensely about this matter. Here we have statements by leaders of the North American continent, including our own Secretary of State for External Affairs, the defence secretary of the United States and a member of the congress of the United States who saw that explosion on March 1. They all agreed that the result of the destructive power of the hydrogen bomb means the end of mankind, and they also stated that there is no military or civil defence whatsoever against the power of the hydrogen bomb.

That is why I suggest that this matter should be discussed and a lead given to us and, I hope, to the world, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). This was brought very forcibly to my attention in an excellent editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Daily Sun on March 27. With your permission, sir, I would like to quote part of that editorial. It states:

> Churchill contemplating the effects of H-bombing nearly weeps in public. Eisenhower, stupefied by news of the scientists' surprise, implies he is stunned by bombing possibilities. All common men everywhere, probably even in Russia, are aghast and voice their dread. Yet no move is made to deal with the H-bomb threat. We believe common men hold their safety and desire to live at peace in their own hands. We believe they can make themselves heard through their governments and elected representatives. Convinced that now is the time for positive action, we suggest the cabinet at Ottawa, through Prime Minister St. Laurent, call for a world conference using the machinery of the United Nations headquarters at New York.
>
> We suggest that he lose no time in asking for this conference. In many countries Canada has ambassadors. Let them pass on the call.
>
> The conference should be summoned in a spirit of absolute objectivity. There must be no ideological fences erected. It must be bombs and nothing but the bombs.
>
> The time for form and ceremony is past and the hour demands immediate action by some one man who does not fear to risk position, or the condescending smiles of statesmen higher in the councils of the world.

I believe that is an excellent editorial, Mr. Speaker. I think it is a call to members of this house to do a little soul searching and see if we cannot adopt a responsible attitude at this session, in this house, at this time and get away from an academic discussion of communism, anti-communism, the recognition of China, or what happened at the Berlin conference, and lay down a program in clear terms calling now for the rule of sanity among the leaders of the nations of this world. The only place I know where such can be directed is through the medium of the United Nations.

A few years ago we might have called that epoch the age of TNT. That gave way to the age of the atom, but already the atom has given way to the hydrogen bomb. I have been trying to find out something about the atomic and hydrogen bomb and I came across what I believe is a magnificent book which can be understood by laymen. It is entitled, "Scientific American Reader". Upon reading that book I learned that there are two differences between the atomic bomb and the hydrogen bomb. The atomic bomb and indeed the entire atomic energy enterprise rests ultimately on the basic reaction following the splitting of uranium 235. On the other hand, the hydrogen bomb is not based on fission, it is based on fusion. There is another major difference. Atomic energy can be used not only for destruction but also for construction and for power. If this scientific journal is correct, the hydrogen bomb can never be used, or at least cannot now be used, for constructive purposes. It can only be used in the sense of destruction. I would like to quote one paragraph from an article in this book written by that great North American physicist Louis N. Ridenour. This is what he says:

> . . . while fission can be controlled in an orderly way to produce useful power in a reactor, the fusion reaction offers no prospect at the present time of any use except in terms of an explosion. We cannot find in the development of the fusion bomb any such peacetime values as are inherent in the development of nuclear fission. Except where the uses of peace demand the detonation of an explosive equivalent to, say, a million tons of TNT, there is no use for a fusion reaction. Thus when we discuss the "hydrogen bomb" we are clearly speaking of a weapon, and a weapon only.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that leads me to what I may call a more practical point. Can we have some understanding as to what is taking place in the Pacific? May I say that I am not directing any criticism against the United States alone, but I believe we have got to direct our thinking toward the United States and the U.S.S.R., both of whom have experimented in exploding a hydrogen bomb.

I was amazed to read in today's issue of the New York Times that it is only in the last six months that the United States has caught up with the technology of the U.S.S.R. in the explosion of the hydrogen bomb. This is not a matter which concerns the U.S.S.R. and the United States only. It is a matter which concerns the world. It definitely concerns us in the Dominion of Canada, particularly as far as the explosions in the Pacific are concerned.

I would like to know by what authority and by what power the United States obtains rule over a part of the Pacific ocean in regard to current hydrogen experiments which may affect the people of the Dominion of Canada. President Eisenhower himself admitted that the scientists have been amazed. They have moved into the realm of the unknown, a realm in which I believe they have no business. Indeed, they are entering into the realm of the supernatural. They were amazed by the explosion on March 1, and they have already stated that for the explosion scheduled for April they will extend the official danger area by 20 times, and it is only recently that some of the things which have occurred have come to light.

If we can accept the press reports, what do we find? We find that there was radioactive ash over 71 miles from the point of the explosion, and there are a number of Japanese sailors who are living proof of that. We also find that the explosion was such that United States marines 225 miles away saw the explosion. When you consider the perimeter of the earth it will be evident that, to see an explosion 225 miles away, the effects of that explosion would have to go far up into the heavens. We also learned that when United States scientists made certain tests they found the ocean was radioactive 800 miles away from the point of the explosion.

That was their smallest bomb. Now, Mr. Speaker, where can this lead to and why am I as a Canadian so interested? I am interested not only from the viewpoint of preventing war and saving mankind and civilization, but also from the viewpoint of the people of Canada. Already we have heard several hon. members ask questions in this house about the radioactive snow in Saskatchewan and in Winnipeg, Manitoba. We have heard it said: Yes, it was radioactive but not dangerous. It may not have been dangerous with that first explosion but there it is over 5,000 miles from the point of explosion. How do we know that it will not be dangerous to the people of this country and other countries when the larger bomb goes off? We have also got to recognize that so far as the United States is concerned these explosions take place in the Pacific ocean. I have actually met people who have the fallacious view that is the place to explode such bombs because there the danger disseminates. It diffuses, and within miles it is gone. Oceanography proves that is a fallacy. It is not like throwing a pebble into a little pool where the concentric circles gradually diminish and disappear.

Oceanography proves that the ocean is different because as you have highways across Canada, as you have channels of air in the atmosphere above us, so you have currents and actual rivers in the ocean cutting through narrow sections of the entire ocean. Sometimes they are only a few miles wide and sometimes several hundred miles wide, but whether in the upper level of the ocean or in what has been referred to as the sunless sea, the bottom section of the ocean, there are these channels of currents and rivers. Some of these channels and currents that start in the mid-Pacific thousands of miles from the Canadian coast reach the shore of the province of British Columbia. It is already admitted that the ocean was found to be radioactive 800 miles from the small explosion. What will happen with the larger explosion when we have these currents that touch the Canadian coast?

You may say that some of these things are problematical. I admit that they are, but in view of what we have read and heard in the past few weeks there are mighty serious questions that should be asked and not only asked but answered. The minister should tell us as far as he can about what information he has gained from consultation with the United States and also through the United Nations with respect to the position of the U.S.S.R. I say that it is a heinous thing that the world's two most powerful nations, the U.S.S.R. and the United States, should take into their own hands the power of a physical god on earth by their experimentation with and probable use of the hydrogen bomb.

I speak as an individual. We are only a small nation but we should make our voice heard. With the stature and status that Canada has it can give a lead. At least the words of the minister would be noted in the press and in the consultative bodies of the world if he would come out with a definite statement and challenge at this time in the rostrum of 15 million people, the House of Commons of Canada.

That is the practical side of the question. There is also the moral aspect, and I should like to read certain remarks of the physicist I quoted a few moments ago beause they put the situation in far better words than I could choose. I think they drive home the point exceptionally well. He said:

> I believe the most important question is the moral one: can we who have always insisted on morality and human decency between nations as well as inside our own country, introduce this weapon of total annihilation into the world? . . . What would an all-out war fought with hydrogen bombs mean? It would mean the obliteration of all large cities and probably of many smaller ones, and the killing of most of their inhabitants. After such a war, nothing that resembled present civilization would remain. The fight for mere survival would dominate everything. The destruction of the cities might set technology back a hundred years or more. In a generation even the knowledge of technology and science might disappear, because there would be no opportunity to practise them. Indeed it is likely that technology and science, having brought such utter misery upon man, would be suspected as works of the devil, and that a new dark age would begin on earth.

I think these words are true. I think they point up in concise form the statements that have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when he says that a third world war will mean the destruction of civilization. Statements have been made throughout the world that another war will mean the end of mankind. The secretary of war of the United States has stated that they are not producing these bombs for fun, that they hope they will be a deterrent but that if a spark starts a war then under certain circumstances this weapon will be used which it is admitted will destroy mankind and the nations of the world.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is time for a little common-sense thinking. I ask, and as a matter of fact I go further and plead with the minister, who, I know, has a great sense of responsibility and a great sense of justice, to take under advisement the giving of a lead at this time to the world, the issuing of a challenge to his colleagues in the United Nations to get down to the matter and discuss nothing else but bombs.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Winch: I am almost finished. We should realize our position in Canada, faced as we are by this unknown power with its radiation that can be carried by the currents of the sea and the air. We should realize the dangers with which we may be faced as the result of the action of another country in doing something that may be 4,000 or 5,000 miles from our shores. I do not want to reiterate. I am certain that the minister and other hon. members know what I have in mind. I feel very intensely about the matter and I look forward to the minister not only answering questions about the Berlin conference, the Geneva conference and the recognition of China but also with respect to what to my mind is paramount today, the question of the position of Canada with regard to the hydrogen bomb and what we can do about it.

Mr. McIvor: I was going to ask the hon. member a question. Does he not think that the President of the United States was following a plan of peace in his famous speech when he suggested to the world that the bomb should be outlawed? What was the reaction of Russia? When Russia did not co-operate should the United States have ceased its work and investigation? That is a very serious question. While Russia goes ahead should the United States stop and not continue its investigation?

Mr. Winch: I would not want anything I have said to be muddied by any implications. When I spoke I made it clear that I was referring to the countries that are experimenting with and using the hydrogen bomb, the United States and the U.S.S.R. It is wonderful to say: Let us abandon the bomb; let us outlaw it because we now see what its power is. But we should do more than talk; we should now go ahead and do it. I suggest that Canada can give a lead to the United Nations.

Mr. McIvor: What more would you want the President of the United States to do than to ask the world to outlaw the bomb?

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, having returned only yesterday from Pakistan and India I have not had the privilege of hearing this debate but I have heard enough to realize that further contributions may not be gratefully received. Nevertheless, I feel that this may be the only opportunity I shall have to make a very brief report on a conference which I think has some bearing on the subject matter of this debate. My journey took the same route as that of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), not by design, as was suggested by some, but because my purpose was to attend a conference in Lahore and it happened to take place shortly after his visit there.

I should like, first of all, to bear witness to the impression I got of his visit three weeks after he had been there, and while, in both Pakistan and India, the memory was fresh. The greatest respect was paid to our Prime Minister, and the relationships between those two countries and Canada were undoubtedly improved by that very gracious visit.

May I make another acknowledgment which my friend the minister may appreciate, namely that I and others who were on this mission received the greatest co-operation and assistance from our Canadian representatives in the cities where we needed their help. This began in London and was continued in New Delhi, the capital of India, and Karachi, the capital of Pakistan, where we were cordially aided and assisted in our unofficial purposes.

The conference, Mr. Speaker, was an entirely unofficial conference. It was a conference amongst the members of the commonwealth, a discussion meeting for the purpose of exchanging ideas and understanding each other's point of view, thus improving relationships. All members of the commonwealth were represented, that is the five older members of the commonwealth, of British origin, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and in addition the three new Asiatic members of the commonwealth. I take the opportunity of saying a word today just to explain my impression of the viewpoint of those three associates of ours in the commonwealth who are Asiatic countries.

The conference was held at Lahore, which is the capital city of Punjab, one of the provinces which constitute Pakistan. Pakistan, India and Ceylon are the three Asiatic members of the commonwealth. I think it was fortunate that the Institute of International Affairs, which sponsors these conferences every five years, chose Pakistan as the scene of this conference. The conference brought together a very strong representative delegation from each of the countries of the commonwealth. The United Kingdom delegation, by way of illustration, had four members of the House of Commons, three of whom were former ministers, including a former chancellor of the exchequer, as well as a former marshal of the air force as a military adviser. Then, there were a number of academic people who make international studies their particular interest. Attached to them were members of three dependencies, two very fine citizens from the new federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, now approaching the point where they may become full members of the commonwealth.

There was an African lawyer of great ability from the West Indies who gave an excellent account of himself and of the experiment in self-government in the British West Indies, a very encouraging thing. Then, there was a minister from the Federation of Malaya, which is under a tutelage system, looking towards full self-government. From Canada we had a delegation of eight; from South Africa there were five or six representing different viewpoints; and there were delegates from Australia, New Zealand and so on. Pakistan was represented by a strong group of thirteen, two university presidents, and the Speaker of the Punjab legislature was chairman of their delegation. I believe he attended here the year before last when the commonwealth parliamentary association met in Ottawa. India had a large delegation.

Our discussions in that ancient city of Lahore, which was the capital of the Mogul empire at one time and later the scene of British administration of that great province, occupied twelve days. We ranged from the strategical and political relationship of the members of the commonwealth through racial and other matters which were of common interest. When I say that Canada was held in high esteem, I believe one reason is that we have never in our history been subjected to the charge of colonialism or imperialism and we have never had any serious race problems. These two elements of human relationships are always present in the minds of eastern people, and one has to think of them throughout any discussion of commonwealth relations. Canada is free from any difficulty on that score.

My impression of our Asiatic friends in the commonwealth was that their first interest, as countries having recently achieved their independence, was the economic development of their own country. They appreciate their underdeveloped state. They appreciate that they lag behind other countries of the commonwealth, and their main concern is for an era of peace in which they can bring about the developments which will raise the standard of living in their own country.

The second feature that colours all their thinking is that common Asiatic view that the European has no right or place in dominating the people of Asia. I found, to my surprise, that concern of the Asiatic peoples even affected their view towards NATO. We regard NATO as an alliance for defensive purposes only and related to defence in western Europe, but they were so concerned about the presence in any Asiatic country of western Europeans that the presence of France in Indo-China was of more concern to them than the threat of communism. They felt that in some way NATO might be assisting France to maintain and carry on that conflict in Indo-China, which to them was very largely an imperialist struggle between a nationalist movement on the one hand and a western dominating power on the other.

I feel that our discussions did something to offset that view of the western defensive arrangement and the alliances involved. I have raised the question here because in any of our external relationships which involve commonwealth countries it is necessary to bear in mind that the Asiatic members of our group do feel more strongly about the subjugation of people in Asia, a subjugation which they have recently broken, than they do about the threat of communism. It will be a matter of education over a period of time to change that viewpoint, and it varies, of course, amongst the three countries concerned.

I found that Pakistan was very cordially concerned with the problems of the West, much more interested than India whose delegation reiterated the neutrality policies of Mr. Nehru and, with difficulty, would concede that they were in any need of following any other course. Now, that was the main impression of the conference that I wanted to mention. I mention this view of our Asiatic friends because I feel that their importance in the world today is such that it is to our interest, not only because they are members of the commonwealth but in the broader view of understanding of what moves them in this field of external affairs.

India, as you know, is a country of 340 million people. I suppose that is the greatest part of the population of the commonwealth. From this distance we may regard Pakistan as a small country, but with 30 million people in its western part and 43 million in the eastern half, a total of 73 million, it places seventh among the nations of the world. They claim to be fifth, but I think Indonesia and Germany have to be counted in there. Ceylon is not an inconsiderable country, but is an island and is, I think, less concerned about current world affairs than the other two. The conference I believe brought to these two big Asiatic partners of ours some idea of the way the western countries feel about and look at the problem of communism. While India was not prepared to align herself positively with either the West or the East, but was content to keep to a middle position, Pakistan's recent moves—her treaty with Turkey and her acceptance of American military aid, and the views we heard expressed at this conference—would definitely indicate that she is to be counted as one of the western group.

As I say, the importance of these countries lies partly in their population and partly in the role they have to play in the future. We, as members of a group which have nothing to bind us together other than good will, can play a very useful part in retaining the confidence, good will and interest which exists in those countries today.

They value particularly the common parliamentary experience which has been their inheritance from British rule. They carry on their business in English. In fact, I think it would be impossible in Pakistan to conduct government without the use of English. And even in India it was freely expressed that although English was the language of their former rulers, it was nevertheless a great language in the world and had the additional advantage to them of being a common means of communication within the country as well as a means of communication in all their external relationships. I dare say that despite the nationalistic moves to promote Urdu and Hindi as the respective languages for the two countries, English will be the common means of communication of those governments and will be a common bond between those countries and the rest of the commonwealth.

The conference played some significant part, I suggest, in improving the understanding which is so essential. After all, understanding is the cement which makes these relationships grow and improve. I would close by making reference to Sir Edward Grey's remark, made in a different context, that nothing better promotes understanding than a consciousness of being understood.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that on a number of occasions since coming to this house I have been tempted to think that a great deal of time has been spent on very small matters.

However, when we entered upon this particular debate, and as it has continued, it has been my conviction that we are now dealing with a phase of our deliberations that is of paramount importance.

I have been taught that men's relationships in life are of paramount concern. Those relationships perhaps can be summed up under three categories, the first of which is man's relationship to God. I feel that that is basic; that is the foundation.

The second is our relationship to our fellow man; and that is of tremendous importance.

The third is our relationship to things, or to the material world around us. It seems to me that we have been dealing with the most difficult of those three, namely our relationship with our fellow man. As I have been considering this matter and listening to the debates a verse from Scripture has come to my mind repeatedly. I shall not preach a sermon, although I am almost convinced that one would not be altogether out of order in doing so—for instance Winch versus the Bible, or something to that effect. But the verse is this:

> If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.

I think that verse should be kept in mind; it is a splendid exhortation. I think that not only in our individual relationships but in our relationships with the various nations of the world we should keep in mind that exhortation from the book of Romans. Humanity being what it is, frictions are bound to arise. But so far as possible I think we must accept the responsibility for removing those causes of friction and cultivating friendships among all men. We must strive with other nations for the establishment of good will among all the peoples of the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come to the matter which prompted me to enter this debate—and I shall not take very long this afternoon—I should like to speak of my own attitude and that of the group to which I belong toward this great question of peace. This has always been a great and wonderful theme. It has been something that men have sought after and nations have coveted. From one viewpoint alone, the moral viewpoint, we ought to search and explore every avenue whereby peace can be secured.

Now when we consider, as we have been considering the atomic bomb and the hydrogen bomb, and its effects and possibilities, the importance of this theme is further enhanced. Before I came here for the opening of the session last fall a delegation of about twenty men and women called upon me and asked me one question: What is your attitude toward peace? I was very happy to be able to tell them that I thought I was just as much in favour of peace as they were. I was just as anxious to see peace established and maintained as they were. And certainly that is still my attitude—and because of the fact that I suppose most of our families have suffered the results of war. I have no doubt that practically all our families have paid some price in wars that have been fought in the past.

Therefore my heart cries out for peace in the world; my prayer is for peace. And I know that other members in this group as well as other members in the House of Commons desire those same conditions of peace.

Following my maiden speech I had a letter from one of my constituents in which very kindly he referred to the remarks I had made, but said, "I deplore the fact that you did not raise your voice for the cause of peace." I replied of course and told him he had misread my speech, and gave him the part that dealt especially with this particular matter.

However, as we think of it today, as I have said, with the tremendous possibilities of war and the potential forces that are placed at man's disposal, we all desire in some way or other to find peace established in this world of ours. I am now speaking for the Social Credit group when I say we urge that every effort be made to resolve the differences between those behind the iron curtain and the free nations of the world. Every possible endeavour should be made in order to accomplish that end. No one in this group wants war. We do not desire just the cessation of hostilities; we desire that a true and lasting peace shall be established on earth.

We deplore aggression. We join with those who advocate collective action by the United Nations to stop acts of aggression, and we take the position that Canada should not and must not be a party to aggression in any sense. However, I think we must be realistic and realize that the world is in great danger of aggressive acts and intentions by other nations, and no one knows when or where they may create incidents—I say "they may create incidents"—which could lead to war. And should that happen—and we sincerely hope and pray that it may not—what is our stand going to be?

I am sure that every group in this house, and perhaps I should say all members with the exception of some hon. members in the group to my right, would take the view that the free nations of the world must not be let down, nor can we let our freedom and all that we hold dear be lost by default.

I think I should call attention to the statement made by the leader of our party in the speech that he delivered on January 29 in the debate on external affairs. These are the words, as found at page 1611 of Hansard:

> My organization and I are committed to strive for international peace and security. We believe that Canada and all other nations should have been striving over the years with all their might to find out what are the real sources of war, and to remove those just as quickly as possible.
>
> We should have been doing everything in our power to remove industrial rivalry among the nations, to establish an equitable distribution of the goods and services this world can produce, and to have them distributed in all nations that are willing to co-operate. We believe that perhaps the greatest single factor leading to international conflict has been the lack of such equitable distribution of the goods and services that were produced. We are unalterably of the opinion that the establishment of sound international trade policies, such as those we have outlined on many occasions, is the best assurance of international peace and security.
>
> At the same time we recognize only too well that there is over the whole face of the world today a conflict of ideologies that is a constant threat to peace and national security. When we realize that this conflict is going on, then we also must be realistic in recognizing the necessity of organizations such as NATO and the European defence community and that sort of thing. We recognize also the necessity of organizing our own national economy so as to provide good opportunities for economic security for all of our people, along with freedom, so we can help them to be happy and contented in their lot and save them in the struggle that is going on for men's minds.
>
> We hear much about peace and the opportunities for peace. We hon. members are getting letters almost every day from some peace organization. Because we speak sometimes with vigour, because we advocate all-out vigilance, some of us are often understood to be belligerent. I hope there will be an intelligent differentiation between the two, as certainly there is a difference. To be vigilant is not to be belligerent. Vigilance is all we want.

Then he went on to say—and I just quote a short statement:

> Speaking of peace may I say that to us, except life itself and liberty there is probably nothing that we cherish as much as peace.

I wanted to place that on record, Mr. Speaker, because it states in a very definite and positive manner the policy of this particular group, and this afternoon I subscribe to that statement. My hope and my prayer is that in every way possible our leaders, this government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will exercise the influence that they have in the councils of the nations to bring about a true and a lasting peace.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): During the course of this debate we have heard a great many comments about the hydrogen bomb. The hydrogen bomb is not of itself any problem, of course. It is merely a mechanical contrivance devised by man, and there would be no problem of the hydrogen bomb except for two forces that are operating against each other in the world today. We have always had those two forces. One is a reasonable and logical force, and the other is an emotional one. They have been operating against each other all through history. You have a good example of that today. The emotional one is nationalism and the logical one is the desire of the countries of the world today to try to get together in some kind of national co-operation such as the United Nations and on a smaller scale such as NATO, and so on.

Nationalism has always been a factor. That is very true, but today it has become more prominent because of the political emergence of the Asiatic countries, particularly those of southeast Asia, and the Middle Eastern countries. These countries, for varying periods of time, have been under the domination of many of the western countries, and they have recently emerged as individual entities. Thus the emotional question of nationalism has made itself very prominent indeed today.

What is this thing called "nationalism"? You see the word used a lot, and I think we ought to make some attempt to define what it might be. A very simple definition, which I can assure you is my own, and no one else's, and of course open to criticism, is that nationalism is the determination of a group of individuals to assert themselves. To go on from there, I say "a group of individuals", and you may ask: Can we narrow it down even more? Well, since individuals tend to identify themselves with groups of people, the emotional reasoning can be referred back to the individual. I think this can be best exemplified by a little story I once heard. It was during Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee, when all the princes from India and from other parts of the empire at that time were travelling through the streets of London. A little cockney down on the corner poked his neighbour as one particularly gorgeous Indian prince was going by all bejewelled and on a bejewelled elephant and said: "Look, we owns him." I think that illustrates fairly well how this business of the individual identifying himself with a group comes about, and it is very important.

We have now got down to individuals, and I am trying to simplify this very complex problem. What drives an individual to want to assert himself?

In the last century a prominent Viennese gentleman called Sigmund Freud, with whose name I think everybody is familiar, started the study of what motivated human beings. I think by and large psychologists, people who study the reasons for human behaviour, would generally agree even yet that probably the basic reason for human beings desiring to assert themselves is probably related back to—and I hesitate to use this word in the house—the sex drive. In any event, the human desire to assert one's self really does go back to some emotional rather than logical drive. There are various ways that can aggravate or increase this desire to assert one's self. In some cases it is just like Topsy in "Uncle Tom's Cabin", just growing up, just being adolescent; you want to show off to your elders a little bit and to make them think that you really are important and that you do know something.

But on the other hand certain things such as suppression and frustration and so on can also make people want to assert themselves. You can now apply these things to groups; I mean groups of people who have been suppressed or frustrated in their national desires. That can aggravate their nationalism or their desire to assert themselves. Other things can enter into it, such as just growing up as in the case of a new country, such as the new Asiatic countries. Even in Canada, for example, we are touchy about little things such as a national flag and the desire that Americans should not think that the King or the Queen actually rule us and that we do not rule ourselves. We are very touchy on little things like that. Nationalism can take various forms.

First of all, let us see about the individual. There are two forms, namely the active and the passive. The passive form of nationalism is of course usually very constructive. Let us look at the individual who wants to assert himself in a constructive way. He may become a great artist or a great scientist or something like that and do something constructive. This again applies to a group of people or individuals such as a country. Ancient Egypt is a good example. Egypt did a lot to contribute to the arts of peace and they were never particularly prominent in war. Ancient Greece in its early days was more noted for the arts of peace than for the arts of war and so on. These are examples of constructive nationalism.

In the more active aspect as far as individuals are concerned, you have the town bully who wants to force his will on somebody else and you have religious fanatics who are determined to force their religious views down somebody else's throat. Referring again to groups of people, you have nations who desire to assert themselves by forcing their national culture upon everyone else. Sometimes people refer to the United States as wishing to do that, thinking that they have the best way of life and wanting to make sure that everybody else has it. In the Middle Ages the Mohammedans and the Turks had that point of view. They tried to force the Islamic cultures on a large part of Europe. Certain nations have strong national political views, like Russia, and desire to force communism on the rest of the world.

I think I have dealt long enough with nationalism in an abstract way and should get down to a consideration of just where does this affect Canada. As I have said, we have a little bit of nationalism in Canada; I refer to our touchiness about things such as the flag and so on.

I think Canada is in a particularly fortunate position in the world. We often hear about Canada being a linchpin between England and the United States and that we can interpret England to the United States and vice versa. I think Canada should continue to be this kind of linchpin, but I think we could very well be another linchpin in the same kind of world machine. I think we would make a very fine linchpin between the new Asiatic countries and the western world such as United States, Great Britain, France and so on. I think Canada is probably the best suited to do this of all the western countries.

The remarks that have just been made by my colleague, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) who has just returned from the East, express that very well. Canada, like the new Asiatic countries, is a new country in a political sense. It is not, of course, in a cultural sense like the Asiatic countries. Their cultural history goes back centuries and even for thousands of years. But politically Asiatic countries like Pakistan, Indonesia, the Philippines and the Middle Eastern countries like Iraq, Iran and Egypt are all new countries politically. So is Canada. It is something we have in common.

Canada has never been in a position where we have attempted to dominate these countries in a political sense as Great Britain, France and the United States have done in the past or in the economic sense as I think the United States has often been falsely accused of doing nowadays. For those reasons the newer countries do not suspect the motives of Canada. More than that, we are too small, at least on a population basis, to attempt to force our will on those other countries and for that reason we are not suspect. More than that, for the last few years we have been very generous in giving gifts of food and mutual aid—I refer to such things as the Colombo plan and so on—to these Asiatic countries. I think they appreciate it, and they do not suspect our motives.

I have some knowledge of this matter in a personal way. There are a number of people from Pakistan living in the town in which I live. They have been there for almost a year now, and they will be there a little bit longer, learning agricultural methods. I have talked to them on many occasions. These people like Canada a great deal. They have been completely accepted in the community. They have had a very good time here. They like this country. They realize that we are not in any way attempting to interfere in their domestic affairs, in their foreign affairs or anything else, and that we only have a genuine desire to help them. They realize that when we give something to those countries we are not asking any quid pro quo in exchange. For these reasons I think that Canada should try to become a new linchpin between the East and the West and act as an interpreter of the western viewpoint to the East. My colleague from Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) suggested a little bit earlier that Canada should enter into some of these Pacific pacts and take an active part. I thoroughly agree with him. I think that such participation would assist us in becoming a linchpin.

Mr. Speaker, I hope these few remarks will be of some help. Accordingly, I should just like to commend them to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are looking forward to hearing the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). In order to facilitate matters I am going to make my remarks as brief as possible. However, as the member for Regina City I feel that I have a duty to my constituents to place before this house some observations which I feel might be of some value to the minister and to the government, and to comment upon some of the remarks that have been made during the course of this debate.

I for one am not perturbed by the fact that this debate has gone on for a number of days. As a faithful reader of Hansard for quite some years before coming to this house I have always felt a little bit of alarm at the manner in which external affairs were treated in the house; I refer to the idea that external affairs were something for which we would just set aside a day for a debate and then, after disposing of it in that summary fashion, get on with the business of the house. I feel that this debate indicates keen interest in external affairs among members of this house; and I think that is a reflection of the keen interest in foreign affairs throughout the country.

After listening to some of the speeches made in the debate, I found that there are many that I thoroughly appreciate. As to a number of the speeches made, while I did not appreciate all the contents or all the remarks in those speeches, nevertheless I felt that they made a distinct contribution to the debate. They were made in a very forthright manner. They were based on some degree of logic, unlike some of the speeches which departed almost entirely from any semblance to logic or historical fact. Consequently I want to deal with a number of matters that I think have been dealt with perhaps in an incorrect way in the house.

A great deal has been said during the course of this debate on the question of the recognition of the Peking government, and I believe part of the difficulty, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the public, particularly the public in the United States, has been sold the idea that there is something synonymous between the terms recognition and approval. Of course, feeling as we do about the Chinese government, if recognition did imply any degree of approval I am sure we would disapprove of such recognition. But the difficulty we find ourselves in today is that many people will not realize that recognition does not involve approval.

When we of the C.C.F. have from time to time recommended the recognition of the Chinese government we have had people call us "fellow travellers" and make uncomplimentary remarks, completely ignoring the fact that the recognition of the Peking government has been advocated by many Canadians in various walks of life and of various political parties. The point of view we have set forth is the point of view taken by the British Conservative government. It will be recalled that last evening the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) dealt with that very matter and pointed out that the British Conservative government under the leadership of the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill today recognize the Peking government. If that government did not approve of the policy of recognition it would be a relatively simple matter for the British government to withdraw their recognition. But they have not done so. Therefore, if there is anything wrong about our advocacy of the recognition of the Peking government then the criticism directed against us must also be directed against the British government. Even in our own country it will be noted by those who follow the press that many leading newspapers all across Canada have come out in support of the recognition of the Peking government.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made his statement on Thursday last he quoted from an editorial which was published in the Ottawa Journal on Friday, March 12.

The Prime Minister did not quote the editorial in its entirety, but I should like to draw the attention of the house to several paragraphs of that editorial which I believe are pertinent to the point under discussion. The Journal goes on to say:

No country can ever know with certainty whether the government possessed by some other country is the government its people want. And the fact is that Canada now recognizes any number of countries without being at all sure that their government is what their people want. There is Russia, and Czechoslovakia, and Poland, and Spain; possibly others.

What Canada does, and must be compelled to do, and what all other countries must be compelled to do sooner or later, just because it is the only sensible practicable way, is to recognize the government of the country which is in effective control —which exists in fact. That, of course, must apply to China. There in an ancient historic nation a revolutionary movement defeated the government of Chiang Kai-shek, drove its armies from the China mainland, set up a new regime. Can we in Canada say sensibly or realistically that this new regime cannot act for the Chinese people, that it is not what the Chinese people want, and that until we discover that it is what the Chinese people want, we cannot recognize it as China's government, exercising authority.

The next day the Ottawa Citizen said almost the very same thing, the thing that we of the C.C.F. group have been saying. The Citizen editorial of March 13, under the heading "Korean Criticism of Mr. St. Laurent" said:

"Korea Republic", a semi-official newspaper published in Seoul, has criticized Prime Minister St. Laurent's opinion that diplomatic recognition of communist China is ultimately inevitable. In its criticism, the newspaper has expressed a viewpoint common to the lunatic fringe of the anti-communist camp, which would deny all hope of a peaceful settlement of issues that contribute to world tension. Korea Republic suggests that anyone, however well meaning, is a "communist tool", if he advocates a course, on any specific issue, that has been approved by the communists; further that diplomatic recognition of the Peiping regime constitutes moral acceptance. On both counts, Korea Republic is surely in error.

Decisions in the non-communist world should not be based essentially on whether or not the communists would favour them, so much as on whether they would help establish a stable peace without weakening the West vis-à-vis Russia and China. If statesmen are to become "communist tools" whenever their views coincide with those of Moscow, the communists could control the West simply by advocating policies the reverse of those the Kremlin really desires. The Labour-Progressive (communist) party of Canada has approved Mr. Conn Smythe's proposal that the Toronto Maple Leafs play exhibition games in Russia. Is Mr. Smythe therefore to withdraw his offer, whatever its intrinsic merits? Of course not. On the second point, Korea Republic's attitude would leave little recourse except to settle international differences by violence. If recognition is to be withheld from Peiping because of disapproval of China's rulers, then how is business to be done with the Chinese nation? Negotiations could not for long be held, or bargains struck, or a settlement reached, if normal diplomatic intercourse is forever cut off. The South Korean regime is not universally approved in the West, owing to President Syngman Rhee's endeavours to suppress opposition and establish a brutal police state. But his is the only government that exercises effective control over South Korea, and the West must recognize it. Much the same rule applies to China.

These are precisely the things we of the C.C.F. have been saying. The British government has said much the same thing, and has taken the same point of view. I believe that once and for all we should end these innuendoes and charges against people in this country who favour the recognition of the Peking government as though there was something insidious about it. I believe the record speaks for itself in that respect.

Along with the recognition of China there must, of course, go the question of China's entry into the United Nations. Much has been said by one or two hon. members about the possibility that China upon being recognized would become a member of the United Nations. The attitude some people have toward the United Nations is rather strange to say the least. Some people seem to believe that the United Nations is a sort of little social gathering in which all good people can be members, and all people we do not like can be kept out. In this regard I was very interested to read a report of a speech made by Sir Gladwyn Jebb in addressing the Pilgrims in London recently as reported in the Western Producer of March 25, under the heading "Jebb Urges Admission of Red China to U.N. Seat".

Sir Gladwyn Jebb, who was until recently the British representative at the UN, and who is now ambassador-designate to France, urged the United States to accept the principle of making the United Nations a true world forum in which peace can be won, and he warned:

"We are just not going to defeat communism by physical means, necessary though it may be to defend ourselves and the whole free world by such methods."

Another world war will not eliminate communism but will be more likely to extend it universally, perhaps under another name, he asserted.

Jebb commented that some Americans misconceive membership in the United Nations as a sort of prize for being a good boy, an attitude which he described as ignoring the world situation in which many governments "are not the sort of which we could possibly approve." "Somehow or other," he declared, "we have got to learn how to get on in this world with governments we dislike, and whose disappearance we should be the first to applaud if it could be accomplished by means other than war."

These are sentiments with which, I am certain, every member of the C.C.F. group would wholeheartedly agree.

The United Nations should be a true world forum. It is rather difficult to understand the nature of the criticism of the United Nations from time to time. It is rather difficult to understand the point of view expressed by some members that you will weaken the United Nations by admitting the Peking government to membership when one realizes that if the United Nations is going to be a true world forum then all the major antagonists of the world should be brought together in order that the vital issues of the day may be discussed. Conversely, we have views such as those of the Social Credit group who would insist on the expulsion of the U.S.S.R. from the United Nations. Would that strengthen the United Nations? It depends entirely on what one's impression of the United Nations is.

If the United Nations is going to do the task for which it was created, apart from the work of the specialized agencies which of course are being carried on from day to day; if it is going to do a major job, then the United Nations is going to have to provide the machinery whereby the various antagonistic elements in the world may be brought together in order that common decisions may be arrived at. So far as the entry of China into the United Nations is concerned, the suggestion is made that it will double our difficulties and will increase obstructionist tactics. I would remind hon. members that I believe in every vote that has been taken in the general assembly of the United Nations the Russian bloc has usually been defeated by about eight to one, nine to one or ten to one. The veto power is already exercised by the Moscow government, and I think there would be very little change in that respect if the communist government of China also exercised that power.

But I do want to emphasize the point that we have got to clear the air with respect to what we consider the main job of the United Nations to be. We must realize, as Sir Gladwyn Jebb has pointed out, that we must make the United Nations a true world forum in which we will get all divergent points of view. There are some who say that we could get things done a lot better if the obstructionists were not there. I suppose some of the Liberals across the way might argue that too much time is spent on debate and that they would get the work of the house done much quicker if they got rid of the opposition. That is the same type of logic as to argue that the work of the United Nations would be facilitated by the expulsion of all those who might disagree with the majority decision. It is up to the majority to persuade the others.

Think of a United Nations in which you only have those who agree and all those who disagree are expelled. It is like having a prize fight with only one boxer in the ring. It is difficult to conceive of the type of reasoning that would lead a person to advocate either the denial of entry of China to the United Nations or the expulsion of the U.S.S.R. from that body.

We are much concerned at the present moment with the coming Geneva conference. Something has been said about the apparent failure of the Berlin conference, but if the Berlin conference brought about the Geneva conference perhaps that is one positive accomplishment of that meeting. There are two attitudes of mind that may prevail among the delegates who go to Geneva. There may be those who will go with closed minds determined that under no circumstances will they yield on any point. Again, there are others who would be prepared to go to the conference and seek any area upon which some measure of agreement might be reached, no matter how small that area might be. I think we must realize that there are some who go to international conferences with closed minds.

I want to draw the attention of the house to a statement made recently by Representative Judd who is chairman of the House of Representatives foreign affairs subcommittee. His words are reported in an Associated Press dispatch from Washington which appeared in the Gazette of March 28. The report reads in part as follows:

> Judd said any truce sought by the allies, rather than the communists, would be "the first step toward the war we are trying to avoid. If the communists come to us with evidence of good faith to negotiate, rather than with another trick or a trap, the United States is always willing to negotiate", he said. But Judd declared a genuine truce would be possible at Geneva only if "they (the communists) ceased being communists."

I think no comment is needed on that statement. It speaks for itself. The attitude of Canada at this conference is something that concerns us at the present moment. We have heard a number of speeches during the course of this debate by members who suggest almost the same kind of closed mind with respect to this conference. The statement was made: After all, what if they do promise to desist from further acts of aggression? We will not believe them anyway. Of course if we are going to take that attitude before the conference opens then we cannot blame anyone but ourselves if we find that no agreement at all comes out of the conference.

But there is one point in this connection that was dealt with very effectively by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). It is the matter of the red herring involved in the use of the word "appeasement" and the reference to Munich in connection with present-day conferences. I find it difficult to understand how a student of world history who has taken the trouble to study the events leading up to the Munich conference and the events of the conference itself can possibly draw any parallel between Munich and conferences held under international auspices at the present time. The Munich conference was a conference to which were invited people who were virtually certain to agree on a particular course, and those who were likely to disagree were not invited. For example, Czechoslovakia, the country most concerned, simply was not invited to the conference because Czechoslovakia quite naturally would have taken great exception to the discussions that were going on at that time. Therefore I do not think anyone should seek at this time to use the Munich conference or the term "appeasement" as a red herring to try to throw difficulties in the way of those who would seek to bring about some small measure of understanding in the world today.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) dealt with an extremely important subject this afternoon. I am glad he did so because it absolves me from the necessity of saying some of the things I wished to say. I think it is an extremely important matter. If the new bomb is exploded next month we may be spared any disastrous consequences, but where is it going to end? Is there going to be further testing of still more powerful bombs? Where is the line going to be drawn? It has to be drawn somewhere, and I think we should give the most serious consideration to the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I do not wonder that he is concerned.

I noticed that last week the Vancouver Province published on its front page a map showing the danger area of a hydrogen bomb explosion such as the one to be exploded next month. The area on the map covered a radius of 450 miles. It extended almost as far north as Prince Rupert, and as far northeast as Edson, Alberta. It included the city of Calgary and the outskirts of Lethbridge and extended south to Missoula, Montana, and to an area just north of Grants Pass. It included the cities of Spokane, Seattle, Portland, Victoria and most of the settled areas of British Columbia. Is it any wonder that the hon. member, representing as he does a Pacific coast constituency, should have risen in his place this afternoon and have made the very valuable contribution he made to the debate? It is the enormous effects of such bombs that brought the Vancouver Province to publish an editorial on the matter. I just want to draw your attention to this editorial because I think it sums up the situation in much the same terms as the Secretary of State for External Affairs used in his address just last Sunday to a group of young people in the city of Ottawa. In dealing with the threat of atomic war or the hydrogen bomb, the Vancouver Province of March 27, 1954 had this to say in part:

> It can only be done by driving home the basic fact that no one will win an atomic war. The scattered, despairing fragments of the human race able to survive such a holocaust would not be very interested in the social theories of Karl Marx or anyone else.
>
> The atom bomb has dwarfed all social theories. When and if the next atomic bomb is dropped as an act of war our ideologies, legal systems, ideas of government, learning, culture, will on that day be rendered mere bagsful of nonsense.
>
> Nothing of value anywhere will survive an atomic war.

With this background, Mr. Speaker, I want to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to see to it that the Canadian delegation at Geneva does everything within its power to seek at least small areas upon which there can be some degree of understanding and agreement. What is the alternative? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of our movement, when speaking in this debate last Thursday pointed out the alternatives which face the world today. He stated the world had a choice of co-existence, if I may use that term, or we might seek to destroy them and they might seek to destroy us. Now, that is the choice before the world today, and I wonder where Canada will stand on this matter.

With this background in mind, I urge the government to take advantage of every possible opportunity to negotiate to come to even a slight degree of understanding on some of the issues that face the world today. Without such an understanding the world will continue to face the perpetual threat of destruction by a third world war.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I advise hon. members that if the minister speaks now, he will conclude the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This debate that is now coming to an end, Mr. Speaker, and the conclusion of which will make it possible to set up the committee on external affairs where these and many other subjects might be discussed further, has ranged far and wide over the world. I do not believe any of us should complain about that because we have learned from the events of the last forty or fifty years that when international relations break down our men have to range far and wide over the world, from Germany to Korea, in the defence of peace.

In the course of the discussion we have made excursions into the fields of history, philosophy, religion, and almost on occasion metaphysics. We have gone as far back as 8000 B.C. and spent a good deal of time looking at what is going to happen in April, 1954, at Geneva. During the course of the debate a great many questions have been raised, and a great deal of advice has been given to the government as to how to deal with them. As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said this afternoon, questions have been hurled at me. On the government's side, we should certainly do nothing but welcome that because advice is helpful, especially when it is good advice.

At times, however, some of the advice—this I suppose is inevitable—that has been given to us has been contradictory in character, especially on the subject of recognition of the Peking government in China. As I understand it from the speeches that have been given, the members of the Progressive Conservative party are afraid that we will recognize that government, and the members of the C.C.F. are worried that we will not. Naturally, therefore, the advice that has been given on that point has been slightly contradictory. I am not quite certain of the position of the official opposition in the matter, apart from the advice they have given as to what ours should be. I think in relation to recognition, and I will come back to this later, the position of the official opposition might be summed up in the words of a song, I think by Gilbert and Sullivan, "Never—well, hardly ever."

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and I think one or two other hon. members on the other side, suggested that we had been derelict in our responsibility on this side because neither the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) nor myself had said anything about the commonwealth of nations. I feel the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) dealt with that matter very effectively yesterday when he said that the Prime Minister had been giving evidence by deed and not only by word of his feeling for the commonwealth of nations which in its new form is very different from the old British Empire and has demonstrated once again the genius of the people composing it for political improvisation, if I may put it that way, and for service to the world.

The hon. member for Greenwood talked about the commonwealth of nations as a third centre of power and hoped that along that line its new usefulness might develop. With all respect to him, I do not see the new commonwealth in that light, either politically or legally, because it is unrealistic, if I may use the word, to talk about a commonwealth composed of nations such as India on the one hand, South Africa on the other and the United Kingdom and the rest of us as a centre of power. There could be no single decision, as I see it, which would bring that power into action. It is not, therefore, a centre of power in the sense that the United States or the U.S.S.R. is. But it is a centre of co-operation and understanding. In that respect it is, and will continue I am sure, to render a very valuable service.

I hope that this centre of understanding and co-operation will not develop as a kind of third force—I have said this before—somewhere between the United States and the U.S.S.R. There are only two forces in the world today, or should be; those forces which are fighting for peace and good international relations and those that are on the opposite side of that issue.

I feel that I should say a few words right at the beginning about the speech made the other evening by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). He accused me softly last Friday of indulging in semantic subtleties. Well, there was nothing subtle about some of his statements. They were clear; but, as I see it, they were clearly wrong; they were directed as we remember for the most part to the United States and to the conduct of the western foreign ministers at Berlin. And I am not suggesting that the hon. member is anything like a fellow traveller, or a member of any fellow-travelling group when I criticize his stand on this matter.

He was pretty strong in his criticism of the western proposals at Berlin for the European defence community for the unification of Germany as obviously unacceptable to the Soviet union and, as he called it, the hasty western rejection of Mr. Molotov's proposals for European security.

What was wrong with these western proposals for the unification of Germany, based as they were upon the principle, which surely we must all accept, of free elections and the formation of a united German government which, once it was formed by free elections, would have full power to contract out of the European defence community if it desired to do so, if it happened to be in?

It seems to me to be most unfair, indeed absurd, to talk about a proposal of that kind, in contrast to the Soviet proposal on the same subject, as sabotaging the Berlin conference. In so far as Mr. Molotov's plan for European security was concerned, that was introduced at the conference in Berlin on February 10. It was discussed by the foreign ministers at three meetings; and in spite of their efforts they failed to clarify some of its points, especially that of its relationship to NATO. Mr. Molotov refused to co-operate in that regard, but it became pretty clear before the conference ended that the acceptance of this scheme for European security would have meant the abandonment of NATO and its replacement, for European states, by a collective security system which would have included all of eastern European communist states, and the U.S.S.R. itself—which is more Asian than European—and would have excluded the United States and Canada and, indeed, the communist government in China. However that nation—and the U.S.A.—would have been permitted to attend the meetings of such a system as observers.

I think after the consideration which was given, and after their inability to get the clarification they desired, the western foreign ministers were entitled to claim that there was no basis for European peace or unity or security to be found in that particular proposal.

In a more general way the hon. member for Nanaimo stated his views, and I am quoting:

> The western powers have been led to consort with all the most disreputable and reactionary elements in Europe to the destruction of the element in that society which might have built a better world in the heart of Europe.

Well, who are these "disreputable" elements? Are they the followers of Moscow, such as Togliatti, Duclos, Thorez, Field Marshal von Paulus, Grotewohl and Ulbricht? No, Mr. Speaker, they are, according to the hon. member, de Gasperi, Adenauer, Ernst Reuter, Robert Schuman, Georges Bidault or Jules Moch.

Later in his statement the hon. member criticized our policy at the United Nations, as he had every right to do. Then he ended up that phase of his remarks with these words:

> We have left the other nations—

That is, Canada has done this.

> —who are not nearly as well equipped as we are—

He did not specify any particular nation.

> —to stand up for principles of honesty and decency in the world.

And at another point he said:

> I think on the most charitable basis we can only say that it has been a somewhat shabby role.

Well, I suggest that our participation in international affairs in recent years is not considered by most Canadians, or in fact by most countries, as justifying its characterization as a shabby role. We have of course made mistakes, and I have no doubt we will continue to make some. But I hope we will never act in such a way that we can legitimately be charged with being shabby in respect of our international responsibilities.

And the hon. member ended up by saying that because of our deficiency in this regard many Canadians are slightly afraid and ashamed of being Canadians. Well, I will have to leave him to that company of Canadians who are slightly ashamed of being Canadians, and I do not think he will find too much companionship there.

Now, there has been a good deal of discussion in this debate about the European defence community, what it stands for and what our relationship to it should be. I did say in introducing this resolution that we supported the European defence community, and then I added the words "or something like it". The hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Eglinton both asked me what I meant by "or something like it". What are the alternatives?

Well, by "or something like it" I had in mind possibly some kind of amendment by protocol for consideration if the original agreement is not satisfactorily effected. And as for alternatives, I would suggest to the hon. member for Prince Albert that if he reads Hansard at page 1584, when I spoke on January 29, he will find that I outlined there the five possible alternatives to the existing international defence community now under consideration.

A good many members in the debate have expressed doubts and uneasiness about the acceptance and the putting into effect of the European defence community. I can understand that uneasiness, because I share it. And if we share it in this house we can certainly understand how citizens of countries close to Germany who have seen so much of invasion in recent years must feel about it. But while we may understand that feeling, still we must ask ourselves, as I have tried to ask myself: What is the alternative? While arguing the point of view that there must be something dangerous in the position, it would surely be wise to follow it up by suggesting a more satisfactory alternative. From my own study I do not think that there is a more satisfactory alternative, unless all those who are now discussing the present arrangement should get together and agree upon changes to it.

Appeals have been made to history in this connection. Well, I draw—and I am sure other hon. members also draw—other lessons from history which bear on the matter. I stated on January 29 that one method of controlling German aggressive expansion is the old unhappy one, by which the west joined with the east against an independent armed Germany in central Europe. Neither in 1914 nor in 1939 was an alliance of that kind effective in preventing war, even if it may have been effective in winning war. And so, with the history of 1914 and 1939 very much in mind, plans for a European defence community have been drawn up in order to bring Germany into an alliance which would give scope for her energy and talents but which would also include safeguards against uncontrolled military expansion.

The EDC treaty, with which NATO would be associated, has provided safeguards which have already been explained in detail in this house. If we have not faith in those safeguards, then we have no reason to have faith in any other conditions imposed by human authority.

Nor do I think we have ground for faith in our ability to control Germany rearmament without this kind of collective organization. Nor do I think we should have much confidence, with the experience of the years between the wars and now, in our resolve, let alone our ability, to keep Germany neutral and disarmed. We have tried that before and it has worked for a few years, but the end result has certainly not made for peace. Therefore I do feel—and I repeat this feeling which I spoke about earlier and indeed as late as January 29—that the best of all alternatives now before us—indeed it is the only one officially now before us—is the European defence community.

The hon. member for Eglinton and one or two other hon. gentlemen have talked about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the hon. member for Eglinton asked a specific question in this regard, whether, commenting on the press dispatch of an interview between the Prime Minister and General Gruenther in Paris, we had accepted recently any new commitments in regard to NATO forces. Notwithstanding any interpretation that might have been given to that particular press statement, which was inaccurate in this respect, we have not accepted any commitments in regard to NATO which have not already been made clear to the house.

The hon. member for Peace River brought up an important question in this regard when he wanted to know the effect, if any—and he was worried about this—of such an arrangement as that which has been entered into between Turkey and Pakistan on our commitments under NATO. It is true that Turkey and Pakistan have worked out a bilateral defence arrangement and I am sure it will make its own contribution to peace and security in that area. But that does not add to our commitments merely because one of the two principals to that arrangement is a NATO member; because our obligation under NATO is to come to the help of, or at least to consider an attack on the metropolitan area of a member state as an attack on ourselves. Any action taken as a result of an outside agreement which brought one NATO country into action because of its obligation to another country that was not a member of NATO would not, as I understand it, involve our NATO commitment.

Then, in respect of NATO, there has been a good deal of talk about our ability to do more in implementing article 2. All I can say is that I realize that this has been a very slow and complicated and at times disappointing process. As I have already said before, in recent years we have subordinated the implementation of the non-defence aspects of NATO generally to the necessity for building up our defensive strength against a threat which seemed very dangerous at the time and remains dangerous. But we are doing something. Every time we meet at Paris we do something more to carry out the spirit of article 2, which is not concerned only with economic co-operation, but also with political co-operation generally; and in the meeting of the NATO council which will take place in a few weeks, on April 23, in Paris, as I think I said the other day, we have only one item on our agenda, namely, the exchange of views on the international political situation. That in itself, the fact that we can meet and talk about these things regularly, frankly and fully, does I think help to bring about this closer political integration, if I may use that word, which we had in mind when we signed the NATO agreement.

Having used the word "integration", I should refer to a question raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who asked for some clarification of the statement made by the Prime Minister at Bonn, which statement he felt went beyond anything that had previously been uttered in this house in regard to our international collective developments. On February 10, I think it was, at Bonn the Prime Minister said this:

> It has become increasingly clear, I think, to all members of NATO and to those many countries who are associated with us throughout the free world that our very survival and our continued development in freedom and in peace depends upon our ability to look beyond national barriers and to make them somewhat less artificial and more satisfactory.

The Prime Minister added:

We believe the proper solution to the economic, cultural and spiritual betterment of all free peoples is to be found in an ever closer integration of their activities and in a greater sharing of their endeavours. More particularly, many of us believe the peoples living about the great basin of the Atlantic ocean might well seek the solution to their problem of economic betterment, political stability and self-defence in this closer integration of their national resources and of their machinery of government.

The Prime Minister of course had in mind when he made that statement—and I think it is one to which none of us would want to take exception—that the hope of the world today, especially the hope of the Atlantic world, and especially under the circumstances of today, must lie mainly in closer and closer co-operation and closer and closer relationship between governments and the agencies of government. In saying that he did not, I suggest, go so far as—certainly not any farther than—Mr. Mackenzie King did in this house on December 17, 1945, when he said—and these words might well be remembered by the hon. gentleman:

The more deeply one ponders the problems with which our world is confronted, in the light—"the terrible light," as Mr. Attlee said—of the implications of the development of atomic energy,—

I do not know what he would have said if he had been speaking today. I continue:

—the harder it is to see a solution in anything short of some surrender of national sovereignty.

Mr. King went on:

With a limited surrender of national sovereignty, there must be instituted some form of world government restricted, at least at the outset, to matters pertaining to the prevention of war, and the maintenance of international security.

I think the lesson of the events of the last two or three days drives home that feeling that there is no safety for us, there is no security for us except in closer and closer international co-operation and more effective international arrangements to protect national security. And in bringing this about—this had been said in other parliaments than ours —there must be some relinquishment of national sovereignty, because the world is too small for jealous competing sovereignties in the circumstances of today. This, as a matter of fact, is not in one sense giving up national sovereignty at all. It consists, as Mr. Wendell Willkie used to say, of making national sovereignty work for us in the interests of national security.

A good many questions were asked about atomic energy matters. The hon. member for Prince Albert asked whether we had any international obligations at the present time with regard to extending present knowledge of atomic energy along the lines of making industry a partner of this development. The answer to that question is no, we have not. He also asked questions relating to the proposed international agency which I had mentioned in my earlier statement. In fact he repeated to me some of the questions I had myself asked in that statement. At this stage I regret that I cannot do more than refer to the proposals themselves made by President Eisenhower when he pointed out that it was expected—and we share this expectation—that the proposed international agency, which is now under discussion, would be set up under the aegis of the United Nations. He also proposed that the governments principally involved—and that would include Canada—should, to the extent permitted by elementary prudence, make contributions from their stockpiles of normal uranium and fissionable materials to the international agency, and he added that ratio of contributions, procedures and other details would properly be within the scope of private conversations. Those private conversations are now going on.

It seems to me that at this stage it would be unwise for any of us to make public statements as to what we think can best be done to implement this general proposal. We have been in close touch with the United Kingdom government as well as the United States government on this matter. The United States government indeed is acting at the present time, as I said the other day, bilaterally with the U.S.S.R. and has put certain proposals to the government in Moscow. Those proposals have not been made public. They go into this matter in somewhat more detail than I have been able to do; but until we get the first reaction of Moscow to those proposals I think it would be unwise and indeed inappropriate for me to say anything more about the details of this matter than I have already said.

I appreciate, as must all hon. members, the uneasiness which has been reflected in this house over recent atomic developments. Yet I cannot help adding that I would be far more worried if those awful explorations into the science and the chemistry of destruction were exclusively in the hands of those whom we have cause to fear rather than in the hands of those who we know will not use them for any aggressive warlike purpose. Having said that, however, we cannot refrain from asking ourselves this question: Where are we going in this matter? As reported at page 3342 of Hansard, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government should make immediate representations to the United States, urging the United States not to undertake these experiments in the Pacific ocean.

As I indicated, I think it was yesterday, in the house, we have been in touch with United States authorities about the results of the recent explosion and have endeavoured to obtain information about the plans for subsequent explosions. We know—and our information in the last few days reinforces our knowledge—that those who have a special responsibility in this matter on our side in Washington share the anxiety of all people of good will at the horrible potentialities of the forces now being developed, and they are as anxious as we are to remove those anxieties. At this moment I can only repeat, as expressing my own feelings, what Sir Winston Churchill said yesterday in the House of Commons in London:

> . . . I am sure that those responsible for conducting these tests will continue to take the most rigorous precautions to minimize the risks involved.

Our interest in this matter has already been expressed in Washington, as no doubt has the interest of other governments, and quite understandably so. But the best way to remove dangers in this field, as in other fields, and the best way to prevent any possible use of those weapons, is to prevent war. I do not desire to use language which is too shrill or excitable, but I cannot help feeling —as other hon. members have felt and have so expressed themselves—almost horror at the magnitude of the destructive forces now being made available for human use. When we talk about things like this it is customary to say that we must reduce the particular subject to its proper perspective. However far you reduce this matter to perspective, the perspective remains horrible.

I would go further, and this is as far as I can go at this time in answer to the impassioned and sincere appeal of my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East. I would agree that all governments concerned—and that includes the Canadian government—should, if I may use the expression, take a new look at United Nations international efforts in this field of the prevention of the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes. The clouds that have arisen eighteen or nineteen miles above that Pacific atoll; the deep and jagged cave that was blown into the bed of the Pacific ocean; and the men who, miles away, suffered merely by contact with the effects of the explosion; all these things surely impose on all of us, and no doubt especially on those of us who have some official responsibility, the obligation to take some kind of action, if one can find it, to harness these forces for constructive ends.

I agree that, in the light of what has happened, we must approach this problem—all of us; all governments—with a greater sense of urgency than possibly we have been showing in recent months. That requires, of course, action at the United Nations or at least international action. It may mean that we should re-examine our own attitude towards the question of international ownership of fissionable material as essential to a solution. But it also emphasizes the desirability, indeed the necessity, of bringing about some form of genuine international control and international inspection, without which anxieties in this matter will not be removed.

I now pass on to some other subjects which have arisen in the course of the debate and move from this question of atomic energy to the Pacific. More than one speaker in this debate has suggested that it should be the aim of our policy in the free world to do everything possible to separate the communist satellites from the U.S.S.R. The leader of the official opposition, speaking on Yugoslavia, said, as reported on page 3377 of Hansard:

> . . . it is my hope that under the influence of the outside world Yugoslavia may gradually emerge from communism into a better form of government that will bring freedom to its people.

Then he added that this is only possible once the people are separated from Moscow.

I think we can all agree with that statement in principle, but it is not always so easy to find the proper policy to encourage that separation. Right Hon. Anthony Eden, in the article which my hon. friend quoted from the Daily Telegraph of London, dated January 20, 1950, said as follows:

> Independent nationalist communism (in China) is certainly possible later—but we should be unwise to count on it.

I agree with that statement and I agree further that we should be unwise to base our policy on its happening. Nevertheless, we should take advantage of any opportunity that may present itself to bring that sort of thing about. One such opportunity has been put forward in some quarters as existing at this time, in increasing importance, namely in encouraging and developing trade between the east and the west. The other night, as reported at page 3380 of Hansard, the Leader of the Opposition said this:

> . . . we do not need to sell our principles for a few dollars' worth of trade.

That is right, Mr. Speaker, we do not need to do that; and so far as this government is concerned, I am sure we do not intend to do so. It is true, however, that there are efforts now being made by the U.S.S.R. and communist governments to increase such trade. Why such efforts are being made at this time must of course be a matter for speculation, but one can be sure they contain much political and propaganda content. I believe we can also be pretty sure that these efforts are not designed to help us. But it is still not impossible that some countries of the free world would be assisted by an increase in east-west trade, that their economic strength would be made greater by that trade, and that that in turn would strengthen their defensive capacity.

The President of the United States himself as recently as yesterday, in his message to congress, had something to say about this. He said:

> Curtailment of our aid programs will increase the pressures for resumption of such trade. A greater exchange of peaceful goods between east and west so far as it can be achieved without jeopardizing national security, and subject to our embargo on communist China and North Korea, should not cause us undue concern.

So far as trade in strategic goods is concerned, no question arises because that is prohibited, and that prohibition will remain as long as circumstances remain as they are at present. But we should do our best to agree as to what is to be included on that list. So far as the proposals for trade in non-strategic goods are concerned, I suggest that each one of these can be considered on its merit, and that consideration will have to include, of course, our experiences in the past, to which allusion was made the other evening, and in regard to the risk of relying on such trade, and the fact that we should not deceive ourselves that we are likely to find in the Soviet union, for example, any considerable market at any time for Canadian agricultural products.

It is true that Soviet agricultural policy has, if not collapsed, at least been very disappointing to those who have been responsible for it, and it is true, according to our information, that there are shortages of agricultural products in the U.S.S.R. But I would remind the house that in the twenties, at a time when there was famine in Russia, the Soviet union of that day did not hesitate to export agricultural products to obtain the currency which they needed for their own industrialization. I believe we would be making an optimistic mistake if we expected the Soviet union to be a lucrative market for Canadian exports of that kind.

There is a paragraph, Mr. Speaker, from the Randall report which was submitted to congress the other day on the question of east-west trade, which I think is worth reading. That report contains this paragraph:

> It may well be, moreover, that more trade in goods for peaceful purposes would in itself serve to penetrate the iron curtain and advance the day when normal relationships with the peoples of eastern Europe may be resumed.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Sir Winston Churchill on February 25 last put this idea in somewhat more positive and indeed more optimistic terms when he said in London:

> The more the two great divisions of the world mingle in healthy and fertile activities of commerce, the greater is the counterpoise to purely military calculations. Other thoughts take up their place in the minds of men. Friendly infiltration can do nothing but good. We have no reason to fear it, and if communist Russia does not fear it, that in itself is a good sign.

I do not know if our optimism would go as far as that, but I think we will all agree that this problem of trade with the U.S.S.R. is a complex one except in so far as trade in strategic goods is concerned; and that proposals to this end should be considered by the government from the point of view of our own national interest which, in the case of the countries of the free world coalition, cannot be divorced from the collective interests of us all.

There were some other questions on Asia and the Pacific raised in the course of this debate. It was pointed out by more than one speaker that we should do what we can as a government and as a country to prevent or assist in the prevention of further aggressive communist conquests in that part of the world.

Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked me whether we would support the speech made in New York the night before last by the United States Secretary of State in respect of Indo-China. The hon. member quoted from that speech and I will put that quotation on the record a little more. On that occasion Mr. Dulles said:

> Under all the circumstances it seems desirable to clarify further the United States position.
>
> Under the conditions today, the imposition on southeast Asia of the political system of communist Russia and its Chinese communist ally, by whatever means, would be a grave threat to the whole free community. The United States feels that that possibility should not be passively accepted, but should be met by united action. This might involve serious risks. But these risks are far less than those that will face us a few years from now, if we dare not be resolute today.

That, of course, is a very important statement. As a government and as a parliament we should study it and find out what is involved in it before we are asked to commit ourselves either to unreserved support, or indeed to criticism of it. But I suggest this is not the time when we should be asked to line up behind it, ahead of it or against it, especially until we find out what is meant by the very important words "united action". We are, of course, taking steps to secure an analysis and explanation of what was meant by that particular statement.

I am sure we all agree there is a real danger in the extension at the present time of communist aggression in Indo-China.

There is also a danger of not supporting the existing Asian democracies as an obstacle to the extension of communism in Asia, about which so many fears have rightly been expressed. I believe that the basis of Asian security today is not only collective action against communist aggression of the kind that has been indicated, but the strengthening of Asian democracies and giving them all the support we possibly can.

Mr. Drew: I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) a question in direct relation to the point he has just made. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs had an opportunity to consider the explanation given today by President Eisenhower of that very quotation to which the minister has just referred?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I read a press account of President Eisenhower's press conference, but I would suggest that before we take any stand on this matter, if any stand is required as regards this statement of United States policy, we should be quite sure we know in our minds the meaning of what Mr. Dulles said.

Mr. Knowles: Also the meaning of the clarification.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in his speech yesterday once again brought to my attention the importance of Pacific security arrangements and the necessity for Canada participating in collective security arrangements in that region. The hon. member complained that I had pooh-poohed the importance of this matter in the past and did not seem to take it very seriously. I would like to refresh his memory for a moment, Mr. Speaker, by recalling debates we have had in this house on this very matter, and especially last February when I went with great detail into the reasons why at this time Canada's accession to membership in any of these Pacific security arrangements was not practical.

Since the last statement I made on this subject the ANZUS council has had another meeting, of which my hon. friend is no doubt aware, in Washington on the 9th and 10th of September last year, and the communique issued at the end of that council meeting included the following statement:

The council—

That is the ANZUS council.

—affirmed its readiness to consider any measure which would strengthen the defence of the area.

The Pacific area.

It unanimously—

That includes Australia and New Zealand.

—concluded, however, that to attempt to enlarge its membership would not contribute directly and materially to this end.

Soon after the council concluded its meeting Mr. Dulles had the following to say by way of comment on this point:

It is, however, unlikely that any one of these existing treaties—

The Pacific treaties.

—could itself be the framework for such development.

That is, a general security pact in the Pacific.

Indeed, before there can be much useful development by way of multilateral treaties there is need for the development, within the Pacific area, of a greater measure of international good will and a greater unity of purpose.

I suggest that the hon. member is not fair to the government when he suggests that we show no interest in this matter or are defaulting on our obligations to participate in collective security arrangements in the Pacific. Surely we have given evidence more than once of our interest in Pacific security which, as a matter of fact, is not separable from Atlantic security. But for us to try to barge our way into the ANZUS arrangement or any other Pacific security arrangement at this time would not be very good diplomacy in the face of the information that has been conveyed to us and, indeed, in the face of the efforts of the United Kingdom, whose efforts to join this organization have not been very successful. In that regard I might point out that United Kingdom interest in this matter is at least as great as ours because it has Asian and Pacific territory. Therefore I commend to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra this extract from Sir Winston Churchill's statement in the House of Commons yesterday when he was being pressed to make representations to the United States on another matter which he did not think would be successful:

Blunt refusals are very serious things. We do not in diplomacy, and even in relations with the most friendly and kindred allies, lead up to anything that may finish in a blunt refusal.

I hope my hon. friend will take my assurance that if we have any reason to believe that we would get anything but a blunt refusal in the expression of our interest in further Pacific security arrangements we would be glad to investigate the matter further.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? Has he explored the possibility of Canada becoming a party to the ANZUS treaty?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, we have, in Washington, as to the views of the United States government, and in Australia, as to the views of the Australian government, concerning the extension of the ANZUS treaty to include other states. I should think the statements I have just put on the record from the communique of the council and from Mr. Dulles would give the hon. member a clear-cut answer to any such explorations.

Mr. Green: Has the minister any alternative type of agreement to suggest?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, we are in continuous consultation with our friends in Washington and other places on this matter. The hon. member mentioned yesterday that Senator Knowland had recently proposed further discussions with respect to the broadening of these security arrangements. We were interested in that, and if the United States administration felt that would be a useful and wise thing to do at this time and we were invited, together with other countries, to participate in any discussions which were designed to bring about greater security in the Pacific, naturally we would give any such invitation the most sympathetic consideration. I cannot go any further than that now, nor do I think I should be asked to do so.

I come now to a subject that, while not the most important, has been the one raised most often in this debate, the question of the recognition of the communist government in China. I should like to say a few words on that subject to clear up the position of the government, if it needs clearing. Legal recognition is, as has already been pointed out in this debate, something you give for your own national advantage in your own national interest, which includes as the most important objective of all, maintaining and strengthening the peace. If, as has been pointed out this afternoon, recognition meant giving approval, if it were only a question of moral judgment, we should today, I suggest, have no diplomatic contact with communist countries—except the communist country of Yugoslavia which is in a very different category—in our own capital or at the United Nations. On this point of recognition Mr. Dulles, speaking the day before yesterday in New York, said:

> Generally, it is useful that there should be diplomatic intercourse between those who exercise de facto governmental authority and it is well established that recognition does not imply moral approval.

"Does not imply moral approval", he said. He went on:

> President Monroe, in his famous message to congress, denounced the expansionist and despotic system of czarist Russia and its allies. But he said that it would nevertheless be our policy "to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us." That has indeed been the general United States policy, and I believe that it is a sound general policy. However, where it does not serve our interests we are free to vary from it.

The Leader of the Opposition, speaking the other day on this point, said that recognition also means admission to the United Nations. Here is what he said:

> Do not let the Secretary of State for External Affairs or anyone else in the house suggest it can be otherwise.

Yet that is exactly what the hon. gentleman himself suggested on January 29, as found at page 1621 of Hansard. He said:

> Let us remember, of course, the distinction between recognition and entry into the United Nations. There seems to be confusion about that. Recognition simply means formal recognition of a government as the de facto government of the state with which we are prepared to do business. Whether or not we are prepared to do business with communist China is something still to be considered, but there is a vast difference between recognition and the entry of the government of communist China into the United Nations.

I suggest that the hon. gentleman was right on at least one of those occasions. But I do not think it matters very much whether or not it means entry into the United Nations. It is more of an academic question than otherwise at the moment. There are a good many members of the United Nations today who have recognized communist China and have not voted for her admission into the United Nations when that subject has come up. There are other states which have been recognized by practically every government in the world and are not members of the United Nations.

The Leader of the Opposition also said that he was "against recognition under present conditions and in the circumstances of today." That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly the position of the government and I think it explains what I meant when I said in Chicago that we were a little more careful in our attitude and, as I thought, more realistic than they were over there. We do not say, as has been said elsewhere, that we will "never" recognize the government now in authority in China. We have said that if conditions and circumstances change we will have another look at the matter. Surely that is only common sense. For as the Leader of the Opposition said, as found at page 3381 of Hansard:

> No one can say that anything is forever in this very uncertain world.

But then the Leader of the Opposition added that in my statement reported from Windsor I went further than that, and I suggest that I did not. He quoted the words attributed to me in a Canadian Press dispatch, and I am not quarrelling with its accuracy a bit. These were the words:

> If Red China adopts a conciliatory attitude at the Geneva conference, Canada might take a new look at this problem.

Then, I added, "Remember that conference is to be about Korea."

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) then referred to what a reporter in Windsor called a summary of further observations and from this summary he built up the thesis that we were contemplating some kind of early recognition or some kind of deal at Geneva —I use that word not in any unparliamentary sense—which might bring about recognition. This summary, the words of which the Leader of the Opposition, as reported on page 3374 of Hansard for March 26, 1954, were mistakenly attributed to me—and I know that was accidental—reports me as having said:

> If the Reds are willing to give assurances that their aggression in Korea is a thing of the past and that they are ready to take an honest line in international affairs, he said, Canada must consider following Great Britain's lead in recognizing the Peking regime.

Well that summary, as summaries often do, gave a wrong impression if interpreted to mean that all the Peking government has to do at Geneva is to say, "We are sorry; we will be a respectable government in the future", and then we will recognize them. My own recollection, based on the notes I had, gives a somewhat different picture than the summary. I believe, however, that one indication of changed circumstances which would bring about, as I see it, another look by the government at this matter, would be an assurance, not merely by words, that the Chinese communist forces were willing to withdraw from Korea and agree to a peace settlement in Korea in accordance with the principles laid down by the United Nations. The end of aggression in Indo-China would be another such indication.

The Leader of the Opposition was very sceptical, and I am not quarrelling with him on this, about the value of any assurances from communists. After some experience in the matter I am inclined to agree that verbal or written assurances from that quarter are very often worthless. But, Mr. Speaker, I had in mind the kind of assurance that the member for Prince Albert was no doubt talking about when he gave the government this advice in referring to the Geneva conference. I am quoting from page 3340 of Hansard for March 25, 1954:

> I think Canadians will expect that the minister at the Geneva conference . . . will demand the fullest assurances that aggression will be banished by it.

It is that kind of assurance that might make it possible for us to have a new look at this question.

Meanwhile the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to deal with and to negotiate with this Chinese government at Geneva at a political conference. In doing so we are merely recognizing the facts of the present situation. Mr. Eden was quoted by the Leader of the Opposition the other day as saying that the decision to recognize communist China is eventually inescapable. I will not go as far as that. I do not know. But the necessity of dealing at Geneva with this government is certainly inescapable. That is the reason we are going to Geneva.

The other night the Leader of the Opposition suggested that British policy on the recognition of communist China was that of the Labour government and not necessarily that of the United Kingdom as a whole. He felt that some statements of Mr. Eden's supported that point of view. I suggest that that is not a historically accurate portrayal of the situation because the leader of the Conservative party, shortly before recognition was given on November 17, 1950—Mr. Churchill, as he then was—said that diplomatic relations should be established with the communist regime. The Conservative party, as a party, did not oppose the Labour government of the day in London when it announced its decision.

So far as Canada is concerned, Mr. Speaker, we will not act at Geneva, I hope, in a way which would betray national honour, national interests, or our hopes for peace. We are going there, so far as Korea is concerned, to convert an armistice into a peace. We have a United Nations resolution for that purpose which, as I suggested the other day, will be our instructions on this matter.

It has been said by more than one hon. member of the opposition that we have adopted a different attitude in respect to Indo-China. We were asked why we did not show a more active interest in the Indo-Chinese problem, which is possibly as important to the peace of the world as the Korean problem. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is a very real difference between the two positions in so far as Canadian participation, if not Canadian interests, is concerned. We have been invited to Geneva, as a member of the United Nations with forces participating in Korea, to help bring about a peace settlement. The text of the invitation makes that quite clear, and I shall read it:

> In accordance with the proposal agreed upon at a meeting of the foreign ministers of the United States, France, the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, February 18, 1954, and announced in the enclosed communique of the same date the government of the United States has the honour to extend to the government of Canada an invitation to participate, if it so desires, in the Korean political conference to be convened at Geneva on April 26.

In so far as the Indo-Chinese aspect of this conference is concerned, the communique of the foreign ministers in Berlin has this to say. They are agreeable that the problem of restoring peace in Indo-China will also be discussed at the conference, to which representatives of the United States, France, United Kingdom, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Chinese People's Republic and other interested states will be invited. Our position here is, however, entirely different. We have not been invited to take part in the Indo-Chinese discussions. There was a basis for our invitation to the Korean peace conference because we are a participating power in the Korean operation. It might be a quite different situation in so far as Indo-China is concerned.

It may well be that those most immediately concerned will want to keep that conference restricted to those who are actually concerned with Indo-Chinese operations.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister be kind enough to read that communique again, because it does not seem to be capable of the interpretation he is putting upon it.

Mr. Pearson: It says they are agreed that the problem in Indo-China will also be discussed at the conference—that is the Korean conference—to which representatives—that is to the Indo-Chinese discussion—to which representatives of the United States, France, United Kingdom, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Chinese People's Republic and other interested states will be invited.

Mr. Fulton: That surely refers to the Korean conference.

Mr. Pearson: It has been made quite clear to us that "the interested parties" refers to those who may be invited to the Indo-Chinese talks. If we are invited we shall play as active a part as we can. However, if it appears to be in the best interests of settling the problem that the discussion be restricted to the four or five countries immediately concerned, I do not think it would serve the best interests of peace to press for an invitation.

In the process of negotiations at Geneva, concessions of some kind may be necessary on both sides to reach any solution. For instance, if some concessions had not been made and some compromise had not been reached at Panmunjom—a compromise upon which the United Nations did not desert its principles—we would have had no armistice at all and no peace negotiations could even be attempted in Geneva. No one I assume opposes or opposed at the time the armistice, and no one in this house opposes the invitation to the Geneva conference. It may be that the hon. member for Prince Albert has some mental reservation about the wisdom of this conference. He is quoted as having said in Toronto, according to the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 9, that the Red Chinese attendance at the conference in Geneva is a victory for Russia. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the case; because China will not be in Geneva as one of the five great powers, or after recognition, or even as an inviting power. Indeed, it is hard to imagine Mr. Dulles, Mr. Eden or Mr. Bidault agreeing to a proposal for a conference at Geneva, if it were a victory for Russia.

Red China will be at that conference in Geneva because we cannot negotiate a peace in Korea without her attendance. Whether we can do it with her attendance remains to be seen.

On February 2, 1951, I said in the house, referring to the Chinese communists:

> They should not think that they can bludgeon or blackmail their way into recognition or the United Nations.

I still feel that way, and also feel that Peking should not be granted diplomatic recognition merely because they signed an armistice in Korea or have agreed to go to a conference in Geneva. But that does not mean that we will not negotiate with this government now in authority in China, when we should do so, or with any other communist government when it is necessary to do so.

We have accepted this invitation, and I hope the Canadian delegation will not follow any course at Geneva or take any action there which would justify the gloomy forebodings expressed last Friday by the Leader of the Opposition, based upon impressions—and as I see it erroneous impressions—that he had received from press quotations. We are not carrying an umbrella to Geneva, nor are we brandishing a bomb either.

Last Friday some pretty violent language was used in respect of some who will be attending this conference. Communist leaders were called thieves and murderers, and there was talk about compromising with the devil. There was talk about the extermination of these tormentors and betrayers of humanity.

I am not sure that very much is gained by this kind of talk on the eve of a meeting, the invitation to which we have accepted and which, after all, cannot achieve anything positive except by some kind of agreement after negotiation with these people.

Then, having painted a pretty black picture of what we are up against, the leader of the official opposition surprised me by saying also—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not suggesting that those words he quoted are mine, is he? The ones with regard to thieves referred to China, which has our ships; and they are stolen.

Mr. Pearson: I did not identify those words with any particular member in the house. The Leader of the Opposition did mention thieves and murderers.

Mr. Drew: With regard to the Ming Sung ships.

Mr. Pearson: He was talking about communists in China, and he did mention the danger of dealing with the devil in respect of communist negotiations.

Mr. Drew: But the other words are not mine. I just wish to make that clear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the minister wish to continue, or shall we declare the motion carried?

Mr. Coldwell: Why not finish now?

Mr. Pearson: If I can have five minutes I could finish.

Mr. Speaker: A messenger from the Senate has just come to the door.

Mr. Coldwell: Why can that not wait?

Mr. Harris: On one point of order, Mr. Speaker, would it be the desire of the house to continue, and to finish this debate when we come back from the Senate rather than continue it later?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think we had better follow the usual procedure.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.

An act respecting Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

An act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

An act respecting the export and import of strategic and other goods.

An act to establish an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1955.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1954.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall go on with this debate and then the Criminal Code. It may be that the Minister of Justice will find it desirable to ask that certain sections stand. When they have all been disposed of, either by having been passed or having been allowed to stand, we shall then take supply, the Department of Public Works. But on Friday we shall return to the Criminal Code for whatever part may not be disposed of tomorrow.

It being ten minutes after six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 1, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Fourth and fifth reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Hunter.

Second report of sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Cavers.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That votes Nos. 465, 469, 474 and 475 of the estimates for 1954-55 approved and reported upon this day by the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

C.B.C. EMPLOYEES—TRIPS ABROAD

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Did any employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation visit countries outside of Canada during the past two years?
2. If so, what expense was incurred?
3. What countries were visited, and what was the purpose of such visits?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes.

2. $86,583.57.

3. (a) United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Norway, Finland, Korea, Jamaica, Mexico, and South America.

(b) Broadcasting coverage such as that of the coronation, activities of Canadian forces in Korea and Europe, Olympic games, royal tour, United Nations, international conferences, etc.; business with outside broadcasting organizations on exchange of programs, etc.; negotiations of arrangements with outside networks for commercial programs; exchange of information on broadcasting developments and consultation regarding matters of frequencies; attending international conferences; procurement of equipment; special training of personnel; and the gathering of information necessary for the corporation.

C.B.C.—PRESS AND INFORMATION DIVISION

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What was the cost of operating press and information division of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953?
2. How many employees does this division have?
3. In what cities are they located?
4. What is the purpose and function of this division?
5. Does it supply free mats or cuts to newspapers and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. McCann:

1. $370,584 for sound broadcasting and television services.

2. Stenographic and clerical—42; others—33.

3. Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax.

4. The purpose of the press and information division is to provide information on the programs and activities of the corporation to publications, organizations, the broadcasting industry, and the public in general. This includes the following functions: writing or editing general publications, and also extension type publications used in connection with certain broadcasts as supplementary material; writing and editing C.B.C. Times; maintenance and supervision of C.B.C. reference libraries; replies to audience mail; dealing with requests for general, and specific, information on C.B.C. activities; supervision of reception and information desks and receiving telephone calls for general information; arranging and conducting studio tours for individuals and groups; arranging for speakers on C.B.C. activities for clubs and other organizations; ordering and circulating magazines, periodicals, newspapers and books required by C.B.C. specialist and other staff; handling details in connection with audience programs such as printing of tickets and distribution; writing and distribution of national and regional news stories on C.B.C. programs and activities; supplying journalists and feature writers with information on C.B.C. programs, including biographical information and photos of artists and performers; providing daily newspapers with program schedules of C.B.C. stations; planning and writing all microphone announcements of C.B.C. programs; providing affiliated private stations with information on network programs; meeting individuals, and groups, representing the press to supply information on C.B.C. programs and activities; arranging for and supervising the printing of C.B.C. publications, including pamphlets and booklets of information; maintaining records of information on sound broadcasting and television not normally available from other sources.

5. Newspapers are not supplied with cuts. Some newspapers which have requested the service are supplied with limited mat service at no charge. The main purpose of this service is to provide newspapers with illustrative material which directly or indirectly calls the attention of readers to Canadian artists featured, or participating, in C.B.C. radio or television programs.

FRENCH NATIONALS IN CANADA CONVICTED IN FRENCH COURTS

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Are there any French nationals now resident in Canada who have been convicted in the French courts of treason or of collaboration with the German occupying forces?
2. If so, how many and who are they?
3. How many, if any, entered the country illegally and have now been permitted to stay?
4. How many have applied for Canadian citizenship?
5. How many have been granted Canadian citizenship?

Mr. Harris:

1. Yes.

2. The department knows of the following:
Dr. Andre Charles Emmanuel Boussat,
Jean Louis Huc,
Julien Gaudens Labedan,
Dr. Georges Benoit Montel,
Michel Lucien Seigneur.

3. All the above named. Copies of the orders in council under which they were landed were tabled in the House of Commons on the 11th day of March, 1949.

4. Four.

5. Three.

R.C.A.F., SASKATOON—REFRIGERATORS, ETC.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many electric refrigerators, deep freeze units, etc., have been purchased and delivered to the Royal Canadian Air Force station at Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, in each of the years 1952 and 1953?
2. What were the brand names or trade names of each of such units, from whom were they purchased and at what prices?
3. Were any of said units removed in either of said years?
4. If so, how many and for what reason?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Refrigerators: 70 in 1952 and 100 in 1953; Deep freeze units: 1 in 1952 and 1 in 1953.

2. This type of equipment is generally purchased in quantity through the Department of Defence Production and stored in R.C.A.F. supply depots until issued and this was the case with 158 units. It is not possible without tracing each unit back through each step from final issue to original procurement to ascertain from whom and at what price specific refrigerators were originally purchased.

Twelve Admiral refrigerators were purchased in 1953 through the Department of Defence Production at McMullen Supplies Limited, Ottawa, at a cost of $154.76 each, and these units were shipped direct to R.C.A.F. station, Saskatoon, to meet an immediate requirement.

The two deep freeze units were purchased locally through the local offices of the Department of Defence Production. A Home Freezer Company deep freeze was purchased from Ward Electric in Saskatoon at a cost of $528.40. An 8-door reach-in cooler was purchased from Ashdown Hardware in Saskatoon at a cost of $475. These are in use in the station's kitchen.

3. No.

4. Not applicable.

IGOR GOUZENKO—APPEARANCE ON U.S. TV PROGRAM

Mr. Fulton:

1. Did the Canadian government, or anyone on behalf of Canada, concur in arrangements for Igor Gouzenko to appear on a TV program with Mr. Drew Pearson on an American network?
2. Did the Canadian government, or anyone on behalf of Canada, take any part in making, or express any opinion as to the nature of, any such arrangements?
3. If so, to what effect?

Mr. Garson:

1. No.

2. Neither the Canadian government nor anyone acting on behalf of Canada took any part in making such arrangements or expressed an opinion as to the nature of such arrangements.

3. Answered by No. 2.

NATIONAL GALLERY—INFORMATION SERVICE

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East):

1. Has the national gallery of Canada any information service?
2. If so, is such service bilingual?
3. If not, does the national gallery apply to the information division of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?
4. Is the national gallery making further use of the said division in order to keep the public informed on its activities?

Mr. Harris:

1. No, not as such.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

COAL SUBVENTIONS—NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Brooks:

1. What amount was paid by the federal government in coal subventions to coal operators of (a) Nova Scotia; (b) New Brunswick, for the years 1950 to 1953 inclusive?

2. What proportion of the amount paid to Nova Scotia operators was for coal shipped for use in New Brunswick?

3. What proportion of the amount paid to New Brunswick operators was for coal shipped for use in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Prudham:

1.

(a)

Nova Scotia

1950	$ 1,005,437.70
1951	3,074,465.83
1952	5,194,287.78
1953	6,101,713.82
	$ 15,375,905.13

(b)

New Brunswick

1950	$ 1,938.93
1951	2,633.64
1952	3,780.16
1953	7,852.84
	$ 16,205.57

2. Nil.

3. Nil.

It will be noted that in the case of shipments via rail, payment of subvention is made to the railway on which the shipment originates.

FIRST AND SECOND WORLD WARS—EXPENDITURES

Mr. Boisvert:

What was the total cost in dollars, to Canada, for (a) the first world war; (b) the second world war?

Mr. Abbott: See parliamentary paper No. 198, tabled March 4, 1954.

SPEECHES BY MINISTERS OF THE CROWN

Mr. Hamilton:

1. For the years 1947-1953 inclusive:

(a) How many speeches and statements by ministers of the crown have been made available in printed or mimeographed form for free public distribution on request?

(b) What has been the total number of copies of such speeches distributed without charge, including the above public distribution and for press, radio and all other purposes?

2. For each of the following publications listed in the 1953 catalogue of the queen's printer:

(a) What is the title?

(b) How many copies were printed?

(c) What is the price?

(d) How many copies have been sold at this price?

(e) How many copies have been distributed without charge?

Bulletins of the biological board of Canada No. 54.
Journal of the fisheries research board of Canada—
Volume VI, No. 3, pp. 281-290; No. 4, pp. 349-350; No. 6, pp. 419-434.
Volume VII, No. 4, pp. 169-175; No. 9, pp. 561-562.
Publications of the dominion observatory—
Volume 1, No. 6; No. 13.
Volume 11, No. 8.

Mr. Pickersgill:

1. (a) and (b). No statistics are kept in most government departments from which it would be possible to give an answer to this question.

2. Order for return.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT—APPLICATIONS FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Robichaud:

1. How many applications were received from New Brunswick under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, for each of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953?

2. How many loans were granted for each of the years above-mentioned and what was the total amount for each year?

Mr. Abbott:

1. Not of government record. Applications are made to the chartered banks who grant the loans. If loans are not granted the Department of Finance is not advised.

2.

Calendar year	No. of loans	Amount
1951	655	$696,750.78
1952	866	926,499.14
1953	896	925,977.28

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT—APPLICATIONS FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Robichaud:

1. How many applications were received from the province of New Brunswick under the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, for each of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953?

2. How many loans were granted for each of the years above mentioned and what was the total amount for each year?

Mr. Abbott:

1. Not of government record. Applications are made to the chartered banks who grant the loans. If loans are not granted the Department of Finance is not advised.

2. Fiscal year

ended March 31(x)	No. of loans	Amount
1951	16	$30,830
1952	11	24,450
1953	7	9,223

Note: The records of these loans are maintained on a fiscal year basis.

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Boisvert:

What was the total national debt of Canada in (a) 1913; (b) 1919; (c) 1939; (d) 1945?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Abbott:

March 31	Net debt of Canada
1913	$ 314,301,625.68
1919	1,574,531,032.44
1939	3,152,559,314.48
1945	11,298,362,017.77

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

FAMILY ALLOWANCES AND OLD AGE PAYMENTS—QUEBEC

Mr. Boisvert:

What was the amount paid to the province of Quebec from 1945 to 1953 inclusive for (a) family allowances; (b) old age security; (c) old age pension; (d) pensions to the blind; (e) pensions to the veterans?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member would amend this question to read "fiscal years 1945-1953 inclusive," it would facilitate answering it, and it could be made an order for return.

Mr. Boisvert: I agree that should be done.

Mr. Speaker: It is made an order for return, as amended.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

INQUIRY AS TO ENTRY OF U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has any offer been received or any suggestion been brought to the attention of the Canadian government that the U.S.S.R. would join NATO? What is the attitude of the Canadian government with regard to the rather grotesque provisos?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have seen the text of the communication addressed to the foreign ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States and France by the foreign minister of the U.S.S.R. on this subject. It was not addressed to any other foreign ministers. In so far as the Canadian government's reaction is concerned, I may have a word or two to say about it when I conclude the debate.

PUBLIC WORKS

USE OF IMPORTED STEEL IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister explain to the house the reason why German steel was recently landed at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, to be used in connection with a public works project? I sent the minister evidence of this.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I am grateful to the hon. member for having sent me notice of his question, which I received a moment ago. The steel in question was transported by German ship, but I understand it was actually French steel, imported in the interests of economic and early delivery.

TELEVISION

RESTRICTED COVERAGE OF GENERAL FOODS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Why did CBOT curtail televising the General Foods program last Sunday evening, when it was carried in full by Toronto, Montreal and every station on the continent of North America?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I shall take the hon. member's question as a notice and give an answer later.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED SUPPLYING OF SABRE JETS TO GERMAN LUFTWAFFE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a story in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that a large number of Canadian-built Sabre jets are bound for the German luftwaffe? Could the minister indicate how many planes, and the amount of money involved?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give notice of his question. There is nothing whatever in the suggestion that "Canadian-built Sabre jets are destined for the reborn German air force" if, by that, is meant that any decision has been made to make Sabres available to West Germany.

When Canadian equipment is available for mutual aid, we inform the standing group of NATO, and the standing group recommends how the equipment should be allocated among the different NATO countries which may want it. The Canadian government then considers whether or not to accept the recommendation. All the Sabres so far made available for mutual aid have been allocated in accordance with the recommendations of the standing group. The question of any allocation to Germany has never come up in any way for consideration. Neither the Department of National Defence nor any agency of the Canadian government has given even the most preliminary kind of consideration to making any class or kind of equipment available for Germany.

I should like to add a word about another statement in this dispatch because, taken from its context, it might give rise to a very serious misunderstanding. It says, "Senior R.A.F. officers frankly admit that they do not want Sabres". I do not know whether senior R.A.F. officers have said any such thing; but I should say this, that the article makes it perfectly clear and plain that, if they did say it, it is in no sense a reflection on the Sabre, but that it is in accordance with R.A.F. policy—or possible policy—of using their own aircraft, when they come into production on a large enough scale to enable them to do so.

I might add that the 370 Sabres we transferred to Great Britain were transferred at the urgent request of the then Labour government, and the chief of the air staff of the R.A.F. That request was supported by the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill, when he visited Ottawa in January of 1952, when he urged this upon me personally and other members of the government in the strongest possible terms.

The article makes the purpose of this quite clear when it says:

> The Canadian-built Sabre sent to the R.A.F. was interim assistance. They filled a dangerous void in R.A.F. fighter command at a time when Britain was woefully lacking first-line interceptor jets.

Now, with regard to the allocation of equipment that may become available for mutual aid, the Canadian government will continue to receive the advice of the standing group, and it will make up its mind what to do in the light of conditions existing at the time, so that the equipment may be best used to build up the strength of the North Atlantic treaty nations to resist aggression and to ensure a continuing peace. And the obvious necessity of continuing to meet this objective has been made very plain—indeed plainer than ever—by the events of the last few days.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question of either the Minister of National Defence or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Has any decision in fact been taken either by the NATO powers or by the allies and/or the occupying powers in Germany to revive the luftwaffe, or any other form of German air force?

Mr. Claxton: The agreement to end occupation, which was signed in May of 1952, provides for limited rearmament of Germany on a scale that is there spelled out; and the North Atlantic council has passed a resolution to associate NATO with EDC if and when that is brought into effect, and in consequence of the arrangement being ratified. At the present time there is no provision for any West German force, except as permitted by the occupying powers.

Mr. Fulton: That does not include an air force.

Mr. Claxton: That is correct today.

Mr. Fulton: No decision has been taken about an air force, has there?

Mr. Claxton: I think the agreement to end occupation does provide for a limited air force for tactical purposes.

GRAIN

REDUCTION IN RYE SHIPMENTS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of today's press report that there is a substantial reduction in the shipments of rye to the United States, and that importations following June will be cut to three and a third million bushels where, formerly, we sold about nine million bushels, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if his department or the government is going to make any effort to have the matter reconsidered.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The tariff commission brought down a decision some weeks ago to reduce the imports of rye from Canada to three million bushels odd, which was the average for the last five years of imports into the United States. This year the United States market has had to contend with abnormally heavy imports of twelve million bushels, and that arrived on the American market at a time when the American crop was unusually large. The recommendation of the tariff board was that the before-mentioned quota be applied indefinitely in the future.

I notice that the President, in his statement, said that he did not agree with the tariff board on that point, and that the quota will apply for the balance of this crop year, and for all of the next crop year, and then expire. After that a new hearing would be required before any further quota is applied.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming: May I ask a supplementary question. If this quota is applied by the United States would it not constitute a breach of GATT?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, technically it would probably constitute a breach of GATT. But I do not think we are going to complain to GATT and make a major issue of a matter which this year would amount to $9 million worth of rye. It does not seem sufficiently important to call on the machinery of GATT.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INVESTIGATION BY COMMISSION CONCERNING LOST TIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Will the minister inform the house whether the unemployment insurance commission has made a report on their endeavour to find a solution to the problem of an employee who loses one day each week in a normal five-day week, and if favourable consideration will be given to an employee receiving benefits for the one day lost through lack of available work.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I do not have the report before me. However, I shall take my hon. friend's question as a notice and try to answer at a later date.

SALES TAX

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OR REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? In view of the reduction in excise taxes made by the United States, will the minister, if he has not already taken such action, give consideration between now and Tuesday night to the elimination or reduction of the federal sales tax?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The minister considers everything at a time like this, but I would point out to my hon. friend, and he may or may not know it, that what he refers to as a reduction in excise tax made in the United States is so far only a suggested reduction.

Mr. Knowles: My question was a suggestion, too.

TRADE

SUPREME POWER SUPPLIES LIMITED—EXPORT PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) asked me whether or not Supreme Power Supplies Limited, of Mimico, had been refused an export permit for transformers and other goods for shipment to Latin America or to any other country.

My officers have advised me that in recent months no applications for export permits have been received from this company by the Department of Trade and Commerce. Perhaps if the company is having difficulty obtaining a permit, it is to obtain an import licence from a country in Latin America.

The last applications on record were for an export permit covering transformers in April 1951, and for a small shipment of steel to the United Kingdom in December, 1952. Both these permits were approved.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he in a position to give a report on the present position of the pollution of the waters of the North Saskatchewan river? What assurance has his officials received that there will be no repetition of the pollution in question?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I gave my hon. friend a very encouraging report a few days ago, but beyond that I cannot add anything now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, of the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the discussion, which I regret I was not able to finish at six o'clock, I tried to deal with some of the questions, indeed most of the questions, I think, that have been raised in the course of this debate. In so far as European questions were concerned I tried to emphasize yesterday that we on this side shared the anxiety of those on the other side about the rearmament of Germany; but we ask those who criticize the policy that is now being pursued, to submit a better solution than that put forth by the European defence community, and to explain how, under the present division of the world between east and west, the present division of Germany between east and west, and in the light of the history of the years between the wars, it can be expected that we can keep Germany neutral or disarmed or both?

In so far as east-west trade is concerned, I said that while there are risks here and while expectations of benefits from this trade may be pitched too high, nevertheless all proposals for such trade in non-strategic goods should be examined on their merits, and in the words of President Eisenhower, increases in such trade "should not cause us undue concern."

In so far as the recognition of communist China was concerned, I tried to restate the government's policy, which is, to use the words used by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) in describing the policy of his own party, "non-recognition under present conditions and in the circumstances of today."

At the end of the sitting yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I was trying to emphasize that in the situation which confronts us today a continuing effort to negotiate outstanding problems is I think essential; otherwise we must admit the permanence, and the unbridgeable nature, of the division of the world. One way by which such an admission would become apparent would be the exclusion of all cominform states from the United Nations, and by converting that organization into an agency for the prosecution of our side of the cold war. I think myself that course would be profoundly wrong.

If this negotiation is to go on, from strength with strength, with wisdom—which includes a full realization of the conspiratorial forces we are up against, and an even more complete understanding of the price of failure —then I suggest that our diplomacy should be characterized by flexibility as well as by strength. We should not mistake flexibility for weakness, or rigidity for strength.

In his statement in the house the leader of the official opposition painted what I thought was a somewhat gloomy picture of what we are up against today, and I certainly do not take exception with him for the colour of the picture which he painted. But he also went on—and this somewhat surprised me—to say, at page 3372 of Hansard:

> The fact is that we are perhaps nearer the hope of lasting peace today than we have been for a very long time.

I think he found reason for that statement in the fact that we have now developed weapons so annihilating in character that no one will want to use them, and there will be a sort of uneasy truce in the world, based on a self-denying ordinance to that effect. To support that thesis he used the analogy of the decision of powers in recent wars on both sides not to use poison gas. This is an analogy which I think myself is not too well founded, because I have heard it stated by military experts that poison gas and bacteriological warfare were not used because such use was not likely to end the war by one quick, devastating blow, and because there were other agencies of destruction at that time more efficient for the purpose. I suggest that the situation is not the same now. In any event, can anyone get any real comfort, security, or assurance that we are really nearing lasting peace, from the prospect of two implacably hostile power groups facing each other in fear and animosity with their hydrogen bombs ready, each one of which would have a destructive force many hundred times greater than that bomb which killed 60,000 people at Hiroshima?

As the Leader of the Opposition himself said—and these words removed from my mind much if not all of the feeling of reassurance that the earlier words may have given:

> Someone may go beyond the controllable limit and thus send dangerous and deadly radiation throughout the greater part of the world. That is now a real and dreadful possibility.

He added:

> Some madman, cornered and hopeless, might employ this dreadful weapon.

And he went on:

> We should be seeking to prevent this frightful possibility.

I am sure we all agree with him on that. One way to do so is to keep strong and steady and united. Another is not to provoke unnecessarily a potential aggressor by driving him, maddened and hopeless, into a corner. The Leader of the Opposition followed the words which I have just quoted with these:

> . . . most of us share . . . a faith that always contemplates the possibility of a change in conduct, forgiveness and of the return to fellowship and decency of those who have offended against the laws of God and the laws of man.

I think we can also all agree with him on that, and I suggest that we should keep that idea in mind as we talk about retaliation as a deterrent and about liberation of the enslaved as a means of keeping their spirits alive. To counsel patience and persistence in negotiations is often termed appeasement, a word which is often thrown out to slur and frighten without any particular effort to understand its meaning. If appeasement means betrayal of our friends and our principles for some selfish but illusory advantage, then I suppose the worst kind of appeasement is to promise something for this purpose that you cannot fulfil, to bluff when you would not be likely or able to act if your bluff were called.

Therefore there lies, I think, at least some danger from eloquent and emotional appeals to support a policy of liberation of the enslaved masses under communist rule by giving them comfort and encouragement for the good and valid purpose of keeping up their spirits, a policy which might, if not handled carefully, also raise dangerous hopes that we can do anything now by action to help them throw off the yoke.

During this debate, Mr. Speaker, we listened to thoughtful and, indeed, eloquent statements by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) relating more particularly to one enslaved people, the Ukrainians, and the desire on their part, a desire which is shared by all of us, that one day they may again be free. I know it is the last thing these hon. members would have in mind that hopes should be held out which could not be immediately fulfilled and, indeed, they both made that point in their statements.

On this question of liberation Mr. George Kennan, former counsel for the United States state department, uttered what I think were wise words at Princeton University on March 30. He said:

> . . . containment and liberation are only two sides of the same coin and both part of a greater problem—the problem of how the behaviour of this nation—

He was speaking about his own country.

> —is to be so shaped as to command the hope and confidence of all those who wish us well, and the respect of all those who do not, whatever side of the curtain they may be on.

There is also, I think, the same kind of danger in emphasizing the policy of retaliation as a deterrent to aggression in a way which would give the impression—and Mr. Dulles himself has pointed this out—that every kind of aggressive communist action will be met by instant and overwhelming retaliation by all means at our disposal when in the event we may have to limit the nature of such reaction in certain circumstances because otherwise it would precipitate world war III. This difficulty and dilemma, and it is a dilemma, explains why we have to increase and strengthen consultation among friends, especially using the North Atlantic Treaty Organization council for that purpose.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the final subject with which I wish to deal and which was brought up by so many speakers in the course of this debate. I refer to the question of consultation between friends. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), as found at page 3372 of Hansard, said in reference to myself:

> He left us with the impression that massive retaliation would not occur without consultation.

But if he would read in Hansard what I said on page 3330 he would not feel that way because I used these words:

> That word—

I was talking about the word "instantly".

> —in connection with the strategy we are discussing, involves no problem, as I see it, if there is a direct attack on your own territory, or indeed possibly on the territory of your neighbour, because then it becomes a question of self-preservation and quick, effective, and instant action is essential and would be taken by any country attacked. No one, I believe, would take exception to that.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in his statement said that he was not able to get very much reassurance from any clarification or explanation which had been made in recent days of this doctrine of instant retaliation as a deterrent to aggression, and which was most recently put forward by Mr. Dulles on January 12. Indeed, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) expressed the same doubts when he asked the question whether we did not have a right to more assurances than answers given by the Secretary of State in Washington at a press conference.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we have more assurances than that. We have them in the statement made by the Secretary of State before congress, and in answers to questions there, where he did say very frankly—and I confess that it was from these statements that I took some reassurance—that on every possible occasion there would be consultation among friends before action of the kind he was indicating would be taken. We know that he will do his best to carry that out.

It may be that we have not complete reassurance; it may be we will never be able to get complete reassurance in this matter. My own view is well expressed by a paragraph from an editorial in a Regina paper which I read yesterday and which reads:

> The clouds of concern may not be entirely cleared away by this reassurance. But what Mr. Dulles told the Senate committee should help considerably to allay the uneasiness within the western coalition.

The machinery of consultation can never work perfectly in a coalition of free states, but we can hope that it will be made to work as effectively as possible, and I believe that the events of the last two or three weeks have given us some additional hope in that regard.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in his statement made a remark with which, in the sense in which he made it, I am sure no one in the house will disagree when he said, when speaking about consultation and decisions made outside this country, that "Canada's foreign policy will be made right here under this roof." In one sense of course he is completely right, but in another sense I suggest that that statement is unrealistic, if I may use that word, unless we wish to withdraw from the coalition and go it alone, which I am sure none of us do. Even if we did withdraw from this coalition our decisions made under this roof would certainly be influenced by the decisions of others, especially in Washington. Indeed, in this year of grace I suggest that no government and no parliament can make its own foreign policy decisions exclusively under its own roof, not even the government in Washington. That is why it is so important that members of the coalition consult and work together.

We can decide our own policy at times as much by convincing our friends about the rightness or wrongness of a course of action as by convincing ourselves. That is one reason why the remarks and arguments of any Canadian minister with any responsibility in the field of external relations will often have to be directed outside his own country. It is also one reason, I think, why any foreign minister in the commonwealth or in the NATO coalition has to spend so much of his time outside his own country.

I was asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Albert whether I was in a position to say anything about the new Soviet proposal for European security in so far as the reaction of the Canadian government to it is concerned.

As I indicated at the time, this proposal was directed by the Soviet foreign minister to the foreign ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States and France. As I have already indicated, I have seen the text of it, and since I have been asked many questions, possibly I should say just a word about it. This proposal, as I understand it, and there has not been much opportunity for very careful study of it as yet, has a direct relationship to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and is of considerable interest to all the members of that organization. Therefore, I assume that the questions with which it deals will be discussed at the forthcoming meeting of the North Atlantic council. That, I believe, is the appropriate forum for international consultation on this matter in so far as international consultation is concerned. But I can say this at this time that no one, I am sure, desires to reject any proposal out of hand which has any chance of bringing about good results.

In my view nothing could be more serious or more dangerous than a more or less final acceptance of the failure of man's ability to communicate with man, across whatever barriers—be they social or political—or whatever curtains—be they of metal, or propaganda, or tradition—may exist today. In a world of hydrogen weapons, genuine misunderstandings, if they become hardened into a despondent belief on either side that sincere negotiations were impossible, could have nothing but tragic consequences for everybody.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I should add this. While the west cannot afford to reject out of hand and without consideration any serious proposals for settlement that the Soviet union may propose, it is equally obvious that we cannot afford to fall into propaganda traps. Both the timing and the substance of the new Soviet proposals suggest that they may be designed chiefly to cause a delay in the ratification and implementation of the treaty to establish the European defence community. As has already been made abundantly clear, the Canadian government supports that project and hopes that it will be implemented without delay. The west cannot afford to put off decisive acts which are necessary for our own self-defence merely in exchange for Soviet words or promises.

Falling into such an obvious trap would, of course, be dangerous. We must be prepared to examine Soviet proposals and to negotiate patiently whenever there seems any prospect that negotiations may prove fruitful, but we must do this while maintaining, until they are shown to be unnecessary, policies which we have adopted with our friends as being needed for our collective defence.

Certainly at first sight the Soviet suggestion that they join NATO seems to be a somewhat surprising and indeed an almost disingenuous one. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization is based on mutual trust between governments and peoples who share many fundamental aspects of a common civilization, and who have demonstrated their desire and ability to work together. Moreover, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is more than a military alliance. It is more than a collective security organization.

It is worth remembering, also, that we and the Soviet union and all the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization belong to a universal collective security organization in the United Nations, and if the Soviet union is now prepared to make this organization effective we should certainly welcome that and the possibilities for co-operation in this field. The universal basis is there, and has been there since the United Nations was founded.

To the extent that we can have confidence in our ability, through the United Nations, to make war impossible, the defence aspects of NATO become less important. If the danger of aggression is entirely removed, then the defence aspects of NATO become unnecessary and could be replaced by a United Nations arrangement.

We in this government have never, I believe, concealed our view that the military alliance aspects of NATO are a second-best, a regrettable, and we hope a temporary necessity. Our real objective, and this applies, I am sure, to all hon. members in this house, is and has been to secure a safe and peaceful world, with collective action in all fields and international co-operation generally organized through the United Nations. Certainly that objective is far from being achieved or even approached at the present time. Therefore, surely it would be folly for us to lower our guard so long as the present danger exists.

I am not asserting that the professed Soviet desire in this proposal to join with the west in effecting arrangements for collective security is completely insincere. I do not know. I may perhaps be giving hon. members a somewhat pessimistic first interpretation, though this seems to be justified by the proposal itself and the experiences we have had.

But I think one can be pretty sure of this, that it would be fatuous to suppose, after the events of the last ten years, and while millions of people in Europe are held in subjection, that the fears and suspicions which Soviet actions have engendered in the minds of most of us west of the iron curtain will be easily or quickly removed by a few diplomatic notes. These fears were indeed engendered not by words but by deeds.

But it would be equally wrong and dangerous to think that the suspicions and fears which at present divide the world can never be overcome. If the Soviet rulers are sincere in their desire for collective security, then I am confident that they will not find the governments and peoples of the western democracies unwilling to listen to any serious overtures they may make. We will persist in our determination to meet any genuine overture for peace halfway, and indeed more than halfway.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I read these words the other day, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to conclude my statement with them. I quote:

> Those who are prone by temperament and character to seek sharp and clear-cut solutions of difficult and obscure problems, who are ready to fight whenever some challenge comes from a foreign power, have not always been right. On the other hand, those whose inclination is to bow their heads, to seek patiently and faithfully for peaceful compromise, are not always wrong. On the contrary, in the majority of instances they may be right, not only morally but from a practical standpoint. How many wars have been averted by patience and persisting good will! Religion and virtue alike lend their sanctions to meekness and humility, not only between men but between nations. How many wars have been precipitated by firebrands! How many misunderstandings which led to wars could have been removed by temporizing! How often have countries fought cruel wars and then after a few years of peace found themselves not only friends but allies!

Those words, Mr. Speaker, were written by one who has never been considered naive, soft, or indeed especially meek. Those words by Sir Winston Churchill provide a good and wise guide for the conduct of the foreign policy of Canada, both at the forthcoming Geneva conference and in the critical times ahead.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, which now ends, will also be of real assistance to the government in this regard. It has provided both spurs to and brakes against action, and has also indicated, I believe, that the broad objectives and underlying principles of our foreign policy are generally approved both in this house and by the country.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Monday, March 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: I believe the understanding is that I shall call group 3 first. Clause 134.

On clause 134—Instruction to jury.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When this matter was up for discussion originally I brought to the attention of the minister the requisite that has been part of the common law of Britain and also a rule of practice, with the authority of repeated precedent behind it, that it would be dangerous to remove the requirement that the jury should be directed that it is unsafe to convict on charges of this type unless the evidence of the prosecutrix is corroborated in some material particular. That has always been the law and it has been based on experience of generations of law and justice. It has been incorporated into the laws of practically all countries which have as their basis the common law of England. I asked the minister whether or not consideration would be given to its continuance in the code. In view of the fact that corroboration is now required under statute in so far as certain sections of the code are concerned, I pointed out that it would be tantamount, in my opinion, to giving the strongest possible support to this view. The fact that no reference is made to it in the section in question would indicate that parliament had intended that the direction heretofore given by judges in their charges to the jury and required to be given would be no longer necessary.

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert has been thinking of the law of England when he states that the law requires that the court's direction in a charge of indecent assault must be that it is not safe to convict upon the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix. In Canada that has not been the law. The Canadian law has not been the same as the British law. In proof of this I would refer my hon. and learned friend to the case of Cullen v. the King, 1949, Canadian Criminal Cases, 337, where he will see in the judgment of Mr. Justice Locke of the Supreme Court of Canada an indication of that court's opinion, put in these words:

> As to those portions of the charge dealing with the necessity for corroboration, the learned trial judge was clearly in error. There was in law no necessity for corroboration but, had there been . . .

And Mr. Justice Locke then goes on to indicate the evidence which constituted corroboration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the nature of the case?

Mr. Garson: It was a case of indecent assault. I agree with my hon. friend that what we are doing now is to provide what we think should be the law from this point on. After careful consideration of the point which my hon. friend had raised on a previous occasion, we have come to the view that whatever the law of Canada may have been up until the present time, from this point on it is desirable that our law in this regard should conform with that of the United Kingdom. I would therefore propose, Mr. Chairman, that one of my colleagues would make the following motion:

> That clause 134 be amended by deleting therefrom lines 11 and 12 and substituting therefor the following:
>
> "charged with an offence under sections 136, 137, subsection (1) or (2) of section 138 or subsection (1) of section 141, the judge shall, if the"

Then it goes on as the clause reads at the present time.

Mr. McCann: I so move.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister a copy of that amendment? It is difficult to follow it without a copy.

Mr. Garson: Yes. I will send one over to my hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think that amendment covers the situation. I thank my hon. friend for having allowed this clause to stand and for having listened to the arguments advanced. After all, what we are trying to do here is to have a Criminal Code that will be in keeping with present-day conditions and meet the situation prevailing today. I think the acceptance of those suggestions is something that indicates the degree to which all of us are prepared to co-operate in order to make the code an effective instrument to assure justice.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 141 agreed to.

On clause 142—Incest.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings requested that this clause stand. The hon. gentleman is not able to be here owing to the fact that a short time ago he had to go to the hospital for a while. It was nothing serious, and I am glad to be able to say that he will soon be back. However, I have not been able to have that communication with him which I should like to have. I think his point was that it might be made subject to the same direction as that applying in clause 134.

Mr. Garson: I have my hon. friend's point and we were proposing to meet it. The hon. gentleman's point was that he considered that in respect of the offence of incest there should be required corroboration of the female complainant's evidence. Again after careful consideration of the offence of incest, along with the other sexual offences in this part of the code, we agreed with the suggestion that there should be the same degree of corroboration in this offence as in the other comparable offences. Therefore I would suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare might move the following motion:

> That subclause (1) of clause 131 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the figures "140" in line 11, the figures "142",

Mr. Martin: I so move.

Mr. Knowles: I have no objection to this amendment being made. In fact, I am glad to see it being made, but I think attention might be called to the fact that procedurally we are setting a precedent which might be remembered on some future occasion. Clause 131 is not before us. It was passed on a previous occasion. I offer no objection to this being done because I know the minister will take exactly the same attitude if we want to open some clause that has already been passed.

The Chairman: I was going to inquire of the committee whether the minister had leave. Do I understand that he has leave?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: On behalf of the member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings I should like to express the thanks of those who hold the same view. We are glad that the minister has seen fit to adopt the point of view previously put forward.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacInnis: Both clauses 141 and 142 carry whipping as a punishment. I am not going to talk about that because a parliamentary committee is inquiring into the subject matter, and a report will be introduced in this house later. I want to make it clear that is the only reason I am not objecting to whipping as a punishment in this or any other section.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now proceed to group 2, clause 222?

On clause 222—Driving while intoxicated.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps we could deal with clauses 222 to 225 as a group. I think when they were stood that was the intention because they all deal with offences with respect to motor vehicles which may give rise to accidents on the highway. I should like the remarks I have to make to apply generally to the three clauses because I want to suggest a point of view in connection with these matters which applies to the question of safety on the highway generally.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we shall deal with clauses 222, 223, 224 and 225, at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: My point was that the remarks I wanted to make applied to all that group of clauses. One of my colleagues has an amendment to move with respect to one of them in particular. I think if we might be permitted perhaps a general discussion on the subject, it might advance the subject. I am not going into detail, although some of my colleagues have particular comments to make.

[Mr. Knowles.]

When these clauses were stood it was after there had been some discussion on the question of safety on the highways generally, and the urgent necessity of taking effective measures to eliminate or at least reduce the appalling toll of death which now takes place annually on the highways of this country. In so far as the improvement of the standard of safety on the highways is concerned it was recognized then, and it must of course always be recognized, that a good deal of the responsibility, both literally and from the point of view of administrative responsibility, rests with our provinces. Therefore no action purely federal in scope is going to provide the whole answer to the problem.

The provinces are concerned from the point of view of licensing both the drivers and the vehicles which they drive, the limitation of speeds on the highway, the standard of road construction, and so on, all of which are elements in this problem of safety on the highway. There are certain aspects of it of a purely federal nature, upon which we can comment. One of these is that the approach, in part at any rate in so far as the Criminal Code is concerned, seems to have been along the line of increasing jail sentences or fines for this offence. It is our view that does not provide anything like the answer to the problem.

In the first place, since a good many of these problems relate to matters which arise out of the use of alcohol, it is going to be difficult for juries to convince themselves that a person was guilty of a crime which always imports, however much we might attempt to refine it, into the minds of the jury, and properly so, an element that the person committing the crime must have intended to act as he did. It is going to be difficult for juries to convince themselves that anyone, having possibly become involved in a fatal accident as a result of liquor, intended to do what he did. It is going to be difficult for juries to convince themselves that when a person becomes involved in a fatal accident as a result of fatigue or a mental lapse brought about through lack of caution or liquor, that person is guilty of a serious crime, and the consequent heavy jail penalty if he should be found guilty.

I feel it follows, from that, that the answer is not to greatly increase the jail sentences, and here I am dealing with the sections as a whole because juries are going to be reluctant to convict. On an earlier occasion I said I felt that this was, in a sense, only a quasi-criminal offence, and therefore the solution to the problem did not rest in increasing the penalties of a purely criminal nature. I believe that part of the answer at any rate lies under section 225 where a judge or a magistrate is empowered to impose, in addition to any jail sentence, a restriction on the right to drive. That is what I would call, for want of a proper description, a purely civil penalty as opposed to a criminal one of a jail sentence. I think that possibly we should give more consideration to the question of further increasing the power of judges and magistrates to suspend the right of the accused to drive if he has been found guilty under one of the sections covered by section 225.

The sections covered by section 225 include what used to be called motor manslaughter. We have the new section, I think it is 192, which covers the offence of criminal negligence that causes the death of another person, as well as the lesser offence of intoxicated or impaired driving. While it is true that in no case will a man come before the court under the sections unless he is charged with an offence, and therefore to some extent we are trying to lock the stable door after the horse has been stolen, nevertheless, thinking of the potential danger in the future, it does seem to me that in sections 192, 193 and 207, whether or not a person has been involved in an actual accident, we should give particular consideration to increasing the power of the judge to suspend or cancel the right to drive.

Where a man has been involved in an actual accident, consideration should be given to increasing the powers of a judge to suspend or to cancel his right to drive. This should be possible where it has been demonstrated that a man, however innocently, has taken a chance which has resulted either in serious injury or, in some cases, in fatal accidents. I do not think it would be placing too much power in the hands of our courts to say that, in addition to the penalty which could be imposed upon him, we would protect society in the future and also protect the driver himself by cancelling his right to drive for a substantial period of time. To that extent society would be protected against any recurrence of accidents brought about by that particular offender.

Then there are other points which should be made in connection with a consideration of this subject. We in the official opposition believe it would be well worth while to call a conference of dominion and provincial officials for the purpose of considering this whole question of deaths on the highways. My colleagues have some specific suggestions as to what might be discussed at such a conference, and I shall indicate generally the ground which could be covered.

First I suggest consideration of a standardization of tests required for the issuance of drivers' licences, and the qualifications to which persons must conform before they are issued licences and placed in the position where they are in charge of these dangerous weapons, high-powered motorcars, and turned loose on the highways.

There is also the question of working out the standardization of equipment on automobiles and a standard degree of excellence in respect of brakes, headlights, shock absorbers, steering mechanism and the like which would be required before licences could be issued. While these may be matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, it does seem to me that there would be an improvement in the situation on our highways if there could be worked out a uniform set of standards which would have to be met before licences could be issued to drivers.

Then, attention could be given to the question as to whether there should be a limitation of the age below which persons would not be issued drivers' licences. Should some attention be paid to a uniform speed limit? That is, should the speed limit be lowered, or made lower than the limit now permitted; and, if so, what problems of enforcement would this create? There would not be much use in lowering the speed limit unless the provinces were prepared to accept the additional onus of enforcement that would go with it.

Those are matters which can and, we feel, should be discussed by such a conference. We believe the discussions would be useful. Quite possibly helpful information might be obtained through prior consultation with representatives of insurance companies, or by permitting them to attend such a conference. These people are engaged in the fields of automobile and liability insurance, and these matters present a very real problem to them.

I have indicated some of the questions which in our view should be considered in any effort to come to grips with this problem of death and destruction on the highways.

I would conclude by repeating that in our view the answer does not lie merely in increasing the jail sentence. That is all very well for the person directly involved in the accident, but it does not solve the problem. In our view other matters must be considered, but no step, however unpleasant or difficult, should be left untaken if it is felt that by taking such a step a contribution could be made to the solution of this most pressing problem.

Mr. Knowles: In my view, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kamloops has made a very satisfactory summary of the points advanced by members in his own party and by others of us on this side of the house when this matter was under discussion at an earlier date. I wish to support once again the proposal that much more serious consideration is required in connection with this problem than simply increasing the penalties provided in the Criminal Code.

When the matter was last under discussion the suggestion was put forward that a conference should be called by the federal government, so that this matter could be studied with those provincial authorities who are charged with the responsibility for highway administration. On that occasion I suggested to the Minister of Justice that advantage might be taken of the fact that his colleague, the Minister of Transport, was proposing to call a conference of ministers of highways in the various provinces for the purpose of dealing with another matter. I do not suggest that there is any relationship whatsoever between the other matter, which is a constitutional one, and the subject before us now. But it does look as though the same people who might deal with this problem would be involved in the conference called by the Minister of Transport. I understand he has now issued invitations to that conference, and that it is to be held in Ottawa in the near future.

I suggest strongly to the Minister of Justice that consideration be given to this suggestion. In other words I am urging that this is not something that should be done next year or five years from now, but that it should be done now. I suggest strongly that consideration be given to the holding of another conference, with those same people attending, to deal with this serious problem of the death and destruction that takes place annually on the highways of this country.

I shall not take the time to repeat the points I made when the matter was under discussion before, or to repeat the suggestions made just now by the hon. member for Kamloops. Unless I overlooked it, however, there is one point that I believe he did not make—and it involves a word that one always uses with caution in this federal parliament; I refer to the word "education". I trust no one will throw back at me the suggestion that I am ignorant of section 92 of the British North America Act. It does seem to me that that stricture does not apply here. Surely there is room for the federal government, in such a conference with provincial authorities, to do all it can by way of urging that there be increased education in connection with the driving of motor vehicles.

[Mr. Knowles.]

As the minister knows, the province from which he and I come has been doing a pretty fair job recently in respect of this matter, and particularly in the greater Winnipeg area. To refer to a point made by the hon. member for Kamloops, in Winnipeg the requirements for obtaining a licence have been made more strict. But it is something more than that. In the very process of making the tests, many of which are given several times over, the provincial authorities themselves are educating the drivers in the matter of safe driving habits. Not only is there that kind of education given to people coming to take tests but, under the supervision of the highways department in Manitoba, training is being given to high school students in the safe and proper methods of driving motor vehicles.

We all know that unless something is done in the course of the next few years, a great deal of money will be spent, and a great deal will be lost, in accidents that will take place and property that will be destroyed—to say nothing of the tragic loss of life that will take place.

I suggest that a mere fraction of that amount of money spent on prevention and on the education of our drivers and potential drivers would be a wise economy, even looking at it from that point of view.

As I say, I do not intend to take the time to repeat the things the hon. member for Kamloops has said, but I do join with him and with others on this side of the house in urging the minister to take very seriously this suggestion of a conference between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities so that something can be done. I urge the minister to look upon this not as a suggestion with which he merely agrees and hopes that something might be done five years or ten years from now, but something on which to act right now. Let him face it as a challenge to prevent the loss of certain lives that otherwise are going to be lost on our Canadian highways unless something is done.

Mr. Shaw: Because of the mounting accident and death rate on our Canadian highways, I agree with most of what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I realize fully of course that much of the responsibility for what is done in this field rests upon the shoulders of the provincial government.

As I see this problem, it falls into two general classifications. There are those accidents resulting in my opinion from persons who just simply should not be driving. One hon. member said that we should raise the age limit at which they are licensed. If that were to be done I would say we should also examine the problem from the top, namely, the problem of those over-age drivers who may be physically incapable of managing motor vehicles properly.

Mr. Knowles: In our province their record is very good.

Mr. Shaw: That is quite possible; it is still a problem that should be given consideration at this time. As far as faulty vehicles and certain classifications of carelessness are concerned, I would say that education would perform a most valuable function. I am pleased to note that in many parts of the country more and more consideration is being given to this matter in the schools. Many youngsters who are not yet old enough to qualify for drivers' licences, but who will soon be, are receiving information along that line. That is one aspect of the problem; but when we come to the other aspect of the problem, namely, drunken driving, driving while one's ability is impaired, I personally think there is only one solution to it, and that is a definite stiffening of the penalties which may be imposed upon such persons following convictions.

I notice that in certain parts of Canada provinces are taking rather strong measures in this respect. For example, I noticed only very recently that my own province of Alberta has raised from six months to twelve months the period during which a driver's licence will be suspended, following a conviction for drunkenness, and there is an automatic jail sentence for a person who does drive while his driver's licence is suspended. That may seem very severe to some, but in my judgment lifting those drivers' licences for a longer period of time will probably have a greater effect upon individual drivers than any fine that one could think of imposing. I certainly hope that right across this country the provincial governments will take very firm action with respect to extending those periods during which drivers' licences are suspended.

I can see a good deal of good arising from a conference of representatives of provincial governments. It may possibly mean a certain standardization as far as penalties are concerned, and that would be a very good thing. I do not think it is necessary, Mr. Chairman, for one to speak longer with respect to this matter; but there is room for much to be done, first in the field of education, and second, in the field of penalties, particularly, as I say, where drunken driving and impaired driving are involved. In my opinion, there is no excuse for it. I think that those who flout the laws against drunken driving and impaired driving cannot complain, no matter how stiff the penalty may be. I hope that the provinces right across Canada will give consideration to the suspension of the licence for a year or even longer of a person who is convicted of those charges.

Mr. McIvor: At the lakehead we have had brought to the attention of the Fort William city council the causes of accidents, because the lakehead is pretty well the centre and away from other places. Men driving big trucks drive for a long time, and sometimes they are so tired that it is difficult for them to keep awake. Another cause of accidents is that trucks have been going for a long time over rough roads and the tires have become weak and they burst. The city council at Fort William feels quite keenly about this.

Mr. Campbell: I have one suggestion I would like to make. The hon. member for Kamloops suggested a conference of the provinces with the dominion authorities. One thing I should like to see taken into consideration is the matter of putting governors on the high-speed and high-powered cars. Today we can buy automobiles with over 200 horsepower motors in them. If we had a governor on the car, perhaps it would hold the speed of the car down to say 50 miles or 60 miles an hour, or whatever the speed limit was in the province in which it was operating. If that were done I am quite sure we would cut down the rate of accidents quite a bit.

I had a little experience last year. As an experiment we tried putting a governor on one of our trucks. That truck had no accidents during the year. Not only that, but it came back from its summer service in far better shape than the trucks that were allowed to run wild. In the matter of upkeep of the vehicles alone it would be of value to the owners, and it would make it impossible for drivers to get up to speeds of 80 miles, 90 miles or 100 miles an hour.

As I have said once before in this house, you cannot put enough police cars on the highways to keep the speed limit down to even 60 miles an hour.

Mr. Starr: I should like to say a few words in support of what has already been said in regard to the serious number of highway traffic accidents with which the provinces are faced today. I am firmly in agreement with the idea that some leadership could be given by the federal government in calling a conference of the departments of highways of the various provinces to see whether some solution could be arrived at to cut down the mounting number of fatal accidents in the provinces, irrespective of their causes.

I have some figures in support of what I have to say. I obtained these figures from the traffic accidents statistical branch of the motor vehicles department of Ontario. These are the statistics for 1951, and are the only ones that I have been able to get. They show that there were 87,659 male drivers and 4,972 female drivers involved. Male drivers to the number of 1,045 and female drivers to the number of 40 were involved in fatal accidents. Involved in personal injury accidents were 21,752 male drivers and 1,323 female drivers. Involved in property damage accidents were 64,862 males and 3,609 females. The total number of accidents in the province of Ontario in 1951 amounted to 54,920.

There has been an increase over a period of years in the number of accidents. The average figures available for the combined ten-year period from 1942 to 1951, broken down in various age groups, show a total of 39,833. In 1950 this showed as 72,788 and again in 1951 it jumped to 92,631, or an increase of 27·3 per cent. The significant part is that the age group involved in the most accidents was the group between 25 and 40 years. The number of accidents in their case was much higher than any other group from 18 years to 65 and over.

Mr. Garson: Twenty-five to forty?

Mr. Starr: Twenty-five to forty.

Mr. Garson: That is a pretty big group of course.

Mr. Starr: Yes, it is the biggest group.

Mr. Garson: What about from 25 to 30?

Mr. Starr: It is not broken down. The groups are from 18 to 24, 25 to 40, 41 to 54, 55 to 64, and 65 and over. In all these groups the increase, compared with 1950 and 1951, was much over 25 per cent in accidents of all types. Of course there is a drop when you compare 1951 and 1952 showing an increase of about 7 per cent over 1951.

Nevertheless the total number of accidents on our highways presents a very serious problem. I realize that the provinces are doing everything they possibly can to cope with it, but we find that even on our superhighways, where everything possible has been done to prevent accidents, accidents are still happening. A solution might be found if the federal government took the lead in initiating a conference with the provinces for the purpose of seeing whether the accident rate cannot be cut down in some way.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I want to make a few remarks in support of those made by the hon. member for Kamloops. I realize that the highway accident problem is largely the concern of the provinces. There are a few things I want to bring to the attention of the committee with respect to the suggestion made about the possibility of the calling of a conference with the support, as it were, of the federal authorities. One point I wish to make has to do with the large number of accidents caused by persons who are financially irresponsible. Sometimes I think they are also irresponsible in other ways. I believe that the experience with the unsatisfied judgments fund in Ontario has proven that it is not a satisfactory solution. It has not turned out to be as good as was hoped. I think we are going to have to come to the position that whenever a licence is issued for the operation of a motor vehicle there will also have to be assurance that if the man to whom the licence is issued goes out and damages life, limb or property he will be responsible for it. That is one of the things that I hope can be provided for through such a conference.

I think the modern phrase is that we should lock the garage door, instead of the stable door, before the damage is done. Inquiries should be made before accidents occur and not afterwards. I think the old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure is true. I think we could reduce the death rate and the amount of damage caused very considerably by a course of prevention rather than trying to cure the situation afterwards by resorting to the Criminal Code.

Mr. MacDougall: I was not present when the first few speakers rose to discuss this problem. However, I did hear the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer and I agree with him one hundred per cent. In this whole problem it does not make any difference basically and fundamentally where the location of the accident or potential accident may be in Canada. It is a question of the individual. It has been suggested by one member that the installing of governors on cars would possibly be a deterrent to increased speed, but in my opinion the fundamental factor in that regard is the man or woman behind the wheel. In my view education with respect to safe driving can be carried out more satisfactorily by teaching the younger people of Canada.

I am sure I am no different from a great number of members in the house who have driven in other than their home province in Canada. I recall that some three years ago I took a short motor trip over a week end, and I do not think at any time in my life was I more glad to steer my car back into the garage than I was on that occasion. One of the reasons for that feeling was not that the people behind the wheels of the cars I either met or passed were impaired or drunk but was entirely due to a lack of rigid control over the vehicle itself and the lack of inspection of such vehicles.

My own province of British Columbia, as you all know, has had a terrific increase in population in the last fifteen years. A former provincial administration instituted a system of rigid testing of every vehicle and truck in the province, and that system is being carried on by the present administration. That may seem a bit expensive and it is, but that method of testing has cut down the number of accidents in the province of British Columbia. How is it doing it? First of all, it keeps off the road the "jalopies" that have nothing as effective in their machinery or chassis as the horns.

In addition, the system prevents men and women from driving cars in the province of British Columbia who are detriments behind the wheel of a car. They are a danger to life. In other words, not only is the vehicle and its mechanism tested but before a driver's licence is issued the driver, male or female, must pass a very rigid examination to obtain a licence. In my humble opinion the testing of the mechanical and human factors is most necessary.

I am sure that there are other members who have found themselves in a similar position to what I have been in myself on occasion. Possibly you are hurrying to get to a destination for no particular reason. It would not make very much difference whether you were five or ten minutes late. But on a congested street or highway you get slightly irate. If you do not move away with the green light as soon as it flashes, a hundred cars behind you will honk at you to get going. These things upset the capability to drive of the man or woman behind the wheel. They get mad and it is useless to assume that when they get mad and annoyed they are as efficient as when they are calm and collected. During holiday periods we find people massing the highways, bumper to bumper, with the car behind continually nagging the man in front to get going. A governor in that situation would not be very much good because you do not go from a standing start to 60 miles an hour. I have no quarrel with the introduction of a governor, but I believe a basic and primary factor in consideration of this matter is the human factor itself.

If by a process of education we can improve the qualifications of potential drivers, I am sure we will cut down the accident rate all over the country. I would emphasize that I am not opposing in any manner or form the suggestion made that a conference should be held between the federal government and the various provinces. But we must not forget that you can have all the conferences in the world to discuss means of eliminating dangerous driving without making any headway unless each province of itself takes measures on its own initiative to see to it that vehicles and drivers are tested. Unless that is done a conference between the provinces and the federal government will not amount to very much.

Many accidents are caused by excessive speed, but it should be remembered that you cannot retard progress as regards speed. What have we today in the modern world which induces excessive speed? First of all, we have the superhighways. They invite excessive speed. Then you have the modern motorcar with, as one hon. member pointed out, about 200 horsepower under the cover. That also induces excessive speed. But you cannot turn the clock back without waking the rooster. These things are part and parcel of our modern transport system.

If we are to deal adequately with this problem of accidents on the highway, it seems to me we must first of all accept the modern methods of transportation and frame our preventive measures accordingly. I might add that since the establishment of testing schools in the city of Vancouver the accident rate has been cut and quite a number of people have been prevented from driving.

Additionally, we have to contend with the vast increase in the number of cars, the increase in the population generally, which in turn creates a greater number of potential drivers. It seems fair to say that if each one of the provinces would, I do not say adopt an exact copy of what has been established in the province of British Columbia, but adopt methods of testing vehicles, that in itself might well cut down the accident rate. Some provinces may have a better system than that which exists in British Columbia, and in that event it would be wiser to adopt their methods.

But I would say most emphatically that all these things combined, together with greater emphasis on the education of drivers, will go a long way towards reducing the accident rate, provided that men and women who are found to be under the influence of liquor are adequately punished and their driving licence is cancelled for a period of time which will make them think a second time before they try to mix liquor and gasoline.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is a subject that naturally exercises the minds and thoughts of Canadians everywhere as it exercises the minds and thoughts of every nation in which the automobile plays such a large part. Certainly, having regard to the number killed and injured, it is one of the most serious problems we face today.

If there was an epidemic in Canada this year which killed eight people every day and injured 80 of whom 20 would be more or less disabled for life, a tremendous effort would be made in this country to deal with that epidemic.

That is the situation with regard to cars today. I have not the latest statistics but the figures for 1950 show that the number killed in Canada in car accidents amounted to 22,070, and that there had been a continuous increase from the end of the war, when the number killed amounted to 1,556. Non-fatal accidents, resulting in injury to one or more persons, amounted to 26,573, and there were 70,800 accidents in which damage was confined to property alone.

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat certainly made a most thoughtful speech on this subject. What course is to be followed?

I am speaking as one who over the years has had some considerable experience as counsel for the defence, and I know what men charged with an offence under the Criminal Code most fear when it comes to a car accident. What they most fear is the loss of their licence. That is one thing they impress upon you from the time you commence to act for them. "I am not worried about a fine, but I do not want to lose my licence. After all, it is something which belongs to me and I need it in my business." That and many other excuses are given as to why they require their licence.

My hon. friend mentioned the question of intoxication. The statistics tell the story in that regard. The ordinary human being who understands how to operate a motor car takes two-fifths of a second from the time he sees danger until he acts and decides on the course he will follow. With a motorcar travelling at 50 miles per hour a car would cover 28 feet before a person could act. If the driver has any liquor which is detectable in his blood by examination, the time required to react to danger is immediately increased by 50 per cent and it takes such a person three-fifths of a second to act.

Much has been said about the need for education. Certainly, I believe something should be done, over the C.B.C. and also through the press, to educate the Canadian people in regard to safety. My hon. friend mentions how successful the campaign was in British Columbia. Such a campaign has been found successful beyond the dreams of those who initiated it in Michigan. But campaigns of themselves will not meet the situation. I for one over the years have been greatly opposed to minimum jail sentences by way of penalties imposed for infractions of the criminal law. A change was made in parliament several years ago whereby a section was incorporated in the code in order to meet what had become a cause of much injustice; I refer to minimum sentences for intoxication. Parliament added a section which provided that anyone whose ability was impaired would be liable to a penalty of a minimum fine of $50. When the penalty was seven days in jail, the wrongdoers were afraid and they defended, because seven days in jail is not an inviting prospect.

I should say something more. It was a difficult thing to get a conviction when the magistrate was faced with the obligation of imposing a minimum penalty of seven days. However, since we provided this alternative section, it was amazing to note the number who would admit that they had been drinking to a greater or a lesser extent. A $50 penalty is not a serious deterrent to driving a car under the influence of liquor. I suggest for the consideration of the minister that the penalty under that section should be increased. The minimum is too low. It affords an omnibus upon which all drunks ride today when endeavouring to get away from the more serious charge of driving while intoxicated. I think the penalty of $50 might well be doubled by way of an experiment. If this is found to be ineffective, a year from now alterations or changes could be made. In the second place, instead of having the law as it is today where the magistrate may remove from the individual the right to hold a licence for the period in question, where the offence the person has committed reveals gross negligence or intoxication, I think the provision should be mandatory for the removal of the licence. That type of education in advance would, I think, reduce the number of offences that would be committed. As the penalty section stands, if it is not an invitation to violate the law, it certainly is not a deterrent.

Just recently, during the Christmas season, I overheard two men discussing this matter. One of them said to the other, "I am going to take a chance tonight, for, after all, it will only be $50". They were discussing the plan in effect in this city whereby the police provided drivers for those who expected to be at a party and to imbibe too freely.

I suggest for the serious consideration of the minister those two ideas: first, the doubling of the penalty under the present "impaired" section and, second, when gross negligence is established—in other words, such a disregard of the rights of others as to constitute not a momentary lapse but a considered course of action—the magistrate should be placed in a position where there would be a mandatory loss of licence.

Today one of the reasons for lack of enforcement is that each of us is in this position, paraphrasing the words of long ago, where he may say to himself on occasion, "There, but for the grace of God, go I". I think that is one of the reasons why it is so difficult to enforce the law with regard to driving cars either in a drunken condition or negligently. Certainly juries which listen to a case in which death has resulted from the alleged action of the accused, when they are discussing the matter are prone to consider, in the secrecy of the jury room—the secrecy of which is shortly revealed after the verdict is given—the situation in this light: After all, it was a serious invasion of the rights of the public. It was gross negligence, in our opinion; but all of us felt that, after all, it is not really a crime. Anyway, there is always the possibility in the future that one or other of us might be in a position where we ourselves would be judged.

Let us have an education campaign by all means, but let it be one reinforced by teeth in the law. When I hear people say that murderers can be deterred by the death penalty, may I say that my experience is that potential breakers of the law in connection with operating an automobile will be deterred when there comes to them the realization that jail will be the result rather than the ameliorative penalty of a small fine.

Mr. Garson: I want to express my appreciation of the efforts of hon. members who have so far taken part in this debate, and my indebtedness to them for the constructive contributions which they have made towards the solution of a problem with which I think each one of us is deeply concerned. However, I have got the impression that many of the statements that were made rather implied a criticism of the efforts that are being made at the present time by the provincial administrators to prevent accidents and death upon the highways. Since, as some of the members have said—indeed, as I have said myself on previous occasions—a large part of the prevention which must be provided in this connection must be at the provincial level, it is a matter of real importance as to whether or not the present provincial administrators are justly criticized. In the few cases which have come to our own attention I am inclined to think that they are not open to criticism. In this matter I am in accord with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that administrators of the province of Manitoba are not at all open to criticism, that they have done a first-class job in this connection and that they have demonstrated what excellent results can be produced by steps which they in fact have been taking.

I have said when this matter was up for discussion before that what we were concerned with here in parliament was doing our part in connection with this problem. This, in some ways, some might regard as a minor part, that is to study and define the acts which produce accidents upon the highway which should be punished as crimes. That is all we can do.

It is true, as several hon. members have suggested, that we might call a conference of the provinces to discuss the means by which their efforts to prevent accidents upon the highway might be stepped up. In doing that, we would be calling them together to discuss, for the most part, matters which were entirely within their jurisdiction, entirely under their control, and entirely their responsibility.

When I made that statement I was not at that time aware that there was a support for that view far more authoritative than what I said. One would almost gather the impression from the discussion that has taken place here this afternoon that no conference had been held by the provincial administrators on this matter, and that each province was not necessarily doing the best it could with its administration, and in some cases not so good a job to prevent accidents. I doubt whether, as a matter of fact, this is so. There is on this continent the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators. I do not know whether it includes Mexico, but it includes all the United States and the Canadian provinces. The national vice-president of that organization is a Canadian, Mr. Robert Baillie, head of the motor licence law enforcement in the province of Manitoba.

Perhaps hon. members would be interested in the views of the members of this organization of men whose profession it is to do everything they can in the various jurisdictions on this continent to prevent highway accidents. What do they say is the best method of doing so? Is it by passing amendments to the Criminal Code? Is it anything any federal government can do or is it something that falls within the provincial jurisdiction? Is it a complicated matter or is it a relatively simple matter? What they say is this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the date of that report the minister has?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend is interested, I have this pamphlet from the American association here.

This is what the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators regards as the cardinal principle of accident prevention on the highways:

> For the money spent, and in the long run, nothing will reduce traffic accidents like a good driver licence law well administered.

That is the judgment of men who earn their living, and a very good living it is for most of them, in this profession. They are intelligent, energetic men who spend their life trying to provide administration which will prevent these accidents.

It is noteworthy, moreover, that this view is supported by a man who is, I believe, recognized as probably the most outstanding individual authority on the continent, Dr. J. Stannard Baker, of Northwestern University, who is a specialist in this field. He makes that statement upon behalf of the association in this brochure to which I have referred.

If I might be permitted, I should like to lay before the members some actual figures based upon the application of the principle in its administration in my own province of Manitoba. There are in that province about 242,000 drivers. Of those 242,000 the carefully kept figures indicate that nearly all the trouble upon the highways comes from 39,000 repeaters, that is those who are not involved in one traffic accident, as any one of us might be through pure misadventure, even when completely careful and sober; but motorists who by a series of "coincidences" come to be involved repeatedly in accidents. The records indicate that these people are the cause of nearly all the preventable accidents.

One of the things we have to keep in mind in this connection is that when you have in the United States and Canada the number of vehicle miles which are now being placed upon the roads of this continent, and in some cases in very heavy traffic, we are bound to have some unavoidable accidents as well as a lot that can be prevented. There will be accidents that are unavoidably caused by the urgency or the density of the traffic, or misadventure in which the participants are careful and sober and where no amount of good management will enable them to avoid what happens. But the view of these experts is that the great bulk of the preventable accidents are caused by repeaters who, as you see, amount to about 16 per cent of the total motorists.

Then, there is another figure, 4,162 who are the really bad ones and in Manitoba they are barred from the road entirely.

Mr. Fulton: For how long?

Mr. Garson: Anywhere up to three years. The hon. member for Prince Albert says his experience as defence counsel has been, as it has always been my experience as a remission officer in the provincial field where drivers are trying to get their licences restored and in the federal field where they were doing the same thing, that the cancellation of the licence is a far better penalty and a far greater deterrent than any fine that could be imposed.

The hon. member for Prince Albert asserted that some person in Ottawa recently was saying he was going to take a chance on being impaired while he drove his car because he would only have to pay $50 fine if he were found guilty. Do you know what happens to a man who has been convicted three times for driving while impaired in Manitoba? He is barred from the roads for life. I would suggest that, while I am not for one moment decrying the possible value that might emerge from a conference called by the federal government to discuss this matter, I must say that I doubt very much whether at such a conference we will be able to tell an administrator like Mr. Baillie very much that he does not know now.

Mr. Knowles: Let him tell the others.

Mr. Fulton: He may be able to tell the others.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. But I imagine in the course of conferring with his opposite numbers in the other provinces in the conferences which these officials have, it would be a most extraordinary thing if he has not long since told them what he has been able to achieve by this method. But perhaps the reason the method is not employed in other jurisdictions is that they find some political difficulty in really making these tough rulings stick.

I suggest today, as I suggested on a previous occasion, when Canada is faced with a very tough highway situation, involving on a large scale huge property losses to say nothing of life and limb, until Canadian administrators develop an attitude in the solution of such a problem which is as tough as the problem itself, we are not likely to get results no matter how many conferences we may call.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit one question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Would not such a conference, and the publicity that would attach to it, help develop public opinion in those other provinces, and thus aid the cause in which both the minister and I are interested.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think it would. And I would not want anyone to assume from anything I have said, or that I may say as I go along, that I am in any way personally or officially averse to calling a conference of that sort. But I think it would be quite wrong to assume that not only Manitoba but other provincial administrators are doing little or nothing now. Moreover I think it would be quite easy to exaggerate the amount of new light that men who have been living with this problem for years would get from a conference such as that. But that of course is no reason why we should not be able to shed that extra light upon it, even if it might be small.

The hon. member for Middlesex East suggested they were having trouble with their unsatisfied judgments fund in Ontario. Well, in Manitoba this pool of motorists with cancelled or suspended licences, which hovers fairly constantly at four thousand people, is made up in part of those who have been involved in accidents when they carried no automobile insurance, or who failed to pay judgments rendered against them in damage actions arising out of accidents, and have stayed in the pool until that condition has been satisfied. I believe—certainly this was the case last time I had any occasion to check it, and I believe it is still the case—that the unsatisfied judgments fund in Manitoba is a great success, largely because in its administration the provincial authorities have pursued a fair but a tough policy.

Another impression I think we must correct in our approach to this question is that created by the use of figures. When the hon. member for Ontario suggested that the group from age 25 to age 40 were the greatest offenders, I suggest that that bare statement by itself may indicate nothing more than that the age group from 25 to 40 constitutes the majority of drivers.

What I suggest is that the method which has been evolved by these experts of measuring the accident rate is one which should be applied; and when it is applied it indicates a result far less discouraging than one might think. The method used in the United States is to take the number of deaths on highways per 100 million vehicle miles. For obviously if in 1954 as compared with 1934 they have several times the number of motor vehicles upon the highways, each one travelling more miles because of better highways, better automobiles, improved engines and the like, we must expect they will have an increase in the number of accidents both avoidable and unavoidable merely because of the volume of traffic.

To step up the volume of traffic in itself brings about an increase in the accident rate. What they have found in the United States is that at the present time they have 7·5 deaths per 100 million vehicle miles; and that is much better, indeed, than the 16 deaths per 100 million motor vehicle miles they had in the early thirties. By action taken for the most part at state level they have been able to reduce that which I suggest is a correct measurement of the highway death rate from what it was previously to what it is now.

In Manitoba, by the method I have indicated, we had pulled the rate down to a low of 6·8 deaths per 100 million motor vehicle miles, although recently I understand it has gone up to some extent. In other words at the low points we got under the average for the United States; and I would doubt whether there is any other province in Canada that has done that.

Estimating highway deaths per 100 million motor vehicle miles is a much sounder basis for any thinking that we may be doing upon the subject than simply to read in the newspapers and the statement that we have had so many deaths over this, that or the other period. For in this matter we have to make some allowance for the fact that we have many more miles of highway, and many more vehicles on those highways than heretofore. It is in relation to the volume of vehicular traffic that any sound judgment we may make would have to be reached.

I believe it was the hon. member for Kamloops who suggested that one of the advantages of a conference of this sort would be that it would be possible to standardize tests for drivers' licences, to standardize equipment, to standardize the limitation of age, and to bring about uniform speed limits. I do not pretend to be an expert in this field, but it would seem to me that there are few countries in the world in which the conditions under which automobile traffic is carried on would vary more between one province and another than they do in the provinces of Canada. The problem of automobile safety in Saskatchewan, with a very low density of traffic upon many thousands of miles of uncongested rural highway, would permit of a standardization of equipment, of tests for driving and of limitation of age that could not be tolerated in metropolitan Montreal.

One of the reasons why it seems to me the benefits of a conference of this sort would be considerably limited is that, surely, by long odds the most effective methods we can work out to grapple with this question must be worked out at the provincial administrative level. These administrators in the provinces have to take cognizance of the conditions in their respective provinces. Rules that would be applicable on the highways through the mountain ranges of British Columbia would not apply on the prairie roads in my own province of Manitoba. It would be folly to think that it would be wise for these gentlemen to standardize their tests in disregard of these differences.

It seems to me the solution to this problem is pretty largely as the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators has indicated, namely that it is right at the state level, and that the biggest part of it is in licensing. I am in some doubt as to whether there is very much that the federal government can tell any of the provincial administrators on that point. I am also in some doubt as to whether the man who is dealing with the traffic problems in downtown Toronto can educate the man who is attending to the traffic on the rural roads of Alberta or tell him something he did not know before. Now, I do not want any person—

Mr. Knowles: Those differences exist within a province?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In our own province conditions in Marquette and in Winnipeg North Centre are quite different.

Mr. Garson: That is quite right, and that is another reason why a man from Montreal is not very likely to add to Mr. Baillie's education upon the subject. My hon. friend has supplied an additional reason for that.

Mr. Knowles: I gave that as a reason for the contrary.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister not think that the man from Montreal would have some experience which might be helpful to Mr. Baillie in considering the problem that he has today with drivers in Winnipeg?

Mr. Garson: The experiences that we would be discussing at a conference called by the federal government would be those experiences which those administrators in conferences of their own had not previously exchanged before the federal conference was called.

Again let me repeat, I do not want to be identified by any of these statements that I have made as being an opponent of the idea of calling a conference; what I do suggest is that the idea that a problem which has resisted the very intelligent, effective and efficient efforts of provincial administrators up until the present time is going to be solved by getting them all together in a new conference called under the auspices of the federal government is a rather far-fetched one.

Mr. Ferguson: May I interject? I have had years of experience with claims of insurance companies. My experience covers thirty years. I heard Mr. Baillie. I lived in Manitoba, and I have been in every province in this country. I know the insurance companies' problems. They have the best records on automobile accidents, and ideas for prevention of accidents. I think Mr. Baillie was absolutely marvellous, and enlightened every Ontario resident, insurancewise and governmentwise at the Royal York hotel. I heard their remarks after he had spoken, and the majority said: "Why don't we adopt something of that kind here"? His suggestions were suggestions that could have been well adopted, and would have prevented accidents that are killing off people in Ontario. They could be adopted here and across the country just as they have been in Manitoba. If the provinces were brought together through the good auspices of the federal government, or of any other body, and Mr. Baillie could give his talk and the successful ideas that are in practice in Manitoba could be put into practice across the country, it would be a godsend to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Garson: I wish to thank my hon. friend for his interjection. Naturally, I agree with everything that he has said. However, one of the things he said or implied was that as a result of Mr. Baillie's speech at the Royal York hotel in Toronto none of these things has been adopted as yet. That perhaps is no reason why we should not once more try to secure their adoption.

My purpose in making these remarks was that if we, in consultation with the provinces, —because I do not think there will be much purpose in calling a conference in which they were not willing to co-operate—should call a conference, I will say to my hon. friends in advance: If such a conference does not produce the miracles that they are projecting, do not blame the caller of it or the provincial administrators who take part in it.

Mr. Brooks: I did not intend to enter into this debate, but having listened to the minister and the other hon. members who have spoken I realize, as I always have, that this is an important subject. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Kamloops in his suggestion that there should be a dominion-provincial conference on this matter. After listening to the minister in the last few minutes I am more convinced than ever that there should be one, because the strongest arguments used for such a conference were those used by the minister himself. He pointed out the fact that the situation in Manitoba was better than that in any other province of Canada, and I thought it would compare favourably with any state in the United States. If that is the situation in Manitoba—and the problems in the rest of Caanda are the same as those in Manitoba—the rest of Canada should have the benefit of what has happened in his own province.

As an argument against that he said that the provinces differ. We all realize they do not differ so far as the driving of motor cars is concerned. The man who drives a car in the city of Montreal also drives a car out through the province of Quebec and in the rural sections. The man in the rural sections of Quebec must come in to the city of Montreal or to the city of Quebec or to some other city. The same thing applies in Manitoba. You have your rural drivers who come into the city of Winnipeg and the city drivers go out into the country. That happens all across the country. The people from New Brunswick drive into Quebec and Ontario. It is all one big problem as far as the provinces are concerned.

As I say, I would approve very strongly of the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops that there should be a conference on this matter. The people are becoming more accident-conscious all the time as accidents increase in Canada.

One matter that impressed me was the suggestion regarding education. We are discussing an offence, and the offence is committed after the drunken driving has occurred. The matter of education is one that should be considered not only at a dominion-provincial conference but in our own provinces. We should educate our young people; we should educate our older people. And we should also try to prevent the accident before it occurs. I am reminded of an accident that happened in my own province just a few months ago. The same type of accident is happening all the time. Four men were drunk in a car. They went to a filling station. The filling station operator recognized that they were drunk, but instead of notifying the police, as he should have done, the men were allowed to continue on their way and within an hour's time they were all reported dead from a serious accident. As I say, that is the type of accident that is happening all the time.

Here we are considering the offence after it is committed. More should be done to prevent the serious things from happening. I am of the opinion that if a man sees another man drunk, and allows him to go on driving his car without notifying the police, he is committing an offence. I know how difficult it would be to make it a criminal offence, but it is an offence. Perhaps we should educate our people with respect to this offence and make them more conscious of the fact that if one sees a drunken man getting into a car he should pick up the telephone and notify police that this man is not fit to drive a car. They should take steps to stop him from driving.

I just rose to say that I approve of what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops and I believe that good results could be obtained by having a conference such as has been suggested.

Mr. Ferguson: I should like to interject this brief observation. After Mr. Baillie had spoken in Toronto these remarks were made by the majority of the people there: "It was a very interesting discussion". The men who were listening to Mr. Baillie were not top government men, and they should have been. They said: "Well, I just came down to hear what he had to say, but he certainly had the facts. If I suggested that to the minister he would tell me to mind my own business." I think that attitude is prevalent among deputy ministers and ministers. If a junior civil servant, or a top civil servant, were to listen to Mr. Baillie he would realize that what he says is true. I would ask this government to set an example and write to the premiers of each province, bringing this to their attention.

A lot of time has been spent on the subject in parliament. We could well afford to adopt Baillie's ideas throughout the country. I have probably had more to do with automobile accidents—not my own, thank goodness—as an adjuster than any other man in the House of Commons over a period of some thirty years, and I recognized very quickly why Baillie in the province of Manitoba was achieving the results he definitely did achieve. These methods are not practised in other provinces and they should be because they have been tried and proved to be correct. They are profitable in Manitoba and would be in Ontario. There is no doubt about it. I believe the federal government can only go so far in requesting, but if they make such a request and no attention is paid to it then they will have done all they can do. Something should be done to bring the matter to the attention of the top authorities in every province.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I think the thing that should be spotlighted in discussing these sections of the Criminal Code is the matter of driving while intoxicated and driving while ability is impaired. Fifty years ago we did not have the problem of drunken driving because no matter how drunk the man was the horse still had some sense. I believe it is even claimed that the model T had a little character, but today when cars have 200 horsepower motors I think we have got to give the most serious consideration to drunken driving and driving while ability is impaired. I think it is an unfortunate thing that the term "impaired by alcohol" should ever have been coined. What standards are we going to use to determine that a man's ability is impaired? Is his ability impaired when he has had one drink of liquor or half a dozen beers? What impairs a man's ability?

A number of tests are dealt with in an article in The Rotarian by Don Wharton. He refers to Sweden, and I think what he has to say is of interest. The article reads in part:

> Everyone knows that heavy drinking makes for irresponsible, reckless driving. But Dr. Leonard Goldberg, of Sweden's Caroline Institute, wanted to know about the effects on driving of light drinking —just a few beers or highballs. To find out, he tested 37 skilled drivers, aged 20 to 45, most of them instructors at driving schools.

The article continues:

> Dr. Goldberg concluded that even a slight amount of alcohol "caused a deterioration of between 25 and 30 per cent in the driving performance of expert drivers." And on the three tests most closely corresponding to actual driving, ability was impaired on the average by 41·8 per cent.

These findings were confirmed by experiments conducted in Toronto recently. A study was made of 919 drivers involved in personal accidents and the conclusion was reached that alcohol became a factor in causing accidents at concentrations as low as 3/100 per cent, and such a concentration can result from one beer or cocktail. When we are using terms such as impairment of a person's ability to drive I think we should have some standard to judge the extent to which ability is impaired. In my opinion the man who thinks he is cold sober but has had several drinks is a more serious menace than the one who knows he is drunk because the reaction times of the first man are reduced. He thinks he is a competent driver and will therefore assume risks that a man who realizes he is drunk would not take.

In order to assist law enforcement officers—and this is the point I want to make—I think we must strive to use all the mechanisms at our disposal to determine the state of drunkenness or impaired ability, if you wish to use that term, with which a driver may be affected. I think we all know of too many cases where the police have known that a man was drunk but could not prove it. I know of accidents in my own locality where everyone knew that the individual involved in the accident was drunk, but the standards of procedure now found in our Criminal Code are not sufficiently adequate to prove such drunkenness.

In subsection 3 of section 224 chemical analysis is mentioned but it is not related to any specific figure. Therefore it is, in my opinion, meaningless. What is the use of saying that a chemical analysis can be considered as evidence when you do not set out any range in the act? I think we should follow the advice of some of the leading countries of the world in this regard. In Sweden there is a compulsory blood test, and where a person has a concentration of 1·5 per thousand they are considered intoxicated and are sentenced to imprisonment for one year unless there are extenuating circumstances. If the alcohol concentration is between 0·8 and 1·5 per thousand the driver has to pay a fine. In both cases the licence is suspended for a longer or shorter period.

In many of the states of the United States a blood test is used in conjunction with other means of determining a man's drunkenness. If the alcoholic content is under ·05 per cent the defendant is not under the influence. Where it is in excess of ·05 and less than ·15 he may be considered drunk when that factor is taken in conjunction with other evidence. If it is ·15 per cent or more he shall be presumed to be under the influence.

I should like to see us take a firm stand on the matter. We cannot beat around the bush with our Criminal Code. We cannot expect our law enforcement officers to take a vigorous stand in the performance of their duty unless they have something to back them up. I should like to see a chemical test provided which could be used by the law enforcement officers. I would not make the chemical blood test compulsory because there are circumstances where it would be impossible and undesirable to make a blood test. I am thinking of an accident occurring perhaps fifty or sixty miles away from a hospital. I certainly would not want to burden the law enforcement officers with the responsibility of taking a blood test in that case.

But a large proportion of accidents occur in the urban areas where the services of a doctor are not far away. At the request of the law enforcement officers a blood test should be made and refusal to submit to a blood test should be considered as evidence of guilt. Such a test would be used in conjunction with other evidence. After we have given the law enforcement officers a fair chance to interpret the law and determine if a man is drunk, why start being chicken again? The bill provides for a fine for a first offence of not more than $500 and not less than $50 or imprisonment for three months or both. I do not like the word "or" in there because I think that if an individual has sufficient money to purchase liquor he will have sufficient money to pay a $50 fine.

The purpose of any penalty in this regard is related to the principle of a deterring influence. I am more than convinced that three months in jail would do more to inhibit intoxicated drivers than any fine you could impose. These are points I should like to bring out. I should like to see very careful consideration given to introducing a blood, breath or body test of some description based on the experience in Sweden or the United States which could be used in conjunction with other physical tests. After we have given our law enforcement officers a chance to protect us by being able to know when a driver is drunk, we should then put the maximum teeth in the law to prevent future occurrences.

Mr. Garson: Before the hon. member takes his seat I wonder if he would tell us whether he read subclause 3 of clause 224 before he made his remarks?

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Yes, but I think there should be some statement of the percentage such as ·15 or ·10, or whatever it may be to act as a guide. I believe there should be some scale or limitation.

Mr. Garson: I believe the hon. member is under some misapprehension. The analysis is admissible. It will indicate a certain alcoholic content in the blood. On the strength of that, along with the other evidence, the magistrate can then reach a decision as to whether the accused was intoxicated or impaired.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I rise to take part in this debate today in the belief that we all realize there have been sufficient arguments put forward to prove to all hon. members just how tremendous a problem the question of safe driving poses. I believe every government and village council through the federal government realizes the extent of the problem we have to face in trying to control this particular phase of modern life. One thing, I believe, we overlook in so many of our arguments is the human element. On other aspects we have all the statistics we require, but there is one element on which we cannot obtain statistics and that is as to how a human being will react under given circumstances. The driving of an automobile has become one of the most commonplace things in our life today, and every child today will inevitably drive a car at some point during its lifetime.

Every day we see the ordinary, quiet individual who goes along quite peacefully and is a model of decorum under ordinary circumstances, but when he gets behind the wheel of a car his ideals change. He is in control of a monster and he does things he would not dream of doing under other circumstances.

Governments today have done everything they can to make our highways safe and to remove every obstacle to safe driving. In fact, I remember a year or so ago an officer in the provincial police addressed our service club. He spoke about that very same thing and he mentioned the Queen Elizabeth highway. That is not our most recent highway but at that time it was supposed to be the last word in safety. There were not going to be any more bad accidents. But what happened? That highway was smoother, straighter, and better in every way and people became masters of their own destiny, but they drove faster and accidents continued to occur. We have, of course, the new turnpike going into the city of New York, but on days when there is heavy traffic on that turnpike the authorities have had to instruct groups of policemen to lead these so-called sensible people into New York so they would not have an accident on the way. That is the sort of thing we are dealing with here today.

I was pleased to note that the Minister of Justice in speaking about the United States suggested that the United States average as regards accidents was probably less than in Canada. In view of that fact, and in view of the suggested conference between the provinces and the federal government, I would like to suggest, as did my colleague for Royal, that the education of our youth should be considered at that conference. I know how jealous we all are of treading on the toes of the provinces when it comes to things over which they have control, but I believe the education of our youth is one of the most essential things in regard to the removal of the problem of dangerous driving, a problem which has become tremendous in this country today.

I am therefore in favour of this type of conference and the idea that education should be discussed at such a conference. Someone has to take the leadership and I suggest the federal government could take the leadership in calling such a conference at which the problem of education among the youth of our country today could be fully discussed.

We hear suggestions made about educating people through TV programs, the radio, magazines and signboards, but we have these things already. I maintain that the driving of a car is such an ordinary thing for a person today that the only solution is that we should have a course in safe driving for every one in our high schools. Such a course should be incorporated in the educational system and through the medium of such training the youth of today will realize that the motor car is not just something to give them pleasure, something to carry them from one place to another comfortably, but that it is also something which has dangerous possibilities. They would realize it is something they would have to control and keep under control all the time.

It is with a great deal of pleasure, Mr. Chairman, that I bring these ideas before the house and sincerely hope that if a conference is called the question of educating our youth while still in high school will be discussed.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, reverting to the point raised by the minister I would like to point out that subclause 4 of clause 224 points out that no person is required to give a sample of blood. Since no person is required to give a sample of blood then subclause 3 is meaningless. Subclause 3 simply states that a chemical analysis of a sample of blood, urine, breath or other bodily substance may be admitted in evidence. But subclause 4 states that no person is required to give a sample. I would suggest that these two factors be made compatible in some way because a person can simply refuse to give a sample of blood, as they will in most cases, and in addition there is no scale of percentages which could possibly guide the law enforcement officers.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this matter largely because I do not agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Kindersley. If my memory serves me right clause 223 is a later addition to our Criminal Code. Under clause 222, driving while intoxicated, it was found difficult to get convictions. My understanding is that it was found much easier to obtain a conviction under the section dealing with impaired driving. It is also my understanding that more convictions were obtained under that section than could possibly have been obtained under the provisions in section 222. The reason for that is obvious. You do not require to prove that a man is driving while impaired. He proves that himself by the manner in which he drives when he goes through a red light, sideswipes another car, or runs into the rear of another car. If he did any of these things then the fact that he was impaired could easily be established. I am not an authority on this, but I am not so sure convictions could be based entirely on blood tests and the amount of alcohol found in the blood.

My understanding is that some men—and some women, I suppose—can hold their liquor better than can others. One man may be badly befuddled after one drink while probably another person could drive reasonably well with two or three drinks under his belt. I do not want anyone to think that he might be able to do that. I am merely saying that it just might be possible. For that reason I do not think the blood test in itself could be complete evidence of intoxication. I therefore believe—and this is really what I rose to say—that section 223 is the most effective section we have at the present time for dealing with this matter of drunk driving.

Mr. Nesbitt: With regard to this section 222, there are four aspects upon which I should like to make a few comments. The first one is with respect to procedure under this section. As the section is worded at present and as it has been worded in the past, it is up to the crown attorney to decide whether or not he will proceed by indictment or will proceed by the method of summary conviction. A number of people made it known to me that there ought to be some chance for the accused to elect trial under this section; in other words that provision should be made so that the accused may have some say as to whether he will be tried by a magistrate or will have the opportunity of being tried by a jury.

I know quite well that for practical purposes it is much more expedient to try cases under this section by a magistrate. It gets them cleared up much more quickly. Hence in practically every case the crown attorney will proceed by the method of summary conviction and not by indictment. But in cases that involve a mandatory prison sentence—as do cases under this section—it seems to me that the accused should be allowed to have to have trial by jury if he so desires. I grant you that, from the way the section is worded, if he had the right to elect trial by jury and if he so elected, he could probably get a much heavier sentence if he were found guilty. Nevertheless, I feel that this matter should not be entirely up to the crown but that the accused should have some say as to whether or not the case is proceeded with by means of indictment or by means of summary conviction.

The second matter I should like to comment on briefly is one which was raised by my colleague the hon. member for Kamloops; I refer to the matter of the possibility of a dominion-provincial conference concerning death on the highways. The minister has suggested that there would be certain practical difficulties in dealing with this matter because conditions vary greatly as between the different provinces. For instance, conditions in Manitoba are quite different, as the minister has pointed out, from those in the city of Montreal or in the city of Toronto. I believe that the hon. member for Royal has pointed out rather well that this is a nation-wide problem, and that people who drive in Toronto today may very well be driving in the country the next afternoon and so on.

There is one other matter upon which I should like to make some comment in this connection. If such a conference were held, I believe it should take into consideration the age at which licences might be granted to people. Earlier this afternoon we heard some figures given by the hon. member for Ontario. He stated that he had certain figures which showed that most accidents were caused by people in the age group 25-40. With all respect to the figures that were given by my colleague, I cannot help feeling that rather poor statistical methods were used in arriving at this conclusion. Obviously the age group 25-40 is the one in which are—from the absolute point of view—by far the largest number of drivers. You have fewer drivers over that age and fewer drivers under that age. If the figures had shown the number of accidents per thousand in that group, they might have been a little bit more indicative of the actual situation.

What I am attempting to lead up to is this question of the age at which people should be licensed to drive cars. At the present time in the province of Ontario—I am not sure what the situation is in Manitoba which, I take it from the remarks made this afternoon, has much better arrangements, generally speaking—the age limit at which a licence to drive may be given is 16. That may be a proper age, but I certainly think the question should be looked into. People at the age of 16—and I am not so far removed from that age that I cannot remember what we used to think about at that time—have little sense of public responsibility. They are growing up emotionally and are a bit more unstable than they are at a later age.

Just by way of example, may I say that I was horrified to hear last summer, from some people who were approximately in that age group, that there is a nice little parlour game which teenagers play with jalopies which as a rule have no brakes and few safety devices, and which they had been allowed to purchase by their parents. This game is called "chicken". It is a nice little parlour game, only it is played on the highways, wherein two carloads of teenagers approach each other as fast as the jalopies will go, and the driver of the jalopy that first swerves away at the last moment is known as "chicken". They also have another little game that is played along the same lines, where they get about six people in the car, three in the front and three in the back, and the driver climbs out from behind the wheel and gets in the back seat and the next person in the front seat moves over. I understand that the rules of the game are that you must be going 60 miles an hour to do this. That again is a thing that you very often get with people who are 16 and 17 when driving cars. I cannot help feeling that this matter should be considered. I am not suggesting that, without due consideration, the age limit for licensing should be raised but I think that things like that should certainly be considered.

The third thing upon which I should like to comment is something that I mentioned in remarks previously in committee when we were discussing this section. I believe the same subject was commented upon by other hon. members including the hon. member for Vancouver East and one or two others. I refer to the situation where you find a driver of an automobile who has pulled his car off to the side of the road and who is intoxicated. The minister on an earlier occasion made some comments on this matter and there has been certain editorial comment on it; I believe that a week ago today the Toronto Evening Telegram had some editorial comment on it.

Just briefly I should like to elaborate my position in this matter at a little bit more length. I agree with some remarks which I believe the minister made, to the effect that if a person is drunk when he got in a car and took off he is clearly breaking the law. There is no argument about that. But let us take the situation where Mr. A, the driver, has been at a party, has maybe had one, two or three drinks, as the case may be, and gets into the car. As most people know, either by personal experience or by reading, alcohol does not take effect instantly. In fact, the action may be delayed for some little time, depending on the person, his condition, whether he has recently eaten and so on. It may be half an hour before much action takes place.

A person may not be breaking the law when he starts off in the car at all, but as he is proceeding down the road he may find that he is becoming intoxicated. His judgment still being fairly good, he realizes that he is not in a condition to be driving a car and should not do so, and his good sense makes him pull off to the side of the road. I maintain in that case that the person when he got into the car had not been committing an offence; and whether a person, of course, was drunk when he got into the car or whether he was perfectly sober when he got into the car and became intoxicated later is a matter of evidence for the court to decide.

I believe that, on other occasions, the minister pointed out that while that may be true, if a person went to sleep in a car and woke up he might not be sober when he woke up and he might decide to drive the car. I cannot help feeling that it is a rather dangerous principle to start bringing into our law, if we are going to punish somebody for something that he might do at a future time.

I feel that the court should be allowed a little more leeway in connection with drunken driving. I am thinking particularly of the situation where a person is found in a car by the side of the road, and is intoxicated. It is settled case law that a person found under those circumstances can be convicted under this section of having the care and control of a vehicle. I feel that in such a case the court should be given a little more leeway because that person has had the good sense to remove the vehicle from the road. If he had not committed an offence in the first place, and had not been drunk when he got into the car, some consideration should be given.

The last thing I should like to bring up this afternoon with respect to this section is the question of drunks generally. A great many remarks have been made this afternoon about drunks and drunken driving in general. I made some remarks in this respect before, but I should like to elaborate upon them a little further. I feel that drunks generally fall into two classes. First of all, there is what is known in popular parlance as the social drinker. I believe that is the type of person this section of the code is aimed to hit.

I might say that the social drinker is the person—it might be any one of us—who goes to a party and has one or two drinks, but who does not drink habitually. These people are much more likely to be quickly affected by alcohol. They may drive a car and become involved in an accident. When they take the car to the party they know full well that if they get into an accident they should be punished. I agree fully with my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Albert, in the remarks he made. When you walk into a situation with your eyes open, knowing full well what is going to happen, you should be punished rather severely. But that is not the case with a person who is an alcoholic.

I have discussed alcoholism with some members of the medical profession, and I understand it is a disease. Confining an alcoholic to jail is not going to accomplish much. He will be there for seven days, then he will get out and do the same thing again. Under the provisions of clause 225 a man's driver's licence can be removed, and that might be of some help. It is a question of whether or not he gets caught. He might very easily be driving down a road while drunk and not happen to get caught. It is only when he gets into an accident he is likely to be caught. Then, of course, you do have cases where people manage to get away and cannot be found for a while.

On this question of alcoholics I should like to suggest that since they are people who are sick sending them to jail will not accomplish much. If some other method could be used in conjunction with the present penalty, it might be helpful. I am going to submit an amendment to this clause which will be as follows.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is that an amendment to clause 225?

Mr. Nesbitt: No, to clause 222, Mr. Chairman. The amendment I should like to suggest would be as follows. At the end of the section as it is at present, the following paragraph could be inserted:

> If any person is convicted of an offence under subsections (a) or (b) of this section, the court may, if the evidence indicates that the accused suffers from alcoholism, direct that in addition to or in lieu of the sentences set out in subsections (a) and (b) of this section the accused shall be confined to a hospital or similar institution for a period not exceeding six months and not less than thirty days for the purposes of observation and treatment.

So there is no misunderstanding of the intention I should like to point out that this suggested addition to section 222 could only be used if evidence was presented to the court which the court believed that the person suffered from alcoholism. The penalty suggested here could be used in addition to the penalties imposed under section 222 or if the magistrate felt the circumstances warranted, the penalties contained in the amendment could be imposed in lieu of the penalties contained in section 222.

The reason I suggest this course is that it gives the magistrate or the court certain power over the convicted person. If an accused person is convicted of drunken driving the magistrate may, upon evidence being presented that he is an alcoholic, invoke the penalty contained in this proposed section. The magistrate may say he will have to take treatment for a period of three or four months in an institution and may suspend sentence. In addition, the magistrate may impose certain penalties contained in section 222. In other words, it gives the magistrate some power to make a person take some kind of treatment. There would be considerable advantage, not only from the traffic point of view but from the point of view of alcoholics generally. It is an indirect way of dealing with alcoholism to bring it under this section, but it may very well be killing two birds with one stone.

In view of the fact the minister will likely have some comment to make on this amendment, as well as other members, I am concluding my remarks to listen to the minister's comments.

Mr. Garson: I am sure that all of us are most sympathetic to those who are unfortunate enough to be alcoholics. We would like to do anything that would assist them, but it would seem to me that their treatment is something which clearly falls under the question of public health and not under the subject matter of criminal law. For that reason, I would question very much whether an amendment of this sort is constitutional, even if it were thought it was wise to enact it.

My hon. friend says or implies that it is not the alcoholic's fault that he is an alcoholic, and if he were a genuine alcoholic I suppose we would all agree with that. But I do not think it is necessary for an alcoholic to attempt to drive a car while he is under the influence of liquor any more than it would be for the diabetic or the person suffering from tuberculosis. If alcoholism is not a crime but a disease, and that seems to be the argument, then all the alcoholic has to do to avoid conviction under section 222 is not to drive a car while drunk.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the minister permit a question at this point? The minister says the the person who is an alcoholic does not have to drive a car, and I would agree except that when the alcoholic is in that condition he is not capable of forming a judgment or knowing what he is doing. The minister stated this was a question of public health, but the code does attempt in other places to deal with the criminal sexual psychopath, inasmuch as they are a menace to the public just as the alcoholic is.

Mr. Wylie: Before the minister replies, I would ask him to speak a little louder because we cannot hear a word down at this end of the room.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member has suggested that an alcoholic in driving a car while intoxicated is in a different position from a person who is not an alcoholic. The argument that I was attempting just now to develop was that to excuse an alcoholic for getting drunk does not involve our excusing him for driving a car while he is drunk. If my hon. friend says, as I understood him to say, that such person drives a car while drunk because he is drunk, and does not know any better, I suggest the same could be said of a drunken man who is not an alcoholic.

I think certainly it would be a retrograde step to put in the Criminal Code a provision which would enable a man to create a defence for himself by saying that he was an alcoholic. While my hon. friend does not suggest that, exactly, he suggests that—> —the court may, if the evidence indicates that the accused suffers from alcoholism, direct that in addition to or in lieu of the sentences set out in subsections (a) and (b) of this section the accused shall be confined to a hospital or similar institution for a period not exceeding six months and not less than thirty days for the purposes of observation and treatment.

Upon what principle of observation of civil liberties and the like could the hon. member justify sending a man to a hospital for six months as punishment under the criminal law because he happened to be brought up on a charge of driving while drunk or driving while impaired. It seems to me that the punishment would be out of all proportion to that particular offence, because it may be in addition to the existing penalties. And in any case, as my hon. friend clearly indicates, the alcoholic is to be committed to the hospital for the alleged purpose of observation and treatment.

The treatment of alcoholism I would suggest is a matter of public health. I would not think it wise to attempt to pass this amendment; and even if our power to do so were unquestionable—which I do not think it is—I do not think we should pass it anyway. For my part as minister of the justice department, I would not dream of imposing this sort of burden upon municipally or provincially operated hospitals without consultation with them. How do we know what facilities they have to care for and guard a prisoner who came to them as the result of a magistrate's order in the manner suggested in my hon. friend's proposed amendment?

I have no objection at all to giving consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion, and discussing it with provincial authorities to see if it is workable and whether and if perhaps the same result could be achieved by constitutional amendment to provincial law to the same effect. If my hon. friend would be content to accept my undertaking in that regard, I would be glad to give it. But I am afraid if the amendment is put to a vote I would most certainly have to oppose it strenuously.

Mr. Fulton: Is not the same principle involved as when a man is committed to a mental institution for observation? Has he considered whether we are imposing a burden upon the provinces when a man is confined to a provincial mental institution as the result of a jury having brought in a verdict on a capital charge to the effect that the accused is insane? Admittedly there might not be as many who would be placed in those circumstances as there would be of those found suffering from alcoholism; but I suggest the principle is the same.

If under the criminal law we have in the one field the right to impose certain administrative obligations upon the provinces, then it seems to me we have the same right in the other field. The minister is no doubt correct when he suggests that where there is a heavy burden imposed there should be the opportunity of prior consultation; but it seems to me the principle is the same.

Mr. Garson: I think if my hon. friend will examine the statutes he will find that persons are committed to provincial insane asylums and hospitals and the like under apt provincial or municipal laws in that behalf.

Mr. Fulton: Not where they are found not guilty by reason of insanity on a capital charge.

Mr. Garson: Oh yes. They are found not guilty because of insanity, under the criminal law. But when it comes to getting them into provincial institutions they have to be certified as being insane, under the legislation under which the institution operates. And of course there is no difficulty in getting a certificate because a psychiatrist is only too willing to give it. That is the basis of their admission. But here the hon. member suggests that we use the Criminal Code as the basis for admission to a provincial institution.

The other point my hon. friend raised was the age at which a licence should be given, and he implied that the young driver was the dangerous driver. These figures offered as a sample of provincial experience might be of interest to him. From 16 to 19 years of age the figures show that there were nine involvements per hundred drivers; from the age 20 to the age 24 there were 12·1; from 25 to 34 there were 9·8. And the figures go on progressively, showing a steady decline from the group aged 20 to 24. So that these figures do not support my hon. friend's suggestion that it is the drivers from 16 to 19 years of age who cause the greatest risk.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question. The question is on the amendment. All those in favour will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment (Mr. Nesbitt) negatived.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 222 carry?

Mr. Bell: I suggest to the minister that in view of the fact the amendment has been turned down he now has reason, by his own admission, for calling a dominion-provincial conference to study the matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 223 and 224 agreed to.

On clause 225—Order prohibiting driving.

Mr. Fulton: This is the clause under which the right of a judge or magistrate to prohibit a person from driving is conferred. I would ask the minister whether, as a result of the discussion on the earlier occasion, any consideration has been given to the matter of laying down a minimum period for which the cancellation shall be continued under section 225 (1) (a), so that there would be uniform practice across the country and so that it might be clearly written in the clause that the suspension is regarded by parliament as a major weapon in fighting highway accidents of this sort. We would wish to be assured that it is not used lightly, and that it is for a substantial period, for reasons I advanced earlier and which I shall not repeat.

Mr. Garson: The point the hon. member has raised was considered, but the course he suggested was rejected because we are of the view that the provincial authorities who have the primary responsibility for enforcing the law in respect of drivers' licences are, in relation to the circumstances in their provinces, in a better position to judge what would be the appropriate period of time to deprive a driver of a licence to drive which he holds from them.

As I am sure my hon. friend knows, this is not the only provision; they have supplementary provisions. As I said earlier, in at least one province in Canada when a man appears on three separate occasions his licence is cancelled for life. This is a matter which, with the provisions that we have in the code as it stands, could be very well left to the discretion of the provincial officers.

Mr. Fulton: The point the minister has raised is one which seems to me to make it desirable that there should be some minimum provision in subclause (a) because, as he has pointed out, the magistrates and judges have the right to suspend the licence for infractions of provincial statutes, or some provincial statutes, when these cases come before them. Here we are creating the right to make an order to prohibit a person from driving after an infraction of the Criminal Code. If the charge is laid under the Criminal Code, then it would not be laid under the provincial highways act or the motor vehicles act, or whatever it may be, which may create a related offence. You would not have a prosecution under the two at the same time. It may be that when the third offence is committed it can only be prosecuted under the Criminal Code.

If the minister thinks it is a good practice that in the province of Manitoba where there have been three convictions for drunken driving the licence should be suspended for life, why do we not put it in the Criminal Code here and say that after a person is convicted three times for this offence, then the judge or magistrate shall make an order cancelling the right to drive for the rest of the person's life.

Mr. Garson: For the simple reason that this law, that is the law under the Criminal Code, plus the correlative laws in provincial statutes, are no more effective than their enforcement. The policy of enforcement is one of the main factors in their effectiveness. That being so, we think that it is the course of wisdom to allow a considerable measure of discretion to the provincial authorities as to what attitude they wish to take with regard to the suspension of licences. In the case to which he referred, one provincial policy has been adopted that is not uniform. Some other provinces do not take the same view. I think my hon. friend will agree that in this, and in many other provisions of the Criminal Code, the policy of enforcement in relation to it is entirely determined by the provinces and in the end it is they who are going to decide what that policy of enforcement is to be.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. Is it not true to say that it is the policy of enforcement in so far as whether or not prosecutions will be made under the act; but surely it is the prerogative of the federal parliament to say if it is creating an offence what the punishment for that offence will be. That is what we are dealing with here. Should there be a prescribed punishment that automatically follows in every province after the commission of this offence, or will the penalty itself be left to the discretion of the provinces?

It is no interference with provincial jurisdiction or autonomy in any way to suggest that here, where the parliament of Canada is creating or defining an offence and saying that a certain course of action will be the function of the Criminal Code of Canada, we should do the other thing which parliament has always done in connection with that and say what penalty shall follow as a result of the commission of that offence, if the accused is found guilty. That surely should not be argued as taking away any right from the provinces.

Mr. Garson: I would point out to my hon. friend—and I think he is aware of it, and would agree with it—that clause 225 that we are discussing enables the magistrate, in addition to the other penalties that he may impose, make an order prohibiting a person from driving a motor vehicle on the highways in Canada:

> (a) during any period that the court, judge, justice or magistrate considers proper, if he is liable to imprisonment for life in respect of that offence, or
>
> (b) during any period not exceeding three years, if he is not liable to imprisonment for life in respect of that offence.

A magistrate has, in respect of any offence committed under this clause, the authority to order the driver not to drive for a period of three years. I am sure my hon. friend does not want that discretion increased.

Then why should we interfere with the magistrate's discretion by setting a minimum penalty for him in a manner which we have not done in any of the other provisions of the Criminal Code, except in relation to the fines imposed for driving while drunk, driving while impaired and theft from the mails. I think these are the only three cases in which we provide the minimum punishment. I see no reason why we should do so in this case.

Mr. Knowles: I have been comparing the wording of clause 225 (1) (a) and (b) with the wording of section 285 (7) (a) and (b) in the code as it now stands. While there has been a juxtaposition of words, I do not detect any difference in effect. What I should like to know is this. Since the provision, both in the old wording and the new, refers to the possibility of a licence being cancelled for any period of time only if the person is liable to imprisonment for life in respect of the offence, on what basis does our province of Manitoba suspend the licence for life in the case to which the minister referred? I am not objecting; I would simply like to know the legal basis for what is being done.

Mr. Garson: Well, as part of the provincial law in every province, the provincial administration have the right to say upon what terms they will grant licences to operate motor vehicles upon the roads of that province. Pursuant to that power, they say that where a driver has been convicted on three separate occasions of driving while drunk he shall not get a licence to drive a motor vehicle upon those roads.

Mr. Knowles: It is done under the motor vehicle act of Manitoba, rather than under the Criminal Code?

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. I am sorry if I have not previously made that point clear. In reply to the objections taken by the hon. member for Kamloops, my point was that every province in Canada having the responsibility for enforcing these provincial acts and the Criminal Code, and having the power to pass prohibitions of this kind, which seem appropriate to them under the circumstances in that province, we have gone a long way in clause 225, and we should not go any farther.

Mr. Maltais: I was wondering whether the minister could indicate to the committee what happens to a driver who has lost his licence under this new law. If he applies to the remittance board to get his licence back, what would be the attitude of that board? If representations are made on behalf of some province how would that affect the situation? Let me put my question this way. If a driver lost his licence by reason of a charge laid under a provincial statute, or under the Criminal Code, what would be the attitude of the remittance board in each case?

Mr. Garson: If the offender lost his licence because of a breach of a provincial statute, his application for remission would have to be made to the provincial remission board and only that board could grant remission. If he had lost his licence by reason of an order made under the Criminal Code, the application for remission would be made to the federal remissions board in Ottawa, and then this federal remissions board would have to decide on the facts of the case as to whether remission should be granted, and in each case the decision would be reached by the appropriate remission board upon the facts that were before it.

Mr. Maltais: The remission board in Ottawa would have no jurisdiction whatsoever to give back the licence of a driver who had been convicted under a provincial statute?

Mr. Garson: The matter would never come before it.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has made it clear—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

An hon. Member: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: At the dinner recess the committee was discussing clause 225.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there was really just one more question I wanted to ask the minister before we rose at six o'clock. One realizes, of course, that one question can sometimes lead to another. The minister had indicated that in the case of Manitoba a person who is convicted three times of driving while impaired has his licence cancelled permanently, and that that is done by a court in Manitoba under the provisions of the Manitoba motor vehicle act. I take it then that the instances to which he was referring were not carried out in the sense that it was a case of a justice or magistrate availing himself of the right set out in clause 225 of this bill. What I would like to know is this, bearing in mind that clause 225 has been on the statute books as section 285. I would like to know whether there have been any cases in Manitoba or in any other province where this provision has been used under which magistrates have cancelled licences for a period up to three years or any longer period because of offences under the Criminal Code.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure I am correct in saying, although I cannot give a concrete example, that orders have been made under this section 225, because I have quite a strong recollection of having signed remission orders in relation to such orders as those under section 225. If my hon. friend looks at the language of clause 225 he will see that it does purport to authorize the cancellation of the accused's motor licence. Under this section the magistrate or judge may simply make an order prohibiting the accused from driving his car.

Mr. Knowles: Has that been done?

Mr. Garson: Yes, that has been done.

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We turn now to the group starting with clause 150.

On clause 150—Obscene matter.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I believe clauses 150 to 153 were allowed to stand and I appreciate the minister and the committee agreeing to that arrangement. I wanted to say a few words about this group of clauses, mainly from the point of view of objectionable literature, not so much obscene objects or other matters.

In 1949 the house passed an amendment to section 207, which now becomes clause 150, which generally speaking had the effect of making it an offence to print, publish, circulate, or sell, or have in possession for any of the aforesaid reasons, a crime comic. That was adding a new type of literature to the type of things prohibited under section 207. Then, in addition, the amendment had the effect of removing one element of the defence which previously had been that if a person could show he had no knowledge that he had in his possession for any of these purposes obscene or offensive matter it was open to him to raise that as a defence. Parliament decided in 1949 that obscene literature or objects and crime comics are to some extent self-evident, and that a person who had them in his possession and offered them for sale should know about them, and where he intended and was willing to take a profit on the sale of these things it would not be open to him as a defence that he did not know he was selling an offensive object.

I think it is fair to say that following the enactment of that amendment in 1949 that particular type of literature, which was the occasion of the amendment, namely the crime comic, disappeared for a time from Canadian newsstands. It was not very long before they began to reappear in a different form. First of all a lot of material which really dealt in pictorial form with a quite different subject matter, began to appear, but it was not very long after that before it began to reappear in something very closely resembling its original form, and we now find vast quantities of crime and horror comics once again circulating in Canada.

We had a further discussion of this question of objectionable literature in the spring of 1953 when a resolution which I moved was before the house. On that occasion I asked for the setting up of a joint committee of the house and the Senate to deal with the question of filthy literature generally, and the minister in replying to the debate on that occasion, and I hope I can give a fair summary of his argument, said that while the problem was still serious it seemed to him that the best answer to the problem lay not so much in further amendment of the legislation—I had asked that a committee be set up to study the question of recommending amendments—the minister said the main answer lay in the vigorous and effective enforcement of the existing legislation.

With respect to the matter of crime comics, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to weaken my argument along other lines, but I am inclined to say that I agree with the minister that the legislation as it existed after amendment in 1949 was pretty comprehensive and should have been quite effective in dealing with that particular subject matter. A good deal of the reason why crime comics and horror comics have been reappearing is found in the fact that there has not been a sufficiently vigorous enforcement of the present provision. Crime comics in 1949 were fairly broadly defined. The definition was contained in section 207, subsection 3 as follows:

> "Crime comic" means in this section any magazine, periodical or book which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially the commission of crimes, real or fictitious.

That seems to me now and seemed to me then a pretty broad definition and yet these things reappear in increasingly large numbers.

I want to say a word about the extent of the menace presented by this type of literature, both crime comics and obscene literature generally, because I want to suggest a still further amendment to the clause. I realize at the outset that there has been a broadening of the definition in the proposed section 150, and I want to give full credit to the effect of that broadening of the definition but I suggest that there is room and indeed necessity for another amendment. That has to do with the penalty for a person who commits this offence. In order to make my case on the penalty aspect of the matter I should like to lay before the committee again some considerations as to why this thing seems to me to be one with which it is most essential that parliament should deal and that it should impose heavy punishment on persons who commit the offence. I am not going to rehearse all the arguments that were used in 1949 and which were felt by parliament at that time to be sufficient arguments for making this type of literature an offence under the Criminal Code. However, I want to draw to the attention of the minister and of the committee the type of thing which is circulating in Canada today, notwithstanding the prohibition which has been in our law since 1949.

I should like to refer the committee to some material compiled by a Dr. Fredric Wertham, who is a very eminent psychiatrist in the United States of America and who has been working on this problem for a great many years in that country. The reason for referring to the experience of the United States of America is that, by and large, the type of pulp comic magazine that circulates in Canada today originates in the United States. In some cases it is imported in its magazine form and in some cases the plates are imported and the magazines printed in Canada. Dr. Wertham has compiled sufficient information to convince me—and, I suggest, any other thinking person who has the welfare of young Canadians at heart—that this type of literature constitutes a real threat to the welfare of the whole nation. He has recently written a book entitled "Seduction of the Innocent" which is published in the United States by Rinehart and is to be published in Canada by Clarke, Irwin and Company. I think it is April 23 that the book is to appear. I have had the privilege of reading advance proofs of the book which have been made available to me through the courtesy of the Canadian publishers. I should like to refer the committee to some of the things that Dr. Wertham has to say about the degrading effect of this type of literature. It is going to be difficult for me to refer to the pages in the book because what I have here are galley proofs, and the page references are not going to be the same. But at page 96 of the galley proofs the book contains this passage:

> I found a good opportunity to study what one might call the cultural role of comic books in small stores in very poor neighbourhoods where immigrants or migrating minorities have moved into a section of the city. For example in a small candy store frequented almost entirely by Puerto Ricans who had moved into the district there is no other reading matter aside from comic books. But of them there is a large secondhand supply limited to the violent and gruesome and sexy kinds. There are always children around, including very young ones, and this is their first contact with American culture.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Transposing it one might say—and still be within the realm of fact—with respect to immigrants into this country, it is their first contact with Canadian culture. To continue the quotation:

> They cannot even speak English, so of course they only look at the pictures. They have not yet heard that the experts of the comic book industry have found that comic books teach literacy, so they don't learn to read from them. But here their little money is taken away from them. Late in the evening, and into the night, children collect at this store, which is also a place for that much hushed-up phenomenon child prostitution of the youngest and lowest-paid kind.

I suggest to you that those are not harsh words to apply to the effects of this type of literature, namely child prostitution of the lowest-paid kind. That is going on in almost every Canadian city today.

I find today, just as we found in 1949, that there does not seem to be a general realization of the extent to which this type of literature circulates amongst children in Canada at the present time. To illustrate the effects of this type of literature on the minds of children I should like to refer to another passage in this book of this eminent psychiatrist which appears at pages 4 and 5 of the galley proofs which I have before me. Dr. Wertham describes the clinic, held at the psychiatric institute of which he was then the head, for the purpose of discussing the effects of these comic publications on a certain child who had been led to commit a crime. This child had no more criminal instincts when he was born than any other child may have; yet he had been exposed to these things and he had, for no apparent reason, shot a spectator at a baseball game in New York. They held a clinic on the boy. They were much concerned about the matter and they tried to ascribe reasons for his behaviour. The passage is as follows:

> When the Lafargue staff conferred about this case, as we had about so many similar others, we asked ourselves; How does one treat such a boy? How does one help him to emotional balance while emotional excitement is instilled in him in an unceasing stream by these comic books? Can one be satisfied with the explanation that he comes from a broken family and lives in an underprivileged neighbourhood? Can one scientifically disregard what occupied this boy's mind for hours every day? Can we say that this kind of literary and pictorial influence had no effect at all, disregarding our clinical experience in many similar cases? Or can we get anywhere by saying that he must have been disordered in the first place or he would not have been so fascinated by comic books?
>
> That would have meant ignoring the countless other children equally fascinated whom we had seen. Evidently in Willie's case there was a constellation of many factors. Which was finally the operative one? What in the last analysis tipped the scales?

Slowly, and at first reluctantly, I have come to the conclusion that this chronic stimulation, temptation and seduction by comic books, both their content and their alluring advertisements of knives and guns, are contributing factors to many children's maladjustment.

I say again to you, Mr. Chairman, that on the basis of what I know is circulating on the newsstands of Canada today in vast quantities, that statement holds as true in this country as it does in the United States.

At this stage I should like to lay before the committee examples taken from a survey of the newsstands. The survey was made in the city of Victoria. I do not pick out that city because I wish to do a disservice to Victoria. I pick it out because I think that, in the minds of most of us, it is regarded as a staid and law-abiding city. Yet here are what have been circulating on the newsstands in the city of Victoria, as shown as a result of a spot check by an interested organization there. I am not going to give the names of the magazines, but I am going to describe the contents. Here is one number published twice monthly, every second week. Here is a summary of the crimes illustrated in most gruesome and complete detail in this book: Spears used in killing; beating with whip; strangling; skeletons of people already murdered; four killings by hypodermic needle; five murders by hired, paid, killer (killer takes drugs to forget); one knock-out and drowning; one murder with poker, pushes body in car over cliff; murderer drinks self senseless with whisky; dead men returning from coffin for revenge; one hanging; detailed formula for making bombs with piece of pipe and playing cards; one flogging of girl who refused master's advances; one deliberate running down and killing by car.

Here is another one, a story with illustrations—indeed, the story is in the illustrations: mentally deranged undertaker who has secret way of killing and restoring people he wishes to torture; has killed three shown in torture chamber, and kills girl he wants by car; uses hypo needle and keeps her in torture chamber.

Here is another one: man becomes mental and strangles two people. He is branded on back with picture of devil by monsters in picture from hell. He drowns a man. He throws a doctor out of the window; five dead, three strangled and one drowned.

Here is another one: terrifying creature comes out of the swamp, kills man; proves to be man with mask; he is killed. Three men drown by strangling, two corpses and five dead.

And so the gruesome catalogue goes on, Mr. Chairman. We are, or should be, horrified to learn that in Canada today, notwithstanding the provisions of section 207 of the Criminal Code, vast quantities of this material are circulated. Lest anyone should think that this is again a pet subject of a person who uses it just as a pet subject, let me read you an extract I found in the Ottawa Journal of March 11 headed "Comic book killing."

Westville, NS, March 11.—Stewart Wright, 13, Wednesday told a coroner's jury how he shot his 14-year-old pal to death March 2 while they listened to a "shooting" radio program and read comic books about "the two-gun kid." The jury returned a verdict of accidental death and recommended that comic books "of the type found at the scene" be banned.

In dealing with this matter I believe it is necessary for us to try to assess responsibility and to provide appropriate penalties. I have said that a good deal of the answer may be found in a more vigorous enforcement. I cannot understand why, with the present provisions in the Criminal Code that I have already mentioned and the present definition of crime comic magazines—I do not like to dignify them by the word "magazine"—this material I have described to the committee is allowed to circulate in Canada. I cannot understand why more prosecutions are not launched. It seems to me one of the answers is that the quantity of this stuff is so enormous that the task of inspecting the newsstands and dealing with it would impose an almost impossible duty on the already overburdened law enforcement officers.

There are a number of interested organizations who have been trying to take some effective action to deal with this matter. But even with the help of these voluntary organizations, parent-teacher associations and so on, the task of policing and inspecting newsstands becomes almost impossible. One can see the magnitude of the task when one realizes it is estimated that about 80 million per month of these books are now published in the United States. I am satisfied that a proportionate number circulate in Canada today, and that would mean something over 8 million a month, and all these are traded about amongst the children in huge quantities. When you think of these figures, then you can contemplate the enormous profits that are made out of this kind of degrading traffic and understand why the publishers and printers laugh at the penalties. They may be penalized for one particular offence. They pay the fine, then change the name of the concern, change the name of the comic book and flood the market with an equally undesirable type under a new name put out by a so-called new publisher.

We are not going to get effective action to deal with this matter until we make the punishment fit the crime. My suggestion is that we concentrate at the moment upon that aspect of the matter, making the punishment fit the crime. I cannot find better words than those of Dr. Wertham to describe the crime; the seduction of the innocent—the deliberate degrading of the minds of Canadian children for the motive of profit. I cannot find words too strong to condemn the type of person who will indulge in that sort of traffic.

I should like to read again from Dr. Wertham on the comparison between the sort of thing the children want and the sort of thing that they actually get. It seems to me that here he has put up a challenge to the Canadian people as well as to the people in the United States for whom he is writing. I have read you, sir, the account of what this boy got, the lad who killed the spectator at the baseball game with a rifle, and who was sent to the reformatory. I suggest that he killed this man for no other reason than that that was the sort of thing he had been conditioned to seeing in these comic books to which he had been exposed.

Some of the publishers pretend that that is what the children want and that it provides a natural escape for some of the impulses of young children. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the idea that this is the sort of thing to which children naturally turn. It is not the sort of thing to which they naturally turn, and never has been until they were degraded and seduced by the type of literature to which they are now exposed. I was particularly struck by this passage in Dr. Wertham's book, in which he compares what they get with what they really want and what they would be happy with. This is at page 140 of the galley proofs:

> One afternoon, after analyzing the content of the latest batch, I was riding on the subway. Across from me was a nice-looking little boy, totally immersed in one of the bloody thrillers I had just gone over. I found myself in a revery. In my fantasy I was addressing a huge audience of parents, doctors, legislators and officials. This is what I was saying:
>
> "Set the children free! Give them a chance! Let them develop according to what is best in them. Don't inculcate in them your ugly passions when they have hardly learned to read. Don't teach them all the violence, the shrewdness, the hardness of your own life. Don't spoil the spontaneity of their dreams. Don't lead them halfway to delinquency and when they get there clap them into your reformatories for what is now euphemistically called "group living." Don't stimulate their minds with sex and perversity and label the children abnormal when they react. Don't continue to desecrate death, graves and coffins with your horror stories and degrade sex with the sordid rituals of hitting, hanging, torturing. Don't sow in their young minds the sadistic details of destruction.
>
> Set the children free! All they want is to play, to learn, to grow up. They want to play games of adventure and fun, not your games of wars and killing. They want to learn how the world goes, what the people do who achieve something or discover something. They want to grow up to raise families with homes and children and not revel in morbid visions of Batman and his young friend. They want to grow up into men and women, not supermen and wonder women. Set the children free!"

[Mr. Fulton.]

I suggest, sir, that that is the problem, the situation which confronts Canada. It is the same situation as that which confronts this highminded man in the United States: to set the children free. It is to me a matter of profound regret that the legislation enacted in 1949 does not seem to have done the job. I suppose that no legislation of itself ever will do the job. There has to be in the public mind an insistence upon enforcement as well as an awareness of the problem.

But I believe one reason why the problem still confronts us is the reason to which I referred a moment ago, namely that there is too much profit in this type of publication, and that the penalties in comparison with the chance of profit are too light. I would point out that this is a ready-made medium of mass circulation that can be turned to the advantage of those who make enormous profit from it, and at the risk of only the light penalties now in effect.

In seeking for a way to meet the whole problem, I was concerned at first lest a new type of comic, the horror comic, might not be covered by the Criminal Code. I find however that section 150 contains a fresh definition of a crime comic and states:

> In this section, "crime comic" means a magazine, periodical or book that exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially
>
> (a) The commission of crimes, real or fictitious, or
>
> (b) events connected with the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, whether occurring before or after the commission of the crime.

I have thought this over as carefully as I could, and it seems to me the definition is wide enough to cover even the horror type of crime comic—that is, the one which shows crime which is entirely fantastic and is committed by a fantastic creature who may exist only in the sordid imagination of its creator. What these imaginary creatures do is still a crime; those things in which they take part and are portrayed are connected with crime, whether it be before or after the commission of the crime.

I have therefore concluded that the new definition goes as far as one could go, and is as comprehensive as one could make it. Therefore the only further approach is that of making the punishment fit the crime. I am conscious of the fact that the penalties at the present time are not light for the individual vendors. They are contained in section 154 which provides that—

> Every one who commits an offence under section 150, 151, 152 or 153 is guilty of
>
> (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or
>
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

I suggest that in the case of an individual news vendor, and possibly in the case of the distributor—if we may take it one stage back in the line of distribution—the present provision contains penalties that are severe enough. Because it is true that there are vast quantities of these things crossing the counters of newsstands, and that many of these newsstands are adjuncts of corner grocery stores or candy stores, and that the proprietors are chiefly engaged in other matters so that they just do not have the time to cope with the physical volume of these things and do the voluntary job of censorship which would be required to distinguish the good from the bad.

The same may be true of the small distributor. At the same time however I do not hold with the brief recently submitted by the periodical distributors of Canada which suggested that the vendor and the distributor should be absolved from any liability. These men are placing in the hands of children things which are going to seduce their minds, things which are going to corrupt their minds and make for a generation of Canadians who have a completely distorted concept of morals and moral values. These people are putting into the hands of the public something which is dangerous to the welfare of our society, and I do not think they should be absolved of all responsibility.

I do suggest however that the primary responsibility lies with the person who puts them into circulation, the man who produces them, the man who first discharges into society this lethal and ghastly form of perversion. And there is where the penalty should be heaviest.

I suggest also that the present penalties provided in the Criminal Code are not nearly commensurate with the extent of the crime when we stop to think of the harm that it may do, and that it is in fact doing.

I have before me an amendment which I would be pleased to place before the committee. I wish to make it perfectly clear that if the minister would like to have time to think it over, or if he thinks immediately that it should be modified in some particular, I would be most delighted to withdraw it for that purpose, or to let it stand, or deal with it in any way he likes.

My amendment is:

> That section 150 be amended by adding thereto the following words as subsection (8):
>
> (8) (a) Every one who commits an offence under this section and who is the person who makes, prints or publishes or has in his possession for the purpose of publishing any of the things enumerated in subsections 1(a) and 1(b) of this section is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years, or if a corporation to a fine of $25,000.
>
> (b) Every one who commits an offence under this section and who is the person who distributes or circulates or has in his possession for the purpose of distribution or circulation any of the things enumerated in subsections 1(a) and 1(b) of this section is guilty of (i) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or (ii) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

As the committee will appreciate, that preserves with respect to the distributor and vendor the present provisions of clause 154 in that it leaves the penalty as it now stands; but with respect to the man who makes, prints or publishes any of these things—that is, the man who initially puts them into circulation after having created them—he and he alone is liable to the penalty of imprisonment for five years or, if a corporation, to a fine of $25,000.

At the present time everyone is liable to a maximum penalty of two years or, if a corporation, to a fine provided under the general section of the act. In the case of a corporation, I submit it is not sufficient.

Here I suggest that the man who commits the initial offence should be liable, if an individual, to a penalty of a sentence three years more than the vendor, which would make a maximum of five years, or, if a corporation, to a fine of $25,000, which I submit is not one penny too much, in view of the enormous profits made out of these things and the way in which in the past the publishers have tended to laugh it off, change the names and bring them out under another guise.

In final support of my position in that regard I should like to refer the committee to the experience in the United Kingdom as described in a report in the Ottawa Journal of January 20, 1954, which shows that they have the same problem and that they do impose very severe penalties on the publishers. This article has a dateline of London, January 20, and states:

> The publishers of a paper-covered book which figured in a brutal murder last year were sentenced to six months in jail Tuesday after the book was judged obscene in court.
>
> In passing sentence, the judge told Reginald Herbert Carter, 34, and Julius Reiter, 46, that the "literary pollution" they produced would "sooner or later drag the whole reading public down into a pool of depravity".

Seven books concerned in the case were entitled "Accused", "Auction", "Persian Bride", "Pursuit", "Amok", "Killer", and "Vengeance".

Their author is said to be Hank Janson, a slight little man in his 40's who lives in Spain.

A copy of one of the books concerned in Tuesday's trial was found last year in the room of Francis Wilkinson, 24-year-old furnaceman who battered a little girl to death.

In the book, a character twisted a strip of cloth around a piece of wood to make a club. Wilkinson killed the child with a chain log similarly wrapped.

He was found guilty of murder last November and was hanged.

At that time, the presiding judge asked what action was being taken against the publishers.

Tuesday, Sir Gerald Dobson said the books must have brought vividly to the jury's attention "the abyss of filth into which the nation is drifting".

"This is literary pollution", he said, and added:

"I can only hope that this trial will mean a sweep in the other direction—towards the realm of pure and exhilarating literature and not this kind of debasing stuff which will sooner or later drag the whole reading public down into a veritable pool of depravity."

In addition to the jail sentence, Sir Gerald imposed fines totalling £6,000 on three publishing and printing companies with which Carter and Reiter are connected.

While £6,000 at the present rate of exchange does not equal $25,000, yet in terms of what it will buy in England that £6,000 is an even heavier fine than $25,000 would be in Canada.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that I have not said anything like what I would have liked to say about the question of obscene literature as distinct from the crime comic book. Perhaps as this discussion develops there may be an opportunity and occasion to say that. Notwithstanding the provision we enacted in 1949, I believe that this crime comic stuff constitutes a grievous threat; and in view of the feeling I have about it, which I submit is substantiated by the passages I have quoted and the events in Canada and elsewhere to which I have referred illustrating clearly the effect this has on children, it is incumbent on parliament to deal effectively with this threat. While I want to give credit to the minister—I am glad to do so—for having accepted the amendment in 1949 and then working out this enlargement of the definition to take care of one or two cases decided since then, I feel not even that is sufficient unless we make the penalties sufficiently heavy to be of a real deterrent nature. If we can do that, then I think we shall enlist not only the immediate active support of the law enforcement officers who feel this is going to give us an instrument through which we can really deal with these people, but we shall also be encouraging all the decent elements of the community who at the present time are suffering a little bit a sense of bafflement and frustration. They will know that now we shall have a weapon in our hands, a weapon of law and decency reflecting the opinion of decent society, which will give us a real instrument with which we can deal with those who deprave and seduce our children.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Kamloops moving this amendment or just submitting it for discussion at this time?

Mr. Fulton: I should probably move it, in order to get it before the committee in concrete form. I therefore move the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Garson: I doubt if there is a single member who will dissent from the excellent and comprehensive expression that the hon. member has just made of our disapproval of these crime comic books. I am very gratified to know that my hon. friend thinks that the legislation that we have upon the federal statute books now in the existing Criminal Code, or if not in that, certainly the amended definition of crime comics in the new Bill No. 7, is adequate for its purpose.

My hon. friend has been good enough to express appreciation of our having accepted his amendment in 1949. For the purpose of the record, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to say that we did more than merely accept his amendment. His amendment, in the form in which it was presented to the house, in our judgment was quite unenforceable. And that is not surprising, because I am sure that when I received it I did not feel myself any more competent than my hon. friend to draft an enforceable amendment for the purposes that he had in mind. With a view to preparing the enforceable provision which we are now discussing we took my hon. friend's amendment, in the form in which he had presented it, and sent it to the various provincial attorneys general of Canada. We asked them, as the ministers responsible for the enforcement of the Criminal Code, to say what they would like to have in this amendment in order that it might be enforceable. In response to our request we received great co-operation and courtesy. Nearly all of them replied to our inquiry. They did not all raise the same points. Some of them had different points that they thought should be covered by the amendment. We re-examined my hon. friend's amendment in the light of the information which we so secured, and worked into it the ideas which we had received from all of the law officers assisting the attorneys general of the provinces of Canada.

There were two reasons for our doing that. In the first place, it seemed to me that that was the most likely way in which we were likely to get an enforceable amendment that would not have some holes in it through which a coach and four could be driven. In the second place, it seemed most important that those who would have the responsibility of enforcing this new law should be consulted concerning the terms of the law which it would be their duty to enforce. The result of these efforts was the law which is now being carried forward in Bill No. 7, changed, I believe I am right in saying, only in respect to the definition of crime comics in order to take care of certain points which had been raised in connection with that definition as it is in the existing code.

My hon. friend is quite right in saying that last year, 1953, a debate took place in this house in which, if I remember correctly, he was urging at that time that the reference to "obscene material" or to the term "obscenity" in the legislation was not satisfactory and that, as he thought at that time, it was desirable that we should provide a statutory definition of "obscenity" in order that any obscurity of that term might be removed.

Well, the position which I took at that time is the same position which I take tonight, namely, having regard to the very great care indeed with which the material upon which we based this legislation was gathered and the care which we took in drafting these provisions in the light of that material, we believed that we had in this law a provision that was quite airtight; and that the time had come, as my hon. friend now agrees, to enforce the law. Now we cannot enforce it; we can only enact it. That is all we can do in this parliament.

Since last spring, when my hon. friend was questioning the adequacy of the term "obscenity" in this provision, a case arose in the city of Ottawa, Regina versus the National News Company Limited—a corporate defendant—which was concerned with a number of books; "Diamond Lil", "Women's Barracks", "Tragic Ground", "Jurymen", and others. The defendant was ably defended by very competent counsel. Every possible attack on, or perhaps I should more properly say defence to legislation was made that could be made. Expert witnesses were brought here to testify that the material complained about was really not obscene at all. The argument has been made that the books complained of were sociological studies and the like.

Trial Judge McDougall of the Ottawa court found no difficulty at all in deciding that the material which was then before the court was obscene within the meaning of the statute and found the accused guilty. From his decision an appeal was taken to the appeal court of Ontario. The judgment of that court was given by Chief Justice Pickup and by Mr. Justices Laidlaw and Hope who agreed with him, by Mr. Justice J. K. Mackay, who also agreed in the result, and by Mr. Justice F. G. MacKay who dissented only in part.

I think that anyone who has read that judgment—and I assume that perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops has done so—will agree that here is a judgment which seems to settle beyond any peradventure the adequacy of the legislation in so far as prohibiting the sale of obscene literature is concerned. My information is that an appeal was taken from the judgment of the court of appeal of Ontario to the Supreme Court of Canada and was later abandoned. Therefore at the present time this Ontario court of appeal judgment would seem to establish quite conclusively that the provision we are discussing is certainly enforceable if there is any serious disposition to enforce it.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister say what penalty was imposed in that case?

Mr. Garson: I doubt if I can. I may be able to check it later and tell my hon. friend, but it does not appear in the court of appeal judgment.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry that I have not my record before me, but my recollection is that it was a trifling sum compared with the size of the profits made by the corporation concerned.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that may be quite true, but I will deal with that point before I take my seat. But in the meantime I might say that it was not trifling because of any provision in the law. It was trifling because the judge who tried the case thought that in his view he was applying appropriate punishment. I was particularly glad to hear my hon. friend say tonight that he thought the law was now quite enforceable and that in his view the thing to do now was to enforce it.

Mr. Fulton: And to make the punishment fit the crime.

Mr. Garson: Yes, also to make the punishment fit the crime, with which I will deal in a moment. I was glad of that for this reason, that if by any chance the law were not in satisfactory form at the present time, as my hon. friend was arguing last year—

Mr. Fulton: May I just make this point? I did not have time in my argument tonight because I did not want to confuse the two things, but I am still not convinced that the law with respect to obscenity is in satisfactory form. My agreement with the minister that it was in satisfactory form was confined exclusively to the crime and horror comics aspect of it.

Mr. Garson: I can only say that if it is not in satisfactory form now when we have a statutory provision that has been interpreted by the appeal court of Ontario as meaning something very definite, and that interpretation is spelled out in an excellent judgment of the chief justice of Ontario, then I think it would be very difficult indeed to get anything that would be satisfactory. And if it were not satisfactory the only way I can see in which we could make it any more satisfactory would be to go back to those whom we consulted in the first place, namely, the provincial attorneys general and ask them to indicate what in their view they thought would be more enforceable and more satisfactory than that which they previously had told us was enforceable and satisfactory.

It is for that reason that I must emphasize tonight, as I said last spring when the matter was under discussion, that the only thing that we can do in this parliament is to enact the criminal law. Once we have enacted it we are completely powerless to enforce it ourselves. The enforcement must be provided by the provincial law officers. For that reason the great bulk of my hon. friend's argument tonight might more appropriately be addressed to the law officers of the provinces of Canada and not to the federal government or federal parliament which can do no more than what we have already done, namely, to enact the law. There is of course a single exception which my hon. friend raised concerning an increase of penalty which is covered by the amendment he has just moved.

The penalty for this offence at the present time is provided in clause 154 of the bill which reads as follows:

> Every one who commits an offence under section 150, 151, 152 or 153 is guilty of > (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

My hon. friend says that he is satisfied to leave the two year penalty so far as the retail distributor is concerned but he wants a much more onerous penalty for the larger companies, the wholesale distributors or, best of all, the publishers who, as he claims, are making large amounts of money from this nefarious practice. To that end he suggests an amendment which would authorize the imposition upon them of a fine of $25,000.

Mr. Fulton: In the case of a corporation.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Garson: In the case of a corporation. I would point out to my hon. friend that if he will look at clause 623 of the present bill he will see that it provides as follows:

> (1) Notwithstanding subsection 2 of section 621, a corporation that is convicted of an offence is liable, in lieu of any imprisonment that is prescribed as punishment for that offence,
> (a) to be fined in an amount that is in the discretion of the court, where the offence is an indictable offence . . .

My hon. friend will agree that the offence we are discussing tonight is an indictable offence, and the punishment which may be imposed upon a corporate defendant under section 623 is not $25,000 or $50,000 or $100,000 but it is any amount that the court sees fit to impose, without limit. Thus the effect of my hon. friend's amendment would be, not to increase the fine but to reduce the fine as it is set out in Bill No. 7, and indeed as it is set out in the existing code, which it enables the judge or magistrate to impose upon these large corporations that engage in this nefarious practice. It would be, I think, very difficult indeed for my hon. friend to argue that he is imposing a heavier burden upon these corporations by limiting the amount of the fine which can be imposed to $25,000 when they are now liable to a fine without any limit whatsoever. For that reason I suggest, with respect, that the passing of the amendment which the hon. member proposes will not improve this legislation. On the contrary it will have the opposite effect.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question? Does the minister know of any case where a corporation convicted of an offence under this section has suffered the imposition of a fine as high as $25,000? I do not know of one, and I have never heard of one.

Mr. Garson: I do not know that they have been but I suggest, and this is something we should remember, that all we can do in this parliament is to empower the courts to impose a penalty without limit. Whether they do impose it is for the courts to decide on the evidence before them. Then if the attorney general's department which is prosecuting the case believe the penalty which has been thus imposed is inadequate, they can launch an appeal as to sentence if they so wish and ask for a heavier penalty. In any event all we can do here is to empower the courts to impose a fine and we have done that in the present instance without setting a limit.

Mr. Knight: I do not want to approach this question from a legal angle, but I would like to express an idea or two about the subject in general. This discussion of the Criminal Code is boiling down to a very small section of the house. I notice that my hon. friends on the opposite side have little to say about it, in spite of the fact that there are so many legal lights in the House of Commons. I have the greatest of respect for my learned friends and I think a certain number of them are useful in any House of Commons. While I am in the same jovial mood I might suggest that if we want to get the Criminal Code done up in a hurry, and in more of a hurry than I believe it is going to take place, I believe we should send the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the minister to a dark room somewhere where they can write it all down and bring us the results on which we might pass approval. I am speaking for myself, of course.

But speaking seriously now, Mr. Chairman —and I have not been speaking seriously up to the present, in case someone misunderstands me—I am interested in this whole question of literary censorship. I am in the rather hopeless position of being able to see much of both sides on this particular question. I might start by saying that I believe the hon. member for Kamloops deserves great credit for bringing this thing to the attention of the public. It is a controversial subject. That is all the more reason why it should be brought to public attention. Just as in the case of Dr. Hilda Neatby: whether one agrees with her or not, I believe that she has certainly done a public service for education in Canada by bringing a controversy in regard to it out into the light of day.

But I was talking about the subject of censorship generally. Censorship is something I am afraid of, and I believe there is only one case in which it is justified and that is when we are dealing with children, and with very young children, children who are in the formative stage, children who are going to get those tastes which are cultivated, and which by their very nature must be cultivated tastes. It seems to me that if you are going to cultivate a taste in anything, the only way to cultivate a taste for these things is to do these things. The way to cultivate a taste for good reading is to read worth-while things. I would suggest that there is perhaps more than just the negative approach here of applying restrictions, applying the law, and fines, and threatening jail; because there is also the positive approach of seeing to it that these people, if you do not want them to read trash, have something decent to read.

I believe that is definitely a factor in this particular argument. As I said, I am afraid of censorship. I am afraid of any interference with intellectual freedom or liberty. I want to read all sides of any question and having read them I want to make up my own mind in relation to whatever the issue may be. May I add that it is a pretty poor cause which cannot stand on its own feet and which cannot be judged or subjected to the judgment of the public.

This legislation in regard to the crime comic book has not, I believe, been as successful as it might have been. That has been admitted here by the hon. member for Kamloops and by the minister who is piloting this legislation through the house. I submit the reason that it has not been as successful as it might have been is because the public is not seized as much as it might be with the importance of this particular situation. To my mind this is more a matter of public education than of punitive legislation. Of course, the question then arises, how is that education to be effected? How are we to affect adults, shall we say, or have adults seized with the importance of the situation when these adults have themselves been brought up on this brand of crime comics, or similar types of literature.

I see another situation concurrent with this legislation and that is the growth of the sale in drugstores, poolrooms, and places where this literature is exposed, of a different and perhaps even worse type of—I shall not dignify it with the name of literature—reading material which you now find in such places. I can understand the feelings of the hon. member for Kamloops when he said he had a feeling of bafflement and frustration when he was faced with that sort of thing. I must admit to that same feeling of hopelessness. One wonders what one can do about it. We in Canada, and I think this is a fair criticism, are not, generally speaking, a reading people. I am hoping that we will turn out to be a reading people. We have been going through the pioneer stages. I know we have had difficulties of communication. We have been digging the stump and stone in this country and we have not had the time nor the leisure nor the money to cultivate ourselves in some of the finer things of life. But the day has come when Canada should take her place, in a literary and artistic sense as well as in a material sense, among the nations of the world.

I am hoping that day will come soon, but the way to approach it and the way to make it a reality is through our children when they are at that pliable age. I believe we must admit that we are not a reading people, and that it is very seldom people will read anything which takes them more than ten minutes. The general situation, if one may judge by looking around, is that most people read the sports page and the headlines and, may I say to my hon. friend from Kamloops, the comic strip.

That is a rather blue and hopeless picture. If we are not a reading public in the adult sense, may I submit this thought for your consideration. We have not in this country any great body of children's literature. In that matter I think we are particularly wanting. I think one must be struck by a visit to Britain——which is a country with which I am most familiar outside of this one—at the contrast one finds there both in the plentifulness of adult literature and children's literature. I could, of course, go on and say what some of it is but I expect that the minister over there on the other side of the house is getting rather impatient and wants to get back to these dry law tomes in which he is more interested, I must say, than I myself am.

As to this business of forcing people not to read what we think they should not read, that is where we come up against this matter of censorship. Who is to decide what I am not to read and what I am to read? As far as I am concerned, as an adult I want to read what I like. I admit that for my grandchildren I may have a different view. While I am talking about my relation to my grandchildren, may I say that I think the parents have some responsibility in this matter. If we are ever going to have in our children that cultivated taste for decent reading of which I have spoken, the parents will have to show more responsibility in the home. We have no homes any more in the sense that we used to have homes when I was a boy. We have not that attitude of gathering the children around the fire of a winter's evening and reading them stories from a book which was chosen by a literate and loving mother. That is an ideal situation in which we could inculcate into those children the taste for reading the things which we, rightly or wrongly, think they ought to read.

As to the failure of this particular legislation, I think the reason for it is that the general public is not sufficiently seized with the importance of the reading habits of their children. I do not think that laws are going to be very successful until the public is aware of their importance.

Those are one or two thoughts along this general line. On balance, I am in favour of the positive rather than the negative approach. I am in favour of the idea of weaning our children onto the stronger food of decent literature rather than of the idea of punishing somebody for selling them something else. I say that I have a feeling of hopelessness when I see the counters of the bookstores flooded with the sort of thing we see there; it is a hopelessness and a frustration produced, not because the people who are selling it are being allowed to sell it but because the general public must be showing a taste for this sort of thing when it is there on the counter so prominently displayed and so generally purchased.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that I have not made much contribution to this particular act. I have read this amendment that has been proposed by my hon. friend. I think that all I shall venture to say upon the matter is that I think it puts the emphasis in the right place, if in fact this type of legislation is desirable. It puts the emphasis on the punishment of the publisher rather that the poor little chap who, in his day-to-day chores of fixing up his cigar stand, his literature stand, his fresh fruit stand and the rest of it, is quite ignorant, in most cases, of the type of tripe—he may be in the butcher business too—that he happens to be selling. Whether or not I would free him of all responsibility, I am not too sure. But if this type of legislation is justified at all, then the penalty should be made heavy for those people who have the opportunity to know what it is, since they produce the stuff, rather than on the little man who is trying to make his living by selling it.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, some of us have been interested in this subject for a good many years and have spoken on it from time to time in this house. As we all know, the hon. member for Kamloops brought this matter rather forcefully to our attention in the last parliament and, as has already been stated, proposed and was instrumental in having passed through this house an amendment to the Criminal Code. While it may be said that the amendment may not have been as successful as some would have desired it to be, I rather believe that it has been quite a success to this extent, namely that we have not seen on the newsstands or coming into our homes the same type of crime comics that appeared before his bill was passed by the house.

What has happened, of course, is that the same publishers have gone into a slightly different field. They have given their publication desires a little bit of a twist. Now, instead of giving out with what is known as crime comics, they give out with horror magazines. The daggers, the guns and all that goes with it may be there just the same; they may show the thumbscrews, the torture racks and a few things like that, with the horror pictures. They have also gone into another sideline, I might say. They have gone into the business of love and sex. These things are things to which some of us have serious objection. The question of how to cope with the entire situation is one that, I agree, presents a problem.

I always listen with interest to the speeches made in this house by the hon. member for Saskatoon. I go a long way with him in his view that public education is what is needed in Canada today. But I do not think the matter ends there. I believe that you must go further than that. When we emphasize the necessity for public morals, what we have is a sort of race between those who take part in education in the field of public morals and those publications which are actually educating in the realm of immorality; and it is a matter of who can get there first. In our various cultural organizations, our homes, our churches and our reform movements are we strong enough to educate the public with regard to these morals and cope with the power of all the immoral publications which are being openly distributed on our newsstands and are going into our homes, and the like?

Now, there has to be a stop somewhere, and I realize that the public conscience should be a deterrent to this sort of thing. But the more wide open this thing becomes, the longer it continues, it seems the greater is there a sort of softening up process whereby the thing becomes more or less acceptable. Something which perhaps years ago would have been seriously frowned upon, is now accepted. I do not quite agree that even as adults we have a right to read what we want to read. Supposing you take that logic into other realms of life. For instance, take the trafficking in dope. Is it right to say, "now I am an adult I have the right to drink or take by the needle or some other process whatever I want to take"? The obvious thing is that I have not that right. There is a place where it ceases to be good for one to take or absorb this or that. There is a difference, of course, between trafficking in dope and trafficking in this sort of thing, but the difference is only in a different field of morals.

I should like to venture another suggestion. I do not know what is involved in "publication" here, but I think there was some discussion of this point previously. I do not see anything in the section concerning radio or television. We are getting to the place where television is a tremendously powerful thing for the guidance of our people and the molding of our public morals. Television is not mentioned, but I believe it should be or else the section should be interpreted as including television and radio as mediums of publication. I want the minister to give some consideration to that.

A while ago I said that the publishers of this sort of thing had taken a different tack and had branched out from the publication of crime comics to the publication of lurid love and sex magazines. I feel that some of this stuff is terrible. If I were to read in this house or discuss some of the things that have appeared in some of our magazines or in some of our pulp books that one can buy on the newsstand for 25 cents, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you would rise and call me to order. I cannot read them, but I shall tell you what I will do with your permission, Mr. Chairman. I have a book here that I bought at the newsstand because the title was quite an innocent title and rather intrigued me. I thought there might be something in there of some educational value. I am not going to mention the name of the book, because I would only advertise it.

I am going to pass this book over to the minister. I have put a little slip of paper in one page, and have marked an "X" against one particular paragraph I want the minister to read. I dare not read it, Mr. Chairman. I do not want the minister to get up and read it out loud. I just want him to look at that one paragraph. Hon. members can watch the expression on the minister's face to see whether or not he thinks—

Mr. Nesbitt: It is not fair to let just the minister see it.

Mr. Hansell: Well, you can borrow it from the minister afterwards, if you wish. I think we have paused long enough for the minister to read that paragraph.

Mr. Fleming: He has read it three times now.

The Chairman: I am wondering whether or not the rules of the house are being transgressed.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know that the book from cover to cover is a particularly bad one, but I do not think a book with a paragraph like that should be printed and sold.

I was riding along on the train on one occasion and I thought I wanted something extra to read so I went into the newsstand at one of our depots and picked up a book of jokes. I like jokes. In fact, I sometimes use them on the political platform. I thought perhaps I might be able to get something valuable in that connection from this book. It only cost me a quarter so I bought it and put it in my pocket hoping to read it on the train. I am not going to pause at this particular time, but I put some slips of paper in various pages of the book and I shall pass it over to the minister. I do not expect him to read this tonight. He can take it home and read it before going to sleep. I am sure he will get some enjoyment out of it. He will notice the slips of paper at certain pages, and on those pages there are some jokes. Those are books that can be bought by anyone and frankly I would not leave those two books lying around my home for anything in the world.

Mr. Ellis: You bought them.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, I bought them. I bought them quite innocently. As a matter of fact, I might inform my hon. friend that I read them, too, otherwise I would not be able to pass them over to the minister with any confidence that they were evidence for my case.

I simply say that I do not believe these things should be published, and when we bring them to the attention of the minister I am sure he will agree. I want to refer to another matter, in all seriousness. Some of our well known magazines today are beginning to publish articles on sex, which twenty or thirty years ago when I was a boy or young man would not have been published. They would have been considered as against the interest of public morals. There would have been such a tremendous cry of opposition against them that they would not have dared publish them any more. They are beginning to be published in the ordinary course of publication, all nicely displayed so that people will eye them and buy them.

I have read some of these articles. I do not want to be too harsh. Perhaps there is some degree of value in some of these articles. I think there are things of value in them. But when they are displayed like that and they fall into the hands of our teenagers, we will say, they are read not for the purpose of acquiring the information that is in the article, but for another purpose altogether. The article may be written by a doctor, whether it is a ghost writer, a phony name or a real M.D. The thing is luscious, and the young people, the teenagers will wallow in it, not for the purpose of acquiring information but because it appeals to certain baser appetites.

I do not know how to get over that situation. I was wondering—and I say this in all seriousness—if there is any value in that sort of thing. I wonder if it would not be a proper thing for the Department of National Health and Welfare to publish small books of this kind that could be distributed to those who would apply for them, or perhaps to home and school associations or, if you wish, even to schools, so that the thing could be brought to the attention of our young people in a proper way.

I think perhaps there might be some merit in that suggestion, although I do not know. It is difficult sometimes to know just where to draw the line. But if this goes on over the radio, over television, in these books and magazines on display in our stores and newsstands, then I personally despair of the next generation. I think we have to put a stop to it somewhere. I am a believer in punishment; I must confess that. I have often said to myself that I do not suppose I will ever be a magistrate or a judge, and I hope I will not, because I fear I would be pretty harsh.

Some people can learn only by punishment. I would not like to see the punitive angle of the law depreciated to any extent. I am in favour of the amendment that has been proposed, although I think it must be recognized that the proprietor of the small corner store or newsstand cannot possibly read everything that comes to him for sale. I believe it is the publisher who should be accused and brought to time. If the law came down on those publishers more severely it would not be long before the situation would be considerably improved.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I have just one or two brief comments with regard to this section. I suggest the saving grace of the book the hon. member for Macleod has been passing back and forth is the fact that there is no picture on the front of it, or at least nothing that was visible from this side of the house.

My understanding is that this legislation is designed to protect the children—not the adults—from the effects of this type of literature. The purpose of the legislation is to protect those of tender years who have not the ability to make their own selections of the books they should read.

Since the clause was drafted we understand a situation has developed on newsstands which was not in evidence a year ago. I believe many hon. members will have had the experience I have had when travelling by train. When one wishes to read something on a train he will go to a magazine rack and look over the twenty-five-cent pocket books. Well, the books themselves may be perfectly respectable. One I noticed particularly told about how to invest and deal on the stock market, and the picture on the front showed a lady wrapped in ticker tape.

An hon. Member: Did you buy it?

Mr. Nesbitt: The point I make is that the publishers take some incident out of a book, often an incident that is not related to the story at all and, for the purpose of selling it they put some obscene picture on the front of the book that has no relation to the contents at all. Particularly in connection with western stories, one will see on the covers numerous people in various stages of being maimed, —blood all over the place. And on the covers of detective stories one will see dismembered corpses and other pictures of that kind.

If people want to read these books, that is their own business. I disagree with the hon. member for Macleod in that respect. But, so far as the children are concerned—well, one can always see a number of small children of perhaps six or seven years standing with their mouths open and their eyes popping out looking at the covers on these twenty-five-cent books showing the partially dismembered corpses, people being whipped, and all that sort of thing.

A year or so ago we did not see so many of those covers on books—only occasionally. If one wishes to buy a detective story or any of the good classics, which are reprinted in these cheaper editions, he would not find covers of that kind on them. But in the last year or so we do not see anything else.

I suggest that some alteration be made in one of these definitive sections which would prevent the putting of gory and obscene pictures on the covers of books. Because, while these seven or eight year old children may never read them—indeed, probably could not read them—nevertheless they can look at the pictures on the front which, I am sure, do far more harm than if they had read the books.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words, not so much from the point of view that has been discussed thus far, but from the practical point of view. I may be one of only a few in the house who have had practical experience at the retail end of this so-called comic-book business, and I say that because some of them in my opinion are not funny at all.

At the outset let me say that I agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon when he says it is very doubtful if we can legislate good taste. That is something that has to be acquired, taught, developed or cultivated; but certainly it cannot be forced down anyone's throat simply by putting it in the law. I have no objection to an attempt being made to protect children from the influence of what is commonly known as crime comics, provided that in framing the law we do not do any injustice or do not make it ridiculous in the eyes of the public by trying to put into it something which is unimportant.

A while ago I mentioned that I speak from practical experience. I have been in the business of selling magazines and periodicals. Let me say quite frankly that while there may be others who hold a different view, I think it is absolutely impossible for the retailer to know at all times what he has on his shelves, whether it be in the form of comics or any other kind of reading material.

For the benefit of those who have not been in this type of business let me give an example of how this works out. When one enters the business of retailing magazines or periodicals the procedure is something like this: He finds out from someone else who the wholesalers are. In western Canada we are limited to two main companies—and I shall not put their names on the record because they may have competitors, and I want to be fair to them. But the point is that the choice is very limited. There are only a few wholesale companies operating in the different parts of the country that have a sufficient stock of interesting reading material for adults, teenagers and children.

The next thing that happens is that you put in a request for a sample order or a suggested order of this type of reading material. This company will send to you a shipment with a suggestion of what quantity of material you should order for the future, and after that they are governed by the returns. In other words, you have the privilege of sending back to these companies the material which does not sell up to a certain date limit. They judge by that what is selling and what is not. As a result, it becomes after a few months almost automatic. You do not order any more. You simply receive from these wholesale companies that which is being bought by the public and particularly so if a person happens to be engaged in the restaurant business or the hotel business or in some other business in which the selling of magazines and periodicals is only a sideline. Certainly, you cannot devote the time nor have an employee devote his time to censoring and studying it day by day or as it is put on the news racks for sale.

Let me say this: In my contact with other retailers of these periodicals and magazines I never found one—and I think I am quite safe in saying there would be practically none in this country—who would deliberately, knowing that certain literature comes within the definition of a crime comic or a horror comic, or even to use the more mild description that the hon. member for Macleod used, lurid literature, stock it, because certainly no one wants to break the law to begin with; and in the second place no one deliberately wants to put anything on his shelves for sale which would be harmful to the children in his community. Anyone who is in that type of business knows that the children and the teenagers are his best customers, and he certainly would not want to do anything that would be harmful to them.

Reference has been made to a submission by the periodical distributors of Canada, and while I hold no brief on their behalf—I have only the same information as all other hon. members have—I believe it would be only fair that both sides of the story should be heard here tonight. We have heard a preponderance of the side which feels that there should be more stringent laws or heavier penalties to back up the law.

Mr. Fulton: Only on the people who put them in circulation.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes. The suggestion is for stiffer penalties in so far as the publisher is concerned. Let me say while I am on that point that if there is to be a penalty at all, then I certainly agree with the philosophy that that is where the penalty should be applied; that is where the prohibition should be exercised. However, I will come to that in due course.

I believe it would be only fair to place before this committee in summary form what this organization, periodical distributors of Canada, have submitted for the consideration of the minister, so that we shall have a balanced point of view, and I am sure we want to do the right thing for all concerned. First of all, they point out that there are about 55 wholesale distributors across Canada. That would be the total number. Within that would be a much smaller number who would be doing the great percentage of the business. Some of them would be very small distributors indeed. It points out also that there are about 10,000 retail booksellers, newsstand proprietors and other news vendors. There are probably more than that. Therefore we are dealing with quite a large number of people in trying to apply this law, when you take in all the retail end of this business.

It points out also that the average distributor, in supporting their argument as to why the distributor even on that level is not able to supervise properly or censor, if one should use that word, the material which he has for distribution, has not the time. The distributor will have about 1,000 different titles of magazines and periodicals on his racks. In my opinion that is a very conservative estimate. My own estimate would be a little higher than that. So that even on that level it would be very difficult for the distributor to exercise any kind of supervision. I think "supervision" is the right term, because certainly we cannot apply censorship to something which has already been published and produced. The only place where it could be effectively censored is before it is committed to print.

Then the summary in the next paragraphs, lumping them together, points out the effects of the amendment which was passed in 1949 to the then section 207. I was not in the house at that time. But I am inclined to think that had I been here I would have opposed the amendment, because practice has shown that it has created serious difficulties, not only from the point of view of the retailer and distributor but also from the law enforcement point of view.

Let me go back to a practical illustration of that. A year or two ago—I forget when—one of the retailers in our home town was charged with an offence under one of these sections of the code, I am not sure which. When I heard of that I became interested in what transpired. Well, the thing was taken to court and great difficulty was experienced by all in trying to decide what was a crime comic when it came to giving a definition—

Mr. Garson: What?

Mr. Zaplitny: Great difficulty was experienced in trying to decide what constituted a crime comic so that a proper defence could be made to that term. I met the chief of police shortly after that and offered as an experiment to have him come into my place of business and pick out from the rack what he considered to be crime comics and to use them as an illustration so that I would not fall afoul of the law myself. Well, he accepted my invitation. He came over and examined the rack. He took a number of comics off the rack and took them along with him to his office. I cannot say that he took them home. When he brought them back to me he told me that they had been reading that kind of thing for years and as far as he was concerned they had done no harm. That was not much help to me.

I made the same offer to the crown prosecutor and to the police magistrate. They did not avail themselves of the invitation, but both told me that so far as they were concerned they were going to let the attorney general of the province decide what a crime comic was. That gives you an idea of the kind of difficulties you run into when it comes to the practical application of the law as it stands. It may be that experience and precedent will iron this out, but the injustice that is being created, or has been created by the amendment passed in 1949, is in the fact that it places the responsibility on the person or group of persons who are the retailers and who are the least able, in my opinion, to protect themselves, or incapable of guarding against that type of literature, because they have absolutely no facilities nor the time, nor, in many cases, even the knowledge to scan through these comics and decide which would be contrary to the law and which would not.

We would almost have to have an expert and, as I pointed out in the instance to which I referred, the only expert to whom I was referred was the attorney general of the province of Manitoba. None of the lesser officials would take the responsibility of saying: This is a crime comic. That is the way in which the law operates in practice. There has been a suggestion made that the law is not too harsh, but I should like to read subsection 6 of section 150. It reads as follows:

> Where an accused is charged with an offence under subsection (1) the fact that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, phonograph record, crime comic or other thing by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed is not a defence to the charge.

When we turn to section 154 we find that under subsection (a) a person guilty of an indictable offence is liable to imprisonment for two years. I am not saying that necessarily would be the penalty, but that is the penalty to which a person is liable. I have not heard anyone who could justify that approach to the retailer or operator of a private newsstand by saying that regardless of whether he knew anything about what was contained in the pages and whether he had any opportunity of knowing it nevertheless he should be responsible for what is depicted in such crime comics if it is considered that they depict crime. Subsection 7 (b) reads as follows:

> Events connected with the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, whether occurring before or after the commission of the crime.

That is pretty wide and pretty vague—"before or after the commission of the crime", "real or fictitious". It is almost going into the field of fantasy in law. I do not know how I would interpret that provision if, heaven forbid, I were a judge. The only thing I would do would be what I think most judges have been doing, throw such cases out of court on the ground that there has not been an adequate definition. I do not want to prolong that phase of it except to say categorically and emphatically that in my opinion it is quite unfair and impractical to make the retailer and distributor of these periodicals the goat for the publisher or producer who deliberately sets out to publish garbage because there is money in it. If there is to be a law and a penalty to punish the publisher or producer who deliberately sets out to put this kind of thing on the market then I would have no objection whatever to seeing such a provision on the statute books with an adequate penalty attached to it. But I believe that it is unfair and impractical to expect our law enforcement officers to enforce the kind of law that exists now, even without increasing the penalty at this stage.

I also want to mention another aspect of the matter, and it has to do with imported literature. A good part of the literature, periodicals, magazines and so forth, read in Canada are imported, particularly from the United States. It is pointed out in this brief that quite often distributors have depended upon the Department of National Revenue to establish the criterion as to what is proper and lawful and what is not. In other words, they took it for granted anything that had passed the customs was within the law and proceeded to distribute it to their outlets to be put on the market. They found to their dismay and astonishment, when in some cases they were charged under this law, that it was no defence whatever to argue that as the Department of National Revenue had passed the material through customs it was suitable material under the provisions of this law. I think that is a serious situation.

If the government takes the position that it is possible to supervise, censor or judge whether or not reading material is suitable and then admits that it is not liable to exercise that supervision, that it either lacks the facilities or the knowledge to decide what is suitable and what is not, what contravenes the Criminal Code and what does not, then certainly a department of the government can put itself beyond the law, and I think they will have to admit that they are trying to enforce a law within which they themselves are not able to operate.

The brief also refers to the fact that the organization has made two submissions to the Minister of Justice, one in May of 1951, I believe, and then more recently in January of this year. I hope that some time before this particular section or group of sections carries the minister will give the committee the benefit of his opinion with respect to whether he wishes to take into consideration the arguments put forward in the brief and in the light of that bring about any changes in the legislation itself. For myself I want to make it quite clear that what I have said this evening is in no way a defence or condonement of lurid literature, crime comics or any kind of literary garbage. I believe there is a great field for good literature. I believe we should promote in every way possible a clean, constructive type of literature for our children.

What I have said is not in any way a condonement of crime comics, but what I do say is that it is unfair and impractical to place the responsibility on these people who have no possibility whatever of supervising or censoring the material which they have for sale. I hope that some changes will be made in order that the law will be one which will be fair both to the public and to the people engaged in this particular business.

The Chairman: Shall clause 150 carry? Carried.

Mr. Fulton: Clause 150 is not carried.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment. Shall we take the amendment?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. There are a number of members who wish to speak on the subject.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this matter tomorrow and then take public works when it is completed.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 2, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Second report of standing committee on industrial relations.—Mr. Viau.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

ANNIVERSARY OF PACT—PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF REPRESENTATIVE CADETS

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, April 4, the fifth anniversary of the signing of the North Atlantic treaty occurs. In connection with the celebration of that anniversary I should like with your permission, sir, to call the attention of hon. members to the presence in the Speaker's gallery today of ten cadets who are representative of the nine hundred cadets now training in Canada under the NATO air training plan.

These ten cadets are newly arrived in Canada, and are now taking preliminary training at the Royal Canadian Air Force school at London, Ontario. They represent five countries, two of them being from Great Britain, two from France, two from The Netherlands, two from Belgium and two from Turkey.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 394, respecting Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company.—Mr. Balcom.

Bill No. 395, for the relief of Elsie Elizabeth Belford Grant.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 396, for the relief of Jean Monette.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 397, for the relief of Pearl Mary Brown Pratt.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 398, for the relief of Annie Holman James.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 399, for the relief of Marie Paule Lemay Mondello.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 400, for the relief of Marilyn Lesley Simpson Lavallee.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 401, for the relief of Edith Lorraine McBurney Robinson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 402, for the relief of Aline Gosselin du Berger.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 403, for the relief of Eileen Lucy Tollett Power-Williams.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 404, for the relief of William Pappas.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 405, for the relief of Claire Labelle Cousineau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 406, for the relief of Denise Marie Helene Laporte Woodhouse.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 407, for the relief of Lois Helena Kearns Higham.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 408, for the relief of Dorothy Rita Wade Moulden.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 409, for the relief of Albert Thornton.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 410, for the relief of Koidula Laigma Hagel.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 411, for the relief of Yvette Lafontaine Tatos.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 412, for the relief of Freda Becker Blumenthal.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 413, for the relief of Monica Elizabeth Benoit Mullin.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 414, for the relief of Felix Andre Landry.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 415, for the relief of Marie-Claire Parisien Barbeau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 416, for the relief of Marie Muriel Gladys Lena Soubre Dubour.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 417, for the relief of Joan Millicent Kemp Tessier.—Mr. Hunter.

CIVIL DEFENCE

THERMONUCLEAR WEAPONS—CANADIAN PREPAREDNESS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning civil defence. Will the minister make a statement concerning the impact on our civil defence planning of developments during the last few weeks in the field of thermonuclear weapons?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I shall fully satisfy my hon. friend in the statement I am about to make. I do not now propose to answer the question in all its implications, except to say that information now available on the destructive potentialities of thermonuclear weapons necessitates, here as elsewhere, re-examination of some aspects of our civil defence program. It emphasizes the importance of the consideration of matters having to do with the dispersal of urban populations, through evacuation, if such need should ever arise—and I am not saying that it will.

Specific consideration is being given to the problem both in Canada and the United States. The new situation increases the importance of mutual aid in civil defence. We are currently engaged with United Kingdom and United States civil defence authorities in a reappraisal of the new situation which now exists, and of which we have been aware since February 11, on the civil defence side.

This has been given top priority at the meeting of the United States-Canada civil defence committee which was held in Washington on February 11, and at the meeting of the federal-provincial civil defence committee which was held here on Monday and Tuesday of this week, with the ministers in the provinces sharing responsibility for civil defence in Canada.

Consultations are continuing with the director of civil defence training for the United Kingdom, Sir John Hodsoll, who is in Canada, and who is spending some time with us in appraising this and other situations having to do with civil defence.

GRAIN

PEACE RIVER—ALLOCATION OF FREIGHT CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister make inquiries about box car distribution in centres north of the river in the Peace river country? It is reported to me by reliable people that farmers at some points along the Northern Alberta Railways have not been able to deliver their first quota as yet. Will the minister also try to determine whether there is truth in the report that railway employees deliberately pull empty cars past points where the car order book is in effect because it makes extra work for them where the order book is in effect?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Since receiving notice of this question I have been making inquiries. In answer to the first question, it is my understanding that the Canadian wheat board supplies to the Northern Alberta Railways, from time to time, a request for the distribution of box cars and the transport controller instructs the railway to place the cars in accordance with the board's request.

[Mr. Martin.]

The purpose of the wheat board's request is to make sure that every point can deliver the five-bushel quota as soon as possible, and the distribution of cars is ordered with that objective in mind.

In answer to the second question, I think there is no basis for the belief that the train crews place the cars to save themselves work. It must be remembered that large quantities of No. 2 northern are already at Fort William and east of Fort William, and we are not presently moving further No. 2 northern wheat. The grain is being selected from grades that are required for immediate sale, and that may have an effect on the car distribution; but in any event both the wheat board and the transport controller are doing their best to see that every point can realize this five-bushel quota.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO CHECK ON RADIOACTIVE MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Probably it is supplementary to the question asked of him by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). What steps are being taken to check on radioactive materials reaching Canada, already reported in several districts? Is the action which he has taken taking that into consideration at the present time?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): So far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned, that matter is being pursued through consultations with the appropriate authorities in the provinces.

PROTECTION FROM POSSIBLE DANGER OF CONTAMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I gave him last Tuesday. When may I expect a reply to the question I asked last Tuesday concerning Canada's defence against atomic radioactive materials?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I can assure the hon. member that the developments to which he refers are being closely studied. I am not in a position to make a statement at the moment, nor can I give any definite date at which a statement will be made.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC AND LEVIS—PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. According to representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress, the American Federation of Labour and the Trades and Labour Council of Quebec and Levis—

Some hon. Members: Why don't you put your question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entitled to give whatever facts are necessary to make his question intelligible, but I think that the best method is first to put the question and then give perhaps a short explanation after the question has been put. It is very difficult for the person who has to judge the value of the question, to say whether the character of the question is one that is justified, if the hon. member prefaces his remarks by a long statement.

Mr. Dufresne: There is no long statement in my question; but I think I should have the privilege of rising in this house without being disturbed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will agree that he has been shown all the fairness that he was entitled to expect.

It would be much easier both for him and for all hon. members if he would put his question in the customary fashion. That is all we are asking him to do. He is entitled to ask his question, but he must not supply information. The purpose of asking questions at this period is to ask for information, not to give it.

Mr. Dufresne: I have not started yet, and I have already been disturbed by hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Dufresne: In view of the alarming unemployment situation in the city of Quebec, in which there are at present 22,000 people unemployed—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Dufresne: Oh, they can raise their voices!

Mr. Speaker: I presume that the hon. member is now coming to his question.

Mr. Dufresne: I was already in my question when I was interrupted.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member be kind enough not to argue with the remarks that I make, because arguing does not help order in debate. All he has to do is to put his question: In view of the alarming situation in the city of Quebec, where he says there are 22,000 unemployed—now, the question.

Mr. Dufresne: I have already respected your decision, Mr. Speaker, and I shall continue that way, but I wish I could be—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid I shall have to ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: These questions on the orders of the day have become an established practice, and I submit that on the consideration of procedure that is now being undertaken very careful regard should be had for the possibility that we deny any effectiveness to these questions if there are rigid limitations imposed upon the manner in which they may be asked.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to comment briefly on the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Quebec West has often asked questions in this house, and on several occasions to my knowledge he has seen fit to preface his remarks by statements or by preliminary remarks instead of coming to the question. He is entitled to ask a question, but he must not recapitulate previous questions, as he did yesterday, for instance, in bringing up a new question. He is doing that again. I have asked him to put his question. I have asked him on three occasions, and I heard him say words to this effect: "That is the way I have been conducting myself and I will do it again." I think these words indicate that he is not taking in good part the remarks that I made to him in good part. I want him to ask his question, but after I have asked him three times he should not argue with hon. members who are entitled to say "Order" if the hon. member is not submitting himself to the decision of the Chair, and that is all that I was trying to have him do. I hope that this perhaps drastic decision that I have had to take in this instance today will help him to co-operate on future occasions. That is the procedure, and that is why authority is put in my hands. It is to make sure that the rules are going to be observed by all hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —in order that fairness—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It does not help decorum in this house when two hon. members try to catch the Speaker's eye. The hon. member for Kamloops has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pearson: Not from his seat.

Mr. Dupuis: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: There cannot be a point of order at this time. I thought that April fool's day was yesterday.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in order that fairness may be shown to the hon. member for Quebec West, and not to enter into an argument on the form of the question, when the hon. member made the remark to which Your Honour referred I was in my place in another part of the house and I heard him say with respect to Your Honour's rulings: "I have always tried to abide by them and intend to continue to do so." I think that Your Honour missed the first part of that sentence. I certainly did not understand the hon. gentleman to be criticizing your rulings but rather to say that he would continue to observe your rulings. His quarrel was with the members on the other side.

Mr. Speaker: I am glad the hon. member for Kamloops brought these observations to my attention. I stand corrected. I am sorry that I did not hear correctly the remarks made by the hon. member for Quebec West. Perhaps later in this period of questions and answers, if the hon. member will be kind enough to put his question I will give him the floor.

[Later:]

Mr. Dufresne: Can the Minister of Labour tell the house if it is the intention of the government to undertake public works in the near future to help the 22,000 unemployed workers in the Quebec city area?

Mr. Speaker: I rise to tell the hon. member that if he had put his question in that form in the first instance, he would have avoided a lot of trouble.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I am afraid that I shall not be able to give an answer, other than one that might be considered as an anticlimax to the preliminary discussion. I should like to thank my hon. friend for sending me notice of his question, together with the preamble. In the preamble and explanation which he has given at the end of his question, I think perhaps he has something of an incomplete impression as to the area served by the two unemployment insurance commission offices in the cities of Quebec and Levis. They not only serve those two cities, but they serve the thickly-populated area astride the St. Lawrence river, totalling about 80 miles along the river and covering some six counties.

The other point I would make is that I would take exception to the total figures which he has estimated in his explanation. As to the question itself, if there should be any extension of the expenditures now reflected in the estimates before the house, whether it is in the Department of Public Works or elsewhere, it would be a matter of government policy and announced at the appropriate time.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION OF LOAN AT GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to direct a question to either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whichever is more suitable. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking to the committee about the sum of $12,750,000 owing by the Ming Sung company, said to me, as reported on page 2400 of Hansard for February 24, 1954:

> While I am not promising the house that the amount due will be collected, I am not saying it is a hopeless account.

My question is: Will this matter and any other matters of a similar nature be discussed with the Chinese authorities at the forthcoming meeting at Geneva?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not expect there will be a suitable opportunity at the Geneva conference, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this matter. If there is, we will discuss it.

Mr. Drew: You will take their assurances.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Has the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare been drawn to the fact that the water pollution situation in the city of Prince Albert is almost as serious as ever? Will he, under the circumstances, give consideration to convening a conference of the three western provinces as well as the federal officials, in order to take further steps to meet the almost intolerable situation that has continued now for five months?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend was kind enough to send me the newspaper clipping which summarizes fairly well the situation he has just mentioned. I have been in touch, since he gave me notice of intention to ask this question, with the deputy minister of health in Alberta, and Mr. Bentley, the minister of health for Saskatchewan, both of whom confirm the situation which I outlined to the house some days ago, namely, that the situation had been substantially corrected at the source, but it would take some time before, following the flow of the river, the correction would be noticed both at North Battleford and Prince Albert.

I am advised by Mr. J. G. Schaeffer, provincial sanitary engineer for the department of public health of Saskatchewan, there has been a slight improvement in the situation at North Battleford and a slight improvement in the situation at Prince Albert. The situation at Prince Albert will not be corrected immediately, but I am told by this time next week it should be fundamentally improved.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I wonder whether the Prime Minister could tell us whether the government has given up all hope of commencing construction of the St. Lawrence seaway during this year?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Hamilton: Supplementary to my previous question, could the Prime Minister tell us whether government policy now is that this will be an all Canadian project, since he indicates there is some hope it will be commenced this year, and since indications are the United States will not be in a position to co-operate with Canada this year?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member no doubt knows that the seaway is dependent upon the construction of a dam reaching across the river, and that arrangements have been made for that dam to be constructed by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission and by the power authority of the state of New York. The power authority of the state of New York has obtained a licence from the federal power commission to go ahead with the construction of that dam. There have been appeals before the court, but I believe the trial court dismissed the appeal or contestation of the licence and the trial court's decision was confirmed by the appellate division of the circuit court.

Under United States procedure I believe there is a period during which an application can be made for appeal to the supreme court, and that delay has not yet expired. Now, I understand that the matter the hon. member had in mind was probably the report that the United States congress has postponed what is known as the Wiley bill. The hon. gentleman can be assured, however, that from what we know of the intentions of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission and the power authority of the state of New York, as soon as the legal impediments have been disposed of work will be started on the construction of the dam. With the construction of the dam under way, the seaway can be provided on either side of the river, and this government has declared its intention, as authorized by parliament, to proceed alone if, at the time work can be proceeded with, proper arrangements for the participation of United States authorities with Canadian authorities in the constructing of the seaway have not been made.

TELEVISION

RESTRICTED COVERAGE OF GENERAL FOODS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wentworth asked the following question:

> Why did CBOT curtail televising the General Foods program last Sunday evening, when it was carried in full by Toronto, Montreal and every station on the continent of North America?

The answer is that a commitment had already been made for the showing on CBOT of the live program "Le tele-theatre de Radio-Canada," which is the regular feature drama on the French TV network on Sunday evenings from 9 to 10.30.

Our schedules are arranged a considerable time in advance and there was a prior commitment on CBOT, so only one hour was available for the Rodgers and Hammerstein show.

[Later:]

Mr. Lennard: I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a supplementary question. Was the program to which he referred televised in Ottawa?

Mr. McCann: Yes, that is my understanding.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 150—Obscene matter.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening we were considering clause 150 and the amendment which had been proposed by Mr. Fulton. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, there were certain remarks made by the minister yesterday in the course of the discussion which, along with remarks made by other hon. members, make me hopeful that if my amendment could be modified it might find more acceptance than it has up to the present.

The minister has pointed out that under section 623 the present provision sets no ceiling upon the fine which can be levied on a corporation which is found guilty of such an offence. My point is, and I made it yesterday in the course of a question to the minister, that there has been no case to my knowledge, or to the minister's knowledge, in which a fine as high as $25,000 has been imposed on a corporation for an offence of this sort. My object was to place in the bill a provision which would have the effect of providing that where a corporation was guilty of this offence, which I believe most hon. members if not all regard as a most serious one, it should receive a substantial penalty. As regards the case to which the minister referred, the National News case, I have the records in my file somewhere though I have not been able to locate them; but my recollection is that the fine imposed was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $750, which is not a substantial penalty. In that case action was taken against the local distributor and he is pretty far down in the chain of responsibility. It may be felt that the fine in that case was adequate. But the effect of the amendment which I have placed before the house would not alter that because it would not raise the maximum penalty now provided for the news vendor or the local distributor. The effect of this amendment would be at the printer's and publisher's level, and possibly at the level of the people who first bring offensive articles into Canada.

I wonder if it would be acceptable to alter the amendment, by leave of the committee, so that it would read:

. . . is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years, or if a corporation to a fine of not less than $10,000.

That changes the fine of $25,000 to a fine of not less than $10,000.

[Mr. McCann.]

I want to say a brief word in further support of my position. I would like to have been able to work out an amendment which would have the effect of providing that, in a case where a prosecution is launched against an individual or a corporation in connection with offensive literature, whether it be of an obscene nature or a crime comic, an effort must be made to find the person primarily responsible for the introduction and releasing of the literature in Canada; because in my view no good purpose is served by confining prosecution, as seems to have been done in the past, entirely to the local vendor or the local distributor.

Something was said yesterday by the hon. member for Dauphin, in defence of the local vendor and the distributor, with which in principle I agree, although, as I have said before, I do not think you can totally absolve them from responsibility. They are not the people who are really at fault in this matter. The fault surely lies with those who have injected this stream of poison into the national life or the national system. It therefore seems to me that in every case where an offensive publication is found on a newsstand, while it may be proper to launch a prosecution against the vendor, who has undoubtedly committed an offence, it should not stop there. Surely in every case a strenuous effort should also be made to trace the thing back through the channels of distribution, through the local distributor, to the wholesale distributor and to the publisher. If the publisher is in Canada, or even if he is not in Canada, attempts should be made to find the person who first imported this offensive material in large quantities and then distributed it across Canada. Our prosecution in every case where offensive material is found on local newsstands should also be directed against the people who are primarily responsible.

I could not think of any way of working that out in an amendment. I am not sufficiently expert as a draftsman to attempt to do that, because in addition to the problem of stating the principle there would also be the technical problem of reducing it to legal terminology.

I would ask the minister to consider whether it is not possible to work out some such provision in our Criminal Code so that we will not be going after the small fry, the man who is lowest in the chain of responsibility, but really dealing and dealing effectively with the source of primary responsibility.

I again want to recommend to the committee that they read Dr. Wertham's book

"Seduction of the Innocent" when it appears. It is one of the finest analyses of the problem that I have seen, and one of the best arguments both as to the seriousness of the problem and as to the necessity of dealing with it. I should like, if I may, to place on the record two or three other excerpts from the book, because they seem to me to establish the case overwhelmingly for action against the publisher.

The following quotation is taken from page 93 of the galley proofs:

> From innumerable talks with children I got this image. Picture to yourself a typical American boy—

This might well read "Canadian boy."

> —of nine or 10 walking along the street. In his pocket is his spending money, or his weekly allowance, or his lunch money, or his movie money or candy money, or some of his saved money, or part of his earnings from after-school work or from a birthday or Christmas gift. A very small group of men is lurking behind him intent on getting most of that money away from him. They want even more than the money he has. They tempt him, they lure him, they show him how to steal, how to break into houses through the windows and how to sell stolen goods. They even sell him the weapons—guns and knives. The profit from all this runs into tens of millions of dollars. What do the children get in return? The Child Study Association of America says that they get "escape"; but what they really get is entrapment.

Then, as he points out and as I know from my own observations happens here:

> Old comic books never die; they just trade away. Just as children were taken advantage of in the field of physical labour, so now they are taken advantage of economically, as a market. In the matter of reading the adults get the best, the children the worst.
>
> Against the child is concentrated the economic power of a large industry. It has been estimated that a third of all cheap pulp made in the United States and Canada is used by comic-book publishers. Even granting that many adults read these comic books, the proportion of adult and child readers is such that over a million dollars a week is taken out of the pockets of children. In other words, children are the main outlet for the industry.

As to the cost of production and the profits made by these publishers, he says this:

> The actual cost of production varies. Some books have royalties attached to them. One comic-book publisher told me that "it costs roughly four cents to produce a comic book". A small comic book, such as one that Columbia University Press got out for educational purposes, costs about one and one-half cents, but if done less carefully could be done for three-fourths of a cent. A sixteen-page comic book such as those used for advertising or in politics costs no more than two and one-fourth cents for an average edition of 650,000.

So those are the figures as to the potential profits to be made by the publishers. As to the argument of free speech, some reference was made yesterday to the problem of censorship. I think that reference was made by the hon. member for Saskatoon. I want to emphasize again that what I am seeking to avoid is the necessity for censorship. The effort being made is to deal with this question adequately and effectively by legislation so that our courts can decide whether an offence is committed and so that it will not be necessary to set up a board of censors which I would detest almost as much as I detest the present stream of poison literature. I should have said I want to deal with the question of responsibility. Dr. Wertham says this:

> My associates and I have spoken to many vendors. And very many of them do not like to sell crime comic books. They know they are not good for children and they would rather not handle them. The president of the Atlantic Coast Independent Distributors Association has estimated that three-fourths of comic books are not "worthy of distribution" and the president of the National Association of Retail Druggists said at a convention: "It is a tragic fact that many retail druggists are peddlers of gutter muck. The charge can be held against them with justice; their only defence is that it has never occurred to them to check on the comic books."
>
> When parents critical of comic books have realized how defenceless they are against them they have made two unreasonable demands of vendors in stands or stories. First they have asked them to read the comic books before they sell them! That is of course impossible, just as it is impossible for a busy housewife to read all her children's comic books first, though that has been suggested by some experts.
>
> The second demand is that the small vendor should reject the most bloody and sadistic comics. But is it fair to ask these economically hard-pressed people to eliminate those comic books that sell best, when nothing is done at their source?

So Dr. Wertham agrees with me, the hon. member for Dauphin and others who have spoken in this matter, that the responsibility does not rest on the vendor—certainly not the main responsibility, at any rate—but that it rests back up at the source. That is where the big profits are made. That is where it is easy to know what you are dealing with and to refrain from producing it, and thus not only to save the vendors from the possibility of committing an offence but to save the children from the poison to which they are otherwise exposed.

Finally in connection with this matter of free speech there is in the book, at page 97 of the proofs, a very interesting commentary where Dr. Wertham says this:

> I am told that if I were to visit the National Cartoonists Society my reception there would lack chumminess. In fact, collectively they consider me to be a devil with two horns. Actually, when we extended our studies to include artists who make drawings for crime comic books, far from blaming them we found that they are victims too. I doubt whether there are any artists doing this work whose life ambition was to draw for crime comic books. From interviews, telephone calls and letters we found out that they are afraid too. This is the kind of thing I was told: "Please don't mention that I even spoke to you! I'd be blackballed: I'd be ruined!" Here I found the comic book industry's conception of freedom of speech again. It is a strange part of the comic book industry that its vendors, writers and artists are so afraid. Maybe they should take the advice of the industry's experts and read horror comics to get rid of their fears.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think that all the evidence points to the conclusion that there is nothing to be said in favour of this form of poison and that the problem that confronts us is how to get rid of it. It was to meet that problem that my amendment was framed. It was to try to meet the problem at its source and to try to make it unprofitable for a printer or publisher to engage in this trafficking, so that first, he would realize that he had better stay out of the business and, second, if he goes into it we can get at him and can deal with him in a way which will effectively prevent him from repeating the offence. It is certainly my impression that, up to the present at any rate, the fine which the courts have felt themselves free to impose on wealthy concerns who make enormous profits from the printing and publishing of this material has been little more than a licence fee to continue in business.

I would hope that the minister might feel that the amendment would be acceptable if we put the fine at a minimum which will indicate to the court that this is the amount which parliament feels the courts should take as the minimum measure of their contempt for and of their opinion against this form of activity and that therefore they should impose this amount as a minimum fine, leaving the discretion to increase the top limit. If the minister would indicate that he would find that amendment more acceptable, I would ask leave of the committee to change it accordingly.

The Chairman: I understand that the hon. gentleman wishes to alter his amendment by deleting the words "$25,000" and substituting the words "not less than $10,000"?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member has leave to do this?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should read the amendment. It is moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton):

That section 150 be amended by adding thereto the following words as subsection (8):

(8) (a) Every one who commits an offence under this section and who is the person who makes, prints or publishes or has in his possession for the purpose of publishing any of the things enumerated in subsections 1 (a) and 1 (b) of this section is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years, or if a corporation to a fine of not less than $10,000.

(b) Every one who commits an offence under this section and who is the person who distributes or circulates or has in his possession for the purpose of distribution or circulation any of the things enumerated in subsections 1 (a) and 1 (b) of this section is guilty of (i) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or (ii) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I have to leave and go to a standing committee, but I have a word to say on this matter. I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops that the individual who initiates the evil thought should be taken care of. But the education of the youth of Canada is not being neglected at the present time. Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops knows that there is another type of crime comic coming into use. Perhaps he has seen the story of Daniel when he stood up for what was right and won out. Perhaps he has seen that in the form of such comics. Tons of this type of literature are being used in our Sunday schools today. That is taking the place of crime comics, comics that show people being killed. I think our religious education leaders, Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish, are to be commended for taking the initiative and not only fighting this evil thing but putting something better in its place.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps I should say a word or two concerning the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops. I am all too frequently embarrassed in relation to arguments put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops to have to keep on reiterating that we in this parliament can only enact the criminal law, that the enforcement of it is entirely the responsibility of the provincial authorities, and that the judgment in respect of any prosecutions which are instituted is properly that of the independent judges and magistrates of Canada.

One of the principles of independence which we have tried to emphasize in this new bill is the giving to the courts of wider discretion with regard to penalties. If we have not competent magistrates and judges in Canada, and they cannot be trusted with that discretion, then what we should do is get rid of the ones we have and replace them with ones in whom we have confidence. But in my opinion it is wholly wrong that parliament or a provincial legislature should restrict the discretion vested in a judge or magistrate by imposing minimum penalties, and in the whole of the present Bill No. 7 there are only three cases in which minimum penalties are prescribed, with regard to drunken driving, impaired driving and thefts from the mails.

In this present case I should like to suggest today, as I did on the previous occasion last spring when my hon. friend was then making some suggestions with respect to tinkering with the present law, that thanks to his initiative in the first place and to the care with which the present provision has been drafted we know now that we have a law that is quite enforceable. In my view what will prevent effective action more than anything else in the enforcement of this law is divided counsel as to what should be done to deal with this problem from this point on. I say that what we should do from this point on, having achieved an excellent and enforceable law, is to stop tinkering with it and call upon the people whose responsibility it is to enforce it to enforce it. I say there is nothing else we can do in relation to this matter other than enforcing the law that will have one-quarter the effect in stamping out crime comics and obscene literature.

Inasmuch as the publishers of these crime comics, as I believe is the case, have not in one single instance been prosecuted by the law enforcement authorities of the provinces, is any member so naive as to suppose we are going to increase the possibility of enforcement by imposing a minimum penalty of $10,000? I for one must reject such naiveté. I do think that the present debate, just as the debate last spring, has served a useful purpose in bringing to the attention of public opinion the gravity of this practice and the necessity of stamping it out, and that it will have a good effect in encouraging public opinion in the various communities throughout Canada to insist that the prosecuting authorities take some steps to enforce this law. But I do suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that is the only method by which we will get any effective action in this matter, and that the longer we create the impression by tinkering around with the law that if we just bring in some new amendment, such as the one my hon. friend suggests, that is going to cure the evil, the longer we are going to be deluded into the type of inaction or divided counsels which postpone any effective results.

With regard to everything the hon. member for Kamloops has said today and with what he said yesterday, I find myself in almost complete agreement. The only trouble is he is saying it in the wrong place. He has come to parliament, which only has the power to enact the law, and is making long speeches concerning the manner in which it should be enforced. I agree with him. I think it should be enforced more than it is. But he should be talking to the attorney general of Ontario, the attorney general of Quebec, the attorney general of Manitoba, the attorney general of British Columbia and the attorneys general of the rest of the provinces. They are the only ones who can bring about the enforcement of this law that he desires.

With an enforceable law upon the statute books, a law which the court of appeal of Ontario has now confirmed is completely enforceable so far as obscenity is concerned, I do suggest that if we have up to date not a single example of prosecution of a publisher of these books I am not so simple myself, and I think there will not be many members of the house so simple, as to think we are going to compel that enforcement by suggesting a minimum penalty of $10,000. When my hon. friend suggested yesterday that there should be a penalty of $25,000 I pointed out to him, and he now concedes the fact, that the law as it stands has no limit. If the prosecuting authorities wish to urge it and if they can find a judge who is prepared to give judgment to that effect, a penalty of $2 million can be imposed upon a publisher of crime comics, and if the evidence in the case warranted such a heavy penalty, that penalty would be perfectly good in law.

That being the case, I think we would be well advised to defeat my hon. friend's amendment and to carry on with the law we have at the present time. If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, I think he would be well advised if he would make these excellent suggestions that he has made in the house to his friends, the provincial attorneys general.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question? The minister has stated that there has not been a single case of prosecution against a publisher. As a matter of fact, I think most of the publishers are in the United States, but I take it what he has in mind is at the publisher level or the level of the first importer. Would he agree the law is satisfactory if that is the case?

Mr. Garson: I would not agree that the law is satisfactory because that implies that my hon. friend thinks it is, and I have just understood him to say that he does not think it is.

Mr. Fulton: Does he really think the law is satisfactory?

Mr. Garson: I most assuredly do, but I would point out to my friend, I think for about the tenth time, what seems to me to be a very simple and elementary principle, namely, that the most excellent law, if not enforced is no better than no law at all. That is all there is to this matter, that and nothing else. I suggest further as another elementary principle that you will not secure one atom more enforcement by putting in this provision about the penalty, either the one moved yesterday or the one moved today, because it seems to me to be a most elementary principle of logic, that if these publishers are not prosecuted with the present penalty, there is no greater likelihood of their being prosecuted with a minimum penalty of $10,000.

Mr. Fulton: What is the present penalty?

Mr. Garson: The present penalty—

Mr. Fulton: Not under the new code but under the code as it exists. What is the present maximum penalty?

Mr. Garson: The present maximum penalty under the code as it exists—I am speaking from memory and I hope my assistant will correct me if I am wrong—is two years' imprisonment for an indictable offence in the case of a person accused, and in the case of a corporate accused the court is empowered, under the analogue to section 623 to which my hon. friend was referred, to impose a fine without any limit whatsoever. That being the case, unless we regard all our judges and magistrates as being incompetent to judge as to the facts of cases before them, what is there more that we can provide, in the matter of penalty, than what we have had on the statute books ever since my hon. friend from Kamloops brought in his bill, and we coopered it up and enacted it?

Mr. Fulton: What does the minister ascribe as the reason why, since 1949, the prosecutions have all been against individual vendors, and none against those higher up in the chain?

Mr. Garson: Oh, my hon. friend is wrong in that. If he will look at the law report in his hand he will see that that is against a corporation.

Mr. Fulton: Oh no, the case I have in my hand is one that was before the Manitoba court of appeal. It is the case of Regina v. Roher, an individual news vendor who was fined $5 in respect of crime comics.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry; I thought my hon. friend had before him the report of the Ontario court of appeal against the National News Company Limited.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Fulton: My question related to crime comics, and the minister will not forget that the case he mentioned related to obscene literature.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: My point is that the only prosecutions in respect of crime comics I have been able to find have been one against an individual vendor, and another against a local distributor. Neither was against anyone higher up. To what does the minister ascribe that fact?

Mr. Garson: Well, not being in the confidence of the provincial prosecuting officers concerned, I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, this discussion indicates the basic weakness in the section. Here we have a law which the minister tells us has not been enforced, so far as any publisher is concerned. There have been a number of cases where vendors have been charged—and I do not know whether the minister has the number of those cases. But during all the discussion it has been made clear that the real and basic weakness has not been pointed out sufficiently.

Last night the hon. member for Dauphin, speaking as one who has had practical experience in the sale of comics, brought out a point which has not been given the consideration it deserves by this committee.

I know in my own constituency a good many news vendors operate restaurants, barber shops and various other businesses, in which they sell magazines only as a sideline. Under the terms of this law they are held responsible for the magazines sold. Yet I suggest they are not always in a position to exercise judgment. As the hon. member for Dauphin pointed out last night, he had turned over a number of these magazines to a police magistrate and, in another instance, to a crown prosecutor, inviting them to check them over and decide whether or not they were crime comics. They did not undertake that responsibility, claiming that the only person who was able to judge whether or not they were crime comics was the attorney general of the province.

In all the discussion that has gone on we have heard no mention of that basic fact; because, as the law reads now, the people who are most likely to run foul of the law are not those who publish the comics at all, but rather the small news vendors who sell them. That is the weakness that should be given serious consideration.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Ellis: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Has he read the section?

Mr. Ellis: I have read it, yes. But I am now referring to the statement made a moment ago by the minister to the effect that publishers have not been convicted under this section. Is that correct?

Mr. Garson: Yes, but that is not necessarily an indication of any fault in the section. It means they have not been prosecuted.

Mr. Ellis: And it indicates a basic weakness in the law.

Mr. Garson: Certainly not.

Mr. Ellis: If a law is on the statute books and is never enforced, would the minister call it a good law?

Mr. Garson: I would suggest to my hon. friend again, as an elementary principle, that, whether or not over any given period of time the law enforcement officers for one reason or another do not choose to prosecute, the point as to whether they do or do not prosecute has nothing whatever to do with the merits of the law. The law may be an excellent law; but if you do not invoke it I suggest it is no less excellent because of that fact that you do not invoke it. That has to do with enforcement; and I suggest that is just as simple as two plus two equals four.

Mr. Ellis: But that is not my point. What I am saying is that at the present time there is a section in the Criminal Code which the provincial attorneys general have not seen fit to use in order to prosecute publishers. In other words, we will take it either that there are no crimes being committed under the section—and I think the minister will agree with what I am saying in this connection—or that the various provinces consider it is not important enough to undertake prosecutions.

In either case, we have spent a great deal of time in this committee discussing the section and an amendment. This section is either unnecessary, because there have been no prosecutions under it, or it is not considered serious enough for the law enforcement officers to take any action under it.

The point I want to draw to the minister's attention is this: Is it not possible under this section to place the blame and responsibility where it should rest, namely on the publishers of these magazines? In other words, when these publications appear on the newsstands they bear the names of publishers. If law enforcement officers go into a news vendor's store and pick up a magazine, and feel that that magazine is being circulated in violation of the section, why could they not prosecute the publisher direct? Why hold the news vendor responsible when, after all, he sells many hundreds of books and magazines and, under the conditions described last night by the hon. member for Dauphin, is not in a position to judge whether they contravene the law.

As I see it the basic issue is that this law should be directed, not against individual news vendors but solely against the publishers. Would the minister tell the committee whether in his opinion direct prosecution of the publishers would not put a stop to the publication of magazines and comic books that we consider offensive under the terms of the act?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have some modest claim to being a lawyer—but not to being a prophet. Therefore I would not like to prophesy what the results would be in prosecuting publishers. But I think that having regard to the fact that our responsibility here is to recognize an abuse and then to draw an effective law which can be invoked by those whose responsibility it is to prevent that abuse, it is on that feature of the matter we should focus our attention. That is what we are here for. One might move toward answering my hon. friend's question by putting it in this form: Is it possible to prosecute a publisher of crime comics?

The reason I asked my hon. friend whether he had read the section was that I thought if he had he would have found the answer to his question in that section. It reads in this way:

> Every one commits an offence who (a) makes, prints, publishes—

The publisher is guilty. I continue:

> —distributes, circulates, or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatsoever, or (b) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, sells or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation, a crime comic.

I would ask my hon. friend to tell me how in the English language the meaning could be made more clear than that, as to whether the publisher could be prosecuted?

Mr. Ellis: I have read the bill; I know full well the publisher can be prosecuted; but my question is this: Is it not possible to prevent the circulation of crime comics in Canada by prosecuting the publisher, period? In other words, should it be necessary to go beyond that point? After all, there are relatively few publishers of comics in this country. Is it not possible, by applying sanctions at the level of publication, to make it unnecessary for the small newsstand owner throughout the country—and there are many thousands of them, at least 10,000 of them—to be perpetually in danger of running foul of the law, under the terms of this act? My question to the minister was not whether publishers could be prosecuted. I know quite well they can be prosecuted, although none has been, as the minister pointed out to my hon. friend. I repeat: Is it not possible to put a stop to the publication of crime comics in Canada by applying the law at the publication level only?

Mr. Garson: I think that I might give a fairly cautious answer to that question by saying that the prosecution of the publishers would undoubtedly tend in that direction. I am not sufficiently familiar with all of the details of this business to know whether that would constitute an entire solution, because there may be sources that I do not know other than Canadian publishers. But I would certainly agree with what I take to be the view of my hon. friend, namely, that prosecution of the Canadian publishers would certainly tend to stamp out the practice.

Mr. Fulton: A most useful purpose has been served here. I do not agree with everything the minister has said, but the fact that attention has been drawn, as a result of this discussion, to the importance of the desirability of proceeding against the printer and publisher rather than against the vendor will certainly serve a potentially useful purpose. I think it will have an effect on our enforcement officers. I do suggest to the minister, notwithstanding that, that some purpose would be served by adopting the amendment, because I suggest that one of the reasons why vendors almost exclusively, and in some cases the local distributor, have been prosecuted under this section is that they are easier to get at. That is the place where the offensive material is found, and so the law enforcement officers, in some cases being pressed or prodded by an active public-minded organization such as the Parent-Teacher's Association, find most of the information against the local vendor and they lay charges. No one thinks of going beyond that. I do not know for what reason they do not think of it, but they do not appear to think of it or to be prepared to take the trouble to go back through the chain to find out who it was that was responsible for first placing this matter in circulation. I suggest that is why the vendor is usually prosecuted. It is easier to get at him. Admittedly he is usually fined $5 and hardly ever more than $50. The records of the cases show that he is not harshly treated by the courts. If an amendment such as I have suggested were adopted, drawing attention to the fact that the man who should be heavily punished, singling him out for attention, if you like, is the printer or publisher, the person who first puts it into circulation, singling him out and marking him for attention by way of a much heavier penalty than the other, it would serve a useful purpose, and it would be a practical factor in the legislation itself. It is for that reason that I put the amendment forward, and for that reason that I continue to support it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a brief comment or two and I should like to ask a question as well. First of all, numerous remarks have been made during the course of the debate on this clause to the effect that very few prosecutions have been laid under the existing section in the code. I should like to suggest, and the minister has pointed out repeatedly, that it is a question of enforcement and not so much a question of the law. The two are related. This whole question of crime comics is a relatively new idea in the law. Unless a local crown attorney or police officer receives complaints from people he simply does not do anything about it. The thing to do to help enforcement is to show the people of the country that this House of Commons means business. A very good way to do that would be to put in a penalty of $10,000.

In addition to that, when magistrates and judges are applying the law and the penalty, and if they have no precedent or example before them—and it is admitted that there are very few under the existing sections of the present code—they have to look at the code to try to find the proper term, or the intention of the legislature. They might have some difficulty in that regard, if they read the proceedings of this debate, to find out what the intention was. But they would have to look at the wording of the statute itself.

Now, a judge or magistrate making a decision and deciding on a penalty would look at section 150. He would then turn to section 154, and he would find that prosecution could be taken either by indictment or on summary conviction, which could not help but indicate to the judge or magistrate that since that was the intention of parliament in passing this law, it was a relatively minor offence, because when a person has the choice of proceeding by way of indictment or on summary conviction—the choice is up to the crown prosecutor—the offence is a relatively minor one. The minister is not going to agree with me when I say this is a minor offence, but one would certainly not get the impression that it is as severe an offence as murder or robbery, where proceedings are taken by indictment alone.

A person could be punished on summary conviction for committing a relatively small offence under clause 150. If there was a minimum penalty of $10,000 it would clearly indicate to any judge who had to give a decision that the House of Commons meant business in so far as the publishers were concerned when this clause was passed.

We can look at other clauses and we see that there is no amount mentioned. There is no limit to the amount that you can fine a corporation. The minister said you could fine it $2 million. That is true, but no judge is going to do that. He will look back at the section and the method of proceeding against the accused, and then he will have to form some conclusion. Any judge would be loath to inflict a very heavy penalty of $10,000 to $25,000 unless he had some precedent or could get some indication from the statute. As Bill No. 7 now stands, the clauses relating to crime comics certainly do not indicate that the intention of the House of Commons is to have very heavy penalties inflicted.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have a question to ask at this point. Can the minister give us information as to the number of prosecutions and also the number of convictions, if any, in the three categories covered, namely, publishers, distributors and vendors, since the amendment was passed in 1949?

Mr. Garson: No, I could not. In order to give reliable figures on that we would have to make an inquiry to all the provinces of Canada; for it is of course provincial prosecutions which are involved. We can only get these figures from the provinces. There are cases, of course, like the ones that have appeared in the law reports, but by no means all the prosecutions involving the point at issue here have been reported in the law reports. There must be quite a number of cases that do not appear in the law reports, and the only way one could get them would be to write to the provinces for them.

Mr. Zaplitny: As I understand it, unless I did not hear correctly the statement that was made, there have been no prosecutions so far as publishers are concerned. Is that correct?

Mr. Garson: No, my hon. friend is quite right in what he heard. Perhaps I was at fault in stating what after all was just a deduction on my part. I formed the judgment that the prosecution of a publisher would be a rather big-scale affair and probably a defended case, so it would be recorded in the newspapers and I would have read about it if it had occurred.

My hon. friend will recall the prosecution of the company in Ottawa, and they took the case to the court of appeals. It appeared in the newspapers a number of times, both during the trial and when it was in the court of appeal. I have deduced, from not having read any reference in the newspaper to a prosecution of a publisher, that there had been no such prosecution. I suppose I perhaps should not state that as a fact, it is more a deduction.

Mr. Zaplitny: The point I am getting at, Mr. Chairman, is this. If there have been prosecutions of vendors or distributors, then it would appear rather strange if there were no prosecutions of publishers. As has been pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina, it should be a simple matter to trace back from the vendor to the distributor and so to the publisher from whom the material emanated. If that is the situation it would indicate, to a certain extent, what the minister has said is quite correct, in that we can only make the law but the enforcement of it is elsewhere. If the provinces do not see fit to prosecute the publisher, then the penalty is not of great importance until such prosecution is begun.

On that point, I wonder if the minister could perhaps enlighten the committee any further. Does he know of any reason, in cases where there has been prosecution of the vendor or distributor, why it was not followed by prosecution of the publisher?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I can state one case, the case the hon. member for Kamloops mentioned concerning the prosecution of a retail vendor in Manitoba. This case could not be followed up by prosecution of the publisher because I believe there are no publishers in Manitoba. The Manitoba authorities could not prosecute because they can only prosecute for offences which occur in the province. The only prosecution of publishers that could take place would be prosecutions in provinces in which there are publishers.

Mr. Shaw: It was not possible for me to be in the house last night during much of the discussion, and I have not felt equal to the task of reading the whole debate. Possibly the question I desire to ask has been asked. When these publications or the plates from which the publications are printed reach the border are they simply passed through without any examination whatever by the customs officials? Is the gate wide open? Certain crime comics appear here week by week or month by month under the same name each time. They are known to be crime comics, so would the minister see any merit in the suggestion that the appropriate authority simply ban the importation into Canada of certain specified publications?

So far as these little pocket editions are concerned, I realize that they appear under different names, and I would not for a moment advise putting a ban on them. They are not all crime comics, nor is it a type of literature which, in all cases, would be bad. It would seem to me that when so many of these publications—I am speaking of crime comics particularly because they are the ones about which we are most concerned and which get into the hands of the children—are known, the appropriate authorities could simply say that those publications are undesirable and therefore are not permitted entry into Canada, nor are the plates. Would the minister see any merit in a suggestion of that kind?

Mr. Garson: This is not recent knowledge on my part, and as I have not made a point of checking it I may be wrong. My impression is that there is a long list of publications including comics which are banned, that is the documents or the magazines themselves, and the plates for making them are also completely banned at the border.

Mr. Shaw: I would suggest that, since this has become such a serious problem, the authority which presently has the right to ban simply take upon itself the responsibility of extending that list. I think if you could curb the action at that point we would not have such a serious problem as that which has been brought up this afternoon, namely the prosecution of the responsible person.

Mr. Fulton: I just want to say now, lest I should otherwise by association appear to be recommending, as a solution to this problem, the extension of any ban or censorship, that all my effort has been towards working out a method of dealing with this under the law and not by resorting to censorship. Even granted that there is a list of those things which the Department of National Revenue, under existing authority, has listed as being prohibited entry into Canada, if we are going to make the department discharge the function of censors, for which they are not really qualified in the first place, I should imagine we would have to add tens of thousands to the staff of the department in order to cope with the enormous volume of this stuff crossing the border. The answer, I say, is to make the penalty sufficiently severe against the people who bring the material into Canada and put it into circulation. We should deal with it that way rather than by enlarging the staff of quasi-censors.

Mr. Garson: If the hon. member proposes not to censor the entry of the magazines from the United States, which are published in the United States, how is he going to prosecute the publisher?

Mr. Fulton: I do not know what the minister means.

Mr. Garson: How is the hon. member going to prosecute the publisher in the United States?

Mr. Fulton: You cannot prosecute the publisher in the United States, whether there is censorship of the material or not.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has been saying that the publisher should be prosecuted. Then he says, I am not in favour of censoring the merchandise coming in from the United States. If it comes in from United States publishers, and there is no censorship—

Mr. Fulton: But I did not say that—

Mr. Garson: Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. Fulton: Well, let the minister be accurate in his interpretation of what I said. I did not say what he has suggested I said.

Mr. Garson: I understood my hon. friend to say he did not wish the Department of National Revenue to exercise any discretion over the entry—

Mr. Fulton: I said I did not wish to extend the functions of the Department of National Revenue as that is not the answer to this problem.

Mr. Garson: But you do not object to the exercise of the function as it has been exercised in the past.

Mr. Fulton: No. I said that if you are going to make censorship your answer you would have to increase your staff to something in the neighbourhood of tens of thousands because of the enormous volume of this material that comes into the country. The duty of these people is not to make themselves censors of mail or parcels or things that cross the border. Their job is to levy tariffs and duties and see that the appropriate customs tariffs are paid. As I say, censorship is a job that has been thrust upon them. I am not suggesting it be withdrawn, but I do not think the answer to this problem lies in extending the quasi-censorship powers of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend will agree we cannot in Canada prosecute publishers in the United States.

Mr. Fulton: No; but you can prosecute those who print books after the plates are brought over. You can prosecute those who bring in and circulate within Canada things which are an offence within Canada.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one thing perfectly clear. I did not suggest that customs officers should act as censors. I said we know that certain publications which appear regularly under certain names are undesirable. As far as I am concerned, I make no apology whatsoever for stating that when that fact becomes known we should ban that publication from Canada. We have no hesitation in passing a law respecting sawed-off shotguns or certain other weapons when we are trying to prevent instances of crime within this country. I make no apology whatsoever for taking this position. I believe we could probably go a long way towards solving this problem if we just simply said: "We know that publication and we do not want it in Canada." I did not suggest it should be the individual customs officer who should determine whether a publication is desirable. We should have an appropriate authority for making that decision.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 16; nays, 35.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, before this clause is carried I have another amendment I want to submit which is in line with what I had to say last evening as regards the possibility of unjust treatment of vendors and distributors. I hope that the gate will not be closed in this regard and that they will be able to plead ignorance in accordance with the law as it now stands. Subclause 6 of clause 150 reads:

> Where an accused is charged with an offence under subsection (1) the fact that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, phonograph record, crime comic or other thing by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed is not a defence to the charge.

I believe that if that subclause were removed it would not absolve the vendor or the distributor from liability as regards crime comics, but it would at least not bar them from pleading ignorance. I want to assure the committee that I anticipate the argument that such a provision might easily be extended to cover publishers, but I cannot conceive of any difficulty in proving in court that a publisher knew the content of what he was publishing. The same is not the case when it comes to the vendor or the distributor. I therefore move, seconded by hon. member for Regina City, that subclause 6 of clause 150 be deleted.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think I should comment briefly on this amendment. It may appear upon the surface to be a bit harsh upon the accused to deny him the plea of ignorance, but, when an amendment was introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops in 1949, and we in the federal government submitted this to the provincial law enforcement officers, we were told among other things that, unless we had a clause like this in the section, almost any of those who were involved, either in retail or wholesale distribution, would be able to say in relation to the charge in respect of any specfic book: "Oh, my goodness, I am shocked to find in page 25 of this book something that is terribly repugnant to my moral nature. But I did not know anything about it. I thank you for bringing it to my attention and I will strike it off my list."

One can easily see that in a situation of that kind we would have a law which was not very readily enforceable, and for that reason we have included this subclause in the bill. The hon. member who moved this amendment told us yesterday about his own experience as a retail distributor. Knowing his reputation for accuracy in all matters, I expected that he would explain that when he received books from the distributor he was able to send any back he wished, because quite contrary to the popular impression none of the retail vendors are under the necessity of selling these books if they do not wish to sell them. As my hon. friend from Dauphin said, the distributor who has a large volume of titles to sell cannot be bothered making up parcels individually for each of their retail vendors. The wholesale distributor sends out in the first instance, as the hon. gentleman from Dauphin correctly stated, a package of books which the wholesaler believes the retailer's community will absorb. If the retailer cannot sell some of these books he may return them. The wholesaler then simply modifies his selection of titles in the next parcel he sends out for no more complex reason than that this is the simple, easy, automatic way to keep the retailer supplied with books which his community will buy. If the retail vendor, with the concern for the morals of the young people in this community to which my hon. friend from Dauphin laid claim, sees amongst the books in his possession something that is clearly a crime comic or obscene, he can send it back to the wholesale distributor. He is required to do nothing more complicated than that to avoid committing the offence of selling these things to the public. That being the case, I do not think there is any reason for an amendment of this sort.

Mr. Ellis: Would the minister tell us how the vendor is going to decide what to send back. The hon. member last night pointed out that in his experience certain local people in his own community would not undertake the task of deciding which magazines should be sent back and which should be kept on the shelf. I would like the minister to tell the committee how the individual vendor is going to accurately sort out good material from bad.

Mr. Garson: I do not know how familiar the hon. member is with these pocket books, but I would suggest to him that if he goes to the average stand and casually goes through the books there he will not have too much trouble in selecting some of the more prominently obscene ones, and in pretty short order. The identification of crime comics might be even easier than that. I must say for my part that this difficulty which has been alleged in separating the wheat from the chaff never impressed me very much. It may be that in the odd case an innocent dealer might be caught, but I do not believe there would be very many such hardships. So far as I know, none have occurred so far under this present section of the code as it now stands.

Mr. Ellis: If it is that easy to decide on the part of the vendor, would it not be just as easy for the appropriate authorities to examine the material as it leaves the publishers, or as has been suggested this afternoon, for the material to be looked over and to be decided on before ever reaching the vendor's hands? In other words, the hon. member for Kamloops spoke of his aversion to censorship. There are two types of censorship. There is the direct type of censorship and there is the more indirect type.

Mr. Fulton: There is the obligation of self-censorship that everybody has to accept.

Mr. Ellis: The point I tried to make this afternoon was this: Why have we got these publications floating around the country?

Mr. Fulton: Because there are profits to be made from them.

Mr. Ellis: Because the publishers of crime comics find that they can make money out of selling crime comics. Consequently, if the job were done properly, and if the responsibility were placed on the shoulders of those who publish the offending periodicals—if it were done at that level—it would not be necessary for the vendor to have to be under the obligation of deciding whether or not he was within the law.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say a word or two on this matter because I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment and I should not like to vote against it without letting my friend the hon. member for Dauphin know why. I would be opposed to the deletion of this subsection because I do not believe we should give anyone the excuse to say that he was selling something the nature of which he did not know. I think that is making it too easy altogether for people to sell salacious literature and to clear their consciences by the fact that they did not take the trouble to know what they were distributing throughout the community. I cannot accept this excuse at all. I think we shall have to keep this subsection in the law in order to make it enforceable to some extent at least.

Mr. Fulton: I rise mainly for the purpose of commenting. While I agree with the minister that the evidence seems to establish that as between the local distributor and the vendor, the vendor is free to return titles which he does not wish to sell, and he gets a credit for them when he returns them, other evidence, particularly the evidence in the recent contempt case at Cornwall, is to the effect that as between a local distributor and his wholesale supplier there is a term in the contract which compels the local distributor to accept all the titles which he is offered. He is not allowed to exercise his discretion; he is not allowed to go through his block parcels and to return direct the titles which he thinks are undesirable. I think the process is that he has to pass those on to his local retailers and that if then they are returned to him by his local retailers, he in turn can return them to the wholesale supplier. I do not know what the correct term for that individual is, but he would be on a bigger scale than the local distributor.

The minister and I have had some discussion of that feature in connection with another provision of the law. Even if the minister is not satisfied that the combines law should be invoked against that practice, I think it should be made clear that it is not a practice to which approval should be given and that everyone who receives goods to sell or distribute, which he does not think it is desirable to distribute, should have the right to return them and should not be bound by a contract to accept them and to pass them on where they may continue to poison the minds of young children. However, for the reasons that I have indicated previously, I do not think that anyone concerned in this process can be absolved from that responsibility, whether he be the vendor, the local distributor, the wholesale distributor, the man who prints the book or the man who publishes it. I therefore think that this subsection should be left in.

Mr. Zaplitny: I should like to repeat something I said when I moved the amendment. I thought I had made it quite clear then, but in view of what has just been said by the hon. member for Kamloops I think it should be repeated. The removal of this subsection will not absolve from responsibility the vendor or the distributor. Its removal will simply have the effect of giving him the opportunity in court of pleading ignorance. That in itself does not mean that by the very fact that he pleads ignorance he is automatically acquitted. There may be plenty of other evidence to show that he is responsible, and that he was not ignorant of the contents. But this section arbitrarily states that he cannot even plead ignorance. It closes that door.

As to what has just been said by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, for whom I have great admiration, I am afraid there is some misapprehension about this matter. Some people are under the impression that this law forbids what is known or has been referred to as salacious literature. It does nothing of the sort. It refers to the commission of crime. The only description of a crime comic—

Mr. Fulton: It refers to obscene literature.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes; to obscene literature.

Mr. MacInnis: That is the same thing.

Mr. Zaplitny: There is a difference. The only definition I can find here that would act as a guide to what is a crime comic is in subsection 7 of section 150, which reads as follows:

> In this section, "crime comic" means a magazine, periodical or book that exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially
> (a) the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, or
> (b) events connected with the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, whether occurring before or after the commission of the crime.

As I pointed out yesterday, that language is extremely wide, hazy and vague. May I also ask why we pick on comics exclusively? When it comes to pictures or stories depicting crime, the matter goes a great deal further than comics. You have, for example, your radio programs and even your television. You have other methods by which crime is depicted, both pictorially and in words; yet you seem to get all excited and hysterical about one particular phase of it. When it comes to some of that lurid literature to which the hon. member for Macleod referred yesterday, I submit that I have not read anything that contains stronger language than do some of the proceedings of the divorce committee that is handled by this very house. Certainly if that was contrary to law, some of the members of this house might find themselves in difficulties.

Mr. Fulton: Parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Zaplitny: But to be serious about the matter, there is not much doubt that the average vendor or—I will not even say the "average vendor"—that the great majority of vendors, even if the wording of this section were brought to their attention, would have great difficulty in deciding what is a crime comic. Not only would vendors have difficulty, but as I have pointed out, even crown prosecutors and police magistrates have found great difficulty in deciding what is a crime comic. For that reason I believe that, without absolving the vendor entirely from responsibility, certainly the removal of this subsection would provide some little measure of leniency by giving him an opportunity to prove that he was in fact innocent.

Mr. Ellis: May I make a comment regarding the difficulty of the vendor? Yesterday the hon. member for Macleod sent across to the minister a copy of a pocket book and pointed out that, while on the whole the book was not too bad, he had found one paragraph in it which he did not like. I suggest that the vendor who sold the book might not have read the entire book or might not have read the offending paragraph. Apparently the hon. member for Macleod feels that the book is not the type of book which should be sold in spite of the fact that the book as a whole was all right.

What the hon. member for Dauphin has just pointed out is quite correct. There is a great deal or difference in the case of the vendor who has on his rack something that he knows, and that anyone can tell at a glance, is obscene or salacious or a crime comic. But a great many publications and books appear on the shelves of a vendor and unless he was prepared to read the entire book from cover to cover, in fact, even after having read the book, he might find it very difficult to decide whether or not the book was salacious in its effect.

The book to which the hon. member for Macleod referred had one offending paragraph. Does one offending paragraph make the book undesirable? This opens up a tremendous field so far as the vendor is concerned. I should like to reiterate what the hon. member for Dauphin has pointed out. The amendment is not going to absolve vendors who knowingly place on their shelves for sale material which they know or have every reason to know offends against this section, but it does protect the vendor who unknowingly places books on his shelves, perhaps because of the fact he has not had time to read the material in its entirety, from being subject to a charge.

Amendment (Mr. Zaplitny) negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 151 to 153 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The next group of clauses is under the general heading "defamatory libel" and commences with clause 247.

Clause 247 agreed to.

On clause 248—Definition.

Mr. Nesbitt: There is a question I should like to ask the minister which I think may clear up the matter very quickly as far as I am concerned. In the city of Toronto, as the minister is no doubt well aware in his capacity as Minister of Justice, certain weekly publications are issued which deal almost exclusively and substantially in lurid crimes, sex offences and that kind of thing. It is quite clear of course that if the material in these periodicals contravenes this section so far as any particular person is concerned a prosecution can be instituted. However, very unusual situations may arise. I know of at least one occasion, and I am quite sure it has occurred fairly often. Apparently many of the articles and stories purporting to be news in these weekly publications are not news at all. They are fictitious, although they appear to be news.

I realize there are other sections of the code dealing with the publication and spreading of false news but the matter of defamatory libel does enter into the picture. Fairly recently an article was published as a news item in one of these weekly publications which referred to a person in the city of Woodstock. It was stated that this person had been convicted of having improper relations with his secretary. As a matter of fact, it stated that he had been tried and convicted. It so happened that the person referred to in the article was non-existent. In addition, no such case had ever been heard in the city of Woodstock in the previous forty years.

Nevertheless, by pure accident a quite prominent and highly respected businessman in the town happened to have similar initials plus the same last name as the person referred to in the fictitious news article. He was caused a great deal of embarrassment, possible loss of business and everything else. I should like to ask the minister whether, in his opinion, this section would cover such a situation. I see that it says:

> A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person . . .

What I am particularly curious about is whether the term "any person" would include anybody who happened to be embarrassed by such publication in view of the fact that further on in the definition of defamatory libel it says:

> . . . or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

In other words, does this particular section of the code envisage that the publisher must have some particular person in mind when he makes the publication or does it envisage that if the publisher happens to hit someone of whom the publisher knew nothing a prosecution for defamatory libel could be instituted?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, this is a point of order that I think I probably should have raised earlier in the proceedings. As Minister of Justice my responsibility is to advise the various departments of the government in matters of law but never the House of Commons or its members. I am afraid if I were to rest upon that point of order in piloting a bill of this sort through the house I would hold up proceedings unduly, and that is why I have not done so. But one would think—this is not an opinion because, as my hon. friend who is himself a lawyer knows, I would have to give the matter much more mature consideration than I have had time to do now—from a reading of section 248 as applied to the facts which he has stated, providing they could be proven, there might be defamatory libel which is defined as "matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person." It is any person at all, and in this particular case, through the unhappy coincidence of the man whose name had been published in this sort of scandal mongering type of magazine, I suppose, is it—was that the type of magazine?

Mr. Nesbitt: One of those weekly periodicals in Toronto.

Mr. Garson: That is right. He happened to live in the same town designated, have the same name and the same initials, and I should think the accused would have a very interesting time indeed proving that he did not intend to prejudice that man by merely pleading the coincidence of the two names being identical.

Mr. Nesbitt: Excuse me; in this particular case the initials were not exactly identical. They were almost identical and the impression created with the public was that it was that person.

Mr. Garson: I took that to be the case. But what I would think would be a more serious difficulty in his invoking this particular provision is the essential difference between ordinary libel, which is the foundation for a civil action in damages on the one hand, and on the other hand the defamatory libel under the code which we are discussing. If my hon. friend will refer to Tremeear, fifth edition, page 372, he will find this:

> The essential difference between civil and criminal libel is not in the matter published, but in its tendency. "It is the policy of the law to leave the care of men's reputations to themselves, and no damage therefore done simply to the reputation of anyone by an individual is foundation for a criminal prosecution. There are two remedies for the wrong caused by a libel; one, where the offence is of a public nature as tending to a breach of peace, by indictment, and the other, when the injury is of a private nature, and merely causes damage to the libelled party, by action.

In this case, if the question ever arose as to its applying to this one man, and his reputation was in fact injured, offhand I should think he might have to seek his recourse by a civil action for damages.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 253 agreed to.

On clause 163—Offensive volatile substance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this clause was dealt with at some length when the matter originally came before the committee. I wish now to deal with it for only a few moments.

On the last occasion the matter was under discussion I referred to the very serious situation in the town of Battleford, to which reference has been made on a number of occasions by the hon. member for The Battlefords, and in the city of Prince Albert where, since November 7 last, the people have been unable to drink water from the Saskatchewan river because of pollution caused through the dumping into the river at Edmonton by the Canadian Chemical Company of certain chemical substances in the effluent from their industry at that point.

I am not here to discuss the responsibility of the federal or provincial authorities, or to criticize either of them for its lack of action. But assuredly the people in Prince Albert and in Battleford as well as in The Pas, Manitoba, to a lesser degree, have been most critical of a situation that has placed them in a position where they have been unable to drink the waters of a river as important to the domestic and industrial uses in the western provinces as is the North Saskatchewan river.

For a considerable period of time the serious question before both the federal and provincial authorities was, first, to have an analysis of the waters, and then to determine the responsibility of one or other industries in respect of the condition of affairs prevailing in the cities and towns I have mentioned.

Finally, as a result of a co-operative effort between federal and provincial authorities an analysis was made of the water, and it was found to have a taste that would prevent any human being from consuming it—unless that human were equipped, as were the locomotive boilers at Prince Albert, the flues of which were de-scaled by the use of this water without any further treatment. In short, the situation was nothing less than terrible.

The analysis showed that the water has in it formaldehyde, methanol and acetaldehyde, all of which suggested that the river was being contaminated by waste from a plant which produced pentaerythritol. Full analysis was made, and it was found finally that Canadian Chemical Company was responsible. There is no desire to have legislation brought in that in any way is retroactive in effect. At no time was there a suggestion to that effect. But it does seem passing strange that under the law as it now exists counsel advising the corporations I have mentioned have concluded that there is no right of action under the Criminal Code as at present worded.

The city of Prince Albert and the town of Battleford, as well as other municipal corporations, have petitioned the government to make provision against the continuance of a situation similar to that, consequent upon the contamination of water necessary for domestic and industrial uses. They have asked for an amendment to the Criminal Code.

The federal government has taken the constitutional position that despite the fact that the Saskatchewan river traverses more than two provinces, the responsibility is a provincial one. It has been pointed out before that there is very little a province can do to punish contamination without the assistance of the government in the province in which the contamination arises.

The government of Alberta has given considerable co-operation and has secured from Canadian Chemicals Limited a promise that the practice heretofore followed will not be continued. The chemical corporation has stopped the course it was following of dumping the effluent into the river. Not only have the various municipalities asked that action be taken, but I am informed that the municipal associations in Saskatchewan have indicated the impossibility of that province doing anything to protect its citizens under the law as it now stands. For, after all, any action that could be taken must be in Alberta.

They have asked for an amendment to the Criminal Code so that certain punishment will follow a repetition of the circumstances in this instance, and for the provision of a law to protect other parts of this country from pollution, which is becoming a problem in almost every province. Pollution of rivers flowing from one province to another is today an offence without adequate punishment and, indeed, without any machinery under the law for the punishment of the wrongdoers.

The home and school association in Prince Albert, with the support of similar organizations in other provinces, has sent in a resolution. The one from Prince Albert is an emergency appeal to all home and school associations, and is signed by Joseph Johnson, president, and Mrs. A. E. Rawlinson, secretary, in the following words:

> We believe that all possible avenues must be explored by municipal, provincial and federal governments, in order to prevent, by adequate legislative action and strict and impartial enforcement of same, any similar situation arising in future within our land.

That would seem to be a reasonable request. The council of the city of Prince Albert, through the health committee of that council, of which the chairman is Alderman Marion Sherman, called upon the federal government to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code making the discharge of chemicals into an interprovincial river an offence.

I am not going to recapitulate what I said previously, but it is a matter of interest that this condition of affairs has continued for five months. Fifty thousand people have been placed in a position where they have had to secure water supplies from wells, springs, and indeed from other rivers adjacent to the municipalities in question. It was because the law provided for no punishment and no offence that when the Criminal Code, clause 163, was before the committee on an earlier occasion I suggested that the clause might be amended. Since then on a number of occasions I have asked the government whether it proposed to take action to amend the Fisheries Act to make it an offence under the particular circumstances. Interest was shown in the question when it began to be apparent that the fish in the river were being destroyed, but action has not yet been taken.

In so far as the Criminal Code is concerned, I asked on one occasion whether the government had given consideration to an amendment to make it an offence to dump deleterious substance into streams upon which people depend for water for domestic and industrial purposes. The answer was that the matter was receiving consideration and that in due course the government policy would be announced. There is no way in which the municipalities in Saskatchewan can meet the problem themselves. The city of Prince Albert has tried to treat the water chemically, but after all formaldehyde may be all right as an embalming fluid, but it is not very good for human beings while still living. They ask for action. People asked for action on the part of the city, but nothing that could be done, according to chemists, would rid the water of the chemicals to which I have made reference, and in particular the formaldehyde and the acetates.

Historically the prevention of pollution under law is founded upon the principle that only bacteria-carrying agencies in the water gave rise to any action. This is not a problem peculiar to Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta. It is becoming a problem everywhere in this country, but it has been brought to a head there. If I could transmit to hon. members the feelings of the people affected by what they have passed through during the past five months in the areas of Prince Albert, Battleford and surrounding areas, the language that I would use would be ruled out as unparliamentary almost before I started to detail what people have said. They are aroused as I have never seen them aroused. They are not asking for an amendment to the Criminal Code to cover what happened in the past.

Today with that optimism that he reveals on all occasions, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that a week or so from now conditions would be so materially improved in Prince Albert—

Mr. Martin: He hoped.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that the immediate cause for complaint would be removed. Well, as I read the file that was brought down in the house in sessional paper No. 190-A on Monday, March 8, I find there, sir, that spirit of optimism, that assured hope that all is well, has not been uncharacteristic of the minister since he first undertook to give assistance, with his officials, to the solution of this problem, and that goes back to January 8 last.

What we are asking for is that conduct such as characterized the industry in question will become an offence under the law. As I said a moment ago, the province of Saskatchewan can take no action with respect to the pollution of a stream or river when that pollution takes place in another province. I therefore wish to suggest an amendment to the minister. He has submitted the matter to his law officers and he may have one that is more effective than the one I have in mind. As a tentative amendment to be considered by the committee I wish to move as follows. I will first read material portions of the clause and then I will place before you, sir, the amendment.

Mr. Garson: Which clause?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Clause 163:

Every one other than a peace officer engaged in the discharge of his duty who has in his possession in a public place—

Now, we come to the material parts:

—or who deposits, throws or injects or causes to be deposited, thrown or injected in, into or near any place,

(a) an offensive volatile substance that is likely to alarm, inconvenience, discommode or cause discomfort to any person.—

And so on:

—is guilty of an offence.

I said a moment ago that that clause does not cover the situation because the substances which are being poured into the river do not come within the ambit of the word "volatile". I therefore suggest, sir, that after the word "place" in line 36 the words:

or in any river or stream whose waters are used for domestic or industrial purposes—

—be inserted, and after the word "substance" in subclause (a) the following words be added:

or any chemical or synthetic chemical or any other substance.

The effective portion of the section in so far as the pertinent facts of this question are concerned would then read:

Every one . . . who deposits, throws or injects or causes to be deposited, thrown or injected in, into or near any place, or in any river or stream whose waters are used for domestic or industrial purposes,

(a) an offensive volatile substance or any chemical or synthetic chemical or any other substance that is likely to alarm, inconvenience, discommode or cause discomfort to any person

And so forth:

—is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

And so on. That is the submission I make. I feel that the minister might want to go farther or there might be a suggestion that the matter should be proceeded with by way of indictment. Such an alteration might be made in the section. However, the purport of the amendment that I wish to place before the committee is incorporated in the words that I have just placed before the committee. I bespeak the co-operation of members in all parts of the house to assist us so that power will be placed in the hands of the people, where it belongs, to resist the action of any corporation or individual who, for its own ends, interferes with or destroys the use of our rivers and streams. Unless this problem of the pollution of streams upon which human beings depend for their water supply is met, this water supply will be endangered more and more as the years go by and these chemical industries are being established, particularly within the western provinces.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend copies of his amendment?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Campbell: I have a great deal of sympathy for the amendment that has been moved. I am not particularly interested in what kind of legislation is to be put on the statute books, provided it does the job. After the Minister of National Health and Welfare made his report to the house some time ago, I wrote to the people in my constituency and to the people of North Battleford, sending them copies of the report and asking them if they felt that was sufficient or did they wish me to continue trying to have something done by way of the Criminal Code. All the answers I received, from practically the same organizations as those mentioned by the hon. member for Prince Albert, the city councils, boards of trade, home and school organizations as well as individual farmers, asked me to try to get legislation passed that would prevent this sort of thing happening in the future. The individual farmers were affected because their cattle would not drink the river water.

I want to say a word about the set-up in Edmonton. I thought the hon. member for Prince Albert was rather mild in what he said along that line. Here we have an industry that commenced operation last September. It is a wealthy organization and requires the best chemists in the land in order to produce this material. Why did the company select Edmonton as a site? These people are rather astute and they have hired the best brains available. They said, here is the river which flows for two hundred miles without passing any city. We could set up our factory here and empty the kind of chemicals we want into this river and probably by the time the river flows past the first town these objectionable odours will have disappeared.

In addition to that, there is no federal law which will give protection to the people residing within the first two hundred mile area. There is a law in Alberta, it is true, that says orders can be given to stop dumping chemicals or waste into the rivers if they cause pollution. It seems to me that is taking action after the crime has taken place. So far as I can ascertain there is no law in Alberta requiring a company to obtain permission before dumping chemical wastes into the river. I have been writing back and forth attempting to get as much information and advice as possible about this problem. I believe that we need a provision in the Criminal Code concerning the pollution of our rivers.

Another suggestion which I believe has merit is that the federal department of health should have jurisdiction over these interprovincial rivers for the purpose of preventing the pollution of the water. I believe that is what we need. We need the federal department of health to decide whether or not they are going to permit these chemical plants to dump waste material in a certain manner. These chemical plants should give an undertaking before they can get a permit to set up the plants.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but it is five o'clock. The house will proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 169, respecting Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 340, respecting Canadian Nurses' Association.—Mr. Stick.

NORTH AMERICAN BAPTISTS INC., (CANADA)

The house in committee on Bill No. 378, to incorporate North American Baptists Inc., (Canada)—Mr. James—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there is just one question which I am prompted to ask by the manner in which Your Honour read the title of this bill. It seems to me you read the title in the form in which it should be printed, for in this house we are used to things being spelled out.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. Knowles: I am asking if it would not be more proper to have "Inc." spelled out.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Deputy Chairman: There are a number of divorce bills which might well be taken together.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that today you might follow the correct procedure and call these bills one at a time. I am not suggesting there is going to be discussion on all of these bills, but I believe some of them have been the subject of contention when before the committee on miscellaneous private bills and there may be members of the committee who will wish to say something on some of these bills. Perhaps you might call them one at a time, Mr. Chairman.

Bill No. 298, for the relief of Alfred Rubens.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 299, for the relief of Clara Stein Rosenberg.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 301, for the relief of Lilli Schwab Barber.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 302, for the relief of Laura Fanny Hoddinott Peckford.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 304, for the relief of Natalie Wynohradnyk Wolcovitch.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 305, for the relief of Joan Bechard Tutty Copeland.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 306, for the relief of Georgette Mertens Herscovitch.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 307, for the relief of Mary Veronica Carmichael Mosher.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 308, for the relief of George Thomas LeGrow.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 309, for the relief of Marie-Reine Roy Laflamme.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 310, for the relief of Gabrielle Gagne Nantel.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 311, for the relief of Velma Mackland Giles Boyer.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 314, for the relief of John Wright Sinclair.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 315, for the relief of Florence Jean Moffatt Tucker Johnston.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 316, for the relief of Margaret Hilda Popper Parker.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 317, for the relief of Cecil Alfred Ellis.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 318, for the relief of Robert Jackson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 319, for the relief of Madeleine Marguerite Faure Eden.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 320, for the relief of William James Cutler McKillop.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 321, for the relief of Agnes Mary Kelly Winters.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 322, for the relief of Florence Elizabeth Hough Topp.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 323, for the relief of Roch Cote.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 324, for the relief of Domina Emerius Lefebvre.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 329, for the relief of Donald Clarke Allen.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 330, for the relief of Jean Albert Raymond Rasson Desloover.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 331, for the relief of Hazel Helena King Featherston.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 332, for the relief of Jessie Ruby Dawe Greenslade.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 334, for the relief of Jean Nelson Williams Blampied.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 336, for the relief of Margaret Ann Eddie Casselman.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 337, for the relief of Marcel Prud'homme.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 341, for the relief of Michele Grignon Ferguson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 342, for the relief of Emile Groulx.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 343, for the relief of Doreen Jeannette Yvonne Sarah Mary Dorothy Sibley Cowans.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 344, for the relief of Muriel Spencer Campbell.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 345, for the relief of Yetta Frumkin Binder.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 346, for the relief of Vera Mary Drummond Stafford.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 347, for the relief of Alice Beatrice Cutler Murdoch.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 348, for the relief of Maartje Stelling McLachlan.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 349, for the relief of Wilfred Roy Fricker.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 350, for the relief of Dorothy Adelaide Jorbahn Rosburg.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 351, for the relief of Joseph Bernard Bertrand.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 352, for the relief of Ann McKinnon Archibald Barnes.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 353, for the relief of Joseph Gerard Arthur Valmore Tremblay.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 355, for the relief of Marie Jeannette Lucille Catherine Clement Cantin.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 356, for the relief of Pauline Prussick Astrof.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 357, for the relief of Martha Betty Schenck Clarke.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 358, for the relief of Felice D'Abate.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 359, for the relief of Olga Korim Falardeau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 360, for the relief of Harold Robertson Mann.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 361, for the relief of Sophie Rosenberg Rosenberg.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 362, for the relief of Frederica Priesel Barrett.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 363, for the relief of Jean Bertha Thomson Lanthier.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 364, for the relief of Roger Tremblay.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 365, for the relief of Adelaide Nina Hall Lanktree.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 366, for the relief of Fernande Gilberte Andrea Leclair Daoust.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 367, for the relief of Diana Barbara Boone Guinness.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 368, for the relief of Clara Sperber Meilen Fink.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 369, for the relief of Maria Assunta Pilozzi Raspa.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 370, for the relief of Robert James Cooper.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 371, for the relief of Diana Frances Nash Milmine.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 372, for the relief of Ross Willis Garrow.—Mr. Hunter.

BIRDIE GLADYS SCHWARZ BARD YUDELSON

The house in committee on Bill No. 300, an act for the relief of Birdie Gladys Schwarz Bard Yudelson—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before clause 1 of this bill is carried there are just a few words I should like to say which apply to this bill and may apply to others. I mention this one because I happen to have the evidence at hand, although I have not taken the time to read it through. There are certain characteristics about this bill which seem to be on the increase. There used to be a measure of originality and some difference amongst these various divorce cases and the evidence that came into our hands but more and more there seems to be a great deal of similarity about them. The same investigators or detectives appear in the evidence in connection with this case as appear in connection with the evidence in many other cases. They give the same type of evidence and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, without singling out this particular case, that parliament is being made to look rather silly in this whole process. I do not wish to say more because as you know, the matter is on the agenda of Mr. Speaker's committee on the rules and procedure of this house and that committee has not yet reached the stage of discussing this matter. Nevertheless, I think it should be pointed out that we are being asked to carry on a process which amounts to rubber-stamping cases such as the one before us.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

MICHAEL SAMULACK

The house in committee on Bill No. 303, an act for the relief of Michael Samulack —Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether any of my colleagues wish to speak on this bill at this time or whether they prefer to leave it for discussion at the third reading stage. This is a case which, I understand, was contested, and I believe the case was heard rather fully in committee.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

BESSIE KATZ ELMAN

The house in committee on Bill No. 312, an act for the relief of Bessie Katz Elman —Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, before we go any further I would like to know from the chairman of the committee whether the evidence heard by the Senate committee was in the hands of the special committee of the house. If the chairman of the committee is in the house probably he could give us that information.

Mr. Harris: I think it is obvious that the chairman of a private bills committee would not be in the house. If my hon. friend wishes to make a point of it we shall have to allow this particular bill to stand.

Mr. Castleden: I would like this bill to stand until the chairman of the committee can be in the house to give that information.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

LUCIEN L'ESPERANCE, JUNIOR

The house in committee on Bill No. 327, for the relief of Lucien L'Esperance, junior —Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this particular bill. I might say that it is the first opportunity I have had to say anything on it, although I am a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee which passed this bill. I must plead guilty to having also agreed to the passage of this bill there without having looked over the contents of the bill or any of the material or evidence that was supplied with the bill. The reason I was in that position was that it was not until after the meeting of the committee that I received this communication in my mail. At the time I received it in the mail I was so greatly amazed at what was there revealed that I laid it aside and I asked a few other members to look it over. We intended to speak on this bill when it came up for second reading. This morning, in looking over my Votes and Proceedings, I suddenly realized that this bill had already had second reading and that I myself had been guilty of voting for this bill in the miscellaneous private bills committee. I just mention these matters, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that something ought to be placed on the record to show the summary manner in which we deal with some of these matters that vitally affect the lives of our Canadian citizens.

When we look into the story behind this divorce bill, we find a man who apparently is fairly well off financially and who has a wife who is in extremely poor health. They have not got along too well and he obtains, shall I say, a temporary separation from her. He employs various detective agencies; and I say "various detective agencies" advisedly. He pays $300 to one detective agency to find some evidence for him. They report back that they are unable to do so. Then he hires another firm and they also report their failure. I believe there is an indication that he hired several more firms and spent a good deal of money on this business of obtaining evidence.

Finally a man walked into his office to sell him life insurance. He asks the man, "How is the insurance business?" The man replies, "Oh, not so good." Then he goes on to relate to this insurance agent his own marital difficulties and the insurance agent volunteers to find the evidence that is so essential in this case. He agrees to pay the insurance agent—and this is all from the evidence—the sum of $750 and the expenses involved. Later on, another witness admits having received $250. A third witness claims that he did not receive anything. He could not very well admit having received anything because he was also the co-respondent that is named. Yet he turns up as a witness for the petitioner. They are a remarkable pair of unlicensed investigators who, in the course of thirteen days, I believe it is—it might have been fourteen days—find evidence on three different occasions that adultery has been committed.

Where licensed agencies have been working for a long period of time, for a considerable amount of money and are unable to show that the woman is other than a chaste woman these men, in the amazingly short time mentioned, turn up all this evidence. Also in the course of the evidence the co-respondent has a fist fight with one of the so-called investigators. However, in appearing here in Ottawa he admits that he is now living in the same room with the man with whom he had the fist fight, and that he has wholly forgiven him. He says that the reason he has forgiven him is that he is a Bulgarian also, that there is therefore this natural feeling of kinship, and they are very sorry for having engaged in a fight with one another.

The lady is then called upon the stand and she tells her story. The co-respondent named became acquainted with her at a social evening. She has this back injury as a result of various factors, possibly. One may well have been the poor treatment she has received on the part of the husband. She cannot ride on the public transportation system and she always has to be taken to and from places in an automobile. This new acquaintance of hers is introduced to her as the fiancé of her very good girl friend. He happens to claim, at least, to live in much the same area of town as that in which she lives. When the evening ends, it is only natural that he offers to take her home. Whether natural or by design, at any rate she agrees to allow this fiancé of her good friend to take her home. Then this same thing happens on another occasion. According to her testimony the man makes a point of showing up at another function she is at and again has occasion to take her home.

On the third occasion when the man offers to take her home she agrees to permit him to take her home rather than impose upon others. I can well understand how people in that condition feel. They do not like to be telephoning their friends and relatives at all times of the day or evening and so on, and be forever asking them, "Will you take me home?" The evidence shows that the lady, despite her handicap, is making a supreme effort to mix in with the normal life of the community. Of the witnesses, these three men, two were hired at an amazing fee. I was seriously wondering whether we had raised our salary enough when I saw that fee, because I think our work is at least as important as that. However, these three men claimed that on each of these three occasions adultery was committed. Naturally they claimed it was done with the consent of the lady concerned.

She claims that on the first two occasions there was no adultery. She does have a story about the third occasion and she has some witnesses. One is a medical doctor. The case has all the appearances of either attempted rape or rape. The amazing thing is that while this is going on his elbow continues to rest on the horn until finally the other two witnesses show up and are able to identify the people concerned.

I may not be well informed about the night life of our cities. However, this continuous honking of the horn was not denied by the co-respondent, although he claimed it had been accidental. However, there is no serious cross-questioning. I was very sorry that we were not fully informed in the private bills committee because as a member of that committee I would have insisted on hearing the evidence over again. I think I have a right to demand that. However, because I knew nothing about the case I had to accept it in good faith. It indicates the summary manner in which $10,000 a year men handle such very serious matters.

I am not too familiar with the laws of the South American countries or with the laws of Spain, France and Italy, but I do know that in a goodly number of these countries they have divorce courts set up to handle these matters. My people elected me to help to legislate and not to act in a judicial capacity. Legislation is an entirely different matter.

When I see that a certain lady is suing her husband for divorce I admit, possibly like some of the rest of us, that I do not pay too much attention to it. However, I carefully read every case that comes to my notice where a husband is attempting to get a divorce. Incidentally, I have never received a copy of a divorce bill yet, and I am rather amazed that I was asked to vote without having had a copy of a bill.

To come back to the point, when a man sues for divorce he wants to be free of his wife. I am thinking of a certain possibility, although I am not going to say that it happened here. Suppose the woman obtains a separation agreement by order of a provincial court and the man is under obligation to pay the lady or the family $100 or $150 a month, whatever the case may be. I notice that such allowances are a little higher now than they used to be. It is a burden on the man that he originally assumed by virtue of the judgment of the court. He pays the money for a year or two and finally it begins to irk him. He becomes very annoyed and restless because of this heavy monthly obligation which ordinarily a married man assumes not only as a responsibility but as a pleasure, even though he howls when the lady comes around for more money.

What is his only way out? There is one possible way out and that is to hire people to obtain evidence, honestly or otherwise, take the case to Ottawa and possibly rely on the financial inability of the lady to fight back. It may also be that a desire not to incur undue publicity may cause the lady not to fight back. The result is that the man is able to obtain a divorce which indicates that the lady has been guilty of adultery. He can immediately reapply to the provincial court to be relieved of his monthly payment. I mention this because I found out afterwards with respect to one case that it was the monthly payment for the upkeep of a child that was irking the man so much, and he was going to get married again. I think he is getting married next week. By the way, his case has not yet been given royal assent. However, that is my information and I feel that it is reliable. The wife-to-be wants the youngster and, after all, it might not cost so much money and he would be completely relieved of any responsibility to the other woman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. At this stage I think I should point out to the hon. member that we are in committee on one particular bill. I think he will agree with me that we have passed the stage where this bill can be used as a vehicle to discuss the handling of divorce legislation generally, and I think I should ask the hon. member to connect his remarks with the specific bill we are considering.

Mr. Regier: I have almost said what I wish to say on this point. I should only like to appeal to every hon. member to read the evidence in this particular case over the week end. I certainly hope that the bill will not be given third reading today. I do not think it deserves such summary treatment here. I think it deserves our attention, and if hon. members of this house will do that I believe that the bill will never receive the approval of the $10,000 a year men sitting in this chamber. In my opinion it is a case of a rich man attempting to get rid of a sick, helpless woman.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Coldwell: No. I think what should be done with this case is to refer it back to the committee for reconsideration when we get to third reading. Like the hon. member who has just spoken, I have not seen this bill before. I must say that as a rule—and I think this is true of most members—that with the tremendous volume of divorce bills coming before the house it is impossible to read the evidence whether or not you want to do so. But while the hon. member was speaking I have been looking over the evidence that has now been circulated, and I am inclined to agree with the hon. member that it looks as though this is a case which needs a very thorough review. The witnesses should be heard again by the committee.

If the circumstances of this case are such as evidently as far as I can see were proven to be so and the two men who allege that they saw the act committed were virtually called by the continual buzzing of the horn of the automobile, it looks to me, as the hon. gentleman says, that this was a case of attempted rape. I do not think there is any question about it from the admitted evidence.

An hon. Member: It was a frame-up.

Mr. Coldwell: How on earth this bill comes before us with evidence of this type behind it I do not know. I cannot understand how it got by the other place. I suppose that in the pressure of the hundreds of these bills going before the committee of the other place it went through.

Mr. Knowles: Over 400 this session.

Mr. Coldwell: Over 400 already this session. This business of dealing with divorce is a public scandal. This woman is a sick woman. She is a cripple. Her husband has been trying to get rid of her. He is a rich man. He has got to pay alimony to the wife and the children by virtue of the order of the Quebec court, and it appears to me that this is a put-up job of rape or attempted rape and that the man is trying to get out of paying alimony to his wife. I think that this bill should not pass the house and that we should not have anything to do with it. It is too bad that a bill of this description should reach this committee stage before it can be reviewed. Imagine the standing committee having to pass on these bills! I am not criticizing members of the committee; I am not criticizing my hon. friend who has taken his seat. But here we have a case coming before this committee, and not one solitary member of it, probably, knew the evidence behind the bill. The thing is a public scandal, Mr. Speaker, and this case brings it before us very forcibly.

I say when we reach third reading of this bill we shall move that the bill be referred back to the committee so that we may make sure that justice shall be done in this particular case. But we are not going to accept this holus-bolus and go through with it in this manner. The thing is shocking, to me. As I say, I have not had time to read it all, but I am going to read it fully. I have just read some of it; and my impression is that it is scandalous.

Mr. Harris: Without in any way agreeing with the comments made by the last two speakers I suggest that the committee might be prepared to report the bill, without prejudice to what we might do in the future, and then we shall hold third reading for consideration, to do as my hon. friend suggests, move to send it back.

Mr. Coldwell: I say that is the only procedure that should be followed.

Mr. Fulton: I can say, without reflecting in any way upon the decision which may be reached by my hon. friends here on the spur of the moment, that I certainly would not agree to pass this bill. I would not propose to talk it out, or hold it up; but after what has been said, and in the absence of any evidence, and with the conclusions drawn by the hon. members who have spoken, I will certainly be compelled to vote against this bill.

I might say that I have several reasons which may perhaps occur to other hon. members. I have refrained heretofore from making speeches on this subject of divorce in the House of Commons, and I intend to follow that course. But I will consistently vote against this method of dealing with the matter, and I will most certainly vote against any bill on which a division may be called—and quite apart from any personal feeling in the matter. In the light of what has been said with respect to this particular case, I certainly feel compelled to vote against this particular bill.

Mr. Harris: One can understand my hon. friend's position. But he might also take into consideration the position of others who would accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that it would be better to have the matter considered again in committee, rather than to have any decision at this moment either for or against the bill. And that is the purpose I think both hon. members have in mind. Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops would agree to that.

Mr. Fulton: I will be compelled to say, "on division", then.

Mr. Harris: All right, if that is the hon. member's wish.

Mr. Fulton: I am opposed to the bill; I wish to make that clear.

Mr. Harris: Then we can follow that procedure, without debating the merits of the bill further, until the committee have had a further chance to look at the evidence.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I have great regard for the minister's integrity, and I do not wish to appear to be suspicious in any way. But some of us have been fooled before. I recall that last session we were fooled right in the committee, and called back again to deal with a bill that was subsequently passed, in spite of the fact that it was turned down previously. It was brought back into the house. At that time, if we had desired to be vicious we could have talked it out, because it was the last day we were going to meet to consider private bills. We could have killed the bill that day.

The only reason I will agree with the procedure suggested is the promise of the minister that when it receives third reading—

Mr. Knowles: When it is called for third reading, you mean.

Mr. Hansell: —that when it is called for third reading we will have the support of the government in sending it back to the committee.

Mr. Harris: I thought I made that clear.

Mr. Coldwell: You did.

Mr. Hansell: All right. I might say this, then, that I am opposed to the bill. But perhaps I have to take some blame for letting this thing slip through the committee.

However I am in the same position as many others. We had a long list of bills. The names of the bills were on our order sheet, and we did not receive the evidence for this one. I supposed that we had received it. Therefore we let them go through.

At a previous committee meeting we had not received the evidence. Some of us protested; and I think it is reasonable to say we expected that protest would serve as notice at least that we were not going to countenance putting bills through the committee when we did not have the evidence.

I am inclined to think that perhaps somebody slipped something over on us on Wednesday by having these all in one block and knowing at the same time that there was at least one case the evidence of which we had not yet received. We will have to take the blame for not scrutinizing it more carefully. I do not cast any reflection upon the chairman of the committee, because he is conducting the committee very well. But there is another point to be kept in mind, and that is that the sponsor of the bill is not in the house—at least I do not see him. And I think he should be here when the bills are in committee. There may be questions we would wish to ask, and yet he is not here.

Now, with those few words, I am willing to be in league with other members of the private bills committee and accept the minister's word that it will be turned back to the committee.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to be able to stand up here and voice my protest against this bill and the way the thing has been handled. I agree that the procedure suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will probably be the best one. I do recommend to the house however that it keep in mind that we are going to be called upon to vote upon this particular bill, and that this might serve as notice to other members to get the evidence in. When a vote is called we can rely upon the good judgment of hon. members to pass judgment, after they have heard the evidence, and to vote according to their judgment. If that is done, I think justice will be done, despite the fact, as someone said, that we are not supposed to sit here in judgment but that we sit in a legislative capacity.

The thing that surprises me, and that I think will come as a surprise to the whole House of Commons, is that the special committee which was set up by the House of Commons to deal with these bills, and dealt with them in that committee by numbers and names, found out after they had voted and passed upon this bill that they had not received the evidence in the mail. And it was not until after the committee had passed the bill and it was returned to the house that they got the evidence upon which they were supposed to base their judgment.

This is the kind of thing that casts reflection upon this house, and every member in it. And it lights up for public notice—and I hope the public will take notice of it—the slipshod manner in which this kind of thing is being done here. And it should be stopped.

In this case, when an application was made in the superior court in Montreal for a separation, that court, which is set up to pass judgment in such cases, thought so much of the evidence given by the wife defending herself that it awarded what they call interim alimony, and granted custody of the child to the mother. Now, when this man finds he is going to have to pay alimony, it would look to me, from the evidence, that he has come to this House of Commons in the hope that he could get a divorce through the house—or a considerable distance through it—without having the evidence presented to the committee.

That I think is wrong. It is a travesty. It is the kind of thing we have been objecting to for years, and we are going to continue to object to this kind of thing. When this kind of thing can happen then surely we have evidence that the whole set-up is wrong and that some different procedure is required in order that justice be done and that this type of thing is not continued. Every hon. member is responsible, if, as a result of the decision here, this man is granted a divorce. If he is granted a divorce then this crippled wife will be turned away by her well-to-do husband and left with the custody of the child and he will be relieved even of alimony. It is something that smells to high heaven.

The evidence proves, so far as I have read, that this man hired people to frame the woman. Everything connected with it stinks to high heaven. If that is justice, then we are wrong, our courts are wrong and this whole system is wrong. I do not intend to vote for it. I will vote against it now and I will vote against it at every opportunity that presents itself. The whole thing is a reflection on parliament. It is a reflection on the whole of Canada. Justice, if that is it, Mr. Chairman, should not be supported by this house.

Mr. Winch: I want to make my own position clear, because this is strictly on procedure. I do not know whether we have to get this out of committee in order to have it come up for third reading before we can send it back to the committee.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Winch: That being so I want my position made clear, because after reading all this evidence from beginning to end, in no stage of the discussion can I support the bill for divorce which is now before us. I do not think I am at all backward or bashful, and I have an open mind in the reading of books. In all my life I have never read any evidence that is so despicable, so odious as the evidence that is contained in this case, and I personally received it only yesterday. Because I feel the situation is so terrible and the action of this man is so despicable, I have to vote against it in all stages. I am going to vote against it at this stage, since we are now in the committee of the whole.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of the clause carrying please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those against it, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on clause 1.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I am afraid I do not understand what my hon. friends are doing. I accepted the suggestion they made in good faith for the purpose of carrying out the suggestion made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I accepted that. Having accepted that I thought the matter would rest there. It is difficult enough to be leader of the house under any conditions, but if hon. members make suggestions and we accept them I should hope that they would live up to the offer they made. Now, I gather it is their purpose to defeat the bill by voting against the carrying of this clause. If that is the purpose, then let us understand each other. The offer that was made was accepted, but it is not now being carried out by those who made the offer. I am prepared under those conditions to deal with this bill in a different manner from that which is now being apparently followed.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that the hon. member for Kamloops suggested he was against the bill and would vote against it. What the minister said is perfectly true. I am prepared to let the bill go through committee, and when it is called for third reading someone would move that it be referred back to the committee for further inquiry and investigation.

Mr. Harris: I undertook to do that.

Mr. Coldwell: But if a vote is called, I find myself in a very difficult position, because I cannot support the carrying of the bill at any stage. That is the predicament I find myself in. I am quite willing to go along with the minister, if that is the general agreement. If a vote is called, you can understand my position.

Mr. Harris: I am sure that if I were in my hon. friend's position my understanding would be that I would vote to carry it on the understanding that had been reached. He will have another opportunity to vote on the bill again when it comes back to this house. At that stage he can state his position as he will. If my hon. friend accepts that, when we vote on this, and if a majority vote in favour of it and the bill is carried as a decision, I hope he will understand that I will not then move on third reading to send it back to the committee as I have agreed to do.

Mr. Castleden: Perhaps we might let it stand on the understanding that it go back to the committee.

Mr. Harris: The only way you can do that, Mr. Chairman, is by this procedure of carrying the bill in this committee, then getting it up for third reading and then move to send it back to the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what I would like.

Mr. Knowles: The committee could carry it on division.

Mr. MacInnis: Surely it is the end sought that we want in this case, namely, a new hearing. If to get a new hearing of the case involves anyone voting for the bill—I do not think that really involves that—he does not have to do anything. But if voting against the bill means that the bill will be carried, then everything that he wanted done is lost.

Mr. Harris: That is correct.

Mr. MacInnis: Surely we should go after that which we want in the way that we shall get it and not in the way to defeat what we want.

Mr. Philpott: Could we not all accomplish the purpose that we have in mind by carrying this stage on division on the distinct understanding that it is going to be referred back on third reading.

Mr. Hansell: May I have one word? The minister is right in this. We must not assume that when the committee carries this the house has carried it; it is only the committee that has carried it so that it can reach another stage. The house still has to carry it, and when it is called for third reading the minister, as he has agreed, will move that it be referred back to the private bills committee, and it will come back here again.

Mr. Coldwell: That is agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): On division.

Clause agreed to on division.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Clause 2 agreed to on division.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Later:]

Mr. W. G. Weir (for Mr. Hunter) moved the third reading of Bill No. 327, for the relief of Lucien L'Esperance, junior.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Harris: No, I move, by way of amendment, that this bill be referred back to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Amendment agreed to.

CHARLES EDOUARD DUBOIS

The house in committee on Bill No. 328, for the relief of Charles Edouard Dubois—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Regier: As far as I know those of us who were objecting to the last bill and who had any objections to raise have raised them. I am just raising the possibility whether we could not save ourselves some work—

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreed that the remaining bills shall be considered as one?

Mr. Coldwell: No. I think the procedure we are following is the correct one.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): On division, and that applies to all these bills.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

HORACE GERVAIS

The house in committee on Bill No. 335, for the relief of Horace Gervais—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Mr. Castleden: Before the bill passes I should like to ask the members of the committee who were on the private bills committee whether the evidence connected with this bill was before them when they passed it.

Mr. Knight: In that connection the method followed by the miscellaneous private bills committee was just the usual one. The usual one is that all the bills are called together, and all the bills were passed except for the little annual speech that I make every year in that committee. So far as I know now, nobody knew whether we had the evidence of these bills or whether we did not. We simply followed the general procedure. There were some questions raised in the committee as to what our job was. One hon. member said, is this an appeal that we are considering against the decision of the Senate? The chairman said no, it is not an appeal against a decision of the Senate. Well then, what is it? Nobody knew what it was. For ten or fifteen minutes I spoke and protested against this general method of handling divorces. Then, as I say, the 15, 20 or 30 bills, whatever the number was, went through very quickly, just as you are doing today, sir. That was the end of the matter.

There were two protested cases, and those we gave fairly deliberate consideration. One of them we decided not to pass the preamble, and the result was the divorce was not granted. It is now removed from this list. That is a record of the procedure in that particular committee. The committee did not vary at all this year from what it had done in the past.

Mr. Castleden: We are glad to have that information, Mr. Chairman. It further confirms the information that we had and the evidence that we have before the house that these bills are being passed without members knowing the evidence or being aware of the circumstances. I hope that will be ended.

Bill reported.

Mr. Weir (for Mr. Hunter) moved the third readings of Bills Nos. 298 to 311 inclusive, 314 to 324 inclusive, and 328 to 372 inclusive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it agreed that these bills be now read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there is just one point, although perhaps it is highly technical. Just to keep it clear, when you listed those groups of numbers it sounds as though you included Bill No. 333, and since Bill No. 333 is not on the order paper I should like it to be clear that there is not some slip by means of which it gets passed.

Mr. Fleming: There are other gaps, too.

Mr. Knowles: There are other gaps, but Bill No. 333 happens to be a divorce bill that was defeated in the private bills committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Bill No. 333 does not appear on the order paper, so perhaps I should say except Bill No. 333.

Mr. Knowles: The divorce bills on the order paper except Bills Nos. 312 and 327.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It is agreed that these bills be read a third time?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to and bills read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: At five o'clock the committee was discussing clause 163 of the Criminal Code and the amendment moved by Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, when the committee was adjourned at five o'clock I was discussing the need for federal legislation which would give the federal government power to deal with the pollution of interprovincial rivers. On January 19, the hon. member for Prince Albert asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question. The minister replied as follows as reported at page 1234 of Hansard:

> My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his question. He asks first of all what, pursuant to the inquiry made of my officers in my absence, was the situation resulting from communications made by the Department of National Health and Welfare to the appropriate departments of health of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Contact has been made with the officers in the two departments of the two provinces. The facts of the matter have been ascertained.

This is what I want the committee to note.

> The responsibility for remedying the situation is recognized by both provinces as not coming within the competence of the federal government. Indeed, whether or not there was that acknowledgment I would have to submit that would have to be the situation as far as the federal government is concerned, for this is clearly a matter that does not come within the competence of the federal government.

As I emphasized in my remarks before the recess, the people in my constituency who are affected by this pollution have urged me to get this government to introduce legislation which would give them some protection. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that the province of Alberta had the authority to deal with this matter and was fully capable of dealing with it. I wish to put section 12, chapter 53 of the Alberta public health act on record. The act states:

> The provincial board shall have the general supervision of all springs, wells, ponds, lakes, streams or rivers used as a source of a public water supply, or for agricultural, domestic or industrial purposes with reference to their purity, together with the waters feeding the same, and shall examine the same from time to time when the necessity for such examination arises, and inquire what, if any, pollution exists and the causes thereof.

They only have to examine the water when the necessity for examination arises and inquire what, if any, pollution exists and the causes thereof. The act continues:

> The provincial board may inquire into and hear and determine any complaint made by or on behalf of a riparian proprietor entitled to the use of water, that any industrial waste or any other polluting material of any kind whatsoever, which either by itself or in connection with other matter may corrupt or impair the quality of the water or may render such water unfit for accustomed or ordinary use, has been placed in or discharged into such water, or placed or deposited upon the ice thereof, or placed or suffered to remain upon the bank or shore thereof. The provincial board may make a report to the minister upon such complaint and as to what remedial measures, if any, are required in respect to any alleged injury or invasion of right as it may deem just.
>
> Where the report of the provincial board recommends the removal or degree of treatment of any such polluting material, any riparian proprietor interested or the minister may apply to a judge of the supreme court or to a district court judge by way of originating notice according to the practice of the court, for an order for the removal or abatement of the injury in terms of the report of the provincial board and to restrain the proprietors of the industry from carrying on the same, or the proprietors or other offending party or parties from continuing the acts complained of until the injury or invasion of right has been abated to the satisfaction of the provincial board.

That is quite all right as far as it goes, but there is no penalty provided in the act after what I might call the crime has been committed. When the board issued an order to the Canadian Chemical Company to stop pouring certain elements into the river the company did what they could. They put up a temporary pipe and that pipe was used to divert certain elements for 24 hours, but after 24 hours the pipe was clogged with residue. What did they do? Did they shut the plant down? No, they turned it right back into the river again. I for one cannot understand why this company which knew of the distress which was being caused to 25,000 or 30,000 people did not close their plant down until they could erect a permanent take-off or pipeline. But instead of that they put the stuff back into the river and it was allowed to run into the river for another 36 hours.

The Prince Albert city council held a meeting a report of which is contained in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of March 16. Here is the report in part:

Our solicitors tell us that company officials worked frantically to clear the obstruction in the pipes last week. But they were not frantic enough to close the plant.

That is the Canadian Chemical Company.

I note, too, that a director of the plant, a Col. H. A. Eydt, expressed annoyance at the publicity given the re-pollution of the river.

I said earlier that the people in my constituency wanted this mess cleaned up. The hon. member for Prince Albert in his remarks stated he had never seen the people in that part of the country so worked up over anything as they are over this particular situation. I am not going to read the dozens of letters I have received, but I want to put two or three editorials on the record. These are newspaper editorials and have no particular political background. I have one here, the North Battleford News-Optimist. I am not going to read it all, but I will read the last part:

Whatever the truth may be one thing is certain.

And here I would like to make a correction. The minister has mentioned North Battleford in connection with pollution several times, but the city of North Battleford is not affected. The city of North Battleford is using well water. But the town of Battleford is affected. The editorial continues:

North Battleford is blessed with untainted water. What a blessing that is!

[Mr. Campbell.]

At Battleford, the Saskatchewan hospital, Prince Albert, and numerous other communities up and down the North Saskatchewan river, a real threat exists. The water smells . . . it tastes like varnish.

That any single industry should so pollute a nation's natural resource is a crime that should be punishable by the law of the land. We in North Battleford who fortunately have not suffered should, and we sure do support our brothers in their fight to have this menace dealt with by the government at Ottawa.

And then the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix had this to say:

It is true, no doubt, that the water pollution from which North Battleford and Prince Albert—

They are wrong again there. They say "North Battleford". It should be Battleford.

—are now suffering does not make the North Saskatchewan river any less navigable than usual. From this point of view, Mr. Chevrier's objection to Mr. Campbell's proposal to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act to take account of the difficulty may have been justified. But the Minister of Transport did not argue on that basis alone. He seemed to be claiming that it would be unconstitutional for parliament to legislate at all with respect to a form of pollution which does not affect navigation or fisheries and may not be medically injurious to health.

We should like to see Mr. Chevrier's opinion tested in the courts, especially if investigation proves the theory that the pollution originates in Alberta.

And that theory has been proven.

For whatever the health implications, there is no doubt, we think, that the taste and smell of their domestic water are more than annoyances to the people of the two Saskatchewan cities. People just will not drink disagreeable water if they can help it; and because they will not North Battleford, Prince Albert and perhaps other communities along the river may suffer economically.

Then I have another editorial again from the North Battleford News-Optimist which reads as follows:

We sympathize with the residents of Battleford. Their water tastes like varnish and smells like . . ., well, it smells like varnish too. Some 3,400 residents of Battleford and the Saskatchewan hospital are presently suffering from the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river.

Fortunately, the people of the city of North Battleford are not affected. They derive their water from wells which have not yet been tainted.

It is unfortunate that governments act so slow. The government of Saskatchewan has not been able to deal effectively with the government of Alberta. It thus seems time that the senior government at Ottawa should step into the picture immediately and settle this issue. The pollution cannot be allowed to continue, for not only is it obnoxious to the taste and smell, but there is a new fear growing among members of the medical profession at Prince Albert that it is also injurious to our people's health.

The water of the great rivers belongs to all the people of Canada. We cannot afford at any time to allow industries to destroy it. The waters of the North Saskatchewan river are a resource which must be protected since it would not be possible for the thousands of people who depend upon it for water to live without it comfortably.

Then Godfrey Hudson whom all of the western members will know—he is one of Canada's noted news commentators—has this to say in a commentary he made on February 24:

The water in the rivers of this country belongs to the Canadian people. Yet a member of the federal cabinet has said that industries and communities from coast to coast have been polluting river water for years, and that the federal government has no jurisdiction over pollution. We think it is high time the federal government amended the constitution, if necessary, to get the power to control the dumping of wastes into rivers. The federal government has the power to control navigation in our rivers. If it is important enough for Ottawa to wield control over navigation, surely it is important enough for Ottawa to exercise control over something that affects the well-being of tens of thousands of Canadians.

We submit that the awful water that the people of Battleford, the patients and the staff of the Saskatchewan hospital at North Battleford, the residents of Prince Albert and the residents of The Pas, Manitoba, have had to drink in recent months has shown a glaring weakness in the present division of powers between the provinces and the federal government. There should be federal legislation establishing uniform control coast to coast over what can be dumped into rivers that are sources of drinking water. And any industry or municipal corporation that plans to dump waste into a river should have to get a federal health permit before getting a construction permit.

That is just what I was saying before supper. Most of what has been said has had to do with humans but we have fisheries legislation in Canada. What has happened to the fish in the North Saskatchewan river? Here is an article from the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix of March 16, from the Prince Albert correspondent:

"The chemical pollution of the North Saskatchewan river threatens to wipe out the fish population of the river," A. H. McDonald, director of the fisheries branch of the Saskatchewan department of natural resources, stated here Monday afternoon. A full report on the situation is to be made to the provincial government and federal department of fisheries.

At the same time, city council here, through its Edmonton solicitors, said it would take legal action against the Canadian Chemical Company at Edmonton, unless concrete assurances were given that no more polluting chemicals would be placed in the river by the company.

Then I am passing over and leaving out a portion of this article which continues further on as follows:

In his fisheries report, Mr. McDonald said tests conducted by his department during the last month had shown a "dangerously low oxygen content" of the water of the river and that the chemicals present appeared to be responsible. "We have noted increasing numbers of dead fish in the river, with a total of 130 dead fish being noted at one small open area near the city."

He said the situation was better downstream, after the junction of the north and south branches of the Saskatchewan river. However, at Cumberland House the fish, while alive, were unfit to eat because of an offensively oily taste, and residents had discontinued fishing.

Recent tests conducted at Prince Albert, when fish from the South Saskatchewan were kept in observation tanks at the power house here, showed that fish placed in a wire screen under the ice, died within an hour of being placed in the water.

The oxygen content of the river necessary for proper fish respiration varies from five to nine parts per million parts of water, Mr. McDonald said. "As far west as Frenchman Butte, the average oxygen content of the North Saskatchewan river is approximately one part per million," he said. "In comparison, the water of the South Saskatchewan at St. Louis averages 13 parts per million, which is good for the time of the year."

"Our biologists are of the opinion that few fish can survive the condition prevalent in the North Saskatchewan," Mr. McDonald said.

What does that mean? That means that it is almost certain that there is not a live fish in the North Saskatchewan river today. How many fish are in the river normally? I do not know. There are probably hundreds of thousands. What is going to happen now when the river has perhaps hundreds of thousands of dead fish in it? How is it going to affect the health of our people? Our people write me and tell me that they are now desperately afraid of a typhoid epidemic. There is a great deal more that I could say, but I do not want to take up any more of the time of the committee. However, I want to make this plea to the government. Our people are looking to this government across the way to bring in legislation that will definitely put a stop to this sort of thing. They are looking, not only to me and to the hon. member for Prince Albert to make a fight but to the other members from the province of Saskatchewan and to every member of the house who may possibly find himself and his constituency in the same position.

It can happen to other constituencies besides Prince Albert and The Battlefords. I appeal, I plead with the government of Canada to take remedial action first of all to bring in health laws which will prevent any industry from commencing business until such time as it has given assurance that it is not going to pollute our rivers. In the second place, we want legislation in the Criminal Code which will make it a crime for any industry to do what the Canadian Chemical Company did. They set up a mechanical monster that can do even greater and bigger things than Paul Bunyan and his blue ox. In the early days on the western plains people used to tell great stories about Paul Bunyan and his blue ox, about what the blue ox could do and what Paul Bunyan could do, but this mechanical monster can put its odours and stenches into every home in the city of Prince Albert, the town of Battleford and even into the provincial hospital.

Surely it is time that we did something to stop this. I want to hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I want to hear from the Minister of Justice and others. I suggested an amendment a couple of weeks ago. I do not want to try to amend the Criminal Code because I am not a lawyer. That is the job of the government across the way. That is the job that our people are looking to you to do. Let us hear what you will do about it.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, with the great and rapid growth of the petrochemical and other types of industry in the oil fields of northern Alberta I think we can all agree that the nation is faced with the problem of what to do with the river pollution which could be caused by such industries in northern Alberta unless something is done to prevent it. Western Canada is faced for the first time with a problem that has been common in eastern Canada, namely, how, under the pressure of industrial development, the rivers of the country can be put to the most advantageous use. I do not think there will be any argument as to the necessity of our facing up to the problem. Perhaps the only argument that will develop is as to the best methods of solving it.

I should like to examine the matter tonight from that standpoint, and to begin with an examination of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert since that is the immediate question before us. Then, because I think that is not a satisfactory method, I should like to move on to suggest others which in my view would be much more satisfactory than the one he has suggested. First of all I should like to deal with some of the facts which he mentioned in his remarks. The first one is that he stated that the corporation in question had stopped the practice of discharging effluent into the river. As we will recall, on the last occasion on which we discussed this matter the problem was not quite that which we have tonight. The problem then was to find out what the facts were.

I suggested on that occasion that it would be impossible, no matter what clauses we had in the Criminal Code, to lay a charge against the guilty corporation until we knew what the facts were and knew which corporation was the guilty one. If my hon. friend will recall, I also suggested that I thought that when we found out what the facts were I would be very much surprised indeed if, when confronted with those facts, the corporation in question would not be quite willing to desist from the practice of discharging its effluent into the river without the necessity of any prosecution at all. It was very gratifying to have the hon. member for Prince Albert tell us this afternoon that that is precisely what has happened, that when the facts were established and the company in question was confronted with them it did desist although, as the hon. member for The Battlefords suggested, there was a short period of time during which the arrangements it made to divert its effluent from the Saskatchewan river broke down.

The suggestion is now made that there is no offence in the code covering this act, and in due course I want to take issue with that statement. The hon. member for Prince Albert having alleged that there now is no offence covering the act of pollution suggests an amendment to provide such an offence. I should like to deal with his amendment. To begin with, I think the amendment is made to quite an inappropriate clause of the bill. It is made to section 163 which comes under the general heading of "Disturbing religious services". This section 163 in its present form is aimed at those who, as set out in the second subsection (b) of this section, throw a stink bomb or stench bomb or device from which any offensive volatile substance mentioned in paragraph (a) of the same section is or is capable of being liberated, and is likely to alarm, inconvenience, discommode or cause discomfort to any person or to cause damage to property.

I do not think that is an appropriate section to amend for the purpose of preventing the discharge of effluent into a river. But I am not stating that as a captious criticism because I will admit at once that if section 163 is not an appropriate section to amend it would be a very simple matter, once we had concluded that such an amendment was the proper method of dealing with the problem, to select a suitable section of the code or to create a new and suitable section to deal with this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Right on that point I would point out to my hon. friend that the reference to disturbing religious services cannot apply to this group of sections in general because section 162 says:

> Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, loiters or prowls at night upon the property of another person near a dwelling house situated on that property is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

That has nothing to do with church services at all. As a matter of fact the heading for this group of sections is not a correct designation.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at the section that he is seeking to amend, he will see that the significant words in it read as follows:

> Every one other than a peace officer . . . who deposits, throws or injects or causes to be deposited, thrown or injected in, into or near any place,

(a) an offensive volatile substance that is likely to alarm, inconvenience, discommode or cause discomfort to any person or to cause damage to property, or

(b) a stink or stench bomb or device from which any substance mentioned in paragraph (a) is or is capable of being liberated . . .

It deals with stench bombs or the contents of stench bombs and their discharge in or near any place to the alarm, inconvenience or discomfort of the people there. As I say, I am not raising this as a captious criticism, because it is quite apparent that if we want to solve the problem of the use of the waters of the North Saskatchewan river by creating new crimes by an amendment to the criminal law—it is a very easy matter, if we do not adopt my hon. friend's amendment, to produce an amendment which would be more appropriate for that purpose.

But what I do suggest is this, that when my hon. friend says there is no offence in Bill No. 7 which covers this act, I would refer him to clause 165 which provides:

Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby

(a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or

(b) causes physical injury to any person

is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

Now, the offence my hon. friend was proposing to create was an offence punishable upon summary conviction. It is true that when he moved his amendment he suggested it could be changed to be made punishable upon indictment. But until that change was made, the only penalty which could be imposed upon an accused corporation would be a fine of $1,000 which, I think, under the circumstances we have been considering, would not likely be an effective deterrent. The section dealing with a common nuisance, which I was reading, goes on to define a common nuisance in these terms:

For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby

(a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the unlawful act, or what is the legal duty?

Mr. Garson: The unlawful act, among other things, would be the breach of the statute which the hon. member for The Battlefords read a moment ago—by discharging the effluent into the river, in contravention of a statute of the province of Alberta or regulations passed thereunder. That would be an unlawful act beyond question, if we did not go on and deal with other aspects of the crime of a common nuisance and indicate that anything which was done in contravention of the public interest might, in itself, apart from being in contravention of the statute be regarded as an unlawful act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the legal opinion of the minister's law officers?

Mr. Garson: It is a statement I am making, and for which I am taking the responsibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister always says that he himself does not interpret the law, but that only the law officers do it.

Mr. Garson: I am making this speech, and I am responsible for it. And if my hon. friend wishes to contradict it he will have ample opportunity to do so. But I wish he would wait until I have finished before he interrupts to contradict it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not contradicting; I was just asking a question, to see what foundation there was.

Mr. Garson: Now, the proposal is to create a new offence. For reasons I have stated, I do not think that this new offence which my hon. friend is proposing to create would be satisfactory for the purpose he has in mind because, among other things, he confines the substance he wishes to prohibit to offensive volatile substances, or any chemical or synthetic chemical, or any other substance.

Now, it is true that in the present case, as would appear from the facts, chemicals were put into the river. But surely if we are going to have a section here which will serve the purposes that have been urged upon us during the present discussion, we would have to have a definition of "substance" which would be broader than merely chemicals.

It is true that my hon. friend says "or any other substance" but he precedes that by the words "volatile substance or any chemical". And I think he will agree that under the ejusdem generis rule, if you have a general term following a number of particular terms, the general term is interpreted as being of the same genus or kind as the particular terms which in the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert refer to chemicals only. This I suggest is not a satisfactory or adequate wording.

Again my hon. friend will say that this is just captious criticism; but I assure him it is not. And it is not captious for this reason, that if my hon. friend adopts a broad enough wording to really provide a solution to this problem, and we put such broad wording into the Criminal Code, which has to have general application to the Dominion of Canada from coast to coast, then I wonder what would be the position of most of the municipalities and a large number of the industries, for example, on the Ottawa river and the St. Lawrence river system under this section which my hon. friend is proposing to move.

I do not think for one moment that my hon. friend's amendment provides a satisfactory solution to the problem of how we are to use for the purposes of the general public and the municipalities and industries of western Canada in an orderly way the waters of the South and North Saskatchewan rivers.

Mr. Campbell: Make it applicable to all of Canada, because we do not want pollution anywhere else in Canada, either.

Mr. Garson: I am trying to confine my remarks to the western problem we are discussing. I think the hon. member for The Battlefords is quite right in this, that if the solution which we provide for the North and South Saskatchewan rivers were to take the form of an amendment to the Criminal Code it would be a solution which would automatically have to be applied to all the other rivers in Canada. And in judging what we should do in that regard we must keep that point in mind.

For that reason we will find that if we are to draft a law of general application for Canada we are more severely restricted in the scope we can take in, because it has to be of general application, than we would be if we were providing a solution which was tailored to the requirements of the North Saskatchewan river alone. And that is another reason why I think the amendment to the Criminal Code is not an orderly solution to this question.

I suggest this—without going into any detail—because I am not a health engineer or a chemical engineer, and I do not know what one should include in a list of substances which were to be barred by the Criminal Code from the Saskatchewan river—but I suggest that if the list were wide enough to be of value then it would be so wide that if applied now to all the rivers in Canada in existing industrial areas it would cause substantial complications which I do not think the hon. member for Prince Albert has taken into account.

For that reason it seems to me that in line with the suggestion made by the hon. member for The Battlefords there is another method of a much more orderly character which would be preferable as a method of utilizing the waters of the Saskatchewan river so that they could be used by industries, within proper limits, and by the general public in western Canada, in a manner whereby they would both derive benefits and neither would suffer serious injury.

I think the solution is to be found in what has already been done by the international joint commission of the United States and Canada when they have addressed themselves to this subject under conditions of infinitely greater disadvantage than those which apply in connection with the Saskatchewan river. Because we are here dealing with the first signs of the problem of pollution in these western streams, whereas when the members of the international joint commission of the United States and Canada applied themselves to the question of the pollution of boundary waters between the United States and Canada, they had to come to grips with a problem that was already in an aggravated and advanced state.

How did they grapple with this problem? If my hon. friends are interested at all, they can find a reference to these points that I shall be making in the report of the international joint commission of the United States and Canada on the pollution of boundary waters published at Washington and Ottawa in 1951. I will not of course cover any large part of it for it is quite a lengthy document. But perhaps I might be permitted first of all to give an indication of what is covered in the heading of objectives of boundary waters quality control. The general objectives are these:

All wastes,—

And this will give the hon. member for Prince Albert some idea of how you would have to define effluent which you are prohibiting from the streams. I continue:

All wastes, including sanitary sewage, storm water and industrial effluents, shall be in such condition when discharged into any stream that they will not create conditions in the boundary waters which will adversely affect the use of those waters for the following purposes: source of domestic water supply or industrial water supply, navigation, fish and wildlife, bathing, recreation, agriculture and other riparian activities.

In general, they say, adverse conditions are caused by:

(A) Excessive bacterial, physical or chemical contamination.

(B) Unnatural deposits in the stream, interfering with navigation, fish and wildlife, bathing, recreation, or destructive aesthetic values.

(C) Toxic substances and materials imparting objectionable tastes and odours to waters used for domestic or industrial purposes.

I ask the hon. member for The Battlefords to see how closely this describes some of the things that he has been complaining about. I go on:

(D) Floating materials, including oils, grease, garbage, sewage solids, or other refuse.

Then it goes on to state in more specific terms the objectives. They say:

Specific objectives

In more specific terms, adequate controls of pollution will necessitate the following objectives for:

(A) Sanitary sewage, storm water, and wastes from water craft

Sufficient treatment for adequate removal or reduction of solids, bacteria and chemical constituents which may interfere unreasonably with the use of these waters for purposes aforementioned. Adequate protection for these waters, except in certain specific instances influenced by local conditions, should be provided if the coliform M.P.M. median value does not exceed 2,400 per hundred ml. at any point in the waters following initial dilution.

Then they go on to deal with industrial wastes, first of all, under the heading:

Chemical wastes—phenolic type

I believe they are the ones that are involved in the Saskatchewan river. Then they go on to deal with chemical wastes other than phenolic. They deal with each one of these one by one, and deal specifically with the conditions in which the effluents must be at the time they are discharged into the river. Then they deal with highly toxic wastes, and with the problem that the hon. member for The Battlefords mentioned tonight, the deoxygenating of waters.

Then they provide for consultation with the various interests concerned. I am informed that far from there being any great amount of difficulty with industry in the carrying out of their objectives, they have found, certainly in several specific cases, the greatest amount of co-operation from the industries concerned. And why should there not be? The industries themselves with large investments have the strongest possible interests in seeing to it that the river upon which they, along with the other residents situate upon it, are dependent for supply of water, should be treated in an orderly and scientific manner.

I should like to read the recommendations of this report. They are not very long, and I think they will shed a good deal of light upon what we might expect from an orderly approach to the problem which we have been discussing. They are as follows:

(1) The commission recommends that the "objectives for boundary waters quality control" as set forth in this report be adopted by the two governments as the criteria to be met in maintaining boundary waters in satisfactory condition, as contemplated in that portion of Article IV of the boundary waters treaty of 1909 wherein it is stated: "It is further agreed that the waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other."

(2) The commission recommends that the remedial measures already known to be necessary as described in the accompanying reports of the technical advisers be put into effect and that additional measures be undertaken as may prove to be necessary in the future to meet the recommended "objectives".

(3) As a procedure to insure accomplishment of the foregoing, the commission recommends that it be specifically authorized by the two governments to establish and maintain continuing supervision over boundary waters pollution through boards of control appointed by the commission. In carrying out this supervisory function, the commission shall notify those responsible for any pollution found objectionable in the light of the objectives recommended above and, in the event that assurance is not received that such pollution will be corrected in a reasonable time, shall make recommendations to the appropriate authority, having jurisdiction as to the further action deemed advisable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that in the face of the problem which is posed by the opening of a great industrial expansion within the valleys, certainly of the North Saskatchewan river, that the only intelligent way to approach it is by this method and not by creating some new offence and haling people into police court and fining them, and when the case is closed, what then happens? Do they go and sin no more, or if they do, who is going to check them?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If they sin some more they are punished again.

Mr. Garson: Is the chief of police or the constable a person qualified to deal with a problem such as the one that has been mentioned, or should it not be dealt with by people who are trained in this sort of work and who know what they are talking about when they are dealing, for example, with the type of chemicals that are alleged to have caused this trouble in the North Saskatchewan river or with any other forms of river pollution?

My hon. friend might say, well, this is going to be very difficult because we will not be able to get together these western provincial governments, which, according to the arguments of both the hon. gentlemen who preceded me in this debate, apparently cannot come to an agreement in this matter. The argument is that by co-operation they cannot solve this problem, so therefore they must come down to the great white father, the federal government, and he is to force them all into position and make them agree and come to an intelligent solution of what is their common problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not the point at all.

Mr. Garson: I say that any statement or implication of that kind is quite unwarranted; and it can be proven to be quite unwarranted in terms of what has already been done in relation to the waters of the Saskatchewan river itself. At the present time there is in existence the prairie waters control board set up by the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are the powers of that board?

Mr. Garson: I was just about to read them when my hon. friend interjected. I was a little bit hesitant about boring the committee with this long statement of powers, but since my hon. friend provokes me I have the best excuse for doing so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are doing a marvellous job on that.

Mr. Garson: Their first task is this:

(a) to collate and analyse the data now available relating to the water and associated resources of interprovincial streams with respect to their utilization for irrigation, drainage, storage, power, industrial, municipal, navigation and other purposes;

(b) to determine what other data are required from time to time in order to reach decisions on questions referred to it and to make recommendations to the appropriate governmental organizations concerned for the carrying out of such field surveys, power investigations, soil surveys, establishment of gauging stations, economic studies relating to drainage and flood control and all similar work which the board considers necessary to supply information required for the proper performance of its duties;

(c) upon the request of any one of the three provinces or the dominion to recommend the allocation of the waters of any interprovincial stream among the respective provinces;

(d) to report on any questions relating to specific projects for the utilization or control of common river or lake systems at the request of one or more of the ministers or authorities charged with the administration of such river or lake systems.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? Will he tell us how that covers pollution, because it seems to me if we follow his own argument the powers of the board relate to the water tables and there is nothing covering pollution.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friends are determined to anticipate my arguments, but I do not object to that. It shows they are at least paying attention to them.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I am paying close attention.

Mr. Garson: It does not cover pollution. It never purported to cover pollution. It was formed before the question of pollution had arisen and naturally it did not deal with something which did not exist.

The point I make, and I might put it in very brief form, is that this board has to do with what quantities of water will be let down from time to time and with the quantities which may be diverted, retained or expended in irrigation and the like.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But not the quantities polluted.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: Just give me a little time. I am going to come to pollution in a minute.

Mr. Knowles: You have to build the Saskatchewan dam first.

Mr. Garson: I suggest that just as this is the intelligent way to deal with the quantity of water which is to be in these interprovincial rivers, so the intelligent way of dealing with the quality of the water that is to be in these rivers is along the same lines. I believe the proper thing to do in this particular connection is to suggest to these prairie governments, which should be and I am confident are deeply concerned about this great problem about which the hon. member for Prince Albert has been so eloquent these many times—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to tell you if you heard the people of Saskatchewan being eloquent, you would understand.

Mr. Garson: Yes, and I am giving him credit. I give the people credit, too, for being eloquent. If I were in their shoes I do not know whether I would be eloquent but I would certainly be strongly articulate.

I suggest that this method of having a body of scientific men to study the problem, to ascertain what is involved in it and deal with it accordingly, offers, on the basis of the precedent of the international joint commission, by long odds the most sensible method of dealing with this problem, and infinitely more sensible than a series of police court prosecutions.

Now, let me make one or two points clear at this stage. This prairie provinces water board now is purely an advisory body. It has no overriding authority of its own at the present time. It has been set up to advise their respective governments whose representatives compose it. It is quite true that before the recommendations they make can become effective they must be ratified by the governments concerned. But I am told the board has had a good measure of success in getting their governments to adopt their recommendations. I would suggest that, as compared with any further amendments to the Criminal Code, especially if they are as inadequate as the ones suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert, it would be infinitely preferable to have this body instructed by the governments which set it up to take over the authority to deal with the question of the quality of the water.

If, for one reason or another, they are not experts in that particular field of pollution because they are men who deal more with quantity problems than with quality problems—they should add to their numbers people who are competent in this other field. If necessary another body of the same character could be set up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it not the federal government that set it up?

Mr. Garson: No, it was not the great white father.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The water board in western Canada was not set up by the federal government?

Mr. Garson: The water board in western Canada, I may inform my friend, was set up by the four governments who are parties to it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who are they?

Mr. Garson: I have already named them, but I shall name them again in the same way I did a moment ago. They were the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Canada; those are the four.

This is merely a suggestion made, if you like, by an outsider from this problem. We in western Canada are just on the eve of a very large industrial expansion. This trouble we have been having is the first harbinger of a lot of other problems of the same character that will arise shortly. If we are going to deal with them in an orderly way we do not want to give this problem of the chemical or other pollution of water, which is a problem for scientists and engineers, into the hands of the chiefs of police or to throw them into the courts for solution when they can be dealt with by a body of this nature that is competent in the scientific and engineering fields.

In this respect I am completely in agreement with the hon. member for The Battlefords. I feel this is the opportune time to take this move because in so far as these large western streams are concerned, we will be able to get in at the very beginning of the river pollution problems that are arising. From the beginning we would have that control over the problem which would have been of enormous advantage to the international joint commission if it had been able to deal earlier in their history with the problems with which it is now dealing. It is for these reasons I am very sorry that I cannot support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. member for Prince Albert speaks I think at this stage it is my duty to remind the committee that what is under discussion is the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Prince Albert, widening the description of certain criminal offences. I am asking the committee not to allow itself to be led so far away from that amendment that we will find we are debating the merits of alternative methods of dealing with the pollution of a certain river, whereas we should be debating the applicability of the Criminal Code to that situation.

I believe members of the committee will agree with me that where I and others in the Chair have allowed a debate to get too far afield, we eventually found we were debating the merits of something that was not before the committee at all. I submit that for the guidance of the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never before in this house have I heard such a torrent of words in order to arrive at a negative position. Certainly the minister's suggestion about the water board was one of the most ludicrous I have ever heard advanced. The water board has nothing whatever to do with the quality of the water. It had to do with the allocation of water as among the three western provinces in order to determine whether or not irrigation projects should be permitted.

The minister says we are on the eve of an industrial development and, to use his own words, we ought to deal with matters such as this in an orderly way. So far as the people of Saskatchewan are concerned, those long-suffering 50,000, this will indeed be a very black Friday. A few weeks ago when the matter was under discussion the minister said he could not deal with the question then because we did not know whether there was any evidence against anyone. We did not know who the wrongdoer was, but once we found out who the wrongdoer was then we would be in a position to consider amendments to the Criminal Code.

At that time I stated that in my opinion the wrongdoer was Canadian Chemical Company. That conclusion has since been established beyond peradventure. The minister says we should follow some course similar to that of the international joint commission. That commission has done outstanding work. It has the power to act and it does act. The minister read the preamble of the powers of this body and said that in order to cover pollution in all of its various aspects there would have to be a great many terms defining the offence. But that is what the law officers were to consult about. That is the reason for the delay in connection with this matter. For almost five months now 50,000 people have been waiting for parliament to act. The province of Saskatchewan, and I hold no brief for the government of that province, cannot act. It has no power to act and the only government that can act is the government of Alberta. It is—

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? We have now, as he has said, knowledge as to which company is mainly responsible for this particular pollution. But will the hon. member say whether or not in his opinion it is open to any citizen of the province of Saskatchewan or Alberta or the law officers or any private citizen in Prince Albert to take injunction proceedings against the company in these circumstances? Will the hon. member say "yes" or "no" to that question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I will say is that counsel who have been retained say there is no right of action, and it is counsel's opinion that is accepted. The minister has brought up the question of an injunction. But the health of the people in Saskatchewan and Manitoba has been affected by what has taken place and has been seriously undermined and the minister's department has done nothing but send out two officials—

Mr. Martin: Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am speaking at the moment.

An hon. Member: It is a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the minister please state his point of order?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, when this debate began I refrained altogether from discussing the merits of this question, but my hon. friend has now stated that the Department of National Health and Welfare has done nothing—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Except send out two officials.

Mr. Martin: —and the house knows and the hon. member knows better than anyone else that department materially assisted in this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member for Prince Albert kindly allow the minister to put his point of order?

Mr. Martin: If the hon. gentleman is going to be allowed to discuss whether or not the government has done anything in this matter I want the opportunity to reply because that is not the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that is not a point of order.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend interrupts more than anyone else in this house and when he is on the spot he can never take it.

The Deputy Chairman: Will both hon. gentlemen kindly resume their seats? I was about to raise the point of order which has been raised by the minister. It is my ruling that it is not within the competence of this committee at this time to discuss whether or not the Department of National Health and Welfare did or did not take certain action in connection with the Saskatchewan river. What this committee is discussing is whether or not the Criminal Code should be amended, and in that connection the situation on the Saskatchewan river certainly comes within the ambit of this discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All of which indicates, Mr. Chairman, how interruptions such as those made by my hon. friend deviate and divert a discussion which comes within the ambit of your authority.

Mr. Martin: You should know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare speaking strictly to the subject matter of this amendment, but apparently we are not going to be able to induce him to rise from his seat to say something definite about this matter which will affect the people of Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have you another chairman over there?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, let me say that we are getting the same interference and the same jeers from the Liberal side of the house as we got a few weeks ago when we were discussing this problem. Have my hon. friends from Saskatchewan who are supporting the government said anything about this matter?

Some hon. Members: Give them a chance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, not one word.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. My hon. friend, perhaps for the benefit of the residents of Prince Albert, stated quite inaccurately that there were jeers on this side of the house. There was not one single jeer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Chairman, one cannot put jeers on the record and we do not broadcast these proceedings, but certainly the sounds we heard were not sounds of approval. Does the Minister of Justice say they were sounds of approval?

An hon. Member: They were sounds of disapproval.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, there is no answer. The people of Prince Albert and Battleford have waited five long months for action since the matter was first brought up. First it was stated that in a very short time a solution would be forthcoming. But this matter—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. My hon. friend knows very well that no one ever said what he is indicating was said and he knows that better than anyone else.

The Deputy Chairman: I think in this case the point of order raised by the minister is very well taken. I myself did not consider that the last remarks of the hon. member for Prince Albert were directed to the Criminal Code. I suggest that the hon. member for Prince Albert bring his remarks under the standing order which states that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. If the hon. member will do that I will do my best to see that he is not interrupted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Returning once more, without interruption, to the amendment, the Minister of Justice states that it does not cover every eventuality which might arise, that it does not cover all the facets and possibilities in connection with pollution. I therefore suggest that the minister, having available the law officers of the crown and with the experience of the international joint commission, should draft an amendment which will cover the situation. My hon. friend from The Battlefords spoke in the most restrained terms when he asked parliament to act on this question. All we ask is that in the industrial development which is commencing in western Canada no corporation in its own interests may use the rivers in western Canada or any part of Canada to the detriment of the welfare of the people as a whole. There is only one way in which that can be enforced and that is under the nuisance section. I have never heard of such a naive and pompous argument as that which the minister endeavoured to advance when he said that clause 163 dealt with religious services. That was one of the most unusual arguments—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege, I would just like to make a correction. What I said was that the clause in question was in that part of the code headed by the terms "disturbing religious services" and that it dealt with the throwing of stench bombs at meetings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That indicates that the minister has not read the section. I will now refer him to the section.

Mr. Garson: Read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The general heading under which section 161 comes is "disturbing religious services". Section 162, which is part of that general section according to my hon. friend, reads as follows:

> Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, loiters or prowls at night upon the property of another person near a dwelling house situated on that property is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Fulton: What about vagrancy?

Mr. Martin: No jeering there.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then section 163 reads as follows:

> Every one other than a peace officer engaged in the discharge of his duty who has in his possession in a public place or who deposits, throws or injects or causes to be deposited, thrown or injected in, into or near any place,
>
> (a) an offensive volatile substance . . . is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Garson: Exactly. Will my hon. friend read subclause (b)? It is the crucial subclause.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are not dealing with the stink bomb. We are dealing with volatile substances. After all, my hon. friend seems to be returning forever to the stink bomb. I am not concerned with that matter. I am concerned about the volatile substances going into the Saskatchewan river. My hon. friend says that amendment might well apply to some other section, that an offence could be created. But then after a vast explanation he says that the government does not intend to accept the amendment I suggested by way of a tentative suggestion so that at least the general purport of the demands of the people in Saskatchewan would be brought before the committee. Speaking for the government the minister has stated that no amendment will be accepted. That simply means that from now on if any corporation continues to dump substances into the Saskatchewan river, places our people's health in jeopardy, makes it impossible for people to use the water of the river that belongs to the people of Canada and is not the property of any corporation, nothing can be done.

We can do no more if he refuses that amendment. We have made our representations. We intend to bring the matter to a vote in order to find out whether or not the people in Saskatchewan are to be placed in the position that they are not to be given some assistance under the criminal law, not with respect to past offences but with respect to future offences, in order to deny the recurrence of this type of thing. We want to know what is the attitude of the government. Certainly alibis, postponements, explanations as to other statutes that might apply but do not, and references to the international joint commission have nothing whatever to do with this question. All of that may be interesting as a recital but it does not meet the problem.

The last time this matter was before the committee the minister said, "Let us just find out the facts and then we will know whether or not an amendment to the Criminal Code should be made." We now have the facts. We now know that one corporation has been pouring three thousand gallons of chemical waste into the river, and that those chemical wastes have rendered the water unusable 300, 400 and 500 miles away; and there is nothing to prevent a repetition. It was in order to punish possible repetitions of this action that this amendment was moved. It is the only way in which the health of the people can be protected under the law as it now is. Indeed, in Prince Albert we have a sanatorium. The minister himself received from Dr. Kirkby of that sanatorium a letter written on March 15 in which he set forth the facts in these words:

Hon. S. Garson,
Department of Justice,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Garson:

Please excuse handwritten letter but have been confined to hospital here for past two months. I am superintendent of Prince Albert sanatorium, a 275-bed institution. The problem of water pollution has been a serious one for our patients. Recently a special filter was installed which was only partially successful.

This pollution question is more than a nuisance. I respectfully request that legislation be placed on our books to prohibit such flagrant disregard of the rights of others by any commercial or other organization.

Respectfully submitted,
R. W. Kirkby, M.D.
Medical Supt.

The only way in which the problem can be met is by making it a crime to do this type of thing. My hon. friend says that we should not make crimes unnecessarily, and I agree; but this is a necessary act. My hon. friend said we should proceed under section 165. Nothing of the kind. Section 165, under the heading "Nuisances", reads as follows:

Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby

(a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or

(b) causes physical injury to any person, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

We cannot establish that today. The medical doctors say it will be two years before we shall know the degree to which those who have gone ahead and used the water will be affected or not affected physically in consequence thereof.

Mr. Martin: Who said that?

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Would he not say that the comfort of the people of Prince Albert was interfered with—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. Garson: —within the definition of public nuisance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right. But again you read these words:

(a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public . . .

Mr. Garson: Yes; comfort of the public.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. My hon. friend has frequently referred to the ejusdem generis rule, that everything is interpreted with reference to the general words preceding it and that that is one of the reasons why counsel gave the opinion that section 165 did not constitute an offence. As I said before, and I repeat it, we cannot establish at the present time that the health is affected of individuals who are using that water; but we know that the Canadian National Railways have found that using this water in its present state is the best means by which to scale the flues of locomotives. If it does that, what must it do to human beings?

Mr. Nicholson: Before the vote is taken I must rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert. The river with the polluted water crosses my constituency. It is true that I have not as many people involved as have the hon. member for The Battlefords and the hon. member for Prince Albert. They both made a very good case and I do not propose to cover the ground which they have already covered. While Cumberland House is not as large as Prince Albert or Battleford, it is an older centre. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will be interested in the problems that are going to affect his department.

The loss of the supply of fish is going to present a health problem for the Indian people at Cumberland House which I think is extremely serious. I was in Prince Albert on January 22 and I want to submit that if parliament could have adjourned for a few days to sit in Prince Albert I feel sure we would have had action before now.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Before you took the chair, a point of order was raised while the hon. member for Prince Albert was speaking. The issue before the house is whether or not a particular amendment to the Criminal Code should be accepted by the government, namely an amendment to deal with the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river. I as Minister of National Health and Welfare decided that it was not desirable to intervene on a purely legal aspect of the debate but I felt that I should reserve my right if there was going to be any discussion on the merits.

The hon. gentleman now speaking is discussing the merits of our handling of this particular pollution, not the merits of the amendment. If he is going to do that I can tell him that I would want to point out that the minister of health in Saskatchewan takes violent exception to what he has just said. If the hon. gentleman is going to discuss whether or not the government of Canada has done its duty towards this particular matter, then we are going to discuss the merits of the question. But the issue before us is whether or not a particular amendment should be made and accepted. That is the issue. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact you have not had the advantage of the discussion that preceded your taking the chair, that hon. members should observe that point of order.

Mr. Coldwell: Before you make your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that what my hon. friend is doing is trying to point out the necessity for this amendment, and in showing that the amendment is necessary surely he has to say something about the conditions now and the effect, without the amendment, upon the people whom he represents in the house. I think my hon. friend is quite within the four corners of the discussion in showing how failure to carry this amendment will adversely affect the constituents whom he represents.

Mr. Martin: We may take it for granted that we are all aware of the seriousness of the situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no sign of it.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says that he does not know about that. It was the Department of National Health and Welfare, in cooperation with the provinces, that was responsible for the improvement that has taken place. What the hon. member is now doing, and in another debate he would be perfectly in order, is seeking to establish the fact that he is interested in the problem, and because others want to keep within the rules of debate we are precluded from indicating that we are as greatly concerned as is the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What they want is action.

Mr. Martin: For that reason the rules of debate should be strictly observed and the merits of the pollution of the North Saskatchewan should not be discussed at this time but whether or not the proposed legal method is the one to deal with the question of pollution generally speaking, and in that regard only with this particular pollution.

The Chairman: Order. I feel that the point of order raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is well taken. On the other hand, this debate has perhaps been somewhat broader than should be allowed under the strict rules of relevancy in committee. I am not going to rule that the hon. member for Mackenzie is entirely out of order but I would ask him to co-operate with the chair in an effort to confine his remarks to the merits of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you. I probably would have been through by now if I had not been interrupted. The Minister of Justice, before you took the chair, Mr. Chairman, took about thirty minutes in indicating why he is going to oppose the amendment before us at the present time, and I think that I should be permitted to indicate that I am going to support it and also to give reasons why I support it.

I submit that the welfare of my Indian friends, whose future is being jeopardized because of the present situation, is a very real problem. As I said, I was in Prince Albert on the 22nd of January. The 22nd of February has passed, the 22nd of March has passed and there is still no legislation on the statute books that will give these people security for the future. If this is not the place to make some provision, then I submit that somewhere along the line the federal government should bring forward legislation that will protect the people because I think it is quite clear that people in Saskatchewan cannot take legal action that will give them the sort of protection they need.

The health of the people of Edmonton is not being affected, and I think it is ridiculous to suggest that the Indian people at Cumberland House should institute legal action against the Canadian Chemical Company, a very wealthy corporation, with a view to convincing the courts of this country that the corporation should discontinue a practice that is going to destroy food of the people of that northern area. When I was in Prince Albert on the 22nd of January I found that you could not drink tea or coffee made from the water. I would not want to take a shower or bath in this polluted water. I think hon. members do not realize what it means to have your water supply cut off so abruptly and for such a long period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: I have here the most recent issue of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix which has just come to me and it contains a story from Prince Albert to the effect that whether or not the water improved the council planned to call a conference of all those affected by the pollution to see what measures could be taken.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: I am not quite sure just what I did say, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin: You are polluting our minds.

Mr. Nicholson: Anyway I am sure that I have the support of hon. members in trying to see that legislation is passed that will afford protection to the people living in these northern regions who are dependent on the water supply from the North Saskatchewan river.

Mr. Tucker: I understand that the Minister of Justice has suggested that this matter is covered already by section 165 of the bill to amend the Criminal Code and that that section has already been dealt with. I would suggest that a reading of section 165 clearly indicates that it does cover this matter because it says:

(1) Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
(a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or
(b) causes physical injury to any person, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

The section goes on to define what is a common nuisance. It reads as follows:

(2) For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
(a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public . . .

I suggest that from a reading of the Alberta public health act, which was cited by the hon. member for The Battlefords, the discharge of this effluent into the river is definitely an unlawful act. My hon. friend said that there was no penalty provided but the penalty is here in the Criminal Code. If under a provincial statute it is an unlawful act which endangers the comfort of the public it becomes a common nuisance, and section 165 says that anybody who commits a common nuisance is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years.

That is one ground upon which it comes within section 165. The only doubt that one could have about whether it would come under this section would arise from the fact that the common nuisance must endanger the lives, safety or health of the public. I do not think any court would have any difficulty whatever in saying that the pollution of river water, which caused people to be unwilling or unable to drink it, does endanger the health of the public where they have to rely upon that water. Certainly, as the minister pointed out, it does endanger the comfort of the public.

There is another way, I suggest, in which that comes within section 165. Some years ago the rural municipality of Cory obtained an injunction against the city of Saskatoon ordering that it should not discharge sewage into the Saskatchewan river. That injunction was a court order, and failure to obey it was an unlawful act. If they continued to disobey the injunction they would come squarely within the terms of section 165 of the act.

Surely if it is a nuisance subject to the obtaining of an injunction to discharge sewage into the river, it certainly would be possible to get an injunction to prevent the discharge of this material into the river, because it would be just as deleterious as the discharge of sewage. I have great respect for the opinion of the hon. member for Prince Albert, but I am sure he must be familiar with the fact that the rural municipality of Cory did obtain such an injunction, and that because of that the city of Saskatoon has had to make arrangements either to build a sewage disposal plant or render itself liable to be proceeded against under the Criminal Code, and the additional liability of contempt of court.

The way the law is at the present time, the actual commission of the nuisance has to be established. Once it is established it is subject to a penalty of two years. I can well understand that when this comes clearly within the "nuisance" clause of the Criminal Code, the Minister of Justice would object to having a clause like this inserted under the broad heading of "disturbing religious services", and taking it from under the heading of "nuisance", where it should be.

Mr. Campbell: How would you put a company in jail for two years?

Mr. Tucker: There is a provision in the Criminal Code where, when a corporation is found guilty of an indictable offence, it can be fined rather than imprisoned. And while I do not carry in my mind the exact amount of the fine, my recollection is that it is very substantial.

Mr. Garson: May I interrupt to point out that the fine is unlimited.

Mr. Tucker: The minister says it is unlimited. I knew a provision of that kind was made.

Mr. Garson: It is clause 623 in this bill.

Mr. Tucker: And there is another provision that where a corporation is guilty of an offence, the officials responsible, as well as the corporation, can be proceeded against. So that I submit the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Albert would inject into the Criminal Code under the broad heading of "disturbing religious services" another matter which would introduce a measure of confusion.

Obviously this matter should be dealt with under "nuisances". I say to the minister that if there is any doubt about this being covered under the "nuisance" clause that doubt should be cleared up. However I do not think there is any doubt in my own mind that it is covered. If there is any doubt, then there should be no question about its being covered; because surely it should be a criminal offence to pollute the waters of a great river like the Saskatchewan so that the people cannot use it for drinking purposes, and so that those unfortunate people in mental hospitals or the provincial hospital at Battleford, who have no means of defending themselves, have to drink water that is practically undrinkable.

That is something that would certainly be a crime; and if there is any doubt about it, it should be made a crime. It is an interference with the health, safety and rights of the public who will use the water of a great river like the Saskatchewan river. I suggest with all deference that if it is not definitely a crime today, then parliament should make it a crime, because there can be no doubt of our competence under the constitution to declare it a crime.

However if it is fully dealt with, as the minister and the law officers of the crown are satisfied, so that action can be taken under the Criminal Code, there should be no need for an amendment. But I repeat that if there is any doubt I would strongly urge the minister to consider an amendment to section 165 to make it very clear that people do not have to go to court and get an injunction before it could be declared a crime under this section. If it is not clearly a crime or an offence under the appropriate section of the Alberta statute—as I think it is—which would bring it under section 165, then I suggest consideration should be given to making it very clear that it is an offence.

I do suggest with all deference that we make crimes many acts that are not as harmful to the public as the pollution of this great river, and the damage it has done to the people who rely upon it for drinking water. If there is any doubt about its being a crime, that doubt should be cleared up without delay or hesitation. However, as I said before, I think it is already covered.

I know the minister has given this matter careful consideration, and he appears to be satisfied that the situation is covered so that the people of Saskatchewan can take action, if this matter is not properly looked after, by bringing it into the court and having the corporation punished. If there is any doubt about their right to take that action, then without question that right should be given to them by parliament. I submit that, with all deference.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, this is the first intimation we have had from the minister or the government that there might be some legislation that would cover this pollution. But what is the position of, let us say, the city council of Prince Albert? In addition to the distress they have suffered, up to March 23 they had to spend something more than $3,000 for the hauling of water. Incidentally they hang black crepe on the doors of the houses to which the water is hauled. Then, the town of Battleford has had a well machine at a charge of $100 a day, and they have had it for some considerable time—I do not know just how long—in an effort to find water.

Apart from the distress they have suffered, will the town of Battleford, that is not in a very good financial position anyway, have to go to the expense of taking action against this company in Edmonton? Or will the federal government, under this act through which it says it has power, take action? Will it be up to the cities to take action, when they might stand the chance of losing, and thereby become liable for additional loss of money? There can be no doubt that a crime has been committed—no doubt about it—that a dastardly crime has been committed against these people.

Mr. Martin: The attorney general of Saskatchewan could do it; there would be no difficulty about that.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: I have a question to ask, in an effort to get some light on the matter.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in spite of some of the lighter exchanges that have taken place across the floor of the house I, for one, would not want to suggest that the Minister of Justice or other hon. members supporting him are not concerned about this problem. I think it is something which warrants our serious consideration. I come from the balmy slopes of the Pacific side where our water certainly will not be polluted by the North Saskatchewan. But even the hon. member who moved this amendment did indicate that he was more concerned about having something adequate done than having the amendment passed in this particular form.

The Minister of Justice made some reference to clause 165 which deals with nuisances, and possibly that may be a more appropriate place in the Criminal Code in which something could be done. But after looking at it carefully I am not convinced it is adequate to deal with the kind of situation that has been described at some considerable length; because it would seem to me, and I have been educated to a certain extent, after listening to the minister in his exposition of some of these clauses, that it is necessary under clause 165, before a matter is a nuisance which is an indictable offence, to prove that the life, safety or health of the public has been endangered.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will continue reading it, he will see that it also includes their comfort.

Mr. Barnett: It is not that; it is in the part which says:

> For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance—

It defines what constitutes a nuisance. Is it not true that in addition to it being a nuisance it has to endanger the life, safety or health of an individual before it is an indictable offence?

Now, I cannot help but contrast the situation of having no effective action under such a section with the situation which exists in respect to the pollution of waters where fisheries are involved, and which are covered under the Fisheries Act. It would be worthwhile to contrast this clause with the section as it is set forth in the Fisheries Act, having to do with a similar offence. Section 33, subsection 2 of the Fisheries Act says:

> No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs . . .

And so on, into the water. Section 61 of the same act prescribes the penalties for committing that offence. The penalty is $20 a day for the first offence and additional penalties if the offence is persisted in of so many dollars per day. It seems to me that the way in which that type of offence is set forth and the manner in which the penalties are prescribed in the Fisheries Act clearly place the onus on the person who may put anything into the waters to establish their prior right to do so before they put anything in.

Not long ago I happened to pick up a publication in which I was interested because it described a very detailed survey of the waters of the Upper Alberni inlet and the river which runs into it, which was made several years ago at a time when it was proposed to establish a pulp mill at the head of that inlet, which would, in the course of its normal operation, discharge certain chemicals into those waters. While what the minister says with regard to the co-operation that many corporations might be willing to give may be true, at the same time we cannot help but feel the fact that what was set forth clearly in the Fisheries Act as a straightforward statement, and penalties are provided for putting chemicals into those waters, may have resulted in that particular firm being a little more cautious in building their plant and dumping the chemicals into the water, and then discovering afterwards that damage was caused.

It seems to me that in dealing with this general problem the same principle should be established in regard to the pollution of waters that are going to be used by human beings. The law should be so worded that the onus would be upon the chemical company to establish before they started constructing their plant or putting the discharges into the water that no harmful result would follow. It struck me that the illustration of what happened in the establishment of this pulp mill was in great contrast to the situation that is being discussed at the present time, where in fact the door was being locked after the horse had been stolen, or where it was necessary, after pollution had started, to go through that careful analysis by the scientists and officials described by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to establish just what was happening. In the one case all of these things were established long before the foundation of the plant was put in. In this case nothing definite was known about it until the pollution occurred miles down the river.

Perhaps there is some other body that could do something. The minister referred to a board. I understood him to say that it was a voluntary and co-operative organization. Perhaps it could conduct the necessary scientific surveys and so on.

Nevertheless, I feel that if in the Criminal Code—if that is the place for it—or in some other act it could be clearly established that the onus is on the persons who contemplate putting chemicals or other substances in the water to show that no possible danger could arise from their action before they start to do so rather than after, and not have the onus placed upon, as the hon. member for The Battlefords said, the council of a city to take court action or seek an injunction or launch a suit for damages and pay the costs. We would thus accomplish the objective we have in mind. I am inclined to think that if clause 165 were given a proper going over with the situation that may exist in mind the principle which is set forth in the Fisheries Act could be incorporated in a clause in the Criminal Code to cover the situation.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Tucker: Before the question is put I should like to have the minister give an opinion in regard to what I put before him. The public health act of the province of Alberta, which of course is primarily interested in the matter, sets up a provincial board to deal with this very question of watching over the supply of water from springs, wells, ponds, lakes, streams and rivers used as a public water supply in the province of Alberta. It sets up a board to supervise that sort of thing, and if there are any complaints about the pollution of any stream the provincial board is empowered to inquire into the matter and it may make a report to the minister as to what remedial measures are required in respect to the matter.

Where the provincial board recommends a remedy, then an application may be made to a judge of the supreme court by any person interested for an order to abate the nuisance. It seems to me quite clear that that is the provision made in regard to interfering with the rights of people within the province of Alberta. They have laid down how the matter should be dealt with once an order is made by the judge in regard to the matter, that this pollution of the river shall cease, based upon the fact of preserving the purity of the water supply. Then, I suggest to the minister, a person who continued to pollute the water after that would be guilty of a common nuisance. A common nuisance is described as a person who does an unlawful act, and if an injunction had been obtained from a judge that would be an unlawful act which would endanger the comfort of the public.

Then it goes on to say that anyone who commits a nuisance and who does endanger the health of the public—any court would hold that interfering with the purity of the drinking water would endanger the public—would be guilty of this offence. I believe that would be one method of putting the problem clearly within the terms of section 165. Then, without getting an order from the court in Alberta, it seems to me all that would be necessary to prove a charge under section 165 would be that a common nuisance had been committed. In order to prove that it would only be necessary to prove that a person had committed an act which endangered the comfort of the public. If it was proven thereby that that was a nuisance, all that would be necessary then would be to show that it endangered the safety or health of the public.

I do not think any court would have any difficulty in finding that an act which made the waters of a river upon which thousands of people depend for their drinking water supply unfit for use for that purpose had endangered the health of the public. If the minister, who has carefully considered this matter in consultation with his officers, and I have every confidence in the law officers of the dominion government, is satisfied that this situation is covered by section 165, then I submit no amendment is necessary. On the other hand I would, of course, feel that if he is in any doubt about the matter the section should be allowed to stand so the problem can be investigated. It is not a matter about which there should be any doubt. If the minister is ready to say he is satisfied the offence is covered, then so far as I am concerned I do not see any reason for the amendment.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Tucker: I want an answer to my question. I believe the minister can tell us whether he feels the matter is covered or is not covered.

Mr. Garson: In addition to the cases which the hon. member for Rosthern has cited, Mr. Chairman, which had to do with the health board in Alberta making certain orders, I find that regulation 1007 of the regulations restricting nuisances and general sanitation in Alberta provides:

> The deposit of any dead animal, manure, excreta, refuse, garbage, liquid waste or other filth upon, on, or into any street, ditch, highway, byway, wharf, dock, lake, pond, river, stream, harbour, water, well or sewer or on to any land, except with the written consent of the local board of health or the provincial board of health, shall be deemed a nuisance.

I would imagine that the contravention of that would be an unlawful act within the meaning of the Criminal Code.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived: Yeas, 25; nays, 58.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 165—Common nuisance.

Mr. Campbell: The minister suggested that perhaps clause 165 would be a better clause to amend than clause 163, Mr. Chairman. I, therefore, move that:

Subclause (2) be renumbered as (3) and that the following be inserted as subclause (2):

(2) Every one who, by himself, his agent or employee, places or discharges, or causes to be placed or discharged or suffers to be placed or discharged, in, upon or near, springs, lakes, streams or rivers, any industrial waste or any other polluting material of any kind whatsoever, which either by itself or in connection with other matter may corrupt or impair the quality of the water thereof in another province or render such water in such other province unfit for accustomed or ordinary use is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years, or a fine of not less than two thousand dollars.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Coldwell: No, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is still on his feet and wants to speak. It is ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday, Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this debate. When it is completed there will be a supply motion presented, and when it is carried we shall call whatever departments will be agreed upon in the meantime and then take public works.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister would care to say what the plan is now as to which group of the remaining clauses will be taken first, group 4 or group 5?

Mr. Garson: The clauses, Mr. Speaker, will be group 4 dealing with treason, etc.

Mr. Knowles: That is after we complete clause 165.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 5, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Fifth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I desire to table copies, in English and in French, of the white paper in connection with the budget 1954-55.

This procedure of tabling the white paper on the day before the budget was adopted two years ago and has, I believe, proved useful to hon. members. I would suggest, if it meets with the approval of the house, and I so move, that it be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings so that hon. members will have an opportunity to study it before I deliver the budget speech tomorrow evening.

I would also ask the consent of the house to have it printed in tomorrow's Hansard together with the budget speech.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PROTECTION FROM POSSIBLE DANGER OF CONTAMINATION

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): On March 30, at page 3470 of Hansard, the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) asked the following question:

What steps are being taken to protect the Canadian people from possible dangers of contamination by radioactive materials which might reach Canada from the explosion of bombs in the Pacific?

In reply to the hon. member's question, I may say that so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned the defence research board has for several years past been following the matter of surface radioactivity at various places across Canada and particularly during periods following the explosion of atomic or hydrogen bombs. The greatest effects observed to date by the board have been very much below the point which could be considered the slightest hazard to human health. I might add that the radioactivity from the explosion of March 1 in the Pacific, of course in so far as this country was concerned, was found to be much less than the slight effects observed in previous years from explosions in Nevada.

From what I have said it will be obvious, I think, that up to the present time there has been no occasion in Canada when any danger of contamination has existed following atomic or hydrogen bomb explosions. The matter is of course under continuous observation and examination and will continue to be closely studied by the defence research board.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 418, respecting the Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Cannon.

QUESTIONS

EXPENDITURES ON DRUGS, MEDICINES, ETC.

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the average percentage of income spent by all Canadians on medical expenses under each of the following headings: (a) on items allowed as deductible under the Income Tax Act; (b) on drugs, medicines, etc.; (c) on spectacles, hearing aids, and all other medical items not allowed as deductible under the Income Tax Act?
2. What is the average percentage of income spent on (a), (b), and (c) as set out in the above question, by Canadians in each of the following gross income brackets: (i) $2,000 per year or less; (ii) $2,001 to $3,000 per year; (iii) $3,001 to $5,000 per year; (iv) $5,001 to $10,000 per year; (v) $10,001 to $15,000 per year; (vi) over $15,000 per year?

Mr. McCann:

1 and 2. No statistical information available.

FOREIGN CREWS IN CANADIAN PORTS—MEDICAL BENEFITS

Mr. Valois:

1. What medical benefits are provided for crew members of foreign vessels which arrive at Canadian ports and pay sick mariners dues?
2. Is there any restriction on the type of illness treated?

Mr. Robertson:

1 and 2. Well-equipped and modern sick mariners clinics are operated by the Department of National Health and Welfare at Sydney, Halifax, Saint John, N.B., Quebec,

Montreal and Vancouver, and plans are underway for a new clinic at Victoria. These clinics are conveniently located at or near the dockside so that out-patient treatment can be carried out with as little delay as possible. In-patients are treated in government or private hospitals with which the sick mariners service of the department has contract arrangements. Medical facilities are also available at the majority of smaller ports where treatment is provided by part-time port physicians and in the local hospitals. Every effort is made to maintain a high professional standard and the services of the most eminent consultants are obtained when needed. Treatment is provided for every condition, except permanent insanity, for such periods as are necessary up to a maximum of one year. The treatment benefits include medical and surgical care and hospitalization, X-ray, nursing, physiotherapy and drugs.

P.F.R.A. EXPENDITURES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What expenditures have been made by P.F.R.A. in each of the prairie provinces, month by month, since the 1st of January 1953?

Mr. McCubbin:

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
January, 1953	$ 10,465.73	$126,900.82	$ 32,872.98
February	3,851.20	128,101.79	15,897.31
March	1,298.96	97,450.66	6,538.69
April	9,943.54	428,643.22	29,438.13
May	20,069.13	254,818.77	40,890.99
June	22,471.62	248,237.01	25,552.69
July	32,216.30	288,570.51	16,306.95
August	55,323.16	239,518.46	24,769.93
September	85,567.28	377,136.41	60,102.55
October	18,695.22	370,103.47	40,383.48
November	36,767.94	260,200.57	29,813.95
December	58,974.24	417,350.92	47,820.26
January, 1954	5,365.61	204,461.09	21,548.38
February	8,063.92	169,636.16	15,049.88

FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS, 1944-53

Mr. Balcom:

What was the total number of federal civil service employees as at March 31, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

March 31, 1944	112,658
March 31, 1945	115,908
March 31, 1946	120,557
March 31, 1947	125,337
March 31, 1948	118,370
March 31, 1949	123,924
March 31, 1950	127,196
March 31, 1951	124,580
March 31, 1952	131,646
March 31, 1953	131,164

FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS, MARCH 31, 1951-52

Mr. Balcom:

What was the number of civil servants as at March 31, 1951 and March 31, 1952, in each of the following departments: (a) labour; (b) post office; (c) veterans affairs; (d) national health and welfare; (e) defence production?

[Mr. Robertson.]

Mr. Dickey:

Department	March 31, 1951	March 31, 1952
Labour	7,686	7,486
Post office	19,478	19,510
Veterans affairs	14,155	13,822
National health and welfare	2,954	3,239
Defence production	—	1,488

Note: The above include only persons classified as "temporary" or "permanent", according to the civil service regulations. Employees whose work is of a casual nature are not included.

IMMIGRANTS—MEDICAL FACILITIES

Mr. Valois:

Are any facilities provided by the government for the medical care and treatment of people from other lands who become ill while en route to Canada and who require treatment on arrival?

Mr. Robertson:

The Department of National Health and Welfare provides both out-patient and in-patient hospital facilities at the larger ocean ports, including Halifax, Quebec, and Saint John. In addition, medical facilities are available at Sydney, Dorval airport, Gander airport and Vancouver. At Halifax and Saint John there are comfortable and well-equipped immigration hospitals at the dockside where a high professional standard is maintained. The department also provides treatment for indigent immigrants who become ill while crossing Canada en route to their destination, or while being accommodated awaiting placement.

GRAIN STORAGE—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Bryson:

1. How much elevator space was there in each of the three prairie provinces on July 31, 1953?

2. How much wheat was estimated to be held on farms in each of the three prairie provinces on July 31, 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Kind of licence	Manitoba bu.	Saskatchewan bu.	Alberta bu.
Public country elevator	41,046,600	161,778,000	107,068,850
Private country elevator	88,000	29,000	232,500
Mill elevator	1,775,000	4,916,500	3,994,000
Private terminal elevator	3,145,500	—	1,715,000
Public terminal elevator	—	11,000,000	6,100,000
Semi-public terminal elevator	3,500,000	—	—
Special annexes	160,000	1,893,410	235,500
Total licensed storage	49,715,100	179,616,910	119,345,850
Unlicensed storage	245,500	765,000	254,000
Grand total	49,960,600	180,381,910	110,599,850

2. Province	bushels
Manitoba	4,000,000
Saskatchewan	50,000,000
Alberta	23,000,000
Total	77,000,000

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. Boisvert:

What was the contribution of the federal government to the unemployment insurance fund since the adoption of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Gregg: From July 1, 1941 to February 28, 1954, $245,782,895.16.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING PLAN—TRAINEES FROM OUTSIDE CANADA

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many persons from countries other than Canada received training in Canada, during world war II, under the British commonwealth air training plan?

2. From what countries did such persons come, and how many in each case?

3. What was the total cost to Canada for the training of such persons, including transportation, maintenance or any other expenses paid by Canada?

Mr. Blanchette: I wish to advise the house that the answer to this same question was given on March 9, 1953, as reported at page 2730 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Question No. 36, answered.

FISHERIES EXPENDITURES, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

What money expenditures have been made by all services in the Department of Fisheries in Nova Scotia, for the fiscal year 1952-53?

Mr. Sinclair:

The total expenditures by all departments of fisheries in Nova Scotia for the year 1952-53 are as follows:

Information and educational service	$ 6,745.75
Marketing and economics service	12,343.97
Fishing bounty	86,263.40
Field services administration	55,412.77
Protection branch	592,403.29
Inspection branch	223,144.01
Fish culture and development branch	265,656.66
Destruction of harbour and gray seals	5,910.00
Fisheries research board	230,705.99
Educational work among fishermen	28,161.40
Fisheries prices support board	622.15
Assistance in construction of vessels	101,264.05
Assistance in construction of bait freezing and storage facilities	40,000.00
Total	$1,648,633.44

Questions

APPLICATIONS FOR CLOSING OF RAILWAY STATIONS

Mr. Pommer:

1. How many applications have been made in the calendar year 1953 and to March 15, 1954, by the railways to the board of transport commissioners for Canada, to close stations in Manitoba?
2. How many applications were made by the Canadian National Railways?
3. How many applications were made by the Canadian Pacific Railway?
4. What are the names of the stations in Manitoba for which applications to close have been approved in the year 1953 and to March 15, 1954?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. No applications were received in the calendar year 1953 and to March 15, 1954 to close stations. However, seven applications were received during this period to replace station agent with caretaker.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Nil.

4. No applications were approved to close stations but the applications to replace station agent with caretaker were approved regarding following stations:

Margaret, Manitoba
Shellmouth, Manitoba
Dugald, Manitoba
Rosebank, Manitoba

During this period one application to replace station agent with caretaker was dismissed and two similar applications are under consideration at the present time.

LIQUOR IMPORTS, 1953

Mr. Hansell:

1. What was the total quantity of the following spirituous liquors imported into Canada during 1953: whisky, brandy, rum and gin?
2. From what countries was this liquor imported, and how much from each?
3. What was the total amount of duty and excise collected on these imports?

Mr. Dickey:

1 and 2. Canadian imports by countries year 1953.

Country	Whisky Proof Gal.	Brandy Proof Gal.	Rum Proof Gal.	Gin Proof Gal.
United Kingdom	927,348	1,056	386,014	90,534
Union of South Africa	..	91,688	..	..
British Guiana	..	..	321,003	..
Barbados	..	..	83,953	..
Jamaica	..	..	137,200	..
Trinidad	..	..	56,553	..
Leeward and Windward Is.	..	..	1,134	..
Malta	..	3,086	..	..
Australia	46	59,371	10,181	..
Cuba	..	..	9,249	..
France	..	137,247	523	..
Greece	..	713	..	..
Italy	..	343	..	..
Netherlands	..	..	..	6,369
Israel	..	459	..	..
Portugal	..	18,168	..	..
Spain	..	2,146	..	..
Puerto Rico	..	..	39,974	..
Yugoslavia	..	222	..	..
Ireland	21	..	..	..
United States	1,389,873	8,218	..	78
Totals	2,317,288	322,717	1,045,784	96,981

3. Customs duty collected was as follows:—

Whisky	$29,660,897
Brandy	3,726,738
Rum	13,146,918
Gin	1,215,335
Total	$47,749,888

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REPRESENTATIVES ABROAD

Mr. Hansell:

In what countries does Canada maintain ambassadors or other representatives, and what is the classification of these?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, the information requested is contained in a booklet, "Canadian Representatives and Representatives of other countries in Canada", of which I should like to table two copies. I shall be glad to forward a copy of this publication to my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT—POOL TURNOVER AND PAYMENTS

Mr. Harkness:

1. How many bushels of each grade of wheat were turned over from the 1952-53 pool to the 1953-54 pool, and at what price for each grade?
2. What was the total amount of money paid by the 1953-54 pool to the 1952-53 pool?
3. From what source, or sources, were these funds secured?
4. What rate of interest is being paid on this money?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

SUBSIDIZED TRANSPORTATION SERVICES

Mr. Kickham:

1. What is the number of subsidized transportation services in Canada at the present time, both freight and passenger services?
2. What is the name and location of such transportation services and the amount of subsidy paid to each per annum?

Mr. Chevrier: Return tabled.

COLOMBO AND UN TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PLANS —TRAINEES FROM OUTSIDE CANADA

Mr. Knowles:

1. Since the end of world war II, how many persons from countries other than Canada have received training in Canada under the provisions of the Colombo plan, the United Nations technical assistance program, or any other plan designed to assist in the development of underdeveloped countries?
2. From what countries have such persons come, how many in each case, and how many in each year since the end of world war II?
3. What is the total amount spent to date for the training of such persons, including transportation, maintenance or any other costs met by Canada?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

REVISION TO CONFORM WITH DECENNIAL REVISION OF BANK ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for a revision of the Quebec Savings Banks Act in conformity with the decennial revision of the Bank Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMPENSATION TO CANADIAN NATIONALS BY COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Have any steps been taken by the Canadian government to place before the government at Peking appropriate claims for redress for compensation in respect of undue hardships and loss of property suffered by missionaries and members of religious orders, as well as other Canadians, since the communist government assumed power on the Chinese mainland?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall take note of the hon. member's question and make inquiries. I could give an immediate answer, but I would wish to be absolutely sure that my answer will be accurate.

Mr. Drew: I might add, since the Prime Minister is taking this as a notice, that I have raised the question because I understand other representations are being made with regard to the fact that the Peking government will be for the first time meeting a number of other governments during the present month.

TRADE

PROSPECTIVE AGREEMENTS WITH SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), I should like to ask his parliamentary assistant a question in the light of the report that a Canadian trade mission is being sent to Spain and Portugal with a view to negotiating bilateral trade pacts with those countries. What instructions are being given to the Canadian trade mission with respect to finding an export market in those countries for Canadian wheat, codfish and other products?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister, I shall take the question as notice, and try to have an answer for the hon. member.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POSTAL SERVICE

DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERIES, TRURO, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. Purdy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. This question is based on the fact that, since the inauguration of the 40-hour week, people in certain parts of the hub of Nova Scotia are receiving their mail five hours later than usual. The question is this; Will the Postmaster General take steps to see that the mail service given to residents in that area served by the street delivery system at the town of Truro, which is the hub of Nova Scotia, be at least as good as it was before the increase in the postal rates.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into that matter.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REPORTED TEST EVACUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of Saturday's press report that civil defence authorities are planning a test evacuation of one minimum-sized Canadian city—possibly Regina—could the minister tell the house whether these reports are correct and, if so, what city is being considered, and what steps have been taken in the planning of such a test?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would call the hon. member's attention to my statement of Friday last on this matter. I believe if he will kindly do so he will see that my reply must be that no such decision has been taken in the particular noted in the question.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SLEEPING CAR SERVICE, SAINT JOHN-HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position to make a statement regarding the rumoured intention of the Canadian National Railways to discontinue their overnight sleeping car service between Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. The management of the railways advise as follows:

The company has found it necessary to re-examine the economy of local passenger trains generally. In this particular case, the overnight sleeping car service between Saint John and Halifax necessitates the running of an additional train between Truro and Moncton, and the earnings on that service have not been remunerative. The average utilization of the sleeping car is 12 passengers per day and that occupancy falls far short of meeting operating costs.

As a measure of economy, in view of continuing lack of patronage, the train between Truro and Moncton is being discontinued and accordingly the sleeping car service between Saint John and Halifax will also be taken off.

Mr. Bell: May I ask, as a supplementary question, whether this matter was considered in committee?

Mr. Fulton: We did not know about it.

Mr. Chevrier: So far as I can remember, although I note that the press clipping my hon. friend sent me stated that it would be taken up, while I was there most of the time there was no question asked along these lines.

Mr. Fulton: We had no notice of it in committee.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR LOW INTEREST LOANS ON FARM-STORED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), or, in his absence, the parliamentary assistant. Has the government received a request from the government of Manitoba that low-interest loans be made to farmers on farm-stored grain? Does the government intend to reconsider its attitude against loans of this nature?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): The hon. member was good enough to send notice of his question to the minister's office. In the minister's absence I would tell the hon. member that I will bring the question to the minister's attention, and he will deal with it at a later date.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 165—Common nuisance.

The Deputy Chairman: On Friday evening the committee was considering clause 165, and the amendment of the hon. member for The Battlefords. I would point out that if hon. members wish to check the wording of the amendment they will find it at page 3644 of Hansard.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, in discussing the amendment to the Criminal Code which was proposed by the hon. member for Prince Albert on Friday evening, it seemed to me that the Minister of Justice showed some willingness to co-operate in the matter, and to try to find some method of handling this whole question of pollution. In his criticism of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Prince Albert, the minister said:

The Deputy Chairman: I would suggest that the hon. member for The Battlefords might perhaps wait for a moment until there is enough silence in the house for the Chair to hear what he is saying.

Mr. Campbell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that in the minister's criticism of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert on Friday night the minister said, as reported at page 3631 of Hansard:

> . . . if my hon. friend adopts a broad enough wording to really provide a solution to this problem, and we put such broad wording into the Criminal Code, which has to have general application to the Dominion of Canada from coast to coast, then I wonder what would be the position of most of the municipalities and a large number of the industries, for example, on the Ottawa river and the St. Lawrence river system under this section which my hon. friend is proposing to move.

Later on, at page 3632, the minister had this to say:

> I am trying to confine my remarks to the western problem we are discussing. I think the hon. member for The Battlefords is quite right in this, that if the solution which we provide for the North and South Saskatchewan rivers were to take the form of an amendment to the Criminal Code it would be a solution which would automatically have to be applied to all the other rivers in Canada. And, in judging what we should do in that regard, we must keep that point in mind.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I did make the suggestion during the course of the minister's remarks that we should make the act applicable to all of Canada. I realize the difficulties we would be up against if the act were amended in the way suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert. I fully realize that there are no doubt thousands of industries all over Canada which are now polluting the waters of our beautiful rivers, and for that reason the amendment has been worded so that the act would apply only to interprovincial rivers. To clarify that point I wish to read the amendment again. My suggestion was that the clauses be renumbered and a new clause be inserted reading as follows:

> Every one who, by himself, his agent or employee, places or discharges, or causes to be placed or discharged, or suffers to be placed or discharged, in, upon or near, springs, lakes, streams or rivers, any industrial waste or any other polluting material of any kind whatsoever, which either by itself or in connection with other matter may corrupt or impair the quality of the water thereof in another province or render such water in such other province unfit for accustomed or ordinary use is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years, or a fine of not less than $2,000.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, would overcome the objection raised by the Minister of Justice who, later in his remarks, as reported at page 3631 of Hansard, had this to say:

> But what I do suggest is this, that when my hon. friend says there is no offence in Bill No. 7 which covers this act, I would refer him to clause 165 which provides:
>
> "Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
>
> (a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or
>
> (b) causes physical injury to any person
>
> is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years".

The minister continues:

> "For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
>
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or"

The hon. member for Prince Albert then asked:

> What is the unlawful act, or what is the legal duty?

The minister replied:

> The unlawful act, among other things, would be the breach of the statute which the hon. member for The Battlefords read a moment ago—by discharging the effluent into the river, in contravention of a statute of the province of Alberta or regulations passed thereunder. That would be an unlawful act beyond question, if we did not go on and deal with other aspects of the crime of a common nuisance and indicate that anything which was done in contravention of the public interest might, in itself, apart from being in contravention of the statute be regarded as an unlawful act.

The minister then went on the deal with another matter and it seemed to me that the committee was left up in the air as regards this. Apparently the minister was trying to adduce the argument that section 165 did give protection and did provide that it would be an unlawful act to endanger the lives, safety, property or comfort of the public, and the implied suggestion of the minister, as I took it, was that action could be taken under this section. However, he did not clarify his statement, nor did he make a positive statement that under section 165 of the Criminal Code as it now stands it would be an unlawful act to pollute the waters of the Saskatchewan river.

Later in the debate the hon. member for Rosthern, dealing with clause 165, had this to say, as reported at page 3641 of Hansard:

> Obviously this matter should be dealt with under "nuisances". I say to the minister that if there is any doubt about this being covered under the "nuisance" clause that doubt should be cleared up. However, I do not think there is any doubt in my own mind that it is covered. If there is any doubt, then there should be no question about its being covered; because surely it should be a criminal offence to pollute the waters of a great river like the Saskatchewan so that the people cannot use it for drinking purposes, and so that those unfortunate people in mental hospitals or the provincial hospital at Battleford, who have no means of defending themselves, have to drink water that is practically undrinkable.
>
> That is something that would certainly be a crime; and if there is any doubt about it, it should be made a crime. It is an interference with the health, safety and rights of the public who will use the water of a great river like the Saskatchewan river. I suggest with all deference that if it is not definitely a crime today, then parliament should make it a crime, because there can be no doubt of our competence under the constitution to declare it a crime.
>
> However if it is fully dealt with, as the minister and the law officers of the crown are satisfied, so that action can be taken under the Criminal Code, there should be no need for an amendment. But I repeat that if there is any doubt I would strongly urge the minister to consider an amendment to section 165 to make it very clear that people do not have to go to court and get an injunction before it could be declared a crime under this section. If it is not clearly a crime or an offence under the appropriate section of the Alberta statute—as I think it is—which would bring it under section 165, then I suggest consideration should be given to making it very clear that it is an offence.

Later in the debate, as reported at page 3643, the hon. member for Rosthern said:

> Before the question is put I should like to have the minister give an opinion in regard to what I put before him.

Again, in the next column, the hon. member for Rosthern stated that he wanted an answer to his question. That question was as to whether section 165 was effective as it stood, and I do not believe the Minister of Justice answered that question.

I agree with the hon. member for Rosthern that this matter should be made crystal clear in the Criminal Code. The mere fact that the Canadian Chemical Company was willing to take a chance that this legislation could not be used against it, and the fact that the counsel for the city of Prince Albert, if my information is correct, did not consider that they could take action under the code as it is, would indicate some doubt as to its effectiveness. I should like the minister to make a statement now and give this house a positive assurance that section 165 as it now stands makes it an offence to pollute the waters of this river.

If a man robs a bank there is no question about the Criminal Code being competent to put him in jail for a long period of time, and what we want in the Criminal Code is that when any industry robs people of their drinking water the act should be made crystal clear and state that such an act is an offence.

There is one question I want to ask the minister. Have there been any prosecutions under this act and, if so, how many have been successful? Was the act written with any idea whatsoever that at any time in the future it should have the power to deal with the pollution of the rivers?

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Garson: If there are any other members who would like to take part in the debate, I should be glad to keep my seat until they have finished so that I can cover at one time all the questions which are raised. Otherwise I can go on now.

Mr. Campbell: There is one other matter which I should like to mention, if the minister would rather answer the questions later on. The minister spoke about what was being done by the international joint commission. I think he mentioned that the solution might be to set up some kind of board that would have similar powers. Another suggestion he made was that the prairie waters control board might be given further powers and additional scientific members who would have knowledge of the particular problem. I think there is a good deal of merit in that suggestion. I do not know who the member of the government is on the board representing the Dominion of Canada but I think that the white fathers' representative here might consider seriously calling this board together or calling the representatives of the provincial governments together—perhaps the western provincial governments only—to discuss this problem and to see whether they cannot work out some suitable solution. I think this is a worth-while idea. I do not want to develop it further.

However, there was one further thing I wanted to say and it is this. The people of Prince Albert wrote to a number of the members of the House of Commons and to the ministers asking for their support in getting this matter cleared up. One of the members to whom the letter was written was the hon. member for Meadow Lake. The town council of Battleford wrote to the hon. member for Meadow Lake and they asked him to support me in my efforts to have something done here in Ottawa. I spoke to the hon. member for Meadow Lake a few days ago, told him that I would be raising this matter and that I hoped he would give me some help.

By the way, I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Rosthern for the contribution that he made the other evening. I know that the people back home will be glad that he made that contribution. Incidentally, I want to say this before I put this letter on the record. If the minister can satisfy me that this section 165 will do what we want it to do, namely give our people protection, then I would be satisfied to withdraw the amendment. Or if the minister will agree to make it crystal clear in the section that the section will cover the pollution of any interprovincial river, I would be quite happy. As I said the other evening, I do not want to try to change these laws in order to make them effective. That is the business of the minister and his department. As I said when I started, he showed some willingness, I thought on Friday, to co-operate in this matter. I am perfectly willing to co-operate if the government will bring in an amendment to this section or will make it crystal clear that this section will give our people protection.

Another question that I intended to ask but did not is this. Could the city of Prince Albert take out an injunction against this company if it started to pollute the river again? The minister can take that question as notice. I now want to put this letter on the record. It is written by the hon. member for Meadow Lake to Mr. L. Pleasance, town clerk, Battleford, Saskatchewan, is dated February 8, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Pleasance:

Thank you for your letter of February 3 received this morning. I wish to thank your council also for bringing this matter to my attention. As a matter of fact legislation is already in effect to prevent the dumping of wastes in the rivers of Canada.

I do not know where he gets that. The letter continues:

This is federal legislation to protect the fisheries of the country, but in all cases action concerning it is taken by the provincial governments concerned. This has been the case since natural resources were returned to the provinces some years ago and they have full jurisdiction over any waters or resources within their provincial boundaries. This being the case and elimination of the trouble the desired result, there is no more point in Mr. Campbell introducing a resolution or bill in this house than there would be for some private member to introduce one in Washington, London or Cape Town, except for its political value.

It is obvious from your letter that neither you nor your council were aware that the federal government had no jurisdiction in this matter and that it was the sole prerogative of the province or provinces concerned. You are in touch with government matters much more closely than the ordinary citizen who likely will know even less of such matter. It would appear that Mr. Campbell is counting very largely on this situation in bringing in his proposed resolution to convey the impression through his motion in the house, that in some way the federal government is not living up to its responsibilities, or just declines to do anything about this situation. The waters of the Saskatchewan river within that province are the sole responsibility of the government at Regina. The federal government has no more jurisdiction in this matter than your town council, and the debating of any resolution concerning its pollution in the House of Commons is of no more material help than such a debate would be in your council.

I cannot say that such a debate in the house would not be helpful to Mr. Campbell's party, especially in view of the fact that so few people are properly informed as to where responsibility lies. The provincial member for The Battlefords could well bring in a bill of this kind in the coming legislature and he should be vigorously supported by the provincial member for Prince Albert. This, of course, may not be quite so desirable from a political standpoint, but could be very helpful in a material way.

To look all the facts of this matter squarely in the face, the Saskatchewan government is not exactly in the driver's seat. The pollution is occurring in Alberta and any directives to the plants, remedying the trouble, must necessarily be issued by the government of that province. Alberta is particularly interested in attracting industries to it at this time. It does not want to put any obstacles in the way of industries locating there. The pollution in question is not affecting any sizeable communities in Alberta and when the decision has to be reached between having happy Alberta industries or unhappy critics in Saskatchewan, they choose the former and let Saskatchewan howl to high heaven. This makes it all the more a matter for negotiation and at the top level, between the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Alberta could stop this pollution in five minutes, if it so wished. All they have to do is tell the plant to close down until such time as they have proper disposal facilities. The adjacent province of British Columbia, which has fifty times the waste dumped in its rivers, has to do something about this situation within its border, because the rivers flow mostly in their province from beginning to end and affect large communities all the way down to the sea. The moment objectionable pollution occurs in that province, the offending plant is closed down forthwith, until they provide adequate settling pools or other purifying facilities before the wastes are dumped into the river. Industries know this in that province and they provide the facilities before they start operations.

In the light of these facts Mr. Campbell's political zeal in these circumstances is quite understandable.

I will be pleased to contribute my two cents' worth to the debate as you suggest, whenever it occurs,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Inflation.

Mr. Campbell: The letter continues:

—but I do not think your salvation lies in this direction. I will be in Saskatchewan later this week, but I do not think the debate will occur for some time yet and I will be pleased to take part in it. Certainly I can speak with some authority as to the quality, smell and taste of the water. Connected with the oil business as I was for some years, I have had many inadvertent gulps of everything from kerosene to diesel fuel. I can emphatically say that I prefer them decidedly. I have never tasted anything more horrible than what has been distributed in your area as water.

In the absence of immediate relief from your troubles, I would suggest that you move your whole community to the pure air and sparkling water of the Meadow Lake riding. There you will be in the tremendous watershed of the Churchill, whose unfathomed waters defy pollution. From our own selfish standpoint we would be pleased indeed to have our population augmented by such good people as yourselves.

With kindest personal regards to you and your town council, I am,

Yours sincerely,

John H. Harrison,
Member for Meadow Lake.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I think you will agree that I have been most restrained so far in this debate, but this is a question in which I have been interested for many years and I wish to say a few words on the amendment. I was rather surprised to hear the letter just read by the hon. member for The Battlefords, and having heard it I would judge that the hon. member for Meadow Lake rather imputed motives to the hon. member for The Battlefords. If there is one member in this house who can be considered as taking a non-partisan view when he is dealing with matters affecting the people of his whole constituency, regardless of their party interests, I think it is the hon. member for The Battlefords. Strangely enough, I have just been reading the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix, and apparently the people of The Battlefords have an entirely different opinion. In order to correct any false impression that may be created by the most unfortunate and ungentlemanly letter that has just been read, I should like to quote briefly from an issue of the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix of recent date. The heading of the article is "Back Efforts to Put Stop to Pollution". The article reads as follows:

Efforts of Max Campbell, M.P. for The Battlefords, to have the federal government take action to halt pollution of the North Saskatchewan river, received support from three different sources here in the last few days.

Hall Clink, president of the local Liberal executive, announced Monday that a letter had been airmailed to Hon. Paul Martin, minister of health, urging immediate government action. A. J. Bater, former Liberal M.P. for The Battlefords, has also taken up the cudgels on behalf of people of Battleford.

From his home at Baljennie, Mr. Bater informed the Star-Phoenix by telephone that he was also supporting the move for federal action and was writing to Ottawa to this effect. He described the situation as "deplorable" and said that a number of his neighbours, who derive their water supply from the river, were also affected.

The Battleford board of trade wired Mr. Campbell at the week end that they were supporting him in his fight for federal action and as a token of gratitude for his efforts on behalf of this town, had named him honorary president of the board.

The editorial goes on to commend Mr. Campbell, and I am quite sure that everyone will agree that the letter written by the member for Meadow Lake to the town of Battleford was entirely uncalled for and most unfair. Having got that off my chest, I want to say a few words on this subject, and I am particularly pleased to see that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is listening closely.

Mr. Martin: I was going to point out, now that the hon. gentleman has had his opportunity to commend the hon. member for The Battlefords, that I hope he will not fail to recall the ruling made by you last Friday, Mr. Chairman, namely, we are not discussing whether or not the government of Canada has done its duty in this matter but whether or not a particular amendment is to be rejected or accepted. Thus far I am sure I would have strong grounds for taking part in this debate and defending the position that we have taken, but I would hope that the hon. member, having had the opportunity to commend his colleague, will, with the rest of us, stay in order.

Mr. Herridge: I can assure the minister that my commendation is a purely spontaneous movement, you might say. I am speaking to the amendment, and as a result of my personal experience in this matter I want to advance some arguments in support of the amendment because I believe that the legislation we have on the statute books at the present time does not meet the situation. I shall be very interested in listening to the minister's reply to the question put by the hon. member for The Battlefords, and I trust that the minister will be able to assure the house that action can be taken under the Criminal Code or that something can be done to get a national approach to this question through the water resources board or something of that sort. If so, the debate will have been worth while.

I think the debate has focused attention on a very important question, one of long standing that affects not only the prairie provinces but all provinces of Canada. As I see it, the pollution of water is one of the most noxious weeds of industrial development in any community. Of the three media of pollution, land, air and water, pollution of water is the most damaging and the most dangerous to mankind. That is why I think we are justified in taking a little time to discuss this clause and the proposed amendment.

Unfortunately there are too many people today who are not aware of the situation. They are not directly concerned with it and possibly think that pollution is not something that is going to affect them seriously in their lifetime. Strangely enough, when you read the history of the British Columbia Indians you find that the Haida Indians, the coastal Indians, hundreds of years ago made pollution of any stream a criminal offence under their code punishable by death. We are not seeking punishment by death, but that does indicate a better understanding of the problem than many people have today. That is why the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for The Battlefords have suggested amendments that would at least put some teeth in the present law.

I think one or two members have made some reference to this matter being a prairie problem, but I am quite sure that it is a national problem. It is also a considerable problem in British Columbia, and that is why I support the amendment. We have pollution of the waters of the north arm of the Fraser river making the water unfit for drinking and affecting the beaches, according to reports prepared by officials of the federal government in connection with the Fraser river—I forget the exact name of the board.

Mr. Fulton: Dominion-provincial board, Fraser river basin.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the hon. member for Kamloops for informing me. Pollution is causing contamination of shellfish so that they cannot be used and in certain areas it affects water for irrigation purposes because it causes a closing of the pores and the water will not penetrate through the soil. Vancouver and Victoria harbours are also affected by pollution.

In the interior of British Columbia we have pollution caused by the mining companies, about which a number of us have been concerned for some years. It has made the water unfit for domestic use, destroyed the fish in some of our streams, and in one case actually damaged a power plant through the erosion of the working parts by particles contained in the water. We have pollution by lumber companies caused by sawdust, shavings and slabs which affects the quality of the water for domestic purposes in some cases. It is injurious to fish and on occasion a danger to small craft so far as navigation is concerned.

What legislation have we in effect at the present time? We have the British Columbia health act and the British Columbia water act. Under this legislation the officials, in my opinion, have been doing a very good job in recent years but their scope is limited. Officials of the British Columbia provincial service have told me that we will never have effective control of the pollution of our rivers in Canada until we have some federal action and treat it as a national problem.

So far as federal legislation is concerned, certain clauses in the Fisheries Act make it possible to prevent pollution. Then there are the Migratory Birds Convention Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act and the Canada Shipping Act, all of which contain clauses dealing with the question of pollution of rivers, lakes, streams and so on. I understand there are also certain regulations passed by the Vancouver harbour board and bodies of that kind.

But regardless of all this legislation, provincial and federal, pollution of water in Canada is increasing daily, and I think it is largely because the unrelated efforts to control are ineffective. As a result, violations are general, and I know of very few prosecutions.

In support of my argument supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords, I should like to quote from a speech made by Mr. P. A. Larkin, chief fisheries biologist of the British Columbia game commission, at a recent conservation conference, that is the annual conference held in Victoria for the discussion of the conservation of natural resources. I might say that other officials have said almost the same thing to me, officials of the federal departments of transport and fisheries and the Department of National Health and Welfare. This is what Mr. Larkin has to say, and I give three quotations from his speech:

> We feel that there should come a day, if we plan properly, when it is accepted that no pollution will exist without the permission of a responsible authority and that such permission has been given in the public interest in accordance with sound principles of resource use planning . . .

Then he says:

> The existing legislation consists of a number of federal and provincial statutes which are designed to serve special interests of a particular resource. As such, while they are effective to a certain degree as preventive measures, collectively they are overburdened with overlapping provisions and they are completely inadequate as instruments of achieving our objective of planned water use. They should be replaced by broad legislation which would observe the necessary dual purpose of protecting special interests where it is desirable to do so, and at the same time, assuring the general purpose, of proper water use.

Then the last quotation from his speech is as follows:

> The panel has noted the trend in most advanced countries and states toward the creation of a single agency to control and abate a particular type of pollution, for instance, water pollution, in a geographical area.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think this gentleman explains the situation very well, after a lengthy experience in dealing with the question of water pollution in British Columbia. I, therefore, support the amendment moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords. I am very interested in what the minister is going to say in reply. In addition, I feel it is time to do something to make it a criminal offence to destroy these great natural resources. As the hon. member for The Battlefords has said, when a man robs a bank he gets a few years in jail. He can rob us of our use of these great natural resources, as many of these industries are doing today, and he goes scot-free.

I suggest we should have an amendment of this type in the Criminal Code, unless the minister can assure us that we are already protected and action will be taken. In my opinion, too, there should be a national conference on this subject, and this is an idea that I have expressed before, between the federal and provincial governments to work out a plan for the national conservation of our forests, land, soil and water use.

Mr. Garson: The remarks I shall make this afternoon will be, to a large extent, a repetition of what I said on Friday last. I make no particular apology for them in that respect because I believe some of the opposition arguments that have been made today are a repetition of what was said on Friday last. I was much taken with the last quotation of the last speaker. Although he said he was giving a quotation to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords, I could not help but feel, while listening to this excellent quotation, that I was in agreement with it; for this quotation really supports the solution to this Saskatchewan river pollution problem which I was advocating on Friday last.

Whatever value a criminal provision may have in this connection, we must all be agreed that the best way to prevent pollution is to prevent it instead of punishing for committing the offence of pollution. And the best way to prevent it, as the hon. member for Kootenay West has just said in this quotation, is to set up a single agency dealing with the question of pollution in that area. The area about which we are talking is the area of the prairie provinces tributary to Saskatchewan rivers. But in agreeing that this is the proper way to do the job I am not saying that there should be a total absence of provisions in the Criminal Code making pollution an offence. I do suggest that of the two methods, the setting up of an agency, with real authority so that no industry could put any effluent into a river without first getting a permit from the authority, is the really practical, orderly and sensible solution of this problem. I feel that both speakers this afternoon, the hon. member for The Battlefords and the hon. member for Kootenay West, agree with that view. Certainly, no other conclusion can be drawn from the remarks that they have made.

The hon. member for The Battlefords says that he is only going to deal with interprovincial rivers and thereby avoid creating the apprehension I voiced last Friday as to the probable adverse effect of the amendment which was then moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert, upon the industries and municipalities tributary to the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers. I should have thought that both the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence river systems were pre-eminently interprovincial rivers, and that if we applied the language of the amendment of the member for The Battlefords to them we would have the following absurd result. This amendment, says in part:

> Every one who, by himself, his agent or employee, places or discharges . . . in, upon or near . . . rivers, any industrial waste or any other polluting material of any kind whatsoever which either by itself or in connection with other matter may corrupt or impair the quality of the water thereof in another province or render such water in such province unfit for accustomed or ordinary use is guilty of an indictable offence . . .

What would happen on the Ottawa river, for example? If an industrial plant on the Ontario side up river from a municipality put effluent into the river which would have these results, then it could be prosecuted for the bad effects upon the Quebec side but it could not be prosecuted for the bad effects on the Ontario side. If the effluent were put in on the Quebec side, then the plant could be prosecuted for the effects on the Ontario side but not on the Quebec side. Now, that really is a Gilbert and Sullivan result if there ever was one.

Mr. Campbell: The provinces have the power to deal with pollution within their own borders.

Mr. Garson: Certainly they have. That is the very point I have been arguing. It is not in criticism of the hon. member for The Battlefords that I am citing this as an example of the great difficulty of providing a solution for the problem in a Saskatchewan river in western Canada without having on the statute books a provision which would be quite embarrassing to established industries, communities and the like in eastern Canada.

We must remember this provision must be of general application throughout Canada. In this regard the difference between the east and west is this. Although pollution is involved in both cases, in the one case we are dealing with the first noteworthy and extensive act of pollution that has taken place upon the Saskatchewan river whereas in the case of the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa rivers, we have a condition now in which there is a considerable measure of pollution which has extended over a considerable period of time on the part of both industries and municipalities. The literal application of an amendment such as the one we are discussing would create many complications, which I am sure the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for The Battlefords have not taken into adequate account at all.

Now as responsible parliamentarians, these are matters of which we must take note. For these reasons I think my hon. friend's amendment would be an unwise provision to put into the Criminal Code. Amongst other things it would produce really an absurd result that although an industrial plant on the Ontario side of the upper Ottawa river put an effluent into the river that polluted it, the people in Ontario could not prosecute, but the people across in Quebec could prosecute for it. For the same act, the same offender, the same river, the people affected could or could not prosecute depending upon whether they lived in Quebec or Ontario. One group in Quebec would have the right of prosecution. The other in Ontario would not. And if the offending plant were in Quebec the same sort of result would follow vice versa. Who could imagine a more absurd situation?

The hon. member for The Battlefords made himself very clear, and I think he was fair in the attitude that he took. He says that all he is concerned about is having an enforceable provision. Upon reflection I do not think that he would claim that his amendment would constitute such. He rather questioned—he did it very tactfully and was very courteous, I must say—the validity of the opinion which I had expressed on Friday last that clause 165 dealing with a common nuisance was one that could be invoked in a case of pollution of this type. If I understood him rightly—I did not hear him too well at this point, and I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—he said that some person in Prince Albert had given an opinion that clause 165 could not be invoked in connection with the recent matter which arose in western Canada.

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I think I should draw a distinction between the giving of an opinion upon the facts of a certain case, especially a case the facts of which one does not have, and I have never even seen that opinion—perhaps my hon. friend has—on the one hand, and on the other hand the stating, as my hon. friend is now asking me to state, what the effect of a clause of this kind is. The opinion which is given on the facts of a certain case and the negative opinion at any one point of time that they cannot use clause 165 may be based not upon the fact that clause 165 is not a good workable clause. But at that given point of time the counsel who was asked may say: "I do not think you have the evidence that would support a charge under clause 165 or any other clause, in the law now, or that can be imagined, because you have not here the evidence to prove this case." During the earlier discussions of this matter it was agreed by common consent on both sides of the house that the real point of the matter was that no sufficient evidence had been established.

The scientists and engineers of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, had been out there trying to get the evidence. At that time they did not have it. Now, the opinion given at that time would be clearly to the effect that they could not use this clause of the act and the reason was that they did not have evidence to prove a case. That is a very different thing from saying that the clause is unworkable.

I said that under clause 165, in the language of that clause:

> Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
>
> (a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or
>
> (b) causes physical injury to any person,
>
> is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

This, as it happens, is the same penalty that my hon. friend has named in his proposed amendment, except that he goes on to say: "or a fine of $2,000." But if the accused is a corporation it can be punished under this Bill No. 7 in an amount, not of $2,000 but in a completely unlimited amount if found guilty.

Then the clause goes on to define the common nuisance:

> For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
>
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or
>
> (b) obstructs the public in the exercise or enjoyment of any right that is common to all the subjects of Her Majesty in Canada.

In our discussion of last Friday the question was raised by, amongst others, the hon. member for Rosthern, as to what was the unlawful act that would constitute one of the indispensable ingredients of this offence of a common nuisance, and I said then that it could be a breach of the Alberta statute, either the section which my hon. friend from Rosthern named or another one which I quoted in my remarks and which I will not read again today to the effect that in the province of Alberta, under the regulations of their health act, it is contrary to those regulations to discharge certain effluents into the river. But I also said this—I think the hon. member for The Battlefords quoted it this afternoon—as reported at page 3631 of Hansard:

> The unlawful act, among other things, would be the breach of the statute which the hon. member for The Battlefords read a moment ago—by discharging the effluent into the river, in contravention of a statute of the province of Alberta or regulations passed thereunder. That would be an unlawful act beyond question, if we did not go on and deal with other aspects of the crime of a common nuisance and indicate that anything which was done in contravention of the public interest—

Not of the statute—

> —might, in itself, apart from being in contravention of the statute be regarded as an unlawful act.

Now, let me give my hon. friend some examples of that. One of the best of these is the judgment of the then Mr. Justice Rinfret, now the Chief Justice of Canada, in the Supreme Court of Canada in Groat v. the City of Edmonton, 1928 Supreme Court Reports at page 522. Mr. Justice Rinfret, as he then was, said this at page 532, and I think this has a quite close bearing upon what we have been discussing:

> The right of a riparian proprietor to drain his land into a natural stream is an undoubted common law right, but it may not be exercised to the injury and damage of the riparian proprietor below, and it can afford no defence to an action for polluting the water in a stream.

Is not what we are discussing the discharge into the river of an effluent which pollutes the water for the downstream proprietor? Listen to this.

> Pollution is always unlawful and, in itself, constitutes a nuisance.

That is without the Alberta statute, and without the Alberta regulations and without the federal Fisheries Act. Some of my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party who have spoken have said that the discharge of the effluent into the river was contrary to the federal Fisheries Act. If it was, it is certainly an unlawful act within the meaning of clause 165(2) which we are discussing. But regardless of whether the pollution complained of is contrary to a statute, the case I have cited says that pollution is always unlawful and, in itself, constitutes a nuisance. How could language be more explicit than that?

That was a case in which a plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages against a defendant city with respect to the pollution of water flowing through a ravine which crossed the plaintiff's land.

An hon. Member: What act?

Mr. Garson: It is not an act; that is my point. It does not necessarily have to be contrary to an act or statute. The pollution itself is an unlawful act—and when I use the word "act" in this instance I am not referring to a statute but rather to an act that someone does, and which is either lawful or unlawful.

The point is that where an upper riparian owner pollutes the water of a lower riparian owner, apart altogether from any statute, it is unlawful; and it is also unlawful under the statute and the regulations.

Mr. Fulton: Could that not be because it was deemed that the pollution is a nuisance at common law?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Would that not be excluded by this provision in the code?

Mr. Garson: No, not at all.

Mr. Fulton: Why not?

Mr. Garson: As I have said on previous occasions, in drafting Bill No. 7 we have defined all the offences as being statutory offences, from this point on. But in so doing, we have drafted them in language which makes available all the case law that was formerly applicable to the common law offence of a nuisance.

I indicated that this was a case in which a plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages. I think the suggestion has been put forward during the course of this debate, although I cannot recall by which member, that there might have been an impression that, inasmuch as the effluent was discharged in Edmonton and the result was in Prince Albert, although in the same river, the problem was they could not get the Alberta authorities to take action against the accused person in Alberta.

I suggest however that that should not be a problem, because the present section 584 (b) of the existing code, which is carried forward into clause 419 (b) in Bill No. 7, says that where an offence is begun in one territorial division and completed in another, such offence shall be deemed to have been committed in any of the territorial divisions.

Now, what happens in a case of this kind? The effluent is discharged at Edmonton in the territorial division of Alberta. If we accept the facts brought forward, it is the discharge at Edmonton which creates the common nuisance in the lower municipalities of Prince Albert and Battleford. It seems to me that it comes squarely within this provision, that the offence is begun in one territorial division and is completed in another. The common nuisance is in Prince Albert, so far as the people who are making the complaint there are concerned; and the common nuisance is in Battleford, so far as the people in Battleford are concerned. They are both caused by the discharge of the effluent in another territorial division.

That being so, I should think we would be much better off to leave the bill as it is, and not pass the amendment suggested.

However, I agree with the hon. member for The Battlefords, and the hon. member for Kootenay West, that it is a much more intelligent solution of a problem of this sort, just at its very beginning on the Saskatchewan river, for the governments concerned to get together and to set up an authority which would say whether or not a company or a municipality could discharge effluent into a river and, if so, with what conditions the discharge of such effluent would have to comply. If there were bacterial content I should think they would have to be a certain count, and if it were chemical effluent there would have to be a certain degree of dilution, and so on. Instead of fining corporations or putting people in jail, after criminal prosecutions, pollution could be prevented in this orderly manner.

However, there was one point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West with which, in deference, I cannot agree; and that is his suggestion that notwithstanding the fact that the natural resources of the country belong, not to the federal, but to the provincial governments, there is, an overriding responsibility on the federal government to tell the provinces how they should administer their own natural resources, and what laws they should pass to this end.

If, as my hon. friend admitted, the people in British Columbia, who have most of their rivers, with the exception of the international streams, wholly within the confines of that province, cannot pass appropriate laws to take care of and to administer those rivers satisfactorily, then I cannot imagine that they are going to do any better with the federal government breathing down their necks.

I must say that if, as I once was, I were in the provincial field, I would greatly object to having the federal government tell me what should be done with regard to natural resources of the province in which I was acting.

Mr. Herridge: The minister would not object to co-operation, would he?

Mr. Garson: No, not at all; that is what I am advocating. I hope I am not putting words in my hon. friend's mouth when I say that I think the whole trend of his remarks this afternoon, and about 50 per cent of the remarks of the hon. member for The Battlefords, was in support of the idea I voiced on Friday, when I said that governments should get together and decide how they should administer their own natural resources. They are in a magnificent position to do that at the present time, for with the first appearance of serious pollution in these Saskatchewan rivers coincidental with the beginnings of great petrochemical and other industries in western Canada, this is the psychological moment for them to co-operate in the setting up of this authority, an interprovincial authority, to regulate the discharge of effluents into the river. Such an authority would be in a position to determine that which, even for competent people, would be a most intricate, nice and difficult question. I refer to a river the variation in flow of which between the low point and high point is very great indeed.

The determination of the seasonal discharges of effluents which would be possible without damaging the water supply, so that the waters of such rivers may be used to the greatest possible advantage of industries, individuals and municipalities would therefore be proportionately difficult. It is only by that type of administration that the optimum advantage will be secured. It certainly will not be secured by an amendment such as that offered by the hon. member for The Battlefords.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, some reference has been made to me, and to a letter I wrote. I have been appearing before the committee on railways and shipping, and shall have to return to that committee, so I shall be brief.

If my understanding is correct, the letter to which reference has been made would be one I wrote in reply to a letter from the council of the city of Battleford in which they asked my support of a bill being brought in by the hon. member for The Battlefords to eliminate wastes in the Saskatchewan river.

I do not know whether the hon. member read my letter in its entirety or merely quoted extracts, but if he did read it in its entirety, I am sure it will be appreciated and agreed that his bill should be brought in where the jurisdiction applies. I believe the minister has himself put that in its proper perspective, and I do not think there is much I can add to his argument in regard to the amendment now before the house.

I can quite understand the concern felt by hon. members opposite and their attempts to try to divert pressure from their own administration in the province of Saskatchewan. That is quite natural and it is an attitude which applies to other things besides rivers. If one watches the procedure of the provincial house in Saskatchewan it will be noted that 99 per cent of their time is spent in diverting the attention of the people of Saskatchewan to this place, and transferring their problems to the federal government. But there is nothing new in that, Mr. Chairman. As far as socialist governments are concerned, they usually attempt to transfer their responsibilities elsewhere instead of shouldering them themselves.

However, I was glad to hear the concluding remarks of the hon. member of The Battlefords. After he had argued that jurisdiction did apply in Saskatchewan, I heard him go on to say that the provinces had complete jurisdiction over the natural resources in their own province. I believe that answers the problem immediately, though I cannot understand why he then attempted to bring in the bill he did. I suggest that the town of Battleford would be far better off to have that matter discussed in the provincial house by the administration in Saskatchewan. We are not exactly in the driver's seat in this particular instance. We are in the position of having to consult with the province of Alberta where the actual pollution occurs, and the province of Alberta, as we all know, is quite within its legal rights in stopping this pollution any time it feels like doing so.

I do not believe anything better can be done than to take heed of the remarks uttered by the minister a few moments ago to the effect that these provinces should get together, and I believe they should get together at this propitious time when pollution is just beginning. However, as regards pollution in general, we do not know anything about it in the province of Saskatchewan, particularly when one considers the situation here in the east. We do not have to go more than two miles from this house to find more pollution than was ever the case in the province of Saskatchewan. If you walk down the Ottawa not more than a couple of miles you will find every kind of offal one can think of floating in the stream and we do not have that sort of thing in Saskatchewan.

I believe that is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Chairman. I believe the problem might better be discussed where something can be done about it and not here in this parliament.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question, not in relation to the amendment, but in regard to the clause generally. I raised this point on a previous occasion when the committee was discussing clause 163, and inasmuch as the minister last week mentioned that that section dealt with religious services I believe it might be better to raise my point under clause 165. I am not trying to obtain legal advice but I would like to ask the minister whether the following situation would be covered by this clause. I refer to the question of certain manufacturing plants and chemical companies who let loose into the air in a city or town, as the case may be, noxious odours, and gases from their manufacturing plants. They may arise from chemical processes in feed plants, and that sort of thing. I asked this question under clause 163 and at that time the minister indicated that it might come under this clause. However, I have carefully examined clause 165 and I am not certain whether the type of nuisance to which I have referred would come under that clause. The clause reads:

> (1) Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or > (b) causes physical injury to any person,
> is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

In the first instance, the question of noxious fumes descending on a community from a factory would certainly affect the comfort of the public and thereby constitute an unlawful act. The minister in referring to the pollution of water cited a case in which the pollution of the waters of a river was an unlawful act under the common law. But I am wondering if this same reasoning would apply to the pollution of the air, which is equally important in many ways for the people who live in the surrounding area. I mention this because not long ago there was a case dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada, with which I am sure the minister is no doubt familiar, and it dealt with the McKinnon Industries Limited. In that case a florist brought an action against the industry because the fumes from the plant were destroying his flowers and he was successful in obtaining a permanent injunction. I think the minister will agree that he was successful only because his greenhouse was there before the industry was established. But would it have been an unlawful act if the greenhouse was set up after the industry had been established? I do not think so. In other words, if a plant in a community starts manufacturing and allows noxious fumes into a community it may be extremely difficult to bring a prosecution under this particular section. It is all very well to say that one should obtain an injunction, but that is a long and expensive course to take and by the time the case reached the Supreme Court of Canada, particularly when the case concerned the offensive behaviour of a large company, several years might have passed. I believe such a situation should be covered by Bill No. 7. To re-state the question, I would like to ask the minister which clause would cover that situation.

Mr. Hanna: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, during the course of this debate last week, and again today, reference has been made to chemical plants in Edmonton. I think it is only fair to put the record straight and state that the chemical plants referred to are at or near Edmonton. The expression "in Edmonton" seems to imply some criticism of the city of Edmonton and—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have heard the point being made by the hon. gentleman and I do not think it is a question which can be dealt with as a point of order. However, he has been permitted to put his correction on record.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I am always reluctant to express an opinion upon a hypothetical question because sometimes it turns out later on that such an opinion is not supported by judgment in an actual concrete case, not because the opinion is wrong, but because the facts of that concrete case have some slight variation which produces a different result. For example, if you have the local situation in a municipality changed either by provincial or municipal law to the extent where it expressly tolerates the emission of not more than a certain amount of smoke, then that in itself would negative in most cases any liability upon the part of the accused. But take this case. Imagine a farming area which has enjoyed freedom from smoke. Suppose a factory comes along and pours a great quantity of smoke in the neighbourhood and the question arises as to whether that constitutes a nuisance. In the absence of any qualifying law that might change that situation, such as the provincial and municipal laws permitting a certain amount of smoke, I should think that would undoubtedly constitute a common nuisance. Perhaps I might cite a case which had to do with water that we were discussing previously, but it is rather on the point about which my hon. friend has asked. This is a Canadian case of Regina v. Brewster and Cook. I may say this was not a civil action; this was a criminal prosecution for nuisance. It was decided in 1859 but it is on the law of nuisance that we have carried along into the code as it stands today. In that case the accused were indicted for a nuisance in maintaining a dam which affected the health of people living in the neighbourhood. By the way, the citation is (1859) 8 U.C.C.P. 208. At page 212 Chief Justice Draper says this:

> It would be a strange proposition if a man could for his own profit overflow some 15,000 acres of land with nearly stagnant water, so as to render the land surrounding and adjoining uninhabitable, except at the imminent risk of health,—

Not against health but "at the imminent risk of health".

> —and to say that, having done this before they were inhabitants, they cannot complain that he is guilty of a nuisance, for they need not have come to it . . .

That is the point my hon. friend has raised.

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Then the chief justice continues further down in the judgment:

> . . . The settlement of a valuable tract of land cannot be lawfully impeded or obstructed by a nuisance prejudicial to public health, any more than a public highway can be obstructed so as to prevent intercourse through the same portion of country.

That case seems to be fairly clear in point, except that it has not to do with smoke. If there is a set of facts like that, in that case they were apparently held by the chief justice of common pleas to have that result.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you very much.

Mr. Campbell: The city of Prince Albert and the town of Battleford have been put to considerable expense. I asked this question the other night but I did not get an answer. The city of Prince Albert has spent something over $3,000 for hauling water up to the 23rd of last month. The town of Battleford has had a drilling machine busy for some time at $100 a day. Suppose those two municipalities decided to take legal action against the Canadian Chemical Company. Does the minister think they have any hope of getting damages under the present act?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any person can accuse me of having relied upon my rights not to advise the members of the house. I have almost exceeded the bounds of propriety in the frankness with which I have discussed these sections because I realize that in a bill of this sort it would be difficult to make much progress if I took the position that I would not express an opinion on any of the clauses to assist the members. But there really is a limit to which I can go. I cannot here express opinions that even indirectly might be used as a basis for civil action in the courts. That procedure would be highly improper. We cannot very well tax the legal profession in the way in which we do through the income tax, and then operate here in competition with them on the floor of parliament. If these people have these claims for damages, the thing for them to do is to consult a solicitor and get advice from him as to whether he thinks they can succeed. In that connection may I say this. The giving of advice by a lawyer to a client not to prosecute or not to sue or anything of that sort is not necessarily based upon legal points. It may be based upon common sense, strange as that might seem.

Mr. Knowles: Is there a difference?

Mr. Garson: As I indicated in earlier discussion here, as soon as the facts were known it is more than likely that an adjustment of the matter could be effected by an understanding between the parties without having court action at all.

Mr. Campbell: There is another point that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and it is this. The city of Prince Albert, through their counsel, sought advice as to whether they could take action against the Canadian Chemical Company. The advice they obtained was that they would have to find a riparian owner in the province of Alberta who would be willing to take action himself under his own name; the farmer or riparian owner in Alberta would have to do that.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, he is now discussing what civil rights of action for damages may be caused by the situation on the Saskatchewan river. I do not think anybody, including myself, has tried to narrow this discussion down too much; but I must say that we cannot go into whether or not matters of civil action have been allowed to arise on the Saskatchewan river. We must retain our perspective and focus our attention on the Criminal Code. With that point perhaps the hon. member will continue.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Campbell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will ask my question in a different way. Could the municipalities take action under the Criminal Code without going and finding a riparian owner in the province of Alberta to make the charge?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will read Hansard of this afternoon's proceedings, he will see that I have already given him an answer to that question in the terms of a section of the existing bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Amendment negatived.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 165 carry?

Mr. Barnett: Before this question is proceeded with, I have one question I should like to ask the minister. I mentioned the point when I was speaking on Friday evening. I still have not been able to understand the wording of this clause, with what to me appears to be a double qualification in subsection 1 and subsection 2. In section 1 it mentions, under common nuisance:

> Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, . . .

Then subsection 2 reads:

> For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, . . .

I could understand it if that section were to be set out so that subsection 2 were subsection 1 and then the present subsection 1 were labelled as subsection 2 and read:

> Every one who commits a common nuisance is guilty of an indictable offence.

But the question that comes into my mind is this. What punishment or what penalty is there for someone who endangers the property or the comfort of the public? There is provided a penalty for those who endanger the lives, safety or health of the public, but I have not been able to see how, under that section, an offence against the property or comfort of the public is an offence subject to a penalty.

Mr. Garson: Section 165, subsection 2 defines a common nuisance. This question arises as to what kinds of common nuisance shall be subject to penalty under the criminal law, and subsection 1 says that of all the common nuisances that there can be, within the definition in subsection 2, it is those that endanger the lives, safety or health of the public that are the ones in respect of which prosecutions can be laid under this section.

Mr. Barnett: Could I ask the question in this way? What redress has a person whose comfort is interfered with?

Mr. Garson: For the purposes of the present discussion, he has not the redress of a criminal prosecution. I do not like to give these offhand statements, but he may very well have a civil action in respect of the nuisance in this other case. In other words, when the Criminal Code purports to define a common nuisance it defines it in terms of what it is and then it goes on to say that only common nuisances which affect lives, safety or health shall be open to prosecution under criminal law.

Mr. Noseworthy: On that point, why does subsection 2 (a) differ from subsection 1 (a)? Why are they not the same?

Mr. Garson: Well, that is what I just finished explaining.

Mr. Noseworthy: Nobody understands it.

Mr. Garson: I will take it by steps. First of all we ask ourselves the question: What is a common nuisance? The answer to that is in subsection 2. The next question is: What kinds of common nuisance can be the subject matter of criminal prosecution under this section? The answer to that is in subsection 1.

Mr. Noseworthy: Then although endangering property or comfort of the public is a common nuisance it is not indictable under this section?

Mr. Garson: That is right. If you endanger my property it is a common nuisance, and, depending upon the circumstances, I may very well have a good action for an injunction and damages. But in this section, which is simply carrying on what has been the criminal law of Canada for many long years, it was not considered proper, and has never been, that if you commit a common nuisance which endangers my property you should be guilty of an indictable offence. But if you endanger my life, my safety or my health, then that would be a criminal offence.

Mr. Barnett: I do not want to pursue this too far, but we have discussed this section so thoroughly that I should like to be able to understand it. Let me put my question this way. It would seem that endangering property or comfort is a relatively more minor offence, but if it is going to be included for the purposes of defining a common nuisance why should not such offences be made liable to summary prosecution? A number of other sections of the code make provision for summary prosecutions for relatively minor offences, and more serious acts are covered by indictable offences. But I still cannot see why, for the purposes of this section, endangering property and comfort should be included in the definition of a nuisance if the penalties in the section are not in any way applicable.

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is anything very difficult to understand. When you define anything for the purpose of a particular section you define it for what it is. Nor do I think there is anything difficult to understand when I say that you do not necessarily indict people for everything that is included in that definition. So far as our present position is concerned, we have good reasons for wanting to retain this language in the present bill. It has been in the law for a good number of years. Cases have been decided upon it in which these sections have been interpreted. We know what the courts consider that they mean, and thus we think it would be injudicious and incautious for us to change the wording. We know what the courts have said it means, and it is preferable to carry on that meaning. I must add that I do not find the difficulty at all that either of my hon. friends has stated.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the minister tell me this? Is the distinction between the way in which the two types of offence are going to be dealt with to be found in these respective words—"guilty of an indictable offence", and "does an unlawful act"? Do these two phrases indicate the respective methods by which the offence is to be treated?

Mr. Garson: No, they do not.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the minister tell me why it is merely an unlawful act to endanger the lives of people under subsection 2(a) and an indictable offence to endanger their lives under subsection 1(a)?

Mr. Garson: I must confess that I am afraid I will have to refer my hon. friends to Hansard, and if they still do not comprehend it I will be glad to discuss it with them if they will see me. The one defines a common nuisance in general and the other says what kinds of common nuisances shall be indictable. We can state these two facts in a dozen different ways but we come back to the two facts in the end.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I point out that you are defining them in precisely the same terms, and I want to know why when "endangers the lives" is used in one part it does not mean the same when it is used in another part.

Mr. Garson: I think it might have been easier for my hon. friends to understand this clause if the two subsections had been transposed. If my hon. friend will just think of No. 2 as being No. 1, I think a lot of his difficulty will be overcome. In other words, first of all you say what is a common nuisance and define it. Then you go on to say that every one who commits this common nuisance which we have already defined, and thereby endangers the lives, safety or health of the public or causes physical injury to any person, is guilty of an indictable offence, but it is not considered appropriate that a man should be indicted whose only offence is that he has injured somebody else's property. In other words, it puts the lives, safety and health of people ahead of injury to property.

Mr. Fulton: One is a criminal offence and the other is a civil action.

Mr. Noseworthy: Then what has the reference to "property or comfort" got to do with this section at all? Of all the kinds of common nuisances one can think of, why are only those two selected and put in this definition when neither of them is indictable?

Mr. Garson: Because they are a part of the definition of common nuisance. All this purports to be is a definition of common nuisance.

Mr. Knowles: This is a very minor point. Perhaps the minister can look at it at his leisure. He might even have Their Honours in the other place deal with it.

Mr. Garson: At my what?

Mr. Knowles: In the minister's spare time. The question I wish to raise has to do with the headings in this general part of the code. I refer to the heading that is inserted just ahead of clause 165, and also to the heading that is inserted just ahead of clause 161. I do not propose to argue the point the minister was trying to make, I think falsely, on Friday with regard to the other heading. I do suggest that the heading "disturbing religious services" does not really apply to clauses 162, 163, 164. It applies only to 161. In support of that argument I point out that clause 163 was section 501A in the old code and it was under the general heading "wilful and forbidden acts in respect of certain property." I have no desire to take up any time, but it does seem to me if it were possible the other day for the minister to be misled, if I may say so, by the heading "disturbing religious services", it might be well to have some change made.

Perhaps it calls for a new heading or some rearrangement of the clauses. As I say, this can be looked at later, but I suggest to the minister it might be well to have it looked at.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection in the world to striking out the term "disturbing religious services." The only reason I mentioned that the other day was, if my hon. friend will examine section 163, he will see that defines an offence in relation to meetings, throwing stench bombs and so forth in meetings. Since there is an intervening section, trespassing by night, my hon. friend's point is quite well taken, that the heading there does not really add to the lucidity of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Just to get this clear, where is the reference to meetings in clause 163?

Mr. Garson: It says:

> . . . throws or injects or causes to be deposited . . . into or near any place,
>
> (b) a stink or stench bomb or device from which any substance mentioned in paragraph (a) is or is capable of being liberated, . . .

My hon. friend, I am sure, must be sufficiently cognizant of the facts of life to know that is what these bombs are for, to cause discomfort, and usually at a meeting. It might conceivably be a religious service, but it is a meeting. True there is an intervening section, "trespassing at night". For my part, if my hon. friend wishes to move an amendment to strike out "disturbing religious services", I have no objection. This heading certainly does not add anything to the meaning of the act.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister gives me that permission, may I ask if he is satisfied then that all the sections from 158 to 164 inclusive might properly come under the general heading of "disorderly conduct"?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think they would.

Mr. Knowles: I agree with the minister on that point, and it might remove some of the confusion. Therefore, as the minister suggested, I move that the heading "disturbing religious services" be deleted from the bill where it appears between lines 6 and 7 on page 52.

The Chairman: Actually, we are discussing clause 165. Has the hon. member leave to revert to that part of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment proposed. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 165 agreed to.

The Chairman: We are now proceeding to group 4, treason. I shall call clause 46.

On clause 46—Treason.

Mr. Knowles: This is a clause which may occasion considerable—

Mr. Garson: I was proposing to offer to the committee some amendments to this section, and perhaps the amendments we have in mind might meet the point my hon. friend is about to discuss. I might submit them to the committee for consideration.

Mr. Knowles: I should be glad to defer my remarks until we have all the amendments the government has in mind.

Mr. Garson: This section of the bill, Mr. Chairman, is one which has already come in for a great deal of consideration, both in the special committee of the House of Commons and also in the other place and in its committees. I feel we will be able to deal with it more intelligently in this discussion if I trace the history of the section up until the present time. Perhaps hon. members will forgive me if, before doing that, I review briefly the law of treason generally. In the banking and commerce committee of the other place such a review was presented on a question and answer basis which is not always very satisfactory.

Now an understanding of the basic law of treason is not without importance in dealing properly with this section before us. In this present brief review I am drawing heavily upon the excellent and succinct chapter in Sir William Anson's "Law and Custom of the Constitution", dealing with the question of treason. As he points out, the law of treason is connected with the law relating to allegiance in two ways. Allegiance is always due from a British subject, wherever he may be, and any subject who acts disloyally overseas may be punished if he at any time can be apprehended afterwards in Great Britain. In the same way, allegiance is due from a Canadian citizen and he can be punished, even although his treason may have been committed outside of the boundaries of Canada, if at any time later on he can be apprehended in Canada.

If we go back in legal history, we find that treason depended, like allegiance, on the personal character of the feudal relations, because treason first came into being in the days of feudalism. Treason at that time was offence against the person, the representatives, or the personal rights of the king. It was a breach of the feudal bond, a betrayal in one form or another by the subject of his lord.

The vagueness of the early law on this subject led to a request by the Commons in 1352 that the king should legislate upon the subject of treason. The answer to their request was the statute upon which the law of treason is still founded in the United Kingdom. This is 25 Edward III, statute 5, chapter 2, and it named seven distinct offences of treason. The first was to compass or imagine the king's death, the queen's—but not if a dowager or if divorced—again indicating the personal monarch—or that of the heir to the throne; second, to levy war against the king in his realm; third, to adhere to the king's enemies; four, to violate the king's wife, the wife of his eldest son, or his eldest daughter, being unmarried; five, to counterfeit the great seal, the privy seal, or coin; six, to issue false money; seven, to kill the chancellor, the treasurer—

Mr. Fulton: How about the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's question is an exceedingly timely one. He must have known what was coming up. It is not quite the Minister of Justice, but the king's justice, the king's justices of either bench, or of assize, in the discharge of his office.

One cannot fail to notice the personal character of all these offences; the king, not the crown in parliament, or the state as embodied in the existing constitution, but the king in person is the object which the statute was designed to protect. The statute of Edward III was designed to protect the king's person; the king's sovereignty; the king's family relations; the indicia of the royal will in administration, the seals; the representatives of the royal will in judicature, the chancellor and judges; the privileges of royalty as they were in those days; the coinage. These are what the feudal society thought it was treason to infringe.

Now, these last four offences need no special notice; they remain as treason on the statute books, though they may be dealt with as felony. The first three have been extended—that is, to compass or imagine the king's death, to levy war against the king in his realm and to adhere to the king's enemies—have been extended by construction. That is, they first of all apply to the personal king. They have been expanded as the concept of kingship developed, and they have also been the subject of much legal comment.

Now, to demonstrate that insight, foresight and wisdom are not the monopoly of these modern times, I should like to quote from this statute, which was passed nearly 150 years before Christopher Columbus discovered America, another short passage. This passage states a principle which we shall be considering this afternoon in the clauses that I shall be discussing in this bill later on. This is the short passage from the statute to which I refer:

> And because that many other like cases of treason may happen in time to come which a man cannot think or declare at this present time; it is accorded, that if any other case, supposed treason which is not above specified, doth happen before any justices, the justices shall tarry without going to judgment of the treason, till the cause be shewed and declared before the king and his parliament whether it ought to be judged treason or other felony.

Now, by these expansions, by construction of the statute of Edward III, we have principles which are very important in legal history: Compassing or imagining the king's death was construed to mean any act directed to the deposition or imprisonment of the king, or to acquiring the control of his person, or any measure concerted with foreigners for an invasion of the kingdom, or going or intending to go abroad for any of these purposes. Cases of mere riot were treated as "levying war against the king".

The Riot Act, 1 George I, statute 2, chapter 5, made it unnecessary to strain the definition of treason in order to punish disorder which had no political end in view; that is to say, if the riot were just a common riot and had not any political or ulterior motives connected with it, it would come under the Riot Act and would not be regarded as a form of treason. But the law of treason took no cognizance of offences against the state which could not be construed to be also offences against the person or personal authority of the king.

It was not until 1795 that statutory force was given to the extended interpretations of the act of Edward III, and an actual or contemplated forcible attempt to make the king change his counsels or to intimidate both houses or either house of parliament was made treason. That is, an offence which was not against the person of the king but against his advisers. In 1848, all the acts or compassing mentioned therein, which did not tend to the death, personal injury, or personal restraint of the sovereign, were made treason-felony, and so not necessarily punishable with death; and that, as a matter of fact, it was that distinction in its present modern form which gave the other place and gave the special committee of the House of Commons a great deal of concern in connection with this clause 46.

In the United Kingdom the treason statute of Edward III still remains treason on the statute books of Great Britain, but treason as distinct from treason-felony is the doing or designing anything which would lead to the death, bodily harm, or restraint of the king, levying war against him, adhering to his enemies within or without the realm, or otherwise doing acts which fall under the statute of Edward III.

Conspiracies to levy war, to deprive the king of the crown or of any part of his dominions, or to incite foreigners to invade the realm are treason-felony, and may perhaps be dealt with as constructive treason. Force contemplated or applied to make the king change his counsels, or to intimidate either or both houses of parliament is treason-felony. Thus, for example, conspiracies of the Fenian brotherhood to use force to separate Ireland from the crown were treason-felony. In considering these precedents I think we should note this, that apart from the case of Lynch in 1903 and of Sir Roger Casement in 1916, all prosecutions in England since 1848 for treasonable offences have been made for felony under the act of 1848.

Now, with that short introduction, we might come to the clause before us. I would like to make first of all the following points with regard to clause 46 (1) (e). The first point is that there is no provision in the present law which is in the same terms as paragraph (e) of clause 46 (1).

The second point is that the Criminal Code revision commissioners apparently considered that the Official Secrets Act, which provided a maximum punishment of 14 years, was not adequate to deal with modern problems connected with the unlawful communication of information to agents of states other than Canada.

The third point is that as recommended by the Criminal Code revision commission and as introduced in the Senate as Bill No. H-8, the provision was as follows:

> Every one commits treason who, in Canada,
> (e) conspires with an agent of a state other than Canada to communicate information or to do an act that is likely to be prejudicial to the safety or interests of Canada;

The punishment authorized was death or imprisonment for life. Now, when one says: "death or imprisonment for life" it means that it is a different kind of death penalty from that provided now in the code for murder, which is a mandatory death penalty, with a judge not having any choice but to impose it. The penalty of death or imprisonment for life with no minimum, means that the judge in a case can, if he sees fit to do so, impose a death penalty or he may impose life imprisonment or such lesser imprisonment as he in his wisdom may see fit, which may be imprisonment for a week or a day; so that there is a very great deal of difference between a mandatory death penalty and the penalty that was first named in this Bill H-8.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is commenting on the meaning of the words "liable to"?

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: Would he care to elaborate further by pointing out the position of a judge in a case where the punishment is death only. He has referred to a case where an accused is liable to life imprisonment.

Mr. Garson: If I recall correctly, I think the code says that for the crime of murder the convicted man shall be sentenced to death.

Mr. Knowles: That is clause 206.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is clause 206. My hon. friend has it before him, no doubt. Then, the section in the present code, 263, is as follows:

> Every one who commits murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall, on conviction thereof, be sentenced to death.

It does not say that he is "liable"; it says that he shall be sentenced to death.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister would clear this up. He made it clear with regard to punishment for treason, where the punishment is a liability to life imprisonment, that a judge might make it for a lesser period—such as, as he suggests, only one week. What is the position of the judge where the punishment is a liability to be put to death, and where no alternative is stated? What is the lesser punishment in that case?

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is any such sentence. Where a mandatory death sentence is authorized in the Criminal Code it says that, upon conviction for murder, he shall be sentenced to death.

Mr. Knowles: I am referring to clause 47 (1) (a)—unless that is one of the clauses the minister is amending.

Mr. Garson: It says that he shall be liable to be sentenced to death. Well, I would want to consider that point. I do not think it has ever been raised before. It does not say "shall be". I would want to look at it and, if I may, to comment later.

I think it might be of some service if we were to compare the form of wording used in Bill H-8 with section 3 (1) of the Official Secrets Act, which provides as follows:

> If any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state
>
> (a) approaches, inspects, passes over, or is in the neighbourhood of, or enters any prohibited place; or
>
> (b) makes any sketch, plan, model or note which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to a foreign power; or
>
> (c) obtains, collects, records, or publishes, or communicates to any other person any secret official code word, or pass word, or any sketch, plan, model, article or note, or other document or information which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to a foreign power;
>
> he shall be guilty of an offence under this act.

Now, the provision was discussed in the Senate banking and commerce committee, but the committee did not report. So that no recommendation was made either in favour of or against the provision. When the bill was introduced in the Senate for the second time as Bill "O"—it was first of all introduced as Bill H-8, and then died on the order paper, and was revived as Bill "O"—the provision was in the same form I have already indicated. The Senate banking and commerce committee, to which the bill was referred, thought at first that the paragraph was too broad and, secondly, that the conduct referred to in the paragraph was not such as should be defined as treason.

Actually the Senate removed paragraph (e) from clause 46 and inserted it in clause 50 as paragraph (c) in a changed form, reading as follows:

> Every one commits an offence who
>
> (c) conspires with an agent of a state other than Canada to communicate information or to do an act that is likely to be prejudicial to the safety of Canada.

Now, by transferring it to clause 50 it made the punishment applicable to it a period of 14 years imprisonment. The provision was then introduced in the House of Commons in the form, naturally, in which it had left the Senate. In due course it went before the special committee of the house at the last session.

The special committee did not agree with the change the banking and commerce committee in the other place had made, and they further amended the paragraph so that it took the form that it now takes in the bill before us. That is, as my hon. friend can see, the form in section 46 (1) (e) as it now reads. Perhaps I might comment upon that wording. It is quite different from the original wording and says:

> without lawful authority, communicates or makes available to an agent of a state other than Canada,—

And then, instead of the single word "information" it particularizes as follows:

—military or scientific information or any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document of a military or scientific character that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial—

Not to the "safety and interests of Canada", which is a rather vague expression, but——to the safety or defence of Canada.

This makes it clear that it was military and scientific information relating to the safety or defence of Canada which was prohibited.

The relevant amendments that were moved in the House of Commons special committee were moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East, and the former member for St. John's West, Mr. Browne, and the former member for Gloucester, Mr. Robichaud. The effect of the amendment was to restore this provision back to the treason section, but to narrow it substantially from the broad and less certain terms in which it had been set out when it was before the Senate.

I have already indicated in the house that the government felt under an obligation, when introducing Bill No. 7 at the present session, to introduce it, with a few minor typographical corrections, in the exact form in which it had been reported upon by the special House of Commons committee at the last session, so that the house would know that Bill No. 7 was the bill which had been considered by the parliament of Canada in a preceding session, and that it came to us again in the exact form in which the House of Commons special committee had passed upon it.

We in the government thought that if we had any views of dissent from the conclusions of the House of Commons committee we should lay before the members of the House of Commons the exact text upon which the House of Commons committee had passed, and then that we should bring in amendments to this text which we in the government proposed. In this way members could judge what had been approved by the House of Commons committee and would know exactly what we were proposing to change.

We in the government were quite deeply concerned with the question of what was the proper punishment for an offence of this kind.

How heavy the appropriate penalty should be for the disclosure of military and scientific information of this sort is a matter which is not without very great difficulty to determine. This new sort of treason is in line with the great change which has come over the offence of treason from what it was in feudal days when it might have been an act of disloyalty to a personal king. But today there could be disclosure of information with regard to the H-bomb or the atomic bomb which might have consequences much more serious for the state than even a personal attack upon the monarch.

Without detaining hon. members of this committee with details I think I should say that the government considered this problem at great length and also in a subcommittee of the cabinet set up for that purpose. We came to the view, which I will introduce amendments to support, that a distinction should be drawn between the offence when committed in peacetime and the offence when committed during wartime when it would be of a particularly heinous character and would be an act just as serious as adhering to the king's enemies. We knew that we would be one of very few free nations which imposed even on a non-mandatory basis the death penalty for an offence of this sort in peacetime. We therefore thought that the penalty sections of clause 46 should be amended to provide that it would continue to carry the present penalty, if the offence were committed during a time of war, and if committed during a time of peace it would carry the penalty of 14 years imprisonment.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleague the Minister of Fisheries to move amendments to clauses 46 and 47. Before he does so, however, I would point out that the amendments to clause 46 are consequential to the amendments to clause 47. I think the amendments to clause 47 will be self-explanatory but if not I will be glad to explain them.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe it would meet with the approval of the committee if these clauses were treated as a group and discussed as a group and we can move the amendments when each clause is reached.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 46 be amended by deleting paragraph (f) and (g) and substituting therefor the following:

(f) conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d);

(g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d) and manifests that intention by an overt act; or

(h) conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraph (e) or forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraph (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act.

I would also move:

That clause 47 of Bill No. 7 be amended by deleting subclause (1) thereof and substituting therefor the following:

47 (1) Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable

(a) to be sentenced to death if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of subsection (1) of section 46;

(b) to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (d), (f) or (g) of subsection (1) of section 46;

(c) to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (e) or (h) of subsection (1) of section 46, committed while a state of war exists between Canada and another country; or

(d) to be sentenced to imprisonment for fourteen years if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (e) or (h) of subsection (1) of section 46, committed while no state of war exists between Canada and another country.

The Deputy Chairman: I will now put the amendment relating to clause 46 as moved by Mr. Sinclair.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to assess the exact effects of these amendments quickly but they do seem to me to meet the objections which have been advanced, particularly against the inclusion of paragraph (e) as it at present stands in clause 46, subclause (1), which may, as clause 47 stands now, carry the possibility of a sentence of death. If I understand the effects of the amendment to the Criminal Code proposed by the minister—if I am wrong he will no doubt correct me—an offence under clause 46, subclause (1), and paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) will still carry the sentence of death, and the offence under paragraph (e) will only carry the possibility of a sentence of death if committed in time of war. Even there, if the circumstances are such that in the discretion of the court it is felt inappropriate to pass a sentence of death, then the accused, if found guilty, may be sentenced to life imprisonment or a lesser term of imprisonment. That seems to be a sensible thing.

Further, if a person commits an offence now contemplated under paragraph (e) of clause 46, subclause (1), when we are not in a state of war he can only be liable to be sentenced to imprisonment for 14 years or such lesser term as in the court's discretion seems appropriate. That also seems to be a sensible provision. But, in order that we may understand the effects of the amendments, may I refer to the proposed amendments to clause 47 and ask the minister whether by virtue of paragraphs (c) and (d) of that proposed amendment the sentence of death or of imprisonment for 14 years will follow, whether or not the information is communicated to the country with which we are at war?

In other words it is now provided that if a state of war exists between Canada and another country—it may be only one country—then if a person commits an offence under paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 46, that is, if he communicates information to an agent of a state other than Canada, then if we are at war with another country he may be liable to be sentenced to death. It would follow from those words, would it, that that death penalty would be imposed even if the information is communicated to an agent of a country other than a country with which Canada is at war? As I read the proposed section or the proposed amendment to section 47, that would be the effect. I am wondering, however, whether that was the intention or whether it was the intention to provide that the penalty of death would follow only if the information was communicated to an agent of a country with which we are at war.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's question really divides itself into two parts. He said, "Would the death penalty follow?" The death penalty would not necessarily follow. This is not a mandatory death penalty. So far as the death penalty is concerned—

Mr. Fulton: I should have said that.

Mr. Garson: I know, but I think it is important to emphasize this. The judge has a wide discretion here to fit the penalty to the crime, depending upon the evidence that comes before him, from a non-mandatory death penalty if the evidence is heinous enough to warrant such a sentence down to a very slight term of imprisonment if it is not heinous at all.

Mr. Fulton: There is room for that discretion.

Mr. Garson: Yes. I am sure my hon. friend is clear on that point. With regard to my hon. friend's other question, while the section clearly states "while no state of war exists between Canada and another country," it is not necessary that the accused person should convey the information to a citizen of the country with which we are at war. I am sure that any person who is familiar, even on a novel-reading basis, with espionage and counter-espionage these days, knows perfectly well that there is no guarantee that if information of this sort is passed out to an agent of country A, it may not be designed from the very first to end up with our enemy country B; and that the purpose of disclosing to country A in the first place was that it might be passed on to enemy B.

I am sure that my hon. friend is also aware of one other fact. If we proceed under the Official Secrets Act, most of the prohibitions are outright prohibitions in connection with which mens rea does not have to be proved. But mens rea has always been an essential ingredient of the crime of treason and mens rea would have to be proved in the present case. That would be the greatest protection that the accused could have because it would have to be shown that, in the terms of the statute, he, with a guilty mind and "without lawful authority", communicates this information. This can hardly be said to be unfair to the accused. When the crown must go to this extent to prove its case against the accused in order to secure his conviction, even although the information which is disclosed was to a citizen of some country other than the one with which Canada was at war, I think it can hardly be said to be unfair to the accused.

Mr. Fulton: Then I think we are clear that in the case of communicating information under paragraph (e), if it is done at the time when Canada is at war with another country, and then if, let us say, it was communicated directly to an agent of that country with which we are at war, it is possible to impose the death penalty. It is also possible to impose the death penalty even if the information was not communicated directly to that country but was communicated to a third country with, let us say, the intention that it should go to the country with which we are at war; there would still be room for the death penalty, under those circumstances. If as the minister has said, the offence itself was less heinous and amounted to a careless communication of information to some other country with which we were not at war, then there would be room for the penalty of imprisonment for life or such lesser term as might be thought to be appropriate.

But if there is no war at all—and I presume this means a state of declared war; and that would be important to determine—then for the offence contemplated under section 46, subsection 1, paragraph (e), there is no possibility of the death penalty. If I am correct there, then I think the other points which I should like to ask the minister to clear up are these. Is it necessary that there should be a declaration of war, or do the words "state of war exists" cover such a situation as the Korean war which I prefer to call a war although it was not a declared war but was covered, I think, in an earlier amendment in 1951 by the term "state of hostilities existing between the armed forces of another country and Canada"? Is that situation contemplated in paragraphs (c) and (d) of the proposed amendment to section 47?

Mr. Garson: The answer is no. My hon. friend can examine for himself the basis for that answer by comparing the wording of subsection 1, paragraph (c) of this same section which covers the Korean situation and paragraph (e) of that subsection. Paragraph (c) reads as follows:

Assists an enemy at war with Canada,—

That is at war in the same sense that we have been discussing it in the section before us.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The paragraph continues:

—or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are;

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: That is the situation in Korea. My hon. friend can see that that is a very different set of words from the set which is used in section 46, subsection 1, paragraph (e).

Mr. Fulton: I suppose that in the case of communicating information, if it was to a country with whom, while there has been no declaration of war, nevertheless our armed forces are engaged in hostilities, then there would be the chance of laying the charge under either paragraphs (c) or (e) because the mere communicating of information might be sufficient to assist the armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities. There would be room for an alternative charge, would there not? Here I am thinking of the reverse of the situation. In the one case we are trying to modify the penalty. But here I am thinking of a situation where information is communicated for the deliberate purpose of assisting an enemy country, a country which is in fact an enemy although no declaration of war has been made, a country with which we are engaged in hostilities. I think my doubt is cleared up to some extent. We are forced to think out loud, as it were, because this amendment has just been handed to us. I think my doubt is cleared up by the fact that there would exist the option of laying a charge under paragraph (c) if we wanted to ensure the heavier penalty in a case of that sort.

Mr. Garson: I would suggest to my hon. friend that if he reads paragraph (c) correctly he will see that it would be quite difficult, I should think in most cases, to prove the offence against the accused because the assistance under paragraph (c) is the assistance of the armed forces against which Canada is engaged; and it would have to be shown that the information in question was of assistance to the armed forces. I am not saying that it is impossible to prove that information was of assistance to the armed forces, but I should think that in most cases it would be more difficult to prove that than it would be to prove that the accused had communicated contrary to section 46 (1) (e) to a state other than Canada information of a military or scientific character that he knew or ought to have known might be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defence of Canada. In order to prove an offence under 1 (c) he would have to prove that the information communicated would assist the armed forces. If he could not prove that, the case would fail.

Mr. Fulton: I am not very happy about this although I do not know whether it is a fundamental objection. It does seem to me, however, that by the amendment we have precluded the possibility of the death sentence. Again I want to be careful of my words because to some extent we are thinking out loud and trying to sort this thing out, but is it not a fact that if these amendments carry we have precluded the possibility of the death sentence against a person who communicates information of a military or scientific nature which is designed to assist the country with the forces of which our Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities, although no declaration of war has been made? Under (e) now, for the death penalty to follow there must be a declaration of war and the communication of information must be made under those circumstances. If, as in the case of Korea, there was no declaration of war and information had been communicated directly to North Korea or communist China designed to assist them and they are not an enemy in the usual sense of the word, then if it did not actually directly assist their armed forces it seems to me we have precluded the possibility of the death sentence although an act, which seems to me to be a highly treasonable one, has been committed.

Mr. Philpott: I should like to ask a question on this same section. We have all received a great many communications from different organizations in Canada about Bill No. 7, but there are no sections concerning which we have received communications about which there is so much confusion as this particular one and the ones having to do with labour. There is a widespread impression abroad that in this case the new section is more drastic than the old one, but I think anyone who examines the section in the code as it now exists will see quite clearly that the new section is not as drastic as the old one.

For instance, I as a newspaperman might be sent to Kenya and my sympathies might or might not be with the Mau Mau. If I came back to Canada and wrote in favour of the Mau Mau then I would come under section 74 (i) of the Criminal Code as it now stands. That subsection reads as follows:

assisting any public enemy at war with His Majesty in such war by any means whatsoever.

Under that section I would be liable to the final penalty. Under the new clause I would have to assist an enemy at war with Canada or armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged. It is much more restricted than under the old code. I was not in the house when the action was taken, but I for one have never been quite clear why this business of invoking war penalties when we were in a state of war which we had not declared was ever put into the code. It has always seemed to me that we got off on the wrong foot and made a lot of trouble for ourselves in fighting the war in Korea. We never did come right out and call it a war and I for one, without further illumination on the point, think that we took a wrong step.

It seemed to me that we followed too closely the example of the United States which wanted to bring in that thing they call a police action without having to get a declaration of war from congress. It seems to me that we should declare war if we are going to have to fight a war. We should declare that a state of war exists and get away from many of these difficulties that arise from different penalties applying with respect to a declared war and an undeclared war. For my own information I should certainly like to hear from the minister why we ever did that with respect to Korea. Would it not have been better to declare war and be done with it?

Mr. Garson: If I neglect to answer some part of someone's question I hope the person will bring it to my attention. To answer the question of the hon. member for Vancouver South first, I must say that the declaration or non-declaration of war does not come under the Department of Justice. All that comes under the Department of Justice is the legislative containment of the results of the non-declaration of war. This is what we have tried to do in clause 46.

Addressing myself to the question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, it seems to me, although I am very far from being an expert in this field, that where there has been no formal declaration of war the only basis you have for the imposition of penalties upon a traitor in relation to what is going on, for example, in Korea is the basis we have stated here in clause 46 (1) (c). We only arrived at the wording of this clause after the most careful consideration. What is it we are involved in? We are engaged in hostilities. That is all that we can say the fact is. There is no declaration of war, no state of war recognized according to the rules of international law. All there is is a state of hostilities, and that is the basis.

Actually, to get down to moral reality, the only information that will come within the status of the activities in which we are engaged is information which will assist the armed forces with whom we are engaged in hostilities. That is so not only for the reason I stated before but also for this reason. At a certain sector of the battlefield we may happen to be engaged with forces A of one country, with forces B of another country and with forces C of a third country. In a month or so forces C may go some place else and not be engaged there at all. We have to deal with the facts as they are from time to time in the hostilities. That is the only basis we can have for the use of a penalty against a person who discloses information of that sort. In the great majority of cases I would think that if information is given to North Korea or to Red China in connection with the hostilities, it is more than likely that the information given to them, in relation to mere engagement in hostilities as distinguished from a state of war in law, will be in relation to the armed forces. Indeed if information is given which is of value to the North Korean state apart from military activities then there is no reason in principle why that act should be any more culpable under clause 46 (1) (c) than if the same information were given to any other country with which we were not at war.

Mr. Stick: I do not want to make it too difficult for the minister, but there is a possibility that Great Britain may be at war with a country and we might not. What happens then? Does the section apply? For instance, Great Britain has recognized communist China, and we have not, so there could be complication in that respect. How would the section be interpreted if information were given to a country which we did not recognize? If we were not at war with a country, then the person giving the information could only receive a sentence of fourteen years; he could not get the death penalty. We are making the law now for the future, and not for the moment.

Mr. Garson: The answer to that question is that Canada is an autonomous nation. When we are talking about being at war within the terms of this section, we are talking about Canada being at war and not Great Britain being at war.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Fulton: It has nothing to do with recognition.

Mr. Garson: I was going to say that a country like Canada need not recognize a country in order not to be at war with that country. And it is the fact of Canada being at war or not being at war which will determine the penalty to be imposed upon a person found guilty of communicating information contrary to clause 46 (1) (e). But if not being legally at war our forces are engaged in hostilities with other forces then assistance to these hostile armed forces if proven will constitute an offence under clause 46 (1) (c).

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister has cleared it up satisfactorily.

Mr. MacInnis: I feel it is rather late in the day to discuss how we happened to get into the Korean war, and I imagine that none of us, despite the very unsatisfactory way in which it went, would wish we had not gone into it. Today we are trying to legislate for the offence of treason in the light of conditions into which the relationship between the nations of the world have brought us. I was glad to learn that this section had given concern to the cabinet, because I did not think the cabinet as a whole ever had time to give detailed thought to matters of this kind.

The point with which I find fault in section 46 is paragraph (g). I understand that when this provision appeared in the earlier draft of the bill in the other place they deleted it. Paragraph (g) reads:

(g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) . . .

I understand that with the amendments offered that will be changed to "forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (d)."

. . . and manifests that intention by an overt act.

How could it be ascertained that a person had formed an intention to do something if he did not manifest that intention in an overt act? I notice the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration indicating he could do it in writing, but the writing itself would be an overt act. I do not believe we should have in this bill any provision relating to forming intentions to do something. I think we could meet the situation equally well by an amendment to clause 46 (f) by saying, "every one commits treason who, in Canada, conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraph (a) to (e)." I should like to see the minister remove paragraph (g) altogether, and also the implication that would have.

This phrase "forms an intention" sticks in my crop. I do not see how in the world you are going to convict a person of an intention if that intention has not manifested itself in an overt act.

Mr. Knowles: At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that like some of the others who have spoken I am glad to note the amendments the government proposes to make to these sections. I feel it should be pointed out, however, that when one studies them closely there is really only one change being made. So far as the crimes listed in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) are concerned, they are still punishable by death or life imprisonment. The only change that is being made is with respect to communicating information under certain circumstances. In time of war that is still punishable by death or imprisonment, but in time of peace that act is punishable by a sentence of only fourteen years. I see the minister agreeing with me that the latter is the only change that is made by the amendments that are now proposed to the committee.

As hon. members know, most of us in this group question capital punishment itself, and in my thinking that carries over into this section of the Criminal Code. I had hoped the minister would be prepared to go farther than his amendments suggest, although that does not detract from my welcoming those amendments. In respect of the one change that is made by the two amendments, namely, that the maximum sentence of fourteen years be imposed in the case of communicating information in peacetime, I feel constrained to point out that that sentence seems to have been chosen to parallel the sentence of fourteen years that is provided in clause 62 of the bill with respect to sedition.

I point out that the sentence under that clause was only two years up until 1951, when it was increased to seven years, and it is now being increased to fourteen years. It does seem to me that, bearing in mind the circumstances under which a person might be convicted under this section, the length of sentence is rather long. I hope that might be looked at still further.

I am glad that the member for Kamloops questioned the minister as he did so that we were able to get the picture clear as to the meaning of the phrase "at war" in the amendments being proposed. I think it is now quite clear, although I must not speak for the hon. member because I do not think he is as satisfied as I am on that score. However, he can speak for himself.

The fact that the government has felt it necessary to introduce a wording in these new amendments that refers only to an actual state of war prompts me to ask the question as to whether any consideration was given by the government at this time to the wording of clause 46 (1) (c). That wording of course was put in in 1951. As the minister knows, it was the subject of considerable debate in this house. Here again the hon. member for Kamloops and I did not agree.

It seems to me there is still some question as to what might be involved in the phrase "assisting forces engaged in hostilities against Canadian forces." An example comes to my mind. Some hon. members may think it is far-fetched, but I lay it before the committee in all seriousness. It has been said in this house in recent days—and I am not trying to revive another debate—that to argue for the recognition of the present government of China is to assist that government.

Mr. Garson: Assisting the government is not the point; it is assisting the armed forces.

Mr. Knowles: It is pretty hard to distinguish between a government of a country and its armed forces, and I think that applies very definitely to China. I know they do, but it is not the case here. What is the position of a person not in the parliament of Canada where there is immunity, but of a citizen of Canada, making a speech and urging upon the government of Canada the recognition of the present government of China.

Mr. Fulton: We are not engaged in hostilities with them.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that. I know we are not now engaged in hostilities with them, but suppose that had happened before the truce was arrived at in Korea. Although we were not engaged in hostilities against them even then, it was alleged that armed forces of that country were engaged in hostilities against the forces of Canada. I wonder whether the minister can say that under that circumstance there is the possibility of one's words, in this land of free speech, being construed as in violation of clause 46 (1) (c)? In other words, Mr. Chairman, what I am asking is whether or not consideration was given to the revision of the decision that the government reached when it brought in the 1951 amendments to the Criminal Code.

Another point which I mention, just to include it in this context, is of course the one the minister wants time to think over. He told me that a few minutes ago. I suggest seriously that he does have to decide what the position is in the case of a judge who finds that the code offers only one sentence that he may impose, namely, liability to death, if the judge feels that the sentence should be something less. The minister has made it clear that where the possible sentence is liability to life imprisonment, the judge can impose imprisonment for a lesser period of time right down to one week. But I put the other question. It is a serious one. I do not raise it facetiously at all. What is the position of a judge in respect of the offences which carry the punishment of being liable to death, where the code provides no alternative, if a judge feels that there should be a lesser sentence?

I have one or two other points I want to comment on with respect to clause 46, and the last one I shall comment on is the one that my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, had something to say on a moment ago. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether subclause (f) as it now appears in clause 46 (1) is necessary at all, in view of clauses 21 to 24 of the code. These are the clauses that provide generally for parties to offences. Since they make that provision generally for all offences throughout the code, why does (f) need to be repeated in clause 46 (1)? I ask the same question with respect to subclause (g) of clause 46 (1). Why is it necessary, in view of the fact that the point there seems to be covered in clauses 406, 407 and 408?

As I say, Mr. Chairman, there are those and a number of other minor points that one might raise; but I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has touched on the most questionable part of this whole clause, namely, 46 (1) (g), which reads in the printed version:

> Every one commits treason who, in Canada,
> (g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act.

I hope the minister will not mind an illustration that now comes to my mind that I should like to lay before the committee. I remember back about 1943 or 1944 when a very largely attended meeting was held in the city of Winnipeg in the civic auditorium. It was held under the auspices of the Canadian-Soviet Friendship League. The principal speaker on that occasion was a chap whose name I do not recall at the moment, but he was a major in the Soviet army and he was at that time a military attaché connected with the Soviet embassy here in Ottawa. When the spy trials were held later and the royal commission made its report, the name of that military attaché, the very one who had spoken at that meeting in Winnipeg, figured very largely as having been a key person in what was covered in the report of the royal commission. I wonder whether the minister remembers who was chairman of that meeting? By the grin on his face I know he does. The then premier of Manitoba, the Hon. Stuart Garson, was the chairman of that meeting. I now ask the same Stuart Garson, who is now Minister of Justice, to look at the section of the code which he as Minister of Justice is now piloting through this house. This is what it says:

> Every one commits treason who, in Canada,
> (g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act.

That clause does not say how closely the overt act has to be related to the alleged intention. I wonder whether the overt act of the Minister of Justice, the then premier of Manitoba, in giving his blessing to that particular person could be regarded as manifesting the fact that he had formed an intention, without lawful authority, to communicate or make available certain information to another state.

Mr. Philpott: Come, come!

Mr. Knowles: I hear some people say "come, come"!

Mr. Abbott: What is an overt act?

Mr. Knowles: I hear people suggesting that—

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would he level the same charge at the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill for having had meetings with Stalin during that precisely same period?

Mr. Knowles: No; I am not suggesting that any such charges should be laid against the minister. It is precisely because I think such charges should not be laid against Sir Winston Churchill, or against the Minister of Justice, or against the hon. member for Vancouver South for some of the things he has written for the Vancouver Sun, that I contend that language such as this should not be in the Criminal Code.

The hon. member for Kamloops wants to know how the minister becomes involved, how the former premier of Manitoba is covered by this clause. This clause refers to a person having formed an intention to do anything mentioned in the whole paragraph, including conspiring. Does the overt act to which I have referred indicate that the Minister of Justice, who was then premier of Manitoba, and chaired the meeting, had formed the intention to conspire with the special speaker on that occasion to do some of the things prohibited in this section?

Some hon. members may take a certain amount of amusement out of this; even the Minister of Justice is amused. But I suggest something like that is no more fantastic than some of the things that have happened in this country. What I want to speak about chiefly in this connection will be more applicable when we reach the sections on sedition. However I should like to make a passing reference to the subject at this time.

I suggest it is no more fantastic that the Minister of Justice be charged under this section with an overt act, having chaired that meeting, which might have been regarded as manifesting an intention to conspire with a certain person, than it was to lay a charge of conspiracy against the late J. S. Woodsworth for quoting passages from the book of Isaiah. It is not one bit more fantastic, in fact it is not as fantastic as that was.

Mr. Pickersgill: It never went to trial.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—pardon me, the Secretary of State—says the case never went to trial. I know; because a similar charge against F. J. Dixon was heard first, and he was acquitted. So J. S. Woodsworth was given a stay of proceedings, proceedings which were never dropped. That stay of proceedings was with him as long as he lived. And through most of those remaining years he was a member of the House of Commons for the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre.

I submit this is not as facetious or as fantastic as some hon. members think it is. What we have here is legislation which, in my view, approaches thought control. We have legislation that gets at people, not for what they do but for what they think or what they intend to do. I submit that is going too far.

I enjoyed the minister's speech when we began discussion of this section, particularly the historical treatise he gave us concerning the development of the law of treason. I noted in particular the way in which he pointed out that it has moved from a concern for the persons of those who wear the crown to a concern for society as a whole. I also noticed his telling us that the range of offences that could be regarded as treason had been narrowed. He pointed out that in the early days there were various offences which are now considered as felonies but which, in those days, were treason.

My quarrel with section 46 is that, to an extent, it reverses that course of history. The course of history has been to narrow the field to such things as attacks on the person of the sovereign, and to the actual waging of war or the aiding of an enemy of the state. In section 46 we have a broadening of that arrangement to include the change made in 1951, and to include also the phrase to which I have been objecting more particularly, and which I have called legislation with regard to thinking.

While I am on my feet, despite the fact that it was my intention to make this reference when we reach the sedition clause, I should like to say a word about another former member of this group who, like J. S. Woodsworth, my predecessor in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, had the distinction of being charged with seditious conspiracy. I am sure all who knew him were indeed sorry to learn the news last night, and to read in the press this morning, concerning the death of the former member for Winnipeg North, Mr. A. A. Heaps.

I think it is highly significant that we should be discussing these sections at the present time. The law can sometimes be wrong. Those who enforce the law can be wrong. This country has had many instances where people who were charged under sections like this have been able to show to the country that they were its real patriots, its foremost citizens. I am pleased to have this opportunity today to pay my tribute to the work that was done in the council of the city of Winnipeg and here in parliament for many years by the former member for Winnipeg North, Mr. A. A. Heaps.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I, for one, am very sorry to see the minister proposing certain amendments to section 46. I feel that the section as it stands in the proposed code is quite adequate. My reason for saying this is that I cannot help feeling that a very unrealistic attitude is being taken concerning the word "war". I know there are plenty of legalistic niceties as to whether we are at war or are not at war with a country. But the situation in the world today is not the same as it was a hundred years ago when people sent a nice, formal declaration of war.

The present situation of the world is, I suggest, almost unique—and I believe the minister would agree with that statement. One may apply the various gradations of war —hot war, cold war, lukewarm war, undeclared war, hostilities—everything else. I think it is time we took a good look at what the situation really is. We were not a few months ago technically at war with communist China or with North Korea. But we had men fighting over there, men who died there. Yet we were not at war with them, of course!

Then, at the present time we are not technically at war with Russia; but to say the least, I cannot help feeling that there is a certain tension between the two countries. Let us suppose that Mr. X sells secrets to Russia or to some of her satellites concerning our radar defence in northern Canada, or about weapons we may have, which he knows perfectly well would be a procedure detrimental to this country and the United States.

At the present time he would go to prison, under the suggested amendment, for only fourteen years. I am sure there are many members in the house, who, whether they choose to say so or not, would agree with me when I say that a penalty of fourteen years for a person who sold secrets concerning our radar defence either to Russia or to Poland, or to some other country, would not be sufficient.

I cannot understand why the minister has made the change in this section. I know that during the past few weeks and months we have been bombarded with letters from the Canadian peace congress, and all sorts of other organizations, some of them genuinely sincere and believing that they are taking a proper procedure. One hears all sorts of stories about some mythical scientist who might by some accident communicate some form of information in the field of medicine to another country, and bring himself under this section.

I suggest however that in the present wording of the clause, prior to the suggested amendment, there is wide enough scope for a judge to make a proper decision in the matter of penalty.

Only in the very extreme case, such as the one I have cited where someone sells Canadian radar network secrets to Russia, would, I imagine, the death penalty be contemplated. But I cannot for the life of me see why the minister proposes this change. It is just playing right into the hands of the propagandists who work on behalf of the communists and fellow travellers.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this section before the minister replies. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he made the comment that the amendments introduced by the minister are at least a slight improvement. However, it is very difficult to discuss the amendments if you do not have a copy of them before you. But in any event I rise particularly to support the point of view advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

There are two major objections to this particular clause. As the hon. member who has just resumed his seat pointed out, we have been bombarded in recent months with communications, cards and briefs from trade unions and other organizations interested in civil liberties and human freedom. I received one from the study group at Carleton College which presents in quite an excellent manner their criticism of the clause we are now discussing. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that I can do better than just quote briefly from their letter because they emphasize, in other directions, the very points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I believe this is a very thoughtful presentation with respect to these proposed amendments to the Criminal Code, but before dealing with their specific objections I want to read a short introductory paragraph from this letter which was formulated by a student Christian movement study group at Carleton College in Ottawa. I presume this letter was sent to every hon. member in the house. This paragraph reads:

> Generally speaking, however, we feel quite definitely that certain civil rights are being infringed upon. We realize that Canada, both internally and externally, is attempting to adjust herself to changing world conditions. But even in these troubled times, basic freedoms, dear to our democracy, should not be forgotten. War hysteria is a phenomenon which, unchecked, could threaten the very foundations of our democratic way of life. In trying to protect ourselves against forces which are the embodiment of injustice and totalitarianism we must not become unjust and totalitarian ourselves.

I am sure all hon. members in this house will agree with those sentiments. The letter continues:

> We feel that our findings are well worth your consideration and trust that you will seriously and conscientiously read our objections.

The letter continues with respect to clause 46 dealing with treason:

> (1) Every one commits treason, who in Canada (c) assists an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are.

After quoting that section they go on to offer these criticisms:

> We do not object fundamentally to the phrase "assists an enemy at war with Canada" but we do object to the remainder.

I have received representations from a good many people who do. The letter continues:

> We do not question the right or the necessity of the crown to exercise vigilance in a time of international tension. We do not condone those who commit treason by helping an enemy at war with Canada. But is not a wide interpretation possible here? First of all, what does "assists" mean? Justice Minister Garson has said (House of Commons Debates, June 1951 at page 4636) "assisting means assisting in any way whatever". This consideration aside, Saturday Night, Vol. 67 No. 30, editorialized on this clause under the heading "What's Treason Nowadays" . . . "The extreme uncertainty and obscurity of the new definition of treason which makes it cover, not merely assistance to an 'enemy' but also assistance to 'any armed forces against whom, etc.? . . .' The existence of a state of war, and consequently of a defined enemy, is a matter of proclamation. The Queen tells her Canadian subjects to whom they may not lend assistance . . . No such official action is necessary to turn a legitimate action into treason when the test is merely that the action benefits any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities".

There is also the important matter of considering with how many countries Canadian forces are presently engaged.

Of course, this was drawn up during the Korean war. The letter continues:

No doubt Canadian forces are fighting Chinese forces. Does this mean that a Canadian businessman who consigns a cargo of non-war goods to Red China, even through intermediary countries, is treasonous, or that a Canadian labourer working with the United Kingdom (for by section 46 (2) this man would not have to be in Canada but only one "who owes allegiance to Her Majesty in right of Canada") engaged in trade with Red China would be found guilty of treason? We understand the situation it is designed to cover. Even so, we do not feel that the situation justifies such variation in the definition of treason, a crime punishable by death.

I would like the minister to deal with these criticisms in his reply. The letter then quotes clause 46 (1):

Every one commits treason who, in Canada,

(f) conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraph (d);

(g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act.

I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre dealt with that clause very well and I completely agree with his remarks. But the letter comments as follows:

Here an overt act manifesting mere intention is punishable by death, or life imprisonment, for example, it would appear that a person writing a letter to an agent of a state other than Canada arranging a meeting to communicate information might be guilty of treason—even though the letter was never mailed. It would be a reasonable police power to make the writing of such a letter an offence. But to go this far "behind the harm" and call it treason is unjust and out of line with the general tenor of our criminal law.

I believe the latter point is well taken. I would like the minister when he replies to the criticism of the act in regard to this clause to give his opinion of the criticisms outlined in this brochure.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I think I should call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing clause 46 and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I want first to comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway when he spoke with regard to paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 46 which reads as follows:

Every one commits treason who, in Canada . . .

(g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act.

I wholeheartedly agree with the comments made by the hon. member. I think it an unusual section for one to find in our Criminal Code. I think it indicates a departure from our accepted idea of our law. There are several other sections on which I should like to comment very briefly.

In paragraph (d) of subsection 1 of section 46 provision is made that:

Every one commits treason who, in Canada,

(d) uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province;

I should like the minister to define the words "force or violence". Those two words are perhaps open to wide interpretation. In our own history I think we have witnessed events which should point out the seriousness of this particular part of the section. In 1935, I recall that a group of young men from western Canada arrived in my own city on the way to Ottawa to place before the government their demands for work and wages. I recall people in my own city who at that time said, "These people are ne'er-do-wells: they are out to overthrow the government and to disturb constituted authority." Indeed there were many people in responsible positions who took that point of view. We know that the end result of that episode was an unfortunate riot. I draw that matter to the attention of the committee in order to indicate that in recent history there have been times when the interpretation of the use of force or violence and the intent of individuals were open to a great deal of question.

I do not think anyone who wanted to give the matter any serious thought or who thought about it objectively would ever have suggested that young, single, unemployed men who were looking for work and wages were out to overthrow the government of Canada by violence or force. But I remind the committee that in this country there were people who said that. Indeed, editorial opinions were expressed to that effect and even sermons were preached from some of our pulpits to the effect that the main purpose behind this march was an attempt to overthrow constituted authority.

There have been other occasions when the intent of individuals was open to question.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the Winnipeg strike. In doing a little bit of research and reading on that matter I have uncovered evidence pointing out quite conclusively that there were many people who at that time argued that the Winnipeg strike was not an ordinary strike at all but was an attempt to overthrow the government of Canada by force and violence. I draw those two incidents to the attention of the minister in order to indicate the seriousness of the particular section and the need for a clear-cut definition. I should therefore like the minister to give a definition of the term "force and violence" in connection with the overthrow of the government, so that it will be crystal clear as to what this section means.

Then in paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 46 reference is made to communication of military or scientific information. I think the term "scientific information" is one which should be carefully defined. In this world of ours I think we realize that all information and scientific knowledge is cumulative, and that it is the result of investigation and research being done by many hundreds or thousands of scientists in all parts of the world. We should therefore be careful to define our terms so that by no stretch of the imagination will this provision restrict the normal interchange of scientific information. I can quite appreciate the intent behind this section. Certainly none of us would approve the transmitting of information of a highly strategic character to any nation with which we might be at war or with which our relationships are not altogether too satisfactory; but I think we have to be careful in this instance to make certain that we do not restrict normal scientific advance.

I recall several years ago listening to a University of Chicago round-table discussion on a Sunday morning. At that time the scientists in the United States were greatly worried about the activities of the government in the country, particularly those of the army, in restricting and censoring papers which they wished to read at scientific conferences. On this score I think the minister should make clear to the committee just what is meant by this term "scientific information".

In paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 46 we find the words "assists an enemy at war with Canada". Some other hon. members dealt with this matter this afternoon. I think the main thing here is to have a clear definition of what we mean by "assists". The word "assist" has a broad meaning. In the light of present-day conditions I think we ought to be careful to make quite clear what we mean. I think one hon. member this afternoon mentioned the Mau Mau terrorists in central Africa to develop a point. I should like to indicate, perhaps by using this hypothetical case, the danger involved here. At the present time British troops are employed in central Africa combating the Mau Mau terrorists. It is altogether possible that in Great Britain there are differences of opinion as to how the government should deal with this particular problem. The official view of the government seems to be that the terrorists should be crushed and that the status quo should be maintained in Kenya. There may be those in the United Kingdom who believe that the best way of handling that situation would be to make some improvements in that country in order to meet some of the difficulties or complaints which have brought about this wave of terrorism. Indeed there may be those who argue that the best thing for Britain to do is to withdraw completely from that colony. There is a difference of opinion.

At the present time, if the section which we are now discussing were the law in Great Britain, a situation could develop wherein, if the official government position was that the British government was going to use all the military measures at its command to beat down the Mau Mau menace, anyone in the country who spoke against that policy and who advocated, for example, the withdrawal of Britain from that particular part of the area, or who urged the government to quit that area, could be described as giving aid and comfort to the Mau Mau terrorists and therefore, I suggest, could be held to be guilty of treason under the act.

Mr. Philpott: Oh no.

Mr. Ellis: Perhaps that is an interpretation with which some hon. members will not agree, but I suggest in all sincerity that it could be interpreted in that way.

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question? Surely not under the new act, under the old act, but surely not under the new act—

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I did not quite get a question out of that. I heard a comment.

Mr. Philpott: I can make it a question. When it is plainly stated that the enemy must be at war with the forces of Canada, how can the hon. member get the Mau Mau terrorists into that?

Mr. Ellis: I thought I had explained that I am taking a hypothetical case. I am suggesting what the situation might be if the section we are now discussing were the law of Great Britain. I am taking the situation over there. I am trying to get away from this country because I realize that in this day and age it is very difficult to be entirely objective on these matters. I think we can be a little more objective sometimes if we make our propositions hypothetical and remove them from our shores. I think I made my point quite clear. I am suggesting what could happen in Great Britain if the section which we are discussing were the law of that land.

If an Englishman were to criticize his government about Kenya or to insist that the government quit Kenya rather than supporting the police action or punitive measures being taken in that country against the Mau Mau, he could be held liable for treason under this section.

Mr. Michener: Which section?

Mr. Ellis: The section we are discussing, 46. Subsection (c) reads:

assists an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities . . .

That is the situation I have been describing with respect to England, and if this section were the law in that land it would read:

assists an enemy at war with Great Britain, or any armed forces against whom British forces are engaged in hostilities . . .

The Mau Mau could be construed as an armed force and they are engaged in hostilities against the British forces in Kenya. Therefore under the terms of this provision persons in Great Britain who oppose the policy of the government could be accused of treason. That is my suggestion to the minister. He may disagree with that. When he replies he may take a different point of view, but from a reading of this section I cannot see why the government could not interpret it to include the kind of situation I have just described.

In recent times we have seen police action taken on behalf of the United Nations, and I think perhaps we may see more instances of that kind.

Mr. Fulton: Where? Indo-China?

Mr. Ellis: With respect to the Korean situation, when it was decided that the United Nations forces should go north of the 38th parallel and move towards the Yalu river that move was opposed by the British government, by the Indian government and by a great many other governments. If this section had been in effect at that time a citizen could have been liable under it if he had expressed disapproval of that particular phase of the police action. I suggest that the important thing we must remember is that we do not want in any way to restrict the rights of Canadian citizens to express their opinions on matters of policy, including matters of foreign policy.

I realize there are many in this country who are opposed to some of these sections for different reasons than those for which we are opposed to them. But regardless of who may be in favour of this provision and who may be opposed to it, I think we as members of the house must use our individual judgment and decide about this section on its merits. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee an editorial that appeared in Saturday Night of May 3, 1952. It is headed, "What's 'Treason' Nowadays?" It deals with these sections of the Criminal Code and reads in part as follows:

Saturday Night had no enthusiasm for those amendments at the time when they were quietly wangled into the code with the least possible advance notice, and we have no more enthusiasm for them now, being convinced that they are potentially dangerous to the freedom of the citizen.

We pointed out at the time the extreme uncertainty and obscurity of the new definition of treason, a crime punishable by death, which makes it cover not merely assistance to an "enemy" but also assistance to "any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists". The existence of a state of war, and consequently of a defined enemy, is a matter of proclamation; the Queen tells her Canadian subject to whom they may not lend assistance and when such assistance becomes treasonable. No such official action is necesary to turn a legitimate action into treason when the test is merely that the action benefits any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities.

Incidentally, this removal of the distinction between "hostilities" and "war" abolishes at one sweep all the "laws of war" as they have developed over the centuries, and creates a new situation to which no precedents or treaties concerning war have any application. Among other things it is not necessary that the Canadian forces in question should have been ordered into hostilities by any action of the Canadian government; they may have been plunged into them by the commander of an allied but alien army. It may be treason to aid an armed force about which the Canadian government does not even know that it is "engaged in hostilities" against our forces, for the amended code says nothing about any action by the Canadian government whatever.

These amendments were drafted very hastily, and upon the urgent instigation of the United States. They have been sharply criticized by many of the best liberal-minded lawyers of the country. They should be very carefully overhauled at the present session.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the hon. member permit a brief question? Is the hon. member taking into consideration the fact that it is necessary under this section to have what is called mens rea, a guilty mind? There has to be the intention to do these things.

Mr. Ellis: I am not going to get involved in a legal discussion with my learned friend. I am not a lawyer and I must confess that my interpretation of this law is that of a layman. I will leave it to my hon. friend to pursue his particular approach to this matter.

Mr. Knowles: We can give him the answer from Tremeear later.

Mr. Ellis: I have read this editorial opinion to indicate that there are many in this country, apart from those people who have been described by hon. members as submitting urgent recommendations regarding this bill, who look upon some of these sections as being very serious in their effect. I think as members of the committee we should look at this matter from the standpoint of the rights of the individual Canadian citizen. I do not think that in the past we have encountered any particular shortcomings so far as the Criminal Code is concerned. Throughout our history we have found it possible to take care of those who have been guilty of treason against the country.

This afternoon the minister gave a talk in which he went back into the early history of the crime of treason. I think what he said is in itself very good reason why we should be most careful before we make any new departures with respect to the treason laws. When a change in law is made I think it is quite obvious that there should be some reason for that change. We in this group are progressive people. We advocate change but only when change is absolutely necessary, not change just for the sake of change. When the Criminal Code is being revised and consolidated there should be particularly strong reasons why any substantial change should be made.

I believe the minister will have to agree that during our long history—I am speaking now of British history because after all all our laws have been inherited from the British—our laws have not failed to take care of these cases of treason when they have arisen. I feel, therefore, the minister should have a very good reason for suggesting any new departures in so far as this law is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he apply the same principle to the economic system?

Mr. Ellis: As I see it, we do apply that principle. We advocate change because, from past history, the need for economic change has been proven. We have had serious depressions in this country. In case the hon. member's memory is short, there were serious economic conditions in this country from 1935 until 1941 which his predecessors did not solve. We in this group advocate change, and we do so because we know that change is necessary. If the hon. member is prepared to accept the conditions that existed prior to the outbreak of world war II as being normal, then that is his right but we in this group maintain that the history of this country has shown the need for a change.

If the minister can show us a great need for a change in this particular section, then of course that will go a long way towards influencing our opinion on some of these things.

Mr. Garson: There is not any change.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ellis: There is a great deal of change here. I cannot quite accept that. I have not the statute with me, but it seems to me that prior to the introduction of this bill the old act required that there be a declaration of war before a person could be charged with treason. A person had to give assistance to a nation with which Canada was at war, whereas under the new section there need be no declaration of war at all.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend is labouring under a delusion because, so far as this particular section is concerned, Bill No. 7 re-enacts the law which my hon. friend from Regina City is discussing as it was on the statute books at the time the bill was under preparation; and the amendments we introduced today are I take it all in the same direction as the hon. member is thinking.

Mr. Fulton: In order to clarify the matter, may I say that paragraph (c) is not new because it was enacted in 1951. However, the minister would not say that paragraph (e) had been there before. I am not discussing whether or not it is justified, but let us be fair and say that paragraph (e) is new law.

Mr. Garson: But paragraph (e) is not what my hon. friend from Regina City has been talking about as I understand him. He has mentioned clause 46 (1) (c) and 46 (1) (d), but he has not mentioned (e). So far as (e) is concerned, the hon. member for Kamloops is quite correct; but the points to which my hon. friend from Regina City is referring as having been changed contain no change.

Mr. Ellis: I am not talking about changes in the last year or so. When we are finished with this bill, as I understand it, this is going to be the Criminal Code of Canada. There are a few matters in connection with capital punishment and lotteries that the commission will have to decide, but my understanding is that we are now revising the Criminal Code of Canada. What I am saying is that the provisions which we are now being asked to pass are different from the law which has obtained in this country over the years. The minister will agree with that, will he not? I am not referring to what happened a few years ago, but prior to world war II there was a provision that made a declaration of war necessary before a person could be charged with treason. Am I not correct?

Mr. Garson: In so far as clause 46 (1) (c) is concerned, but that was added to the code in 1951. If I recall correctly it was changed at that time, but it is not changed in this bill. This bill simply carries forward what was introduced into the law in 1951.

Mr. Ellis: I am not going to argue the point of whether this was changed in 1951. My whole approach to this bill is that it will be the revised Criminal Code. It is true that some of the changes made a year or so ago are going to be incorporated, but whether or not a particular change was incorporated two years ago or more does not alter the validity of the arguments which are being raised now. We want this changed, and that is my argument.

Mr. Garson: You want it changed back.

Mr. Ellis: Certainly, I am saying it has been changed from the established practice. Merely because the change was made two years ago does not mean it was the established practice.

With regard to this section, Mr. Chairman, I do feel the objective which we should seek in this committee is to make this country safe from treason and espionage. I feel all hon. members are agreed that we should have good laws on our statute books to protect this country against those who commit treason. When we have gone that far, we must be extremely careful not to make the laws so ambiguous or so difficult to understand that it might be impossible to apply justly and thus create a lot of borderline cases. There should be no possibility of any misunderstanding. I suggest that there are terms used in this section that are extremely difficult to define exactly.

So long as the section is in the form it is now, it does offer some threat to the liberty of the individual. Once we have protected this country against acts of treason, it should be our task to be just as zealous in removing any possibility that this section could be used to deny any Canadians the right to express their opinions on matters of urgent public importance.

Mr. McIvor: I know something about the Winnipeg strike and the marches that took place. One of the causes of this was section 98 of the Criminal Code. I thought then that section 98 should be obliterated, and when our party came into power that was done.

Mr. Knowles: Not entirely.

Mr. McIvor: It took away individual rights. I do not see anything in this act so far that would compare with section 98. So far as the Winnipeg strike was concerned, I was in favour of it up to a point. The strike was won, and decidedly won. The strike committee did not use their grey matter or else they did not have any. If they had waited another week it is the consensus of the middlemen that the strike would have been won. What did the strike committee do? They called out the firemen; they closed down the waterworks; they called out the milk wagons. They took over the government of the city and then they issued cards by permission of the strike committee. Then the middlemen in Winnipeg woke up. They formed a committee of a thousand and that is what beat the strike.

Those who are in charge of labour or those who are fighting labour have to be fair. To me the trouble then was absolute selfishness on both sides. Until we find some way to kill absolute selfishness, there will be trouble.

There is one thing that I should like to say—

The Chairman: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I wish he would confine his remarks to clause 46 and the amendment proposed by the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. McIvor: I do not mind being called to order by you, sir, but there is one thing that follows in clause 46, and that is the penalty of death. I may be wrong, but I am one of those who is not absolutely sure that we should have the penalty of death in any case. Thank you.

Mr. Fulton: I know very well that the minister will be anxious to answer the arguments that are being put up. In so far as the defence of the government is concerned, I am not disposed to rush to his rescue, because he is capable of taking care of himself and the government does not deserve, indeed if it needs any, help from this side in respect of its own case. But because we of the official opposition take a rather different view from the views expressed by the hon. member for Regina City particularly, and one or two others who have spoken, there are some factors which are important to bear in mind in order that we may be fair in what we are doing if we should enact this clause in its present form or that of the amendment suggested this afternoon.

In the first place, in so far as subclause (c) is concerned, it is important to bear in mind that it is not the government that is going to be interpreting the clause. I may interpolate here, thank God for that. But the fact is that it is the courts that are going to be interpreting the clause and are going to decide whether an overt act has been committed, or any other act, which indicates that the person accused has done something with the intention of assisting an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities. Owing perhaps to the reluctance of this government to face facts, what used to pass for or be called "at war" is now described as "a state of hostilities." We have things called "states of hostilities" today and if we have that state of hostilities, then it seems to me that we have to take account of it in our criminal law, and that is what this section enacted in 1951 did, and that is I imagine the purpose for which it is being continued.

I suggest this also to my hon. friends who are concerned about the possible abuses of the section. I recall very clearly when the section was under discussion in this house in 1951 I asked whether it would be possible that it might apply to the case of a Canadian who at that particular time was engaged in making broadcasts from North Korea in favour of the enemy, and accusing the United Nations' troops of indulging in germ warfare, which to me is very close to treason, if in fact it does not constitute treason. I was told at the time that it was the opinion of the law officers of the crown that this section was not sufficiently wide to make it possible to lay a charge against that person when she might return to Canada. If that is so, then it seems to me that the effect of the section is pretty narrowly restricted, and it is going to cover only genuine cases of treason. It does seem to me that we should admit in realism the possibilities of treason under the new set of circumstances, and that what we have is called a state of hostilities instead of a state of war. Therefore I am not very much alarmed by the continuation of subclause (c) which was enacted in 1951.

I should like to deal for a moment with subclause (g) which also has given rise to concern and express why it is that we are prepared to support this clause in its present form. It is being suggested that to provide that a person who forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act is guilty of treason is something that should not be in our Criminal Code. I just point out that it is in that form in almost these words in section 78 of the Criminal Code, which has been there since at least 1906, if not indeed since 1892, and which reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who forms,—

Then there are detailed certain intentions, and it continues:

> . . . and manifests any such intention by conspiring with any person to carry it into effect, or by any other overt act, or by publishing any printing or writing.

Therefore subclause (g) has been in the law for quite some time.

Mr. Knowles: That does not sanctify it.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all, but I think my hon. friends will have to make a better case against it than they have made so far in order to justify its removal.

I should like to ask the minister to enlighten the committee with respect to this matter of liability. I am using the word "liability" in the sense that it says a person is liable. It is pointed out in clause 47, which is the section imposing the penalty:

> Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable
> (a) to be sentenced to death—

Now, by the amendments there are certain modifications introduced, and an alternative is made in time of war when he may be liable to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life. The question has been raised as to whether the provision of that section providing for a sentence of imprisonment for life makes it possible to impose an alternative punishment. The question was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to whether that form of words "liable to be sentenced to death" makes it possible to impose an alternative punishment to the death penalty. It seems to me that clause 621 would be the governing section here, where you find in subsection 1 the following:

> Where an enactment prescribes different degrees or kinds of punishment in respect of an offence, the punishment to be imposed is, subject to the limitations prescribed in the enactment, in the discretion of the court that convicts a person who commits the offence.

Then, subclause 2:

> Where an enactment prescribes a punishment in respect of an offence, the punishment to be imposed is, subject to the limitations prescribed in the enactment, in the discretion of the court that convicts a person who commits the offence, but no punishment is a minimum punishment unless it is declared to be a minimum punishment.

With these two provisions taken together, it would seem to me that where it says the person is liable to be sentenced to prison for life that is not prescribed as a minimum punishment, and therefore, in the discretion of the court imposing the sentence, any imprisonment for a lesser term than life could be imposed. But where you have it set out that a person is liable to be sentenced to death, then I do not see any alternative; I do not see any room for discretion, because if you sentence him to death he is sentenced to death. You cannot sentence him to partial death or to less than death. There surely is no room for discretion. I think we should be quite clear, particularly because of the amendments advanced with respect to clause 47.

I would like the minister to tell us the effect of these apparently alternative sentences, the different sentences of death or of imprisonment for life. I take it that they are alternatives. In other words, a judge can sentence to death, but he need not sentence to death. Therefore if you are not going to sentence to death, you can impose any jail sentence you like—a sentence of life, or any other lesser term. Because of its importance, under section 47, about which I shall have something to say later, I should like the minister to confirm whether or not that view of the law is correct.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend from Kamloops is trying to heap coals of fire upon my head for having opposed his resolution the other day in the matter of crime comics, for he has undertaken tonight to answer three or four arguments for me, and in a manner upon which I certainly must commend him, and with most of which I am in complete agreement. For that reason I do not think it will be necessary for me to devote further time to reply to the hon. member for Regina City. The hon. member for Kamloops has done a first-class job of this already.

Now, with regard to the point he has raised: when I was asked that question this afternoon, without stopping to look at the wording of the section, I was in some doubt, because in the section dealing with murder the wording is that an accused shall be sentenced to death, whereas in the case before us the words used are that he shall be "liable to be sentenced to death". I think, however, for the reasons given by the hon. member for Kamloops, that it is clear beyond peradventure that a distinction has to be drawn between the mandatory sentence of death authorized in clause 47 (1) (a) as it is in the bill, on the one hand, and the discretion given to a court to impose a sentence of death, or imprisonment for life, under clause 47 (1) (b), on the other. Because here are two subsections in juxtaposition, one of which says that the convicted person is liable to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life, and the other of which says that an accused person shall be liable to be sentenced to death. It seems quite clear that in the first case there is a discretion in the court as to which of two alternative sentences may be imposed, but in the second, there being no alternative to the death penalty, it is mandatory.

Members who want to make absolutely certain of this point wish to amend 47 (1) (a) so that it would have the same wording as that in the section providing for the death sentence for murder. I do not think that is necessary because, historically, the death sentence has always been mandatory for treason, and the wording we have in section 47 (a) is the wording which goes back to 1892, when the code was first enacted, and which has prevailed ever since that time.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Regina City, I am not a lawyer; and I was impressed by the lack of reality in his speech.

It seems to me that the Criminal Code, basically and fundamentally, is a Canadian Criminal Code for Canadians. I do not know why we should get involved with the Mau Mau. What I am asking is that we keep to the idea that this is a Canadian Criminal Code. If we were to do that I think it would be better for all members in the house, and all Canadians outside the house.

As to this question of treason, I would point out that when the Criminal Code was first discussed in the house two years ago I had a few words to say on the subject of treason and sabotage. I have not changed my mind one iota since that time.

Mr. Knowles: A typical Liberal.

Mr. MacDougall: It is quite possible to put up a plausible argument for a lessening of the penalty for treason. One can allow himself to be drawn away from the fundamental principle, and that is that a person who commits treason against his country, particularly in wartime, is not only guilty of the villainous act of treason but, additionally, he is guilty of mass murder. And let us not mistake that situation.

Through the medium of the press and through debates in the house we hear suggestions concerning those poor people who have committed murder, to the effect that they should not be hanged. Well, whether they should or should not be, it seems to me the time has come for parliament and all people in Canada to realize that when someone is murdered, that murdered person is one of a family who will sorrow for the loss, just as we see people sorrowing about the fate of the murderer.

I believe we can allow our emotions to run away with us on an issue like this. My suggestion is that we should keep in mind the horrible results that can flow from treason. It is not the murder of one person or two: It may be the murder of 200 or 2,000 innocent people. Rather than go along with the hon. member for Regina City, and try to minimize the effect of the Criminal Code, I suggest to the House of Commons through you, sir, that we should increase the intensity of punishment. We should not allow ourselves to be carried away by emotional sentiment.

I will admit much can be said on both sides of the question. But let me explain this, that freedom is not licence. When we have freedom in the country it does not mean that we are permitted by the laws of the country to commit mass murder. And, particularly in wartime, it seems to me the death penalty is not too great when treason has been proved. I think the people of Canada generally would agree with me when I say that treason is one of the most despicable crimes that can be committed against one's fellow man.

I recall from my public school days a verse which, while not written particularly on the subject of treason, does make reference to those who have no patriotic feeling toward the land of their birth. If my memory is not at fault, the verse runs like this:

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd
As home his footsteps he hath turn'd,
From wandering on a foreign strand?
If such there breathe, go, mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim,—
Despite those titles, power and pelf,
The wretch, concentred all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust, from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonour'd, and unsung.

Surely the man or woman who holds Canadian citizenship either by naturalization or by birth should not at our hands receive a lesser sentence than has been depicted in the closing words of the verse I have just recited. Treason is a despicable crime and the tougher it is made on one who has committed such a crime then as far as I am concerned the happier I will be.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, if we can come down from the realm of the poetic for a moment and discuss the very unpoetic and pedestrian wording of this clause I should like to have some explanation regarding subclause 3 of clause 46 which states:

(3) Where it is treason to conspire with any person, the act of conspiring is an overt act of treason.

If we look back to subclause 1 it will be noted that there are two paragraphs there which appear to cover that particular case. For example paragraph (f) states:

conspires with any person to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e).

I assume that the actions set forth in paragraphs (a) and (e) comprise the circumstances under which it is treason to conspire. Then in paragraph (g) we have it carried a little further. I refer to the paragraph to which my colleagues objected and to which I add my own objection. Surely we are attempting to decide what were the intentions of those who conspired. The question I want to find the answer to is the necessity for subclause 3 when we already have paragraphs (f) and (g) of subclause 1. Is there some other purpose to it than is set out there? It seems to me we cover quite effectively the treason which is involved in conspiracy in the previous subclauses. Or is there some distinction between committing treason and committing an overt act of treason? Would the minister give us an explanation?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, clause 46 in subclause 1 lists under paragraphs (a) to (d) inclusive examples of different forms of treason and then in paragraph (e) it lists the paragraphs which have been mainly under discussion this afternoon and this evening which cover the communication of information which being brought in under the treason section is made treason. Paragraph (f) refers to the conspiracy of committing the offence of treason.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): As set out in the previous subclauses?

Mr. Garson: Yes, in all the previous paragraphs. In other words, they may not succeed in committing the offence of treason under paragraphs (a) to (e) inclusive, and it may not be possible upon the evidence which is available to the prosecutor to say anything more than that a conspiracy was hatched to commit treason, and that at the time this conspiracy was disclosed the act of treason itself had not been consummated. But the act of conspiring to commit treason is in itself a crime. Paragraph (g) specifies and refers to an overt act indicating an intention to do any of these things above mentioned. But this reference to an overt act is some measure of protection for the accused because it means he cannot be charged with a mere idea. He cannot be convicted for having an idea. It is only when as a result of entertaining that idea he has done some overt act that he offends against clause 46 (1) (g); and unless that act can be proven against him he will not be convicted under clause 46 (1) (g).

Subclause 3, the other point to which my hon. friend refers, is I believe pretty largely self-explanatory. It states:

Where it is treason to conspire with any person, the act of conspiring is an overt act of treason.

In other words, where the conspiracy which is charged is in reference to an act which is treason then the act of conspiring itself is an overt act of treason within the meaning of paragraph (g) of clause 46, subclause 1.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before we carry the clause as amended I wonder if the minister will comment on the suggestion some of us have made that reconsideration might be given to the wording of clause 46, subclause 1, paragraph (c). A number of hon. members have quoted from an article in Toronto Saturday Night. I have in my hand an editorial from the Ottawa Citizen dated Friday, May 2, 1952, which was written on the basis of the article in Saturday Night, and also on the basis of what happened in the House of Commons here in 1951. The minister is perfectly correct in drawing attention to the fact that in so far as Bill No. 7 is concerned we are not enacting clause 46, subclause 1, paragraph (c), for the first time. It is old legislation, but not very old. It was introduced for the first time in 1951. Despite the poetic utterances we heard from the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard on the effect of this clause, I would like to draw attention to this paragraph from the editorial in the Ottawa Citizen. The heading is "What is Treason?" and the editorial states:

"Treason," a crime punishable by death, may be interpreted as assisting by trade, criticism, or in any way whatever any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are in "hostilities". Under the term "hostilities" might come any police action in which Canadians were involved by other than Canadian authorities, regardless of whether or not the Canadian government had issued an order or a declaration of war.

The editorial writer of the Citizen went on with a sentence which modesty prohibits me from quoting in full, but I will say it refers to the fact that these amendments were passed over protests of a number of "parliamentary watchdogs" of civil liberty and the names listed therein include members of the Liberal party, Progressive Conservative party and the C.C.F. My hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway and myself happened to be included, but so also was the hon. member for Prince Albert, and Senator Arthur W. Roebuck in the other place. The Citizen editorial writer goes on to say:

When parliament deals with the report of the royal commission on Criminal Code revision, the changes of last June should be reviewed and improved beyond criticism.

I should like to know what the minister has to say in response to that. I think it is fair to say that there has been, in his own words, no substantial change in clause 46, subclause 1, paragraph (c) from the form in which this legislation was enacted in 1951.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at the present Criminal Code, if he has it in front of him, he will find that section 74 (i) reads as follows:

Treason is
(i) assisting any public enemy at war with His Majesty in such war by any means whatsoever;

Then if he will look at the first part of section 46 (1) (c) he will see the words "assists an enemy at war with Canada". I am sure that he will not object to that language.

Mr. Knowles: That is pre-1951.

Mr. Garson: Yes, indeed; for many years. The language here used in clause 46 (1) (c) is not so explicit or so far-reaching as that of the code from which it is taken. I take it therefore that when my hon. friend says he wants reconsideration of paragraph (c), he is talking entirely of the words commencing with:

—or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are;

Mr. Knowles: That is correct; reading the word "assists" in connection with the words which the Minister of Justice quoted.

Mr. Garson: That is right. In other words, the whole thing would read as follows:

Every one commits treason who, in Canada,
(c) assists . . . any armed forces—

And so on. There is a good deal of editorial opinion to the effect that this wording is the product of inadequate consideration and lax draftsmanship. In a matter of this kind it is extremely easy to sit on the sidelines and criticize. I can assure my hon. friend and those critical editors that we were, in the anomalous situation in Korea, confronted with a legal problem of great difficulty. In international law there was not any state of war. There was no declaration of war. Yet large forces were engaged in a violent conflict and scores of thousands of people were being killed and wounded. Nearly all of the physical and military characteristics of war were painfully self-evident. Under these circumstances the legal draftsman has a task of no little difficulty to provide that a treasonable act done in relation to these hostilities in Korea which, had it been done in relation to killing people in an officially declared, formal war, would certainly be an act of treason.

I think that there will not be too much disagreement in this committee that treason in substance is treason whether it is committed in relation to the hostilities in Korea or whether it is committed in relation to a war officially declared according to international law. The task of providing words that would cover a case of that sort fell upon the parliamentary draftsmen, and it was only after a great deal of consideration that these words that appear in the section were chosen.

To those who are inclined to criticize them, including the editors, I would say that we who shared in the responsibility take the criticism in good part. We realize that the words may not be perfect. But we should be greatly interested and gratified if our critics would produce a better concept and a better wording to delineate the offence we were trying to provide for. The matter is most difficult. Two or three states may be involved as enemies. We hardly ever know whether any given state is engaged in the war. We are not sure until their troops are identified there that they have any part in it; and even then they may deny it. There is therefore no use of defining the treason in any sense in relation to the state that is concerned. It must be defined in relation to the forces which are engaged in hostilities. That is what has been done. With all due deference to the views that have been expressed this afternoon and this evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Regina City, I would submit that since penal statutes are strictly interpreted by the courts, the assistance that is meant here, and that the courts would interpret to be meant here is assistance to the armed forces of the enemy.

Mr. Ellis: Will the minister say why it would not be possible to put those words in the act?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will just listen carefully, I will read the section to him. It reads as follows:

> Every one commits treason who, in Canada
> (c) assists—

[Mr. Garson.]

I will leave out the reference to "an enemy at war with Canada".

> —any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are;

Sometimes we can determine who the forces are but we are not so able to determine to which country they belong. Under these circumstances the draftsman is bound to relate the act to assistance given to those forces.

My hon. friend was talking about the Mau Mau and so on. I would ask him if he has such little confidence in a jury of Canadian citizens that he thinks that a person would be found guilty on a charge under this section for making a speech upon the foreign policy of Canada advocating that the British people or rather the Canadian people—I suppose it would be ourselves if we were at war with the Mau Mau; if you could call an affair of that sort war—should withdraw; or, as to Korea, for making a speech in Canada questioning government policy in Korea. A great many such speeches have been made, in fact, and I have not heard of any charges being laid under this section. But how could the best prosecutor in the country convince a jury of Canadian citizens that a man who made a speech in Canada questioning the wisdom of Canada's foreign policy in relation to Korea could be assisting the forces in Korea against whom the Canadian forces were opposed?

We must use a little bit of common sense in the interpretation of these provisions. Indeed, as I said before, when penal sections come before the courts the general practice is to interpret them strictly because we do not believe in depriving the accused of his liberty unless the charge can be strictly brought home to him. More than that, one of the difficulties of proving a charge of treason is that there is no other section in the Criminal Code in respect of which the necessity for proving mens rea or the guilty mind is more strict than it is in connection with the offence of treason. It would not only have to be proved that the accused in a case of that sort had been guilty of some act the effect of which would have been to assist those armed forces, but the crown would have to bring home to him the mens rea, the guilty mind or intent that in what he was doing his intention was to assist the forces engaged against the Canadian forces in Korea. Therefore all this talk about this section being an interference with freedom of speech in Canada is—if I may use this word and if it is parliamentary—just pure unadulterated poppycock.

Mr. Fulton: A stronger word could be used.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: Carried on division.

Clause as amended agreed to on division.

On clause 47—Punishment.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Sinclair moves:

That clause 47 of Bill No. 7 be amended by deleting subclause 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"47 (1) Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable

(a) to be sentenced to death if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of subsection (1) of section 46;

(b) to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (d), (f) or (g) of subsection (1) of section 46;

(c) to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (e) or (h) of subsection (1) of section 46, committed while a state of war exists between Canada and another country; or

(d) to be sentenced to imprisonment for fourteen years if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (e) or (h) of subsection (1) of section 46, committed while no state of war exists between Canada and another country.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fleming: Will the mover of the amendment explain?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it is with some regret that I have to say that we find the amendment to this section moved by the minister unacceptable. The reason for that is the amendment deals—I think the minister will agree with me—pretty well exclusively with the fact of a verdict of guilty under subsection (e) of section 46. The intent of the amendment is to provide that if a person conveys information of a military or scientific nature to the agent of an enemy state in peacetime, then the maximum sentence will be fourteen years, and if he conveys such information to an agent of an enemy state when a state of war exists between Canada and any other country then there will be the possibility of the sentence of death or sentence for life or any lesser jail term that may be imposed in the discretion of the court.

It is to the effect of this amendment on subsection (e) of section 46 that I intend to address myself exclusively. I am sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is not in the house because, while I do not echo all the sentiments he expresses, I would imagine he would approve of the sentiments I am about to express and upon which I am about to give him the opportunity to vote. I hope that perhaps some of his colleagues will acquaint the hon. gentleman with the fact that this opportunity is to be afforded him so that he can come in and tell us where he stands.

I take the position that subsection (e) of section 46 is the sort of provision which we should not enact lightly in the Criminal Code of Canada. It is the sort of section which, as I see it, arises out of and is made necessary by the revelations of the royal commission on espionage which revealed the extent to which and the skill with which enemy agents are able to infiltrate even the government service, even the realms in which the most secret research and scientific work is carried on. The royal commission indicated to us not the possibility but the very grave danger of the betrayal of these secrets to the agents of an unfriendly foreign country.

With the developments that have been taking place in the Pacific in the last couple of weeks, with the knowledge we have that Canada is building a radar screen across the north country, and with the knowledge we have that we and our allies are doing our best to develop our own defences against the possibility of attack and also to seek weapons on the basis of the existence of which we hope to be able to deter anyone who may have it in his mind to make an attack, I think it becomes obvious that one of the most vital interests of the state is to prevent knowledge of these defensive systems and of these possible weapons from falling into the hands of the only potential aggressor. It seems to me to be perfectly obvious that that is the aim and object of subsection (e) of section 46.

As I say, even with the reluctance that we experience in enacting this sort of thing in peacetime, it does seem to me that we are justified in placing this type of provision in our law with all the safeguards that have been described in the discussion that has just concluded on the previous section. It seems to me that if we are going to put that into our law we are going to deprive it of any effect, particularly any deterrent effect, if we make the penalties such that a dedicated agent of a foreign country may incur them without too much regard for the consequences. That is the first consideration which comes to my mind.

The second consideration is that probably no more dreadful thing can be done than to betray to a potential enemy the very methods by which we are trying to make ourselves secure against his attack, and particularly to place in the hands of that potential enemy the weapons which we are developing and which we ourselves rely upon, for the time being at any rate, as being the most powerful deterrents against that sort of attack. In other words, it occurs to me that it boils down to this, that it is just as dastardly an act of treason to betray our secrets at this period as it would be to betray them in time of an actual shooting war, and that therefore the effect of the amendment moved by the minister, providing that the maximum penalty that may be imposed for that type of treason committed at the present time should be fourteen years, is not well conceived and should not be accepted by the committee.

I had thought of moving an amendment to the amendment which would change subsection (b) of the proposed amendment to read:

to be sentenced to imprisonment for life or such lesser sentence as the court in its discretion may impose if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (e) while no state of war exists between Canada and another country.

But looking it over it occurred to me that that object was already achieved in subsection (c) of the proposed amendment because subsection (c) provides that such person may be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (e), and that that effect would be achieved if we deleted the last two lines of subsection (c) and all of subsection (d). Then you would leave alternative sentences, a penalty of death or a penalty of life imprisonment or such lesser jail term as the court in its discretion thought fit to impose.

Therefore the court could take cognizance of the nature of the offence if proven. When I say "proven" I ask my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party and all other hon. members to give due weight to that word. We are not letting down the barriers which protect an accused. We are not making it any easier for the crown to discharge the onus on it, but we are saying that when the crown has discharged that onus of proof, then it shall be in the discretion of the court to take cognizance of the heinousness or otherwise of the crime of which the accused is now convicted by a jury of his peers. If the crime of which he is guilty, and was found to be by that jury of twelve men, is a very serious and dastardly one, possibly giving away important secrets with regard to our radar defences or secrets with regard to atomic or hydrogen bomb development, then it shall be in the discretion of the court to impose the penalty of death. But if the crime is a lesser one, perhaps resulting only from carelessness, inadvertence, or from the fact that the accused was genuinely interested in scientific development and it is at least open to suggestion that the communication he had with the foreign country was to his mind merely a process in the stage of scientific development, and that he had no thought of betraying his country by something of that nature, then it will be in the discretion of the court to impose a jail term up to a maximum of life imprisonment. I call to witness here what the minister has said to me on other occasions about the undesirability of imposing too many restrictions on the court as to the discretion it will use in imposing a sentence or in making the punishment fit the crime. I suggest we are entitled, in the interests of the state, to leave it to the court to decide whether this act of treason, committed at a time when there is no declaration of war between Canada and any other country is a type that merits the death sentence or the lesser sentence of imprisonment up to the maximum of life.

I feel, therefore, that having taken the step, which is a hard step to take, to enact subsection (e) of section 46, we should not weaken our position by deciding that the person who is guilty of that sort of crime in time of peace, possibly with the most reprehensible of motives and the most deliberate of intentions, should not be liable to suffer the most extreme penalty. He may have acted deliberately; he may have acted in a way that makes it clear he knew quite well the effect of his action would be to deprive hundreds of thousands of his fellow men of their lives, so I do not think it is too much to suggest our courts should have the discretion of exacting from him the severest of penalties.

I therefore move:

That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the words "section 46" in the proposed subsection (c) thereof.

Mr. MacInnis: As it has been indicated there is likely to be a vote called on this section, Mr. Chairman, I wish to put myself on record as supporting the amendment that was moved earlier by the Minister of Fisheries. The hon. member for Kamloops said that this amendment imposes too many restrictions on the judge in passing sentence. I do not agree because this amendment outlines quite clearly the penalty for committing the crime, not only under different circumstances but at different times as well. I do not believe that the commission of the crime mentioned in section 46 (e) is the same when committed in time of peace as it is when committed in time of war.

I think probably this should be said by a person who finds himself in my position. A most amazing amount of thought and consideration has been given to the revision and consolidation of this code. I believe it is a very great thing that the bill has been reviewed in this committee of the whole with such meticulous care. When the bill becomes law there will be sufficient evidence, I believe, of what the parliamentarians had in mind that when the judges have to deal with any of these offences they will find their decision easier than otherwise might have been the case. I do not believe that the crime of communicating secrets to the enemies of Canada is the same thing when committed in time of peace as it is in time of war. If this section comes to a vote we are bound in the interests of good lawmaking to support the amendment.

Mr. Pearkes: I find it extremely difficult to draw an exact line between peace and war. I think of Pearl Harbor. The United States and Japan were at peace, but Japan struck at Pearl Harbor. Might not a situation arise in the future where some treacherous person was able to guide a flight of enemy bombers through, shall we say, our radar screen and up to some vulnerable target in this country, then turn back and leave the bombers to go to their target? He would be, I suggest, committing an offence just as deadly as if he had gone right in with those bombers.

Under this amendment, if he were subsequently captured I suggest he would be able to plead that war had not been declared and that the treacherous act had been committed during peacetime when he had shown the enemy flight of bombers the way to avoid our defences, but before the actual act of war had been completed he had turned around and gone back. He would be able to plead he had committed this offence in peacetime rather than in war.

Mr. Knowles: Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, all of us in this group will oppose the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops, and in turn support the amendment which has been moved on behalf of the government by the Minister of Fisheries. On the assumption that the amendment carries, I may say that we are still not satisfied with clause 47. In our view there are two or three things that are still unsatisfactory about it. We have already expressed our views with regard to capital punishment itself, and I want to say I do not think the minister satisfied me earlier this evening on the point as to what the judge does with respect to a person accused under clause 47 (1), (a), (b) or (c), where the penalty may be the liability to be sentenced to death.

What I have in mind there is that though in the lesser crimes the judge is given an alternative, in connection with the highest form of treason there is no alternative whatsoever. However, I do want to extend my commendation to the government and to the cabinet for having given consideration to this matter, for having set up a subcommittee, as the minister pointed out this afternoon, to go into it and to come up with at least some amelioration of the situation as proposed in the amendment of the government which is now before the house.

As I listened to the hon. member for Kamloops, I recalled something I ran across a few days ago in a book by Lord Rosebery on the life of Pitt. He discussed some of the very restrictive and coercive laws that were put on the statute books in the days when Pitt was prime minister, at the turn from the eighteenth to the nineteenth century. He speaks as an Englishman who is not happy over the fact that there had been on the statute books of that country at various times certain restrictive and coercive pieces of legislation, and he says one or two things that I should like to quote:

> It is not easy in cold blood to defend these proclamations and prosecutions and bills. Still less easy is it for a generation that has so often resorted to coercion to criticise them. Ever since the death of Pitt, all English governments have at times adopted those exceptional measures for which their supporters are so apt to censure him.

He goes on a little further to say:

> For the extraordinary laws parliament itself bears the burden. Its secret committees and reports made it impossible for any minister to refrain from proposing coercion bills. The scandal and terror caused by the assault on the king were the cause of others.

This is the sentence to which I draw particular attention:

> These laws were passed, and these prosecutions instituted under the ignorant ferocity of panic.

I hear people saying there is no comparison. I submit we are brought very close to that situation in the remarks that some hon. members are making. There is panic and there is fear, and some amongst us are forgetting some of the great principles of freedom and liberty that are so basic to our way of life. I think of those words of another Conservative, uttered not so long ago, Sir Winston Churchill, when he said that we must not lose faith in democracy's capacity to tolerate free speech. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that these restrictive measures, these attempts to increase penalties like this, suggest a sense of panic that is really not necessary and is not in keeping with our democratic tradition.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Before the question is put I think one should deal just briefly with the suggestion that I suppose is bound to be made on a matter of this sort, and that is the amendment that we have moved here today, the amendment to the amendment, represents a restriction on free speech. We are dealing with subclause (e) of clause 46, and the penalty to be imposed if a person is convicted of an offence against that section. Let us read what it says:

(e) without lawful authority, communicates or makes available to an agent of a state other than Canada military or scientific information or any sketch, plan, model, article, note or document of a military or scientific character—

And here are the important words:

—that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defence of Canada.

I am not able to see that there is any infraction of the right of free speech in stating that a person will not be free to communicate to an agent of a state other than Canada information of a scientific character which refers to radar, radar installations, the H-bomb, our atomic research in the field of weapons; that sort of scientific information, or of a military nature; the disposition of Canada's defences, the defence plans and installations which are designed to protect us against aggression, or to be called into effect if we ourselves should be attacked; information of that nature that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defence of Canada. Is there any infraction of the right of free speech in saying that a man will not be free to convey that sort of information which he knows or ought to know may be used against us, against his own fellow citizens? I think, sir, although I am a member of the Conservative party and of the official opposition, that I have a reasonable—I was almost going to say a liberal mind; I don't mind using that word—

Mr. Fleming: Make sure it is spelt with a small "l."

Mr. Fulton: Yes, and a much more liberal mind than some of my colleagues on the other side of the house. I think that our whole position over the past few months and years has indicated that, but I cannot see anything here that is an infraction of the right of free speech. Since we have taken that position to make it an offence to convey to an agent of an enemy state such information for such purposes, then it seems to me that it is a matter we can discuss and debate here without accusing each other of transgressing on civil liberties as to whether, if a person is found guilty by a jury of his peers of that offence, and found guilty after he has been tried in our courts with all the safeguards that exist there, and which we certainly at this time have done nothing to remove; with all the safeguards which surround an accused person, then, what we are doing by our amendment to the amendment if it carries, in modification of the minister's amendment, is saying that it shall be open to the courts to determine whether the crime of which the accused is convicted is of a sufficiently heinous nature with respect to its effects upon the fellow citizens of that accused person to warrant even the imposition of the most extreme penalty.

It will be up to the courts to determine that. We are not saying that every person accused shall be dealt with in that way. We are saying that if the crime is potentially dastardly enough we are justified in leaving it to the courts, if the accused has been found guilty, to say whether or not he shall be punished in that way; that is all.

Mr. Nesbitt: I expressed my views on this, I may say, in no uncertain terms this afternoon. Before we come to a vote on this amendment to the minister's amendment I was wondering whether he would care to comment on some of the arguments that have been presented by this party; because I cannot conceive how the minister could have moved the amendment he did, in view of some of the arguments that are being presented here.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Amendment to the amendment negatived: Yeas, 16; nays, 55.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Fulton: Carried on division.

Amendment agreed to on division.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 47 as amended carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause as amended agreed to on division.

On clause 48—Limitation.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I notice that subsection 2 of section 48 contains some restrictive aspects on the proceedings for overt treason, as set out in clause 47. I notice that it does not include the overt act of treason that is defined in section 46 (3). I wonder if the minister could tell us why that distinction has been made?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, until I heard my hon. friend comment just now I would have said that clause 47 provides penalties for all offences described in clause 46. It will be noted that clause 47 is the penalty clause. What is the language upon which my hon. friend is relying in support of his allegation to the contrary?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): In the first place we turn to section 48 and we see this:

No proceedings shall be commenced under section 47 in respect of an overt act of treason expressed or declared by open and considered speech—

And so on. Now then, overt acts of treason set forth in clause 47 are only those that are set forth in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) or (g) of clause 46, and have no reference to clause 46 (3).

Mr. Garson: May I point out that clause 46 (3) is a subsection in the nature of an interpretation section. It does not create a new offence, but it makes it clear that the "overt act" referred to in paragraph (g) of clause 46 (1) includes the act of conspiring to commit treason. Subsection 3, in a sense, is a definition section, and it explains what an "overt act" of treason includes. It includes the act of conspiring to commit treason.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am still a bit at sea. I was not at all satisfied with the minister's explanation when I raised the point on clause 46, and I am still in a fog. I said at that time that I could not see any necessity for subsection 3. It does not refer specifically to the previous subsections of clause 46. It just says, "where it is treason to conspire". Now, where is it treason to conspire?

Mr. Garson: Clause 46 (1) (g) reads in this way:

Every one commits treason who, in Canada . . . (g) forms an intention to do anything mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) and manifests that intention by an overt act.

Now, if a charge were laid under paragraph (g) the question would then arise: What does such overt act include? Subclause 3 of clause 46 answers that question by saying:

Where it is treason to conspire with any person, the act of conspiring is an overt act of treason.

So that then the prosecutor and the accused person himself knows that when a charge is laid under clause 46 (g), among the other overt acts of treason that can be brought home against an accused is the act of conspiring to commit treason.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 50—Assisting alien enemy to leave Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions on this clause. First of all, will he comment on lines 31, 32, 33 and 34 which read—

—unless the accused establishes that assistance to the state referred to in subparagraph (i) or the forces of the state referred to in subparagraph (ii), as the case may be, was not intended thereby, or—

Is this not another case of putting the burden of proof on an accused? I see the minister shaking his head and, while I like to see him shake his head, I would rather hear what he has to say.

Mr. Garson: To begin with, as the sidenote on the opposite page indicates, this is a re-enactment of section 76 in the existing Criminal Code. The lines about which my hon. friend complains provide a defence for an accused against the charge brought against him, and where it has been proven that he "incites or wilfully assists a subject of (i) a state that is at war with Canada, or (ii) a state against whose forces Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities, whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the state whose forces they are, to leave Canada without the consent of the crown". These lines enable the accused to make a defence for himself by proving that he did not intend to assist such state or such hostile forces.

Perhaps I might illustrate by giving a parallel example of a case that actually occurred in Great Britain. This was the case of Rex v. Ahlers, 51 K.B. 616, where the accused was charged with adhering to the king's enemies by aiding and comforting them. The accused, who was a naturalized British subject, acted as consul for the German government in the first world war. He assisted German people to return to Germany in August, 1914, after a state of war existed between Great Britain and Germany.

I would ask my hon. friend to follow this, as compared with the defence provided in this bill, because the charge was somewhat the same. His defence was that he believed that under international law nationals of belligerent countries were allowed a certain time to return to their own countries if they so desired, and that he had no evil intent in assisting the Germans to return to Germany. It was held by the court of appeal that the jury should have been told in the judge's charge that they must consider whether the acts of the appellant were done by him with the intention of assisting—

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister would go back a sentence or two, and repeat.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it was held the jury should have been told by the judge whether that action had been taken with the intention of assisting the king's enemies, or whether, on the other hand, he acted without any such evil intentions. The crown must prove the intention. In the present case it is specifically provided the accused can come along and establish that the assistance to the state referred to in subparagraph (i) or the forces of the state referred to in subparagraph (ii), as the case may be, was not intended thereby, and in that way he establishes his defence. In this case in Great Britain it was held the judge should have charged the jury as to the nature of the defence which was established in that case.

Mr. Knowles: Was the case in Great Britain quoted by the minister based on British law or was it an appeal in connection with a Canadian case?

Mr. Garson: It is based on British law.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister the corresponding section from British law?

Mr. Garson: I do not think we have a charge of adhering to the King's enemies but that I believe would come under (c) assisting an enemy at war with Canada, or specifically it would come under assisting enemy aliens to leave Canada and get back to their own country.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the case the minister has brought to our attention and I can see that it might cover this clause, but I confess I am not fully satisfied. I think the reason for my last question was obvious, namely that the court's decision was based on the wording of a British statute which may not be parallel to this clause. Its significance would not necessarily carry over. According to clause 50, it is a defence for the accused to be able to establish that the assistance he is charged with having given was not intended to be assistance to the enemy. That is a defence.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: But supposing he is not able to establish that defence? Does the case then go against him automatically on the basis that he has not established the required defence? What is there in the section to require the crown, in the absence of the accused establishing that defence, to prove that there was intent?

Mr. Garson: First of all, the crown has to prove that he wilfully assisted, and they prove that by showing that in fact he got these people back to their homes in the same way as the crown has to establish the case in Great Britain. Then he comes along and says: "Well, I got them back all right, but I did not do that to help this other country. I did that because I was under the impression that there was a period of time during which it was quite proper for them to go back and I did not do it to help the German government against the British government. I did it because of this mistaken impression that there was a period of time during which it was proper for me to do that." I have not read the full report, but judging from the Ahlers case he was found guilty and then the case was taken to the court of appeal on the grounds that there had been a misdirection and that the judge should have charged the jury to the effect that the crown must prove an intent on the accused's part to assist the king's enemies and that the jury should consider the evidence which showed that he had no such intention.

Mr. Knowles: I hope that judgment from the British court has significance for our own courts.

Mr. Garson: But the advantage of this clause in clause 50 is that the case goes against the accused, unless the accused establishes that assistance to the state referred to in subparagraph (1), and so on was not intended by what he did.

Mr. Knowles: I can see that that is a defence if he is able to produce it.

Mr. Garson: If he is not able to produce it then he would not have a defence and he would be found guilty.

Mr. Knowles: That is my point. Does it follow automatically that if the accused cannot prove himself innocent he is then found guilty?

Mr. Garson: No, it does not. It is only when the crown is able to produce evidence to prove a prima facie case against the accused that if the accused cannot answer this prima facie case the crown has brought against him he will be found guilty, and I believe rightly so.

Mr. Knowles: Let me ask one more question. I note the penalty under this clause, which was two years under the old code, is now increased to 14 years. That is a substantial jump. Can the minister give any justification for that? It was two years as set out under section 76 of the old code.

Mr. Garson: One fact that should be kept in mind in that connection is that these sections in the old code, as my hon. friend can see from the footnotes, go back to the last revised statutes of 1927 and probably before that. In the interval there have been a number of international events such as the second and perhaps the first world war, and other international developments which have led people to revise their ideas as to the proper punishment that should be imposed in cases of this kind. This penalty to which my hon. friend refers is one that was recommended by the royal commission which drafted the code and it has gone through the other place on two separate occasions. Finally, it came back into the House of Commons at the last session and went before the House of Commons special committee and now comes before this committee at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: May I remind the minister that in the interval between the time when this section was first put on the statute books there were amendments in 1951 which dealt with other sections in the code both before and after this one and apparently at that time it was not felt necessary to change the two-year sentence.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that it is ten o'clock?

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would like to take the second reading of the Quebec Savings Banks Act hoping and believing that there will be practically no debate on it since it will be sent to the banking and commerce committee after second reading has been granted; then we shall continue with this debate hoping to finish it before five o'clock.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 6, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, of which I have not given him notice. He may not need any notice because it is the subject of an editorial in the Globe and Mail of this morning. Is any instruction given to the agents of the department abroad to limit to any definite quota the number of immigrants from countries in which they operate?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the near approach of the Easter recess, can the minister say whether the legislation respecting pensions for disabled persons will be on the order paper before we rise for Easter? If not, will it be on the order paper when we come back?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend did not give me notice of this question. The answer is simple. I have already given it three times this session. The government, having initiated this program, will be among the first to see that it is brought in at the earliest possible moment.

TRANSPORTATION

ARROW LAKES—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is based on the boiling indignation of 3,000 of my constituents at the intent of the Canadian Pacific Railway to terminate steamer service on the Arrow lakes on the 24th day of this month. Has the minister received any communication from any minister of the government of British Columbia urging favourable consideration of any application for a subsidy for the maintenance of steamer service on the Arrow lakes?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to that question is yes. I suppose I should add this: The communication came from the minister of public works of that province, in which he asked whether the federal government would give consideration to the establishment of a service by means of a subsidy. While I have not answered his letter, I am afraid that the answer must be in the negative, because the government gave very careful consideration to that matter some time ago and has decided against it.

Mr. Herridge: On the basis of the minister's answer, I should like to ask a supplementary question. If the government of British Columbia were to take over and operate steamer service on the Arrow lakes, would the federal government give consideration to an application from the government of British Columbia for a subsidy equal to 50 per cent of the loss incurred, or an agreed percentage in the operation of this steamer service until road transportation was available?

Mr. Chevrier: If the government of British Columbia will make an application along the lines of my hon. friend's question, I am sure we shall be glad to give it the best consideration possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION COAL BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys? Can the minister inform the house whether he is in a position to bring down the estimates for the dominion coal board before the Easter recess?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Not until after the Easter recess, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

PROSPECTIVE AGREEMENTS WITH SPAIN AND PORTUGAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I put a question to his parliamentary assistant concerning the instructions given to the trade mission going to Spain and Portugal. Can the minister now answer the question?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The purpose of the trade mission going to Spain and Portugal is to endeavour to straighten out trade difficulties in those countries which arise from exchange restrictions and import controls. It is hoped that by negotiation we can clear the avenues of trade so that we can get better results from our efforts in these two countries.

Mr. Fleming: Is there anything in the way of a new trade agreement, apart from the removal of exchange restrictions and import controls, being sought or expected during the course of those negotiations?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That will depend on the attitude of Spain and Portugal toward a new agreement. If an advantageous trade agreement can be worked out, I have no doubt that the trade mission will recommend it to the Canadian government.

FISHERIES

SALT FISH—MEETINGS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND AND NOVA SCOTIA OPERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which I sent to his office yesterday. Because of his absence then, he may take it as notice. Is he in a position to make a statement concerning the outcome of the meetings held on Thursday and Friday last with Newfoundland and Nova Scotia salt fish operators? If so, will he state the basis on which the operators in the mainland provinces, especially Nova Scotia, will be able to buy salt fish in Newfoundland?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will accept the question as notice and make a statement later.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

ADULTERATED BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question either to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or to the Secretary of State concerning a certain question of mine passed as an order for return on March 3, and having to do with certain stocks of adulterated butter in the hands of the government. I wonder if I might expect an answer before the butter is disposed of?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO STIMULATION OF PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the dust bowl conditions in the grain producing areas in the United States and the lack of grain production thereby, has the minister any plans for stimulating Canadian grain production and assuring domestic grain supplies for Canada during the next two or three years?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I can offer no such stimulation or assurance. Canada has at least one crop in hand which has not been sold as yet, and I might point out to my hon. friend that we never kill the wheat crop in the month of April either in Canada or in the United States.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

REVISION TO CONFORM WITH DECENNIAL REVISION OF BANK ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for a revision of the Quebec Savings Banks Act in conformity with the decennial revision of the Bank Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, the bill to be based on this resolution provides for the revision of the Quebec Savings Banks Act under which two savings banks operate, one in Montreal and one in the city of Quebec. The principal features of the bill are: (1) the extension of the bank charters for a further period of ten years to July 1, 1964; (2) a provision, complementary to the proposed legislation in the National Housing Act, to permit these banks to lend money on insured mortgages; (3) an increase in the limit on the amount which the banks may lend on conventional mortgages; and (4) an increase in other investment and lending powers.

I am proposing that, for the first time since 1913, there should be a complete re-enactment of this act and a repeal of the former one. In doing so, this bill follows, wherever appropriate, like provisions in Bill No. 338 relating to the chartered banks, which has recently been given consideration by this house and sent to the banking and commerce committee for further study. Many of the administrative changes proposed in that bill have been incorporated in this one as well. I shall be pleased to give a more detailed explanation when the bill is before the house for second reading, and I propose, after it has been given second reading, to move that it be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the minister is going to comment further on second reading and proposes to send this bill to the banking and commerce committee, I shall reserve my comments.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 419, respecting savings banks in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Abbott moved the second reading of Bill No. 419.

He said: This bill provides for the revision and re-enactment of the Quebec Savings Banks Act and for the extension of the charters of the two banks which operate under this act for a further ten-year period.

These banks, one in Montreal and the other in the city of Quebec, are each over 100 years old, having been founded in 1846 and 1848 respectively. They were later incorporated by special acts and after confederation were granted charters in 1871 which were to continue in force for ten years. Since that time, it has been the custom to enact decennial extensions of the charters concurrent with those of the chartered banks. Their record has been one of steady progress under sound management and today their combined assets amount to more than $225 million.

The operations of the savings banks are in many ways similar to, and in other ways quite different from, those of the chartered banks. Hon. members will recall that changes were proposed in the method of computing and in the level of cash reserves for chartered banks, but I am not proposing similar changes in this bill. The movement of deposits and loans is far less volatile than in the chartered banks, and the present reserve basis has proved satisfactory for these institutions.

Loans on the security of mortgages have been, for many years, a type of investment in which similar institutions in other countries have invested funds. The act was amended to permit our savings banks to enter this field in 1948 and they have since become quite an important factor. At December 31 last they had outstanding almost $7 million in loans of this kind. At present these loans are limited to the equivalent of 10 per cent of a bank's deposit liabilities. In this bill, I am proposing that the limit on conventional mortgages be raised to 20 per cent of deposit liabilities and that, as proposed for the chartered banks, insured mortgage loans under the National Housing Act may be made without statutory limit.

There are also several provisions in this bill which alter and, in some cases, increase the investment and lending powers of these banks. I shall not deal with them in detail at this stage as the changes will be apparent to hon. members as they study the bill, and it will of course be considered in the banking and commerce committee.

As I informed the house a few moments ago, this bill constitutes the first complete revision since 1913 of the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and there have been included all the provisions of the proposed Bank Act which are appropriate to the operation of these savings banks. Some of the more important are provisions relating to: (1) the period in which the banks may carry on business; (2) a method of increasing the authorized capital and the manner in which the bank may dispose of the additional stock; (3) investment restrictions with respect to bank pension funds; and (4) destruction of old records.

There are, of course, many consequential changes, but these do not require explanation at this time.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the amendments proposed in this bill will benefit these two institutions, which have served their respective communities so well for more than a century, and will also benefit those who use their services.

As I have indicated, when the bill is given second reading I shall move that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee, where I am sure it will receive the careful study it deserves.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, again, in view of the fact that the minister proposes to refer this bill to the banking and commerce committee, I shall reserve any comments I wish to make until that time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening we were considering group 4, and I shall now call clause 50. Shall the clause carry?

On clause 50—Assisting alien enemy to leave Canada.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to ask a question or two about this clause. I have one or two recent letters here that deal with it. One, in dealing with section 50 (1) (a), has this to say. In order to save time I am not going to read the section.

> The same phrase "engaged in hostilities, whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the state whose forces they are" appears here. The same objections mentioned in regard to section 46 (1) (c) hold here. Further, we object to the shifting of the burden of proof: in this section the accused has to "establish" his lack of intent to assist the foreign state. Traditionally in our criminal law an accused has had the protection of a "presumption of innocence"; here the presumption is rather of guilt.

I should like to have the minister's comment with regard to that criticism of the section.

Mr. Garson: I did not catch my hon. friend's concluding sentence. My hon. friend said "I should like"; I did not hear what he would like.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Herridge: The question that was raised was this:

> Further we object to the shifting of the burden of proof:

I am talking about clause 50 (1) (a). The letter continues:

> in this section the accused has to "establish" his lack of intent to assist the foreign state. Traditionally in our criminal law an accused has had the protection of a "presumption of innocence"; here the presumption is rather of guilt.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had dealt with that question at some length yesterday in reply to the points that were raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I pointed out that the necessity for the accused's establishing what his intentions were did not arise until after the crown had first proved a prima facie case against him. I dissented from the view which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had expressed that there was any shifting of the onus in this section. I said that what the section really did was to spell out that if the accused, although he might have committed some act from which it appeared that he had committed the offence, was able to show that his intent was not to commit it, that would constitute an effective defence.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 57—Offences in relation to members of the R.C.M. Police.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister will offer a few comments on clause 57? I believe a few changes have been made from the wording as it was in section 84 of the former version of the code. One is—and I mention this with approval—that the word "wilfully" has been introduced. The only other change of significance seems to be in that the last three lines have been reduced to one line. I take it that the punishments to be meted out for an offence of this kind are on summary conviction and are covered elsewhere in the code. The main question I want to ask is this. Why is it that, in the case of clause 54, no proceedings shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada whereas there is no such proviso in the case of clause 57? Perhaps the minister could indicate not only why that proviso is in one clause and not in the other but could also tell us what is the effect of having that proviso in or out?

Mr. Garson: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as an institution of government, come under the direction of the Attorney General of Canada. In the ordinary routine of laying a charge under this section I would think the charge would presumably be laid on the recommendation of the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which recommendation would be made to his minister who would be the Attorney General of Canada. That would not be true in section 54.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, that opens up another question. Why then is the consent of the Minister of National Defence not required in the case of clause 54? I throw out that question to the minister. I still ask him if he can give an answer to my other question, even though he may think it does not now apply: what is the legal significance, in a case like that of clause 54, of having the proviso that the consent of the Attorney General of Canada must be obtained?

Mr. Garson: The legal significance is that before proceedings can be instituted, perhaps irresponsibly, the case has come to the personal attention of the Attorney General of Canada who, being a lawyer, is able to examine the facts upon which it is alleged that the proceedings can be instituted in order to make sure that the facts support the proposed charges and that no person will be put to the inconvenience of defending such proceedings unless the sufficiency of the evidence has been passed upon by the Attorney General of Canada.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 60—Sedition.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 60 is the first of three clauses dealing with the subject of sedition, seditious libel and seditious conspiracy. We bordered on this subject yesterday when we were dealing with the subject of treason although, as I understand it, there is a distinct difference. The hon. member for Fort William yesterday spoke with satisfaction of the fact that soon after the Liberals came to power in 1935 action was taken to delete the former section 98 from the Criminal Code. Many of us were indeed pleased that that action was at long last taken in 1936. I do not have yesterday's Hansard in front of me in order to make a direct reference to it but, as I recall it, the hon. member for Fort William suggested that section 98 had been obliterated completely and I offered the interjection "Not entirely". I rise to explain my interjection and to go on from there.

If one looks at chapter 29 of the statutes of 1936, which was an act to amend the Criminal Code, he will find that section 1 did what the hon. member for Fort William said was done. It repealed in its entirety section 98 of the Criminal Code, chapter 36 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. Accordingly, these volumes that some of us have which purport to be office consolidations of the Criminal Code as it now exists have a blank between sections 97 and 99. There is no section 98 in the code that is at present in force. However, if one looks further into the same chapter 29 of the statutes of 1936 which repealed section 98 of the Criminal Code, he will find that section 4 of that statute added a new subsection 4 to section 133 of the code. Section 133 of the code is the section dealing with sedition. The point I wish to make—indeed the point I had in mind when I made my reply to the hon. member for Fort William last night—is that some of the words that were in the former section 98 were retained in the code by putting them in subsection 4 of section 133. I refer in particular to such words as "who teaches or advocates". I want to make it quite clear that as I read subsection 4 of section 133 of the code as it now stands—

Mr. Philpott: Which code are you referring to, the new one or the old one?

Mr. Knowles: The old one at that moment—or as I read clause 60 of the bill now before us, it is difficult to take exception to any of the words in either instance, although I do take exception to certain words in clause 62. Nevertheless the fact is that under words like those in clause 60—and these are some of the words that were in the former section 98—some things have happened in this country which some of us cannot forget. I made a passing reference yesterday to what happened in Winnipeg in 1919, and the hon. member for Fort William also made reference to the events in Winnipeg in that year. I have no intention of recounting the events of the general strike that took place in my city in that year, but I do remind members of the House of Commons that on that occasion some nine or ten citizens of my city of Winnipeg were charged under the Criminal Code with various offences, in most cases the charge being seditious conspiracy.

I referred yesterday to the case of the former leader of this group, who was the former member for the constituency I have the honour to represent, the late J. S. Woodsworth, who was charged under the Criminal Code of Canada with seditious conspiracy. One of the several counts laid against him in that charge was that he had quoted these words in certain articles which he had written:

> Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed;
>
> To turn aside the needy from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor of my people, that widows may be their prey, and that they may rob the fatherless! . . .
>
> And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.

They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.

These passages from the book of Isaiah actually got into print in an article over the name of J. S. Woodsworth and, believe it or not, they were included amongst the counts laid against him when he was charged with seditious conspiracy. There was a fifth count against him which had to do with certain articles that had got into type but which had never reached print. They have of course reached print since then. In fact I should like to read at the moment from a book on the life of J. S. Woodsworth by his daughter, Grace MacInnis.

Count five, "Alas! the poor alien", was one of those articles seized in type. An indication of its nature can be had from its opening and closing sentences. It began: "When is an alien not an alien? Answer: When he is a rich man, a scab-herder, or a scab." And it ended: "If after a fair trial undesirable aliens are found, let them be deported. Meanwhile, how about deporting the profiteers? Everyone knows they are undesirable."

There was another count, count six, containing a quotation from the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, later a minister in the British cabinet. Entitled, "The British Way", it outlined the platform of the British Labour party together with the comments of Mr. Woodsworth, including the following:

This is the British way, and remember! It is absolutely constitutional!

I should say in passing that the reference in some of these quotations to deportation was of course in connection with a certain amendment to the Immigration Act which was passed rather hurriedly during the heat of the Winnipeg strike. I went to the library yesterday to refresh my memory on that part of the story, with which I was already quite familiar, and despite the fact that I have known the story for many years it did seem rather strange to look at just two pages of the printed Hansard for June 6, 1919, and to discover that within the compass of those two pages one finds the record of the introduction of a bill which had been passed in the other place, and which was given first reading, second reading, consideration in committee of the whole, third reading and was passed, all, as I say, within the compass of two pages of Hansard for June 6, 1919.

Hon. members may be interested in knowing what the very next item was immediately after that bill had been given its three readings in such a short space of time. The next item recorded in that Hansard was that there was a messenger at the door, namely, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. Parliament was in high gear. The bill had been passed in the Senate that same day, before it came here. It was passed here in less than an hour and the governor general or his deputy was ready to give approval to that amendment to the Immigration Act. Indeed, it was an amendment to amendments that had already been made at that session.

Such was the speed with which parliament acted on that occasion towards people like J. S. Woodsworth and A. A. Heaps, both of whom I mentioned yesterday. Eight others were involved, including William Ivens, John Queen, George Armstrong, R. E. Bray, Robert Russell, W. A. Pritchard, R. J. Johns and F. J. Dixon. These are not men, Mr. Chairman, who can be thought of any longer in this country as guilty of sedition, although a number of them spent time in jail, several of them in Stony Mountain penitentiary or at what was known as a prison farm.

As the Secretary of State pointed out yesterday, the actual case against Mr. Woodsworth was never brought to trial. The reason for that was that the charge against F. J. Dixon was very similar to the one against J. S. Woodsworth and the case of F. J. Dixon was called first. He defended himself in an address to the jury which is one of the masterpieces of the history of our area, and he was acquitted. As a result of his being acquitted, Mr. Woodsworth was informed a few days later that there was a stay of proceedings so far as his case was concerned and that he need not appear until he was advised. Well, he never was so advised, but that stay of proceedings stood for the rest of his life.

I have mentioned the case of William Ivens, one of the few of this group who is still alive. He is living in the city of Winnipeg and is still active and interested in the affairs of this nation. Some months ago I had occasion to make a close study of Mr. Ivens' life in connection with an address I was asked to give. Indeed, it was at a banquet that we tendered him as a testimonial at the time of his seventy-fifth birthday.

I was quite interested in some of the material that is on record, and this relates very substantially to this whole question of what is sedition. My whole point is that we have to distinguish between those who are definitely against the community as a whole, definitely against society, definitely against Canada, and those who are merely seeking or advocating reform. As I suggested yesterday, some of those who have been adjudged criminals by the laws of the land have turned out to be the nation's real patriots.

Just before the incidents of the strike period in Winnipeg in 1919 it appears that Mr. Ivens, who was writing in a publication known as the Western Labour News, said something rather critical of the Winnipeg Free Press. That goes on all the time and to those of us who live in Winnipeg that sounds like today rather than thirty-five years ago. At any rate, shortly after that the chief press censor for Canada—I need not bother to name him now except to say he was a civil servant—wrote the editor of the Free Press and said something like this: "I note in the issue of the Western Labour News of January 31, 1919, a bitter and unwarranted attack on the Free Press. You might be interested in knowing the record of this man Ivens as revealed by an examination of his writings made at this office."

Then, after using a few epithets and adjectives that were not altogether complimentary, and in my view were quite false and unwarranted, the chief press censor set out to give to the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press some of the quotations from Mr. Ivens' writings which were objectionable, which were seditious, which were terrible. I am going to give one or two of them.

Mr. Garson: Did he say "seditious"?

Mr. Knowles: He left that to the Free Press. I am sorry I have not the full text of the letter, and I would not want to make that assertion without checking back on it, but certainly that was the inference. This is one of those objectionable quotations:

> War will end not by war and not by the professions of the diplomats while war is in progress, but by the establishment of justice on the earth.

Imagine that as an objectionable statement! I can imagine the Secretary of State for External Affairs saying practically the same thing today. He might use slightly different words but he would express those same sentiments.

Here is another quotation:

> The imperative call for the statesmen of the world to adjure and utterly repudiate their imperialistic secret treaties and to restate their war aims in conformity with their claims of a war for justice, right and democracy is resounding across the world today.

As I say, it was quotations of that sort that the chief press censor of Canada drew to the attention of the Free Press so that they might answer "this man Ivens". I must digress for a moment to say that I have not been able to find anything in the files of the Free Press during the period following the writing of that letter to indicate they made use of the information conveyed to them by the chief press censor for Canada. By the way, I should just complete briefly my reference to William Ivens by pointing he was one of those who, during the strike of 1919, was charged with seditious conspiracy and upon being convicted was sentenced to jail. He came out of jail to take his place in the legislature in Manitoba, having been elected to that legislature while he was still in jail. The same thing happened in the case of John Queen and George Armstrong, if not in the case of others as well.

As a matter of fact, the Minister of Justice will recall being associated with these men as a member of the legislature of Manitoba during the time when he and they were there together. I am sure he will agree with me that they were not seditious characters. They may have given him a lot of trouble—

Mr. Garson: As a matter of fact, one of them, the Hon. S. J. Farmer, was my colleague in the Manitoba cabinet for two or three years.

Mr. Knowles: I do not wish to spoil the minister's story, but the gentleman to whom he refers was not put in jail.

Mr. Garson: No, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: He was one of the group who did not happen to have that distinction conferred upon him. John Queen, who was one of those who spent time in jail, was not only in the legislature along with the Minister of Justice when he was there, but for some eight or nine years was mayor of the city of Winnipeg, as was S. J. Farmer shortly after the strike.

It is very easy to talk about these things in retrospect and to say that they will not happen again. I am sure that the people of Winnipeg, prior to these incidents, would not have imagined that these men would be charged with seditious conspiracy and would spend time in jail. It did happen, and some of this language is still a part of the code. I want to say quite frankly that I find it difficult to quarrel with most of the precise wording in the clause that is before us, but I do not like the use of those words "teaches and advocates," because they were in section 98 and have been carried over into this clause 60. I do make a plea for an understanding of this whole situation, and for the realization that we have to distinguish between treachery to one's country and the attempt to win reform, even radical reform. In other words, sedition must be recognized as treachery against the country as a whole and not just opposition to the government that happens to be in power.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? In the remarks he has made within the last two or three sentences, has the hon. member taken into account the provisions of clause 61 of the bill?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, and that is one of the reasons why I confess that I find it difficult to pinpoint many words in these clauses against which one could complain, although I am against the length of the sentence provided in clause 62. As the minister says, there is a saving feature in clause 61, which purports to make it clear that one can point out errors or defects in various governmental bodies. With the indication we have of the errors and defects across the way, we would have to claim that right whether or not it was accorded to us.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, that this country not forget the incidents to which I have been referring, and that we lean over backwards to keep it clear that opposition to the government that happens to be in power is not treachery or sedition, but rather that there is a place and a need for the reformer, for the real patriot, for the real citizen of the country who sets out to make things better than they are.

Mr. Garson: Now that my hon. friend has finished his remarks, I rise to a point of order. I would suggest that what we are dealing with here is clauses 60 and 61 of the present bill, which have nothing to do with section 98 that was formerly in the Criminal Code. I am afraid that if we get off into a debate of section 98, which could be such a fruitful subject of discussion, we may talk for a long while and not be on the point at all.

Mr. Knowles: The minister will admit that some of the wording in the former section 98 was, in 1936, transposed to section 133 and is now in clause 60.

Mr. Garson: I would admit that, but I do not think it has any relevancy to what we are discussing now, because if my hon. friend would look at the case of Rex v. Boucher, decided in 1951, he would agree that most of the points he has been making this afternoon are obsolete.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister one brief question on clause 60. I am interested in a definition of sedition as the minister understands it. If the minister will look at clause 60 (1) he will see the peculiar manner in which the definition is stated. It says:

> Seditious words are words that express a seditious intention.

And then:

> A seditious libel is a libel that expresses a seditious intention.

Again we have sedition defined in terms of sedition. I wonder if for the record the minister could give a definition of just what sedition is, in terms of clauses 60, 61 and 62?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clause 60 (4) I think he will find on the record the definition he is seeking.

Mr. Winch: I was going to ask the same question about clause 60 (4). It says, "without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression 'seditious intention'." And so on. In other words, we do have power under subclauses 1 and 2, but it is worded in such a way that it says that black is black and white is white. That is exactly what it says.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Winch: Well, it certainly does not give a description of the meaning of sedition. It just does not make sense.

Mr. Ellis: On that point would the minister give us the significance of the words "without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression 'seditious intention'." In other words, in clause 60 (4) we find what, indirectly, can be described as a definition of sedition as a conspiracy to carry out a seditious intention, or to teach or advocate the overthrow of the government. I would ask the minister to tell us why it is necessary to have written in this section the words, "without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression 'seditious intention'."

Mr. Garson: Well, perhaps I had better attempt to clear up these doubts in the minds of my hon. friends by giving them an example of a case where the words "seditious intention", that are defined in clause 60 (4), were considered. That was the case to which I have already referred. It is a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Boucher v. the King, 1951, S.C.R. 265. The main point dealt with in this case was as to whether "seditious intention" included an intention to incite to acts of violence or public disorder in all cases. Excerpts which express the views of the members of the court I shall now quote.

In this instance, the opinion of Chief Justice Rinfret was as follows:

> The advocating of force is not the only instance in which an accused could be found guilty of a seditious intention.

That is a minority judgment, as my hon. friend will see as I go along.

Then, this was the opinion of Mr. Justice Kerwin:

> The intention on the part of the accused which is necessary to constitute seditious libel must be to incite the people to violence against constituted authority or to create a public disturbance or disorder against such authority. An intention to bring the administration of justice into hatred or contempt or exert disaffection against it is not seditious unless there is also the intention to incite people to violence against it.

Mr. Justice Taschereau stated the following:

Upon application a new hearing was granted and heard by the full court, and in view of the opinions now expressed by the majority, it is settled, I think, that generally speaking, the writings complained of must, in addition to being calculated to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of subjects, be intended to produce disturbance or resistance to the lawfully constituted authority. But as pointed out by my brother Cartwright, there is another definition of seditious intention which I think must be accepted. I agree with him that an intention to bring the administration of justice into hatred or contempt or to excite disaffection against it, is a seditious intention.

And then, Mr. Justice Rand:

The test is not either the truth of the language or the innocence of the motive with which he publishes it. The test is this: Was the language used calculated, or was it not, to promote public disorder or physical force.

As Mr. Justice Rand indicates, the words in which he specifies the test are taken from the judgment of a British judge, Mr. Justice Coleridge, in the British case of Rex v. Aldred.

Then, Mr. Justice Kellock expressed the following:

It is noteworthy that the draft code of the royal commissioners was not accepted by parliament, and in my opinion, incitement to violence toward constituted authority, that is, government in the broad sense, or resistance having the same object, is, upon the authorities, a necessary ingredient of the intention.

In my opinion, to render the intention seditious, there must be an intention to incite to violence or resistance or defiance for the purpose of disturbing constituted authority. I do not think there is any basis in the authorities for defining the crime on any lower plane.

At the present time, therefore, in England, matter of the character here in question, if made the subject of criminal process at all, appears to be treated as contempt of court, rather than as seditious libel. Such matters may, of course, be regarded from the standpoint of seditious libel if intention of the necessary character be established.

Then, Mr. Justice Estey:

I would clarify my previous reasons by adding that a seditious intention must be founded upon evidence of incitement to violence, public disorder or unlawful conduct, directed against His Majesty or the institutions of the government. With great respect, I am of opinion that in all cases the intention to incite violence or public disorder or unlawful conduct against His Majesty or an institution of the state is essential.

Then, Mr. Justice Locke:

The question remains whether it is accurate to say that "a seditious intention is an intention to excite disaffection against the administration of justice" as stated by Stephen.

The great English commentator:

Only if disaffection be construed as meaning resistance to or disobedience of the law or the authority of the state is it accurate, in my opinion.

I concur in the opinion by my brother Kellock that that portion of Stephen's definition which declares that "the intention to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of such subjects" is a seditious intention without more, is inadequate as a statement of the common law and I agree with his conclusion upon this aspect of the matter.

Then Mr. Justice Cartwright:

The reasons of my brother Kellock bring me to the conclusion that the definition quoted above ought not to be accepted without qualification, and that before a writing can be held to disclose a seditious intention by reason of being calculated to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of His Majesty's subjects it must further appear that the intended, or material and probable, consequences of such promotion of ill-will and hostility is to produce disturbance or resistance to the authority of lawfully constituted government.

In my opinion at common law an intention to bring into hatred or contempt or to create disaffection against the administration of justice is a seditious intention, and I do not find anything in the provisions of the Criminal Code to negative this view.

I think it will be seen from these judgments that there is a clear majority of judges on the Supreme Court of Canada who hold that incitement to violence is a necessary ingredient of the offence of sedition. It might perhaps illuminate the matter a little bit further if I were to quote at further length from the judgment of Mr. Justice Rand, which I will now do:

The definition of seditious intention as formulated by Stephen, summarised, is, (1) to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against, the King or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom, or either house of parliament, or the administration of justice; or (2) to excite the King's subjects to attempt, otherwise than by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in church or state by law established; or (3) to incite persons to commit any crime in general disturbance of the peace; or (4) to raise discontent or disaffection amongst His Majesty's subjects; or (5) to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of such subjects. The only items of this definition that could be drawn into question here are that relating to the administration of justice in (1) and those of (4) and (5). It was the latter which were brought most prominently to the notice of the jury, and it is with an examination of what in these days their language must be taken to mean that I will chiefly concern myself.

There is no modern authority which holds that the mere effect of tending to create discontent or disaffection among His Majesty's subjects or ill-will or hostility between groups of them, but not tending to issue in illegal conduct, constitutes the crime, and this for obvious reasons. Freedom in thought and speech and disagreement in ideas and beliefs, on every conceivable subject, are of the essence of our life. The clash of critical discussion on political, social and religious subjects has too deeply become the stuff of daily experience to suggest that mere ill-will as a product of controversy can strike down the latter with illegality. A superficial examination of the word shows its insufficiency: what is the degree necessary to criminality? Can it ever, as mere subjective condition, be so? Controversial fury is aroused constantly by differences in abstract conceptions; heresy in some fields is again a mortal sin; there can be fanatical puritanism in ideas as well as in morals; but our compact of free society accepts and absorbs these differences and they are exercised at large within the framework of freedom and order on broader and deeper uniformities as bases of social stability. Similarly in discontent, disaffection and hostility: as subjective incidents of controversy, they and the ideas which arouse them are part of our living which ultimately serve us in stimulation, in the clarification of thought and, as we believe, in the search for the constitution and truth of things generally.

Mr. Herridge: I want to thank the minister for putting that information on the record. It will certainly be helpful to laymen like ourselves who have not a very clear understanding of some of these legal terms; but I rise to say that I entirely support the approach to this clause of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I often find that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre can express my thoughts better than I can myself. I should like to ask the minister this question. Formerly the penalty for sedition was two years, and then under certain amendments in 1951 the penalty was increased to seven years. In this bill it is increased to fourteen years. Will the minister tell the committee why there is such a sharp increase in the punishment for the offence which has always been somewhat vague and difficult to define? It seems to me to be very harsh and severe.

Mr. Garson: In the case of this clause, as in the case of some other clauses that we have examined of somewhat similar character, the recommendations of the royal commission with regard to the penalty here are a reflection of the hardening of public opinion that has been going on for some time, with reference to the seriousness of the offence of genuine sedition when it arises, and I think myself that this hardening is probably quite soundly based when we look about us and see so many countries, happily not on this continent, in which the overthrow of free government was accomplished by seditious methods. In the light of current history any person who is a realist at all can hardly quarrel with a penalty of fourteen years for sedition as interpreted in this judgment which I have just read, which indicates that an essential ingredient is the actual incitement of force and violence against the constituted government. This offence of sedition we are discussing as interpreted by the courts does not infringe upon the freedom of speech to which we have been accustomed in this country for a long time. But where you have people in our midst, although I am happy to say that we have not had very many cases of this kind, as a matter of fact—

Mr. Knowles: How many have there been?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: Well, I do not think I can answer that question offhand, but certainly not very many. The group of men in Winnipeg of which my hon. friend spoke earlier this afternoon was by far the largest single group at any one period of time that we have had perhaps in the whole of Canadian history; and since those Winnipeg trials I do not think there has been any similar group anywhere in Canada. But if we were confronted with a genuine, determined and spirited case of sedition embracing the intention to overthrow the state by violence, who is to say that it would be impossible that the circumstances of such a case could not be sufficiently heinous to warrant a maximum penalty of fourteen years? I think that is the test. It does not by any means follow in any of these cases that the judge is going to impose the maximum penalty. The maximum penalty is in the section to give the judge scope to make the punishment fit the crime in these cases where the circumstances are sufficiently heinous.

Mr. Winch: I, too, appreciate the endeavour of the minister to give us a studied interpretation of the exact meaning of the words "sedition" and "seditious intent." I look forward tomorrow to being able to make a real study of just what the minister did say and the quotations that he put on Hansard. But I have tried to follow the remarks of the minister very carefully, and as a result of doing that I am now distinctly worried about this clause and the meaning or the interpretation of sedition and seditious intent.

I agree wholeheartedly with the minister when he says that if we have a situation where there can be a conspiracy or an intent in this country to overthrow the government by violence, then we need something like this, and that should be the interpretation, and there should be a penalty to fit the crime. But I want to take the minister back, if I can remember this correctly, to all the statements which he read from learned judges. They did not just deal with the overthrow of the government or constituted authority by violence. I can only just take it as I could get it down, but it did amount to this: that there can be a question of seditious intent if one takes the action by speech or by writing; might cause disaffection; that could give rise to disturbance; that could give rise to discontent amongst the subjects; and that could give rise to hostility. These were the words used and quoted. But I would point out that that happens almost every day in labour circles throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada, because you give rise to discontent by opposing legislation, and perhaps if you speak of strikes, or discuss or write about something which may cause a disturbance you are definitely giving rise to a situation which may result in hostility between the government and the subjects, and between the employer and the employee.

I believe I know what is in the mind of the minister in regard to clause 61 and with reference to the judgment he quoted. I believe it was Chief Justice Rand who pointed out that these things by themselves in a country such as this, where you have free speech and the right to express your thoughts and views, could not be taken as being seditious unless, as I believe the minister added, they were of such a nature as to actually involve breaking the law. I have not the minister's exact words but I believe what he said was to that effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it also happens on occasion that these things are discussed in labour circles, and if that is a correct interpretation of sedition then I know quite a number of well-respected citizens in British Columbia who could be considered guilty of sedition because they are absolutely opposed to a certain act which was introduced in British Columbia. They are doing their utmost to oppose that act and to arouse hostility toward it, and have even gone to the extent of suggesting the calling of a general strike. A general strike is against the law and one could not possibly be held without breaking that law, and therefore those who create hostility and disaffection by opposing the government because of the introduction of certain labour legislation and call for a general strike would be, according to the remarks of the minister, not just guilty of breaking the law but also guilty of seditious intent. That is a very serious thing, but it is the only interpretation we can place upon the remarks made by the minister.

Mr. Garson: The only thing I can suggest as regards my hon. friend's remarks is that he has misinterpreted mine.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, in discussing this group of clauses what I have to say has largely to do with the question of punishment and I believe no better case against the extension of the term of imprisonment could be made than is to be found in the minister's own remarks. I cannot remember when the last case of this sort occurred but I believe it was about 35 years ago. There was a prominent case then—

Mr. Garson: The case I was quoting from took place in 1951.

Mr. MacInnis: I am aware of that, but as far as other cases are concerned, and since 1951, we have increased the penalty from two to seven years in spite of the fact that nothing had happened in the 30 years before that time. We increased the sentence by 200 to 300 per cent. That, to my mind, would indicate that our people were going to the dogs. We are going to double it again. I wonder what the people who proposed changes in this legislation were thinking. What country did they think they were legislating for? I have been going around this part of the world for some considerable time and I associate with people who sometimes have reason to be dissatisfied with things as they are, and I am quite prepared to tell the minister and the committee that the thinking of the people I have in mind is far more constructive now than it was 25 or 30 years ago. There is far less danger of their doing anything which will be contrary to the law or contrary to the well-being of Canada.

I quite understand that there are a few people in this country who might be willing, if they had the opportunity, to upset things by an appeal to force and violence, but even then the influence of such people is diminishing every day. I believe in the 1945 election the Labour-Progressive candidate who opposed me had something over 4,000 votes. In the 1949 election in the same constituency the Labour-Progressive candidate received about 1,300 votes. In the recent election, in 1953, I am not quite certain but I believe their candidate received around 500 votes, and it certainly was not because of the candidate herself. She was a most attractive person outside of her politics. However, there you have an example in which the votes they received dropped from over 4,000 to about 500. The same thing has happened as regards their influence, although they still have some influence in the trade union movement. But the trade union movement is well able to handle that situation and I feel it is an insult to Canada and the people of Canada to increase a penalty in this case when no crimes have been committed and when the reason for that increase is supposed to be to prevent crimes of this kind. It is perfectly ridiculous and in view of the reasonableness the minister has shown throughout the long discussion we have had on this bill in the house and in committee I am surprised that he should hesitate for a moment, if not to return the penalty to what it was before 1951, at least to restore it to what it was in 1951.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not moved by the appeal made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, and is he not prepared to move an amendment, or have the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration move an amendment, to restore the penalty to a term not greater than was set in 1951?

Mr. Garson: If any hon. member in this committee can move me I am sure it is the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. But I would point out that this recommendation came from a royal commission. It went into the other place on two separate occasions and it was debated there and in its banking and commerce committee. It came back into the House of Commons and was considered here and before the special committee of the House of Commons at the last session of parliament. If my memory serves I think I am right in saying that until the exception was taken here this afternoon no person has as yet, in the five years that this bill has been extant, raised the question that this penalty was excessive. Under our laws of sedition that are not in any sense harsh laws and that only apply to genuine sedition where that is proven, I must say I do not think that a maximum penalty of fourteen years is out of the way in the world in which we live today. When I say that I admit, in order to be perfectly candid—and in this perhaps I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway—that this section may not be invoked very often. I hope it will never be invoked. But when it is invoked for an offence under the language that we have here in this bill it will be invoked for quite a serious offence for which it seems to me that the penalty indicated is not excessive.

Mr. Fulton: May I suggest to the committee and to my friends of the C.C.F., including the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway—for whom in general I have great admiration although not always for his judgment—that it seems to me that they are missing out one important point. They seem to be looking at the section—and this was my feeling in connection with the discussion of yesterday evening—and looking at the penalty it provides, and then translating their natural sympathy—the natural sympathy which we all have for a person who may be unjustly accused—into an automatic assumption that such a person will be convicted. I think the point that my hon. friends miss is that these penalties will not be imposed unless the person is convicted. If therefore such a person has not been guilty of the offence described here, these penalties are not going to be exercised against him.

I am not familiar with all the history back of the period to which my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was referring. It may well have been that the prosecution was ill-conceived and improperly laid. I am not justifying or attempting to justify anything that may have been unjustifiable there. It is a great mistake and almost a miscarriage of justice to launch prosecutions under those circumstances. But, as I understand it, the fact is that in the test case the accused was found not guilty. Therefore the penalty was not imposed.

Surely our attitude should be this: What is the crime which we are seeking to cover and for which we are providing a penalty? Is that penalty commensurate with the seriousness of the crime that is under consideration? If it is, then that penalty should stand, because even although it may be a severe penalty it could only follow for an extremely serious crime and will not be imposed against persons who are innocent of that crime. I would say that for the man who is guilty of sedition, uttering seditious words, seditious libel or taking part in a seditious conspiracy within the meaning of those offences, the maximum penalty of fourteen years is not too much.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest to the hon. member for Kamloops that he had better be careful. He may be inviting that penalty for himself one of these days.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think that I shall ever be guilty of sedition, seditious libel or seditious conspiracy. If I were, then I would deserve the penalty.

Mr. Knowles: Some of the things my hon. friend might say might be thought to be that by other people.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; but they have to be proved to be that in court.

Mr. Knowles: The point I really rose to deal with was something which the minister raised. A moment ago he gave an answer which, if I may say so with respect, he has given us a good many times, namely that this has been gone over through all the various stages and that this point has not yet been raised. Even if it has not been raised, that is the purpose of this consideration, namely to check on the various clauses of this bill before it is reported to the house for third reading.

May I also remind the Minister of Justice that, with respect to the clause having to do with treason, he pointed out yesterday that, notwithstanding all the consideration that had been given to the treason clause and the offences and penalties under it, the matter was considered by a special committee of the cabinet. He even boasted—and I do not blame him for so doing—that there were in the cabinet people who were more exercised about some parts of the treason section than were some persons outside of the cabinet; and hence yesterday he proposed an amendment reducing the sentence in the case of that section of the treason clause that deals with communicating information where that happens in peacetime. Even if no previous consideration had been given to this point, I suggest that it might well be considered by the cabinet, as was done in connection with treason.

However, I am afraid that I cannot accept the assertion that the point has not been raised during the past five years. I have not all the documents at my desk but from amongst the many papers I have here I was able to draw the submission which the Canadian Congress of Labour made to the special committee of the House of Commons on Bill No. 93, under date of February 17, 1953. On page 2 of this brief I read the following:

> Section 62 (Seditious Offences).
> This is the present section 134, with a much higher penalty. Down to 1951, the maximum was two years; then it became seven; now it is to be fourteen.
> Why? It may be arguable that the 1951 increase was necessary because of the vast change in world conditions since 1927, or even since the repeal of the old section 98. Even that is questionable.

I point out that these people not only raised the question but cast doubts upon the increase. I continue reading from the brief:

> But what drastic change in the situation in the last year and a half makes it necessary to double the maximum penalty now?

Those are almost the very words used by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway a few moments ago.

> We are not, of course, suggesting that sedition is a good thing, or even a trifling offence.

That is what the hon. member for Kamloops just pointed out.

> But presumably the government's "object all sublime" is "to make the punishment fit the crime". Does this do it?

It runs in my mind that there have been editorials on this matter and that there have been other briefs that have raised the very same point. I therefore submit, Mr. Chairman, that it was not quite correct for the minister to say that this question had never been raised. On the basis of the evidence I have given it certainly was raised before the House of Commons committee by the delegation representing the Canadian Congress of Labour.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I imagine that while we are discussing the three sections, it would not be in order to move an amendment to section 62 until that section is called. I am going to move an amendment. I was going to say that the trouble is that, when questions of this kind arise, they usually arise in times when the minds of people are troubled. In the case that we have been referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in 1919, people were in a state of panic. In my opinion the most seditious thing that was said during that whole affair was not said by any of those who were arrested but was said by the then solicitor general, I think it was; in any case, it was Arthur Meighen. He sent a wire to a lawyer in Winnipeg to have these men on the high seas within twenty-four hours and that the legality of the matter would be gone into afterwards. If there was ever anything that was seditious—and a seditious conspiracy at that—it seems to me that was it, coming from the fountainhead of government. Therefore you can see the sort of atmosphere in which cases of that kind are likely to arise. It is then very difficult for counsel, judge or jury to act reasonably and as they normally would.

Mr. Barnett: I have been listening to this discussion with some interest. The particular point I want to make is along a somewhat different line from that which has just been followed, but I imagine if the minister has any further reply to make on the question of penalty he will be prepared to do so. I must confess that the thought that has been running through my mind is that the word "sedition" is a nasty one. I know perfectly well that if I go back home among my fellow workers and use the word "sedition" it conjures up a lot of things in their minds and in the mind of other ordinary citizens of this country. Those of us who are fortunate enough to be able to sit here as members of this committee have had the benefit of the explanations that the Minister of Justice has offered with respect to what is involved in sedition. But I think what we have to realize is that most of the people of Canada are not going to have the benefit of that kind of explanation.

In looking at this section I first of all read the words in subsection 1, namely:

> Seditious words are words that express a seditious intention.

I must say that my mind was not greatly illuminated. I then looked through all the dictionaries I could find in the library to find out what are seditious words and what is a seditious intention. Not a great many citizens of Canada are going to take the trouble to do that. I must say that there come to my mind the words that the Minister of Justice uttered earlier with respect to the revision of the Criminal Code when he said that it was the desire and intention to produce a revised Criminal Code which would be more readily understandable by the ordinary citizens of Canada. A great many sections of the bill set out that for the purposes of the particular section the offence shall be (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). From my point of view the greatest weakness of this section is that the expression "seditious intention" is not thus defined.

It is something which the ordinary person cannot understand. It is something that can be used by those who wish to mislead the ordinary citizens of Canada. It gives the right and opportunity to do so. I do not know whether other members of the house are as aware as I am of the all-out campaign being conducted at the present time by what are, to my way of thinking, certain subversive interests in connection with the revision of the Criminal Code. As far as I am concerned, if we leave the section the way it is we simply are handing these people ammunition.

I know that if I went home and tried to explain to the working people of my constituency that this is an innocuous section, that it can only be invoked in case of an all-out conspiracy to overthrow our government, I would have great difficulty in making them realize that is what is intended. Actually I am not at all convinced myself that such an interpretation of the section would hold water as the section stands at the present time. I think that is the first thing that should be changed. "Seditious intention" should be spelled out as meaning such and such and such and such and such and such. From the very use of the phrase in subsection 4, "without limiting the generality of the meaning of the expression 'seditious intention'," it does not need much imagination to see how a spell-binding communist orator—and they have them—could take that particular phrase and mislead and disturb the ordinary people of the country. That is what they are trying to do and that is what they are going to continue to do if we leave the section as it stands.

If it could be clearly stated that the only way in which the offence of sedition could be committed would be when it involved an offence against the state, I must say that much of the misunderstanding and fears existing in the minds of the working people of Canada would be allayed. But from listening to the minister I still have the understanding that under certain circumstances, in times of stress in labour disputes, this section might very well be invoked again as it has been in the past. If that is the case, then I suggest that the section tends to foment the very conditions which most of us are anxious to prevent. I feel the section should be so worded that by no stretch of the imagination could it be considered to apply in the ordinary dealings between the employing class and the working class in Canada. If that were done, we would have done a good deal to strengthen democracy in Canada.

From my personal knowledge and associations, and partly as a result of my own thinking, I know that there is a deep-rooted latent fear in the minds of the working people of Canada that at some time in the future those things are going to be done again which have been done in the past, and that as the result of the ill-advised disposition of police forces or other agencies of so-called law and order wrongful acts are going to be committed by the so-called lawfully constituted authorities which will result in counter-measures on the part of the working people, with men being arrested and convicted under these sections.

I have been looking at the provision with regard to the administration of justice in Canada and wondering whether not so long ago I was not in grave danger of being liable under this section. Some of us who are associated with the trade union movement have been gravely concerned by what appears to be a trend on the part of the employing interests to run to the courts and secure various forms of injunctions. We had a situation in which certain members of my own union were involved. I happened to have the responsibility of producing a radio broadcast on behalf of the organization, and I am quite willing to admit now that at that particular moment I was a little hot under the collar. I think I produced a phrase in the script that went something like this, that if this sort of action were continued I could see that it might render the judges of our country—I phrased it very carefully—liable to the suspicion of palm greasing. Now, of course, my script went before the counsel for the radio station, a chap whom I happened to know, and he threw up his hands in horror. He really went through the roof. He said, "Never in the history of British justice..." and so on. I tried to explain to him that I was just as concerned with the preservation of the high tradition of British justice as anyone else. I was concerned to see that no action was taken which might tend to lower the dignity of the courts in the minds of the people of the country.

However, I can quite imagine that if, under the stress of possibly a more serious situation than existed at that particular time, I had gone on the air with some such statement as that, I might have been liable under this section as it is now worded. I maintain that my intention was not a seditious one, although certainly I may have been in the mood to be highly critical of certain actions that were being taken by a portion of the structure of our society. I feel that the most important thing that might be done with this section would be to rewrite it in such a way that a person with an ordinary education would find the offences clearly spelled out. There should be a clear indication that this section is designed to deal with deliberate and, if you like, full scale intent to overthrow the structure of our society by violence.

Mr. Hollingworth: I believe that what we should consider in connection with this section is the whole question of civil rights. Certainly, I shall fight as vigorously as anyone else in this house against any infringement of civil rights. After a careful consideration of this section, and the other sections dealing with this problem, and after listening to the minister's explanation, particularly the quotation from Mr. Justice Rand's judgment, I do not feel that one can take exception to the drafting of this section. I am of the opinion it does not infringe upon the civil rights of the individual, and that is the all important matter with which we should be concerned here.

I must say though, Mr. Chairman, that I do not like the fourteen year penalty. I realize that, as the hon. member for Kamloops has pointed out, it is only the guilty person who is going to suffer, but nevertheless the fact that the section has not been invoked except on rare occasions seems to indicate that the extension of that time limit is unwarranted. The only thing I can say in justification of it is the fact that it is the maximum penalty. It is quite conceivable a judge would impose a lesser penalty if the crime were less serious. However, as I say, I do not like the fourteen years. I would be inclined to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his remarks in that regard. The saving clause, of course, is that it is the maximum penalty and that period would not have to be invoked. Those are my general observations.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Vancouver East, Mr. Chairman, did ask the minister a very easy question to answer, I think, when he pointed out that the wording of this clause is not easy for the layman to understand. Subclause 1 of clause 60 reads:

> Seditious words are words that express a seditious intention.
>
> (2) A seditious libel is a libel that expresses a seditious intention.
>
> (3) A seditious conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to carry out a seditious intention.

It would appear to me that before members of parliament are asked to support legislation of this type, the minister should be able to give an explanation of the meaning of sedition so that a layman could understand it. He referred to the case of Rex v. Boucher, and while I listened carefully it will require a reading of the extended remarks before I can understand just what learned jurists had to say about this question. I wonder whether, even at this stage, the minister might not start over again and put his comments in words that the members of the house who have not been to law school might be able to understand.

Mr. Fulton: That is an invitation that I hope the minister will be able to resist.

Mr. Nicholson: This is a rather disturbing piece of legislation to be asking us to support, since it includes that fourteen year penalty. I believe members in all sections of the house are agreed that any person who becomes an enemy of the state should be dealt with harshly. However, I feel we should clearly outline what the offences are. As has been pointed out by my colleague, a number of people in Winnipeg went to jail for sedition back in 1919, and certainly if this clause had been on the statute books at that time they would have received a fourteen year sentence.

In view of the fact that we have had an exceptionally good record in Canada, we should not be asked to support legislation that is not set out in words that everyone can understand. I feel that the fourteen year penalty is an unreasonable period to be suggesting for offences that cannot be explained in more precise language.

Mr. Herridge: I want to support the arguments made by the other members in this group against what we consider the indefinite terminology of this section. I might explain that some of the experiences I have had in life have made me somewhat wary of this word "sedition". It is one that is extremely difficult to define. Sedition can be many different things in different times and circumstances. It depends on the mood of the day.

On one occasion in 1933 I recall being asked by an Anglican clergyman to give an address at the funeral of a member of the C.C.F. party. I gave what I thought was an excellent address, and what do you think happened? The local magistrate informed the attorney general of British Columbia that I had been preaching sedition and asked for me to be investigated. I did not know anything about this until about a month later. The police officer who had been sent in to conduct the investigation came to my house and told me all about it. He said it was a lot of rot and they had been investigating the wrong person.

On another occasion, which I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway will recall, I was going to address a public meeting in a small town in my constituency. This incident illustrates how time and circumstances alter things. At that time the C.C.F. was far from respectable in many quarters. I went to rent a hall in this small town, and I was refused a hall. The person who refused me told me that the magistrate there had said we were talking sedition. We could not rent the hall and I am quite sure if we had come before that magistrate, or the one I mentioned previously, we would have been proven guilty of sedition and given the penalty imposed by this clause.

In any event, we could not get a hall. Finally, I saw the chief of police and convinced him I was a respectable person. We were allowed to hold a meeting in the public square under police supervision. I just mention these two incidents to indicate how the definition of sedition changes under certain circumstances. We have got beyond that now, and those incidents would not happen today. I mention them to indicate the possibility of the mood of the public or the circumstances changing. I think other members of this group who have suggested that the definition is not clear enough, and that the penalty is too severe, are quite right in those objections.

Mr. Enfield: To get back to the subject of the definition of sedition, I think when we are discussing the Criminal Code we should look at the clauses from three distinct considerations. One, of course, is the wording of the clause itself. Secondly, we must always keep in mind that there must be an element of what is known as mens rea, or guilty intention to commit a crime. That must always be appended to every clause we discuss. Then, thirdly—and perhaps most important—we have to look at how a section has been interpreted by the judiciary. I know that often many students of law are inclined to think that more legislation is passed by the judiciary than by the legislature itself.

As the minister has already referred to the case of Boucher v. Rex, which seems to be the leading and the most modern case on the subject, I shall not repeat the details of it. However, some hon. members have asked for a capsule summary of what Boucher v. Rex says. I just happen to have, as luck would have it, what I think is a good summary of the ratio decidendi of Boucher v. Rex. I think perhaps it would be of interest if I were to place it on record.

[Mr. Herridge.]

It was held in that case that there is no finding of seditious intention unless there is evidence of incitement to violence. And it is interesting to note throughout this summary that the words "violence" and "resistance to law" are given great emphasis by the judges concerned. It states that there is no finding of seditious intention unless there is evidence of incitement to violence, public disorder or unlawful conduct directed against the Queen or the country's institutions.

It is stated that an intention to promote feelings of ill will and hostility between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects, without anything more, cannot be seditious. I think that is very important to be kept in mind, and it will bear repetition—that an intention to promote feelings of ill will and hostility between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects, without more, cannot be seditious. You have to have something more than that.

Then it must be shown, further, that the intended or natural and probable consequences of promoting such feelings is to produce disturbance of the government, or resistance to its authority. That carries it very much farther. There must be the intention to incite resistance to law, not merely an intention to criticize or to promote contempt for law.

That is the summary from the headnote of the case, which is reported at page 265 of the Supreme Court Reports of 1951. It is true that the summary is prepared by the legal editor concerned. But the idea is to read from the headnote, and then to look through the judgment. If one's feelings are more or less in agreement with the headnote, it provides a basis upon which to summarize the case. Because, obviously, one cannot take these cases and comb through them thoroughly. The job would be monumental. Hence the headnote is provided for the sake of convenience.

As I say, this is the summary that I have found from reading the case. I am giving it to the committee for what it is worth. I suggest that before any change in set-up is made it is absolutely necessary to go into the question of how the courts have interpreted the law. If a change is made there is a great possibility that the judicial interpretations that have gone before are completely lost. You open the door for an astute counsel. The section is changed, and one cannot quote with authority a judgment based upon an earlier section that reads differently from the present one.

So, before we entertain any amendment I suggest, with respect, that this point should be seriously considered. As to the penalty of fourteen years, it seems to me that by comparison with some of the other sections we have covered, where there are penalties of fourteen years, this penalty is a fair one. For example, we dealt yesterday with clause 46 (e), the transferring of scientific information, and a clause which carried a sentence of fourteen years.

When we look at these sections, in comparison, it seems to me that the fourteen years in this clause is justified. The offence is just as serious. Anyone promoting resistance to the law—and presumably this would be some type of force or bodily resistance—is committing just as serious a crime as anyone who gives information to someone else who in turn might use that information to promote bodily resistance or force against the present government.

The penalty of fourteen years is a maximum. Upon making inquiry with respect to judicial interpretation one finds few cases on the subject. Those that have been tried before the courts have been of a serious nature.

One would not want to leave the penalty too low. Where there is a serious offence the court must have the opportunity to punish fully and properly. On the other hand, this is a maximum, and the court still has discretion to limit the sentence to what would be considered appropriate for the offence involved.

An hon. Member: The hon. member has answered the point.

Mr. Martin: And a very good answer.

Mr. MacInnis: Does he say that the penalty before 1951 was so low that it promoted sedition in Canada? In how many cases was the law of sedition invoked during those years?

Mr. Enfield: I do not think one can say that the penalty was so low that it promoted sedition. But when the Boucher case was tried in 1951 it was felt that, owing to the seriousness of the situation involved, the law as it stood did not provide sufficient in the way of penalty to cover the degree of wrong that was committed. I am only going by the reported cases on the subject, and there appear to be very few of them. There is Rex v. Frost, in 1889—and I must say I have not counted them up. Then there is Rex v. Shaefer, Rex v. Snyder and Rex v. Felton. There are only about four cases quoted.

Mr. MacInnis: Since 1951?

Mr. Enfield: Since 1951, so far as I know,—and I may be wrong—there is no reported case. I would imagine that any case on the subject would be reported, because it is very serious.

Mr. Gillis: Are those Canadian cases?

Mr. Enfield: Yes. As a matter of fact, two or three earlier cases were British.

Mr. Ellis: As important as penalty is the reason for the change. I have not heard a very lucid explanation as to why it has been found necessary to increase the penalty. The minister was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre how many cases of sedition he could recount, and I believe he said that offhand he could not say how many cases there were, but that the largest batch of such cases occurred at the time of the Winnipeg strike.

Judging from the change proposed in this bill one might almost be under the impression that this country is seething with discontent, and that the government is mightily worried about the great numbers of people who are guilty or who are likely to become guilty of sedition. I am inclined to believe that any outsider who read this section would be under the impression that sedition had become so serious in Canada that the parliament of Canada found it necessary to increase the penalty in 1951 from two years to seven years, and that it has worsened since that time and again the parliament of Canada has found it necessary to increase the penalty to fourteen years.

The minister suggested the reason the change is proposed is that in troublous times such as we are going through there was apprehension in the minds of the people who proposed the change, and consequently they felt that a more severe penalty was necessary. That argument was used yesterday in connection with the treason clause. I can understand that there is some logic behind that reasoning in so far as the treason clause is concerned. I think hon. members will agree that certainly our history to date would indicate that there are reasons why we should look upon treason perhaps in a different light from what we might have fifteen years ago. But I suggest that in so far as the law respecting sedition is concerned, we should not confuse the two at all. In so far as sedition is concerned, I can see no reason whatsoever why the government should have found it necessary to increase the penalty.

Is it that the government anticipates difficulties and feels that it must strengthen the legislation? Perhaps they have reasons for suspecting that in the future a more severe law might be needed.

As it affects civil liberties, I suggest that if a situation ever develops where people are so discontented that they will listen to those who suggest the overthrow of the government by force, you will find that laws concerning sedition will not serve the purpose for which they were intended. Our history has shown that even during the depths of the great depression of the 1930's—and the minister will admit this—there were very few cases of sedition. Therefore I can see no valid reason whatsoever for this most spectacular increase in the penalty from two years to seven years and then doubling the seven years to fourteen years. This is a move which I feel deserves a very careful explanation on the part of the minister, and I should like him to give us clearly and concisely the reason why at this time it should be necessary to double the penalty over the 1951 maximum.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Gillis: I should like to say a word or two on this clause. The hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni made statements which should cause the minister to give this clause a little more consideration. The increase in the penalty does not bother me very much; it is the possibility, under the clause, of convicting people of sedition who might just be criticizing.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Kamloops said that he did not intend to commit sedition. He made a radio broadcast, if he will recall it, not so long ago—

Mr. Fulton: It was not a radio broadcast, it was a statement in the press.

Mr. Gillis: I saw it in the press, and I thought it arose out of a radio broadcast. It could have been construed as causing disaffection to Her Majesty's forces.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all.

Mr. Gillis: It just depends on the condition of the liver of the judge that you meet that morning whether you are guilty or not.

Mr. Fulton: It would be a jury who would decide, twelve good men and true.

Mr. Coldwell: They might be upset, too.

Mr. Gillis: In the final analysis the judge will decide whether you will get fourteen years or not.

There are not very many in this house who have led any kind of an active life who could not have been picked up on a good many occasions under this clause. That is the dangerous part of it. My hon. friend across the way gave four cases that he had looked at. He did the committee a service when he put that side of the question on the record. I am not particularly concerned about how many years a person gets for sedition provided it is proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that he did commit sedition. The thing that I am concerned about is the possibility of a miscarriage of justice on account of the ambiguous language used in the clause and the many interpretations that could be put on it either by a judge or by a jury.

One case sticks out in my mind that my hon. friend did not put on the record. I have had little experience with some of these things. A man who was secretary-treasurer of the mine workers union in 1922 became involved in a strike. The union was on strike, and arising out of that strike force was used on the part of the government. The attorney general armed a lot of thugs and put them on horseback. They came into the area and they created trouble. As a consequence of that difficulty the secretary-treasurer of the union made a press statement, and on the basis of that statement he was arrested for sedition. I had the privilege at that time of being one of the people who collected money to provide a defence for him. He was tried and convicted and sentenced to two years in Dorchester penitentiary. That was the maximum penalty at that time.

I know that we cannot criticize the judge who rendered that decision. We are not permitted to criticize the judiciary here, but it has always been clear in my mind that there had been a miscarriage of justice when that man was sentenced for sedition because the statement he made was not any stronger than statements I have made a good many times under similar circumstances. It was because of a section like this that that could happen. Anything at all can be construed as being seditious or having a seditious intent, and that kind of thing. As my hon. friend said, with a good smart lawyer in there to prosecute you and with the average jury that you pick up across Canada and with the ambiguous language contained in the clause, the lawyer can almost convince them of anything.

An hon. Member: With an emotional approach.

Mr. Gillis: Yes. The attorney general of that day—I am not going to name any names because most of them are dead, including the person involved—could justify that conviction at that time. He practically admitted that the statement made in the press was true. He told the truth; he merely stated the truth of a certain situation, but there were times when it was a crime to tell the truth. That is the way he justified himself. As I said before, I am not so much concerned about how long the sentence shall be, but I am concerned about the circumstances under which a judge and a jury can try you and sentence you for sedition.

The hon. member for Vancouver East was quite correct, if press reports are correct, that looming up in British Columbia is a struggle. The changes in the labour code of British Columbia are not so good, and the trade union movement, and rightly so, is up in arms and questioning these changes. Statements have been made and will be made in that city that could render those people liable to sedition. The Minister of Justice should not forget that the enforcement of this law will be in the hands of the provinces and in the struggle of the unions in British Columbia to maintain democracy that struggle is going to be with the provincial government.

I will not impute motives to anyone out there, but it is only natural for a government or an individual to defend themselves and fight back if they believe what they are doing is justified. The danger there is apparent, and I believe the warnings given by the hon. member for Vancouver East are justified. I know of another province in this country where this code will be enforced and where those who will administer this code and laws in that province are not going to be very lenient or understanding in relation to matters which might be misconstrued under this particular clause. I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated the case correctly. I believe where we have a clause such as this, where freedom of speech and thought is concerned, and in view of the development of the world situation, the minister should rewrite that clause and make it clear beyond the shadow of a doubt that no one can misapply it or use it for purposes of their own in any given situation. I would like to see the minister remove some of the ambiguous language from this clause because as it stands now it can definitely be misapplied and misunderstood.

Mr. Garson: As he so often does, the hon. member for Cape Breton South has just raised points of real substance which I think are certainly deserving of a reply. I would like to make that reply in these terms. The leading case upon this subject is Boucher v. R, which was decided as late as 1951. Now I can quite understand the views of laymen to the effect that it might be better for the purposes of defending this clause against those who criticize it, not always fairly, to attempt to produce an interpretation of all the judgments of the judges of the Supreme Court in the Boucher case, and insert this interpretation in clause 60 as a definition of sedition. From the political point of view there is a great temptation to take that easy way. But it seemed to us that clause 60 is tied up closely with the civil rights of the individual Canadian who may be on trial on a charge of sedition. When therefore we already had in the Criminal Code a section dealing with sedition which has been interpreted definitively by the highest court in Canada, it is better to leave that definite result upon the law books even if it is less explicable politically, than to attempt to write another clause into the code which again has to be interpreted judicially before one can say precisely what the law of sedition is.

We have a firm law now and I think it is a very good law. It may be that in the selections I made from these judgments I read extracts which were rather long and by doing so confused the issue. I did so consciously because if there is anything I abhor it is having a sentence or two taken out of context, and in each case I tried to give enough of the context so that the real sense of the single important sentence could be understood by this committee. But perhaps if I were to go through the judgments and read just the single important sentence—

Mr. Winch: The Rand judgment is important.

Mr. Garson: They are all important because the law is established by a court of nine judges. As the hon. member for York-Scarborough said, the ratio decidendi of that case can only be established by a proper understanding of all the reasons for judgment given by all of the judges.

In the case of Mr. Justice Kerwin this is the single sentence:

> An intention to bring the administration of justice into hatred or contempt or exert disaffection against it is not seditious unless there is also the intention to incite people to violence against it.

In other words, in order to bring home the charge against the accused you must prove against him an intention upon his part to incite people, to whom his expression of opinion or his speech is made, to violence against the government.

Now, the next single sentence is from Mr. Justice Taschereau:

> I think that, generally speaking, the writings complained of must, in addition to being calculated to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of His Majesty's subjects, be intended to produce disturbance or resistance to the lawfully constituted authority.

He must intend to create violence, not to make a speech. Mr. Justice Rand puts it in the form of a question:

> The test is this: was the language used calculated, or was it not, to promote public disorder or physical force.

If the language was so calculated, it must also be proven that the person who uttered it intended to create disorder and violence.

Mr. Justice Kellock said:

> . . . in my opinion, incitement to violence toward constituted authority, i.e., government in the broad sense, or resistance having the same object, is, upon the authorities, a necessary ingredient of the intention. . . In my opinion, to render the intention seditious, there must be an intention to incite to violence or resistance or defiance for the purpose of disturbing constituted authority.

Then Mr. Justice Estey said:

> I am of the opinion that in all cases the intention to incite violence or public disorder or unlawful conduct against His Majesty or an institution of the state is essential.

Mr. Justice Cartwright said:

> . . . before a writing can be held to disclose a seditious intention by reason of being calculated to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of His Majesty's subjects it must further appear that the intended, or natural and probable, consequence of such promotion of ill-will and hostility is to produce disturbance or resistance to the authority of lawfully constituted government.

Now, what we are talking about in the offence of sedition is the deliberate intention to create violence and disturbance against the lawfully constituted government. That is not too dissimilar in principle to treason. For the offence of sedition a maximum penalty of fourteen years imprisonment is applicable. Now I recognize the force of the argument submitted by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Cape Breton South that it would make both the government's position and the task of hon. members of the house defending this legislation much easier if there were in clause 60 a definition of sedition which reflected accurately all of the reasons for judgment in the Boucher v. R. case.

But if we do that, then we have a different section in the act from that upon which the judgments were decided. If a case arises and comes before the court, then the new language has to be interpreted again. We shall then have found that we have purchased this political facility of explaining our position at the expense perhaps of some doubt as to what the law is, and a doubt that is in relation to a law which is of great importance to the accused. That is the reason why we thought that of those two alternatives, the intellectually honourable thing to do was to stand by certainty in the law and face any criticism in which such a course might involve us.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

[Mr. Garson.]

The Deputy Chairman: Carried on division.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clause 61 agreed to.

On clause 62—Punishment of seditious offences.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to propose to clause 62. I think that sufficient has been said on this matter of penalties and that I need not take up the time of the committee any further. It is shown that breaches of these sections of the Criminal Code are few and far between. As I see it, unless the government falls down in its duty of providing good government in this country, there is nothing in front of us that would indicate there is any danger that there will be more reason for sedition in the future than there has been in the past. I therefore move:

> That clause 62 of Bill 7 be amended by deleting therefrom the words "fourteen years" and by substituting therefor the words "five years".

I myself hardly know why I did not put in "two years" instead of "five years" but I imagine that I did it, in my usual reasonable way, in trying to get the support of those who would think that two years was too little. I am sure there are many members in this chamber—on the other side as well as on this side—who think that, without a single case being before the courts, raising the penalty from two years to fourteen years is altogether unreasonable.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. MacInnis) negatived: Yeas, 9; nays, 53.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: Before you put the clause, Mr. Chairman, there are just two or three things I should like to say. It seems to me—and as a result of the discussion that has taken place this afternoon I feel it more strongly than I did before—that this whole question of sedition should be referred to a royal commission. I think it is at least as important as are some of the subjects which have been referred to a committee of this house or to a royal commission.

The second thing I want to say is this. I feel that the fact that there is to be on the statute books of Canada legislation of this nature providing for the type of penalty that is involved in clause 62, now that our amendment has been defeated, makes even more important the need for a bill of rights. Along with this kind of legislation I think there should be a companion measure setting out what are the civil rights of Canadian citizens.

The third thing I suggest is this. I think that perhaps what is needed in the country more than coercive legislation is an institution, if I may call it that, akin to Hyde park in London. If we had a few places like that across Canada where people were perfectly free to express their views on any subject in any way under the same kind of circumstances as those under which views are expressed at that famous corner, I think we would gain from it even as the people of Great Britain have gained from that symbol of civil liberty and freedom of speech.

Mr. Garson: I have only one thing to say, Mr. Chairman, and I shall say it briefly. My hon. friend has no reason at all to say that under the laws of Canada there is not available the same freedom of speech that is available in Hyde park in London.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: Carried on division.

Clause agreed to on division.

The Deputy Chairman: I notice that it is now just on the verge of five o'clock, and we have completed one group of sections. The next group which I presume the committee will start on at its next sitting commences with clause 32 and deals with riots. As hon. members know of the special program that has been agreed upon for this evening, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

BESSIE KATZ ELMAN

The house in committee on Bill No. 312, for the relief of Bessie Katz Elman—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved the third reading of Bill No. 312.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it agreed that the bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Title agreed to and bill passed on division.

Private Bills

NIAGARA GAS TRANSMISSION LIMITED

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 325 (Letter D-10 of the Senate) intituled: "An act to authorize Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Bill No. 325 and Bill No. 389 both come from the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Is it agreed that they be committed together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 325, to authorize Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.—Mr. Hunter.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 389, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited—Mr. Decore—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: Before this clause is carried, there is a question I should like to ask. At the moment I am not sure whether it should be asked on this bill or whether it should have been asked on the other bill. What happened to the suggestion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that one of these bills might be amended by the addition of a coming into force clause?

Mr. McIvor: It was not needed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If I may answer that, before the bill was referred to the committee the two pipe line companies, Niagara Gas and Trans-Canada, had entered into an agreement, which was signed by both parties and which was submitted to the committee. The committee believed that agreement adequately protected the situation, and that is my own opinion. Therefore I see no present purpose in the inclusion of a coming into force clause.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister if there is not the further fact that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is to build the line from the Niagara river to Toronto?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Green: Whereas the original intention was that it should be built by Niagara Gas Transmission.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. The result of the agreement is that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited will build the line.

Private Bills

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EASTERN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Balcom) moved the second reading of Bill No. 394, respecting Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Mr. Knowles: Is the sponsor of the bill in a position to make a statement on it?

Mr. Croll: Yes. This bill is sponsored by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) who is absent on constituency business, as is the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey). There is some urgency about this bill which was passed by the Senate on the 31st of March. Its effect is to amend the act of incorporation of the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company which was incorporated by a special act of parliament in 1917 with an authorized capital of $10 million divided into shares of a par value of $100 each. At the time of incorporation—I am sure the house will agree with this—it was a highly imaginative undertaking since it was intended to construct a single channel telephone cable.

In 1931 the project was suspended and since that time the company has been inactive. For quite obvious reasons the act of incorporation was amended by special act of parliament in the session of 1931 which authorized the company to reduce its capital by bylaw, which had to be filed with the Secretary of State. This was done on the 1st of September, 1931, and the capital was reduced to $75,000 divided into shares of $100 each.

The house is aware that the transatlantic telephone service since its inception in 1927 has been provided by radio and is subject to atmospheric and other interference not applicable to cable. On November 27, 1953, an agreement was entered into between Her Majesty's postmaster general of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company. That agreement provided for the construction, at a cost of $35 million, of a cable extending from Oban, Scotland, to Clarenville, Newfoundland, and then to Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia and by radio relay from Sydney Mines to Portland and New York.

The three countries, the United States, Great Britain and Canada, have agreed to lay this submarine cable which contains thirty-six circuits and will provide for the carrying of thirty-six conversations simultaneously.

Mr. Knowles: We need one in this house.

Mr. Croll: It would not be such a wonder if they knew this house. The distance between the two mainlands, between Nova Scotia and Scotland, is 2,200 miles. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company will own 50 per cent of the stock; the British post office department will own 41 per cent, and the Department of Transport will own 9 per cent. The head office of the company is now located in Halifax and will remain in Halifax.

The Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company and the New Brunswick Telephone Company will both have representation on the board of directors of the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company. I am requested to ask the house to give second reading to this bill and to send it to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Fulton: Where does Eastern come into that?

Mr. Croll: They have a charter. Originally it was incorporated as the Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company. They are now a wholly-owned subsidiary of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 395, for the relief of Elsie Elizabeth Belford Grant.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 396, for the relief of Jean Monette.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 397, for the relief of Pearl Mary Brown Pratt.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 398, for the relief of Annie Holman James.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 399, for the relief of Marie Paule Lemay Mondello.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 400, for the relief of Marilyn Lesley Simpson Lavallee.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 401, for the relief of Edith Lorraine McBurney Robinson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 402, for the relief of Aline Gosselin du Berger.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 403, for the relief of Eileen Lucy Tollett Power-Williams.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 404, for the relief of William Pappas.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 405, for the relief of Claire Labelle Cousineau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 406, for the relief of Denise Marie Helene Laporte Woodhouse.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 407, for the relief of Lois Helena Kearns Higham.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 408, for the relief of Dorothy Rita Wade Moulden.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 409, for the relief of Albert Thornton.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 410, for the relief of Koidula Laigma Hagel.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 411, for the relief of Yvette Lafontaine Tatos.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 412, for the relief of Freda Becker Blumenthal.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 413, for the relief of Monica Elizabeth Benoit Mullin.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 414, for the relief of Felix Andre Landry.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 415, for the relief of Marie-Claire Parisien Barbeau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 416, for the relief of Marie Muriel Gladys Lena Soubre Dubour.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 417, for the relief of Joan Millicent Kemp Tessier.—Mr. Hunter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, on these twenty-three divorce bills, may I make one suggestion, and I do so confident that it will be carried out. As the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter), who is the chairman of the committee to which these bills will be referred, knows, there was some difficulty the other day because when a certain bill was reported back to the committee of the whole it was ascertained that the bill had been dealt with in the committee on miscellaneous private bills before the printed evidence had been received and was in the hands of the members of that committee. I merely rise to suggest—

Mr. Hunter: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that none of these bills came before the private bills committee before the evidence was available although there was one bill upon which the evidence was available only a matter of an hour and a half before the committee met.

Mr. Knowles: I think the statement made by the hon. member for Parkdale serves only to underline the point I am making. My suggestion to him is that we should have the assurance that none of these bills will be considered by his committee until he is satisfied that the printed evidence is in the hands of all the members of that committee. Surely that is the least for which we might ask.

Mr. Hunter: I shall be very glad to do that. In fact, I have already given instructions to that effect.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

BALOISE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 418, to incorporate Baloise Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Could we have an explanation?

Mr. Cannon: The purpose of this bill is to incorporate a Canadian company to take over the assets and liabilities of a Swiss company which has been operating in Canada since 1923 in the field of fire and automobile insurance. The bill has the approval of the superintendent of insurance. The capital will be $1 million. Before starting business the paid-up capital will be a half million dollars, which is double the usual requirement. The company intends to do business in the whole of Canada in all kinds of insurance except life.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 30, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Fairclough for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): I want to speak on this Bill No. 2, not because it is one applicable to women but because it concerns a simple matter of justice. Since the turn of the century women in Canada and in the other free countries have been fighting for this type of justice. We are not quite as militant about it today as we were fifty years ago, but I believe we are just as determined. Equal pay for equal work is a principle that I believe a young country like Canada should establish forthwith. Only three provinces in Canada have been enlightened enough so far to introduce equal pay laws. They are Saskatchewan in 1952; Ontario in 1951 and British Columbia earlier this year. Even those provinces are not exactly practising what they have enacted.

In Canada we pride ourselves on being a young country and yet we lag far behind on this enlightened legislation. Older countries such as France and Italy already have equal pay laws, and so has Burma. I believe Mexico was the first country to enact such a law in 1917. Many years ago Britain approved the principle of equal pay but has never actually enacted it into law. I should like to see Canada approve the principle, enact it and enforce it. In the creative field there is no discrimination at all. An artist is judged and paid according to his or her talents. An author signs the same contract with a publisher irrespective of the author's sex. In fact, such words as "authoress" or "poetess" are obsolete today. In the professions a lawyer or a doctor is worthy of his or her hire. I am proud to say that in my own profession there is no such word as "reporteress" or "editoress".

Yet in one of the most important of all the professions, that of teaching, not only are school boards notably reluctant to recognize this basic principle of equal pay but so are a good many of the male teachers. One reason for this, and I have heard it many times, is that men teachers do extracurricular duties that women teachers are not called upon to do or are not able to do. If a job calls for the same qualifications, then it seems to me there should be one salary schedule. If a little extra brawn is needed along with the brain, then a little extra pay should be given for that brawn. But whether it is in the teaching profession, in industry, or in the civil service, the brawn should be paid for and if the brain qualifications are the same and men and women do an equal job then they should receive equal pay.

Even in industry there is a strange reluctance to recognize this principle. It is true that for some time now the steel workers union has been working on the full application of the equal pay principle, and a good many other labour unions have incorporated it into their contracts. Generally speaking, however, the principle has not received more than lip service. On this question of justice the trade unions have not been overly vocal, nor has management. Unfortunately, and perhaps most important of all, women have not been particularly vocal or have not fought for it. Each group has a different reason for this, but I believe we are all the victims of prejudice and tradition.

Our thinking has not caught up with the actual conditions because from kindergarten on through university we give Canadian boys and girls exactly the same education. They start out with an equal opportunity. We turn out equal products, and then when it comes time to pay these products for what they can contribute we discriminate in the pay. One of the arguments against equal pay for equal work is that men have greater responsibilities towards the establishment of homes and the maintenance of dependents. Like the words "poetess" and "authoress", those are obsolete arguments today. There are more than a million women working in Canada and out of every hundred working women who are gainfully employed, eighty-four work to support themselves and dependents; eight work for special reasons such as buying a house or educating their children or paying off bills; another eight work because they want to work or for the pleasure of paying taxes.

So that 84 out of every 100 gainfully employed women are working because they have to work. While these women may receive one salary for a job, the men receive another salary for the same job. And yet the men meet equally on so many other footings. When it comes to price tags, for instance, there is no discrimination. There is no discrimination when it comes to taxes. When it comes to groceries, fuel or rent there is no discrimination. Yet we do find insistence upon this discrimination in the matter of payment received for jobs.

Some misapprehension has developed among the unions upon the mistaken idea that women will take jobs from men. However, it has been proved again and again that equal pay actually protects men as well as it protects women, and in fact that it protects employees as well as employers. Equal pay discourages employers from hiring women at lower rates of pay, and thus replacing men when they can get cheaper labour. Also, if the principle is adopted universally it protects employers from another industry operating at a cut-rate hiring a majority of women at lower pay, and thus competing unfairly.

I find myself slightly befuddled by the minister's reaction to Bill No. 2. As reported at page 2593 of Hansard he asks this question:

> Who is to say what is comparable work, even as between two men employees?

It seems to me the point there is that when it is two men employees who are doing comparable work, or what is considered comparable work, they are paid equally.

Then, as reported at page 2594, the minister pointed out that the four great national labour organizations, and the National Council of Women, have not pushed this matter in their presentation of briefs this year. But I suggest that the government should not sit back waiting to be pushed, but should give leadership in this direction.

It seems to me the minister has been trying to tell us that the people are not particularly concerned with this problem, and therefore asks why the government should intervene. But I would point out that last year a Gallup poll was taken asking the question from those interviewed, whether they believed in equal pay for equal work, and two-thirds of Canadians answered that they did believe in equal pay for equal work.

Finally, the minister says that he is not against equal pay for women, but that he is going to vote against the bill. This leaves me more befuddled than ever because I cannot see how one can be for something, and vote against it.

In conclusion I would ask the house to remember the preamble in the United Nations charter which establishes the basic principles of human rights in the dignity and worth of the human person, and in the equal rights of men and women.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask the hon. member a question? In the Gallup poll to which she refers was the question, "Are you in favour of equal pay for equal work?" or was it, "Are you in favour of equal pay for equal work, to be instituted by an act of the legislature or parliament?"

Mrs. Fairclough: That is splitting hairs.

Miss Aitken: I shall read the question. The question was: Generally speaking, do you think women who work should receive equal pay with men for the same kind of work, or do you think men should receive more?

Mr. Gregg: I agree with the first question. I am on the side of the angels, there.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of this bill on equal pay for women, although I am aware that the minister looks with, shall I say, only a lukewarm eye on this particular bill. Let me say at the outset that in my opinion it is not a very good bill, and my reason for giving it a certain amount of moral support—and I certainly intend to vote for it—is that I believe it will encourage the government to bring in a really good bill to do the job which the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) is trying to do.

May I say at the outset that it seems to me a great many of the arguments used for so many years in favour of unequal pay—that is, that the man had to get more pay than the woman—have passed away. That is especially true in this country. Because, under the really wonderful welfare state this government has set up, a state in which there is social welfare without socialism, social welfare without regimentation—things like family allowances, grants, old age pensions and old age security—the need for the husband and father to get more money than a woman has largely passed away. Therefore, from the standpoint of equity there is no reason now why there should be discrimination between the sexes.

I say, however, that in my opinion this is not a very good bill. There are weak spots in it. I believe there are great weak spots in all the legislation in Canada which deals with equal pay between the sexes. The last time I talked to my very good friend, the late Agnes Macphail, she remarked what a great sham the bill in Ontario was. I know the bill passed in British Columbia, to which my hon. friend referred, has had some very unpremeditated effects; and one effect it had in British Columbia was that instead of benefiting women it actually handicapped them in certain of the industries. Because in some corporations, whose names I shall not mention, there was an immediate reclassification of the jobs, with the result that, in the end, women found themselves worse off than they were before.

I say there are real weaknesses in the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Hamilton West. I notice, for instance, that she has entitled the bill the "Women's Equal Pay Act." I, for one, would like to know from the hon. member why she did not entitle it the "Equal Pay Act"? Is it that all people are equal, but that women are more equal than men?

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps.

Mr. Philpott: I ask that because, just this afternoon, up in the banking committee I asked the president of the bankers association of Canada the same question on this subject, and he told me that while he had no complaint to make about the quality of the work done by women, and that women apparently were just as efficient as men on the job, in certain categories women were being paid more than the men were being paid for doing exactly the same job. So I would like to point out to the hon. member sponsoring the bill that one immediate effect of it would be to reduce the pay of a certain number of bank clerks in Canada. So it seems to me that perhaps, having in mind the Irish gentleman who believed in the equality of all men, but also believed that the Irish were the best of the lot, we should take a second look at some of the provisions in the bill designed to give equal pay to women.

In my opinion a better approach to this whole question of equal pay would have been to put equal pay provisions in the anti-discrimination law passed by the house a year or so ago, and to make it an offence to discriminate against anyone on grounds of race, colour, creed or sex.

Mr. Knowles: Have you consulted the Minister of Labour on that point?

Mr. Philpott: Speaking about labour, I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that one of the reasons why we have not had equal pay legislation long before now in North America, or better still, we have not had equal pay action long before now is that the trade unions of North America, to say the least, have been decidedly even more lukewarm about this particular measure than the minister happens to be about this particular bill. We had a notorious case of a great union in the United States not so many years ago where even in their own head office, they were not giving equal pay as between men and women for the same job, even though they were setting themselves up as a champion of organized workers in such and such a field.

Further, I may say that while I intend to vote for this bill just as a gesture, a small token, that perhaps we should get this government to bring in a better bill after due investigation, I would think that one of the great things we need in this country is an expert investigation under some proper body as to just what are the facts about discrimination in pay as between men and women, and what might be done most effectively to redress any discrimination that there should be. I know that this is not the stage to discuss it, but if this bill ever gets into the committee stage I certainly will do my best to emphasize the impracticality of the machinery that the bill sets up to try to get a remedy for alleged grievances, because it puts the whole onus on the individual, and then it sets up very cumbersome and clumsy conciliation machinery. I notice also that it invokes a fine of merely $100 on anybody who offends the law. After all, if there were a really serious case of discrimination, the employer could gyp the female employee out of $1,000 salary and could well afford to pay the $100 if he were caught.

However, as I say, this is a long-overdue reform in Canada, and there should not be any discrimination between the sexes. We should have equal pay for equal work, and even if it is true that in some cases people are clamouring for equal pay, especially the school teachers and others, they ignore the fact that there is a certain amount of injustice, for instance, where some of the male teachers are called on to stay for many hours after school is out to carry on extracurricular activities for which they get no compensation. Notwithstanding all that, I do intend to vote for this bill because I think it is a step in the right direction, even if it is not a very long one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Hamilton West speaks now, she will close the debate.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): In replying to some of the statements which have been made in the course of this debate I should like to deal with several points, but right at the beginning I cannot resist commenting on a news item which has just been brought to my attention. In this evening's paper there is an article headed: "British budget contains promise of equal pay." It goes on to describe the new budget which was brought down in Great Britain today and it says it is indicated that the British government had at long last acquiesced in the desires of the women of Britain, and intends to bring in equal pay legislation.

Mr. Rowe: This government might bring it in tonight.

Mrs. Fairclough: On March 2 when this bill was introduced the minister, in replying, first of all admitted that women's work was needed certainly in our rapidly expanding economy. I am interested to note that in the current issue of the Labour Gazette it is indicated that women in the labour force are highlighted. There are several articles from various sources, and some extremely interesting information. One article is apparently the product of the department itself. It states that from 1901 to 1951 the number of women in the labour force has increased almost fivefold, and the ratio of women in the labour force to the total population of women of working age has almost doubled. The proportionate increase in their numbers in the labour force has far exceeded that of men. If I were not simply using this period in reply I should like to quote further from this article, but I do not wish to take the time of the house now because, if it is at all possible, I should like to see this question brought to a vote.

Apart from the fact that the minister has admitted the need of women workers, it is substantiated many times in the articles to which I have referred. Again the minister has said that this bill makes provision for complaints. I should like to say that that is the way it should be. I do not think that the enforcement of such legislation should depend upon inspection. In the legislation there should definitely be a provision for the lodging of complaints. I note it has been said by some of those who have spoken that there have not been very many complaints lodged under the legislation which is in effect at the present time. In order to find out exactly what the situation is I have procured some information with respect to the Ontario act which went into force just two years ago. I have found that in that time 104 complaints have been lodged; 38 of these are in process at the present time. Of the total number, 14 were dismissed and 52 were withdrawn, presumably after consideration, and I expect a certain amount of agreement between both parties, but 38 are still in the process of being considered.

The minister also made the remark that women do not appear to be numerous in the membership of our labour organizations. I should just like to say that that is probably true and it is all the more reason why they need legislation to protect them. If the large number of women who are employed in industry and in commerce and in education and in other fields today are not protected by labour unions or by labour organizations which promote their rights, then there is all the more reason why federal legislation should set out the intent of labour generally in this country, and certainly indicate the thing which is already, as the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) said earlier, the opinion, as shown in the Gallup poll, that most of the people of this country are in favour of equal pay for equal work.

I might say in that regard that the minister was splitting hairs when he asked whether the question put to the people was whether they thought women should have equal pay with men or whether they thought legislation should be enacted to provide for it. Certainly if the predominance of opinion was in favour of it, I would think that the predominance of opinion would likewise be in favour of legislation to enforce it.

The minister said further that he thought that the matter of equal remuneration should be a factor in collective bargaining, and that it had hitherto been regarded as a factor in collective bargaining; but apparently the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia did not think so, nor did the 13 states in the United States of America which have enacted this type of legislation, nor did the other countries which have enacted such legislation, and now certainly the British government does not think so either, because they have indicated their intention of bringing in legislation at this session of parliament.

Industrial Status of Women

The minister goes on to say he does not want to give the impression no problem exists, but he adds, as reported at page 2594 of Hansard:

> I should like to know that a specific problem existed . . . and that it was serious enough to warrant intervention.

I do not know how serious the minister believes a problem should be before there is intervention. Certainly there is a problem as he admits, and it should be seriously considered and not just brushed lightly aside with a lot of half-baked excuses about the fact that it should be a matter for collective bargaining; that the time is not ripe; that we have not taken advantage of the legislation at present on the statute books; that the present bill is inadequate, or any of the number of minor criticisms which have been attached to this legislation.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said on March 19, this is a matter of establishing a standard, and probably, as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) pointed out, there would not be many prosecutions, but the act itself would have a salutary effect on employers, and I believe that is why you do not have too many complaints under this legislation. Once legislation is in effect the average person goes along with it and they do not deliberately flout the law. They try to abide by the laws of their country. Several other hon. members have been concerned, as was the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) today, with the implementation of this act. But I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that any legislation being brought down for the first time is ever perfect. I cannot agree with him that this matter has any connection with the fair employment practices act. We gave very careful consideration to that matter and I know the minister considered it in detail when he brought in the first bill, but I cannot agree this matter of equal pay for equal work has any place in fair employment practices legislation.

I would suggest that the hon. member for Vancouver South must have been influenced by those who conducted what was more or less a lobby on this subject, and I can assure him that we were all victims of that lobby, although some of us with strong opinions on the subject were not influenced by it.

Mr. Philpott: No one lobbied me.

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps you didn't recognize it as a lobby. In any event this legislation as I said previously has been adopted by many governments both in this country and abroad. It is a progressive type of legislation which fits well into the changing employment conditions of our time and I solicit the support of every hon. member of this house in regard to this legislation.

The house divided on the motion (Mrs. Fairclough) which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Aitken, Miss	Jones
Argue	Knight
Balcer	Knowles
Barnett	Leboe
Bell	Lennard
Blackmore	Low
Blair	Macdonnell
Brown (Brantford)	MacDougall
Bryson	MacInnis
Cameron (Nanaimo)	McCullough (Moose Mountain)
Campbell	McGregor
Cardiff	McLeod
Casselman	Monteith
Castleden	Murphy (Lambton West)
Charlton	Nesbitt
Churchill	Nicholson
Coldwell	Nickle
Crestohl	Noseworthy
Dinsdale	Patterson
Drew	Philpott
Dupuis	Purdy
Ellis	Quelch
Eyre	Regier
Fairclough, Mrs.	Robinson (Bruce)
Fleming	Rowe
Fraser (Peterborough)	Shipley, Mrs.
Fulton	Simmons
Gagnon	Small
Gillis	Stanton
Goode	Starr
Green	Thatcher
Hahn	Tustin
Harkness	White (Hastings-Frontenac)
Hees	White (Middlesex East)
Herridge	White (Waterloo South)
Hodgson	Winch
Hollingworth	Wylie
Howe (Wellington-Huron)	Zaplitny—78.
Johnson (Kindersley)
Johnston (Bow River)

NAYS

Messrs:

Anderson	Cloutier
Applewhaite	Cote
Ashbourne	Decore
Batten	Demers
Bertrand	Deschatelets
Blanchette	Deslieres
Boisvert	Dumas
Boivin	Enfield
Bonnier	Fairey
Boucher (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie)	Follwell
Bourget	Fraser (St. John's East)
Bourque	Gardiner
Brisson	Garland
Brown (Essex West)	Garson
Buchanan	Gauthier (Lake St. John)
Cameron (High Park)	Gauthier (Nickel Belt)
Campney	Gauthier (Portneuf)
Cannon	Gingras
Caron	Gingues
Carter	Girard
Cavers	Gour (Russell)
Chevrier	Gourd (Chapleau)
Gregg	McMillan
Hanna	McWilliam
Harris	Mang
Harrison	Masse
Hellyer	Meunier
Henderson	Michaud
Henry	Mitchell (Sudbury)
Hosking	Nixon
Houck	Pearson
Howe (Port Arthur)	Pickersgill
Huffman	Pinard
Hunter	Pommer
James	Poulin
Jutras	Pouliot
Kickham	Power (St. John's West)
Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough)	Proudfoot
Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare)	Prudham
Lafontaine	Ratelle
Langlois (Gaspe)	Roberge
Lapointe	Robertson
Leduc	Robichaud
Lefrançois	Robinson (Simcoe East)
Lesage	Ross
Lusby	St. Laurent
MacEachen	Smith
MacKenzie	Stick
MacNaught	Studer
Macnaughton	Viau
McCann	Weaver
McCubbin	Weir
McCulloch (Pictou)	Weselak
McIlraith	Winters
	Wood—109.

Mr. Speaker: The time allocated for private and public bills having expired, the house at eight o'clock will consider the business which was previously announced. As it is six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

Perhaps I should remind hon. members that during a division they should not leave the house and also that they should not leave the house until the Speaker has left the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I must depart from my carefully prepared text to express my appreciation for the warmth of the greeting of my friends behind me.

This is my eighth year as Minister of Finance and my tenth budget speech. When I brought down my first budget the world had just emerged from a long and costly war. Looking back at it now I can say that the views I then expressed about our own affairs have been more than justified, but our international hopes have fallen far short of realization. We have had to cope with recurring threats to peace and security, and we have had to incur heavy costs, in co-operation with our friends and allies, in building up the defensive strength of the free world. Solid progress, however, has been made during 1953 and we can face the future with growing confidence.

The growing strength of the North Atlantic alliance has done much to reduce the dangers of armed aggression, but fundamental solutions are still denied us. A just settlement of these questions requires the free world to continue to improve its defensive position in order to negotiate from strength. We cannot yet afford to relax.

In the economic sphere, 1953 has been a much better year. Industrial and agricultural production in almost all countries has continued to expand, and consumption has risen. Supplies of many products entering into international trade are becoming more plentiful, and international markets more competitive. The recovery of Germany and Japan has contributed to this development. It is becoming increasingly evident that after many years of scarcity and inflation we are returning to more normal competitive conditions.

It is encouraging to note the further improvement which has taken place in trade and payments relations between the dollar and the non-dollar countries. The clearest indication of this is the substantial increase in the gold and dollar reserves of overseas countries. During 1953 the sterling area achieved a substantial over-all surplus with the rest of the world. The central reserves held by the United Kingdom rose by $670 million during 1953 and have continued to rise in the first quarter of 1954. As a result of these favourable developments the position of the sterling area has strengthened considerably. A substantial improvement in the over-all balance of payments and exchange reserves has also been experienced by most European countries.

The progress of the United Kingdom toward freer trade is most significant. Large sectors of trade have been decontrolled; commodity markets have been reopened; and important raw materials and foodstuffs have been placed under open general licence. As a result of these changes, United Kingdom importers are now free to purchase a large part of their basic requirements from the cheapest sources, including the dollar countries. Significant relaxations in trade and exchange controls have also been introduced by Germany, Belgium, Holland, South Africa and a number of other countries.

While this worth-while progress toward freer trade and payments is a source of satisfaction it still falls far short of what is needed. In many respects the balance of world trade, although very much improved, still lacks defence in depth. It cannot be otherwise as long as major currencies are inconvertible, and there continues to be a widespread use of restrictionism and discrimination.

Perhaps the most encouraging feature of recent developments in this field is the change in the attitude of many countries to their external financial problems. There is a growing impatience with the existing system of direct trade controls and discriminations and an increased awareness of the serious economic damage which results from the perpetuation of such policies. To a greater extent than at any time since the end of the war, overseas countries are showing a willingness to envisage basic changes in their trade policy in order to deal with their exchange problems in a fundamental way.

This attitude is most clearly expressed in the "collective approach" proposals formulated on the initiative of the United Kingdom at the commonwealth economic conference in December 1952. These proposals envisage the restoration of an effective system of multilateral trade, and the achievement of currency convertibility over the widest possible area through co-operative international action. In the course of my last budget I stated that Canada had participated fully in the development of the "collective approach" and would be willing to co-operate in any common efforts required to achieve these goals. Today, I am glad to report that real progress has been made over the past year in laying the foundations for the implementation of this constructive program.

In January, as the house knows, I attended the conference of commonwealth finance ministers in Sydney, Australia, which—by the way—I consider to be the most satisfactory conference of this kind since the end of the war. In reviewing developments since the December 1952 meeting, the conference agreed that the substantial improvements which had taken place confirmed the fundamental soundness of the policies and objectives which they had set for themselves. Without reservation all commonwealth countries joined in a clear reaffirmation of the "collective approach" proposals for currency convertibility and freer trade.

During the past year constructive developments have also taken place in other countries. For most of this period the United States has been in the process of re-examining its foreign economic policies. An important stage in this process was completed in January, when the United States commission on foreign economic policy issued its report. The recommendations of this commission—better known as the Randall report—provide, in my view, a reasonably promising basis for action by the United States in a co-operative movement towards a sounder system of trade and payments.

Progress has also been made by international agencies with responsibilities in this field. The international monetary fund has made changes in its rules and practices to ensure that its resources can be used more effectively to support a major move to convertibility. In Europe the OEEC has undertaken a study to see how the European payments union can best be integrated into a broader payments system, and powerful new voices have recently been raised in western Europe in favour of an early move to convertibility and multilateral trade.

As part of this general move to strengthen the instruments of international economic co-operation, the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade have undertaken an important program of work for the coming year. GATT has made a most valuable contribution to the expansion of world trade, and we welcome the decision to undertake a general review of the agreement with a view to making it a more effective instrument. The session which is planned for next fall will also consider the prospects for new multilateral tariff negotiations. In the meantime, in order to safeguard the stability of present tariff arrangements, the existing agreements have been extended to the end of June, 1955.

From what I have said, it is clear that events are shaping up to make the coming year an important one for progress in international economic co-operation. The new and positive attitudes of many countries, their improved trade and payments position, and the substantial progress towards domestic economic stability have combined to create a more favourable climate for advance than at any time since the end of the war.

No single country can by itself ensure the success of an enterprise which must essentially be a collective, co-operative effort. At the same time, I think it fair to say that the policies and attitudes of the United States in this regard occupy a place of central importance. The United States has been one of the strongest exponents of policies directed towards the reduction of trade barriers and the expansion of international trade. The success that has been achieved in this field is in large part due to the steady encouragement and substantial assistance that the United States people and their government have given to the countries of the free world. Canada has welcomed these policies and has played its full part in this constructive enterprise.

Three weeks ago I attended the first meeting of the joint United States-Canada committee on trade and economic affairs where ministers of our two countries had an opportunity to examine economic problems of common concern. Consideration was given throughout the discussions to the need for action towards freer trade and payments on a broad front. It was agreed that few things would contribute more to the well-being and economic stability of the free nations of the world than a forward move in this direction, and it was recognized that enlightened economic policies on the part of both the United States and Canada would contribute materially to the achievement of a better trade and payments system throughout the free world. United States ministers warmly welcomed the evidence of a desire in many countries to take decisive steps towards the restoration of a broad area of convertibility. I came away from these meetings with a distinct impression that the United States administration is willing to do its part in making such a movement successful. To this end the United States administration has just placed before congress a program designed to give effect to the main recommendations of the Randall commission. It is greatly to be hoped that the actions of the United States in the trade field will continue to provide effective leadership at this critical time.

Canada, as the third largest trading country, also has important responsibilities to fulfil in these co-operative efforts. At Sydney and at Washington I reaffirmed our willingness now, as in the past, to play an appropriate part in bringing about a freer world system of trade and payments.

Earlier in my remarks I referred to the fact that there has been a return to more normal competitive conditions in world markets. As might be expected, this development has brought with it growing protectionist pressures in many countries, including Canada. It should be clear that any retrograde step at this time would not only prejudice the achievements we have already made but would also jeopardize the prospects for real progress which are now at hand.

I come now to a review of economic developments in Canada during 1953 and the outlook for 1954. In 1953 the Canadian economy reached new peaks of production, employment and consumption. A year ago I based my budget on the expectation that the gross national product would increase by about 4 per cent; actually it increased about 5 per cent. Since population increased less rapidly than national product and since prices were stable, the average Canadian worker and consumer had more dollars to spend and was able to obtain more goods for his dollars than in any year in our history.

The main factors responsible for the high level of production of 1953 were much the same as those of 1952 although the relative importance of some of them varied. Our very large defence program continued to give strong support to production and personal incomes, but this element has become a sustaining rather than an expansionist force. In each of the years 1951 and 1952 defence expenditures increased by about $600 million, whereas in 1953 they were about the same as in 1952 and there will be not much change in 1954. This slowing down in the growth of defence expenditures no doubt contributed to the levelling off of production in some industries that became evident toward the end of 1953.

On the other hand, a very substantial increase in consumer expenditures, and an expanding program of private capital investment, were strong stimulating forces. Consumer expenditures, strengthened by the continued rise in real incomes, showed a particularly large increase, and were the most dynamic force in the upward movement of 1953.

New investment in plant, equipment and housing rose by 10 per cent. New housing showed the most striking increase, rising by about 30 per cent, and was responsible for almost two-thirds of the total increase in durable physical assets put in place in 1953. There was a considerable increase in construction in the sectors of trade and commerce and in institutional building, where investment had previously been postponed by government restrictions during the early defence build-up period. Capital expenditures in manufacturing declined slightly, but investment in mining and resource development continued to increase. There was a significant increase in business inventories during the first nine months of the year, concentrated largely in the manufacturing and retail groups. The decline in inventories during the final quarter, though it contributed to the levelling off of business activity, was basically a constructive adjustment.

Finally, 1953 was also another big year for Canada's external trade. Imports continued the upward trend which first became apparent in the latter part of 1952, and were 9 per cent greater than the previous year. Exports, on the other hand, while still at very high levels showed a decline of 4 per cent from the record established in 1952.

The substantial increase in demand for imports reflects in large part the high levels of investment and consumer spending which characterized the economy during 1953. It also reflects the improved supply situation in many countries and sharper competition in world markets. These factors also contributed to the small decline in Canadian exports, including such traditional export products as wheat, woodpulp and farm machinery.

A significant change took place in the direction of our export trade. Sales to the United States rose by over $100 million, while the proportion of our exports going to the United Kingdom and other commonwealth markets declined, reversing the trend which had prevailed during 1952. On the other hand, there was some increase in the proportion of our imports coming from the United Kingdom.

The emergence of an import surplus on merchandise account was the main reason for the swing in Canada's balance of payments position from a current account surplus of $157 million in 1952 to a deficit of some $467 million in 1953.

