Even if I believed however (which I do not) that a central bank could now perform useful functions as a part of our monetary system, I would still entertain the view that the present is not a suitable time for its establishment. My reason for this conviction is that, without regard to the financial disturbance which would undoubtedly be caused by such a fundamental alteration in the structure of our monetary system, an institution of this kind would hamper rather than help the government of the day in dealing with the manifold and complex financial problems with which it is confronted.

And this final quotation:

A central bank, newly established, entrusted immediately with the ownership of the entire cash reserves of Canadian banks, and administered by a necessarily untried and independent board of directors, clothed with the power of controlling currency, credit and security issues and charged with the conduct of negotiations respecting our external public finance, could, I think, be only an impediment to the government in this trying period, when direct unfettered governmental action is manifestly required.

A little further on he uses these words:

In the solution of all these problems, it is my belief that the existing banking system of Canada supplemented by the provisions of the Finance Act, affords the government a much more efficient instrument than that system controlled and regulated by a newly-created central bank, independent, in theory at least, even of the government of the day.

I think probably men throughout this country, and particularly the men who are responsible for moulding the opinions and guiding the destiny of this nation in the trying times ahead, would be well advised to stop using the term "funny money" entirely until they begin to know something about what constitutes "funny" money and non-funny money. I maintain that the quotations which I have read and the information which I have given, drawn from this report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, 1933, constitute an absolute, unanswerable argument in support of the whole Social Credit position.

There is just one matter that needs to be given thought before we leave. People will ask: How can we determine how much money can safely be issued and brought into circulation without causing inflation? That is certainly an all-important question. The answer is this: The amount of money which needs to be in circulation at any time must depend directly on the total amount of goods within the country to be purchased and to be exchanged; consequently the amount of money in active circulation at any given time must be gauged in accordance with the amount of goods and particularly the amount of surplus goods and productive capacity not being moved into consumption or not being used. Bearing this in mind, and remembering that surely it must be possible to find men skilful enough to be able to make the calculations necessary in order to harmonize the amount of money in circulation with the amount of money work to be done—exchanges to be effected—bearing this in mind, certainly it must appear that the Social Credit proposals are well worthy of most careful and respectful attention by all hon. members and by this country.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) proceeds with his speech, may I tell the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that today again I found that he had been quoting too much at great length. I did not wish to interrupt him while he was making his speech, because during this debate great latitude is allowed; but I do not want him to consider that because I have been lenient today, on other occasions I shall allow him to quote at such great length while he is speaking.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I shall endeavour, during a few moments, to shed a ray of light over the discussion in vogue nowadays, that is, the question of direct taxation and federal-provincial fiscal agreements, by analysing certain aspects of the problem.

A few days ago a serious and independent newspaper wrote:

We remember that it was following a temporary agreement with Quebec that Ottawa took over income tax. Now, on the strength of an authorization granted for a time, the federal government claims that the province has no longer any right in that field.

We have here, Mr. Speaker, exactly the kind of information which misleads opinion, instead of enlightening it. And such confusion is spreading more and more in the minds of a great many people, so much so that one is inclined to believe that speech was given to man to bewilder the mind.

I quote the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec, who says that the provinces have exclusive right in the field of direct taxation, while claiming at the same time that the constitution must not be changed by one iota. The spirit and the letter of the constitution must be preserved, he asserts. The late premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Macdonald, said that the act of confederation should be redrafted. The Ligue d'Action nationale de la province de Québec stated before the Tremblay commission that our confederation should be rebuilt to prevent it from being a lie, that it must recognize the prior right of the provinces. Others say that subsidies are contrary to the spirit of confederation.

The Hon. Antoine Rivard relies on the fact that education is reserved to the provinces to state that the provinces have a prior right in the field of direct taxation. The Montreal chamber of commerce, which is not a political body or at least should not be, says that the matter of prior rights has no importance. In fact, they say it would be better for the federal government to authorize the deduction because the agreements would bring greater advantages. What confusion!

It is the same thing with the Conservative party, but confusion is still greater there, if that is possible. It passed a resolution at its convention, but completely disregards it in the house. And so we wonder whether the party is preparing one kind of political campaign for Quebec and adopting a different stand in the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I shall try to make my modest contribution and to throw a little light on this, even though I may have to repeat what others have said before me, because many people do not know the truth about this problem.

I fail to see why some people make statements as if they were the Gospel truth without even trying to find out what the truth is. Calmly and objectively, in order to do justice to the province of Quebec as well as to Canada as a whole, I shall try to deal with some interesting points in order to show why the federal government has to maintain the stand taken on this matter.

Why did the federal government propose fiscal agreements to the provinces?

Well, it is simply because the federal government and the provincial governments have legally a right of joint ownership in the field of direct taxation. That is a formal right; it is clear and to the point.

A great man has questioned that statement. At the federal-provincial conference of 1945, the premier of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, stated, and I quote the following words which appear at pages 355 and 356 of the report of the re-establishment conference of 1945-46:

> Among the matters exclusively reserved to the provinces, section 92 of the British North America Act mentions "direct taxation within the province." On the other hand, section 91 of the said act also vests in the federal parliament the right of raising money "by any mode or system of taxation". These two enactments are not contradictory; they mean that the provinces, in which according to the letter of the law has been vested the exclusive right of direct taxation, should have a priority right in such a field.

This problem turns on the word "exclusive" which appears in section 92 of our constitution. Unfortunately, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis has forgotten something. The respect which I owe him forces me to say that he must have committed an extremely serious oversight, one which has unfortunately cost the province of Quebec $164 million since 1948, when he could have recouped $53 million without even signing an agreement, by accepting the 5 per cent offered to the taxpayers.

And yet, if he had read the preceding section, section 91 of the constitution, he would have seen that the word "exclusively" is to be found in both sections 91 and 92, and I quote section 91 which he forgot to quote in his statement before the conference on re-establishment:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms in this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 3. The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

And so, when we read the two sections, we find that the word "exclusively" appears in both. They seem to contradict themselves and to be in mutual opposition. But on studying the text carefully one realizes that under section 91 the federal government has the exclusive right to raise money by all kinds of means for federal purposes, namely for purposes specified in the section.

In section 92, the word "exclusive" means that the provinces have the right to raise money in a direct way only, and for provincial purposes only. So there is no opposition and you have to admit that the text is clear and precise. Besides, that is how the other premiers of Canada, even the then premier of Ontario who is now the Leader of the Opposition in this chamber, understood it at the conference. The provincial prime ministers have realized that the federal government was entitled to levy taxes in every way.

To prove my case let me quote some of their statements. The premier of Manitoba said, on page 140 of the report:

> To the dominion were given the expensive national responsibilities and to assist them unlimited powers to support any kind of tax, direct or indirect.

The Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the premier of Nova Scotia, said, on page 531 of the same report:

> At confederation, as it has been said many times around this board, as we all know, the right to direct taxation was given to the provinces, and the dominion was given the right to levy and collect money either by direct or indirect taxation.

And the hon. premier of Ontario (Mr. Drew):

> The provinces were empowered to levy taxes in the field of direct taxation . . . whereas the dominion government was authorized to raise money by any form of direct taxation.

Now, here is what the Hon. Mr. McNair, premier of New Brunswick, is reported to have said, on page 27:

> The dominion has adequate power to meet the needs of our provinces as well as others. With its control of monetary policy, and the broad and unlimited powers of taxation it possesses, the dominion is in a position, drawing upon the resources and tax-bearing capacity of the whole nation, to see to it that the provinces are placed in a position to maintain their local services at appropriate and uniform Canadian levels.

And the Hon. Mr. McNair added:

Let me say that we in New Brunswick are just as jealous of our constitutional rights and privileges as are the people in any other province. But we want autonomy in substance, as well as in name. We look upon provincial autonomy as a means to an end—not an end in itself. We look upon dominion autonomy in the same way. The end to which they should be devoted, through their proper exercise, is the greatest good for the greatest number of Canadians.

But, Mr. Speaker, is it possible for us to admit, even for a moment, that the premiers of the other provinces could really be a party to the handing over to the federal government of rights which do not rightfully belong to it under the constitution, to their own detriment? Out of nine premiers, eight at that time recognized the federal government's right to levy taxes by any and every means. One premier only refused to recognize that right, and that is the Hon. Maurice Duplessis.

However, Mr. Duplessis does recognize the necessity for an agreement. Here are some of his words to that effect, as found at page 123 of the report:

As the conference was convened by the federal authorities it was only proper for them to place before the delegates their own proposals. With all due respect for the opinion of others I do not think it is up to the provinces just now to make proposals or counter-proposals.

And further, at page 324, he added:

During the time necessary for the study and solution of these Canadian problems, a temporary agreement, precise, clear and categorical, the duration of which would depend on the needs of the federal body and the needs of the provinces, might be entered into, as a temporary measure, but based on the very foundations of the Canadian constitution.

In short, it would be possible to rent, and we insist on the term rent, in return for a fair compensation not only material but even constitutional, certain present taxation powers of the provinces, powers that could reasonably be rented without in any way impeding the march forward, the progress and prosperity of the province.

Is this not a recognition of the need for agreements between the central and the provincial governments? Then he adds, on page 414:

Speaking for the province of Quebec . . .

No, as I do not want to be unkind, I am not going to quote this. I am now reading from page 415 of the report:

It should be possible, and it could be possible, without changing the fundamentals, which cannot be changed and which should be considered as untouchable; it should be possible and it is possible to make temporary arrangements, clear, precise and definite arrangements, taking into consideration the rights and prerogatives of every party to it.

We are willing to collaborate during the necessary time by renting to Ottawa—and I insist on using the word "renting" to Ottawa—certain sources of revenue which can be discussed and which could be found, because we are in good faith and we have the sincere and deep desire to collaborate.

We must therefore come to the conclusion that all of the governments of the country have recognized the necessity for an agreement. If no such agreement could be reached it would mean the sowing of the seeds of national disunity, with the progressive destruction of the ideals which the fathers of confederation and the following generations have pursued and which we are still striving to attain.

During the negotiations, there were three different opinions out of nine. Mr. Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, was of the opinion that subsidies were a bad thing and that the constitutional act should be revised. The premier of Ontario, who had his own common ground of agreement with the premier of Quebec, said that taxation powers should be defined. We are ready, said Mr. Duplessis, to rent temporarily our taxation rights, provided a conference be called on a set date to define taxation rights. I do not want, he said, mere electoral promises because I have been in politics for 25 years and I know what promises are worth. That means that the federal government in exchange for a temporary agreement would have to undertake to relinquish sovereign powers which had been officially recognized by the constitution. Did you notice the bargaining, Mr. Speaker? One can readily see that such a transaction is impossible because, owing to its growing commitments, the Canadian government is unable to abandon its powers of taxation, just as the provinces are unable to abandon the powers granted them by the constitution. Each are independent entities which, within their own spheres, have absolute and sovereign rights. However, as far as taxation rights are concerned, the fathers of confederation have given to the federal government, which is the essential organization for the maintenance of economic and social life as well as the development of our country as a nation, powers which enable it to obtain the necessary funds to meet and fulfil all its commitments.

The fathers of confederation were great men, but when one thinks that in 1867 the provinces gave up freely for a mess of pottage a revenue of $13,600,000 against a fixed subsidy of 80 cents per capita, and when one thinks that they abandoned their rights to sources of revenue likely to increase considerably and which then made up 85 per cent of the national revenue, one must admit that those who drafted the pact of confederation did not intend to give a prior right to the provinces in taxation matters.

About three years later, in 1870, I believe, Nova Scotia complained that the per capita subsidy set at 80 cents per person was not enough to enable it to fulfil its obligations. At that time, direct taxation was an unimportant taxation field, and no government wanted it.

The right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) stated that there could be absolutely no question of allowing the federal government's sovereignty to be infringed upon by a renunciation of its powers of taxation. We have had two wars and, following these, the federal government was obliged to assume a public debt of the order of $12 or $13 billion and to pay an interest on that debt of $400 or $500 million annually. And a third world war still remains a possibility. That is why we must all co-operate in working for a better social, economic and political future in this country. The federal government, of whatever party it may be, can have no special sympathy or antipathy for the provinces, there can be no question of discrimination towards different races or religions, not even towards the various political parties which govern the provinces. The federal legislation must be uniform throughout the country.

We Quebec Liberals do not want it to be said that through sentimental weakness towards our province, we have contributed to destroy the Canadian confederation.

Mr. Balcer: You are destroying Quebec.

Mr. Breton: No, we do not want to destroy Quebec; all the members of this house know it, and I will go further. The Liberal party has always been an autonomist party and remains so, whereas you Conservatives, when you wish to speak of autonomy, must quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. Honoré Mercier. The Liberal party has always been the defender of the minorities in this country, and, first of all, that of Quebec. Our whole political history is there to prove it. We are autonomists, because we aspire to freedom and cherish democracy.

The confederation was established, Mr. Speaker, so that two great races might unite and work together for the development of our country. It had to be so, if we wanted to create a nation capable of flourishing and of taking its place on the international scene. That is confederation.

A question which should be studied with extreme care, in an objective manner, has become an emotional and confused issue, with utter disregard for the Canadian nation.

There is a nationalism which befits the Canadian government. It is that nationalism which calls for the pursuit of an ideal which leads to independence and sovereignty for Canada in national and international affairs. It was the nationalism of the late Henri Bourassa who has largely influenced our march towards that magnificent goal. We wish to continue his work. Mr. Bourassa rendered a great service to this country by expounding ideas which led at the time to great controversies but which have favourably influenced the policy of this country.

This long digression was brought about by the interruption of the hon. member for Three Rivers. I would now like to talk about taxation and subsidies.

In 1885, Mr. Honoré Mercier, then premier of Quebec, invited the other provinces to take part in a conference for the purpose of forcing the federal government to increase the subsidies.

In 1907, Sir Wilfrid Laurier told the House of Commons that Lower Canada and the maritimes would not have become part of confederation if they had been told that they would have to levy direct taxes in order to get revenues.

That shows that political problems are apt to assume widely different aspects: in those days nobody would levy direct taxes; today everybody is clamouring for them.

In 1953, the Montreal chamber of commerce—or the Quebec chamber, I cannot remember exactly—presented a brief to the Hon. Maurice Duplessis. This brief began with these words: "We are happy to appear before a great leader, the defender par excellence of provincial autonomy."

Following which the same organization, appearing before the Prime Minister of Canada, "recognized his great desire for conciliation".

That is a gesture to be noted, and I insist upon it because when confronted with those difficult problems the Canadian government tried to extend a friendly hand to all the governments of Canada in order to foster national unity, without which our provinces, one after the other, may eventually become small republics, having at their head an omnipotent and permanent president. They would have modern capital cities, but their people would be miserable, illiterate and poor. That may be a sad picture, but it could be the outcome of the separatist dream.

I know that the Hon. Mr. Duplessis is not a separatist because he has said too often that he wants to co-operate with the federal government and that the constitution should not be changed. We can count on the fingers of one hand those people who have such nebulous dreams, that can bring about quarrels and disputes such as we are now witnessing in the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that the immense majority of the people of Quebec and of the whole of Canada are anxious to preserve that structure so patiently and so successfully erected by our forefathers, and I hope that our children will continue to make Canada a beautiful and a great country, that the two great races living side by side in this country will better appreciate each other as they have only one desire, that is to safeguard our liberties, to increase our common security, and to eliminate the inequalities which necessarily exist in a free country.

Our constituents tell us about the great problems with which are faced workers, farmers, professional people and all those other citizens who earn an honourable living for themselves and their children. Through the daily contacts we have with our constituents, we know that nationalistic tendencies are not truly representative of the Canadian people as a whole. We know too of the responsibility which the federal government has to discharge. It is to administer the country to the advantage of all, without distinction. We must understand that we have been sent here with the express mandate of promoting national unity. I am convinced that there are people who try to sow confusion in the minds of the others, but I am confident that the province of Quebec will be able to tell the difference between provincial autonomy and their obligations toward this country.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the autonomist feeling of the province of Quebec is as legitimate and normal as individual aspiration towards liberty. We should not, therefore, hold it against a Quebecker if he should be an autonomist. This is a natural reaction which any democratic system must encourage just as other rights to freedom.

Still autonomy, like freedom, has limits beyond which lie licence and anarchy. In the same way in which every right carries with it an obligation, autonomy or, if you prefer, independence carries with it, in the case of the province of Quebec, responsibilities towards the Canadian nation.

May I be allowed to state at this point that were these agreements arrived at by coercion, and should this mean that the majority in this country was enabled to impose its views on a minority in this country, the Liberal party, or at least its representatives in the province of Quebec should carefully analyse the consequences of such a political attitude. If one reads the history of this country one will notice that the Liberal party has always been energetically opposed to a majority policy whereby no account would be taken of the opinions and rights of a minority. I hope that it will continue as it has done in the past to defend this ideal.

Mr. Speaker, I am told my time is up. I am sorry.

Mr. Speaker: I might ask the hon. members if they would consent to the hon. member continuing his speech.

(Text):

The hon. member has exhausted his time. He says he has just a few more things to say. Therefore would hon. members agree to give him unanimous consent so that he can conclude his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Perron: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to letting the hon. member continue his remarks.

Mr. Breton: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the house for its kind attention. I shall strive to be as brief as possible. I thank more particularly the hon. members who do not understand French but who stay here just the same.

The figures mentioned in the brief of the chamber of commerce gave the impression that the federal government was guilty of centralization and was keeping for itself all sources of revenue. According to that brief the federal government is now taking 77 per cent of all the provinces' revenues, the municipal governments are taking 11 per cent and the provinces 12 per cent.

That is a very sad picture of the federal government's encroachments. I took the trouble of checking how true it was. I obtained figures from the Department of Finance and from the bureau of statistics. Here is the result. Here are the figures concerning provincial and municipal revenues: 75 per cent in favour of the provinces and the municipalities in 1950; 67 per cent, in 1951; 57·3 per cent, in 1952, and 52 per cent, in 1953. That is quite far from the 23 per cent given to the public by the chamber of commerce and repeated in this house by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer).

Municipalities have powers which are granted or given to them by the provinces. If they do not enjoy more revenue, that is not the federal government's doing, since the provinces can grant them powers of taxation. The province of Ontario for instance helps its municipalities by giving subsidies which come to $4 per capita in the case of Toronto, and $3 in the case of Ottawa, that is $4,000,000 for Toronto and $600,000 for Ottawa. The Ontario government gets along with its municipalities since agreement is necessary for the success and prosperity of Ontario. Quebec should do the same, but that is not our problem. If I mention the fact, it is simply because provincial and municipal revenues have been lumped together.

Now if we merely stop to consider the provinces and the federal government, we will see that ever since confederation the revenues of the former compare quite favourably with those of the central government.

The ratio is about constant. During the depression of 1930, the provinces drew as much revenue as the federal government. And do you know what happened? The provinces kept receiving subsidies from the federal government which did not have sufficient revenue for its own needs and had to borrow to make up its deficits and help the provinces. Situations such as those show why the fiscal problem is a difficult one which calls for experts.

I have here a table of the gross revenue of the provinces compared to that of the federal government from 1867 to 1941, along with a table showing the net revenue from 1941 to 1953. These figures are as follows: 37 per cent of the federal government's revenue in 1867, 28·5 in 1870, 23·4 in 1921, 50 in 1930-31. The federal government had in 1930-31 a total revenue of $327,720,000, compared to $179,143,000 for the provinces. In 1935-36 the percentage of provincial revenue, compared to the federal government's, was 64·4 per cent. Yet, in that same year 1935-36, the Canadian government was still paying the provinces subsidies in a proportion of 16 per cent of their own sources of revenue. The proportions in favour of provinces are always considerable, and in any case, much more important than is shown in the brief submitted by the chamber of commerce.

I conclude for hon. members have already been very patient. We must all, here in Ottawa, consider the fact that the government of Canada has been created for the Canadian nation and that nationalism must only exist as far as it is needed by the Canadian nation. We all must infer that the provinces cannot, nowadays, claim a privileged position with regard to the federal government. Consequently the 15 per cent deduction as suggested by the Progressive Conservatives and approved by the chamber of commerce is not acceptable because it would result in a situation equivalent to giving prior right to the provinces.

We must accept what the Minister of Finance told the Leader of the Opposition at that time. That shows how extremely complex this problem is. An honourable compromise must be reached and the solution will not be found in an electioneering climate, nor through a recourse to ultimatums or the levelling of charges of centralization. That would not settle anything.

At the time of the conference the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, who was then minister of justice, was willing to make important concessions. He asked the provinces whether they had counter-proposals to make, and he asked Mr. Duplessis what amount he would like to get in return for the renting of his rights for a temporary period. He never got any answer. "Taxation rights must be defined, and the federal government must abandon its rights," said Mr. Duplessis. "Then we might agree to rent temporarily our rights."

I do not think that we can thus settle the fiscal problem in a way that will benefit the economic and political life of our country, or resolve the problems of unemployment, war and peace.

I believe that a compromise is essential and I think that the interests of a party or of a group should not be opposed to those of Canada.

If the Hon. Mr. Frost can recognize, as he did at the opening of the 1952 session in Ontario, that his province didn't give up any of her constitutional rights when the agreement was signed, the hon. premier of Quebec could do the same without any risk. The premier of the province of Quebec would do honour to himself by signing that agreement, and I am sure that he would have the approval of the Canadian people, and, in particular, of the 300,000 taxpayers who will have to pay this tax.

The right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, who was then minister of justice, went as far as to recommend, in his proposals, that the provinces prepare an amendment to the constitution, granting them the right to collect the provincial sales tax in an indirect manner. They did not even answer. I therefore call upon the good will of the interested parties.

(Text):

Mr. Brooks: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to seem discourteous to the hon. member, but he has now had about sixteen or eighteen minutes' overtime. It seems to me he is establishing a precedent that we should not like to have continued in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was just about to rise myself, because for the last seven or eight minutes I heard the hon. member say that he was concluding, and I was hoping for the last word. But it looks to me as though we might be of some help to him and ask him to give us his last word now and resume his seat.

Mr. Breton: I have, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it was a poor, scrawny creature that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) dragged into this chamber on April 6 when he presented his budget. Nevertheless it was accompanied by the usual showmanship, the usual obedient cheering from the Liberal benches, led by the cheer leaders in the front row. But it was obvious to those of us who sat over here and observed the performance that hon. members opposite had not much stomach for the task that had been assigned to them.

There is no reduction of taxes in this budget; there is of course a pretence of certain reductions, Mr. Speaker, but let us look a little deeper. Let us look behind the pretence and the sham to the reality of the situation. We find in two or three of the resolutions that reductions in certain excise taxes on certain goods are proposed. It is interesting indeed, Mr. Speaker, to recall that on many of these commodities these are taxes which this government imposed, in many cases raised, which we of the opposition opposed and demanded should be reduced long ago. And we are glad so far as these limited and meagre reductions extend to see now the success of our efforts in previous sessions. Those of us who sat in this house in the last parliament will recall the fight we put up year after year in budget debates for reductions of the altogether too heavy taxes that were being applied to such articles as electrical appliances, luggage and other things.

But if one looks a little further at these proposals and their contents he discovers some weird and wonderful things in the selections which have been made by the Minister of Finance for his rather limited bounty. If one examines the proposals he will see for instance that the Minister of Finance has found it within his big heart to reduce from 15 per cent to 10 per cent the excise tax on lapis lazuli; whereas at the same time he does not find it within his heart to make any reduction whatsoever in the sales tax on such necessities as clothing, boots and shoes, prepared foods and household furniture. Apparently there is no room in the plans of the Minister of Finance for reduction of taxes on such necessities of life. It is preferable, in his view, to go on adding to the cost of living by collecting those taxes on basic necessities of life.

And then of course there are those strange anomalies, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the Minister of Finance is a two-wheel man or a three-wheel man. He is certainly not a four-wheel man, because if one examines these budget resolutions he will see that the minister is proposing a reduction from 15 per cent to 10 per cent in the excise tax on motorcycles and all other two or three-wheel motor-driven vehicles including motors for attachment to bicycles, but not a copper of reduction in the taxes on motor cars. The bounty of the minister ends with three wheels. There is no place in his economy for a reduction in taxes on four-wheel vehicles. And so we shall have for another year a continuation of a situation where on the low-priced cars, standard models, the federal tax collected in this country amounts to $350 per car; whereas across the border in the United States the federal tax amounts to only $90. Is it any wonder that motor cars are very much more expensive in this country than they are in the United States? The explanation, Mr. Speaker, is to be found in the tax policy of this government, and there is not a cent of reduction found in this budget on the heavy taxes, the extortionate taxes, which are being collected by the federal government on motor cars.

Hidden taxes go on. There has been no attempt on the part of the minister to bring these taxes out in the open so that the consumer, the man who pays for the goods, knows what portion of the price is going for taxes.

Then, Mr. Speaker, any who looked for any possible reduction in the income tax this year has of course looked in vain. The same heavy rates are to be borne by the Canadian people for another year. Taxes start at 18 per cent on the first $1,000 of taxable income and are graduated steeply up from there. But, Mr. Speaker, I suppose the realists in this country, those who know the mind and the mentality of this taxing government, knew better than to expect reductions in taxation this year, because this is not an election year. The warmth of the feeling exhibited by the Minister of Finance a year ago in bringing in his budget, his consideration for the taxpayers at that time has vanished. It is a bleak chill that he has breathed upon the taxpayers this year. But of course the tax cycle has moved on. This is not an election year, and those who know the mind of this government had no reason to expect that there would be any reductions this year.

Mr. Speaker, there will be no effective, significant reductions in taxation at Ottawa here until this government faces up, as it has never done, to the problem of its own waste and extravagance. Time after time when proposals have been made in this house for review of the operations of government with a view to introduction of efficiency and elimination of waste and extravagance our efforts have been defeated by the government.

This year, what do we see with regard to the matter of expenditure? It happens that the burden of rearmament this year is to be reduced by $128 million as compared with last year. This heavy burden that has been borne by the Canadian people since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea four years ago is to be lightened this year to the extent of $128 million, while still continuing at a total rate of $2 billion. But, Mr. Speaker, has that saving been passed on to the Canadian people in the form of reduction in taxes? It has not, because this spending government has found ways and means of spending an additional $200 million on departments that have no relation to rearmament, an extra $200 million over last year. And so, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are to be called upon to pay more in taxes this year than they paid last year because expenditure is to be higher this year than it was last year.

There is a rumour current on this parliament hill that this is the last budget to be introduced by the present Minister of Finance. Well, he has apparently made up his mind that it is to be a record budget, for record budget it is. It is a budget that proposes to take more money from the pockets of the Canadian people this year in taxes than has ever been taken from them in any year in our history. As compared with what was up till then the record year, 1953-54, this budget adds another $76 million on top of last year's total of taxes. It is a record budget in another respect because at no time in all our history, save only at the very climax of world war II, has the government proposed to spend so much money as in this budget. And so, Mr. Speaker, a record budget it is, and as such it should be defeated.

The effects of high taxes are having ever-widening consequences. We see them reflected increasingly today in the high cost of production which is having secondary effects in this country of very serious significance. We see on every hand, every day, Mr. Speaker, the effects of these high taxes in the increasing cost of production, and they have been a major contributing factor in bringing about a situation where our export trade has been falling off to a disturbing degree.

Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, the extent to which, by reason of these high taxes and high costs we have been pricing ourselves out of some of our best markets abroad? The government seems to take no account of that fact, and no responsibility. The effects do not stop with our markets abroad, for right here at home, by reason of these high taxes and the high costs to which they have given rise, we are seeing the loss of our domestic market to goods which are being imported from countries abroad where the burden of taxation is less heavy.

In consequence we see today Canadian unemployment at a post-war peak. The latest government figures issued by the national employment service have shown that on March 18 the number of Canadians applying for work through that service totalled no less than 570,000. We have had no figure to compare with that in the last decade and a half.

Does this budget offer any relief at all for unemployment? Mr. Speaker, the situation is serious but it does not seem to worry this government. They have not faced up to it. They have not even taken the trouble to acknowledge the seriousness of the situation. Already 50,000 of those receiving unemployment insurance have exhausted their benefits. What is the government doing about that? Nothing! And when this situation has been laid before them, when we have asked for a parliamentary committee representative of all the parties in the house to study the question and formulate plans they have defeated all our efforts. And what is their solution for the problem of unemployment? To do something? No, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that the government proposes to do in relation to unemployment. They have even quite blithely passed up the opportunity this budget offered of doing something to lower the cost of production in these industries where unemployment is very serious today.

One thinks at once of the textile industry. One thinks of the farm implement industry. Are those and others afforded any relief in this budget? Are the workers who are employed in them? No, Mr. Speaker, the same taxes weigh on these industries under this budget as they have weighed in the past. They will carry that same burden in trying to confront competition facing them in the home market today. And the answer of this government? Well, Mr. Speaker, the answer is just the usual shrug of the shoulders; the usual attitude of nonchalance and complete indifference to the situation.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that through all these lush years this government has made not the slightest preparation for the situation that has been emerging with respect to unemployment. They have not even been concerned about it. Their record on preparation is a complete cipher.

There was one subject which occupied not a little of the time of the Minister of Finance during his budget speech, and it has occupied the thoughts of a number of hon. members in this house, particularly hon. members from the province of Quebec during the course of this debate. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to devote a few minutes to the consideration of a situation which, as I see it, will assume serious proportions unless grappled with now by the Prime Minister, and can have lasting consequences of a most undesirable nature.

The subject of dominion-provincial relations was introduced by the Minister of Finance in what was a very belligerent and truculent passage in the budget speech he delivered on April 6. One other cabinet minister, the minister of northern development, has spoken on the same subject in this debate and last evening we heard a speech on the same subject from the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pinard).

An hon. Member: And a good speech too.

Mr. Fleming: There have been other speeches delivered by private members on this subject. But, Mr. Speaker, is it not rather amazing that in a subject of such cardinal importance, a subject which now confronts this house, and a subject important enough to engage the attention of two cabinet ministers, that from the Prime Minister we have had not one word in the course of this debate? It has been a very coy performance we have had from the Prime Minister of Canada on this subject in this debate. Dominion-provincial relations are at all times a matter of first importance in Canada. They are in a special sense peculiarly the responsibility and special concern of the Prime Minister. Invitations have been extended in the course of this debate to the Prime Minister to make a statement on this subject. Two weeks ago yesterday my leader urged the Prime Minister to call a conference of the dominion and the provinces about that matter. Only the Prime Minister can call such a conference. Has the Prime Minister taken any notice of that appeal? We are waiting patiently for the Prime Minister to break his very strange silence in this debate. National unity has been shown to be at stake but, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister continues silent.

It is a simple proposition of our system of cabinet government that the Prime Minister assumes responsibility for what has been said by his cabinet ministers. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there can be little doubt the Prime Minister was fully aware of what the Minister of Finance had to say in his budget speech before that speech was ever delivered. But still the Prime Minister has remained silent. Having been privy undoubtedly to this budget speech, being constitutionally responsible for statements made in the course of this debate on this subject by his own ministers, I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is time this house heard from the Prime Minister on this subject and I, for my part, speaking with I hope the modesty becoming a private member, wish to say that I challenge the Prime Minister to enter this debate and make a statement on his position on this subject of dominion-provincial relations.

The situation has been referred to in numerous speeches in the course of this debate, and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) gave us a fiery speech this afternoon. But that is the situation we have seen developing and while, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to review at length the history of this subject there are, nevertheless, several salient facts in the history of this subject which must, I think, be fully understood.

In a sense the year 1942 is something of a watershed in the matter of dominion-provincial relations in relation to matters of taxation. My reference, of course, is to the wartime agreement for which authority was given by parliament at the 1942 session of this house and which is to be found in chapter 13 of the statutes of that year. Authority was given to the Minister of Finance to enter into agreements with the provinces, and the keynote of this statute and of the powers conferred upon the government by it is to be found in the preamble, which reads as follows:

> Whereas the dominion and the provinces and certain municipalities have been levying taxes upon incomes and upon corporations, and it is expedient during the continuation of the present war and for a certain readjustment period thereafter that the dominion only should levy such taxes;

What was the background, Mr. Speaker, out of which this statute arose? As we have been reminded, Mr. Speaker, the British North America Act does purport to confer powers of taxation on both the dominion and the provinces. Section 91 of the British North America Act, in subsection 3, purports to empower parliament to make laws for "The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation". Then section 92 in subsection 2 purports to confer upon the provinces exclusive powers including:

> Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

Until 1917 the dominion had never entered the field of direct taxation; and when the dominion entered the field under the stress of conditions existing in world war I, Sir Thomas White, in introducing the first federal income tax, referred to it as "a distinct innovation in federal fiscal legislation". He recognized at the time that in most of the provinces there was a municipal tax upon income and indeed, in some of the provinces, a provincial tax on income as well. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that prior to 1942 the majority of the provinces of Canada had already enacted laws providing for a provincial income tax. In addition, some of them had passed laws providing for municipal income tax. For instance, British Columbia levied its first income tax in 1876, Prince Edward Island in 1894, Manitoba in 1923, Alberta in 1932, Saskatchewan in 1932, Ontario in 1936 and Quebec in 1939.

Mr. Pickersgill: In 1940.

Mr. Fleming: The year in which it was enacted was 1939.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman will look up the date, I think he will find it is 1940.

Mr. Drew: No; it is 1939.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. gentleman who interrupts would be a little more sure of his facts, Mr. Speaker, I think he would have less to say in the house.

The situation in 1942, Mr. Speaker, was that the majority of the provinces had already entered the field of provincial income taxation and had also passed laws providing for municipal income tax within their boundaries. It is also an interesting fact that the dominion from 1936 on co-operated—in a way in which they are not prepared to co-operate today—with these provinces which were collecting a provincial income tax. To facilitate the collection of the provincial income tax, to reduce the cost of collection and the burden of machinery, and to have some regard for the taxpayer who has to make out the forms, the federal government collected the provincial income tax and combined the federal and provincial collection in one return form. That was done, Mr. Speaker, by the federal government in connection with the provincial income tax of Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island. Those of us who lived in one of those provinces well recall the forms. The form provided for the usual tabulation leading up to the calculation of the federal tax. Then we arrived at the taxable income for provincial purposes and to it applied the provincial rate in a short addition to the federal form. It all went in in the one form with a minimum of trouble to the taxpayer and a minimum of expensive collecting machinery.

Mr. LaCroix: When was that?

Mr. Fleming: That was being done from 1936 on until 1942. In 1942 under the stress of wartime conditions the provinces, with some understandable reluctance, agreed to step out of these fields in return for certain payments guaranteed to them under the agreements and with the firm understanding that these fields of taxation would be restored to them when the war was over. I read the preamble of the statute. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the preamble expressly provides that these agreements were of limited duration.

What has the situation been since 1942? Mr. Speaker, I do not dwell in detail on this matter but I point out that the principal fact which emerged in this field since 1942 is the skyrocketing rise of the federal income tax. Along with it has gone an increasing responsibility upon the provinces and municipalities and rising costs to them of all those services which they are called upon to render to their people. In the meantime, the provinces which had these income taxes had largely disbanded their collecting staffs.

Along came the dominion-provincial conference in 1945; it was adjourned to 1946, adjourned in 1946 and not then resumed. It was adjourned under circumstances that made it quite clear that it was to be resumed, but it never was resumed. Instead, the federal government then began to make individual dickers with individual provinces. But then there was a ray of hope in 1950. After the federal election of 1949 it seemed as though some sanity was to be introduced into this situation, and that some attempt was to be made to bring the dominion and the provinces together; because then the federal government called a dominion-provincial conference to meet here at Ottawa at first. Later it adjourned to Quebec and resumed there with respect to one particular matter of concern, namely methods of amending the Canadian constitution in Canada. But discussions on financial aspects of federal-provincial relations were not resumed in any conference and the responsibility for the fact that those discussions were not resumed rests upon the shoulders of the government opposite.

Let it not be forgotten that in these conferences some eloquent voices were raised against any attempt on the part of the federal government to crowd the provinces out of those fields which had been theirs prior to 1942. One thinks at once of the eloquent voice raised time and again in those meetings and in public even after those meetings, frequently, by the late Angus Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, when he reminded the Canadian public as well as the people of his own province that the rights of the provinces must be respected, and that if we are to have regard for the fact that this constitution under which this country was brought into being is a federal constitution, then the federal government cannot elbow the provinces out of rights and fields of taxation that were given to them by the constitution.

I hope it will not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that the first voice raised in a dominion-provincial conference, by way of acknowledging that the central provinces, by reason of the fact that most of the large corporations have their head offices in those provinces, should share some of the taxation benefits of that fact with the other provinces, was my leader who was then premier of Ontario.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, and regard should be had for a principle which apparently in the government of today has no place. It is the principle of which the house was reminded in his speech yesterday by my colleague the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), who recalled the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, echoed by the late Mr. King, in pointing to the unsoundness of a situation where one government collects and another government spends. But these sound admonitions have been forgotten by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no place any more in the thinking of this government for the kind of principles that the leaders of the past, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. King, thought to be axiomatic in Canada.

Let it not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, and let it not be denied that the federal government has made it as tempting as possible for provincial governments to sign these agreements.

These agreements are legal, they are binding, and they must be honoured. Let there be no question about that. I was shocked last summer, in travelling through Manitoba in the course of the election campaign, to find that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was trying to frighten the people of that province into thinking that the dominion-provincial agreements then existing would be jeopardized if a Conservative government were elected to office. Such utter nonsense, Mr. Speaker! It was a fiction. The fact of the matter is that the Conservative party has said that those agreements would be honoured and would be respected and carried out to the letter. That is still the position of Her Majesty's opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentlemen a question?

Mr. Fleming: With pleasure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would they be renewed at the expiry of the present agreements?

Mr. Fleming: I am quite sure that whatever deal is acceptable to the provinces when these agreements expire the provinces would get an infinitely better deal from a Conservative government than they would from this Liberal government, and nothing will be forced down their throats either.

Mr. Harris: You would raise the ante, would you?

Mr. Fleming: We have heard some interesting departures in this debate on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite—the latest interruption is symbolic—departures from the realm of reality and flights into the realm of fancy. What was the situation? The provinces at the conclusion of the wartime agreements had been out of the field of levying direct personal and corporation tax for some five years. It was politically difficult for them to re-enter that field. The resumption of taxes that they had collected for years before 1942 would have looked to many people like a new tax. It might not have been politically possible.

In the second place, many of them had no collecting machinery and, Mr. Speaker, at that point the federal government refused to do any collecting for them. What had been possible before the war, what the federal government had willingly done up to 1942 the federal government was not prepared to do after 1947.

In the third place—and this is the most important fact of all—the federal government had so completely occupied the field of income taxation, whether on individuals or corporations, by its extortionate rates of taxation that there just was not room in that field for any other taxing authority. All the adroit sophistry we have heard on the part of the Minister of Finance and others who have spoken in the same vein, talking of respecting the concurrent rights of the provinces in the field of taxation, simply ignores the hard facts of the case. The camel got its head into the tent and the camel, the federal government, proceeded to get its whole body into the tent and occupied the whole tent. There was no room at that stage for any provincial government to climb into the tent. There was no room for any provincial camel any more.

There is the hard fact of the situation, and there is the fact that makes this sophistry we have listened to from the Minister of Finance and others so completely unrealistic. You can talk today about concurrent rights on the part of the provinces, the Minister of Finance and others can say that the provinces have just as much right as they ever had to levy income tax on persons or corporations but, Mr. Speaker, you must take account of the fact that the federal government is already taxing to the limit in those fields. That is the inescapable fact, and no amount of fallacious sophistry on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite will change that fact. Nothing will change it except action on the part of the dominion and the provinces to come together to reach an agreement in this field and then action on the part of parliament and the legislatures in consequence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as a gesture the Minister of Finance has made provision in recent years to allow provincial governments to collect the equivalent of 5 per cent of the federal tax on individuals, of course with their own machinery, and to collect the equivalent of 5 per cent of the federal tax on corporations up until a year ago, at which time it was increased to 7 per cent. The situation now remains that part of the taxes paid by taxpayers, whether personal income tax or corporation tax, in any province which has not signed one of these agreements with the federal government, is used in part to pay rentals to the signing provinces. What is left by the existing federal legislation to any province that does not sign an agreement, namely 5 per cent of the federal income tax on persons and 7 per cent of the federal income tax on corporations, is not nearly as much as any non-signing province would receive if it signed an agreement.

Mr. Lesage: Except Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: I will deal with that because the agreement with Ontario is not complete. It does not include succession duties. It was limited.

There is one other fiction that has a bearing in this debate with which I wish to deal and deal explicitly. It is the fiction that no pressure has been applied by the dominion government on the provinces. That is so far from the facts as to bear no resemblance to them.

I have pointed out in the first place the inadequacy of any field left to any non-signing province without imposing on its taxpayers burdens that, in addition to the existing federal impositions, would be too heavy to be borne. In the second place, there has been that obstinate refusal on the part of the federal government to collect provincial income tax for any provincial government which seeks to collect its own personal tax or its own tax on corporations. It has compelled any such government to set up its own expensive collecting machinery. In the third place, the federal government has tried to make these agreements as attractive as possible to any province in the hope that all will sign. But, Mr. Speaker, there is more direct evidence than that of pressure on the part of the federal government. One has only to recall the statements made by the ministers who signed the agreement on behalf of the Alberta government a few years ago when remarks were made on the part of these ministers that a pistol had been held to their heads and they were signing the agreement virtually at pistol point.

This afternoon the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) had a good deal to say about the fact that the premier of the province of Ontario had signed an agreement in October, 1952. Evidently he has completely overlooked what the premier of Ontario had to say about the agreement that he signed at that time, for here are the words that were uttered by the premier of Ontario on October 21, 1952. He said that at best the agreement was nothing more than a "stopgap arrangement." He warned that it did not provide a solution to the municipal problem, which in turn is "dependent on a shift of taxes and revenue from dominion sources to the province and then to the municipalities". These next words are a direct quotation from his remarks:

> We have urged the dominion government to begin discussions with the provinces to obtain these objectives. The present tax system is outmoded.

These are the words of the premier of Ontario and he has made similar statements since that are to the same effect as the remarks he made at that time.

Nothing short of a dominion-provincial conference seeking agreement with reference to fields of taxation will be adequate to meet the needs of the situation. The provinces of Canada have important constitutional rights and responsibilities. Those rights and responsibilities must be respected. In Canada we live under a federal system. There never would have been a Canada had there not been a federal system and, sir, the responsibilities which the provinces and their creatures, the municipalities, are bearing today are becoming ever more costly. While that process has been continuing, while their burdens have been growing, the federal government on the other hand has in fact been increasing its powers under our constitution by the extent to which it has been centralizing at Ottawa the collection of revenues. Sir, prior to the war the percentage of the total taxes in Canada collected by the federal government was 39 per cent. Last year that percentage had doubled to 78 per cent. More federal taxation and expenditure mean more federal power at the expense of the provinces.

Warnings like those that came from the eloquent tongue of the late Angus Macdonald have fallen on deaf ears opposite, so that today we have confronting Canada a situation which is the inevitable result of the policies followed by the federal government and its failure to seek agreement with all the provinces through the medium of a dominion-provincial conference.

This situation, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of concern, not simply to the province of Quebec, not simply to Quebec members in this house, but to all of Canada, because we see here, and have seen it in this debate, the wells of Canadian unity being poisoned by the statements that have been made by hon. members opposite; bellicose statements exposing the same kind of belligerent truculent attitude that was shown by the Minister of Finance during the course of his remarks in the budget debate.

It is imperative that there be called a dominion-provincial conference. Only the Prime Minister of Canada can call a dominion-provincial conference. The agenda for that conference must include this whole field of taxing powers and responsibilities. It must take due account of the necessity of honouring and respecting, both in the letter and in the spirit, all existing agreements. It must seek in the long run, under the proper auspices and with a patriotic Canadian spirit, to secure a better deal than any of the provinces have had as yet. It would mean an end, Mr. Speaker, to a situation such as that which now has arisen and for which this federal government must accept responsibility.

No one in this house has spoken more eloquently on the subject of national unity than has the Prime Minister, and upon the necessity for maintaining that unity. Today national unity in Canada is threatened by this situation that has been allowed by the federal government to emerge. Provocative truculence on the part of ministers and members opposite is no contribution to the settlement of this problem. What has been exhibited here on the part of the federal government is evidently a determination to beat the province of Quebec to its knees.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was a strange afterthought, it was a remark completely out of tone with the other remarks made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, when he said at the end of his remarks that the door was still open. It was a curious afterthought, and completely different from the prevailing tone of the minister's remarks in relation to this subject in his budget speech. It is evident that if there is to be any discussion, so far as the attitude of the government opposite has been expressed, the Quebec government will have to come cap in hand and rap on the door of the Minister of Finance.

I say this is a matter of concern to all of Canada. The fact is that all the provinces have asked for a resumption of the dominion-provincial conference. When it adjourned in 1950 it did not end there. It adjourned, ostensibly to meet later, with optimistic statements on the part of the Prime Minister and other representatives of the federal government; optimistic statements about the good that had been accomplished by the conference and what was yet to be accomplished in the course of further discussion.

Is it not a strange contradiction, is it not an amazing commentary on the attitude of the government opposite, that at this very moment at Geneva representatives of the Canadian government are sitting around a table with representatives of communist governments, Russia and China, to discuss matters of at least common concern, yet the Canadian government will not bring itself to sit down with fellow Canadians representative of the provinces to discuss matters of common concern?

It is not long ago that the Prime Minister returned from a tour abroad during which he visited several of our sister nations of the commonwealth. He undertook this tour with the complete approbation, and indeed the earnest good will of all political parties in this house.

During the course of the tour the Prime Minister gave expression, as indeed we all knew he would, in his visits to other countries, both those in the commonwealth and those outside the commonwealth, to the Canadian spirit of friendliness, conciliation and good will. This same spirit is urgently needed now here. It rests with the Prime Minister of Canada and no one else to decide whether a dispute, which has already been the occasion of very bitter expressions on the part of some hon. members opposite, a dispute which apparently is becoming more bitter day by day if we are to judge by their bitterness, is to be permitted to continue to become more divisive, more threatening to Canadian unity, or whether instead there is to be a sensible approach in the true Canadian spirit of good will and understanding. Which course is to be followed, bitterness, disunity and division, or the conference table, the spirit of good will, understanding and accord? The choice rests with the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might ask the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) a question. I ventured to suggest that the Quebec income tax was imposed in 1940 rather than in 1939 and the hon. member suggested I did not know what I was talking about. I wonder whether he has seen chapter 16 of the statutes of Quebec 1940, which imposed the Quebec income tax?

Mr. Fleming: This is a curious remark from the hon. member. I suppose he is not unfamiliar with a reference book prepared in 1945 for the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, the so-called green book, bearing the label "Personal Income Taxes." It is a federal publication, so perhaps he even had something to do with compiling it. If he will be good enough to look at page 21 he will see the federal government had this to say under the heading "Quebec":

> The province of Quebec first levied a tax on income in 1939 (chap. 16, Laws of 1940). It differed from the tax of the other provinces in that it imposed a flat levy of 15 per cent on the amount of tax payable by an individual to the dominion . . .

I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that this tax was first imposed in 1939. I think he is dealing with the statutory reference of 1940. There may have been a change made then, but I am prepared to go by what the federal government said in its green book.

But, Mr. Speaker, be that as it may, whether it began in 1940 or 1939, it had been in existence for not less than two years before the dominion-provincial agreement of 1942. And I also draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that the rate then in effect in the province of Quebec was 15 per cent of the amount of taxation payable by an individual to the dominion—the same rate now proposed. The federal government in those days was generous enough and big enough to collect that tax on behalf of the province.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think, if I might be permitted to say so, that the hon. member was misled, as others were misled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I have not spoken in this debate; and this is all I expect to say.

The hon. member was misled, as others have been misled, by the not very precise reference in the green book. But the fact is, as he would see by looking at chapter 16 of the statutes of 1940, that the tax was imposed in 1940 and that it applied to income earned in 1939.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is a matter of some little importance. It happens to be a matter of some little importance because in 1939 the present premier of Quebec was in office in that province. In 1940 he was leader of the opposition in that province and he objected, I understand quite vigorously, to an income tax being imposed in Quebec, as being something that was quite unnecessary.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Secretary of State a question? Did he write the green book?

Mr. Pickersgill: That's a secret.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of following what has been said in the last while by hon. members who have preceded me in the debate in the discussion of a number of very interesting subjects. We have heard many speeches on dominion-provincial relations; and earlier today we heard from the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) an interesting address on the subject of Social Credit. Let me say at once that I always enjoy his exposition of the subject. Each time I hear it I have the hope that I will understand the theory. Yesterday evening I think he came about as close to disclosing the philosophy as he ever did when he mentioned that it had been referred to as scrip tease. I thought that at last he was getting down to the bare facts of Social Credit. But it was not to be.

What I have to say will not follow along the lines of the debate which has been taking place this afternoon. I would like to speak directly to what is in the budget speech, particularly as it affects trade. In my opinion this budget overlooks a great many things which the people of Canada had a right to expect to find in it. My understanding is that a budget should do three things: It is a review of the current economic position of Canada; it is an announcement of the fiscal and other changes to be recommended by the government; and it is also a forecast of government policy. Under those three headings I should like to examine the provisions in the budget and see to what extent they are satisfactory.

First of all, in giving a review of the economic situation in Canada I believe the Minister of Finance tried to give a rather optimistic picture. However in one or two places in his speech he had to admit—and I shall quote his own words—that the situation is not as rosy as he would like to have us believe. For example, as reported at page 3725 of Hansard for April 6, he made this significant statement when he referred to the fact that there has been a slowing down of business activity and a drop in incomes in certain sectors of our country. He gave this as the reason:

> This slowing down in the growth of defence expenditures no doubt contributed to the levelling off of production in some industries that became evident toward the end of 1953.

That is a significant statement, for this reason, that at various times the public has been led to believe that it has been the general economic policy of this government and of the party which now holds power that has been responsible for that condition in Canada described as prosperity. But now we have the significant statement that due to a lower expenditure on defence, immediately there has been a slowing down of production, a levelling off of prices, and so on.

Mr. Benidickson: In some industries.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, in some industries; and later on I shall point out the industries concerned. The significant point is that we are told all these conferences that are being held throughout the world, including the one in progress today, are designed to bring about a peaceful situation in the world, a situation in which all nations can continue to live in peace and prosperity. I believe all nations are looking forward to a time when war will become unnecessary.

If that is the over-all objective, then we must dare to hope that defence expenditures will be reduced as a regular thing in the future. If the small drop in national defence expenditures in Canada this year has already affected our economy to the extent indicated by the Minister of Finance, then surely it is time to do some serious thinking as to what the effect will be if conditions were such that it was possible for us in Canada as well as for people in the United States and in other countries to cut defence expenditures in half, or to even less than that. Surely that is a matter which must be given serious consideration. Because until the beginning of the second world war we had a situation in Canada which was described in various terms, but was commonly known as a depression. During those times there were members in the house who suggested to the government that it was not necessary, in a country as wealthy as Canada in potential natural resources, to have unemployment and to have poverty in the midst of plenty. Those suggestions and ideas were disregarded. In fact I well remember that Mr. Dunning, who was minister of finance in those days, used quite often to brush aside such suggestions with the question, "Where is the money to come from?"

Later on as we moved along it was discovered that money was the least important of the considerations, and that as long as we had the natural resources and the potential, a medium of exchange could be found. And it was found. We found we could expand the economy and the industry of this country to an extent undreamed of in 1939. Those who would have said that it was possible in, let us say, 1938 or 1939 to expand the production and industrial potential capacity of the country to the extent it was expanded in, let us say, 1945, would have been called, and indeed were called, dreamers and visionaries. Yet they spoke the economic truth.

I wish to refer to another statement in the minister's speech, found on the very next page, where he said:

> There is no need for me to go into detail concerning the nature of the present economic situation. It is characterized by more unemployment than we had last year at this same time, and by more unemployment than any of us like to see. It is marked also by a slackening in the growth of production and by declines in certain industries.

There is an indication of the fact that we are slowly, perhaps not too slowly, drifting back into a position of recession which may end up in a major depression. The reason I put that on the record is that the paragraph farther down, as far as I can see after reading the speech, is the only recommendation the minister had to make as to what could be done about such a position. Here are his words, as reported at page 3726 of Hansard:

> The re-emergence of keen competition in trade means readjustment and reappraisal. It means a sharpening of pencils and a careful re-examination of managerial and labour efficiency. This is not an easy process, but it is a very necessary one, and the longer it is postponed the more difficult it becomes.

So far as I can see, that was the advice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) had for those industries who find themselves in a depressed position. He advised them to sharpen their pencils, to look into their methods of doing business, to create greater efficiency and so forth. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the solution. I do not believe that anyone in this house seriously believes that that is the solution. It is not a matter of greater or more efficient production. When we look over the situation in Canada and when we listen to the speeches of private members on the government side of the house, we hear from day to day that their greatest problem is in the field of marketing. We have surpluses of this and of that; we have produced and are producing great quantities. It is not a matter of being able to produce more; it is not a matter of greater efficiency. It is a matter of creating, in my opinion, a proper price relationship in order that the medium of exchange may be as equally distributed as it is possible in our economic set-up so that the wheels of industry may continue to turn.

I now come to some of the budgetary changes. I do not need to go into detail. They are available to the public and printed in the press. It strikes me as rather strange when I look at the changes that were made, —and I am in favour of some of them; for example, the reduction or the removal of the sales tax on implements or equipment used by municipalities, the reduction of excise taxes on certain goods, are desirable— when you boil it all down, when you study all the budgetary changes you find that it all amounts to so little that the general public has expressed a great deal of dissatisfaction and discontent.

Only a short time ago, in the budget before the election, it struck me, as I went back over the literature published by the Liberal party during the election, they took a great deal of credit for what they called the "sunshine budget". They took a great deal of pride in some of the tax reductions that were made. They made it appear as though they were well on the way to lifting some of the tax burden from those who now have to bear it. Since the election is over we seem to come right back again, to the budget which was brought down this year and which I think was correctly described by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) as a scrawny budget. It has been described in various terms. I find in one of the newspapers that the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Congress of Labour characterized it as an empty budget. He was not far out. They also point out that the government seems to have ignored almost completely the representations made by agriculture.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

I am not going to go through that, but to illustrate I hold in my hand a letter and certain other representations made by the Manitoba Federation of Agriculture and Co-operation. This is an organization which represents a large number of farmers. It also represents the co-operative movement in Manitoba. I have found them to be extremely modest in their requests, and so has the government. We are informed that this organization made a certain request to the government with respect to certain tariff changes. To give an illustration of the way they feel about it I shall read the first two paragraphs of this letter. It starts out by saying:

> On March 9, 1954, in a memorandum presented to the Minister of Finance, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, of which this organization is a member body, requested that certain changes be made in the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act.
> In bringing down his budget on April 6, the Hon. D. C. Abbott made no reference to the suggestions of the federation of agriculture and made none of the suggested changes in the Customs Tariff or Excise Tax Act. This is a regrettable omission.

To that I say, hear, hear. In a moment I shall make reference to some of the requests that have been heard. Those requests were exceedingly modest and reasonable and I dare to hope that the government will yet take the opportunity, which will be present when we are in committee, to recommend certain amendments to the resolutions which will be before us and make those changes.

The federation asked that all instruments of production used by farmers in Canada be duty free. Certainly there was nothing very radical about that request nor anything very unreasonable about it. It is in line with what the government says is their policy. We have been repeatedly told that they believe in lower tariffs; that they do not believe that farm implements, which enter into the cost of production, should be subject to customs duty. But there are a number of very important pieces of equipment, let us say, which are used in farming which are still subject to taxes, and this organization asked that they be removed. Nothing was done about it, and no mention was even made of that request in the budget speech.

They also asked that the sales tax on stock feeds be removed, and that apparently was not done. One or two other requests were made which I hope the government will still be prepared to carry out before the resolutions are carried.

What about government policy? I believe that is the most important part of the budget, Mr. Speaker. Apparently what budgetary changes the minister has recommended the government feels are sufficient. We may have a difference of opinion on that, but we are not going to be able to do very much about it. Government policy is important because it has to do with the future. And in a country as young as Canada I believe we must have a policy, and a great deal will depend on the type of government policy that is in operation in future years. I find that the government has actually no policy for the future. I say that because in 1949 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made a certain statement as to what the philosophy of the government was and that was quoted as recently as March 9 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), apparently with approval. These are the words:

> Canada is a free enterprise economy and the initiative for economic expansion rests with private individuals and firms. The government will endeavour, through its policies, to create a climate within which private initiative thrives and industrial expansion is encouraged.

There is nothing particularly wrong with that statement except for the fact that when you analyse it it means that the government is prepared to do nothing in the way of economic planning, believing as they do in what they call free enterprise, which sometimes is referred to as private enterprise. Call it what you will, they believe in the policy of laissez-faire, drift. I take issue with that policy because I believe we are in a time in which, whether this government likes it or not, whether any party in this house likes it or not, the government of Canada is going to have to take a greater share in the economic affairs of the country if they are to fulfil their responsibilities.

We have advocated and do advocate economic planning. There are those who oppose it. Well, let us face the issue. Let us give each other the benefit of the doubt. We are honest about our opinions. We believe in economic planning because we believe that there is nothing that can be substantially accomplished without planning. That is being proved every day in our business and industrial affairs. It does make a difference what the planning is for and it makes a difference who is doing the planning, but if the government actually believes that they are going to take some responsibility for the general welfare and the economic development of the country they must accept that the philosophy of economic planning is necessary.

After examining the proposals of the budget and the budget speech we have heard questions asked everywhere on certain points. I am sure hon. members who were home recently during the Easter recess have had these questions thrown at them regardless of the constituency they represent or the party to which they belong. People are asking what is being done about unemployment. What are we going to say? Are we to quote for them the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which apparently is government policy? He stated that it is private initiative which must look after the economic affairs of this country, and that the government takes no responsibility for these matters. Are these the answers we are supposed to give the unemployed? If we are to follow out the government policy and interpret it in that way then certainly the people in this country will wonder what we are doing.

We are asked about the grain situation. Recently figures have been presented in the press showing that over one billion bushels of grain are now available in Canada. We will soon be entering into another crop year. In 1954 the acreage under seed will be as high as ever and it is estimated we will have another huge crop for this year. But then, if we get a good crop, as good as we have had in past years, what will the situation be? How are we going to turn that grain into cash? I agree, to some extent, with what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has often said, namely, that a large amount of grain in storage on the farms or in the grain elevators is not a bad thing. Of course, I believe we might well have lean years as well as the more productive years we have had, and the situation may well arise when we may be very happy if we have a great deal of grain in storage because it is one of the best, and least perishable foods on this earth. But the farmer has to pay his expenses, pay for his tractor fuel, hired help, and all the other incidental expenses which go into farming, as the Minister of Agriculture very well knows. To the farmer grain stored in the granary or in the elevator, unless he can turn it into cash, is not a very useful commodity. Therefore, something has to be done to turn that into cash. Various suggestions have been made but none of them apparently have met with the approval of the government, though it is a matter which is becoming more and more urgent, particularly since we are approaching next year's crop.

We have been told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the best we can hope for is a quota of seven bushels per acre during the present crop year. But what will the situation be after that? On the first of August it is more than likely to be down to two bushels an acre again and how will farmers handle that situation when they have some 1952 crop, when they have not sold the 1953 crop and the 1954 crop is coming on top of that? How are they going to meet their expenses? How are they going to safeguard their credit which is even now in jeopardy? And how are the dealers and local merchants going to continue to carry their customers with the credit they have been extending, unless some of that grain, or a substantial part of that grain can be turned into cash? That situation has to be faced and faced very quickly, but apparently so far the government has no plan and has given us no hope that they have any solution to the problem.

The government has turned down all the suggestions that have been made. The budget debate has not brought out any new suggestions, nor have any alternative suggestions been advanced by the government. We are anxious to know what they are going to do about that situation.

Then there is the question of price relationship. I am not going to speak extensively on that subject this evening because I have spoken so often on the question of prices in this house that I hesitate to weary hon. members any longer. But I feel strongly about this because I believe a great many of our troubles can be traced to the price policies of the present administration. I believe it was a major mistake when in 1946, 1947 and 1948 the government began to abolish price controls as quickly as possible and permitted the condition to be created where price relationship went entirely out of joint.

The government, of course, will probably say this is a matter which can be handled quite properly within the provinces. I am not going to go into that controversy because we have heard enough about dominion-provincial disputes during this debate. But I would like to say this, that no one can seriously claim that any provincial government in this country could successfully operate a price control system within its own borders. It is either a question of this parliament enacting the proper legislation or we will not have it at all. Let us get that point quite clearly fixed. But in speaking of price control, and I have mentioned this point before, I hope it will be clearly understood that I do not necessarily mean lower prices. As a matter of fact, it does not have to mean lower prices at all. It would mean the establishing of a price relationship so that the cost of production can be safeguarded in relation to the price at which the product is sold.

At this point I would like to refer once again to the speech of the Minister of Finance and point out that what this government has done is to permit 50 per cent of the savings and of the incomes of those who are on pensions to be confiscated by inflation. I make that statement on the authority of the Minister of Finance himself, although, of course, he did not say so in so many words. However, if you turn to the appendix to the budget, at page 3759 you will find a graph which sets out the gross national expenditure and underneath that there is written "in current and constant dollars." Now the current line on this graph shows $24 billion and the dollar, taking 1935 to 1939 as a basis of 100, drops down to exactly one-half. In other words, this is an admission by the Department of Finance that the dollar of 1935 to 1939 is today worth exactly 50 cents. It means that those whose income has not increased since price controls were removed, and who are for example on a pension or a war veterans allowance, or some other fixed income, have had one-half of their income confiscated by inflation.

Now that is a fact which the government cannot dispute, and that has also been the effect on those who have saved up a little money during the years of the war or previous to that, or who retired during 1945 and 1946 as many people did. They are mostly farmers and business people and others who have saved up a little money, put it in the bank, and hoped that that money would see them through. They have found that inflation has confiscated 50 cents of every dollar they saved. That is also true of people who bought war bonds with dollars which were worth 100 cents. When they receive their money, or when these bonds are redeemed, they are going to get dollars which are now worth 50 cents.

That is confiscation and it is a strange irony to find that the same party which so often used to accuse the C.C.F. of the intention of confiscating the people's money through nationalization of the banks—though that is a form of propaganda I do not hear any more—themselves today stand guilty of having confiscated 50 per cent of the savings of the Canadian people and of all those who are on a fixed income such as a pension.

That is what has happened under our price relationships since price controls were taken off; and that is not all of it. We have a marketing problem. We were told by the Minister of Agriculture not so long ago that there would be no difficulty in selling Canadian farm products on the overseas market provided we are prepared to accept the price that they are willing to pay. That statement in itself may be a perfectly truthful one, and I am not disputing it; but what does it mean? It means that Canadian producers, whether they be producers of grain, livestock or any other farm commodity, would have to accept, in many instances, a price which would be less than or very close to the cost of production. In other words, they would have to accept a price at which they could not economically operate their farms. If we had a proper system of price relationships, where the costs of production could be safeguarded by keeping at the proper level the price of things that go into the cost of production such as fuel, farm machinery and all the other things that go into farm production, it would be possible for Canadian farmers today to accept a lower price than that which they are currently asking or getting and to retain those world markets which have slipped through our fingers in recent years. But certainly no one today can be heard to say, "Oh, yes, we have allowed your cost of production to go up until it is almost double what it was a few years ago, but if you are willing to sell your production at half the price you are now getting, we will find markets for it." We have got ourselves into that dilemma owing to the fact that there is no proper price relationship between the cost of production and the price of the goods we sell.

Then what about social security? I have already pointed out that inflation has reduced the real income of those who are on pensions, who draw family allowances and so on. People are asking what this parliament is prepared to do about increasing family allowances, old age pensions, blind pensions and so on, in order at least to compensate them for the loss they have sustained due to inflation. After looking through the budget and listening to the speeches made so far by those on the government side of the house, I can offer no hope to those who ask these questions. Apparently nothing is to be proposed to this house this session with the exception, of course, of legislation which we expect in respect to persons who are disabled.

When we plead for improvements in our social security measures we are often admonished by members on the other side of the house, including members of the cabinet, —even the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) himself—who point out that it is going to cost money to do these things. Obviously it will cost money. But, Mr. Speaker, I plead on behalf of the aged, the disabled, the blind and so on and I do so without any apology because I ask for them no greater generosity than that which the government has seen fit to lavish upon the members of this house and the members of the Senate. There seemed to be no hesitation with regard to where the money was coming from in that respect.

Then what about a national health plan? Obviously that is another one of those skeletons in the closet which the government hopes will not rattle too loudly and will not attract too much attention. They hope that they can tiptoe past that issue quietly without having it raised too many times during this session. But it is another one of those election promises which have been made again and again. No doubt it will be made just as blithely at the next election as it has been in the past. I think it is time to play fair and to be honest with the Canadian public. If this government intends to bring in a national health plan, then certainly something should be done in this session to indicate that it is going to be done before this parliament is dissolved.

I have already pointed out that we believe in economic planning and in establishing a proper price relationship. May I just say now in a general way that I believe it is time we had a new economic philosophy, a new way of looking at things. Here I speak for myself only as an individual, and I say that I believe it is time we accepted the philosophy of co-operation in place of the philosophy of competition. I know that a large majority of the members of this house think that the competitive system is the right type of economic system. I respect their views, but to me it runs counter to all the other teachings and to all the other things which we accept as being right on the moral side of life. From the time we learn to speak or start in to school or take part in any activities in relation to our fellow human beings, we are taught to respect each other and to help each other.

For example, we are taught the golden rule: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. But as soon as we get into the economic sphere, as soon as we get to the age where we must make a living, then we have to pervert and degrade the golden rule. In order to live with the system you have to do others before they do you. There is something fundamentally wrong about that concept. There is a conflict between the moral forces which we accept and boast about as the Christian principles of kindness and brotherly love. Then we turn around in our economic affairs and we attempt to live in a cutthroat or jungle fashion: we compete and fight. Often I used to thrill to a statement made by the former prime minister of Canada. I used to love to hear one phrase he used so often during the years of war, when he said that we must have a new social order in which human need will be the cardinal principle and not human greed. How little of that philosophy one finds in this budget or in the policies of the present government.

I believe it is time that we accepted the philosophy of co-operation, of helping each other in our activities, and translated that philosophy into our economic system. It is not something that is going to be done overnight. I am not so optimistic or so idealistic as to think that. But I think it is time a good start were made. If we accept that philosophy seriously and want to translate it into our economic affairs, the place to do it is in our annual budget in order to show that we believe in helping each other instead of competing with each other.

There are business people today who are beginning to realize that this whole question of competition, which to them has been sold as the idea of free enterprise, is not what they thought it was in the first place. From time to time we get reports on the growth of monopolies, combines and cartels, these economic machines which try to throttle free competition, which try to put the small man out of business in order that the big monopoly can operate more freely. All these things are beginning to persuade the people that more co-operation in economic life is needed in order to bring it into line with the philosophy of co-operation that we accept in our moral principles.

In addition to that I will say only this. I think it is time that this parliament was prepared to raise its sights. This budget which we are now discussing is not something we can feel proud of. Somehow, I think every one of us should have a slightly guilty feeling; and those who are directly responsible must, of course, bear the greatest portion of it. When we leave this parliament, when this session is completed, and go back into the constituencies, people will say to us, "So you have passed the budget; you have made provision for certain taxation and so on"; and they will ask, "What have you done that is new? What economic plan have you developed that is going to solve our unemployment situation or is going to do something about trade, or about our grain problem?" and so on.

We are going to have to say that the excise tax on jewelry, fur coats, cameras and fishing rods was reduced. I am sure there will be great comfort in that for the half a million unemployed who are wondering how they are going to pay their rent or make the next payment on their house or car. With the finance company looking over their shoulders and breathing down their necks, it will be a great comfort to them to be told that they are going to be able to buy cameras, fishing rods, jewelry or fur coats a little more cheaply than before. I am sure these are not the kind of things in which these people are interested. I think it is time that we raised our sights and realized the great development potential there is in this country, particularly in the northern areas. We should be prepared to accept public investment as one of the methods to bring about that development.

I am not opposed to private investment but there are times and places where, because of the nature of things, this great potential will remain undeveloped unless public investment is used as an instrument of development. The whole history of Canada proves that, and I need not go into it in detail. I believe it is time that we were prepared to set up an investment board which would have a two-fold function. One function would be to provide a place where the public could invest their surplus funds and the other would be to direct investment toward the useful development of our natural resources. I believe we have a great deal of potential wealth and unless we are prepared to remain hewers of wood and carriers of water for United States capital we must be prepared to use Canadian capital and public investment where necessary in order to develop the great potentialities of our country.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, as I see it, it is the wish of every member of the house that oratory be spared so that the present debate on the budget may be as short and as concise as possible. In accordance with this wish and to help the advance toward a successful early end of the session, I will circumscribe my remarks to a few points of special interest to my own constituents and deal mainly with a proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act with respect to mutual insurance companies, with federal-provincial relations and with two or three other points arising from the impressive speech delivered by our able Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the night of April 6 last. May I be permitted first to extend my sincere congratulations, and those of the population of Glengarry-Prescott, to the minister for his comprehensive review of Canada's economic and financial position. His conclusions on our national production in 1953 and his forecast for 1954 are not only most encouraging but contain a factual indication of the ascending development of our country under a competent Liberal administration.

By many sources, including stout supporters of the opposition, it has been said that the Minister of Finance has presented a "wait and see" budget. Never, perhaps, was a more impressive tribute paid to a government financial expert. By saying so, even those who intended to criticize were recognizing the far-reaching viewpoints that obtained in the preparation of the budget by the Minister of Finance. His realistic approach to all economic and financial problems made him realize that the world, and consequently Canada, had reached a turning point where careful steps alone are to be made if one wants his country to go ahead in the international financial organization without disrupting our own industrial or commercial set-up. For all this, and the tactful way in which he managed to protect so many sectors of the population from being hurt by an unfair distribution of taxes among the paying public, the Minister of Finance is to be thanked and congratulated.

But, in opening my remarks, I indicated that I intended to speak briefly about a subject that is of particular interest to my constituents, that of a proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act with reference to mutual insurance companies. On this, which is also of great interest to the great majority of Canadian farmers, I wish to express my fear as to the consequences of the budget income tax resolution No. 6 which reads as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

6. For the taxation of a resident mutual insurance corporation, . . . as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities on and after January 1, 1954, were a profit from a business, and declaring that a non-resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, shall be deemed to be and always to have been subject to taxation on that basis.

This resolution might have to be clarified, but I am given to understand that it would allow the government to re-establish as taxable the surpluses of mutual insurance companies, thus disregarding the favourable report of the royal commission which gave its opinion that purely mutual companies should be taxed only on investment income. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this opinion was concurred in by the income tax appeal board and backed up by the Supreme Court of Canada last summer.

If that is the meaning of resolution No. 6 as it stands, I want immediately to take a firm stand against it and to ask hon. members of this house to keep in mind the danger involved when the resolution is discussed in further detail by the house. The great majority of farmers of my constituency have their fire insurance with the Glengarry Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company or with the Prescott Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company. The two insurance companies are giving insurance protection at cost and any surplus they build up is solely for the reserve demanded by the department of insurance. There are no profits.

There is no doubt, if these two companies have to pay extra taxes along the suggested lines, that the additional cost would have to be charged to the insured farmers who, in my estimation, are already charged heavily enough. What is bound to happen in Glengarry-Prescott can be multiplied across the country by the number of constituencies where farmers are organized on a mutual basis for fire insurance protection. That is why I think that it would be in the general interest that the members of the house, especially those representing rural constituencies, should scrutinize resolution No. 6 when the amending bill is before the house.

I also indicated in my preliminary remarks that I intended to speak about federal-provincial financial relations. On this subject as well I will be brief, but I think, at this stage of the debate, that it is about time that the voice of a French-speaking Canadian living outside of the province of Quebec should be heard, pointing out the importance of standing united as citizens of a great and fast-growing country. The only direct reference I will make to the statement of the Minister of Finance on the matter will be to say that the vast majority of my constituents entirely agree with his understanding of the constitutional rights on taxation.

(Translation):

It would not be right for me to continue my remarks on that subject without congratulating most sincerely the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) on the outstandingly clear presentation he made of this matter in the afternoon of April 14. He really did examine the problem in its true light, setting it out in a perfectly sober and logical fashion, throwing back the responsibility for double taxation on the shoulders of those to whom it really belongs, that is, on those members of the Quebec legislature who have voted this provincial income tax legislation. The minister was fully qualified to speak on behalf of his Quebec colleagues. Speaking for myself, and with due regard to my very inadequate qualifications, I would make so bold as to express the opinion of those who have been called, in the province of Quebec, the "separated brethren", and for the survival of whom, we are told, some are prepared to fight to the bitter end.

(Text):

As a representative of a merged constituency where the best elements of the two great racial groups of Canada are represented, I feel particularly well qualified to speak on that subject. A good number of my constituents are, as I am, of French extraction and speak that language. They are consequently very interested in any political moves that are made in their name across the Quebec border. The English-speaking group also has a keen interest in these moves for they may have, as in this case of double taxation, a devastating effect on national unity and on the whole of the Canadian economy.

But what prompted me mainly to say a few words on this question today is the fact that most of the steps taken in Quebec for the so-called protection of provincial autonomy are represented as being moved for the defence of the rights and the survival of French Canadians, no matter where they live in Canada. The latest instance along this line was the adoption by the Quebec government of the act to create a new provincial income tax. I wish to state emphatically today that French-speaking Canadians living outside of the province of Quebec do not agree with this interpretation.

As citizens of Canada we are fully conscious that everything tending to disrupt efforts for unity is not in our best interests. We feel that the Quebec income tax law tends only to separate Quebec from the government of this country, instead of putting forward an authentic desire for co-operation that would give monetary help to the taxpayers of Quebec as well as solidify the national structure without endangering the constitutional rights of the French-speaking population.

As "separate brothers", we cannot accept the contention of the Quebec administrator that the British North America Act was a pact between the two main races of Canada. We consider it, as the fathers of confederation considered it at the time, an act uniting the provinces of one country under a single government charged with the general administration and with full powers of taxation, leaving to the provinces questions of local administration with powers restricted to direct taxation. If the British North America Act were a pact between races, how would the Quebec government be able to legally act for the French-speaking population living in other provinces?

On the other hand, as has been said so well by others who have taken part in this debate, no one questions the right of the provinces to direct taxation. But if the British North America Act limits the taxing powers of the provinces to direct taxation, it does not mean that this limitation gives them a priority in that field as the Quebec administrator would like us to believe. It does not mean either that the fathers of confederation were logical in granting equal powers in the same field of taxation to both the provinces and the federal government. But it is our feeling that we should try to make the best of what we have as long as the fiscal clauses of the British North America Act are not modelled to the satisfaction of all. We know the Canadian government, our government, stands ready to study appropriate means of minimizing the present difficulties. Unfortunately, we cannot say the same for the Quebec government now.

My only reason for bringing up this subject today is to point out the necessity for close co-operation between the various elements of the country, and the danger of an individual being out of step and sabotaging the common effort towards the building of a strong and powerful nation. It is for that reason I limited my remarks on the constitution to general viewpoints without going into details, and emphasizing only that a false conception of the factual position of our constitution can become a menace to the future of national unity as well as to the welfare of a great portion of the population.

When we initiate a study to improve social welfare, particularly the rehabilitation of disabled persons and the establishment throughout the country of assistance to invalids, we find that if some increase could be brought about in these measures of assistance it would prove of tremendous relief to these people. In my province we already grant a measure of assistance to invalids.

There is one question that is of particular interest to me, sir, and that is the help and encouragement of the youth of this country. I feel that in Canada we have young people with talent, initiative and tremendous possibilities. Unfortunately many of them lack the means to put these potentialities to some use. With the eventual implementation of the Massey commission recommendations, why could we not devise some means whereby our young people could be given a helping hand and provided with an opportunity of serving the country in a manner more appropriate to their potentialities? I have seen many young people who were brilliant students and graduated from school with flying colours, yet they had to seek employment. If they were given the opportunity, these students would enter fields for which they feel they are better suited. If our young people felt there was a federal youth department to which they could apply for assistance or guidance, I am sure that before too long we would have the experts that today we are seeking from other lands.

A youth department established on a national scale would certainly not infringe upon the provincial departments of education. Through co-operation with the provincial departments we could have at the disposal of our young people experts in the different fields of learning and craftsmanship who could give guidance to those young people who had not yet gone out on their own in life's struggle. These young people would be able to discuss their own problems and aspirations with men of experience. We certainly have fields or divisions in all departments of this government where such young people could serve. We could give guidance to the young men from the farm, who could study at experimental farms or stations throughout the country, as to new methods of farming that would improve the lot of those living on the homestead. Under the supervision of this new department young people in industry could learn for themselves, thus putting their own talents to the best use in order to make our world a better place in which to live.

The same thing might be said of the different fields of knowledge because with the proper guidance and the help of grants our young people could follow a course best suited to their aptitudes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member wish to adjourn the debate?

Mr. Bruneau: Mr. Speaker, I shall only take about one minute to complete my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue beyond six o'clock?

Mr. Knowles: For one minute.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bruneau: If we were to help the young men today I am sure it would pay dividends a hundredfold and give us better citizens tomorrow. I hope, sir, that before too long Canada will have a youth department, because it would pay countless dividends. If we are, even unwillingly, under obligation to spend billions to teach man to kill man, I believe the idea of a youth department is worth considering and some effort should be made to help our young people serve this country better.

On motion of Mr. Perron the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall begin with the Department of Public Works. If it is completed tomorrow, we shall take the department of northern affairs for the balance of tomorrow. However, on Friday the minister of the northern affairs department will not be here, so we would go on with agriculture and national health and welfare.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 29, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—PAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the Unemployment Insurance Act been studied, since January 1, 1954, by the government or by any officials thereof, to determine whether provision should be made for a person who has qualified for unemployment insurance benefits to continue receiving such benefits until such person is re-employed?
2. If so, by whom have such studies been made?
3. Have such studies resulted in any decisions or recommendations to the Minister of Labour?
4. If so, what are the terms of any such decisions or recommendations?
5. Will legislation based thereon be introduced at this session?

Mr. Gregg:

1, 2, 3 and 4. Studies in relation to the Unemployment Insurance Act are being carried on by the unemployment insurance commission in conjunction with representatives of interested departments. The studies do not relate to provision for the payment of benefits to any person for an indeterminate period of time falling outside the scope of an unemployment insurance scheme.

5. No.

DENTIFRICE ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare made any investigation or examination of tooth pastes, tooth powders or other dentifrices being sold in Canada, to determine whether or not such products measure up to the claims made for them in advertisements appearing on their behalf?
2. If so, what are the results of such investigation or examination?
3. Have any dentifrice advertisements been found to be misleading? If so, in what way?
4. Have any dentifrice advertisements been found to offend against the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act, as assented to on May 14, 1953? If so, in what way?
5. Have any protests been received from dentists or dental associations concerning dentifrice advertisements?
6. If so, what action has the government taken in connection with such protests?
7. Is the government aware of any public protests concerning dentifrice advertisements made by the American Dental Association?
8. If so, what study has the government given to such protests, or what action has the government taken on the basis thereof?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes. Tooth pastes and tooth powders have been analysed in the laboratories of the food and drug divisions during the past few years. Manufacturers have also been requested to submit data in support of claims made or proposed for advertising purposes.

2. The results of the analysis revealed no violation of the Food and Drugs Act or regulations. Some of the data submitted was not considered adequate to support the advertised claims and manufacturers have withdrawn such claims voluntarily.

3. Yes. Some dentifrice advertisements have been found misleading in that statements were made that could not be supported by adequate evidence.

4. The Food and Drugs Act, as assented to on May 14, 1953, has not yet been proclaimed; therefore no offence can be committed at this time in contravention of the revised act.

5. One dental association asked for the department's views on anti-enzymes as related to dental health and the advertising of such products.

6. The dental association was informed that manufacturers were requested to submit clinical evidence in support of their claims and where such evidence was not scientifically acceptable, they were asked to withdraw such claims.

7. The Department of National Health and Welfare is not aware that the American Dental Association has ever advertised a dentifrice.

8. See answer to No. 7 above.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL SUBSIDIES—B. C. FIRMS

Mr. Hahn:

1. Do any firms in British Columbia receive a subsidy from the federal government?
2. If so, what are the names of such companies, and to what extent are they subsidized?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have had a word with the hon. member for New Westminster and he has consented to having the words "engaged in mining, metallurgy or agriculture" inserted in the first part of the question after the word "firms". If that amendment is agreeable, this question could be made an order for return.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: As modified, this question is made an order for return.

VETERANS INSURANCE

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. How many world war I veterans are at present carrying veterans insurance?
2. How many of these are still paying premiums and maintaining policies at their full face values?
3. How many have taken paid up insurance and discontinued paying premiums?
4. How many in the past ten years have taken the cash surrender value of their policies?
5. How does the cost of world war I veterans insurance compare with that of veterans of world war II and that of Korean veterans?
6. How do paid up insurance values compare with those of world war II veterans for comparative age groups?
7. How does veterans insurance for veterans of world war I, world war II and Korea each compare with ordinary company life insurance in relation to premiums, paid up insurance values and cash surrender values?
8. Is veterans insurance sold on a strict actuarial and self-sustaining basis?
9. If not, to what extent is it subsidized and what was the cost to the government of this subsidy for the fiscal year 1953-54?
10. What is the premium on a policy of $1,000, face value taken out by a world war I veteran at age 55?
11. At what age would said veteran be entitled to a paid up policy for a full $1,000?
12. What would be the paid up insurance value on said policy after 25 annual payments had been made and the veteran had reached the age of 80?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GENEVA CONFERENCE—ABSENCE OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES FROM DISCUSSIONS ON INDO-CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house if it is on the instructions of the government that the Canadian representatives at Geneva are not attending the discussions on Indo-China?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not on instructions of the government. It is no doubt as a consequence of the discussions we had about the matter before the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) left for that conference. As I stated the other day, our position was that we were not committed to the actions that are proceeding in Indo-China and had no standing to ask to participate in the decisions that might be arrived at in respect of that situation; we wanted to be careful and not depart in any way from the attitude we have maintained in the house that our commitments with respect to action in the East were limited to those that were under the aegis of the United Nations, and that if it became advisable for us to go beyond that the government would give very careful consideration to the facts and would come to the house and make full disclosure of the facts upon which any recommendation might be made or any other commitment might be undertaken.

Mr. Drew: Would it not be an advantage to have the information which could be obtained at such a meeting without in any way committing us to the outcome of what may take place?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am convinced that we are getting just as full information about what is taking place as if we were really a participant in the discussions.

TAXATION

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have two questions to ask the Prime Minister, of which I have given him notice. The first is this: Was the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) expressing government policy when he said in Edmonton on April 28, as reported in a Canadian Press dispatch in the Globe and Mail of April 29, that "there will be little, if any, change in taxes for years to come."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I assume that the hon. member is referring to the report in the Globe and Mail of April 29 as the basis for this question. I have secured the report and I find that nowhere in it is the minister reported as having said the words used in the hon. gentleman's question. As a matter of fact, the report states:

> He told the Canadian Club that despite existence of the hydrogen and atomic bombs, the need for conventional weapons is just as great.

Then there are some words that are indicated as a quotation which are as follows:

> The H-bomb has not lessened the magnitude of the defence operation. There is still a need for a navy, army and air force of about the present size as the minimum force necessary to enable us to do our job.

Then the reporter goes on to say:

> Observers said this was a clear indication that defence budgets will remain at the present level for years—around $2 billion annually. Defence forms at least 40 per cent of the national budget. Thus tax reductions, if any, would necessarily have to be small.

It seems to have been the impression made upon those who heard the speech that there was not likely to be a change in taxes for years to come. There seems to have been no such statement made by the minister, and it may or may not be an accurate conclusion to draw from the statement of the minister that the situation seemed to require the maintenance of as large forces as we have at the present time. In any event there has been no government policy determined with respect to taxes for future years, and there will be no determination until we know just exactly what is the situation we have to budget for in those future years.

Mr. Macdonnell: As I think my question indicated, I was quoting from the dispatch. I should like to read the words again and ask the Prime Minister if he thinks what he has said indicates any inaccuracy in the sense of this dispatch. I read the words:

> Defence Minister Claxton indicated today that there will be little change in taxes, if any, for years to come.

As I understood the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) he said nothing to differ substantially from that.

Mr. St. Laurent: The reporter says that the minister indicated that there would be no change in taxes for years to come. Then he goes on to explain how that indication was made. It was made by the statement that under present conditions it appeared necessary to maintain the strength of the forces now in existence.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not like to be inaccurate, so again I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks there is any inaccuracy in the statement which I have read?

Mr. St. Laurent: There is only this inaccuracy. The statement appears to have been a conclusion drawn by the reporter. From the statement that the forces will have to remain at their present strength he draws a conclusion about the taxes, and whether or not that is an accurate conclusion to draw from the statement is a matter of opinion.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT REGARDING DEFENCE BUILD-UP

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My second question is this. Will the Prime Minister comment on the statement made by the Minister of National Defence as reported in a Canadian Press dispatch of April 29 on the subject of NATO. I hope these words are correct.

> If the defence build-up had been continued as originally planned, the economies of NATO members would have been wrecked.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Again, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the reporter does not state that as being a direct quotation of what the minister said. As to what the minister said, I do not know; I was not there. I had inquiries made at his office as to whether or not there were notes that he was to use for his speech in Edmonton. I was told that there were no such notes. I received notice of the hon. member's question just a few minutes before I came into the house. There has been no opportunity to communicate with the Minister of National Defence.

Whether or not he is under the impression that had the original forecast that it was necessary to build up an active force for an attack in July, 1954 been carried out, it would have involved such extensive expenditures by members of the NATO organization as to wreck their economies, I have no personal opinion. The minister has attended several of the meetings of the council of the NATO organization. What impression he got from the discussions at those meetings, I do not know and I would not like to attempt to offer any comment upon material that is not available to me at this time.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will reserve any further questions until we see the text of the minister's speech.

Mr. Abbott: A splendid idea.

CIVIL DEFENCE

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS—REFERENCE TO ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare clarify the situation in regard to civil defence in the light of a statement made by the responsible minister in Ontario that there are, in fact, no agreements with Ontario and Quebec as had previously been stated in this house.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As the hon. member has said, Mr. Speaker, the minister in charge of civil defence in Ontario did make a comment which I understand appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. I do not always have the opportunity of reading the Globe and Mail until the evening, so I am not in a position to accurately and completely answer my hon. friend's question.

I understand that he said I was in error in saying there had been general agreement on the matter of civil defence and the matter of financing in connection therewith. I wish only to say that I believe the record will indicate that what I said represented the situation correctly at that time. It is true that the province of Quebec did not agree with the general proposal, and that Ontario took the position it wished to proceed with its program of standardization of hose couplings. After that heavy expenditure had been made consideration would be given to whether or not the proposed new formula would be one which the province would support. I may say that the other provinces expressed general agreement with the proposition as stated.

If there has been any error, I am sure it is an error in good faith on both sides, because for the minister for civil defence in Ontario I have nothing but the highest respect. I am sure if there has been any misunderstanding he and I will be able to settle it in a satisfactory manner.

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—STATEMENT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to make a statement concerning disarmament. In its resolution on disarmament of November 28 last, the United Nations general assembly suggested that the disarmament commission study the desirability of establishing a subcommittee which should seek in private an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem and report to the commission as soon as possible. The commission has now set up a subcommittee on which Canada is represented together with France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union.

The establishment of the subcommittee is considered by the Canadian government as an important step towards the settlement of a vital problem, the importance of which has been underlined by recent developments in the field of atomic and hydrogen weapons. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will be the Canadian representative on the subcommittee which will begin private talks on or about May 13 in London. Mr. N. A. Robertson, Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom and Mr. David M. Johnson, Canadian permanent representative to the United Nations, will be alternate representatives in London and in New York respectively.

The disarmament commission has recommended that the subcommittee submit a report of its discussions not later than July 15 next. The commission itself is called upon to report to the general assembly and the security council not later than September 1, 1954. The Canadian government earnestly hopes that these renewed efforts on the part of the United Nations will result in substantial progress being achieved in finding a solution to the problem of disarmament.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

INVESTIGATION INTO CRASH AT MOOSE JAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and I regret that I have not had an opportunity of giving him notice. If he is not prepared to answer it now, perhaps he would be kind enough to take the question as notice. Was any spokesman for the Canadian air lines pilots association invited to appear as a witness before the body appointed by the Department of Transport to investigate the recent air crash at Moose Jaw?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Subject to looking at the record, Mr. Speaker, my answer would be no.

Mr. MacLean: Did this association express a desire to have a representative appear before the investigating body with regard to that accident?

Mr. Chevrier: The investigation is carried on under a statute, the Aeronautics Act, and, as I indicated to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) yesterday, I have now received a copy of the report. I should think it is somewhat late for representations to be made at this time.

Mr. MacLean: No, I believe I have been misunderstood. My question was, were representations made at the time the board was sitting to allow a witness to appear?

Mr. Chevrier: My answer to the first question was that so far as I can recollect no representations had been made. I may be wrong in that, and I would have to look at the file. Certainly none have been brought to my attention.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEASONAL UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the speech the Minister of Labour is reported to have made yesterday at a meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, can he tell the house what steps the government proposes to take to implement the recommendations made to the minister for minimizing or eliminating seasonal unemployment?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to send the hon. member a copy of the speech I made to the Canadian Manufacturers Association yesterday, and I believe that will give him the answer.

Mr. Knowles: I hope that at some stage the minister will give that information to the house.

FISHERIES

NATIONAL FISHERIES INSTITUTE MEETING—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, notice of which I sent to his office this morning. Has the minister or his department given any consideration to the advisability of sending representatives to the annual meeting of the national fisheries institute to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, starting on Sunday next, at which important problems affecting the Canadian fishing industry will be discussed?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The Minister of Fisheries, the deputy minister of fisheries and the director of fish inspection will all attend that meeting.

TELEVISION

GOVERNMENT POLICY IN GRANTING OF LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if it continues to be the policy of the government not to permit more than one television broadcasting station in any area?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on March 30, 1953 I made an announcement with respect to the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation having to do with the granting of licences for television stations. Since that time there has been no change, nor is there any change contemplated at the present time.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government has now decided whether it is going to ask parliament to extend the Emergency Powers Act at this session.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I propose to make a statement tomorrow about the further legislation to be introduced. However I can assure my hon. friend at the present time we have come to the conclusion we will not at this session ask parliament to extend the Emergency Powers Act. We felt it was a grave decision to make because there is still a pretty explosive situation existing in the world. I hope the situation will not require the exercise of any but normal powers by the governor in council. But should it develop that there would have to be, in the interests of the safety of the nation, powers exercised that are not normally conferred upon the governor in council by existing legislation, we would have to resort to the War Measures Act. I sincerely hope that will never be necessary while I am a member of the government.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The Chairman: The last time the committee sat we were discussing resolution 374 as it is found at page 51 of the estimates, the details appearing at page 447.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

374. British Columbia, $4,450,000.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, when the committee last considered these estimates on April 9 the question was raised as to whether or not the government would take any part in the construction of a new bridge over the north arm of the Fraser river, commonly known as the Marpole bridge. At that time the Minister of Public Works gave the undertaking that he would look into the situation, and if he found there had been any commitment by any member of the government, such commitment would be honoured. I refer in particular to page 3943 of Hansard where the minister is reported to have said:

> I simply wish to assure the committee that if my predecessor here or any of my other colleagues in good faith have committed the federal government to participation in that bridge, they may be assured that that commitment will be honoured.

And farther down on the same page he is reported as follows:

I do not want to hedge on these words. If my predecessor, or any of my colleagues, speaking on their responsibilities as members of the cabinet, have said that we will participate in the cost of building the Marpole bridge, then we will honour the commitment.

Then during the Easter recess I made further inquiries into the situation on the coast, and found that on Vancouver island the government paid a portion—half, I believe—of the cost of the road from Patricia Bay airport to Victoria, on the basis that it was a road from an air station of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

As the minister is doubtless aware, the main R.C.A.F. station in British Columbia at the present time is based at the Vancouver airport. If the existence of an air force station was sufficient for the government to contribute to the cost of the road from Patricia Bay to Victoria, then the same argument applies with regard to the Marpole bridge which, to all intents and purposes, is the only connection with the airport from the city of Vancouver.

I have also found further corroboration of the fact that commitments were made. For example, on April 15 of this year, during the Easter recess, the minister of public works in British Columbia was quoted as follows in the Vancouver Province:

Mr. Gaglardi insisted the Right Hon. C. D. Howe had made a commitment to help B.C., and said, "I still believe the government will stick by its previous promises. I still refuse to accept anything but a positive answer."

And then he added this paragraph:

"Mr. Winters is a very fine man and I'm sure he'll help."

Whether that was just a little bit of honey, or not, I cannot say.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It is a statement of fact.

Mr. Green: Then on June 15, 1953 I find reference to a statement made in the B.C. legislature by Mr. Gaglardi. The article says:

Before the last legislative session Mr. Gaglardi visited Ottawa and reported he had a pledge of help from Rt. Hon. C. D. Howe.

Then I would refer to a press dispatch appearing in the Vancouver Sun of December 17, 1951, reporting upon a statement by the then premier of British Columbia, the Hon. Byron Johnson, concerning talks in Ottawa. The article states:

He had discussions with Transport Minister Lionel Chevrier concerning the financing of a new bridge at Marpole—

And there is an article referring to a statement by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) appearing in the Vancouver Province of November 13, 1951 as follows:

He said—

And this is Mr. Goode.

—Defence Production Minister C. D. Howe had told him in writing that the federal government was "not interested at this time in any more than a payment of $400,000 toward the Marpole crossing."

And I have a further quotation going back to 1947 reporting an interview with the minister of public works in British Columbia at that time, the late Mr. Carson. This article is dated November 21, 1947 and states, in the last paragraph:

Mr. Carson said he is not going to Ottawa with specific plans but wishes to sound out Mr. Howe on the federal government's attitude. Last year, Mr. Howe, when on the coast, said federal support would be forthcoming.

When I spoke on April 9 I quoted press statements reporting the Minister of Trade and Commerce as promising help in 1946. In addition, I quoted at that time statements by Mr. Arthur Laing, who is now the Liberal leader in British Columbia, to the effect that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had promised help and also press reports of 1950 and November 1951 in the latter of which the Hon. Mr. Mayhew, then the British Columbia minister in this government, was quoted as follows:

Because the airport is served by the bridge, Mr. Howe offered them some aid—I think it was $400,000—but that is all. The money is still available if and when the city and province decide to build.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the provincial government has taken a lead and is going ahead to build this bridge. Is the federal government going to honour the commitments which were made at that time, as reported in the press, or, in any event, commitments which were understood by the people of British Columbia to have been made by this government?

Mr. Winters: I wonder whether my hon. friend would clarify that last statement? Did I understand him to say that the provincial government had now taken the lead and is going to build the bridge? Is that the statement he made?

Mr. MacDougall: He made the statement; it is not right.

Mr. Green: The report of Mr. Gaglardi's statement is given in this way:

Premier Bennett has said that although he still expects federal help, British Columbia will go ahead to build the bridge with or without it.

It has been intimated the provincial government will pay its promised one-third share and then impose tolls to collect the rest if Vancouver and Ottawa don't participate.

If that action is followed, then in my humble judgment it will mean that the people who use that bridge will have to pay tolls because Ottawa has broken its promise. I hope the government here will not allow itself to be put in that position.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I say a word, since my past remarks have been quoted by my hon. friend? This discussion of a bridge across the north arm of the Fraser river has been continuing for a good many years. In the beginning it was a fairly simple proposal of replacing the present swing bridge by a lift bridge at or near the same location. Conditions were different at that time in that we were operating the Sea Island airport. Discussions were held, but never with any agreement between the city and the province. I had said that if the city and the province were able to come forward with a scheme in which they both agreed, the federal government might be expected to contribute something up to one-third of the cost. Remember this was an indication given a good many years ago. Well, the city and the province never did agree, and they have not agreed to this date. But the province went up into the stratosphere and talked about a $7 million or $8 million bridge, which incidentally might give a better access to the airport but was really intended as another artery to the international border. At that time I indicated that we were not interested in a bridge for that purpose, that there is no federal responsibility for such a structure built wholly within a province. I still say, and I have repeated more recently, that if the bridge is confined to replacing the present bridge and serves no other purpose, and if the city and the province agreed on such a proposal, and agreed on their participation, the federal government would consider assistance.

That is the extent of my undertaking at any time. If the $400,000 figure was mentioned it then represented about one-third of the total expenditure that we were discussing; but I may say that much water has gone over the dam since then, and I consider that the present Minister of Public Works is not bound in any way by discussions about a totally different project which took place seven or eight years ago.

Mr. Green: I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the government is prepared now to make a contribution to a bridge over the north arm of the Fraser. There is no doubt at all—and I am sure he will agree with me—that there has to be some change made either in the present bridge or there has to be a new bridge built. Frankly I think it would be foolish simply to build up the old bridge. It is an old wooden structure, over fifty years old. This airport is certainly one of the two leading airports in Canada. The air force base on Sea island, which is part of the airport, is vital to the defence of the west coast, and it would be poor business not to build a proper bridge when a bridge is being built. Is the government prepared to pay one-third of the cost of such bridge? If it is not prepared to pay the one-third, approximately what contribution would it make? The provincial government has gone ahead and prepared plans.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Of what?

Mr. Green: Of a bridge which is to be known as the Oak street bridge. It is a short distance—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is a high level bridge leading to the international boundary.

Mr. Green: It is a high level bridge, yes; that is right. But a bridge to the airport should be a high level bridge; it should not be opened for every little scow that comes down with a load of sawdust. That is what is happening now. It is being opened hundreds of times a year. A businesslike approach to the question would be for the dominion to come off its high horse of not being willing to make any payment at all and agree to pay one-third of the cost of the plan, provided that plan is approved by the Department of Public Works. I think Vancouver is unanimous on this question. I would be surprised if any of the hon. members from greater Vancouver differed from the stand that I have taken. Of course they will have to speak for themselves, but this is a very serious matter. Any change in the bridge has been held up for many years.

As I said on April 9, such a condition would not have been allowed to exist in central Canada for six months simply because the seat of government is here in central Canada. Because we are 2,400 miles or 2,500 miles away it seems to be easy for the powers that be to shrug their shoulders and find someone else to blame. As a result nothing has been done. I hope that that position is not going to be taken on this question today.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I be permitted to finish my remarks in the light of what has been said? I would point out that the government has received no proposal for a bridge leading to the airport only. That is all we are interested in. The city and the province have never at any time in my experience, in my nineteen years in this house, agreed on any proposal to build a bridge to serve the airport. My hon. friend is talking of a hypothetical bridge. There are bridges and bridges. Some we might be inclined to help out and others we would not help out. There is no obligation whatever on the federal government to assist in financing any bridge. It is a bridge within a province and a bridge within two municipalities.

A great many access roads have been built to airports without any federal help. I cannot think at the moment where we have helped access to any airport except in the case of Victoria. In that instance, there was an insistent demand that we build a civilian airport closer to town, and after a good deal of discussion and negotiation it was decided by the province and by ourselves that we could both save money by improving the access to the existing military airport, which was done. I cannot think of another case in the whole history of airports where the government has made a substantial contribution to providing access from a town to an airport. That is the position. I think the position today is that if the city and the province were to agree on a bridge solely for the purpose of giving access to the Sea Island airport and wanted to bring it along and sit down with us I do not think that contribution is barred, but certainly there is no definite commitment for a contribution as far as my discussions are concerned.

Mr. Green: Does the minister mean that the dominion government will make no contribution whatever unless this bridge is to be one solely to serve the airport?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is correct, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Green: May I say that that is a ridiculous stand to take. If it is good business to build a high-level bridge a few hundred yards further up the river, even though that bridge serves a further purpose and will help with regard to traffic to the airport, surely a contribution should be made to that bridge. Why should the government take the position that it will not contribute one cent unless a bridge is built which serves only the airport? The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a good businessman, one of the best in Canada. I am amazed that he would take a position of that kind. I think that on reflection he will not stand by that statement. He will realize, just as must everyone in this house, that if it is more practical to build in another spot a bridge which can serve more than the one purpose—that is, more than the airport—then that is what should be done and the dominion contribution should go into that bridge.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, we were talking about past commitments. The Minister of Public Works will speak about what we will do today or tomorrow. I am talking about past commitments. I made clear to Mr. Carson the stand I have taken. I made it clear to all concerned. I have been referring to past commitments that had been made by myself. My hon. friend was referring to commitments made by myself. What the government will do under present-day conditions is something that the Minister of Public Works will deal with.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce admits that he did make commitments at least to the extent of $400,000 for help in the construction of the bridge?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The amount of $400,000 was not mentioned but a certain definite proposal had been put forward by the province and a somewhat similar one by the city. I said that if they would build the bridge as planned, which was a lift bridge, providing reasonable freedom from interruption to the traffic to the airport, I thought the government might contribute up to one-third.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that is quite definite in all this discussion and that is that a bridge is needed across the north arm of the Fraser river. I drove a milk wagon over that bridge forty-five years ago and at that time there was a sign there which said not to trot your horses. It has not improved a great deal during the intervening time. It seems to me that the initiative for the building of the bridge rests with the provincial government. When the provincial government has decided on building a bridge, I believe that this government has a responsibility in connection with a contribution, although I cannot agree with the minister that a bridge would be built there solely for the airport. You cannot build a bridge there just solely for the airport. But a bridge built there as a bridge for general traffic would undoubtedly help traffic to and from the airport.

I think it was the Vancouver Sun which put on a little demonstration the last time the Prime Minister was in Vancouver just to show how easy it was to hold up traffic going to the airport on that bridge. But at any time that definite plans are made for building a bridge—and I say again that matter rests with the provincial government and not with the city of Vancouver or the federal government—and when those plans are there, I will be ready to urge the federal government to make a contribution.

I believe that the contribution will have to be more than $400,000. The most recent figure that I saw—I would not be too definite now as to what it was—was, I think, several million dollars. A $400,000 contribution is neither here nor there. As the minister was heard to say one other time "What's a million dollars anyway?" I say again that I shall be glad to add my words and efforts to those of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to get a bridge that is badly needed there; but I believe that the initiative should come from the provincial government.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I might just state what the position is since we last discussed the matter on April 9 here in committee. Since that time I have been reviewing the files to see what has been the nature of these alleged commitments. From the files I have found that they are mostly newspaper reports. Just what more there is to it, I do not know.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said today that there was a commitment.

Mr. Winters: I was going to add that when my hon. friend interrupted. In the meantime the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said before the committee that he promised some time ago that the federal government would participate in building a low-level bridge whose primary purpose was to provide access to the airport. I might state also that Hon. P. A. Gaglardi was here this week and saw me on Tuesday, at which time we discussed the bridge. He then talked in terms of a high-level bridge costing in excess of what he estimated to be $10 million. I told him I was surprised at this high-level bridge proposal. He said it had been before the department for some time, but in fact I was not aware of it. I still thought our discussion related to a low-level bridge which was estimated to cost about $1,200,000, and that is how the $400,000 figure arose. I told Mr. Gaglardi that in the light of all these developments I was perfectly prepared to review the whole subject, to discuss it further with my colleagues and then to let him know what the decision would be.

Mr. MacDougall: As a Vancouver member I have an interest in the construction of bridges which is equal to that of my friends the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I do not think that this is the time that we should muddy the waters in connection with this discussion. It seems to me that in the minds of different people we are putting the cart before the horse. My good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has spoken of a crossing over the north arm of the Fraser river. I think that what we must realize first and foremost is that a crossing might mean a crossing at Marpole or a crossing at the southern end of Oak street. There is no doubt that what has been said by my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is quite true, namely that 45 years ago the Marpole bridge was then fairly new and that at that time it was necessary not to exceed the speed limit by trotting your horses. Since that time there has been no improvement in the Marpole situation but rather a great deterioration by virtue of age.

I think we have to look upon this thing in the light of the traffic conditions today. First of all, if we start talking about Marpole high suspension, we are running into a dead-end street for the simple reason that it would be a detriment to navigation by virtue of its close location to the airport. I am not trying to bring up a question between the bascule bridge that is a possibility or a high-level suspension bridge, but the Marpole bridge as now located is very close to the landing field of the international airport in Vancouver. Consequently I think it would be poor business to consider in that particular area a high-level suspension bridge. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra spoke about a crossing over the north arm of the Fraser river. A crossing might mean a crossing at Marpole or it might mean a crossing at the end of Oak street. When you get into the question of $8 million or $10 million bridge construction, you are certainly going to have a high-level suspension bridge.

Whether a crossing is to be decided upon at this time I am not prepared to say for the simple reason that it is my considered opinion that before any definite and specific action can be taken, either by the municipal or provincial government of British Columbia, or the federal government here, the first thing to be done is to ascertain who is going to own the international airport. When we have that question settled it is quite possible that one or other of the potential crossings over the north arm of the Fraser river will have automatically eliminated itself.

Last summer and fall there was an editorial in the Vancouver Sun with respect to the Marpole bridge based upon the possibility of handling the project in three ways. The municipality of Richmond would construct the southern approach, the city of Vancouver construct the northern approach, with the provincial government possibly sharing the construction of the central span.

That, to me, is very sound; but just the same is the potential crossing of the Fraser going to be at Marpole, or is it going to be the southern extension of the Oak street bridge? I do not think I can quite go along with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra on this question at this time because on the basis of his approach I think we are going to make confusion all the more confounded, and heaven knows we have enough of that now.

It seems to me that the logical thing to do now is to ascertain at the earliest possible moment whether the federal government and the municipalities can come to an agreement on the sale of the international airport. When we have done that we will then be in a much better position to judge whether the crossing to be established is going to be at Marpole or at the southern end of Oak street.

In this whole question, Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt that we have more to consider than simply the problem of traffic in a city which is growing at the terrific rate at which Vancouver is now growing. There is much more to this problem than that of a mere traffic bottleneck. In the event of our having to evacuate the city of Vancouver we are in a positively untenable position at the present time. We do not know, nor can anyone in this house know, regardless of how well informed they may be with respect to foreign affairs, when some trigger-happy character may pull the string, and if that should occur the city of Vancouver, as I have said, is in a very bad position. I believe the aspect of possible evacuation should be considered in connection with bridge outlets from the metropolitan area of Vancouver.

I am no authority on this aspect but it seems to me that we would be well advised to discuss a crossing over the Fraser when we have first decided what is going to happen to the international airport. When that is decided then one or other of the crossings now in people's minds will automatically eliminate itself and the various governments concerned, municipal, provincial, and federal, will be in a much sounder position to come to an agreement if for no other reason than that the expediency of potential evacuation might bring about an agreement satisfactory to all concerned.

I am just as anxious as the two hon. members from Vancouver who have already spoken on this question that we have an adequate crossing over the Fraser river, but I believe that before we come to any final decision as to where that crossing is going to be it is essential that the government of British Columbia, and the municipalities of Vancouver and Richmond, know exactly what the score is with respect to the ownership of the international airport. In this instance, Mr. Chairman, I believe we could possibly hasten the construction of adequate crossings over the Fraser river if we do not now rush into it until such time as we know where that crossing is actually going to be located.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, earlier this week I spoke on this question in this house and today my name has been brought into the discussion in regard to certain correspondence between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself. At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce—and I think this was in 1951—made his suggestion of financial assistance being conditional upon the city of Vancouver and the provincial government becoming interested in this bridge. Whether a mistaken report was issued in that regard is not my responsibility but in numerous speeches I mentioned the amount of $400,000. I also mentioned the fact that this was a provisional amount.

We are talking about a bridge which is 65 years old and which during October 1953 opened no less than 664 times. I represent people who are deeply concerned with this matter and I can say that my people in Richmond believe that the federal government have a responsibility if the airport is purchased by the federal government. I said that earlier this week and I say it again.

In regard to a southern highway from Vancouver to the United States, there is confirmation of that in the brief which the provincial government of British Columbia brought to Ottawa some time last year. If hon. members read that brief they will find no mention of a Marpole bridge. There is mention of a highway to the United States. If it is the opinion of the provincial government of British Columbia that this bridge is being built only to supplement a highway to the United States then I would doubt that the federal government had any financial responsibility. But in my speech on Tuesday I outlined certain specifications in regard to my support of one-third of the financial cost, and if I remember correctly this is what I said: that plans and specifications be made and offered by the provincial government of my province to the Minister of Public Works so he may then know what these plans are. It has been stated in the Vancouver press that these plans are already here, but I do not believe that is true. I believe I can place the responsibility for that statement upon a provincial cabinet minister who gave it to the Vancouver press. I understand the final plans have yet to be decided upon and I have some doubt they have been drawn at this moment.

However, when we start talking about federal responsibility then I cannot but agree with my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. If we do purchase the airport at a cost of $1,100,000—I think that is the amount suggested—then I hope the Minister of Public Works will take a look at this plan in regard to the Oak street bridge. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard made some suggestion that an offer had been made to Richmond to build the southern approach to the bridge, but I think he was in error. The municipality of Richmond has not the money and the suggestion has not been made to them that they build that southern approach. What was suggested some time ago was that the city of Vancouver would build the northern end of the bridge, the federal government the southern end of the bridge and the provincial government the main span. I do not think that the suggestion was offered very seriously but it was offered late last year.

There is no doubt in my mind that the municipality of Richmond needs a crossing. It is quite clear to me that the crossing is going to be at Oak street because the provincial government has already bought large quantities of land in my municipality—title to which I understand has been given to either the province or one of their officials. I happen to know the people who sold the property to them, and I think you can take it that, as I said on Tuesday, the intentions of the provincial government of British Columbia are sincere. The engineers have told the provincial government that a high-level bridge at Oak street is quite permissible having regard to the act that governs the control of airways. The engineers in British Columbia seem to be of the opinion that this would be no detriment to the landing of aircraft.

I said last year at several meetings on the coast that it was my opinion that at this time the present Marpole span should be done away with and that a new span should be built 30 feet above high water level which would allow every vessel using the north arm, except one, to go under the bridge without any suspension of traffic. I understand that one dredge that goes to New Westminster once a week would have to have the bridge raised for it, but that is all. As I said last Tuesday, the bridge was opened 664 times in a month. This is a disgrace for which responsibility should not be attributed to the federal government but to the provincial government of British Columbia because there is no doubt that at this time there is a contract signed by the municipality of Richmond and the provincial government whereby the provincial government accepts full responsibility for that bridge. I have seen the document. It is in the hands of the municipality of Richmond, and I am quite sure if the Minister of Public Works wishes it I can get him a copy.

I think every member from British Columbia is sincere about this matter, and I hope the people at home are not being kidded too much with respect to this bridge. On any street in Vancouver, Burnaby or Richmond you will find a different rumour regarding what the federal government proposes to do. The truth should be put on the record, and as one who is vitally interested I may say that as far as I know I do not think the federal government have moved on this matter. I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works, as I did on Tuesday, that they do not move until plans and specifications are in their hands showing a sincere intention on the part of the provincial government to build the bridge.

Mr. Philpott: I want to say a word about the bridge, one end of which happens to be in my own constituency. I will assure the committee now that it is going to be just a word because it seems to me it is quite superfluous for us to talk at too great length about the details of who is going to pay for how much until we have some exact, hard and concrete proposition in front of us. I for one was very glad to hear the assurances of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Public Works that when the authorities primarily responsible for building the bridge, the provincial government of British Columbia, come to the federal government with a hard and fast proposition this government will be prepared to give it fair consideration. As far as I am concerned, at this moment that is good enough for me.

I want to make one or two observations on the question of principle. It would be very presumptuous for me, as a new member of the house, to say to what degree the national authority should step in so far as the question of bridges is concerned, but as I read the constitution of Canada I see no obligation whatever upon the government of Canada to pay for any bridges except on three different scores, if bridges are interprovincial, if they are international or if they are, for some peculiar reason, required for primarily national purposes.

There are three national purposes which might be involved with respect to the Marpole bridge. In the first place, if the federal authority does acquire the airport at Vancouver, which I certainly hope comes to pass because I believe the offer now made is a fair one, then it seems to me only common sense that the government of Canada will require access to their airport because it is no good unless you have access to it and access away from it. Just before coming here for this session I made a speech at the air force base on Sea island and my audience literally galloped out on me at about a quarter to five because they wanted to get to the Marpole bridge to beat the traffic. Otherwise they would be held up for about two hours. There, of course, is a very practical reason why we need a proper bridge to get to one of the most vital airports in the whole Dominion of Canada.

The second consideration about which I would remind the committee is of course the question of navigation in its relation to traffic. Just the other day we heard the Minister of Public Works tell how fairly the government has dealt with the province of Ontario with respect to the bridge over the canal at Burlington, Ontario. I am not saying this is the case, but if the same considerations apply in respect of traffic over the Fraser river as apply in respect of traffic over the canal at Burlington, namely, that it is an advantageous thing to build a certain type of bridge in order to facilitate navigation, a federal responsibility, then it seems to me that the federal authority would be prepared to give sympathetic consideration to any hard and concrete proposition that is made. I may have a bit more to say if a hard and concrete proposition is ever placed before the federal authority, but all I want to say now is that I am delighted with the assurances we have received this afternoon from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Public Works that when the federal government have something real to go on they will give it proper consideration.

Mr. Green: Before we drop this subject I should like to have the minister make perfectly clear exactly what the position of the government is to be on this bridge. On April 9, as found at page 3940 of Hansard, he said:

> We have, to date, told the government of British Columbia that there is no federal government responsibility with respect to the bridge, and that we cannot participate in the cost.

Today there has been some change in the attitude of the government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has admitted that he at least made a commitment several years ago, and the Minister of Public Works has said he will have another look at the question. That does not go very far. I should like to know exactly what the government stand is to be. Is the government now prepared to participate in the cost of a bridge over the north arm of the Fraser river and, if so, under what conditions and to what extent?

Mr. Winters: My position is exactly the same as it was. As we have just heard, a bridge of this type is not normally a federal government responsibility. It was for that reason we told the government of British Columbia that under normal circumstances this was not our responsibility and we did not see that we could participate. Then hon. members brought to my attention the fact that certain of my colleagues were alleged to have made commitments with respect to the bridge. My hon. friend heard today the extent to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce said he had told the government of British Columbia the federal government was prepared to participate. In the light of that, only this week I told the minister of public works of British Columbia that I was quite prepared to review the whole case having regard to all these considerations. I was thinking in terms of a low level bridge. He apparently is thinking in terms of a high level bridge.

As other hon. members have said here today, I want to see his clear-cut proposals. I should like to know something about the extent to which the city is prepared to participate. The minister from British Columbia told me this week he was not able to inform me of the extent to which the city would share. He had no agreement with them. There are details to be worked out, and I am not in a position to tell the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, much as I should like to oblige him, specifically on what basis and to what extent the federal government is prepared to participate. That is a matter that must be studied fully in the light of the facts that are still to be placed before us.

Mr. Green: Can we take it from the minister's statement that the dominion government is prepared to participate in the construction of the new bridge?

Mr. Winters: I must have the facts before I can give any such assurance.

Mr. Green: The minister is not making any commitment whatever today that the government will participate in the construction of the new bridge?

Mr. Winters: I am making no commitment beyond an undertaking to restudy this whole matter. While I say that, I have in mind the position taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce today, and hon. members may be assured that will not be overlooked.

Mr. Jones: I should like to deal with the item for a public building in Vernon, B.C. I was rather surprised to see that the amount had been dropped from $100,000 to $25,000 and so far as I am aware no reason has been given to the city of Vernon, the board of trade or any of the interested parties. I was rather surprised because it indicates a change of policy on the part of the new minister.

The history of this public building goes back four or five years. Some years ago a new site was acquired by the government for this building and about three years ago the government informed the city of Vernon that plans were started for this building. It was hoped tenders would be called that fall. Two years ago the present Minister of Fisheries was in Vernon, was taken over the site, and definitely promised on his return he would see that something was done to speed up this work. A previous minister, Mr. Mayhew, also promised the same thing to the city of Vernon.

The previous minister of public works made a definite promise that this building had a high priority and would be started and completed last year, 1953. I have a whole file of letters if the minister wishes to see them to corroborate what I am saying. The last one is dated February 4, 1953. The assistant district architect for the Department of Public Works in Vancouver told the city of Vernon that it was the federal government's intention to commence construction of the new post office in Vernon immediately. The city wrote saying they were naturally very pleased and were looking forward to the completion of the public building before the year was out.

The Minister of Fisheries stated, after inspecting the site of the new federal building and thoroughly examining the plans, the present inadequate post office and the plans for its use as a city hall, that upon his return to Ottawa he would take up the matter with the Minister of Public Works in an effort to have construction expedited. That was January 20, 1952. I have a letter from—

Mr. Winters: I think I can save considerable time for the committee if the hon. member will let me state what the position is. We propose to construct a building in Vernon. We are waiting now for certain other departments of government to decide whether or not they wish space in that building. We expect those decisions will be finalized later this year and we aim at having the plans ready next year.

Mr. Jones: I thank the minister for his reply, but I had the same reply nearly two years ago. A form was sent around to each department asking what space they required in the new building, and it was a question of having those forms completed about a year and a half ago.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I do not really see that this is getting us anywhere. I just told the hon. member what the position is. It seems to me the practice is growing of quoting everybody except the minister responsible for the department. I have told the hon. member what the position is. I hope he will take my word for that.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to give the minister a change by conveying to him the appreciation of my constituents at the announcement that a new post office is to be built in Nanaimo. I should like also to question him as to the policy of his department in releasing such news. At Easter, before I left for my constituency, the minister was kind enough to send me a letter informing me the department was not going to build a breakwater at Cowichan bay. This sad news I had to convey to my constituents. The first thing that confronted me when I landed in Nanaimo was a report in the local paper that the president of the local Liberal association announced that a contract had been let for a new post office in Nanaimo.

I am given to understand that the Minister of Public Works is not responsible for such disclosures but it is the work, shall we say, of one of his colleagues who is delegated to take a paternal interest in the province from which he comes. I should like to say this is really a very bad policy. I am quite sure the minister does not need any information from me to know just what little pile of hay I made out of that particular situation at the three meetings I addressed at Nanaimo during the Easter recess.

Mr. Hahn: I wish to convey my appreciation to the minister and to his department for the proposed erection of a new post office in the town of Cloverdale. I understand tenders have been called for the demolition of the city hall building in the city of New Westminster. So far as we can gather, this is supposed to be the site of a new federal building in the city of New Westminster. I have just a few pertinent questions with reference to both the Cloverdale area and New Westminster. What branches of the various departments are going to be housed in the particular buildings, and can any information be given as to the size of the proposed building in New Westminster? Is it contemplated that it shall be erected later this year?

Mr. Winters: As the hon. member said, we have called for tenders for the demolition of the present buildings on the site acquired.

We are in the process now of preparing plans for a building to house the post office, customs, unemployment insurance commission and soldier settlement, as well as perhaps some other departments of government. We have not assembled all the information, and the plans are only now in the state of preparation by the department.

Mr. Hahn: What is it intended to house in the Cloverdale federal building?

Mr. Winters: So far as I can determine, from information at hand, that building is for postal purposes. The contract was awarded to the Allan and Viner Construction Company, in the amount of $135,290.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—
375. Yukon and Northwest Territories, $670,000.

Mr. Simmons: When does the minister expect work will be completed on the new federal building in Whitehorse, and when will it be ready for occupancy?

Mr. Knowles: See the president of your local Liberal association.

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member for Yukon outsmarts the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on one or two occasions he should not take it too badly. As of March—and that is the latest figure I have—the building at Whitehorse was 85 per cent completed. It should be finished this fall.

Mr. Simmons: What provision has been made for water and sewer services?

Mr. Winters: For water there will be a well; for sewage there will be septic tanks until the water system in Whitehorse is completed.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—
376. Unforeseen improvements, $1,200,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: Does this item include any specific amounts, or is it in the nature of a reserve fund to cover emergency situations?

Mr. Winters: It is to cover items now unforeseen, and is in the nature of a reserve fund.

Mr. Nesbitt: I would draw to the minister's attention the post office building at Woodstock, Ontario. A few years ago some satisfactory alterations were made to this building, which had the effect of improving the facilities offered. However the entrance and exit leave much to be desired. To get into the building one has to climb two or three steps, and immediately he is confronted with an extremely heavy door. Indeed, the door is so heavy that small children and older people have difficulty opening it. On several occasions I have had to open it for older people because they have been unable to pull it back.

After getting through the original difficulty presented by the door one reaches a very dark vestibule having a stone floor. During the winter months, and with the winter conditions we have in southern Ontario, a great deal of ice and snow accumulates with the result that the floor becomes slippery. Last winter I believe one lady broke her hip after sliding and falling on that floor. After crossing the vestibule, if one is fortunate enough to do so without accident, he reaches a small step leading to two swinging doors, only one of which opens inward. I believe both open out. This irregularity is the cause of many bumped noses. To get out one must pass back through either of these two swinging doors and down a step. From the stone step one reaches the vestibule which, as I have said, in winter time is covered with ice and snow and is often slippery. It was at this point that the accident occurred. From the vestibule one passes to the outside.

I would also refer to the mail box placed outside for the posting of letters. Naturally one would expect that a mail box outside a post office, to receive letters and parcels after mailing hours, would be at street level. But we find nothing of the kind in this instance. In this particular post office the box is about floor level above the street. A set of steps has been erected outside the post office so people may reach this slot on the side of the building. These steps were built a few years ago, and have crumbled away to a great extent. They are so narrow, particularly when they are covered with ice and snow in the winter months, that they would accommodate only the feet of a small child. They are exceedingly dangerous; so much so that numerous complaints have been made and people have stated they refuse to go up the steps. The result is that an old fashioned red box has been placed outside to facilitate people wishing to post letters and parcels after hours. However this box is around at the side of the building, and most people do not know it is there.

I bring these matters to the attention of the minister because, while they are small, they are very important to the people who use the post office every day. And, in addition, during the winter months the condition found there could become exceedingly dangerous and hazardous, and already has occasioned one accident. I would recommend that the situation be corrected, and I bring it to the minister's attention.

Mr. Winters: Thank you.

Mr. Green: This would appear to be a sort of safety valve for the department. As the minister has said it is a reserve. I notice the amount is $1,200,000, the same as last year.

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Green: However, as indicated at page 448 of the estimates book, the estimated expenditures for 1953-54 are set at $900,000, and the actual expenditures in 1952-53 were $936,015. With a new broom in the Department of Public Works—a nice, new minister and a nice, new deputy—it seems that with all these nice, new heads, and with the promise that we are to have a far more efficient Department of Public Works than we had before, this would have been a good place to begin making a change. If he needed this amount at all, why could he not cut the figure to $1 million. That would have been a saving of at least $200,000, and every $200,000 helps.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is not aware of how many items were cut out of the estimates.

Mr. Green: That may be so; but here is another that could have been cut—and I hope it will be cut next year. Would the minister explain why this item is necessary at this time, when we have new and efficient management in the department?

Mr. Winters: Thank you.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary to have this big reserve? I can understand it might have been necessary in the old days when the Department of Public Works was run as a patronage department; but why should these reserves be necessary now? What I say applies not only to item 376 which covers unforeseen improvements but also to item 402, which sets aside another $400,000 for this purpose:

To supplement, on approval of treasury board except where less than $1,000 is required, any of the appropriations of the Department of Public Works.

Obviously that is just another amount held in reserve. And, then, item 403—

Mr. Winters: That is under the engineering branch.

Mr. Green: Item 403 is as follows:

To provide for balances required to complete any projects undertaken in previous fiscal years and for which no specific provision is made in the fiscal year 1954-55, $400,000.

It seems to me that an efficient department could plan with sufficient care that it would not be necessary to have large reserves of this kind set aside every year in the estimates. I would ask the minister to comment on this situation.

Then I would ask the minister to explain to the committee the responsibility of his department with regard to buildings beyond Canada. When the estimates were first under consideration we raised the argument that, as its name implies, the Department of Public Works should be the department of government responsible for public works in Canada. In recent years this country has been spending more and more money on buildings abroad. For example, we have—

The Chairman: Order. I must draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that we are discussing item 376, and I am afraid a discussion of public buildings outside Canada does not come within it.

Mr. Green: This item is a building item for unforeseen improvements.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: If I may finish—

The Chairman: Order. May I point out to the hon. member the terms of the resolution? The resolution reads:

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates.

In other words, the discussion under this item is limited to projects which are listed in the details.

Mr. Green: My understanding of this vote of $1,200,000 is that it is not restricted to the buildings that are outlined in the details, but it is a reserve to cover any other buildings that may be necessary. The minister can correct me if I am wrong.

The Chairman: That is not the way in which the resolution reads, but perhaps the minister can help us on that point.

Mr. Green: In fact, the minister has already said that such is the case; that this is a reserve of money that may be required to be expended on any buildings. Obviously there would be no point in confining it to the buildings that are actually mentioned because amounts are set out for these particular buildings.

Mr. McIvor: In Canada?

Mr. Green: No, buildings anywhere; if it happens to be a building outside Canada then it would come under that vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winters: Yes, I should be glad to comment on that, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member's observation was a perfectly valid one. I stated in the house and elsewhere that it is not our intention to put in the estimates amounts of money that we are not likely to spend during the year in question. It is true that last year we did not spend $1,200,000, although that amount was voted.

Mr. Green: You did not spend that.

Mr. Winters: No, I said we did not spend it. This year the officials were able to convince me that we are likely to require $1,200,000. I can assure my hon. friend that if I find we are not spending all of this vote, it will be cut down next year. It is not our intention to ask for votes that we will not be able to spend.

As to the responsibility of the Department of Public Works for buildings abroad, so far the department has had no responsibility for those buildings. At the present time we are engaged in discussions with the Department of External Affairs and it may be that we shall assume some responsibility.

Mr. Green: I think that point is of great importance, Mr. Chairman, because as I said earlier more and more money is being spent on buildings abroad.

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Green: There is to be a new building at The Hague, a new building in Rome and either a new building or an expansion of a building in Paris. A building is being completed in Washington which last year was supposed to cost $1 million, and we are now told it is going to cost $2 million. I hold in my hand a dispatch of April 26 of this year headed: "Costly Canadian military headquarters biggest foreign army job in Washington." A swank building is being erected by the Canadian government at a cost of $2 million. The article says:

> It is a $2 million stone and steel structure complete with bronze door automatic elevators and a big bomb shelter.
> Resting on 900 concrete pegs, each driven 40 feet deep into the soft ground of stately tree-lined Massachusetts avenue, the massive structure was started last fall. It is about one-third completed.

The dispatch goes on to say:

> The building will be the largest in Washington designed by a foreign embassy purely for its military components.

Then last October we had the Canadian consul general in New York, Mr. Ray Lawson, getting big ideas about a building for Canada in New York. I am quoting from a dispatch of October 31, 1953:

> Canada House in United States to cost $5 million
> A $5 million Canada House which would serve as New York headquarters for all major Canadian enterprises—business and governmental—is proposed by Ray Lawson, Canadian consul general here.

It is about time that the Department of Public Works stepped into this picture. They are, or should be, the best qualified to decide on the kinds of buildings that are going to be erected all over the world by Canada. I suspect quite a few million dollars could be saved for the taxpayers of this country if the Department of Public Works handled all these buildings rather than let the Department of External Affairs put up these swell buildings for their embassies.

Has government policy been changed at all? Has the Department of Public Works been put in charge of the construction of these buildings? I notice from the annual report of the department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, which we now have, and therefore, can no longer complain about not getting the report, that at page 107 the Department of Public Works gets into the picture of those public buildings beyond Canada only for buying the floor wax and things like that. We have here nothing for buildings beyond Canada for construction, but for repairs and maintenance there is $14,000 odd; rent, $72,000. Apparently the Department of External Affairs lets the Department of Public Works pay rents on the buildings that are rented, but does not let it have anything to do with construction. For salaries and wages the amount is about $500; furniture and fittings, $5,200; fuel, about $1,500; light and power, $6,800; water, $2,000; caretakers' supplies and sundries—this is where the floor wax comes in, I suppose—$12,200; total, $115,400 odd. That is the sum and substance of the contribution of the Department of Public Works to Canadian buildings abroad.

Can the minister assure us that his department is to be given a place in this picture and that it will become the authority which constructs the buildings for Canada abroad?

Mr. Winters: I think I outlined before when the estimates of the department were up earlier in April the general policy regarding the role of the Department of Public Works. I said just a moment ago that we are now engaged in conversations with the Department of External Affairs as to public works' participation in their building programs. What we in the Department of Public Works would like to do is to have the department in that degree of good shape that would make other departments feel we can carry out their construction work to better advantage for them than they can themselves. I would personally hope that would be the case, and it is the goal toward which we are working.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Gagnon: May I be permitted to ask a question on item 368 which was passed a few weeks ago?

Mr. Winters: I do not mind, if there is unanimous consent, so long as it is not a discussion. If it is a question, I do not mind.

Mr. Gagnon: This question has to do with construction of a public building in Chicoutimi?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to revert to item 368?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gagnon: An item of $250,000 was approved by parliament last year for that project but nothing has been done up till now. Would the minister care to comment on the project?

Mr. Winters: The situation there, Mr. Chairman, as I recall it, is that although there was that amount in the estimates last year we found this year when compiling the estimates that we were not ready to go ahead with the building. The plans had not been prepared. At the same time the Postmaster General indicated to me that he would like to study the whole matter of postal services in the area, and until such time as that is done we shall not be able to proceed with the building.

377. Branch administration, $653,824.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am not quite sure whether I should bring up here what I want to deal with or under item 395. Perhaps the minister can help me. I want to deal with the item that was in last year's estimates for the Vesuvius bay and Crofton ferry and which is out this year. I do not know whether I should discuss it here or whether I should wait until we come to item 395. If the minister does not object to my dealing with it under this item, I will do so now.

Mr. Winters: I should be glad to have it dealt with under this item. If my hon. friend would like me to do so, I can tell him quickly what the situation is.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes; if the minister will.

Mr. Winters: Last year in the estimates—I think it was in the supplementary estimates—there was an amount to cover ferry landings at both Crofton and Vesuvius bay to accommodate a ferry which was to be purchased privately, I believe, and operated under a subsidy provided by the provincial government. When I considered these estimates it seemed to me that that was appropriately a matter for the provincial government because the ferry service is really an extension of the highway service of the provincial government. We therefore dropped the item pending further consideration. I have now had an opportunity of considering the projects in detail and also of discussing them with the minister of public works of British Columbia. I believe there are grounds now for considering them as joint projects. I believe the ferry landings can be regarded in the nature of public wharfs with structures built to them to accommodate a ferry. I told the minister of public works of British Columbia that I thought it was a matter with regard to which we could appropriately co-operate to the advantage of the citizens who wished to use the service. With that in mind, I propose to ask treasury board to include in the supplementary estimates amounts for ferry landings both at Crofton and at Vesuvius bay.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Thank you.

Mr. Green: As this is the first item under the engineering branch, can the minister tell us the present position with regard to work on Ripple rock? Some weeks ago we had a report that there had been a core taken of the rock underneath the narrows and up under Ripple rock to see whether or not the water would break into a tunnel if one were constructed. Can the minister tell us whether a report has yet been received on the results?

Mr. Winters: I am sorry that I am not in a position to do so. My hon. friend will recall that when this recent approach to the removal of Ripple rock was brought forward the responsibility was transferred from the Minister of Public Works to the national research council which is under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am aware in a general way of the work that has been done but I assume that my friend will wish to get the details from my colleague. I have not them in my possession.

Mr. Green: If it is decided to bore the tunnel out under the narrows and up so that the rock can be blown up, will that work be done by the research council or by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Winters: I would think it would be done by the Department of Public Works but as yet there has been no determination of that matter.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—

380. Maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works, $3,674,565.

Mr. Robichaud: Under this item I notice an appropriation or estimate of $3,674,565 for maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works for dredging. Out of this total I am pleased to note that a sum of $1,291,552 will be spent for dredging in the maritime provinces.

May I be permitted to describe briefly the situation which exists in my county where the fishing industry is of major importance. The one thousand or more fishermen of Gloucester county land commercially twenty-four different varieties of fish and shellfish. Unfortunately ice conditions from December to May prevent fishing operations during these months, with the exception of smelt fishing which is carried on through the ice. It is therefore most important that these hard-working fishermen be provided with facilities allowing them to take full advantage of the short period of six months where they have to earn a full year's living for themselves and their large families.

Harbours and channels with sufficient depth of water are required to permit those deep-sea fishermen, equipped with modern craft, to reach the fishing grounds and to return to port with their catches. If the fishing industry is to survive it is essential that these fishermen be provided with facilities to navigate freely at all tides, under all kinds of weather conditions at least during the summer months.

The entire Gloucester county deep-sea fishing fleet, including over 50 modern draggers, valued at over $1¾ million, uses the entrance of Shippigan gully between the mainland and Shippigan island, on their way to and returning from the fishing grounds. Day in and day out, at all hours of the day or night, under most favourable weather conditions as well as during heavy gales, storms or fog, these sturdy fishermen have to feel their way through a winding and twisting channel to reach their ultimate destination.

I want to take advantage of this opportunity to impress upon the Minister of Public Works the urgent need for immediate action on this particular project. Unless the dredging of the main channel at the entrance of Shippigan harbour is proceeded with without delay, a proportion of the fishing fleet will be most seriously handicapped during the coming fishing season. A total catch involving approximately 40 million pounds of fish deserves the utmost attention of the department.

This request, Mr. Chairman, also applies to a number of harbours along the Gloucester county coast line. How can we expect those brave fishermen to exploit to the best of their ability the rich resources of the sea if they have to wait for long hours, and sometimes for days, for the tide to rise so as to enable them to refloat their grounded fishing vessels? I would appreciate it, as would my friends the fishermen, if the minister could assure the committee that he will give this request the attention it deserves and would ask his department to recognize its urgency.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Mr. Winters: I shall certainly be glad to give to that request the attention that I am glad to give to all hon. members' requests.

Mr. Green: At page 453 we find the details of this vote. There is an increase in redredging by contract or day labour of $100,000 and there is an increase in repairs and upkeep of equipment of approximately $130,000. Why is it necessary to have these big increases in these items?

Mr. Winters: Redredging by contract or day labour amounting to $675,000 provides for maintenance dredging by companies when the work cannot be carried out by departmental plant due to the fact that departmental dredges are unable to perform all of the dredging operations; in other cases, when redredging is needed in areas some distance from the department's dredging fleet and includes particular cases where annual redredging is required. It also covers small day labour redredging jobs by scraper, bulldozer, drag lines, hand dredging and so on. The reason for the increase here is that the amount voted last year was not enough to cover the work we were required to do. We ran short of funds. This year we want to make sure we have enough.

Mr. Green: How much was spent last year?

Mr. Winters: I have not that figure before me. I am told the amount was fully encumbered but we have not been able to spend the amount of money we expected would be required to be spent during the year.

Mr. Green: Why is it going to cost $120,000 more to repair equipment this year than it did last year?

Mr. Winters: These are increases for the maintenance of new plants to be put into operation in 1954-55, $33,000.

Mr. Green: But that is capital expenditure and surely would not come under the heading of repair?

Mr. Winters: It is for the maintenance of new plants being put into operation. The second item deals with the replacement of boilers for dredge No. 9 and tug Fredericton, $60,000; replacement of five pontoons for dredge No. 21, $38,600; replacement of pontoons for dredge No. 305, $20,000, which makes a total of $151,600 less decreases in other plants which amount to $19,757 leaving a net increase of $131,843.

Mr. Green: Can the minister explain which department does this dredging? I believe this is another case where work has been taken away from the Department of Public Works and is being done by other departments. For example, a great deal of dredging is being done by the Department of Transport. Can the minister explain why it is necessary to have any department, other than his own department, do dredging work in Canada, and to what extent other departments are doing dredging work, and what the basis is for this division? It does seem to me it would be more efficient if the Department of Public Works could handle this type of work.

Mr. Winters: I might say at the outset that the work is all done by the Department of Public Works with the exception of the St. Lawrence ship channel and the canals such as the Rideau canal, the Lachine canal and others which are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: But why cannot your department dredge the Rideau canal?

Mr. Winters: There is no reason why we cannot do this. It is just a division of responsibility and I would not care to comment on whether it is more efficient.

Mr. Green: Is there any real reason why this dredging cannot be done by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Winters: It is simply that the ship channels and canals come under their jurisdiction and I suppose it has been a matter of practice for them to carry out the work.

Mr. Green: But the Fraser river carries a great deal of shipping.

Mr. Winters: I know.

Mr. Green: And the dredging there is done by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Winters: I would not wish to argue the merits of this with my hon. friend. It is a matter of practice.

Mr. Green: Does the minister really feel that this dredging should be done by his own department?

Mr. Winters: I would not wish to comment on that.

Item agreed to.

Roads and bridges—
384. Maintenance and operation, $423,449.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, this item concerns the Burlington channel bridge and there is an item in the details concerning that bridge amounting to $85,920 concerning maintenance and operation. Which bridge does that cover?

Mr. Winters: That is the highway bascule bridge.

Mr. Lennard: Has there been any progress made in connection with the proposed new bridge over the last few weeks?

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I can best answer that by reading a letter which I dispatched to the minister of highways for the province of Ontario on April 5, 1954. That is the last communication I have on the matter. I had a brief discussion with the minister of highways, Mr. Doucett, one day last week though it added nothing to the matter and was merely a passing conversation. This is the letter:

Dear Mr. Doucett:

This is with reference to your letter dated February 15, 1954, in which you requested federal financial participation in the building of a high level four-lane vehicular bridge over the Burlington canal.

Although engineering plans have not yet been submitted to us, and, as a result, there is no detailed estimate of costs, we understand that your preliminary estimate of that part of the bridge toward which you feel the federal government might participate is $13,300,000. This, of course, is subject to change when the detailed plans are available, but I understand you feel it may nevertheless be regarded as a good preliminary estimate.

This whole matter has received careful consideration by this department and by the government. I believe it is generally recognized that the problem is primarily one of facilitating the flow of highway traffic which has increased substantially in the past few years and which is likely to grow further in the future. If we were mutually concerned only with local vehicular traffic, then a much less expensive bridge than the one you are now contemplating would be satisfactory. In fact, the double bascule bridge built and operated by the federal government would serve the purpose.

However, the federal government is appreciative of your desire to provide facilities for an increased flow of vehicular traffic, and since part of the cost at any rate is due to the requirements of navigation which make a high level bridge necessary, the federal government feels there is some justification for its financial participation.

Having regard to the fact that this problem is primarily one of handling highway traffic within the province, it follows that it falls within the scope of provincial jurisdiction. However, because of the factors mentioned above, the federal government has authorized me to inform you that it is prepared to contribute up to one-third of the cost of a high level bridge.

I understand from our previous conversation that your government will assume full responsibility for highway traffic over the canal and that once the high level bridge is completed it will no longer be necessary for the federal government to maintain and operate the bascule bridge which we would then remove. At the same time, as a matter of convenience to pedestrian traffic, we propose to add to the present railway bridge a sidewalk or sidewalks to enable pedestrians to pass from one side of the canal to the other.

You may wish to inform me if the foregoing terms on which the federal government is prepared to participate are satisfactory to you.

(Signed) Robert H. Winters

Mr. Lennard: You have not received anything from the provincial government since?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Lennard: Well, I think it is about time you did because, as the hon. member for Niagara Falls pointed out a few days ago, this is the biggest bottleneck in Canada and possibly the biggest on the North American continent. I do not believe there should be any great delay in starting this bridge because at the present time there is considerable delay every time a pleasure cruiser wishes to go from the lake to Hamilton harbour. Traffic is held up and it is a very great nuisance. If the provincial government is at fault then I think it is about time they started doing something about this situation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this item mentions the Burlington channel bridge, the Kingston, LaSalle causeway and the New Westminster bridge. Can the minister tell us the basis on which the dominion accepts responsibility for the Kingston, LaSalle causeway and the New Westminster bridge?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of that. This matter has not risen before and I have not had an opportunity of looking into the background or the basis on which we are participants. I am therefore not in a position to say. However, if my hon. friend would like me to look into the matter and discuss it with him I would be glad to do so.

Mr. Green: I shall be grateful if the minister will do that.

Item carried.

Roads and bridges—

385. Towards international bridge over the St. Croix river between St. Stephen, New Brunswick, and Calais, Maine, the state of Maine to pay a like amount, $125,000.

Mr. Brooks: Can the minister tell us when he expects this work on the international bridge to be completed?

Mr. Winters: That is thinking in the future. We have not even arrived at a final decision with the state of Maine as to its start, let alone its completion. But we are making progress. We have seen preliminary designs of the bridge. We have agreed now that it should be a two-lane bridge. There was quite a responsible body of opinion locally which felt it should be a four-lane bridge. We explored the matter with the United States authorities to find out whether or not they were interested in a four-lane bridge and would participate in the cost of it, but we concluded that faster action would result if we stuck to a two-lane bridge. Plans are now in the process of being prepared. I hope they will be ready before too long.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Brooks: I think the minister should press for a four-lane bridge and not give up too easily.

Mr. Winters: We were quite prepared to press. As a matter of fact, we did press, but when there is a partnership it takes more than the pressure of one partner to bring about a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. Brooks: That is true in more cases than bridges.

Item agreed to.

Roads and bridges—

386. Towards construction of spans of bridge over the interprovincial channel of the Ottawa river between Pembroke, Ontario, and Allumette island, Quebec, $200,000.

Mr. Green: This is a contribution towards a bridge to be built across the Ottawa river?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the basis on which the dominion accepts responsibility for helping to build that bridge, and also the division of cost?

Mr. Winters: Yes, I would be very glad to do that. The basis on which we accept some responsibility is that it is an interprovincial river. It is the Ottawa river and any bridge crossing it would reach from the province of Ontario to the province of Quebec. Under the British North America Act the federal government has some responsibility for interprovincial bridges where such bridges are required to be built. As to the sharing of the cost, that is still a matter for decision. We have had discussions with the appropriate officials of Ontario and Quebec. We are prepared to be quite flexible and have already said that we would participate on two bases of costs which were submitted by the other partners.

One of them was that there should be a straight split of one-third. We said we would agree to that. One of the other partners suggested that Quebec do a portion of the work, Ontario do a portion of the work and we do the balance of the work, roughly the centre section. We said we were prepared to agree if that was the basis on which it was finally to be worked out. The three partners have not yet come to a final decision whether the bridge should be built or on what basis the costs of the structure should be shared. I am hopeful that we will reach agreement. I feel that the other two partners are interested in getting on with the job. It was only this week that I exchanged letters with the premier of Quebec on this important matter in the hope that we can come to some early decision.

Mr. Green: What is the estimated cost of the bridge?

Mr. Winters: I think it is of the order of $1,200,000 or $1,300,000.

Mr. Green: Is it a high level bridge?

Mr. Winters: No, it is not a high level bridge.

Mr. Brooks: The minister stated that the responsibility of the federal government was defined under the British North America Act. My understanding, for which my authority is the former premier of New Brunswick, Mr. McNair, is that the federal government is responsible for the whole cost of building interprovincial bridges. I brought the matter up here a few years ago. I asked for an opinion from the Department of Justice but I never received one. It was in connection with the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge between New Brunswick and Quebec. I also understand that the provincial governments of New Brunswick and Quebec still feel that the responsibility is that of the federal government and that it is set out in the British North America Act along those lines. I wonder whether the minister has any comments to make on that or whether he is definitely of the opinion that the responsibility of each government is limited to one-third?

Mr. Winters: No, I have no strong views on the subject. I think these are matters which require negotiation. It is all right to say that a certain bridge should be a federal responsibility but if that does not produce a bridge it does not do anybody any good.

Mr. Brooks: Is the matter clearly defined in the British North America Act?

Mr. Winters: I am no expert on the British North America Act. I understand there is some federal responsibility where a bridge is international or interprovincial. I understand too that there is also the question of how much of an interprovincial bridge is actually interprovincial because up to the boundary it is within one province and on the other side of the boundary it is within the other province. It is a very difficult problem and I do not profess to be able to offer a solution to it.

Mr. Brooks: Just another argument for a federal-provincial conference.

Mr. Winters: An argument for federal-provincial co-operation.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—

388. Nova Scotia, $4,923,000.

Mr. Gillis: There is a question I want to ask the minister. The details of this item are on page 460 and there is an amount for dredging for Sydney, Nova Scotia. I am wondering whether that is dredging of the harbour or a sandbar outside the harbour. The amount that the federal government is spending is $37,000 and I am wondering who is paying the rest and just what kind of dredging project it is.

Mr. Winters: This $37,000 is 50 per cent of the estimated cost of the dredging. The Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation will pay the other 50 per cent of the cost. The dredging of berthing areas is necessary to provide sufficient depth for large ocean-going cargo boats chartered by the Dominion Iron and Steel corporation and the Dominion Coal Company for import and export shipments of steel, coal and iron ore. The proposed work is: (a) dredging berth west side of coal loading pier No. 2; (b) dredging berths east and west side coal loading pier No. 3; (c) dredging berths east and west side steel loading pier No. 1; and (d) dredging berths east and west side ore loading pier No. 2. The above dredging involves the removal of 48,000 cubic yards, scow measurement, of sand, silt, clay and gravel.

Mr. Gillis: Is the work to be done by the department's dredging apparatus or by a private firm?

Mr. Winters: The work is to be done by contract.

Mr. Gillis: By your own dredges?

Mr. Winters: No, we will invite tenders and let a contract. That is the intention.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to make a general comment on these items. Looking at the general items for the engineering branch, it is obvious that there is a great saving in this particular work. In 1953-54 $34,612,500 was spent, and the amount for 1954-55 is $25,820,600, a saving of $8,791,900. We are always very pleased indeed to note savings of this kind, but it does seem rather peculiar that last year there was an expenditure of over $8 million more than it is intended to spend this year. I mention this because, speaking particularly of my own province—and I know that the same conditions prevail in other provinces—we are in a recession. The provincial government of New Brunswick is endeavouring to find provincial works in order to relieve the unemployment situation there. When I was home at Easter I met people practically at every turn wanting to know what the provincial government was going to do on this road, that road and the other road in order to give employment to the people.

Now, as I said a moment ago, it is an anomalous situation that the federal government, when there is a recession in this country and when there are over half a million people unemployed, should reduce the amount of the expenditure for public works of this kind in which employment could be given. I am going to be blunt about it. In the election year there was some $34 million expended when the employment situation was not nearly as bad as it is today, when there is a decrease of over $9 million.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, this is something that requires some explanation from the government. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Gloucester mention his constituency a few minutes ago. We know what the situation has been in Gloucester county because the former member for Gloucester was a strong advocate of public works in his constituency.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He was not better than this one.

Mr. Brooks: I am not making any invidious comparison, I am only stating the facts.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid the time has come when I must interrupt the hon. member on the ground that a discussion as to whether or not the policies of the Department of Public Works should be directed towards relieving unemployment was, I think, properly held under the general administration item. We are now dealing with specific items which deal with specific dredging in various places. I am not trying to curtail discussion any more than is absolutely necessary for the efficient carrying out of the business of the committee.

I am going to ask hon. members now that we have passed the general item to try to confine their discussions to the items that we have before us. I know that the initial items on this dredging were called rather quickly and perhaps the hon. member who now has the floor did not have an opportunity to get up on the original dredging item. I am going to say at this stage that it is my opinion that a general debate on the question of whether or not public works should be used as a means of relieving unemployment is not in order on the item now before us.

Mr. Brooks: I have to bow, of course, to your ruling. I still cannot help noticing the great difference there is in the amount voted in this item this year as compared to last year. I do not believe it is out of place to comment on the necessity for this work this year as compared with last year. Take my own province, for instance, and we find that in 1953-54 under item 390 there was $2,880,000 voted for work that year, whereas this year the amount is $1,334,500, a difference of $1,545,000.

[Mr. Brooks.]

While I am not going to discuss the matter any farther, I am sure it is obvious to every member in this house, and it is certainly obvious to the people concerned, that there is an anomalous situation. Take Prince Edward Island, for instance. We find under item 389 the vote this year is $847,800, whereas last year it was $1,930,000, a difference of $1,082,200 for that small province. I do feel that the house and the country are entitled to some explanation as to why there is such a large difference in the vote this year as compared with last year.

Mr. Winters: I should be very glad to say a few words. I am always interested in the way my hon. friend sees political significance in everything we do.

Mr. Brooks: It is so obvious.

Mr. Winters: He looks for a political reason behind every bush. I often have to disappoint him. This is not the first time I have had to disappoint him this year by asserting that there is no political significance in the point he has raised. I hate to have to do it again, but that is the fact. I must say that my friend is one of those who, in an election campaign, speak most vigorously about the high level of government spending, but the moment it drops he says, "Let it drop somewhere else, but not here."

Mr. Brooks: You have never heard me say that.

Mr. Winters: I read some of your reported speeches last year. Of the total amount voted, which my hon. friend says correctly was $34,612,500, the total amount spent was about $21·5 million. Now, as I told my hon. friend before, it is our policy to try to include in the estimates only the amounts we expect to be able to spend. If we can spend this $25,820,000 it will actually represent an increase rather than a decrease. I hope that will help to allay the haunting fears of my good friend.

Mr. Brooks: I hope it will give some employment.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—
389. Prince Edward Island, $847,800.

Mr. MacLean: I have a question or two to ask on this item. I notice in connection with the vote for harbour investigation and development at Rustico, last year the amount was $100,000 and there is an indication in the note that of the $150,000 in the estimates this year $90,000 is a revote. I take it that only $10,000 was actually spent out of the $100,000 voted last year?

Mr. Winters: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacLean: I trust the minister will be able to assure us that this year the course of events will be different and a real attempt will be made to carry on this project so that the $150,000 will be spent for improvements.

Mr. Winters: That is our aim, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacLean: I have one other question. Can the minister indicate whether any request has reached him with regard to a wharf at Point Prim for use of the rather large number of fishermen who fish from that point? I did not see any item in the estimates, and I was wondering if it might be covered in the supplementaries?

Mr. Winters: The item was requested, and I know it has been requested several times by the junior member for Queens, but we were not in a position to go forward with it because we had not completed our investigations and have not been able to do any planning.

Mr. Matheson: I wonder whether the minister could give the details of that $150,000 expenditure at Rustico?

Mr. Winters: This amount of $150,000 includes a $90,000 revote, and is required to continue the investigation for the development of the harbour and to provide funds for actual construction as indicated by the investigation to be necessary. An amount of $36,000 is included in this item for the construction of a boat shelter now under contract with Messrs. Noye, Raynor and Noye. Improvement and development of Rustico harbour in the interests of the fishing industry is an immediate necessity.

A survey of the tides, currents and sea bed movements in the area was carried out in 1953 by the Nova Scotia technical science service under the direction of Dr. S. J. Mazur at a cost of about $20,000. Rustico harbour is one of the most important fishing stations in the province, activity being carried on continuously from the opening of the lobster season, May 1, up to the close of cod and mackerel season in the late fall. The proposed work, as I indicated, is for a boat shelter, now under contract, and the building of a dam to shut off Little harbour at the east end of Robinson's island; and possible further surveys, as well as to carry out any other recommended improvements based on the findings of the investigations carried out in the past two years.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—

390. New Brunswick, $1,334,500.

Mr. Robichaud: I see an item of $17,500 for a wharf at Little Pokemouche gully. Can the minister tell us when the department intends to call tenders for this project?

Mr. Winters: We are still awaiting the results of borings for that project.

Mr. Bell: I have a few questions to ask about breakwaters in the bay of Fundy, Saint John county. I believe I have already indicated to the minister the concern of the people of Lorneville about their breakwater. It is spring in that area now, and work has not yet begun. They are wondering what the plans are for the breakwater at Lorneville.

Mr. Winters: I have asked the department to engage the services of a consulting engineer to carry out an inspection and make a report. For this purpose we have retained Mr. O. J. McCulloch, who is a consultant in the marine field. I understand he has visited the breakwater but I have not yet received his report.

Mr. Bell: I would remind the minister that the breakwater in its present condition is of no use to the fishermen down there. They have been very patient about the matter and would like to see some action taken this spring.

Mr. Winters: That is why I thought I should get a report on it.

Mr. Bell: I would also inquire about the situation at Dipper Harbour. I am given to understand—and I have seen for myself—that the old retaining wall, which has been used partly as a breakwater, is now giving way. The residents indicate that a few dollars spent now would serve the purpose, but that if it is left until a later time it would require the expenditure of a large amount of money. Is there any report on this breakwater?

Mr. Winters: I have no report before me, but I shall consider my hon. friend's comments.

Mr. Bell: I wish the minister would do so, because promises were made two or three years ago that something would be done, and a small expenditure now would probably save considerable expense in the future.

Then, what is the plan for Maces Bay, for which there is an amount this year?

Mr. Winters: We expect to have the plans ready for the breakwater extension at Maces Bay within the next few days.

Mr. Bell: Then, I would ask about dredging at Courtenay bay in Saint John harbour. I am bringing the matter up at this time, because amounts have been spent for this purpose in other years. There is a story around Saint John that the new oil tankers cannot enter Courtenay bay because dredging has been slowed up. What are the intentions for the future at that point?

Mr. Winters: At the request of the Irving Oil Company, and certain other citizens in Saint John, including my hon. friend's predecessor in the house, we have been studying the situation. We have not yet made any final decision, and we have no funds in the estimates for work at Courtenay bay.

Mr. Bell: I would ask the minister to keep in mind the fact that we have always had these oil companies located at Saint John, but that recently moves have been made to Halifax to accommodate part of their facility. We do not know for sure if it is the policy of the companies or merely because the facilities at Saint John are not extensive enough to provide proper docking and harbour facilities to service a modern tanker fleet. I hope we will not lose out in this connection merely because of a few dollars in the estimates.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—
392. Ontario, $6,573,400.

Mr. Noseworthy: This item refers to the work of the engineering branch in Ontario. I would ask the minister whether his department has any administrative control over or any interest in the water level of lake Nipissing. I have before me correspondence from individuals and recommendations from chambers of commerce and city councils regarding the low level of water in that lake. Has this matter been discussed, and what can be done?

Mr. Winters: There is a control dam at the outlet of the French river into lake Nipissing, which is owned by the Department of Public Works; and we exercise control over the level of water. A deputation was received recently from North Bay in connection with this problem and we are keeping active supervision of control measures. We receive water levels reports twice daily, and are endeavouring to see that the situation is controlled to the best advantage.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, in the riding of Bruce there is a shore line of about 150 miles. There can be no doubt that on many occasions the requirements along the shore line could become a headache for the Department of Public Works. However, I would ask the minister for some information concerning the proposed construction of a dock at Tobermory. I understand that in years gone by there was an estimate for part of this work. This year it is dropped completely. I would point out that there are many people in that locality who depend on fishing for a livelihood. Then, I am sure the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is familiar with the area, and will know about the beautiful scenery in that part of Ontario.

To complete the work some 900 feet would have to be constructed. My suggestion is that, when the minister's department reaches the point of building the dock, it should not be done piecemeal. I ask the minister not to do it piecemeal. When you take into consideration the amount of money that will be spent, it will be more economical to do it all at once. Eleven fishing boats worked out of the harbour of Tobermory and last year they sold $212,448 worth of fish. I am sure the minister is familiar with marine slips, and if he will visit that area he will agree with what I am saying. Can the minister tell us whether at the present time they have plans in view for future construction?

Mr. Winters: I understand my hon. friend is talking about the proposed dock at Tobermory. There was an item of $50,000 in the estimates last year. We have not been able to decide upon a proper site because of differences of opinion locally, nor have we obtained the water lot, but we do hope to be able to proceed with the project there. It is still in the planning stage, and that is all I can tell my hon. friend at this time.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Once more I would ask the minister not to consider doing it piecemeal, but all at once. Is the department contemplating doing any permanent work at Southampton in connection with the river mouth? It is a bone of contention every year, and it costs a lot of money for dredging.

Mr. Winters: In the details of the estimates there is an item on page 466 which reads: "Saugeen river (Southampton)—reconstruction of pier." The amount is $110,000.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): In connection with that, I understand a deputation will be coming down to have an interview with the minister which I am sure they will obtain. Their suggestions will be worth taking into consideration in regard to permanently improving the river mouth. It may entail some co-operation between the municipality and the province, I do not know; but I would suggest that it be looked into from that view to make something permanent.

Mr. Enfield: I should like to take a brief moment to express my pleasure at knowing that the sum of $1,768,000 has been provided for work in Toronto harbour. We cannot underestimate the value of Toronto harbour. It now serves a metropolitan area containing nearly 1½ million people, and is simply packed with industry. We can expect, I suppose, greater activity there when the St. Lawrence development is completed. There is one problem, however, that we see in Toronto harbour. It is not a natural harbour in the true sense of the word, in that the basin keeps filling with silt that is taken off the lake at various points and dropped by the current when it reaches Toronto harbour. One of the unfortunate circumstances of the problem is the fact that the silt is taken off Scarborough bluffs, which are in my riding, and deposited in Toronto harbour. It is then dredged out of the harbour and taken to the lake front and used as filling for good land which they sell at a profit. Therefore they are really selling Scarborough land at a profit, which goes to the city of Toronto. That is putting it very facetiously. However, the problem is very serious for Scarborough in that the bluffs are crumbling away and housing of course along the bluffs finds itself in a very precarious position. There is no note here, and therefore I do not know what the plans are for the spending of $1,768,000. I note that $800,000 is a revote from last year. Have any representations been made to the minister regarding the problem of the Scarborough bluffs? Will any of this money be earmarked for research or remedial action in that regard? Some talk has been heard of building groynes, for example, out in the lake from the bluffs, which may or may not be a good thing. If the minister has information there on the expenditure of the money generally I would appreciate it very much if he could give us a word on it.

Mr. Small: Since my riding of Danforth is adjacent to York-Scarborough, similar conditions exist on its shore line. Erosion is taking place from the currents of water going both east and west under certain adverse weather conditions. May we have the details of how the money is to be allotted?

Mr. Winters: The amount of $1,768,000 is broken down as follows:

(a) To complete the contract with Sir Robert McAlpine and Sons (Canada) Limited for construction of harbour headwall	$1,266,000
(b) Towards dredging adjacent to harbour headwall	400,000
(c) Reconstruction of outer end of east pier	82,000
(d) Repairs to east pier (circulating channel)	20,000
Total	$1,768,000

As to Scarborough bluffs, except for what the hon. member has told me, we have had no deputations or any requests for any action there. I understand it is the general problem of erosion in areas of the great lakes.

Mr. Small: Erosion is caused by the current, as pointed out by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, and it has been taking place for a good number of years. About twenty years ago they did take care of the south end of the riding toward the westerly part. It was suffering from the same kind of erosion at that time, and they did a fairly good job. But at the east end of the riding and also in York-Scarborough, which includes the Scarborough bluffs, there is a serious problem that will have to be attended to. Only a limited amount of money will be available. The money that the minister has reference to goes to harbour improvements within the Toronto bay proper. It has to do with channels leading to the bay and so forth. This condition is outside of the bay altogether. No provision has been made this year for taking care of the erosion on lake Ontario. Is it possible to get an appropriation for that?

Mr. Winters: This problem of erosion comes up every year, and every year the government states its position. The general policy is that unless the erosion is attributable to navigation, or is likely to endanger navigation, or is caused by some federal government structure, then it is not a federal government responsibility.

Mr. Small: I realize that. The last time assistance was given, I believe, on a joint proposition between the province, the municipality and the federal authorities, and it was done through the hon. member for Danforth at that time. Probably the same arrangement could be made at this time.

Mr. Winters: I presume that was one of those unemployment relief measures in the early 1930's.

Mr. Small: If we have the same condition now it would apply again.

Mr. MacInnis: The erosion or the unemployment relief measure?

Mr. Small: What I am anxious about is something to take care of the erosion condition that exists, and if it cannot be done this year I should like to have something earmarked for this problem next year.

Mr. Pallett: Can the minister tell me what work he expects to have completed on the Port Credit harbour this year? In the estimates $400,000 is earmarked for that work. I wonder just what it entails.

Mr. Winters: I have read some of my hon. friend's advertisements in his election campaign. I presume it is related to them. It is a revote.

Mr. Knowles: The minister sees politics behind every bush.

Mr. Winters: I did not see it first. It is a revote of $400,000 to provide towards harbour improvements to give deep-water facilities to serve the growing industrial area between Toronto and Hamilton. This is a breakdown of it. The entire proposal includes the construction of a breakwater, several wharves, a slip and approach, and dredging to give deep draught harbourage.

Mr. Stanton: In the details there is a revote of $20,000 for Blockhouse island at Brockville. Can the minister give me information as to what the department has in mind with regard to the work at Blockhouse island?

Mr. Winters: The proposed work is demolition of the existing cribwork structure down to low-water level; the building up of the east bank of the island with stone fill; the laying of an 18-inch concrete mat over this fill; the construction of a masonry wall with a one to one slope up to elevation 248·3; the laying of a 10-inch pavement slab.

Mr. Pallett: The original question I asked the minister was as to the work which it was expected would be completed this year. I may have misunderstood the minister but I do not quite feel the answer was given to that question. I refer to Port Credit harbour.

Mr. Winters: We expect to start with one wharf this year.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—
393. Manitoba, $103,000.

Mr. Knowles: This includes a revote for the extension of Alexander avenue wharf at Winnipeg. As the minister knows, the government has agreed to this extension which was requested by the Winnipeg and St. Boniface board of harbour commissioners. Can he tell us what progress is being made and how soon it is expected that the work will be completed?

Mr. Winters: The proposed work is the construction of a round timber pile bent extension 147 feet long by 42 feet wide on the downstream end of the existing Alexander wharf. I understand there is some hold-up with regard to the property and that we have not been able to acquire it. The matter is now before the Department of Justice.

Mr. Knowles: I have one other question under the general heading of work in the province of Manitoba. I ask this question because of the discussion a moment ago in which the two members from the Toronto area took part. I refer to the discussion as to federal responsibility or denial of responsibility where there is erosion.

As the minister probably knows, a few years ago when his predecessor was minister of public works, some work was finally done at the town of Gimli on the west shore of lake Manitoba. Erosion was taking place there to a considerable extent and it was having an extremely serious effect on the town of Gimli. It was finally admitted by the government that navigation had something to do with it and some valuable work was done. A substantial wall has been built from the centre to the south end of the town. I know that the minister feels that, when something has been done, we in the opposition always say that the government should have done a little bit more. I hope the fact that I seem to be speaking in this vein will not be held against the validity of the claim of the people in that area.

The fact is that the people who have property just south of where that wall was built feel that the further erosion that is taking place with respect to their property is in part due to the currents that are set up by that wall. I know that the minister might say that if the wall were extended a little bit further, those still further south would have a claim. I know something of the geography of that area. I think it is clear that there is a further point to which that wall could be built beyond which it would not be necessary to go further. I hope that the request these people are making for an extension of that wall will be given favourable consideration.

Mr. Winters: I shall be glad to look into that matter.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—
395. British Columbia and Yukon, $4,998,500.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks under this item. I do not rise by any means in a complaining spirit. I am going to try to make some constructive suggestions, and comments. I know the department is preparing to undertake a good deal of necessary construction and a number of necessary repairs to wharves and structures of that type in my constituency. I want to say that those communities which will be affected by those new structures or by those improvements appreciate greatly the works proposed by the department.

Before passing on I should like to bring to the minister's attention the fact—and I think I am correct in my statement—that I represent a riding that has the highest per capita wealth production in Canada. I think that statement will be found to be correct, if you take the total production of Kootenay West and relate it to the population. This means an extremely large income tax collection from the area. Hence there is great justification for the investment of government funds in public works and facilities of that sort.

I want to bring to the minister's attention the necessity for the reconstruction of a wharf at Robson. I am not expecting that it will be undertaken this year, but I have been asked by the West Kootenay and central farmers' institute, various fruit growers' organizations and the Castlegar chamber of commerce and local residents to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the old wharf at East Robson is getting extremely shaky. It has been there for a good many years. In fact, it is so shaky now that when the bus goes down to meet the steamer or when the fruit trucks go down to take fruit away from a barge or boat the drivers are told to proceed only part way down because it is not safe to go down the full length. It is certainly not safe for heavy loads at the present time. It is an important wharf because it is the one at East Robson which is at the south end of the Arrow lakes and there is a great deal of tonnage that goes over that wharf throughout the year. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and his officials in the hope that consideration will be given to the necessity for the reconstruction of this wharf in the near future. I am of the opinion that when the question of reconstruction comes up it will possibly be to the advantage of the public generally to slightly alter the site and possibly construct a somewhat different type of wharf. That is all I am going to say about that. As a matter of fact, the minister knows I ask for very little. I am one of those who bother him very little indeed.

But I want to mention a very important matter in relation to the Duncan river. For some years the department tried to move a large log jam on the Duncan river, as it flows from Howser lake into the north arm of Kootenay lake, but without much success. This meant it was impossible to float booms of logs down the river and impossible for small craft to proceed up river. But finally the department decided to make a new channel after going over the whole question very thoroughly with one of the minister's engineers who came from New Westminster to discuss and plan what should be done to remedy the situation and the work was finally got under way. I wish to compliment those men who have undertaken the building of that new channel from Howser lake to north Kootenay lake. I believe the cost has been on the average some $4,000 or $5,000 per year. It has been of great convenience to the lumber companies in that area and for small craft proceeding up the river to Howser lake.

However, I wish to make one suggestion relating to this new channel on the Duncan river. In 1896 there was a race between Jim Hill of the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. in regard to the building of a railway into the Lardeau. The C.P.R. got through first, though the railway has since disappeared. However, Jim Hill's engineers built a trestle across Howser lake towards Howser. The grade was built, trestles erected, but the entire project was abandoned when the C.P.R. won the race. Over the years logs and brush, the stumps of trees and debris have floated down from the north Duncan river into Howser lake. That debris has piled up against the piles driven across the south end of Howser lake and there is now a considerable quantity of sand lying against these piles so that the level of Howser lake is being artificially raised more and more each year. That sand has piled up and is causing inconvenience to lumber operators and the few residents living around the lake. I have looked over the whole jam myself with some of the local residents. The current is strong at this point and I would suggest that half a dozen cases of dynamite could be used to blow a hole in this sandbank created by debris accumulated around the pile that would open up a narrow channel but the natural erosion would clear away the rest. I bring this to the minister's attention because I believe that this work could be done with the expenditure of very little money and be a great improvement.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, there is one item in this vote on which I would like to question the minister and that is in relation to the fishing harbour at Vancouver. I notice that in the estimates it is referred to as a "fishing harbour". I know it by the more modest name of a wharf. This project has been under request for some considerable time, but I understand there has been difficulty in obtaining control of the property on which to build a wharf. I would like to know what progress has been made during last year. I understand a site has to be bought from the Indian reservation. I would like the minister to tell us what progress has been made in getting this wharf or harbour completed.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, we have acquired the property on which to build this wharf but as yet we have reached no agreement with the harbour commission as to its management. When that is completed we will be able to proceed with the work for which this money is voted.

Mr. MacInnis: Have the plans for the construction of the wharf been completed, and what will be the total cost? Is the total cost included in this estimate? While the minister is dealing with that point he might give us an estimate of when the work might be finished. There is great demand for this harbour on the part of fishermen and fishing vessel owners who come into Vancouver.

Mr. Winters: The estimated total cost of the fishing harbour is broken down as follows: purchase of land, $90,000; access road, $10,000; dredging, $355,000; bulkhead, shed, roads, parking area, services, platforms, wharf, etc., $355,500; floats, mooring piles and gangways, $103,750, or a total cost of $914,250. The plans have been prepared and we will be ready to go ahead as soon as the matter of management can be worked out satisfactorily.

Mr. Green: On that point the minister said the total cost would be about $914,000.

Mr. Winters: The total estimated cost, yes.

Mr. Green: I take it that includes the $100,000 vote made last year?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Green: And the vote for this year of $365,000?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Green: So it is quite apparent that the wharf will not be completed this year?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Green: When does the minister expect it will be finished?

Mr. Winters: It is difficult to say. We have not yet got the management agreement worked out but as soon as that is arranged we will be ready to get on with the job. I believe if we get on with it reasonably early this year we can complete it in the next fiscal year.

Mr. Green: Then the minister believes it will be completed some time in 1955?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. Green: I put that question because I have here a publication called "Soundings" which is issued by the fishing vessel owners association of British Columbia. The issue for August, 1953, carries the heading "Complete in '54" and the subheading "Funds Assured for Wharf." The article reads:

> Vancouver's new fisherman's wharf, to be constructed on the south shore of False creek, will be completed and in operation by the fall of 1954.
> This is the post-election assurance given by Fisheries Minister James Sinclair.
> He said that the additional $625,000 required to complete the development, definitely will be appropriated at the next session of parliament.

Apparently that statement by the minister is incorrect?

Mr. Winters: I have not spoken to the minister and I do not know under what condition he made that statement. Of course, that is merely a report of what he said. The circumstances are as I have outlined them here today.

Mr. Green: The actual fact is that the wharf cannot be completed until 1955?

Mr. Winters: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question regarding dredging in the Fraser river. Earlier this week in a private discussion with him I drew to his attention the problem now being encountered in the Ladner channel in permitting boats in and out of that particular region. At that time I did not have the facts available to substantiate what I was then telling the minister, but I have now obtained the facts and figures from the board of trade of that town and it appears that something like $735,000 worth of shipping passes through. There are four marine gas stations also located there. It is very difficult for a boat to get in and out of the port in order to load and unload its wares. I wonder whether the minister is prepared at this time to state whether they intend to carry on the dredging operations before the spring shipping pressure hits the port?

Mr. Winters: I take it my hon. friend is speaking of Ladner. No, I am not prepared to state that. I have not the final report.

Mr. Patterson: I have been watching for a place to make inquiries about a certain matter and it would seem to me that it would come under this particular section. It has to do with rock work on West Nicomen island. I have just received a telegram today and perhaps the best thing I could do would be to read it. It reads as follows:

> Letter last year from Minister of Public Works advised that a request for rock work on West Nicomen Island cost to be shared equally by federal and provincial and Nicomen district would be favourably received. This March request made district agreed to raise one-third of cost and the provincial government also agreed to one-third. No reply has been received from federal public works. Due to urgency and the fact that work must be completed before river rises operations have been started but will have to be shut down if immediate reply not received from dominion public works. Could you contact the minister and impress the importance of a reply being sent in answer to wire to him from provincial diking commission also from deputy minister of lands?

Mr. Winters: Would the hon. member say who signed the wire?

Mr. Patterson: J. A. Worth, secretary of the West Nicomen ratepayers association at Deroche.

Mr. Winters: What is the date of it?

Mr. Patterson: April 29. I was wondering whether this project was included in the estimates or whether any action is being taken on the matter.

Mr. Winters: It is not included in the estimates. We are still studying it.

Mr. Patterson: In view of the urgency of the matter, will the minister be able to give a reply in the very near future?

Mr. Winters: We will reply very soon.

Mr. Green: There is included in this vote an item of $1,080,000 for dredging the first narrows in Vancouver harbour, and that includes a revote of $750,000 which was the total amount of the vote for the preceding fiscal year. I know that considerable work has been done there during the last fiscal year. How was that paid for if it is all to be revoted now, and what progress is being made?

Mr. Winters: The position is that a contract has been awarded to the B.C. Bridge and Dredge Company Limited and Northwestern Dredge Company Limited in the amount of $1,042,800. The date of completion for the dredging is set at August 7, 1955.

Mr. Green: Has anything been paid yet for the work?

Mr. Winters: I am told now that the indication that the whole amount is a revote is in error, and that something has been paid for the work that has been done.

Mr. Green: I wondered about that. It was also suggested that there should be a model of the whole harbour set up for the purpose of studying further changes in the first narrows. I should like to know whether or not that has been done and, if so, what progress has been made and when steps will be taken to do this additional work over and above the actual dredging of the first narrows which is now under way.

Mr. Winters: I am told that the project is under the same committee which is studying Ripple rock and which reports through the national research council to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us what progress has been made?

Mr. Winters: No, I cannot.

Mr. Barnett: I find myself somewhat in the same position as I imagine a good many members do, that I am tempted to discuss some of the things that are not included in these estimates more than the ones which are. However, I do not propose to yield to that temptation except to draw to the attention of the minister another instance in which it would appear to me at least that it is a case of the left hand not knowing what the right hand is doing. I wish to refer to the West Coast Advocate, which is published in the city of Port Alberni. The issue of April 15 contains the following:

Also addressing the meeting—

Incidentally, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Arthur Laing, leader of the Liberal party in British Columbia.

—was . . . Irving Wilson, candidate in the 1953 federal contest. Mr. Wilson reviewed his recent trip to eastern Canada, and assured the meeting of the federal government's intentions on such local matters as the Alberni boat basin, west coast fishermen's floats . . .

The thing that struck me as being a bit strange was that at about the same time Mr. Wilson was solemnly assuring the people of the Alberni valley that the project on Kitsucksus creek, which is known as the Alberni boat basin, was going to be proceeded with. I received a letter which the minister may recall informed me that it had been decided not to proceed with that particular project. I thought the minister might be interested in knowing about that situation because it is a project in which the people of the city of Alberni particularly are quite interested.

Naturally they were rather disturbed at having been informed on the one hand by someone that the project was going to go ahead—at least, I understand so from the reports that were given to me—and on the other hand being regretfully informed by me, when I discussed the matter with the president and secretary of the board of trade, of the information I had from the minister. It did not create a particularly good situation.

However, there are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister about items that are included in this vote. The details are on page 468. There is one item, partly new and partly a revote, in connection with the project at French creek. The item reads, "Qualicum beach (French creek)—improvements". The people of that area are very much interested in that project. When I visited it while I was at home during the recess I was pleased to note that some considerable work had been done in the construction of the breakwaters since I had last seen it. However, as I understand the situation, the portion of the work which is included in this year's vote has not been completed and I would be very interested if the minister would give me details as to what further work is contemplated on that project.

Mr. Winters: In reply to my hon. friend's first statement about Alberni, the reason we have not been able to go ahead with the fishermen's floats is a dispute as to the adjoining property. That is the reason there was the change in contemplated action. I know my hon. friend will understand that things like that are bound to occur. The intention was to proceed, and had it not been for this dispute we would have done so.

At French creek, which is shown as Qualicum beach, the proposed improvements include enlarging the boat basin, extending the floats, constructing a diversion dam and rock breakwater. The construction of the breakwater is under contract with Ed Welsh and Company Limited at $32,130.

Mr. Barnett: From the description the minister has just given me, I take it that there is no provision for any deepening of the channel entrance leading into the basin itself. One of the reasons I asked that question is that I happened to see it for the first time at extreme low water on a recent visit.

Mr. Winters: There is no provision here for that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Barnett: No provision for that? I should like to point out to the minister that before that project can be considered to be completed, in my opinion that is a necessary consideration. It does mean that a low water access to the basin is not available.

Mr. Winters: I shall certainly bear that in mind. I am glad to have these comments.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—

396. Repairs and upkeep for the maintenance of services, including reconstruction and replacements, and to authorize commitments against future years in the total amount of $420,000, no new works to be undertaken, $3,535,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item, and in particular why it is necessary to have a vote of this size? In 1953-54 there was only $2,830,000 expended and in the previous year $2,502,000 approximately, and yet we have a vote this year of $3,535,000.

Mr. Winters: As my hon. friend knows, this is the amount for repairs and upkeep of harbours and rivers generally, including reconstruction and replacement, but does not provide for any new work. Although it is estimated that the actual expenditure this year will be $2,830,000, the authorization under the vote included considerably more moneys than that. In fact, so far the funds for the last fiscal year authorized were $3,133,667.26. This is an estimate and the same remarks that I made earlier will apply here. If it is found we do not need this much money, we will certainly not carry it next year. It is one of those votes with respect to which I shall have to learn by experience.

Mr. Green: Can the minister explain the purpose of this vote?

Mr. Winters: It is largely to provide for storm damage, which has been quite considerable in the fall of the year around my own part of the country, and I know that any seacoast is exposed to the same hazards.

Item agreed to.

Trans-Canada highway division—

397. Administration, operation and maintenance, $487,484.

Mr. Hodgson: I understand that this item is for administration and covers the salaries of your own department for trans-Canada?

Mr. Winters: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Hodgson: Has the minister ever thought of paying anything towards the maintenance of the highway after it is built? I know that is not contained in the agreement with the provinces, but something has to be done to encourage them to build more of these roads if we are going to complete the project in the seven-year period. Would the department consider something along that line?

Mr. Winters: My hon. friend knows I am limited by the provisions of the act. The act does not provide for maintenance but only for participation in the cost of construction, and I cannot go beyond that. I might add that when the provinces entered into the agreement to construct the highway by December 9, 1956, they did so knowing full well it provided only for the cost of construction and not for maintenance.

Mr. Hodgson: That was more or less a sort of horsetrading deal that was initiated. Probably you are a better horse trader than some of the provinces, so you got the best of the deal. I think you have to do something to encourage the provinces to build more of this road or else take over the maintenance.

Mr. Winters: My friend is getting into a field that presents great difficulties. I am sure he knows there is still one province in Canada that has not signed the agreement because of stated fears of the invasion of a field of provincial jurisdiction. Maintenance of highways is a field that the provinces have always regarded as their own, and it would bring up a whole new series of problems which I believe are beyond the scope of anything that was contemplated when this act was being considered and finally approved.

Mr. Hodgson: Since the minister has mentioned that one province, is there any hope of getting that last province to sign the agreement within any reasonable time?

Mr. Winters: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that we are available.

Mr. Churchill: In the details shown on page 470, there is an amount of $13,380 for film displays, broadcasting, advertising and other informational material other than publications; is that in connection with the trans-Canada highway and what purpose is served by that?

Mr. Winters: In the film board, we undertook some time ago to present a picture of Canada generally and at that time we used the vehicle of the royal visit, which was rather successful. I believe it was the most successful picture we ever made in the film board to interpret Canada to Canadians in a broad sense. We discussed another vehicle to try to develop that same sense of showing Canada as a whole to Canadians, and it occurred to us that the trans-Canada highway might be an appropriate means. We undertook, with the national film board, to share the costs of a film based upon the trans-Canada highway, but really designed for the purpose of showing Canada to Canadians in a manner that might appeal to them. That is the reason for that vote.

Mr. Hodgson: I see that item is down $10,000 this year. Does that mean you are not going to take another picture this year?

Mr. Winters: No, it is the same film.

Mr. Green: The last time these estimates were under discussion the minister indicated the highway would not be completed in time. Can he tell us when it will be possible to drive over the highway rather than when it will be all hard-surfaced and properly completed? I understand that at the present time there is a gap, I do not know of just how many miles. When is it expected a person will be able to drive over the highway?

Mr. Winters: There are two gaps that have not yet been constructed to a point where a vehicle can drive over them. One covers a distance of about 180 miles in Ontario and the other covers some 80 miles in Newfoundland. When these gaps will be closed is a matter for the provincial governments. We have been urging them, as I said before, but they have their own highway programs and their own highway problems. They are in the best position to judge how much of their total highway effort should be devoted to trans-Canada.

I said at that time the provinces did undertake by agreement to build their part of the highway by December 9, 1956. Now, it remains to be seen whether that is going to be achieved. We hope it will. I have written to all the provincial governments on several occasions—the last time was in December of last year—reminding them that the authority given to the government under the Trans-Canada Highway Act extends only to December 1956, and that we have no authority beyond that date.

Mr. Green: Has the minister any idea of when these two gaps are to be closed?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Green: I suppose it will be some years earlier than completion of the system?

Mr. Winters: I cannot add to what I have said. The agreements provide for a termination date, and the provinces undertook to complete the highway by that date. I recognize the problems just as they do; but I do express the hope that they will be able to complete the highway on time. Some of the provinces will. The minister of highways of Alberta was in to see me this morning and indicated that he thought Alberta would finish on time. I believe Saskatchewan will, too; and there are others as well. Whether or not they all will is a matter for their own decision.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister be showing the gaps in the film of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Yuill: Is there anything to come up in the near future by way of plans for a Yellowhead route?

Mr. Winters: The Yellowhead route is not part of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Yuill: I believe it is designed as such.

Mr. Winters: But it is not designated as such, and that is the determining factor. The hon. member may have his own opinions in the matter, but the fact of the matter is that the Yellowhead route has not been designated by the provinces concerned as the trans-Canada highway. That was their responsibility, and they chose another route.

Mr. Yuill: And it was a very unhappy choice; I would like to say that. Would the government and the minister take kindly to considering the feasibility and possibility of building, as the most important part of the trans-Canada highway, the Yellowhead route, both from the point of view of economy and of service to the people. I realize, of course, that the Minister of National Defence placed no importance on this phase of the matter from a military standpoint, but I suggest it is worthy of consideration. I would ask if, after the Big Bend highway is completed, the government would take kindly to building the Yellowhead route.

Mr. Winters: I cannot add anything to what I have said. The hon. member is talking about something for the future. The problem at hand is to complete the present trans-Canada highway; and that is the only authority that has been given by parliament. We are in the hands of parliament in these matters.

Mr. Knight: The minister has answered in part as to the rate of progress made by the various provinces. I take it from what he has said that Alberta and Saskatchewan are reasonably well ahead of the others?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Knight: Then, which of the provinces are not so far ahead?

Mr. Winters: What is it my hon. friend wants?

Mr. Knight: I should like to have the comparative rate of progress in the building of the trans-Canada highway in the various provinces. In other words, I should like to know about the nearness of completion of the program. The mileage completed would be a good criterion.

Mr. Winters: It is easy to answer in the case of Quebec, because they have not started. With respect to Nova Scotia, to date two contracts have been awarded for bridges, but no work has been done on highway construction. I have here figures showing the number of miles approved and the number of miles completed. I shall have before me in a moment the total mileage in each province, and give the hon. member the information he wants.

In Newfoundland the total mileage of highways is 610 miles. There have been contracts of one kind or another approved for 236 miles, and the equivalent mileage completed is 139 miles. In Prince Edward Island the total mileage is 74; miles approved, 43·88; equivalent mileage completed 38·58. For Nova Scotia, as I said, contracts have been let for two bridges, and the total mileage to be completed is 310. Those two bridges are in Pictou county.

Mr. Gillis: No work has been done on the highway.

Mr. Winters: No. Then, in New Brunswick the total mileage is 388; miles approved, 45·60; equivalent mileage completed 45·60. In other words, they have completed the only part of the road for which contracts were awarded. In Ontario the total mileage is 1,412. Contracts have been approved for 374·40 miles, and the equivalent mileage completed is 309. In Manitoba the mileage is 305; miles approved, 127·40; equivalent mileage completed, 114·90. In Saskatchewan the mileage is 414; mileage approved, 292·40; equivalent mileage completed, 270. In Alberta the mileage is 292; mileage approved, 196·41; equivalent mileage completed, 196·41. In Banff and Yoho parks, which are the responsibility of the federal government, the total mileage is 83. We have approved work on 14·80 miles, and considerably more will be done this year. The equivalent mileage completed is 12·20. In British Columbia the total mileage is 692. Assuming that they will follow the route of the Big Bend, the mileage approved is 150·29; the equivalent mileage completed is 124·76.

Mr. Hansell: I wonder if we might call it six o'clock because I have several questions to ask.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing item 397. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Holowach: I would appreciate learning one or two things on this item, from the minister. I am sure that many hon. members, particularly those from British Columbia and Alberta, are concerned with certain problems that have arisen in connection with the construction of the trans-Canada highway in their portions of Canada. With respect to the Big Bend route of the trans-Canada highway, can the minister give us some clarification as to what in his opinion is the proper solution of the problem created by the proposed construction of the Mica creek dam, which, I understand, will affect the area for about 126 miles from north to south and flood a portion of the highway construction? In view of the federal government's participation in the financing of the road, as well as the concern of the people of western Canada that there be no misconstruction, or waste of public funds, can the minister tell us whether any alternative route has been suggested? Surely the people of Canada would not want to see a highway built at the bottom of a lake.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the route designated for the trans-Canada highway is along the Big Bend of the Columbia river. That is quite a long route. It is, I think, 195 miles from Revelstoke to Golden; whereas the direct distance is only about 95 miles, some 100 miles shorter. The problem is made more complicated by the location of a very good potential dam site at a place called Mica creek, at the north end of the Big Bend which, if built, would flood out a part of the route of the trans-Canada highway. We have been engaged with the government of British Columbia in trying to find an alternative route. Only last year we explored a pass called Rogers pass, which seems to have quite good possibilities. I am not at all sure the government of British Columbia shares our optimism as to the possibilities of building the road through the Rogers pass. In any event, the matter must soon be resolved one way or the other. We have also assured the government of British Columbia that if a trans-Canada highway were built around the route of the Big Bend and was subsequently flooded out they would be completely indemnified, as we would be, by the interests responsible for the building of the dam. In the meantime, this week, I had a discussion on that point with the minister of highways and public works of British Columbia, the Hon. Mr. Gaglardi, who told me it was his intention to start work this year on that part of the Big Bend which, under present planning, would be part of the trans-Canada but which, if that route were abandoned in favour of some other, would still be a necessary road, and the investment would not be lost as a result. The part of the road he has in mind is north from Revelstoke, and I understand it is his intention to start on it this year.

Mr. Holowach: May I take this opportunity to ask another question of the minister? Has the government considered the advisability of building, in addition to the presently contemplated program of the trans-Canada highway, an additional trans-Canada highway from Winnipeg to Saskatoon, Edmonton, Edson and Jasper via the Yellowhead route to the west coast? In view of the unprecedented industrial development taking place in the central and northern part of Canada, it seems to me that such a road is very necessary. There is also the precarious position in which the north finds itself. From the standpoint of military necessity such a highway is also of primary importance. Further, has the government considered accepting the request of Premier Manning, acting on behalf of western provinces, which was made last spring, to discuss the matter of additional defence highways?

Mr. Winters: The discussion was held, Mr. Chairman, but the federal government took the view that the only commitment we have in mind at the present time relates to the building of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Green: The minister mentioned Rogers pass. I believe that is the pass through which the Canadian Pacific Railway ran originally. When they built the long tunnel at Glacier they abandoned the road through Rogers pass. As I remember it, there was great trouble there with snow slides, and there were some very serious accidents on the railway as a result of those slides. Have the minister's engineers reported that as a favourable route for the highway?

Mr. Winters: The report we have is just based on a walking survey.

Mr. Green: In the summertime?

Mr. Winters: Two of our engineers went through there. It is true it is a heavy snowfall area, and it is true that if the road should be built there would have to be considerable distances of snowsheds and other precautions; but even so, if it were feasible to build it through there the indications are that it would in any event be considerably cheaper than to build the extra 100 miles involved in the Big Bend highway, which in itself presents some very difficult construction problems.

Mr. Green: Could the minister have a check made of the route from Golden south and then through the mountains to the head of Kootenay lake and from there up to Arrowhead and Revelstoke? Some suggestion has been made that that would be an easier way to get across the Selkirk mountains. It might be worth while to have that route checked.

Mr. Winters: The position is of course that the designation of the route is the responsibility of the provincial government; but we would certainly be happy to examine with them any possible route through the mountains between Revelstoke and Golden.

Item agreed to.

398. To provide for surveys and construction of the trans-Canada highway through national parks, $2,000,000.

Mr. Harkness: I presume that the major portion of the $2 million which is to be voted for this year's expenditure will be on the trans-Canada highway through Banff park, with the remainder on the adjoining park in British Columbia. Can the minister tell us how many miles of the trans-Canada highway through the park are still to be completed, and not only through the Banff park but through the other parks which may lie on the route? I think there is only one.

Mr. Winters: There are still 67 miles to be completed, and this vote will be used largely for 12 miles of construction in the Yoho park. We intend to start on the west end of the Yoho park this year and work east.

Mr. Harkness: And it is the construction from Golden eastward by and large that this $2 million is intended for; is that right?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: When is it intended to complete the trans-Canada highway, of which practically none is completed through Banff national park?

Mr. Winters: As my hon. friend knows, we have been doing a considerable amount of work from the east gate into the town of Banff and into Lake Louise. Just when we shall complete that portion of the work in Banff park, I am not prepared to say; but we intend to push on with the construction of the road in both parks, which is our sole responsibility.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask whether it is the intention to have this work completed through the national parks by the time that the agreement which I believe is to end in 1957, is it not, or in 1956—

Mr. Winters: 1956.

Mr. Harkness: —runs out with the provinces for the completion of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Winters: I would hope we would be able to do that. It will be a big task because construction there is difficult. There are still long distances to be built. Subject to our being able to have funds voted by parliament and to overcome physical difficulties in the way of doing it, we hope to be able to complete it on time. But I do not want to minimize the difficulties of doing it.

Mr. Small: On page 470 where details are given of item 398, we find an item of $24,300 required for increases in rates of pay. May I ask the minister for an explanation of that item? The reason why I ask for it is this. Last year there was no provision for the increase. Did these people not get an increase when the rest of the civil servants received one last year?

Mr. Winters: These people are not civil servants.

Mr. Small: Did they not get an increase last year? There is no provision made for them.

Mr. Winters: I am told that this is a matter of the form of bookkeeping; that there was an increase last year but that it is incorporated in the other figures.

Mr. Small: The reason why I asked the question was this. This increased pay is for the number of 86 employees spread over a year. If they did receive an increase last year, it was not very much. It means only about $5 a week. If they were not treated favourably last year, I do not think they have had enough.

Mr. Winters: There was a general increase last year and again this year.

Item agreed to.

Engineering branch—

399. To provide for remedial works where damages are caused by, or endanger, navigation or federal government structures and to complete protection works already under way, $500,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item and give us examples of what projects this money is used for?

Mr. Winters: This money is spent largely on rivers where there is river bank erosion resulting from navigation or which is likely to endanger navigation or which is attributable to some government structure, such as some breakwater or wharf which sets up the kind of currents which contribute towards erosion. There are many examples along the St. Lawrence river where there is erosion resulting from the passage of ships and the wakes they throw up. We have spent a considerable amount of money on them. One good example is that at Longueuil on the south side of the St. Lawrence river east of St. Lambert, I think it is, across from Montreal. A considerable amount of money has been spent there. There are many similar examples where it has been necessary to protect the river banks.

Item agreed to.

General—

401. To provide for advance planning of projects including acquisition of sites, $500,000.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask a question or two on this item. It apparently is to provide for advance planning of projects including acquisition of sites, $500,000. This afternoon the chairman ruled that we could not ask about unemployment. However, I presume it will be quite in order to talk about those who are on an enforced holiday without remuneration. I want to ask the minister this question. Is this item in the estimates with a view to the planning of projects that can utilize the services of persons who are unemployed in the future? Is that the particular purpose of this item?

Mr. Winters: No. It is not the primary purpose of the item.

Mr. Herridge: What projects are being considered? What I mean is this. Is the planning itself to cost $500,000? It must be quite extensive.

Mr. Winters: No. It is not really very extensive at all. As a matter of fact, it is a very small vote for the purpose. As I have indicated previously, we hope that in the future we shall be able to bring items to a sufficient stage of planning that, when we carry an amount in the estimates, we shall be able to get on with the work. Heretofore, in some instances votes have been put in the estimates before sites were acquired and before planning was undertaken. The result was that they had to be voted year after year and I think a good many members became tired of seeing revotes in the estimates with no construction taking place. This is a means for doing something about that matter. We propose to do some planning so that when we put an item in the estimates we shall be able to get on with the work. That is the intention behind it.

Mr. Herridge: We are all for that procedure.

Mr. Green: This vote is to be used for two purposes, apparently?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Green: One is for planning?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Green: For preparing plans?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Green: And the other is for acquiring sites?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Green: How is the amount to be divided between those two objectives?

Mr. Winters: There is no attempt here to divide it between them. It is just to be used as required for the acquisition of sites and for some planning. We have not endeavoured to break it down. It is just a lump sum being carried for the first time. Here again we shall have to gain experience with it.

Mr. Green: Is it intended that the sum will be $500,000 each year?

Mr. Winters: I could not say that.

Mr. Green: Or are there likely to be big increases?

Mr. Winters: I will say this. It will be varied as conditions require, either upward or downward; I do not know which it will be. This is just a rough guess, a method to try to make for a little bit more orderly presentation of the estimates.

Mr. Shaw: Possibly it would be appropriate for me to express at this time the hope that part of this $500,000 may be used to acquire sites and to make plans for those five projects which I brought to the attention of the minister prior to this time, namely the five projects which were approved by parliament last May. I trust that the minister will not overlook the crying necessity for progress with respect to those projects. We trust that we shall learn soon that at least the sites have been acquired for those five projects, including the one in my own home town, and that the preparation of plans is going forward without delay. I have just returned from my home town and I may say to the minister that that is the hope expressed by all of the citizens of that community.

Item agreed to.

General—

402. To supplement, on approval of treasury board except where less than $1,000 is required, any of the appropriations of the Department of Public Works, $400,000.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary to have this item in the estimates in view of the changes being made in the administration of the department? We have just passed a vote of half a million dollars for planning and acquiring sites. The minister has told us that all his estimates have been gone over carefully, that work is to be put on a current basis and that all the estimates he has asked for are to be used for actual construction during the current fiscal year. Yet here we have this old item of $400,000 which is evidently used to supplement any one or more of the other votes which we have already passed. That does not seem to me to be very good planning. If this department is to be run so efficiently, why does it require a lump sum of $400,000 which can be drawn against to increase any or all of the other items being voted for the department?

Mr. Winters: This is not to supplement the votes in the estimates, but to pay overages on contracts that have been awarded and cost more in some cases than the amounts voted for the particular project. It is a vote which is required for completing payments in cases where the amount of the contract exceeds the amount carried in the estimates.

Mr. Green: In other words the figures in the preceding votes are based on estimates for the work done.

Mr. Winters: For the work to be done.

Mr. Green: And this $400,000 is the difference between the estimate and the actual cost in cases in which the cost is higher than the estimate?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Green: That is the reason for the vote?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Item agreed to.

General—

403. To provide for balances required to complete any projects undertaken in previous fiscal years and for which no specific provision is made in the fiscal year 1954-55, $400,000.

Mr. Knowles: Here is another item, Mr. Chairman, which seems to be a vote designed to provide a margin, or what might be called leeway. I notice that in the fiscal year 1952-53 the amount voted was very largely used, and in the year 1953-54 it was estimated that the entire $400,000 would be used. Could the minister give us a few examples of the sort of cases in which this money was used during the fiscal year 1953-54?

Mr. Winters: This is to provide for items which were not in the estimates and which we thought would be finished during the preceding fiscal year but for which completion has been carried over into this fiscal year.

Mr. Knowles: If I may interrupt, is it in the nature of a revote or is it additional money?

Mr. Winters: It is more a revote than additional money. It could be additional money. We thought a project could be completed out of last year's estimates but it carried into this year and we have to get the approval of parliament by this means to pay the amount that is carried over into this fiscal year. I do not know, though, which examples would serve the point my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Knowles: The minister might just pick out the two largest items he sees before him.

Mr. Winters: Here is one; Fogo harbour in Newfoundland, $11,625.55. Here is another for Richelieu river in Quebec for dredging amounting to $13,543.13. There are quite a list of examples here and I could give many more. For example, in British Columbia there are a number of places under $5,000 amounting to a total of $4,422.58. These overrun into the succeeding fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

404. Statue of the late Sir Robert L. Borden, $50,000.

Mr. Knowles: Will $50,000 be the total cost of this statue?

Mr. Winters: I understand it will be the total cost of the statue.

Mr. Knowles: Has it been decided at what spot on parliament hill the statue will be located?

Mr. Winters: It is intended to locate the statue on the west side of the west block. The exact location has not been chosen but we are making soil tests to determine the exact nature of the foundation, though it will be somewhere on the lawn on the west side of the west block. That is the present intention.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if the monument will be of the same type and general appearance as those now standing in the grounds of the parliament buildings?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, a competition has been held and as I recall it three of the principal persons who have entered designs have been asked to submit further designs with a little more, shall I say, traditional background. But the government has not laid down the type. Rather did they leave it to those sculptors who entered the competition to submit preliminary designs, and there is a committee supervising the choice of design at the moment.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I know that ideas may differ once we enter the realm of art and sculpture, but I should like to express the opinion here that it would be a mistake, in view of the fact that we already have a number of statues of rather uniform type around these buildings, to depart from that type. They are all bronze, full length figures on a granite base, and I believe it would be a mistake to depart from that general type of figure in any statue that may now be erected.

Mr. Harris: Without entirely agreeing that the statue will be a replica of those now on parliament hill, may I say that the committee has much the same reaction as my hon. friend and we are thinking along much the same lines.

Item agreed to.

405. Emergency shelter administration (formerly under department of resources and development), $25,000.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I believe this item is the first of three relating to housing, the others being items 406 and 535. I do not propose this evening, Mr. Chairman, to precipitate any general discussion on housing. There have been some sessions since the war when there have been altogether too few opportunities for the discussion of housing policy in general. But this session is not of that nature. I suppose housing has had more ample discussion at this session than in any session during the post-war period. We had an extended discussion of the new National Housing Act on second reading; we had it before the banking and commerce committee for some weeks, where it was submitted to what I believe may be called very intensive study; we had a further discussion at some length in committee of the whole when the bill was reported back to the house for third reading. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no occasion now for any extended debate on housing policy in general.

However, Mr. Chairman, I have a question in regard to this item in particular, which covers an amount of $25,000 for emergency shelter administration. This has been a dwindling item for some years. The amount appropriated last year, I see, was $35,000, but if we have regard to the details on page 473 we will find that in the previous fiscal year expenditure reached a total of $454, and that in the fiscal year just closed there had not been any money spent at all up to December 31. The estimate of the amount required for the remaining three months of the fiscal year was also nil. Therefore I am led to ask why there should be anything in the estimates under this item this year. What need can now remain?

Mr. Winters: The need remains, Mr. Chairman, to keep these properties we still have in good shape and fit as living accommodation. This is not an item on which the taxpayers are required to carry any burden. The operation carries itself, but it is necessary to come to parliament to get a vote each year for the necessary expenditures on capital additions or changes to the accommodation. That is something one cannot predict accurately. We thought $25,000 little enough, but whether that will be spent I do not know. If it requires to be spent in order to keep the accommodation in shape then we shall have to have it.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I believe we are all aware of the relationship of which the minister speaks between appropriations under this item and net cost to the public treasury, but he will have to make out a better case for an appropriation under this item than he has yet made out. Will he tell us exactly how much was spent on this item in the fiscal year ended March 31?

Mr. Winters: We spent no money this year on them, but under the terms of agreement for these projects Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a contingent liability to restore the sites in the event that the projects are vacated. They have been gradually abandoning these areas and in those cases it has been necessary to restore the sites. It is entirely possible there may be some site restoration this year, and in that event this money will be required.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think that is a very satisfactory or convincing case. Not a cent of money was required last year, not a copper! There was $35,000 appropriated by parliament for the purpose indicated by the minister and not one cent was required. Now we are asked to provide $25,000 for a purpose which did not require a cent of expenditure last year. Surely the minister is not seriously going to ask the house to appropriate $25,000 when not a copper was required. This is an item that has been dwindling year by year. The need has shrunk rather than increased, and I suggest there is no reason to expect that anything more is going to be required during this new fiscal year than was actually required during the fiscal year just closed. I suggest to the minister that if he is thinking of some unforeseeable needs he would be well provided if he had $5,000 in his estimates for that purpose. I suggest that to him seriously.

Mr. Winters: I am pleased to have that serious suggestion, but we have projects at Edmonton, Regina, Brantford, Saint John, Sydney, Halifax and Long Branch, and I do not think it would be entirely prudent, with all these tenants, to assume, for example, that just because a water main did not break last year one will not break this year. I am very glad to have the serious suggestion of the hon. member for Eglinton, but I would not want to take the responsibility of having something happen this year that we could not cope with for lack of this amount of money which I am sure my hon. friend will agree is quite a modest sum in relation to the projects we have to handle.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was just about to ask the minister where these emergency shelters were located, but he has answered that. How many people are now housed in emergency shelters across Canada?

Mr. Winters: Approximately 1,000 people.

Item agreed to.

406. To provide for the expenses incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence (formerly under department of resources and development), $700,000.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if he can tell us how much of the money spent last year under this item was spent on schools? I have in mind the schools that are constructed where extra facilities are needed because of the concentration of defence personnel.

Mr. Winters: I would estimate that there has been about $100,000. Schools are about 15 per cent of the total program that Central Mortgage has been supervising, and on that basis there has been about $105,000 spent under this vote on schools.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister anticipate that about the same percentage of this year's vote will be spent in that way?

Mr. Winters: I would think so, about the same percentage.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us where this money will be spent this year, or in what cities or communities these schools will be located?

Mr. Winters: There will be schools at Tufts Cove, Cornwallis, and Shearwater, all in Nova Scotia, at Chatham in New Brunswick, Portage in Manitoba, and Penhold, Wainwright, and Suffield in Alberta.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for giving that list. As he knows, last year or the year before a fairly substantial sum out of this vote came to Winnipeg to assist in the building of a school near Fort Osborne barracks. The amount was a help to us, and I can say that in Winnipeg we appreciate this form of federal aid to education. May there be more.

Mr. Churchill: Is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation responsible for all married quarters, schools, etc., required by the Department of National Defence, or just for those areas for which the department asks assistance?

Mr. Winters: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is responsible for the entire program of married quarters for the armed services. The quarters are built with funds voted through the Department of National Defence for that purpose, and Central Mortgage is responsible for their construction.

Mr. Fleming: An interesting question arises from an examination of the details of this item on page 473. The book of estimates indicates that the amount appropriated last year for this purpose was $700,000, the same amount that the minister is asking us to vote now. On the other hand, the details indicate that the expenditure in the fiscal year just closed exceeded or is likely to exceed $900,000. Was there a supplementary estimate and, if so, how much?

Mr. Winters: There was a supplementary estimate and, speaking from memory, it was $450,000.

Mr. Fleming: That would make a total of appropriations last year on this item of $1,150,000, which compares with an expenditure in the fiscal year 1952-53 of $1,025,000, in round figures. What was the amount actually expended under this item in the fiscal year just closed?

Mr. Winters: I am told that the actual expenditure is very close to the estimate shown here of $902,000.

Mr. Fleming: Then I take it that some curtailment of the program is contemplated in this new fiscal year, for $700,000 is now being sought.

Mr. Winters: This is another matter of budgeting. This is the amount that treasury board thought should be put in the estimates, but I feel that we will again need to request a supplementary amount.

Mr. Fleming: That leads me to ask about the program of construction that is planned for this year and how it compares with the program that was actually carried out last year.

Mr. Winters: The program for this year given to us by the Department of National Defence, as I have it before me now, includes 1,906 units broken down as follows: R.C.A.F., 556; army, 1,318; navy, 18; and defence research board, 14. But I understand the army is now contemplating a further amount of housing which will be in the order of 1,000 additional units.

Mr. Fleming: Where?

Mr. Winters: I do not believe they have broken their program down in detail, at least they have not detailed it to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister before him, for this year's program, information indicating where those quarters are to be constructed?

Mr. Winters: The quarters are to be located in quite a long list of centres, including Tufts Cove—

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps for the sake of saving time the information could go on the record, that is, if the minister does not wish to take the time to read it?

Mr. Winters: I shall have to revise this list I have in my hand, if I do that. Perhaps it would be quicker to read it. There is Tufts Cove; Chatham for radio; Shearwater—

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister the amounts in each case?

Mr. Winters: I have not a complete list of units. The rest of the list is: Mount Uniacke, Chatham station, Valcartier, St. Hubert, Barriefield, Hagersville, Camp Borden— both for the army and the air force; there are two groups at Camp Borden; Petawawa, London, Clinton, Winnipeg, Dundurn, Wainwright, Edmonton, Calgary, Claresholm, Moose Jaw, Penhold, Suffield, Portage, Chilliwack and Rocky Point.

Mr. Fleming: Do I understand the minister has not the amount in each case?

Mr. Winters: Not in each case, no.

Mr. Fleming: Is any program for the construction of schools included this year?

Mr. Winters: Well, I mentioned the points—

Mr. Fleming: I understood the minister referred to the construction of schools in last year's program. I am asking now about this year's program.

Mr. Winters: I was speaking of this year's program.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, thank you. Then, could the minister indicate the current cost of school construction according to the estimates before him, broken down, let us say, by rooms? We approached the problem that way when reviewing the operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on behalf of Defence Construction Limited last year.

Mr. Winters: About $25,000 a room.

Mr. Tustin: I do not know whether the minister gave the information, but if he did I did not hear him. Was there a housing project in the list for Picton, Ontario?

Mr. Winters: No, there is nothing listed for Picton, Ontario.

Mr. Churchill: There is a note in the details on this item that says it is to provide for expenses incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in constructing and supervising construction, etc. Is it not solely for supervising construction?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: This does not cover any portion of the capital costs?

Mr. Winters: That is correct; this is not a portion of the capital cost, it is the supervisory cost.

Mr. Fleming: I have just been handed a copy of the further supplementary estimates that the house voted in the last week of March, 1954. The provision in the further supplementary estimates for this purpose was not $450,000, as mentioned by the minister, but $130,000. Is there some further item besides this?

Mr. Winters: I am told those are the further supplementary estimates. There was another item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Fleming: Is $450,000 the total of both?

Mr. Winters: That is my recollection.

Mr. Churchill: Do the activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in connection with these projects for national defence extend beyond the borders of Canada?

Mr. Winters: No, purely domestic.

Item agreed to.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

535. To provide for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purposes of subsection one of section 45 of the National Housing Act in respect of housing projects for veterans, for the acquisition of land for housing projects, and for housing projects at Gander, Newfoundland, for sale or rental, $1,124,000.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if we could have a statement from the minister on this item? It is true it has been substantially reduced from last year, but it is an item on which there is no detail in the book of estimates. I would ask the minister for an explanatory statement.

Mr. Winters: This item, Mr. Chairman, provides for the construction, conversion and improvement of housing projects for veterans; for the financing of the construction of housing projects at Gander, Newfoundland, and for the purchase of land at Fredericton, New Brunswick. A summary of the 1954-55 program is (1) a carryover from March 31, 1954; (a) completion of veterans' rental project at Fraserview, Vancouver, B.C. and other sites, $200,000; (b) permanent improvement of war workers houses, Vancouver and other sites, $344,000; (c) completion of houses at Gander, Newfoundland, $250,000, making a total carryover of $794,000.

As to new construction for 1954-55, there is (a) sewer and water services for the Gander town site, Newfoundland, $30,000; (b) purchase of land at Fredericton, New Brunswick, for a housing project, $300,000; that makes a total of $330,000 for the new program or an over-all total of $1,124,000. As to Fredericton, I might say that the decision has been made not to locate the living accommodation for the troops of Gagetown camp in Fredericton, so that amount of $300,000 will not be required for that purpose. This decision was taken after these estimates were compiled.

Mr. Fleming: Does that mean the sum of $330,000 should be subtracted from this item? We should not be asked to vote it if the proposal has been abandoned.

Mr. Winters: We have actually spent about $40,000 of it. Central Mortgage did acquire a small amount of land and did some work on the project; the rest of the vote will not be required.

Mr. Fleming: I presume we can eliminate it now, and that we will not be asked to vote money that will not be required. Perhaps the minister could indicate how much he would require for any commitments, and we could reduce the vote by the balance.

Mr. Winters: I have no objection to the reduction of this vote by a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. Harris: I move that the item be reduced by $250,000, Mr. Chairman.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister now if he would indicate how many housing units are involved in the appropriation of $794,000 of a carryover, and in the second place how many units are involved in the project at Gander?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, it would be difficult to say how many units are involved in the carryover; that is just a clean-up vote for a large number of projects across Canada of which the largest is the Fraserview project, which has some 1,200 odd units in it.

Mr. Fleming: That is the complete project?

Mr. Winters: Yes. I understand from the Department of National Defence that their plans, initially at any rate, are to build 1,400 units for the Gagetown camp site.

Mr. Fleming: The minister, I am afraid, has not answered my question. I should like some means of testing the value that the country is to receive from this expenditure of $794,000, the carryover of the various projects mentioned by the minister. I should also like the number of units in the project at Gander. I think he must be in a position to give us more information about the number of units that are to be constructed under the provisions for the carryover, and surely he must be in a position to tell us how many units are involved in the project at Gander.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the first vote, for the completion of the veterans rental project at Fraserview, is to pay the contractor for the completion of the project. Then, in connection with the improvement of war workers houses—there are 344 housing units required to be improved permanently at the rate of $1,000 per unit. Then, with regard to Gander: there are 100 housing units there.

Mr. Fleming: What is to be the cost of the hundred?

Mr. Winters: The total cost is approximately $1,200,000.

Mr. Fleming: About $12,000 per unit at Gander?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: What is the total cost per unit at Fraserview, on an average?

Mr. Winters: I have not that figure.

Mr. Winch: I understand there are 1,200 units in the Fraserview project?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Is the department putting in a central hall for community purposes? If not, is there any truth in the statement that the offices there, on the project, will be given to an association at that point free of charge?

Mr. Winters: The temporary offices of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have been built on land owned by the parks board with the understanding that when the offices are no longer required they will be turned over to the parks board on some arrangement still to be negotiated.

Mr. Winch: There is no plan whereby, in a project such as Fraserview with 1,200 units, the department also makes provision for a community centre?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Winch: Would the department take that into consideration, in a project of this nature involving 1,200 families? That would mean a large influx in a brand new area. Who accepts responsibility for community centres?

Mr. Winters: I would think there would be some responsibility on the tenants themselves to do something to provide for their own recreation. The experience in Central Mortgage in connection with war workers houses by way of providing community centres has not always been the kind of experience that would lead them to go into a community centre on this project.

I know my hon. friend could make out a good case for it. But the fact of the matter is that in this particular project, which I believe is the biggest in Canada of its kind, there is no intention now of building a community centre.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps this matter should have been attended to when the land was being bought and laid out for a residential area. I do not know whether the minister has seen the project—

Mr. Winters: Yes, several times.

Mr. MacInnis: —but, when it started, part of it was in my constituency. I remember there were a number of headaches getting things straightened out; but I believe finally they were straightened out. Some attempt should be made to assist these people in acquiring land nearby, if it is available, for community centres. We have gone into that sort of thing in Vancouver in most residential areas. This is a large and compact one and, as it is new, the quality of the residences is fairly good. But more than that, the population consists almost entirely of young married couples with families. To have no community centre for recreation is a condition that should be remedied now, if it can be.

Mr. Winch: I imagine I might as well speak out plainly now, instead of approaching the matter indirectly. So I shall ask my question in a direct fashion: Let me point out, first, that this project is in part of my old provincial riding. One of the leading Liberals in the area, if not the leading one, who was also at one time a candidate, who lives there and is also a member of the community association, has said that the federal government is going to turn over to the community association free of charge the buildings now occupied by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Is that information correct or incorrect?

Mr. Winters: One of the difficulties is that Central Mortgage does not even own the land on which the buildings are erected. However, as I said, we have an arrangement under which we will work out something with the parks board, when Central Mortgage no longer needs office space.

Mr. Winch: It will be worked out with the parks board, with the community association or with the ex-Liberal-candidate?

Mr. Winters: It will be the parks board.

Mr. Winch: And the community association as such?

Mr. Winters: The parks board is the only body with which we have undertaken to do anything.

Mr. Winch: The point I wish to have cleared up is this, that the defeated candidate, either provincial or federal, is not the representative of the riding, so far as you are concerned?

Mr. Winters: Are you saying that, or asking?

Mr. Winch: I am asking.

Mr. Fleming: I was interested in one remark the minister made when he pointed out that an average of $1,000 per unit is being asked for 344 housing units. Where are they located and how long ago were they constructed? How does it happen that these extensive repairs are required, averaging $1,000 per unit?

Mr. Winters: These are old wartime war workers houses. They had no basements or foundations, and this is an attempt to improve them by putting permanent foundations under them. I am sure my hon. friend has seen this going on all across the country. It is a quite expensive undertaking, but it does improve the houses substantially. It requires new foundations and often new sills. Quite often dry rot has set in. It is the old vintage of wartime housing.

Mr. Fleming: Then it is a great deal more than repairs?

Mr. Winters: I said it amounted to permanent improvements to war workers houses.

Mr. Fleming: I was referring to the minister's last remark when he mentioned 344 units at $1,000 each, and I understood used the word "repair".

Mr. Winters: If I used that word, I used it incorrectly, but I do not recall that I used it.

Mr. Fleming: I understand then that it is really the reconstruction of units that were constructed without cellars.

Mr. Winters: It is what I said—permanent improvements.

Mr. Fleming: I ask as to the kind of contracts under which new units are being constructed at Gander and elsewhere. What type of contract is being used by Central Mortgage?

Mr. Winters: They are all firm bid contracts.

Mr. Fleming: Firm price? No cost-plus involved here, at all?

Mr. Winters: No, in each instance it is a firm price contract.

Mr. Fleming: Were tenders called in every case?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Starr: The minister said that it would cost an average of $1,000 per unit for permanent foundations. It seems to me that with respect to the original wartime housing, where houses were being put up for sale, the allowance made was $600 per unit for the same type of work. Why is the estimate $1,000 per unit now?

Mr. Winters: It depends on the vintage of the houses and the degree of repairs they need when foundations are put under them. I am told that at one time Central Mortgage and Housing made such allowance up to $700, but the amount indicated is an estimate of likely present-day costs.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

302. Departmental administration, $455,547.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote at page 44 of the blue book and the details at page 373.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like the minister to make a statement on this department. He is a new minister and his estimates are coming up for the first time. I should like to hear from him for a minute or two.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Hon. members will note that the amounts shown in the 1953-54 column of the blue book are the amounts provided by parliament in that year for works and services for which the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources continues to be responsible.

The total shown is $21,647,650, of which $325,731 covers appropriations which will not be required in 1954-55. The remaining $21,321,919 may be compared directly with our requirements for 1954-55, which total $22,031,026, or an over-all increase of $709,107, or about 3·4 per cent.

This increase is the net result of a number of increases and decreases. The major decreases are a reduction of $500,000 in the estimated requirements for the spruce budworm program in New Brunswick and a reduction of $550,000 in the provision for the eastern Rockies board capital expenditure program which is now coming to a close.

These decreases are offset by an increase of some $440,000 in the national parks operations vote, and some $587,000 in the national parks construction vote. Further increases of a more minor nature will be noted in various votes, and I will be glad to explain these when the particular votes are reviewed.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Nesbitt: On this opening item of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources there is a matter that I should like to call to the attention of the minister. It has to do with the subject of an island in lake Erie, Ontario. This island is a very interesting place indeed from many points of view. It is approximately 14 miles long and varies in width from approximately 1 mile to 3 miles and averages approximately 1½ miles in width. There are more than 17,000 acres of land on this island. It juts out from the Canadian shore of lake Erie and stretches out toward the middle of lake Erie almost to the international boundary line. The start of the island, which, owing to the filling in of the marshes, makes it in reality a sort of peninsula rather than an island, forms a long bay about 18 miles wide at the mouth and diminishes to only a few hundred yards in width at the narrow end. This particular island to which I refer would probably make a wonderful site for a national park for various reasons, which are as follows:

First of all, this large island is located within 150 miles of probably the most thickly populated part of the Dominion of Canada. It is in southwestern Ontario and is part of the county of Norfolk. If this island were made a national park it would then be available as a playground and a place which could be visited not only by our own people there but by tourists from the United States as well, and we all know that tourist trade from the United States is very valuable indeed. In addition, this island is a veritable paradise for wildlife. I understand there are more snakes on the island per square foot than anywhere else in the world, but none of the snakes are poisonous. There is one particular variety there which I believe is found nowhere else in North America. It is called the "wamper", a large water snake, from six to eight feet long. It is harmless, although it might cause nervous shock or something of that kind if arrived upon unexpectedly.

There are also eagles on this island, and in the waters adjoining the island there is probably the best small-mouth bass fishing in North America. There may be other places which are as good. I say that in deference to other hon. members, but I do not think that any other place is better. In addition to that, this particular island is also one of the very finest duck-shooting places in North America. The reason for that is the large bay that is formed by this island and the mainland of Ontario and the rest of lake Erie. Because of the fact that this island is nothing more or less than a gigantic sandbar, there are a lot of shallow inlets and bays and small islands adjoining the inshore side of this long island or small peninsula. In these little bays the waters are not more than a few inches to a few feet deep, and there are large quantities of wild rice which attract a great many game birds in the fall, wild ducks, geese and so on. The island also has a very large stand of virgin timber, which is a rarity in that part of Canada. And, particularly, some of the hardwoods grow to a great size, which is also unique. Unfortunately the present owners of the island are cutting down this timber and selling it.

Hon. members may very well ask why these things exist, and I shall come to that in a moment. The island also has great historic value. It stretches right out in lake Erie and has often been called the Sable island of the great lakes. More ships have been wrecked around this island than anywhere else in all the great lakes put together. As I have already pointed out, the whole island for that matter is a shifting sandbar. Right off the end of the island is a very deep hole, I believe the deepest spot in lake Erie, which, compared with the other lakes, is not very deep, not more than 200 feet deep. The end of the island has been shifting with the winds and currents and as a result during the last century and indeed in this century there have been a great many wrecks.

For those who were able to land on the island without being chased off by the gamekeeper it has often been a source of great interest to see the wreckage of some of these old ships poking up through the sand. Many books have been written about this place. Possibly a number of hon. members have read some of them. It is also of interest that in the war of 1812 when General Brock set out from Port Dover in some small boats, to capture Detroit—which he did quite successfully—the party rowed around this island, landed at one point on it and camped there all night.

There are many other points of interest. At the present time the eastern tip of the island is still retained, I believe, by the federal government and a large lighthouse station is maintained there, whose light guides vessels safely through lake Erie and away from the highly dangerous end of this island. For those who are unfamiliar with this particular piece of land may I say this. When there is still all this wildlife on this island and it is still in the virgin state, there may be many who are wondering why people are not allowed to go on it. The reason is extremely interesting indeed. In the year 1866, which even for Ontario is a relatively long while ago—I would remind hon. members it was before confederation—a special act of incorporation was passed by the legislature of Upper Canada. This act incorporated a company called the Long Point Company. The original directors were to be John Brown, George Hamilton Gillespie, Thomas Cockburn Kerr, William Little, David Tisdale, Lauchlin McCallum and Samuel DeVoe Woodruff. It is rather interesting to note that these gentlemen I have just mentioned were all Canadians and that they all came from different parts of what is now the province of Ontario. One came from Hamilton, one came from St. Catharines, another from London, another from Simcoe and so on. It is also interesting to note that two months before this act of incorporation was passed, these same gentlemen had purchased from the crown virtually all the lands which make up this island of Long Point. Some small parts of those lands were acquired later by the company, but most of the lands were acquired by these same gentlemen from the crown at that time. Hon. members may be able to draw their own conclusions—that is the only thing they can do since all these people are, of course, long dead and gone—as to why they came from different parts of Ontario when they acquired these lands from the crown. In due course these same gentlemen, being the directors at the time of the incorporation of the company, sold this whole island to the company.

It is interesting to note what the objects and purposes of this company were. Paragraph 3 of the act of incorporation reads as follows:

> The company may carry on the business of pursuing, protecting and granting licences to take game, muskrats, mink, otter, beaver, and fish, upon the said lands and property or in the water covering the same; and generally the doing of such other acts or things with the said land or with any mineral substance or thing, grown, or to be grown, found or being in or upon the same, as may promote the interests of the company,—

Then they very nicely put in this qualification:

> —and not being contrary to the laws of this province, or the terms of the patent from the crown.

Then one of the most interesting items of all is paragraph 4 of this act of incorporation which reads as follows:

> The capital stock of the company shall be the sum of fifty thousand dollars, divided into one hundred shares of five hundred dollars each, . . .

Then it goes on to say that this amount may be increased from time to time. It is interesting to notice that the purchase price paid for all this land by the new company to these same gentlemen who had originally purchased it from the crown was one hundred shares of the company. For those of you who are familiar with the rudiments of corporation law, the implication is obvious. For those who are not, let me say this. The fact remains that while the shares in the company were to be one hundred shares of five hundred dollars each, the land given in exchange for these shares was fully paid up. In other words, the land was virtually turned over in exchange for these shares. On the face of it there seems to be nothing particularly wrong with any of this procedure. But let us go into the history of this company and this island a little bit further.

It has been a well-known fact—and to everyone in that part of the country it is common knowledge—that the in fact owners of the company have ever since that date been a number of extremely wealthy men from New York city and the surrounding areas. Occasionally there has been a Canadian member. At the present time I believe there are two and possibly three Canadian members of this club. The rest of them are all citizens of the United States. The late J. P. Morgan, of considerable financial fame, was one of the owners, or was one of the members and shareholders of this company. Many other men with prominent names in American business and financial history have been owners and members of this club. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee to go into this matter at any great length, but the information is easily available.

As I understand it this club—and I say this in order to be fair—has kept up the objects and purposes that were set out in the original charter. They have been scrupulously careful about the taking of game. It is my understanding that the members of this club go to the club only during the duck-shooting season in the fall and that they take only a few ducks, something which is extremely admirable indeed. I understand that they seldom if ever attended the place during the bass-fishing season. I may say that there have been some extremely noted visitors to the club. His Majesty King Edward VIII, while Prince of Wales, was a guest at the club, and I understand he did some shooting there at the time of his visit. Of course that was quite a number of years ago.

To get back to the original suggestion, I feel that this island should become a national park and the property of all the people of Canada, not only for the use of our citizens but as a wonderful attraction for tourists as well. It is quite true that the Long Point Company and its shooting and game club have done a very good job of preserving the wildlife there; and I think they should be commended for what they have done. While it is true that it may not have been all a matter of altruism, because by keeping everybody else off the island they actually protected the game and fish there for themselves, the fact remains that, no matter what was their reason for doing it, this is a wonderful preserve of wildlife and it is one of the few places of its kind anywhere in the settled or populated parts of Canada.

In addition to the Long Point club itself there is one other club known as the Rice Bay club which is situate in the water area near the shore. This club is set up on stilts on the water and is not actually attached to the land. I understand that they always manage to get along very well with the Long Point Company and the residents of this club have never been asked to leave. I would think it would be quite possible, if these lands were obtained for the public benefit, that there would be no necessity to disturb the people who have had possession and who have enjoyed certain rights there but that they could be left alone. However, I am quite sure that the members of the Long Point Company do not need an island nearly fourteen miles long and a mile and a half wide purely for their own purposes. There should be a good road through the island so that the public can come in, as they do in other natural parks, and see nature as it is under unique circumstances.

There is one other thing of interest about this island and that is what I may call the bay side, which is very swampy and full of wildlife such as snakes and so on, and which would be ideal for setting up any type of reserve. The southern or lakeside shore of the island has one of the most beautiful natural beaches in Canada with very fine, hard, white sand stretching for miles and would be suitable for holidayers. Now the far end of the island, that is the end closest to the mainland, which was never acquired by this company, is at the present time leased by the province of Ontario to cottagers on a 99-year lease basis with certain restrictions on the type of cottages that can be put up there. There are many hundreds of cottages, though in fact only a few have the advantage of a lakefront site. Most of them are in plots of sand toward the middle of the island. These cottagers come largely from places such as London, Woodstock, Tillsonburg, Brantford, Simcoe, Toronto, Hamilton and many other places, as well as from the United States. I know that a great many people from my own riding have summer cottages there and a great many people also have small cabins which they use on fishing and shooting expeditions. At the opening of the bass season anywhere within three miles of this particular island there are not dozens but hundreds of boats out fishing. For those who have been there it is indeed a unique spot. I could go on, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think it is necessary to discuss this matter at any further length. I think the main idea has been put across to the minister.

However, I understand that there are other islands and areas in Ontario which could be turned into national parks. The minister was kind enough to give me this information, since I did not have time to look it up myself, but I understand that one of these areas is Pelee island, which is at the opposite end of lake Erie near the city of Windsor. I think it would be a rather suitable thing if some arrangement could be made with the Ontario government so that this island, Long Point, can also be acquired as a national park, as well as Pelee island.

I would like to wind up these remarks by emphasizing that such natural assets showing Canadian wildlife as it is in that part of Ontario, and which have remained unspoiled, should become the property of everyone in Canada and should not remain the property of a few very wealthy people from the United States.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say a word as to the policy of the government as regards the setting up of national parks. As hon. members are aware, the first prerequisite is that the land for a park be offered by a provincial government to us free of all encumbrances, and it is only after such an offer has been made that the various factors which have to be taken into account before we can come to a decision are in fact considered.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief observations on the first item in these estimates, but before proceeding to do so I must say that I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. His speech was most interesting and informative.

This is a department which during recent years has frequently changed its name and certain branches have been rearranged from time to time. It is, in my opinion, a very important department indeed and one of those departments which offer tremendous opportunity and scope for a minister with talent and imagination, and also a great opportunity for action in regard to the natural resources of this country. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that we are indeed fortunate in having a young minister in charge of this department face to face with some very ancient problems. I hope the combination of the two will distil a very satisfactory result.

I have read the entire report issued by this department because it always makes interesting reading. I think the officials who compiled this report are to be congratulated on issuing a most interesting document. I am, of course, referring to the report tabled on March 31, 1953, while it was still the department of resources and development. I found the report interesting, comprehensive and excellent in every way.

I wish to make again the suggestion I have made on previous occasions when dealing with these estimates, that in my opinion the estimates of this department should be referred to the committee on mines, forests and waters. That committee has not met for quite a number of years and this is a committee that could do a good deal of useful work. I am not suggesting that the estimates should be submitted solely for examination, to ascertain how the money should be spent. I think the estimates should be submitted to the committee so that the committee will have an opportunity to hear from various excellent technical personnel in this department in regard to the amount of work they are doing. There are quite a number of men in this department doing very useful work of which very few Canadians, and indeed I believe a small percentage of the members of this house, are aware, and I think the referring of these estimates to that committee would be well worth while and provide members of this house with an opportunity to learn about the work being done by this very important department.

That is all I am going to say about the estimates at this time. But I do want to say a few words—I see the minister looking at me and I am quite sure he knows what I am about to say—in regard to the recent resources conference held in Ottawa, the first I might say since 1906. This conference was sponsored by the Canadian Forestry Association, the Agricultural Institute of Canada, the Canadian Forestry Institute, the Canadian Institute of Engineers and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I am sure the minister will agree that it was an excellent conference, at which I spent a most enjoyable two days. I must say I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's welcoming speech. It was a very interesting speech and indeed a capable speech which was received very favourably by the delegates present. I hope that as a result of the work of the conference and their findings the minister when he next addresses an organization of that type, or even in addressing this house, will commit the government to some definite action along the lines suggested by the conference.

Two days were spent dealing with the important question of renewable natural resources. There was an excellent discussion on our forest resources and another on soil and water resources, and yet another on wildlife and recreational facilities. Papers were read and discussions were held by people who knew what they were talking about, and some of the most prominent people in Canada working in these spheres made some excellent speeches which were well worth listening to, while the discussion on their papers was interesting indeed.

As the result of these two days of papers, addresses and discussions, the conference summarized its opinions. It did not pass a formal resolution but more or less by general agreement summarized the findings of the conference. I think it is quite fair to say that the opinion was generally expressed that there should be a national policy in the development of our natural resources devised as the result of dominion-provincial co-operation. That question was mentioned again and again in the papers and discussions that followed.

It was also suggested by several speakers that a royal commission should be established to study the whole question of conservation of natural resources in Canada, to gather evidence, hear opinions, and make recommendations and prepare a report. I was also very interested to notice that repeatedly, whether the speaker came from British Columbia, the prairies, central Canada or the maritimes, the opinion was expressed that we must have a national approach to this problem and that there should be greater contributions from the federal government towards a general overall national conservation policy in Canada.

These were not the opinions of people who had not given consideration to the subject. These were the opinions of people who have lived with these various questions, forest resources, soil and water conservation, wildlife and recreational problems, for many years, and that was a summary of their opinions. I hope that as the result of that conference and its findings, as the result of the meeting together of minds of people prominent in these fields from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the government will give some consideration to the findings of the conference. I trust that the immediate result will be an increase in the estimates of this department next year in order to assist the provinces with respect to forest protection, soil and water conservation, conservation of wildlife and recreational resources.

I do not know whether the minister has received any formal representations from the conference but I would certainly like the minister to give consideration to the opinions expressed there and to inform the house if the government is being moved in the direction of calling a dominion-provincial conference to establish a national policy on conservation as the result of consultation and co-operation.

Mr. Lesage: I have received a letter from my good friend, Mr. Van Camp, but I have not yet received the resolutions adopted at that conference. My hon. friend may rest assured that the officers of my department and I will give these resolutions all the consideration that they certainly deserve.

Mr. Shaw: Assuming that we will not conclude consideration of the national parks branch tonight, possibly what I am about to say might be taken as notice by the minister because I am sure that he and his officials will want the opportunity to secure the information which I require. The minister may or may not recall that last December, when we were considering amendments respecting the operation and maintenance of parks, I asked a question to this effect. I wanted to know what rights go with leases when leases are granted in park areas or in areas under the jurisdiction of the parks branch. After I had said that I had certain information with respect to a bad situation in connection with Banff national park, the minister asked me to submit the information to him. I thanked him and said I would, but I must say that it has taken me until this time to get all the information I wanted.

Last week I was asked to meet two different organizations for the purpose of discussing this matter. The area I have in mind is just outside Banff national park and is known as the Ya-Ha-Tinda area. It covers eighteen square miles and consists of portions of township 32, ranges 11 and 12, west of the fifth meridian. According to an order in council passed on the 14th of March, 1950, which I have before me, this area was set apart for the use of the dominion parks branch for grazing purposes. I have heard that a ranch is now established in that area.

But, Mr. Chairman, these are the complaints. Is this still a park area? It is under the jurisdiction of the parks branch, but is it still a park area? If so, do the rules and regulations governing parks apply here? This is what we find. In this area of eighteen square miles some persons are permitted to hunt big game and some are denied the right. Rangers have stopped certain persons from going in there but when these hunters have challenged the jurisdiction of the ranger no action has been taken.

On the gate leading into the property is a no trespassing sign. Apparently the no trespassing sign applies to some people but does not apply to others because certain persons have been refused entry to this eighteen square mile area while others have been permitted to enter. I do not mind telling the minister that the meetings I had last week were with two branches of the fish and game association. These hunters have gone in there and have seen hunting going on. They have seen game shot and taken out of the area and yet they themselves have been excluded from this eighteen square mile area and have been threatened with prosecution if they enter.

These people say to me that if this area is to be a game preserve, as are the park sections, that is fine, they have no complaint; but if it is to be an area in which some people are allowed to hunt, then all should be allowed to hunt there. They tell me that recently a part of the area has been plowed up and they think that is strange. They say it is a mistake. Part of the area is very similar to the prairies and has a type of grass known as prairie wool. If that is removed it will be an absolute disaster.

In this eighteen square mile area there is some of the finest scenery that you would want to see, and yet according to the sign on the gate and according to the orders given by the rangers it is closed entirely to the public. They think there is something strange about all this. This has been the experience for a number of years now and these men would like to get true information with respect to the situation. If the area is closed, if the public are completely excluded, they want to know it. If those in authority have the right to put up a no trespassing sign on the gate then these people would like to know it. A very good road leads right up to the gate where the no trespassing sign is posted. Cars can move right up to that point. Within a matter of three miles inside a most beautiful waterfall can be seen. Yet, as I say, these people are ordered out of there and are warned what will happen if they go in. On the other hand, others go in there and camp. I was asked if I would look into the matter. I may say that I have just returned today and I had hoped to be able to get the facts together a little better. I trust that this matter can be straightened out so that I can advise these people as to the true situation that exists in that eighteen square mile area.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask one question for clarification? Would the hon. member say who has been doing the warning he is talking about?

Mr. Shaw: The rangers.

Mr. Lesage: The park employees?

Mr. Shaw: Yes; they must be park rangers because these men told me it was a federal park ranger. Under the order in council, Mr. Chairman, it says:

> Whereas the Minister of the Interior reports that it is proposed to withdraw certain lands including Ya-Ha-Tinda area from the Rocky Mountains park, Alberta, and that the said area is now used and will continue to be required by the dominion parks branch for winter grazing:
> Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council . . .

As you will note, it was set aside out of the region by the parks branch, presumably for winter grazing. Then down below it states:

> . . . also withdrawn from disposal under the said act and set apart for the use of the dominion parks branch for grazing purposes.

These men tell me it is a federal forest ranger who is in there and who orders them off the place. Incidentally, he misses an island, apart from the park proper, but there is provincial land all around him. Here is the order in council. I have seen recent correspondence between certain of these men who have complained to the provincial government. The provincial government has had some correspondence with the federal authority in connection with it. I believe the province recommended that a corridor be cleared into this area in the park. In any event, quite a number of these letters are filed, and it is most disturbing and most confusing. Perhaps the minister would like to look into it.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the hon. member if he would hand me a copy of the order in council that he had in his hand? That would help me clarify the position. Perhaps then I will be able to answer his question.

Mr. Shaw: Yes. I assumed the minister would want some time to look into this subject and that was my reason for bringing it up now.

Item agreed to.

National parks branch—

304. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,397,820.

Mr. Harkness: This item deals with the general administration of all national parks. We have a breakdown in the back of the book which is on the basis of the employees, what is paid for various materials, and so forth. It is a breakdown of that amount involved, $4,397,000. Now, just to get some idea of what is spent on one or two of these parks, would the minister give me a breakdown of the $1,094,431 and of the $1,231,588 which was spent on Banff last year and this year?

Mr. Lesage: In Banff national park, the total estimate for 1954-55, so far as repairs and upkeep of buildings and works is concerned, is as follows: administration buildings and camp grounds, $10,216; roads, bridges, streets, sidewalks and trails, $69,909; water and sewer systems, $3,791; recreational facilities, $8,397; other buildings and works, $11,008.

Now, if my friend is interested, as to repairs and upkeep of equipment at Banff national park: repairs and upkeep of cars, trucks and heavy equipment, $87,775; repairs and upkeep of other equipment, $6,284, for a total of $94,059. Those are two of the important items under operation and maintenance.

Mr. Harkness: As I understand it, then, this item 304 takes in a certain amount of construction work, and all the construction is not under the next item, 305, which is for the construction or acquisition of lands, buildings and works.

Mr. Lesage: It is for repairs and upkeep of buildings and works, not new construction. New construction is under item 305.

Mr. Knight: There are two small items I might perhaps mention here. The first one is the site of Batoche, about which the minister or his assistants are probably well informed. There is a need there for a building of some sort which is a permanent site. I will not go into the history. I understand there is an old building there now which has been offered to the department and I understand from the departmental officials that the price being asked for that building is perhaps too high. I would be inclined perhaps to agree with that. I would urge, though, that this department might consider proceeding with that piece of business. I know there have been negotiations, but I feel the amount the department has offered for this particular building might be considered too low. I just wanted to draw that to the minister's attention, in the hope that perhaps negotiations would be continued so that that permanent place, which has a great connection with Saskatchewan's history, might be preserved.

There is a road there, too, but I do not know whether it will come entirely under the provincial government or whether the dominion department would consider it had some responsibility. It is a historic road up which certain troops went at the time of the rebellion. It runs along the river bank, and although I do not quite know where it is, it is in the same Batoche district near the historic battleground. I do know the people there would like to get the matter settled so there would be some permanency about it.

The other item, I suggest, might come more nearly under the heading of museums. We of course, in the province of Saskatchewan, unfortunately have not very much history. I feel we should make an effort to preserve what history there is. I should like to pay tribute to a man who has devoted the important part of his life to the preservation of things historical in that province. He is Campbell Innis, who was formerly a school inspector and I think has acted for the department in an official capacity in connection with the historic site of the old town of Battleford. At the town of Battleford there is the old mounted police barracks and a very interesting and well kept museum on the site of the old fort.

After that had been established, and after the dominion government had taken some interest in it, a few various old implements of one sort or another began to be gathered together. Saskatchewan, of course, has been an agricultural province. The things to which I am referring are things like the buffalo carts, the Red river carts, as they called them, and the first machinery that was used in the breaking up of that country for agriculture. A collection finally developed and was gathered together in one or two places in the northern part of the province, I think somewhere around North Battleford or Battleford, and some in my own city of Saskatoon. I would hope that the minister would come out to Saskatoon—and I give him a hearty invitation to do so. As I said the other day, during two weeks of the election campaign we had five cabinet ministers out there. I do not think the minister now before the committee was one of them; but he would be welcomed if he did come. As I said the other day, I am here to return the visit of those cabinet ministers.

Mr. Knowles: He was not a minister then. Perhaps he will come next time.

Mr. Knight: At any rate, to go back to my story: the point I wish to make is that we have a marvellous collection out there—

Mr. Lesage: I will come to see it in a month and a half.

Mr. Knight: —of instruments of transportation used in the early days, beginning with the Red river cart. Then we go into agricultural implements, and we have ancient buggies, and all sorts of things. We have had a grant from the provincial government—and I have no doubt the minister will tell me that this is provincial rather than federal business, because cabinet ministers in the dominion departments of government have a habit of saying that.

At any rate, after these things had sat out in the elements for a long time, finally some well-intentioned people got them housed under one roof. They brought them down to my city. On the west side of that city there is a place something in the shape of a hangar in which all these old implements have been gathered. A crew of men was hired. The old building was scraped out and renovated, and put into shape for exhibition. The place is now full of those relics.

The Minister of Agriculture was out in Saskatchewan during the Easter recess, and I believe he was invited to look over these things. However, he was not able to come, because he was on other forms of business. If he had gone he would have been interested to see the buggy that was driven over the Saskatchewan plains for a good many years by his predecessor, the late Hon. W. R. Motherwell, whose name, as a former minister of agriculture, is treated with great respect both in the House of Commons and in the country.

I suggest that the department of the minister to whom I am addressing these remarks might take some interest in the matter, and accept some responsibility for the exhibition of these objects. I do know that the provincial government has given a fair grant, and that the municipality of Saskatoon has done something for them. Finally they got these things in out of the weather, and necessary repairs have been done. I have no doubt thousands of tourists will look over the exhibition this year. While I am not sure, I think a small admission fee is charged. If it is, the revenue will be used for maintenance.

I know, however, that at the moment a cement floor is required in that museum. That would put the finishing touches on it. I am merely suggesting that when the new minister looks over his historic sites, museums, and that sort of thing, he might look at this one. I know that the national museum comes under his department and I see no reason why, if a national library should have branches throughout the country—and I am happy that it has—a national museum should not be treated in the same way. Those of us from Saskatchewan are in favour of that sort of thing. I believe it is important that we preserve our connection with the past.

That is all I wish to say on the matter. I simply draw it to the minister's attention in the hope that he will look into it and give some consideration as to whether or not he would be justified in seeing that this institution receives some support from this department of the federal government.

Mr. Lesage: As to the first point raised by the hon. member, I am quite familiar with the question of the old rectory at Batoche. That this is an historic site of great historic value, I would be the first to agree. But of course we cannot buy historic value, because it is impossible to appraise or to evaluate it in money terms. We have to purchase at the appraised value any building or lands we may require. In this instance the price asked was $10,000, while the appraisal made was around $1,500.

Mr. Knight: I think the offer of the dominion government also was $1,500.

Mr. Lesage: No, the offer was not $1,500. We said $10,000 was not a reasonable price, and we asked if they would not bring the price down to a reasonable figure—because certainly I was ready to recommend a figure higher than the $1,500, if we could come to a settlement. However, the owners have not seen fit to come down a single cent from the $10,000.

Again, I am very much aware of the historic value of that site, because it is part of the Riel history, which I have known for years. I shall be meeting with members of the historic sites and monuments board on June 7 and 8, when they have their annual meeting here in Ottawa, and I am going to discuss with them some other solution to the problem with a view to satisfying the owners and at the same time maintaining the policy in the department, which we believe is sound and should be followed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, in contrast with what was said by the hon. member for Saskatoon, in British Columbia we are very rich in history. On that account I have always been interested in marking historic sites and monuments. For some years I urged that a monument be erected to David Thompson at the Castlegar-Robson crossing of the Columbia. I was informed about a year ago that the board had agreed to the suggestion, and that a monument was going to be erected at a suitable place. What is the reason for the delay? I do not think anything has happened to date.

Mr. Lesage: There is a general reason, that we are late in setting up these plaques that have been recommended by the historic sites and monuments board. We have a definite budget, and we try to do as much as we can each year. However, to date, we have not been able to keep pace with the recommendations of the board. That is the general answer to the hon. member's question. However, I shall look into the matter in particular and see that there is not too much delay in the case he has mentioned.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to discuss the Waterton Lakes park, and it might take some time. Perhaps the item should be allowed to stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we will take agriculture, and national health and welfare.

Mr. Knowles: Both?

Mr. Harris: Certainly.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

374. British Columbia, $4,450,000.
375. Yukon and Northwest Territories, $670,000.
376. Unforeseen improvements, $1,200,000.

Engineering branch—

377. Branch administration, $653,824.

Engineering services—

378. Salaries, surveys, inspections, etc., $1,918,878.
379. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $74,900.

Dredging—

380. Maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works, $3,674,565.
381. New plant and equipment, $1,464,600.

Graving docks—

382. Maintenance and operation, $527,026.

Locks and dams—

383. Maintenance and operation, $413,673.

Roads and bridges—

384. Maintenance and operation, $423,449.
385. Towards international bridge over the St. Croix river between St. Stephen, New Brunswick, and Calais, Maine, the state of Maine to pay a like amount, $125,000.
386. Towards construction of spans of bridge over the interprovincial channel of the Ottawa river between Pembroke, Ontario, and Allumette island, Quebec, $200,000.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended upon individual listed projects—

387. Newfoundland, $2,189,800.
388. Nova Scotia, $4,923,000.
389. Prince Edward Island, $847,800.
390. New Brunswick, $1,334,500.
391. Quebec, $4,670,100.
392. Ontario, $6,573,400.
393. Manitoba, $103,000.
394. Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories, $180,500.
395. British Columbia and Yukon, $4,998,500.

Harbours and rivers generally—

396. Repairs and upkeep for the maintenance of service, including reconstruction and replacements, and to authorize commitments against future years in the total amount of $420,000, no new works to be undertaken, $3,535,000.

Trans-Canada highway division (formerly under department of resources and development)—

397. Administration, operation and maintenance, $487,484.
398. To provide for surveys and construction of the trans-Canada highway through national parks, $2,000,000.

Generally—

399. To provide for remedial works where damages are caused by, or endanger, navigation or federal government structures and to complete protection works already under way, $500,000.

General—

400. Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $15,000 to be expended upon any one work, $590,000.
401. To provide for advance planning of projects including acquisition of sites, $500,000.
402. To supplement, on approval of treasury board except where less than $1,000 is required, any of the appropriations of the Department of Public Works, $400,000.
403. To provide for balances required to complete any projects undertaken in previous fiscal years and for which no specific provision is made in the fiscal year 1954-55, $400,000.
404. Statue of the late Sir Robert L. Borden, $50,000.
405. Emergency shelter administration (formerly under department of resources and development), $25,000.
406. To provide for the expenses incurred by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence (formerly under department of resources and development), $700,000.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

535. To provide for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purposes of subsection one of section 45 of the National Housing Act in respect of housing projects for veterans, for the acquisition of land for housing projects, and for housing projects at Gander, Newfoundland, for sale or rental, $1,124,000. On motion of Mr. Harris item reduced by $250,000.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

302. Departmental administration, $455,547.
303. Branch administration, $61,420.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 30, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT CONCERNING LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Last Tuesday, Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), I said I would shortly be in a position to make a full statement to the house concerning the government's legislative program for the remainder of this session. I should like now to make that statement.

In addition to the measures arising out of the two resolutions, of which notice was given in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings, and the measures arising out of the budget resolutions which involve amendments to the Excise Act, Excise Tax Act, the Income Tax Act, the Customs Tariff and possibly the Customs Act, definite plans have now been made for the introduction of the following twelve bills before the end of the session. These bills are: Amendment to the Veterans Land Act; a new measure concerning inventions by members of the public service; further amendment to the Post Office Act; the usual Canadian National financing and guarantee bill; a bill to round out the superannuation act by providing a system of contributory death benefits for civil servants and members of the regular forces and to discontinue the issuing of individual policies under the Civil Service Insurance Act; amendments to the Judges Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the Department of Transport Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Radio Act, the International Rapids Power Development Act, and the Canadian Citizenship Act.

These two last bills are small bills that are being introduced in the Senate. In addition to the measures above, the government may wish to introduce, before the end of the session, legislation regarding the National Physical Fitness Act and a bill to authorize the establishment of a national park in Newfoundland. Furthermore, as hon. members no doubt know, this week the Minister of Transport had discussions with representatives of the various provincial governments concerning the control and regulation of interprovincial and international highway transport. The federal and provincial governments are now considering the proposals made during the course of these discussions, and it is possible that following such consideration a bill on this subject may be introduced during the course of the session.

That is, Mr. Speaker, the government's legislative program as presently contemplated for the balance of this session. Many of the measures I have mentioned are of relatively little importance and should not, I believe, take much time in the house. It is possible, of course, that between now and the end of the session, because of circumstances now not foreseen, the government may find it necessary to introduce measures that have not been mentioned here. Should that happen, there should be very few and they should not substantially alter the program as I have outlined it. Hon. members know that there are still a number of committees sitting and their reports will in due course be submitted to the house for consideration.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister indicate the nature of the amendments to the Judges Act that are contemplated?

Mr. Speaker: Order. While I was listening to the outline of the legislative program I was asking myself what I would do if a question were put as to the nature of these various measures. If I allow the question put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), where do I stand so far as the other questions which might be asked by members about all the measures the Prime Minister has outlined are concerned? Should we not refrain from being too curious at this time, and wait until those measures are presented?

I should like to submit this to the house. It seems to me to be the logical course for us to follow at this moment to wait until these measures are introduced in the proper fashion. Under our rules no one will be caught by surprise because notice has to be given. Let us follow the proper procedure.

Mr. Drew: I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that unless the Prime Minister has some reason for not answering this—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drew: I am addressing my remarks to the recognized Speaker in the house. I was submitting to you, Mr. Speaker, that unless the Prime Minister had any objection to giving that explanation, it might easily dispose of other discussions that might be prompted by members' thoughts on this subject. I should think it would be very helpful to the members and facilitate the consideration of these subjects if, in the case of an act of this kind, the Prime Minister would indicate to us the nature of the amendments proposed.

Mr. Speaker: May I perhaps clarify the remarks I made a moment ago. The Leader of the Opposition was quite right, on the orders of the day, to ask a question of the Prime Minister as to the legislative program to come. Now, the Prime Minister indicated that he would make that reply, and he has done so today. The question is now asked as to what is to be done with respect to one particular piece of legislation to come before the house.

If I allowed this question, then I would have to allow at this period questions pertaining to the subject matter of any other legislation which the Prime Minister has announced, if hon. members chose to ask those questions.

At this time we must ask questions concerning matters of urgency. My ruling is that we should not deal with the various subject matters contained in the legislation the Prime Minister has announced. See Journals, Monday, July 15, 1940, ruling of Mr. Speaker Glen, last paragraph, page 218.

PROCEDURE IN REGARD TO QUESTIONS AND NOTICES OF MOTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I hope we have not established the practice that questions to the ministry are to have precedence over members' questions, government notices of motions and government orders on Fridays.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is putting his question to me I will have, much to my regret, to tell him that it is not customary for hon. members to put questions to the Speaker from the floor. If the hon. member wishes to have an explanation upon that subject I shall be glad to see him later in the day. See Beauchesne, third edition, citation 302 and citation 114, also ruling of Mr. Speaker Macdonald, May 21, 1951, Hansard.

JUDGES

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house if it is the intention of the government to consider revision of judges' salaries during the present session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter which could not be dealt with without a resolution which, before it was brought to the house, would have to be submitted to and receive the approval of the Governor General.

Mr. Drew: That is the kind of information we get.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has not forgotten to bring in an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I am sure there will be great disappointment if no amendments to that act are brought in at this session.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have stated a complete list of the government's program for the remainder of the session.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

SECRET ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement made yesterday by the Prime Minister that no legislation will be introduced extending the Emergency Powers Act, will he tell the house whether the government has reached any decision as to what it intends to do about the matter covered in what is known as the secret order in council.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have already stated in the house that if the emergency legislation was not extended, the secret order in council would expire with the legal existence of that act.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC AID TO SOUTHEAST ASIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): The Prime Minister has not mentioned the possibility of a bill dealing with supplementary estimates. In the light of the press report of a speech he made in Toronto on Wednesday night, may I ask him if the government intends to propose an increase in economic aid along the lines of the Colombo plan to nations of the commonwealth in Asia?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No such decision has been reached by the government up to the present time.

TRANSPORTATION

ARROW LAKES—SUBVENTION FOR STEAMSHIP SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Has any minister of the government of British Columbia discussed with the minister the question of steamship service on the Arrow lakes? If so, in view of the great concern of some three thousand of my constituents, and many others in British Columbia, over the present situation, can the minister inform the house of the result?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to speak to me yesterday afternoon about this matter, and to indicate that he would ask his question. I did discuss with the minister of public works in the government of British Columbia the matter of a subvention for the Arrow lakes steamship service. I am unable at this time to add anything to what I have already said on the subject in this house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CAMP IPPERWASH—INVESTIGATION INTO DISAPPEARANCE OF ARMY STORES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is he prepared to make any statement on the disappearance of army stores at Camp Ipperwash? If so, can he indicate the extent of the losses involved? Is it the intention of the department to institute an independent investigation, apart from that being conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. In answer to the first two parts of the hon. member's question, I may say that a few months ago, during a routine ordnance audit at Camp Ipperwash, some discrepancies were found in clothing accounts, as a result of which a further audit and a stocktaking check were initiated, and the R.C.M.P. were asked to investigate. These checks and investigations are still continuing.

The investigations thus far would indicate that the losses involved are substantially less than the $15,000 suggested in press reports which I have seen but obviously I cannot make a definite statement in that connection until all the relevant facts have been established, and such steps taken as those facts may appear to warrant.

The answer to the third part of this question is no.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CLASSIFICATION OF CANNED MIXED FRUIT AS PEACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the tariff board's ruling, dated April 28, to the effect that mixed fruit is not peaches, will provision be made for rebate of the excess duties paid on the importation of canned mixed fruit during the period that the higher rate of duty has been charged?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): No consideration will be given to the question of refund until the matter is finally determined. As the hon. member is no doubt aware, decisions of the tariff board are subject to an appeal to the exchequer court upon any question of law, within thirty days from the date of the decision.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question, arising out of the mixed fruit case, which was heard recently by the tariff board. May I ask if the government intends to continue using the Department of Justice to represent the Department of National Revenue in hearings before the tariff board?

Mr. McCann: The answer is yes.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

SEA ISLAND STATION—LOSS FROM FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, will the Associate Minister of National Defence give the house a report on the disastrous fire which took place yesterday at the R.C.A.F. hangar at the Vancouver airport at Sea Island?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. From such information as I have at hand, it appears that late last evening hangar No. 3 at the Royal Canadian Air Force station at Sea Island, British Columbia, was completely destroyed by fire, together with its contents. No lives were lost, I am glad to say, and no person was injured.

The hangar housed a number of smaller units, among them a search and rescue flight, a land search station, and several administration details. Destroyed in the fire were six aircraft consisting of one Lancaster, two Expeditors, two Otters, and one helicopter.

The station fire department was on the ground in a matter of moments and was later assisted by the Richmond fire department, the Vancouver fire department, and fire equipment of the Department of Transport. Nevertheless, because of the nature of the fire, and the extent, it was not found possible to control it. The loss, while not yet accurately determined, will be substantial. The cause of the fire is as yet unknown, but a board of inquiry was appointed immediately to investigate the possible cause.

Mr. Green: A supplementary question: Was the fire equipment from the city of Vancouver able to get across the Marpole bridge?

Mr. Campney: So far as I know, there was no delay.

FISHERIES

EXCHANGE OF SCIENTIFIC INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries if he can give us the particulars concerning an agreement which has been reached between Canada, the United States and Japan in relation to the exchange of scientific information about fisheries, according to a statement which I see in today's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The reference is to the first report of the international commission for the north Pacific fisheries, a report covering the inaugural meetings held in Washington in the month of February. This commission was set up as a result of a treaty signed last year by Canada, the United States and Japan for the conservation and the protection of fisheries of the north Pacific.

The headquarters of the new commission will be at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver.

Meanwhile the scientists of the three countries will be meeting together to set out the research program and to co-ordinate the research work of Canada, Japan and the United States in the north Pacific. Since the hon. member is interested, I shall make a copy of the report available to him.

DISABLED PERSONS

REFERENCE TO PROPOSED PENSION LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all grateful that the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McIvor: —is bringing in a resolution or legislation at this time—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. McIvor: —for the benefit of the handicapped.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister now completed agreements with all of the Canadian provinces in connection with proposed pensions for disabled persons?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): If I understood the question correctly, my hon. friend asks me whether we have agreements with all of the provinces regarding the proposed scheme for a nation-wide system of disability allowances. I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension as to the precise requirements in this regard. As he knows, we did have a conference with all of the provinces, when the general principles and the general intentions of the government's legislation were outlined to the provinces. That conference was not predicated on the necessity of having any agreement with the provinces, although understandings were naturally reached with them.

The formal agreements will follow once the legislation has been introduced in this house and passed by parliament. Then, to make the measure effective in the country as a whole, it will require agreements with each province.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister when it is intended that this legislation, notice of which the minister has now given, will come into effect?

Mr. Martin: Just as quickly as possible, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $432,490.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the vote on page 4 of the blue book and the details on page 76. Shall the resolution carry?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, it is not customary for the Department of Agriculture to remain undiscussed until such a late period in the session. I presume one of the reasons for that was that I was absent early in the session and later in the session was not in a position to deal with my estimates. However, I want to thank hon. members of the committee for the very kind references which have been made from time to time to the changed condition in relation to myself, which makes it possible for me to be here at this time.

The estimates which are being placed before the committee are for about $1,700,000 more than last year. I only wish to make that reference to them at this stage and then to deal with more general matters, as has been the custom at this stage in the consideration of the estimates.

In the first place, I should like to deal with farm production, showing the relationship between farm production east and west during the past years, and in making that comparison to indicate what our position is at the present moment in relation to surpluses and other matters related to the question of agricultural production.

It has been our practice in the past to give the complete figures in connection with production from year to year, and in doing so to speak in a general way of the position of agriculture. But on this occasion I should like to make a division as between east and west on the ground that most of our production in the eastern part of Canada, from which farmers receive their return, is in the form of livestock, livestock products and many specialties that do not add largely to the income, but do produce results which are very beneficial or otherwise to small groups of people. Then, so far as the west is concerned, by far the greater part of our production is in cereals; but nevertheless there is a considerable production of livestock products, particularly cattle and hogs.

The figures which I have before me with regard to the matter indicate a number of facts, which I think it is well for us to consider at this time. These facts are related to production east and west, but before dealing with them I think I should refer to the further fact that there are more farmers in the eastern part of Canada than there are in the western part; that is, if you just count heads, there are more people engaged in agriculture east of the great lakes than west of the great lakes. Because of that fact, when one gives the figures, it is not sufficient just to divide by the number of people and then say there is so much production per head in eastern Canada and so much in western Canada and leave it at that. There are a number of facts that ought to be considered along with these statements.

The first is that while there are more farmers in eastern Canada, many of them are engaged in such activities as producing on small areas fruit and vegetables which go to market, and producing on other small farm units to an extent which is perhaps not so great as the production on some of the western farms which run into hundreds of acres.

In dealing with the matters having to do with agriculture from that point of view, I want to emphasize the position which does exist in relation to agricultural products in general. I am going to deal with production east and west on a cash basis. I know that when I speak of cash returns for farm products some people are going to say to me: that is not the entire return. But I think in so far as the individual farmer is concerned, he is more interested in the dollars that he is getting from day to day in relation to a question like this than he is in the questions that we sometimes refer to when we object to cash returns as against the returns which are considered from other points of view in certain publications which are put out from time to time. But I am going to confine myself at this time to the cash returns which the farmers have, the amount which they receive from day to day, from week to week and from month to month, and see if we cannot arrive at some conclusions which may be helpful to us.

I have in my hand a summary table, "cash income from the sale of farm products and from supplementary payments over the years, from 1942 down to the present". I have had those years following 1942 divided into three-year periods; my reason being that we have considered, in arriving at conclusions, that it is not advisable just to take one year and compare it with other years before or after. It is much better to take three-year periods and compare one three-year period with a like three-year period. From 1943 to 1945 we had income from farm products in the east amounting to $655 million the first year, $703 million the second year and $770 million the third year, or a total of $2,128,562,000. Following the same plan, in the next three-year period we had in the east $2,871,173,000. But I think it probably would be better if I were to take east and west side by side rather than to go through one list and then the other. Therefore going back to the first three-year period, income from farm products amounted to $2,128,562,000 in the east and $2,858,770,000 in the west. In the next three-year period the figures are $2,871,173,000 in the east and $3,348,716,000 in the west. In the third period, from 1949 to 1951, the figures are $3,605,406,000 in the east and $3,952,669,000 in the west. So far as the last period is concerned, we have only gone through two years of it and the figures are $2,444,668,000 in the east and $3,129,903,000 in the west.

I have made an estimate of what the amount is likely to be over the three-year period, and at this time I will read the total amounts for all Canada in each of the three-year periods. They are: From 1943 to 1945, $4,987,332,000; from 1946 to 1948, $6,219,889,000; from 1949 to 1951, $7,558,075,000, and for the last period of two years $5,574,571,000. If I were to add to the last figure the estimate for the present year that total would be $8,200 million worth in cash for farm products.

I give the figures in order to say that over the period from 1942 down to the present there has been a constant increase in the annual returns for agriculture each three-year period. If one were to take the annual returns year by year there would be some years in which we would drop down and there would be others in which we would come up again. I am simply giving the figures in this form in order that we may be able to take the rises and falls as they come and conclude that for each three-year period there have been considerable increases in agricultural production in this country over the preceding three years. Cash income has risen from $4,987 million in the first three-year period to $8,200 million in the last period, so there has been an increase of a very considerable amount over that period of time.

The next point with which I wish to deal in connection with these matters is that there are more farmers in the east than there are in the west.

Mr. Zaplitny: Before the minister goes on, would he mind giving us net figures in line with the cash figures he has given?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not want to take too much time at this stage in going into all the details with respect to these matters. I have the figures here and could do so, but I do not want to take too long. As we go through the estimates we can discuss these different details.

The next point I wish to make is that we have a very considerable production of dairy products in Canada. Those dairy products are made up largely of butter and cheese. A similar review of the price situation in relation to them would indicate that there have been increases from time to time. There have been along the way years in which we have dropped back but we have come up within a year or two, and there have been increases in these products from time to time.

In recent weeks we have had some discussion of the butter situation in Canada, and I should like to point out to the committee that we are selling our butter under a plan which has not been applied to other farm products. Over the years we were obtaining butter in some surplus during the summer months, and quite often in the winter months we were called upon to import butter from elsewhere. The present position is that it is being suggested to us that under the plan we have been following we are accumulating a surplus of butter in Canada. Today is the end of the butter year, so to speak, and the board has the largest surplus of butter under their control that they have ever had. I am not altogether certain that I would be right in saying that there is much more butter in Canada today than there was at some other times at the end of the dairy year, as these figures would indicate, but nevertheless there is a considerable amount. A round figure which can be stated is that we have about 33 million pounds of butter under the control of the board, and that butter will be placed on the market from time to time as the months go by.

In so far as cheese is concerned, we are in the position where practically all of our cheese has been sold or is in position to be sold, and it can be said that we have very little, if any, surplus of cheese. So far as butter is concerned, I would also say that it is not really established that we have any considerable surplus of butter. It could disappear over a few months' time or we could accumulate more, and as the months go by we will be dealing with that particular question.

I should like to deal next for a few moments with the marketing of cattle and hogs. Under the plans that are being followed we have very considerable numbers of cattle and hogs produced from year to year. At one time we had considerable trouble marketing the cattle and hogs that were produced, but I am pleased to be able to say that this year there has been no great difficulty in marketing the cattle and hogs that have been produced. We are marketing by far the greater part of our hogs in Canada. Some shipments are being made to the United States but the greater part of our hogs are being marketed in Canada. In preceding years we had some difficulties in marketing our cattle in the United States because of the disease that afflicted them, but again we are back into the position where we are marketing practically all of our surplus cattle in the United States in the form of beef and live cattle. There is very little hanging over the market at the present time. To complete the picture with regard to beef I would like to say that there have been representations made to the effect that we should set a floor price for cattle in Canada. We have replied to that by saying that we do not believe it is necessary. Our surplus beef all goes to the United States and the U.S. price is the highest in the world. Our price is secondary only to theirs and we obtain prices for our cattle in the United States based upon the market price which is established there, less the duty we have to pay in order to get our cattle there. Therefore, we do not consider that it is necessary to have a floor price under cattle. We believe that the market as it at present operates provides very good support for the cattle industry in this country.

In so far as hogs are concerned we have not had surpluses in recent years. At one time we had a production of hogs which made it necessary for us to look for markets, but at the present time we are marketing nearly all our hogs in the Dominion of Canada. The production is not sufficiently great to have presented us with any great marketing problem in connection with hogs. As regards any of the cuts we find it necessary to sell because we have not a sufficient market for them here, we have been able to sell at a very good price in the United States, and therefore we have not been trying to beat our way into the British or any other market simply because of the fact that our product is going on the market at better prices than we would be able to obtain anywhere else.

I think I should say a few words with regard to potatoes. There has been a situation in Canada recently which is quite different from that to which we have been accustomed. We are finding it more difficult to sell our potatoes in Canada than we have done for some little time. We had to sell our potatoes at the level which has been set under the measures we took from time to time to establish floor prices. We had to establish a price in relation to potatoes grown in the maritime provinces part of which are exported, and we have not been able to hold that price at the level which was established earlier, with the result that there is a possibility that the government may have to take some loss in connection with potatoes this year. As hon. members know, our objective is to attempt to set a floor price under our farm products which will be beneficial to the farmer and which at the same time will result in products being sold at a price which will not necessitate a subsidy being paid. It appears at the moment, though, that we might require to pay some subsidy on potatoes.

However, in connection with that I would like to say that our sales to the United States amounted to $60 million over the last ten years, and our purchases amounted to $30 million. In other words we have sold about double what we purchased from the United States as regards potatoes. At the same time I think I should say that we have not been so fortunate in the sale of table potatoes as we have been in the case of seed potatoes. Our seed potatoes have gone to the United States in considerable quantity and have been sold there, but we got just about the same number of table potatoes back into Canada as we sold in the United States. There is a very good reason for that but it can be discussed when we come to deal with that particular product.

I would like to say a few words with regard to wheat acreage. Questions have been asked from time to time as to our position in regard to wheat. Well, the present position is that we have approximately one year's crop of wheat on hand. It has been necessary to announce in this house that we have not been able to make many sales in relation to last year's crop, and therefore we have practically a full crop on hand. The reason for that is largely the fact that we have had such good crops. A few years ago one was inclined to say that we could not grow too much wheat over a five or six year period, and probably that is still true; but for the first time we have had the experience of growing three very good crops in a row. These crops have yielded quantities of wheat very much greater than the usual amounts. I would like to add in that regard that because of that high production our marketing difficulties have arisen in spite of the fact that our sales have been the same as those experienced in past years. It is not a case of our marketing less wheat year by year. It is a case of our having grown very much more wheat than usual during the last three years, and that tends to produce an accumulation of wheat. I would like to add, however, that we should not be misled by that fact. A market can be found for that wheat, in part at least, over the years that lie ahead, but we have no assurance that if we have the same crop this year we would be able to lower the surplus which is being carried at the present time. But I do not know that that is a very great hardship for the farmers at the present time. In past years we have gone through the experience of reducing production from year to year with the result that we had not very much to sell some years as compared with others, even though the price was fairly good. At present the price is fairly good compared with other years and we have a very large amount of wheat in storage in the Dominion of Canada.

The mere fact of that wheat being in storage makes it possible for us to take advantage of any market which is available, and we have been selling regularly up to a recent date, the result being that if you compare sales this year with sales in the past it will be found there is not a great deal of difference, though the fact that we have produced so much wheat leaves us with a considerable surplus.

The peak of our storage is perhaps as high now as it has been at any time and those hon. members who come from the western part of Canada will know that storage there is practically at capacity level and it will not be very long before we enter another crop year.

I just wish to point out these facts in relation to the wheat position in Canada at the present time, and I would like to add that if you take the year at the beginning of our difficulties as 100, that is the year 1928-29, our average acreage today would be at the figure of 101 compared with the figure of 117 in the United States. Our peak acreage was 114 and the peak in the United States was 125; our lowest acreage was 67, while the United States low was 79. That is not taking actual acreage figures, but is taking figures based on the 1929 acreage as representing 100; that is not in bushels but is in figures which represent the index position in relation to other years. Our present position is that we have a considerable amount of wheat in storage in Canada, possibly more than at any other time, certainly more than at any other time unless it be in the years 1943 or 1944 when we had our peak in storage during the war years. This wheat will be marketed from time to time and we expect it will bring a price which will be favourable to the farmers where that wheat is grown.

There are two matters with regard to which I want to say a few words at this stage. One of them is the fact that I made a trip to Rome last fall in order to attend the FAO meeting which is held every second year in order to discuss farm problems across the world. While I was there I took the opportunity to go down to Israel and to visit that country, my reason being that many of the policies which we follow on this continent had their origin many years ago over in that section of the Asiatic continent. Many of our ideals and ideas have been imported from there. In our setting up of many of our activities in relation to the sale of food products, we have made a study of what has happened over in that section of the world at some time or another, and then we have more or less followed the ideas which they developed away back in the early years.

When I was down there this time I was greatly surprised to have recalled to my mind many of the things we have discussed in this country, and particularly in the western part of Canada, over the years that I have been associated with government. We quite often ask ourselves the question as to where we got the idea about this and where we got the idea about that. Since being down to Israel I have concluded that we obtained many of the ideas we have through reading what we call the Bible, the story of these people back in that country. My reason for saying that is that when I was over there this time I found that they were following much the same policy or the same plan as that which we are trying to persuade the people to follow in western Canada—both areas are comparatively dry areas—or practically the same plan as was followed by the early settlers in what we call Israel back in the early years, and we go back to those areas today in order to get the basis for some of the things we are doing in the western part of Canada particularly and even right down across this country.

When I got over there I was surprised to find that they were digging out the dugouts they had down in the southern part of the new Israel—that is they were digging the sand out of them—and they were able to tell us at this late time that they were dug in the time of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. At that time they had dugouts, but those dugouts differ from ours in that they are dug in limestone. The dugouts were filled up with water just as ours fill up with water, and they utilize the water for the same purpose. History indicates that on different occasions these dugouts have been destroyed by the invasion of others who did not see the use of them. But at this time the people who are settled in Israel are going back, cleaning out these dugouts and allowing the water to run down from the hills alongside of them and fill the dugouts up again. In an area where there is a little bit more than four inches of rainfall in a year, they are going back to produce livestock just as they did in the days of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the years that we read about in our biblical stories.

As one goes through that country and visits the different areas there, one is struck by the fact that many of the things we are doing in this country were done there many generations ago, some of them back a thousand or more years before the birth of Christ. Hence it is interesting to go there. It is interesting to see these old structures—which were brought into being away back in the time of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—resurrected by those with modern thought and modern means of doing so. It is interesting to see functioning in that area of Israel the same kind of equipment as that which we use throughout Canada in order to dig dugouts or to build roads or do all of that kind of thing, repeating what was done there many hundreds of years ago or, as a matter of fact, many thousands of years ago.

When one pictures the results they are getting now and compares them with the results obtained in that time, one is really moved to think that we do not have developed in these days all of the things which are helpful to mankind. As a matter of fact while I was there I was compelled to conclude that about the only thing that is different now is that we have the internal combustion engine—and probably I should say we even have the steam engine—which is different from what they had. It was more a matter of using manpower in those days to do the things which we are doing now by mechanical power. I only wish to say at this stage that I found the trip over to Israel at the end of last year to be most helpful in arriving at conclusions as to how we might proceed, particularly in connection with the developments in western Canada having to do with drought.

I want to say a word also about irrigation in our own western area. I have noted in the press some references to my recent trip to Saskatchewan. I have here in my hand one editorial which was written yesterday, or at least which appeared in the paper yesterday. I do not know just when it was written. I suppose it appears because my estimates were coming before the committee today. In any case it appeared there. The heading is "Mr. Gardiner On His Own?". They put a question mark after that. I do not know just why they put the question mark there. Most people in reading that would say "Mr. Gardiner On His Own" and pretty well leave it at that.

Mr. Martin: He does not do badly on his own.

Mr. Gardiner: No; he does not do badly on his own.

Mr. Knowles: On his own what?

Mr. Gardiner: If they had put "is" at the beginning of it and had put the question mark at the end of it, it might have served the purpose just as well. What I wanted to say in relation to it is that the editorial goes on to say that I have been doing something which the rest of the government apparently has not been committed to.

Mr. Martin: I would not agree with that.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend says that he would not agree with that. I am quite sure he would not. But the fact is that the gentleman who wrote this editorial—I do not know that you can always be sure that it is the editor of the paper who writes the editorials—was not in possession of quite all the facts because he suggests that I took some position here which I was taking on my own and he is wondering whether the government would agree with what I had said. What did I say? I said this out in Saskatchewan when I was discussing these questions with a delegation who appeared before me in the hotel in the city of Saskatoon. They wanted to ask me something about the possibilities of there being a development of the South Saskatchewan river dam. I intimated to them that it is a question that is still under consideration, and a question that I was going to discuss with the provincial government the next day or two days later when I returned to Regina.

In discussing that question, I indicated to them that there had been a certain amount of money set aside for the purpose of further investigating the possibilities of the South Saskatchewan river dam. I indicated that in having these discussions we had some time ago ceased to pay too much attention to what had been in the report we received two years ago, and that we would probably now be willing to consider the representations that were being made by Saskatchewan and to which we were listening each time we made a trip to that area. I indicated that in so far as the reports which had appeared were concerned, it was just possible they did not cover everything which should be covered in connection with the discussion of the question.

The point raised by the editorial is something to the effect that I had said we were going to go ahead and do certain things. This assertion is based on a statement which I shall read from the editorial. The article speaks first about a classic story concerning Melbourne in the British house, and another story concerning Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Israel Tarte.

Mr. Harkness: What editorial is this?

Mr. Gardiner: It is an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 29, and it states:

> All this comes to mind upon our reading an interview which Mr. James Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, gave last week to the Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix. Mr. Gardiner told that newspaper that the government "has forgotten all about the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river", proceeded to make clear that he did not share in this lamentable lapse of memory. Mr. Gardiner, in other words, was disagreeing publicly with his cabinet colleagues on a matter of major policy—voicing dissatisfaction with their conduct.

I suppose I could leave the answer to that to my colleagues in the government. I am quite sure they will agree with what I am going to say now. Anything that I have done in connection with the Saskatchewan river dam has had the endorsation of the government of Canada, and the same is true of any discussions I have had with anyone who is concerned with it.

The story told here, I presume, was believed to have been a little wrong by someone out west because the press got in touch with me and asked me if I had really said what was in the report. I said, well, if you leave out the things that are put in between the quotation marks and put in something a little different and add what I really did say before the quotation marks were used, I would say, "yes, there is not anything particularly wrong with it." They questioned me some more, and here is what they wrote following that:

> Commenting on a statement made to the press in Saskatoon Thursday when he was quoted as saying the federal government has forgotten all about the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river dam, Mr. Gardiner said he explained the $250 million figure mentioned in the report represented, in addition to the dam, cost of irrigation and other expenditures.
> "This cost might pile up over a number of years," he said. "The federal government has nothing to do with much of this expenditure. When the dam has been constructed—if the federal government decides to proceed with it—all that is left for the government to do is to maintain the dam at the lake."
> "The rest would be up either to the provincial governments or the individual farmers who would pay for these additional costs", Mr. Gardiner said.
> The agriculture minister said that as far as these phases are concerned the federal government has forgotten all about them.

And I might add, the criticisms that have been made in connection with them.

> "Now, we are dealing with the provincial governments concerning the building of the dam."

That is to say, we are not dealing with the installation of an irrigation system all over that part of western Canada. These figures are not concerned with other matters that are only indirectly related to the building of the dam. A figure has been arrived at that we think will cover the cost of the dam, and the province is inclined to agree. You will recall that in the beginning the province took strong exception to the suggestion that this particular plan which they have had in mind over many years would cost $250 million. They said the plan as outlined would not cost $250 million, and we have been in agreement with them that in so far as the project just spoken of is concerned, and upon which we would give assistance, if proceeded with, it would not cost that amount of money. We agreed, therefore, to undertake further discussions with the government of Saskatchewan on the question.

I want to make it plain from the beginning that we have not committed this government, nor has the government of Saskatchewan committed itself, to any particular line of procedure. We had further discussions in Saskatchewan last Saturday while I was in the province. I am looking forward day by day to having further suggestions come to us from the government of Saskatchewan. In the meantime I am not in a position to make any further announcement about it than was made a year ago. We have not given any undertaking to anybody to do anything with the money of the people of Canada that has not been discussed fully here, and discussed fully elsewhere.

As a matter of fact, the sum of money that you will find in these estimates for this particular project is only $500,000. The item is still there, and as you know it is a project that will cost somewhere from $60 million up. The provincial government will assume some of it and the federal government will assume some of it, if it is ever done. At the moment there is no agreement between the province and this government, but the question is still being considered. The representations made by the government while I was there were representations that would help in arriving at a final decision in connection with the matter.

In so far as the article that appeared in the western papers is concerned, and which was copied in the eastern papers, the proposals made are very clear to one who has sat in on all the discussions, as I have. However, they are not so clear when one reads what is contained in the article. I would just ask you when you are reading the article—we can discuss the pros and cons of the statements as we go along with estimates—to note that about half the sentence will be in quotation marks and the other half will not. If the sentences had all been put in quotation marks, and only the things which were said could be put in quotation marks were printed, the story would have quite a different appearance.

Mr. Knowles: Were the commas in the right place?

Mr. Gardiner: Not all of them. Most of them were, but some were not.

The fact is that the matter is still under consideration. No one has turned the project down. It is still being considered; and any discussions which take place in connection with this debate should be associated with the fact that it is still being considered. I have a great deal of information with regard to it which, I think, can be brought out as we go along with the estimates.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more at the present time than to indicate that the plan has not been discarded. The plan has not yet been fully considered by the provincial government along with the federal government; and when it is, an announcement will be made by this government and, I presume, by the other government as well, as to what decision has been reached. I am not in a position to say today that we are going to build the dam in Saskatchewan, and I am not in a position to say that it is not going to be built. It is still under consideration, and it is being given the most careful consideration we can give to it.

With those remarks I am going to content myself with waiting until I hear some of the discussion which I presume will come from both sides of the house in relation to the present position of agriculture. I think, to state it mildly, that agriculture is in a better condition today throughout the Dominion of Canada than it has been at any other period in my experience. And when I say that, I do not mean only my experience in the government, but I mean as well my experience in farming. I think farmers all realize that they are in a better position today than they have been at any other time. I am not going to say that the government of Canada is entirely responsible for that; but I am going to say this, that we have not done anything to prevent it. And the situation has been improving from time to time.

As we discuss the estimates we will be able to go into the different points which concern us in relation to those matters having to do with agriculture. I want to thank hon. members for the extent to which they have denied themselves the privilege of saying all the things they might have liked to say until the estimates have come before the house. As we go along with the consideration of those estimates we will try to make whatever explanations are necessary.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, let me assure the minister that we are glad to see him back in the house in his usual good form—and I use the expression "his usual good form". I have noticed this time that the figures used are mainly cash figures. The strange thing, you know, is just how figures and tactics can change in a very few years. I can remember well that it was only a few years ago, when cash returns were not so good, during the war years, and when the farmers were taking less than the value of their products, it was always talk about volume—volume, volume, volume: everything was volume. Cash figures were never mentioned to any extent.

Then, only a year or so ago, the same condition was true with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Then the Minister of Agriculture comes before us today and changes the situation. When we have a condition when things are a little tougher than they were in 1951, he does not take the figures for one year. Oh no; he takes a three-year average. If the past year had been a good one, he would not take a three-year average; but because it is bad this year he goes back and grabs a year, three years ago, to try to make up for the bad year this year.

However, I am sincere when I say that we are glad to see him back in the house, in good form and in comparatively good health. He has said that we have approximately 33 million pounds of butter, which is not a surplus. Of course, if that were all the butter in Canada, probably it would not amount to a surplus; but I do not think anyone will agree with the minister when he says there is no surplus of butter in Canada.

It is true when he says that there is no large surplus of cheese.

I am not going into a discussion of the South Saskatchewan river project at this time, but most certainly I can see a good deal of debate in future along those lines.

There is no doubt about the position of agriculture in Canada today. Even though the Minister of Agriculture and others who support the government are making light of the present situation, the farmers of Canada know what that situation is. They are going to think what they like, regardless of what is said here in the House of Commons. They know how much money they have in their pockets. They know how much they will have left after they buy the necessities they have to buy. And, with the farmers, those are the figures that count.

One can readily understand why the minister took the average for the last three years. However, I have before me figures circulated by the dominion bureau of statistics which show index figures of farm prices for the last three years. This is the No. 1 issue for 1954, and the information is given in monthly and annual form.

The annual index figure for 1951, according to this publication, was 296.8; that for 1952 was 274.5; and for 1953 it was 247.5. Then I find here three other figures, namely those for January 1954, December 1953 and January 1953. The figure for January 1954 is 233.2. I take it the Minister of Agriculture will agree that these figures are correct. They indicate a reduction to the extent of 21.4 per cent in the prices of farm products since 1951. We will let the people decide for themselves whether there is any difference in the position of agriculture today from what it was a few years ago.

On the other hand, in that same period the prices of goods purchased by farmers has gone up by four per cent. It is clear therefore that while the gross income of farmers is down by 21.4 per cent the net income is further reduced by the fact that the goods the farmer has to purchase have increased in that same period to the extent of four per cent. That is the net position of the farmer today.

In the House of Commons for the past few years we have fought consistently for the retention and extension of trade with the United Kingdom. This government has just as consistently dropped trade with the United Kingdom and favoured the United States market. It is true that the market in the United States has given us a little better price. But while the price is better, I contend that the United States market has been so unstable that the average position is poorer than it would have been if we had taken a little less money and sold in the market we were sure of.

Would it not have been better to face squarely the price factor involved in trading with the United Kingdom than to be subject to the unpredictable quotas of the United States? We never know when there will be a quota on this or a quota on that—and this has been proven in the matter of dairy products and oats and, more recently, rye. In the case of oats, it is bad enough having the United States government imposing a quota, but when our own government officials agree to restrict the export of those oats, thereby allowing the United States government to get off the hook, then it is showing a pretty weak-kneed attitude, I would think.

What can we expect from the United States at the present moment? As near as I can find out from the latest figures available, the amount of farm produce the United States is holding, and is owned by the United States government today, is $6·75 billion worth. Farm produce to the amount of $6·75 billion worth is owned and held by the United States government. In the face of that, can we expect to sell them very much farm produce? It is true that a little beef has been going over to the United States in the last couple of weeks.

Within the last few months the United States has changed its policy, and according to the press the new plan is to be based, instead of on the price from 1907 to 1914, on the previous ten-year period to the year with which they are dealing. That is, if they are dealing with 1954 it will be taken from 1953 back to 1943 or 1944, the previous ten years from the year they are dealing with.

Another thing is that the latitude in determining the percentage of parity is to have much more elasticity, and they are going to be able to change it from one percentage to the other a great deal more than they have done heretofore. The other thing is, they are going to freeze excess commodity reserves. They are going to isolate them from the market. They will not be put on the domestic market to lower prices.

With the huge surpluses in the United States, as I said before, we cannot expect United States farmers to sit down and say nothing and allow our products to come in and be sold in that country. It is not necessary for me, really, to go back over this government's policy during the war years. Everyone knows about it, the farmers best of all. The farmers realize how much less they were forced to take for their products during the war. They were told that the markets would be retained for them after the war and that the reduction in prices would be made up to them to take care of the losses they took during the war years. What has happened is that since the war, when the markets got a little tough and it was not as easy to sell the products as it used to be, and production had gone up a little, the government more or less ditched the marketing of agricultural products and threw it back on the shoulders of the farmers and the provinces to deal with.

The Ontario cheese producers have accepted the ball. They were thrown a challenge last fall by this government that refused to help them in any way with respect to the surplus of cheese that they had on their hands. Therefore they did something themselves, and I want to commend the cheese producers of Ontario for doing it and probably leading the way in future marketing patterns.

As I said before, they found themselves with a surplus of cheese. That surplus was going to depress the domestic market so much that they felt it was better to take a small loss on some of this surplus and get rid of it, get it off the market. In doing so, I do not want anybody to say that it is dumping of cheese, because it is not. They were merely competing with the price at which England could buy cheese elsewhere. Do not let anyone say that that is dumping of cheese on the English market. They were merely taking a price that was competitive with other countries for the surplus of cheese and making it up to the producers by holding the price of domestic cheese to the point where our people could well afford to buy it, and which will pay the farmers a decent price for their cheese. They need to be congratulated on that which they thought at the time and still think was a good idea, namely, to get rid of the surplus cheese. In getting rid of that surplus cheese they not only helped themselves as cheese producers but they helped the entire dairy industry across Canada, and I think the dairy industry realizes that, as has been said on many occasions since that time. It was mentioned here, at the dominion-provincial conference, by the president of the dairy farmers of Canada. That is the position in which the farmers apparently find themselves in today.

What about the hog situation? The minister said there has been very little export of pork in the last year. There is a story behind the pork situation. As we all recall, in 1952 we had an outbreak of disease which we do not like to mention in this House of Commons, or any place else. But we know that in 1952 there was a terrific drop in the price of livestock products; so much so, that the government set a floor price on hogs of 23 cents. Although the price of hogs never did reach quite that low, it did have a definite effect on the number of hogs sent to the market. It is now having the opposite effect, and there is a scarcity of hogs in the country. I contend that the floor price of 23 cents is directly responsible for the shortage of hogs that we have today and the price of $36.50.

Fewer gilts are coming onto the market now than for quite some time, indicating that more hogs are being bred and of course we all know the inevitable result. In another year probably, or from six months to a year, more hogs will be coming to the market and the price will tumble. What is the government going to do when that happens? Have they any policy; have they any floor price? Have they any idea what the floor price might be? If they have, I have never heard anything mentioned along those lines, so I can only suppose that they have none, or if they have, probably they are not letting it be known at the moment. Although the minister said there was not much export of pork last year, I notice from the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics that last year we exported 55,320,000 pounds of pork, and of canned meat, of which I do not know the percentage of pork, but I would imagine it would be rather high in view of the fact that the government was holding quite a bit of canned pork at the time, there is another 30 million pounds. So that in all last year we exported 55,320,000 pounds of pork itself and then 30,255,000 pounds of canned meat, of which a moderate percentage would be canned pork.

As I say, the beef situation is quite a bit different. The price of beef is much less than pork at the present time and people are eating more beef. Certainly no pork to any extent is being canned now at today's prices. Then, as I said before, a little beef is now travelling across the border. When more pork comes on the market this fall the price of pork will no doubt go down. What will happen to beef at that time no one of course can say, but we can speculate that people will be eating a little less beef and a little more pork and that the amount of beef in storage may possibly rise.

With the exception of butter it is true that there is not much surplus of dairy products, but we should not overlook the surplus of breeding stock and the potential productivity of the dairy industry. Unless we have a very dry year and poor pasture it is evident that a tremendous amount of milk will be produced because of the surplus of dairy stock across the nation. There is no doubt about it that the livestock producers have been hit the hardest of any, so far as the price drop is concerned. With the average drop being 21·4 per cent, I would venture a guess that in the case of the livestock producer 30 per cent would be a conservative figure at which to place the reduction.

I am going to leave it to my colleagues to discuss the subject of the grain farmers of the west more thoroughly. However, even though government officials and government members have said that the surplus of wheat is a good thing, grain in storage, as I said the other night in the budget debate, will not buy the products that are necessary on the farm. It must be sold and the cash received before western farmers can buy the necessities of life, and until it is sold there is not much that the farmers can do in order to help to maintain employment in the cities. When farmers have money they are by far the greatest purchasers of manufactured goods and, as I also said the other night, I am glad to see that the labour unions are now realizing that fact. They are realizing more every day that the buying power of farmers means very much to them as labourers in industry in Canada.

During the last year the mixed farmers of eastern Canada may have made up on hogs what they lost on cattle, but nevertheless their purchasing power is reduced not only because they have fewer dollars in their pockets but also by the fact that they are fearful as to what prices they are going to receive tomorrow and they do not want to part with the dollar they have today, even for necessities. They are fearful because they remember what happened before. They are hanging on to the dollars they received yesterday instead of parting with them, because they are fearful as to what they are going to get for the products they sell tomorrow and in the future. Cheap food and a high level of employment certainly do not go together. Any drop in the net income of farmers will undoubtedly be felt by industry and labour alike.

The spread in prices from the producer to the consumer has always been a very important part of our debates and will probably continue to be. With people demanding more service and a nicer looking package, it is going to cost them more money. If the consumers of this country want to pay that kind of money for paper it is up to them. That is what they are doing today. They are paying a very high price for the wrapping around produce they are buying from farms across Canada. However, apparently that is what they want.

[Mr. Charlton.]

If the government at this time is going to throw the ball to the farmers to look after themselves, which is rather obvious, then we as farmers, with the assistance of our producer organizations, must be prepared to accept it. However, if that is the policy of the government then let them make sure that producers have adequate representation on all boards having to do with the sale of farm products.

Apparently the old idea of building up a nest egg for a rainy day period has been destroyed by the government through its taxation policies. In the budget debate a few nights ago I had something to say about income tax and I want to say something more now. It used to be that practically every farmer in the nation took pride in the fact that if he worked hard during his lifetime and saved his money he would have enough on which to retire in his old age. Taking good days and bad, ordinarily that would be true, but what has happened in the last twenty years has destroyed that theory.

In the good years from 1920 to 1929 farmers made money and paid off their mortgages, but in the thirties they had to remortgage. Then we came to the second world war and the government put a ceiling price on farm products preventing the farmers from getting any more for them. The result was that our farmers did not have the opportunity to make up what they had lost by way of depletion of their capital in the 1930's. They did not have a chance to do so in the last ten years because the income tax inspectors came along and took it away from them. The farmer has not been able to build up a surplus for a rainy day. If something goes wrong now he turns to the government. There is nothing else he can do because the government, through its taxation policies, has prevented our farmers from competing in export markets just as much as they have in the case of industry.

There is no doubt that taxation is the greatest single factor in the cost of production. I repeat that taxation is the greatest single factor in the cost of production for both industry and farmers, and as long as the government maintains the high taxation policy it has maintained the farmer is going to come to the government for assistance because he has not had a chance to build up a surplus to carry him over a bad period. The taxes on labour, component parts and finally on the manufacturer's price for the finished product spiral and spiral until the product reaches the consumer. As I said before, if the government refuses to reduce taxes, then the responsibility is thrown directly back on the manufacturer and farmer to try to compete with other people who are not burdened with that kind of taxation or high cost.

It is rather odd to find in the estimates that the amounts for postage, telegraph and telephones have gone up considerably in practically every item. The total amount may appear very trivial, but so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned the amount for postage has increased by $16,810.

That figure may sound trivial after the discussion we have heard here in the house concerning millions upon millions of dollars. But in addition there has been an increase in telephone and telegraphs of $21,842. I mention that, Mr. Chairman, because, as I have pointed out on previous occasions, this government has advised industry and farmers in particular to go out and cut costs which they say are the main reason why we cannot compete with other countries. But has this government made any attempt whatever to reduce the costs of administration? There was an increase of $38,652 in postage, telephone and telegraphs. What is the reason for that increase this year? That is what I want to know and it is what, I believe, many people want to know, because even though it may sound ridiculous to mention that figure in the same breath as the large item now before us in these estimates, it is still a figure which could be cut down. Unless this government in some way makes it evident to the people of Canada that they are attempting in some way to cut down administration costs, then I do not think they should urge the agricultural industry of this country to cut down their costs.

It is always wise to check back on the records of the past and look sideways once in a while in order to anticipate attacks coming from some other direction. In that regard I would say this to the government. Let them take off the coloured glasses long enough to get the true picture and see the danger signals looming up on the horizon.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, the minister gave us an interesting view of the agricultural picture in this country in which I myself am very much interested. I was interested in his remarks in regard to Israel and what he had seen there as regards ditches and irrigation. I do not come from an agricultural district and I have, since redistribution, lost a good many of my farmer supporters and I therefore have to rely very largely upon the people of my own city either to elect or to reject me, but I am interested in how irrigation might affect our city.

I notice the minister spent a great deal of his time in the course of his remarks on the question I raised during the budget speech, and I do not blame him, for the minister is very adroit, and must very well know that someone would certainly challenge him on the remarks he made in my own city and which were conveyed to the public through the medium of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix which, incidentally, is a pretty reliable newspaper. The minister dealt with the fact that some of his remarks were made in addresses to the S.R.D. association, and I notice that one interview was given to a reporter. I presume the minister sat down, as I have done upon occasion, and gave a considered statement to that reporter. I have some difficulty in understanding the speech which the minister has just completed and I would submit that that is not completely due to lack of intelligence on my own part, for the minister before now has mystified us on this question.

However, as I said the other day during my speech on the budget, I am glad to see the minister so well. In this regard I would like to endorse the remarks made by the hon. member who spoke first. Personally I have nothing against the Minister of Agriculture. Indeed I am very happy to see him here and, I might even say, altogether like his old self again. But that, of course, does not mean that I am not compelled to differ with him politically, particularly on this issue which means so much to my own city.

I am not going to go into the whole history of this thing. I will not go into the history of the project, nor the reasons why we require irrigation, but I think it would be perhaps as well to give one or two of the reasons why I find myself interested in it, because, as everyone knows, cities in our part of western Canada are completely dependent upon the prosperity of the farmers who live in the surrounding districts. If you reach the stage where the farmers through adverse circumstances can no longer live in that district, then, of course, you cannot expect prosperity in that city. As I have pointed out before, the irrigation of those prairie plains is the one thing which would bring about an increase in rural population. It would also bring about a diversification of farming, and bring about stability to the extent where the farmers would have insurance against the onslaught of drought. Therefore I make no apology for demanding that the dominion government should proceed forthwith with the construction of that dam.

At this point I would like to deal with something of the story of these press reports which the minister, I notice, was particularly careful to explain and about which I have no doubt he must feel some degree of sensitivity. I know I would if I were in his position. A cabinet minister who, after all, must speak for the government, whether he wishes to or not, cannot just go running around the country saying these things and not expect to be challenged in regard to them in the House of Commons.

The minister in his speech today said some rather peculiar things. I am not going to quote them. But as I remember it he said he had not undertaken to do anything which he had not undertaken. I cannot make head or tail of that particular statement. He did say that he is not in a position to say the dam is going to be built. I quite realize that, but I want to go back to the quotations from the various interviews the minister granted in my own province, and some of them in my own city. Apparently the minister had a busy week. I will not go into his political activities, but we were told here that he did not attend the conference called by the S.F.U. and that he was closeted with Dr. Partridge of the Liberal association. But that is small potatoes. Let us get on to the main issue. I notice the first quotation here is from a clipping in which it is stated that the outlook for the dam was never better. That is the opinion expressed by one of the officials of the Saskatchewan river dam association after he came away from a meeting with the very persuasive minister.

As I said the other day, I am amazed how good the minister is at that sort of thing. Here we have a man completely convinced that the outlook for the dam was never better just because, forsooth, the minister gave a little talk. I have heard the minister talking for what must be close to thirty years, but on this occasion I propose to put on the record some of the things the minister has said. However, there it is. "The outlook for the dam was never better", says the Star-Phoenix in a headline on April 22. The minister said today, and I do not blame him at all, that he objects to these quotation marks. If I were the minister I would prefer never to have what I said put in quotation marks, because after all these quotation marks are rather difficult to wriggle away from. They put them around what you actually have said and you have difficulty saying that that is not what you said, or not what you meant to say. Without these quotation marks there could be a good deal of paraphrasing by the minister and by other people who happen to read the speech. But I want to draw attention to the quotation marks to which the minister objects, and in this case this is not a speech which might be made on the spur of the moment by a man who is either optimistic or irresponsible.

[Mr. Knight.]

This is an interview. By the way, let us have the headlines first. They are rather large; I think they can be seen all over the house. The headline is, "Ottawa Ignoring Commission's Report on Dam, says Gardiner." A minister is speaking, a minister of a responsible government. Then I thought back and I said to myself, "Does the cabinet know what the minister is saying?" Does Mr. St. Laurent know what he is saying? He was on the same platform as the minister and on a not too far distant occasion. At any rate the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister were on the same platform at Regina. I think it was before the election. There the Prime Minister gave a rather categorical statement that under the circumstances of the adverse report the dam would not be proceeded with. Now we have the minister apparently speaking for his colleagues and this is what he said within these objectionable quotation marks:

The federal government—

And then the quotation marks start.

—"has forgotten all about the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river dam," . . .

The cabinet either knows about that statement or it does not know about that statement. If it knows about that statement, then it meant it to be made. I wonder what the Prime Minister's comment would be at this moment in view of that particular situation where previously he gave the categorical statement that the dam under the circumstances of that adverse report would not be proceeded with. I think that is a fair question. I do not think that I am going to go into the rest of this article. As a matter of fact, the minister picked out from it those parts which, I presume, in his opinion were on his side of the argument and took, as it were, my feet from under me somewhat by advancing them first. That is an old trick and a perfectly legitimate one.

Mr. Martin: It is not a trick.

Mr. Knight: The minister knows all about tricks. In case the record would not get it, the minister of—what is it?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member should be interested enough to know that.

Mr. Knight: It is the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and as to him may I say that I will stick with Shakespeare and say that there are no tricks in plain and simple faith. There is no one who knows more about tricks than does the Minister of National Health and Welfare and there is no one who can get up here and do a better job of twisting things a little bit and making them look a little bit different. I would not say whether he or the Minister of Agriculture is more adroit at that particular feat.

Mr. Martin: That is a compliment that I take with great satisfaction.

Mr. Knight: Personally I much prefer the method of the Minister of Agriculture who is accustomed to use a club. Faced with the choice between the club of the Minister of Agriculture and the stiletto of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will take the club of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member is partial because he comes from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knight: Let the minister make his own speech. If he is going to justify this thing about the Saskatchewan dam, I shall be pleased to hear from him in due course.

It is interesting that the Ottawa Journal would pick up these particular quotations from statements of the minister, or alleged statements, if that phrase suits the minister, as they appeared in the Star-Phoenix.

All this comes to mind upon our reading an interview which Mr. James Gardiner,—

He might have called him Hon. James Gardiner.

—the Minister of Agriculture, gave last week to the Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix. Mr. Gardiner told that newspaper that the government "has forgotten all about the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river", . . .

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, just to keep the record straight, may I say that I did not say any such thing.

Mr. Knight: It is here. I have these little quotation marks. These things in quotation marks are here. The minister does not like them. However, what we find here is this:

Mr. Gardiner told that newspaper that the government "has forgotten all about the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan river", proceeded to make clear that he did not share in this lamentable lapse of memory. Mr. Gardiner, in other words, was disagreeing publicly with his cabinet colleagues on a matter of major policy—voicing dissatisfaction with their conduct.

I myself do not agree with that. I think he went too far. The editorial continues:

Whether Mr. Gardiner is right in remembering or his colleagues right in forgetting, is not here the point. The relevant thing is: What about collective cabinet responsibility? Has it been thrown into the discard, looked upon as a useless relic of the days of Melbourne and Laurier?

That is pretty well the extent of the minister's statement at Saskatoon. If the minister with his usual agility can wiggle himself off that hook, I shall be interested to see him do it. There is no one who is better equipped to do it, but I doubt if even he can.

There are so many things one could say about this matter that one does not know where to begin. The minister says the dam has not been promised. He says now that he is in full agreement. He said today that the members of the cabinet were in full agreement with this statement. He did not say that they knew he was going to make it. But he certainly did say that with regard to anything he was doing or saying about this dam, his colleagues knew about it. That is something new. That is a bit of a change from a year ago.

I have in my hand Hansard of February 9, 1953 and I am going to take the liberty of quoting a word or two from what the minister said on that particular occasion. I would point out that the occasion is different; and when the occasion is different the minister's statement becomes different. Here we go. It is the matter of making adjustments and balances. At page 1740 of Hansard of February 9, 1953 I find the minister reported as saying this, and he is speaking about the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Alberta:

But neither one of those governments has any undertaking, either from myself or from the government of Canada, that we are going to go ahead with those projects.

The reference was to certain irrigation projects in which there was included the building of the South Saskatchewan dam. I now come to the next page, 1741, where I find the minister is reported as saying this:

Well, I am going to tell you this: I do not know any more about who is supporting and who is opposing the project in the government of Canada than you do, and I am going to tell you why. It has never yet been discussed before the government of Canada,—

That was the question of the Saskatchewan dam. Now today I am congratulating the minister on having reached the point where we have got a bit of this collective responsibility and that he has now reached the point where he takes his colleagues in the cabinet into his confidence and says, "As to what I do, they know what I am doing". I am glad that the minister has now committed himself to the idea that the government and, I presume, the Prime Minister, is prepared to go ahead and do something about this construction.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say what my hon. friend has just stated.

Mr. Knight: May I say quite frankly that I am prepared to accept a statement when I hear it from the Prime Minister of Canada.

I now come to another quotation on the same page, 1741. There the minister says this:

Therefore I come back to the point that the building of the dam never was discussed in council—

I presume that is the cabinet.

—before the 30th day of May or since.

We do make advances with the dam, for it is thirty years since it was first discussed, and in another thirty we may get something out of it. The minister is asked some questions here. The hon. member for Prince Albert was amazed when the minister said that the cabinet did not know anything about this. I am quoting the minister now, as reported at page 1744:

We have not yet discussed it with the province of Saskatchewan since the report is out, and until it is discussed we are not in position to proceed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or with the cabinet?

Mr. Gardiner: Or with the cabinet.

So it had not been discussed with the cabinet and it had not been discussed with Saskatchewan. But today we are in the assured position—we are all ready for another election—that the cabinet is unanimous and no doubt they will be doing something about the building of this dam. The Leader of the Opposition addressed a question to the minister and he obtained the same answer. This is at page 1747 of Hansard. I have one other little place marked. I did not know that I had these passages marked until I found this old Hansard report and it is tremendously useful to me today. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre got into the discussion at that point. I quote:

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister mean the members of the government with whom he has not discussed the matter?

Mr. Gardiner: I think I know them as well as my hon. friend does.

Mr. Knowles: But the minister says he has not discussed the question with them at all.

Mr. Gardiner: I have a pretty good idea what they think about most of the matters I am talking about in spite of the fact we have not discussed them.

On that occasion the minister said he thinks he knows what they think about it. I am glad that now we have got a little farther because he said today that he knows not only what they think about it but what they say about it and they are all in agreement about it. Away we go to the races for another year, and the next election.

I could go on, of course, because this subject has been discussed for so long and so much has been put on the record. I have accused the minister, I have indicted him for making contradictory statements, and probably in that case it is my responsibility to prove I am right in my assertion. I am going to give you a quotation from one more speech that the minister made at Southey, Saskatchewan. The press report reads:

Agriculture minister Gardiner told an election meeting last night . . . etc.

I really need to read only the relative part.

This work for irrigation could be started as soon as the need for employment arose after the war.

Here we are today with more than 500,000 men out of work, and no public works shelf. We heard about a public works shelf back in 1945, but the goods have gone off the shelf now. There is not any shelf. This work for irrigation could be started as soon as the need for employment arose after the war, says the minister.

In addition the minister told of a large program for which the plans were only partly drawn, costing $110 million in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It would involve a dam on the Saskatchewan river near Outlook, Saskatchewan.

I might have said that speech was made at a political meeting in 1945. The Leader-Post commented on that speech in an editorial as follows—I am sorry but I cannot say what the minister said. All I can do is stress these quotation marks that are here. The editorial says:

All in all, it was a valuable as well as a provocative speech which Mr. Gardiner made. What he told the three provinces and the people of the three provinces in a word was that the federal government does not need any more urging. It already has both the intention and the authority to go ahead on the four major water conservation projects named.

May I point out in that regard, too, that one of those things was the Outlook dam. There is a lot more of it. Here is something a Liberal M.P. said speaking at Kindersley. The press report states:

He stated that he had secured assurances—

I would not know where.

—that one hundred and eleven million dollars would be available for the proposed scheme.

Then, the Leader-Post of April 27, 1946, under the title "Saskatchewan dam assured", carried the following article. I shall read only the third paragraph.

The dominion government thus did not need the endorsation of the South Saskatchewan river development association to begin work on the South Saskatchewan river. It had already decided to go through with it.

I will give you another one. This one is a speech made by Mr. Gordon Ross, and perhaps we cannot hold the minister responsible for what he said. The press report states:

Tenders will be called shortly for the much discussed South Saskatchewan irrigation scheme, J. Gordon Ross, Moose Jaw, intimated at a Liberal nominating meeting here Wednesday.

As a comment I would say that would be a likely place for such a statement to be made. The date is May 23, 1946. The article continues with the following in quotation marks:

"The scheme has been worked out; much of the engineering has been done and before long some contracts will be allowed", Mr. Ross said, "and a start will be made as soon as men and equipment are available."

Well, that is that. As for the expenditure, I noticed that in his speech today the minister emphasized that this was not largely an expenditure by the dominion government, but after all the provincial government was going to pay for a lot of it. The federal government would only have to build the dam and then look after maintenance. There was not a word of that before 1951. In all those old election speeches that I recall there was not a word about it. The minister never said anything about Saskatchewan participation when he spoke in the Technical school in Saskatoon back in 1944 at the time of the provincial election. He said, "We will build this dam", and he mentioned the sum of $110 million. I see the minister is ready to get up and tell me that some of that was for Alberta.

Mr. Gardiner: I will not bother you.

Mr. Knight: Thank you.

Mr. Gardiner: You are doing yourself enough harm; I do not need to bother.

Mr. Knight: When I made a speech in 1952 similar to this before the election the minister told me to keep right on going because I was hanging myself. The minister said that in the city of Saskatoon he had a lot of friends and I would be doing myself a lot of harm. Well, sir, I took that risk and the Minister of Agriculture was one of the five cabinet ministers who came to my city before the election. May I point out to him that I am back here now and returning his kindly visit.

Mr. Nicholson: With a bigger majority than ever.

Mr. Knight: Never mind the majority, but it is a larger one and one that shows a one to one correspondence in thousands to the numbers of cabinet ministers who visited our city.

It was only in 1951 that we were astonished to find, after we came back after the election, that Saskatchewan would have to help finance this scheme. The figure the minister mentioned then was the sum of $33 million for the province and that has been increasing since. It was boosted to $45 million, and at the moment I do not know where it is, but the Saskatchewan government is going to have plenty of responsibility in regard to the building of that particular project.

Now, our people are getting a bit angry about this. I do not know whether the failure of this government to do anything about the project had anything to do with the results of the last dominion and provincial elections in Saskatchewan. I believe the minister would at least admit that in those elections his party was none too successful. I believe I shall leave it at that. After a while you get tired of being promised these things. You get tired of these deviations and these twistings. Even the Star-Phoenix, which is a good newspaper and usually leans quite heavily on the Liberal side, does not like these things.

Here is a clipping from the Star-Phoenix of April 29, 1953. It is headed "New Deal on the Dam", and reads:

Mr. Gardiner's suggestion for a new deal on the South Saskatchewan river dam cannot be taken seriously.

Have we got to the point where the senior Liberal member and cabinet minister for Saskatchewan cannot be taken seriously? If so, I think it is too bad. I should like to be able to take seriously the words of any cabinet minister. This article goes on:

He has been making speeches about the dam throughout the country ever since 1946.

I could correct that, for it was a lot earlier than that. I am not going to go into this matter any more, but the article concludes by saying:

Mr. Gardiner cannot escape announcing a federal policy—

That is all they know about it, they underestimate the minister.

—for the South Saskatchewan river by raising additional questions. The reception which the people of Saskatchewan gave to the report of the royal commission should have been enough to tip him off that the people of this province are in earnest about getting some irrigation developments started long enough before the next drought to do some good. Moreover, the Saskatchewan River Development Association is not leading a delegation to Ottawa this week to be confronted with a new set of conundrums—

That is not my word.

—designed to get Mr. Gardiner or the federal government off the hook. We want to know what the federal government proposes to do about the Outlook dam.

And I want to know; and I think everybody else does, and particularly everybody else who lives in that particular section of the country.

Well, sir, I did not intend to say nearly as much as I have said; but maybe it is a good thing that someone should draw attention to these statements. The minister goes out to the west and makes statements. Then he comes back and, in his usual manner, he explains them away in the house—"I meant this" or "I did not mean this" or "the reporter put a comma in"— the last time it was a comma. Do you remember the famous comma? Today it is quotation marks he objects to. And let me say if I were accused of making that statement, I would object to the quotation marks too.

I think we should have some forthright statement. I give the minister credit for wanting to have the dam. I believe he does want it. But let us know what the state of affairs really is. The Prime Minister says one thing at a meeting in Regina and the Minister of Agriculture says something else at Saskatoon. Then he comes here and says something which I, at least, interpret as being different.

Either we should drop this thing as a political dodge or we should build it. Preferably, I am in favour of building it. Meantime, if you cannot build it, then be honest about it and say so. The minister will say, of course, "I was honest and said so". He has already quoted passages to that effect. Well, what are we to take from these quotations? The minister goes out and makes these statements. They are given to us in quotation marks. If it is true that this cabinet has now decided to ignore the commission's report on the dam, then that is a cabinet decision. What is that cabinet decision? Is the cabinet decision that the dam is to be proceeded with? If it is to be proceeded with, is it to be proceeded with forthwith? Let us know.

Let me finish this speech by saying, as I said to my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare: There are no tricks in plain and simple faith.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, although I am an enthusiastic supporter of irrigation and a supporter of the Saskatchewan irrigation scheme—when it is finally determined just what is the best scheme, and who is going to pay for it—I do not propose to follow the previous speaker in respect of his general theme.

I would like to join with those who have already spoken in expressing our rejoicing that the minister is back, and that he is rapidly recovering his old fighting form which, I am sure, all hon. members have greatly enjoyed, even though at times they may not have rejoiced over the things he was saying or what he was doing. But we do want to have him back and in a condition to say those things.

[Mr. Knight.]

There is another reason I am glad the minister is not going to be eased out of the house by the hospital route, and that is this, that of all the men in the cabinet who have spoken in respect of the question, the Minister of Agriculture has manifested the greatest degree of forward looking in the matter of the disposal of our surpluses—getting them out of the country. The minister will correct me if I paraphrase inaccurately what I believe he said on one of his trips. As I recall it he said, in effect, that if we cannot devise means whereby we can get our surpluses into the hands of those who need them, then that fact must indicate that we are deficient or lacking in ideas.

The minister indicated clearly to me, and I believe to those to whom he was speaking, that in his opinion it was possible for us to get our surpluses into the hands of those who need them, regardless of whether or not they had anything to pay in return. And I would gather there was an implication in the minister's remarks that an obligation was imposed upon us to exert ourselves in an effort to solve that problem.

It was almost like a spring in the desert to find those words coming from the Minister of Agriculture, a minister in a Liberal cabinet at Ottawa. I am glad to see him back. I would encourage him to go straight along that line, and he will find me right behind him when he does.

I enjoyed the minister's review of the position up to the present time, although he did not tell us a great deal. He did give a few facts. I am not sure however that they were related generally to our whole problem. They did not give us any definite idea as to what we could expect in the future in relation to the stability of agricultural conditions in our country—and that is something we are all looking for, including the minister. I think it is fitting that we should lay down for ourselves some general principles in agriculture upon which we can go forward.

No one in the house needs to be told that the backbone of this nation is agriculture. If we allow our farmers to be impaired in their efficiency and in their effort to produce the needs of life, we shall seriously weaken the whole economic fabric of Canada, right from the foundation. We shall destroy the confidence which in these days of great anxiety is of much importance. To illustrate, all we have to do is to remember what happened to farmers a few years ago in the matter of hog production. They were preparing themselves to produce hogs to fill further orders, and suddenly the bottom fell right out of the market, and all the producers of hogs in the west were, as they have expressed it, burned. Most farmers sternly resolved, in most emphatic language, that they would never touch hogs again.

We do not want that kind of condition to develop again in the west in connection with any agricultural product, because by the time the farmers recover their confidence it may be too late. As everyone knows we are in dangerous times.

Now, the principles in which Social Crediters believe are, I believe, the same as those in which all other people believe, so far as farming is concerned. The first of these is that the price of farm products to farmers must not be permitted to fall, except in accordance with a general corresponding fall in the prices of all items entering into their costs of production. For hundreds of years economies and governments have succeeded in making farmers take the rap when an endeavour was made to bring prices down in a country. I hope that we are too enlightened in this age to attempt to do that any more.

I have said on the floor of this house that prices of certain commodities had to come down. I did not mean they should come down while the cost of production stayed up. That is the first general principle. We should like to know whether the minister agrees with that and whether his department is to be guided by that principle and whether there is to be one hundred per cent backing of him and his department in the cabinet at Ottawa in the advocacy of that principle. If there is, we shall support it, the minister, his department and the government in respect of agricultural prices, and so will the people.

The second great principle is this—I am not sure everyone will agree with this, but the minister will come somewhere near agreeing with it I believe. We should have capacity production of all non-perishable foods, capacity both in respect of variety and of quantity. This is no time to begin to cut our production in reference to any of the needs of life. I believe every hon. member agrees in that respect. Well, if every hon. member agrees in that respect, let us put pressure on our government to see that they live up to it—and we can do it. The Liberal members can do it and they will have the opposition behind them in that wholesome endeavour.

The third principle is that all of the non-perishable foods ought to be stored on the farms in storage facilities accepted by government inspectors. There is altogether too much danger in this world today to have our great storehouses of food built in places like Fort William where a lucky bomb could blow the whole of a season's supplies right out of existence.

Mr. McIvor: It is a great place in which to live.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, it is a great place to see everything blown to the sky. I noticed that as I was coming by, just the other morning. They have even made those great elevators white so the enemy can locate with greater ease. I ask any hon. member whether he thinks it is safe to have this nation storing food all in such conspicuous and readily accessible concentrations as that. No one will say it is any longer safe.

There is another important matter, and that is as regards the elevators in which we store grain all over the prairies—it is easy to detect and destroy them. As a matter of fact, as the hon. member for Peace river says, they are landmarks. Imagine what a merry time a flotilla of bombers that happened to get over our guard coming in from the north would have just utterly demolishing every one of those concentrations of elevators at every important point clear down Alberta's length and breadth, from the Peace river to the United States border. Similarly with the Saskatchewan elevators; with just one blow they could knock down seven, eight, nine or ten elevators all in a row. Think of what likewise could be done in Manitoba. It is easy enough for us to be supercilious about this matter and smile, but there will be no smiles if the thing happens. There would be nothing but dismay. Let us remember that that thing could happen to you and me within the next year. What are we going to do about this? Are we to be just sitting ducks inviting the enemy to come, or are we going to do something about it? All of this indicates, in my judgment, that we should adopt forthwith a policy of storage on the farm.

The fourth principle which I think is very important is this. Let us expand our production in purposeful teamwork with the British commonwealth and the United States. I do not know what has happened to the British people and the United States people within the last ten or twelve years. We seem to have got the idea that there is no security, there is no validity in anything British or Anglo-Saxon any more. It has got to be international, or it has no virtue. Let me warn hon. members that in my opinion we shall live to see, and we shall not have to live very long, the United Nations crumble as we saw the league of nations crumble.

Mr. Ellis: You will help them.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not going to help them. Let us have a little sense. I am just warning that this thing could occur.

Mr. Hollingworth: Does the hon. member who is speaking think that the methods of Senator McCarthy conform to Anglo-Saxon traditions?

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member will bring his question up in an appropriate place where we can deal with it then I shall deal with him until he wishes he had never brought it up. It has nothing in the world to do with what we are discussing at the present time, and anybody who brings it up is just plain cheap. He is not thinking about the big problems in the country at all. Any person in this house who would be cheap in these times is just not fit to be here. That is my opinion, and I will maintain it right to the limit, and I think the hon. member will when he gets outside and thinks it over.

Let me say once more that we should develop in co-operation with the British commonwealth. You can count on the members of the British commonwealth; you can count on Britain. We have always been able to count on her, and I would ask you, what other countries can we count on, outside of the United States? Let us be realistic and pay a little more attention to the British commonwealth.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock the house will proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There are several divorce bills on the order paper, Bills Nos. 423 to 440, inclusive. Is it the consent of the house that they should be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill No. 423, for the relief of Mary Joy Thomson Asselin.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 424, for the relief of Ronald Arthur Leslie.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 425, for the relief of Lucienne Saint-Laurent Calve.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 426, for the relief of Roberta Barbara Shvemar Feigelman.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 427, for the relief of Pearl Marie Neil Lane.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 428, for the relief of Marjorie May Price Amory.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 429, for the relief of Marie Jeannette Laure Lafreniere Lucas.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 430, for the relief of Frances Goldberg Glegg.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 431, for the relief of Thelma Nellie McKeage Patrick.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 432, for the relief of Madeleine Roy Julien.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 433, for the relief of Louis Tothe. —Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 434, for the relief of Joseph Delphis Guillaume Delorme.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 435, for the relief of Nicolas Joseph Ladislas Barath.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 436, for the relief of Ferencz Gyula Babinszki.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 437, for the relief of Beatrice Alexandra Duff Sheppard.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 438, for the relief of Remi Charbonneau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 439, for the relief of Kathleen Florence Pippy Hayward.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 440, for the relief of Fred Skiffington.—Mr. Hunter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The business under private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will revert to the consideration of the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $432,490.

Mr. Blackmore: I had been dealing with four principles that I had laid down as being desirable in respect of our agriculture. I was urging that we keep our eyes on the British commonwealth and the United States. If others then wish to fall in line, very well, but if they do not, our foundations are not going to crumble because they fall out of line. We can be great and powerful and accomplish the mission that the Lord intended us to accomplish without having any serious complications with peoples other than our own and I do not intend any offence to anybody else.

In my judgment the fifth principle is this: Let us aim to produce for our own adequately, and then some for our neighbours. Let us be conscious of that all the time. If it is flax, if it is sugar, if it is wheat, if it is any one of all the essentials of life, let us produce adequately for our own, make ourselves as nearly self-supporting as possible, and then produce some for our needy neighbours. They are going to need all we can give them.

I have in my hand a letter dated April 23, 1954 that I have just received from the North American regional office of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations. There are passages in it which I believe we should contemplate once more and see if we cannot do something about the situation. Speaking of the food supply, here are some of the words:

> However, global estimates tend to give a favourable impression, obscuring the fact that because of great differences in production between regions and countries, people in many areas have still less to eat than before the war, especially in the Far East.

Speaking of the 1953 report which has just come out, the letter has this to say:

> This report gives two outstanding features of the current world food situation. One, the vital necessity of raising productivity, per man and per hectare, in the underdeveloped areas. The other, nothing less than the sheer magnitude of the world food problem as a whole, still not properly appreciated in many countries. Whatever standards are taken, some 70 per cent of the world's people are living below the present average world diet. To raise their diet to that average, itself far below the best fed countries' level, would take an additional food supply equal to the total 1952-53 production of North America and Oceania combined.

In the light of that I ask any member in the house: Can you conceive of its being a sensible thing for us to limit our production of grains and non-perishable foods like beans, corn, flax and so on? The letter continues with this quotation from the report:

> "Compared with the real human needs of the deficit countries, as distinct from what they can afford to buy, food stocks now accumulating shrink into insignificance. Whatever supplies are shipped to those countries, whether in the normal way of commerce or as gifts or loans, can do no more than alleviate their real needs. A basic improvement", the report says, "in their food supply, must come primarily from a steady increase in their own production. To help forward this improvement is the main task of FAO."

I offer this comment on the letter. I have had the impression ever since we began forming these FAO's and all the rest of them that there has been an unreality about their performance. FAO, for example, is designed to supply surpluses from one country to another, but somehow or other it never enters into the minds of those in the organization concerned with planning and operating that the money has to come from somewhere. Money is the thing that counts in these matters. The result is that FAO has been just about as valuable as a fifth wheel as far as actually getting anything done in the world is concerned.

They tell me that the world still has fourteen hundred million people going to bed hungry every night. While FAO is all right as an ornament, it might just as well be written off unless we supplement it in a way that will really make it able to do its job. I believe the men in charge want to do the job.

There is another quotation further on in the letter which I think it is important for us to have. It reads as follows:

> . . . and the task of finding some solution to the problem of distribution is one of primary importance.

Of course it is, but I ask hon. members how many times they have heard anyone in this house suggest a means of increasing distribution. Outside of the Social Credit group, who has suggested any means that could increase distribution? I ask them to read the newspapers, the big wise, know-it-all newspapers like the Ottawa Journal, the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Windsor Star, the Montreal Star and all the others that can tell us all about how to run everything.

Mr. Knowles: Do not forget the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh yes. When have they ever said one single word about how to improve distribution? When have they ever done anything except to attack and assail those who did try to offer suggestions? That is a serious matter. I did not name all the offending newspapers, but the pathetic thing is that throughout the nation from coast to coast and throughout the United States this matter of distribution is the one great problem we all recognize but never try to do anything about. Somebody has got to do something about it. And may I suggest that we cannot do something about it if we use only the old measures which have been tried and tried and proved wanting ad nauseam.

Here is another short quotation. The letter writer has been telling about how FAO had referred this particular problem of distribution to a working party—noble little working party; Canada is a member of it! A bright lot of information it will get from Canada, especially if Canada sends the Minister of Finance because he has never offered a suggestion in his long life about how to increase distribution. He will not even listen to suggestions of any kind. I say that right to his face, and I do not blame him for not answering, because I know he cannot answer that point. Neither he nor any other member of the Liberal party has ever made any effective suggestion to this house as to how to deal with the problem of distribution. All they talk about is free trade, but free trade has been tried for thousands of years and has never succeeded yet.

Mr. Abbott: Higher and higher protection.

Mr. Blackmore: That is just as foolish.

Mr. Knowles: Everybody is stupid but our John.

Mr. Blackmore: Everybody likes to get away from the heat, but you don't have to go to the point of freezing. What you want to do is to find the proper place in between—the middle road.

Now this is what it says about this working party which has been working away something like the group of brilliant Canadian men who went to the Bretton Woods conference and signed an agreement. They sat around and listened to a lot of communist spies telling them stories and selling them a bill of goods. They then came back and pretended they had achieved something wonderful. But all they had was a gold brick. But here is what this writer says about this working party:

> The working party was in no position to find a complete solution to this question of surpluses, but they did review and draw up recommendations for several types of special arrangements for surplus disposal, at least in line with existing supplies and to prevent the accumulation of new surpluses.

Now, is that not a bombastic way of saying they did nothing? It is a most effective way of telling people that the working party could do nothing and never will do anything as long as such parties are composed of people who cannot look into the future as the Minister of Agriculture was evidently endeavouring to do when he suggested that if we could not find a means of getting surplus goods into the hands of those who need them there must be in us a deficiency of ideas. Let us get the ideas. They are around and they can be found. Back in 1915 our fathers had the ideas as to how this thing of distributing could be done, and they did it under the finance acts of 1914 and 1923, as I indicated on April 28 in my talk.

And so, there are five things that need to be said about this question of agriculture. First, let us see to it that we do not force our primary producers to take the rap in our endeavours to bring down the cost of living in this country. Everyone knows that the cost of living should be brought down. As I have already indicated, however, we should not force the farmers to bring it down and crush them under the burden, without bringing about a corresponding reduction in their costs which now are becoming so onerous. To suggest that the farmers should carry this burden is an improvident and most fallacious proposal. Secondly, we should work for the greatest possible degree of production of every kind of which this country is capable, and we should concentrate on the production of goods which will not perish such as beans, peas, corn, all the grains, sugar, and the like. Third, we must store these commodities on the farm and provide adequate storage facilities. Fourth, in all our efforts we must work in co-operation with the British commonwealth and the United States. And fifth, we must produce as far as we possibly can all the things we need ourselves and some which are needed by our neighbours, and then see to it that those neighbours get those goods.

The question might be raised as to how we are going to finance all this. Well, I have already said enough about that. In my speech on November 17 I went into that question in detail and I also dealt with it in my remarks on April 28, and I challenge any man in or outside of this house to find any flaw in the suggestions I made. I do not care who he is.

To say that we cannot take from the Bank of Canada money to provide the storage facilities is simply to talk nonsense. If we cannot take that money out of the Bank of Canada then we had better replace the Bank of Canada with the Finance Act of 1923, because under that act they were able to do it. To say that we cannot take the money out of the Bank of Canada to pay the farmers for their grain after it is put into storage is once more to be unrealistic. To say that we cannot take money out of the Bank of Canada to pay the farmer for the storage of the grain while he takes care of it on his farm is once more to be unrealistic. And to pretend that taking money out of the Bank of Canada would cost the taxpayer anything is thoroughly unrealistic. This would apply to all that is required in storing all the different kinds of non-perishable goods which Canada can produce over the next ten or fifteen years. Let anyone who thinks he can answer those statements get up right now and try.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are the Social Credit proposals in regard to the problems facing our agricultural industry. If we adopt these proposals, and back the Minister of Agriculture in his endeavours to make the agricultural industry of Canada greater and greater in the years ahead, I will guarantee that with his leadership it shall be done.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the minister in his speech this afternoon contended that the farmers in Canada are now in a better position than at any other time in their history. That is a contention with which I think he will find the farmers of this country cannot agree, and certainly the statistics do not bear it out. In spite of that, however, the minister devoted almost all of his speech to an attempt to prove that that statement was true, except for that part which he devoted to the South Saskatchewan dam. I am not going to deal with that matter.

However, with the aid of a few statistics available to me in the house at the moment, I would like to demonstrate that the group of figures which the minister put on record covering the cash income of the farmers during the period from 1943 to the present time, and which he used with the evident idea of trying to persuade the house and, of course, farmers throughout Canada that they are better off now than ever before, do not prove that at all. As a matter of fact, there are other figures which show that the reverse is the case. The minister dealt with the cash income of farmers over three-year periods and, as I have already pointed out, he did that evidently for his own purpose because if he had put them on the record on a year to year basis it would have given us a much better indication of the amount of income, cash or otherwise, the farmer earned during the past 11 years.

The minister stated that the farmers' cash income for the last two years amounted to $5,574 million. The estimate, including the third year—which would be the year 1954, he must mean—would bring this up to $8,200 million. That means that he has estimated the cash income for farmers for this year, 1954, as $2,626 million. On what basis he has estimated that figure, goodness only knows. Certainly the budget figures that were produced will not bear out any estimate of that kind. In other words, he has estimated about the same cash income as the average for the two years preceding, namely 1952 and 1953; and 1952 was the top year which we have ever had as far as the farmer's income is concerned. Nevertheless, the minister is estimating just about as much as the average of those two years. What they were separately, I do not know. I do not think for a minute that that estimate can be taken very seriously.

When the minister was attempting to do this same thing last year he did not use the figures of cash income. I have here a copy of Hansard of April 27, 1953, and this is what he said then as reported at page 4440. He dealt then with the net income of farmers:

> Net income to farmers from the sale of farm products reached a peak of $2·2 billion in 1951. Estimates for the net income received in 1952 are placed at just under $2 billion. There is some indication that this present satisfactory position may be maintained.

In view of that statement, it is interesting to look at the figures produced by the Minister of Finance as to what the net income of farmers was during these past few years. As a matter of fact, the minister was not even accurate in the figures he gave to the house last year; that is, if the Minister of Finance is accurate in the budget papers he has produced, and I am giving the Minister of Finance credit for being accurate in those budget papers.

Mr. Abbott: Thank you.

Mr. Rowe: Maybe they were both wrong.

Mr. Harkness: In this year's budget papers at page 3760 we find set out in table 1 the national income and gross national product. There we find the net income of farm operators from farm production in 1950, and that figure is given as $1,503 million; in 1951 it was $2,106 million. That is the year in which the minister said it was $2,200 million. In 1952 it was $1,934 million and then in 1953 it was $1,667 million. It is getting on toward $300 million less in 1953 than it was in 1952.

I do not think there is anybody here who will maintain that prices are not still falling, that they have not fallen so far this year, that they are not less than they were in a similar period last year, namely, 1953, or that there is not the prospect of their falling, particularly those of grain, from the levels that were secured last year. The chances of the prices being less are great; in fact, prices are almost certain to be less. In view of that consideration, I find it difficult to understand the minister's trying to sell the idea that the farmers are better off than they have ever been before. As far as cash income is concerned, they are less well off or they were less well off in 1953 by the difference between $1,667 million and $2,106 million or in other words approximately $400 million less well off.

In view of these figures which show what the net income position of the farmers is, it is quite certain that the estimate that the minister made of what their cash income is going to be, namely $2,600 million, just is not correct and cannot be correct as far as this coming year is concerned.

In addition to that, of course we have to relate the income that farmers have received to the prices that they have to pay for the goods they buy. They have not heard that there has been any great reduction in the price of farm machinery, fertilizer, binder twine, insecticides or any of the other materials which farmers have to purchase in order to carry on their business. In other words, the cost of carrying on farming operations is just about the same as it has been or has declined very little, whereas farm income has declined considerably.

The statistics which my colleague the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand was using a while ago from the bureau of statistics with regard to the index numbers of farm prices for agricultural products of course show clearly in another way what is shown by this table about the net cash income. Looking at the figures from year to year, we find it is rather noteworthy that the high point was reached back in 1951 when the index for the price of farm products was 296·8 and that it has now declined, as of January of this year, to 233·2. That is a very serious decline. During the same period, as I say, the prices of the things farmers have to buy have not declined.

A little comparison with regard to farm prices and the cost of the things farmers have to buy is given in the Searle Grain Company's weekly report of October 7, 1953. It states:

> The current index number, compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics, of the costs of the things prairie farmers have to buy for their living and production now stands at 226·4 compared with 100 in 1935-39. This means that it takes $2.26 in the hands of prairie farmers to have the same purchasing power today that $1.00 had before the last war. This, therefore, means that the total payment on wheat so far to be made of $1.72 a bushel has a purchasing power equal to 76 cents in 1935-39. This is for No. 1 Nor. Fort William, but this $1.72 equals only $1.54 to farmers at the average country point, which $1.54 has a purchasing power equal to only 70 cents in 1935-39. The initial payment of $1.40 for 1 Nor., but which at the average country point equals $1.22, has a purchasing power equal to only 54 cents in 1935-39.

In other words when you relate to the actual amount the purchasing power of the money received by western farmers for their grain—for their wheat, particularly—you see that the price that they are receiving for the wheat is a low price. It is not a high price at all. That, of course, has served greatly to confuse the issue so far as farmers are concerned and so far as the people of the rest of this country are concerned. When they see farmers getting $1.78 a bushel for their wheat—if that is the price of wheat—they say that that is a high price. But as I pointed out today, actually what the farmer on the farm is getting is about 70 cents a bushel in terms of the purchasing power of 1935-40 money, and it is therefore looked upon as a low price for wheat.

The Minister of Agriculture went on to deal with certain specific products in an effort to bolster up his contention that farmers are better off now than they were before, and he had something to say about cattle. If we look at the price range of cattle during the past two years we find that, by and large, cattle prices are about half what they were two or three years ago, that is taking all grades of cattle into consideration because the price drop in some of the poorer grades has been greater than that of the quality steers. However, just paying attention to the price of good quality steers, 1,050 pounds, on the Toronto market in 1951, we find they reached a price of $34 per hundred. They remained at $34 a hundred or right around that figure for the most of 1951 and particularly the latter half of it. Then the price dropped and has continued to drop until in today's Globe and Mail I noticed they are quoted at $18 to $19 per hundred. The price has been almost cut in half. This is a very serious drop, especially when you take into consideration the lower grades of cattle. We find the price is very little more than half of what it was in 1951.

In spite of this the minister says the farmers are better off under those circumstances. How could a cattleman be better off? He is certainly worse off. In fact, a considerable number of cattlemen have experienced a lot of trouble, particularly those who bought cattle at the high prices that prevailed in 1951, and have had to sell those cattle at these lower prices.

The minister dealt with the question of hogs. He professed himself as quite satisfied with the cattle picture, and said we had better markets at home and in the United States than we could get anywhere else in the world, so everything was all right. The fact that we may have better markets at home or receive bigger prices at the moment for what we are producing now than we would receive anywhere else in the world, is perhaps a matter for some satisfaction. Nevertheless it is not much satisfaction to the man who is only getting half as much as he did two or three years ago. Certainly, that man is not nearly so well off.

When we come to the question of hogs, we find the price is quite high now and has been for the most of the past year. The reason for the high price of hogs is to be found in the machinations of this government. The policy of this government that led to maintaining grain prices at unduly high levels is partly responsible, as is the announcement that the floor price would be cut off. This encouraged the farmer to get rid of hogs as fast as he could. As a result there was a cleaning out of hogs about a year and a half ago at a time when they were selling for around $20 or $21 a hundred. They are now up to $34 or $35 a hundred.

At that time many people got rid of sows which were due to farrow, so an artificial scarcity of hogs was created. This artificial scarcity is a direct result of the policies pursued by this government. The minister expressed great pleasure over the fact we were not producing more pork than we could consume in Canada. The inference is that we do not need the large overseas market for bacon and pork products that we enjoyed for many years. We can eat everything we produce. The only reason we can eat everything we produce in the way of pork is that the policies followed by this government have created a scarcity. We could produce a great deal more pork than we are producing.

If we were doing so we would not have the difficulty we are having now with the large surplus of grain. The destruction of the hog industry in this country, as a result of the policies pursued by this government, is responsible for quite a bit of the surplus grain we have. If we had maintained our overseas markets for these pork products, particularly for bacon in Great Britain, we would be producing a great deal more pork and the hogs would have eaten up a great deal of this grain. In other words, the policies this government has followed have aggravated and aggravated these various farm situations.

Now the minister had something to say about the butter situation. He believed there was nothing to worry about, but I would think there is likely to be quite a bit to worry about. I notice that the National Dairy Council of Canada is getting quite worried. Every week or two they send me a lot of literature in connection with the matter, pointing out the very large surplus of butter we have on hand at this time as compared with other years. This particular circular is dated April 30, 1954, and it shows the stocks of butter on hand as of that date. There were 45·6 million pounds on hand, and the circular lists the stocks of butter on hand as at that date during the years from 1932 to 1954. The stocks this year are the highest we ever had. In 1950 there were 28·4 million pounds and last year there were 27 million pounds. The other years are down to 5, 11, 6, 12, 9, 11, 6, and so on. That was all the surplus butter there was at that date. We are holding this large amount of butter at a time when we are just entering the butter producing season.

The minister believes there will be no difficulty about it, but I do not know. He said the government might suffer a small loss. So far as I can see the only way they are going to get clear of this surplus is to sell it at practically give-away prices. If that is done the people of this country will probably have to add a considerable amount of money to the government fund.

The minister devoted a certain amount of time to the wheat situation. He stated that the marketing this past year has been close to usual. I do not know just what that means, but certainly if the figures on the disappearance of grain mean anything—and I think that is the only thing we can look at—then the disappearance for this past year has been quite small in comparison with other years. I have not the figures here, but I looked at them yesterday and the disappearance for this past six months has been considerably below normal. If the minister is talking about the whole year 1953, that is a different matter.

So far as the past six months are concerned there has been a considerable slowing up in the sales of grain. The minister went on to say that the large amount of wheat we had on hand was due to the large crop we had during the past three years. He said that we now have a year's crop on hand. As a matter of fact we have on hand considerably more than a year's crop. The biggest crop we ever had was two years ago when we had 664 million bushels. We now have on hand, according to the best estimates I can secure, about 741 million bushels. The minister said that if the sales of wheat continue about the way they have in normal years and we have a normal disappearance, everything will be all right.

Well, everything will not be all right. As a matter of fact, if we did not grow one bushel of grain next year, and just the normal disappearance took place, we would still have a very large amount of wheat on hand—far too big a carryover. If we grow only a small crop next year, then by this fall again we will have an enormous carryover. As a matter of fact, if we grow another good crop—and if one may judge from the present weather conditions there is every prospect of another good crop this year—we are going to be in an almost hopeless situation so far as storage facilities for grain are concerned. We will be in a position where there will not be room in the elevators for anything like the amount of last year's crop, and there will be no room whatsoever for this year's crop. Therefore I presume there would be no opportunity to deliver any of the new crop.

So the wheat situation in Canada, particularly from the point of view of making delivery of the wheat stored or on hand, is extremely serious. I do not think the minister is doing the farmers in this country any service when he attempts to minimize that situation. Instead of that, the minister and other members of the cabinet should be making plans right now for the handling of next year's crop, so far as storage is concerned.

Many farmers will not be in a position to buy lumber to build granaries, and there should be some payments to the farmers who have grown the crops so they can carry on their farming operations. These are extraordinarily pressing problems, and the government should be taking steps right now to meet them, instead of sitting with folded hands hoping that the best will happen, or probably that there will be a crop failure, or something of that kind. Because, unless the government is hoping for a crop failure, there can be no logic whatever in just sitting and doing nothing.

There is no use closing our eyes or attempting to deceive ourselves by blinking at the truth, because the general situation is considerably poorer than it has been for a number of years. It is just the exact opposite of the picture the minister tried to give us today. For several years he was in a very happy position, because every year prices were going up. That happened for some time after the war, although there was a setback in 1950. But, apart from that, prices went up year after year; and year after year he came into the house and said that things were better this year than last year, that there was more money in the farmers' pockets, and so on. There had been some recession last year from the high of 1951; but this year it is certainly ridiculous to say that the condition is better, or to attempt to fool the House of Commons and the farmers of this country.

Instead of that the minister should face the situation, because it is a serious one. On behalf of the government he should state what they are prepared to do to solve some of these problems.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the statement made this afternoon by the minister regarding the South Saskatchewan dam. However, I must confess to some disappointment in what he said. He left the impression with us that while he and the government had not done anything toward building the dam, since they had not done anything against it we should therefore be satisfied. I am afraid that proposition will not find general acceptance among the many people of Canada who are looking forward to the commencement of work on that project.

Like the hon. member for Saskatoon, I am particularly interested in the South Saskatchewan development because I represent a city which over the last few years has grown by many thousands in population. It is a city that is vitally dependent upon the agricultural prosperity of the surrounding country. I realize that there is nothing that will contribute as greatly to the economic well-being of Saskatchewan as the building of the South Saskatchewan dam. The minister has pointed out on many occasions what this dam would mean not only to the farmers directly concerned but also to the hamlets, villages and cities of Saskatchewan.

I would like to feel that this is a matter of national importance. I suggest we should rid our minds of any thought that this is a project that will affect only a small part of the country because, after all, agriculture is the basic industry in Canada. I believe that in Saskatchewan we have almost forty per cent of the cultivated acreage of Canada. Certainly we do possess a great part of Canada's farming land. The welfare of any one part of Canada is reflected in the welfare of the country as a whole.

The Prime Minister has intimated the national importance of this particular project. On June 28, 1952, speaking about some of the projects then being considered in Canada, one of which is nearing completion —I am referring to the Canso causeway—and also referring to the St. Lawrence seaway project, he said, as reported at page 3945 of Hansard for that year:

> The third project was the South Saskatchewan river project. This is of particular interest to the central prairies, but it is also of interest to the whole of Canada to have Canada developed in such a manner that there will be no depressed areas in this country.

We know that one of the projects to which he referred is now nearing completion. We have had repeated assurances that a start is going to be made on the St. Lawrence seaway project. And I want to say I am certain that members from all parts of Canada welcome the building of that seaway. I am certain all members from my own province are pleased to see works of public importance, whether they are being constructed in the maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia or anywhere else in Canada. We have to view this situation in a national sense and recognize, as the Prime Minister pointed out, that the South Saskatchewan river dam project is something that is not just primarily for the benefit of the people living in that geographical area, but something which will contribute greatly to the economic well-being of Canada.

It is not my intention to go into the detailed history of this project. In previous years the matter has been dealt with by various members when speaking in the house. But I do remind hon. members that the project will accomplish two purposes: First of all it will offer some insurance against conditions which existed in my province only a few years ago, a period of time during which a good percentage of our people were on relief. We suffered from practically every unfortunate occurrence nature could inflict upon us—drought, soil drifting and weed infestation. We know during that time the serious condition that existed in the livestock industry. We know many animals were lost, while some were shipped to community pastures. We know about the great quantities of hay that were moved into Saskatchewan.

All that is history. But we should remember that these conditions could very well return. As a matter of fact we know that in 1945, 1947, 1948 and 1949 hay was shipped to Saskatchewan from points in Alberta and Manitoba, in some cases at a cost of $10 a ton. We know those conditions have occurred in recent years; and we have no guarantee that nature is going to smile on us in the future so far as rainfall is concerned, or that we will be spared the disastrous drought conditions that are being experienced in certain states of the union to the south of us. There is no greater method of protecting and insuring against a national calamity in the particular area such as that than by the building of that dam.

Apart from the negative aspects of the building of the dam, a great contribution of the building of the dam would be to Canada, not just to the geographic area of which Saskatchewan is a part, but to the dominion as a whole. Without going into any unnecessary detail, Mr. Chairman, I just want to summarize as briefly as I can and suggest that this project, as the hon. member for Saskatoon has pointed out, was initially a federal project. I recall the minister making statements.

I always enjoy listening to the minister at a political gathering. If he is speaking at a meeting within a reasonable distance I usually make an effort to go to hear him, and I recall his speaking in glowing terms of what the construction of this dam would mean to Saskatchewan and to Canada as a whole. I recall that all during that time there was no suggestion at all that this was to be a joint project; it was going to be a project built by the federal government. Then, after many promises had been made during the 1945 campaign and in 1949, which the hon. member for Saskatoon quoted. In 1953 we heard similar statements. The Regina Leader-Post of June 23, 1949 is reported as quoting the minister as saying, as may be found in Hansard of February 9, 1953 at page 1769, as follows:

> The South Saskatchewan project would provide power and encourage building of industries in small towns, provide an incentive for young people to stay in this province. "I think we have made a fairly good start now," said Mr. Gardiner; "send us back to complete the job."

In the last campaign we had similar assurances given on behalf of the minister. I hold in my hand a clipping which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of July 14 last headed: "Liberals certain to construct dam." The article continues:

> Agriculture Minister J. G. Gardiner said Monday night that he was sure the South Saskatchewan river dam would be built by a Liberal government if the government were left in power long enough to permit the usefulness of the dam project to be proven by its advocates.

I realize that the minister couched his language perhaps a little more cautiously than the statements he previously made, but the inference was definitely left. In particular the inference was given in the heading of this news story: "Liberals certain to construct the dam". I suppose we have ourselves to blame to some extent. We ought to know that when Liberals promise to do something—

Mr. Gardiner: It will be done.

Mr. Ellis: —it may go on for twenty or thirty years, just as we have waited for health insurance since 1919. I do not think we should be too optimistic, but I do feel the minister gave the assurance to our people repeatedly that this dam would be built and suggested at the outset that it was to be a federal project. It had nothing to do with the province at all. This was to be a work to be done by the federal government.

We do know the project was definitely promised. I do not think that any member of the government can argue that the Liberal party has not committed itself to the building of this dam over the years. Indeed moneys have been set aside from year to year to carry on the preparatory work of this project. I am not sure what the exact amount is, but I think $2 million or $3 million has already been spent laying the foundations of this project, and just when we felt reasonably sure that the project would be commenced we find the minister reversing the field and pointing out that we will have a dam built when the provincial government gets around to paying its share. That came as a distinct surprise and shock to people in our province.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sure my hon. friend does not want to misrepresent. I have never said that with regard to a provincial government.

Mr. Ellis: I do not believe the minister would deny that press reports have been to that effect. Certainly since the time this dam was first promised back during the 1940's I have never been able to find reports of speeches made by the minister or by Liberal members of parliament or candidates that this dam was to be a joint provincial-dominion undertaking.

Mr. Gardiner: You have not read Hansard.

Mr. Ellis: I have read Hansard. The hon. member for Saskatoon quoted quite extensively from the debate on this matter which was quite prominent on this whole question. I will agree that perhaps the minister may make statements which he later interprets in his own way, but I suggest that even though the minister may interpret the statement to mean one thing, the general impression given to the reading public is another thing. But suffice it to say that the general impression prevailed throughout the province that this was to be a federal undertaking.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not the point that I raised. My hon. friend said that I was laying blame on the provincial government for some things they were doing. I have not done that at any time.

Mr. Ellis: I hope I was not exactly laying the blame. I do suggest that this was what was intimated: We are prepared to go ahead with it with the provincial government; we talked it over with the provincial government and they are prepared to state how much of the cost they will pay. That is using the most general terms. When the project was then put in a different light the provincial government moved quite swiftly to assure the federal officials that the provincial government was quite prepared to co-operate to any reasonable extent in the pursuance of this particular project.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. It is now just about a minute and a half to six o'clock. I understand that the Minister of Finance wishes to table a report which must be tabled today.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Ellis: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was discussing the change in the nature of the proposed South Saskatchewan dam. I had pointed out that over a period of some years the dam had been promised by the minister and his followers in our province, and that at that time there had been no intimation whatsoever that this was to be a joint project between the federal and provincial governments. Then we were confronted with a new development when the minister made it known that the federal government would be prepared to proceed with the dam if and when the provincial government was prepared to take some part in the building of the dam.

As I pointed out, this came as a distinct shock to people generally of all political parties because up until that time there had been no suggestion that the federal government considered it anything other than a strictly federal proposition. Not only did this change take place but the minister went the full circle last year because, when speaking at Indian Head just prior to the last election, he suggested during the course of his remarks that if the province wanted the dam built it should go ahead and build it and that it was primarily their responsibility.

Far from being a federal responsibility, it was first of all said to be a joint responsibility and then the minister went so far as to say that it was primarily a provincial responsibility. If he really believes that I would draw his attention to the fact that from 1934 to 1944 there was a Liberal provincial government in Saskatchewan and from 1935 on we have had a Liberal government at Ottawa and if the minister, as he suggested last July, felt that if the province wanted the dam it should go ahead and build it then I suggest he should have made that suggestion to Mr. Patterson who was premier of the province from 1935 to 1944.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend will permit me, I am sure he does not want to misrepresent the matter at all. He will recall that it was not until 1946 that either the site of the dam or any other matters that made it possible to build it at Outlook were announced.

Mr. Ellis: That is an interesting comment. I have not the information at hand but I think by going through the files I can find references to the dam prior to that time.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not saying there were not references to the dam. The dam was not promised by me but was advocated by me for many years prior to that. I did not promise the dam. I simply advocated that it ought to be located and built.

Mr. Ellis: There is a fine distinction in words there.

Mr. Knowles: Very fine.

Mr. Ellis: The minister says that he did not promise it but simply advocated it. The way the minister can advocate something makes it sound very much like a promise, and while the minister may have felt that he was advocating it I feel quite certain that his audiences were under the impression that he was promising it. This afternoon the hon. member for Saskatoon was wondering whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Agriculture was more adept at skirting or avoiding a question or issue. The Minister of National Health and Welfare took that as a compliment.

Mr. Knowles: They both are.

Mr. Ellis: When I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture is a past master at it perhaps he will take that as a compliment. It is a compliment in one sense when one is speaking about political sagacity and adroitness, but viewing the problem from the point of view of those who want to see the job done I do not think it is quite so complimentary.

Be that as it may, the minister interrupted me and said that he did not promise the dam at an earlier date but merely advocated it. I am quite certain, however, that the people were left under no illusion as to what the impression was that he sought to leave with his audiences. With respect to the project itself, may I say that I am speaking of the project as a whole. I assume that the storage of the water was and is even today considered a federal responsibility. Now when the people in the province of Saskatchewan found that the federal government was now going to require the provincial government to pay part of the cost they might well have felt that the Liberals had been kicking this football around for a great number of years, had been advocating the dam, if not promising it—I will use the word "advocate" —and that it was now up to them to put up. They might well have felt that the Liberals had been attempting to win elections on this promise long enough and that it was about time to deliver the goods.

But I am proud of the way in which the people of Saskatchewan viewed the matter. They did not view it from a political standpoint at all. The natural tendency would have been for the people to say that they had been tricked and fooled over the years by the federal authorities and that the federal government was now trying to welsh on their promise to the people. Instead the provincial government took, I think, a very co-operative attitude. They had been under the impression that it was a federal responsibility, but instead of harpings and recriminations, instead of denouncing the federal government the provincial authorities were extremely co-operative. When it was announced that the provincial government would be required to pay a part of the cost they stepped in right away and made an offer to the federal authorities on the basis of what they considered to be their fair share of the costs.

I have here copies of the correspondence which passed between the premier of the province and the Minister of Agriculture. I am not going to refer to it directly because I believe many of these letters were placed on Hansard last year by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. However, I think the correspondence indicates quite clearly that the provincial government stepped in immediately and said: All right, we are disappointed that the federal government is not going to treat this as a federal responsibility but the main thing is we want the dam built and we are prepared to bear a share of the cost.

I think the minister will agree that in each successive stage of the protracted and apparently fruitless negotiations that have been carried on over the past several years between the provincial government and the federal government the provincial government has shown its good faith and willingness to co-operate in every detail. I think there can be no doubt on that score. Various objections have been raised from time to time, and I should like to refer to an editorial in the Star-Phoenix of July 9 last, under the heading "Blockage Upstream". It reads in part as follows:

> . . . Mr. Gardiner outlined three requirements that would have to be met before the federal government could make a final decision on the project. The requirements were: 1. Interprovincial agreement on the use of the water required for the project.
> 2. An offer from the Saskatchewan government which would remove any suspicion that the federal government was subsidizing the cost of the power development connected with the undertaking.
> 3. A realistic estimate of the cost of the project, to settle the conflict between P.F.R.A. figures and those contained in the Hogg report.

With respect to the first point, an interprovincial agreement on the use of water was required for the project. It was very interesting last summer just prior to the voting to see the tremendous amount of space devoted in the press in the west to this whole question of getting the right to use water from the Alberta government. At that time, just prior to the election, Liberal speakers were able to go out and say that we could go ahead with the dam but the Alberta government was standing in the way. It was a very fine whipping boy to use just prior to the last federal election though, of course, we know that this has subsequently been cleared up by the announcement that there was no longer any obstacle in that connection. Therefore, point No. 1 has been removed as an obstacle to proceeding with this project.

Now, the second point was the offer from the Saskatchewan government which would remove any suspicion that the federal government was subsidizing the cost of the power development connected with the project. Here again, the premier of the province in a number of letters to the Minister of Agriculture, and later publicly, announced the provincial government's willingness to pay for the hydro generating plant and pay for part of the cost of the project in order to remove any possibility that anyone in Canada might feel that this project was in any way subsidizing the power users in the province of Saskatchewan. In other words, I think any doubt that might be in hon. members' minds regarding any suspicion of fear that there might be a subsidization of power development has long since been removed.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, just on that point I think if hon. members follow the report which has been read to this house from that particular group they will find that in Saskatchewan last week I stated that the two matters had been settled to the satisfaction of this government, and the point with regard to the part of the cost which the provincial government will pay if the project is proceeded with is still under discussion.

Mr. Ellis: I quite agree with that statement, Mr. Chairman, because I know that in the initial correspondence between the premier of the province and the minister the premier did set out the exact figures. The minister wrote back and suggested that what the federal authorities required was not a set of exact figures but some general agreement to share part of the costs. In other words, the province went so far as to be committed to a definite set of figures which the minister apparently felt was not necessary at that time. While that may be at present under negotiation I think that at no stage, at least up to the present, has there been any reluctance or any unwillingness on the part of the provincial authorities to meet the Department of Agriculture and come to some agreement in regard to sharing the cost. In other words, at no stage has there been any reluctance or unwillingness on the part of the provincial government to share part of the cost in the construction of this dam.

With respect to the third point, a realistic estimate of the cost of the project to settle the conflict between the P.F.R.A. figures and those contained in the Hogg report, I am certain that when the decision to appoint a royal commission to investigate this matter was first announced it caused a great deal of consternation among people, particularly those who had not been following the development of this project. I believe the minister himself is on record as having said some very uncomplimentary things about this report. I am not sure whether his comment was "silly dam report" or "dam silly report", but at any rate I have clippings here, though I do not wish to take up the time of the house in reading them, in regard to various Liberal members who also expressed themselves as being very sceptical or unconvinced as to the need for this commission in the first place.

I am not too sure as to the number of years, but I believe the P.F.R.A. has been interested and has investigated this project for nearly 16 years, and I think we can have confidence in our P.F.R.A. engineers. I do not think any hon. member has suggested that the government is lacking in qualified personnel. These people have been working over a good many years, very often in the field and covering the entire province, and they have a full understanding of irrigation problems within the prairie provinces. They have had considerable experience along these lines as the result of many, many years of research and they have arrived at an estimate of what the dam would cost.

I understand that the original estimate was $101 million, but in view of the intervening years one would have to add the increase in costs which has taken place and I believe this cost certainly would not exceed 30 per cent over that period of time. That would bring the cost of the dam up to about $135 or $140 million, but in any event the P.F.R.A. engineers on the ground who have done a tremendous amount of work in this connection presented the government with a set of figures. The government chose to disregard these figures and set up a royal commission which asked a private corporation, the Mannix corporation, to investigate and submit other estimates. We know that the report of the royal commission was not too kindly received by those who were interested in the project irrespective of their political beliefs, and I am sure the minister himself was not too pleased with the findings of the commission.

At that time the provincial government presented a brief in reply to the royal commission in which it took each item of the report point by point and it makes what I think are critical observations of the royal commission report. I certainly do not intend to deal with this at this stage, but I do feel the points raised by the royal commission have been quite effectively met, although I am suggesting that there might be some disagreement.

I think all those who are interested in the construction of this project will agree it is a fairly accurate estimate of the findings of that commission so that when I read in a newspaper a few days ago that the minister had stated in Saskatchewan that the government was prepared to forget the report of the royal commission, and I heard the minister's explanation this afternoon in which he said he did not say these things or rather he put his own interpretation upon what he is reported to have said, then I was not at all surprised. The minister is always running into difficulties by saying something and afterwards having to explain what he did say and very often his explanation is at variance with what the average person who heard him in the first place would suggest he said.

Therefore, irrespective of the minister's footwork this afternoon in explaining what he meant in his statements in Saskatchewan, I suggest that the people out there hope that he meant precisely what he said, namely that the government has forgotten about the royal commission report. If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, then indeed the last of the obstacles has been removed. In other words the question of the water rights has been settled as it affects the province of Alberta, as has also the question of the provincial government offering to bear part of the cost. I have not heard any evidence to the contrary and judging from the correspondence between the provincial authorities and the Department of Agriculture that does not seem to be any great stumbling block. If the province is quite prepared to bear a share of that cost, and if the minister says that the government is prepared to forget the report of the royal commission then I suggest that the last obstacle towards the commencement of the project has been removed.

If that is the case then I feel that we should proceed immediately with the construction of that dam because the minister is on record as indicating how valuable a contribution that dam would make to the economy of the prairie provinces and of Canada generally. I think the Prime Minister is also on record. I have noted a couple of quotations in Hansard with respect to the debate last spring in which he seems to be quite satisfied that it is not a purely local matter at all but is a project to the general advantage of all Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: In order just to clear the air in connection with the matter we are now discussing, I think that I should say this. When I was here this afternoon I was not as fully informed as I am tonight. I met the provincial government last Saturday and discussed the only matter which is still waiting to be determined before it is again presented to the government here. We discussed there the proportion of the cost the provincial government should take on if the dam is proceeded with. I had a letter this afternoon from the premier of Saskatchewan stating their position in relation to it. I still have to take that matter up with the government. That is a matter that is still standing in the way. I am not saying that the provincial government is responsible for it at all. It is just a matter for negotiation. It takes some time to determine the matter when you are going to spend $60 million or $100 million.

Mr. Ellis: I realize that the minister has information that we do not possess. I mean that, after all, there are negotiations which are being carried on. What I suggested during the course of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, was that up until the present time—that is up to the point that we have knowledge of—the province made its offer right in the letter from the premier of the province. For example, on February 10, 1951, when the premier wrote to the Minister of Agriculture, he pointed out in part:

> Our understanding is that the federal government is prepared to accept full responsibility for the construction of a dam, the estimated cost of which is to be in the neighbourhood of $68 million. It was further suggested that the distribution system at an estimated cost of $19 million and the cost of levelling the land for irrigation, which is estimated at $6 million, were to be the responsibility of the provincial government and the water users who will benefit by this project. It was also suggested that the installations for the generation of hydroelectric power at an estimated cost of $8 million were to be the exclusive responsibility of the provincial government. While this is not the allocation of costs which was suggested when this project was first proposed, if this is the only basis on which the federal government is prepared to proceed with the project, I do not see that we have any alternative than to base our discussions on the allocation which you outlined to us.
> My colleagues and I are most anxious that the South Saskatchewan river development project shall be proceeded with at the earliest possible date. As soon as the federal government has announced its intention to proceed with this undertaking we are prepared to negotiate and sign an agreement on the basis of the allocation of costs outlined above.

In this letter the premier commits himself on behalf of the province of Saskatchewan to a definite undertaking in so far as the sharing of the cost is concerned. Here is my point, Mr. Chairman. At that time the federal government did not say, "Oh, we cannot go ahead with it because we are not satisfied with the proposition; we do not feel you are going to pay enough." That was not suggested at that time. Now the minister says that is one of the things that is holding it up. During the time of this correspondence and over these past several years the obstacles and impediments to proceeding with this project did not deal with the question of the allocation of costs—up until the present time at least. Other reasons have been thrown out but as far as I can see from the correspondence, the question of the allocation of costs has not been the important point.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has said that this should not be a political matter or should not be a political issue but that it is a business proposition and should be handled as such. All I am suggesting doing is this. If he reads my letter of April 24, 1953 to the government of the province of Saskatchewan he will find that there are four propositions made there. One is that the water rights would be cleared up. In Saskatoon last week I stated that the water rights are cleared up to the satisfaction of this government. Another proposition was that the provincial government was to give us an undertaking that when the water was once put into the dam, they would use it for some particular purposes. They have agreed to use it for the purposes which were outlined by the P.F.R.A. organization. That was the second point. The third one was that some provision had to be made which would warrant us in believing we knew what the cost was going to be. In Saskatchewan last week I stated that those three points had all been taken care of and that the one that is still left is this one we are now talking about, namely the part of the cost of the dam itself which will be paid by the province and the part which will be undertaken by the federal government if the project is undertaken.

An hon. Member: Your halo still does not fit.

Mr. Ellis: I am glad to hear that statement from the minister. I do not know whether we can take it from that statement that when this matter of the allocation of costs is settled we are going to see the commencement of the construction of the dam. I want to suggest that this matter has been dealt with before. We have had correspondence and we have had assurances on the part of the minister that when these matters were settled they would go ahead. But each time we just sort of got on a dead-end street and found that we were confronted with something else. I certainly hope that the minister's statement here indicates that when this matter has been cleared up as between the federal government and the provincial government, there will be a commencement.

I would draw to the attention of the minister the fact that when the premier of the province telegraphed the Prime Minister last spring with regard to this matter, he asked the Prime Minister for assurance on two points. I think I have the exact wording of the telegram. It reads in part as follows:

[Mr. Ellis.]

I am in receipt of letter from Mr. Gardiner asking provincial government to submit proposal for construction South Saskatchewan dam. Before submitting proposal or discussing agreement essential that we have from you categorical assurance on two points, first that you are now convinced that South Saskatchewan river project represents best use that can be made of water available, and secondly that federal government prepared to proceed with this undertaking if government of Saskatchewan assumes fair share of costs.

That was last spring. These negotiations have been going on for some time. When the provincial government made an offer initially and suggested an exact sum of money at that time as to what their share would be, the minister replied that that is not what they wanted; he indicated that they did not want a definite figure at all but that they just wanted something to kick around, something they could discuss.

I am quite certain that the minister is perhaps quite sincere in his assurances that perhaps something can be done, but I do not know just whether the minister's assurances are enough.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to clear up the point entirely, Mr. Chairman, may I say that there is not anyone who has yet said that the dam was going to be built. That fact should be absolutely understood. No one has said the dam is going to be built. However, the question of costs and all that are being considered as between this government and the provincial government. All I can say is that if agreement is reached as between the two governments with regard to all the points, there is a possibility that it will be proceeded with. But up to the present time on every occasion that the federal government have discussed the matter with the province they have said, "We are discussing it under the absolute understanding that no undertaking has yet been given that the dam will be built".

Mr. Ellis: I do not know just what the minister means when he says that no undertaking was made by the government. If there was no undertaking by the government, may I say this. The people of Saskatchewan were certainly led to believe that there had been an undertaking by the government.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member just does not understand—

Mr. Ellis: I do not want to make a political speech. If I did, I would be prepared to read—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ellis: —quite a number of quotations from the speeches of prominent Liberals campaigning in the 1945 election campaign, the 1949 campaign and the last campaign. In the Rosthern by-election the people were told that if they sent Makaroff to Ottawa, that would be tantamount to repudiation of this great scheme. How can you repudiate an undertaking that was never given? The minister now says no one ever promised to build the dam. When he was campaigning during the by-election in the constituency of Rosthern it was said that if anyone but a Liberal was elected it was a repudiation of this scheme. Now, it is suggested here that the government never really promised to build the dam.

Before six o'clock I suggested that we really perhaps never should accept at face value the statements that are made by Liberal politicians even when they are ministers of the crown, and especially when the statements are made just before an election. The minister now says no one promised to build the dam. I am quite sure that will come as a great shock and surprise to the people, whether in this house or outside. As I say, the record is quite clear on this point. The hon. member for Saskatoon this afternoon put several quotations on the record which made the point quite clear. Whether or not the Liberal government ever intended to build the dam might be a moot point, but there is one point that is quite clear. They certainly told the people it was going to be built.

I might say that not only during the Rosthern by-election but throughout many campaigns this has been a stock political football for the Liberal party. They have certainly made use of it in the last three federal elections. Just how effective it has been, I do not know, but certainly they have tried to use it as an effective political weapon. If the minister wants to say now they never promised the dam at all, then I shall leave it with the people of western Canada to accept or reject that particular statement. I am quite sure there are very few in Saskatchewan who will accept that statement at its face value. I shall grant you—

Mr. Gardiner: You and your friends discussed it all during the last election in my constituency, and I was elected.

Mr. Ellis: As I pointed out, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Mang: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he recall the visit of the Prime Minister during the election campaign when he spoke at the armouries in Regina at which time it was made quite clear by the Prime Minister's statement that the dam would be built when the people of Canada were convinced and he was convinced it would be in the national interest to construct the dam? At that time does the hon. member recall that comments were made as to the forthrightness of the Prime Minister in making that statement right in the city of Regina in the heart of Saskatchewan? He did not say it was going to be built or that it was not, and he was commended for his honesty.

Mr. Ellis: After some of the comments that have been made here regarding what the government proposed to do, I am not quite sure that we are ever clear about what a minister of the crown says just before an election.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ellis: I recall the visit of the Prime Minister at that time, but I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps it is the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister who should get together to compare notes on this point. It is quite sufficient to say that over the years this has been used in several elections by the Liberal party—

An hon. Member: And by the C.C.F. too.

Mr. Ellis: They definitely promised us to build this dam as a federal responsibility. So far as the provincial government is concerned I would point out that they did not want to view this as a political matter. I believe that if you read through the correspondence sent by the premier of Saskatchewan—I believe the minister will agree—nowhere in this correspondence will you find any suggestion of the government looking at this from a political angle.

Mr. Gardiner: I quite agree with that and I say again to my hon. friend that nowhere will he find there is anything in my letters either of a political nature.

Mr. Ellis: That is just the trouble. The minister now tells us that after corresponding with the provincial governments for a number of years, there was nothing in his letters.

Mr. Gardiner: Nothing political.

Mr. Ellis: I do not know how one could expect to carry on negotiations between a senior and junior government when the minister admits he never had anything in his correspondence.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says there is nothing political in the provincial letters, and I say there is nothing political in mine, either.

Mr. Ellis: I was not suggesting there was anything political in the minister's letters, but I am certainly suggesting there was something very much political in the way he has handled this problem in the country.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not going to tell the hon. member that if the dam ever is built, either by this government or any other government, I will be more responsible for it than anyone else.

Mr. Ellis: I have intimated, Mr. Chairman, that I feel that this matter of the dam is something that affects all the people in the province. We do not like to look upon it as a political question at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ellis: It is something of benefit to the province and to the country. As I suggested at the outset of my remarks, any project that is of general advantage to Canada, any project that is going to increase the productivity of this great country of ours or that is going to assist this country in gaining a greater measure of economic stability, will be welcomed by us. So far as I am concerned, I am very happy to see such projects being carried out in different parts of Canada. Although I am from Saskatchewan, I am just as much in favour of the seaway project as anybody in this house. I am quite sure that—whether it is the Chignecto canal or the Canso causeway—anything that is for the benefit of this country, will find favour with us.

We also say this. When the minister has stated this is of advantage to Canada, when the Prime Minister himself has gone on record as suggesting this is something of benefit to Canada as a whole, then I think that after years of protracted negotiations, after the various points might have been cleared up as the minister has pointed out, I think the time has now come to commence the building of this dam.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not want to be drawn into any argument about the Saskatchewan dam, but I should like to assure the hon. members from Saskatchewan that just before the next election, perhaps six months before, this dam will become a hot issue. It will come up again, just the same as the extension of mail routes comes up before every election. When I want to secure an extension to a mail route I say to my constituents, "You put in a petition about two or three months before the election and there is no doubt in the world but you will get that extension. I have obtained three or four of them before nearly every election.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We will remember that the next time.

Mr. Cardiff: I might just say that there was an extension granted to three of my neighbours within a mile and a quarter of my farm at the time of the last election. I knew nothing about it until it was announced. I believe the Liberals thought they would get those votes, but I doubt that they did.

After the election some people two and a half miles down the road put in a request for an extension of the mail route. They had more right to it than the extension granted to my neighbours. They wrote to the department in London and were informed that there was no chance in the world of obtaining that extension. These people sent a letter to me.

The Chairman: Order. I wonder when the hon. member intends to discuss agriculture?

Mr. Cardiff: Right away, Mr. Chairman. I just want to finish that sentence. The three people I mentioned did get the mail route, and everybody is happy now.

I want to congratulate the minister upon his return to health. When he returned to Ottawa from overseas, I thought he had had it. He did not look very well. He had a far-away look in his eyes. When I saw the minister in such good form this afternoon, I could not help but think he had improved wonderfully. I hope it continues; I am serious when I say that. However, the minister did sound ridiculous this afternoon when he attempted to inform the house and country as to the buoyancy of the situation in regard to farmers, both east and west, in the matter of returns in the last ten years.

However, one thought did occur to me when he was speaking. I cannot tell the committee the difference in the number of farmers in the east as compared with the number in the west, but I venture to say that not more than a third of them are in the west.

Mr. Gardiner: More than that.

Mr. Cardiff: Well, there might be half, although I do not think there are half of them in the west.

Mr. Gardiner: Not half.

Mr. Cardiff: In his figures this afternoon, regardless of the fact that not even half of the farmers are in the west, the amount given for the east was $2,128 million as compared with $2,258 million for the west. In the next three-year term the figure for the east was $2,871 million and for the west $3,348 million. The next figure given for the east was $3,605 million and for the west $3,952 million. The next figures the minister gave were $3,444 million for the east and $3,129 million for the west.

Mr. Gardiner: The last figures were only for two years.

Mr. Cardiff: The fact remains that the figure for the west was still high. And that brings me to this point, where I say that those of us in the east are not receiving as much consideration as are the farmers in the west. Certainly we are not making as much money, and we work a lot harder to get it.

Mr. Gardiner: That brings up another point. That is the real reason why there is more income tax paid in Saskatchewan, per farm, than there is in Ontario. One does not need to look for another reason.

Mr. Cardiff: I grant you that, because of this fact. The cash return in the west is available; the tax collector can get the figures quite readily. And it is a pretty difficult matter to sidetrack the income tax branch. In the east the farmers do not have much in the way of income, because they do not make enough money to pay income tax. Very few farmers in the east are in the income tax brackets. The department has put forth an extra effort in the last year or two to collect more income tax from the eastern farmers and, while it may have been having some success, it is not having as much success as was expected when the drive was put on. However, I am not ready to discuss that subject in detail because I do not have the figures with me at the moment. I will discuss it before the estimates are completed, or perhaps I may have a chance in the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Finance when the subject of income tax paid by farmers is before the committee. I say the farmers are not being dealt with fairly in that regard.

This afternoon the minister made reference to a three-year average. The farmers are given a chance to take a five-year average and if, in some cases, they have not made a return, they are put on a net worth basis and they are not permitted to consider the lean years with the good years. I think that is a mistake that should be corrected.

In the last few years the government has been very anxious to sell farm produce so long as there was a good market for it. But when the marketing situation got tough, then the responsibility was thrown back on the farmers themselves. That was what happened in connection with cheese. Anyone can sell on a buoyant market. There is no trouble in getting rid of products when everybody wants to buy them. It is when there is a surplus that there is difficulty in selling. The cheese people took the bit in their own teeth. The government cannot take credit for it. The cheese producers were able to dispose of their cheese, and we find a position where the cheese industry is in a rather healthy state. This is due to the effort they put forth themselves.

And due to the fact that the cheese situation is somewhat better, the butter manufacturers have been placed in a better position, too. But it will be found before the next six months is up that the minister will have a lot more butter on his hands than he has now. When he cannot get his supply down to around 20 million pounds at this period of the year he certainly will not get it down farther between now and the period of flush production of milk.

I am going to say something now about the hog situation. A year or so ago when, under the minister's policy, the price of hogs was lowered to the extent of 3 cents, how long did it stay there?

Mr. Gardiner: It is 23 cents today.

Mr. Cardiff: Did it ever get down to 23 cents?

Mr. Gardiner: It went down close to that in the month of January; but it went right back up.

Mr. Cardiff: Yes, it went right back up. As a matter of fact, it went up to 28 cents inside of a month, and it has been going up ever since. But during that period of time—and this is the joker—when they were afraid they were not going to get paid for their hogs a good many hogs were marketed, including brood sows and every other kind of hogs, both little and big, many of which were not fit to go on the market. They were all shot out on the market, with the result that we were short of breeding stock. Then, of course it does not matter how high the price goes, if no one has anything to sell. The only reason now we are consuming all the pork we have is because we do not have the pork. But a year from now the minister will be saddled with a position in which he will find supplies of surplus pork to worry about.

This afternoon the minister said something about cattle. Let me give a concrete example of how much money we made out of cattle in the last few years. I shall describe my own experience, because I know exactly what I made—and I am no different from many other producers. As a matter of fact, I am in a much better position than many others were.

Anyone who bought heavy cattle or two-year-old cattle in 1951 took a decided loss. We all lost 10 per cent, right off the bat, at the time of the foot-and-mouth disease. Perhaps that was not the government's fault, or the fault of anybody else, but we took a 10 per cent drop right there, and the situation never righted itself. Stocker cattle were selling for as much as 36 cents a pound in 1951. I happened to buy forty head at that time. I felt there was going to be a drop in the price of cattle, and I bought small ones. Anyone who bought small cattle managed to get his money out of them, but those who bought the heavier cattle in 1952 not only lost their feed but they lost a considerable amount of money in addition to that. They had to sell them and they lost large amounts of money.

In my case I did not have to sell in 1952, because my cattle were not the proper size. I could not get in 1952 what I paid for them, after feeding them for a year. The result was that I kept them another year. At the end of the second year—that is, last year—I sold them. At the end of the second year I got 18½ cents a pound on cattle for which I paid 36 cents. I did not lose any money in dollars. As a matter of fact, I had $1,200 after feeding for those two years, but it did not pay for the chop they consumed. I am not the only farmer. I got off pretty lucky.

A lot of farmers who bought heavy cattle, or two-year-old cattle, in 1951, not only lost their feed but they lost pretty nearly half of what they paid for the cattle. They have not redeemed themselves yet. A lot of these fellows are still working away. I do not feel so sorry for those who were in the cattle business for several years and had a chance to make a little money, but I do feel sorry for the younger men who just started up and had to pay a lot of money for those cattle. Mind you, the bank will only carry you so long as your risk is good and then you have to sell. Because they could not cover their notes they had to sell their cattle, and those are the fellows I feel sorry for. A lot of them were in that position.

That is the position in which the cattle business is today. Since last fall cattle have been holding pretty steadily; in fact, much better than I expected they would. Those of us who bought cattle last fall found that tops were going at about 18½ cents. They are still worth 18½ cents. I heard of a sale made the other day at 21 cents. Those cattle went to the United States. They were an exceptionally choice bunch of cattle and consisted of two or three loads. If cattle stay around 20 cents or 18 cents I have no doubt that some of those boys will make a little money this year, but that is all in the future. We are hopeful that that will happen.

As I said before, the government was ready to accept the responsibility for selling produce of the farm when selling was good, but now that it is difficult to sell they are throwing it back to the producer and letting him do the best he can. I do not believe in subsidies. In the first place, I believe we would have been better off if we had never had any. We would have learned to take care of ourselves and not depend on the government. Too much dependence is put on the government and the individual is losing his initiative. This country was built on personal initiative, and until we get back to that there is no hope that the government will pull us out of all the difficulties that we face.

I do not think I have any more to say at this time. As the items go through I shall have more to say. I must say one thing. On going through the estimates of almost every minister's department it will be found that nowhere is the government making any attempt to lower administration costs. No other business in Canada, including agriculture, could operate like that. In every other business a decided attempt is being made to cut costs. The reason why producers' costs are so high, both in manufacturing and in agriculture, is that taxes are too high, and those taxes have to be paid first. Until the government makes some attempt to lower departmental costs we will not be any better off.

Mr. Zaplitny: I should like to make a few references to the speech we heard this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture and also to mention a number of points which are of particular interest to the farmers of Manitoba. In his speech this afternoon the Minister of Agriculture informed us that in his opinion the farmers have never been in a better position than they are today. I am not going to dispute that at any great length, but I should like to quote a different point of view of a person whose opinions will carry some weight. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Globe and Mail dated March 8 of this year, which quotes a former premier of Ontario speaking at a conference. He was speaking to the annual meeting of the shareholders of the First Co-operative Packers Limited of Ontario. These are his words:

> As things have been going we cannot, I think, avoid a crash. The symptoms are now disturbingly close to those that preceded the crash of 1929.

He was discussing agriculture generally, and those were the opinions he expressed at that time.

Mr. Martin: Who was he?

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Drury, a former premier of Ontario. Somewhere between the statement we heard this afternoon and the rather gloomy forecast made by Mr. Drury is the situation which exists in agriculture. Figures already produced in this debate have shown that there has been a rather serious decline in the income of farmers generally. A little later on I shall put some more figures on the record in that connection.

I also wish to refer to another statement, and I was rather surprised to hear the Minister of Agriculture say this. He said that in his opinion a floor price is not necessary under cattle or beef, or whatever the term was he used. That does not seem to meet with the opinions that I have heard expressed by farmers in Manitoba, at least. I am not in a position to speak for farmers in Saskatchewan or elsewhere; I confine my remarks to the farmers with whom I am familiar.

I hold in my hand a copy of a brief presented to the Minister of Agriculture in February of this year by the interprovincial farm union council. This farm union council represents the three farm unions of the prairie provinces; that is, of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have no doubt the minister will agree that the members of this council are men and women with a great deal of experience in agriculture, some of whom have had previous experience in government in various responsible positions, and I think their opinions are worthy of consideration at this time. What do they have to say about the livestock situation? I should like to quote from their brief where they refer to livestock prices. These are their words:

> The livestock industry's present position is serious and should have the immediate attention of the government. Livestock producers have taken a severe beating during the past two years, and from all available information it appears that the situation may become even worse. From figures available we find that in 1906 there were 1,181 cattle per thousand population in Canada and in 1952 there were only 635 cattle per thousand population; this shows that there is no oversupply of cattle today. Furthermore, we note that stocks of meat in storage on December 1, 1953 are 13 million pounds less than one year previous, which shows that we are not producing much of a surplus.

May I just stop for a moment to point out that with the latter part of that statement the Minister of Agriculture apparently agrees, because he said this afternoon that there is not a great surplus of beef products in Canada at the present time. The brief goes on:

> Yet prices during the past two years have declined approximately 50 per cent.

I have no doubt that these figures are based on statistics which are authentic, and if that is so then certainly it is a far cry from the impression that was left this afternoon. A drop of 50 per cent in the price of livestock products certainly would indicate that the producers of livestock at least are not in the best position that they have been in for years.

Mr. Gardiner: Fifty per cent on cattle.

Mr. Zaplitny: All right; we will accept that. Let it be cattle, but it does not say so in this brief. I continue:

> In view of this, can such a drastic price decrease be justified? We believe it is time that a full investigation of the livestock industry in Canada be made—right from the situation of the primary producers to that of the ultimate consumers.

That was in February, and in the same brief the farm union council suggested that they were interested in a livestock marketing board. From time to time there have been discussions about a livestock marketing board in the house as well as in the provincial legislatures. The attitude taken by the Minister of Agriculture—he will have to say if this is still his attitude—has been that this is something for the provincial governments to look after. Apparently the farm union council is quite willing to go along with that idea, but they have placed a proviso in their brief, and I think a very wise one. They point out that the federal government has taken the attitude that the provinces should take the initiative in setting up livestock marketing boards. They are agreeable to going along with that, but here is the proviso:

> Provided suitable floor prices are assured to the actual producers by the federal government, the farm unions have indicated their willingness to go along with you on such a proposal and would draw to your attention that we have taken the lead in calling two livestock marketing conferences on the prairies—the first in October of last year, and the second in January of this year—where the actual producers were invited, and did attend. At these conferences it was decided to begin drafting an improved plan for livestock marketing, using provincial legislation where available and in those provinces where the majority of livestock producers are ready to proceed, looking forward to the establishment of an interprovincial producer-controlled marketing agency in the near future, utilizing existing federal legislation to provide the needed co-ordination in livestock marketing.

Since then there have been one or two additional conferences, and if newspaper reports are correct the minister was present at one of them at least. In Manitoba two conferences have recently been held, one under the sponsorship of the Manitoba farmers' union, which was largely attended, and the meeting of approximately a thousand farmers almost unanimously agreed that there should be a livestock marketing board under existing Manitoba legislation. I understand that the same situation exists in the province of Saskatchewan so far as the organization there is concerned. Apparently there is some difficulty in Alberta because I understand there is no provincial legislation at the present time providing for the establishment of such a board. However, that situation may change.

In addition, shortly after the conference in Winnipeg, Manitoba, another conference was called in the city of Brandon by the Manitoba wheat pools. The delegates there present took under consideration the proposal made by the farmers' union to set up a livestock marketing board. While the wheat pools declined to take any active part in the setting up of such a board, they did pass a resolution supporting in principle the idea of a livestock marketing board. Apparently the farmers of Manitoba are going ahead through their organizations and I assume that they expect that the plan to set up a livestock marketing board will receive the approval of the provincial government.

But in my opinion a very important consideration so far as the possible success of such a board is concerned is that very proviso which the interprovincial council placed in their brief when they added "provided suitable floor prices are assured to the actual producers by the federal government." It is quite clear that unless some provision is made for setting a floor price under cattle and livestock prices generally at the federal level the prospects for success would not be very bright if a board were set up within a province or if a joint board were set up by the three prairie provinces in an endeavour to co-ordinate and synchronize their efforts.

I believe that those who are very keenly interested in this question of a livestock marketing board, and in my opinion that represents a large majority of the farmers, are going to be somewhat disappointed to learn that the minister has said that in his opinion no floor price is needed under cattle or hogs at this time. However, apparently that is the policy of the government and unless the government is willing to change its mind nothing can be done about it at this time. But I do hope that the minister will re-examine the policy and take into consideration the fact that the farmers of the three prairie provinces are seriously trying to do something at this time to safeguard the future of the livestock industry. Another substantial drop in prices of livestock in the three prairie provinces could have most serious consequences so far as production is concerned.

I turn for a moment to some of the other representations made in this brief. We were also informed that the over-all situation so far as grain and other things are concerned is good. The brief points out that from 1946 to 1952 farm indebtedness increased from $367 million to $486 million. It also points out that from 1951 to 1953 farm income dropped by $137,270,000. I am not going to quote figures at any great length because we can get into quite a dispute about figures depending on how they are made up. The situation is that farm income is dropping, and one of the most serious phases of it is the livestock situation. I do hope that the government will consider coming to the assistance of provinces that are interested in a livestock board and will at least give them the protection of a floor price so that they may successfully operate the kind of livestock board that they decide is most suitable. I might say at this point it is not quite clear yet just what form the livestock board will take if and when it is approved by the farmers, but the principle of a board and also the principle of a board of livestock commissioners has been endorsed by the great majority of the farmers of the prairie provinces, and certainly in Manitoba.

I want to deal for a moment with another question. It is not a new subject in the house nor is it a new subject to me or to the minister. I refer to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, one of the acts administered by the minister's department. In recent months several efforts have been made by the province of Manitoba to secure amendments to the legislation. So far the government has not seen fit to recommend any amendments. I think it might be well to point out that the agitation for amendments to the act was made the more urgent by the fact that the northwestern section of Manitoba, which happens to be the part of the province represented by myself and the hon. members for Churchill and Portage-Neepawa, was severely damaged by floods in 1953. As a result the municipalities, chambers of commerce, the provincial government and provincial and other members had to find some means by which they could come to the assistance of these farmers.

I should like to draw to the attention of the minister something which I hope will not give rise to another round of political brickbats. I will try to do it as calmly as possible, but it is quite reminiscent of the South Saskatchewan river dam situation. Last summer at about the height of the flood situation a meeting of the Liberal association was held in Dauphin at which they nominated a candidate. It so happened that I was present as an observer because it was announced that at the same meeting there would be a discussion about the flood situation.

Sitting back and listening to the discussion I heard from high local officials of the Liberal association as well as the then sitting member representing that district, and the Minister of Justice was also there though I regret he is not in his seat at this moment because I would have something further to say for his particular benefit. However, all those present on the platform—and represented among them were at least two of the provincial members, the federal representative, and other representatives of the Liberal party—without exception rose and advised the meeting—which comprised almost 400 people all of whom had been informed in advance that there would be a discussion and perhaps an announcement as to what the federal government would do to assist the farmers in that situation and they were keenly interested in what these men had to say—that the situation was worse than the Red river flood and they used words such as "disastrous" and "catastrophe" and called it many other things and made statements which made it quite clear to any reasonable person that if they would only make requests to the federal government for special assistance in order to compensate them at least in part for the terrific losses they had sustained the federal government would come to their assistance.

I want to make it clear that not one word was said at that time about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This was to be special assistance over and above the ordinary provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and I think the farmers and municipal officials there were quite justified in believing something was going to be done if a request was made. The rest of the story is well known by the minister. Here I would like to say that I am not placing any blame on the shoulders of the minister because he was not present.

The Deputy Chairman: I apologize for having to interrupt the hon. member but I am doing so on his behalf. I would ask committee members that if they have to carry on conversations to do so as quietly as possible. I do not think it is fair to any hon. member who is trying to address the house or to those who are trying to listen to him.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I was saying, perhaps the Minister of Agriculture was not even aware at that time of the statements being made. However, surely the minister must have been made aware of the facts after having received a visit from a small delegation while he was in Saskatchewan. That delegation on returning from their visit to the minister, and here I only repeat what has been said by others, left the impression again that if the province of Manitoba would make a request to the federal government assistance would be forthcoming.

From that time on many of us made great efforts to have a request forwarded from the province of Manitoba to the federal government for this special assistance believing in good faith that since statements had been made, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture had said that he would be willing to consider such a request, it would be for the benefit of the farmer to do so. But as the correspondence piled up we found there seemed to be the same tendency as is displayed in this South Saskatchewan dam situation that certain statements are made and then people start backing away from them. Here I would like to quote from a letter from the premier of Manitoba to the Minister of Agriculture dated December 12, 1953 discussing this whole situation of special assistance which I had requested in the house. I was not alone in making that request for the same request was made by municipal officials and provincial members. However, I would like to read this paragraph from that letter:

> I might mention in regard to this whole question that to my knowledge there has been no suggestion from the federal government that assistance, other than that given under the P.F.A. Act, would be forthcoming if the province of Manitoba so requested.

Now I will have to accept his word for that.

Mr. Gardiner: There is another letter besides that one.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, there are a couple of dozen letters but I am not going to take the trouble of referring to them all. This is an important phase of this matter because up until the time I received a copy of this letter, which the premier of Manitoba was good enough to forward to me at the same time as it was dispatched, I was fully under the impression, and so were hundreds of farmers and municipal officials in that area, that the federal government was willing to consider a request from the province of Manitoba for such assistance.

It now appears that the premier of Manitoba had no such assurance. The result of this was that instead of obtaining special assistance the province of Manitoba had to attempt to obtain an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in order that the farmers in that area, and of course in similar areas elsewhere, would receive benefit under that act.

To give some justification for that requested amendment to the act I should like to place some figures on record. I have here a set of figures which set out the contributions made by farmers to the prairie farm assistance fund under the one per cent levy, and also the payments made out of that fund. I will give them only in round figures. Farmers in the province of Manitoba from 1939 to 1952 made total contributions of $11,903,857.84 and to that we must add the 1953 payments amounting to $516,719, because the latter figure is not included in that first total. The two figures together bring the total contributions to a little over the $12 million mark. When we turn to the benefits received during the same period we find that from 1939 to 1952 the benefits received in Manitoba amounted to $3,394,546 to which we must add the 1953 figures totalling $500,128 which brings us to a total of nearly $4 million which is about one-third of the total contributed. In other words, for every three dollars contributed by the grain farmers of Manitoba since 1939 under the one per cent compulsory levy they received only one dollar from that fund in return.

Due to that we find that later on towards the end of the session in the Manitoba provincial legislature a resolution was introduced by Mr. Stinson, who is the leader of the C.C.F. group in that parliament, in these words:

> That in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of requesting the federal government to grant emergency assistance to farmers who suffered crop losses due to flood damage in northwestern Manitoba in 1953.

That, of course, was in line with all the other representations that were made. However, the government of Manitoba apparently did not approve of that resolution in that form so a government member moved an amendment so that the amended resolution read as follows:

> That this house urges the federal government to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in order that Manitoba farmers who suffered serious crop losses due to excessive moisture conditions in 1953 receive further assistance.

Those last few words are rather important. May I repeat them: so that they may "receive further assistance". This resolution or amendment apparently was not framed for the purpose of amending the Prairie Farm Assistance Act only for future years but also so that if the amendments were made, farmers in Manitoba could receive further assistance with regard to 1953.

A copy of this amendment no doubt was forwarded to the government here. I also raised the matter several times in the house asking the minister whether the amendments would be recommended. Finally we were told not so long ago that the government had no intention whatever of bringing in these amendments. At this time I should like to plead with the minister not to close the door.

The situation in Manitoba, as I have already pointed out, is such that the farmers have contributed to the fund three times as much as they have received out of it. That situation is owing to the way in which the act operates. In Manitoba there is interest in starting a crop insurance scheme which, incidentally, was suggested by the minister himself in one of his letters to the minister of agriculture in Manitoba. However, as we know from experience, the setting up of a crop insurance scheme at the provincial level at this time is a thing that is not going to come about quickly. We know that investigations were made in Saskatchewan and Manitoba as far back as 1939, 1940, 1942 and so on—and perhaps even before that—into the feasibility of setting up a crop insurance scheme on a provincial basis and that nothing has come out of it.

Even though that committee has been set up by the Manitoba legislature to look into the matter again, I am sure that it will be years before that province will be in a position to take action on a crop insurance scheme; and even then they might have to ask the backing of the federal government in order to underwrite the scheme so as to make it successful. In the meantime I think a good case is made out, not only for the province of Manitoba—and here I am not just making a plea for the constituency of Dauphin or the other two that I have mentioned, namely those of Churchill and Portage-Neepawa which are more urgently involved at this time—but for similar areas in the other two prairie provinces. I think there should be set up some system of zoning under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in order that farmers in those areas at least have the hope or the possibility of benefiting equally under the act. As the situation is now, the scales are unevenly balanced to the detriment of Manitoba; that is not something done deliberately but that has been the result. In the province of Manitoba, or at least in part of it, we suffer more from flooding than from drought. As a result, when it comes to a matter of applying the act, even if it is done in the most lenient manner possible, it just is not possible to give the kind of compensation the farmers deserve.

I am going to recommend that the minister consider under the act a zoning plan under which, after studying crop reports over a period of years—and all those figures are available—it should be possible to set up zones with different yields as the qualifying yardstick. At the present time the yield is set at eight bushels per acre on the average on wheat. There are some areas in which wheat is not a suitable yardstick. There are some areas in which the figure of eight bushels is certainly not a suitable yardstick for a qualifying figure. Certainly northwestern Manitoba is not, because our crop yields on the average are higher than those in most parts of Saskatchewan, and the farming is done on a smaller scale. As I pointed out, flooding and hail affect crop yields in a different manner than does drought. It is not the over-all picture. It is spotty. So I am going to recommend that the minister consider the idea of zoning so that in certain areas we could have a qualifying figure of eight bushels as at the present time but in others perhaps the figure should be twelve bushels. In others it might even be fourteen bushels, depending on the over-all long-time average yield.

There is another justification for such zoning for qualifying purposes, and that is the actual cost of production. It is well known that in the dry areas of the province of Saskatchewan, for example, or in Alberta summer fallowing is a much simpler and less costly operation than it is in northwestern Manitoba or, for that matter, in northeastern Saskatchewan. Where there is much more rain, where conditions are different and the land is heavier, it is necessary to work the land much more thoroughly and much more often during the summer months, a procedure which of course entails much greater expense. If crop conditions are normal the farmers are, of course, compensated for that expense by having a heavier yield. But if they have a loss owing to flood or hail or some other cause, the amount of money they have put into that land is much greater than it is in the case of, say, southwestern Saskatchewan or the drier areas. I therefore believe it would be only fair and just to set up a zoning system in order that farmers may have an equal opportunity at least of benefiting from this act.

As the situation is now I may say quite frankly to the minister that there is a great deal of discontent with the act in the province of Manitoba. The premier of Manitoba has stated on behalf of this government that he is definitely dissatisfied with the act. He has stated on occasion that Manitoba should cut itself entirely away from the act, should have nothing to do with it and should set up its own crop insurance scheme, all of which is all right provided that he has a crop insurance scheme to put in its place. At the present time the province has not such a scheme. I for one do not go along with the premier of Manitoba on that matter. I think that we should not cut ourselves away from this act until the province has a crop insurance scheme to put in its place, or something which would be better. But the over-all picture in Manitoba is that unless this act can be amended so as to give the farmers of Manitoba a better break than that which they have been receiving, certainly the province of Manitoba would be justified in eventually breaking away entirely from this act.

There are one or two other things about this act that I think need some changes. For example, there is the provision under which lands bought or purchased from the province after a certain date—I believe it is 1940—are not eligible for prairie farm assistance. At the time this provision was placed in the act there may have been some reason for it, but since then it has certainly worked a hardship on some of the farmers. Those farmers are not exempt from the one per cent levy. They still have to contribute to the fund one per cent of the value of their crops just like anybody else, and they feel that they are being discriminated against if they are denied the benefits of this act to which they are obliged to contribute. I think consideration should be given to making a change in that respect.

In closing I want to say just a word on this question that I have tried to discuss as calmly as possible, although I feel strongly about it. I think that on future occasions we should not have a repetition of what happened where persons make statements like those which were made in the town of Dauphin about the end of June, making it quite clear that the federal government was going to come to the assistance of these farmers and these statements are accepted in good faith, and then later on the people are told that there was no such intention. I think that sort of thing is not good for public relations. I do not think it is good for the Liberal party. I do not think it is good for government. I do not think it is good in any respect. I think that statements like that are the kind of statements which bring into contempt the statements of politicians across Canada. I think we have a duty to the people of this country to keep them informed accurately and honestly at all times. Even though I cannot see how those statements could have brought any political advantage—no doubt they were designed to bring political advantage or were an attempt to bring political advantage but I fail to see how they could have done so—those statements were made. Then they had to be eaten by those persons who made them.

As a result, there has been a great deal of bitterness and bickering in the province of Manitoba since last July. Of course now we know where we stand. The federal government has told us quite plainly they are not going to do anything in this respect. The premier of Manitoba has made it quite plain he intends to make no such request of the federal government. I am not, therefore, laying any blame at the doorstep of the Minister of Agriculture. Certainly the people who made those requests and those representations were justified in making them on the basis of the statements that were made to them by the Liberal politicians at that meeting to which I have referred.

Mr. Gardiner: In view of the fact these estimates will probably not come up again for several days there are one or two things I should say in reference to some of the questions which have been raised. I do not want to enter into a discussion about the last question which was raised, except to say this. After the first meetings which were held there was considerable done. I am not saying that everything was done that those meetings requested, but everything was done which could possibly be done under the present terms of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and that amounted to considerable. It was not simply a matter of forgetting all about it, and not doing everything that could be done under the act as it is now drawn.

The other matter about which I wanted to say a word is the floor price on cattle, and beef particularly. The member for Dauphin has gone into that in some detail, and I only want to say that I agree with what he has said, that I did attend one of the meetings held in western Canada recently, the one which was held in Saskatoon last week. This question was discussed at that meeting. I do not believe Alberta was represented at the meeting but the Manitoba farmers union was represented as was the Saskatchewan farmers union. Representations were made at that time, and they were the same as the submissions to the government that were read to us here.

We discussed this question for the greater part of the afternoon, and they reached the unanimous decision which was contained in the press statement later. It was somewhat of a withdrawal from the position taken in the resolution that was read by the member for Dauphin. What I want to say concerning the matter of a floor price under cattle or under beef is exactly what I said to the gathering in Saskatoon. I said I did not think there was anything to be gained at this time in putting a floor price under cattle as our surplus is sold in the United States, the highest market there is in the world. If we were to establish a price higher than that as a floor price, then there would be enough beef from the United States come over here to entirely ruin our markets and put us in a position of not being able to sell. On the other hand, if we were to set a price lower than the price being obtained now, then the natural thing would be to suggest that we were indicating the price was too high.

With those two matters placed before them the committee asked what alternative we had to suggest. I stated to them that we had the co-operative marketing act of 1939. Under that co-operative marketing act we could set up a marketing organization to make it possible to do the same things as we have done for cheese in Ontario for two years, and which we are asked to do again this year; the same as we have done for potatoes in the provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. In other words, we could guarantee an initial payment not to exceed 80 per cent of the average price for the last three years. I stated to them that there was only one case in which we did make the average 80 per cent. In most cases it was 60 per cent, and in some cases it was less than 50 per cent. In any case we guaranteed the organization so that they could go to the bank, raise money and whenever they took delivery of whatever the product may be they would be in a position to make an initial payment to the farmer. Then, the organization proceeds to sell the product and when they realize a price for it, they divide the money amongst those who form a part of the organization.

I repeat what I suggested a moment ago. After they had discussed that, and discussed it very fully, all of those present at that meeting stated they would make these representations the next day to the general meeting. I understand they did make them on Friday of last week, and that the idea was supported at that meeting. Under that legislation you do not have what is generally called a floor price. There is no attempt made to guarantee a price to the producers, but there is an effort made to set up a pooling organization of which all the producers can be a part. They have their own organization to sell their product. My intention in saying what I did was to impress upon them that we thought it was better to proceed under that legislation, which is already on the statute books and which has worked successfully in 96 out of 98 operations since 1939.

When I say it has operated successfully, I am speaking as a member of the government. When we set up the act we hoped to be able to make such arrangements with the organization that was benefiting by it that there would not be any payment necessary on the part of the government. Now, we miscalculated on furs and we did have a considerable amount of money to pay on furs at the end of the war. This was largely because prices were high towards the end of the war, and when they dropped rather suddenly the government had to pay some of the guarantees it had made.

The second case in which we will probably have to make some payment this year is the guarantee for the potato growers in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

The guarantees made were higher than the prices received for the potatoes when they were sold. The producer gets his initial payment, and if there is a loss occasioned the federal government pays it. On the other hand, if there is a profit made there is a distribution of those profits to the individuals who were part of the organization set-up and who delivered products to that organization.

As I say, we discussed it very fully, and after having discussed it fully there was this attempt that is being made in Saskatchewan. I assume it will have its effect in Manitoba as well. The attempt being made in Saskatchewan is to organize first a livestock board to handle the livestock under the provincial act. Then they suggest that they may come to this government in order to get a guarantee which makes it possible for them to make an initial payment so the farmers can carry on until their product is sold. Then they will again come here if there are any profits in order to get permission to pay out, having indicated that there will be no loss to the government here, and they will make further payments to the farmers.

The legislation is there, and I just wanted to say tonight, while the question was being discussed, that those are the reasons why it was not thought wise to put a floor price under cattle at this time. There is, as you know, a floor price under hogs of 23 cents which has been referred to by the hon. member for Huron. The only time the price has gone down close to that was a period which the hon. member for Huron mentioned, when the farmers were putting their hogs on the market in much greater numbers than the market would readily take them. That was during the month of January, when they thought that the lowering of the guaranteed price or the floor price was going to result in the lowering of the price of hogs. They thought that, and they delivered hogs in great numbers and almost succeeded in forcing the price down to 23 cents. But immediately that process had been carried through, the price went back up. And the prices have been the highest since that time that they have ever been in our history.

It is true, as the hon. member for Huron said, that those who stayed in benefited by that, and those who got out did not benefit. But I would like to call to the attention of western members the fact that the production of hogs has gone up. In the province of Saskatchewan as of the month of June in the year before last I believe they had over 400,000 head of hogs on their farms. Last year in June they had almost 50 per cent more, with a figure of something more than 600,000. In the province of Ontario—and I think the hon. member for Huron will agree with this—they have succeeded through the years in holding the numbers of hogs in Ontario up to a point higher than they were even during the war. And while we in Saskatchewan had 1,700,000 hogs during the war and dropped down to almost 400,000, the province of Ontario went up after the war, and it continued to go up until this year. I do not think they have quite as many this year as they had a year ago. But that reduction in Ontario started to take place under the high prices, not because the prices were lower.

Hogs have been selling across Canada during this past year at anywhere from $42 or $43 per hog up to $50 or $55. Everyone in the house who has raised hogs will know that that is not a price at which one loses money, even at present costs. The returns are fairly high. There is a floor price of $23 under hogs. The price has been up in the $30 bracket during the greater part of the time since that floor price was put on.

In connection with cattle, the situation is as I have outlined it. I doubt very much if it would be to the benefit of farmers—as a matter of fact I am convinced it would not be—for us to put any floor price on that we could put on at the present time. The regulator of cattle prices is the prices in the United States. As the hon. member for Huron said, there have been cattle going to the United States during this last week at $21 per hundredweight.

Mr. Cardiff: That was paid here for them.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that was paid here for them, and it means that all the costs—duty, freight and so on—were paid. They were landed in the United States at some point where they were slaughtered at that rate. There is great sympathy for the farmers—particularly the young farmers—who came into the cattle business in 1951, as was described by the hon. member for Huron. Those who came in in 1951 and bought cattle at the prices then prevailing certainly took a loss. But the older men who have been in the cattle business for a long time were in a different position. I have talked to a good number of them in the last week or two and they have told me they made good money prior to 1951 on a rising price. They have handled about the same number every year and many of them were in a position to take the loss which they had to take as a result of having bought at the peak price in 1951 and selling at the lower price in 1952 or 1953.

But I understand well the position of the young men. Indeed, I was in that position at the end of the first war, myself. I lost most of what I had, and certainly all I expected to gain by going in. The price did go down. It went down a long time as it did following the last war. I agree that the young people who have gone in now have had some difficult experiences. However I think the hon. member for Huron will agree that those who bought their cattle last fall and fed them during this winter have done very well.

It would take quite a while, even at the gain they could make this year, to make up the loss they had to take following 1951. But we hope it will not be necessary for them to do that and that they will be able to go along in this line of business. Operating on the American price they have a floor which is as high and as strong as any floor could be—whether this government were to put it on, or whether it was put on in any other way. The American market is the natural market for our surplus. Our cattle go there; and if the market here will not stay close to that price, then they will go there in greater numbers.

Our marketings in the United States in the last year have not been very high, the reason being that apparently we were not prepared to accept the prices which were paid. With hogs as high in price as they were people were more inclined on this side of the line to eat more beef. And a great number of the cattle which have gone into the market have been consumed here in the form of beef. But we are still convinced that the best floor price we can have at the moment, and probably for some time to come, is the American market, with the American price. That is the reason why we have not thought it was particularly wise to put on a floor price for cattle this year.

I think that is all I need to say tonight. There are other matters I should like to refer to at a later time. I did think, however, that these matters should be discussed now rather than to leave them over until next week.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, most of the remarks I wish to make on agriculture can be made in the discussion on particular items. However I wish to take this opportunity to deal very briefly with one particular subject which is somewhat dear to my heart, and which I am sure is very close to the hearts of a great many of my constituents, and that is the unfortunate lack of co-operation between various departments in the federal and provincial governments. On several occasions this has seriously affected agricultural development in my constituency.

In passing I might say that the constituency of Kootenay West produces only about 16 per cent of its total food requirements. Therefore it can be seen that there is a great opportunity for expansion of agriculture in that constituency, particularly when it is known that we have thousands of fertile uncleared and unsettled acres. What are the principal reasons for this? The principal reasons are lack of transportation and lack of public investment in irrigation, drainage, schools and hospitals, as well as in public services such as lighting and telephones.

I readily admit the good work that is being done by both the federal and provincial governments departments of agriculture; but there is a lack of co-operation that I think is very necessary for the proper settlement of this part of the country and for the protection of our farmers. This lack of co-operation between the federal departments and the provincial government causes difficulties in my constituency particularly—I am speaking from experience—for those who are farming at present and prevents many others who would wish to farm to take advantage of the many fertile acres which are only awaiting public investment on the part of governments, federal and provincial, and the application of industry and labour on the part of individuals. To illustrate that point I must mention that while we produce in my constituency only some 16 per cent of our total food requirements, we have some 16,000 acres of undeveloped fertile agricultural land in the Lardeau valley, of which the greater portion is black soil bottom land. We have thousands of undeveloped acres on the Arrow lakes and thousands of acres idle in other parts of my constituency remaining undeveloped because of the lack of co-operation that provides the public investment and the public services that are necessary if this land is to be settled by the people who want to settle it.

The federal government is responsible for P.F.R.A., and I shall have a little more to say about that under the item in question. Great work can be done under P.F.R.A. in British Columbia, and particularly in my constituency. There is the Department of Veterans Affairs interested in settling veterans. There should be the greatest co-operation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Veterans Affairs and the provincial departments concerned. The federal department can do something to promote agriculture and to give some guidance to the development of these new areas in the establishment of not expensive but small illustration stations, that would be of help to settlers, because our conditions vary greatly within a few miles. Then there is the question of co-operation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Public Works. Very often the lowering of a river by some dredging or the removing of some log jams or something of that sort lowers the water table of the surrounding land and provides additional opportunities for farming. In the last three years the lowering of the Duncan river as a result of the removing of snags and obstacles has lowered the water table in the surrounding land so that 3,000 or 4,000 acres can be farmed to better advantage.

Then, we have the federal government responsible for unemployment. What an opportunity for some co-operative planning and to use many now unemployed in all these projects. The provincial government is responsible for roads, hospitals and schools and for the provision of light and power facilities and for telephones. All that is required is a common-sense approach and the development of more co-operation instead of the unplanned approach with both the federal and the provincial governments going their own ways, and federal departments and provincial departments carrying on without any co-ordination of their activities. What we need is a co-ordinated approach and a co-operative approach on the part of all agencies, federal and provincial.

I want to illustrate that by a recent happening in my constituency which could have been prevented, I believe, if there had been some co-operation between the federal departments and between the federal government and the provincial government at an earlier stage, and some activity on the part of the Department of Agriculture to protect the farmers' interests in my constituency. I refer to the plight of the farmers and the fruit growers on the Arrow lakes who are left stranded because of the discontinuation of steamer service on the Arrow lakes.

In the early days that district was settled as a result of promotion activities in London largely by the government of Canada, the government of British Columbia and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Most of the early settlers in the Arrow lakes district, as they were in the Kootenay district, where our good chairman comes from, were green Englishmen who suffered the full consequences of their greenness after they arrived. I remember one settler in the Arrow lakes, a Dr. Kelso, who made particular inquiries in London of the Canadian Pacific Railway when he bought a tract of land in the Arrow lakes district where we had a steamer service in operation, and which was an excellent service. He inquired whether it would be maintained. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company's officials said to him and to many others intending to settle on the land in that area that not only would they guarantee to maintain the present service but if anything it would be improved.

That is the basis upon which the settlement took place. Many of those people in those isolated communities have spent a lifetime clearing the forests and clearing the land, planting orchards, making fields and developing farms; their whole life experience, all their capital and all their labour have been devoted to the development of their small ranches during the last half century. All their investment is in that district, where suddenly, with thirty days' notice, the Canadian Pacific Railway discontinues the steamer service on the Arrow lakes, with a callous indifference to the needs of the farmers and settlers who settled in the district in the early days. The company's officials did not even have the courtesy or the decency to give those affected at least six months' or a year's notice of the discontinuance of the service so that they could arrange for some other service. At the present time the farmers in my district who want to get out to Revelstoke from south of Nakusp have to engage to travel on non-scheduled aeroplane flights and this is most expensive. At the present time there is no provision to transport the freight, express and passengers in general, from Nakusp to Arrowhead.

I bring this to the attention of the minister because in a situation like this the federal Department of Agriculture should have been interested in the plight of these ranchers, and so should the provincial government and the provincial department of agriculture. Here are people who were brought into this country by government and C.P.R. advertising, who have devoted their whole lives to the development of the country and have made a great contribution. Suddenly on thirty days' notice, they are left without transportation facilities and their whole established routine is upset and disturbed.

At the present time every effort is being made to have some service established on certain portions of the lake, and I urge that the Minister of Agriculture do everything he can to support the activities of the West Kootenay and central farmers' institute, and the various fruit growers organizations and the other organizations in the district of the Arrow lakes who are trying to find some way now to re-establish a service which will give them an opportunity to travel, to ship their hay, their fruit, their other commodities, such as cherries and produce of that sort, north to Revelstoke, or south to the Kettle Valley railroad. I emphasize again that this is an excellent illustration of an unfortunate happening to 3,000 people, the majority of whom are small ranchers, fruit growers and farmers, because of the lack of co-operation between federal departments and between the dominion and provincial governments.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, shall I rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Mr. Herridge: There is one subject I forgot to mention. I ask for the indulgence of the committee. I intended to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that the national film board has taken an excellent picture of this steamer service on the Arrow lakes and it is going to be shown in the railway committee room at seven o'clock on Tuesday. I hope the Minister of Agriculture and all hon. members will attend to see what an unfortunate thing has happened to my own district in the loss of this necessary and historic steamer service.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall continue with the budget debate and if, as may be hoped for, we complete it, we shall spend the rest of the day on the budget resolutions. If they happen to be disposed of we shall go on with the Japanese trade treaty; but if Monday is taken up on the budget and the resolutions we shall take the Japanese trade treaty when we reach it on Tuesday and legislation which I can indicate on Monday evening to follow that. It will be our intention to take estimates again on Thursday and Friday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 3, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

OLD AGE PAYMENTS—MANITOBA

Mr. Castleden:

1. How many citizens in Manitoba, 70 years of age and over, receive old age security payments?
2. How many citizens in Manitoba, 65 to 69, receive the old age pension?
3. How many citizens in Manitoba, 70 and over, receive a supplementary allowance from the provincial government?
4. How many citizens in Manitoba, 65 to 69, receive a supplementary allowance from the provincial government?
5. What is the total amount of the supplementary allowance paid by the provincial government of Manitoba?
6. What is the total amount of the supplementary allowance paid by the provincial government of Manitoba in the 65 to 69 age group?

Mr. Martin:

1. In February 1954—42,388.

2. In February 1954—4,828.

3. Supplementary allowances are not paid by the province of Manitoba to recipients either under the Old Age Security Act or under the Old Age Assistance Act.

4, 5 and 6. See answer to No. 3 above.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT EXPENDITURES, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

What were the total expenditures by all branches of the Department of Transport in Nova Scotia, during the fiscal year 1952-53?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

General	$ 1,325.00
Canals	41,950.89
Marine	1,886,721.55
Railways	6,032,340.94
Air	1,329,335.38
Grand total	$9,291,673.76

ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN, OTTAWA—40-HOUR WEEK

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government in the Ottawa area yet been accorded the five-day 40-hour week?
2. If not, have representations been received by the government requesting that such employees be accorded the five-day 40-hour week?
3. What consideration has been given to such requests?
4. Will such employees be put on the five-day 40-hour week at an early date? If so, at what date?
5. If it has not yet been decided to put such employees on the five-day 40-hour week, will the matter be given further consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1 to 5. Stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government in the Ottawa area have not yet been accorded the five-day 40-hour week. Representations, however, have been received and the matter is being given consideration.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

FRENCH LANGUAGE TELEVISION, OTTAWA-HULL

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Has an application been received for the establishment of a French language television station for the Hull-Ottawa district?
2. If so, has such application been accepted?
3. Has it been rejected? If so, for what reason?
4. What percentage of French programs are being broadcast by CBOT?
5. What is the percentage of French-Canadian population in the Hull-Ottawa district?

DISABLED PERSONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF ALLOWANCES—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting allowances for disabled persons and to provide for the payment to the provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts in respect of allowances for disabled persons paid by the provinces, to certain persons who have attained the age of eighteen years, and who are totally and permanently disabled and in need of such allowances, not exceeding in respect of any recipient fifty per centum of forty dollars monthly or of the amount of the allowance paid by the provinces monthly to the recipients, whichever is the lesser; and to provide for the making of agreements with the provinces in relation thereto and for the conditions and duration of such agreements.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. FELICIEN AND HILLSPORT LINES—PROVISION FOR FINANCING

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct lines of railway from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and from Chibougamau to Beattyville, all in the province of Quebec, and from Hillsport on the main line of the Canadian National Railways to Manitouwadge Lake, both in the province of Ontario, being on the whole approximately 321 miles at a total estimated expenditure of $38,750,000. The measure will make provision for the issue by the company of securities, which may be guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction. To enable the company to proceed with construction forthwith, temporary loans may be made to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council and secured by company securities.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is it the intention of the government to set up a committee on veterans affairs, the resolution providing for which has now been on the order paper nearly three months?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I should think the motion would be moved at a very early date—probably immediately after the debate on the budget.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INITIAL PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister say whether an early announcement will be made as to the 1954 initial price for grain, so that farmers can plan to better advantage for the current season of operations?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It will not be possible to make an early announcement regarding the initial price. There are too many factors that are obscure at the moment that will be much more clearly defined later in the season. The announcement will certainly be made before the end of the crop year, but not much before then.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FIRE IN HANGAR AT PENHOLD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence, notice of which has been given. Has the investigation into the fire which occurred at the Penhold air station on April 10 been concluded and, if so, will the report be tabled in the House of Commons or otherwise made available to members of parliament?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): The fire occurred at Penhold on April 10. Immediately thereafter a Royal Canadian Air Force board of inquiry was set up to investigate the circumstances of the fire. I am informed that the board completed its investigation late last week and that the proceedings are either in transit or about to be forwarded to Ottawa. I think it is a well-established practice that reports of service boards of inquiry investigating service matters go to the minister for his information and guidance and that of officials of the department. It has never been the practice in this house to table such reports. I shall, however, be glad to give the hon. member any information I can as soon as I myself am in possession of all the relevant facts.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Is it the practice of the government of the United Kingdom to share with or impart to the Canadian government any of the information of the United Kingdom with respect to atomic or hydrogen bombs? If so, is the minister in a position to comment on a press report in today's newspapers that the British government has a cheaper and more effective hydrogen bomb than the government of the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There is complete exchange of information with the British government on matters with which the Canadian government is concerned; but the Canadian government is not manufacturing bombs, and therefore we have no information to exchange with Britain on that subject, and we receive no information from Britain on the subject.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Perron (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, when one addresses the house for the first time in the course of a debate such as this, it is somewhat customary, I believe, to say a few words about one's own constituency. I therefore would like, at the outset, to recall certain political memories concerning the county of Dorchester and the men who have represented it here in this house.

I would like, in particular, Mr. Speaker, to remind you that in 1916 the member for Dorchester was holding the office you are performing today with such dignity. I refer to the Hon. Albert Sevigny who presided over these debates also with great dignity. The Hon. Mr. Sevigny later became a minister in the Borden cabinet, and, had it not been for certain circumstances which are of little interest today, would still be, I believe, the member for Dorchester. Mr. Sevigny is now chief justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec over which he presides with the dignity and legal experience which are so well known to all.

The Hon. Lucien Cannon, who was the uncle of the present representative of the Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon), then represented the constituency of Dorchester for about 12 years. He was solicitor general in the Mackenzie King administration. Nobody has forgotten what an able speaker this former member for Dorchester was. I must admit, for my part, that this speaking ability was, to me, a source of the greatest enjoyment when I was still a young man. Later on, the Hon. Mr. Cannon was appointed to the Quebec superior court. His untimely death was a great loss to the bench, among whose most enlightened members he was.

Dorchester also had the privilege of being represented here by one of its native sons, the Hon. Onesime Gagnon, who was a minister in the Bennett cabinet and who is now provincial minister of finance in Quebec. He administers this important department with the same competence, devotion to work and selflessness that he had shown when he sat here.

And what can we say of my immediate predecessor, the Hon. Leonard Tremblay, who now sits in the Senate, but who represented Dorchester for 18 years. It is always a difficult and delicate thing in circumstances such as these, especially when dealing with political opponents, to speak on topical matters, before the passage of time has completely eliminated all friction. So I shall say about Senator Tremblay, to parody a famous statement: "He did me too much wrong for me to speak well of him, but he did too much good for me to speak ill of him." However I should like to congratulate the government on having appointed him a senator, for he had served his party well and that will enable him to keep on living in the political atmosphere which has always been so dear to him.

Mr. Speaker, need I add that, as a rule, the member for Dorchester is elected with a small majority and that the present member was no exception to the general rule at the last elections. May I say, also, that Dorchester is on the opposition side for the first time. Here, I must confess that it was the other Quebec ridings that were at fault.

Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with two questions of special importance for the province of Quebec, but which have repercussions throughout Canada.

In the first place, I wish to speak to the resolution submitted by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) amending the Income Tax Act with regard to mutual insurance companies other than mutual life companies.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the constant buzzing that I hear here is most annoying. I cannot hear the hon. member who is speaking; there is too much competition with his voice.

(Translation):

Mr. Perron: Secondly, I want to discuss federal-provincial relations, particularly as far as the provincial tax just introduced by the government of Quebec is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, resolution No. 6 of the budget speech, which relates to the taxation of mutual insurance companies and appears on page 3736 of Hansard of April 6, 1954, reads as follows:

> Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:
> 6. For the taxation of a resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities on and after January 1, 1954 were a profit from a business, and declaring that a non-resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, shall be deemed to be and always to have been subject to taxation on that basis.

Thus the government has decided to tax the income of mutual insurance companies, including mutual fire insurance companies. The government has resolved to put an end to a struggle that has been going on for many years and in which it has never come out on top. In fact, following an investigation by a commission appointed by the government to determine whether co-operatives should be taxable, the commission came to the conclusion that some mutual fire insurance companies should not be taxed. Later on, the Supreme Court of Canada gave a decision along the same line. And these conclusions are quite logical.

The one aim of many mutual fire insurance companies is to help their members in the event of some disaster. They sprang from a charitable purpose. At first, when a farmer lost his farm buildings or his house by fire, the parishioners organized a subscription to compensate him for his loss. Then, it was found more practical and easier to create a relief fund based on yearly contributions. This fund was used to compensate the victims of disasters. In this way there was less delay. There is no question of profits. Those who look after the administration and development of these mutual fire insurance companies give their time voluntarily or almost free of charge and their zeal should not be taxed. There are no dividends, as all profits are turned back into the relief fund. Moreover, it is recognized in the amendment that it cannot be considered as commercial operations or profits, since the law says that the revenue is taxable "as though it were a profit from a business". It is thus recognized that no profits are involved. Moreover, the government commission and the Supreme Court held these same views since they stated in their conclusions that these are co-operatives without capital stock, without dividends, without refunds, and which have been established for the sole purpose of helping their members.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment, in my opinion, is a denial of justice because it is retroactive and makes subject to taxation organizations which, the Supreme Court has ruled, should not be taxed. If, in a given year, there is no fire, the treasury will have the same devastating effect as fire on the finances of these mutual companies.

I am therefore asking the minister to modify this amendment which affects at least 300 mutual fire insurance companies operating in the rural parishes of Quebec and which has created quite a commotion among their 60,000 members. This tax affects the very existence of these mutual companies which are necessary institutions and whose value is beyond doubt. I therefore ask the government to abide by the decisions of the Supreme Court and of the royal commission.

Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted now to broach a question of current interest, which concerns the right of the taxpayers from Quebec to demand that the federal government deduct from their federal income tax the amount which they are called upon to pay under the provincial income tax act. It is a hot issue in that province at the present time, especially since the Minister of Finance rejected the Quebec taxpayers' request.

It is only in this house that there seems to be any argument about the question. In the province concerned, all the people, regardless of political affiliation, unanimously recognize the fact that the federal government has absolutely no grounds to refuse a deduction based upon the most elementary justice.

All the newspapers, French or English, even those which, usually, support the Liberal party, have declared that the federal government was under the obligation to grant such a deduction and for my part I have seen no article in any paper, whatever its political colour or creed, defending the stand taken by the Minister of Finance.

Municipalities, chambers of commerce, labour unions, and a great many public organizations, associations or corporations have made representations and been unanimous in asking for such a deduction.

Opinion has never been so unanimous throughout the province. It is perfectly synchronized; the only false notes have come from the supporters of the government representing Quebec constituencies.

I admit that I find this rather strange and difficult to understand. However, we must recognize that the arguments advanced until now lacked the firmness and conviction usually shown on the other side of the house. Those arguments do not seem to have converted many people in the province of Quebec. Those arguments smell of oil, as Boileau would put it, and in reading them or listening to them one has the impression that they are the result of long sleepless nights.

Mr. Speaker, everything has been said on this matter during the past two months and as we may well hear more about it, I shall not speak too long. In my opinion, the matter is quite simple, provided one does not try to complicate it. From the admissions made by government members, one can readily conclude that the taxpayers have a right to demand this deduction. As a matter of fact, they concede that the provinces have a right to direct taxation, and that income tax is direct taxation. On the other hand they say, after denying any prior right—which, by the way, is an encroachment upon our constitutional history—that, as far as the provinces are concerned, their right to direct taxation is "parallel and concurrent with, as well as equal to" the right of the federal government. I found these epithets in the speeches delivered by members sitting on your right.

Moreover, personal income tax, as everybody knows, has reached the saturation point; this has been recognized by the Minister of Finance, who said so during the last electoral campaign, and by the taxpayers, who are asking for a breathing spell. Looking at the income tax assessment tables, one finds that those in the higher brackets are taxed up to 80 per cent of their income. Besides, this has been unanimously admitted, and the taxpayers who just filed their income tax returns have had the opportunity to find it out for themselves in a more direct and concrete way.

But what is to become of the rights of the provinces since our first concern must be for the taxpayer. We are told this right is parallel, concurrent, equal. But these words must retain some sense for us. Parallel, concurrent, equal, these do not mean that the central government must take everything, and the provinces nothing at all. In dollars and cents this means that on May 1, 1954, the government which has taken everything and collects $300 million must give up about $20 million to the provinces that have decided to use part of their own rights. If that were not the case, that right would be a fictitious one. That seems good logic to me.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that if there is double taxation, the onus of it must rest on the Quebec government. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) said as much in his speech on Wednesday, April 14, as reported in Hansard, at page 4078:

> This double taxation is exclusively due to the decision of the Quebec government which now attempts to throw the blame upon the Canadian government. This reminds me of the little boy who pulled the cat's tail and replied to his father who had told him to stop: "I am not pulling; the cat is".

That is what the hon. minister said. Well, I wish to tell him amicably that this is a feline suggestion, to say the least.

Who is responsible for this double taxation? The one who has rights and decides to use part of them, or the one who has the same right, a parallel, equal and concurrent right, and who takes all? Is the Quebec government to blame for this double taxation when the federal government collects $300 million and the other wants to raise $20 million, a ratio of 1 to 15? Why should the government levying the smaller sum be blamed? I confess that I do not understand that very well, especially when it comes to a parallel, concurrent and equal right.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec is refused a $20 million deduction, charged with levying double taxation and offered $40 million if it will sign a free and voluntary agreement. It should not be forgotten that it is always the same taxpayers who pay. The province is being offered $40 million, but it only wants about 20 and wishes to collect it itself; that is really what is being refused. The taxpayers would thus save about $20 million, but they are not allowed to do so.

When we consider that this amount of $20 million represents 1/200 of the total budget, that is ½ of 1 per cent, it seems to me that we have not been used to such meanness on the part of the federal government.

Another objection that has been raised is the fact that if such a deduction were granted, the very principle of the federal-provincial tax agreements would be affected.

We might say, right away, that, when these agreements were signed, it was stated that they would be of a temporary nature. They will terminate in 1957 anyhow, which removes any idea of permanency. They might be renewed, it is true, but who can say whether it would be on the same basis. It is also true to say that some cabinet ministers have made statements to the effect that such temporary agreements should be permanent, but there again, the provinces did not respond to these appeals, which nevertheless make it appear as if they were being sounded upon the matter.

Therefore, since these are temporary agreements, there can be no principle involved. Moreover, a section in the Quebec income tax act states that the act will be in force for three years.

That section seems to have been forgotten. Taking for granted that the federal-provincial agreements will be carried out and that they will expire in 1957, and, also, that the provincial income tax act will expire in 1957, I cannot see how this could affect the economy of the agreements. No province could complain since the province of Quebec will draw less than she would have received if she had signed an agreement.

Then we are told that there should be some way to come to an understanding. We have on the one hand—I repeat here what the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) has said—a government that wants to give and, on the other hand, a government that wants to receive. That is the very point, Mr. Speaker. It is true that there is, on the one hand, a government that wants to give but, on the other hand, there is the government of the province of Quebec that does not want to receive.

Efforts are being made to buy what is not for sale. Here is the situation in a nutshell. The government of Quebec wishes to collect its own taxes and does not care for gifts or favours. It wishes to exercise fully, entirely and freely the powers of an autonomous and sovereign government, in its own sphere and within its own rights.

Our constitution and the jurisprudence established by our courts and the privy council, when they have been called upon to provide an interpretation on that point, establish clearly that the provinces are sovereign in the fields granted to them and which are described in section 92 of our constitution. The levying of taxes which are needed for the purpose of administration is one of the prerogatives of a sovereign state. That is what the province of Quebec wishes to do. It needs money to cover the cost of its education and public health programs and of the administration of the social measures it has adopted. The government of Quebec wishes to collect that money itself and does not want any subsidy from the central government.

It has been said that this was a struggle between the Union Nationale and national unity. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not a struggle between Union Nationale and national unity and that those two phrases are too similar to imply the slightest idea of struggle. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Alexandre Taschereau, Lomer Gouin, P. J. A. Cardin and all the great Liberal leaders have stated, in one way or another, that it was a false and nefarious principle for a sovereign government to provide subsidies to another sovereign state.

[Mr. Perron.]

In saying that, I do not think that they endangered national unity. Let me quote what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> It is a completely false principle which permits one government to receive revenues and another to spend the money; that will always lead to wastefulness.

People have not been up in arms as a result of that statement, so far as I know. On the contrary, I believe everyone applauded it. Today, it is exactly the same thing as we must decide whether the province of Quebec shall or shall not rely on subsidies. In my opinion, we should not worry about national unity, even if some hon. members seem to worry about the Union Nationale.

Quebec has always generously contributed to the assistance given less privileged provinces. She has done so since 1945 without demanding any compensation, while other provinces have received subsidies; Quebec has thereby contributed more than any other province of our confederation to the maintenance of Canada's economic stability. It is not because Quebec wants to avail herself of a right that this economic equilibrium will be disrupted. The people of Quebec understand that they are citizens of a great country and they want to keep on contributing to its development and greatness. In return, they have the right to demand firmly what is rightly theirs. It would only be an act of distributive justice to accede to their request.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to say that I am proud of my party's stand on this matter. In demanding that we respect the pact which brought about confederation, the Conservative party follows the tradition of its great leaders, Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir John Macdonald. I am all the more happy at the stand taken by my party that it was the very stand taken by such great Liberal leaders as Laurier, Mackenzie King, Taschereau, Lapointe, and others, during more than half a century. The Liberal party is shunning its past in favour of a centralization which is the very negation of the principle embodied in the constitution, and such centralization is bound to have evil consequences on Canadian politics. Fortunately, we are in a position to foresee that the Conservative party, which was responsible for confederation, will be one day entrusted by the Canadian people with the task of stemming the tide of centralization and of rebuilding that which will have been destroyed.

Because of the importance of this question of personal income tax, and because this government has turned down the Quebec taxpayers' request, I take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, of appealing from this decision to the Prime Minister himself. I do so on behalf of 300,000 taxpayers and in the very name of justice, placing this question outside and above the realm of political partisanship.

(Text):

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this legislation before it is passed. I assume that this will be the last budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will bring down. I hope to spend about 30 minutes telling him what I do not like about his current effort. Nevertheless, I think I should say in passing that I am sure history will record that the Minister of Finance has done a first-class job in the years during which he has been Minister of Finance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in analysing this current budget, one fact very quickly emerges. Nine years after the war, at a time when most Canadians are tired and weary of heavy federal taxation, the government once again is providing little or no tax relief. The concessions offered by the minister in his speech before Easter amounted only to about $40 million. If we work that amount out on a per capita basis, it means that the average Canadian this year will receive tax relief of only about $2.67 each. Surely hon. members will admit that this reduction is trifling and insignificant.

During the coming year the minister is proposing to take the staggering sum of $4,460 million from the pockets of the Canadian people. I believe this total is about $60 million more than he took from them last year. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that our present tax burden is already adversely affecting the Canadian economy, particularly in the fields of employment and trade. In the first place, of course, it is obvious that high taxes blunt incentive and discourage initiative. Today it is also obvious that federal taxation is lowering consumer purchasing power in the domestic market. Very substantial sums which the average Canadian might otherwise spend to build a house, buy an automobile, or purchase farm machinery, are being siphoned off in high taxes. The resulting reduction in the demand for goods is reflected in many Canadian cities today in reduced demand for labour.

In the third place, I think that even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would have to admit that our present tax level is hurting our investment program in new plant and new equipment. I think we would have been in trouble several years ago had it not been for the heavy influx of United States capital. Personally I have always believed —and I believe today—that, where taxation is concerned, there is a point of diminishing returns. When that point has been exceeded, individual and corporate saving is hindered, and the creation of new jobs is jeopardized.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I contend that our present tax rate in Canada is helping to force up the Canadian cost structure. Many authorities tell us that Canadian prices are among the highest in the world. We are being undersold in both the domestic and the export market in many instances. We are being undersold despite our modern factories, despite our proximity to natural resources, and despite our technical knowledge. I contend that one of the reasons we are being undersold, is the heavy federal tax burden which is imposed upon Canadian producers. During the past winter Canada experienced a mild but very definite economic recession. At one time we had more than 540,000 persons unemployed. That was a greater number unemployed than Great Britain had in the same period. In proportion to population, I think it was a greater number of unemployed than the United States had. Yet, in this budget, the government has taken virtually no steps to deal with the problem of unemployment.

I believe that the primary aim of this budget should be to check the present mild recession in Canada before it becomes really serious. The government should adopt fiscal policies which would make the economic climate more favourable for individuals and for business to expand, thus indirectly creating a greater demand for labour. As I see it, the first step in promoting such expansion should be a sharp reduction in federal taxation. The minister argues that if he cut taxes, he would lose revenue that he needs. In taking such a position it seems to me that he is failing to grapple with the basic problem involved. I contend that he could reduce taxation yet still balance his budget, if he would curtail relatively unnecessary expenditures, and if he would eliminate waste, extravagance and duplication in government services. Surely a dollar saved by economy means just as much to the federal treasury as does a dollar collected in taxes.

In his budget speech the minister admonished Canadian industry to eliminate waste and to cut expenses. I think that Canadian business would take that advice more to heart, Mr. Speaker, if the minister and his colleagues had themselves been setting a better example in conducting the biggest business in the country, which is the federal government. In his speech before Easter the minister gave no assurance whatever to the people of Canada that he planned to be more thrifty. Not a word was spoken, nor a promise given, concerning the elimination of waste or the reduction of costs in government. I remind the Minister of Finance of the old adage, that actions speak louder than words. I think his advice would be more effective if he practised what he preached. In his budget speech of a year ago about the main contribution he made with regard to saving was this, and I quote from page 2121 of Hansard of 1953:

> We are, for example, this year inaugurating a suggestion awards plan in the civil service which we are confident will, over the course of time, result in many major and minor improvements in efficiency of operation . . .

What saving has the plan produced? I quote from Hansard of December 9, 1953 at page 735:

> Approximately 30 suggestions have been implemented which will result in an estimated savings of $6,500 for the first year each actual suggestion in efficiency of operation . . .

I think savings of that kind are rather paltry. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in this house the word "economy" is like a foreign language. If you mention it too often, you are likely to get into trouble. Yet if we are going to have real tax reductions in the near future I think something must be done to cut federal expenditures.

Time and again the Minister of Finance has suggested to opposition members that they should be specific, and that they should try to pinpoint places where they think savings could be made. I have gone over the estimates this year, as I have gone over them in the past. I shall try to make specific suggestions again this afternoon, even though I know many hon. members may not agree with what I have to say. I should like to make a few proposals to the minister for his consideration.

My first specific suggestion has to do with the Canadian National Railways. According to a report which was recently carried by the Montreal Star and other papers, the C.N.R. is proposing this year to build a 1,000-room hotel in the city of Montreal. The new building is to be a luxury hotel which will accommodate 2,500 people at banquets and 4,000 people at conventions. The president of the C.N.R. is not proposing to build this hotel out of revenue. Rather he is coming once again to the taxpayers of Canada for another handout. I suggest that there are certain reasons why this handout should not be forthcoming.

Two years ago parliament approved a reorganization of the capital stock of the C.N.R. That reorganization had the net effect of wiping out approximately $1 billion in liabilities and substituted therefor non-interest bearing stock. At that time we were given the assurance that, if the reorganization went through, the profit and loss picture of the C.N.R. would be greatly improved. To a degree it has improved. Nevertheless, despite the reorganization, and despite the fact that the C.N.R. has literally billions of dollars invested. in 1952 it was able to show a profit of only $142,000 and in 1953 of only $244,000. A few weeks ago, when appearing before a parliamentary committee, President Gordon told that committee that he expected the railroad this year would once again be deeply in the red.

Perhaps I do not know very much about business, but it seems to me that it is not sound business practice for a company to indulge in luxury expenditures at a time when it has a substantial deficit. I think this should be particularly true with regard to the C.N.R., when we look at the past record of their hotel system. The profit and loss picture of the hotel system has never been particularly good. One of the best years was 1952. In that year, with an investment of $31·5 million, the hotel system showed a profit of $535,000. But even that profit was only a bookkeeping profit, as the annual statement points out, because adequate depreciation reserves were not set up. Yet despite the past history of the hotel system, Mr. Gordon now comes before parliament and suggests that the taxpayers should spend another $20 million on another hotel. How are we to know that this building might not be another white elephant? I want to tell the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that in my opinion the people of Canada are most willing to finance capital expenditures for the C.N.R. if or when they are opening up and developing the country. Such a policy is sensible and logical in a country like Canada. But I do not believe that the building of a luxury hotel any place in Canada falls within that category of expenditure. When Mr. Gordon can show a substantial profit for the C.N.R. let him come to parliament and propose to spend that profit any way he wishes. If he wants to build a hotel, that will be his business; but until the time comes when he can build it out of revenue it seems to me that such an expenditure should be struck from the estimates.

Mr. Abbott: It is not in the estimates.

Mr. Thatcher: I would refer hon. members to vote 179 in the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Abbott: What is the number of the vote for the C.N.R.?

Mr. Thatcher: I am sorry, but I have not the number available offhand.

Mr. Abbott: The reason I ask is that there is no vote.

Mr. Thatcher: It is an expenditure which is being proposed in any event for the current year.

Mr. Abbott: Not by the government.

Mr. Thatcher: What is the difference? The C.N.R. is owned by the government. I would refer the house next to item 179 of the estimates of the Department of Labour. This item proposes the expenditure of just under $1 million for the administration of the annuities act. In addition to the amount for administrative costs, a sum of $1 million is also being sought in order to keep the fund on a sound actuarial basis. The original purpose of the annuities act was to permit people of moderate means to make provision for their old age. Even with the advent of a better old age pension scheme I think there is a place for the annuities act in our overall system of social security. On the other hand, I cannot convince myself—and I am speaking only for myself—that it is sound or sensible to sell federal government annuities at less than cost.

Since the inception of this legislation the taxpayers have been forced to bear costs in the neighbourhood of $33 million. I strongly believe that when government annuities are sold, the premiums should be sufficient (1) to carry the administrative costs and (2) to keep the fund sound. I think that annuities could still be sold at prices which would be most competitive and considerably under the prices that insurance companies charge for similar kinds of policies. I emphasize that I think the annuities act is a useful piece of legislation, but I urge the government to save roughly $2 million annually by making operations under the act self-sustaining.

Mr. Gregg: Before my hon. friend goes on to something else, may I be permitted to ask a question? May I ask if his remarks regarding annuities represent the present policy of his party?

Mr. Thatcher: I thought I made that very clear. I said that I was speaking personally. I am quite sure that the leader of this group and probably certain others do not feel as I do, but I still think it is a matter which, as a member of parliament, I should discuss. I trust I have made myself clear.

Item 98 in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs calls for an expenditure of $200,000 for the international civil aviation organization. The purpose of the vote is to provide the organization with rental charges at less than commercial rates. When the vote was originally authorized in 1950 the amount was only $64,000, but the amount has been increasing each year. Up to the start of the present fiscal year the taxpayers have subsidized the organization to a total of $310,000. May I say at once that I think Canadians are most happy to have the headquarters of the organization in Canada but, speaking for myself, I can see no reason why the organization, like Canadian organizations, should not pay its own rent. I believe that the subsidy of $200,000 should be discontinued.

I draw the attention of the house to items 53 and 54 of the estimates which call for the expenditure of approximately $2,400,000 for the overseas shortwave broadcasting service. I remind the house that this service was originally inaugurated during the war, and my understanding is, that its main purpose was to keep in contact with our troops overseas. When our troops came home, there was of course no need for this type of communication. It is quite true that the broadcasts have some propaganda value overseas but I do not think that the costs, which have been increasing year by year, are anywhere in line with the value received by the Canadian taxpayer. The elimination of this expenditure could save the taxpayer $2,400,000.

In the fifth place, I think that a good deal of money could be saved by the elimination of duplication in various government departments. I believe, rightly or wrongly, that since coming to Ottawa I have seen overlapping which no business firm could afford. I should like to give the house an example of what I have in mind. I would refer hon. members to sessional paper 161-A. That return shows that in the city of Ottawa alone, the federal government today maintains forty-five separate and distinct libraries, at a total cost to the taxpayers of $750,000. The Department of Justice has three separate libraries. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has four separate libraries. The Department of National Defence has seven separate libraries in the Ottawa area alone. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources maintains five separate libraries. The Department of the Secretary of State contains two, the Department of National Revenue has two, and so on.

In addition to the libraries operated by the different government departments, there are those in such agencies as the national film board, the civil service commission, the public archives, the R.C.M.P., Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and so on. I simply cannot believe that so many libraries do not represent duplication. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that if he would consolidate them he could probably save in the neighbourhood of $250,000. I suggest also that the example of libraries is only typical. It seems to me that the government is riddled with similar types of duplication in government departments.

I should like to refer now to sessional paper 120-B which was tabled for me earlier this session. This sessional paper shows that in the past year, the atomic energy control board made two grants at Deep River for the building of churches. The first grant was for $75,000 and was made to St. Alexander's parish church, a Roman Catholic church. The second grant of $142,000 was made to the community church, a Protestant church. Both churches were fairly elaborate in their construction. I should like to quote from the Ottawa valley Ensign of November 21, 1953, which contains a report of the proceedings at the laying of the cornerstone of the Roman Catholic church. The paragraph reads as follows:

> The future church, an apricot brick structure, will feature tinted glass windows, a bell tower displaying a 60-foot high spire, laminated wood trusses of Gothic design in the interior, and a baptistry directly below the bell tower.

In other words, it is a fairly luxurious church, and obviously the Protestant church is even more so because almost double the amount of money has been spent on it. I take exception to these grants for two main reasons. In the first place, as far as I can find—and I am subject to correction if I am wrong—these items were not in the estimates. If they were, they were certainly well hidden, and I do not think parliament discussed the expenditures before they were made. In the second place, I object to expenditures of this kind because in my constituency, and I think in other constituencies in Canada, the people themselves contribute towards the building of churches. It seems to me that this expenditure singles out one separate community for special treatment. I do not think it is fair that people elsewhere in Canada should have to contribute taxes to build a church in any community, and I hope that expenditures of this nature will not happen again.

Item 76 in the estimates proposes to provide $130,000 for a number of paintings for the national gallery. This is in addition to the expenditure of $350,000 made late in March for that same purpose. Personally, I cannot become too enthused about expenditures of this kind. It seems to me that in this period of heavy federal taxation some kind of limit should be put on them. I suggest that, at the very outside, the national gallery should spend in any one year no more than $150,000. If that had been done this year the taxpayers could have been saved $330,000.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

In the seventh place, I think one of the very foolish expenditures, if I may call it that, was connected with the government's decision this year to move the film board down to the city of Montreal. My understanding is that by the time that palatial home is completed, and by the time a staff of 475 and their families are transferred, the taxpayers will be out between $6 million and $7 million. I guess it is too late to do anything about it; but if it were possible I would certainly suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that he could save that $7 million very easily by leaving the board in Ottawa, without the service being impaired.

In the eighth place, I feel impelled to say a few words about the civil service. And I want to emphasize, as I did when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) queried me, that I am only speaking personally, and not for this group. However, as elected representatives I think it is our duty from time to time to go over the payroll of the civil service. Now, it is a fact that in recent years our civil service numbers have been increasing very rapidly. I would remind the house that at the outbreak of war in 1939, Canada had a civil service that, in all, totalled 46,106 persons. During the height of the war, when we had such organizations as the war-time prices and trade board, rationing boards and the like, our civil service was only 115,000 persons. By 1950 it had moved up to 125,000; and according to a parliamentary return, at the beginning of this year our civil service numbered 135,000. If you add casual employees, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, commission employees, and ships' crews to our civil service, then at the start of the year it numbered 172,000. And that figure still did not include the 152,000 who were employed in government corporations and agencies.

Now, it is quite true that Canada has grown mightily in wealth and in resources since 1939. But I find it rather hard to understand why, with a population increase of 40 per cent since 1939, our civil service should have almost tripled in number. I think our record in this regard should be examined all the more carefully when we compare what has been happening in Canada with what has been happening in the United States and Great Britain. From October 1952 to October 1953 in the United States, under the Eisenhower administration, the civil service was reduced by 197,000 employees or 10 per cent.

Last year Prime Minister Churchill was able to reduce the civil service in Great Britain by 20,000.

Now, in view of those figures many taxpayers throughout Canada are wondering if it is really necessary for our civil service to continue to grow and grow. Today in Ottawa scarcely a week goes by when some new board or commission is not set up. And when a new office is set up it must have a new staff. My experience has been—and I am speaking generally—that when a board is disbanded, usually the employees who were working for it are simply sent over to some other branch of the civil service. Over the years, that kind of policy cannot help but tend to impair efficiency.

I am speaking subject to correction, of course, but as I see this problem there are some departments which have superfluous civil servants. I shall give one specific example to the Minister of Finance, in the hope that he might examine it. This has to do with the office of the deputy minister of national defence. In 1944, at the height of the war, the combined offices of the deputy ministers of air, army and navy had a staff of 98. In 1946 there were only 77. But today, according to a parliamentary return tabled earlier in the house, Mr. Drury's office has 114. There may be a reason for the expansion; but on the surface, at least, it looks to me as though there might be something out of line. I feel that the number of government employees could be reduced without impairing efficiency. I am not suggesting that the government should commence any large-scale program of dismissals. I know that such a program would not be feasible, nor would it be desirable. But I do suggest that, generally speaking, the numbers of the civil service should be frozen at the present level, even though a few exceptions might have to be made. I think a sharp reduction could be accomplished if vacancies in the future were not filled by new appointments, but rather were filled by a reshuffling of existing personnel. If treasury board should see fit to indulge in such an economy drive, I believe the taxpayers of Canada in the coming year could save $30 million or $40 million.

My ninth suggestion has to do with item 283 of the estimates, and the subject of national fitness, which comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare. I I am pleased to see that there is an expenditure this year of only $78,000. This expenditure has been reduced by about $125,000 annually over the last several years. But I still do not think we have done quite well enough. When this legislation was inaugurated during the war, it was for the purpose of co-ordinating physical fitness programs among the various provinces. Actually, while it has done a certain amount of good in distributing literature, and the like, by and large the program has been a disappointment. In the first place, two provinces did not come into it at all; and in the second place the division which was supposed to be interested chiefly in physical education has, in later years, become mainly interested in adult education, including such things as the drama. I do not think the taxpayers are getting value for their money and I suggest the item should be deleted from the estimates.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps you and I are in agreement.

Mr. Thatcher: I hope so, Mr. Minister.

I refer next to the estimates of the Post Office Department. Hon. members will recall that early last year the department had the firm of J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited come in to do an examination to see whether greater efficiency was possible. One of the major recommendations of the company was that the post office savings branch should be discontinued. Company officials claimed a saving of $377,000 could be made. I am aware of the reasons given by the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) as to why he did not think this was a logical saving. Nevertheless I would like to see the matter re-examined. I think there was merit in the Woods and Gordon suggestion.

In the eleventh place I would refer to item 251 in the estimates, which has to do with sick mariners' treatment service. Since confederation the treatment of sick mariners on a prepaid basis has been provided at Canadian ports. Under the Canada Shipping Act tonnage duties are levied against ships using this service to offset the cost of providing the treatment.

In the year 1952-53, according to the public accounts, 20,000 Canadians were treated under the provisions of the act and 89,000 foreign seamen. That year the cost of the service to the taxpayer was $588,000. Yet, the revenue collected on duties was only $340,000, or a net loss of about $250,000. Perhaps there are reasons why my suggestion would not be feasible, but it seems to me that it would be logical to increase the duties which are charged for this service until they cover the cost. If that could be done I suggest that the taxpayer could be saved in the neighbourhood of $250,000 a year.

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member recommend that that be done?

Mr. Thatcher: It looks logical to me; if it is not, I would be glad to hear from the minister.

Mr. Martin: I would be very glad to have that question put.

Mr. Thatcher: I remind the minister and the house that 80 per cent of the service is provided to foreign seamen rather than to Canadians.

A saving which I mentioned a year ago had to do with the printing of government pamphlets, bulletins and publications, which seem to me to be of little value to the taxpayers. In the year that has gone by I do not think very much has been done to curtail those unnecessary expenditures. I hold in my hand the annual catalogue which is put out by the queen's printer. It is headed: "Canadian Government Publications." As one looks through the publication, he cannot help but be appalled at some of the things on which the government is spending money to have printed. I recall the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) pointing out some of these pamphlets. For instance, on page 213 I find one having to do with the "Cruising speed of goldfish in relation to water temperature". On page 215 I find that a bulletin is put out by the government on "The effect of fin clipping on the cruising speed of goldfish." I question the value to the taxpayers of bulletins such as these. On page 444 I find a bulletin listed on "Land snails from the Canadian Rockies"; another one, "Some shell heaps in Nova Scotia". On page 446 I find listed: "Dinosaur tracks from Peace river". On page 447 "Hooded Hadrosaurs of the Belly river series of the Upper Cretaceous".

Mr. McCann: Is there anything funny there about Moose Jaw?

Mr. Thatcher: I have not been able to find it. If you know anything, I would be glad to mention it.

On page 451 I find this publication listed: "The lizard Chamops from the Wapiti Formation of Northern Alberta"; on page 453: "The Inviting-in-Feast of the Alaska Eskimo"; on page 454: "Abnormal Types of Speech in Nootka". One can go on page after page—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is it not true that all the publications he has mentioned are merely reprints of relatively short learned articles which appeared in publications that have to be published anyway, and that they bring in a little extra revenue by being separated from the publications in which they appear?

Mr. Abbott: He would not know.

Mr. Thatcher: That is a true statement; I would not know.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps it would be a good idea to find out first.

Mr. Thatcher: I think every hon. member would agree that hardly a week goes by that 25 or 30 pamphlets published by some government branch or bureau do not come into our offices and are consigned to the wastepaper basket. Some of them undoubtedly have value, but I am not going—

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may interrupt the hon. member again, I wonder whether he would in the next month send me all the publications that he receives from the printing bureau or from any government department that he would otherwise consign to his wastepaper basket? I would like to have them.

Mr. Thatcher: I will do better than that. I will give the minister a list of all those in this book, which will speak for itself.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I would much prefer to have those that come to the hon. member's desk.

Mr. Thatcher: I will do that if the minister will do one thing for me. If he or the Minister of Finance will have the queen's printer assemble in the railway committee room every pamphlet, bulletin, etc., published by the government in the past year, for examination by members, I will accept his suggestion. If he did that, even he and the Minister of Finance would be surprised at the waste.

I still contend that the taxpayers could be saved several millions of dollars if some of these unnecessary pamphlets and bulletins were not printed.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the government still has not seen fit to set up a central purchasing agency to purchase supplies and materials for the crown. Today there are dozens of different branches that are making purchases for the crown. Sometimes these branches are actually competing against each other. I doubt whether there is a single large company in the Dominion of Canada which has not a central purchasing department. Out in the province of Saskatchewan we tried it some years ago, and the provincial minister tells me that he has been able to effect a good many economies through bulk buying. A central purchasing agency of the federal government could effect very substantial economies by taking advantage of maximum quantity discounts through bulk buying. I can only guess, but I would estimate that about $10 million could be saved in a year if the minister wanted to carry out this suggestion.

I know that I have only touched on the problem of saving very superficially. Nevertheless at least it gives some indication of what I have in mind, and I suggest that if some of the economies which I have mentioned today were put into effect a minimum of $75 million could be saved. At the same time, I also realize that if we are to make major economies it will have to come from the Department of National Defence.

I am not going into the Department of National Defence in detail but events have transpired in the last year which make me wonder whether it would not be possible to have modest defence cuts. In the first place, the shooting war in Korea has ended; and it would seem that the international situation has bettered somewhat. During the past year President Eisenhower, who is perhaps one of the greatest military men living, has seen fit to ask the United States government to carry out cuts of 10 per cent in defence expenditures, and now he is aiming for a 15 per cent cut. Prime Minister Churchill tried to effect a similar reduction in Great Britain. The Australian government is trying to cut defence expenditures by 8 per cent.

In recent months I believe the construction of airport buildings, military buildings and the like, has pretty well neared completion. Under these circumstances I believe that our defence effort could safely be cut at this time, without impairing efficiency, by perhaps $200 million.

In conclusion I repeat that the time has come when the Canadian people do want tax cuts. I also know that they cannot have tax cuts unless we have reduced expenditures. Taxes at the three levels of government today are taking one-third of our net national income. That fact is jeopardizing our trade position abroad and is contributing to unemployment at home. I call upon the federal government to set an example to Canadian industry, by improving its own efficiency, by cutting its own expenditures and reducing its own costs. If it will set such an example, then and only then is it fair for the minister to tell Canadian business to compete by becoming more efficient.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, subject to only one minor incidental exception that I remember, it has not been the practice for me to take any personal part in the debate on the budget. The government's proposals and its policies with respect to the budget are put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and in doing so he speaks for each and every one of his colleagues.

Now, this year, as in the past, the Minister of Finance has done that in a manner which in fact as well as because of our joint constitutional responsibility has the full and unqualified support of each and every one of us. There has arisen, however, an unfortunate clash over the use of direct taxing powers by the federal authorities and the authorities of the province of Quebec. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on two occasions already has suggested that this clash is such as to make it my duty, as Prime Minister, to invite all the provincial governments to meet with the federal authorities to deal with it. I feel that I should make a short statement to the house—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I cannot let that statement go unchallenged. I have at no time said that it was necessary to call the premiers together to resolve the problem that has arisen with Quebec. What I said was that this problem affected all the provinces and that all the provinces should be brought together to discuss the broad question of taxation, which it is the duty of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to resolve in some way in view of the promises made.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected if there is any correction in what the hon. gentleman has said.

I feel that I should make a short statement to the house on my position as Prime Minister with respect to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, whether it be expressed in my terms or, if he prefers, in his terms.

This clash in federal-provincial relations is not something new. It should not be forgotten that its resurgence at this time is not the result of any recent action of the federal government. It arises as the result of a statute recently adopted by the legislature of Quebec imposing taxes on the personal incomes of a certain number of Quebec taxpayers who are also taxed under the federal Income Tax Act.

The provincial statute contains an assertion that under the constitution the provincial governments have priority over the federal government in this field of direct taxation. This recent action follows the serious attempt made in the dominion-provincial fiscal conference of December, 1950, to find and to implement a satisfactory solution of the problem arising out of the present needs of the federal and provincial authorities, and their concurrent taxing powers over the same taxpayers. It might be interesting to compare this assertion of priority of right in the field of direct taxation with what I think is a quite frank and realistic attitude taken at this 1950 conference by another provincial government, that of Ontario.

We find in the report of the proceedings of the conference at page 22 that Mr. Frost said the following in that connection:

> In the past there has been a great deal of discussion over the respective rights of our federal government and our provinces in the various fields of taxation. The federal government has an unquestioned right in the field of indirect taxation. The field of direct taxation has been divided. The opinion of Sir Thomas White when he imposed the first federal income tax in 1917 has often been quoted. He stated that because the provinces and, in consequence, their municipalities were confined in the raising of revenues to the measures of direct taxation the federal government should not, except in a case of "manifest public necessity", invade the fields to which the provinces were solely confined for the purpose of raising their revenue. He indeed indicated that in entering the field of income tax the federal government was violating the spirit though not the law of the confederation arrangement.

Mr. Frost then went on:

> We believe that we must be realistic about these matters. In 1950 we are living in a different world than that of 1917. We do not think it is possible for the federal government to withdraw from the fields of personal income or corporation tax. They derive a great portion of their revenue from these fields and they are indispensable to them. What is needed is the frank recognition that there must be a joint occupation of these fields and with this recognition an active spirit of co-operation between the provincial and federal governments. The federal system of government is a partnership and if it is to operate efficiently it must be a working partnership. We believe that ways and means of either assigning or sharing these fields of taxation can be devised which will be mutually satisfactory to the federal government as well as to the provinces. After all, such a recognition carries with it the realization that both federal and provincial taxes come from the same source, namely, the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not believe anyone can dispute that the federal government does derive a great portion of its revenues from these fields. In fact, the taxes from these fields yield almost 60 per cent of the total federal revenue, about $2·5 billion of total revenues of something less than $4·5 billion.

Now, are those revenues indispensable to the discharge of the federal government's national responsibilities? To get an answer to this question, we have only to remember that the debt charges amount to about half a billion dollars; that federal subsidies and tax rental payments to the provinces amount to about $340 million; that defence and defence production expenditures amount to almost $2 billion—$1,900 million; and that welfare expenditures disbursed by the Department of National Health and Welfare and by the Department of Veterans Affairs amount to almost a billion dollars. Well, that represents almost four-fifths, almost 80 per cent of the total federal expenditures. I feel everyone will admit that all these are national responsibilities, have become national responsibilities, and that provision for them has to be made.

I am not disputing that the provinces and municipalities also have pressing fiscal needs. I am merely saying that Mr. Frost's realistic statement of December 1950 is still true as a realistic appraisal of the situation now. It is true also that the federal system is necessarily and inevitably a partnership, and if it is to work efficiently it must be a working partnership. We tried our best at the expiry of the wartime tax agreements, and again in 1950, to devise a method whereby our system could operate as a working partnership, based on that frank recognition of the fact that our fiscal needs were such that there had to be joint occupation of the field of corporate and personal income tax or an appropriate sharing of the revenues derived from that field.

On the other hand it is not in agreement with the facts to say that the federal government failed to recognize its undertaking given when the wartime agreements were made, that they would be only temporary agreements. They were only temporary agreements and they came to an end. But the problem did not come to an end and because it did not come to an end we tried to devise some way of meeting it, and having found that our so-called green book proposals were not acceptable to some of the provincial governments we offered to renew the wartime tax rental agreements on a basis which provided a larger share of the revenue to the provinces than during the years of the war. No province had to make a new agreement, and as a matter of fact the two largest provinces did not make any new tax rental agreement, although seven of the then nine provinces chose to make them and they were authorized by acts of parliament and of the legislatures and became operative. But they were all temporary agreements and it had been one of the undertakings at the time they were being discussed and being prepared for signature that there would be another dominion-provincial fiscal conference at least a year before they expired to determine what would happen when they again came to an end.

That conference took place in December 1950 though the agreements were still to operate until March 31, 1952, 15 or 16 months before the expiry of the agreements. In December 1950 the situation was as described by Mr. Frost in his opening speech at that 1950 conference, and we could think of nothing better to suggest than a further renewal, because the problem was still there. We did make that suggestion, but we did not pretend that these tax rental agreements were an ideal solution nor that they should or could be a permanent solution, but we had been unable to devise anything that was apt to work out as satisfactorily under the conditions which existed at that time. We and others felt that there was some merit in a system of sharing the proceeds of these taxes on a fair basis rather than having each one of two or more authorities imposing and collecting taxes from the same taxpayers in the same field.

No other scheme was discussed, though some of the provincial premiers expressed their dislike of having what they referred to as subsidies instead of exercising the responsibility of levying their own taxes. Most of the provinces, however, favoured the renewal agreements, and even the premier of Ontario, who had had no agreement since the expiry of the wartime agreement, expressed these views concerning the fiscal arrangements:

. . . I believe that these must be framed against the background of the emergent and, I hope, transient conditions to which I have referred.

We are experiencing inflation. The cost of government, as of other things, is rising. We cannot say where prices will be a year from now, let alone four or five years from now. Under these conditions we should try to avoid making decisions which will commit us irrevocably to a course from which we might find it impossible or impracticable to retrace our steps. I suggest in view of the emergent conditions through which we are passing that we endeavour to proceed to an agreement or agreements on the grounds of finding mutually satisfactory methods for the next few years which will meet the substantial requirements of the federal government and those of the provinces without making irrevocably basic alterations in our relationships.

We now have the experience of the last four years in which eight of the provinces have participated in tax rental agreements with the federal government.

Newfoundland had come in in the meantime and it had made a tax rental agreement but there was none with Ontario or Quebec.

These tax agreements have filled a need in Canada. They have been of considerable assistance to several of the provinces, and it is likely they will continue in some form to have a place in the arrangements which will be made here.

A little further on in his speech he said:

Perhaps the needs of all the provinces for the next few years would be met if we were to revise the present plan in some particulars to encourage certain improvements which experience now shows would be desirable. Probably it would be better to follow this course rather than to attempt at this time to create something which would be entirely new and untried.

After the opening speeches of the conference which are reported in the published report, the conference resolved itself into a committee of the whole to sit and discuss in camera. The only published record of what took place in the in-camera discussions is the offer which was submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and his explanatory statement about that offer followed by the release of the agreed statement to the press which was issued and published after the in-camera sessions had been adjourned. That is to be found at page 137 of the published report of the conference and it is in these terms:

The conference discussed:

1. The offer of the federal government for new tax agreements;
2. The offer of the federal government respecting old age security.
3. A provincial proposal for an amendment to the constitution to permit the provincial legislature to levy an indirect sales tax at the retail level.

It will be remembered that at that time there was also being discussed at this fiscal conference the proposal for the universal old age pension scheme which would require an amendment to the constitution, and apparently there also had been discussed the suggestion of an amendment which would permit the provincial legislatures to levy indirect taxes at the retail level.

The statement goes on:

It was agreed:

That the proposed amendments to the constitution regarding this indirect tax and regarding old age pensions should be drafted by the Department of Justice and submitted to the provincial governments for early consideration;

That a continuing committee should be set up to consider the character of legislation which would be appropriate respecting persons between the ages of 65 and 69 and to what groups thereof and under what conditions it should be made applicable in each province;

That the continuing committee should be under the chairmanship of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and should be brought together as soon as provincial decisions had been reached on the constitutional amendment;

I believe the constitutional amendment referred to in that last paragraph was the one which would be required to provide for the old age pension.

The statement continues:

And that the provincial governments would consider the proposal for new tax agreements and indicate their respective positions at a later date.

It was also decided to suspend the further deliberations of the federal-provincial conference on constitutional amendment and of its continuing committee of attorneys-general pending consideration of the tax agreements and related matters. Once these have been disposed of, the committee of attorneys-general will resume its deliberations at the earliest convenience of the federal and provincial governments.

Here I digress for a moment to call attention to the fact that this is the explanation of the fact that the federal-provincial conference on constitutional amendment and the continuing committee of attorneys general have not met since that time. It was agreed that their deliberations would be suspended. It must be recalled that that conference had nothing to do with any other actual amendment to the constitution than the provision of a method whereby subsequent amendments could be made here in Canada without having to be referred to the parliament of the United Kingdom. It was realized that that was something that was desirable but not urgent and something about which it was not apt to be possible to reach any agreement if we could not reach an agreement on the immediately urgent fiscal problems that we had to deal with. Hon. members know that those fiscal problems and the matters relating to them have not yet been disposed of. Of that fact there can be no better evidence than the turn which part of this debate has taken on the present budget.

But with respect to the tax rental proposals I was of the opinion—as I still am—that these temporary agreements were, under the circumstances, good agreements; I was of the opinion that they were good for Canada and good for each one of the provinces. They recognized and gave effect to the concurrent rights of Canada and of the provinces in this field of direct taxes. I do not think that they impaired in any way the constitutional jurisdiction either of parliament or of the legislatures of the provinces. They also provided that, while they were in force, the people of each province would have for their provincial services a fair share of the kind of taxes which are made possible by the general economic activity of the Canadian nation, although for collection purposes they cannot be evenly productive throughout the whole country. I can assure the house that if I had felt that the agreements could have meant any permanent impairment of either federal or provincial jurisdiction, I would not have been prepared to recommend them.

The situation at the present time is such that I think it would be a grave responsibility to make any permanent change in what was provided by the original act of 1867. That does not mean that there cannot be agreed to from time to time a modus vivendi as to the way in which the respective powers of the federal authorities and the provincial authorities will be exercised. But I cannot bring myself to believe that I would be prepared to take the responsibility of any permanent alteration in the constitutional powers as they were allocated between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities at the time of confederation.

I happen to be—as I happened to be in 1950—the Prime Minister of Canada, but I am a resident of Quebec; and I am just as firm a believer in the integrity of our federal system with its division of powers and responsibility as is any other Canadian, whether he is a resident of Quebec or of any other province. Both as Prime Minister and as a resident of Quebec I would have been happy to see my native province participate in this modus vivendi because I did not see nor can I now see in it any danger or threat to either federal or provincial constitutional rights.

The statement agreed to after the in-camera discussions, and published at that time, was that each province would consider these tax rental proposals and would indicate its position at a later date. There followed a great many more negotiations between the Department of Finance and the individual provinces, and within eighteen months or so nine of the ten provinces indicated their respective positions and entered into the proposed temporary rental agreements which are to extend to March 31, 1957. The government of Quebec did not do so, however. It just abstained from having any further dealings or discussion with us about the matter in any way or form whatsoever. I saw in the Montreal Star some time ago a report that Mr. Duplessis said that he had written to me and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). He may have written to me and to the Minister of Finance, but not about any solution of the fiscal problems between the federal authorities and Quebec, unless he is referring to some correspondence we had when we were discussing the grants to universities. In one of those letters he said this: Why do you not turn over to me 5 per cent of the personal income tax? That will be more than you are offering to Quebec universities under this $7 million grant. I replied that this grant would expire on March 31. I do not remember just the date of the correspondence but it was some little time before March 31. I said: You know that under the present act we cannot make any remission of this 5 per cent of income tax to the provincial government. We could merely give it as a deduction to a taxpayer who had paid a provincial income tax to your government. The other thing is the constitutional lapsing of this vote unless Quebec's share is taken from it before March 31. Can we not find some scheme which will not prejudice your position or ours but which will not leave these Quebec institutions without their proportion of this grant which is about to lapse? For that year an arrangement was worked out whereby there was a joint commission of the federal government and the provincial government to make the allocation and to recommend a way in which the grant would be paid to the institutions in Quebec. But that had nothing to do with the general possible collision between the exercise of federal rights and the exercise of provincial rights in the field of direct taxes.

Then, as the house knows, a few weeks ago, without any suggestion whatsoever from the Quebec government that some kind of agreed working arrangement with the federal government might be desirable, the Quebec legislature passed this taxing statute which is in force and which gives rise to this controversy. It is in force and those of us who reside in Quebec must comply with it. Like many others, no doubt, I myself have commenced to comply with it and have made my first quarterly payment in accordance with its terms. Under the legislation as it exists, and as it was known to exist at the time that the Quebec statute was passed, we who are taxed by it will be entitled, when we settle our 1954 federal income tax, to a credit not exceeding 5 per cent of the federal income tax, though the provincial tax amounts to 15 per cent or more. According to my calculation—I may be leaning backwards—it is something over 16 per cent in my case. Of course no one likes the idea of having to pay about 10 per cent more income tax because he resides in the province of Quebec than if he resided elsewhere. The question arises: What can be done about it? Well, it is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that anything which can be done about it will have to be the result of some kind of temporary agreement between the federal authorities and the Quebec authorities. I hope it is not the view of the Quebec authorities that there cannot be any kind of agreement with the federal authorities because of the danger of impairing what they claim to be involved in the autonomy of Quebec. I hope they do not feel that there could not even be any exploratory negotiations with us, but if that were the situation I do not see how there is any way of avoiding the consequences of this clash.

Surely no one will suggest that this parliament should agree or could agree to recognize the asserted claim of Quebec's priority of rights over the rights of the nation as a whole in the field of corporation and personal income taxes. If the fathers of confederation had been so unwise as to make that the law of the constitution, of course we would have to get along with it as best we could in spite of its paralysing effect upon the nation as a whole. But fortunately it is not the law of the constitution and this government and this parliament, I am sure, are too conscious of our respective responsibilities to the nation as a whole, the nation of today and the nation of future generations, to do anything that would tend to make that the law of the constitution.

What then is the alternative? The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has suggested, perhaps not as a complete alternative but as something that should be done, that there should be a federal-provincial conference. Well, what reason is there for bringing together the representatives of the other provinces? The other provinces have all made tax rental agreements which still have about three years to run. These agreements were entered into in good faith. They were entered into under the authority of acts of parliament and of the legislatures of the respective provinces, and I think Canada has got to live up to them unless they are modified by mutual consent.

This government is not going to suggest to the provinces that have made these agreements that they should consider modifying them unless we have got some better reason for doing so than the mere fact that one of its provinces has not made a similar agreement and has proceeded to levy its own taxes without any agreement at all. No one will suggest, I am sure, that the federal government should or could give preferential treatment to any one province. I think we would all feel that just could not be done. No one, I hope, would suggest, in order to give Quebec taxpayers more generous deductions than those now provided for in our income tax law, that we should either increase the tax rental payments to the other provinces or agree that they too may impose their own taxes and get for their taxpayers, at the very substantially increased expense of the federal treasury, somewhat more generous deductions. The federal treasury just could not stand either of those courses.

On the other hand, I think that everybody hopes some temporary arrangement can be worked out which will enable the people of Quebec to get for their province's services a fair share of the taxes on corporate and personal incomes without having to bear income tax burdens greater than those which prevail elsewhere in Canada. How that eminently desirable result can be achieved in some other way than through the way agreed to by the other provinces I do not know, but there may be alternatives. I hope there are alternatives. Since the taxing statute was passed many individuals and groups of individuals have had thoughts and made suggestions about possible alternatives. One proposal has been put before the provincial commission on constitutional problems by the institute of chartered accountants of Quebec.

I have not seen their brief, but the Montreal Star in its issue of April 27, 1954, had this to say about it:

It proposed a sweeping revision and a sharing of tax fields along lines which may, or may not, be adapted to the national need but which deserves study just the same.

The Gazette of Saturday, May 1, reported that the Montreal board of trade had also submitted a brief to the same commission. The report reads:

The Montreal board of trade proposed yesterday that the Quebec royal commission on constitutional problems prepare immediately an interim report on income and corporation taxes and urge the provincial government to confer promptly with federal government representatives to find a satisfactory compromise to end an "intolerable situation". In a brief presented at a commission sitting here, the board said it believes the matters in dispute must and can be settled by negotiation without impairment of the constitutional rights of the province, "provided the negotiations are approached in a spirit of good will and having in mind the interests of the taxpayer".

I am sure any negotiations would be approached in a spirit of good will and having in mind the interests of both the federal and provincial governments and the very pertinent fact that those interests affect the same taxpayers of both levels of government. Briefs have also been submitted by the chamber of commerce and many other public bodies and, as I have said, we ourselves have had representations from many individuals and groups who are concerned, as we all are, about this problem.

But the only authority we can recognize as entitled to make suggestions for the province of Quebec is the Quebec government. I think that is self-evident, and that is why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) stated in his budget speech that if there was a desire for co-operation and collaboration the premier of Quebec would always find the door open for full and frank discussion in the hope of finding a mutually satisfactory solution. Some persons, both in this house and outside of it, have tried to describe that as an invitation to the premier of Quebec to come cap in hand knocking at the federal door. Of course it is nothing of the kind, and I do not think it is helpful to try to so distort it. It was and it remains a sincere and genuine expression of readiness at all times to sit down with the authorities of Quebec for a full and frank discussion of any alternative to a tax rental agreement and the hope that they will indicate their readiness to do so too. It implied our further hope that through these discussions we might be able to find a mutually satisfactory solution. That is, of course, still our position, and those are still our hopes.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

If, after negotiations between us and the Quebec authorities, it appears that there is some kind of modus vivendi which could be agreed to between us and which would respect the rights of both the federal and provincial authorities, and which could be offered to other provinces or any of them, in lieu of their present tax rental agreements, and still leave the federal government in a position to discharge its national obligations, I would not hesitate a moment to invite representatives of all the provinces to meet with us in another conference. But, quite frankly, I do not think that under any other conditions the holding of a federal-provincial conference now would be desirable, or apt to be at all helpful.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, at this moment I do not propose to discuss any of the problems with which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has just dealt. I am going to leave that to those who have made a study of federal-provincial affairs.

I do wish to say that I appreciate what was said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) regarding the budget and the savings that could and should be made in the administration of our affairs so that the Canadian taxpayer, whether he be a manufacturer, a farmer, or engaged in any other occupation, could lower his costs of production.

I rise today to protest against budget resolution No. 6 in the amendments suggested to the Income Tax Act. It reads as follows:

For the taxation of a resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities on and after January 1, 1954, were a profit from a business, and declaring that a non-resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, shall be deemed to be and always to have been subject to taxation on that basis.

I was one who thought that when the Supreme Court of Canada ruled on the case of the Stanley Mutual of New Brunswick this question of taxation of farm mutuals was a closed book. However the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has seen fit to introduce it in his budget, for reasons which I cannot quite understand.

First of all, what I do understand is that from that proposed taxation only about $130,000 could be expected. When one thinks of that amount and compares it with the hundreds of millions of dollars the government is taking from the people, and spending, he realizes at once that it is only a small pittance. And it is for this reason I rise in my place today to voice my protest against resolution No. 6.

I do so, first, because in their long history the farm mutual fire insurance companies have provided fire insurance at cost to their policyholders—and I say "at cost" and not at a profit. Never in their long history have they indicated a profit.

I protest in the second place because this move would aid in the final and eventual elimination of many of the farm mutual insurance companies.

Thirdly, I protest because the minister has not seen fit to accept the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Stanley Mutual in the province of New Brunswick.

Fourth, I rise to protest because the minister failed to take into consideration the fact that in addition to the premium they pay, the farmers and others insured must also sign a premium note to the extent of a percentage of the face value of the policy. And the premium note is for no other purpose than to share in the losses—not in the profits—that might come to policyholders of mutual insurance companies, and to assist in their financing.

I understand there are about sixty-eight local mutual companies operating in Ontario. They operate in areas where in most cases fire-fighting equipment is either inadequate or non-existent. Therefore they are taking risks that many straight line companies do not take, and do not care to take.

Then this question arises in my mind: Who are the real culprits behind the minister who are so insistent that budget resolution No. 6 shall be proceeded with? Through the years the premiums paid by farmers on their policies have varied according to the costs of providing the insurance. But, as I say, there has always been the premium note which has stood as a guarantee against loss. Surely, of all people, the minister is or should be aware of the fact that mutual fire insurance companies, as in respect of other companies, must have reserves with which to operate.

I think this is an ill-conceived move and one that should be dropped. And I am not alone in this, because members on all sides of the house know of the plight of these insurance companies and of the resolution, and are just as perturbed as I am about the final and net result which, in many cases, would mean the elimination of small farm mutuals, some of which have been in operation since prior to confederation.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the refusal of the government to grant the income tax deduction requested by the taxpayers of the province of Quebec brings once again to light the matter of the rights of the central government and of the provincial legislatures.

It therefore seems appropriate to recall the debates that preceded and followed the pact of 1867, to stress certain statements made at that time and in the years that followed and to analyse the decisions brought down by the courts in that matter.

The arguments I wish to submit today to the kind attention of this house lead me to believe and to assert that the provinces have a prior right in the field of direct taxation. In support of that theory, which is not new, I would like to quote the opinion of a few legal lights and political leaders. I have taken those statements from works pertaining to constitutional problems.

During the debate on second reading of the act of 1867 in the House of Lords, Lord Carnarvon, who had helped the Canadian delegates put the finishing touches to the document, stated:

(Text):

The several provinces which are now free to raise a revenue as they may think fit, surrender to the central parliament all powers under this head except that of direct taxation . . . But there is, as I have said, a concurrent power of legislation to be exercised by the central and the local parliament. It extends over three separate subjects—immigration, agriculture, public works.

(Translation):

In the case of the Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. the Receiver General of New Brunswick, Lord Watson clearly defined the character of our constitution and the status of the federal and provincial governments:

(Text):

The object of the British North America Act was neither to weld the provinces into one, nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to create a federal government in which they should all be represented, entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they had a common interest, each province retaining its independence and autonomy . . . In so far as regards those matters which by section 92 are specially reserved for provincial legislation, the legislation of each province continues to be free from the control of the dominion, and as supreme as it was before the passing of the act . . .

The provincial legislature possesses powers not of administration merely but of legislation in the strictest sense of that word; and within the limits assigned by section 92, of the act of 1867, these powers are exclusive and supreme.

(Translation):

To those who contended that the British North America Act broke all ties between the crown and the provinces, the privy council answered that the latter were not subordinated to a federal government, and reasserted the supremacy of the province in matters reserved for provincial authority.

(Text):

And, in Hodge v. the Queen, Spragge, C.J., says:

The provinces had possessed plenary powers upon subjects of a local and domestic nature before confederation; and the general scheme of confederation appears to have been to leave to them the plenary control of these subjects. They were, under the act, legislatures in regard to these subjects in the true and full sense of the term. This is the more apparent from the use of the words "exclusive" and "exclusively" (and they are used repeatedly), in the imperial act.

The following passage from the argument of Mr. Edward Blake before the privy council in St. Catharines Milling and Lumber Co. v. the Queen, may be quoted in this connection:

What then was the general scheme of the act? First of all, as I have suggested, it was to create a federal, as distinguished from a legislative union; but a union composed of several existing and continued entities. It was not the intention of parliament to mutilate, confound and destroy the provinces mentioned in the preamble, and, having done so, from their mangled remains, stewed in some legislative cauldron, to evoke by some legislative incantation absolutely new provinces into an absolutely new existence. It was rather, I submit, the design and object of the act, so far as was consistent with the redivision of the then province of united Canada into its old political parts, Upper and Lower Canada, and with the federal union of the four entities, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the resettled parts of old Canada, Ontario and Quebec—it was the design I say, so far as was consistent with these objects, by gentle and considerate treatment to preserve the vital breath and continue the political existence of the old provinces. However this may be, they were being made, as has been well said, not fractions of a unit, but units of a multiple . . .

(Translation):

Sir Alexander Galt, who had advocated legislative union in a speech delivered in Toronto, nevertheless made the following statement during the parliamentary debates of 1865:

(Text):

In transferring to the general government all the large sources of revenue, and in placing in their hand with a single exception, that of direct taxation, all the means whereby the industry of the people may be made to contribute to the wants of the state . . .

(Translation):

Remembering that Galt was then minister of finance in the Canadian legislature, and, as such, entrusted with the estimates of the new provinces, that he was one of the men most responsible for the pact of 1867, moreover, that he was a known centralizer, we realize that even the advocates of a strong central authority were giving up direct taxation exclusively to the provinces. It was then a source of revenue of little importance, quite unpopular—just as it is today—which they thought it was almost impossible, or at least very difficult, to put into force.

During the 1867-1917 period, as I said here recently, the central power, recognizing the exclusive rights of the provinces, abstained from encroaching upon that field.

(Text):

As Mr. Benjamin observed upon the argument in Russell v. the Queen before the privy council on May 2, 1882, referring to sections 91 and 92:

The general rule of construction is one of course which your Lordships will keep in view, that general words are controlled by special and specific provisions; that you do not take general words to override special provisions, but you take special provisions as constituting in their nature exceptions to the general words.

(Translation):

The reference at the time was to the right of Ottawa to regulate the liquor trade.

In the case of Bank of Toronto v. Lambe, this point of view would seem to have been approved.

(Text):

Their Lordships adhere to that view, and hold that, as regards direct taxation within the province to raise revenue for provincial purposes, that subject falls wholly within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

(Translation):

Before the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Sedgwick, in the Local Prohibition case, expressed the view that the act is an agreement, a treaty, a pact concluded by independent communities upon federating. He says:

(Text):

When a general subject is assigned to one legislature, whether federal or provincial, and a particular subject forming part or carved out of that general subject is assigned to the other legislature, the exclusive right of legislation, in respect to the particular subject, is with the latter legislature. For example, parliament has marriage, but the legislatures have the solemnization of marriage. On that subject they are paramount and supreme.

(Translation):

And so, any particular matter handed over to a province may not be absorbed by a general matter handed over to the federal government, even though one would be included in the other.

Lord Watson, to explain his interpretation of sections 91 and 92, in that case, states:

Any other interpretation of the general authority devolved upon the Canadian parliament by section 91, in addition to the powers therein enumerated, would not only be contrary to the intention of the act, in Their Lordships' opinion, but would also be tantamount to divesting the provinces of any autonomy.

Clement, in "The Law of Canadian Constitution", at pages 480 and 481 clearly stated that the particular excludes the general:

(Text):

From any large general class in either section must be excepted any particular class in the other which forms a branch or subdivision of the larger general class.

For example: from the general class "criminal law (sec. 91, no. 27)" must be excepted the particular class, provincial penal law, sec. 92-15.

From the "regulation of trade and commerce, section 91, subsection 2, must be excepted trade "licences", section 92-9. From "property and civil rights," section 92, subsection 13, must be excepted many items contained in section 91. From "the administration of justice in the province" must be excepted certain branches of jurisprudence which are to be found wrapped up in some of the items in section 91.

It has, indeed, been suggested that all the items of section 92 are in the nature of exception to section 91; but, while there is a sense in which the proposition is certainly true, it is equally certain that in the sense of the rules under discussion some of the items in section 91 are particular classes to be excepted out of larger general classes enumerated in section 92.

(Translation):

In the case of Citizens Insurance Co. v. Parsons, in 1880, Judge Montague Smith analysed the potential conflicts between the subject matters of section 91 and those of section 92.

(Text):

He believes that the legislature could not have intended that the powers exclusively assigned to the provincial legislatures should be absorbed in those given to the dominion parliament. He gives as an example the celebration of marriage in a province and direct taxation. He adds:

. . . so the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation is enumerated among the classes of subject in section 91; . . .

But direct taxation within the province in order to raise revenue for provincial purposes has been assigned to the provincial legislatures by section 92, so it obviously could not have been intended that in this instance also the general power should override the particular one.

(Translation):

A general power cannot include a particular power which flows from it.

In the case of Hodge v. the Queen, in 1883, the privy council refused to recognize that provincial parliaments were inferior institutions. Their Lordships stated that, within the limits of the subject matters and fields mentioned in section 92, "the local legislature wields a supreme power and enjoys the same authority as the dominion parliament". This may be found at page 59 of the report of the royal commission:

Sovereignty resides in the state. Central and local governments are the agents of that sovereignty and they cannot destroy or control each other.

(Text):

Joseph Doutre in "Constitution of Canada", page 222, says:

According to the well-known rule where a general intention is expressed in a statute and the act also expresses a particular intention incompatible with the general intention, the particular intention shall be considered as an exception," direct taxation must be considered by section 92 as being excepted from the monopoly given in general terms by 91st section to the federal parliament.

Bora Laskin, professor of law at the University of Toronto, in Canadian Constitutional Law, Toronto, 1951, notes that the respective taxing authority of dominion and provinces may not be used by either of them to sterilize powers of the other government.

(Translation):

If the federal government had a prior right in the field of direct taxation, the provinces would, in fact, be deprived of this source of revenue and, in spite of the explicit terms of section 92 (2), would be unable to make use of it.

We cannot maintain Canadian federalism without autonomous provinces, and our provinces would not be autonomous if they could not keep their financial independence.

Obviously, powers assigned solely to the provincial legislatures must not be absorbed by the powers granted to the dominion parliament.

(Text):

In re Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada (1932) A.C. 54, Lord Sankey, L.C., stated that:

Inasmuch as the act embodies a compromise under which the original provinces agreed to federate, it is important to keep in mind that the preservation of the rights of minorities was a condition on which such minorities entered into the federation, and the foundation upon which the whole structure was subsequently erected. The process of interpretation as the years go on ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provisions of the original contract upon which the federation was founded, nor is it legitimate that any judicial construction of the provisions of sections 91 and 92 should impose a new and different contract upon the federating bodies.

(Translation):

If this is a compromise, Mr. Speaker, each power is a sovereign power within the limits of its attributions.

Sections 91 and 92 are mutually exclusive.

Section 95 confers on the dominion and on the provinces a joint responsibility with regard to agriculture and immigration, with a predominance of federal authority in case of disputes.

The constitution has therefore given to the central government, in matters pertaining to taxation, powers which are limited by those granted to the provincial states. The latter have thus the exclusive power to levy direct taxes within the limits of their respective territory for provincial purposes. "The theory of the federal government's unlimited rights crushes, in its very principle, the fiscal autonomy of the provinces."

Such a conception is definitely anti-federative. A federation is not based upon the principle that one of the partners can alter the conditions of the federation or destroy it but upon a pre-established equilibrium that can be modified through evolution without any of the parties having the power to break it of its own initiative.

Through centralization of revenue sources and an almost absolute control of financial, social, and economic legislation, the Ottawa government is endeavouring to establish a national spirit which can result in a consolidation of its position but also, on the other hand, in the destruction of the loyalty of the taxpayers towards the local governments.

Some of the provinces may like to be nothing more than pensioners but the province of Quebec is not one of them. Following the example set by our ancestors, we are proud enough to refuse to be valets.

He who holds the purse strings holds every initiative, every liberality and the most powerful means to reduce refractory elements to acceptance of his ideas.

Professor Adarkar, Ph.B., in "The Principles and Problems of Federal Finance" (London, 1933), establishes a distinction between political sovereignty and legal—in principle—sovereignty. He holds that financial sovereignty determines political sovereignty, whatever the situation in respect to legal sovereignty may be.

(Text):

Mr. W. A. Carrothers, from Victoria, in "Problems of the Canadian Federation" published in Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, February 1935, states at page 28:

> Political sovereignty would be of little value without commensurate financial authority; otherwise a government would be unable to implement its own legislation.

Mr. J. A. Corry, of Queen's University, editor of the same publication, in an article entitled "The Federal Dilemma", volume 7, page 26, 1941, says:

> The wide taxing powers of the federal government, if resolutely used will help to whip the states into line.

(Translation):

Since the federal authorities cannot legislate in one way for French-speaking Canadians and in another for the other citizens of the country, it becomes important that "the province of Quebec which is, de jure and de facto, the legal and political habitat of French-speaking Canadians" have and maintain the necessary executive, judicial and legislative powers as well as the revenues for the good administration of the rights and privileges which belong to her exclusively.

Those privileges, essential to the survival of our racial group, have been guaranteed to us by the pact of 1867 and any encroachment upon Quebec's autonomy amounts to a breach of the contract between the two great races of this country.

Authorities agree that section 92, subsection 13—pertaining to property and civil rights in the province—was included in the act of federation for the sole purpose of—> —safeguarding the fundamental institutions and ways of life of Quebec.

That quotation is taken from page 34, volume 1, of the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

The case of Quebec is truly unique in our federation. All provinces except Quebec have the British civil law. All except Quebec and Newfoundland have divorce courts. All except Quebec and Newfoundland have a system of neutral public schools. All provinces except Quebec have but one official language, English. Quebec is the only province with a legislative council. Finally, this province is the only one having a majority of its citizens who do not speak English, that is the French-speaking group.

One should not lose sight of that historical fact.

Any amendment to the constitution requires the consent of all contracting parties.

(Text):

On February 18, 1925 the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, said as reported at page 298 of Hansard:

> . . . the British North America Act itself is not only the charter of the Dominion of Canada; it is just as much the charter of the provinces of Canada. We derive our powers from the British North America Act; so do the provinces. They have no constitution other than the British North America Act; all their powers they derive from that act. Would it then be fair for us to arrogate to ourselves the right to change the act which is just as much the constitution of the provinces as it is our own?
> . . . the conclusion is that we cannot ask for power to alter, without the consent of the provinces, the constitution which is their own constitution as well as it is ours. I ask my hon. friend this question. Confederation was achieved and the new parliament was opened in 1867. Does he believe that two years afterwards, in 1869, for instance, this parliament could have fairly and reasonably amended the B.N.A. Act or have asked the imperial parliament to amend it, without the consent of the four original provinces? Could he fairly say that that could have been done two years after the opening of this parliament? If it could not be done at that time, could it be done 25 years afterwards, or even 50 years afterwards, without the consent of the contracting parties in the pact of confederation?

I heard it suggested some time ago that this idea at confederation of a treaty is an antiquated idea. Maybe it is. But truth does not cease to be truth when it gets old; and old truth is always true. You cannot prevent the facts from being facts whether you like them or not.

(Translation):

A dishonest practice aimed at drawing the sympathy or hatred of the ignorant and the anti-French elements, which has become popular in certain quarters through the insidious propaganda of centralizers, consists in painting the supporters of autonomy in the darkest colours and calling them separatists or isolationists.

However, nothing could be more false. What we are defending in rejecting legislative and fiscal absorption is the sacred right of remaining ourselves, of preserving our language, our religion, our ideals and our culture within the Canadian community.

(Text):

Referring to tax rental agreements in his budget speech last year the Minister of Finance said:

The virtue of this approach was that it was not dependent for success on the unanimous acceptance by all provinces. A cardinal principle in the offer was that no pressure, direct or indirect, should be placed on any province to accept an agreement. This has been a fundamental position in the federal government's attitude ever since.

(Translation):

Quebec, therefore, could, without running the risk of being blackmailed or criticized, refuse to sign the proposed agreement.

As for personal income tax, the federal legislation, recognizing that a provincial tax of that kind is possible and legitimate, allows specifically a 5 per cent deduction from the federal tax.

The central government thus recognizes, to a certain extent, the principle of deductibility.

To object, now, to this right being exercised, is to show open intention of forcing the province of Quebec to meet the requirements of the central power, which are opposed to the principles of sound democracy.

It is unjustifiable, we read in the brief submitted to the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada by the chamber of commerce of the district of Montreal, to draw a distinction between a taxpayer entrusting the federal government with remitting to the provinces a share of the taxes he has to pay, and the taxpayer who divides it himself.

The stand taken by the Prime Minister is no surprise to me, for he stated, at Winnipeg, in July 1953, that he didn't want to go down in history as the one responsible for depriving the federal government of powers that may be vitally needed to ensure our common salvation.

He prefers to take the responsibility of "undermining the federal pact, and surrendering the French Canadians to the majority", wrote Mr. Andre Laurendeau, after that statement was made. It is he who, as the legal adviser to the Rowell-Sirois commission, advocated a return to the first days of confederation, in other words, one fiscal authority in possession of all important revenues, and provinces supported by grants. It was also he who stated, in this very house, that the federal parliament could abolish section 133 of the constitution providing for the use of French in official documents, without the necessity of obtaining the prior consent of the provinces.

It would be impossible to imagine that those who drafted the agreement of 1867 would have wanted to bring about the disappearance of the provinces or to place them in such a position that they would be unable to benefit fully from the advantages of that sovereignty which they already possessed and to exercise those prerogatives devolved upon them by the act itself.

Those who represented at the time Lower Canada, that is, the province of Quebec, would never have signed a treaty divesting my fellow citizens of rights and revenues indispensable to their existence.

They knew in 1867 that in order to build schools, colleges and universities, government help was imperative; they knew that subsidies were necessary to preserve them, and still it was decided to leave to the provinces absolute authority on matters pertaining to education.

When offering subsidies to universities, the federal government recognized that they needed financial assistance. The step they then took in an unconstitutional way, why would they not take it indirectly, in the way advocated by the Quebec legislature, namely through allowing the deduction of the provincial tax from the federal tax. They would thus co-operate in the application of legislation designed to help those institutions.

For the central power, this is a nominal sum, $15 million at the most, taking into account the 5 per cent deduction already allowed and provided for by the act.

The Department of External Affairs will grant this year $31,450,000 to help other countries and international organizations and the Quebec taxpayers would be refused the few millions they claim?

Twenty-five million dollars are given under the Colombo plan in order to further the economical development of coutries in south and southeast Asia, but the legitimate claim of the people of Quebec is rejected.

Leopold Richer wrote on March 27, 1954, in Notre Temps:

> Ottawa is acting as if it wanted open warfare or desired to crush the national unity which it pretends to build up and defend.
> No concessions for Quebec, say the Liberals. No concessions for Quebec or the Vatican! But, on the other hand, let us make every possible concession to the communist governments and to Mao, the communist dictator of China!
> That is how we are ruled. The Quebec Liberals betray the highest and most permanent interests of their province. They scarcely can be proud of such an attitude!

Like everybody else, judges have very different views, on political issues, says the royal commission report, at page 60. Should by any chance the present finance minister (Mr. Abbott) be appointed to the supreme court, it would be easy to foresee what rulings would be rendered in judicial disputes between the provinces and the central power.

The rights of the provinces in the field of direct taxation cannot be denied and autonomy becomes an empty word if the revenue essential to its preservation is not guaranteed through the granting of exclusive sources of revenue.

Notwithstanding the opinions of our fashionable "internationalists" and of our ambassadors of "good will", who are much more preoccupied with the fate of South Koreans or Indians than with the future of French Canadians in our confederation, the present struggle is not partisan in scope.

The main cause is the unjust and repeated encroachments of the Ottawa government on the fields allotted to the provinces. The struggle is that of those who ask for the integral respect of the 1867 contract between the two great races established in Canada, that of free men who cherish their financial and economic independence, without which it is impossible to exercise the other freedoms inherent to a sovereign state, that of people opposed to the dictatorship of socialist centralizers.

In that struggle, conducted not only for the benefit of the citizens of Quebec but for the welfare of all Canadians, we, of Quebec, are ready to fight until final victory is ours.

The people are on our side. We shall remain in the van as champions of provincial autonomy; we wish to prosper, but not by begging subsidies and alms from the government in Ottawa, not by being the servants of a wealthy but stingy master. We wish to work in peace and harmony with the central power, "to be united," as Talleyrand said "like a horse and its rider," provided the horse is not always the province of Quebec.

Let there be no barriers to our cultural development; let us have the necessary taxes to make our educational system prosper and, as always, Quebec will remain one of the glories of Canadian confederation.

Mr. Speaker, it is essential that the sacred interests of national unity and of our country should not be confused with the political interests of the Liberal party.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of my first speech, I would like to congratulate you upon your elevation to the high office of Speaker of the house.

The day a new member delivers his first speech is surely a day to be remembered. It is an opportunity for him to express the feelings which are a source of joy and satisfaction in the fulfilment of the duties he has assumed; it is also for him an opportunity of appraising some fearful aspects of the perspectives that open before him.

My first joy is, no doubt, to say how deeply honoured I am to represent in this house the good people of my constituency. The county of Kent, faithful to its tradition, once more indicated its confidence in the great Liberal party by sending me here to support this government, headed by a great leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Political history tells us that, since 1900, the county of Kent has been represented by a member of the Liberal party for forty years.

I therefore feel happy to uphold that tradition which, I hope, will be maintained for many more years.

The thought of those who preceded me in this house makes me fear the task I am beginning to fulfil, knowing that they have fulfilled theirs with brilliance and experience. But their example will be a source of inspiration to me, as I proceed forward along the path that lies ahead.

May I be allowed to mention at this point those predecessors of mine who are still alive. Many hon. members know with what zeal and devotion my immediate predecessor, the Hon. A. D. Leger, discharged his mandate during the thirteen years he spent in this house. It was to no one's surprise, such being the case, that his many years of selfless service, his merit and his experience should have brought upon him the very great honour of being called upon to sit in the other place. Many hon. members here too will have known and appreciated the member who sat for Kent from 1935 to 1940, Mr. Louis P. Robichaud, of Richibucto. He has always devotedly served his county where he has been for a record breaking number of years a most diligent and devoted secretary-treasurer of the municipality of Kent. Some too will remember Mr. Telesphore Arsenault, who sat for Kent from 1930 to 1935. Mr. Arsenault, who is now over eighty years of age, also resides in Richibucto, loved and respected by all who know him. I also want to say a word about the member for Kent from 1911-17, Mr. Ferdinand Robidoux, a lawyer, who now resides at Shediac. Not only is he active in national causes, but he also is a devoted servant of his own municipal corporation. And without leaving the federal scene, I should also like to mention the name of Mr. Pius Michaud, who practises law in Edmundston, N.B.

Mr. Michaud sat in this chamber for seventeen years, and although he is 84 years old, he is still very active, and may I add that he has always been for me a most genial uncle. Here again, I want to recall the memory of the late Dr. E. N. Leger, federal member for Kent riding from 1890 to 1892, until his untimely death; the latter was my uncle, as well as the uncle of hon. Senator A. D. Leger. I now want to talk about the provincial political field, to recall the name of the Hon. A. A. Dysart, now judge of the New Brunswick court, former provincial member for Kent riding during 27 years, and premier of the province of New Brunswick from 1935 to 1940, and the memory of the late David Landry, former member for Kent from 1908 to 1917, who was successively minister of agriculture and provincial secretary-treasurer; he also was a most distinguished uncle of mine.

Mr. Speaker, Kent riding is part of the area called Acadia. Its people are also Acadians, to a large extent. So, as member for that riding and as an Acadian myself, I must talk now about the celebrations which will mark, in 1955, the bicentennial of the dispersion of the Acadians.

It is useless to retrace here the different stages of this historical event, the anniversary of which we want to stress. That, however, is not the aim of the celebrations that are being prepared. They will rather point out our rehabilitation as an ethnical group. What we shall try to demonstrate during these anniversary celebrations will not be so much the negative side of this historical fact, which would insist upon what the Acadian people was not to be, but rather the positive aspect, by showing what this people is now and what it is meant to become. The lessons we shall try to learn therefrom are related to our faith in our future. We shall spread, before today's generation, all the courage and strength our fathers needed in order to obtain for us the place we now occupy in this country of freedom, Canada. And in view of our past, we shall show the present generation tomorrow's duties and obligations. The Acadian people have only one ambition, that is to contribute, by the full development of qualities and gifts bestowed by Providence, to the cultural, economic and moral expansion of this country. Mr. Speaker, there is something more to this drama of dispersion. The fact that two countries, two races, which two centuries ago were full of animosity and hostility towards each other, have come closer together, in Europe as well as in America, and live in friendship and peace, is for the world, in these days of uncertainty and trouble, an invitation to universal peace addressed to men and countries of good will.

There are in America today from 1,200,000 to 1,400,000 Acadians: 600,000 in Louisiana; 300,000 in the maritimes; 150,000 in Quebec; 150,000 in New England; 50,000 in Ontario and the western provinces. Everywhere they profess the same faith, everywhere they sing the same hymn, "Ave Maria Stella", everywhere they fly the same flag, blue, white and red, with a gold star. Except in Louisiana and in the western provinces, the main Acadian communities are united under the banner of a fraternal society, the Assumption Society. That organization aims first of all at maintaining, through its branches, a sound solidarity, and, secondly, through its insurance fund, at ensuring a concentration of the savings of its members for their own protection and for the financing of their own Acadian enterprises.

The head office of that company is located in Moncton, New Brunswick. It is in the maritime provinces, in the very heart of Acadia of olden days, that Acadian life in its most ardent and authentic form is to be found. There we have prosperous, religious, educational and economic institutions which do honour to the whole country. Religious life is organized in one archdiocese and three Acadian dioceses: the archdiocese of Moncton, the dioceses of Edmundston, Bathurst and Yarmouth, the latter newly-formed. Numerous institutions look after our people's education. Among the most important, may I mention St. Joseph's university, Sacred Heart university at Bathurst, St. Louis university at Edmundston, Ste. Ann's college at Church Point, Notre-Dame d'Acadie college, at Moncton, and Maillet college at St. Basile, Madawaska. The two latter are classical colleges for girls.

Acadians also have their daily newspaper, L'Evangéline, founded through the generosity and with the help of everyone.

The French-language radio station recently set up at Moncton by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation gives much pride and satisfaction to the Acadian groups of the district. In the economic field, prosperous co-operative societies help their members to achieve economic independence.

Mr. Speaker, as an eminent man said just a few days ago: Acadia has risen; it is on the march. True, the Acadian population is still made up primarily of farmers and fishermen, who have always been in the forefront; but that group has its own institutions, its clergy, its professional classes and its leaders. Those are additional factors that ensure its survival.

Mr. Speaker, I have just given the house a brief outline of the Acadian people who will soon commemorate the bicentennial of the dispersion. The Acadian people invite all Canadians to join them during those celebrations. They urge the Canadian government and the governments of the provinces where Acadians are to be found to commemorate the event by appropriate deeds and acts.

As a maritimer, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to refer to different statements made in the house with regard to the economy of the maritime provinces. True it is that in the light of the general economy of our country there are reasons for a certain concern about our present conditions. As a stimulating measure some are advocating the Chignecto canal project for the purpose of increasing trade through our seaports. Others, viewing the need for more industrialization, are advocating the Passamaquoddy project as a means of providing more and cheaper power. Still others, in their own way, offer their own unbiased personal suggestions. But when all these proposals are made I am sure they are made with one common purpose in mind, to be of some assistance in devising ways and means to stimulate our maritime economy.

As a member from the maritimes I too have a keen desire to see that our provinces share more fully in, and contribute more effectively to, the fast expanding economy of our country. Perhaps I could illustrate to some extent the situation as it exists, if not in the whole of the maritimes at least in some parts, by relating to the house an incident which I personally witnessed a short time ago on the train to Ottawa. While I was sitting in my seat I could overhear the conversation of two young ladies sitting back of me. At a certain time I heard them speaking of a town that I knew very well, in the vicinity of my own home town. I then introduced myself and engaged in a conversation with them. I learned that the two ladies were the last members of a family of fourteen who had left their home town to take up domicile in a city west of our capital city. When I further questioned them as to the motives that had prompted the family to choose that particular city in preference to many others they gave me a still more significant answer. They said that they had chosen that city because half the people of their home town were already there. Our chief problem in many parts of the maritimes, Mr. Speaker, is a vital one. Unless we can hold at least the greater part of our natural increase of population we are faced with a future full of uncertainties. I shall endeavour to enlarge upon this statement at a later stage of my remarks.

May I now be permitted to deal more specifically with my own constituency of Kent, New Brunswick. The demographic situation of my county could not better be described than by the words of a friend of mine who, during a speech he made in the New Brunswick legislature a short time ago, had this to say:

> In Kent county the population is 85 per cent French; the other 15 per cent is divided somewhat equally between the Irish, the English and the Scotch. We live together harmoniously and we are all liberals!

Before I endeavour to outline some special aspects of the conditions in my own constituency there is one point I want to clearly establish. I am outlining this picture in a purely objective manner without attempting at this time to apportion the responsibility for this situation to any existing authority particularly. Census reports from the 1951 census give us the following information with regard to the population of Kent county. During the ten years involved there were 8,000 births registered. During that same period of time 2,000 deaths were registered. Yet our net increase was but 1,000. It is therefore apparent that in those ten years

5,000 people, or about 83 per cent of the net natural increase, have left the county. Now, if we further analyse the situation we come to other undesirable conclusions. The majority of those leaving the county are those entering the earning period, that is to say our young people. In fact, in checking with the municipal officials, I received the information that during the year 1953 there were but 12 to 15 new homes built in the whole county—that is, in a county of some 27,000 population.

Under those conditions, it is therefore obvious that we are fast moving towards the status of a population composed mainly of children and old people. This in turn brings the unhappy situation where the increasing municipal burdens have to be borne by comparatively fewer people. In fact every year the school budget requirements are becoming heavier, due to an increasing demand for a more advanced teaching program. More schoolteachers have to be hired; new schools have to be built. Yet as soon as those who during their school age were a liability to the municipality reach the age where they should become an asset, they set out for other parts of the country, due to a lack of opportunities at home. The same situation now applies in our church organizations. In my own town of Buctouche we are just starting to build a new church. Due to the high number of large families, we have to build a large church. Naturally we would be very anxious, on the other hand, to keep most of that growing generation with us, when they attain the earning period, so that they could assume their part of the financial responsibility now contracted on account of them.

What is the answer to this situation? There is but one answer: To create opportunities. We are convinced that the greater number of those leaving the county are doing so through a matter of necessity and not through a matter of their own choice. We know that to be a fact, because when these people come back during vacation periods they tell us they would come back to stay if only they could make their living.

And how do we create new opportunities? May I suggest that a special study of the local conditions be made so as to determine every possibility to provide employment for our ever-increasing population. May I suggest, furthermore, that we need at least a few manufacturing industries in our county. While I know that in speaking that way, I may sound presumptuous, I do so for one reason that possibly very few others in this house, if any, could advance: Kent county is without a single permanent manufacturing establishment. True, we have our fish plants along our shores, but these are only seasonal. For that reason I ask that the possibility of establishing any industry, be it of any size, be seriously investigated at the first opportunity. In the meantime I submit we should direct our attention towards a greater development of our primary industries, namely, agriculture, fishing and lumbering.

Agriculture, to me, always is an appealing subject. I imagine that when you are born on a farm, and brought up on a farm, it leaves impressions in your mind which will never fade. You can never forget those wide horizons, the charms and melodies of nature, the peaceful atmosphere of rural life. Nor can you forget the good people of the countryside, those rugged, hard-working farm men and women, who are the backbone of the country.

Mr. Speaker, let us be all solicitude for our country people; without them, our economy cannot be maintained. I have heard many true statements in this house about our farming people, and about the hard conditions they are facing. But I also feel that many things have been said in this house which contain something more than solicitude for the farmer's welfare; many a speech I have heard here, I submit, reflected more political display than economic dismay. Agriculture is a subject of major importance in our country, too important indeed to be abused for sheer political motives. Mankind has always subsisted through the land, and I contend that our Canadian way of life, depending to a large extent upon the prosperity of the farm, is not on the verge of disruption. When man will work the land diligently, yes in hardship at times, but also with hope, it will provide for him abundantly.

Mr. Speaker, it is well to accept those things which nature provides; but human ingenuity is also essential. Agriculture is the main industry of Kent county. Our farmers for the past few years have enjoyed certain advantages of great benefit to them; namely, the services of a devoted class of agronomists, the benefits of the price and support board, the federal freight assistance, the helpful influence of the maritime co-operative services, free courses supplied by a school of agriculture, and others. Yet they also have their difficulties. The farmers of Kent county, like those in most part of the maritimes, are mixed farmers. The mixed farmers are probably those we hear the least about, although their difficulties are as great as those of any other class of farmers. Due to the small acreage of the Kent county farm there remains little possibility of increasing the actual operations, which often fail to provide sufficient income to make it profitable. I would, therefore, be very anxious to see that an economic survey be conducted to ascertain the possibilities of improving the present conditions.

In that respect I am convinced that there are two fields of endeavour which, if carefully studied, could be very profitable to our farmers. First, I am sure that we are losing the opportunities of a profitable market in the canned vegetable and canned fruit business. I can think of no reason why we in the maritimes should look to the outside to supply our needs of those food commodities. Vegetables of almost every kind, and many varieties of fruits, grow well in our part of the country. And the vegetable crop arrives during vacation time, when the children of our large families in Kent county could supply advantageously the necessary labour to pick those crops. And the high freight rates now existing in the transportation of goods would add to the advantages of such a project.

Secondly, I feel that for somewhat similar reasons we should be able in the maritimes to provide for our own requirements of canned milk. It was pointed out a few days ago by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) that the design of the maritime industrial economy, in his own words, has suffered a decline since 1867. This situation, in some respects, has probably been brought about by an inferiority complex detrimental to our own welfare and prosperity. Why before perspectives like these should we meet only sentiments of doom, just because the initiative should start at home rather than somewhere abroad? In fact, a few experiments in some parts of the maritimes have already been made in these fields, and the results have proved very satisfactory.

A few years ago, in some sections of New Brunswick, no one had ever thought of making a great business of the strawberry crop. Today in those same areas this crop has become a thriving business, which brings good returns annually. Why could we not obtain the same results in other similar fields? These projects, canned vegetables, canned fruits, and canned milk, could be studied from a double angle. First, by subsidizing local firms or organizations willing to undertake such projects; or, secondly, by inviting firms already in those lines of business in other provinces to open branches in our own region. Such industries, I am sure, would be of great benefit to all in the maritimes, to the farming population particularly, and in a special manner to my own farming population of Kent county.

Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say a few words about fisheries. The fishing industry in Kent county in the matter of importance comes next to agriculture. It will be easily understood, therefore, that I attach great importance to this subject. The people of the fishing villages of my constituency are hard-working people, striving to derive from their labours, sometimes with great risk, a modest subsistence. There are two observations I wish to make at this time, with regard to this industry.

First, I want to draw the attention of the government to the fact that I believe the time has now arrived when we should give more importance to education in the fishing industry. If I remember correctly, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) in his speech earlier made reference to the matter, and I concur in what he said. In agriculture, for instance, we have our technicians, our agronomists, our agricultural schools, our farm organizations. Our fishermen are also confronted with their problems, but have no institutions to assist in solving them. New regulations in the fishing industry are enacted every year. Most of the fishermen hear of these through government officials living in their midst, not as technicians ready to assist but as officers to enforce the law.

I believe if more stress was placed upon educating these people in the different aspects of their profession a lot of complications would be eliminated when law enforcement is applied. I am happy to say that an experiment of that nature will be attempted by the Department of Fisheries in Kent county shortly. I had requested that competent authorities be sent into the different fishing centres of the county to explain, in a series of educational talks, the numerous aspects of the lobster industry. This, I am informed, will be done before the next fishing season, and I am very happy about it. I hope that this initiative will be but a first step in a complete educational program for our fishermen everywhere.

I feel that in my own part of the province of New Brunswick, facilities for such a program could easily be obtained at St. Joseph's University. This institution, through the services of its extension division, has already proven to be of great assistance to our population, and I am sure the authorities would welcome the opportunity of further participation in the education of the fishing class of our population.

My second observation, sir, bears upon a subject of a particular nature: the oyster industry in Kent county. I can well remember when a very few years ago, this industry was very flourishing in my constituency. Today it has completely disappeared. And in the face of the present economic conditions of my county the importance of restoring this industry cannot be overemphasized. Our departmental technicians and scientists have the knowledge of the causes responsible for this condition. I now urge them to investigate the situation, and to use every means to revive the oyster industry in Kent county. We need it.

The third industry of Kent county is lumbering. Many depend upon it for their main source of livelihood, others as a supplement to their farm and fishing income. As a further result, this industry provides a substantial source of labour for the stevedoring industry during the navigation period, around the ports of Buctouche and Richibucto. The recent recession in the lumber industry has been felt in almost every business field of Kent county. It is hoped, therefore, that we will soon witness a return to those conditions when activity will again reign at its peak in our forests, along our roads, and around our ports for a better climate in the economy of Kent county.

I have no illusions, Mr. Speaker. The mandate I agreed to carry when elected to this house is heavy. I trust that with guidance and assistance all will be well.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It was with more than passing interest that I listened to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon. It rather seemed to me that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), having applied the lash a little while ago, the Prime Minister was now holding out the carrot, and that both of them, to a certain extent in their attitudes, seemed to feel the province of Quebec in its attitude was playing a little bit of the donkey. I for one cannot go along with that feeling. I do feel that we learned this afternoon there was going to be no federal-provincial conference in the immediate future. We learned that the Minister of Finance was not really being nasty in his remarks in the budget debate. He did not really slam the door. We did not learn very much else. It was unfortunate, first because we do very much need a conference between the provinces and the federal government at this point to resolve some of these difficulties, and we need it, Mr. Speaker, held in an atmosphere of amity, good understanding and co-operation, and not in an atmosphere of mutual vilification, no matter how it is clothed.

We also need at such a conference to realize, all of us coming to that conference, that certain parts of this country have peculiarities that they are very proud of. The government, and particularly some of its luminaries, must realize this and approach the negotiations with the provinces of Canada with an understanding of the peculiarities and the differences of each region.

Quebec, Mr. Speaker, does not want to be set aside and treated as a region which is apart. We do have our regional differences perhaps; we have our prides and our peculiarities but I am an English Canadian coming from Quebec and that is why I am treating this subject in this way. Since I live in that province and meet the residents of that province day after day, so many of whom are French Canadians, I realize that they, their province, their philosophy and their thinking have made a tremendous contribution to the development of this country. Partially because of that and partially because of their own long history, they are jealous of their prerogatives.

They want the freedom to develop and to keep the traditions that they hold most dear. I hold no brief for those within Quebec who are isolationists and who would set the province apart. I hold no brief either for those here at Ottawa in this government who would set Quebec apart. I feel that perhaps the time has come when some of these things should be said, and when these regional differences and the necessity for operating within them should be recognized and should be emphasized.

I know as I go across this country, and I have been across it from one end to the other, that there are few people who realize just what is in the minds and in the hearts of most French-Canadian citizens in Quebec. They think of them as a people who perhaps want to live completely unto themselves. They do not realize that the French Canadian views himself as the first Canadian, as the one who is proudest, not only of his own little portion of Canada but of Canada as a whole. He views himself as having made, and as continuing to make, a tremendous contribution to the development of this country of ours. Within that framework, however, he does not feel that he should be anglicized or that he should have certain pressures exerted on him which would change his culture, that culture which has contributed so much to this country of ours. Nor does he feel that he wants to impose his culture, his religion or his way of life or anything about him, upon the other parts of Canada.

He truly wants to live in amity with everyone. I think perhaps, Mr. Speaker—I hesitate to mention this—the change which those of us who live in Quebec can see in the attitude of those who live with us in the province towards international affairs bespeaks more than anything else the willingness of those in Quebec to learn to co-operate, and to change and fit themselves into the world as they know it. We do know that over the years the majority of the residents of our province have keenly felt the necessity for avoiding foreign wars or foreign entanglements. There have been many almost catastrophes that have occurred as a result of that feeling. Today, as our province becomes more urban, as the people of Quebec have learned more and have travelled more, the attitude of everyone in the province, French and English, toward international affairs has changed a great deal.

Just recently I read in the newspaper, for example, that the question of conscription, so long almost a fighting word in that province, was no longer a fighting word; that the people of Quebec were coming more and more to be prepared to play their part, as they have always done when the chips were actually down, in all phases of international affairs. I cite that, Mr. Speaker, and I do so perhaps using words very poorly, as some example of the thought I am trying to get across. It is a sincere desire on my part that this government should do more than simply say that the door is open. After all, doors are open under many circumstances, but people do not necessarily call at the door or go through the door unless they have reasonable assurance that on the other side they are going to be met with a welcome; they are going to be met with co-operation and kindness; they are going to be met by people who really want to sit down with them in amity and understanding to work out their problems.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this government should give more indication than it has so far, not only that the door is open, but indicating the type of reception that will be found by those who go through that door. I believe that perhaps we have not as yet heard too much about that. Above all let us remember that while those in Quebec are particularly affected by this problem at this particular moment, it is a national problem that affects every province in Canada. It is going to affect us on a continuing basis until a reasonable solution is found. The evasion of the issue by not calling a federal-provincial conference is merely postponing the difficulty.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose I had just concluded making a few remarks about the possibility of a federal-provincial conference. I would like now to turn my attention to the budget generally and express at least my personal regret at the general tone of the budget and my views on what it contains. I rather like to think of it as having been brought down by a likeable Minister of Finance who brought in an unlikeable budget. It is always the case that when unpleasant things are brought in by pleasant people we never know whether to discuss the unpleasantness of the thing or the pleasantness of the person. Actually this budget is one which seems to perpetuate the government's idea that a million dollars is just a drop in the budget and that decreases in the cost of one department must be balanced by increases in the amount allotted for another department.

There is one thing though we must say about our Minister of Finance and the government generally. They do not allow being rather hopelessly in debt to prevent them from spending. Certainly that must seem to be the case in view of some of the things included in the estimates. It does seem, however, Mr. Speaker, that we badly need a more careful study of the impact of taxation on the Canadian economy. The tax problem today is more difficult than it has ever been before in our history, and it is made so by problems of national security and by the high level of our social security payments. Since there seems to be general agreement that social security payments are necessary in the world of today, there are only two major fields in which reductions seem possible. One lies in the possibility of examining national security payments, and the second in administrative expenditures of all kinds. I think that perhaps in both these fields we have a great opportunity through increased efficiency and the elimination of waste and extravagance to reduce our expenditure quite considerably.

On the other hand, to allow national security expenditure to fall below the level necessary to provide a reasonable measure of national security would be absolutely foolhardy, and also to fail to levy ample taxes for national security and other government expenditure would really be self-defeating because in a time of full employment such as this we would pay for these expenditures in another way which would, in effect, mean inflation.

We must work toward a solution of our tax problem by making progress in two directions. First, the development and execution of policies which will provide adequately for our national security at a minimum cost; and, secondly, the development of a tax system to meet the necessary costs of government, including the cost of national security, with the least impairment of national growth and the minimum of hindrance on the development of the individual in his work and in encouraging him to make the greatest possible contribution to our economy by providing him with sufficient monetary reward.

To give some idea of how our present tax structure penalizes the individual who makes an above the average income I have worked out comparisons on taxes paid over the lifetime of the statistically average Canadian, and two hypothetical individuals, the professional man and the medium successful businessman. Working from dominion bureau of statistics figures I have assumed that these men were married at the age of 27, which is the normal age for marriage in Canada, that they had their first child two years later, and the second child again two years later, so that you have here something approximating the average Canadian family.

The statistically average Canadian I have described here starts work at 16 and works until he is 70 years of age. It is interesting to note that his income by the time he is 27 years old and married is about $2,380 and then it rises to $2,558 from the period when he is 35 until he reaches the age of 44, and declines gradually from there on. However, throughout the lifetime of this statistically average Canadian—and this average is reached by taking the incomes of all Canadians and averaging them out—this individual never makes more than $50 per week, and on this he must establish a home, keep a wife, and raise two children as well as pay the government during the course of his lifetime the amount of $3,202 in income tax. For a man who never makes more than $50 per week this is an amazingly large sum. It is more than he will make in any one year of his lifetime, and it is more than he would require to put his son or daughter through college.

Then we turn to the businessman and the same set of figures apply. We estimate that he works from 17 to the age of 70 and that his income rises gradually from $2,000 to a top amount of $4,800 and then drops down ultimately as his earning power declines to about $4,000. The Minister of Finance and his taxes, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) with his collections, will take from this man the sum of $21,715.

Then we turn to the professional man, the most highly paid class in Canada. I might add incidentally, Mr. Speaker, that in looking over these tabulations I was amused to find that as well as there being classes covering the professional men, salesmen, employed people and businessmen there was another class covering deceased. This made me realize just how extensive are the operations of the taxation departments.

These professional men start off at the age of 25. Up to that time they have been obtaining an education. They start off with an average income of $3,000 and eventually their average reaches $7,400 and they finish work at the age of 65 making the sum of approximately $6,500 per year. Throughout the period of his lifetime, Mr. Speaker, this professional man pays the government $34,382 in income tax.

If hon. members will examine these figures for a moment they will see how tremendous is the burden which is being borne by the person who through his own efforts, initiative, or ability stands out above the ruck in any way, shape or form. The average Canadian pays the astonishing amount of $3,202 during his lifetime in income tax alone. The businessman on a medium income of approximately $5,000 a year pays $21,700, and the professional man with the average professional man's income pays $34,400.

We must remember there are men in every walk of life, in business, in factories, and men working with their hands in industry throughout this country who have the ability and even the desire to work a little harder in order to make a little bit more money to improve themselves. But with this tremendous impact of taxation on them as individuals, what incentive is there? It is bad enough when you examine it on the basis of one year; but when you examine it on the basis of a man's lifetime, you can see the reasons which might almost encourage him not to work so hard and not to make such a contribution to our economy when so much of it is going to be taken away from him in taxation.

I should now like to turn for a few moments to one other suggestion concerning the operation of business in Canada. The responsibilities of business and of industry in this country of ours are many; but perhaps the most important one of all is the responsibility of business and industry to improve the living standard of everyone in Canada and to supply steady jobs for those who want to work. In order to accomplish this result, business and industry must constantly improve their present products, they must create new ones and they must persuade people to buy their output. In order to accomplish this objective there are certain methods and media which they can use.

Primarily, they have the work they can do on research on their products and on the improvement of those products. They have the work they can do in the field of research in finding new markets for themselves. They have the work they can do in the field of sales and advertising efforts to move these products into the hands of the consumer once they are manufactured. To me it seems that it is a primary responsibility of government to encourage business to operate in all these fields under all conditions, but particularly to offer business and industry some opportunity and some encouragement to operate in the fields of research and distribution of their products when times are difficult and when perhaps we are in a minor recession. At that time there is sometimes a tendency for business to restrict their expenditures or to cut back on expenditures which they feel can be carried over from one year to another. When sales slip, we must offer them the opportunity and the encouragement to carry on these important expenditures because it is essentially on them that our future prosperity is going to be based.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance that there might apply here something to which I referred last November in the course of the throne speech debate. I greatly regret not having seen something of that nature done when the budget was presented to us. To be specific, I am suggesting for his consideration that every business should be given the opportunity or the right to get a tax deduction each year, in addition to that which is now allowed, up to, say, 3 per cent of their sales dollar, in order that they might buy non-interest-bearing government bonds which would be redeemable at will by the buyer. The payment on these bonds would be allowed as a deductible expense. By the terms of this suggestion this money would have to be used either for research expenditures or for advertising expenditures. The buyer of the bonds could redeem them at will at any time. If he chose not to use the money for the designated purposes, he would be taxable on the amount at the time the bonds were redeemed. If he merely held the bonds for five years, they would be automatically redeemed at the end of the period and the buyer would be taxable on the amount but he would not be taxed on that amount if he could prove that the amount of money redeemed through the bonds had been invested in research or in advertising. For research, he could use the money for the creation of new products, for new packaging or for new plant methods to produce products more cheaply. For advertising, he could use the money to stimulate the consumer into buying products through any means that were at his disposal.

The important thing is that the government of Canada would lose nothing through the introduction of such a measure because if the money was not used for the designated purposes the government would collect their taxes. If it was used for the designated purposes, there would be additional taxes coming to the government through increased business arising from the use of the money in this particular way and through increased employment which would result as the outcome of research into new products and the sale of those new products.

While this suggestion is perhaps new here, it is not really a new proposition. Something similar to this procedure has been done in Switzerland for some time. While it is a new proposition perhaps in exactly the way it is presented, we must remember that under our present tax laws, business and industry are allowed to do something quite similar in many fields. For example, through their accounting practice they can follow a procedure which moves profits from one year to another, and they can do this quite legitimately. Through inventory valuation they can accomplish the same thing. Through either capitalization or write-offs, at varying rates of their assets they can determine to an extent their taxation. Their depreciation policy generally has an effect on it. Of course, the major item is the carry-forward or carry-back of losses in any one year in so far as they affect taxes. Under such a suggested procedure the government is, of course, in the position of getting rather considerable sums of interest-free money for anywhere from one to five years. I have already shown how the government would not lose in taxes collected under such procedure.

In conclusion, I put forward an idea such as this and I point out the heavy impact of taxation on the individual Canadian not in any hope or expectation that hon. members who sit opposite are going to be greatly impressed. I do it almost with a feeling that my words are falling on deaf ears. But it does seem to me we have got to realize at some point that, although it was the individual who built this country in the first instance, in the 1500's, 1600's and 1700's and, with an axe in one hand and a gun in the other, pushed back our frontiers, although the industrialist and the businessman, that job having been done, have furthered that development in the last forty or fifty years and brought us to the rather comfortable position which we as individuals enjoy today, these incentives and opportunities are gradually being delimited and made smaller and smaller.

The man who thinks big in Canada today, under our government regulations, under government control, under government supervision, is at a disadvantage. In looking across the floor of the house I wonder how someone like the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would have felt if he had started out in life under the same restrictions, controls, taxation and everything else that his successors are encountering today. He is an older man now. He has made his mark, and certainly in the field of industry and engineering it is a good mark. But there are men who are going to come after him, men who are even now pushing themselves forward, who want to make a life here, a life that stands out, a life that means something, a life of accomplishment, who are not satisfied just to be another person, who are not satisfied to do another job but want to really accomplish something, and the incentive is being taken away from those people today.

Admittedly something else is being given in its place. They are being given cushions underneath them and all around them. They are being featherbedded, but the type of man I am talking about does not want featherbedding. He does not appreciate it. He appreciates the opportunity to live and do for himself and for his country to the best of his ability. I hope that in the years to come that type of man is going to be given the atmosphere in which to operate that will encourage him and lead him on. I do not think it ever will be done by the featherbedders who sit opposite. It will be done by other groups, and primarily those among whom I sit, who have a keener appreciation of what built this country and made it great, and who can make this country greater than any member of the present government can even envisage.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, there are certain problems pertaining to the lower region of the Fraser valley and to British Columbia itself that have been well dealt with, such as the need for adequate diking and diking facilities, river crossings, provincial assistance and many others, and I do not intend to spend much more time on them. I wish to add my voice in endorsation of the stand taken by those who have raised them. We need dikes. Many people live in fear of our mighty Fraser river. We need means of crossing it, and there is a federal responsibility here. The Fraser is the St. Lawrence of British Columbia and we should regard it as such.

The fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has entered this debate is indicative of the need for a complete appraisal of the problems with which Canada finds itself faced today. Apparently the provinces are having financial difficulties. We have labour and unemployment problems. We have social assistance problems involving assistance to the aged, to the war veterans, to the blind and to the incapacitated. We have a problem of trade. We have a problem of conservation. The problem of taxation as it pertains to Quebec was dealt with to a degree by my associate, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod). I would also urge the government to be primarily concerned about the effect that the situation may have upon the morale of thousands of Canadians forced to live in the province of Quebec at the direction of the Department of National Defence. These include men and women in the armed forces and many civil servants who are not there of their own volition. Therefore particular consideration should be given them to see to it that they are not dealt with in this fashion. I was pleased that the Prime Minister agreed that some temporary agreement with the province of Quebec must be reached.

My main reason for taking part in the debate at this time is twofold. I wish to draw the attention of the government to a problem that is applicable particularly to my own riding and to the province of British Columbia as a whole but is also national in scope. I wish to deal with the question of fisheries and also the matter of our old age pensioners. With respect to the old age pensioners I have a part of table 23 here from the census of 1951 which deals with age distribution and gives the figures for those 70 years and over in the various provinces compared with the total population.

I have taken the time to figure out the percentage represented by those 70 years of age and over compared with the total population of the dominion. If I might be permitted at this time to have the table placed on Hansard I think I could save an appreciable amount of time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hahn: The table is as follows:

	Age 70 and over	Total Population	Percentage of total represented by those 70 and over
Canada	652,776	14,009,429	4·7
Newfoundland ..	14,419	361,416	3·9
Prince Edward Island	6,439	98,429	6·5
Nova Scotia	35,485	642,584	5·5
New Brunswick	24,747	515,697	4·8
Quebec	138,936	4,055,681	3·4
Ontario	245,266	4,597,542	5·3
Manitoba	38,121	776,541	4·9
Saskatchewan ..	38,110	831,728	4·5
Alberta	37,504	939,501	4·0
British Columbia	73,210	1,165,210	6·3
New Westminster Federal Riding
Delta	434	6,701
Langley	887	12,267
Surrey	2,486	33,670
New Westminster	1,754	28,639
Riding Total	5,561	81,277	6·84

On a national basis those 70 years of age and over represent 4·7 per cent of our total population. The provinces in which the figure is greater than the national average are Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia. The provinces in which the number of these 70 years of age and over is less than the national average are Newfoundland, Quebec, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The two provinces which are well above the national average are Prince Edward Island, with 6·5 per cent, and British Columbia with 6·3 per cent, compared with the national average of 4·7 per cent.

My own riding of New Westminster is well above these averages with 6·84 per cent of its population over 70 years of age. The population of the riding of New Westminster compares with that of the province of Prince Edward Island. The reason for people settling in these two regions, Prince Edward Island and the coastal region of British Columbia is, I find, primarily climatic, but many have also come to my riding on the specific advice of their physicians.

I am not going to deal with the emotional aspect of the problem of old age pensioners at this time. As the Prime Minister said, we must be realistic. As I see it, the problem is a realistic rather than an emotional one. The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan have long realized the need of assisting these people.

Some years ago British Columbia supplemented the allowance of the aged by $10 a month. Alberta likewise had given their aged a supplementary allowance of $10 a month. So-called socialist Saskatchewan has helped their aged to the extent of $2.50 a month. This year British Columbia and Alberta have each increased their assistance to $15 a month. Saskatchewan has undoubtedly found its cost of socialistic automobile insurance and health insurance will not permit it to increase its supplementary allowance, and so has added nothing to its supplementary allowance.

So we find that British Columbia gave $15 supplementary allowance per month, that Alberta gave a similar amount, and Saskatchewan $2.50. On the yearly basis the aged in British Columbia receive $180 supplementary allowance, those in Alberta receive the same amount and those in Saskatchewan $30. In the rest of Canada they receive nothing in addition to their regular old age pensions. But those persons eligible for old age pensions and supplementary allowance have a total income in Alberta and British Columbia of $480 plus $180 or $660, and in Saskatchewan $480 plus $30 or $510. In the other provinces of Canada they receive only $480.

Apparently, federally, we expect our aged to live on less than one-half the amount we allow by way of income tax exemptions for others. The problem resolves itself into four parts. First, there is the individual's ability to get and to hold a job. The individual must obtain a job and he must hold it if he intends to supplement his own allowance.

Secondly, there are municipal obligations —the ability to give medical and relief services to the individual. Then there is the provincial obligation—the recognition of its obligations to the individual and the municipality.

Fourth, we have the federal obligation, which includes the three—obligations to the province, the municipality and the individual. If we analyse each particular case we see this: In the individual we have as a society taken this man off the market as a labourer, and he therefore of necessity frequently becomes the responsibility of the state. We have declared him too old. He is a senior citizen. The municipality in such areas as Delta, Surrey, Langley and New Westminster, which I have the honour to represent, are hard pressed. They have many more than their comparative share of the senior citizens. The figures show that 6·8 per cent of their population are those of 70 years of age and over, while the rest of Canada has only 4·7 per cent. I might point out at this time that their average of 6·8 per cent is much higher than the rest of British Columbia, which is only 6·3 per cent; and that, in turn, is much higher than that of the rest of Canada. Many of them are not revenue producing. In the past they have not contributed to the cost of operating the municipality, and they have not paid their share of the utilities costs. Many are ill and many are in need of medical help.

Then we find such municipalities as Surrey and Delta with no hospital facilities. They depend upon surrounding areas; they need and wish to build a hospital. They have in this particular instance tried for the last ten years to raise funds to do so, but have never been able to. The national health grant of $1,000 per bed is not sufficient to assist them, even though they have more than their share of the number of aged, as compared with the rest of Canada. They need help.

This poses the question: Is it the responsibility of the municipal district that has not received any revenue from some of its citizenry to supply them with this help; or is it a federal responsibility to try to help in these areas those who have come from other provinces? And therefore should not the federal government make a substantial contribution to those areas having considerably more than the Canadian average of aged? Certainly it would appear they are deserving of some help.

In British Columbia we find the average cost of hospitalizing senior citizens is $15 per month. Our municipalities should have a direct claim on each area which has sent us some of its senior citizens. You have most of the dividends of their labours. We have some of your finest citizens you have had.

The next obligation is provincial. I maintain that since British Columbia now gives a supplementary allowance of $15 per month to these people under a means test they have met their obligation. This is specially true when one adds the medical expenses of our senior citizens to this group. As I said earlier, it is at an average cost of $15 per month for old age pensioners.

Now I come to the federal responsibility. The major taxation field is in the hands of the federal authority. They give $40 per month. My proposal would be that the federal government should increase the old age pension to at least $60 per month. Where any man or woman is denied the privilege of working because he or she is too old, such persons should not be expected to live on less than $60 per month. That should be the minimum allowance from the federal government. It must be kept in mind that the senior citizen has only one alternative: He must choose food, clothing or shelter. Canada is a cold country, so he must pay the piper for a place to lay his head. That leaves him little with which to buy things to eat and to wear. The more he eats the less he wears; the more he wears the less he eats. Simple, isn't it? Let us try it some time—or perhaps the thirties give example enough. I appeal to hon. members to make this adjustment.

Earlier in the course of this debate the member for Okanagan-Revelstoke referred to the conservation of our forests in British Columbia, a problem to which we must give attention. Trees do not mature overnight. Reforestation is a problem of today, not of the distant future. It is the responsibility of this government to help protect the industry of the future. And I am sure every member in the house, be he Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F., Social Credit or an independent, will say, "We must protect Canada's forests". Therefore I shall not devote any more time to this problem. But as I said earlier: Conservation is one of those factors that require complete appraisal.

Frequently I feel the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is right when he suggests that if the capital of Canada were much farther west we could expect different treatment from what we get today. I refer specifically to the apportionment of the tax dollar in direct relation to what our province contributes to the taxation coffers of the Minister of Finance.

I do not refer to the treatment from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). The people of my province for a time have had the utmost respect for his decisions. Up to now the Minister of Fisheries has given careful consideration to the fisheries problem in British Columbia. We now have a further problem of conservation, however, which has not received the careful study we think he should have given it. Therefore I am bringing the question of conservation of pink salmon on the Fraser river to his attention. We find there are three means of destruction of pink salmon, the first of which is the natural means, the second of which is man's stupidity and the third, fishing.

To deal first with the natural process of destruction. I would point out that this is the law of balance in nature whereby fish eat fish and birds eat fish and spawn, thereby gradually bringing about a balance through the process of survival. This, it seems to me, is self-explanatory.

The second means of destruction is that of man's stupidity. The erection of dams and other artificial impediments prevent fish going to their spawning ground. And we might add here the factor of the pollution of water about which we have heard so much in recent days. Quite frequently pollution destroys spawn and fish.

The third element of destruction is that of fishing. This is a process of deliberate destruction by man. I would say that the fisheries problem is a dual one.

I should like to point out what the province of British Columbia has done in the matter of the conservation of salmon. I shall read the report issued by the Fisheries Council of Canada on April 23 of this year, page 2, under the caption: "British Columbia bill to guard Salmon runs endorsed":

> Vancouver Sun, April 9 reports: "Fisheries Minister Ralph Chetwynd in Victoria received a pat on the back for spear-heading provincial legislation to protect salmon from the river dam construction. Fisheries Association of British Columbia gave Chetwynd "full credit" for introducing Bill 47, an amendment to the fisheries act which received second reading in the legislature Wednesday. "The bill indicates the government does not intend to allow construction of hydro-electric installations at the expense of our valuable salmon fisheries", the association said. "This fact is implicit in the wording of the bill which clearly states the minister shall approve plans for a fishways, screens and other devices before construction starts." The association described Chetwynd as the "first provincial fisheries minister to fully recognize and accept responsibility which Victoria shares with Ottawa for protection of British Columbia resources against unilateral development."

Let us now go to the federal field. Here we have an announcement by our Minister of Fisheries that calls for the closure of the Fraser river above the Pattullo bridge after September 16 of each year. This affects the livelihood of some 600 fishermen, some part-time and some full-time. Now, Mr. Speaker, the fishermen on the Fraser river are aware of the need for conserving the British Columbia pink salmon run. I am sure our Minister of Fisheries will agree with that, but they are unhappy, very unhappy for very good reasons. The Department of Fisheries in its very democratic fashion sent a questionnaire to each fisherman and others interested in this business of conservation and related British Columbia fisheries problems of which closure of the river to fishing was question No. 5. To the best of our knowledge it is not proved by the majority report. If it is, then certainly the plea and resolution of the fishermen should be given more complete consideration. I will therefore read a resolution of which I am sure the minister has a copy. I refer to the resolution issued by the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union, dated April 8, 1954, as follows:

> Whereas the fisheries minister James Sinclair has officially stated that the Fraser river above Pattullo bridge will be closed each year after September 16, and
> Whereas the two reasons given are conservation and quality, and
> Whereas it can be shown that there is no difference in quality below or above the bridge and it does not offer a solution to conservation by closing that area but does, as a result, cause overcrowding in other areas and creates extreme hardships to those fishermen who cannot move to other areas.
> Therefore be it resolved that we use every means at our disposal to have the government rescind the closure above the Pattullo bridge.
> Be it further resolved that we make a strong demand for the postponement of any final decision until 1956 in order to provide ample opportunity for full discussion with the fishermen directly affected, to give them ample opportunity to make adjustments, and to allow them to participate in the Adams river sockeye run in 1954.
> Be it finally resolved we demand special compensation for the fishermen directly concerned by the federal government in event the department still insists on proceeding with the closure order.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the preamble to this resolution. There is no question about the need of an explanation respecting the fact that the minister has called for closure of the fisheries. As far as the fishermen and I are concerned, the reason requiring the closure for conservation purposes meets with our approval. There is definite need for conservation of fish. As far as the quality of the fish is concerned, however, as you can discern from this resolution, up to now it has not been definitely ascertained that any man can go to the Fraser river and take samples of either fish that go up that river above or below the Pattullo bridge, and taste any difference in quality with any degree of accuracy. As far as the resolutions themselves are concerned I shall deal only with the one reading:

> Be it finally resolved we demand special compensation for the fishermen directly concerned by the federal government . . .

In this particular case I would say that probably the fishermen concerned might have been much better advised to have requested the government rather than demanded that they do something about it. I am sure that a request would meet with more consideration. I would say that these are probably desperation tactics on the part of those particular individuals concerned.

On April 12 the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union—the same union to which I made reference a moment ago—had this to say in part II of a brief which I understand they have sent to the minister:

> On February 5, 1954 the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union submitted a lengthy brief to the Department of Fisheries opposing this new regulation. We quote here from this brief: "The area above the Pattullo bridge accounted for less than 10 per cent of the sockeye, less than 3 per cent of the chums and less than 2 per cent of the cohoe, caught by Canadian fishermen in the Fraser river and its main approaches. Even in the Fraser river alone, area 29D (above Pattullo bridge) accounts for only 18 per cent of the sockeye, 16 per cent of the chums and 23 per cent of the cohoe. It is therefore clear that the elimination of fishing in this area is not vital to conservation of the salmon runs to the Fraser river. We might add that salmon fishing has been pursued in this area from the very beginning of the industry. We do not believe it has suddenly become impossible to conserve our salmon, except by closing down this entire area.

We must also draw your attention to the fact that the date proposed for the closure of area 29D (above Pattullo bridge) coincides with the arrival of the Adams river sockeye run at the mouth of the Fraser. Thus, the fishermen who have been curtailed in their fishing efforts during the past eight years in order to rebuild the Fraser river sockeye runs would now be cut off, for all time, from any participation in these late runs of sockeye".

Mr. Speaker, reference to the documents that I have just read indicate that it is not a problem of conservation to deprive these men of fish that they have already conserved. They have a certain right to expect that they would have the privilege of fishing on these particular grounds. For the past eight years they have been protecting those grounds for the very purpose that they would have the right to fish when the fish began to run. Now that they are beginning to run they are being deprived of that particular privilege. I do not think that is quite playing cricket. I continue with the document:

The United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union is absolutely opposed to the closure of the area between New Westminster and Mission bridge. We feel we should briefly sum up our objections as follows:

1. Conservation of fall salmon, pinks and chums, or any other species of salmon, is not mainly dependent upon closure of this area.

That was indicated in the percentage of fish that was caught in that particular area, Mr. Speaker. I must say that I concur in the suggestion that the conservation of the fish is not dependent upon that area above the bridge. I continue:

2. A treaty with the United States covering conservation of pink runs and equal catch division is the real need in conserving pink salmon and not the closure of any section of the Fraser.

You will probably recall that at the time of the throne speech I spoke along this same line and suggested that probably an agreement might be reached between the authorities in the United States and ourselves, particularly with the state of Washington, which is concerned, for the purpose of drawing up a commission similar to the sockeye commission to carry on the work of study of conservation. I understand that to a degree this commission is set up. I continue:

3. Equalization of weekend closures between the approaches to the Fraser and the Fraser river combined with a deliberate program of equalizing catches between Canadian seiners and gillnetters would at the same time provide a better opportunity to apply conservation measures.

In respect to this suggestion that the fishermen themselves had to make, it appears to me that if the seiners and gillnetters are prepared to take off an extra day each week to permit the salmon to run up the Fraser, and therefore allow the fish to spawn, it would be a more reasonable excuse than to deprive 600 fishermen in the one section of the river from carrying on the fish trade that they have been used to doing for so many years. The brief continues:

4. Overcrowding in the industry must be solved by a fair program of licence limitation, not by eliminating our historic fishing grounds.

I would not completely agree with this idea of licence limitation. The very fact that we are living in a world of free enterprise would, in itself, indicate that each person should be privileged to enjoy fishing in an area where others are permitted to do so for commercial purposes. However, since we are limiting the number of fish that we are allowing these people to catch, there may be a certain justification in permitting our government to issue licences to them.

Now, there is one other suggestion that I would add to this group respecting licences in those fields, and it is this. In the event of licensing, and in the event that the minister feels we are going to have to close the river, then I would suggest that the government should grant these licences and make them revocable on a basis of possibly ten or fifteen per year, as the case might be, and provide these fishermen with another means whereby they can earn their livelihood. One must understand the situation thoroughly. One must realize that the Pattullo bridge in this instance divides the Fraser at the city of New Westminster. About half of the gill netters work on the east side of the Pattullo bridge and the other half on the west side. What is being suggested is that the group shall move from the eastern side of the bridge, about six hundred of them, down into the western side of the bridge where there is a larger body of water. However, by not stopping these fishermen from fishing in that area west of the bridge I maintain, and so do the fishermen, that we are just transplanting the problem. We are not going to solve the problem of conservation. We are still going to have to tell these people they can only fish so many days each week.

I believe that the Department of Fisheries, and the capable minister, realizes that since the Fraser river channel is becoming one of the continent's most rapidly growing fresh water navigation centres, we should at least be prepared to stop fishing in that area at some time. I know that the fishermen in that area fully realize the necessity for cutting down on fishing licences, but they are not prepared to go along at this time with the sudden request that the fisheries shall close on September 16. I am quite aware of the fact that this thing has been growing for years. I do know that the fishermen, too, had been aware of that fact to a degree, but they had not been told at any time that this was the year so that they might have prepared themselves for it. It is for that reason they are making the request that an extension be granted this year and possibly to 1956, which would give them the chance to re-establish themselves in other occupations.

As I said earlier, some of them are not fully occupied in the fishing industry, but they supplement their income by fishing. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) knows how difficult he would find things if they gave him another 600 unemployed and said, "Here, you have to find jobs for them". It would make him quite unhappy, and I would sooner see a group of fishermen partly unhappy than see our Minister of Labour completely sad. I, therefore, request that the Minister of Fisheries and this government reconsider the announcement of the closure of the fisheries on the Fraser river after September 16 each year, and deal with the problem in the manner it has been my privilege to propose.

Mr. Speaker: Some time earlier in his speech, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) asked that certain tables be printed in Hansard, interspersed amongst his remarks. I am sorry that at the time he made his request I was conversing with another member, so in order to assure the regularity of the proceedings I should like to ask if the hon. member has the permission of hon. members?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): May we know what those tables were?

Mr. Speaker: At the time the hon. member made his request, other hon. members attempted to direct my attention to his request by saying they were agreeable to having these tables printed in Hansard. At the time I believe the hon. member explained what they were and it was the consensus of the house they should be printed in Hansard. I wanted to ensure the regularity of the proceedings at this moment, and I thank hon. members for their co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): As we reach the later stages of this budget debate, I have no desire to prolong its life unduly. I should like, however, to take the opportunity to make some comments with regard, not only to the budget itself but also to certain matters of public interest with which this or any budget necessarily has a definite connection. I think also, Mr. Speaker, I shall take just one moment to extend to my colleague and office mate the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Michaud), who apparently has been promoted to the cabinet, my congratulations upon his excellent maiden speech delivered in this chamber this afternoon.

Like many other citizens I have in the past followed with some degree of attention, through the medium of the press and the radio, the annual presentation of the budget. The presentation of this budget is, of course, the first one that has been accompanied—I will not say adorned—by my presence on the floor of this house, an effective guarantee of my keener interest. I suppose, therefore, that I may still fairly call myself, to an appreciable extent at least, a budget neophyte. The word, I think, in addition to its meaning as a novice or a tyro, may also designate a convert or new believer. I find that on the present occasion, and with reference to myself, I may safely use it in both senses. It is my firm opinion that this budget is a sound and equitable one, a budget suited to the times. In his presentation of it on April 6, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has given to the Canadian people, whom it so immediately affects, a budget statement which they have found both acceptable and, for the most part at least, reassuring.

Viewed merely as, shall we say, an extended communique from the taxation battlefront, or a recurring tally of what is required of our citizens in the way of rendering unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, the budget forms a financial document of exceeding importance. But in a broader sense, seen as a mirror of our entire national and economic life, our external relations in a troubled world and our prospects for the future, the budget and its presentation go far beyond mere finance and become a matter of vital concern to all Canadians. That, I take it, is the major reason for the wide latitude of topics traditionally allowed in this debate.

During the last few months much has been said, both within and beyond the confines of this chamber, concerning the perils, the difficulties, the problems which menace our national safety, our democratic freedom and our diversified economy. In the spate of discussion there has been, to my mind, a very real distortion of emphasis, in the economic field at least, by the opponents of this government. Marked stress has been laid upon the darker aspects of the picture, but there has been a tendency to underrate or ignore the existence of those favouring factors which can operate so powerfully as a redressing influence. In my opinion, the minister's budget speech has contributed notably to restoring a saner perspective.

It is true that in that vast and often obscure sphere of international relations, wherein lie ultimate peace or war, there cannot as yet be any high degree of optimism, nor did the minister attempt to exhibit it. Even here, of course, there are favouring factors. But for all the increase in armed strength of the west, for all the earnest if groping efforts towards attainment of lasting settlements, no responsible person can seriously argue that the shadow of a third world conflict does not still hang dark above us, an ominous and constant threat to our security and very existence. And until that shadow departs and a stable peace is assured the cost of our national defence must inevitably continue as by far the largest single classification of government expenditure. Even success in the current negotiations at Geneva can achieve only a troubled peace, permitting no relaxation of vigilance. To drowse at any time beside the bear and the dragon would be to court a rude awakening.

To all considerations of peace and war there has been imparted an urgency, as of desperation, by the recent revelations of the stupendous powers of mass destruction now available to man in the hydrogen bomb. To many the results of the Pacific tests have meant literally the end of all hope, and a descent toward either inertia or hysteria.

The minds and souls of men recoil in horror from the grim potentialities of the future. And yet here too there has been, I think understandably enough, a distortion, a confusion in popular thought, between the dangers which total war would bring and the danger of its occurring. The imminence of the latter has tended to be confused with the magnitude of the former.

But that greatest of statesmen, that rarely fallible prophet of the international scene, Sir Winston Churchill, has made a calmer appraisal. To him the hydrogen bomb has in fact lessened, rather than augmented, the likelihood of a third war of the great powers. Apart altogether from the stature of the British Prime Minister, his reasoning appeals to many, among whom I count myself. What man, or group of men, would deliberately invoke a world conflict when the price and fruits of victory have so terrible an identity with the penalties of defeat?

That is not to say that the hydrogen bomb is or ever can be a guarantee of peace. Great wars have been precipitated in the past, and may be again, by the accident of events, with scant deliberation or forethought on either side. And the hydrogen bomb may even increase the incidence of perimeter wars such as we know in Korea and Indo-China. For the communist world, shrinking, even as we do, from the consequences of a direct clash between the great powers, may well divert an increasing segment of its strength towards the fomenting of such acts of aggression as may, with little likelihood of H-bomb reprisal, sweep one by one the lands of Asia, of the Middle East, and of Africa into its pouch. That is a mounting danger, not to be effectively met or averted by any threat of the hydrogen bomb, which, in the circumstances, as our enemies could well foresee and count upon, would almost certainly never be translated into action. And yet we must be resolute and able to act against any such aggression. We know that if, by gradual encroachment elsewhere, the free west is reduced to the status of a beleaguered fortress, a larger Dien Bien Phu in a uniformly hostile world, the ultimate fall of that fortress is inevitable.

Is it not apparent then that to guard against and, if necessary, to resist and repel all or any such aggressions wherever they may occur, the democracies must maintain their armed strength at the highest level in every conventional form as the only means for effective action?

And again, even in a major conflict, one cannot entirely ignore the possibility that the horrors of the hydrogen bomb may impel a mutual abstention from its use. And finally, even if these bombs fall, many experts of war still envisage a real and vital role, both in defence and in attack, for the fighting forces of land and sea and air which have constituted our bulwarks of the immediate past.

To me, therefore, the suggestion that such existing forces, with their conventional weapons, are obsolete, their maintenance and expansion a needless and wasteful drain upon this country's economy, has no foundation in either present reality or future probability. It could be justified only by the achievement of a just, enduring, and universal peace, and that is still far from us, not yet engendered in the minds of men.

Not only this year, therefore, but indefinitely we must continue to provide for our national defence those vast sums which represent so great a part of our entire governmental revenue. No budget can be compiled, no plan laid for the expansion of the national economy or the advancement of our people, without taking into full account that formidable necessity. Certain critics of the present budget might well bear this more clearly in mind.

I turn to our economic situation concerning which, as I have said, I see an undue distortion toward gloom in the professed thinking of many opposition members in this house. As a corollary, they have inevitably accused the Minister of Finance of unwarranted optimism in his budgetary conclusions. This is not, by many, the first year in which his critics have laid that charge at his door. Thus they have been hammering at him, like woodpeckers against armour plate, for the best part of a decade. But he has confounded those critics uniformly and often —nine times, the count, is it not? And it is my prediction that the present occasion will constitute the tenth. They may, however, draw some consolation from the thought that thereafter their humiliation, that is at the hands of this particular Minister of Finance, seems likely to end.

As I have indicated, I hold the minister's outlook for our economic future to be amply justified. Indeed, there are already signs that the earlier government forecasts of an upward trend in business as the year rolled on are to prove accurate. And considering the position of Canada, the vast possibilities for development within her borders, the wealth of her natural resources, and the character of her people, I see little room to doubt that her history for many years to come, given only peace, will be one of advancement and prosperity.

That is not to say, Mr. Speaker, that our progress will be without minor, sometimes perhaps substantial, interruptions and setbacks. One must never forget that dependent as we are on foreign trade to dispose of much of what we produce we are far from being complete masters of our own commercial destiny.

I do not wish to imply by anything I have said that I am in a mood of unreflecting optimism. Indeed it would be difficult for one from the maritimes to be ever wholly optimistic concerning the economic future of those provinces, for our special economic problems we have always with us, to a greater degree, I think, than any other area of Canada.

Not long ago, Mr. Speaker, another and veteran member of this house, from a different part of the country, remarked to me that the present session had seen less talk than usual concerning maritime rights. The truth of this statement my brief experience cannot gauge. But if there has been in fact during this session less assertion of maritime rights, or aspirations, or difficulties, I can assure the house that it is not because of lack of material. So long as geography leaves us where we are—and I see no prospect of any imminent change in that regard—we shall remain a distinct regional entity with problems and difficulties uniquely our own.

This brings me to a point on which I wish to lay particular emphasis. Laissez-faire is dead. The evolution of democratic government has long been toward assuming a steadily widening responsibility for the economic welfare of nations and people. It is a process, I think, not only advantageous but inevitable. That is not to say, of course, that this or any other government is or can be a complete underwriter of prosperity. Business and industry, as in the past, must stand primarily by their own efforts. But few now question that it is an accepted function and duty of this government to foster and encourage, to every reasonable extent, those economic conditions under which business and industry may best flourish and our people correspondingly benefit.

Now, it is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that this responsibility is not discharged in its entirety if, whatever the opulence of the country as a whole, the prosperity of any one region lags unduly behind that of the rest. In such case, I hold it to be the peculiar obligation of the national government to alleviate by every reasonable exercise of its legitimate powers the effect of those handicaps, geographical or otherwise, which militate against that region's economy.

Any dream of a universal equality, or near equality, of prosperity throughout the nation must I fear remain a dream; but every region is entitled to a fair place in the economic sun, and the lessening of existing discrepancies should at all times form a prime objective of this government.

The maritime provinces, unfortunately, have almost traditionally lagged behind the rest of Canada in the economic race. Like the other parts of the country, we have made material progress in recent years, but we are still, relatively as well as absolutely, far in the rear. The grossness of existing inequalities calls for strong remedial action toward their abatement.

I am happy to say that this government is not unmindful of its obligations in this regard, and that many measures which it has inaugurated have contributed substantially to the advancement of the maritimes.

This has been true to a degree even in fields where no special regional significance is evident or intended. The great achievements of social security, old age and family allowances, unemployment insurance, and veterans benefits have no merely regional application; and yet I think that, relatively speaking, they benefit most those provinces whose people have least. So indeed it is with every federal measure involving proportional expenditures throughout the whole country.

Other federal action has been aimed directly, and with a fair degree of success, at stimulating our maritime economy. In the field of freight rates, where so many of our commercial ills originate, much has been done by way of alleviation. The system of coal subventions and the assisted movement of feed grains from west to east have all played their part and have earned for this government the trust which our people have accorded it. Yet the task remains heavy if the maritimes are to enjoy their full and rightful share of the national prosperity. It is not, I think, primarily a matter of doing now what should have been done in the past, although I shall cite one or two instances of that nature. Rather, there is a need to devise new measures or to expand existing measures in order to overcome new problems as they arise; and of newly-arisen problems the economic history of the maritimes has always shown a plenitude.

Of all the sweeping changes which have affected the economy of this country since confederation few, whatever the ultimate good, have failed to come initially as a staggering blow to the maritimes. We may go back to that vast sea shift from sail to steam in the last century which ended their golden age. We may come forward to this very hour and find the Nova Scotia coal industry, a chief prop of the economic life of the province, facing a desperate struggle for survival against the increasing competition of oil and gas from the new fields of western Canada. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the obligations of this government towards the maritimes can never be regarded as static. They go far beyond the mere continuation of existing measures which now may well prove to be inadequate. Such new action must be taken and such new measures must be devised as will prove at least sufficient to prevent any further deterioration of our maritime economy as compared with that of the rest of Canada. I am, of course, well aware that the problem is not that of the federal government alone. Each province concerned has its own responsibility—and an urgent one—to shoulder. Of my own province I may say that it faces the task with energy and determination.

But here I must point out an inherent evil in the situation. Lack of economic development and opportunity creates the need for action. The same lack inevitably limits the provincial capacity to meet the need. The financial resources of the maritime governments are slight compared with those available to the governments of the wealthier and more populous provinces where, at the same time, the problem of economic expansion virtually solves itself. Thus it is that the greater the burden, the less the provincial capacity to sustain it. In our maritime provinces we must therefore look—and I maintain that we have the right to do so—to this federal government for a correspondingly generous measure of assistance in the removal of those barriers which so greatly beset our path of economic progress. The enduring prosperity of this nation demands the prosperity of all its parts. Let none forget that we too were created the heirs of Canada.

In what forms should such assistance be devised and extended? To a lame man a crutch may be desirable or necessary, but a lasting cure of his affliction is much to be preferred. Therefore the real aim for the maritimes—certainly not always to be easily achieved—should be the permanent strengthening of their economy in all its phases, including farming, mining, lumbering, fishing and manufacturing. No other benefits within the power of this government to bestow—whether of social security or otherwise—can begin to match the benefits that would flow from the attainment of this aim. I have mentioned the advantages of social security measures to the maritimes, but I think perhaps I should also say that we certainly have no wish to be reduced to the status of a race of pensioners.

The most immediate of our problems in Nova Scotia is that of the coal industry. However, since this industry will no doubt be the subject of extended debate in connection with the dominion coal board estimates, I touch upon it at present no further than to say that the preservation of this industry is essential to the provincial economy, and that there exists a reasonable prospect that adequate governmental assistance now will enable it not only to survive but to stand again largely upon its own feet within the next decade.

Perhaps I should interpolate here that I accept as sound the view that no government can or should adopt a policy of perpetual assistance to every industry which, without that assistance, cannot continue to operate. No government can entirely repeal the law that an industry must be able to meet competition or give way to those that can. On the other hand, it has long been recognized in this country—and I think it is not seriously disputed—that a policy of governmental assistance to certain key industries on which a national or regional economy depends is often not only desirable but imperative. Every case must be judged on its individual merits. On that ground I am confident that the maritime coal industry has the strongest of claims upon this government, as will be fully demonstrated, I hope, when they are presented in this house on the fitting occasion.

As I said a few moments ago, maintaining our maritime economic life at a respectable level, in so far as this government is concerned, is not merely a matter of continuing measures which may have sufficed in the past. The inevitability of change prohibits a static policy. Let us then consider possible new measures to stimulate maritime economic activity and to prevent the occurrence of any undue unemployment. I stated earlier that this nation faces the necessity, extending into an indefinite future, of maintaining a towering level of expenditure for armed defence. Thus governmental contracts in this connection will continue to play a leading part on the industrial scene.

I think much can be said for the view that in the placing of such contracts very special consideration should be given, as a matter of national policy, to those areas which, like the maritimes, stand most in need of industrial stimulation. It might be added that such a policy would also tend to discourage the overexpansion of certain already established industries of central Canada. We have been told that such overexpansion is a major cause of the difficulties troubling some of those industries today.

Whenever the need arises to quicken industrial activity and to provide increased employment a vast program of public works is invariably suggested. Public works are an excellent thing, and I should be delighted to learn, for example, that a new post office was on the drafting board for every hamlet in my constituency. Undoubtedly a considerable amount of employment would be thereby created. Unfortunately, it would be for the most part of a temporary nature and merely a palliative. Our situation in the maritimes calls rather for more lasting remedies through a permanent development and expansion of our industrial and other economic activities.

Again, it has been pointed out that in this day of power machinery the number of men employed, even on extensive public works, is as a rule comparatively small. In this connection, however, I should like to emphasize a difference between two classes of public works. Incidentally, may I say that I am using the term "public works" in a very broad sense, and not merely as referring to projects properly coming within the scope of the department of that name so ably presided over by my fellow Nova Scotian, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). One class might be exemplified by new post offices or, indeed, by most new government buildings. This class of public work provides a certain amount of employment during its construction. Upon completion it may, and usually does, fill a long-felt need and minister to the pride and convenience of local residents. But there its contribution to the economy of a community or the surrounding areas largely ends.

On the other hand, we have that type of public work which, in addition to achieving all these results, also exerts a lasting and beneficent effect upon the level of economic activity throughout a community or a whole region. That is, to my mind, the type of public work which, when proposed, should always receive from this government the most careful and sympathetic consideration, the more so when the objective is the permanent advancement of areas such as the maritimes. Any temporary abatement of unemployment to be afforded by the actual construction—desirable though it might be in itself—would constitute only a minor factor in the whole range of implications.

An outstanding instance of this type of public work is the proposed St. Lawrence seaway development. Nova Scotia also is not without examples. The marshland reclamation now being carried on there and elsewhere is one. Its benefits to the segment of our agricultural population affected are for the generations, although I suggest—as I have suggested before—that the full and rounded completion of the project involves also a vastly expanded program of research to determine all those potential new uses to which the reclaimed lands may be most profitably put.

If I may call it a public work within my broad definition, then I may also name the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry soon to be in operation and so largely a result of the forward vision and indomitable persistence of my good friend, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Kirk). The stimulus which this ferry will give to our growing tourist trade, as well as to the general commercial life of western Nova Scotia, is incalculable.

To the people of my own immediate area, however, the Chignecto canal will remain the prototype of the class of public work I have last mentioned. We do not urge construction of the canal merely because of the employment to be created by its building, or merely because it represents an unfulfilled promise of confederation. We urge it rather because of the permanent and far-reaching uplift which we are confident it will bring to the economic life of the whole territory of the maritimes, as well as to Newfoundland and even farther afield.

The employment of a few hundred men for perhaps two or three years upon the actual construction would be indeed welcome, and nowhere more than in my own town of Amherst which stands almost upon the canal's prospective banks; but that result, that benefit, is of scant significance compared with the comprehensive and lasting advantages to our economy which the canal and its use will bring.

The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) recently gave a detailed and convincing account of these latter advantages which, indeed, anyone can substantiate by glancing at a map. The hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy) has also touched upon the topic. I have no wish to repeat or elaborate further at this time upon what they have said, but I certainly add to it my hearty concurrence. If this government seeks ways and means for the permanent strengthening of our maritime economy, here is a beckoning opportunity.

And, indeed, my constituency provides another, if less spectacular, opportunity. For many years until the last war, when its operation was discontinued, an automobile-carrying ferry, subsidized by the federal government, plied between the port of Parrsboro on the Minas basin shore of my constituency and ports of Kings county on the opposite side of the basin. By this means a water route of some fifteen or twenty miles eliminated for motor vehicle traffic an overland journey of ten times the distance along the shores of Minas basin and Cobequid bay to Truro, which stands at the head of salt water, and thence down the far shores again.

Apart altogether from the convenience to local residents, the ferry was much patronized by tourists, and today, with the vastly increased stream of tourist traffic, it would be put to correspondingly greater use and would give a very strong impetus to that trade which is to us a major source of revenue. I hope to see in the not distant future comprehensive representations made to the government for assistance in effecting a resumption of this ferry service with expanded and improved facilities. I most earnestly hope that these representations, when they are made, will be given most careful study and most sympathetic consideration.

Turning to another topic, I may say that we of the maritimes heartily approve the steps taken by the government, in conjunction with those of the provinces, to widen the scope of the vocational training program so that persons displaced from one industry may be trained for employment in others. This will certainly prove a boon in countless individual cases, and as such it deserves the highest commendation. But the advantage to a province as such is dependent chiefly upon there being within that province alternative industries capable of absorbing the retrained workers. From a maritime point of view, the placing of those workers in the industries of central Canada, however beneficial it will be for the individuals concerned, represents a loss to us. And so we return to our fundamental need, a general stimulation and expansion of all phases of our economy.

It has been predicted—I am going into the future now—that the continuing threat of war may eventually lead, as a measure of national safety, to the widespread dispersal throughout all the provinces of those manufacturing industries now so heavily concentrated in central Canada. By such an occurrence the maritimes would presumably benefit in their degree. But for the present it is no more than a possibility of the future.

Equally of the future is the suggestion that the coming application of atomic power to industrial use may accomplish somewhat the same result and bring all provincial economies more nearly to a common and equitable level. As to that, we shall see. An easier prediction, I fear, is that the misuse of the atom in war may bring all mankind to a common level, the illimitable level of the desert. For the meantime it is better to deal with present realities and for us in the maritimes to face as they are those economic problems which still beset us. With the full co-operation of this government, given to us in the future as it has been in the past, they can be overcome.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the budget debate, with all the fanfare attending it, from the beginning, and the different titles that have been given to it, and having witnessed the debonair manner in which the finance minister delivered his budget speech, I think it was a masterly job of making the best out of the sorry mess the government is in. First everything is lovely and we will be all right, but there are one or two soft spots. We will have an odd rough one here or there. The industries are doing fine, except for textiles, machinery and electrical equipment. The farmers are not doing as well as usual. In other words, we are going to have a good year if we do not run into the hard times that I see ahead and that I hope we can miss.

You could call this budget the much ado about nothing budget. At page 3724 of Hansard of April 6, 1954, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said in his budget address:

> For most of this period the United States has been in the process of re-examining its . . . policies. . .

He went on to say that the United States commission on foreign economic policy had issued its report, the Randall report, and then said that the recommendations contained in the report—

> . . . provide . . . a reasonably promising basis for action by the United States in a co-operative movement toward a sounder system of trade and payments.

I suppose this reasonably sound basis in a co-operative movement is to be found in the restrictions by way of quota that they have imposed on our rye shipments to them and the inhibitions that our cattle trade endures which I presume come under the broad and expansive application of the GATT program, that instrument of vague benefit to Canada since it has been in operation and which has therefore been extended to June 30, 1955. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) also said:

> The United States has been one of the strongest exponents of policies directed towards the reduction of trade barriers and the expansion of international trade.

So much is this so that they have contributed to the deterioration and demise of our textile industry, and they play havoc with our fruit, vegetable and flower markets in the springtime. This was further ameliorated by the Minister of Finance in these consoling words:

> . . . it was recognized that enlightened economic policies on the part of both the United States and Canada would contribute materially to the achievement of a better trade . . . system throughout the free world . . . To this end the United States administration has just placed before congress a program designed to give effect to the main recommendations of the Randall commission.

I suppose that the government is confident that these recommendations will be passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate in toto. The Minister of Finance also stated, as found on page 3724 of Hansard:

> As might be expected, this development has brought with it growing protectionist pressures in many countries, including Canada.

What could he expect? Why, all through the debate on the speech from the throne and in subsequent debates there was a constant litany from the government seats, the epitome of which was "from this, good Lord, deliver us, and give protection to relieve our local condition."

The cool merger of free traders with the protectionists on the government benches insisting that something be done about the withering condition of trade is causing an increase in unemployment in every walk of life in our economy. They pictured the difficulties of the farmer, the fisherman, the potato grower, the textile worker, the lumberman, the apple grower, the miner, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and implored that something be done to give some kind of relief from the business atrophy that has beset us since the last election when Canada's continued prosperity was promised, when the assorted aggregation of "pie-in-the-sky" boys who grace the benches opposite were masquerading as the evangels of everlasting prosperity with the proverbial pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, which has turned out to be only dross, in the form of unemployment, loss of markets, and adverse trade balances. Well, the warning signals are now flying to tell of stormy weather ahead. Whether or not it is palatable to this so-called "free trade" government, they tell that we will have to protect the home markets and industries.

The traditional policy of the Conservative party has been the development of our natural resources and their fabrication into consumer goods, as well as the protection of our labour potential, and we have always implemented this by legislation brought in by the front door; but the Liberals have always brought it in by the back door, and masquerade as free traders under a cloak of simulated protection. It is the voice of Jacob but the hand of Esau. The Minister of Finance also states:

> Our very large defence program continued to give strong support to production and personal incomes, but this element has become a sustaining rather than an expansionist force.

There is the nub of the whole situation today around which our economy is wrapped, and the levelling off process is the sequence that has stabilized our economy and kept it from disintegrating. But in its wake has followed a plethora of financial organizations that are ever ready to lend the hard-pressed citizen, who is now feeling the pinch of the government's alluring policies, needed money at high rates of interest to see them through Canada's continued prosperity. Then he gives this fillip to their flagging spirits, to encourage them:

> —while the proportion of our exports going to the United Kingdom and other commonwealth markets declined, reversing the trend, which had prevailed during 1952.
> On the other hand, there was some increase in the proportion of our imports coming from the United Kingdom.

You will notice the hedging in the last sentence of this quotation, to explain the lost wheat market.

That hackneyed phrase, "no truck or trade with the Yankees", seems to be a favourite expression of accusation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in his tirades against the Conservatives. Well, it is obvious now that, intentionally or not, there has been put into operation by the government, to our detriment, a quite opposite policy: "No truck or trade with the British", and they are enjoying with evident satisfaction that accomplishment, little realizing that they have impaired the flow of the lifeblood of our nation. He further states:

> The emergence of an import surplus on merchandise account was the main reason for the swing in Canada's balance of payments position from a current account surplus of $157 million in 1952 to a deficit of some $467 million in 1953.

Reduced to ordinary language, we had more imports than exports by some $310 million. That can be attributed to our two jacks of trade, the right and left bowers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who have trumped each other's ace—or probably we can call it a misdeal—in their handling of our wheat crop. One said sell, the other said hold, and between the two the farmers were left holding the bag.

The only satisfaction that the wheat growers have extracted out of it is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has restored to them as of December last the car order book to take a few paltry bushels per acre to the storage elevators, while the advice of the Minister of Agriculture was ignored; the double shuffle took place, and the deal lost us the British market for a difference of eight cents a bushel, and a difference of $150 million surplus to $460 million deficit, with the farmers rich in the possession of wheat they cannot sell, the farm implement industry on short rations, the shipping industry folded up, and the railways on the skids to deficit earnings. What one hell of a mess in continuing Canada's prosperity!

We on this continent are living in a paradise, with our country unscathed by the hand of war. We have a standard of living that three-quarters of the world's human population have never enjoyed, and if they have any knowledge of it, it is from the picture and story books.

For the last decade and a half, the total productivity of our economy was in demand, and that demand far exceeded our ability to supply. There were ready markets for our goods, both abroad and at home. With the cessation of the war, and our armed forces repatriated, there was a huge backlog for all kinds of durable goods to be supplied, caused by the shortage of materials necessary for our wartime economy—houses to be built—homes to be furnished—clothes to refurbish the depleted wardrobes—plus the expansion in our industry, and the need for getting the war-wracked and devastated countries back on the road to recovery.

That we have flourished and prospered was not the creation or design of this government, who could neither retard nor accelerate it. It can be attributed to the productivity of labour and management, who have been rewarded for a job well done by the government letting inflation run rampant; the bonds and securities purchased in good faith are worth but half in their purchasing value, and the purchasing power of our dollar is only fifty cents, and probably less after we have paid our taxes.

Today, with our inflated economy, which the government created, we have barriers to our entry into world markets, and this is further aggravated by the re-entry into world trade of Germany, Japan, Italy and the other war-devastated countries, and the reluctance of the Latin-American countries to deal with us, notwithstanding the glowing reports from the Minister of Trade and Commerce after his visit to them.

In Hansard of February 17, 1954, page 2189, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott), speaking in the unemployment debate, was discussing the last world-wide depression of the 1930's, and he said:

> I think there is a lot in this theory of the stars, astrology, or whatever it may be. I do not know whether the Conservatives turn up before a depression, or whether the depression turns up before the Conservatives, but you find they arrive at almost the same time, in this country.

Well, the stars in their courses may indicate that a certain condition will happen in the cycles of life. I will tell the hon. member for Vancouver South that his conclusions are at fault. It is not that the depression and Conservatives arrive together. The truth of the matter is that the Liberals, when in power, eventually get the country into such an unholy mess that the people turn to the Conservatives to extricate them from their plight, and again bring about stabilization and the consolidation of our economy. And that day is not far off.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) made reference in Hansard of April 14 to an adherence to the spirit of confederation to establish an equality of treatment in the distribution of revenues to all provinces, so that they may fulfil their constitutional obligations, and effect fiscal agreements that would avoid double taxation. To this everyone will agree.

By the terms of the British North America Act, set out in section No. 91, this parliament has exclusive authority to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. It also sets out in section No. 92 that each province has the exclusive right to raise revenue by direct taxes for provincial purposes. To this everyone is in agreement—as to the power of both bodies being able to collect by direct taxes.

The difference arises out of who will have priority in collecting, or who will carry the opprobrium of being the body making the second collection when agreement cannot be effected to collect by a single collection. Notwithstanding what has been said by the Minister of Finance, and his examples of how in some of the states in the United States they have dual taxes, there is this difference: Whether it was done by tacit agreement or understanding, the provinces were the only bodies employing direct taxation from confederation up to the year 1917, when the then finance minister, the Hon. Thomas White, under the stress and demand for more revenue to carry on world war I, introduced the first dominion income tax, and went into considerable explanation for so doing, and why they had to invade what was recognized by all as the exclusive taxing field of the provinces.

This remained the situation up to world war II, with parliament utilizing only one of the fields of direct taxes, but during the interval from confederation to world war II some provinces had intermittently used the personal income tax for revenue.

With the heavy demand during the dark days of world war II, to obtain further revenue parliament then made a proposition to the provinces to invade the fields of succession duties, corporation, transportation and amusement taxes, and the provinces, motivated by patriotism, did, by a fiscal agreement, vacate their taxing fields for the duration of the war, actually renting them to parliament, after which, unless further agreements were made, a return to the status quo would ensue.

The situation now prevailing is that the government has made separate agreements with every province except one, instead of by the original method of a dominion-provincial conference when a general agreement was amicably worked out. The government has manoeuvred itself into the position that it is reluctant to give up and return to the status quo, to which they originally agreed.

Now then, if the government did not believe that the provinces had some claim through their long tenure of occupancy from confederation, notwithstanding the government's constitutional position, why did they enter into these tax rental agreements with the provinces to vacate their taxing fields? The only conclusion we can arrive at is that they had to jockey into a position where they had possession and be in complete control, to be the first to levy taxes, and a province or provinces which did not enter into an agreement with them would have to bear the full odium of having imposed a double tax when the real offender is the government, by virtue of the facts and conditions I have outlined.

This is a matter of grave concern, not only to one province but to all provinces, and some consideration should be given to the provinces because of their vested rights in the long uninterrupted occupancy of their taxing fields.

It is unfortunate that the impact had to come upon the government from the province whence they get their greatest support. The government is now caught in the milieu of their hybrid Chauvinism. This Liberal party has been so long in office by reason of its hold on Quebec. It held Quebec by a deliberate policy of banking the fires of racial prejudice. Now these fires are bursting into flames, and severely scorching the faces of the federal Liberals.

We Conservatives live and think in the tradition of Sir John A. Macdonald. It was he who saw the vision of a united Canada—French and English—neither one of the two main racial origins seeking votes by trying to exploit its unnatural prejudices, but living and working together in mutual self-respect for the common weal of the nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, if I waited until now to take part in the present debate on the budget, it is because, faced with the confusion which seems to exist and with the complexity of the problem created by the unilateral decision of the Quebec government to collect a personal income tax—the move being based on the alleged priority of the legislature in respect to direct taxation—I felt under the obligation to listen first of all to the representations of the electors of the riding I have the honour of representing here as well as to the various arguments which would be put forward, before taking a definite stand.

It was my duty to take such an attitude because the problem has assumed new aspects and can give rise to grave consequences, in the provinces as well as in the entire country. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said here that much too bitter terms had been used since the government of my province announced that it would collect a personal income tax equal to 15 per cent, inasmuch as it was free to refuse to participate in the fiscal agreements, freely signed by the other provinces in co-operation with the Canadian government, and as certain non-political organizations have asked the latter that permission be given to deduct the provincial tax from the federal tax.

I am taking for granted and I recognize, following the statement made this afternoon by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent, that the government of the province of Quebec did not itself ask for this deductibility and that no official approach has yet been attempted by the Quebec government in order to obtain this deductibility of 15 per cent, if press conferences, that are often characterized by considerations of party politics, have not admittedly become the consecrated formula for an exchange of views between the various governments of this country. As the newspaper Le Devoir, which is not lacking in ideas, says, it would be introducing a "new look", a twentieth century look, in federal-provincial relations.

As during the time allotted to me, I intend to speak about federal-provincial relations from the point of view of fiscal authority, I hope to be pardoned if I hesitate to utter my remarks in the manner of our opponents, in whose speeches the confusion raised by their ideas is only equalled by the contradictory spirit pervading all their policy announcements, according to the time or place of their statements.

The Conservative member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) contradicted the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) when he said, on April 28, as reported at page 4211 of Hansard, that the agreements concluded between the Canadian government on the one hand, and the provincial legislatures on the other are legal, while the hon. member for Quebec West had stated emphatically, on April 27 of this year, as reported at page 4159 of Hansard, that the fiscal agreements were illegal. And then the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) told us, on behalf of the party to which he belongs, that the Conservative party recognizes and supports the principle of deductibility which was accepted following a resolution of the general convention of the Conservative party. The official financial critic of the Conservative party (Mr. Macdonnell) and his leader himself, in an accusing silence, are not even bold enough to refer to that doctrine in the present debate, leaving us under the impression that they do not support the stand taken by their senior member from Quebec.

The only spirit which now moves me is a feeling that I share with a large number of my fellow citizens. We are worried about the 300,000 Quebec taxpayers who will have to bear the burden of double taxation, and the lack of understanding which still remains in the minds of some of them who still do not understand the failure of their government to accept the 15 per cent deduction formula put forward, which would allow the Quebec government to obtain an amount lower than that which it would have received had it entered into an agreement.

I stated a moment ago that the situation resulting from the unilateral decision of the government of my province of levying a tax on personal income and then trying through subrogation, that is through the help of non-political organizations, to obtain deduction of that tax, without previous agreement to that effect, gave rise to a very complicated problem owing to the fiscal agreements binding the federal government and nine other provinces.

In my humble opinion, the solution to that problem, owing to its constitutional implications, its social and economic consequences as well as its political impact, must take all those factors into consideration. I think that a proposed agreement that would not take these various elements into consideration might well remain inoperative. I shall go even further and state that a long-term and permanent solution must also take into account the special position of the province of Quebec because of the distinctive character of the racial group that makes up its population.

I was happy the other day to hear once again the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) assert that the Liberal party was, of all political parties, the one truly Canadian and national party, the one that had best understood the position of Quebec. I am confident that the Liberal party which now presides over the destinies of the nation, will be able to find the remedy to those growing pains which have now developed between the government of my province and that of my country in the taxation field.

In speaking thus, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to shirk my responsibilities by refraining from making the remarks I proposed to make about that stalemate or, at the risk of repeating myself, about those growing pains of the Canadian nation.

I would like first of all to speak about the constitutional aspect of the matter, of its social character, and then of its economic and political implications.

In the constitutional sphere, most glaring contradictions have been expressed. It has been said that provincial legislatures had exclusive jurisdiction in the field of direct taxation, as has been asserted this afternoon by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), who later said that this right was prior to that of central government. As far as I am concerned, I share the opinion of those who believe that the rights of the Canadian government in matters of direct taxation are equal to and concurrent with the rights of the provinces and that there is no prior right, neither in favour of the central government nor in favour of a provincial government.

The British North America Act of 1867 embodied that principle under section 91 which grants the Canadian government the power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation, and under section 92 which grants the provincial legislature the power to raise money by means of direct taxation within the province for provincial purposes.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what the Canadian constitution provides, and though I am not a lawyer, I can hardly see how this text could be read as granting a prior right to either one of the two authorities. It is true that the word "exclusively" appears in the preamble of section 92, but the same word is to be found also in the preamble of section 91. On the other hand, it is not the first time the Canadian government holds powers concurrent with those of the provincial legislatures.

Many more examples could be quoted in the sphere of Canadian political activities where the jurisdiction of the central government runs parallel with the jurisdiction of the various legislatures.

Is that not, in any event, the very point which has been an issue between the federal government and the provincial governments since the early days of confederation? That point of view will be readily understood if only we remind ourselves of the thousands of dollars which the Canadian people have had to pay in legal costs while endeavouring to obtain a determination of certain rights or a clear definition of the meaning of certain sections of our Canadian constitution.

How is it that no authority has ever tried to bring before the courts this matter of concurrent and equal jurisdiction in the matter of direct taxation, since this state of affairs has existed since 1917? Along with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) I would say that that alone proves that the theory of priority rights in the matter of direct taxation is something new and would be extremely difficult to prove. I am not sure, though, that the privy council did not hand down a decision in that connection, in London, around 1936.

[Mr. Maltais.]

The hon. members of this house will no doubt recall that Manitoba citizen who challenged the right of his province to impose an income tax, under the pretext that income could not be taxed twice, namely by the federal government and the provincial government at the same time. I now refer to the judgment of the privy council in the case of Forbes v. the Attorney General, where the following may be found, at page 260:

> Both income taxes (federal and provincial) may co-exist and be enforced without conflict. The federal government taxes part of the Manitoba citizen's income, the province taxes the other part.

That judgment speaks for itself. In addition, the question of the levying of taxes and that of their distribution is intimately connected, according to the spirit and the interpretation of confederation.

Without going into the merits of subsidies, I must just the same admit that it is fair and honest to look for an interpretation of the Canadian constitution with the fathers of confederation themselves, who, in addition to giving us our constitution, also put it to the test during the few years following 1867. What was, then, the fiscal policy in 1868 and during the ensuing years?

In 1868, on the morrow of the birth of the Canadian constitution, the province of Quebec received from Ottawa, by way of subsidy, the amount of $913,412, or 59·7 per cent of the total budget of the province. In 1869, the Quebec budget was made up to the extent of 59·2 per cent of Ottawa subsidies, in 1870, of 52 per cent, in 1871 of 49 per cent, and in 1872, that is five years after the passing of the confederation act, the budget of the province of Quebec consisted of subsidies from Ottawa to the extent of 47·1 per cent.

These, Mr. Speaker, are true facts in the constitutional field that nobody is able to deny and that prove without ambiguity, that in 1954, the matter of subsidies, even if related to a power of taxation belonging to the provinces, may not be quoted in this debate as an argument contrary to the spirit of confederation. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard) tried to argue, with the help of quotations from the fathers of confederation, that the spirit of the British North America Act was contrary to the policy of subsidies resulting from fiscal agreements. He quoted Brown in support of his argument.

To paraphrase the saying of a French author, I might tell him: Give me something taken out of its context and I can succeed in having the author of the words hanged. He found that a quotation of Brown's declarations could be of use to him. I shall therefore go to that same Mr. Brown for a statement which will contradict him. I borrow a quotation from the official report of the debates preceding confederation, page 93, where Mr. Brown was dealing with the question of federal subsidies:

> We had to face the following alternative: grant to the provinces the revenue from indirect taxation, which field we wanted to leave exclusively to the central government, or allow the central authority the right to collect the money and allocate it afterwards to the various local governments to enable them to face their local needs. We chose the latter solution.

If words have any meaning, that statement of a father of confederation is absolutely different from the impression which my hon. friend from Lapointe tried to give in quoting this great Canadian.

On motion of Mr. Maltais the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow, and when the motion is carried, take the resolutions.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 4, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND NON-OPERATING UNIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour concerning the current negotiations between the non-operating railway unions and the railway companies. In view of the failure of any two members of the conciliation board to get together on what might be called a proper report, what steps does the government now propose to take to facilitate the reaching of an agreement between the parties?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the matter referred to by the hon. member is still under consideration by the parties concerned, and any comment by the minister or by any other third party would, I think, be inadvisable at this time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

IMPERIAL WAR GRAVES COMMISSION—CHARGES FOR ENTRIES IN REGISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the minister aware that relatives of Canadian war dead are being asked to pay $1.25 for a copy of the entry in the cemetery and memorial registers, giving details of their loved ones' graves? In view of this situation, I should like to ask further: Is the financial assistance to the imperial war graves commission provided by the Canadian government not sufficient to cover this expenditure?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the registers to which the hon. member refers are pamphlets, books, printed and issued by the imperial war graves commission on each of the cemeteries in which commonwealth forces are buried. These are in the form of memorial books. They contain not only the name of every commonwealth member of the forces who is buried in the cemetery but also photographs, maps, and a history of the campaigns which led to the cemeteries being built. They are not given by the imperial war graves commission but are simply sold as memorial pamphlets, somewhat as the pamphlets in the parliament buildings, giving a description of our memorial chamber, are made available to people who come to visit the memorial chamber.

The financial assistance given by the Canadian government to the imperial war graves commission is for the building of cemeteries, the setting up of headstones and the care and maintenance of those cemeteries afterwards on a pro rata basis, according to the number of graves.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO GROUNDING OF JET AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. I am sorry I did not give notice, but I doubt whether he would require it. Has action been taken to ground all Canadian jet aircraft pending a complete investigation into recent crashes?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such order having been made. There are various types of jet aircraft, and I know of no reason why all jet aircraft should be grounded. As is well known there has been difficulty outside the service in regard to one particular type of jet aircraft; but I know of no existing grounding order in the service. I will inquire further as to the position.

GRAIN

CHURCHILL—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will construction of the extension to the government elevator at Churchill, Manitoba, begin this year, and have tenders for this project been let?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to the first part of the question is yes, and to the second part the answer is that tenders have been advertised and the expiry date of those tenders is some time during the latter part of the month of May.

NATURAL GAS

REPORTED INCREASE IN IMPORTATIONS FROM UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister assure the house of his government's support for the proposal announced in this morning's press of the Union Gas Company of Canada to increase the import of American gas to southwest Ontario and improve the economics of an ultimate gas pipe line from western Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have already discussed this matter with the principals concerned including the Union Gas Company of Canada, and I have indicated that under certain conditions there would be no objection to the temporary import of that gas, with the definite understanding that the import would end when western gas is available in the area.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE—CAVE-INS ON ADJOINING STREETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works? Is the report correct that no expert in soil engineering was consulted in the drawing of the plans for the new Winnipeg post office? Will the city of Winnipeg be reimbursed for all the costs resulting from the cave-ins on the streets adjoining the area excavated for this new building?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. We obtained competent architects, the firm of Green, Blankstein and Russell, and followed their advice which, I understand, is in keeping with accepted practice in the area. Some caving has taken place, but I understand from the architects that little if any more is expected. The cost of repairing the damage will be much less than the expense of measures which would have been necessary to prevent caving. Our architects have already been in communication with the city engineering office, and where caving can be attributed to the excavation for the public building the city of Winnipeg will be reimbursed.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

INVESTIGATION INTO CRASH AT MOOSE JAW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Associate Minister of National Defence. Would the minister say if the finding of the service court of inquiry which investigated the recent crash at Moose Jaw will be made public?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): The matter is under consideration. I am not in a position to say when a statement will be made.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, May 3, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): When the debate was adjourned last night, Mr. Speaker, I was indicating the reasons why I felt justified in holding that there could not be any priority in the matter of direct taxation either for the central government or the governments of the various provinces. I then quoted sections 91 and 92 of the constitution, and I also showed the part played by subsidies in the first years of confederation.

Leaving now that aspect of the matter, I would like to revert to the social consequences of the solution to the existing problem between the government of Quebec and the government in Ottawa with respect to the fiscal agreements which were signed, or could have been concluded with regard to fiscal matters, to say that it would entail enormous difficulties from a constitutional point of view. However, if the parties concerned must live up to the constitution, it is equally important to appraise the social and economic responsibilities which constrain the Canadian government to retain for itself its main source of revenue, that is, direct taxation.

Reading through the history of confederation, from 1868 to the present day, we will not fail to realize quickly what increase there has been in the responsibilities of the federal government, both as far as the people of this country themselves are concerned and as regards international relations which have gained tremendously in importance since those days.

In 1868 the population of this country was approximately 3,700,000 whereas it now is over 15 million. In 1868 the total revenue of the federal government was $13·6 million, whereas in 1952, it rose to close to four billion dollars.

At the time of confederation we were a colony. Now we have become an adult nation which must live up to responsibilities which no government desiring to retain and respect its own national autonomy can escape.

Since 1868, the provinces which pioneered confederation have been joined by six other provinces. Together they now make up this Canadian nation of ours. Of course we have not come this long way together without stresses and strains, and great difficulties to overcome.

When paying tribute to the fathers of confederation, it is appropriate also to appreciate the wisdom of those political figures who, since 1868, have led our country within the framework of the confederative system so that today we may pride ourselves on being Canadians.

But I am digressing and I come back to the argument I wish to make, that is, that the social obligations of the Canadian government in a partly planned economy are closely connected with the use of the direct tax and the use of that field of taxation is definitely not the exclusive possession of a political party or an innovation of the present government.

In 1917 the Canadian government exercised for the first time its constitutional right to tax the income of its citizens in view of the expenditures due to our contribution to world war I. Incidentally, a Conservative minister of finance, who was a member of a union cabinet, proposed that measure himself on behalf of the government then in power.

From 1920 to 1934, the revenue from that new source of taxation hardly changed from year to year. In 1920, those direct taxes brought to the Canadian government $64·5 million, as compared with $61·3 million in 1934.

As will also be remembered a depression then so violently shook the country that several provinces were forced to approach the central government in order to cope with the unemployment crisis that broke over the whole country.

Then came the period of social security legislation when the Canadian government had to take over responsibilities in the form of financial burdens that time could only increase.

First, it was the old age pension legislation in 1927, which the province of Quebec, then under Liberal rule, refused to accept, invoking the principle of autonomy, but that was agreed upon nine years later by a Union Nationale government, as a political advantage out of which sufficient capital has been made since. Then we had legislation concerning unemployment insurance, pensions for the blind, family allowances, in a word a whole set of social measures that is absorbing about a third of the Canadian government's budget.

It is the duty of the national government to maintain a sound national economy and, while respecting the constitutional rights of the provinces, the Canadian government cannot, without running the risk of encountering serious troubles, give away its revenue sources without a previous agreement. It is now possible through our social legislation to eliminate partially the special inequalities which tend to spring up and grow under a democratic system based on private enterprise where economic conditions vary in a more or less pronounced degree between the different areas of our country.

Nobody will deny the sense of responsibility the government has shown when it introduced this legislation providing as it were for the distribution of more than a billion dollars to the Canadian population. When we think that the province of Quebec received, last year, apart from the war veterans allowances, nearly $200 million by way of social benefits, we can realize the tremendous effort put up by this government to avoid a possible unemployment crisis.

In 1953, Quebec children received 107 millions; our 70-year-old citizens, 69·9 millions; those aged 65 to 70, 39·8 millions; and our blind people 1·1 million.

These obligations assumed by the Ottawa government, approved and asked for by all Canadians, are directly connected with the power of taxation on incomes which makes it possible to carry out this social work.

If I take into account the cost of governing this country, the money needed to finance our national debt and the tremendous amount needed for national defence in the face of the communist threat, I am inclined to believe that these national obligations must be considered in the solution of the problem existing between Quebec and the federal government.

In view of the part played by direct taxation in modern public finance, the Canadian government has been forced to rely more and more on this method of taxation, to which it may rightfully resort under our constitution.

Direct taxation has been, for several years, in the hands of the central government not only an efficient means of collecting revenues but also a control lever for the administration, stabilization and guidance of our national economy.

So it is no wonder that the Canadian government has been under the obligation to depend much more upon direct taxation in the past twenty-five years than during the years which immediately followed the adoption of the confederation act.

Obviously, on account of the equal and concurrent right of the central and provincial governments to that same field of taxation, a reallocation of taxation powers between the various governments has long been wished for.

Since, unfortunately, no such formula satisfactory to all concerned has been found, we have come, for want of anything better, to a temporary compromise, that is to the system of fiscal agreements which was put into effect during the last war and which remained in force with some modifications.

These fiscal agreements aim at two things:

1. A better apportionment of national revenue between the most favoured province and the less favoured, economically speaking, with a view to enabling the latter to discharge their constitutional obligations in conformity with a principle of autonomy which any province might proudly make its own, and also of making possible a decentralization of the revenues derived from taxation.

2. The avoidance of double taxation.

In Canada nobody has yet denied that some provinces cannot levy all the revenues they need to fulfil their obligations, even though they resorted fully to the taxation fields granted them by the constitution.

Let those who may be tempted to discount the ill effects of double taxation cast a glance towards the province of Quebec.

This double taxation is today at the root of the trouble we are witnessing in the province where I was born, where I live and where I learned the language I now speak and which, by the way, I have no fear of losing. The government of the province of Quebec, which was represented by its premier at the various federal-provincial conferences at Ottawa, had the opportunity of making counter-proposals to the fiscal agreements but never made any constructive proposals regarding that fiscal policy. In fact, after showing a sincere desire to co-operate, even to the point of stating its willingness to sign an agreement, the government refused any such agreement. It would seem that it prefers to temporize rather than to act.

Before speaking of the unilateral decision of a majority of the Quebec provincial legislature to levy a direct tax affecting more than 300,000 Canadian taxpayers and before dealing with the request submitted to the Canadian government by a non-political organization, asking that the said tax be deductible, as a Quebec taxpayer I would like to say a few words about the negative stand taken by the Quebec government since 1948.

I am not denying the right of the government of my province to levy a direct tax within the province, even though this is questionable. Moreover, in the absence of any agreement, I would certainly have been in favour of the method suggested by the Montreal chamber of commerce, which asked the Quebec government to levy an income tax of 5 per cent, which would have been completely deductible and would not have cost one cent more to the Quebec taxpayers.

Evidently, the Quebec legislature had a right to levy the tax it wanted, but we were once told that autonomy was not a question of 5 per cent and that principles had no monetary value. Today, we have a 15 per cent tax, of which 5 per cent will be deductible from the federal tax; thus, the cost to Quebec taxpayers will be 10 per cent more.

These figures of 5, 10 and 15 per cent remind me, not of a 5 per cent autonomy, but, as they indicate, of a "5 and 10" autonomy.

The Quebec government refused to sign the agreements. It had a right to do so. But what is the net result? It is as follows:

In 1948, the Quebec government levied, through corporation tax and succession duties, the amount of $43,100,000; in 1949, $59,200,000; in 1950, $61,200,000; in 1951, $71,700,000; in 1952, $84,800,000; in 1953, $80,900,000; in 1954, $82,600,000. This last figure of $82,600,000 is taken from the public accounts of the province of Quebec; in other words, the government of Quebec levied during seven years, though no agreement was signed, the amount of $483,500,000. Let us see now what the Quebec government would have received, if it had signed a fiscal agreement. I include in the following amounts the rental of succession duties, since the amount produced by this tax was included in the amounts levied by the province of Quebec through its own legislation.

By virtue of these agreements, the government of Quebec would have received in 1948, $45,100,000; in 1949, $64,100,000; in 1950, $69,900,000; in 1951, $78,200,000; in 1952, $107,700,000; in 1953, $111,700,000; in 1954, $121,300,000, that is, all in all, $598 million, or a difference of $114,500,000 which the province of Quebec could have received, but which it has lost.

And that is not all. Since the other nine provinces have already signed agreements with the Canadian government for the next three years, let us see what Quebec will lose by not signing these agreements and taking into account the 15 per cent tax now in operation, let us examine what will happen if the present difficulty persists and if this problem is not solved.

Quebec will receive approximately $23 million this year from its personal income tax, but 5 per cent only of this impost will be deductible from the federal levy. It means that Quebec will receive, during the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1955, without any additional cost to its taxpayers, about $7,800,000, deductible from the federal tax, and it will cost Quebec taxpayers $15,200,000 representing the non-deductible portion; for the fiscal year 1956, Quebec will receive about $7,900,000, deductible and it will cost taxpayers $15,900,000, non-deductible. For the fiscal year of 1957, Quebec will receive about $8 million, being the deductible portion, and it will cost taxpayers $16 million non-deductible.

In brief, the government of Quebec will collect, as being deductible from personal income tax, an amount of $23,700,000 and it will cost taxpayers a further amount of $47,100,000 that the government of Quebec will collect just the same, but which will add to the burden.

If you add to that figure of $23,700,000 the amount Quebec will derive from corporation taxes and succession duties during the same period, you get a sum of $275,700,000, representing the total revenues the province of Quebec will receive from deductible direct taxation.

How much would Quebec get under the temporary agreement system over the same period? Supposing the economic position remains about the same for the next three years, we arrive at an amount of $372 million.

Making the necessary deductions, Quebec will therefore, during the next three years, lose the difference between the eventual revenue under the agreements, that is $372 million, less its own deductible taxes amounting to $275·7 million, or a net loss of $96·3 million. Of course, this figure will be partly compensated by the additional burden of $47·1 million, but I am not taking this into account, as this sum will be levied in the province of Quebec, and is not deductible.

As I said a moment ago, the province of Quebec has lost, during a period of 8 years, $114·5 million because it remained outside the agreements, and if the status quo is maintained, the province will lose an amount of $96·3 million during the next three years. Mr. Speaker, since the province of Quebec is going to lose $210 million through maintaining the present situation in respect to fiscal policy up to the time the agreements expire, I am right in saying with my colleagues from Quebec that the problem is serious and alarming.

That sum of $210 million just about equals the budgetary expenses of the province of Quebec for 1951. In other words, the Quebec government would have thus been able to devote to the education and the public health of my fellow Quebeckers twice the amount assigned to those fields in 1951 and would have been in a position to solve without difficulty the problems which confront the universities in Quebec, to say nothing of highways and colonization.

The seriousness of the situation calls for a solution and since the 15 per cent deduction asked for cannot be granted without undermining the very base of the entire fiscal agreement system now in force between nine of the provinces and the federal government, I shall look elsewhere for a compromise solution which would have the advantage of endangering in no way the existing agreements.

Since the province of Ontario when it signed an agreement did not rent its right to succession duties, would it not be possible to get Quebec, Ontario and the federal government to sign an agreement which would enable those two provinces to collect from that source larger revenues than they are receiving at present?

Such a result might follow a concession on the part of the federal government through which it would reduce the succession duty it is collecting or accept, after negotiation, relatively high rates of deduction with regard to provincial succession duties.

Owing to the fact that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are more favoured than the other eight provinces, the granting of that concession by the central government would not materially affect the agreements with the other eight provinces, because they are already drawing subsidies under the tax rental agreements.

In 1947, the largest revenues derived from the taxation rights were received by Ontario and amounted to $15,200,000; Quebec received $11,400,000, British Columbia, $3,200,000 and New Brunswick, $1 million.

Since revenues derived from that taxation field vary greatly as between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario on the one hand and the rest of the provinces, on the other, such a concession by the central government would not entice the other provinces to avail themselves of that concession.

If such an agreement enabled the province of Quebec to amend her succession duties in order to get $7 or $8 million more than she is now drawing from that source of taxation, and avoid double taxation, the present stalemate could be solved by means of another concession on the part of the Quebec government.

As a matter of fact, the government of the province of Quebec is seeking a further revenue of $23 million, the amount which the 15 per cent income tax levied upon its taxpayers is supposed to yield.

As it could already derive approximately $8 million more from its succession duties, the government of Quebec has only to amend its personal income tax so as to lower the rate to the level of 5 per cent deductible from the federal income tax in order to get another $15 million which would not cost one cent more to its taxpayers, as such a tax would be entirely deductible.

Quebec then, without renting its taxation fields, would get the $23 million which it seeks, and double taxation would be avoided.

On the other hand, there would not be any loss of revenue for the federal government, as that portion of the subsidy that Quebec would get by signing an agreement would remain in the consolidated fund of Canada in order to compensate for the loss incurred by the change made in its succession duties.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether such a proposal will be considered, but I believe that no stone should remain unturned if we really want to find a way out of this difficult situation, and I urge the provincial government of Quebec to seek with an open mind and in a spirit of co-operation a common ground for the solution of this fiscal problem.

I am voicing this appeal in all sincerity. I have noticed that at a press conference, on April 9 last, as reported by the Canadian press the next day, the premier of Quebec stated that he would not initiate new negotiations with Ottawa.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in this house yesterday that the Quebec government had given no answer following the last federal-provincial conference convened by the federal government. Such being the case, I fail to understand why the premier of Quebec does not wish to enter into new negotiations.

There is no need for new negotiations. It should be sufficient to continue those which were started at the last conference, in regard to which the Quebec government has thus far given no answer. To make things clearer I would like to quote the Prime Minister's statement as reported on page 4338 of Hansard:

> The statement agreed to after the in-camera discussions, and published at that time,— . . .

That is after the dominion-provincial conference on fiscal agreements.

> —was that each province would consider these tax rental proposals and would indicate its position at a later date. There followed a great many more negotiations between the Department of Finance and the individual provinces, and within eighteen months or so nine of the ten provinces indicated their respective positions and entered into the proposed temporary rental agreements which are to extend to March 31, 1957. The government of Quebec did not do so, however. It just abstained from having any further dealings or discussion with us about the matter in any way or form whatsoever. I saw in the Montreal Star some time ago a report that Mr. Duplessis said that he had written to me and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). He may have written to me and to the Minister of Finance, but not about any solution of the fiscal problems between the federal authorities and Quebec, unless he is referring to some correspondence we had when we were discussing the grants to universities. In one of those letters he said this: Why do you not turn over to me 5 per cent of the personal income tax? That will be more than you are offering to Quebec universities under this $7 million grant. I replied that this grant would expire on March 31. I do not remember just the date of the correspondence but it was some little time before March 31. I said: You know that under the present act we cannot make any remission of this 5 per cent of income tax to the provincial government. We could merely give it as a deduction to a taxpayer who had paid a provincial income tax to your government. The other thing is the constitutional lapsing of this vote unless Quebec's share is taken from it before March 31. Can we not find some scheme which will not prejudice your position or ours but which will not leave these Quebec institutions without their proportion of this grant which is about to lapse? For that year an arrangement was worked out whereby there was a joint commission of the federal government and the provincial government to make the allocation and to recommend a way in which the grant would be paid to the institutions in Quebec. But that had nothing to do with the general possible collision between the exercise of federal rights and the exercise of provincial rights in the field of direct taxes.

Mr. Speaker, if words have any meaning at all, and if the dominion-provincial conference of 1950 had the respect of the nine other provinces of my country, I have the right to say that Ottawa never closed the door on negotiations and that if the one-sided action of the government of my province had closed the door, the words of the Prime Minister of my country opened it yesterday.

(Text):

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this budget is conspicuous on two main grounds. The first is its failure to deal in any way with the changing situation with which Canadians are now confronted. The second is the attitude it displays not only toward the province of Quebec but towards every province of Canada. So far as this budget is concerned there apparently is no unemployment, no serious situation in the textile industry, no great problem in the electrical equipment industry, nor anything to worry those making farm machinery. In fact, the government apparently thinks there is nothing to worry about which will not be cured by the efforts of our friends in Washington. From listening to the obedient desk thumping of the supporters of the government and the bland assurances of the government itself, one would think that there were no problems of any kind to be examined. Yet it is from the official records of the government that we learn of the seriousness of the situation with which we are confronted. As we have been told more than once, 570,000 people are registered as applying for jobs. That does not include everyone who is seeking a job. There is a more important figure when we seek to understand what the buying power of our people is. According to the March figures of the dominion bureau of statistics, which are the last available, the total of unemployed and partially employed was 777,000. That is a formidable figure. That means that according to the government's own figures more than three-quarters of a million of our workers have been greatly reduced in their buying power, with consequent reduction of demand for what other workers can produce. In fact we have a higher percentage of unemployed or partially employed in Canada than in the United States, in spite of the tremendous development of resources and industrial expansion which is taking place.

We have the greatest wheat carryover in our history. We have the prospects of a better than normal crop this year. Not a word in the budget indicates any recognition of the serious position in which the farmers now find themselves with huge quantities of grain stored on their farms on which they are not able to obtain down payments. Nothing in the budget or the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) indicates any recognition of what this means to the railways, to the shipping companies and, above all, to the farmers themselves, whose difficulties are aggravated by the fact that the government gives them no lead. Not a word is there in the budget to show any real recognition of the tragic plight of the Canadian merchant marine. There is nothing to suggest that this vital part of our international service is to receive any encouragement from this government.

Our manufacturers who are wondering how they are going to increase employment, our fishermen, our producers of base metals, and the farmers who still provide the firm foundation of our whole economy, are blandly assured that there is nothing really to worry about and that anybody who is in any difficulties had better meet the situation by more efficient methods. This, Mr. Speaker, does come with particularly bad grace from a government which has refused over and over again to take the steps which are necessary to give it some sort of efficiency in its own operations. It has been said before and will bear repeating that this government refused to adopt the very methods that any business would adopt if it hoped to remain solvent. Yet this government tells businesses that are finding difficulty in maintaining employment today that the way to solve their problem is to be more efficient, and certainly not to follow the government.

There is not a single member of this house who does not know where millions are being wasted by the government. There is not a member of this house who does not know of duplication of services or, to be more accurate, of multiplication of services. Merely as a symptom, and not in any way as a measure of the disease, it is only necessary to examine the number of economists, statisticians and publicity agents that this government needs to proclaim its virtues.

Over and over again we have introduced a motion asking for the setting up of a body of inquiry similar to the Hoover commission in the United States. As a result of that commission in the United States, according to the statements that have been made, $7 billion has already been saved and they expect to save another $5 billion. On a proportionate basis that would mean a saving of nearly $700 million here and the hope of still more.

I recognize that it is not possible to say in exact figures what savings a similar inquiry could assure here. However, I do suggest that it is not sensible for anyone to suggest that considerable savings cannot be made having regard to the manner in which our government has operated in so many ways along lines similar to those followed in the United States. We have heard figures placed before us of substantial savings that could be made. After all, those relate to some subject that is before us with the figures attached to that item by the government. What I am emphasizing is that there is a broader basis of saving, the kind of saving that every big business undertakes periodically if it has any hope of maintaining its sound economic position. Whatever the figure would be it would certainly run into hundreds of millions of dollars. Without any serious examination of the proposition and with nothing but an arrogant denial that anything can be improved, the government has simply asked its supporters to vote down this motion time and time again.

Yet this is the government which now tells the people of Canada that their answer to the problem they face is to be more efficient in their production and in their daily work. When the government prescribes this cure, well might we remind them of the adage, "Physician, heal thyself". This inefficiency of government, and the firm refusal of the government to deal with it in any practical way, is related to the second important aspect of the budget. As the government has continued to centralize power, the checks and balances provided by the federal system have been more and more weakened and the opportunity to restrain extravagance and waste has become less and less. It is for that, as well as for constitutional reasons, that we should examine the attitude of the government toward the provinces and the municipalities. I say that in the firm belief that the closer we bring the supervision of public expenditure to the people themselves at the provincial and municipal levels, the more effective the supervision of the spending is going to be.

In many ways this subject is the most important part of the budget speech. The Minister of Finance regarded it as sufficiently important to devote a very considerable part of his speech to an explanation of the negative attitude adopted by the government. The refusal to consider the proposal for tax deductions in respect of the personal income taxes levied in the province of Quebec is important not only in its effect upon the income taxpayers of the province of Quebec but upon the people of every province because of the attitude it discloses towards the earlier undertakings of this government. Four weeks ago today I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to invite the premiers of the provinces to attend a conference to discuss our acute tax problems. At no time did I suggest, as was indicated yesterday, that the Prime Minister of Canada invite the premiers to come together to assist him to solve the particular problem with the province of Quebec. That, after all, would have been an affront to the government of Quebec, and it certainly would have placed upon the premiers of other provinces a responsibility that is not theirs.

I urged the Prime Minister to call a conference because the situation arising in relation to the province of Quebec is merely a symptom of the general problem. Yesterday the Prime Minister gave his answer. It was a most unhappy speech in every way. It was unhappy in content, unhappy in presentation and unhappy in its consequences.

Mr. Abbott: A very good speech.

Mr. Drew: In effect it was a simple and emphatic statement that until the province of Quebec submits to terms imposed by this government there will be no conference, although every province has been asking for a conference for a long time.

There were some curious omissions from the statement of the Prime Minister. He quoted with satisfaction and at considerable length the statement of the premier of Ontario at Quebec in September, 1950—

Mr. Abbott: At Ottawa.

Mr. Drew: At Ottawa in 1950—some considerable time before Ontario had signed an agreement, but he failed to make any reference to the statement of the premier of Ontario at the time the agreement was signed. While that may not have been the intention of the Prime Minister, the effect of his quotation yesterday and his speech generally was to leave the impression that Ontario is satisfied with the present situation. For that reason let me quote from what the premier of Ontario said at the time the agreement was signed. This was the text that accompanied the announcement of that agreement.

Mr. Abbott: I think it was 1952.

Mr. Drew: Yes, 1952.

The signing of this agreement will not solve Ontario's tax problems. It is, at best, a stop-gap, pending the working out of a more satisfactory distribution of tax and revenue sources. Nor does the agreement provide a solution to the municipal problem which is, in turn, dependent on a shift of taxes and revenues from the federal government to the provinces and from the provinces to the municipalities.

We have urged the federal government to begin discussions with the provinces now with a view to obtaining these objectives. The present tax system is outmoded. The rapid growth of industry and population in Ontario has created enormous demands for provincial and municipal public services in the form of new hospitals, schools, highways, sewers, water-works and projects for conservation and pollution control. But in the face of this expansion, the tax structure has remained immobile and out of balance with the requirements of the provinces and municipalities.

Our object should be to achieve a tax structure that is favourable to industrial expansion and gives full play to the willingness and power of the people to work and save. At the same time it should be clear, equitable and in balance with the need of each level of government. We must aim not only at social justice in taxation, but also at devising a system which best assures that economy and efficiency in government services will be encouraged.

At the dominion-provincial conference of 1945-46, an economic committee, consisting of technical advisers of the federal and provincial governments, was established and accepted as permanent machinery by all the governments to serve as a fact-finding body on taxes and other fiscal matters. This economic committee held meetings in December, 1945, and again in January, 1946, but its work was not continued.

We urge the federal government to re-constitute this economic committee. The committee should then be directed to study the Canadian tax structure, including the distribution of taxes and revenues and the allocation of functions among governments, and to report on the fiscal measures which will best serve to promote good government at all levels.

I would point out that at the very time the government of Ontario entered into this tax agreement, it pointed out the agreement was nothing but a stopgap. The premier of Ontario made it quite clear that this was not something he expected to stand until some time nearer the approach of the time to reconsider this agreement. He said, and I repeat words that I have already quoted:

We have urged the federal government to begin discussions with the provinces now with a view to obtaining these objectives.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this statement is not open to the interpretation that the government of Ontario, any more than any other provincial government, expects to wait until the maturity of the present agreement or until all provinces have similar agreements to examine the situation. It will be seen that the premier of Ontario asked that the economic committee reconvene when he made this statement in 1952. The purpose of this economic committee was to provide the essential statistical information upon which to base arrangements between the governments. As evidence that the position of the Ontario government has changed in no way on this subject, the request for the convening of the economic committee was repeated by the premier of Ontario in his budget speech in March of this year. This was brought to the attention of the federal government. I have no doubt, in fact, that they had already seen it. On March 22, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was asked if the government had made any decision concerning the proposals by the premier of Ontario that the economic committee be reconvened. The minister's reply, as reported at page 3195 of Hansard for that date, was certainly illuminating.

Mr. Abbott: As usual.

Mr. Drew: He said:

Speaking for myself, I have not been able as yet to give any consideration to that suggestion.

As the Minister of Finance says, it was as illuminating as usual.

Having received no satisfaction from the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who had asked the first question, then asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on March 26 if the government had made any decision in regard to this proposal. The Prime Minister replied, and these are his words, as reported at page 3364 of Hansard for that date:

Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been discussed in council and, of course, no decision has been arrived at.

There the matter stands. Nearly two months have passed since the proposal was made, but there is still no answer. Evidently the decision has not yet been made or has been made against the proposal. The Prime Minister would lead us to believe that the decision has been not to call a conference because he says he sees no reason for bringing the representatives of the provinces together. In his speech yesterday the tone of the Prime Minister was conciliatory in every way, and so were his words. According to the Prime Minister the door is open. The question arises, open to what?

Can there be any doubt in the mind of anyone who has listened to the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that the door is open only if the government of Quebec is prepared to accept some arrangement similar to the temporary agreements with the other provinces? The speech of the Prime Minister yesterday, taken as a whole, is not susceptible to any other interpretation. The Prime Minister asked the government of Quebec to make a proposal. Now, whether the proposal is agreeable to the government of Canada or not, the government of Quebec has made a proposal. We have all read about it for some time, and we have heard it discussed in this house. It was discussed by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech.

The government of Quebec proposes that the 15 per cent personal income tax levied by that government be deductible for federal tax purposes so that there will be no duplication of taxes. Whether this proposal is acceptable to the Prime Minister or whether it is approved by other hon. members in this house, there is no doubt of the fact that there is a definite and understandable proposal which has been refused. It is that situation with which we are now confronted. I submit it is our duty to examine this. We must examine it. The Minister of Finance took a great deal of time to explain why they were refusing this proposal. It is the duty, therefore, of every one of us to consider just what this proposal means; what the effect would have been if it had been accepted, to see if we can find any reason for the attitude of the government under present circumstances.

I have sought to emphasize my own belief that this is part of a common problem affecting every province and arising out of the wartime tax agreements of 1942. It is not something peculiar to Canada alone. The same problem does affect the governments of Australia and does affect other federal states as well. At the time the provinces of Canada gave up their rights in the fields of direct taxation allotted to them by the British North America Act, the government of Canada solemnly undertook to restore the position of the provinces in these tax fields after the termination of hostilities. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that this undertaking was not something put forward by the government of Canada on its own initiative. It was something that was insisted upon by the provinces that at that time recognized the possibility that at the time the agreements ended there might not be a return of those tax rights.

As the Prime Minister recalled, I was present here in Ottawa during some of those discussions. As a matter of fact, I renewed those discussions when I became premier of Ontario in 1943. I know what the reasons were, and I know that it was on the prompting of the provincial governments that certain undertakings were given that were intended to be respected after hostilities had ceased. Having said that, may I say without any reservation that the provinces which entered into those agreements did so in the belief that they were playing their part in a common effort to give to Canada the opportunity to meet the great dangers with which we were then confronted in the very gravest days of the last war. After the war was over requests were made that these agreements be carried out. In fact, before the final stages of the war with Japan we were called together in conference here in Ottawa to consider proposals put forward by the Canadian government. In fact, it was on the very day that the first atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima that we met here in Ottawa to discuss ways and means by which those undertakings could be carried out. That is now nearly nine years ago. The provinces are still waiting for the government to take the initiative, which must be the initiative of the government of Canada, to find a solution to this financial and constitutional problem, which was the result of the combined effort when all the governments met during the years of war to meet the dangers that then confronted the whole of Canada.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that examining the discussions that took place, examining the agreements that were signed in 1942, examining the statute which approved those agreements and examining all the discussions that have taken place since that time, it is the duty of the government of Canada to find the way to honour that pledge.

Again, let me repeat that this is not an issue between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec alone. This is an issue affecting the whole federal system. It was very simply and fairly stated by the late Angus L. Macdonald in a speech to the Dalhousie law school two years ago in these words:

> A fundamental question now arises. It is this: Do we wish to continue as a federal state?

I quote his words because the premier of Nova Scotia at that time was a great student of constitutional law. He had also been closely associated with this problem from its very beginning. That same question is being posed today in Australia. The Prime Minister of Australia said last year that the federal system there will—and I quote his words—"break down hopelessly", unless the authority of the state is restored. I merely quote this to indicate that there are others who have this problem, and that there are others who share the same opinion.

The Prime Minister of Canada said yesterday: What good would come of inviting the premiers of all the provinces to a conference? First, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that it would be fulfilling the duty of the government of Canada to the provinces. Second, is the fact that it would be starting to work out arrangements by which its pledge could be fulfilled. Third would be the fact that all provinces could discuss this subject with knowledge of the difficulties which will arise if a clear and workable plan is not formulated before the termination of the present temporary agreements.

May I quote one of the most highly respected financial papers in the world in regard to this situation? The London Economist, discussing the agreements signed in Australia in 1942, which followed very much the same pattern as those in Canada, had this to say last year:

> No other single act in the history of Australian federalism has done more to strengthen and consolidate the centralization of power in Canberra than the adoption of uniform taxation in 1942.

It was in relation to this statement of the Economist that the late Angus L. Macdonald said this:

> If that comment be accurate for Australia, can a like view be taken of the existing federal-provincial agreements in Canada? That is a question to which I should hope all Canadians, and particularly lawyers, should give serious and enlightened consideration.

It is with these warnings and statements of this kind before us that I do urge the Prime Minister and every hon. member to examine this problem with the utmost care and to recognize that what has happened in the case of the province of Quebec is merely an indication of what can happen on a much larger scale, unless the Prime Minister comes to grips with this subject without further delay by inviting all the premiers to a conference.

There is another aspect to this question of a general conference which I should mention in passing. As was recited in the statute approving the agreements of 1942, it was the municipalities as well as the provincial governments which gave up taxing rights. At all times the municipalities have been as greatly concerned with some proper reallocation and definition of taxing power as have the provincial governments. All over Canada today municipal councils are emphasizing the serious situation with which they are confronted. Denied other taxing fields, the increasing local burdens place heavier and heavier taxes upon the homes and real estate generally. If there were no other reason for a general conference at this time this in itself would constitute an urgent and compelling reason why the Prime Minister of Canada should invite the provincial premiers, along with representatives of the municipal councils, to examine this subject without further delay.

If only to emphasize my point, may I recall the statement made by the minister responsible that civil defence organization is more important than ever before because of the threat of the hydrogen bomb. That was what he said only a little over a week ago. If that is so, and in this case I do not think his statement will be seriously challenged by anyone, then there are added urgent reasons why the plight of the municipalities be examined and a new method found for raising the revenue required by the municipalities as well as in the larger legislative areas.

Now, let me examine the request of the province of Quebec, the proposal of the province of Quebec, that the provincial income tax amounting to 15 per cent of the federal income tax should be deducted. Great exception has been taken to the levy of the 15 per cent provincial income tax. At what point, Mr. Speaker, did 15 per cent become such an impossible figure? The Prime Minister admits that the burdens on the provincial and municipal authorities have increased proportionately with those of the government of Canada. It seems strange that the government of Canada should be so worried about 15 per cent, when it not only approved of an earlier levy of 15 per cent by the province of Quebec, but actually collected that amount for them under a single tax form, with a single cheque payable to the federal treasury and signed by the taxpayer. That system worked well for several years up to the time of the tax agreements in 1942. This government then accepted that percentage as satisfactory and collected the provincial as well as the federal tax under a system which not only worked satisfactorily between the government of Quebec and the government of Canada, but worked equally satisfactorily between the government of Ontario and the government of Canada.

Mr. Abbott: But there was no deduction, of course.

Mr. Drew: I will deal with that. It worked equally satisfactorily with taxes collected from Manitoba and taxes collected from Prince Edward Island. At that time well over 70 per cent of the taxpayers of Canada were paying their taxes under that satisfactory arrangement. And the fact is that, in the case of Ontario, there was no duplication of taxation. At that time the dominion government had not, of course, all the taxes gathered together the way they have today. They were only collecting 39 per cent of the total tax burden. The provincial and municipal governments had a wide field of taxation open to them. Therefore the Ontario government deducted the taxes payable to the federal government from all the taxpayers in Ontario, and avoided duplication. And at the time the 1942 agreements were signed all the governments were discussing the possibility of extending similar arrangements to avoid duplication.

This is not the first time it has been tried. And when it worked so well in the years up to 1942, I would recall the promises to restore the provinces to their position at the time the agreements were signed. And their position at the time the agreements were signed was a position which included this method of collection—a method of collection which has been asked for by the premier of Ontario as well as the premiers of other provinces.

I submit that this government is in honour bound to adopt that method, if it lives up to its undertaking made in 1942 to restore the provinces to their position at that time.

Mr. Lesage: It was only 4 per cent in Quebec in 1942.

Mr. Drew: At what point did this method become so unacceptable? The fact is that it became unacceptable at the time this government started on a definite plan of the centralization of taxation in Canada to get as much power here in Ottawa as possible. This has been no accident. It has been a steady and deliberate plan to bring under the control of this government as much of the total tax moneys of Canada as possible.

Then we come to the question as to whether the 15 per cent should be deducted. Well, it is not for me, and I submit it is not for the government of Canada, to say whether a provincial government is levying the correct amount, as long as the amount it is levying is within its rights, and for the purpose of carrying out its duties under our constitution.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: So long as it complies with those requisitions it has a right to do so. And I am glad to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) saying "hear, hear." I would hope that we might see some evidence of complying with that principle. Any talk of a province occupying the whole field is really not worthy of consideration.

The fact is that the provinces are very susceptible to the attitude of the people toward them. The people are much closer to their provincial governments than they are to this government at Ottawa. The provincial governments have not the publicity agents, either, to obscure the realities by the methods that have been employed so successfully by the government. The fact is that the provincial governments will undoubtedly find that voters in any province, if they can, will deal with the situation to meet what is legitimately required for their own purposes.

[Mr. Drew.]

Now, let us examine the question of deductibility. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicates that he does not question the right of the government of Quebec to levy its income tax. But he does challenge in the strongest terms the proposition that there is any prior claim to the field of direct taxation. I cannot recall that it has been asserted at any time that there is a legal priority on the part of either government. We all know that through somewhat loosely-worded provisions of the British North America Act the federal government was given particular power to tax in any field. The provincial governments were given the right to tax only in the field of direct taxation. That produces one simple result: If the provinces are to have any real authority, then that authority must be interpreted in their ability to tax. Therefore the provinces, having the direct tax only as a source of revenue for the carrying out of their responsibilities, surely must be assured of an adequate area of taxation within that field.

As premier of Ontario, this is what I had to say on the subject on August 6, 1945—and I repeat that statement now as a statement which indicates the position we took at that time, and it was the same position that was put forward by other provinces. I said:

> While it might be legally possible for the dominion government to extend direct taxation to such a point that they could completely blanket the only field of taxation open to the provincial governments, it need not be argued that such a result was never intended and that the very existence of the provincial legislatures and their governments under the British North America Act carries with it the implicit understanding that the dominion government will leave the field of direct taxation open to the provinces to such an extent as will make it possible for them to fulfil their obligations to the people.

Mr. Speaker, that puts forward a position that was not seriously challenged at that time. The fact is that the government of Canada has recognized a priority, and it has itself established the principle of deductibility. Why argue about deductibility as though it was something that had not already been accepted by this government? The question is only as to amount, only as to percentage. This government has already provided for 5 per cent in the case of personal income tax, and it has dealt with the subject also in relation to corporation income tax. Deductibility as such, therefore, is not in question; it is the amount.

If we recognize the fundamental principles of our federal system, it is the right of the government of Canada to say to any province: We accept the proposition that you can levy a provincial personal income tax. We recognize that it should be deductible. But we think it is our duty to tell you that it must not be over five per cent.

Mr. Speaker, the acceptance of that proposition would mean the end of the federal system. The acceptance of that proposition would mean that no provincial government could carry on its duty, except with the consent and permission of the federal government. No matter what the name might be, the provincial governments would be nothing more than subservient commissions carrying out the orders of this government. They would be rubber stamps for Ottawa. And whenever they needed more money they would have to come, cap in hand, as the premier of Quebec has been invited to do, through that door that is opened for such a clearly defined purpose.

Surely that was not the spirit or the intent of our federal system. Then, again, let us recall that this government itself gives the strongest arguments in support of the proposal which has been made by the province of Quebec.

This government for some time permitted five per cent deduction in the case of corporation income tax. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec have levied a seven per cent tax. They were two per cent above the provincial taxes, and the five per cent was deductible as in the case of personal income tax.

Last year the government introduced an amendment extending the exemption from five to seven per cent, and for what reason? They extended it because that was the figure of the provincial levy. This was what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said on March 10, 1953, as reported at page 2783 of Hansard:

> This amendment is being recommended in conjunction with the proposal which I announced in my budget speech of increasing the credit for corporation income tax from five per cent to seven per cent in accordance with the principle that nothing in federal legislation shall in any way discriminate against a province which does not enter into a tax rental agreement.

That was a principle clearly asserted in relation to corporation tax which at that time had been set at a figure above the figure for which the federal government had provided deduction. Therefore, for the reasons explained by the Minister of Finance, the deduction was increased to meet the amount imposed by the provincial government. There is no other way by which it could have been arrived at, and the fact is that the only question is one of amount. The only reason that this government will not meet the request for a deduction up to 15 per cent is that five per cent is, so they say, what the province can have in the case of corporation tax. But it is apparently not for the province to say what they should levy in the field of their own taxation.

If it was proper for the government to extend the deductibility to the point at which the provincial governments had levied corporation income tax, then why is it not equally proper to extend the amount of deductibility in the case of personal income tax?

Mr. Abbott: I did not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, because I know he wants to be accurate; but the seven per cent was raised from five per cent after the negotiation of the 1952 agreement. That is the figure provided in the agreement which the provinces may impose.

Mr. Drew: Yes; that was the figure provided in the agreement which the provinces may impose for the very simple reason that this government was meeting the levy that was imposed by the government of Ontario and it was made at the suggestion of the provinces.

Mr. Abbott: At the suggestion of the provinces, certainly.

Mr. Drew: It was suggested by the premier because the provinces were levying seven per cent and that province as well as the province of Quebec arrived at the figure of seven per cent for the reasons which the Minister of Finance has now indicated. The Minister of Finance has now made it quite clear that there was no other arithmetic foundation for arriving at that figure.

Mr. Abbott: At that time it was a matter of negotiation between all the provinces and that was the figure arrived at.

Mr. Drew: It was a matter of negotiation and I hope there will still be some consideration given to this subject, because I am going to suggest that the same method of negotiation be used in relation to personal income tax as was adopted in the negotiations which took place in regard to corporation income tax.

The government has established the principle of deductibility. It accepted 15 per cent as a perfectly proper percentage on an earlier occasion. Let us therefore examine what the results would be if we followed the same methods of negotiation as were followed in 1952.

If this arrangement were carried out, the government of Quebec would receive some $25 million less from this source than it would receive if it entered into an agreement similar to that which the other provinces have signed. The situation therefore is a simple one. The situation is that the proposal put forward by the government of Quebec is one which will cost the Canadian taxpayers generally $25 million less than would be paid if Quebec entered into an agreement at this time, similar to that which this government is so anxious to have them sign.

Since the government of Quebec is prepared to accept $25 million less, and the federal treasury saves that amount, what explanation can there be for the suggestion that any province would be prejudiced by an arrangement of this nature? Yesterday the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 4339 of Hansard:

> No one, I hope, would suggest, in order to give Quebec taxpayers more generous deductions than those now provided for in our income tax law, that we should either increase the tax rental payments to the other provinces or agree that they too may impose their own taxes and get for their taxpayers, at the very substantially increased expense of the federal treasury, somewhat more generous deductions. The federal treasury just could not stand either of those courses.

I cannot believe, Mr. Speaker, that those were the words the Prime Minister intended to use. It is difficult to understand why they were used. The federal treasury would be paying out $25 million less than they have indicated they are anxious to pay to the province of Quebec. There would not be one cent more paid to any other province. There would be a net saving to the taxpayers of Canada of $25 million which, to be perfectly clear about it, would be at the expense of the income tax payers in the province of Quebec. We cannot complain about that, however, because that is what the government of Quebec has suggested. The situation is that not one cent would be added to the amount that this government would collect from the other provinces. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that this government really is not ready to have Quebec sign an agreement? I do not believe it. On the contrary, I was under the impression they were anxious to have Quebec sign an agreement. If that is so, then they are prepared to pay Quebec $25 million more without adding a cent to the taxes which would be collectable elsewhere, or change the amount payable by the other provinces.

Mr. Lesage: What would be the effect of the 15 per cent deduction in Ontario?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the points I am making are, I am sure, perfectly clear to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lesage: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Drew: The question that is being asked is as unreal as the statement by the Prime Minister which I have just quoted. Every provincial government has fixed its taxes for this year and the hon. member who has just interrupted should know that. If he does not know that, he should, because they were fixed some considerable time ago, and at the time they were fixing it the premier of Ontario asked the government of Canada to reconvene the economic committee and we are still waiting for this government to decide what it is going to do in regard to that proposition.

Mr. Abbott: You have still failed to answer the question.

Mr. Drew: I have not failed to answer the question. I have made it perfectly clear that there would be no change this year in the amount that would be collected in Ontario or any other province, not a cent. There cannot be, for the taxes have already been levied and anyone who is aware of taxing methods must know that and would not raise that question.

But, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a solution to this apparent impasse. It is one which would detrimentally affect no provincial agreements. It is one which would detrimentally affect no taxpayer in any part of Canada. I suggest and most earnestly urge that the Prime Minister agree to this deduction. The Minister of Finance indicated this afternoon a method by which this can be dealt with. He indicated that when this government very properly extended the deduction in the case of corporation income tax by the amount levied by the provinces it was done in a friendly co-operative spirit. Now then, let the same method be adopted in regard to personal income tax. Let it be done for this year. Let the Prime Minister at the same time call the premiers together to a conference here and start discussing the vitally important problem—not of the single tax payments in any province but the broad problem—of the reallocation of taxes in every province of Canada for the benefit of the provinces and of the municipalities. That would be a solution that would deal with the situation this year. If this government is ready to send its representatives all over the world to meet other governments in the hope of finding solutions of problems, surely it should be prepared to display the same spirit here in Canada. Surely it does not think that a solution of this difficulty—and I am talking about a solution with all the provinces—is more difficult than is the solution of those problems which arise with the persons that Canadian representatives are now meeting at Geneva.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has it within his power to display a spirit which would be extremely helpful in ending comments of a kind that are not conducive to the strengthening of unity within this country. The Prime Minister alone can call this conference together. I assume that we shall soon be voting on the budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, those "hear, hears" show a greater measure of interest in the budget than most of the hon. members opposite have displayed at any time since it was first announced.

Mr. Lesage: What about the "hear, hears" from your own side?

Mr. Sinclair: We have been bored to tears for the last hour.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the solution to this problem is one which need not place before us the necessity for deciding the advantages of one procedure or another. The facts are there. Whether it is the best proposal or not, the proposal before this government is one which will save the taxpayers of Canada $25 million they would otherwise pay if the government of Quebec signed the agreement which this government has sought to have them sign. When the vote on this budget takes place, it is perfectly true that it is not a vote on an ordinary budget. The Prime Minister made that fact clear yesterday. He said that it is not customary for the Prime Minister to enter this debate. That has, in any event, been true in recent years in this house. There are very great differences. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made that fact clear by the amount of time he devoted to this particular problem which I have been discussing.

Mr. Abbott: Not as much as the Leader of the Opposition has taken today.

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance had an extremely poor case. The Minister of Finance took sufficiently long to present the dismal picture he put before this house that he should object to no reasonable time that is now taken to present the real facts of the case.

Mr. Sinclair: What a man!

Mr. Abbott: The Leader of the Opposition has a poorer case today.

Mr. Drew: Even his assistant did not understand it, as was indicated just a few minutes ago. Mr. Speaker, those who vote for this budget will, by their vote, express approval of the refusal by this government to consider the proposal that is before them from the government of Quebec. That fact is perfectly clear. Those who vote in support of this budget will cast their vote in support of the proposition that there is to be no conference of the governments of Canada as was promised and as has been asked for by most of the provinces of Canada, if not all. Those who vote for this budget, quite apart from any of the figures involved, will also be voting in support of the proposition that nothing now be done to attempt some method of meeting the urgent needs of the municipalities whose tasks are increasingly heavy at this time and who need consideration as much as do any government authorities in Canada. Do not let any member of this house try to argue that the vote is only on the figures. The vote is on the figures and the meaning of the statement presented to this house by the Minister of Finance and which the Prime Minister yesterday said met with his complete approval and that of the government. That is what the members of this house are voting on.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Drew: I hear the Minister of Finance say "That is right". I hope hon. members will all recognize the fact that the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government, indicates that his belief is that these are the things which members of this house are voting on if they support this budget.

Mr. Lesage: It is a vote of confidence.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I believe the proposal that has been put forward offers a solution which still should be considered even at this late stage in the debate. What is there that separates this government and the government of Quebec so far as anything that has appeared before this house is concerned? What separates them is a costly conflict over the way in which the government of Quebec is going to raise revenues which will be $25 million less than they would be entitled to collect from the very same source if they entered into the agreement proposed by the government itself. That is a costly conflict, a meaningless conflict and one that members of this house should not wish to see take place when such an easy solution presents itself, with the certainty that, before taxes are levied next year by this government or by any provincial government in Canada, they can solve this problem by meeting and dealing with it in the way that governments in Canada have dealt with this subject on earlier occasions.

I believe that the very fact that such a proposal were made would carry with it the suggestion of co-operation and of a friendly spirit which, if it is important in the international field, is far more important right here in Canada where the strength of our country starts to be built. I believe that it will provide a solution which is acceptable right across Canada. No other part of Canada loses anything. No other part of Canada is denied the chance to meet and to discuss the way in which these problems would be solved. Every government in Canada would have the chance to begin to lay the foundation now for those broader arrangements or those wider adjustments that were clearly promised in 1942 when the provincial governments gave up their main taxing rights. The test of harmony and good will to which the Prime Minister referred yesterday lies now with the federal government. Again I urge the Prime Minister to say that this proposal will be accepted and, at the same time, that he will call a conference. I believe that this display of harmony and good will would be in keeping with the grave times in which we now live.

Mr. W. M. Buchanan (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the fact that the house is anxious to dispose of the budget debate but, as a new member who has not taken up any of the time of the house during this, my first session of parliament, I feel that I should make a few remarks at this time because I represent a constituency which is both rural and industrial. The budget is a document that has considerable influence on the year ahead for both farmers and industrial workers. Before speaking briefly on the budget, there are a few matters I should like to discuss which are of particular interest to the people of my consituency. I want to make these observations because in my riding, where we have some unemployment, I think that certain measures that are of interest both to the provincial and the federal governments will be of some help in relieving unemployment. For example, at the present time the federal and the provincial governments are making a forest survey in connection with the pulp industry. Half the cost of the survey is being met by the federal government. The result of the survey may mean more development in the pulp and paper industry which of course would help to relieve unemployment.

The second point that I should like to bring to the attention of the house is the fact that work will be undertaken in Cape Breton this summer on the trans-Canada highway. I understand that as part of this work a bridge will be built across the Bras d'Or lake which will relieve the congestion caused by the present long wait for ferries. I might also mention that we have one of the finest national parks in the Dominion of Canada at Ingonish. It is a part of the famous Cabot trail and is a great attraction for tourists, who come from all parts of North America and spend their vacations at beautiful Keltic lodge.

We also have one of the finest harbours on the Atlantic seaboard. The federal government built a new terminal at North Sydney at considerable cost. There are a large number of men employed as stevedores and in similar work at North Sydney which is the point of embarkation for Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. Within a short time we expect a new ferry, now under construction, to be put into operation between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. This ferry is badly needed because imports and exports over this route have increased considerably since Newfoundland joined confederation. I am pleased to say that the people of my constituency appreciate very much the federal government's action in making the ferry route to Newfoundland part of the Canadian National Railways system.

The port of North Sydney also enjoys a large trade with the Portuguese fishing fleet, and the purchases they make in the town of North Sydney are very important from the standpoint of revenue. We look forward to an increasing and expanding trade with the Portuguese fishermen, but I would remind the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) that some dredging is necessary at several docks to permit continued and uninterrupted service for these foreign fishing boats. I am reasonably sure that the minister will see that this necessary work is undertaken.

The budget is a very important statement. It is an account of the stewardship of the government for the past year and a forecast of the social and economic picture for the year that lies ahead. The budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on April 6 did not make any great changes. There is a great deal of argument that many things might have been done, but in my opinion economic conditions in Canada and throughout the world would seem to justify the stand taken by the government, namely, to determine if the economic factors outside our own country which influence trade and mean so much to us in the field of employment will bring about the changes necessary to stimulate our whole economy.

In order to solve unemployment not only government action is required but also the understanding co-operation of labour, management and government. In the circumstances which now confront the country it would appear to me that the only way to increase our purchasing power and to stimulate consumer buying, which would assist in relieving the unemployment problem, would be for the government to give immediate reconsideration to the extending of unemployment insurance benefits and to the increasing of social security payments. This line of action, I think, is realistic and completely the reverse of recommendations made by some sections of the opposition that the government should retrench by curtailing its expenditures in many fields.

We have heard a great deal about the proposal of the government of Quebec to impose a provincial income tax of 15 per cent and to have it allowed as a tax offset by the federal government. As a junior member of the house, I am not going to say too much on the question of dominion-provincial relations or the constitution of Canada, but I should like to say that the only way we can get equality of opportunity in Canada, as between province and province, is for the federal government to have the power to collect taxes as they are doing under the dominion-provincial agreements so that we will be able to carry on our present social security program, hospital grants, vocational training grants and other assistance to the provinces of that nature.

In effect, under the dominion-provincial agreements, with the taxing powers in the hands of the federal government, the federal government is then in a position to redistribute the wealth of the country on a more equitable basis. The prairie provinces and the maritime provinces would lose very heavily were any action taken which would tend to upset the present dominion-provincial agreements. I feel that it is my responsibility as a Nova Scotia member to put myself on record as stating most emphatically that I will use whatever power I have as a member to support a continuing policy of a more equal distribution of the wealth of the country.

The budget did offer some relief to the Nova Scotia coal mining industry. The 10 per cent sales tax on stokers for use with furnaces in the heating of buildings, and on coal crushers for use directly in the manufacture and production of goods, was discontinued. This, I think, is a gesture in the right direction.

The coal industry of the maritime provinces is undergoing a serious period of reconstruction in order to meet the competition from gas and oil. The picture is far from bright, but I feel the industry, the workers and the general public of Nova Scotia are aware of the problem and are doing all they can locally to find a solution. I feel that the people of the maritimes, with their inherent good sense, their vision and courage, will find a way out of this problem as they have out of many other serious problems with which they were confronted.

One could continue, Mr. Speaker, presenting the academic picture of the budget. However, I believe I have said sufficient to indicate that little change will be felt by the average person in Canada in 1954 in so far as tax relief is concerned. I repeat, therefore, what I said in opening, that the government was realistic in holding the line for this year in order to determine what changes may be necessary to meet conditions in a changing world. The next year will be a crucial one. If we can get by without a war, and I am sure we can, then the main emphasis will be on making the social and economic changes that are going to be necessary to meet conditions that are arising as other parts of the world get into production and with whom we shall have to compete in world markets.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I found it necessary to occupy this short time at this period of this session. I did feel that I should make these few observations to indicate to the people who sent me here that I am endeavouring to present their views on matters that are creating difficulties in the country.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): May I at the outset, Mr. Speaker, congratulate the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr Buchanan), who has just taken his seat, upon his address. I feel he found perhaps the same difficulty that most maritime speakers have found, and that is to say anything good about this budget. His remarks conveyed the same impression as the remarks of others from the maritime provinces, that the situation in the maritimes is serious indeed. There is very little help for us in this budget. They all had great difficulty, as did the hon. member, in finding anything to praise.

A few days ago I listened to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy). He pointed out that a great many men in his constituency were without work, and said there were a great many out of employment in the city of Moncton as a result of lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways. The hon. gentleman did not dwell very much on the unemployment situation in Westmorland or the difficulties the people there are having. He spoke about the Chignecto canal, which is always a safe subject either in Westmorland or any other part of the maritime provinces. I have spoken on the Chignecto canal upon many occasions, and like the hon. member for Westmorland, I intend to continue pressing for the development of that canal.

There are, however, immediate problems in the maritimes and, as I said a moment ago, there is little indication that this budget will help us in any way. I listened to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). I might say that I wish to congratulate all these hon. members on their remarks. He was greatly concerned about the fisheries in New Brunswick, and in his own county of Gloucester in particular. He spoke of the great need of public works, but did not in any way compliment this government on its budget or upon what it was doing for his part of the country.

Yesterday I listened to the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Michaud). He spoke of the great difficulties being experienced by the farmers of Kent county, and of the fact there are no markets for our fisheries. He spoke about the people leaving the county of Kent. He could have gone further and spoken about the people who are leaving the province of New Brunswick and the maritime provinces. He said that only the old and very young people were left in his constituency. He mentioned the fact that the old people were receiving the old age pension and the very young were receiving family allowances. The young men who wish to start homes, the people we are anxious to keep in the maritimes, unfortunately are the ones who are leaving.

I could go on and mention the remarks of other hon. members, such as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Lusby). I wish also to congratulate him on his speech. It was a well prepared address, and he had a strong feeling for his own county of Cumberland as well as for the rest of Nova Scotia. His complaint was, as was the complaint of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, concerned with the sad situation of the coal industry in Nova Scotia today. As I say, there was little in any of these speeches that I feel would commend this budget that has been introduced to the people of the maritime provinces.

I cannot say that I was altogether disappointed in the budget. I have been in this house now for quite a number of years, and I have learned from experience that a post-election budget is never a very satisfactory budget so far as the people are concerned. We have learned not to expect very much, and we were not disappointed in the budget in that respect this year. Some reductions in taxes were made, but as has been pointed out by numerous speakers they were mostly on luxury goods. So far as my home town of Sussex is concerned, I was pleased to note there would be a reduction in the excise tax on soft drinks. There are two manufacturers of soft drinks in the town of Sussex, and this reduction will be of benefit to them.

I was not so well pleased, Mr. Speaker, with the resolution that proposes to tax mutual insurance companies. Resolution No. 6 of the budget resolutions proposes this tax on mutual insurance companies doing business in all parts of Canada. In New Brunswick we have five small mutual insurance companies and, as everyone knows, they are made up mostly of farmers. In the 1930's it was very difficult for the farmers to obtain fire insurance. They banded together and formed these companies in order to help themselves. As far as these companies are concerned the government now proposes to tax what is known as underwriting gains. In some years, over and above the amount of money which is collected from the premiums, there are certain gains. In other years, naturally there are losses. It depends on the amount of money that has to be paid out for fire losses. I understand that these companies are not objecting to any tax assessment on the interest of their earnings, and that is very important; but they do object to a tax on the underwriting gains of the company. The matter came before the Supreme Court of Canada. I might say that the company which was responsible for bringing this matter before the Supreme Court of Canada was the Stanley Mutual Insurance Company of Stanley, New Brunswick. It is one of the five small companies of this kind that we have in the province.

The judgment of Mr. Justice Locke of the Supreme Court of Canada, which was concurred in by the other five judges who sat on the appeal bench, was that these companies should not be taxed. They declared that the gains were not profits. I should like to read just what Mr. Justice Locke said:

> "The question is whether the surplus resulting from the amounts received from premiums paid in cash at the time the insurance is effected and from assessments being in excess of that required for the company's operation is a profit or a gain" . . . "no question arises regarding the interest earned upon the company's investment of its reserve fund which is conceded to be taxable."

The court held that the underwriting gain of a mutual was neither profit nor gain so as to be taxable within the terms of the Income Tax Act.

I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to labour this point further; but I feel that, taking into consideration the judgment of the supreme court and taking into consideration the fact that these companies, as I know them at least, are small companies which are banded together in order to assist farmers mostly, in all fairness this resolution should be withdrawn and there should be no tax imposed as far as these companies are concerned. I hope that resolution No. 6 will be withdrawn.

The minister was very optimistic in his budget. I feel that very few share his optimism when he said as reported at page 3726 of Hansard:

> My reasons for saying this are, first, that the support to be given to production in 1954 in the principal areas where demand originates is well assured. This statement holds good whether we look at the intentions of Canadian business with respect to new investment, or at the probable expenditures of Canadians as consumers or builders of new houses, or at the rate of government expenditures, or at the prospects for export.

As far as business investment intentions are concerned, in 1953 the business investment was $5,059 million. As far as the proposal for 1954 is concerned, it is ·4 per cent lower than it was in 1953, which does not indicate that business expects to improve. The minister has told us that there would be an upward swing in the second half of 1954. Well, it is May of 1954, and we shall not have to wait very long to see whether there is an upward swing. I may say that there are very few indications of it at the present time. Unemployment is not only increasing—

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Brooks: —but business is finding that it is having a more difficult time as the days go by. I am not one of those who cry blue ruin. As a matter of fact, I do not think there is any necessity to cry blue ruin. I am also not one of those who would say that prosperity is around the corner. The situation is serious and unfortunately it seems is either going to remain serious or become more serious.

As far as agriculture and fishing are concerned, the prospects are that they will be down 5·2 per cent in 1954 over 1953, and the prospects for lumbering and forestry industries are that they will be down 15·3 per cent. Those industries are of very great importance to our maritime provinces, and when lumbering, fishing and forest industries are down, then the whole economic situation of the provinces is in a bad way.

I might also point out that the maritime provinces always seem to be the first hit when there is a recession or a depression. We have mentioned the textile industry on a number of occasions. As hon. members know, one of the large textile mills in New Brunswick was the first to close its doors, throwing some 500 to 600 people out of work, with no prospects of ever opening again. We also know that the textile mill in Milltown has had to lay off a great many of its staff; and in my town of Sussex four or five years ago we were fortunate in having a small textile mill move down from Quebec and open up there. It was a great asset to our town, and gave employment to quite a number of people. The relations between labour and employers were the very best both in the factory and in the surrounding country. Within the last three weeks this factory has also had to close its doors. They say it is only temporary, but still there is no knowledge when it will open again. These things are very serious. To me they are a clear indication that the situation is not good or not as good as it should be.

We might look at some other indications, Mr. Speaker. A fair indication of business in this country is the matter of railway carloadings. Today they are 8 per cent under figures for the same period in 1953. On March 21 the cumulative 1954 loadings was 737,531 cars as compared with 818,267 in the same period last year. That is a reduction of 10 per cent. That is a very fair indication of the big drop in business in this country.

We also may take as an indication the purchase of new motor vehicles. It used to be considered that a motor car was a luxury. Today it is considered a necessity. In addition to the motor car there is the truck, which is one of the great essentials of business in this country. The new motor vehicles sold in January of this year numbered 23,133, a drop of 7,070, or over 23 per cent, from the same period as last year.

Surely this is a strong indication, Mr. Speaker, of a great drop in business in this country.

Retail value was 21 per cent lower with a figure of $59,137,000 as against $75,031,000 last year. And I could go on to mention numerous other indications. The unemployment insurance claims also give an indication. On the live unemployment insurance rolls of February 26 the number stood at 512,567, an increase of 17,736 or 4 per cent over the month previous, and 149,402 or 41 per cent over the same date last year. These, to my mind, are all very strong indications of what the situation is in this country today.

I was interested to note in the labour research for the months of March and April a list of the number of industries showing a drop in employment. These are selected industries in Canada; and while I shall not weary the house with giving all the information, I shall pick out some of the items. For instance, in February in the forestry industry there was a drop of 15.2 per cent in February, 1954 as compared with February, 1953. In the boot and shoe industry there was a drop of 7·8 per cent, and in textile products, with the exception of clothing, a drop of 16·5 per cent. In cotton yarns and broad woollen goods there was a drop of 20.1 per cent, which in synthetic textiles and silks a drop of 13·5 per cent. In agriculture implements the drop was 28·6 per cent while in the construction industry it was 9·7 per cent—and so on, all through a long list.

As we are often told in the house, exports are of the utmost importance to Canada—perhaps more important than in any other country in the world. When our exports drop off a very serious situation develops. In January, 1954 the value of exports was almost 18 per cent below that of January, 1953, and over 15 per cent lower by volume.

This indicates to me, as I am sure it does to anyone else, a very serious situation. We had hoped that there might be something in the budget to encourage industry in Canada. Unless we have industry the unemployment situation certainly cannot improve. We had hoped there would be something to lower the cost of production so that our people in Canada could compete with production from other countries. In the period since the war Canada has been in a favoured position in that she has had an elastic market, a great sellers' market. Other countries such as Germany, France, Holland and Japan were not manufacturing; their factories had been destroyed. But today they are becoming competitors of Canadian manufacturers. In order to compete Canada must give very serious consideration to taxes, particularly a reduction of the sales tax and other help of that kind.

I should like to comment for a short time on a subject which was discussed the other day by one of the members for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) and was also mentioned by one of the members in the other place. It is a subject which has been of some considerable concern in the maritime provinces, although very little has been said about it until recent times. The press in New Brunswick for the last few months has made reference to the public domain that was part of Canada at one time, and which we in the maritime provinces had considered as part of our right, from which we have received no benefits.

The Fredericton Gleaner has been carrying articles on this subject for the last few months. As hon. members know, at confederation Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia purchased from the Hudson's Bay Company all the northern lands of this dominion. In 1903 the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were carved out of those lands. At that time neither of those provinces was given its natural resources or public lands. In lieu of that they were given large subsidies.

[Mr. Brooks.]

In subsequent years the boundaries of Manitoba were extended so as to double the size of that province, and this was taken out of lands which, as I say, belonged to the public domain of Canada, to the maritime provinces just as to the other parts of Canada. At a later time the provinces of Quebec and Ontario had their boundaries extended away to the north, enriching those provinces by millions—yes, as it is proving now, probably by billions of dollars.

The maritime provinces, with their circumscribed boundaries, could not be increased, and in no way were compensated for what they had helped to purchase in years past. I should like to read the remarks of some of the outstanding Canadians with reference to this matter. I would turn first to what was said by the Hon. William Pugsley upon the occasion of extending the boundaries of Manitoba. A long debate took place in the House of Commons at that time, one in which not only members from the maritime provinces but those from all parts of Canada took part. As everyone knows, the Hon. William Pugsley was one of the outstanding statesmen of eastern Canada and for a good many years was Sir Wilfrid Laurier's righthand man. He was a constitutional lawyer and an authority on the British North America Act. He had this to say:

> I desire to take the position that these lands do not belong to Manitoba. Those of us who come from the smaller provinces to which no territory can be added, in order to do justice to the people we represent, have to take the ground in the strongest manner possible that neither Manitoba, Ontario, nor Quebec, is entitled to one acre of these lands which are outside the bounds of these respective provinces. These lands formed a part of the Hudson bay territory, they were bought by the original four provinces of Canada, and they paid their hard money for them. While it may be natural and right that they should be added to these provinces, yet if they are to be so added the addition ought to take place upon terms upon which the other provinces have been consulted, and with which they are satisfied.

And later in his speech he says this:

> It is proposed to enlarge the territory of Manitoba. It is proposed to give her $560,000 a year in lieu of public land. On the order paper also we find a proposition to enlarge the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and to give to them vast tracts of territory which, I say, belong to the whole people of Canada, the people of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, as well as to the people of other sections of Canada.

The debate was carried on for some time and Sir Robert Borden, who was then prime minister of the Dominion of Canada, had this to say after dealing with other aspects of the matter:

> I would like to point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that one of his own colleagues—

He was referring to Mr. Pugsley.

—on that side of the house has raised an important question this afternoon, and has expressed views with which my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) may not be inclined to concur; namely, that when this question does come to be considered, some regard will have to be given to the claims of some other provinces in Canada and especially the three maritime provinces whose boundaries have not been increased, whose boundaries cannot very well be increased on account of their natural situation. That is a matter that will have to be taken up in connection with the handing over of their natural resources to the three prairie provinces. I would like my hon. friends from the maritime provinces to understand that that is a matter which has not escaped the attention of the government.

These remarks were made on February 27, 1912, and can be found in Hansard at column 3896 of volume II of the report for the 1911-12 session. That is a long time ago and nothing has been done as far as compensating the maritime provinces in that connection from that day to this. The matter was discussed at a provincial conference some time later, and in his memoirs the Hon. A. E. Arsenault, premier of the province of Prince Edward Island, who attended that conference, who later became chief justice of Prince Edward Island and who was recognized for his outstanding legal knowledge, stated that at this conference one of the matters which was discussed was the joint claim of the maritimes for compensation for school lands given to Saskatchewan and Alberta, the railway belt given to British Columbia, as well as for the northlands given to all the other provinces which resulted in a great expansion of their physical boundaries. That was 1913 and the interesting part of his memoirs is a quotation from Sir Lomer Gouin, who was the premier of the province of Quebec and, as we all know, an outstanding Canadian statesman. Mr. Arsenault had this to say.

Once more Sir Lomer made a significant statement.

And this is the statement:

"At the present time," he said, "we do not know whether those lands are an asset or a liability. They are, for the most part, unsurveyed and sparsely populated, and it is going to cost us a lot of money to administer them. However, should they in the future prove to be valuable, then I am of the opinion that the maritime provinces should receive adequate compensation for their interest in them."

That was a statement made by the premier of Quebec at that time. Now, as I said a few moments ago, in those years these lands were not considered to be of any great value but, as hon. members know, these lands today have become fabulously wealthy and are estimated to be of enormous value to the provinces which received them. All kinds of metals, gold, basic minerals, radium, uranium, iron, oil, and gas have been discovered, and the land containing this untold wealth was not considered to be of any great value at that time. But today these sections are some of the richest parts of the Dominion of Canada. Take, for example, the millions of gallons of oil discovered in Alberta and western Canada. Today that oil is being piped to Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, and other parts of Canada, as well as to the United States.

I would like to point out to this house that while all this oil is being pumped to other parts of Canada and even into the United States not one gallon of this western oil will reach, at least through pipelines, the maritime provinces. The maritime provinces will not benefit to the extent of one gallon of oil. The same can be said of the billions of feet of gas that have been discovered in the great gas fields of western Canada which were in this great public domain, and not one cubic foot of this gas will go to the maritime provinces.

These lands are also rich in water power. We have all read of the great development of hydroelectric power in northern British Columbia, northern Labrador, northern Quebec and northern Ontario, and of that great potential water power found in these regions not one single horsepower will ever come from these areas to the maritime provinces.

In this connection I might also mention the Hudson Bay railway which was built to meet the needs of western farmers. The people of the maritimes helped to pay for this railway which ran to the port of Churchill, they helped to pay for the development of iron ore in Labrador and Quebec and they will help to pay for the development of the St. Lawrence seaway which came more or less as the result of the discovery of iron ore in the Labrador area. The railway which is being built from Seven Islands to these ore fields will also be paid for, in part, by the maritime provinces.

I am attempting to point out to the house, Mr. Speaker, that for all this immense wealth which at one time belonged to the three maritime provinces, as well as to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, no compensation has been received by our provinces. We have never taken objection to the great development of the rest of Canada, and the maritime provinces have always paid their share.

We helped to pay for these lands; we helped to pay for the Hudson Bay railway; we will help to pay for the St. Lawrence seaway; and we will help to pay for the development of the iron ore in northern Labrador. We will have to pay for all these things, but as the situation stands at present we will not gain one cent as far as benefits are concerned. I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are watching me and I will call it five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it being five o'clock the house will now proceed to a consideration of private and public bills.

It having been indicated that there is no business under private and public bills, the house will resume the business previously under consideration.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to labour this point any further. However, I might say this. I think this is an illustration of the horse and rabbit trade. It is probably the greatest illustration in the history of this country or that of any other country of the horse and rabbit trade. Since confederation the maritime provinces have been getting the rabbit and the other provinces of Canada have been getting the horse.

Mr. Rowe: Fifty-fifty.

Mr. Brooks: Yes; fifty-fifty. When we discuss a provincial-dominion conference I feel that this is one of the first subjects which should be discussed at such a conference. No matter what some members may think, I have a feeling that there is fairness among all the members from all parts of Canada. I believe that they will agree that the maritime provinces have not received their just dues with regard to western lands and also the lands of northern Quebec and northern Ontario; I refer to the public domain. I believe that in the interest of fairness a dominion-provincial conference will demand that, even at this late date, justice be done to these provinces.

I know it has often been said that we do a great deal of complaining in the maritime provinces. May I say that we have had a great deal to complain about. We are sometimes told to help ourselves. That is always good advice, not only for provinces but for individuals. We in New Brunswick feel that we can help ourselves. We have always been considered to be one of the poorer provinces but, as hon. members know, in recent years we have been fortunate to discover in our province minerals which, in the past, we did not know we had.

We are told that one of the great reasons why we have not developed more industry is that we have not cheap electric power. In order to develop our mineral resources, to attract industry and to develop more industry we must have cheap electric power. The government of New Brunswick have been trying to solve this problem, as have past governments in that province. Today they think they have a solution in the development of more power on the Saint John river by means of a project called the Beechwood project. It is a project which, for full development, will cost a considerable sum of money; it will cost more than the province of New Brunswick can afford. For a partial development, which is being promoted at the present time, the cost will be about $44 million. The development of this hydro-electric power will mean a great deal to the province of New Brunswick. It will probably mean the difference between prosperity and difficult times.

I understand that the government of New Brunswick have approached the federal government, not to ask them to develop the Beechwood project but to ask them for assistance in raising money for the development of hydroelectric power at Beechwood. They have asked the assistance of the federal government by way of making available treasury loans so that they might have a lower nominal rate of interest than they would have if the province of New Brunswick is obliged to borrow the money from outside sources. I do not know what the attitude of the federal government is to this proposition but I think that the proposition that has been made to the federal government is a very fair one. It is one which will mean a great deal to New Brunswick and I hope it will be accepted. It is not one that is going to increase the debt of the dominion. It is not going to mean that the people in other parts of Canada will have to give one cent. The province of New Brunswick will pay its debts. But with the backing of the federal government it can raise money at lower rates of interest than would otherwise be possible, thus making hydroelectric power available to the people of New Brunswick more cheaply than would otherwise be possible. As I say, I hope that this matter will receive serious consideration by this government.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to sit out this discussion but, as it goes on and on, I feel that I might as well make my contribution also. I first want to compliment the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Buchanan) on his maiden speech. Having regard to the fact that he is a new member, that we have a complicated budget and that we are living in twisted times, I thought that he took a rather realistic view of the whole situation. He did an excellent job. As his next-door neighbour on Cape Breton island I feel it to be my duty to say that I am extremely pleased with his attitude, his manner and his general approach to this problem of the budget. However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that I can pay that tribute to every hon. member to whose speech I have listened.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria said that, having regard to the times in which we are living, this year was a good time to take a look around. I think that anyone who is doing any reading at the present time will have to come to that conclusion. I think he will be forced to the conclusion that we are not just faced with a temporary recession and that it is not something that is going to cure itself. The whole thing arises out of faulty mechanics in society. The situation in which we find ourselves indicates that we did not learn much from the last war. In my judgment present circumstances indicate that we are headed back for what we had in 1939 unless some down-to-earth, realistic thinking is done by those in charge of the management of the economy of, not only Canada but of the United States.

I have here in my hand a copy of a magazine called The Reporter. It is a United States publication and it is a rather exclusive one. Some fairly good writers contribute to it. The issue I have in my hand is that of March 30, 1954. In it there is an article with the caption "The Recession is Here". It is written by an economist who takes a look at the whole economy of the United States. He runs through, industry by industry, the present inventories, the percentage of drop-offs, the general market trends and all that kind of thing. The conclusion at which he arrives is that as far as the United States is concerned the recession is here. I am not going to read that article because I like to read these things for myself and to summarize them. Anyone who is interested can pick up the magazine and read it for himself. I consider that article to be an authoritative one written by a man who is not grinding any axe. He is merely reading the danger signs as they affect the economy of the United States.

I think anybody who is reading the newspapers will have to agree with me. What is true of the United States is also true of Canada because the economy of this country is so tightly locked to the economy of the United States that anything that happens over there will spill over into Canada. I am sure that any member of the house who takes a look at our basic industries today must agree that basic changes have got to be made. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) missed coal and steel but he did talk about the textile and electrical industries and the difficulties that are facing agriculture.

We have heard discussion about picayune savings in government expenditures, but I do not think they would have very much effect. Someone says that you can cut off a few civil servants, stop publishing certain books and save a million and a half dollars. That kind of thing is unrealistic in the type of situation that confronts us today. I have in my hand an editorial from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. It is an excellent paper. I have always considered that it is unbiased, and I think it perhaps makes the best contribution with respect to maritime problems of any newspaper in Canada. You cannot say that an editorial in that paper represents socialist thinking. It is a straight honest attempt to make an honest appraisal of every problem that arises in the country.

Mr. Harris: That is not the opposite of socialism, is it?

Mr. Gillis: I am trying to anticipate the kind of comment I would get from a lot of people in this house if I were to suggest the kind of thing that this editorial suggests. The editorial points out that the federal government payroll at the present time is approximately $80 million a month, and I should like to pound the words of the editorial into the ear of the fellow who wants to save $1,500,000 out of $4½ billion because he thinks he is going to save the country. The editorial deals with the function performed in terms of money by reason of this capital expenditure.

In my judgment the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria was quite right when he said that a period such as the present, when industry and almost all our economic organizations appear to be standing pat and taking a look at things, is not the time to cut government expenditures but is the time to spend more money and prime the pump if you want to avoid a complete slump. The hon. member was quite right, and to hear that kind of opinion expressed on that side of the house is like a breath of fresh air. The editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald has this to say:

> Eighty millions a month, $960 million a year, that is a fabulous figure in any language. But it is money distributed in every part of the country. And that is the function of money, to be kept in circulation. Money hidden away in the "old sock" or under a brick of the fireplace is quite as useless as the gold hoarded in Fort Knox which, as Sir Winston Churchill has said, "might just as well be in the virgin rock in the Rand." No sensible person believes that governments should throw money with reckless abandon, but the idea that money spent is money wasted is just about the most fallacious economic doctrine possible to be imagined. We should not therefore be horrified at a public payroll of the magnitude indicated; rather, we should remember that this money, and a great deal more along with it, flows from the federal treasury as part of the bloodstream of trade and commerce and industry, without which no nation could endure.

I bring that to the attention of some of those who are talking at the present time about cutting government expenditures here and there. I do not believe in inefficiency or waste, but until such time as someone is able to get up in the house and put his finger on some place where there is inefficiency, then in my judgment the saving of money is not argument enough in the circumstances that this country faces today. The more purchasing power in circulation the greater the chances are of avoiding unemployment, which is our big problem at the present time.

I heard a member who sits not very far from me suggest that the construction of the new C.N.R. hotel in Montreal was a terrible thing and should not be undertaken at this time, that it was going to cost $20 million and someone was going to have to pay for it. I heard that matter discussed in the railway committee. The construction of that building in the city of Montreal is necessary. Before the committee the president of the C.N.R. pointed out the fact that in the city of Montreal there is not a hotel with accommodation for the type of conventions that take place today in Canada where 600, 800, 1,000 or 1,500 delegates assemble. He is quite right because I have had the experience of attending one or two conventions where the convention had to be divided, and that does not tend to good business.

The president of the C.N.R. also pointed out that he has applications from organizations all over the United States that will mean that the hotel will be booked solid with conventions for at least two years after it is completed. The project will pay for itself. It is a self-liquidating project. Some people talk as though Canada were through developing. They talk as though we did not need any more population and give the impression that we should just sit tight, put our money in the sock and all that kind of thing. This country is developing and the hotel project in Montreal will help to solve the unemployment problem to some extent in that city.

I heard a lot of other proposals along the same line, but as far as I am concerned not one of them would stand up. In my judgment they do not mean anything.

Mr. Harris: The whole of his speech?

Mr. Gillis: All the recommendations I heard with the exception of a few publications about which he quibbled. I do not know these publications. I do not know what value they have. With that exception I would not say that the economies recommended would amount to very much. I picked out the example of the hotel because it seemed to me that it was a subject to which the speaker had not given very much thought.

Another recommendation I heard was that the annuities administration should be given a going over. That is not a new thing to me. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), myself and others were members of a committee that endeavoured to amend the annuities act not so long ago. The insurance companies from coast to coast put up a terrific lobby and used exactly the same arguments. As far as I am concerned, the annuities act is good legislation. I am sorry it was not amended along the lines of the bill that the Minister of Labour brought in at that time. I am sorry that somebody capitulated to the arguments of the insurance companies. It is the only yardstick we have in Canada by which to measure insurance rates. It was said that it should be put on a competitive basis, but that is exactly what the insurance companies were afraid of. We did want to write in one or two clauses that would make it competitive, but they did not want those clauses. I hope the Minister of Labour will reintroduce that annuities act with the amendments he proposed at that time.

Mr. Knowles: And which the house supported on second reading.

Mr. MacInnis: Not a chance.

Mr. Gillis: I want to tell the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) that I am not going to say anything about coal. I am going to save that part of my—

Mr. MacInnis: That is what they are doing with the coal.

Mr. Gillis: —remarks for his estimates, after I hear him tell us what the government is prepared to do as a result of the last conference he had with the industry.

This afternoon I listened with a great deal of interest to the Leader of the Opposition. His speech was my principal reason for rising at this time because he dealt with a subject that is extremely important to the end of the country from which I come, the subject of dominion-provincial agreements. When he referred to unemployment and so forth, whether or not he realized it, he made one of the best cases against the so-called system of free enterprise that I ever heard. In effect what he said about marketing and the breakdown as it were of the whole set-up proved conclusively the inability of industry in this country to compete today. We had a similar situation on our hands from the twenties to 1939 when we got into another war and, to a certain extent, our economy was planned. Then our economy worked well, and even though we were throwing away 50 per cent of our national income there was prosperity and full employment.

When the shooting was over the government removed the controls and returned control to General Motors, Dominion Steel and Coal, Canada Packers, General Electric and the rest of them. Before the trenches were filled in they were sitting back uttering the same old cry; there is unemployment, and we cannot compete. That is the picture the Leader of the Opposition painted this afternoon. I believe he was quite right in the figures he presented. There is no purpose served by the Minister of Labour or anyone else trying to rationalize the question of unemployment. Figures presented by the minister in this house a month or so ago showed that there were about 520,000 unemployed. He told us also that about 56,000 people who were receiving unemployment insurance would not receive any benefits after April 21.

Now, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition brought the figures up to date when he said that according to information he had there were 570,000 on the unemployment insurance rolls. He said that actually there were 730,000 people looking for work. If this latter figure is correct, I would say that there are about 270,000 people in this country who have been removed from the unemployment insurance rolls and therefore have no income. I know that in my own area there were about 1,100 who were removed from the unemployment insurance rolls on April 21. These people have no income at all. Something has to be done about that. My recommendation is not that the government should fire a few civil servants somewhere or cut out a publication; that is not going to solve the problem. Something has to be done immediately.

My suggestion is, and has been, that unemployment insurance benefits should be extended. They should be extended until such time as these people can be put to work. If the government has to subsidize this fund, then that is too bad but people have the right to eat; that is a prior right.

There is another thought I should like to leave with the minister. One hears it everywhere because I think everyone has picked it up today as their swan song. We are told we have priced ourselves out of the market. Wage rates in Canada are too high. There is another side to that story. Perhaps profits in Canada are too high also. If one looks at some of the recent balance sheets published in the press one finds that profits are very high. Before the captains of industry in Canada start telling the workers that $2 or $1.60 an hour is too high, they should look at their own rates. An example should be set.

I have in my hand a paper called The Guardian, which is the official organ of local 195 of the auto workers union. This little paper does a good research job. In talking about wages, the Minister of Labour should remember this. General Motors has quite an unemployment problem, both in United States and in Canada. According to this paper the president of General Motors, in 1953, had an income of $637,233; that is a lot of money. It is $368 an hour for the forty-hour week or $6 a minute. I am leaving this thought with the Minister of Labour because he will be meeting delegations of these people who will tell him they cannot compete with Britain; they cannot compete with the mass production methods of the United States, and their only solution will be to pull down the standard of living in Canada by reducing wage rates. Before that argument presented by the top executives in Canada becomes valid, they should start to make readjustments in their own house. I have just given one example of the amount of money that is paid to those who feel the worker who produces that wealth should take a cut every time they get into trouble. I mention that to the minister because I have heard a lot about it recently, and I know he has. It has all come from the same people, the people who are in the $368 an hour bracket. They should put their own house in order first.

Let me say a few words on this question of dominion-provincial agreements. I do not want to pose as an authority on the British North America Act. I want to say that so long as you have the centralization of wealth in Canada, such as you have in Ontario and Quebec, and a centralization of industry that keeps in the two central provinces about 80 per cent of the wealth of Canada, there is no other way by which you can get any amount of equality for the rest of Canada except by having the taxing powers in the hands of the federal government. Then, as the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria said, the federal government can redistribute some of that wealth to the hewers of wood and drawers of water on the prairies and in the maritimes.

I knew this was going to be a pertinent question, so before I went home for Easter I took a look at some of the figures for my own province. I wanted to see where we would be without these dominion-provincial agreements. The argument has been advanced that the provinces are losing something. For twenty years before coming into this house I listened to talk about the amalgamation of corporations being good business. By an amalgamation of corporations across the country and the head offices in the centre of Canada you cut your administrative costs 100 per cent as far as management is concerned, and it is good business. That is what has been going on. We have been taking from the outlying provinces most of their wealth and putting it into the two central provinces. The taxes are paid there; the succession duties are paid there and so forth.

I know that Nova Scotia was reluctant to come into these dominion-provincial agreements. There are a lot of people in this country who, when you give them a little job and a little bit of authority, insist on holding that, even if it is just presiding over the poverty that exists in the area. I never could get it myself. It is true that Nova Scotia did not want to come into these agreements but our provincial budget this year will be around $48 million. Some $23 million to $25 million of that money will come back under these dominion-provincial agreements. In personal and corporation income taxes we will pay to the federal government around $30 million; but what are we getting back? That is the point. The fact that this dominion-provincial agreement existed is the only reason that we are getting it back.

I took a look at the family allowance payments in that province from 1946 to 1954, during the lifetime of these agreements, and I found that during that period $131,499,280 was paid in family allowances alone in the province of Nova Scotia since the establishment of the dominion-provincial agreements. In the matter of old age security $39,083,367 has been paid. We have received that amount in these two items alone. Then we come to old age assistance, and during that time the federal government has contributed to old age assistance $1,988,733. In the matter of blind allowances, in the three-year period we have received $617,917 in that field alone. From 1947 to 1953 the subventions on the movement of coal amounted to $5,949,000 odd, or $2.40 a ton on the 2,405,767 tons of coal moved during that period.

For vocational assistance in the establishment of schools in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, certain amounts were paid by the federal government to the provinces. During that year $63,900.59 went to Nova Scotia. I have the figures for the other provinces but they are not relevant to my discussion. Hon. members can see from that that if it was not for these dominion-provincial agreements where we would fit in that province, and that is equally true of New Brunswick, or much more so, and it is equally true of the prairie provinces, and partially true of British Columbia.

As long as my hon. friends who oppose these dominion-provincial agreements are prepared to maintain the kind of centralization of industry and wealth in these two provinces of Canada that exists, in order for the other provinces to exist there has to be some method of redistributing the wealth of this country in the way that it is now done by the federal government.

The Leader of the Opposition brought up the example of Ontario and their 7 per cent. That is true, but it was done by agreement. As I see the present proposal, it was not done by agreement. The province of Quebec enacted the 15 per cent tax, and after they enacted it they said they wanted it to be used as an offset to the federal tax. Well, that is not agreement. The other nine provinces of this country cannot be wrong. Everybody is not out of step except Duplessis, I hope, in this matter of redistributing the wealth of this country. As one member of this house who lives in a section of Canada that likes to be called Canadian, I am glad that the federal government have taken the position that they are going to maintain the kind of policy in taxation that means the greatest good to the greatest number of Canadians. And as I indicated a moment ago, it is in the best interests of the great majority of the people of this country that these dominion-provincial taxation agreements should be maintained.

I do not say they are perfect, but they are a start, and they are subject to discussion and reason from time to time. I would not see any difficulty in the dominion-provincial agreements, as far as Quebec is concerned, if someone came in, sat down and talked the matter over. That is democracy. The right to agree and to disagree and intelligent compromise will be the final result that is democracy. Anyone who is not prepared to do that is not prepared to accept the mechanics of democracy.

I will join with the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, and say that anything that I can do as an individual member to see that a system whereby we can at least get something back from the centre is maintained, as it is in the dominion-provincial agreements, I will do.

People should realize that the wealth of industry that they have in the central provinces was taken from the provinces east and west. We lost fifty industries in the province of Nova Scotia in fewer than fifty years, and a lot of them were large industries, to Quebec and Ontario. Most of the high salaries paid in steel and coal in these organizations today, and the dividends, go to Mount Royal in Montreal, and the taxes are paid in the province of Quebec. The only method that I know of whereby we can at least get some payments to enable us to stay in the field of social security is by redistributing the wealth in the way that we are doing at the present time. But the time will come when we will realize that industry in this country has to be decentralized to a greater extent than it is at the present time.

In summing up the Leader of the Opposition mentioned what the premier of Ontario had to say in regard to the signing of the agreement. He told me at least that what the premier of Ontario was complaining about was the burden imposed on municipalities and service organizations in this province by the indiscriminate laying down in Ontario of industry after industry that they are not prepared to cater to. First, they developed a huge power shortage. It has made it necessary to develop the Niagara falls project. They went around half in darkness during the war to conserve power because of the great centralization of industry in this province of Ontario.

I notice that in the United States today they are being advised by experts to get busy and to start to decentralize their industrial machine in that country, both for economic reasons and as a greater measure of protection in the event of war.

You know, it is a strange thing but the only reports from any corporations I have seen recently that seem to indicate they are getting along all right are the reports from government-owned plants. Everyone else is screaming. Canada's publicly-owned rubber factory, it is pointed out, is a profitable success. I do not need to read what is said about it. But I do say that the government is going to have to make changes along the lines represented by Trans-Canada Air Lines, the Polymer Corporation and Canadian Arsenals, because these organizations are planning their production. Others are not. It is this type of planned organization which must be implemented in the future if we are going to meet competition from outside. We will have to sit down together and realize that not just a few people own Canada but all the people of Canada are shareholders in the future of our country. If adjustments are necessary, then we can make them together.

But I do say it is bad taste for someone who is receiving $6 a minute to tell someone else that he should work for less than $1.60 an hour. That kind of thing is going to bring about what happened in Europe. It will drag the house of cards down around our ears.

I should like to say a word to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) concerning the unemployment figures we have today. Every second paper one reads contains a story about an increase in immigration. I have here a small clipping which says that 25,000 families are to be admitted to Canada. At one point in Ontario the minister made a statement a couple of months ago that we are going to bring 186,000 immigrants into Canada this year. Well, I would say to him that this is a bad year to be thinking along those lines. As I have said on many occasions in the house, our immigration program lacks planning. No one seems to be taking a look at industry, or at the problems of agriculture, and determining the kind of people we should bring into this country, whether there are homes for them or jobs they can fill. In other words no one seems to be considering the contribution these people must be prepared to make to Canada.

This would be a good time to stop and take a look around. When one looks into this question of immigration he finds that people are saying, "Yes, but there is the humanitarian reason to be considered." Of course there is; I admit that. But let us understand the situation. If we are going to take in 186,000 persons for humanitarian reasons let us be prepared to tax ourselves to feed them. It is not good enough to take them in and drop them in centres already overcrowded so that they will be bidding for jobs against people who have jobs, or for homes when there are no homes available. That is not good enough. If we are taking them in for humanitarian reasons, then let us understand that that is so. But our centres are overcrowded today. The cities in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia are badly overcrowded. I would strongly urge the Minister of Labour that the first thing that must be done is to put those unemployed persons who have gone off the relief rolls in a position where at least they will be able to take something home to eat.

Until we get around to a point of ironing out the problems of competition we are up against, this fact must be considered. It will not be easy, because the average industrialist wants to make money. If he can take an industry from Canada and transfer it to Africa or Japan or China, or some other country in which he can get cheap labour, and then sell his products in this country, he will do so. It has been done before, and to some extent it is happening today.

We have a serious problem on our hands. So far as my approach to the budget is concerned, I would say it is not a political approach, because my first concern is for the country at large. I am not unmindful of the fact that in two wars thousands upon thousands of our young people offered their lives to see that this country remained fit to live in, and so that we might maintain our institutions as we have them. I would not want to quibble about anything that was good for this country, because I want to see it prosperous.

Having said that, let me add that I notice from the press that our genial Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) has been invited to become the skipper of the ship in Nova Scotia. If I had a vote on that, I would vote for it because something is wrong in that province. It needs a good captain at the present time. There is nothing wrong in the province that could not be cured by a little bit of common sense and some honesty. That is one of the things badly needed in public affairs, generally, of this country—a little honesty.

Whether the Hon. Bob Winters is going to Nova Scotia or not remains to be seen. But I would say that under prevailing conditions in the province—steel production is down; 1,700 men have been laid off from the steel plant; we know that the coal industry is in a bad way—I know from my visits there that they are looking around to see what can be done. Of course it is a job for the Liberal party. As I said before, however, I am interested in the welfare of Nova Scotia and of Canada. I am also interested in seeing that anyone who is calling the shots in any section of the country should have some realistic approach, as well as the courage and the necessary honesty to do that which is right rather than that which is politically expedient. I am not going to give the minister any advice; but I do hope Bob Winters will go back down to Nova Scotia. I believe he could make a valuable contribution down there; and I know the people of that province well enough to know this that, despite politics, any approach he would make to the problems of the province would meet with co-operation and assistance, because the people down there want to have something done.

These remarks have been rambling, I realize. My main reason in rising was to make some observations on the dominion-provincial agreements. In my view they represent a long step forward and mean a great deal to the provinces outside of Quebec and Ontario. It means that some of the wealth siphoned off from those provinces can be returned by way of social security payments, as they are at the present time.

(Translation):

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, for many years and particularly during these past few months an unfortunate propaganda campaign has been conducted in the province of Quebec to convince the population that the federal government is not only alien to Quebec but moreover hostile towards that province, and that federal legislation aims at nothing but the destruction of the autonomy of Quebec, and the violation of the rights and privileges granted to it by the constitution of the country.

It seems to me, however, that it is only since confederation, since the establishment of a central government that the government of Quebec, the province of Quebec and its population have been able to exercise fully their rights and their freedom. It is also since confederation that the province of Quebec has made tremendous strides in every field, so that it is now one of the greatest and one of the most prosperous in Canada.

It is also since the central government exists that the French Canadians have been able to play with the other citizens of Canada their rightful part in the administration of this country.

There is no need, Mr. Speaker, to spend much time looking through the history book or the pages of daily papers to find the names of French Canadians who have been and are still standing guard over the destinies of the province of Quebec, as well as over the destinies of this country as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, we have had, in the province of Quebec, to find a solution to many difficult questions and thorny problems, but they are now things of the past, and the province of Quebec never lost any of her constitutional rights, and the problem which now besets my fellow citizens in the province of Quebec will go down in history without the position of the province of Quebec undergoing any change whatsoever. Our province will always remain the place where our children will have the freedom and the right to speak the tongue and practise the religion of their forefathers.

There is not one Liberal member from the province of Quebec who would support the government if he thought that our autonomy, our race or our religion were endangered in the slightest degree by the legislation of the present government. We too are French Canadians and we want, as well as anyone else, to keep our language, our rights and our religion, but we would not be justified, for example, in indulging in unwarranted demagogy and sentimentalism, which would be detrimental rather than helpful to the people of the province of Quebec.

When our forefathers decided to establish a confederation, they did so because they saw certain advantages in that set-up and today all the Canadian provinces benefit from social and economic advantages which only confederation can give to each of the provinces. But the advantages also entailed certain obligations, among them those upon which rests the very constitution of Canada, that is co-operation and understanding between the provincial governments and the central government, without which there can be no confederation, there can be no national unity, there cannot be any nation.

Mr. Speaker, for the people of the province of Quebec, provincial autonomy is extremely precious and sacred, but we should never lose sight of the fact that national unity is also very important. It is only through sincere co-operation between the governments of the provinces and the central government that Canada can take its place among the great nations of the world in order to settle and direct international affairs and at the same time look after the defence, the economy and the social security of each of the provinces that make up Canada.

I believe that we, of the province of Quebec, should be proud that our nation, which was born on the very soil of the province of Quebec, has become in a few short years, a strong, free and sovereign country, as was envisioned by the fathers of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we should show the same eagerness to safeguard national unity as we have shown to preserve and safeguard provincial autonomy, because as long as the province of Quebec is part and parcel of confederation, its welfare and its interests will be closely related to those of the government of Canada.

Protection of national unity is not tantamount to betrayal of the autonomy of the province of Quebec. These are not incompatible. That idea was well expressed in this house by one whose love for and devotion to the province of Quebec could certainly not be doubted.

I would like to quote in this connection the words spoken by the Hon. P. J. A. Cardin in this house, on November 30, 1944:

> In the evening of my life, from the point of view of age and of parliamentary service, let me through you, Mr. Speaker, and from my place in the House of Commons, address just a word to the citizens of the province of Quebec and ask them, whatever may be their sentiments, whatever be their feelings at the present time, to take things easy, to reflect before acting, and to remember that they are not only citizens of the province of Quebec but at the same time citizens of Canada as a whole, who desire to see their country in the not distant future, and with the will of all concerned, become a great and independent country.
> They are as much interested as I am, as much interested as others are in the future of our great land, and they should do all they can to help to build up, on the foundation of confederation, a great and prosperous country, which, with the help of God and the concerted effort of those who are in authority, before long will be a country of which we shall be proud and in which we shall have great honour.

Mr. Speaker, those words apply equally to the present situation. They are as true as they were in 1944, and I submit it would be unworthy on the part of the province of Quebec to want to share in the benefits of confederation without recognizing the heavy responsibilities of the federal government and to deny its co-operation in the solution of an extremely complicated problem which concerns every province in Canada.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the stand taken by the premier of the province of Quebec can surely be interpreted as being un-co-operative; in fact it has even been aggressive in some instances.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose, I was saying that it was unfortunate that the attitude of the prime minister of Quebec showed a lack of co-operation and was even, at times, aggressive. In some Quebec circles, the idea seems to prevail that it is still possible to change Quebec into a sovereign state. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that one would have to be very shortsighted to wish to secede from our confederation at a time such as the present when all the countries of the world are grouping themselves together in order to repulse the attack of the enemy if it comes and to protect more efficiently their national economy.

All the unrest and the misunderstandings now present in Quebec seem to revolve around the claim made by the premier of Quebec that federal-provincial agreements are directly opposed to provincial autonomy and aim solely at the destruction of the French-Canadian element.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is difficult to justify such accusations because federal-provincial agreements are legal contracts which must and shall be upheld before all courts of justice, especially since the preamble of each of those agreements contains a paragraph which formally guarantees the constitutional rights of the provinces and of the central government. I would like once again, Mr. Speaker, to quote the preamble of the agreements signed between the Canadian government and that of the province of Ontario. In fact I believe the preamble throws so much light on this whole problem of provincial autonomy, that I took the trouble of translating it into French. I now quote the preamble of the agreements between the province of Ontario and the Canadian government:

> Whereas, in view of the desire of the parties hereto to avoid as far as practicable a dual system of direct taxation, the parties hereto have resolved to enter into an agreement designed (a) to establish a more equitable system of taxation throughout Canada by reducing duplication of direct taxation and of machinery for the collection of direct taxes, (b) to give a greater measure of stability to the revenue of the province in order to enable it more adequately to carry out its responsibilities, and (c) to enable Canada, with the co-operation of provincial governments, to carry out fiscal and other national policies intended to maintain high levels of employment and production;
> And whereas it is agreed that neither Canada nor the province shall be deemed by reason of having entered into this agreement to have surrendered, abandoned or given over to the other any of the powers, rights, privileges or authorities vested in it under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, and any amendments thereto, or otherwise, or to have impaired any of such powers, rights, privileges or authorities;

Mr. Speaker, may I point out here that the agreements offered to the province of Quebec were drafted in exactly the same terms.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it would seem difficult to entertain any opinion unfavourable to federal-provincial agreements, if we consider, besides, that these agreements are only to operate for five years and that they are after all only temporary measures made necessary by an urgent problem, as much in the interest of the province of Quebec as in that of Canada as a whole. It is also difficult to understand, Mr. Speaker, why such agreements could have been termed injurious to the autonomy of the provinces, or again why it was thought necessary to refuse benefits accruing from them, since all other provinces in Canada have benefited thereby.

I do not intend to repeat the constitutional and fiscal arguments which were brilliantly set forth by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) and by the hon. members for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard), Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) and Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault). They proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that the federal government had a right equal to that of the province of Quebec to levy a direct tax and that moreover the dominion-provincial agreements brought financial benefits to the province of Quebec.

It would be useless to try to add anything to the brief and lucid statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in this house yesterday afternoon, when he showed the only stand the federal government could adopt under the circumstances. It would also be useless for me to try to open the doors wider to welcome the province of Quebec than did the right hon. the Prime Minister in order to find a solution which would provide relief for the taxpayers in the province of Quebec.

In spite of the logic of his argument based on rights as much as on facts, the premier of Quebec does not seem to want to understand the position and goes on repeating false accusations to the effect that the federal government wishes to annihilate French Canadians. Well, Mr. Speaker, while this dispute is continuing between the two governments, Quebec taxpayers, who pay more provincial taxes than any other Canadian citizens, must, moreover, unfairly and uselessly bear double taxation caused by the recent introduction of a provincial tax in Quebec. It seems to me that, under the circumstances, the parties involved should consider first and foremost some relief for the Quebec taxpayers and then solve their problem with the calmness, peace and level-headedness that are necessary for the settlement of such an important constitutional issue.

It might perhaps be well, Mr. Speaker, if I briefly recapitulated the facts that have brought about the present situation in the province of Quebec.

1. The country faces a financial problem which no magic formula can solve.

2. Agreements have been proposed to solve that problem and enable the federal government to honour its obligations.

3. When those proposals were made to the provinces, it was understood that if one or more provinces did not wish to sign such agreements, and insisted upon collecting directly from the taxpayers, these taxpayers could deduct 5 per cent of the tax they were supposed to pay to the federal government.

4. The Quebec premier refused to sign such agreements, claiming that they constituted an attack against autonomy. He even refused to take advantage of that 5 per cent deduction, which gave him the right to collect a 5 per cent tax, which since 1948 would have represented $53 million.

5. The premier of Quebec, without consulting the federal government and without any notice whatsoever, imposed a 15 per cent tax on the income of Quebec taxpayers.

6. Once such a tax was established, he asked the federal government to deduct all of that 15 per cent.

The federal government had to refuse the authorization to deduct that 15 per cent tax in the interest of national unity because when the agreements were signed with the other provinces of Canada, it was understood that the taxpayers of provinces that did not sign would be able to deduct 5 per cent of the tax paid to their provincial government. If the federal government had granted the authorization to deduct that 15 per cent tax, the provinces that signed the agreements under those conditions could have protested against such a violation of the terms of the contract. They could have abandoned the agreements and the federal government would have been faced with the same problem that existed prior to the agreements.

Moreover, in doing so the federal government would have endangered national unity in Canada.

In listening to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon, I asked myself whether he was considering that national unity was not a good enough reason to justify the government's attitude in refusing to authorize a deduction greater than 5 per cent, before the federal-provincial agreements signed between the federal government and the nine other Canadian provinces come to an end. I also wondered whether the Leader of the Opposition, if he were responsible for the administration of this country, would have, under these circumstances, taken upon himself to grant a deduction of more than 5 per cent to the province of Quebec.

As things are, and after seriously considering the situation, the federal government could do nothing but refuse the 15 per cent deductibility requested by the government of the province of Quebec. As the tax had already been put into force by the premier of that province, Quebec taxpayers found themselves squeezed between double taxation, without the federal government being able to do anything to help them.

Reviewing those facts, it might be possible to bring redress to the taxpayers who were wronged by the premier of the province of Quebec. Apparently, that 15 per cent tax levied on the personal income of the Quebec taxpayers was intended to yield the amounts needed for health and education, and they claim that the province will derive from that source an additional revenue of approximately $22 million. One can estimate that within three years the province of Quebec will have thus collected about $66 million.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I suggest there could be an agreement if, on the one hand, the Quebec government were to offer to suspend its new income tax legislation, which it has introduced for a period of three years, that is until 1957, and if, as compensation, the federal government were, upon being formally authorized to do so by the Quebec taxpayers, to grant to that province $53 million, i.e. the amount which could have been deducted from what has been levied from these taxpayers in federal income tax and that the Quebec government could have collected had it imposed a 5 per cent income tax back in 1948.

The provincial government could then, for a period of three years, impose a 5 per cent tax, according to the provisions of the federal income tax legislation, as well as to the terms of the agreements. This would bring to the provincial treasury $14 million. In this way, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec would have collected approximately $95 million, that is $29 million more than it would collect by imposing this double taxation.

In that manner the federal government would have respected the spirit and the letter of the terms of the agreements signed with the other provinces.

When the agreements with the other provinces come to an end in 1957, the Quebec government and those of the other provinces of Canada will then be in a position to try to find a permanent solution to the problem we are confronted with today, and that, in the light of the conditions and circumstances then prevailing.

Perhaps I do not see the objections or arguments one can raise against my suggestion, but it seems to me you find there at least the basis for an honourable compromise which could be accepted by the Quebec government, nor does my suggestion jeopardize national unity and, after all, would afford relief to the taxpayers in the province of Quebec by delivering them of this burden of double taxation. However I cannot help repeating here that such a compromise is much more complicated and still much less advantageous than the signing of the federal-provincial agreements themselves, which do not violate, either, any part of the rights or autonomy of the province of Quebec.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I shall be accused of betraying my province, my faith and my people. It will be implied that I do not understand the unique position of the province of Quebec within Canada. Some are going to pretend that I do not cherish our autonomy, our faith, or our language as much as our opponents do, but I am satisfied, absolutely satisfied, that it is not by introducing double taxation in the province of Quebec that we shall be able to help our fellow citizens. Neither is it by placing our Quebec industries at a disadvantage that we shall be able to assist the people of Quebec. The refusal to refund 3 per cent interest to those who want to avail themselves of our federal housing legislation will not help our fellow citizens in Quebec to become home owners. It is not by refusing millions of dollars, through hostility to all federal legislation, while weakening the economy of the province of Quebec and posing as a martyr that the premier of Quebec will best serve the people of his province. On the contrary, if our economy is sound and stable, our universities, our technical schools, our colleges, our primary and secondary schools will be in a position not only to survive but also to dispense their science and teaching to a greater number of our young people who, in turn, will take care of the rights, privileges and traditions bequeathed to us by our forefathers.

No, I am neither afraid nor ashamed to uphold the federal-provincial agreements which are neither more nor less than temporary means of getting around a serious and complicated problem and that with a view fully to protecting our national unity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the premier of the province of Quebec does not want to sign the agreements, if he does not accept the proposals made here or any other proposals, I hope, in all sincerity, that he will be kind enough, for the sake of the Quebec taxpayers, to offer some alternative to the federal government.

For I am convinced that there is for the province of Quebec a way of escape from the present deadlock in which she finds herself provided that Mr. Duplessis really wants to show his desire to co-operate with the federal government, a desire about which he spoke at such length at federal-provincial conferences.

(Text):

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at the outset I consider it a very real privilege to be allowed to sit in this house in company with some of the greatest statesmen of our time. I regret, as does this whole house, the untimely death of Gordon Graydon which necessitated the by-election which preceded my taking this seat. It is my earnest desire to give my country the same high quality of service that was given by the former member for Peel. It is a privilege extended to few Canadians and, attendant with that privilege, are heavy responsibilities.

It would be remiss of me if I did not on this occasion commend to this house certain matters, and one in particular of great national interest. It seems to me that being one of the newest members of the house I can speak perhaps more as a layman than as a house expert. I, personally, am satisfied that my remarks carry the complete support of my county and I am satisfied they will carry the support of the majority of the people of this country.

Some governments have a political philosophy to the effect that rather than introduce legislation that is farsighted and visionary, or shall we say anticipatory, they would introduce legislation that is forced upon them and carries the momentum of the moment with it. They believe that a sounding of public opinion should first be taken, and on finding the legislation cannot be too dangerous to them politically it will be enacted. Tonight one of the matters that I would commend to your attention has the happy condition of containing both these elements of political philosophy, in that in many areas of Canada the momentum of the moment is behind it, while in other areas anyone taking the necessary steps would be blessed in the future with having been sufficiently farsighted to foretell the hardships which are presently occasioned in some parts of Canada.

We say, and with considerable pride, that nothing is too good for the young people of this country of ours. The government expounds the great advances we are making in our social services. The government expounds the great need to keep our ramparts strong in the military fashion against aggression. We say strongly that there must be equal opportunities for all. There is a situation that applies in Canada at the present time that will have the effect of making these platitudes sounded from a great height seem quite meagre and empty. Both by natural growth and by immigration for the past years the population of this country has been increasing considerably, which after all is a condition not unusual in any country after a war. I point out that the situation that must be dealt with tonight is one of the direct results of the increase in population.

Today across Canada the necessary expansion of school facilities is placing an uncompromising burden on the municipal taxpayer. In the long run this can only result in the curtailment of necessary educational services and the consequent reduction in the standard of education provided. This would indeed be a sorry thing in the lives of young Canadians, especially if the governments of the day stand by and do not seek some method by which our educational tradition can remain at a high level rather than be curtailed by austerity programs that are not in keeping with the other standards of living in this country.

I wish to make it plain that the solution of the educational problem must be arrived at without interfering in any way with the autonomous control of education enjoyed by the provinces. It may be argued that this educational problem is one which should be left to the provinces and not introduced on the floor of this house. On the contrary, today education is a national commodity. A person educated in Prince Edward Island may well work in the city of Toronto, and a person educated in the city of Toronto may well find employment in Victoria. The benefit of the education given in the formative years is enjoyed where the adult locates, and it is for that reason that I say there is a national interest in education. There is more than an interest merely in the standard of education. There is an interest also in the overwhelming burden the municipalities are being asked to share in the post-war expansion.

Everyone agrees that we must have more houses. With the development of more housing we find the demand on the municipalities for more services involving capital outlay. Some of the expenses incurred for these services, such as water and sewers, may be self-retiring in that the revenue will take care of the expenses incurred. However, there is no self-retiring basis for the expansion required in the educational field. Since the minister believes in a balanced budget and a retiring of the capital debt of the country, is it unreasonable to believe that the municipalities desire to do the same thing? It is evident that this philosophy cannot be carried out under the present system at the municipal level, except by curtailing necessary services.

One need only look at the increase in debt structure of the municipalities to appreciate the seriousness of the municipalities' position. I have with me tonight a table showing the municipal debt structure of seven provinces for the years 1949-50 and 1950-51. This table shows the total increase in municipal debt in this two-year period, and is as follows:

	1949	1950	1951	Total Increase
Nova Scotia	$ 32,564,000	$ 38,623,000	$ 46,437,039	$ 14,000,000
New Brunswick	33,523,000	38,054,000	44,917,303	11,000,000
Ontario	364,475,000	435,038,560	538,117,561	174,000,000
Manitoba	54,767,000	60,000,000	77,588,250	13,000,000
Saskatchewan	35,000,000	41,000,000	47,081,265	12,000,000
Alberta	76,000,000	103,000,000	119,463,855	43,000,000
British Columbia	127,000,000	133,000,000	153,147,786	26,000,000
Quebec			549,262,459
Newfoundland			4,100,573
				$293,000,000

From personal observation during the years 1951-52 and 1952-53, I would say that the debt increase has been higher during those years. The total municipal debt of this country in the past four years must have increased until it is now very close to $750 million.

This system of financing is quite contrary to the principle of debt retirement so often enunciated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Now, what are the reasons? Surely the municipal administrators are Canadians, as he is, and therefore they have the usual abilities to administer funds. I wonder if perhaps the reason is the decrease in the percentage of the tax revenue which is now allocated to the municipalities. The percentage of the per capita share of the tax dollar in 1939 was as follows: the federal share was about 40 per cent; the provincial share was about 20 per cent and the municipal share was about 40 per cent. In 1951 the federal share had increased to 71 per cent; the provincial share remained about the same, it had dropped to about 17 per cent, but the municipal share had dropped from 40 per cent of the national share of the tax dollar to 12 per cent. In other words, there was a drop in municipal revenue directly of 28 cents in the dollar.

It was admitted by the provinces and the municipalities that during the war years the federal budget required bumping up to meet the exigencies of the situation and, accordingly, certain concessions were given. It must now be admitted by this house that municipal budgets need bumping up to meet the exigencies of the situation and it is now time for this government to take the steps necessary to effect that.

It may be of interest to this house to know that without one increase in adult population in this country the educational costs will have doubled by the time the children now in grade 1 reach grade 8. In other words, educational costs in this country will have doubled without one increase in adult population in the next seven years.

I know it is not the intention of the members of this house that the educational systems of which we have become so proud shall be allowed, through lack of a few dollars, to become stagnant pools. We know it is the earnest desire of every member to see that the children in this country are properly educated. I believe that some hon. members are a little inclined to pooh-pooh the position of many of the municipalities, and I believe that a careful study by them of the municipal position will cause them to review their previous thoughts and will perhaps move them to take some concrete steps so that the municipalities which so gladly gave to this country when it was required during the war years will receive their just due at this time so they may continue with the proper services to their own residents.

If we accept the premise that there is a continued need for educational services, and if we accept the fact that the municipalities will shortly not be able to deal with it from their present sources of revenue, then the responsibility lies with this government to seek a satisfactory solution to the problem to ensure the future of the young Canada of today.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, the present debate on the budget assumes an especially great importance for the taxpayers of the province of Quebec and I would like to make today my humble contribution to this discussion.

I intend to put forward tonight some suggestions and opinions which may help find a solution to the ticklish problem recently created by the attitudes which have been taken with respect to provincial income tax. The adoption of definite positions has brought the relations between the federal government and the provincial government to a deadlock.

The taxpayers of Lake St. John district are following the debate on that matter with a great deal of attention and interest and they have a right to know what their representative in Ottawa thinks of it.

Mr. Speaker, the double taxation which applies to 300,000 taxpayers of the province of Quebec has given rise to considerable unrest among our population. I wish to object without delay to a situation which would mean that in the field of personal income tax, the taxpayers of my province would bear a heavier burden than the taxpayers of the other provinces. On the other hand, in his extremely well documented and balanced speech, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) recently showed that if Ottawa agreed to the 15 per cent exemption claimed by Quebec regarding the provincial tax levied on personal income it might well upset the whole structure of the present fiscal agreements, in fact that such a system of exemption would upset the whole Canadian economy.

I am opposed to having Quebec taxpayers pay 10 per cent more income tax than the citizens of the other Canadian provinces. All responsible Canadian citizens should make it a point to study this situation and find a solution if possible.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is appropriate to make an analysis of the circumstances and reasons that have brought about present conditions. I do not want to try to interpret the intentions of the fathers of confederation, that is to ask myself whether they were centralizers or autonomists.

I am satisfied that none of the fathers of confederation could humanly foresee the present situation. At that time no one could foresee the stupendous development that would come about in Canada during the twentieth century.

In the 87 years that have elapsed since the act of confederation, Canada, which was a colony in 1867, has now attained its full independence.

In the past 40 years we have very generously done our share in two world wars.

Then, as a free and sovereign nation we have committed ourselves to heavy obligations, to safeguard democratic freedoms, through membership in the United Nations Organization and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

We have gone even further; we are taking part in the Colombo plan, which has cost us $25 million each year so far. Through the Colombo plan we are helping the nations of southeast Asia to attain economic stability, we are relieving the hunger of millions of Asian people, who ask nothing better than to stay free, to prosper in peace and, above all, to stay outside the communist sphere of influence.

Everyone knows that communism prospers where there is starvation and poverty; it intensifies its propaganda when harvests are bad, when people are starving, in Asia more than anywhere else perhaps. The Colombo plan is a humanitarian undertaking which promotes freedom and constitutes a means to curb communist and atheistic dictatorship.

Those generous policies taken by the federal government were approved by the Canadian people; so were the extraordinary expenses that Canada had to incur as a contribution to the defence of the free world against the constant communist threat whether in Korea, in Europe or elsewhere. The high cost of social security in Canada was requested, obtained and approved by the Canadian voter. The Liberal party was only yielding to popular demand, when it undertook, during the past quarter century, to set up the whole system of social security.

But, Mr. Speaker, this assistance to family, national health, old people, unemployed, veterans and so on, entails for the central government and the taxpayer an enormous burden of responsibilities which must always be discharged.

Some people see in this controversy between Quebec and Ottawa nothing but a political issue; but it appears to me basically as a problem which must be viewed in turn under its constitutional, ethnical, social and economic facets.

We should not allow the political aspect of this matter, acute though it may be at this time, to obscure the rest.

I will return later to that part of my remarks but, for the moment, I would like to say a few words about the Quebec aspect of this situation.

Because of its racial characteristics, because of its religion, which differs from that of most Canadians, because of its own peculiar school system, through which it has been able to jealously guard its French language, Quebec has always looked upon its part in confederation from a point of view unlike that of the other provinces.

These may, without undue difficulty, accept an exchange in federal-provincial jurisdictions. Quebec, so far, has refused to enter into an agreement similar to that accepted by the other provinces.

The people of Quebec hold pretty generally to the theory that the government of that province must stand very close watch over its sources of tax revenue so as to be in a position to discharge the obligations imposed upon it by its own peculiar ethnical characteristics, notably in matters of education and health.

One can approve or disapprove that theory, but to be realistic and honest, it must be admitted that in the quest of a solution to the present deadlock, that point of view must be taken into account.

Ottawa and Quebec have already concluded agreements and there is no reason why those two governments should not try to open discussions on new topics such as income tax, for instance.

It is obvious that during those conferences it will be necessary to take into account federal obligations in the field of social security, among other factors.

In 1952 all provincial governments, including that of Quebec, agreed to amend the constitution to allow the implementation of old age security. This measure burdened the federal treasury with an annual expenditure of nearly $400 million.

The importance of federal leadership and policies in case of a depression having previously been stated by experts, I shall not linger on this point. It is, for instance, a well known fact that, should inflation become somewhat acute, the federal government may alone apply the brakes by controlling prices, credit, and so on.

From a constitutional point of view, articles 91 and 92 of the constitution are very explicit, and I cannot subscribe to the proposition that the provinces have priority in matters of direct taxation. The rights of each government, federal or provincial, are unquestionably equal and parallel.

The position is this: both governments have concurrent jurisdiction in matters of direct taxation. Some consultation is necessary to discuss and determine, with the help of financial experts, the normal limit to which the taxpayer may be called upon to pay without creating chaos in the people's economy. The normal point of saturation for personal income taxes could be set at 100 per cent. Direct taxation, that is corporation and individual income tax, succession duties and so on could be re-examined at the same time.

Federal and provincial experts, having determined, after a study of these questions, the needs in each field, federal and provincial, the allotment of direct taxation could perhaps be considered so that there should never again be any duplication or double taxation.

Federal-provincial agreements are such a new and recent institution that it is impossible for all means of respectable understanding and compromise, acceptable to all concerned while safeguarding the autonomy of the provinces, to have been exhausted. Formulas will come out of intergovernmental discussions, provided that such discussions take place in a friendly and creative spirit.

As it can be foreseen that considerable time will elapse before a final and permanent solution is arrived at in the taxation field, I would like to suggest a provisional and temporary solution.

Last year, the federal government granted to Quebec corporations a tax exemption of 7 per cent in view of the fact that Quebec had not signed any fiscal agreement.

It seems to me that the federal government could take into consideration the proposal that a similar 7 per cent deduction be granted to individual taxpayers, with respect to their provincial income tax.

Such a decision would mean that the provincial government would collect about the same amount it will raise through the imposition of 15 per cent tax, under the present law.

To achieve such a result all of the 700,000 taxpayers in Quebec, who pay their taxes to Ottawa, would have to contribute 7 per cent of their tax to the province of Quebec.

That solution would mean the same amount for Quebec but it would mean especially that the taxpayers in Quebec would not be aware of that provincial tax since it would be fully deducted by the federal government, as in the case of corporations established in Quebec.

It seems that such a temporary agreement would raise both governments in the opinion of the Canadian public.

While those temporary agreements were in force, discussions could very well be held for the purpose of finding a permanent solution to that ticklish problem.

And the Quebec taxpayers would not be prejudiced in the least. They would be in the same position as the taxpayers of the other provinces.

[Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John).]

Mr. Speaker, I have deliberately refrained from quoting the fathers of confederation and those who have presided over the destinies of our country since then. I have much respect for those who drafted the constitution of 1867, but I believe that our present problem must be settled by our own statesmen, in the light of present conditions.

Owing to the enlightened patriotism of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), his sound judgment and foresight, I am confident that the problem that has arisen as a result of the new provincial income tax act will soon be settled.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to voice my opinion in this debate, but above all to plead the cause of the taxpayers of Lake St. John and of the province of Quebec as a whole.

The Saguenay-Lake St. John district has witnessed in recent years a truly extraordinary economic development as a result of its varied and numerous resources, and more particularly of its powerful hydraulic resources. The prosperous district of Chibougamau, which was a source of envy for the Abitibi and Lake St. John districts, can now be reached from either of them since the government has decided to build a railroad between St. Felicien and Chibougamau and from there to Beattyville.

The Liberal party, which was responsible for the industrial expansion of Lake St. John district in the past, deserves once again the gratitude of the whole Saguenay population for the sound decision which it has just taken, giving new impetus to such a stupendous development.

I would not like to resume my seat without extending special thanks to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The people of Lake St. John district want me to recognize, on their behalf, the part he played in bringing about this sound decision taken by the government.

Since I came here, I have advocated on three different occasions the construction of this railroad. Again last year, on March 2, 1953, it was my privilege to conduct and introduce a delegation from the Saguenay industrial development council to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). Needless to say how happy I was to hear about that decision, which will be particularly beneficial to the constituency of my hon. friend, the member for Roberval, but which will have a substantial effect, from an economical standpoint, over the whole Saguenay-Lake St.

John district, and therefore, over the constituency which I have the honour of representing in this house.

(Text):

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to take very much time in this debate. While I have not had the privilege of listening to many of the hon. members who have spoken, I have heard quite a few of them in the last few days and have found the speeches most interesting.

I do not think I would have taken part at all had it not been for a situation which seems to have been coming to a head in my own constituency, and apparently is reaching a point where it is serious. Most certainly I agree with other hon. members from the maritime provinces who have spoken. Invariably they have agreed that those of us in the maritimes do suffer disadvantages from which people in the rest of Canada do not seem to have to suffer. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has presented a rather prosperous picture in his budget. I imagine that almost everything has been said by way of general criticism, and also many speeches have been made supporting the minister's budget.

It would seem to me, from what I have read in Hansard and from what I have heard people say outside the House of Commons, that we appear to be running into a great deal of difficulty and, for such a prosperous country, there seem to be many trouble spots. We must realize that while there may be prosperity in some parts of the country there are many other places where there is a high degree of unemployment and where the people are having a difficult time. I think it is time this government along with others faced up to this situation. Before dealing with the subject about which I wish to speak I would like to quote a few words from the statement by the Minister of Finance as reported at page 3723 of Hansard where, referring I presume to the past year, he stated:

> In the economic sphere, 1953 has been a much better year. Industrial and agricultural production in almost all countries has continued to expand, and consumption has risen.

Last Friday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said, as reported at page 4285 of Hansard:

> I think, to state it mildly, that agriculture is in a better condition today throughout the Dominion of Canada than it has been at any other period in my experience. And when I say that, I do not mean only my experience in the government, but I mean as well my experience in farming. I think farmers all realize that they are in a better position today than they have been at any other time.

I am not disputing that from the government's standpoint in Ottawa and in studying tables of statistics covering the entire country that might well be a fair statement to make, but each of us who sees the picture as it regards our own constituency and the surrounding area has a very different perspective. We see the situation as it actually exists, and, as I pointed out before in this house, as it can be seen on the ground. From that point of view the government's outlook seems to be rather exaggerated, particularly when you compare their view with the situation as you know it and when you are familiar with the existing conditions.

Tonight I wish to spend a few minutes in dealing with the economy of my own constituency and the surrounding area in New Brunswick. The chief industry in that area happens to be potato farming. Very few people talk about potatoes in this house. I imagine there are other hon. members who could discuss this topic but most of them are on the government side of the house and I presume they are quite happy with the situation as they find it. However, I cannot say that for my own part because my people are not very happy at the moment. I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the Minister of Agriculture will agree with me when I suggest that they are probably in receipt of a large number of telegrams from people in my area and the surrounding countryside.

I am not going to read the telegrams which I have received in regard to this matter but I would like to state briefly the substance of one of them which I think will give this house an idea of the seriousness of the situation. This telegram comes from a group of potato farmers who are organized into what is called the federation of agriculture for Victoria county. Organizations such as this have been established in several counties. However, the telegram to which I have referred states that some 4,000 cars have been shipped and about 3,000 more remain to be shipped with no assurance from the marketing board that they will be handled. This telegram states that the remaining potatoes are deteriorating rapidly and will soon become unsaleable and that because of such deterioration the farmers in that area may be ruined financially. A large percentage of the farmers will be unable to plant another crop and some are now planning to get rid of their stock and machinery if possible and go out into the labour market and look for work.

After setting out these facts the organization winds up by asking that the dominion government through the Minister of Agriculture consider doing something to keep these farmers on the land so that they will be in a position to put in another crop.

That is the sum and substance of the situation, stated briefly. However, I would like to enlarge on that. I stated a few minutes ago that I did not dispute the fact that the cash income of farmers in Canada was greater last year than it was previously, but we are now in 1954 and the consumption of agricultural products is apparently diminishing because many people are unemployed and during this winter a great many people have been forced to live on a restricted income. It therefore has not been possible for them to eat as well as they normally would and that factor must be taken into consideration.

The Minister of Agriculture stated that cash income had doubled from something like $4,987 million during 1943 to 1945 to about $8,200 million during, I think he said, 1951 to 1953. I would have liked the minister to carry that calculation a step further and point out that while that cash income has increased the farmers' expenses have also increased. Had he done that I think it would have been demonstrated that the net result to the farmer in 1953 was that he was no better off than in 1943. They were certainly handling more money but they were not making any more. In other words, they could not put any money away, the only difference being that last year most of them put in another crop.

Last fall the New Brunswick potato farmers, following the lead of the farmers of Prince Edward Island, waited on this government and induced them to put a floor price on their potatoes, and that floor price—I think that is the way in which to state it—guaranteed a certain price. I thought that was quite a good idea and I still think so, particularly if the scheme was properly handled, but when the government undertook to do that they had to insist on the potatoes being handled by an agency, which is quite proper, and they were handled through what is called the marketing board.

But apparently there is a lot of confusion as to whether that board has been a success. During the few days which I spent at home during the Easter recess I met quite a number of farmers who came into my town and some were quite happy about the way in which the board had handled things because they had got rid of the potatoes and they were now in a position to go ahead and put in another crop. But I must confess there were just as many farmers who had not sold any potatoes as yet and they did not speak very highly about the way in which the board had handled the situation. I believe there is a great deal of truth in that because I am informed that someone in the department insisted that the board handle this potato business in a more equitable manner. If that is so I congratulate the officials of the department for keeping on the job. Since they started the quota there has been some improvement in the situation but unfortunately it was too late in the season in the case of those farmers who are still holding potatoes.

Three thousand cars of potatoes from the last week in April until the end of the season represent a large quantity of potatoes. These farmers are, as you may say, getting panicky. I know that many of the officials feel that these potatoes will be handled between now and the end of the season, but there is no assurance of that outcome. That is why these farmers are getting panicky. It is coming right now to the time when they should be starting new crops. A lot of these men are equipped to grow only potatoes. It is a potato area; it is potato land. They have the equipment for potatoes and they cannot easily switch to anything else. They seem to be faced with one of two situations: either to try to get credit to put in another crop, hoping that next year will be a good year—and about one in three or four usually is—or to sell their equipment and go out and try to get work on the labour market. I say that is an unfortunate situation.

I understand that the Minister of Agriculture also has received pleas from some of the municipalities. I can understand that. While I was in my own municipality, at Easter, as I still have a connection with the council I was called in in consultation with regard to loans. The county which is my own municipality is not what you would call a poor municipality. Its credit has been good. It is one of the good farming areas in New Brunswick. But I should like to point out this fact for the benefit of the members of this government who have been asked to give consideration to these pleas. The loans in the said municipality of Carleton are 100 per cent higher today—or they were when I was home—than they have ever been in the history of the county, even in the darkest days of the depression. The bank has been asked to get extra authority from its head office in order to make further loans to carry on until the end of June. If the farmers cannot carry on, they cannot pay their accounts.

A few minutes ago my hon. friend was speaking about the responsibility of municipal governments and the load of taxation. I should just like to confirm what he said from my own experience in my own municipality. Unless things pick up with regard to potatoes—and they are about the only thing out of which the people in my constituency are able to get money—and the accounts are settled up before August 1, a good many schools in my municipality will not open because I do not think you can expect the school teachers to go in and teach school unless they are sure of their pay. I am sorry to say this, and I am not crying blue ruin. However, I have enough experience to know how much money it takes in that municipality to run the schools, and I know that enough taxes will not be paid in by the first of September to keep all the schools going.

I am stating these facts, Mr. Speaker, and I have taken the floor to review this situation in order to impress it upon the government and upon our own minister from New Brunswick; I refer to the Minister of Labour. I think he understands the situation fairly well. While hon. members from other parts of Canada may say that you are subsidizing potatoes from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, I think it is important that you consider going a step further this spring and consider doing something for these farmers who have not been able to get rid of their potatoes or who will not be able to do so, in order to put them in the same position as are those who got rid of their potatoes.

Here is my reason for saying that. When you gave the guarantee last fall to the farmers through the marketing board you assumed some responsibility at least in so far as the farmers are concerned. I feel that you assumed a moral responsibility to see that every farmer who wished to sell his potatoes was treated fairly and equitably. I say that for this reason. The minute the board took over under this government's guarantee the dealers had no choice of free selling. The board bought the potatoes and controlled the orders. You took the competition—if you like to put it that way—away from the dealers. In other years when the market has been free and open and private enterprise has been handling the crop it has always been disposed of and the farmers never became panicky as they have this spring.

I am not saying that the board is not going to be able to dispose of this crop. I am not here criticizing that marketing board. When the board started operations last fall I lent it what little support I could among my constituents. I have stood behind it, and I still hope it turns out to be good. But this is what I want to impress upon this government and the members of it. These people are up against a serious situation and they do not feel like waiting to see whether the board is going to be able to take this stock. They are looking to you for some guarantee that the board will be able to handle it and that if the board falls down on handling it you will come to their rescue.

I say that for this reason, and I wish to repeat it. Had the board handled this whole transaction in an equitable manner, every farmer would have got rid of a certain percentage or all of his potatoes and if some potatoes were left in the cellars or the storehouses of farmers, every farmer would have been treated in the same manner. They would all have some, and then there would have been no kick. But when one man who has 3,000 to 4,000 barrels of potatoes to sell is allowed to get rid of them and another man, maybe his neighbour, who has 2,000 to 3,000 barrels of potatoes to sell has not sold them and has no prospects right away of selling them, that situation does not seem to be fair and equitable. That was the way, up until May 1, that the situation was lining up, as far as I can understand it. That is the reason there have been so many telegrams coming to the government or at least that is why the assistance is being asked for by the farmers for the balance of this season.

I do not think it is necessary for me to dwell any longer on this matter. I know that the potato business is full of rumours. No doubt the department here in Ottawa has heard all sorts of stories. No doubt you may think that some of these telegrams contain exaggerated statements. However, I know that the potato business is a tricky business. On behalf of these people in my constituency back home I want to impress upon hon. members the fact that unless they get a chance to get credit in order to put in another crop, a great many of them are going to be in just the situation described in one of the telegrams. They are going to be on the road. They are going to be out looking for a job in the labour market; and goodness knows there are not too many jobs available in the labour market. In these times no farmer should be forced to sell his machinery, to leave his farm or to go out and leave it unworked in order to make a living. I do not think that is good business. I say that this government is morally responsible because of the fact that they entered into an agreement with the marketing board.

I think you should have gone a step further and insisted that the marketing board treat all farmers alike. If you had done so, I do not think the farmers would have had any kick. But now you should do the best you can and give some direction to the board that they must handle all these potatoes in one way or another so that all farmers will be able to get rid of their potatoes and will be treated alike. If it does not work out satisfactorily then you can decide whether you want to carry on another year. I hope that the marketing board will become a successful institution. However, there is one thing against it. It takes away from the dealers the competition of selling and it may not turn out to be as good as we had hoped it would.

I think the Minister of Labour is going to hear more about it from the people in Victoria county, if he has not already, and also the Minister of Agriculture. I impress upon the government the necessity of doing something for these people because I feel that the government went into it in good faith and really led the farmers to believe in it. I am glad to see that the Minister of Agriculture has entered the house. I wish he had been here a few minutes ago, but he can read what I said. It was not very much. In part I was praising him for what he did and in part I was criticizing him for not insisting that the board do equitable work. I do not think you had to do it, but I do think that if you had taken hold of the allotment of orders sooner we would not have been in the position we are today.

I hope that the board will prove to be a success, but in order to make it a success I think the government has to give serious consideration to some of these pleas. As I said a few minutes ago, while you may feel that some of these statements are exaggerated, I know all about the potato business and I am afraid there is more truth in them than I like to believe. I happen to know that the loans of municipalities in this constituency have reached serious proportions. If there is anything you can do to give assurance to these people, get them out of their panicky condition and carry them through this season I am sure they will appreciate it.

(Translation):

Mr. Gustave Roy (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first time I have an opportunity to speak in this house, I would not like to depart from that excellent custom which would have me join every member of this house in congratulating Mr. Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin) and yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, upon your elevation to your present high posts and upon the dignity and competence brought by you to the discharge of your duties.

You will no doubt allow me to continue in this vein and to congratulate also the new ministers and parliamentary assistants, and more particularly the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) and the member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Speaker, from the few observations I have been able to make on the proceedings of this house, I have concluded that hon. members take advantage of two debates to say a few words on the importance of their constituencies: the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and the budget debate.

My riding is especially known because it sent to this house two great parliamentarians, two outstanding political figures, two great Canadians and two great autonomists. The first one, a father of confederation, Louis Joseph Papineau, and the second, an uncompromising advocate of the rights granted by this very confederation, Henri Bourassa.

A fervent patriot, a sincere and honest autonomist, Henri Bourassa, that great French Canadian political figure, left in the minds of my constituents, whom he worthily represented for several years, a political spiritual heritage they will preserve for a long time through future generations. Surely if Henri Bourassa were today at this desk, he would express all his satisfaction with the accomplishments which have resulted from ideas he suggested and vigorously advocated a quarter of a century ago. In all his independence, he would congratulate with me the present government for having implemented almost all along the line, in less than twenty years, the ideals he advocated; for having such ideals, suggested and debated hardly thirty years ago, they called him a utopian, a dreamer, and considered him unbalanced.

He would be proud and happy today to commend the St. Laurent government for the repatriation of the constitution, for the appointment of a Canadian governor general, for bringing about our complete independence from foreign ties, for the achievement of this great national unity prevailing among all Canadians. He would rejoice with me to see that an almost complete national unity may soon bring about the acceptance of a purely Canadian flag, the proclamation of a single national anthem, O Canada, and the early appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican.

But I wonder, these days, what Henri Bourassa would think of federal-provincial relations and of the thorny problem raised by the Quebec government with regard to provincial rights to direct taxation and their corollary, the deduction of the provincial income tax from the federal tax.

No doubt, this question seems to give rise to an issue that is difficult to solve, and since both governments concerned, i.e. the governments in Ottawa and Quebec, seem to have the same rights, I think my illustrious predecessor would dare suggest to the Ottawa government that it should again, under the circumstances, make the first conciliating gesture, in order to find a point of agreement and bring about tangible and profitable results for the Quebec taxpayer as well as for the national and provincial Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, with the exception of this last controversy, it seems that this budget has not generated too much deception or too much enthusiasm and that, generally speaking, the Canadian people recognize obligingly enough that Canada has had, for several years, an excellent finance minister (Mr. Abbott). We have therefore some reason to share once again the optimism reflected in this last budget.

However, may I suggest to the Minister of Finance to restrain his overenthusiastic advisers who propose to levy a tax on mutual fire insurance companies. In my riding, there are a few of these mutual companies which have every reason to complain and to try to prevent this unjust and unfortunate measure proposed by the Minister of Finance, since the carrying out of the sixth budget resolution would have disastrous consequences for the farmers of my constituency. And I am sure that if the Minister of Finance, with the help of the appropriate experts, goes to the bottom of the question, he will easily discover that these mutual societies are nothing but co-operative enterprises which have nothing to do whatsoever with the insurance business. They are no more than organized charity institutions. They are not looking for profits; on the contrary they involve the collective responsibility of their members. The fact that in some provinces, these mutual organizations have become profit-minded corporations is proof of the generalization of this transformation. If it is right to tax the first group, there must be some way to do it without annoying in any way those of us who remained faithful to the spirit which inspired their foundation.

Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the Farm Improvement Loans Act be amended or that those entrusted with its administration be made to pay less attention to red tape and show more interest in the excellent principles upon which the measure is based, so that the farmers from Quebec, and those of my riding in particular, may be able to benefit in greater numbers therefrom.

Mr. Speaker, the three main sources of revenue in my riding are agriculture, timber and the tourist trade. Because of the fluctuations of our markets and of the international situation, our agriculture is more or less stable, and our lumbering operations leave our forest workers all the time in a state of anxiety and insecurity.

Those two industries have to rely on a third one, the tourist trade, to balance their budget.

Sometime ago I read in an American sports and tourist magazine an article by an economist who stated that if Canada, and more particularly the province of Quebec, earmarked 50 per cent of its budget for the organization of the tourist trade in the vast areas so richly endowed by nature, in ten years the revenue from the tourist trade would double their annual budget and permit them to do away with most taxes, and more particularly with the 15 per cent income tax.

Before the war, and during the economic depression in Canada, the various governmental organizations in Ottawa had put forward several suggestions and projects to build up that profitable tourist trade. Billions of dollars are within our reach; we only have to extend the hand to get them. In my constituency, we have been endowed with natural beauties and advantages and we are only awaiting the funds which the government may decide to earmark for the organization and development of that trade, which would increase the standard of living of my constituents and make them prosperous, while paying dividends that would greatly compensate the government for its investment. Moreover, the expansion of the tourist trade would solve the unemployment problem which, in my constituency, is sufficiently serious to entail material and moral consequences, which the government should remedy.

Naturally those disturbances make themselves felt in various ways on our human resources and more particularly by a decline of health standards. I take pleasure in congratulating the government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for the progress made in the field of national health, but I always find it strange that a nation which spends two billions yearly for destructive purposes still has such a high rate of mortality, so many handicapped, so many people who suffer through lack of appropriate medical care because they cannot afford it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the government whether the time might not be ripe to set up a compulsory health insurance scheme for that large number of Canadians who cannot afford to be sick.

Health insurance could be set up by stages, adding, one after the other, the various categories of medical needs, starting however with medical and hospitalization costs in the obstetric and pediatric group, according to age and severity of illness.

Mr. Speaker, in the same line of thought, I congratulate the government, which will introduce a measure granting assistance to the disabled, adding another stone to the structure of our generous social security system and bringing our country a step closer to the social and economic objectives which consist in the elimination of inequalities in the distribution of revenue, thus ensuring a means of livelihood to vast categories of people.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say in concluding my remarks that as long as Canada will be under this administration which has been in power for the last twenty years, all Canadians may have faith in their country, in its development, as well as in its wealth and continued prosperity.

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, before the debate on the main motion is brought to a close, I would like to say a word on the budget resolutions introduced here on April 6 last, and more particularly on resolution No. 6, which is of interest to me since it is suggested that the surplus of mutual fire insurance companies be liable to taxation as though they were ordinary business concerns.

Of course, much could be made of the peculiar situation brought about in this respect by a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, which decided, in 1953, in a test case, that the Department of National Revenue, according to the terms of the Income Tax Act, had no right to levy taxes on that type of company. Following that judgment, which was only an interpretation of the law, the government have, on second thought, undertaken to change the act, to tighten its mesh, so to speak, in order to entrap certain groups of taxpayers who, so far, had got away scot free.

This change, if it is passed by the house, will oblige mutual fire insurance companies to pay taxes on the amounts paid in by the members to make up a reserve in order to face disastrous conditions which will certainly come about sooner or later.

I see two vital differences between the position of mutual insurance corporations and that of capital stock fire insurance corporations. First of all, what is taxed in the case of ordinary insurance companies are real profits, and the most apparent effect of the tax in this case is that the shareholders and not necessarily the policyholders will receive lesser profits, less substantial dividends, and premiums will not be necessarily increased. On the contrary, in the case of mutual insurance corporations, it is no longer profits which are being taxed, but rather expenses: it is the policyholders' premiums and these, of necessity, will have to be increased.

As a matter of fact, the amounts which make up the reserve and which would be taxable, under resolution 6, come only from the premiums paid in by the policyholders, and those premiums are collected in order to pay strictly administrative costs in addition to compensations allowed the policyholders in case of fire.

It is impossible to find in all this anything in the nature of a profit. This is a protection sold at cost, and how can one make a profit when one sells at cost?

I may be asked: if there is no profit, how can there be an accumulated reserve fund? This reserve fund is only meant to facilitate operations.

In principle, each member of a mutual company has, in case of a fire, to pay his share to compensate the victim of disaster. It is understandable that the larger the number of members, the slower and more expensive the operation of collecting contributions. In order to take care of this situation, the premium is collected once or twice a year. In other words, the member is made to pay his quota, or mutual contributions, in advance, instead of having to pay it at the time the disaster happens.

As the contribution is solely used for the compensation of disaster victims, and not for paying out profits to the shareholders, it is necessary to wait for a fire to happen before using it. That is why the amounts are put aside and accumulated for the bad days, and are called a reserve fund. Where is the profit item in all this?

Secondly, in the case of mutual companies, the eventual amount of compensation to be paid is difficult to determine in advance, since the company must base its calculations on a relatively limited number of members. Thus, the 309 mutual companies of the province of Quebec have an average of a little less than 300 members each. Capital stock companies, on the other hand, can rely on an infinitely wider membership. In this case it becomes easy to determine probable standards which will deviate but little from the line generally followed by the number of disasters. And it is exactly for that reason that those large companies have a reserve fund, the amount of which varies very little from year to year while, often enough, the so-called reserve of the mutual companies may be seen to melt suddenly—which would truly be the case—in a fire of major proportions.

Does the government want the farmers to go back to the old method of passing the hat every time one of them is hit by a fire? No doubt, that practice led to splendid demonstrations of a sometimes extraordinary sense of devotion. In fact, this practice is fortunately still in existence in many localities. However, one must not forget that things have changed since those heroic times. Our farmers have grouped themselves into organizations, the same way our workers did, by the way, and it would be unfair, I believe, to penalize them for doing so by taxing the manner in which, in a modern way, they have put to use their good old spirit of mutual aid and of mutual support.

Moreover why should mutual companies dealing with fire insurance be treated in a different manner from mutual companies dealing with life insurance?

During the last few days I have received letters, telegrams or resolutions in which eleven or twelve mutual organizations established in my riding of Beauce voiced their protests. Also, last week end, I had a visit, at home, from the official delegates of three or four other companies who expressed verbally their opposition to the project.

All told, 15 or 16 such mutual societies in Beauce county have officially protested against the government's intention to tax them. I therefore pass on very humbly to the house these protests and I beg the government not to give effect to the project embodied in the sixth resolution of the present budget.

(Text):

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, three questions come to my mind in considering the budget from the maritime point of view. They are prompted by the Minister of Finance's cheerless and pessimistic words with respect to the budget. His statement that present indications point to an early uptrend in business might in itself be considered fairly hopeful for us, but the past records of optimism of the government immediately defeats that in our minds. Further words that the outlook for export trade was uncertain and much depended on the United States were also disappointing to us. Added to this is the constitutional aspect that has developed out of the debate so far. And, surprisingly, we in the maritimes are interested in the British North America Act and its various interpretations.

These questions that come to my mind are, firstly, just what is the economic condition in the maritimes? Secondly, what are our rights and claims with respect to the British North America Act and, thirdly, what course of action might be taken? First of all, I should like to discuss briefly the economic condition of the maritimes. If there should be anyone here who has any doubt that we are in a bad financial strait in the maritimes I wish that he would be attentive while I review some facts pertinent to this point. In 1871 in the maritimes we had a population of 770,000 out of a total of 3·7 million. We made up one-fifth of the population of Canada. Now we make up one-eleventh. Saint John, my home town, at that time was the fourth largest city in the dominion; now we are the eighteenth and according to the last census our population has decreased 1,000.

To my mind the weekly wage rate is a key figure. I go through the Canada Year Book and I see these figures which indicate to me that we are not even holding our own in this respect. These are the weekly wage rate figures. In 1947, Prince Edward Island's was $24.75; Ontario, $38.57 and British Columbia, $41.55. The average weekly earnings in 1949, the last figures available, show Prince Edward Island with an increase of $5.01 to $29.76; Ontario had increased by $5.77 to $44.34 and British Columbia had the greatest increase of all, $5.81 to $47.36. While these figures might seem small, they are significant to me in this respect. At confederation the per capita trade figures for Ontario were $35. These are interprovincial trade figures that were kept at that time. They are not available now, but they do give us some comparison. New Brunswick surprisingly had a per capita trade figure of $56. That will give hon. members an idea of the trend since that time. The last figures for personal income show the maritimes at $804 and Ontario at $1,409.

A report on the economic condition of the maritimes is not complete, Mr. Speaker, without some consideration of present-day problems. The first one that comes to my mind is the unemployment situation. In Saint John the unemployment figures were 2,600 at Christmastime, 3,400 at the time of our unemployment debate and they are 4,200 now. In other words, the peak is not over in Saint John even though there may be some national trend different from that. Construction has been slow to come around and improvements in that picture will not be seen for some time.

The Marysville picture is still bad, with 385 people still out of work, according to the April 21 publication of the Fredericton Gleaner. Sixty-seven employees have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways in Moncton. The short Montreal closed season has hindered Halifax and Saint John. The other day I saw where some reliable labour group had estimated the unemployment in the maritimes at 20 per cent; whereas we know the Canadian figures are only 11 per cent.

Before leaving the economic picture of the maritimes I should like to quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 17, 1953. It is an article entitled: "Canada's stepchildren". It commended itself very highly to me as a very fair appraisal of the maritime situation. The subheading is: "Maritimes too dependent on Ottawa". I should say that it is written by Richard J. Needham. This reads:

> But the fact remains that the economy of that area—
> Referring to the maritimes.
> —is not in sound shape; that wages, and hence living standards, are substantially below the national average; that, as the financial editor of the Toronto Star put it a year ago, they are cut off from the rest of Canada by a sort of economic iron curtain. The fact remains that for all the money Ottawa has pumped into the maritimes since confederation, they are still unhealthily dependent on it.

And so I leave those figures of the economic situation in the maritimes with hon. members; and I throw out the challenge that if anybody can show me that we are even holding our own down there, I will be appreciative of it.

The second question that comes to my mind concerns our so-called maritime rights. This matter is very thoroughly dealt with in the report of the royal commission on maritime claims, commonly known as the Duncan report. This commission was headed by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, and sat in 1926. I believe the findings are still true today. Perhaps some of the suggestions for the future have changed a bit, but a complete analysis of the picture is still pertinent, and I recommend it to anyone who might be at all interested in the position of the maritime provinces. Many of these specific claims are dealt with in that report.

I should like to refer to four of those claims. The actual money grants were dealt with most thoroughly this afternoon by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). He referred to the claims that those of us in the maritimes believe we have, in view of the additions to territory in Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. Original agreements were made at the time of confederation—and I refer to both written and unwritten contracts. Before the actual contract was signed there was an understanding with the maritime provinces whereby, due to the fact that they could not possibly have territorial expansion, they would be allowed to share in the additions to the north enjoyed by the provinces I have mentioned. This matter is dealt with very thoroughly, and perhaps hon. members can guess at the results in that respect.

Then, in the matter of tax rentals, may I say I feel strongly about the way this matter was handled by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he was in Saint John in the election campaign last year. Statements were made to the effect that the government in Ottawa wished to be very generous with the maritime provinces in the matter of tax rentals because it was felt we had a claim to some of the money due to the fact that the head offices of our large corporations are located centrally. Well, that is the very thing to which we are objecting. We definitely want to have some of the head offices of businesses down our way so that it will not be a case of giving a handout every time we go after extra considerations.

Then the development of trade is another matter that confronts us vividly in the maritime provinces. Halifax and Saint John have suffered because of the Montreal season to which I referred a short time ago. Yet no efforts are being made by the central government even to try to regain United Kingdom trade. I feel that with Mr. Peter Thorneycroft and his group coming out to Canada in a short time we should get down to business and talk to them in an effort to regain this United Kingdom trade that is so very vital to the welfare of the eastern provinces.

Then there is one further matter, that of migration. We all know the story of the maritimers who have gone out west and done well. It is all very fine to be able to say that a premier of British Columbia is a New Brunswicker or that a prime minister of Great Britain was from the maritimes, or a justice of the supreme court in one of the other provinces is from the maritimes. That sounds good; but I say that we are losing our future if the best men in our eastern provinces have to go out west or to other places.

Finally I should like to deal with the course of action that might be taken by us in trying to correct this situation. The first suggestion I would make would be to forget the sectionalism that exists in the maritimes. I think we could take a fine example from western members who, when the wheat problem is under review, drop all their other interests and get behind the discussion of that problem. I remember speaking to a western member only today. I know that he has no connection with wheat farmers and that he is entirely independent of the wheat situation. However, he said to me, "I have to go down and speak about the wheat situation". That is a lesson for those of us from the maritimes.

The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) who comes from New Brunswick is interested in the Passamaquoddy project. Then, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) has spoken fluently about the Chignecto canal. At the present time I favour the Beechwood project. But I would say this, that we have to get together. I would not mind sacrificing interests or sectional ideas I might have if I felt that we could put our weight behind the suggestions we make. My weight might not be as great as some others who are in a better situation; but I believe that if we would speak up, as the western members do, we would be listened to.

Then my second suggestion is most appropriate in this debate on the budget, because I would refer to the situation at Marysville. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) spoke glowingly the other day in the committee on industrial relations about the plan they have to correct the situation down there, which has been brought about by the shutdown in the textile mills. We appreciate his efforts; nevertheless I feel it is my duty to say that those efforts are not being directed in the right way. The situation in Marysville can be corrected only by bringing new industry to Marysville. Vocational training for those who are there is all very well; but there must be industry for them to go to.

In this respect I believe we could take a lesson from the New England states. In their bargaining over support of the St. Lawrence seaway I understand some of the states have asked, and been assured they will get, consideration for their surplus labour areas. Another thing that was asked for, and might be worthy of consideration, was an acceptance by the government of a certain type of depreciation over a number of years, in an effort to induce new industries to locate in these surplus labour towns. In other words, assessments do not have to be lowered by the localities, but the federal government should be willing to depreciate by a special method of low-cost depreciation that would induce industries to locate in towns such as Marysville. I feel that would be a step in the right direction.

I have already pointed out the importance of trade to us in Halifax and Saint John, and I shall leave a suggestion in this connection.

I think we should investigate and consider very seriously the possibilities of making Saint John and Halifax free ports. In the United States today they already have free trading zones, and I know that San Francisco, New York, and New Orleans have had considerable success from this business of foreign trade zones. These foreign trade zones in the United States do not replace other shipping and receiving facilities. They provide extraordinary additional services the greatest of which in many cases develop trade which otherwise would not be able to move. This development of new trade in commodities which had not heretofore entered the United States is deemed to be of prime advantage in assisting, expediting and stimulating foreign trade.

These are the views I leave with you, Mr. Speaker, and in reviewing the matter I would like to say that I have emphasized three questions which came to my mind in first considering the budget. The first of these is, just what is the economic picture in the maritimes? Secondly, what are our rights under the confederation agreements? And thirdly, what course of action might be taken to get some form of agreement such as our western friends seem to be able to obtain? In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from this report of the royal commission on maritime claims which I have already mentioned. The words here are very appropriate and I think they hit the nail on the head as far as the maritimes are concerned in relation to the dominion. I quote from page 11 of the report which reads as follows:

> The maritime provinces today are different in the structure of their enterprise from what they were in 1867, and their potentialities are even greater today than they were then. Confederation, too, is no longer an experiment. Its achievements in the complicated art of nation-building have brought it to a point of development which more than justifies the hopes and the vision of the early builders. The maritime provinces have produced, in every walk of life, men who have played a high part in the story of achievement. We believe that the claim which these provinces have submitted . . . and the future possibilities of their own part of the dominion, should now be reviewed with sympathetic consideration and understanding, so that in approaching the future a better balance of territorial prosperity can be assured, and the original hope of confederation—unity, prosperity and contentment for all the provinces, as well as for the whole of Canada—can be made capable of realization.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I have the permission of the house to adjourn the debate?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Speaker, the budget debate at present taking place in this house offers opportunities to hon. members to express their views on certain matters which otherwise may not arise in the ordinary course of the proceedings and which do not generally come under discussion. But listening to other hon. members taking part in this debate, and reviewing the subject matter of the serious problems which are brought to the attention of the government, I am amazed that up to this time no one has touched on a problem which is surely of concern to all hon. members because it involves a matter of great importance in the rapid growth of this young country.

Looking at a map of the world and Canada's location thereon in terms of its relation to neighbouring countries we cannot help but notice that Canada covers a vast area and is geographically in a strategic position. It is only a few flying hours from our neighbours to the north and northwest. In addition to its strategic position its territories contain vast resources of strategic materials. Space is another thing that we have in great abundance in Canada and while that in a sense is a blessing, when one considers the possibilities of expansion and growth, it must be borne in mind that our cities and our people are widely scattered and distance carries with it serious liabilities.

In this regard I would like to deal with the problem of the ever-increasing needs for commercial roads and highways throughout our country. There has been very little discussion during this session of parliament on this topic other than the proposed assistance in the construction of the trans-Canada highway project. Highways and roads are of great importance to Canada and I consider it my duty to express views on this "down to earth" subject and introduce for the serious consideration of the government the need for further financial aid to the provinces, particularly in the matter of building certain interprovincial highways which, because of their military significance, are important for the entire country.

It is realized, Mr. Speaker, that the function of building and maintaining highways and roads falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but when roads affect the social, economic, cultural and indeed the security and lives of Canadians then I do believe that a certain measure of this responsibility must fall upon the shoulders of the senior government.

On motion of Mr. Holowach the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow and later in the afternoon I hope we will be able to take the resolutions.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 5, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

INTERIM REPORT ON CRASH AT MOOSE JAW

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, an interim report on the Moose Jaw aircraft disaster has now been received by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). Interim reports have also been received by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and by myself as the minister responsible for Trans-Canada Air Lines. The following statement is a summary of the facts disclosed by the three reports, all being in agreement as to the facts.

On April 8 last a Harvard training aircraft of the R.C.A.F. and a Trans-Canada Air Lines North Star were in collision over the northeast outskirts of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. Investigations into the circumstances surrounding the collision are being conducted by the Department of Transport, the R.C.A.F. and Trans-Canada Air Lines. Completion of reports in this connection will take some time, but certain facts have been established which indicate what took place.

Trans-Canada Air Lines' scheduled flight No. 9 en route from Montreal to Vancouver was proceeding west on civil green airways No. 1 over Moose Jaw in accordance with its flight plan. The R.C.A.F. Harvard was climbing in a northeasterly direction across the airway in accordance with its flight plan which involved a routine navigational exercise. It was not performing aerobatics nor engaged in interception of the civil aircraft. The weather at the time of collision was excellent from a flying standpoint and visibility could not have contributed to the collision. All findings indicate that both of the aircraft were functioning properly from a mechanical standpoint and that the communications systems were in order. The T.C.A. pilots were competent in every respect for their assignment and their previous records were free from accidents. The captain had flown approximately two million miles in the company's service. The R.C.A.F. pilot of the Harvard had an outstanding record on his course and was known to be a mature and responsible young officer.

The two aircraft were on converging courses. The initial impact apparently took place between the nose of the Harvard and the left outboard engine of the North Star. It is calculated that as the aircraft approached the point of collision the North Star was approximately 45 degrees to the right of the Harvard line of flight. The Harvard was approximately 23 degrees to the left and one or two degrees below the North Star line of flight. Partial destruction of the aircraft took place at the point of collision with total destruction following, by fire and impact with the ground. It cannot be established whether either pilot saw the other aircraft, but it must be concluded that they did not see each other in time to avoid collision, although both were in a position to have done so.

As in the case of road traffic, the rules of the air provide that when two aircraft are converging the aircraft on the right has the right of way and the aircraft on the left must alter course to avoid collision. This, of course, does not relieve either pilot of the responsibility for keeping a sharp lookout to avoid collision.

Standing instructions of both the R.C.A.F. and T.C.A. emphasized the necessity for care arising out of the proximity of the airways and the Moose Jaw training establishment.

It has always been the policy within Canada and in other countries to avoid unnecessary restrictions on flying under clear weather conditions of good visibility. Canadian regulations are under constant review and are not only comparable with, but in some cases more rigorous than, those of other countries. Nevertheless, a special examination of existing regulations, both civil and military, has been undertaken on a joint basis to ascertain whether changes, particularly in those sections having a bearing on this accident, are required.

Prompt steps have been taken to effect settlement with those who suffered from the disaster. The Royal Canadian Air Force has assumed responsibility for settling damages for life and property that occurred on the ground, and Trans-Canada Air Lines has assumed responsibility associated with passengers in the aircraft. These settlements are being made without prejudice to the division of the costs of the settlements between R.C.A.F. and Trans-Canada Air Lines, which will be determined after all final studies have been completed.

Aircraft Crash at Moose Jaw

Mr. Green: Does the minister not think that further steps should be taken to keep those training planes away from the travelled routes of the passenger planes?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Steps are being taken at the present time to determine further measures to protect both the training planes and the passenger planes. Just what that report will be I do not know, but I assure my hon. friend that his question is receiving study at this time.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister has reported for three departments, may I ask him: In the event of an opportunity occurring, either to discuss the report of the accident or to make suggestions, on what estimates of what department should the matter be discussed if it is desired?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I presume the logical opportunity would be when the estimates of the Department of Transport are under discussion.

PRIVILEGE

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette acquainted us with the fact that today, May 5, the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Beaudoin), who is also the distinguished Speaker of the house, is celebrating his birthday—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to have to call my hon. friend to order, especially since he is being so kind to me, but the subject which he wishes to speak about is not such as to allow him to rise at this time on a question of privilege.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, would you allow me to present my best wishes to you later, personally?

Mr. Speaker: It is always permissible for any hon. member to approach the Speaker, whatever the reason.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT TO ADD CHURCHILL AS DELIVERY POINT

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 441, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as set out in the explanatory notes, is to permit producers in the area accessible to Churchill to benefit from the cheaper freight rates.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

H.M.C. DOCKYARD, ESQUIMALT—TENDERS FOR CRANES AND MONORAILS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Have tenders been called for overhead cranes and monorails for the electric shop at H.M.C. dockyard, Esquimalt, British Columbia?

2. If so, (a) what safety factors have been set out in the specifications, including safety devices at discharge points and interlocks; (b) what specifications have been made regarding provision for impact loads; (c) what specifications have been given for the maximum beam deflection under full load?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. (a) The specifications call for a safety factor of not less than 5 to 1. This safety factor applies to safety devices at discharge points and interlocks and through discharge points and interlocks. The specifications also call for all interlocking beams which constitute discharge points to be locked together with safety and perfect alignment by means of a heavy slotted steel fork held in place by spring action. The automatic stops are to be raised to allow passage of the wheels of the hoist carrier under them only when the crane girder is properly aligned and the interlock thrown. This is designed to eliminate the possibility of the carrier running off when the interlock is disengaged.

(b) A minimum allowance of 10 per cent of the live load is required for impact as required for electric hoists operating at a speed of less than 30 feet per minute.

(c) There has been allowed a maximum beam deflection of 1/450 of the span in the specification for all cranes, runways and monorails in this system under full load.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—RAYMOND ARTHUR DAVIES

Mr. Hamilton:

1. Has Raymond Arthur Davies, recently sentenced to two years in jail for passport frauds, ever been connected in any way with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. If so, in what way, for how long, and at what dates?

3. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ever purchased scripts or material from him?

4. If so, what was the title of each, and when was it broadcast?

5. If Mr. Davies was ever employed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, who authorized his employment, and who recommended him for employment?

Mr. McCann:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. During the spring of 1944 several short items were selected and used from a number which Davies submitted on a free lance basis while in Moscow as a newspaper correspondent. Following his return from allied countries he made five 15-minute broadcasts dealing with conditions in allied countries in eastern Europe on the following dates: December 21 and 28, 1944; January 4, 11 and 18, 1945.

5. See answer to No. 1.

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK—SLAUGHTERHOUSE

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Is the government building a slaughterhouse at Riding Mountain national park?
2. If so, what will be the cost of this slaughterhouse, and what functions will it perform?
3. Who is performing these functions at the present time, and at what cost?

Mr. Lesage:

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. To keep the herd at about a constant level, a small number of buffalo are slaughtered each year. Tenders are called on the basis of per pound dressed carcass weight, f.o.b. the animal enclosure at the park. The animals are shot by the park staff but the skinning, dressing and removal of the carcasses from the park are carried out by the butcher submitting the highest tender. The actual cost of the work is therefore not known. The total paid to the department in 1953 by the successful tenderer, Mr. H. W. Scrase of Dauphin, Manitoba, was $1,157.77.

CIVIL DEFENCE—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Cavers:

1. Has a federal-provincial conference on civil defence been held recently? If so, on what date?
2. Who attended the conference?
3. Was there any discussion of the administration of the civil defence grants program? If so, what was the gist of such discussion?
4. What were the other principal aspects of discussion?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes. On March 29 and 30, 1954.

2. The Minister of National Health and Welfare. The provincial ministers responsible for civil defence. The provincial civil defence co-ordinators. Federal civil defence officials. Sir John Hodsoll, director-general of civil defence training for the home office, Great Britain, and the Hon. Mrs. Katherine Howard, assistant administrator of the United States federal civil defence administration, also attended.

3. Yes. The discussion revolved about proposed extensions to and revisions of the grants program and methods of making the grants more flexible.

4. Among the other principal subjects of discussion were the hose coupling standardization program, training programs, revisions to the existing federal civil defence compensation scheme, continued co-operation between all levels of government, medical and welfare stockpiling problems and communications and warning systems.

Sir John Hodsoll advised the delegates regarding the civil defence problems faced in Britain, the Hon. Mrs. Howard summarized civil defence programs in the United States, the chairman of the Canadian chiefs of staff committee gave an appreciation from the military point of view of the international situation, and the chairman of the defence research board discussed new developments in the field of offensive and defensive weapons.

HAROLD C. BANKS

Mr. Hamilton:

1. Was Mr. Harold C. Banks ever a member of the labour advisory board of the Canadian maritime commission?
2. If so, what was the date of his appointment?
3. Is he now a member?
4. If not, when did he resign?
5. What was the reason for his resignation?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Yes.

2. March 12, 1952.

3. No.

4. May 12, 1952.

5. In tendering his resignation Mr. Banks wrote that his duties as vice-president of the Seafarers International Union of North America left him no time to continue on the labour advisory board.

MICHEL SEIGNEUR

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. When and how did Michel Seigneur enter Canada?
2. Was he, at any time, an inspector of the Waffen SS?
3. Has he been sentenced in any French court for treason?
4. If so, what was the sentence?
5. Has Seigneur been granted Canadian citizenship?

Questions

Mr. Harris:

1. On December 1, 1946, as a non-immigrant. As the House of Commons was informed on March 2, 1949, Dr. Seigneur was granted a landing under authority of order in council P.C. 2920, dated June 29, 1948.

2. Information not available.

3 and 4. He was sentenced to death in absentia, by a French court of justice, as guilty of having had dealings with a foreign power with a view to encouraging the undertakings of that power against France.

5. Yes.

LEPROSY

Mrs. Shipley:

1. Approximately how many new cases of leprosy are admitted to Canadian leprosaria annually?
2. What proportion of these contracted the condition outside of Canada?

Mr. Martin:

1. 1951-52, 3 cases; 1952-53, 1 case; 1953-54, 3 cases.

2. All of the above cases are believed to have contracted the disease outside Canada.

IMMIGRATION—VACCINATION

Mrs. Shipley:

1. How many persons are vaccinated annually under Canada's quarantine regulations requiring vaccination of persons entering Canada?
2. From what countries may persons enter Canada without the requirement of recent vaccination?

Mr. Martin:

1. Not less than 300,000 persons are vaccinated annually as a result of present quarantine requirements. These include 150,000 immigrants, 50,000 visitors from Europe, 50,000 of the 200,000 merchant seamen who arrive at Canadian ports each year on ships subject to quarantine, and approximately 50,000 travelling Canadians.

2. Persons entering Canada from the United States, Alaska, the Hawaiian islands, Panama canal zone, Bermuda, Cuba, the Bahamas, Jamaica, the Virgin islands, St. Pierre, Miquelon, Iceland and Greenland, are not required to have vaccination certificates on entering Canada.

CHIGNECTO CANAL

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland):

Will consideration be given by the international joint commission for the inclusion of a canal across the isthmus of Chignecto, making Boston the American eastern seaboard terminal of the St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. Pinard:

No. The international joint commission has no jurisdiction over the isthmus of Chignecto.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PORT BURWELL HARBOUR

Mr. McBain:

1. Did the railway car ferry Ashtabula go aground in Port Burwell harbour?
2. If so, how many feet of water does the Ashtabula draw?
3. What is the estimated depth of the water in Port Burwell harbour?
4. In view of this, does the government intend to send the public works dredge to Port Burwell?
5. If so, when will it commence dredging operations?

DISABILITY PENSIONS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many disability pensioners, by provinces, are there in Canada?
2. How many disability pensions, by provinces, have been awarded each year since 1949?
3. What were the total enlistments, by provinces, during world war II?
4. How many disability pensions, by provinces, have been awarded to veterans with service in Canada only, and how many for service in the United Kingdom and European theatres of operation?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I had a word with the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and he is agreeable to having substituted for the word "provinces", where it occurs in this question, the words "districts of the Department of Veterans Affairs"; and also to substitute for the date "1949" the phrase "each fiscal year since April 1, 1949". This will make it much easier to answer this question and on that understanding might it be made an order for return?

Mr. Speaker: The question as amended is made an order for return.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO DESCRIPTIVE PAMPHLET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Does this rather attractive pamphlet, which came to me at noon today and which is entitled "Proposed South Saskatchewan river development project", printed by the queen's printer in Ottawa and dated April, 1954, containing all the details of the scheme, mean that the government has decided to go ahead with the South Saskatchewan dam?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the interesting pamphlet to which the hon. member refers, and all I can say is that no decision has been reached in that regard up to the present time.

Mr. Coldwell: I will be very glad to send the pamphlet across to the Prime Minister, and I would point out that it was produced by the government.

BUTTER

PURCHASES IN 1954—SUPPORT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Proudfoot (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture the following questions: (a) Is the agricultural prices support board purchasing 1954 butter, and if so at what price? (b) Has there been any recent change in the butter price support program?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to submit a copy of this question to me yesterday and I have had this answer prepared. The dairy year is considered to run from May 1 to April 30. At April 30, 1954, the agricultural prices support board held in stock about 33 million pounds of 1953 make butter.

The current support price in bulk or the board buying price is based on 58 cents per pound basis Montreal through April 30, 1955. The board offers to buy first grade creamery butter manufactured in Canada in carloads at this price. This means that the board is a buyer in the market at all times.

On May 3, 1954, the board, in order to continue selling its stocks of 1953 butter, reduced the selling price to 55½ cents per pound in solids in carloads in Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and British Columbia.

The net effect of this policy will be that the board will continue to protect the producers' price at the 58-cent level and may buy a somewhat larger proportion of the total current make butter because 1953 make butter will be moving into consumption.

A similar operation was completed in the spring of 1950 when the board held about 20 million pounds of 1949 make butter at April 30, 1950.

Some groups have suggested that farmers will receive less money owing to this policy. This should not result, since the board continues to buy on the same basis as it did last year and will buy as much first grade butter manufactured in Canada as it is offered.

Under the present plan we start at 58 cents each year in bulk at Montreal and advance monthly until the selling price reaches 61 cents, that is, wholesale. We must go back to the original price of 58 cents at the beginning of each year, or the support price would increase to a high level over the years.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 4, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of the debate last evening I had made introductory remarks with respect to the theme of my address. I said that the budget debate offers opportunities for hon. members to express their views on matters which ordinarily do not come up for discussion unless, of course, they appear in the program of business of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time for private consultation having expired, may we now resume the discussion of the budget?

Mr. Holowach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Speaking yesterday evening, I mentioned that various members who had taken part in the budget debate had already touched on timely problems but that, thus far, no one had discussed a matter which is of primary and basic importance in the rapid growth of this young country. It was pointed out that Canada's geographic position on the map of the world is strategic, and that our cities and our people are scattered widely over a large area. It follows that distance is a blessing in the matter of our future potentialities, but since our cities and people are widely scattered on the face of the map this presents serious liabilities in connection with the protection of this vast country of ours.

The problem which I intend to discuss is created by the ever-increasing need for commercial roads and highways which will serve Canada not only in the economic sense but in the event of emergencies. I further pointed out that thus far little reference had been made in this session of parliament to furthering federal aid to the provinces in the matter of their road programs, beyond the assistance given to the provinces in the matter of the trans-Canada highway project. The need for federal aid to the various provinces in their road programs is extremely great. I intend to make reference to the need for one particular interprovincial highway which, apart from its commercial advantages to western Canada, would provide western Canada with further measures of protection.

In my opening remarks I explained that I realized the building of highways and roads is a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. But since roads affect our entire economic and social life—and surely we will agree on this point—as well as providing security in the event of emergencies, a great deal of responsibility in the matter of assisting the provincial governments in their road-building programs rests with the senior government.

I am sure that we will all agree, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of our assembly is to legislate and to govern. But this function does not always provide common ground for agreement for the simple reason that, with regard to legislation, there are various interpretations which various members give, as to what is the best type, as far as the needs of our country are concerned. However, I am certain that all of us will basically agree on this, namely, that the purpose of government is to offer protection to our country and to our people. It seems proper for me to say that realism suggests that roads are essentials for the well-being of our people in the economic, the social and the security sense.

I spent considerable time yesterday with this thick volume of some 600 pages containing the government's estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955. The estimates provide for expenditures of close to $5 billion, and of this amount $2 billion is for national defence. From there I proceeded to the lengthy text of the budget address, and I searched in vain for some indication of further federal aid to the various provinces in the matter of assisting them with their road programs. I was naturally disappointed because I could see no measure or outline of program which would indicate that such aid is forthcoming. Especially regrettable was the fact that no reference was made to the need for construction of additional trans-Canada highways, and in particular one from the city of Winnipeg to the west coast, through the central portion of western Canada by way of Saskatoon, Edmonton, Jasper park and the Yellowhead route.

The various provincial governments of western Canada and public-spirited bodies as well as military authorities have insisted that such a road should be undertaken. I believe that the federal government would perform a great service to this end were they able to spark negotiations and give some measure of inducement and encouragement to the provinces involved in the matter of building this essential highway.

[Mr. Holowach.]

According to the details itemized on page 53 of the 1954-55 estimates for the Department of Public Works, the total federal contributions to the provinces under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act will be $20 million, which is an increase of only $5 million over 1953-54. This amount is for all the provinces of Canada with the exception of Quebec which, I understand, has not entered into the dollar-for-dollar cost arrangement. Further, it is indicated that the grand total of expenditure for the administration, the operation, the surveying and construction of trans-Canada highways through the national parks, as well as the already noted contributions in the matter of the trans-Canada highway project, will be $22,487,484 which is an increase of some $6,031,883 over the preceding year. While some may feel that the federal contribution is substantial, in the light of the comparison with what the provinces are spending and allowing for factors of revenue and population, I believe that the federal contribution is "embarrassingly insignificant" and represents only a scratch on the surface as far as the highway problem is concerned.

In the April 10, 1954, issue of the Financial Post, on page 46 there is indicated an outline of the various spending of the provincial governments in the matter of highway construction. I should like to read just a few of the larger expenditures. As to Quebec:

> During 1953-54 the Quebec roads department completed an extensive program of road construction, in many cases continuing the work begun in the previous year. Outlay for roads totalled $57·7 millions.

As to Ontario, the following interesting report appears:

> The current year, which is the fifth in a five-year building program, is provided with $124·3 millions for building, maintenance and administration. But there is a balance of $21·5 millions in the highway reserve account. The total of current budget and reserve account makes it very likely that the province this year will complete a record highway building, reconstruction and maintenance program.

With regard to Manitoba, the following appears:

> Two major factors have given impetus to road highway development in Manitoba: the tourist traffic and the development of the province's natural resources. This impetus is measured by a $17 million expenditure last year, to be boosted to $18 millions this year.

As to Saskatchewan, we have this report:

> Saskatchewan's road budget has been raised to $18·6 millions this year from 1953's figure of $17·2 millions. Some $5 millions has been earmarked for trans-Canada highway including the federal government's share.

With respect to Alberta the report is as follows:

> Alberta's expenditure for highways this year shows the biggest increase over 1953 of any province: $57 millions this year compared with $38 millions last year. Of the total, $41·8 millions will go for new construction.

This is the situation with respect to British Columbia:

> In the fiscal year ended March 31 the province spent $27·1 million on construction and $13·1 million on maintenance. It looks now as though 1954 spending will be about equal to this figure.

A most interesting report that should be considered by the house is one issued by the trans-Canada highway system association dated April 21, 1954. It contains a tabulation showing United States federal aid authorizations to the various states for road construction. I might say that the report is based on pertinent information from the United States bureau of public works. It indicates that in nearly every fiscal year since 1916 tremendous amounts have been set aside for the purpose of assisting various states with their highway construction. The report outlines post-war authorizations by the United States government and indicates that during the fiscal years 1946, 1947 and 1948, $500 million was expended yearly making a grand total of $1,500 million in federal aid for road building during the three-year period. For the years 1950 to 1955 the colossal sum of $3,050 million has been allocated for the national system of highways. Peak aid is to come during the years 1954 and 1955 with some $575 million allotted to the various states for each year in order to assist them with their road programs.

In following recent congressional hearings in the United States, one also finds much emphasis laid on the importance of highways in that country. One of their objectives is to establish road-building standards at an early date. It seems to me that the exemplary program being followed by our good neighbours to the south should give us food for thought so far as our own highway programs are concerned. Many of the historical facets of the history of our nation are linked with the story of roads and routes. I am sure it would surprise many if they were to examine the events that have changed the course of nations and discover the important effect that roads and highways have had on the outcome of those events. I think that the impact of good roads on every phase of a nation's development cannot be questioned.

In the light of the tremendous development taking place at the present time in western Canada, and also because of the geopolitical situation in which our country finds itself, I think that the aiding of our various provinces in their road and highway programs is most necessary. Time and again we hear the need to develop new areas of Canada mentioned. As Canadians we realize that this country abounds in great resources and possibilities, and in addition to wise federal fiscal policies which are necessary in order to encourage development of our natural resources we must also have the means of acquiring access to those resources as well as to bring out the production of our rich country. Before we can take advantage of these resources we of course must have roads.

Nor do I think any hon. member can advance a logical argument why we should not formulate a clear-cut national program of highway construction. This would not mean that we would interfere with or jeopardize in any way the jurisdiction of the various provinces with regard to highways and roads, but it would provide a certain amount of guidance and objectives as well as standards which would suit not only our present needs but also those of future years.

I think such a policy is desirable particularly from the standpoint of national defence. Of course such a policy would have to be divorced completely from all political considerations and would have to be based on cold facts and what is in the best interests of the country. I realize that all of this requires money. The provinces need money. The federal government has heavy commitments, but I do not think that the words "financial assistance" should frighten us in view of the purpose for which the money would be spent. As grown-up men and women we of course understand that it is impossible to build all the highways we require or give all the assistance necessary at one stroke unless of course we implement the very sound principle that what is physically possible and desirable should also be made financially possible.

But under our method of doing things we recognize first things come first, and so far as highways are concerned those that have a direct bearing on the well-being of our nation as a whole should rightfully be considered as the first undertakings. The government grows bigger and bigger each year, and in the light of the broad scope of the bills introduced, and studying the various expenditures that are made, it would appear that we are not too far away from the time when there will be few functions that the government does not possess.

However, the primary concern of the government, as I mentioned before, is the security of our nation. Defence is a national matter. It occupies the highest priority in the spending of the taxpayers' money. There is no quarrel with that, for in the light of what is happening in the world we have no alternative. But it does seem strange that certain highways which would serve to make Canada great industrially and strong defensively do not share in that priority. I should like to make this matter clear. It is understandable to every thinking person that the provincial governments, undertaking as they do vast and varied road programs within their respective provinces in order to meet the needs of the various communities, cannot do justice to the needs of their provinces and on top of that build highways which will serve all the people of Canada in the light of our ever-growing economic expansion.

This matter has been brought to the attention of the federal government for many years. As recently as last spring the western provinces requested a conference with the federal authorities in order to discuss serious highway problems. I refer to a request on March 28, 1953, and again on April 10, 1953, by Premier Manning, acting on behalf of and in accord with the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. May I say that backing this request were the people of western Canada who were not seeking concessions but felt justly that the building and undertaking of this road I have mentioned is worth while and in the best interests of Canada. As Canadians, these same people approve the building of the Canso causeway in Nova Scotia as well as the proposed St. Lawrence seaway as being of benefit not only to eastern Canada but to the whole country. In the Prime Minister's reply to the first request for such a conference he is reported in the Montreal Star of April 28, 1953, as having stated:

> In view of our own very heavy commitments and of the excellent financial condition of the provincial governments, it is hard to see how the federal authorities would be justified in undertaking any additional responsibility for highways at this time on the assumption that they might some day be required for defence purposes . . . Defence planning involves the determination of priorities and . . . there would always be projects much more urgently needed for our defence.

The premier of Alberta, Mr. Manning, made a second request for a meeting on April 10, 1953. In reply to this request the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated that the cabinet was busy trying to complete the session before the coronation, and added:

> As there is no possibility of considering any addition to the provision now being made for highway expenditure by the federal government in the present fiscal year, there would appear to be no urgency about arranging to meet the delegation.

[Mr. Holowach.]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the presentation of expenditures at this session of parliament nullifies the argument on this latter point, and I do believe that the arguments advanced by the Prime Minister in his first answer to the premier of Alberta are contested by substantial and unassailable arguments to the contrary.

The building of a highway from Winnipeg to the west coast through central Canada by way of Saskatoon, Edmonton, Jasper park and the Yellowhead route will mean we are making strategical moves instead of just talking about them. It will show possible aggressors that we intend to be prepared, and that is one way of stopping aggression. The adoption of such a route would provide rapid and efficient transportation to that portion of Canada most likely to be the scene of our defence. In any event, the building of this road would certainly expedite the growing development of that vast area. The highway I have just proposed would tie in with the airports which, because of their strategic location, are the headquarters of the northwest air command of the R.C.A.F., as well as with the centres which are the headquarters of the western command of the Canadian army.

Not long ago the Prime Minister, in his usual sincere manner, enunciated great faith and confidence in these territories. I refer to the remarks that he made when speaking to the Northwest Territories Act on January 19 in this house. The case for the route of a second trans-Canada highway that I propose is overwhelming, and not the least of the arguments is the fact that the terrain, the elevation, snowfall conditions and population factors lend themselves to the effort involved and would help realize the economic construction of this route. For example, I have certain figures that are quite revealing. The highest elevation in the Yellowhead route is 3,717 feet, as compared with 5,337 feet and 4,450 feet on the Kicking Horse and Crowsnest pass routes. In so far as the matter of snowfall is concerned, the Yellowhead route has less than that of any route proposed, as can be verified by graphs from federal sources. It is the only route that could eventually lend itself easily to the construction of a four-lane transcontinental highway. These features resulted in the choosing of the same route by the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, in their very impressive construction project.

Apart from the commercial and military significance of this route, which makes it an absolute necessity, it would run through the central and most densely populated portions of western Canada and could easily link with the already constructed 1,600 mile Alaska highway, which was built at a tremendous cost and which represents one of the great engineering feats of this century. Furthermore, the route as I have proposed it, should have priority and construction should be undertaken immediately because of the overwhelming concentration of targets such as oil, uranium and chemical plants. This highway would serve all the local areas for the betterment of trade and commerce as well as the tourist industry, which is one of Canada's great sources of revenue.

My few remarks are not intended in any way to be a complete appraisal of the advantages the selection of this route would have for all of Canada. It is not intended to detract from the importance of the presently constructed trans-Canada highway. It is intended to show the need for making an early start on other projects, quite apart from the presently constructed trans-Canada highway, in view of the red tape and length of time it takes to get things started. By way of illustration I would point out that although parliament did pass the Trans-Canada Highway Act in December 1949, the target date for completion will not be until the year 1956 or later. In other words, using that as some form of timetable, it can be seen that if a decision were made at this moment to undertake the building of this route, it would be many years before it would be completed. I just wonder whether we as Canadians can afford to wait. I think not.

I am sure the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia would cooperate and welcome the federal government's interest in assisting them in the building of this highway. We in Alberta have always favoured not one but three arterial highways running from east to west. There is one trans-Canada highway in this country, but the United States has ten national highways. I believe that the time for action in this important matter is now because a road, like anything else, cannot be built with good intentions alone. I submit that from the public standpoint it is most desirable the federal government meet with the provinces in order to discuss this vital matter. Canada is a big country. I feel we are justified in advancing this great proposition.

The job of giving Canada adequate systems will not be accomplished by provincial road programs alone. Further postponement of the building of the road, which I have submitted is necessary, will retard and harass further development in western Canada. It will retard industrial investment as well as the defence of our nation. Furthermore, at a time when our country has many unemployed, the undertaking of such a project would absorb many of those seeking work. I submit that the calling of a conference with representatives of the provincial governments, in order to discuss highway problems, is vital to the public interest. Such a conference would have as its objective the formulating of a national highway program and the offering of further aid to the provinces with their own highway programs. I feel that defence highways could then be discussed at this conference. I am sure such deliberations would indicate the advisability of undertaking the route I have outlined and the need for assisting in the maintenance of the important all-weather Yellowhead route.

Mr. W. A. Pommer (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time to address this house, I should like to follow the custom by congratulating you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and Mr. Speaker on the high honour that was conferred upon you in your appointments to these high offices. I should like to commend you on the able and impartial manner in which you are carrying out your duties. I realize that time is marching on and that we have been engaged in this budget debate for a good many days, but I thought this afternoon I should make a few remarks in support of the policies of this government to show how those policies have affected my province of Manitoba.

In preparing notes for the remarks I propose to make it seemed to me it would be appropriate if I were to direct the attention of the house to the growth and prosperity my home province has enjoyed in the last few years. I am convinced one of the main tests of democratic government is to see how its policies and administration work out when applied in the day-by-day affairs of the businessmen, and of its people generally. And when I say "businessmen" I include of course farmers, fishermen, miners, and all who engage in business activities. Because in modern times the financing and managing of our farms has become just as much a question of business management as has the operation of factories, and retail-wholesale establishments.

Mr. Speaker, the details of the government's financial plans have been set forth by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in such a comprehensive and lucid manner that it would be presumptuous for a new member like me to attempt to add anything to it.

There is, however, an old and true saying that the proof of the pudding is in the eating; and since as a Manitoba resident of many years' standing I can justly claim to know Manitoba, I would like to tell the house how the government's policies have worked in Manitoba in recent years. The results which this government's policies have produced in my province are the best proof of their soundness and wisdom.

For example: In bringing in the present budget, this government has followed the sound fiscal and trade policies which have so substantially contributed to the economic development of Canada and, as a result, Manitoba. The trade and tariff policies which have been directed toward an expansion of our international trade have contributed to our growth as well as our wealth.

In a country such as ours, which is blessed with surpluses of almost all products, we must depend upon exports. We must trade and buy where we can sell. Therefore, in my opinion, the government's continued resistance to tariff increases is a welcome and healthy sign.

In more recent years the implementation of the dominion-provincial tax rental agreements by this government have done much toward stability of revenue in provinces such as Manitoba. It has enabled provinces such as these to plan ahead. Knowing that certain revenues will be available, it has assisted government at the local level—the municipalities and the school districts, through the increased grants they now receive from the provinces, thereby making their financing less difficult. These agreements are of considerable importance to us, and the expressed intention of the government to preserve them has been reassuring to the people of Manitoba.

Several speakers from eastern Canada have told of the part played by their constituencies in the early history of Canada. My constituency and indeed the whole of Manitoba has grown to its present stature in the period since confederation. In fact, it is very doubtful whether 100 years ago there was a single permanent white resident in the whole of the area of my constituency. I think it is a matter of real pride that in less than 100 years this district has grown, from what many people looked on as uninhabitable, and frozen wilderness, to a prosperous, highly developed agricultural community, with an excellent system of highways, railways, and with telephone, electricity and radio in almost every single home in the whole of the constituency.

I repeat that this has all happened in less than 100 years. We could narrow that considerably to say that a very great part of it has occurred in the last 20 years, the years of Liberal government at Ottawa and the years in which were developed the policies and practices which I am here to support.

I have recently been interested in the material being issued by the Manitoba department of industry and commerce in respect to the growth and development of various Manitoba industries in the last few years. I think the story which they tell reflects great credit on the people and government of my home province and I think it reflects equal credit on the policies adopted and put into effect by the federal government.

In the case of agriculture, it is estimated that the total value of production in 1953 in Manitoba amounted to $290 million as compared with only $89 million in 1938. In other words, in 1953 agricultural production amounted to three times the value of 15 years ago. This represents, of course, a combination of price increases and of increases in the volume of farm production. It reflects also the development of new and more profitable types of vegetable and animal products. The prosperity brought about by this great increase in the value of farm products is reflected in the fact that the value of machinery on Manitoba farms in 1951 was estimated at $232 million as compared with only $59 million in 1941. Many of our people thought that mechanization of agriculture had gone a long way by 1941. The fact is that since 1941 the number of tractors on Manitoba farms has more than doubled, while the number of combines has increased from approximately 1,700 to over 15,000. At the same time our farmers were buying and paying for this vast amount of new farm machinery, they also enjoyed the first benefits of a rural hydro program which brought electricity to every farm in my constituency, and they bought corresponding quantities of electric stoves, electric refrigerators, and other appliances, as well as new automobiles and trucks. The figure quoted is that trucks on Manitoba farms in 1941 numbered approximately 7,600 and in 1951 the number had increased to over 21,000.

That this great amount of new equipment has been bought and paid for out of improved earnings of Manitoba farmers is clearly demonstrated by the fact that mortgage indebtedness to life insurance, trust and loan companies was down in 1952 to less than $6 million as compared with over $32 million in 1937. These figures speak well for Manitoba farming industry and they speak equally well for the prudence of Manitoba farmers in taking advantage of good times to pay off their debts and get into a strong position for the future.

I could not, however, end my remarks on this subject without adding that the record of the last few months is much less satisfactory than the record over a period of years. Farm prices are no longer rising, and have indeed dropped sharply in some cases. Farm costs, on the other hand, are continuing to rise. Freight rates and other transportation charges are an important cost to Manitoba farmers. Farm machinery costs and tractor fuel, municipal taxes and provincial and federal taxes must all be paid before anything is left for the farmer and his family. If farm prices drop, and, even more so, if one or two bad years cut the output of Manitoba farms, the result will be disaster unless steps are taken to make corresponding reductions in the expenses which our farmers must meet. There is nothing new in these points, but they are well worth repeating in order that our attention to them will continue.

Agriculture is and always has been the backbone of Manitoba, but in recent years manufacturing has achieved an increasingly important place, until now the total value of manufactured products in Manitoba is more than double the total value of farm products. A great part of our manufacturing is, of course, the processing of farm products on their way to market, but other industry is far from unimportant.

In 1953, fifty thousand people were employed in manufacturing industries in Manitoba and these industries had a payroll of over $115 million and turned out a product estimated at $610 million. Between 1941 and 1951 Manitoba's production of manufactured goods increased by 260 per cent which is almost the exact per cent of the increase recorded for the province of Ontario.

The wide range of manufacturing carried on in Manitoba is well illustrated by the 60 new industries which are reported to have begun operations in Manitoba during 1953. These 60 new industries were distributed as follows: 17 in clothing and textiles; 11 in iron and steel products; 8 in wood and paper products; 7 in non-ferrous metal products; 5 in food and beverage processing; 4 in non-metallic mineral products and 8 in other product varieties.

I do not feel that I should take the time of the house to dwell on the development of the north country, since the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) is more qualified than I am to speak of the mineral developments in northern Manitoba; but I do want to mention the nickel properties being developed at Lynn Lake, which is the only Canadian nickel mine outside of the province of Ontario. Then there is a new railway line through the territory between Lynn Lake and the Flin Flon-Sherridon area.

The progress being made in oil exploration in the southwest sections of Manitoba is also of remarkable value to us, but it has been overshadowed by the outstanding results farther west; but we in Manitoba are proud of the steady growth of oil production in our province and we are very pleased to see industries developing in Manitoba which draw their raw materials from the oil pipe line. We are looking forward to the completion of the Trans-Canada gas pipe line as another feature for further industrial development in Manitoba.

As I remarked earlier, all these developments are a source of satisfaction to our province and indicate that we of Manitoba, like most Canadians, have done extremely well in the past few years under the present administration. We hope to continue that progress, and this administration, and for that reason we support the measures necessary to carry it forward.

In concluding, I would like to refer to two further figures. The department of industry and commerce of Manitoba reports that toward the end of 1953 it conducted a survey of all manufacturing firms in the province, and received replies from approximately 500 of them. Of the firms reporting, some 24 per cent indicated that they had expanded their plant during 1953, and no less than 44 per cent of them reported that they are planning expansion in 1954. This is truly a remarkable expression of confidence in the continued growth of this area. It is significant also that this anticipated growth is based upon the foundation of an income and living standard which, in 1953, gave to Manitoba retail sales estimated at $840 per person which is some 8 per cent higher than the average of retail sales for the whole of Canada. Surely, a province which is able to buy from retail stores in such quantities as this has every right to feel that its people have been well served by the fiscal and trade policies of this government.

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this budget debate there are two features that I should like to deal with as they affect western agriculture, and, because of the importance of western agriculture, as they affect our Canadian economy.

The world's wheat situation and the surplus situation in Canada were adequately dealt with by my colleagues, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) and the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson), so I will not deal with that particular phase at any great length. I am going to deal specifically with one problem as it affects the western farmers.

From time to time many suggestions and improvements are offered for the Canadian wheat board, and I do not think these can be construed as criticism of our board system of marketing. Everyone should know that there is no group that has fought harder and longer for the system of orderly marketing such as the wheat board than the members of the C.C.F. Farmers generally are strongly in favour of the board system of orderly marketing. There was some dissatisfaction last July and August when the board deviated from their policy and opened delivery quotas. As many of you know, the delivery quota is an invention of the Canadian wheat board, which allows farmers the opportunity of delivering their grain in orderly fashion. And when the board deviated from that program in a pre-election period some of us had cause to wonder. The results of that deviation were most unsatisfactory. Apart from criticism of that nature or suggested improvements as I would rather call them, anyone who says that the C.C.F. is opposed to the board system of marketing has been misinformed by a political pinhead, or is one.

We heard this cry in the last election: it was said that a vote against the Liberals is a vote against the Canadian wheat board. There are even today some members of the Conservative party who criticize the Canadian wheat board, but the basis of their criticism is not the same as ours. Many of the members of the Conservative party are criticizing the Canadian wheat board because they prefer the cutthroath competition of the open market. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said, as reported at page 3991 of Hansard:

> I hope that the minister is not going to leave us in the position we are in now.

We are currently operating under a system of orderly marketing under the Canadian wheat board.

We must be realistic about conditions that exist in the Canadian grain picture. Owing to three successively large crops we have unprecedented stocks of grain. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said that a large stock of grain is a very good thing for Canada and that the government is following the policy of storing the grain for future use.

With orderly marketing our present surplus can gradually be fed to world markets and will in time be sold. Take, for example, the very low grades of 1951 with which, I believe, the Canadian wheat board did a creditable job.

The minister said that we were pursuing a policy of storing grain in Canada, but we are storing that grain at the expense of the farmers of Canada on the farms of Canada. If the government wishes to follow a policy of that nature I think it should embark upon it realistically and advance methods which would allow the farmer to store that grain. It might be suggested that the high cost of building government terminals and public storage would put this out of the question, but what better place could one find to store grain than where it is currently stored, namely on the farms of Canada?

Under the policy which the government is now pursuing, of leaving the farmers with their unsold stocks of wheat, we have found the situation where the farmers are desperately short of cash for operating expenses. These expenses have consistently increased over the past ten years and we cannot for one moment assume, as I am afraid many do, that gross returns from a farm are in reality the net returns. In an earlier debate I calculated that the cost of production per wheat acre was in the neighbourhood of $17.75, not allowing for any return to the operator or his family or for the retirement of debt. With the inclusion of these factors it came to an amount in the neighbourhood of $25 per wheat acre.

On Monday, March 29, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stated, as reported at page 3412 of Hansard, that the wheat board was in the process of making a final payment, and that it would be sufficient to take care of spring seeding requirements. The payment to the 250,000 permit holders in Canada of $58,282,438 meant that each farmer received $233. With that amount of money, the first that many farmers had received in four or five months, and in some cases much longer, the farmer is expected to feed and clothe his family; he is expected to pay interest on his borrowings at the bank; he is expected to pay his income tax; and he is expected to treat his seed for wire worm and other types of seed diseases at a cost varying up to 75 cents an acre. He is also expected to purchase his gas, oil, grease, and pay his repairs. It is obvious that the average receipt of $233 by farmers is sadly inadequate in meeting these requirements. At points fortunate enough to have a supplementary quota the farmers will be short of cash in the very near future, and will have used up their bank credits.

The shortage of purchasing power in the hands of farmers is having an effect on the rest of Canada. We have heard of the recession in the farm implement industry, in the automobile industry, and in other industries which supply goods and services for the Canadian people, and a great deal of the responsibility for that recession can be attributed to the inability of Canada's major industry, agriculture, to obtain adequate purchasing power.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am again requesting that this government consider making an interim payment on properly stored farm grains. The matter has been suggested before and did not receive very much consideration or sympathy. Conditions in western Canada are growing consistently worse, and immediate action is required in this matter. I am not asserting that all the farmers in western Canada require an advance payment on their grain, but there are many who do, the smaller farmers, for example, and those who have recently become established.

It would be a simple matter to have an inspection of the grain stored on the farms by the many P.F.A.A. representatives whom this Liberal government has so liberally scattered around Saskatchewan. If they were found to be incompetent, the grain agents of the elevator companies could be bonded to carry out an inspection of farm stored grain.

Once the authorities were assured that there was an adequate supply of grain properly stored on the farm, they could make a cash advance of 75 cents a bushel on a maximum of 2,000 bushels. That figure of 75 cents would be approximately half of the amount for which the government hopes to sell the wheat, and I do not see how there could be any chance of the government losing in that regard.

If each of the 250,000 permit holders in Canada took advantage of the opportunity to borrow $1,500—and evidently the constituents in the riding of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Pommer) who has just spoken are in no need of the advance because as he has just said, everything there is rosy because of the policies followed by the Liberal government—it would reduce this figure somewhat, and if all the permit holders took advantage of the opportunity the maximum loan would be $272,500,000.

Now the cost to the government of this loan would be in terms of the interest rate only, and the government should be able to obtain a short term loan at two per cent which would give us a figure of $5,450,000 which would be the cost of implementing a program of interim payments on farm stored grain. In other words, the cost of putting nearly $300 million purchasing power into the hands of the farmers would be less than the amount required to move the national film board to Montreal. It would amount to, I believe, just one-eighth of one per cent of our gross budget, and since the money that the farmers receive would in turn be put into circulation, it would give an impetus to those industries which service the agricultural industry and which are now suffering a recession, and it would reduce unemployment.

In the month of February of this year the government paid out the sum of $30 million in unemployment insurance benefits. But $300 million of purchasing power in the hands of the farmers would increase employment and reduce this figure, so in effect it would cost the people of Canada nothing to implement a program of interim payments on farm stored grain.

I mentioned the farm implement industry, and this is another phase of our western economy with which I would like to deal. In a period when farm income is on the downward trend we can give consideration to the problem in two ways. We can concern ourselves with mechanisms to increase the receipts of the agricultural population and these mechanisms could take the form of guarantees and floor prices which could be extended to livestock products. The other approach is to give consideration, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) recommended in his budget, to maximum efficiency, in that way reducing the costs of production of the farmers in western Canada.

As is the case with other industries, farming has become highly mechanized. In 1830, prior to the invention of the reaper and the steel plow, it required 55·7 man-hours to produce one acre of wheat. In 1896, with the development of the horse-hauled binder, the man-hours were reduced to 8·8, and again, with the development of the small tractor and tillage implements, to 3·3 in 1930. Today it requires about one and one-half man-hours to produce one acre of wheat. These figures I am quoting were taken from the Financial Post of two years ago. It is apparent then that there has been a transfer of labour from that directly involved in agricultural production to that supplying the goods and services required by farmers and servicing the products of the farm. With this high degree of mechanization a farmer is in a position where he must have the most modern and efficient equipment if he is to exist. If he fails to keep pace with his neighbours and to effect the various economies that are necessary for maximum efficiency, he will end up in a position of bankruptcy and will be bought out by a more efficient operator.

As evidence of this fact, purchases of farm machinery in Saskatchewan increased from $142,754,400 in 1941 to $525,644,660 in 1951. The machinery requirements of the Saskatchewan farmers increased from $2 to $9 per acre as an over-all average in this period. The select committee on farm implements of the Saskatchewan legislature of 1952 determined that the machinery investment ranged from $37.27 per acre for a 160-acre farm to $13.10 for a 640-acre farm to $8.29 for a 2,000-acre farm. We must at the same time be aware of the fact that mechanization is far from complete and that much of the equipment in Saskatchewan is in need of replacement. It will be noted that I quoted figures for the past few years in terms of dollars, and I do that as a background to the claim that farm machinery prices are out of all reason.

The farmers of Saskatchewan—as well as the farmers in the other provinces of western Canada and Ontario; in fact the farmers all over Canada—are in the position of having no alternative to buying machinery, and the machine companies are taking advantage of this fact. The cost of one-way discs, harrow plows and tiller combines at the plant increased from $163.35 in 1943 to $329.86 in 1949 to $473.43 in 1952. The costs of this composite line of machinery at the factory level increased nearly 350 per cent in that nine-year period. The costs to the farmer would increase even more because of the increase in the freight rates and the increase in handling costs. With current freight rates, the charges in many cases are 10 per cent of the final cost of the machine delivery to points in western Saskatchewan.

The problem of the high cost of farm machinery is not a new one. It has been the subject of Saturday night conversation for many years on the street corners in all of the towns in western Canada. The matter was thoroughly investigated by a special committee of this house in 1936 and 1937. The high costs were dealt with by a select committee of the Saskatchewan government in 1939 and again in 1952. It is apparent that the recommendations of these various committees have fallen on deaf ears or it would not be necessary to bring the matter up again at this time.

At page 420 of the Journals of 1937 it is stated:

> The companies having during the depression years maintained relatively their price levels, the committee suggests that now they are approaching a period of normal or above normal volume of production and sales, the companies can well afford, comparatively and actually, to lower their prices and still make satisfactory financial returns, because of the great savings in overhead per unit of production. This policy would be of particular benefit in the period in which the farmer is making the necessary replacements.

At this period of time in 1936 and 1937 there was a severe depression in Saskatchewan, and farmers were consequently unable to purchase farm machinery. As the crop failure years passed away the war took over, and the farmers were still unable to purchase equipment. Hence there was a terrific backlog of demand in the post-war years. The high cost of farm machinery in these post-war years has been a deterring influence, and there are many farmers who are still in dire need of new and more efficient farm machinery.

The select special committee on farm implement prices and distribution in Saskatchewan of 1939 had this as one of their conclusions:

> The committee is of the opinion, therefore, that the reasons advanced by the companies as justification for increased prices cannot be supported, and finds, as did the Ottawa and United States inquiries, that prices are substantially higher than they should be.

The select special committee of the Saskatchewan provincial government in 1952 would, without a doubt, have reached the same conclusion. In fact, I think it is fair to say that the failure of the major implement companies to co-operate with that committee would be evidence of guilt.

The high price of farm machinery did not stop with 1952. The index of farm machinery prices rose from 189·2 in August, 1951 to 198 in August, 1953; that is an increase of 4·7 per cent. In this same period the index of commodities and services used by the farmers increased by only 1·8 per cent. Today, in spite of the increase in technology and of all the developments in manufacturing techniques and production line assemblies, we have a persistent and regular increase in the price of farm machinery.

The machinery companies make the claim that it is the high cost of wages and material that has been solely responsible for the increase during the past ten years or so. We cannot deny that increases have taken place, particularly since the price controls were removed by the Liberals, aided and abetted by the Conservatives. Out of fairness to labour it should be pointed out that the net value of production for each dollar paid out in wages has increased from $1.46 in 1946 to $1.75 in 1951. In other words, in 1946 the average worker in the farm implement industry earned $1,735 in wages and produced $5,476 worth of goods. In 1951 the average worker earned $2,947 in wages but he produced $12,159 worth of goods.

I am not trying to make the claim that the costs of materials and labour have not been partly responsible, but there is one other factor that is more significant in the increase in the cost of farm machinery, namely the profits enjoyed by the major machine industries. From 1946 to 1951 there was an increase in gross sales of 122·1 per cent whereas in this same period the profits, before taxes, increased by 223·6 per cent. I know that this will be denied by a maze of figures and statistics from the large implement companies. In fact, they will probably come out with figures to show that they are losing an equivalent amount. It is obvious that at least some of the companies are not losing too much when we find a major implement company in Canada buying out the Ferguson company and putting itself in a position of leadership in Canada, and in a position where it could monopolize the production of many lines of machinery.

The select special committee to investigate the farm implement industry in Saskatchewan in 1939 concluded that the price structure in Canada is not decided on a cost plus a reasonable profit basis, but on a basis tacitly at least agreed upon by the leaders of the industry. This committee further concluded that the price of each comparable implement is fixed at approximately the same amount by the companies manufacturing such implements. The Ottawa committee made this finding:

> The committee is of the opinion, as a result of the above finding, that there is competition in the matter of securing sales but little or no effective competition in the matter of prices as between companies.

With the increase in the selling price of farm machinery the commission received by the dealer is naturally going to increase since it is computed on a percentage basis. The competition at the retail level is therefore quite keen. The dealer finds himself forced to give more than the true value for used trade-ins in order to effect a sale. Right now the yards of the implement dealers in western Canada are loaded to a worrisome capacity. In most cases the dealer has offered much more than the true value in an effort to attract some business. The small implement dealer is not the one who should accept the responsibility for initiating competition. This should rest with the manufacturer.

The implement dealers play a very important part in the agricultural life of western Canada and it is generally agreed that it is only fair that they should be allowed a fair return on their investment and labour. Generally speaking, there is no group supplying a service to agriculture that accepts that responsibility as conscientiously as do the implement dealers. During the busy season their businesses are open at all hours of the day and night, and I know of many instances where implement dealers have worked all night to repair a combine that has choked on a good-sized stone or a tractor motor that has a connecting rod through the side. Many implement dealers are playing an important part in relaying technical information to the farmers. They act as a liaison between universities and the agricultural industry.

The royal commission on price spreads of 1934 found that the price of repair parts was out of line with the costs. At that time the selling price of a machine made up of repair parts was 173·2 per cent of the cost of the new machine. The Saskatchewan report of 1939 states:

> Companies fixed retail prices of repair parts at a mark-up of 60 per cent of the factory cost in excess of the mark-up on a completed farm implement.

This would work out to an average mark-up of 80 per cent. Part of this is due to lack of standardization. I know of many pieces of equipment that use almost identical bearings at different parts in the machines, and standardization would mean that the implement dealer would be able to get by with a smaller stock. May I also point out so far as repair parts are concerned that the part number is either stencilled on or cast in the metal. When a part is broken it is in many instances greasy and dirty and many times the pieces are not recovered. When the implement dealer orders a repair part from the divisional point and the wrong number is given the implement dealer is expected to throw the part under the bench and keep it in his stock with no hope of utilizing it and try to recover the cost of that operation from his other sales. I would suggest that the companies allow their dealers to return unused stock at periodic intervals.

It is apparent from the brief outline I have given of the farm implement industry that there is a severe lack of competition, that the implement companies are operating for the purpose of making the maximum profit and without consideration for the provision of service to the farmers of Canada. I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that he put his anti-combines legislation into action against this target and determine the degree of price fixing there is in the farm implement industry. Failing that, I would request that the government establish another committee to investigate the farm implement industry in order to determine why the price of farm machinery is out of all reason.

I have pointed out that it is obvious that the government should initiate a policy of interim payments on farm stored grain to this very important section of the economy. As I have pointed out, it is particularly required by those starting to farm under the Veterans Land Act and by those commencing any type of farming. It is also required by those who followed the advice of the government last year. The government said that next year after the election things were going to be better than they were then, that there was nothing to worry about and they should go ahead and spend their money. The farmers who followed the advice of the Liberal campaigners are some of those who are in need of an interim payment on farm stored grain. This would help the Canadian economy generally. Surely if the gold mining industry is worth a subsidy of approximately $15 million the agricultural industry is worth one-third of this amount, and the government would probably get it back through various benefits to other industries.

I have shown that production costs must be reduced. I have demanded an inquiry into the farm implement industry, but such an inquiry should not stop there. There should be an investigation into high freight rates, the high cost of fertilizer and other factors that contribute to the highest cost of production that western agriculture has ever experienced.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have already made known my attitude on the subject of the deductibility of the provincial from the federal income tax; this was on March 24, before the budget was brought down. Following the budget speech, the chamber of commerce of the district of Montreal, in an editorial published on April 19 in Commerce-Montreal, made the following statement on this subject:

> In other words, it is no longer a question, as it was last year, of freedom, of a complete absence of pressure. A province has to sign an agreement or feel the pressure of its taxpayers who have to pay higher taxes than those of other provinces.
> Viewed in that context, one really wonders what is meant by the invitation made by the federal Minister of Finance to the premier of Quebec, asking him to come to Ottawa to submit proposals. Let us not forget that within the framework established by the federal government, such proposals can only deal with the renting of taxation fields from Quebec for a consideration. Any other proposal is eliminated. There can be no question of a greater deductibility than that which has been recognized. It has been refused. There can be no question of compensating the taxpayer in proportion to the amount that the province would derive from the renting of its taxation fields. Such compensation is refused. What then?
> Why not give the province of Quebec to understand that its representations would not be in vain?

I am entirely of that opinion, but I do hope, having heard the rather conciliatory remarks made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whose tone was entirely different from that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that, sooner or later, a solution may be found, as in the case of the Quebec corporations. After all the federal treasury cannot indefinitely resist the just and reasonable claims of the people of my province.

In view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance in this house, on May 4, in answer to a question put to him by the Leader of the Opposition, and according to which a vote for the budget was a vote against the deductibility of the provincial tax, and in view also of the fact that no account is taken of the deduction of the provincial tax in the budget as it now stands and that the principle of non-deductibility is therefore at stake therein, I will vote against its adoption since to act in any other way would mean that I am approving the government's refusal in this connection.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: We shall now deal with the Excise Tax Act.

Excise Tax Act

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

1. That the excise tax on the following goods be repealed: (a) furs; (b) electrical appliances adapted to household or apartment use, namely: blankets; chafing dishes; coffee makers; curling irons or tongs; dish washers; food or drink mixers; food choppers and grinders; floor waxers and polishers; garbage disposal units; hair dryers; irons and ironers; juice extractors; kettles, portable humidifiers; razors and shavers; toasters of all kinds; vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor; waffle irons; (c) firearms and complete parts thereof and ammunition; (d) golf clubs and golf balls; (e) fishing rods and fishing reels; (f) cameras, camera lenses and unexposed photographic films and plates; projectors for pictures; (g) trunks; suitcases; bags and luggage of all kinds; purses; wallets; billfolds; key and card cases; handbags; jewel cases; dressing and toilet cases; shopping bags; golf and other sports bags; (h) coin, disc or token operated vending machines.

2. That the excise tax on the following goods be reduced from fifteen per cent to ten per cent: (a) articles, materials or preparations of whatever composition or in whatever form, commonly or commercially known as toilet articles, preparations or cosmetics, which are intended for use or application for toilet purposes, or for use in connection with the care of the human body, including the hair, nails, eyes, teeth, or any other part or parts thereof, whether for cleansing, deodorizing, beautifying, preserving or restoring, and including shaving soaps and shaving creams, antiseptics, bleaches, depilatories, perfumes, scents and similar preparations; (b) motor cycles and all other two or three-wheeled motor driven vehicles including motors for attachment to bicycles; (c) devices, commonly or commercially known as lighters; (d) coin, disc or token operated games or amusement devices of all kinds; (e) ash trays; tobacco pipes; cigar and cigarette holders; cigarette rolling devices and other smokers' accessories; (f) fountain pens; ball-point pens; ink pencils; propelling pencils; desk sets and all other desk accessories; (g) matches; (h) tires and tubes in whole or in part of rubber for self-propelled machines or automotive vehicles of all kinds; (i) clocks and watches; (j) articles of all kinds made in whole or in part of ivory, jet, amber, coral mother of pearl, natural shells, tortoise shell, jade, onyx, lapis lazuli, or other semi-precious stones; (k) articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, including diamonds and other precious or semi-precious stones for personal use or for adornment of the person; goldsmiths' and silversmiths' products; pewter ware; (l) articles of cut glassware, crystal glassware, cut or not, etched glassware, or metal decorated glassware; (m) articles of china, porcelain, earthenware, marble, stoneware, or other pottery ware; (n) carbonated beverages, aerated waters, unfermented fruit juice beverages and imitations thereof and all other compounded or mixed soft drinks and all mixtures or products advertised or sold for making soft drink beverages or imitations thereof whether sold in liquid, concentrated or in dry form; (o) candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy.

3. That the excise tax on carbonic acid gas and similar preparations be reduced from twenty-five cents per pound to fifteen cents per pound.

4. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed: (a) oil and gas burners and stokers for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings; (b) coal crushers and stokers for use directly in the manufacture or production of goods; (c) equipment sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale, at a price in excess of one thousand dollars per unit, specially designed for use directly for road making, road cleaning or fire fighting, but not to include automobiles nor ordinary motor trucks; (d) wall panels for use in buildings and materials for use in the manufacture of such panels; (e) drain tile not exceeding four inches in inside diameter and twelve inches in length; (f) sheet music and materials used in its manufacture; (g) hearing aids and parts therefor including batteries specifically designed for use with such hearing aids.

5. That provision be made to require the payment of sales and excise taxes on all products packaged and sold as lighter fluid.

6. That provision be made to require the payment of sales and excise taxes on the packaging used to contain goods subject to these taxes and on any other articles packaged with them whether the goods are imported, or are manufactured or produced in Canada.

7. That provision be made to ensure that machines and tools for operation by tractors are not included as accessories therefor in the prevailing exemption from sales tax.

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the seventh day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-four.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, we now come to sample the meal, the compulsory meal put before us four weeks ago by the Minister of Finance. It is very interesting to observe that apparently inside this chamber there is the same enthusiasm for this budget as there was four weeks ago, though even here I do not judge it entirely by the noise. We often say that the proof of the pudding is the eating of it, but I suggest it is not pudding we are getting here but just a dry crust to crunch. However much satisfaction the minister may get out of the applause, when we look to the country we do not find the same enthusiasm. I wish to spend a moment or two, Mr. Chairman, in trying to assess—

The Chairman: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must ask hon. members of the committee to maintain silence while the hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Macdonnell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I realize how dull it is, but hon. members can sympathize with me and know that it is worse for me than it is for them.

I want to spend a moment or two in trying to assess, with the experience of four weeks behind me, just what this budget has done and has not done, and I wish to draw attention very briefly to some of the views which have been expressed as to the adequacy of the proposals which have come before us.

I read very briefly from the Globe and Mail of April 8, which says that cuts in the budget are mere "nicks", and says that the minister confined them to a few commodities in the luxury and semi-luxury class. The writer of the same article, speaking of the Minister of Finance says: He and his advisers are men of little faith.

In a way, they have reason to be, for they have a tiger by the tail—the tiger of remorselessly progressive expenditure.

I go on to read from the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member's speech, but I do recall that when the hon. member was making his major address on the budget and was attempting to do the very same thing, the Speaker, who was then in the chair, said that the rules did not permit the member to read editorials from outside the house reflecting on or expressing opinions about the conduct inside the house.

Mr. Macdonnell: I remember very well that the Speaker took me to task, but I thought at that time it was merely because I was seeking to read at some length expressions of views. Here I wish merely to quote a few brief phrases just indicating the general discontent which we find throughout the country. I go on, Mr. Chairman, as I say, to read very briefly from the Ottawa Journal of April 7:

It will be a long time, if ever, before the man in the street feels substantial effects from sales and excise tax cuts.

And then the Calgary Herald of April 8 refers to a few small crumbs tossed his way, referring to the citizen, in the form of reduced luxury and excise tax, and then in an editorial entitled: "Encore Not Demanded" the Sydney Post speaks of the government sitting tight and fixedly hoping for the best. The St. Catharines Standard of April 17 says:

It takes a little time to get the hang of the budget, and some late discoveries reveal window-dressing which invites ridicule, if nothing worse. There is to be no tax on curling irons, about as much in general use now as the old moustache cup.

Mr. Benidickson: In the speech of the hon. member to which I referred a moment ago, he quoted from three editorials, and the Speaker said that was not in order. The hon. gentleman said that he had read all that he wanted to read anyway and was quite content to dispense at that point. We have had more than three at this time, and I wonder what your ruling is, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ferguson: Would you mind making a ruling?

The Chairman: Order. I think the—

Mr. Ferguson: There is only one Speaker in the house.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the point of order which has been raised by the parliamentary assistant could be based on citation 306 of Beauchesne's second edition, which I might read to hon. members of the committee.

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I have been listening to the extracts which have been read by the hon. member for Greenwood and up to this stage I do not think he has transgressed citation 306.

Mr. Macdonnell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Anyway, the parliamentary assistant will be glad to know that I am nearly through. There is one from the Toronto Star that probably he would particularly like to hear.

In its general application, the sales tax continues at 10 per cent, and is the worst tax which Canada imposes.

Then, I have one final quotation from the Toronto Star of April 23:

The $40 million tax cuts in the recent federal budget, while distributed over a broad range of items, will probably have "little discernible effect on the economy at large, either in lower prices or higher profits," the Bank of Montreal said in its business review.

Again we have this further quotation from the Bank of Montreal review:

The budget was notable not so much for the changes that were made as for the changes that were not made.

I should like now to make a comparison, Mr. Chairman. It has been referred to in the house already, but I want to dwell on it a little, and that is a comparison of the microscopic reduction in taxes that we have got, and incidentally no reduction in expenditure at all, with what has happened in the United States. I am informed that there has been a reduction of $7 billion for this year from Truman's estimate for the year. On that basis, if one divides by say twelve, which I think is a rough and ready figure, it would mean that we should have a reduction in this year of something like $600 million instead of $36 million. I think that gives us something to think very earnestly about. I ask the question why our reduction is so small. I think the answer is very simple. There is no sense of urgency in our government in regard to reduction.

Now, economy is not an easy thing and we all know that. But I would like to again emphasize this lack of urgency. The minister has grown accustomed over the years to what he has called "buoyant" revenues. We were able to spend, and spend and still have surpluses. It was a jolly life, while it lasted. After all, Mr. Chairman, no one likes an economizer. He is usually a lantern-jawed fellow with perhaps a Scottish Presbyterian background and people avoid him because they think that is not going to be the kind of fellow they will like. They do not like economy. On the other hand, they like a spendthrift. They like a jolly fellow, ruddy and probably a little full in the face, with nice pleasant easy manners who makes the spending of money attractive. And that is the kind of thing that people come to like.

Mr. Rowe: That side of the house is full of them.

Mr. Macdonnell: As far as I can see we are going to go on like that until something happens to change it. Spending your way through is much more pleasant for a lot of people than saving, particularly for those who have the most to say. The truth of the matter is that we have been on a huge spending spree or jag and it will go on as long as the taxpayers allow it. Of course, the government can argue that the taxpayers, by their action last August, did allow it. I suppose they might even argue that the government has a mandate to spend. That may be for the moment, but on the other hand perhaps the day will come when people will begin to suffer from this and the taxpayers will take a different view.

However, the government goes ahead, and the minister has estimated a tiny surplus which is really no surplus at all. He was in his usual optimistic mood. Nevertheless, he admitted his budget was based on an optimistic estimate. If you had the present situation in a private business people would be on their guard. They would be preparing for possible eventualities. They would not bet their whole future on the continuation of a boom. After all a private company has to take precautions of that kind and even a public corporation is in the same position.

In this morning's Gazette there was a reference to a very substantial falling off in the gross revenues of the C.N.R., but to their credit there is also a very substantial falling off in their expenses, and indeed it is almost as great.

We have a surplus estimated but it is a tiny surplus; as I have said before, you could put it in your eye. If you had a situation of that kind in a private corporation the management would begin to take action. The difference in public affairs is that you always have the taxpayers' pocket available and you can always borrow if necessary, and so it goes on. Over the past 15 years the government has become accustomed to living in a boom. There is no sign that they think the situation has changed. The minister admitted the possibility of it, but he is really betting on the return of the boom. That, in plain words, is what we are doing.

At page 3727 of Hansard the minister, after having referred previously to the situation in the United States, was reported as saying:

> My general conclusion is that our national products in 1954 will be at least equal to 1953, and probably higher; in other words I think that an upswing in the second half of the year will more than compensate for the declines that are evident in certain branches of industry at present.

That is what we all hope, and perhaps it will come true. But in private business they would not rely wholly on that. They would have to take steps to deal with the situation. The government, as I have said, is betting on a boom. We are all familiar with one hackneyed quotation from that famous character Micawber. I have got one which is not quite so familiar and which I think is worth while bringing to the attention of the house. It is the opinion of Mrs. Micawber about her husband and, as will be indicated in the quotation, these were the days when people went to prison for debt. This is what she says:

> I have known him come home to supper with a flood of tears, and a declaration that nothing was now left but a jail; and go to bed making a calculation of the expense of putting bow-windows to the house, "in case anything turned up" which was his favourite expression.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we are living in that same sense of fancied security and just hoping everything will be all right. Just hoping—and taking no steps.

We get an increase in expenditure across the board and the minister comforts himself by saying that he thinks all will be well. It is a kind of "Rake's Progress"—a very nice rake, of course—and it can turn out to the great disadvantage of this country.

As I have already pointed out, there can be no economy without a sense of urgency, but if you have a sense of urgency then, as we have seen in the United States, remarkable things can be done. Hon. members will recall that old music hall catch "Where there is a will there are three ways." Well, we have not even found one of the ways, and it is about that that I now complain. Everyone knows there is extravagance. I myself have previously referred to the fact that there are 55 economists in the Department of Agriculture. I took some trouble to get some ideas as to what these economists do.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. gentleman is causing me just a little worry and I think perhaps in fairness to the committee and to the hon. member who now has the floor I should raise this question at this time. I am of the opinion that the government's financial policy, particularly with respect to spending and charges of extravagance and so forth, should be dealt with on the general debate on the budget. But we are now in committee of ways and means and standing order 58, paragraph (2), states:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The item now under discussion is the Excise Tax Act and I am going to suggest to the committee that it would be unreasonable for the chairman to prevent any hon. member who is addressing the committee to lay a foundation of general policy for the remarks he wishes to make. However, I believe it is my duty to the committee to ask the hon. member to come to the Excise Tax Act. I am not trying to control the committee too rigidly because I understand this is the first time in the committee during which hon. members have had an opportunity to discuss the budgetary measures now before us. But I am suggesting to the hon. member, and I think he will agree with me, that he should now turn his attention to the item before us. He has every right to lay a ground for attacking the proposals under the Excise Tax Act but that is what I must ask him to do at this time.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, with all due deference I somehow sensed that incidents of this kind might arise and I fortified myself as far as I could by making inquiries in what I thought were well informed circles, certainly better informed than I, and I was informed that it was clear that in beginning to discuss this resolution which, after all, contains the whole or most of the tax reductions we are getting, it would be relevant to refer to tax reductions as a whole and to indicate how small they are and give one or two illustrations after criticizing them and indicate why I think they might have been larger. I do not propose to go into this matter at any length. Indeed I think I have only one illustration I want to give. Then I see in my notes in large letters, Mr. Chairman, that I come next to the "details of reductions".

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me just to say this. I am sure that he will co-operate. If we permit him to discuss matters and if we have speeches which would require an answer, we are likely to find ourselves debating the subject matter of the hon. member's speech and not the subject matter of the resolution before us. It is that situation which I was trying to avoid.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think what I am going to say will be so convincing that there will not be any answer at all. I just wanted to make a reference to the expenditure of the Department of Agriculture which has 55 economists. I tried to find out what they do, and I want to read just one short extract showing the kind of thing they do because it seemed to me to be doubtful that it would be very useful to the ordinary farmer. I have here a pamphlet entitled "The Influence of Prices on the Relative Consumption of Beef and Pork". It is published by the Canada Department of Agriculture and is dated Ottawa, June, 1953. At page 7 there is a technical appendix in which appears the following:

> The assumptions of the analysis are:
> 1. The consumption ratio of beef to pork will vary inversely with the price ratio.
> 2. A given absolute change in the price ratio will not produce a constant absolute change in the consumption ratio. The amount of change will vary with the general level of the price ratio.

Then I go on to read one short paragraph which I hope will make all this clear to members of the committee because, up to the present time, I have not understood it very well. Here is what we find:

> When the ratios are plotted the result is a curve with constantly decreasing slope, very noticeably concave upwards. If X_1 is the consumption ratio and X_2 the price ratio—both expressed as percentages—the general equation of such a curve is > where C and b are constants, the latter being negative.
> $$X_1 = CX_2^b$$

I read only that short extract, Mr. Chairman. I do not know how widely this pamphlet is distributed. I propose to return to this matter when we reach the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. It may be that that pamphlet goes only to a few experts who are capable of understanding it, something which I am not capable of doing. It occurred to me that that is one of the things which happens when you feel that there is lots of money and that you can just spend your way through.

I now come to the details of the reductions and I ask the question: What principle was arrived at in reaching these reductions? Was it on the basis of necessities or luxuries? I shall just read a few, Mr. Chairman, and I hope I am well within the mark now. I will just read these few: Furs, electrical appliances, firearms, golf clubs; then I go on and I read: coin, disc or token operated games, ash trays, fountain pens, and so on. To refer briefly to one, namely furs: Are they a necessity or a luxury? The minister told us the other day, after a speech he had made in Toronto, that he had been convinced by a very eminent authority, namely his wife, that actually furs were necessities. However, I feel that that conviction arose after the budget and not before it. Now we come to firearms and complete parts thereof. I suppose they are used by two classes of people, namely sportsmen and gangsters. To gangsters I suppose they are a necessity but to sportsmen I take it that they are luxuries. And so it goes as we come to golf clubs, fishing rods and the others. My conclusion is that these results have been arrived at not on the basis of necessities or luxuries or on the basis of the greatest good to the greatest number but rather on the basis of the least good to the greatest possible number; in other words to spread it out as far as possible; in other words, to appeal to as many voters as possible. The principle seems to be the least good to the greatest possible number. That is the only principle that I have been able to discover in this list.

I should like to draw attention to one or two of the figures here; and when I am doing that I should like at the same time to draw attention to the increase in expenditure that has been going on. For example, let us take electrical appliances by way of illustration. We find that $5 million of the $33 million reduction is on electrical appliances. In passing I just point out that at the same time that is going on, the expenditure in agriculture proposed for this year is $76 million, roughly, which is up about $1,700,000. I come down to the small item of matches, which is $300,000. I mention at the same time that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation expenditure is to be up from $8 million to $23 million. I think there is a special reason there because I think a special earmarked tax, which we objected to a year ago, has yielded a good deal more than it was expected to yield. Therefore that figure—and I want to guard against any comeback on that matter—perhaps is, in a sense, accidental; but there it is. We have $15 million up there against a reduction of $300,000 that I just mentioned a moment ago. Then we come to candy and chewing gum. That is one of the large items—nearly $4 million—at the same time the expenditure of the transport department is up about $15 million. I do not think I need to take further time on this matter, Mr. Chairman. I just wish to point out that this microscopic $33 million reduction is all that we are getting to assist us at the same time that expenditures are going up, up and up.

I should now like to hasten to a conclusion. I should like to point out that we have to deal with these trivialities—because that is all they are—when big questions have received no answer. We are told on all hands that high costs of the things we produce may cause us great embarrassment in selling. Yet we go on collecting $1,200 million or more in corporation taxes. These taxes raise costs and make the difficulty of selling just that much greater. All that the minister has to say is to admonish the people who are in business that they must sharpen their pencils and do a better job. But no example is given by the government. I recall to my mind the words used somewhere in Shakespeare: "I could easier tell twenty what was good to be done than to be one of the twenty to follow my own good advice." I think that statement is true in the case of the minister.

We now have vivid, disagreeable and alarming evidence of the extent of unemployment because this very day we have had here representatives of the union of the unemployed. What a phrase that is that we have come to: the union of the unemployed. The union of the unemployed are here and yet nothing has been done. Nothing definite has been done with regard to unemployment. Indeed there has hardly been an admission by the government that unemployment is a serious problem. They are standing by and hoping that things will turn out all right. As I said a little while ago, it is the boom mentality. We are relying on things improving in the United States, although that improvement carries with it no guarantee that our problems will be solved because as we know—and I shall not take the time to reiterate it again—the United States in many ways competes with us; and the fact that things improve there will not necessarily solve our problem at all.

The plain fact is that in the years that have gone by we have regarded boom as normal. We have bewitched ourselves into feeling that in some mysterious way because we have got a lot of natural resources we will always have a market for them. We are getting most unpleasant evidences from time to time that there is only a market for them at a price. We are getting even more disturbing evidences that we can be undersold in our own back yard, as somebody put it, by foreign manufacturers. As I said a moment ago, the mere fact that conditions in the United States may improve is no guarantee that ours will.

Therefore I should like to comment on this resolution. The reductions, even though it is very difficult to find any principle on which they were arrived at, will be welcomed of course by the people for whom they are made, but they seem to me to be without any rhyme or reason except the possibility of pleasing the largest possible number of people. It does seem to me that the upshot of it all is that we are just toying rather aimlessly with a serious situation.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I noted at the start of today's discussion on this resolution that it was referred to by the chair as "a" resolution. It is not my purpose to revive the discussions we have had in former sessions on a point of order so far as voting is concerned, but for the purposes of discussion may I ask whether we are discussing the whole of the Excise Tax Act resolution or whether we are discussing it clause by clause or paragraph by paragraph. The reason I ask that question is that the points I want to raise relate mainly to clause or paragraph 4 and perhaps some others. In other words, if we are taking the resolution paragraph by paragraph I am prepared to let paragraph 1 go, but if in order to make comments on paragraph 4 I have got to make them at this initial stage I will have to govern myself accordingly.

The Deputy Chairman: I think this matter was given a little consideration before we went into committee today. I consider that I am bound by the decision—I think it may be called a decision—of the house of April 26, 1951, which I think is summed up by the remarks of the deputy chairman found at page 2434 of Hansard of April 26, 1951. The deputy chairman said:

> The hon. member was not in the house this afternoon when the matter was discussed as to whether or not the paragraphs of the resolution were to be discussed separately or as a whole. The decision was made by the house that they were to be discussed as a whole. Therefore what is now before the committee is not eight items or eight clauses. It is one resolution with eight paragraphs. Therefore there is only one item so far as the committee is concerned, and that is the whole resolution.

Accordingly, I think that I must permit discussion as members see fit upon anything which is included in the Excise Tax Act resolution now before us.

Mr. Knowles: I will not ask you, Mr. Chairman, what you think of that course of procedure, if we have no alternative but to follow it. I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance a few questions relating more particularly to the sales tax or consumption tax which is included in this omnibus resolution. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether consideration was given to reducing the amount of the sales tax right across the board from its present total figure of 10 per cent to some lesser figure?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Certainly the budget is preceded by a great number of meetings between the finance minister, several of the other ministers concerned and their officials, and this is a development that takes place over weeks, even months. There is at all times an examination of the merits in a particular year of making a tax reduction, if one is possible, in one section or another. My hon. friend of course realizes that the particular tax to which he refers, the 8 per cent sales tax and the 2 per cent old age pension tax, yields a large amount of money. As I recall it, I think the 2 per cent tax accumulated almost $150 million last year. Therefore a 1 per cent reduction in the rate of the consumption tax, as my friend describes it, on the same items that are subject to tax at the present time means a loss of revenue of something in the nature of $75 million. One can thus appreciate that a tax reduction of that amount in this particular year would have resulted in a forecast of a deficit.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to express the view very briefly that it would have been better to reduce the sales tax right across the board than to remove the excise tax altogether from certain luxuries, as was done by the Minister of Finance in this budget. It does seem to me that the government is relying on the fact that people have become used to the sales tax and the government seems to have got away from any serious consideration of the possibility of reducing it substantially right across the board. In my view a 10 per cent hidden sales tax, that has as wide an application as this sales tax has, is a regressive form of taxation, and I regret that this year's budget did not include provision for a reduction in that sales tax.

May I now ask one or two questions under the general heading of the sales tax which relate to a more specific matter. Paragraph No. 4 of the resolution before us includes a provision for repeal of the sales tax with respect to equipment sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale, at a price in excess of $1,000 per unit, specially designed for use directly for road making, road cleaning or fire fighting, but not to include automobiles or ordinary motor trucks. That of course is a welcome relief to municipalities so far as it goes, but I suggest that its relief and its application are indeed very limited.

In connection with the position of municipalities, I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to comment on the fact that the regulations under the Excise Tax Act, dated April, 1950, include this section numbered 12:

> Where persons, firms or corporations produce printed, multigraphed or mimeographed matter for their own use, to a value of over $3,000 per annum, they are required to account for the consumption or sales tax on their total production of such goods. The tax is to be computed on the total cost of all materials, including electros, engravings, stereotypes, plus 220 per cent. The value of negatives, electros, engravings, stereotypes, half-tones, and other printing plates is to be included only once—

That is very kind of them.

> —in the value on which sales tax is to be calculated and not each re-run.

This regulation was drawn to my attention by one of the officials of my own city of Winnipeg. In drawing this to my attention it was pointed out that from my own experience, having once upon a time been a member of the council of the city of Winnipeg, I know there is a need for mimeographing a great deal of material so that it may be placed in the hands of the aldermen and others who have to work on it. It has been pointed out to me that if in preparing this material the officials simply used typewriters and sheets of carbon paper so as to produce carbon copies, they would pay only the 10 per cent sales tax upon the cost of the typewriter ribbons and on the cost of the paper and carbon paper that would be used. Obviously when a great many copies and a good deal of material has to be prepared that is a rather inefficient and expensive way to do it. The officials of the city of Winnipeg, therefore, like the officials of other municipal bodies, resort to the use of mimeographing machines.

But lo and behold, this regulation under the Excise Tax Act makes the provision that I have just read. It works out this way. If the city council of Winnipeg purchases mimeograph paper worth $1,100 and simply leaves it on the stock shelves the only tax that would be paid would be the 10 per cent tax. But if it is used for its own purposes, namely for the production of mimeographed documents, it works out this way. The sales tax item of $100 is first of all reduced, leaving the value at $1,000. But then there is added to that $1,000 for the purpose of computing the sales tax the amount of 220 per cent, so you add $2,200 to the $1,000 which gives you $3,200 as the figure on which the sales tax must be computed. It is then that the 10 per cent figure is brought into play, and 10 per cent of that amounts to $320. This sales tax of $320 has to be paid on an original purchase of $1,000.

When I started to give this example I believe I said we should assume the purchase of $1,100 worth of mimeograph paper. What I should have said was, assume the purchase of $1,000 worth of mimeograph paper plus the 10 per cent sales tax which would bring it to $1,100. It is from that point the deduction of $100 is made so that the much larger figure can be added. The result is, as I say, here is a sales tax of $320 that has to be paid on a purchase of $1,000. I do not believe the aldermen of the city of Winnipeg are particularly incapable of understanding things, but it looks to them as though they are paying a 32 per cent sales tax on their mimeograph paper and mimeograph supplies.

When the Winnipeg officials have taken this matter up with the authorities to try to get an explanation, they have been given the explanation that if they had the material printed the sales tax that would be paid on all the plates and materials that went into the printing process would result in their paying a figure which would come to that amount. Surely a city council is not going to be asked to compare the mimeographing that has to be done for its regular meetings or for meetings of its committees, which has to be done very quickly and in many cases is just for temporary use, with the kind of material it is necessary to print in more permanent form. As has been pointed out to me, the whole purpose of resorting to the mimeograph process is to do a job that would normally be done not by printing at all but by the typewriter and by the making of carbon copies. It is an attempt to be more efficient and more economical that leads to the use of the mimeograph process rather than typing carbon copies.

The figure I have for a recent fiscal year in the city of Winnipeg suggests that the amount of tax that has to be paid is not going to break our city of Winnipeg. As a matter of fact it is the sum of $1,254.78. But it does strike the aldermen of the city of Winnipeg as a rather large sum to pay in taxes on mimeograph paper, especially when for all practical purposes it works out to a rate of 32 per cent. I should like to have the comments of the parliamentary assistant on that situation. I can hardly ask him to justify it, because I do not think it can be justified. I suppose he can give the explanation for this gouge, if I may call it that, that has been given to the city of Winnipeg, but more particularly I should like to know whether consideration has been given to the eliminating of the regulation which I read so there will not be this sales tax of 32 per cent on mimeograph paper and supplies.

Mr. Benidickson: I confess that the detail on this point is new to me. But I know the hon. member holds a card in the printers union, and he doubtless appreciates that any printing of this kind on a large scale, we will say in an industry or something of that kind, is to that extent in competition with the printing that would be done in the normal way by the printers and bears a considerable labour content. From the remarks he made, I was not quite clear whether he felt that a regulation of this kind should be removed solely in respect of municipalities, because he started his discussion with reference to an item in the resolution dealing with municipalities.

Is the hon. member saying that if the expenditure were over $1,000 in the case of a municipality, this particular requirement should be waived? Is he saying that any business firm or anyone else with internal printing of that size should also escape the imposition of this form of tax?

Mr. Knowles: In reply to the first comment made by the parliamentary assistant, may I remind him that I dealt with it before he made it. I pointed out that this is not material that would otherwise be printed by any letter-press process, or even by an offset process, but it is material which would otherwise be produced for the aldermen by the process of typing carbon copies. There is no element here of competition with the established printing trade.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Would it be mimeographing?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, that is what we are talking about, the mimeographing of reports, agendas and things of that sort that you have to have around the city hall, most of which material is not of a permanent character. I know quite well that the minutes and proceedings of the city council of Winnipeg, which are permanent, are printed. Indeed they are printed in a union shop, I might tell the parliamentary assistant.

As to the other question, it is the government that boasts, as the minister did when he presented his budget on April 6, that it is doing something to relieve the costs imposed upon municipalities by taxation. If the government wishes to go further with this matter and establish some figure at which exemption would be granted, that is up to the government. I confess I am not as much concerned about the relief of taxation as it would affect private firms in business to make money as I am about the relief of municipalities who operate wholly on the basis of money they receive from the taxpayers, and mostly on the basis of money raised from taxes on real estate. I have tried to answer the question of the parliamentary assistant, and I would be glad if he would answer mine.

Mr. Benidickson: Frankly I do not think that in all cases my hon. friend could assure anyone that only mimeographed paper would be used, and that the machines being used internally could not be of another type—perhaps of the offset type—which might be in direct competition with a printing plant. As I said at the beginning, it was a new point so far as I was concerned. Certainly I shall make inquiries about it; but I was anxious to find out whether my hon. friend's concern was solely from the point of view of the municipalities.

Mr. Knowles: That is my chief concern.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. It is not one of those items that is particularly spelled out in this resolution. I still disagree with the hon. member when he suggests that another municipality, for a completely different purpose, other than that of minutes, could not probably use another type of printing.

Mr. Knowles: The government itself, under the terms of paragraph 4 in the resolution, has accepted the principle that municipalities are entitled to some relief from the sales tax.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, on some things. This is the first step. We are going reasonably cautiously with it. We have always explained in the past that we feel a great many municipalities have to be dealt with. Administrative difficulties are sometimes heavy in proportion to the expenditure. All those things have been explained in the last two years. This is the first step of its kind. The hon. member makes reference to a rather unusual item that he thinks should be added. He will recognize of course that I am not in a position to say that it can be added this year. I can assure him however that his remarks will be considered by those who will be looking into the matter at a later time.

Mr. Michener: I have a question referring to paragraph 4(c) which, as has been noted, assists municipalities in carrying out their functions by giving some relief from the sales tax. It refers to certain items of equipment. A good deal has been said in the general debate on the budget as to the problem of the municipalities under the present division of taxing authority or taxing power. It has been made apparent that they are being heavily subsidized by the provincial governments to enable them to carry out their responsibilities. I note that in the case of provincial governments the sales tax is given as a complete exemption in the articles with which they have to deal, and that the principle has also been extended to public hospitals and other institutions by way of assisting them in carrying out their purposes. As the parliamentary assistant has said this paragraph represents the first step in one method of assisting the municipalities. I know, too, that we have on the order paper item No. 9 the import of which is not yet known to us, but which is as follows:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to extend the benefits of the Municipal Grants Act and to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

I assume that this is a measure to assist municipalities by federal action. The fact that this appears on the order paper, and the further fact that a brief, which I have seen, has been submitted from Toronto, a city of which my riding is not an inconsiderable part, leads me to ask the parliamentary assistant whether he would care to indicate whether the government has set its face, shall I say, against any additional exemption from sales tax for the municipalities. In other words, is it going the whole way in freeing them from this tax and, if so, whether this other method of assisting the municipalities, which is not yet known, is in any way comparable in extent?

Mr. Benidickson: This is as far as the government intends to go in this field at the moment. My hon. friend has referred to other legislation which, I may point out, amends an existing statute so as to make it more generous. I would remind him that the original legislation is relatively recent. It is only in recent years that the federal government has made grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities. As I say, this is new; and after consideration prior to the budget this year this is the extent to which the government will go.

Mr. McIvor: There are some good things in paragraph 4. Those who suffer from failing hearing will now get their equipment free of sales tax. In the last three years the minister has been asked to free hearing aids. This is the first time it has been done, and it is important to many people. It may not seem important to some, but those who are selling hearing aids believe it is. And I am sure those who buy them will share that view. I commend the minister for having taken this step as set out in paragraph 4 (g).

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Could the minister give figures showing the loss of revenue in respect of the item set out in paragraph 1 of the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: I could give an estimate. The revenue loss estimated for the coming year in respect of electrical appliances is $5 million. I believe that was the figure used by the hon. member for Greenwood. The estimated loss of revenue in respect of furs is $4,400,000; coin operated merchandising machines, $250,000; cameras, $1,350,000; firearms and ammunition, $1,300,000; fishing rods and reels, $350,000; golf clubs and golf balls, $200,000; luggage including trunks, bags and the like, $3,300,000. Those are the items in respect of which the entire 15 per cent is being removed.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I have a question on some of the other items in part 2. This was brought to my attention by a man who is in the undertaking business. Line 4 reads:

. . . for use in connection with the care of the human body.

Down below that it says:

Preserving or restoring.

He wondered whether that included embalming fluid.

Paragraph (d) reads:

Coin, disc or token operated games or amusement devices of all kinds.

Does that include those machines of chance?

Mr. Benidickson: No; a distinction has been made between vending machines—

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): That is in No. 1.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member is referring to No. 2?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: Only the 5 per cent reduction applies to that type, and the 15 per cent applies to the vending of merchandise as opposed to or contrasted with the use of the machine for amusement purposes.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): There is no deduction on the machine of chance.

Mr. Benidickson: Five per cent.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Five per cent only?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. Everything in item 2 is subject to a 5 per cent reduction, bringing the excise tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Does that apply also to machines that are illegal under the Criminal Code?

Mr. Benidickson: I am not aware of that kind.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I believe they are included in this 5 per cent reduction.

Mr. Knowles: A fine example of cabinet solidarity.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Paragraph (e) of No. 2 mentions pipes, cigar and cigarette holders and so forth. Was any consideration given to reducing the tax on cigarettes? The reason I ask that is that in this morning's paper the Royal Canadian Mounted Police report that they caught two men smuggling 165,000 United States cigarettes, and another case of 140,000 cigarettes and another two men were arrested with 25,000 cigarettes. It is all in this morning's paper. With the tax on cigarettes in Canada as it is at the present time we cannot expect anything else but that people will try to smuggle them in. I ask the parliamentary assistant whether any consideration was given at this time to this matter.

Mr. Benidickson: A very substantial reduction was made last year, partly having in mind the matter of smuggling which had been increasing. We believe from the evidence in the intervening period of the past year that this kind of thing has gone down very considerably since the reduction of last year.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It is still pretty high, though, which I believe the assistant to the minister will acknowledge. In paragraph (i) of item No. 2 we find that the tax has been reduced on clocks and watches. Clocks and watches are an absolute necessity. Although this will help the Canadian industry to some extent, I do feel that some restraint should be put on the import of parts of watches because it will certainly ruin the Canadian trade. In paragraph (j) of item No. 2 we find:

Articles of all kinds made in whole or in part of ivory, jet, amber . . .

And so forth. Practically everything that is mentioned in this paragraph is imported. Is this change made to help the importers? The stuff is not made in Canada; most of it is imported into Canada. A reduction from 15 per cent to 10 per cent is made on articles made of ivory, jet, amber, coral, mother of pearl, natural shells, tortoise shell, jade, onyx, lapis lazuli, or other semi-precious stones. All that stuff is imported.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the hon. member for Peterborough will recognize that a number of these items are reassembled into other articles of jewelry and adornment and the tax reduction, added to the reduction in the general classification of jewelry, will doubtless be reflected in the ultimate consumer price.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Just one more question. Item No. 7 reads:

That provision be made to ensure that machines and tools for operation by tractors are not included as accessories therefor in the prevailing exemption from sales tax.

With respect to tools and machines for operation by tractors, there would be hydraulic lifts, shovels, blades and different things of that kind. Can the assistant to the minister tell us just what is meant by this item?

Mr. Benidickson: At the present time the act provides for an exemption for tractors for farm purposes, or used for logging, and accessories for this purpose; but some items are not considered to be accessories for which the exemption is intended: Such things as bulldozers and tractor shovels, tree dozers, cable control units, hydraulic control units and things of that kind are not to be considered as accessories entitled to the exemption.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): A hydraulic lift on a tractor is almost a necessity on some farms, because the farmers have to use them all the time in handling some of their equipment. Why should they not be included in it?

Mr. Benidickson: An item such as my hon. friend describes, and particularly the ones that I recited, are considered rather to change the function of the tractor itself. It gets you into a different field, and they are not considered to be accessories.

Mr. Michener: Can the parliamentary assistant give me the estimated total tax loss which this resolution will cost and also two or three items which I should like to have the details on. First, paragraph (h) of item No. 2, tires and tubes, and, second, the item to which I referred before, namely, equipment for municipalities. How much is estimated will be lost on these two items and on the whole resolution?

Mr. Benidickson: Really, Mr. Chairman, we have not a good estimate on the possible revenue loss in connection with the exemptions on certain items for municipalities. The exemption does not apply to all municipal purchases for which there might be some statistics. I am afraid I could not answer that particular part of my hon. friend's question. I can give an estimated loss of revenue on the reduction of excise taxes on certain articles from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. On tires and tubes, which the hon. member asks specifically, the estimated loss is $3,500,000; candy and chewing gum, $3,950,000; fountain pens and pencils, $275,000; jewelry, glass, china and those other items, $2,400,000; lighters, $100,000; matches, $300,000; motorcycles, $50,000; slot machines, $100,000; smokers' accessories, $150,000; soft drinks, $3,800,000; toilet articles, $2,800,000; carbonic acid gas, $100,000.

Mr. Michener: Can the parliamentary assistant give an estimate for the whole resolution, if only approximate? There must be some estimate of it.

Mr. Benidickson: The major items are in paragraphs 1 and 2 and each amount to about $16 or $17 million, and I would suggest the average would run to about $36 million.

Mr. Michener: That is true probably of the entire forecast?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: I would like to question the parliamentary assistant with regard to section (c) in paragraph 4 which deals with the deduction with regard to municipalities. It seems to me there are quite a number of conditions surrounding that expenditure in excess of $1,000 in regard to equipment used directly for road making, cleaning, or fire fighting, but not in the case of automobiles or ordinary motor trucks. As one looks at this amendment to the Excise Tax Act it seems to be somewhat of a gunshot prescription. There does not seem to be any particular justification for reductions on some articles while others are left as they were.

For instance, in this section we have a reduction on mink coats, fishing rods, and golf balls, but we have a limitation on the reduction as it affects municipalities which are hard-pressed at the moment. It appears to me as though the government is trying to do something for the municipalities and is then undoing it. Surely automobiles and ordinary trucks are used for fire fighting, road maintenance, road cleaning and so on. The hon. member for Peterborough has also raised the question of accessories on certain equipment used on the farm which is almost as important today as the tractor itself, and I am rather amazed that more consideration has not been given to such items.

This is a very tardy way of handling tax reductions in any event. The entire tax reduction proposals are minor in character. In fact the government will be taking more from the people this year than they took last year while ordinary expenditures have increased. You cannot very well call it a substantial reduction in taxation if you merely take a little bit off mink coats, golf balls, fishing lines and a few other things and leave the same tax on the attachments to farming equipment. The farmer uses these attachments such as manure and gravel loaders, and they are as important as the tractor.

When we turn to the municipalities, on whose behalf we have been pressing for reductions for a long time, we find the government will allow them a reduction on anything over $1,000 but not in the case of ordinary motor trucks or automobiles where no reduction is allowed at all. I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that an ordinary motor truck is essential for fire fighting. It is essential for road cleaning and maintenance. I would like the parliamentary assistant to give us the reason why we have these fancy, delicate reductions in the case of luxury items while with other things which are an absolute necessity in carrying on municipal functions there has been no reduction at all.

Mr. Benidickson: An attempt was made in taking this step for the first time to include a number of the more costly items on which municipalities obviously must spend a substantial amount of money. The question of exempting motor vehicles was certainly looked at but, on the other hand, it was felt that in the treatment of some of these major items of municipal equipment there was much greater likelihood that they would be subject to resale and trading and that would have a greater effect on the general automotive truck and automobile business.

Mr. Rowe: You mean up to $1,000?

Mr. Benidickson: No, over $1,000.

Mr. Rowe: But you mean there would be more trading up to $1,000?

Mr. Benidickson: An automobile would probably be put on the market again for resale much more readily than other things, particularly if it had a lower tax rate than was general within the community.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, on paragraph 4 I would like to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to a request made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to which I referred earlier in connection with stock feeds. Perhaps the best way in which I could do that would be to read the submissions of the federation which are contained in a brief submitted to the department. This is their statement:

> In dealing with the Excise Tax Act, we requested that all materials used in the manufacture of stock feeds be made exempt from sales tax by adding the following item to the farm and forest section: "material to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of poultry, cattle and other stock feeds" and that the following item be added to the tax exempt farm and forest list of schedule III of the act; "antibiotics and veterinary drugs."

Apparently nothing has been done in that direction as far as I can judge, and at this time I would ask the parliamentary assistant to bring this matter to the attention of the minister so that it might be given some consideration. Obviously we are not going to pass all these resolutions today. I would be quite happy to move an amendment in this regard, but, of course, it would be out of order under the rules of the committee so I will content myself with the hope that the minister will give that request consideration. In my estimation it is a reasonable and modest request and there seems to be no reason why materials used in the production of livestock should not be treated in the same manner as other farm equipment which goes into the cost of production. I hope the parliamentary assistant will give this matter some consideration.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. Benidickson: Consideration will be given to the hon. member's remarks. I recall that he did refer to this brief in making his speech on the budget but I would draw to his attention the fact that under the schedule in the Excise Tax Act there are quite a number of categories given exemption and they include a long list of foodstuffs and a long list of farm products. In so far as stock feeds are concerned they are not subject to a sales tax, but it may be that certain items that are part of the mixture are themselves taxed because they have been manufactured somewhere else. Stock feed, which is the finished item, is a compound of the whole thing and not subject to tax.

Mr. Zaplitny: Of course that is a reference to the materials used in the manufacture of stock feeds, and is quite a different matter.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question. Section (h) of paragraph 2 mentions tires and tubes in whole or in part of rubber for self-propelled machines or automotive vehicles of all kinds. I suppose that includes bicycles. Could the minister tell us how many of those tires and tubes are imported? The reason I ask is that I was in a store last week and they did not have a Canadian tire in the place. They were all imported tires and it appears that they can get them cheaper than from Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Benidickson: I have not got that figure for my hon. friend at the moment but I will make a note of his question and see that he is supplied with that information if it is possible to obtain it.

Mr. Charlton: I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant if the tires included in the purchase of a new car are exempt from this tax.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: And when the manufacturer buys tires to put on combines or farm machinery or trucks does he get that exemption?

Mr. Benidickson: They are considered to be an accessory in the case of farm machinery and come under the general classification of, I believe, section 409 of the Customs Act which covers the free entry of farm implements.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question. I did not quite clearly understand him when he mentioned the fact that bulldozers and road equipment are exempt. It is understood that under paragraph 4, clause (c) to which I had referred, bulldozers and road equipment would be exempt from sales tax?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend and I are really not referring to the same section. I think that in paragraph 4 (c) there is a list of equipment on which municipalities will no longer have to pay sales tax.

Mr. Rowe: Oh; I see.

Mr. Benidickson: The discussion in connection with bulldozers had reference to another item in this resolution.

Mr. Rowe: That is what I thought.

Mr. Benidickson: Bulldozers, if over $1,000 and purchased by a municipality, would not be subject to sales tax.

Mr. Rowe: For information purposes only may I ask this question? As to a bulldozer that is purchased for logging operations or for farm operations, is it exempt from taxation?

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct; in a general way.

Mr. Rowe: In a general way?

Mr. Benidickson: As you know, there is the matter of from the stump to the common carrier; I think that is the general phrase used in logging operations.

Mr. Rowe: The tax is on for construction companies; on bulldozers purchased by these companies there is a tax but for a farm operation or for making bush roads and so on, bulldozers and other machinery are exempt, are they not?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): A bulldozer is not exempt on a farm.

Mr. Rowe: Maybe your farm does not need a bulldozer.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Yes, it does. That is why I asked about hydraulic equipment.

Mr. Benidickson: No. I am informed that in the case of a logging operation—that is the pushing out of the road—the bulldozer would bear tax.

Mr. Rowe: It would bear tax?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: Nearly all other types of logging equipment are exempt, are they not?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; generally speaking. There is a classification like the farm implement classification.

Mr. Rowe: In logging operations bulldozers are extremely important machines. Neither the provincial government nor the dominion government assists companies and loggers much in building roads which are helpful for fire fighting and are also absolutely necessary for the carrying on of their operations.

I might submit that I do not think there is any other item in logging operation equipment on which the exemption would be more greatly justified than it would be on the bulldozer. As the parliamentary assistant indicated a few minutes ago this afternoon, I realize that there has been a certain amount of caution and a certain amount of fear that some of these articles would be juggled, where advantage would be taken of the exemption and they might be resold or retraded. There may be administrative difficulties along that line but I wish to submit to the parliamentary assistant and his minister that serious consideration might be given to the exemption of bulldozers, machines which are of such great importance in production.

Again I want to emphasize the fact that it is highly desirable that roads should be built through the forests for the purpose of fire protection. I have often suggested that both provincial and dominion governments should co-operate to a greater extent with operators in order to get a better system of roads for fire protection and for the development of proper forestry through the various northern sections and areas that are not being operated effectively, in order to protect the trees from disease, fungi, fire and so on.

I just wish to draw this matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant for his consideration. As everyone who is familiar with bush operations knows, in the matter of building roads a bulldozer is just about as essential as is any other implement in that field. I think some reconsideration might be given to this matter.

Mr. Benidickson: So far the exemption is limited just to the tractor portion of the equipment.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the resolution carrying today, if that is the wish of the committee; but there is one other subject that I want to say something about. However, I am prepared to do it on second reading of the bill. Since I have indicated that there is such a subject, perhaps I should let the parliamentary assistant know what it is so that whoever is piloting the bill through the house at the second-reading stage might be prepared to discuss it. I refer to the request of charitable organizations for a sales tax refund similar to that which is granted to hospitals. Whoever is sponsoring the bill on that occasion can find what we will probably say by looking at Hansard of March 31, 1953. There the parliamentary assistant will find that his colleague the hon. member for Spadina as well as the hon. member for Eglinton and I spoke on the question. I am sure that the other members to whom I have referred will agree with me that the time has come for something to be done in this connection. We shall have more to say about the matter later, in case it is the desire of the committee to pass this one resolution today.

Mr. Rowe: I do not want to hold the resolution up, Mr. Chairman; but before it passes I should like to have some assurance that the parliamentary assistant and his minister might give some consideration to paragraph 4 (c) with reference to municipalities. I do not want to hold the resolution up beyond six o'clock, but I still feel we have not been given any real reason why the exemption is limited to articles whose price is over $1,000 or why a motor truck should not be included as a necessity for municipalities, for such purposes as road cleaning, road construction and so on. I cannot help thinking that the government might well have considered these articles and might not have so greatly restrained their reductions. As far as I am concerned, I will be satisfied if the minister would agree to give serious consideration again to that item. I do not want to hold up the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: Fairly serious consideration has already been given but it certainly can be reconsidered between now and the time of bringing in the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not want to hold the resolution up either, Mr. Chairman, but I do not feel altogether happy about the answers we have been getting, as I understand it, as to why this reference in paragraph 4 (c) "in excess of one thousand dollars per unit" is necessary. As I understand it, the suggestion has been made that it would be easier, in respect of smaller items, to abuse the statute by dealing in them. Surely the municipalities have, first of all, some conscience and, in the second place, they have to keep records. I would think that one ought to be able to trust them. But in so far as you cannot trust them or if you are not prepared to operate on that basis, it should be remembered that they have records. It surely ought to be possible to have records. If the reason which has been given is the only one, I should like to ask whether the matter could not be reconsidered before this resolution passes. I do not want to be less reasonable than was my colleague the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No; it is not carried.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, tomorrow and Friday we shall take estimates, beginning with northern affairs, continuing with fisheries and then agriculture.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 6, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

First report of the joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

QUESTIONS

ARMED FORCES RECRUITING PERSONNEL

Mr. McGregor:

1. During the fiscal year 1952-53, how many personnel in the (a) army; (b) navy; (c) air force, were used mainly in recruiting?
2. In each case, what were their ranks?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. The following service personnel in the field who were engaged mainly in recruiting in 1952-53: Navy, 38; Army, 91; Air force, 196.

Note: Army and R.C.A.F. recruit only for the active force; navy recruits for both active and reserve.

2. (a) Navy: Lieutenant commanders, 6; Lieutenants, 6; Chief petty officers, 1st class, 10; Chief petty officers, 2nd class, 6; Petty officers, 1st class, 5; Petty officers, 2nd class, 3; Leading seamen, 2.

(b) Army: Lieutenants, 25; Sergeants, 39; Corporals, 5; Privates, 22.

(c) Air Force: Squadron leaders, 5; Flight lieutenants, 23; Flying officers, 59; Sergeants, 31; Corporals, 4; Airmen, 53; Airwomen, 21.

TUNNEY'S PASTURE, OTTAWA

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How much of the property known as Tunney's pasture was purchased by the government?
2. From whom was the purchase made?
3. What was the purchase price?
4. What buildings are the government constructing there?
5. How much is the estimated cost of construction, etc.?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Approximately 113.5 acres.

2. W. L. Ballentine, J. Beaudin, Laurier Bellefeuille, Donat Bray, Burgess Tool Company, Charles Burnside, Leonard Copeland, Rodrique Dagenais, William Doe, Rodolphe Dumouchel, Margaret Ericksen, William H. Fader, Lewis R. Ferrier, Alex. Fleck Limited, J. A. Lalonde, Edouard Lavigne, Harvey Leduc, Henri Leduc, Napoleon Martineau, Rupert S. McClelland, John M. McGuire, Mrs. Anne B. McManus, Mrs. Grace Olivier, Mrs. Sarah E. Poll, Edmond Quesnel, Albert Quesnel, Ernest St. Germaine, Tessier and Schryer, Victor J. Thom, township of Nepean, Gordon C. Webster, Robert S. Wright.

3. The site was expropriated under date of July 28, 1947. Settlements have been made in the amount of $670,125.

4. The following buildings are under contract: (a) Food and drug laboratory for the Department of National Health and Welfare; (b) Virus laboratory for the Department of National Health and Welfare; (c) Archives storage building; (d) Testing laboratory for the Department of Public Works.

5. (a) $2,566,450; (b) $943,243; (c) $1,180,-956; (d) $681,235.

FRENCH EDITION "CANADA 1953"

Mr. Girard:

1. Has the distribution of the French edition of "Canada 1953" been prohibited in France by the ministry of commerce?
2. If so, has the Canadian government made representations to France, protesting against the restricting of distribution of French publications printed in Canada?
3. Is there a cultural agreement whereby French publications from Canada may enjoy the same freedom of distribution as is granted by Canada to the publications coming from France?

Mr. Pinard:

1. To the best of our knowledge and as far as we can learn from inquiries in Ottawa, there has been no difficulty concerning the distribution of the French edition of "Canada 1953" in France. Further inquiries are being made through the Canadian embassy in Paris.

2. See answer to No. 1 above.

3. No. The movement of books and other literature is, as with other countries, handled commercially and customs, exchange control and other regulations are applicable to it where they exist. I understand that exchanges of books have in the past been subject to private agreements between publishers in Canada and France and that it is hoped that such agreements can be revived.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SECURITY ARRANGEMENT FOR SOUTHEAST ASIA—DISCUSSIONS REGARDING INDO-CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Will the Prime Minister give the house information concerning a security arrangement for southeast Asia which was announced by President Eisenhower yesterday as being in the process of formation? And is the Canadian government participating or willing to participate?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. gentleman telephoned my office as to the terms of this question shortly after one o'clock today. I saw it just a few moments ago. It is rather vague. "Is the Canadian government participating or willing to participate?" I do not know whether that refers to the discussions that are taking place, or if it seeks to get a declaration as to whether the Canadian government is willing to participate in a security arrangement for southeast Asia.

Mr. Green: That is what I had in mind.

Mr. St. Laurent: That matter has not come up for consideration by the Canadian government. As I understand the hon. gentleman's question there is very little information I can give him about it; it is based on the statement made yesterday by President Eisenhower in which he referred to the suggestion made by Secretary Dulles in his address of March 29. The President goes on to say:

> Obviously, it was never expected that this collective security arrangement would spring into existence overnight. There are too many important problems to be resolved. But there is a general sense of urgency. The fact that such an organization is in process of formation could have an important bearing upon what happens at Geneva during the Indo-China phase of the conference.
> The countries of the area are now thinking in constructive terms, which include the indispensable concept of collective security. Progress in this matter has been considerable and I am convinced that further process—

It must be "further progress".

> —will continue to be made.

As I said in the house the other day, if and when the question as to whether Canada should make further commitments arises for decision it will be given very careful consideration, and our conclusions, if they are that we recommend further commitments, will be brought to the house and the reasons for these conclusions explained before we take the responsibility of making commitments for the Canadian nation.

I cannot add anything to that. We are, of course, very much concerned with what is going on at Geneva and elsewhere. In connection with that I might perhaps take advantage of this occasion to clarify the answer I gave to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) a week ago. My attention has been called to the fact that the hon. gentleman's question and my unqualified answer might have given the impression that we were taking no part whatsoever in discussions affecting the position in Indo-China. Well, that would be quite contrary to the statements which have previously been made in the house, and quite contrary to the facts.

The situation with respect to Indo-China is that so far as the formal phase of the Geneva conference is concerned the sole responsibility for deciding its membership rested with the inviting powers under the decision taken by the foreign minister of France, the Soviet union, the United Kingdom and the United States at their conference of last January in Berlin.

That information has already been given to the house and the fact is that these powers have now decided in Geneva that membership will be restricted to themselves and communist China, the three associated states of Indo-China, and representatives of the Viet Minh. Canada has not been invited to participate in the formal discussions which are about to take place in Geneva.

The problem of Indo-China is a most complex and difficult one. There is much to be said in favour of the inviting powers' decision to keep the formal discussions on Indo-China to those parties principally and immediately concerned. In the interest of the solution we had no grounds to complain of not being included. Such neighbouring countries as Thailand, the Philippines and Australia, which are more closely concerned with developments in Indo-China than are we, are not being brought into the formal discussions. On the other hand, informal discussions on Indo-China have been and are taking place all the time at Geneva because it is a matter of such vital interest to world peace.

The report we receive from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is that he and members of the Canadian delegation are participating in those informal discussions about all those matters as actively as is any other delegation outside of the countries immediately concerned with the problems of Indo-China. As was stated in the house, we were invited to the conference that would take place on the Korean problem but we were not invited—and others that are more directly concerned than we are were not invited—to participate in the formal discussions in respect of the Indo-Chinese situation.

I am sure that all those who are really interested in peace are much concerned about what can be done and about security pacts that could be useful anywhere. But as to whether or not Canada should be a participant in other security pacts than the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is something which we have not yet had to consider and about which we have not yet had to come to any conclusion. The statement I made in the house stands. If we come to the conclusion that it would be helpful for world peace—and that would mean that it would be helpful to and in the interests of Canada—and decide to make recommendations, we would bring those recommendations to the house and have them discussed here. In the meantime there is nothing I can usefully say following this declaration of yesterday by the President of the United States. The matter is certainly being investigated. Exploratory talks are taking place but they have not yet come to the point where it would be required of us to say whether and under what conditions we might feel it was in Canada's interests to be a participant.

Mr. Green: May I ask a supplementary question? Can the Prime Minister explain how the statement that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported to have made in Geneva fits into the picture? From a press report which appeared yesterday purporting to quote the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I quote as follows:

"Failure here"—

That is at Geneva.

"—may well necessitate further collective consideration by those who, as a result of such failure, will feel increasingly threatened, of further ways and means to meet that threat . . ."

Mr. St. Laurent: I cannot add anything more than what the Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported as having said to newspapermen who inquired from him about that matter. This is a dispatch as published last night in the Ottawa Journal:

External affairs minister Pearson said today that when he wrote his speech for the Geneva conference he had not had in mind the specific possibility that Canada might join the projected southeast Asia security pact.

He made his comment when asked about the significance of the statement in his speech yesterday that failure of the Far East conference here might result in further collective security measures by the western powers. This would apply particularly in respect of Indo-China.

I cannot add anything to that. At the present time there is sometimes a tendency to try to read into anything that is said meanings that were not intended by the one who said it. That is quite natural because, as individuals, we are all concerned with the security of the world at the present time and we are all anxious to get as much information as we can get about it. Because of that feeling it is quite natural that there is sometimes read into anything that is said a meaning that was not intended.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question arising out of the answer he has given to an earlier question. Since Canada is so obviously and, as the hon. gentleman has stated, so properly concerned about the prospects of success or failure of the conference on Indo-China, did the Canadian government make any representations as to whether or not we should be asked to participate in formal discussions of that conference?

Mr. St. Laurent: The answer is a negative one, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

GENEVA CONFERENCE—RETURN OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question that bears to some extent on the answer he gave to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). Is it intended that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) should continue to lead the Canadian delegation at Geneva throughout the entire conference or is he coming home? Can the Prime Minister give any indication, in that event, as to how much longer the Secretary of State for External Affairs intends to remain at Geneva?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; I am not in a position at this moment to say when he might expect to be home, nor do I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself would be able to do so.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORTS OF VOTE ON BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a matter of privilege. Several papers today carry stories which misconstrue our vote on the budget yesterday. May I just refer to a dispatch of the Canadian Press in the Montreal Gazette of today. It reads in part as follows:

A Liberal member of parliament today voted against the government on the Quebec income tax issue.

Wilfrid LaCroix (L-Quebec-Montmorency) sided with the opposition as the Commons voted 136 to 70 to approve the government's 1954-55 budget.

He was the only Liberal to criticize the budget decision against granting Quebec's request that the province's new 15-per-cent personal income tax be fully deductible from federal tax payments.

May I say that we voted against the budget because of the criticisms we made here. Contrary to reports, we are thoroughly in support of the government's stand on the Quebec tax issue.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FIREPROOFING OF BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Having regard to the loss by fire of national defence service buildings this year and the announcement of new construction at Petawawa, including barracks buildings, administration buildings, mess halls, garages and so on, is consideration being given to seeing that those buildings are fireproofed?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the assumption that the hon. gentleman makes seems to be that the loss by fire of defence property is out of all proportion to what it should be. There is no justification for that assumption. The loss is much lower than is the loss in respect of corresponding civilian properties in Canada.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Claxton: It is a matter of statistics. Whether or not it is worth while to build a completely fireproof building depends on the nature of the building and the fire hazards. The type of construction we use is partly fireproof, partly fire-resistant and sometimes not fireproof at all, depending on the type of construction. But to fireproof all the buildings would give rise to an expenditure out of all proportion to the savings in connection with loss by fire.

POTATOES

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER ASSISTANCE IN DISPOSING OF BALANCE OF CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I did not give him notice because I think he can answer it. If not, he can take it as notice. In view of the rather serious situation among the potato farmers of New Brunswick, has the minister or his department or the government received any request from the potato marketing board of New Brunswick for further assistance in the handling of the balance of the 1953 potato crop?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): We are in communication with the boards of both New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island with regard to the situation that is developing in connection with the marketing of potatoes. If my hon. friend will allow me to take the question as notice, I will obtain for him the exact figures as to what the position is at this time and give them to him tomorrow.

Mr. Montgomery: Thank you very much. That is all right.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National parks branch—
National parks and historic sites services—
304. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,397,820.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find this vote on page 44 of the blue book and the details on page 374.

Mr. Shaw: On April 29 when these estimates were last before the house I brought a matter to the minister's attention and requested certain explanations and clarification with respect to it. The minister indicated that he would secure the information. If he has it here I should like to know what it is.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have secured the following information with respect to the operation of the Ya-Ha-Tinda ranch. This ranch comprises an area of some eighteen square miles in township 32, ranges 11 and 12, west of the 5th meridian in the province of Alberta. It is completely separate from Banff park, being about one and a half miles from the eastern boundary of the park at the nearest point. The property is owned by the federal government and administered by the national parks branch. It is not, however, a national park, nor is it subject to the parks act or the regulations made thereunder. Up until a few months before the transfer of natural resources agreement of 1930 the ranch was within the boundaries of Rocky Mountain park and was administered under the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

The area comprising the ranch is particularly good grazing land for horses and has been used for this purpose by the parks service for many years. When the transfer of resources agreement and the new National Parks Act were being prepared to come into effect simultaneously it was realized that the Ya-Ha-Tinda ranch would be outside the boundaries of the new Banff park which would replace the Rocky Mountain park. As the area was still required as grazing land for park horses belonging to the warden service it was withdrawn from the Rocky Mountain park by order in council P.C. 565 of March 14, 1930 and therefore was not included with the federal crown lands transferred to the province of Alberta a few months later. It was this order in council that was referred to by the hon. member for Red Deer when he discussed the ranch last Thursday evening.

Since the passage of the order in council the land has continued to be administered by the parks service but, as I mentioned before, it is not subject to the National Parks Act and it is in effect similar to any privately owned ranch in the province of Alberta. The hon. member raised the question of hunting privileges within the ranch boundaries. We have checked with the superintendents who have been in charge of Banff park since 1947 and I have been assured that at no time have they given permission for hunting on the ranch property. As a matter of fact when the then park superintendent visited the ranch in September, 1952 he found a number of hunters on the premises. They were requested to leave and signs were erected prohibiting hunting and also motor traffic on the property. These signs have been maintained and to the best of our knowledge no hunting has taken place on the ranch since that time.

There is one feature that may have led to a misunderstanding about hunting. A trail, which is passable at times to motor traffic, leads to the ranch, and an extension of this trail crosses the ranch and leads to excellent hunting grounds to the north and west of the ranch. We have permitted hunters and pack trains to cross the ranch on the way to the hunting grounds beyond. Many return through the ranch bearing their kill. This may have given the impression that the game was shot on the ranch property. I might add that we do not have any intention of opening the area to hunting and the foreman in charge has been instructed that hunting is prohibited.

Mr. Shaw: I appreciate very much the information that has been given. May I ask the minister whether the area has been leased to any individual or group of individuals?

Mr. Lesage: If the hon. member means the ranch area there is no lease and there is no intention of leasing it.

Mr. Shaw: The word "ranch" rather confuses me. Who operates the ranch in this area?

Mr. Lesage: As I said a few moments ago, the national parks service operates the ranch for the grazing of horses which are the property of the parks administration.

Mr. Shaw: There is one other matter. The minister has indicated that we may have been confused with respect to hunting in the area. I would suggest to the minister that possibly that aspect of it should be checked a little more carefully because hunting has been conducted in the area. Hunters have been seen shooting in the area, and that led to much of the difficulty. Other hunters have been forbidden the privilege while they themselves have witnessed hunters hunting in the area. As I say, that led to a good deal of criticism because it did appear to the people to whom I spoke, hunters and others, that certain persons were being granted the privilege of hunting there. The minister has given the assurance that there has not been any hunting in the area and that there will be none, but I am more concerned with the policy. I certainly hope that that is the policy and that every effort will be made to enforce it rigidly. Otherwise there is bound to be no end of trouble.

There is one other matter I should like to clear up. I should like to know why this is a more or less privileged area in relation to park areas? Why is it that the public are prohibited from entering? The minister has said certain pack outfits have been permitted to pass through. That is news to me, and I am sure it is going to be news to many of those hunters with whom I spoke and who were told to pay attention to the no trespassing sign on the gate. Personally, I cannot understand why people who desire to spend a Sunday afternoon, for example, by those falls, which are very beautiful and are just two or three miles inside the area, are prohibited from entering. I should like to know if any similar situation exists anywhere else in Canada? Can the minister give me any information about that? I want to know specifically why the public should be barred from entering there as they would any park area?

Mr. Lesage: This is not a national park. As I have already explained, this is the same as private property. It is being kept in order to have a place for these horses to graze. We need a place and that is the place that is used. It has been used for years, and there is nothing I can add.

Mr. Shaw: I have no argument with the minister's declaration that they require an area for grazing purposes, but I cannot understand why we should have an 18-section area like that from which the people are barred. As I say, people may desire to go there to spend a Sunday afternoon. Secondly, I should like to know how many horses are owned by the federal parks branch that are pastured in the area?

Mr. Lesage: The number of horses, I am informed, is approximately 150.

Mr. Shaw: May I just pursue the one aspect further, and that is with respect to this no trespassing sign. It is very prominent on the gate. The road comes right up to the gate, and that is the end of it. It is a good road. Why should the public be prohibited from entering? I am not suggesting there should not be any rules or regulations. We have these rules and regulations governing the actions of people who go into the parks. I should like to know why the citizens of my community cannot go into that area on a Sunday afternoon and have a picnic lunch. It is a strange situation that has caused a great deal of criticism. In fact, the people call it the iron curtain area; that is what the people of my area call it. They say this is extraordinary. It is different from anything else of which we are aware in any other part of the country.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, as I said a few moments ago, this is a ranch area and is only about a mile and a half from Banff national park. I believe that Banff national park is an area sufficiently large to accommodate the people from my hon. friend's riding. The no trespass sign is there because it is an area that is mainly grass but has some wood. We have to be very careful about fire and also careful, as my hon. friend was asking us to be, to do everything we can to prevent illegal hunting. That is one of the ways.

Mr. Shaw: If that is the only effective method of preventing illegal hunting we may just as well bar people from the parks. Let me point out to the minister that while it can be said Banff is a large area not too far away from this area, let us not forget that the way one has to travel to get from the area in which these people live it is 150 to 175 miles, whereas many of them live only five, ten, or fifteen miles from this beautiful spot in the prohibited area. It is true there is grassland there. There is grassland very much like our prairie wool. The minister should not be led to believe it is a section similar to areas in the southern section of Saskatchewan. There are some beautiful spots in that area.

There is always the danger of fire. Certainly there is the same danger on provincial crown lands in the areas surrounding this ranch. If a fire started in the provincial crown lands area, the Ya-Ha-Tinda area would go up in smoke, too. I do not believe that is a good argument. I do not believe our people are going to be satisfied or remain quiet until they know exactly why they, the citizens of Canada, are barred from going into an area which, in theory if not in fact, they the people of Canada own.

I should like to ask one other question. Am I to be barred, as a member of parliament, if I want to go into that area as soon as I go home? The no trespass sign I suppose refers to me as well as to any person. All I am going to suggest to the minister is—I make no threat at all—that I am likely to make a test case out of that because I am going in there. I have been asked to go in there, and I am going in. Possibly in that way we will find out who will institute the prosecution, and I believe we shall have a most interesting court case.

Mr. Knowles: It has been nice knowing the hon. member.

Mr. Shaw: After all, it may be a pleasant way to retire, if that is to be the end result. Can the minister indicate to me, in advance, so I shall know what preparations to make, if they are going to prosecute me if I go through that gate and into the area which I feel, as a citizen of Canada, belongs to me as well as to everyone else?

In the absence of an answer, I am going to serve notice now that I am going to make a test case out of it. Shortly after I get home I am going through the gate and we shall see what follows. All I can say is, if I am not back here again it has been nice knowing all of you.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to ask a question about these 150 horses. Are they used by the rangers for patrols?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, they are for the wardens, for patrols and for the forest fire patrols.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The Minister mentioned that during the hunting season pack trains and hunters were allowed to go through the ranch to the hunting ground. Are there patrols at that time along the ranch road to make sure these people do not hunt at that time?

Mr. Lesage: Of course they have to ask the foreman or one of the hired men who are on the spot for permission to go through. When permission is given these two hired men know the people are going across and they follow them and check on them.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): When the hon. member who has just preceded me enters the park he has to ask permission to go in.

Mr. Lesage: It is not a park, and it is not a public place. It is a ranch that provides a grazing area for the horses which are the property of the park service. They have to graze somewhere, and that is where they are put. It is 18 square miles and it is not at the disposal of the Canadian public. It is the property of the government assigned to a definite purpose. There is one foreman and one hired man looking after the horses. If we permit the general public to enter, as we do in the parks, of course we shall need a lot of persons to act as wardens and the cost will be increased. We have these immense park areas like Jasper, Banff and Yoho with their warden services and they cost the people of Canada a lot of money. I do not see why we should have this little piece of property as a park when we need it for a definite and private reason. The government is entitled to use property as private property, just the same as any other citizen, when it needs it.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I am not objecting to that. The minister has said that they will allow hunters and pack trains to go through at certain times. How are people to know when they can go through? There is a no trespassing sign at the gate. How does one know when he can go through; that is what I am getting at. There must be something definite about it; it cannot be left in this hit-and-miss fashion.

Mr. Lesage: Next year, when my estimates are being considered, I shall be able to answer the question because, before the hon. member for Red Deer goes through, I shall have gone through myself—at least I shall have made a try.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The minister is going to prepare the way for the hon. member for Red Deer so that he will be able to go into the ranch; is that it?

Mr. Shaw: Some reference has been made to the added cost of supervising this area. I am given to understand that one of the park rangers is spending quite a bit of time there, anyway, particularly during the hunting season. Many of these hunters have been accosted by the ranger, whose name I can give if required. I should like to know two things: Are there any other horses, outside of government-owned horses, pastured in the Ya-Ha-Tinda area?

Mr. Lesage: Well, I am informed by the director of the parks branch that, to his knowledge, the answer should be No.

Mr. Shaw: Then, I have one other question, and then for the moment, I shall leave the matter. Reference has been made to a ranch foreman and manager, or some such officials; I am not sure as to the exact terms used. Are those men on the payroll of the federal government?

Mr. Lesage: Definitely.

Mr. Hodgson: Does the minister say there are only two men on the payroll to look after this park or ranch, or whatever it is called?

Mr. Lesage: That is correct, according to my information—except in haying time, when there is a temporary haying crew.

Mr. Hodgson: The minister had better look at it again and see whether there are not some horses on the payroll.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say a word or two about the Revelstoke park, because many of my constituents are interested in that park, which is situated on the mountain at Revelstoke. I, too, have been interested in it since it was established. First of all I notice the minister has said that he is going out west to take a look at things. I do urge that he get off the train at Revelstoke and that he should not fail to visit the Revelstoke park. It is a very beautiful one on the top of a mountain, with a beautiful eighteen-mile drive leading up to it.

I would bring to the minister's attention the manner in which the records for that park are kept. According to those records only Canadians visit the park, and there is no reference to citizens of the United States or of other countries visiting there. I know the record is quite incorrect because on a number of occasions I have been to the top of the mountain with visitors from the United States and Great Britain. I have met hundreds of people from places outside Canada who have visited the park during my residence. I suggest therefore that it should get credit for having entertained these outside visitors, because those visits indicate an interest in the park far beyond the confines of Canada.

I suggest further that when the minister visits the park he should take a good look at the construction of new buildings there. I shall not say more on the subject but I would like to have his opinion as to whether those buildings are the right type to be built at the top of a mountain, in a park.

In view of the unique nature and the elevation of this park, as well as its beauty, I suggest more money should be spent in its development. I happen to know that people from the United States and from the old country visit it whenever they come to British Columbia, and that they are keenly interested in it. I do suggest that more money should be spent in the development of the Revelstoke park.

I do not know what the government's policy is and whether it would spend more money on the park if the Canadian Pacific railway were to build a hotel at the top of the mountain. However I have noticed that advertising by the travel bureau is coincidental with the information sent out by the two railway companies. I would urge again that the minister look into the possibility of spending more money on the development of this park.

Mr. Dufresne: A short time ago we heard reference to one hundred and fifty horses living in an area of eighteen square miles. Well, if hon. members do not like the sound of that, I would point out to them that we have labouring people in my home city, families of eight or ten, living in three-roomed apartments. Do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be reasonable to keep these horses in an area of possibly a couple of square miles, instead of eighteen square miles, and thus permit the people of Canada to have access to this park?

Mr. Harkness: I should like to make a plea to the minister, one which the late Mr. Adamson and I have been making to successive ministers who have been in charge of the national parks over the last nine years. It is a matter concerning which, unfortunately, very little has been done. I refer to the improvement of skiing facilities in the western Rockies, particularly in the area leading out from Banff and Lake Louise, and crossing the Alberta-British Columbia border. We have in that area, and perhaps to a somewhat lesser extent in the Jasper area, the finest skiing to be found anywhere in the world. Unfortunately it is not used to any great extent because the number who visit there from eastern Canada, as well as from the United States and other countries, is relatively small. The number is nothing like as great as the number who go to much less desirable skiing areas in the United States and, of course, there is no relationship whatever to the great numbers who visit Switzerland, the Austrian Alps, and places of that kind.

We do not expect numbers as great as those who visit the European skiing resorts because we realize that there are not such great numbers of skiers on this continent. I am convinced however that the number of tourists and, of course, the revenue to the country and to the parks in particular, could be greatly increased by the improvement of skiing facilities. Those now available are limited and relatively expensive. For a number of years the late member and I advocated that the department should do a great deal more work by way of clearing ski trails so that people could go on ski trips to the mountains. It might make some effort to provide huts, such as are found in large numbers in the European skiing areas. These huts could be built at a relatively small cost and could be used by those skiers for overnight shelter, and things of that sort. The same trails, of course, could be used in the summertime by hikers. That is one thing which would not cost a great deal of money and it would greatly add to the number of people who could make use of skiing facilities in our Rockies during the winter months.

Another matter is the provision of a somewhat larger and better airstrip than exists at Banff at the present time so that the people can come in by air. To some extent that has had an effect on the number of people who go there to ski. In view of the present transportation methods and so on, one of the facilities that could be improved is the airstrip at Banff, which is quite small and undeveloped. Perhaps an expenditure of a considerable sum of money is not justified on that airstrip, but a certain amount of expenditure in order to increase its size is justified.

I wish the minister would go very closely into the question of the improvement that could be made as far as skiing facilities are concerned. I am absolutely certain an improvement in those facilities will pay big dividends, not only as far as this particular park is concerned, but as far as the entire tourist industry into Canada is concerned. If he will consult with the director of the Canadian travel bureau—I believe that comes under his department—he will agree fully with that view that that is one way in which we can materially increase the number of tourists, and therefore the number of tourist dollars we see in this country.

In addition to these general remarks, I may say that the youth hostels have increased quite considerably in the national parks out there, the Banff and Jasper national parks. I do not know about the British Columbia parks, but I think there has been some development of youth hostels in them also.

Can the minister tell us under what conditions those youth hostels are erected? What assistance is provided by the parks branch, if any, in addition of course to providing the site? How many of those are in existence at the present time?

Mr. Lesage: There are seven or eight of those hostels, and they are provided free of charge to the youth. We supply them with fuelwood, and all necessities of life, except food, of course, garbage facilities, public services.

Mr. Harkness: The service that is provided to the youth by the parks branch is the provision of a site to erect the building on and the provision of fuel. Apart from that no other assistance is given; is that correct?

Mr. Lesage: The buildings are the property of the government and the parks service has erected and maintained them, except for those at Eisenhower junction and Lake Louise.

Mr. Harkness: That is the point I am getting at. The parks branch actually erects and owns the buildings. In other words, all of the cost of the construction has been carried by the parks branch?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, with the exceptions mentioned.

Mr. Harkness: And the buildings are, you might say, operated merely by the youth hostel association?

Mr. Lesage: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: As I think I said before, the development of this youth hostel movement is an exceptionally good one. It has made the use of our national parks available to a large number of young people who otherwise could not go there because they could not afford the charges of the hotels and so on. I hope the erection of those hostels will be continued and expanded. It is one of the finest things that has been done in the national parks in the last two years, and I am extremely glad to see it.

The other matter which I mentioned was the provision of better skiing facilities. Perhaps it can be tied in with the erection of those youth hostels. Some of those youth hostel buildings could be used for skiing purposes in the wintertime. Can the minister comment on the general matter of improvement of skiing facilities which I spoke of a few minutes ago?

Mr. Lesage: I have not been there since the spring of 1946, but I expect to be there this summer and I intend to meet the people who operate under licence at Mount Norquay and to discuss with them facilities there and any improvements that can be made to the present facilities. The hon. member can rest assured that I shall keep his representations in mind when I am there.

Mr. Harkness: I may point out that this business of discussing with the concessionaires of Mount Norquay what further improvements may be made does not even touch on the representations I was making, namely, the provision of ski trails through these mountains, thereby making much more territory available to skiing than exists at the present time. That is one of the difficulties of skiing out there. That is one of the reasons why fewer people go there than otherwise would. The number of places where you can actually go to ski and where there are facilities for people to get in out of the cold are extremely limited. You have only Norquay besides Banff, Sunshine and two or three other places. That is all we have. The very point I am making is that these ski trails and other things that could be used as youth hostels in the summertime are just straight shelters, cheaply constructed. Huts or lodges should be provided so that a much greater area could be opened up to skiers.

Mr. Brooks: Where are these seven or eight hostels located? At what parks in Canada do we have them? Are there any in eastern Canada?

Mr. Lesage: They are all in the mountain parks.

Mr. Brooks: Is it the intention to have any constructed in eastern Canada? We could do a bit of skiing down east, you know, as well as out west.

Mr. Lesage: I will consider it.

Mr. Montgomery: I have a question or two to ask the minister. This may not be the right place to ask it. If it is not, I would like him to tell me. I heard nothing about the revenue derived from these parks. Does the government get any revenue from these national parks? If so, where can we find it?

Mr. Lesage: At page 379 of the estimate book.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Before the item is carried I want to bring to the attention of the minister something that has bothered me for some little time in connection with the Banff national park. I refer to the buildings erected in the park area. This is in the town of Banff. I have had several instances of people writing to me in regard to the regulations concerning buildings. I have taken some of these cases up with the department and the officials, and they are working on them now trying to evolve some sort of a solution.

It is a very bad situation, and I am not bringing any particular instance to the attention of the minister at this time because, as I said a moment ago, the departmental officials are looking into some of them. There has been a great deal of complaint, particularly in regard to the erection of duplex buildings in a single-dwelling area, and then in erecting a multiple dwelling in a duplex area. These areas are divided into A, B and C in the park, in the town of Banff itself. I have complaints in this regard. I understand the minister's position and the position that the park officials find themselves in, in regard to these particular grievances. There has been a great deal of lax administration—shall I put it that way—in the past in regard to the construction of houses in the Banff area.

For instance, I know people who have built a duplex in a class "B" area and then having gone ahead—some with the permission of the park authorities and others without permission—and put in an extra suite they of course get into trouble because they have done that. They point out to me that while they themselves are in trouble with the park officials there are many other people living around them who seem to get away with it. I had a list sent to me the other day involving, I would think, about 50 people who are living in areas apparently in violation of the regulations. Now, as I have said, I am not going to make these names public because the park officials are looking into some of these cases. I think though, generally speaking, that the department will have to make a complete revision of the regulations, particularly those in relation to the town of Banff and the national park area, because there are so many conflicting rules that I cannot see how this building problem can be solved within the town of Banff until we start off with a completely new form of regulation.

I am not one of those who wishes to bring problems before the minister when I know that these problems have arisen because of violation of the existing regulations, but I am placed in a very peculiar situation, particularly when people come to me and say, "Well, I have violated the regulations and the park officials are taking it up with me but there are dozens of people living around me who have also violated the regulations and are getting away with it." I hear the remark "Well, they are probably Liberals." I am not going to make that assertion because so far as I know, since the election, and I emphasize that, I do not think there has been too much political interference in Banff. We cannot help having a little of that I suppose, but if there is anything like that I can assure the minister he will hear about it. However, up to the moment I do not think there has been too much interference in that regard.

On this occasion I would like to suggest to the minister that in view of the fact that I have had so many complaints in regard to the building regulations, something more concrete will have to be evolved and there will have to be some further revision of these regulations so that people will know that one family is treated exactly like another. That is all I want to say on that topic at this time.

Mr. Lesage: I would just like to point out to the hon. member that it is quite possible these houses which were not built according to the present regulations might have been built before the present regulations came into force. But if the hon. member has had complaints from people about homes built contrary to the regulations and since these regulations were put into force I would appreciate it if he would let me know the names of the people involved and I will look into the matter.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I thank the minister for these observations. Departmental officials are aware of some of these cases and are looking into them now in an attempt to straighten out the situation. But the minister has put his finger on a point there. He has stated that some of these people might have had their homes erected before these new regulations went into force. But I would point out to the minister that that presents a difficulty because if you have a family living in a designated duplex area and there are multiple dwellings in that duplex area it does not make any difference when they were built, trouble is bound to arise. Then again we have people who have a duplex with a suite in the basement, and it is rather difficult to explain to an individual why he cannot go ahead and build a duplex in the same area and put a suite in his basement when the neighbour has one and has had it for a number of years. It is all very well for the minister to say that perhaps that fellow built his house a few years ago. Perhaps he did. I am not going to argue about that. But it is difficult to explain to them why they cannot do the same as their neighbour has already done. That is why I am pointing out to the minister that I think it is high time these regulations were given a thorough overhaul so there will be no misunderstanding on the part of people who build homes in the Banff park area.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, there was some discussion earlier this afternoon about the barring of the public from public land, and in connection with that I would like to make a brief reference to another case in perhaps a slightly different category which aroused a great deal of ire and resentment on the part of visitors to Banff last fall, and also considerable resentment on the part of the local people. I refer to the erection of a fence around Chateau Lake Louise which, I am told, rather effectively barred public access to one of the showplaces of western Canada, Lake Louise itself. I would like to ask the minister whether his department plans to take any action to prevent a repetition this year of what occurred during last summer and fall.

Mr. Lesage: You mean at Lake Louise?

Mr. Nickle: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: That whole matter was discussed when I brought in the amendment to the parks act during this session and I have nothing to add to what I said at that time.

Mr. Montgomery: I would like to ask the minister another question in connection with the matter I raised a few moments ago. Could the minister give us a breakdown of the amount of revenue which was obtained from each park. Perhaps if he cannot do that at this time he would be kind enough to supply the information later.

Mr. Lesage: I can give the figures for the last full year.

Mr. Montgomery: That is what I am referring to for the others are only estimates.

Mr. Lesage: The figures are as follows: Banff, $350,307.43; Cape Breton Highlands, $9,149.00; Elk Island, $52,205.00; Fundy, $13,584.00; Georgian Bay, $396.00; Glacier, $3,085.00; Jasper, $127,281.46; Kootenay, $92,691.00; Mount Revelstoke, $485.00; Point Pelee, $20,487.00; Prince Albert, $79,304.00; Prince Edward Island, $9,472.00; Riding Mountain, $128,050.00; St. Lawrence Islands, $200.00; Waterton Lakes, $48,590.00; Yoho, $47,351.00.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to hear the minister say a few days ago that it was his intention this summer to visit Fort Battleford, Saskatchewan. I am sure he is going to find a great many things of interest to him there and I would add that if I knew when he was coming I would like to be there to welcome him. It is only about three or four years since his department took over the operation of this fort. There is a great deal to be done. I was wondering what the plans of the department are for this summer. Is the minister's department planning for new buildings or for any improvements to the grounds or roads?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, we are on item 304. Any questions about new buildings would come under item 305. It would make it much easier for me if such questions were asked under that item. I have quite complete information on each vote, but if I have to go from one to the other, I find myself in difficulties. I should appreciate it greatly if the hon. member would ask his question under item 305.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): There is one matter about which I want to ask the minister. I am quite sure it does not come under this estimate, however. Probably I should have raised it under the estimates of the Department of Public Works because it has something to do directly with the trans-Canada highway. However, it is a matter which certainly affects our tourist traffic. In the figures which the minister gave a moment or two ago he indicated that Banff national park receives more visitors than does probably any other national park in Canada. One of the things I want to bring to the minister's attention is this. Last year during the tourist season the road going from the Banff gate—that is the east gate—to Banff itself was a disgrace. Then to top it all off, right in the middle of the tourist season, when the tourist traffic was the heaviest, they put about two inches of oil over the top of that road. You should have seen the condition that tourists' cars were in after they had passed over that five or six miles between the east gate and the town of Banff. I would not ask you, Mr. Chairman, to listen to some of the remarks that some of the tourists made when they got to the end of that road.

What I should like to draw to the minister's attention is this. Something should be done before the tourist season starts—I suppose the minister would have to go back to the Minister of Public Works who is the minister responsible for the building of the trans-Canada highway—to see to it that that road is not left in the condition in which it was left last year. In fact, the condition became so bad that Mr. Strong, the superintendent of Banff park, I understand had to go himself to the contractors about that road and appeal to them to do something about it. I understand that was not part of Mr. Strong's duties either, but that he did so in view of the fact that so many complaints were coming to him and so widespread was the dissatisfaction that was felt because of the deplorable condition of that highway. There were holes in it of such a size that a car would almost drop out of sight; and that is not exaggerating the situation either. It was a most deplorable condition. I would ask the minister, if it is necessary that it should be done, to draw this matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works; and I would ask them to see, between the two of them, whether that road cannot be put into some decent shape for our tourist traffic this year.

Mr. Lesage: I will talk to my colleague, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacLean: I should like to ask the minister a question or two about parks generally. I notice that the parks under his department are of three types, namely scenic parks, animal parks and historic site parks; at least that is how the Canada Year Book differentiates between them.

Mr. Lesage: There are the two types of parks, national parks and national historic parks.

Mr. MacLean: The scenic park is a national park. I do not want to split hairs. In any event, some of the national parks are for scenic purposes and some are for the preservation of wild animals. Is that not correct?

Mr. Lesage: There is only one, namely Wood Buffalo, which is specifically for animals. Even Elk Island park is also for recreational purposes.

Mr. MacLean: I understand. I am concerned chiefly with historic site parks. The minister has a number of those. I was wondering when a historic site is considered to be suitable for the establishment of a park or when it is considered to be justifiable to establish a park at a historic site. Can the minister give any indication as to what are the deciding factors? As far as historic site parks are concerned, I understand that up until recently there was only one west of Ontario. Now I believe there are three on the prairies. As far as I know, however, there are none in British Columbia and none in Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland. I was wondering whether consideration is being given to preserving such places as Fort Macleod in southern Alberta and perhaps Fort Lajoie across the harbour from Charlottetown or any places in Newfoundland. As far as parks generally are concerned, I think Newfoundland is the only province in Canada that has no national park. Is consideration being given to the possibility of establishing a national park in Newfoundland?

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, this department sets up historic parks or declares a certain place to be a historic site on the recommendation of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada. There is on this board a representative of Prince Edward Island. We always seek the advice of that board before we make any decision. Maybe my hon. friend knows about it, but I do not know whether he or any other persons have put before the board a request for the establishment of a historic park or some historic site in Prince Edward Island. That is the normal procedure. Then we get our recommendations from the board.

Do I understand that the hon. member asked a question about the national park in Newfoundland?

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: I do not know whether my hon. friend noticed it or not, but when the Prime Minister announced on Friday the legislation that was still to come before the house before the end of the session he mentioned as a possibility legislation with regard to a national park in Newfoundland. The government of Newfoundland has offered to the Canadian government a certain area for park purposes. We have examined the area. We believe it is a good area for park purposes but we are obliged to wait until the government of Newfoundland can offer this area free of all encumbrances. I realize that some negotiations are going on between the government of Newfoundland and some owners of timber rights so that the latter will give up their interest in the lands which would be in the park area.

Mr. MacLean: I thank the minister for his answer. I have another question. It occurs to me that since Newfoundland has come into confederation so recently, unless they previously had some system of marking historic sites that have now been taken over by the historic sites and monuments board there would naturally be a great backlog of work to do with regard to marking historic sites in Newfoundland. What progress has been made or what is the position?

Mr. Lesage: Some historic sites have already been marked in Newfoundland. Two were marked in 1952 and two in 1953. Does the hon. member wish to have the list?

Mr. MacLean: No. I think I am correct in saying that in Canada as a whole there are over sixty provincial parks. I believe six provinces have provincial parks and the other four have not. Is any assistance given to provincial governments with the idea of establishing provincial parks in those provinces where there are none?

Mr. Lesage: My attention is drawn to one recent case where we sent somebody to Newfoundland to help the authorities there to set up a provincial park in Newfoundland.

Mr. MacLean: I notice that this department engages in hatching fish, as does the Department of Fisheries. It seems to me that might be duplication. Has any system been worked out whereby that type of work might be done for the department by the Department of Fisheries? I also notice that the department employs weather observers. The Department of Transport is the largest employer of weather forecasters and observers. Has any effort been made by the minister's department to borrow such observers from the Department of Transport rather than the department hiring such people?

Mr. Lesage: So far as fish hatcheries are concerned, I visited the hatchery at Banff, and I understand that the fish kept there are trout. Maybe there are other kinds. I am not an expert on fish, but I saw beautiful trout there and I realized that they were not for commercial fishing purposes but for sport fishing, which is quite different from the operations of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps even more beautiful trout are hatched in a hatchery in my riding and I do not think it is operated by the minister's department; I think it is operated by the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Lesage: You are very lucky.

Mr. MacLean: It aroused my curiosity to notice in the list of employees of the department that there is a sailmaker. What does he do?

Mr. Lesage: I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. MacLean: A sailmaker is employed by the department. I was curious about his duties.

Mr. Lesage: He repairs tents and canvas for construction camps in the parks. There is no position of this kind, this year.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a question with respect to traffic regulations in the parks. As the minister knows, Manitoba highway No. 10 passes through Riding Mountain national park. About a year ago, I believe, a bus service was established between the southern part of the province and Flin Flon. I understand that a trip charge is made for buses moving through the park and also that the matter is under consideration. Has there been any change? It is not a heavily populated route at all. The passenger revenue is rather small and as a result the situation is rather awkward.

Mr. Lesage: This is not a main highway but a park highway. There is an alternative route to Flin Flon, which is the provincial highway. I understand that the road through the park is shorter and that is why many of these buses follow that route. But we must not forget that these roads are built for park purposes out of moneys that come from the general taxes of Canada and not from gasoline taxes collected by the provinces for the building of roads. There is a nominal charge, the revenue from which represents a very small amount of the cost of the building of that road which should be preserved for park purposes, especially when there is an alternative highway by which to go to Flin Flon and northern Manitoba. We do not prevent the use of it, but if somebody uses it he has to pay the entrance fee to the park in the same way as anybody else. Incidentally, it is a very small fee.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think the purpose of the service is to serve points other than those located on the roundabout route to the north. The service was put into operation by request as a convenience to the people of the northern part of the province.

Mr. Lesage: That does not change the principle.

Mr. Dinsdale: I take it that the basis is still the same. The matter is not under consideration at all?

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Knight: Is there any timber being cut in national parks anywhere in Canada with the exception of such timber as is required for the administration of the parks? Is there any such thing as timber berths being granted to commercial lumbermen or lumber companies in the parks?

Mr. Lesage: Generally there is some timber cut for use in the parks, but with respect to Riding Mountain park—the hon. member for Dauphin is quite aware of this—some cutting by settlers is allowed under permit from us. However this is done according to well known forest management regulations. In Wood Buffalo park we allow some timber cutting by Eldorado Mining and Refining company but the company of course pays the regular dues for it.

Mr. Knight: But in the sense of my question I take it that there is actually no commercial cutting of timber in the national parks of Canada?

Mr. Lesage: No, except in Wood Buffalo for Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. I am also informed that there are four or five permits which existed before the western parks were created. These permits were not abolished and the people who held them still can cut, but according to well known rules of forest management which are pretty severe in our case.

Mr. Knight: I hope the minister's face is set against that sort of thing. Certainly mine is.

Mr. Lesage: Definitely.

Mr. Knight: I am a little worried about when the leases expire to which the minister has referred. Are they in perpetuity?

Mr. Lesage: I will have to look into the matter of the expiration dates. It is of no relative importance.

Mr. Knight: If any of it is being done it is of importance to me and I think to the people of Canada. I should like to remind the minister of what, in my opinion, was the rather scandalous situation that existed in the park to which he has made reference, Riding Mountain park in Manitoba. It was before the minister's time in this department, but I believe it is a fact that the particular lease that was held by a lumber company for that area allowed this company to cut timber there as long as there was anything of any commercial value. It eventually got to the point where the company was cutting the small trees for fence posts.

Mr. Lesage: That is all over.

Mr. Knight: I am pleased that it is all over, and I think it should be kept that way. I directed my question to the minister to ascertain if these leases had run out. So far as Riding Mountain park was concerned, the company got the timber and the people of Canada got the stumps. I think that was true in that particular case. A few years ago I was assured that so far as Riding Mountain park was concerned the matter had come to that conclusion and there were no longer any leases in that park.

I should be sorry if this idea of giving leases for almost any purpose in these parks were continued. I was a little worried when the minister admitted that certain timber concessions had been given to certain mining companies—

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. Lesage: That is not what I said. I am sorry, but I said that one crown company, the Eldorado Mining and Refining company in the Northwest Territories, had been given the right to cut timber in Wood Buffalo park. The cutting of this timber is permitted under severe forest management rules and under our supervision for something which is considered as essential to Canada. It is only mature timber that is cut at Wood Buffalo park, which is in the far north.

I can assure my hon. friend that I am in complete agreement with him. The reason Newfoundland has no national park yet is that the authorities there are negotiating with some people who hold timber limits and the authorities have to have the land set free of those rights before we accept it. That is the policy of the department.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister a question which may be a legal question, and that is something I do not know anything about. Where timber leases are given—I have nothing against that—or sold—

Mr. Lesage: We do not give any.

Mr. Knight: —is there some legal method by which it can be arranged that such leases would be automatically cancelled in case that area were taken over later by the nation as a park?

Mr. Lesage: No such leases are given. I have said that once. The ones that are left have existed for years and years before the parks were parks.

Mr. Knight: Once more the minister has not understood my question. I am not talking about leases that are given for national parks. I am talking about leases that are given on public lands of some sort, where there is no park, but if that land later becomes a park is there some way by which a provision could be written into that lease stating that the lease would be terminated when and if the nation assumed control of that property as a national park? This would avoid the situation that arose in Riding Mountain park in Manitoba. As I say, it is a legal question and I do not know whether or not the minister can answer it. I believe I have said enough to at least impress upon the minister the desirability of keeping the property of national parks for the people of the nation.

Mr. Lesage: That is the purpose of establishing national parks. The hon. member and the committee may rest assured that it is my utmost desire there shall not be commercial activities in the parks. According to section 4 of the act, these areas are reserved for the enjoyment and recreation of the people of Canada.

Mr. Bell: With respect to Fundy national park in New Brunswick, can the minister tell me without too much trouble if the covered bridge at the eastern approach to the park is within or without the park area?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed that it is probably within the park's property.

Mr. Bell: Has the minister given any consideration to the possibility of correcting a dangerous highway hazard where this bridge now exists?

Mr. Lesage: I shall look into the matter.

Mr. Bell: I believe this past year it was necessary to shoot some moose in Fundy national park during the closed season for moose in New Brunswick. After these moose were killed there was some argument as to who had the legal property, the federal or provincial government. I was wondering if it had been decided who actually had the property of these bodies?

Mr. Lesage: Was this last fall?

Mr. Bell: I believe it was.

Mr. Lesage: It was never brought to my attention that there was any difficulty about shooting moose in Fundy national park. I understand that at some time last fall the matter was referred to the Department of Justice, who advised us we had the right to control the shooting of game within the boundaries of national parks.

Mr. Bell: I have another question in connection with the historic sites part of this item. I believe the minister will recall that I have been communicating with him about Fort La Tour in Saint John and the possibility of erecting some monument there. We are agreed there is some difficulty in getting a suitable property for it. Could he tell me if this is just to be a cairn or is it going to be a large site?

Mr. Lesage: Can the hon. member tell me if the question has been submitted to the historic sites and monuments board?

Mr. Bell: Yes, it has gone all through those channels.

Mr. Lesage: And it is now a recommendation to this department?

Mr. Bell: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: I shall look into the matter and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. Bell: I pointed out to the minister in the letter that we would like to have something done this year because we are recognizing one of our early colonists in the person of Mr. de Champlain. It will be the 350th anniversary, and we hope also to be able to unveil a suitable monument to Lady La Tour who made an historical defence in Saint John. This was in early Saint John history when there were Indians running around in central Canada. We would like to see some consideration given to this matter.

Mr. Lesage: I shall have a look at the file.

Mr. Holowach: Can the minister tell us if the government maintains any historic site in Elk Island park in Alberta? If so, what was the cost of that historic site?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed that in Elk Island national park there is no historic site as such, but there is a building that recalls the activities of the Ukrainian settlers in Canada.

Mr. Holowach: What was the cost of that building?

Mr. Lesage: It was erected some years ago. I did not bring with me all the detailed expenditures in the parks branch over the last twenty-five years. My hon. friend will understand that I could not do that. I have the expenditures for last year and for two years ago, and the estimates of what we expect to spend next year. But it was difficult for me to bring a complete library into the house.

Mr. Holowach: Was it not put up two years ago?

Mr. Lesage: A few years ago; before my time. I do not know just when it was.

Mr. Yuill: Are there any plans for extending the scenic routes in Jasper national park? I understand there has been some correspondence on that point from the chamber of commerce in Jasper requesting the extension of certain routes within the park.

Mr. Lesage: I suppose the hon. member is referring to the Banff-Jasper road. We are going to pave ten miles of that road at what we call the Jasper end, and rebuild ten miles this year starting from Lake Louise in the direction of Jasper.

Mr. Yuill: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Lesage: It is very costly.

Mr. Yuill: Those were not the roads to which I had reference. I was attending the committee on agriculture when the earlier discussion took place on this subject. However there are other roads in the area to which the chamber of commerce referred in its letter to the minister which, I understand, he received recently and of which I have a copy. Would the minister's department take kindly to the establishment of a winter as well as a summer resort at Jasper? We have at that point facilities unsurpassed in Canada. I understand some representations have been made along those lines.

Mr. Lesage: I have received representations from the Jasper chamber of commerce and from others, and the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Hodgson: What price does Eldorado Mining and Refining pay to the department for the timber cut in the park, and is it purchased on a stumpage basis, or so much per thousand log feet? How much have they taken?

Mr. Lesage: So much per thousand board feet.

Mr. Hodgson: How much?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know.

Mr. Hodgson: Your officials should know.

Mr. Lesage: I shall have to look into it, and send the information to the hon. member.

Mr. Hodgson: Is any reforestation being done there?

Mr. Lesage: The cutting being carried out by Eldorado Mining and Refining affects only the mature timber.

Mr. Hodgson: Is that timber being cut under the supervision of the parks board?

Mr. Lesage: Definitely, yes, under supervision of the department.

Mr. Hodgson: They are not just slashing it out?

Mr. Lesage: No. It is done according to the rules of forest management as set down by the forestry branch. Our officials are following the work all the time. I suggest it would be easier to discuss the matter when we are considering the estimates for that branch.

Mr. Hodgson: In many places they reforest at a rate of two trees for each one cut. What is being done there?

The Chairman: Shall the item carry.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to refer to Riding Mountain national park. The figures given by the minister indicate that this park is the second greatest revenue producer of all our national parks. I note from the report of the department of resources and development, as it was then known, for March 31, 1953 that in point of attendance it ranks second, with a visitor roll of 409,518 for the year 1952-53.

When on December 11 of last year we were considering the amendment to the National Parks Act I discussed with the minister the necessity for a bus depot at Riding Mountain national park. In view of the large number of visitors who go there I advanced at that time an argument in favour of the establishment of a bus depot. The minister said that it was up to the bus company to establish such a depot. However he concluded his remarks by saying that of course he would look into the matter. I wonder if in the interval the minister has looked into the matter and whether he is now prepared to make some announcement.

Mr. Lesage: I have looked into the matter and the announcement I can make at this time is that the more I have looked into it the more I have been convinced that the present policy is the right one—that any bus depot would have to be built by the operators of the buses.

Mr. Churchill: I do not disagree with that; but my point is that a bus depot should be established there, and that the department, which permits the buses to enter the park, to operate on the roads of the park and to stand at the sides of those roads, has certainly made some concessions to the bus operators and might very well request them to establish suitable accommodation for the people who go in. The number of people who enter Riding Mountain national park each year by bus is very large and, as I pointed out in December —and I regret having to repeat it—there is no suitable accommodation for the passengers. They have to debus into a lane and there is no place under cover for their luggage or for themselves, with the exception of a workroom in a garage. There is no rest room for bus travellers; in other words there is no accommodation whatever. The substitute for a bus depot is a filling station, at the front of which the tickets are purchased. The luggage and the passengers are placed in the centre of the filling station where work on the repairing of cars is carried out. On a rainy day anyone who is waiting for a bus must crowd into that area to get shelter.

The condition is far from statisfactory. This is the second most important national park in Canada from the standpoint of revenue received from visitors. It is visited by people from the western provinces and the United States. In some respects it has been kept up to a high standard. However one of the lamentable omissions has been the lack of accommodation for people who come in by bus. Those who enter by car have places to go, and may rest in their cars; but bus travellers receive no consideration at all.

Let me make it clear that the people who are looking after the interests of the bus company by way of selling tickets and arranging for travelling on the bus are performing a very efficient service, within their limitations of space. I would point out, too, that there is ground available for a bus depot. I think it has been left vacant purposely all these years in the hope that a bus depot would be established there. How does one have it established? I am asking the minister to urge upon the bus company the establishment of a depot for the accommodation of visitors to the park.

Mr. Lesage: I will send them Hansard.

Mr. Churchill: I think the minister has to do more than send them Hansard. I am perfectly sure they will be quite pleased to read what I am now saying, but I should like some better action than that. If it is left to a casual remark, or something of that nature, I am sure nothing will be done. In the interests of the national parks and of the public does the minister not think this is essential accommodation? Other things are provided in the national park for the accommodation of visitors, and a bus depot would fill a long-felt need. I am pressing the minister to continue his investigation. Surely he is not just going to leave it at this stage, at which I say something about it in the house and he makes a remark about it and it is just left there. Can the minister not consult with the superintendent of the park and see what arrangements he may have attempted to make in the past with the bus line? He can communicate directly with those who operate the buses and suggest to them that this is an essential part of their service to the public, and if they—

Mr. Lesage: That is what I wanted to hear. And if they—

Mr. Churchill: These are things—

Mr. Lesage: What is the threat?

Mr. Churchill: —that can be done.

Mr. Lesage: And if they do not?

Mr. Churchill: The bus line would not be running its service into that park unless it was at a profit.

Mr. Lesage: That is none of our business. The franchise is provincial.

Mr. Churchill: That is quite true. I was interested in that some years ago and had something to do with arranging for a direct bus service from Winnipeg to the park instead of a change of buses at Neepawa or Minnedosa and the provincial authorities and bus lines co-operated magnificently. Now there is a direct service right to the park from the city of Winnipeg. What I want to impress upon the minister is that the number of people who go in by bus is very large. I have travelled up there by bus several times during five successive summers. I know the circumstances extremely well. I have gone there and this business of standing out in the rain or enduring the dust and having no place for your baggage is not pleasant, and I have seen other people enduring the same difficulties which are not necessary in a national park of this standing.

The erection of a bus depot at the Riding Mountain national park would not be a very expensive undertaking because naturally it does not have to be of the same standard as one that faces winter conditions. It would be used only in the summertime. These parks are established for the convenience of the public as recreational areas, and surely we should make sure that in those recreational areas proper accommodation is provided for all types of travelling. I reiterate that at Riding Mountain national park, which is the second most important park from the standpoint of attendance and revenue, there is no suitable provision for those who come in by bus. What will the minister do about it?

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I first want to say that I agree thoroughly with the representations just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. May I suggest a solution to the difficulty, if the minister does not have one handy? He could satisfy both the request made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and the one made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, if he would suggest a deal to the bus company of relieving them of the fee that they now have to pay in order to drive through the park in return for proper bus accommodation.

I have two questions I should like to ask the minister in connection with the Riding Mountain national park. First, I believe last fall or last summer recommendations were made to his department in connection with skiing facilities at that point. At the present time there are no skiing facilities and, as is well known, the park is inactive during the winter months. There has been considerable investment, both from the point of view of the treasury and privately, in the facilities of that resort.

If investigations were made the minister would find that there are good possibilities for skiing in that area. It would bring additional revenue and make greater possible use of the Wasagaming resort. I believe it would be desirable. Has the minister looked into that question?

Mr. Lesage: This is one of the things we have under active consideration. We are investigating now what the effects of the necessary cutting of timber and wood on the slopes would be on the run-off of water. The setting up of a skiing resort in the Riding Mountain park is under active consideration. The possibilities are being studied very carefully at this time.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am glad to hear that. I shall leave it at that. The other question is in connection with big game animals within the boundary of the park. I was very interested in the exchange of opinions a few moments ago in connection with another park. I am not sure that I have the name of the park, but I think it was the Fundy park in the maritimes. The minister related the opinion of the Department of Justice that so far as all game within the boundaries of the national park is concerned, it is under the jurisdiction of his department. In other words, the proprietors of those animals are the department which administers it. That is a very interesting point, and I am glad he takes that attitude because we have a problem in connection with the Riding Mountain national park which has been causing some headaches for a number of years and has given rise to considerable dispute as between the province and the federal department.

Every few years that there is a late harvest —and there appears to be some danger of a late harvest this year again—large numbers of elk particularly and some deer come out of the Riding Mountain national park and damage the crops of the farmers who were unable to harvest them in time. If the crop is early and they can harvest it at a normal date not too much damage is done because the tendency of these animals is to come out late in the fall, particularly after the first snowfall. On several occasions elk have done serious and widespread damage. I have inspected it personally, and I speak from personal knowledge.

I have seen fields of flax which would have yielded from 20 to 25 bushels an acre completely destroyed and trampled into the ground. The same thing has happened with wheat, oats and other crops as far as a mile and a half, and in some instances two or three miles away from the boundaries of the park. When those farmers whose crops were lost attempted to obtain some compensation they were given a sort of classic runaround between the provincial government and the federal government. The province maintains that since these animals belong to the federal government—

Mr. Lesage: They do not.

Mr. Zaplitny: —then, they are the ones who are responsible for their actions. The federal government has taken the attitude that the game laws of Manitoba, of course, are under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, which is true, and therefore they feel they do not have the responsibility. Of course there can be a delightful debate from the legal standpoint, but it does not bring any compensation to the farmer. Leaving the legal angles aside there is a feeling that there is a good moral case at least, because if a farmer living near a national park owns a herd of cattle, or horses, or any other animals and these animals find their way into the park and destroy property which belongs to the park authorities, then I am sure the federal government would be quite ready to prosecute the owner of that livestock and claim that he is responsible for the actions of his livestock. I do not think there would be any dispute about that. However, when the reverse happens, when the livestock which is owned by the federal government goes on to a farmer's property and causes damage—

Mr. Lesage: They are not livestock. They are wild animals.

Mr. Zaplitny: But who owns them?

Mr. Lesage: Well, who could own free wild animals? If they were owned they would no longer be free wild animals.

Mr. Zaplitny: Perhaps if they were a little more domesticated they would do less harm. I might point out that perhaps one of the reasons why they do leave the park is because of the crowded conditions. I notice in the case of the park mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer the authorities see fit to provide 18 square miles for a herd of 150 horses, which works out mathematically at 77 acres per horse, so they must have Trojan horses there to provide such an area. In addition, perhaps if the elk had most pasture facilities within the park they might not leave it. But the legal point, or shall I say the question of justice, is that the minister has just taken the attitude this afternoon that wild animals within the park are the property of the government of Canada.

Mr. Lesage: I have never taken that attitude, Mr. Chairman. When they are in the park they are under our control, but when they are outside the park they become the control of the provincial authorities. We are doing our best, in collaboration with the provincial authorities, to restrict the wild animal population in Riding Mountain park in order to prevent grazing outside the park limits.

Mr. Zaplitny: But that hardly covers the point. The minister now says that wild animals are under the control of his department so long as they stay within the confines of the park but that the moment they cross the boundary line and go outside the park they come under the control of the provincial authorities.

Mr. Lesage: That is correct.

Mr. Zaplitny: But that does not cover the point at all. Because if the federal government is responsible for the actions of those wild animals which are under their jurisdiction, they are also responsible for keeping them within the confines of their property. I am sure the minister, who is familiar with herd laws passed by rural municipalities, is aware that it is not the responsibility of the municipalities to keep livestock off farms in certain areas. It becomes the responsibility of the owner of that livestock to keep his livestock fenced in or confined to a certain area so that it will not damage other farms. If the same principle holds good in this case, it is the responsibility of the federal government to keep their wild animals within the confines of their property. Of course, I am aware they cannot do that unless they round up some of the horses they have at the other park, put on spurs, and ride herd. But if they are not capable of keeping them on their own property, then the least they can do is to be responsible for the actions of those animals.

Mr. Lesage: What do you want to do, kill the elk and abolish the park?

Mr. Zaplitny: No, not at all; for all I am asking is that the federal government, which has a proprietary right over these animals—

Mr. Lesage: It has not.

Mr. Zaplitny: —or have control—

Mr. Lesage: When they are in the park.

Mr. Zaplitny: Well, the minister is a lawyer and I would hate to see what would happen if he took that kind of case to court. I am glad—

Mr. Lesage: It is a very good case.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am sure he is quite in the wrong if he is trying to tell me now that if the wild animals under the jurisdiction of his department damage someone else's property then he is no longer responsible for their actions. That sort of legal philosophy would not go very far under property and civil rights. I am not asking that these animals be destroyed or the park abolished. On the contrary, I am asking the federal government to be responsible for the actions of the wild animals which come under their jurisdiction and which stray on to farmers' property and cause damage to their crops. The government should be willing to compensate such farmers for the damage done. It would not involve a large amount of money and it only happens once in every two or three years, but certainly it is time we should have a clear-cut arrangement so that the farmers who have suffered damage will know to whom they can apply for compensation or, if necessary, whom they should take to court to sue for damages. So far they have been given a runaround by the federal government and there is no one to whom they can apply in order to collect damages. I would like the minister to make a categorical statement as to whether he feels the federal government has any responsibility under the conditions I have described, and if so, to what extent.

Mr. Lesage: I cannot add anything to what I have already said. These wild animals are under the control of the park authorities when they are in the park. The moment they go outside the park boundaries they become a provincial responsibility and there is nothing I can do about it.

Mr. Knowles: Like a Liberal when he gets out of caucus.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we all know of other parks in which there are deer which often take the notion to run away and visit open farmland and sometimes damage grain, and there simply is not anything one can do about it. As far as responsibility is concerned, what I rose to say to the minister is that if he is having trouble with crops being damaged by wildlife which has strayed from the parklands, and he is considering compensation in that respect, then I think he should also consider the Migratory Birds Convention Act and give consideration also to damage done to crops by wild ducks from nearby lakes. We have ducks from areas not far from those mentioned by the hon. member for Dauphin and I am bound to say that, at certain seasons of the year, I have had many more complaints presented to me in regard to damage done by wild ducks than that caused by deer. This, of course, is a seasonal matter, but if the question of compensation is going to come up in this regard I frankly cannot see why the federal government should be held responsible for such damage. After all, while the game is in the park there is no problem in so far as damage to the crops outside is concerned. When they are outside the park they are free game for hunters from whom the federal government secures a moderate amount of money through issuing licences. I presume the same applies with respect to birds, and if it is a question of compensation for damage done in a matter of this kind I believe it comes down to a question of the licence fee charged to the hunter to hunt this game and I frankly do not know where one can draw the line in so far as damage done to crops is concerned. They should be limited to the area within the national park, though that is difficult to achieve because these animals can move a considerable distance in a relatively short period of time and if good foliage or greener fields are farther away then the animals will go that distance in order to obtain good feeding. I am wondering where the line should be drawn.

While I am on my feet I want to make reference to what was said earlier in connection with the proposed ski slide in the Riding Mountain national park. This would be a very desirable undertaking and perhaps if we had a greater population in the immediate area the project would meet with even greater enthusiasm than it has so far. The minister has referred to the problem of removing trees from the Riding Mountain area where the ski slide might be established, and the possible effect there might be resulting therefrom because of quicker run-offs, and maybe adding to a rather difficult problem that exists in that area now in so far as flood conditions are concerned. But along with it, as I have understood the situation, arises the problem of winterizing facilities in the park area. My understanding is that the facilities there for the accommodation of the public are privately owned and that, as such, it would be private initiative that would have to winterize those things to make suitable accommodation out of them.

There is another problem that arises in this same connection, namely the facilities for reaching the park. The railway facilities are not immediately adjacent to the park. You have to go in either by way of McCreary or Erickson which are some little distance out of the park area. Otherwise it would be largely a matter of automobile or bus travel. However, that is perhaps something that does not stand completely in the way but it is one of the problems that arise therefrom. But having regard at the same time to the people who would use the skiing facilities, it would look to me as though it would be largely a holidaying crowd there for week ends or longer periods. Perhaps we should assist in providing facilities for those people, but I cannot see it immediately as a place where people would go in only for the week end for skiing purposes. It would look to be a project for a sort of winter resort. Maybe that has something to commend itself and perhaps it will as time goes on. But in the same light I point out this other fact in so far as skiing is concerned.

I must confess that I do not know where our skiing enthusiasts in Manitoba reside. We have had two ski undertakings in the southern part of Manitoba, one at La Rivière and the other at Roseisle, that were given considerable encouragement by week-end excursions by both our railways. I think a good deal of pleasure was gained therefrom and to some extent they are being continued, but the railways have discontinued the service which was a week-end service, I think maybe largely on Sunday. I would hope that the minister would continue to give his usual careful attention to this undertaking. If we can have a winter resort in Manitoba, I am all for it. But at the same time I think that a careful survey should be made of the population that is likely to use those facilities and to what extent tourists or ski enthusiasts from outside of our province might be induced to use those same facilities and certainly those from areas other than those immediately adjacent to it. In reviewing this matter I hope the minister will continue to keep those areas in mind.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say just a word once again in support of the request and the very good case made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in respect of the establishment of a bus depot at Wasagaming in Riding Mountain national park. I need not develop the argument because it has been put very well, but I should like to ask the minister specifically whether his investigation in this matter included conversations or correspondence with the bus people. If so—well, I need not pursue that question because I see him shaking his head.

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Knowles: The minister did not get in touch with the bus people?

Mr. Lesage: No; I did not.

Mr. Knowles: I do not think that is a satisfactory situation. I realize it was the minister's predecessor whom we addressed on this question—

Mr. Lesage: No; it was myself.

Mr. Knowles: It was in December of last year.

Mr. Lesage: It was I.

Mr. Knowles: However, it seems to me that to deal with this matter at all would require contact with the bus companies. I will go a little bit further than did my neighbour the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He suggests that they might be requested to establish a bus depot. It seems to me that since they get their permission to do business in the park from the park authorities—the minister is shaking his head.

Mr. Lesage: No, no. The bus company does not get permission from the park authorities. There is an entrance fee for buses.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes.

Mr. Lesage: They pay the entrance fee at the gate and they are entitled to pass just as any other motor car is entitled to pass. The franchise to operate from one point to another in the province of Manitoba is under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities as it is in any other province.

Mr. Knowles: Who is responsible for the roads inside of Riding Mountain national park?

Mr. Lesage: That is the point. We are building and maintaining the road, but we are not collecting the gasoline tax to do that. We are doing it for park purposes. The road is open because it is an alternative route by which to go up to the northern part of Manitoba, a fact which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that the federal government is not collecting the gasoline tax but he admits that the federal government is building and maintaining roads in the park.

Mr. Lesage: Surely.

Mr. Knowles: And that the federal government collects a fee from every vehicle that goes into the park.

Mr. Lesage: Yes; but that fee does not begin to pay for the roads.

Mr. Knowles: Whether it is a fee for one trip or is a one-season fee, I suggest that the authority which collects that fee from the buses is certainly in a position to lay down the conditions under which those buses will go into the park. I should be perfectly willing for the minister, in the first instance, to follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and request that they give consideration to this matter. But if they are not willing to consider it on the basis of a request, I think the government should go further and require it. I submit that it is a matter of some disappointment—I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will feel that way as I am sure will all of us in Manitoba—to discover that the minister has done nothing about the matter since it was presented to him, except his claim that he has gone into it and that he has considered it.

Mr. Lesage: Surely.

Mr. Knowles: He has considered it but he has not taken it up with the people who might do something about it. I hope we will get a better report next time.

Mr. Lesage: I was asked to consider the advisability of having this department pay for the building of this bus depot.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Lesage: I said at that time that I believed it was up to the operators of the buses to build that station. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre insisted that I again look into the matter more carefully, and I did so. But I never could come to the conclusion that it was up to this department to build a bus depot. My view was that it was up to the bus operators to do that, as was done in Banff national park.

Mr. Knowles: Did you tell them that?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, if the bus service there is not under any permit or licence from this department, it seems to me that the request for the building of a bus depot which is now made by the members for that region, shall I say, instead of being addressed to me, one who has nothing at all to do with this service, should be addressed to the bus company. That is what happened in Banff park. The Greyhound bus company has built itself a bus depot. A few moments ago I said I was going to send Hansard to the bus operators. More and more I believe I am going to do it.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister does send Hansard. Then the people who read it will get the correction which I now offer. As I recall it, the minister said that I was insisting that the department build a bus depot in Riding Mountain national park.

Mr. Lesage: That is what the hon. member did last year.

Mr. Churchill: I said no such thing at all. In my remarks last December—and repeated today—I stressed the necessity for a bus depot. I was not asking the department to build it or insisting that the department build it. If it is more proper for the Greyhound bus line to build the bus depot, well and good. My point is that the department has a responsibility to the visitors to that national park whose numbers are in excess of 400,000, many hundreds of whom enter that park by bus. How the department discharges that responsibility is in the lap of the minister.

Mr. Knowles: What a lap!

Mr. Churchill: When the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa was speaking he suggested that he was confident that the minister would give his usual careful consideration to the point that the hon. member was raising. I have not the least confidence that the minister will give careful consideration—

Mr. Lesage: If the hon. member keeps on like that there will be a good chance that I will not.

Mr. Churchill: —or that he has given careful consideration to this point. There is nothing usual about what he has been doing that has any relation to careful consideration. But there is a responsibility on the part of the department to people who visit our national parks. We provide many other things for them in the national parks. As my colleague from Winnipeg mentioned, a road system is provided in the national parks. Golf courses, swimming facilities, bath houses, tennis courts, bowling greens and all sorts of things are provided. In Riding Mountain national park there is a museum and beautiful flower gardens to interest those who go there.

National parks exist for the pleasure, enjoyment and recreation of the people of Canada. A bus depot at Riding Mountain national park would simply be proper accommodation for those who enter that park by bus. We have suggested to the minister ways and means of getting that accommodation provided. I feel he has brushed us aside a little bit when we have asked that he correspond with the bus company, take up the matter with the superintendent of the park, investigate the various angles and find out for himself the number of people who go there by bus. I do not have accurate figures, but I have been there when three buses fully loaded have arrived at the same time, followed in the afternoon by others. That goes on during the summer season day after day with, of course, the main emphasis on the week ends. I have arrived there with over one hundred people coming there at one time by bus just on one day. Therefore I feel safe in saying that hundreds of people enter the park by bus, and they have no suitable accommodation when they debus or when they assemble to catch the bus for the return journey.

[Mr. Churchill.]

In my opinion the minister must apprize himself of the facts and discharge his responsibility to those who visit Riding Mountain national park. I would stop at this point and wait for a reply from the minister but I feel that he will make some noncommittal remark. Therefore, having now interested him in Riding Mountain national park, I will go on and suggest certain other things that might be done there for the convenience of the visitors and for the protection of the park.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that he go there, and that he go by bus.

Mr. Churchill: I hope he will. I would be very happy to travel with him by bus. We might have an interesting conversation en route and when we got to our destination. I have been familiar with Riding Mountain national park from its inception and have resided there in tents and cottages since 1930 with the exception of the war years. Therefore I know something about the place. My impression is that just prior to the war it was in better condition than it has been since, although the last two years have seen considerable improvements made in the road conditions and so on.

I was very much concerned to note that some time during the war years certain facilities disappeared from the bathing beaches at the park. There used to be a high diving board on which the young people enjoyed themselves. That disappeared in the interval and so far as I know has not been re-established. I would point out to the minister that it is rather important to check the small piers that are dotted along the shore of the lake in the settled area. There are quite a number of them and he should check them to see if suitable repairs cannot be made. A few years ago they were damaged considerably by ice and high water. As a result they have become shortened leaving at the end of them, submerged under water, rocks and shortened piles. This creates an extremely dangerous condition for people who want to dive off these piers. The small piers are used by people for bathing and diving purposes.

We know that every year at some summer resort someone dives into shallow water or into a place where there are rocks and suffers serious injuries. Two years ago I drew this matter to the attention of the department by letter and some adjustments were made. The piers were repaired to a certain extent, although not necessarily as the result of my letter. Small signs were placed at the end of the piers saying "danger" but I think that is not sufficient. I think the piers should be rebuilt to their original length thus covering up the rocks and piles that are under water. Strangers coming there late in the evening sometimes go down to bathe and in the excitement of the moment, and unaware of the condition, they might dive off the end instead of the end of the piers. It would be very serious for anyone who suffered this misfortune.

I also suggest to the minister that in view of the steadily increasing attendance at Riding Mountain national park—the report for 1952-53 shows an increase in attendance of 75,429 just in one year—more facilities should be provided at the beaches. There is a long pier which is crowded on holidays and Sundays by hundreds of people milling about and jostling each other. After almost twenty years of existence of that pier it might well be considered that a second pier should be constructed. The present long pier is used of course by people who are going on boat excursions and by the launches which take visitors around the lake. It is also used by people who swim off the pier. It is very crowded and tends to be very dangerous for the swimmers with launches coming in and out. Perhaps after twenty years a second pier should be constructed.

I suggest to the minister that, in keeping with developments at other summer resorts, better facilities should be offered for young children. I have seen summer resorts where small slides were provided near the shore for young children. There is nothing at all of that kind at Riding Mountain national park. There is just the beach. There are similar things that might well be done.

In the time of high water a few years ago the walk along the beach that extended for a mile or two was destroyed. It has been repaired in part during the last two years. That again is something that needs looking into so that the standard of the park will be maintained as it was before the war. In some places where the cliff is a bit steep, wooden steps were built down to the shore in the early stages of the park. These suffered from decay, and in some instances they have been taken out and replaced only by gravel. The steps are steep and slippery, and I have wondered why the wooden stairways were not maintained or replaced. These are some of the things with regard to Riding Mountain national park that deserve attention and consideration. In its general appearance it is a credit to Canada. It is a credit to those who have been in charge of the operation over the years, and certainly it is a credit to the gardeners who look after the lawns and flowerbeds. But the standard of the park needs constant supervision and maintenance. I suggest the minister make it one of his main items of investigation when he goes there this summer to make final plans for the construction of the bus depot.

Mr. Regier: I should like to say just a little bit about one of the national parks that is under consideration. I should like to say how pleased the people of the lower mainland of British Columbia were at hearing that some active consideration is being given to the establishment of a national park in Newfoundland. However, we would like to point out that there are upwards of 700,000 people living within a very closely confined area on the lower mainland of British Columbia.

Not long ago we had a return tabled in this house including some correspondence that had taken place in regard to this matter. The people of the lower mainland immediately took great interest in the contents of that correspondence. I can assure the Minister of Fisheries that the people there are not going to easily forget the letter he wrote to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in which he advocated and held forth the possibilities of the area known as Garibaldi provincial park. We were happy also to notice the answer the minister sent to the Minister of Fisheries. The answer indicated that if and when the government of British Columbia was willing or able to build a first class highway to the entrance of Garibaldi park, and if and when the government of British Columbia was willing to offer the unencumbered title to the lands to the federal government, then the minister assured us he would give the matter most sympathetic consideration.

I know we do have some national parks in British Columbia. However, these national parks are hundreds and hundreds of miles away from where most of our people live. Most of our people live in an urban area and many have not the automobile that is necessary to take advantage of the national parks we have. A lot of these people are old age pensioners and people in receipt of war veterans allowance. We have more than our share of these people. They have no park facilities available to them except those provided by the local municipalities. It is true we have the world famous Stanley park. However, when you go there on a Sunday afternoon you are able to see very little because the park is literally overloaded with human beings.

I should like to commend the ministers concerned in this exchange of correspondence. I know that possibly the highway in mind was a Howe Sound highway, leading to the northern entrance of Garibaldi park. I noticed that some of the local Liberals in British Columbia used the minister's answer in an effort to hamper the attempts of the British Columbia government to complete the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. An attempt was made to tell the people that if we did not finish the Pacific Great Eastern but had the Howe Sound highway, the federal government would take over the development of this great national asset, Garibaldi park. I do not know whether the people concerned did not realize or were not aware of the fact there is a new highway within a very few miles of the southern entrance to Garibaldi park. I hope the government will soon build a main highway off that to the entrance to Garibaldi park, and will at that time offer to hand over the unencumbered title of Garibaldi park to the federal government.

I am firmly convinced the resources of the provincial government are not nearly sufficient to develop Garibaldi park. If the park is developed by the federal government as a national park, and if a highway is built from the southern end of Garibaldi park to the northern end, it will do a lot for the economy of the province. It will help Canada and it will make new recreation facilities available to some 10 per cent of the people of Canada, not to mention the tourists who would visit this park from the United States.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, in support of the argument the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has made in connection with what is known in British Columbia as Garibaldi park. Strangely enough, shortly after I became a member of this house I had some correspondence with the former minister of the interior, which he passed on to the then minister of trade and commerce, who was a member of the cabinet from British Columbia. I believe it is a fact that the former government of British Columbia, that is, the government of the late Dr. Tolmie, in 1930 or 1931 offered the Garibaldi park area to the federal government for development as a national park.

I was informed by Mr. Stevens, who was then the minister from British Columbia in the cabinet, that the reason the federal government did not accept at that time was that there was no money available for the development. I do not believe that excuse holds today. I am rather sorry that I did not look far enough ahead to have this correspondence with me. It is now hoary with age, but I assure the minister that what I am telling him are the facts, and they can be proven by reference to the correspondence. Everything the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has said about the beauties of Garibaldi park and the advantage it would be to the large population in British Columbia, which is congregated in that small section of the lower mainland, is quite correct. I would be glad indeed if the minister would give some study to this matter. I can see no reason why he should not study it, because it is so important to British Columbia. In doing so I am sure he would have the support of his colleague who represents that area.

Mr. Churchill: I have been encouraged by the minister to ask one or two further questions. What is the basis of the minister's estimate of expenditures in the various national parks? Does it bear any relationship whatsoever to the number of visitors? Upon making a hasty calculation from the estimates for this year and the number of visitors as shown in the report for 1952-53, I find that at Banff national park the expenditure would be about $2 per visitor, at Jasper about $5, at Prince Edward Island national park 70 cents and at Riding Mountain national park 50 cents. Is there any relationship between the expenditure and the number of visitors?

Mr. Lesage: There is of course to a certain extent; it is one of the factors. But the factors to be considered are numerous and varied. Much depends upon the stage of development. So far as I am concerned, I receive reports from the director of the parks branch in respect of the various parks, setting out what is required by way of improvements in a given park for the coming year. We establish an order of priority, and look into the matter ourselves. We must decide what is a reasonable amount to be spent in a park in any given year, and the order of priority of the various projects. Of course the number of people attending the parks is one factor, and the stage of development is another. The encouragement given to tourists is another. It must be kept in mind that costs in the mountain parks are higher than they are elsewhere, and there are various other intangibles that must be considered. I am sure my hon. friend, with his experience, knows very well the kind of study that must be made, when it comes to a decision as to what will be spent in one park and what in another.

Item agreed to.

National parks and historic sites services—
305. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $3,640,735.

Mr. Campbell: Would the minister answer the question I raised a while ago?

Mr. Lesage: We propose an expenditure of $21,000 this year for the construction of an administration building and a residence for the museum assistant at Fort Battleford national historic park.

Mr. Campbell: Is any work to be done on the ground, by way of a water system or anything like that?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed a water well has been dug.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, there are several matters I should like to bring to the attention of the committee in respect of Waterton Lakes national park. Those who are not familiar with Alberta will not know that the Waterton Lakes park is located in the southwestern corner of Alberta, bordering on the state of Montana. It is the first of a series of parks running from south to north, including the Banff and Jasper national parks, as well as others.

Waterton Lakes park, as I pointed out to the committee last fall, is in many respects the show-window of Canada owing to the fact that to the south of it is the great Glacier national park in the United States, through which runs the famous Logan pass highway, to travel over which people often journey more than a thousand miles. The fact that so many people go to Glacier park, and that Waterton Lakes park adjoins it, suggests to the average mind that if we could make Waterton Lakes park sufficiently attractive we would bring into Canada those tourists who visit Glacier national park in the United States.

There are other reasons why Waterton Lakes park serves as a sort of show-window for this country, one of which is that the southernmost route of the trans-Canada highway, which runs through the Crowsnest pass, passes within thirty or forty miles of the Waterton Lakes park. It passes through Macleod and past Pincher Creek, so that people who are on that highway running east and west across Canada could visit the Waterton Lakes park; and each one of them who could spare the time and money would certainly do so if we could only make of the park the kind we have dreamed of making it.

In what I am saying I am not depreciating the park in any way. It is very beautiful and is becoming well known. It has tremendous potentialities. In addition to what I have said, it is not very far from the main trunk highway running from south to north in Alberta, entering at Coutts, and going through Lethbridge, Calgary and Edmonton up into the northland which, everyone agrees, will become a veritable fairyland of tourist attraction before very long.

There is one other aspect to which I referred last fall and which I believe is worth repeating. For some reason or another there has not been the amount of development in Waterton Lakes park that it deserves. It has been more or less neglected since around 1920, or perhaps right from its inception. This becomes clear when one considers the amount of money spent there in comparison with the amount spent at Banff, Jasper, and other parks in Alberta. I believe, as do the people of Lethbridge, that somehow or other we should manage to catch up in the development of this park, because money has not been spent there as it has been in others.

With this brief review as a background I wish to ask several questions and make several comments. In the first place the people of Lethbridge riding are very thankful for the work the minister has done within the last year. In thanking the minister, I wish to recall for all hon. members, and particularly those in the country who might not know, that much of the fine development that has taken place in Waterton Lakes park in the last few years has been because of the active interest of the man who just preceded the minister in his position, namely, the present Minister of Public Works. Therefore in thanking the minister we have those two men to thank. As far as I have been able to gather from the way the present minister is attacking his work, I would say that he is going to be one of the greatest ministers that we have had in this department in the history of Canada.

The Lethbridge riding, as I was saying, is grateful for the amount of money which has been spent and which is appropriated to be spent in the Waterton Lakes park in the near future. According to the record on page 380, we find that the amount of money appropriated last year was $190,000 for the building of new constructions in the park, general improvements, and the amount of money appropriated for the present year is $211,725. We are grateful for this. It does not include upkeep of the park, as hon. members know. This is the amount of money that has been set aside for making new improvements and generally increasing the beauty of the park.

I should like the minister to give the committee several sets of details, if he happens to have them convenient. I should like to know how much money has been appropriated for the Waterton Lakes park, for improvement in buildings and the like in the park from the year 1924 down to the present time. That would give us a chance to get a general idea of how much money has been appropriated. Then I should like him to tell, if he has the figures at his disposal, how much of that money that was appropriated for improvements of the park was not spent in the park but was returned to the department unspent. Can the minister give those figures?

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member was good enough the other day to tell me in advance that he would ask these questions so that I could obtain the figures. I have no record of the appropriations from the fiscal year 1924-25 to the fiscal year 1934-35, but with the consent of the members of the committee I can put on Hansard a list of the expenditures year by year from 1924-25 to 1934-35 exclusive and then—

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the minister can put this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: The table follows:

Year	Expenditures
1924-1925	$40,130
1925-1926	45,499
1926-1927	47,476
1927-1928	50,999
1928-1929	52,471
1929-1930	68,870
1930-1931	104,360
1931-1932	69,637
1932-1933	78,136
1933-1934	99,505

From 1934-35 to 1953-54 I can give a list showing the amount appropriated in each fiscal year, then the amount of actual expenditures made and then the lapsing balance for each year. With the consent of the committee I should like to place that on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister the unanimous consent of the committee to place those figures on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: The table follows:

Year	Appropriation	Expenditures	Lapsing Balances
1934-1935	$138,126	$137,234	892
1935-1936	194,552	194,717	—165
1936-1937	115,439	114,102	1,337
1937-1938	83,683	83,363	320
1938-1939	80,060	79,740	320
1939-1940	164,301	163,816	485
1940-1941	79,633	79,681	2
1941-1942	93,980	92,965	1,015
1942-1943	69,768	69,577	191
1943-1944	72,337	62,364	9,973
1944-1945	68,230	64,984	3,246
1945-1946	115,000	100,243	14,757
1946-1947	118,000	116,348	1,652
1947-1948	141,200	140,988	212
1948-1949	401,763	382,137	19,626
1949-1950	580,316	557,768	22,548
1950-1951	393,799	297,613	96,186
1951-1952	618,608	464,970	153,638
1952-1953	530,090	515,113	14,977
1953-1954	400,410	356,573 (Mar. 31, 1954)	43,837
	$4,731,379		$385,049

I should like to give the following explanations, though, for the lapsed balances for 1950-51 and 1951-52, which are quite large. In 1950-51 the lapsing balance was $96,186, as will be seen from the table on Hansard. This amount was made up of lapsed balances in a number of different works and projects. The largest lapsing amount was $20,705 in the replacement of an old bridge over Upper Cameron creek. These lapsed balances occurred for various reasons, such as non-completion of projects due to weather conditions and changes in plans resulting in savings of funds.

In 1951-52 the lapsed balance was $153,638. There was one large project for the hard-surfacing of a number of park roads at a total estimated cost of $323,500. Of this amount, $128,452 lapsed, about half due to non-completion of work, and the other half due to the work being done at less cost than had been expected. The remainder of the over-all lapsed balance for the park was comprised of minor amounts in a number of projects.

Mr. Blackmore: Has the minister at his disposal immediately the amount of money that was appropriated for Banff and Jasper over the years from 1924 to the present time? Does he happen to have those figures or can he give us those?

Mr. Lesage: No. The hon. member drew to my attention the questions that he intended to ask as to Waterton Lakes park, but I did not gather that he wanted the same figures for Jasper and Banff. These questions require quite an amount of work, as he will realize, and I did not think that he would ask the question that he has just asked.

Mr. Blackmore: I wish to thank the minister for his care in giving us the figures which he has already given. I wonder whether the minister happens to have at his disposal the materials from which he can give us an account of the improvements which have been made in Waterton Lakes park during the last year? Does he happen to have those readily at his disposal?

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry. I have what is proposed for this year, though.

Mr. Blackmore: I would rather the minister would keep those and give them to us at a future time.

Mr. Lesage: I do not have the details of the expenditures for 1953-54.

Mr. Blackmore: I just add one request at the present time. In addition to what has been done recently, may I say that, as far as I can judge, during the past two years the progress in the park has been just about as rapid as one could expect it to be. All we needed was a little more money. Possibly it would not have been easy to spend that money if we had it. There is one important improvement which I feel the country ought to make in the park rather soon. There should be a good swimming pool in the park. In rather earlier times past private enterprise provided a swimming pool, but that swimming pool was condemned. It was thought by those who had charge of such matters that it was hardly suitable and probably not safe enough; therefore it was closed. Since the closing of that swimming pool the deficiency has been noticed rather painfully in the park. I would suggest to the minister that if it can possibly be done in the very near future, a fine swimming pool should be built. It should be in a large, commodious, beautiful building which could be used on stormy days so that the people could come in out of the rain or out of the cold winds such as we sometimes get there in the summertime, and enjoy themselves just as well inside that building as they would if they were outside. Sometimes we have stormy weather on three, four and five days in a row, in the summertime. And in the park, for reasons that do not need to be gone into, it becomes a very disappointing situation to those who happened to choose those particular days for their holidays. Therefore, if we could have a building such as I have indicated, we would be additionally grateful to the minister.

Mr. Hodgson: Item 305 is a large item consisting of $3,500,000. A little over $1 million is allotted to roads in the park. Can the minister give us a breakdown of the money that will be spent on roads in each park?

Mr. Lesage: This involves some research and I do not think I have a breakdown of the figures now. The main item is in the Banff national park covering the reconstruction of the Jasper highway from Mile 0 to Mile 10, that is from Lake Louise. The estimated cost of that is $602,000. At Jasper there is another item of $148,000 for the completion of another portion of the Jasper highway. There is an expenditure of $350,000 for surfacing the Cabot trail between Mile 0 and Mile 18·5 in Cape Breton Highlands national park. In the Fundy national park there is an item of $30,000 and another for $10,000. In the Jasper national park there is an item for the replacement of a bridge at Mile 15 on the Banff-Jasper highway at a cost of $100,000. And there is another item for the Banff-Jasper highway at a cost of $53,000. I am just going through these items now.

Mr. Hodgson: It is quite all right. The reason I ask this question is that I have some very close friends who live near Jasper park and I have some other friends who also visited the park in Manitoba and both complained bitterly to me as a member of parliament at the state of the roads and said the worst road they had come over was in the Manitoba national park, and I believe roads through other parks in the west are in the same bad state of repair.

Mr. Harkness: I am very glad to hear that the Banff-Jasper-Lake Louise highway is now being improved. I was over it last summer and I am sorry to say that the American tourists with whom I spoke who were going up to the ice fields at Columbia all complained bitterly about the state of the highway. There is no doubt it is extremely bad as far as the national park is concerned and the state of the road undoubtedly means that we are not getting as many customers in that area as we might have and therefore I think it is quite essential that the road be improved. Apparently about 10 miles of that road from Lake Louise up is being rebuilt and a certain amount of resurfacing being done. But I wonder if the minister could tell us how soon it is expected the whole road will be surfaced.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member will appreciate, it is a very costly operation. We are spending over $900,000 this year on the improvement of that road.

Mr. Macdonnell: What's that?

Mr. Lesage: The road from Banff to Jasper. Oh, you mean what is $900,000?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: The financial critic of the opposition should know better than I.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am just quoting from the authority across the gangway.

Mr. Lesage: We will complete that road as rapidly as possible and have it all in good condition. I agree the scenery along that road is really beautiful, perhaps the most beautiful in Canada, and it is a great attraction for tourists. I can assure the committee that the improvement of that road has very high priority.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad it has priority, but the minister has not yet indicated how soon the road will be completed. He has mentioned the fact that it is an expensive operation and that he expects to spend about $750,000 this year on that project. There are some expenditures which make money and some which do not bring in any return at all, but this happens to be an expenditure which, in my opinion, is going to bring in a great many more tourists and therefore many more tourists' dollars. Certainly the condition of that road was so bad up until recently that it caused a great deal of damage to the tourist industry. This is therefore one project which is likely to pay for itself and it is likely to provide a return on the money already invested there. But if the road is allowed to remain as it is this investment will be lost. From that point of view I do not think the fact that this project is going to be so costly should deter the parks branch. Even if the road is not surfaced I would suggest that the number of maintainers could be increased. A great deal could be done just by improving the maintenance of the road. As the road was last year you would get a fair stretch which would enable you to travel at about 50 miles an hour. Some would go even faster than that at, say, 60 or 70 miles an hour, which I agree is much too fast. Nevertheless, no matter what speed you were doing, you would suddenly strike very bad chuck holes which would almost shake the car to pieces. Short of paving the entire road, what I think could be done is to increase the number of maintainers and graders. In other words, you could have much better maintenance at a relatively low cost and I hope that this will be done so as to eliminate the very rough conditions which existed last year.

Mr. Lesage: I can assure my hon. friend that the superintendent of parks, who is on the floor of the house at this time, has listened very carefully to the hon. member's remarks and instructions will be issued accordingly. We are spending a little more on maintenance this year, but this is a very difficult task, because the old road has a poor base. That is why we have to rebuild the road and that is why it is so costly. However, I have taken particular note of the hon. member's remarks and he can be assured that steps will be taken to avoid a recurrence of the conditions he has described.

Mr. Harkness: I might just add that I drove back from Jasper park and the road was in much better condition.

Mr. Lesage: Much depends on the weather.

Mr. Harkness: No, the maintenance men had been over the road fairly recently and I think that proves my point, that a few more maintenance men on that road would make a great deal of difference. There is one other point I would like to raise and that is in regard to the item which deals with buildings as well as roads and parks. The item amounts to approximately $800,000 and I would like to ask the minister what type of buildings are included in that item.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Lesage: For each park?

Mr. Harkness: No, but I would like to know the situation particularly with reference to the Banff, Jasper, Kootenay and Yoho parks, and I would especially like to know if this item provides for any more youth hostels such as I described an hour or so ago, and also if it provides for any of these ski huts or anything along that line.

Mr. Lesage: No. Neither one. Not this year.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry that it does not provide for any of those buildings this year. I would hope perhaps that the estimate might be moved around a bit. I do not know just what construction has already been started, if any, but I would hope that some buildings along that line might be provided for. The minister was going to give me what buildings are provided for in those mountain parks.

Mr. Lesage: Yes. Here are a few. For instance, in Banff, construction of a combined caretaker's residence and heating plant at cave and basin bathhouse, $53,000; water and sewer installation, centralized service, $57,500; construction of a park warden's residence for the Banff district warden—the present building is old and rotting—$11,000. The replacement of kitchen shelters at Tunnel mountain camp grounds at a cost of $8,000; the completion of a staff quarters building at the east gate of the park, $12,000; construction of a patrol cabin on the Howse river in the vicinity of Howse river pass trail, $5,000. There is $25,000 for the continuation of reconstruction of the Norquay road this year, sanitation, cutting and hauling of mature and diseased timber and operation of sawmill and planer, $20,000. The others are small items.

In Jasper, construction of headquarters warden's residence, $19,852; construction of lookout cabin at Maligne lake, $2,500. In Kootenay national park, construction of a garage and a maintenance compound area, $107,000; construction of a semi-detached staff residence at Radium townsite at $23,000. There is a truss bridge in Yoho, at Mile 4 from Yoho valley road, $72,000. Extension of existing administration office in Field townsite; $15,000; and various other small construction items.

Mr. Harkness: My only comment on that would be that I do not doubt that all these buildings will be useful and so on, but I would think that some of the money that is appropriated for these various residences would really be much better spent and would give a greater return to the Canadian people as far as enjoyment is concerned—and that is what the parks are for—in the use of the parks and would also attract far more visitors if some of it were put into buildings of the sort that I have mentioned such as youth hostels, ski cabins and things of that sort. I would hope that, in making up the estimates in future years, the minister would keep that matter in mind. I think I noticed an item of $53,000. Was that the amount the minister mentioned?

Mr. Lesage: The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harkness: $53,000, for a residence at the cave and basin. That seems to be a little bit excessive.

Mr. Lesage: There is a heating plant.

Mr. Harkness: That includes a heating plant as well as a residence.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: That is a heating plant for the residence?

Mr. Lesage: For the bathhouse; the heating plant is for the bathhouse.

Mr. Harkness: For the bathhouse? Is the water not hot already? It was when I was in it last. It pours out of the rock quite hot. I do not see that you need any heating plant. As I say, no doubt it will add to the amenities there and so on and particularly to the comfort of the caretaker. However, it is quite a large amount of money and I would think that some of it or perhaps the whole amount might much better be spent on this other type of construction that I have mentioned.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister tell us why each year we are asked to appropriate twice as much for Banff, which is served by the C.P.R., as we are asked to appropriate for Jasper, which is served by the C.N.R.?

Mr. Harkness: It was the reverse in previous years.

Mr. Noseworthy: Not last year.

Mr. Lesage: I am told that it varies. Some years the expenditures at Jasper are higher and some years the expenditures at Banff are higher. It happens that this year it is higher at Banff. But in the Banff expenditures let us not forget that there is $600,000 for the Banff-Jasper highway. Last year there were a few hundred thousand dollars on the Jasper-Banff highway because the reconstruction was made at the Jasper end. Hence it was under Jasper. This year it is made on the Banff end so it is under Banff.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Noseworthy: I am serious.

Mr. Lesage: I believe that is the best explanation I can give.

Mr. Noseworthy: What I notice here is that both last year and this year the amount for Banff is really more than twice that for Jasper; that is the situation in the last two years.

Mr. Lesage: I do not know what the hon. member is talking about. Is that construction or maintenance?

Mr. Noseworthy: It is on pages 379 and 380.

Mr. Lesage: On page 380 I see that in 1953-54 the proposed expenditures for Jasper park were, in round figures, $640,000 and for Banff they were $530,000, which is less.

Mr. Hodgson: They did the work at the opposite end of the road.

Mr. Harkness: Will the minister give the figures as to the number of visitors to Banff and to Jasper? I think those figures would provide a sufficient answer to the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lesage: Yes; I can give those figures. The total number of visitors at Banff in 1952 was 582,434; at Jasper, 104,047.

Mr. Harkness: More than five to one.

Mr. Lesage: That is right.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Hodgson: No. I should like to ask the minister about these cars. At page 379 I see an item "Acquisition of Cars and Trucks, $141,950". How many cars and trucks does that represent? If the minister has that information handy I should like to have it.

Mr. Lesage: I will have to pick them out of each park in order to give the total number. Is there any particular park in which the hon. member is interested?

Mr. Hodgson: No. I just wanted to know how many vehicles it represented.

Mr. Lesage: I can give the hon. member some examples. I will take the largest park, namely Banff park. That will give a good indication, without listing all the equipment. Under this heading in Banff national park there are six 5-ton dump trucks which are replacements.

Mr. Hodgson: They were replacements? They are new but they are replacements?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, they are replacements. The hon. member will realize that this new construction and maintenance of roads takes a great many of these trucks.

Mr. Hodgson: That is right.

Mr. Lesage: But these are all replacements; these six 5-ton dump trucks at Banff are replacements. So far as I can see, they are all replacements at Banff.

Mr. Hodgson: I was wondering how many were cars. I hope you are not buying all these engineers new cars to ride around in.

Mr. Lesage: From what I can see here they are all replacements. There would be one or two exceptions but mainly they are replacements.

Mr. MacLean: I see that there is an amount of $38,825 for new construction at Prince Edward Island park and that last year the amount was $67,695, almost twice as much. I should like to know whether the item voted last year was actually spent or whether this is partly a revote. I should also like a breakdown of the proposed new construction for the year ahead.

Mr. Lesage: I can tell the hon. member now what the new construction will be. For the continuation of the development of camp grounds at Stanhope and Cavendish there is an amount of $4,850; construction of laundry, shower and toilet building at Stanhope to service the camp ground—there are no facilities now—$9,500; construction of refreshment booth at Cavendish, $3,000; construction of kitchen shelters at Stanhope lane, Rustico and Cavendish, $4,000, or a total of $21,350.

Mr. MacLean: The total amount is $38,825. Is there any provision for improvement of roads in the park this year?

Mr. Lesage: No, there is no provision for roads this year. Last year the proposed expenditure was $67,695. Up to the 31st of December, which is the last figure I have, actual expenditures amounted to $43,376. The largest item, roughly $22,000, was for seal coating with asphalt and chips of the Dalvay-Stanhope road. The second largest was approximately $16,000 for the construction of a garage at Dalvay for car and equipment.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister about Prince Albert national park. We call it Waskesiu. Is any new construction proposed there this year either in the form of roads or administration buildings?

Mr. Lesage: Yes. The items are as follows: Construction of a semi-detached staff residence, $25,000; continuation of construction commenced in 1953 on trailer park in Waskesiu townsite, including the installation of power and water services, $15,000; completion of camp ground development, $5,000; continuation of program of reconstruction of fire trails, approximately twenty miles, $7,500; continuation of the program of replacement of street lights, $8,000; continuation of logging and lumbering operations, $12,000. Then there is a long list of items under $5,000. Does the hon. member wish me to give those?

Mr. Knight: No.

Mr. Byrne: I find it rather disconcerting that the minister has given priority to the Lake Louise-Jasper highway. I am sure he still has in mind the very important link in the Banff highway from the boundary at Kingsgate in southern British Columbia. There is a section from Radium to Banff that has had the prime coat and requires the finishing surface. I hope the minister will keep that in mind. He also said that he felt that on the highway from Jasper to Lake Louise there was some of the greatest scenery in Canada. I am sure he will change his mind if he visits Yoho and Kootenay parks this summer. The facilities in both these parks are excellent. While there may be room for improvement, nevertheless the tourist attractions are first class. It is not necessary to build an indoor swimming pool in either of these parks. From May until October they are open, and in Kootenay park one can swim the year round. Certainly you can play outdoors from the early spring to the late fall. I think the minister should give first priority to the hard surfacing of the road from Radium at least to Eisenhower junction.

Mr. Lesage: I understand that is the Banff-Windermere road. Some work was done on it last year and it is under active consideration for some expenditure next year.

Mr. Harkness: I note that there is an item of $452,000 for historic sites which is a considerable increase over the $286,000 of last year. This is for the acquisition of property and buildings so that I presume the department intends to secure certain historic sites which they have not owned heretofore or to erect a greatly increased number of markers or monuments, or both. Can the minister tell us something about what this vote is intended to cover?

Mr. Lesage: May I just read quickly the main items that make up this figure? They are: construction of museum building at Baddeck, Nova Scotia, the house of Alexander Graham Bell, $150,000; continuation of renovation and repairs to the Halifax citadel, $100,000; continuation of restoration, construction and preservation work for the fortress at Louisbourg, Nova Scotia, $5,000; repairs to the fortification walls at Quebec city, $25,000; restoration and repairs to Dufferin terrace, Quebec city, $56,000. We will recoup two-thirds of that last amount. The city of Quebec and the C.P.R. are to pay one-third each. Repairs to buildings and walls at Lower Fort Garry, Manitoba, $29,000. We hope to acquire the Batoche rectory at Batoche and have provided $5,000 for acquisition of and repairs to the Batoche rectory.

Then there is construction at Battleford, as I said a few moments ago, to the extent of about $21,000. Then there is $20,000 for the erection of new memorials. This item is for a long list of places. Then there are various smaller items.

Mr. Harkness: It would seem that the bulk of this increase is in these two items in Nova Scotia, Alexander Graham Bell house and the Halifax citadel. What makes the Alexander Graham Bell house so expensive? I think the minister said $150,000?

Mr. Lesage: It is a new building, a complete museum to house the Alexander Graham Bell relics.

Mr. Harkness: I thought you meant you were buying his old home.

Mr. Lesage: No, that is to build a museum.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

National parks branch—

306. Grant to the Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining about this grant, but I should like to know if there are any conditions imposed in connection with it. I know that this family has done valuable work in connection with the conservation of the Canada wild goose, in particular. It has tagged these geese, with the result that certain scientific findings have been made in regard to bird habits.

Are there any conditions attached to the grant, or is it simply an amount given to the family to carry on the work they are now doing? Is there any accounting kept, or any definite research other than the work I have described?

Mr. Lesage: This is an annual grant to the foundation, and there are no strings attached. The grant is to the foundation, not to the family.

Mr. Knight: It is to carry on the work they are known to be doing?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, this conservation work.

Mr. Knight: There is no accounting made by way of definite findings to the department? Is there a report?

Mr. Lesage: I believe the foundation makes a report every year which, if my memory serves me correctly, is received by all members of parliament.

Mr. McBain: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question regarding the Jack Miner bird sanctuary. I happen to know that the late Mr. Miner took a great interest in this sanctuary. I have no doubt that when it was established a number of years ago he spent untold sums of money out of his own pocket. We know that costs have been mounting, and that they will have affected costs in connection with this foundation the same as they have other lines of business in the last few years. I am wondering if the minister has given consideration to increasing the grant, because my understanding is that last year the foundation operated under a deficit of $5,000.

Mr. Lesage: From the fiscal year 1940-41 to the year 1945-46 the annual grant was $2,500. Then in the fiscal year 1946-47 it was doubled to $5,000 a year, and has remained at that figure since that time. We propose the same amount this year.

Mr. Hodgson: The foundation does send out a statement of its affairs each year—at least I have received one. It shows that they have been operating on a deficit which now amounts to about $5,000. I should think it would be well if the department would consider allowing them another $1,000 for a year or two until the deficit is wiped out.

National parks branch—

307. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $10,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to comment briefly on this item, mainly with a view to bringing hon. members up to date with the progress in connection with the development of the international peace garden on the North Dakota-Manitoba border. Even though the minister has only recently assumed responsibility for the department, I am sure he is well informed in this matter. During recent years the peace garden has come prominently to the attention of the Canadian public as a result of the disturbed conditions on the international front.

Three years ago the grant to the international peace garden was discontinued. We were delighted last year when it was restored, and we are happy again this year to see it in the current estimates. Before the grant was discontinued for one year it was fixed at $15,000 per annum.

Originally the grant resulted from the interest shown by the former member for the old constituency of Brandon, the late J. E. Matthews, who always took a most vital interest in this significant project. While we are grateful for the annual grant of $10,000, there is hope that it will be restored to its former level of $15,000.

In saying this I would point out that just within the last few weeks the congress of the United States voted the sum of $100,000 for development on the United States side of the peace garden. It seems to me that $15,000, or even more, would be a reasonably proportionate sum to be devoted to the project on the Canadian side of the boundary.

During the discussion today the minister indicated that he intends to make a complete survey of departmental activities across the country during the forthcoming summer. I am pleased to note his intention. So far as I know, I do not think any of his predecessors in the department has had the privilege or opportunity of visiting the international peace garden. I take this opportunity to extend a very cordial invitation to him to inspect the garden when he is out in that part of Canada. And if there is no other means of transportation available I shall be happy to see that he is taken down the beautiful highway No. 10 to the border. I am sure he will be tremendously impressed by the development that has taken place in the garden since world war II.

I do not want to prolong these remarks, but while I am on my feet there are one or two points I should like to bring forward. I am sure that eventually Canada will have a chain of botanical gardens right across the country. I know there are groups working toward this end at the present time, and that they have been so engaged for some considerable period. The nucleus of such a garden is already being established at the international peace garden, and it is the hope of those who are most vitally interested that eventually the peace garden will be included within a group of government-sponsored botanical gardens.

The idea was first conceived by the international horticultural society, and was largely the brain-child of the late Henry J. Moore of Islington, Ontario. That was one of the thoughts he had in his mind back in 1929 when attention was first given to the establishment of a garden of this nature.

Then I should like to make only a passing reference to a matter that might more properly be discussed under item 310. It is hoped, too, that some consideration will be given to the establishment of a museum at the site of the international peace garden. The number of people visiting there annually is increasing. That fact has been recognized by the construction of a new customs port during the present year right at the entrance to the garden. I believe that eventually Canada will have a system of decentralized museums which will bring together all the cultural artifacts gathered from each of the districts, and that we may preserve in that fashion the cultural history of the area in which the museum is located. Quite recently some very significant discoveries in regard to Indian lore have been made in the vicinity of my constituency, and I presume that all the artifacts that have been uncovered in these discoveries have been moved to the national museum. It seems to be much more highly appropriate that these artifacts should be retained in the province in which they belong and form a part of the story of that particular area.

In concluding my observations, I once again extend the most earnest invitation to the minister to visit the peace garden to see for himself the numbers of people who visit there, and get a more personal appreciation of the significance of this important park. I hope he will accept the invitation.

Mr. McIvor: Since I lived in Souris for a number of years I know the importance of this peace garden. I will back up the hon. member completely in supporting $15,000 to be spent because it would be money well spent.

My other reason for rising is this: When the minister is making the trip I would invite him to stop off at Fort William, where he would see some scenery worth looking at, in order that we might have mount McKay as a national park. We have been trying for this for a number of years, and if the minister gets a look at it I know what will happen.

Mr. Lesage: I wish to thank hon. members for all the very kind invitations they have extended to me. I would be delighted to accept all of them, but if I do I hope that the criticism of the opposition on the amount of my travelling expenses since coming here will not be too harsh.

Mr. Hodgson: That gives me an idea. Perhaps we should check up on these travelling expenses. The expenses in this item are not the minister's personal expenses.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to support what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has said with regard to the international peace garden. I know it is a very worthy project and deserves all the assistance that can be given so that Canada's share of that international peace garden may match the project that has been undertaken on the other side of the border.

However, I do not propose to speak at length except to draw to the minister's attention the fact that an admirable map in the back of the report of the department of resources and development, for which of course he is not responsible, does not indicate the international peace garden. I would suggest that he draw to the attention of those officials who are responsible for producing a map of this sort the fact that the international peace garden should be properly marked in the future.

Item agreed to.

Canadian wildlife service—
309. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $437,271.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Will the minister tell us what the buffalo population is at the present time, or does he know that?

Mr. Lesage: About 12,000.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Are there any musk-ox in Canada now? And where are they?

Mr. Lesage: There are musk-ox in the north.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I know there are, but has the minister any under his control?

Mr. Lesage: I would not like to be asked to control a musk-ox.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Are they under the minister's department?

Mr. Lesage: That comes under the northern administration and lands branch, Northwest Territories; that is where the musk-ox are.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I wondered whether they came under the minister's department.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, under the northern division, not under the parks division.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): We have to wait until we come to that.

Mr. Lesage: I would rather wait until the director of the northern division is with me to answer detailed questions on the musk-ox.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): What about elk? How many elk are there in the parks, and has the disease that they had a few years ago been cleared up?

Mr. Lesage: I am not in a position to give the population figure at the moment, but they are very healthy. There was a disease amongst them a few years ago, of which I am not personally aware, but it is not of much concern today.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister tell us what species of fish are being propagated to be placed in the lakes of the national parks?

Mr. Lesage: It is trout, salmon trout, speckled trout, rainbow trout and all the very nice species of trout which it is pleasant to catch with a fly.

Mr. McIvor: And good to eat.

Mr. Lesage: And good to eat, as the hon. member says.

Mr. Herridge: I understood that eastern brook trout were being raised.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, that is one of the species.

Mr. Herridge: It does not compare with the Kamloops trout. We do not want them in our lakes.

Mr. Stick: Has any survey of wildlife in Newfoundland and Labrador been carried on lately, or is there any contemplated? I understand a survey was supposed to be taken in the last year or so.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, there is one investigation of Brunnich's murre populations. The investigation is being made for the purpose of securing data on the status of these birds which are used extensively by the coastal residents of Newfoundland for food purposes. There is also a study going on of the eider duck farming possibilities, of natives collecting their down in the Arctic and sub-Arctic regions.

Mr. Nesbitt: There is one item I want the minister to satisfy me on and that is the matter of northern allowances. Can the minister explain exactly what it entails?

Mr. Lesage: The cost of living in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and the Arctic of course is much higher than in the rest of Canada, and that amount is to help the civil service employees to cope with the very much higher cost of living in those regions.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one further question on the matter of rental of equipment. I see the amount has more than doubled over last year. Can the minister make any comment on that?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, the increase is due to the extended use which will be made of boats, equipment, horses, dogs, and especially aircraft on field projects. The cost of hiring aircraft in 1953-54 was $10,000 and the estimate for this year is $28,340.

Item agreed to.

310. National museum of Canada, $305,681.

Mr. Dinsdale: I presume, Mr. Chairman, that "national museum of Canada" refers to one central museum. During the discussion today there has been reference to other museums located across the country. Are they considered to be part of the national museum, or are they quite distinct?

Mr. Lesage: No, the others come under the heading of historic sites. This item refers to the national museum of Canada located here in Ottawa. The others are historic sites in which are located articles of historical value. For example, the Alexander Graham Bell museum which is to be built will contain items pertaining to the development of the telephone invented by Bell. Most of these, though, come under the historic sites division.

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the minister indicate whether articles of historic interest located across the country are brought to the national museum or whether they are retained in the locality in which they are found.

Mr. Lesage: Some of these articles are housed in provincial museums. It all depends on who finds them. The individual who finds such objects might offer them to the national museum, to a private museum, or to a provincial museum, or even keep them for himself.

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister is no doubt aware that it used to be the general practice a few years ago for groups from the United States, for example, to carry out research on Canadian historical sites and remove these objects of historical interest. Is that still possible?

Mr. Lesage: No, where there is federal jurisdiction we do not allow the export of such articles.

Mr. McIvor: We have a museum in Fort William and it might be well worth the minister's while to have a look at it.

Item agreed to.

Engineering and water resources branch—
311. Branch administration, $63,156.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if this is the item under which we might discuss mineral development roads?

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. Lesage: Mineral development comes under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, except for mineral development in the north which will come under northern administration votes. This vote has only to do with water resources.

Mr. Bryson: Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, but I said mineral development roads. Would they come under this item?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, I suppose they would come under the engineering and water resources branch.

Mr. Bryson: In that case, Mr. Chairman, and in view of the many letters which have been exchanged between the minister and the Saskatchewan department of highways, would the minister care to make a statement regarding the continuation of the negotiations which have been going on during the past year in connection with the Flin Flon-Denare Beach road?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Douglas, the Saskatchewan minister of highways, visited me on or about, I believe, April 26 and we discussed the matter again but there is nothing more I can say at this moment.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, this item dealing with engineering and water resources is important since it covers a subject of very wide application which is of great importance to this country. We must safeguard our resources such as this, for their neglect would have a detrimental effect on soil and forest conservation. It has been pointed out by experts in this field that water conservation is not an engineering question. It is not a question of building dams after the floods have occurred. It is rather a question of developing soil conditions so that the moisture soaks in where it falls, which in turn prevents the flooding of rivers and water courses downstream causing all sorts of havoc. I say that merely to illustrate that water, soil, and forest conservation are interrelated, and I would suggest to the minister that since his department is called the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources he should perhaps take the lead in co-ordinating conservation efforts generally. Conservation is not a matter which concerns his department only. In a broad sense it is a matter in which the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are also vitally interested. I would be very pleased to see some sort of co-ordinating committee set up which would deal with this matter not only as it concerns departments of the federal government, but also provincial governmental departments. A committee of the privy council already deals with matters of research and I would like to see a similar committee set up to deal with the safeguarding and maintaining of our natural resources with special regard to soil and water conservation. The membership of that committee could include ministers in the cabinet whose departments deal with such matters.

Recently there was a conference here in Ottawa dealing with conservation and the use of land and water resources and a national authority to administer such a program was advocated. I would like to have the minister's views on this matter and I would also like him to indicate what steps we might anticipate in future with regard to closer co-ordination between the various branches of government at all three levels, federal, provincial and municipal, which in future will deal with this intricate and complex subject.

Mr. Lesage: I believe that this government has taken the lead in conservation. Two instances come to my mind. A few years ago this house adopted the Canada Forestry Act by which this government certainly gave leadership in the field of forest conservation. At the last session this house passed the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act—and that was also an instance of leadership—under which we agree that we will contribute 37½ per cent of the cost of major conservation projects when the province itself contributes 37½ per cent, the local interests contributing the balance of 25 per cent. Since the hon. member has been speaking about co-ordination with the provincial authorities, may I assure him that since the passage of this act negotiations have taken place with the authorities of various provinces who have come forward with projects which are now under study and negotiation. There is fairly close co-operation with the provinces which are interested in water conservation, as evidenced by the amount of money that we have expended under the Canada Forestry Act. A wide interest has been shown by the provinces in the field of forest conservation, together with the federal government.

Mr. Hodgson: On this administration item, and having reference to the hook-up with the provinces, may I ask whether it is the province that administers this project or whether it is the dominion government?

Mr. Lesage: What kind of projects has the hon. member in mind? Does he mean water conservation projects?

Mr. Hodgson: Lake of the Woods control board.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member mind if I answered that question when we reach the vote relating to Lake of the Woods control board? It is vote 312.

Mr. Hodgson: The minister may say that it is vote 312, but under vote 311 we find this: "including federal share of expenses of the Lake of the Woods control board".

Mr. Lesage: Yes; but there is a special vote. That is the heading. The vote is No. 312.

Mr. Hodgson: Very well.

Mr. Green: Item 311 covers branch administration of the water resources division. Can the minister tell us the present position with regard to the plans for using the headwaters of the Yukon river for the development of a great power project? I believe it will be one of the greatest developments of this kind in Canada and perhaps the largest in the country. I understand that there is to be 4½ million horsepower.

Mr. Lesage: 4½ million to 5 million horsepower.

Mr. Green: I stand corrected; 4½ million to 5 million horsepower. The situation seems to be rather complicated at the moment. As I understand it, the Frobisher people, through their subsidiary Quebec Metallurgical Industries Limited, plan to put their power plant on the Taku river and then to bring in ores for smelting from all over the world. However, there is another firm, the Aluminum Company of America, which proposes to use the same water for the establishment of a power plant at Skagway in Alaska; and apparently they plan to make aluminum. It looks as though the dominion government is taking one side and the provincial government of British Columbia the other. The waters are half in British Columbia and half in the Yukon. Hence if the governments will not co-operate, there will not be any scheme. Can the minister tell us what steps have been taken by those two groups and what the situation is at the present time?

Mr. Lesage: As far as this government is concerned, the only steps that have been taken are those taken by Quebec Metallurgical Industries Limited to obtain from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources—the then department of resources and development—a permit to survey. It is not an exclusive permit and it is not a priority permit. No request for a priority permit has yet been made. We have received no request from Alcoa, the Aluminum Company of America, or from the Aluminum Company of Canada for a permit to survey. As far as this department is concerned there is only one permit which has been issued to survey the headwaters of the Yukon river, and it has been issued to Quebec Metallurgical Industries Limited. No request has been received from others. I am speaking of the period since 1951 or 1952. I am speaking of latest developments. I believe that is what the hon. member has in mind.

As to the alleged difference of opinion between this government and the government of British Columbia, may I say that we are not aware of it. The hon. member might have read newspaper reports about some speeches or some declarations made in British Columbia, but no representations have been made to us by the government of British Columbia. The only thing I could do, I believe, about the question of the export of water power or power—and I believe it is the most appropriate thing for me to do—is to refer the committee to a statement made by the Prime Minister on December 8, 1953. I do not at this moment have the reference to the page, but I know that the members of the committee will recall the statement that was made by the Prime Minister at the time he was introducing the bill to set up the new Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. There is nothing I could add to that statement at this time.

Mr. Green: Is it perfectly clear that the policy of the dominion government is to refuse to give permission for the construction of this Alcoa plant which will mean a power plant in the United States and aluminum made in Alaska which will be in competition in the United States market with aluminum made at Kitimat in British Columbia, a situation which might well prejudice the whole Kitimat scheme. Mind you, aluminum from Alaska would enter the United States duty free whereas aluminum from Kitimat would be subject to duty levied by the United States. This is a very serious situation from the point of view of the west coast. We would like to be sure that the dominion is not going to take steps that will mean a power plant and smelter in Skagway, Alaska, rather than on the Taku river in British Columbia or in some other Canadian centre. Unfortunately half the water is controlled by the province and the other half by the dominion. Some way or other an agreement will have to be reached. Otherwise I believe there is a chance of the companies going to Ungava, certainly going away from the west coast. Will the minister give us a definite statement tonight on dominion government policy?

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. Lesage: I can do nothing better than to read what the Prime Minister had to say about this matter. This is the policy of the government and there is nothing to add. He said:

> The hydroelectric possibilities of the region are immense. By the construction of dams at appropriate places, some of them reversing the flow of certain rivers and lakes draining into the Yukon river, and by taking advantage of the large drop of the level of that country to the Pacific, power can be developed in enormous quantities. It was suggested to me that there was more than 4½ million horsepower that could be developed in that way. Hon. members will remember that some time ago there was a suggestion that these waters, or much of them, could be diverted for development into Alaska. Well, they are Canadian waters and while we do not want to adopt any dog in the manger attitude about our resources which cannot be used in our own country, I think that those which can be used in our country must be reserved for the generations that will follow us and who will develop this country. I was happy that the minister's declaration in that regard was applauded in the house on December 17, 1952—

That was a declaration by my predecessor.

> —and I am glad to see that my reference to it today meets with the unanimous approval of the representatives of all the Canadian people. We do not want to be isolationists but we do feel we have a trust to future generations for the resources with which Providence has endowed this vast land over which now our people exercise sovereignty.

I believe that is a complete statement of government policy, and there is nothing I could add.

Mr. Green: Will the minister take steps to have this policy communicated formally to the government of British Columbia?

Mr. Lesage: I had a long interview with the premier of British Columbia last December. He was accompanied by the minister of finance of his government and I was accompanied by my deputy minister. We had a long interview during which I made it clear that that was the policy of the government.

Mr. Green: I thought the minister said a few moments ago that he did not know anything about British Columbia's stand.

Mr. Lesage: No, that is not what I said. I said that I did not know anything officially about any differences of opinion. In December, when we discussed the matter with the premier of British Columbia, there was no apparent disagreement.

Mr. Green: Can the minister take steps to have some further discussion with the British Columbia authorities on this question?

Mr. Lesage: I have just written to the premier of British Columbia last week telling him that I intend to call on him when I am in Victoria, and of course that will be one of the questions on the agenda.

Mr. MacInnis: With respect to the matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, perhaps there is another approach to it, if I may be permitted to ask a question. I do not know whether it is proper at this time to refer to priority of control, but which government, the federal government or the government of British Columbia, has priority of control as far as the waters of this river are concerned? If the federal government has priority of control I think that possibly the statement of the Prime Minister read by the minister should be satisfactory to the committee. On the other hand, if the province of British Columbia has priority in the matter the situation might be different. I would be glad to hear from the minister on that point.

Mr. Lesage: Of course this parliament through the government has control over export. There is no doubt about that. We have over-all control over the export of water power. As far as the development of resources in Canada is concerned, and with specific reference to the headwaters of the Yukon river, the government of British Columbia has jurisdiction over that part of the headwaters which lies within British Columbia and we have jurisdiction over that part of the headwaters which lies within the Yukon.

Mr. Bryson: Would the minister say whether negotiations are continuing between his department and the Saskatchewan government with respect to a division of costs in connection with the Flin Flon-Denare Beach road?

Mr. Lesage: As I said a few minutes ago, I had a visit with the minister of highways, I believe, of Saskatchewan, Mr. Douglas. We discussed the matter, and I am expecting some more information that I have requested.

Mr. Hardie: As the minister knows, the development of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon is dependent on cheaper transportation, cheaper power and cheaper everything. As a matter of fact, we are living in a high cost area and I think it is hindering the development of the country. With respect to the Northwest Territories power commission, I should like to ask the minister whether his department has at any time considered extending the amortization period of the Snare river power plant, the Fort Smith power plant and the Mayo power plant in the Yukon in order to provide cheaper power for the people who are pioneering the development of the country. If I may give an example, in the city of Ottawa I get the same power for the sum of $5 for two months that in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories costs me $40 to $50. I would appreciate it if the minister would take the matter up with his department with the idea of extending the amortization period of the Northwest Territories power commission plants and helping the people who are pioneering the country.

Mr. Lesage: This of course is one of the factors we have to study when we go into ways and means, as we are now doing, of bringing down the cost of living in the north country. We have started this study and we will carry it on as rapidly as we can. The hon. member is aware of my interest and the interest of my officials in the north country. I believe our north country has a tremendous future but we have to plan carefully. On the other hand, we have to act and we are preparing a basis for action. In preparing that basis we are studying all the various factors that affect the cost of living in the north in order, we hope, to bring down the cost of living so that life will be more normal and it will be easier to develop that northern country which is so promising.

Mr. Hardie: I thank the minister for his remarks. He did say that we have to plan carefully. I hope he is not persuaded by the economists today, but remembers that the Northwest Territories will be there for 100 years, as will that power plant. It will be producing power for the mines in the north. I feel that if we do extend this we should extend it for forty years.

Mr. Simmons: What is the present period of amortization on the Mayo river plant?

Mr. Lesage: It is 20 years.

Item agreed to.

Water resources division—

312. Administration, operation and maintenance, including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference, $669,597.

Mr. Hodgson: I asked the minister a question on item 311, and he said he would answer it under item 312. It referred to the set-up of the Lake of the Woods control board.

Mr. Lesage: Here is the note I have under an item in vote 312. Following an interchange of correspondence in 1952 between my predecessor and the minister of lands and forests in Ontario and the minister of mines and natural resources in Manitoba, it was agreed that representatives of the three governments concerned should make an examination of the damages in the field and make a report. Manitoba's interest, it was clearly understood, was only in the case of properties bordering on the Lake of the Woods. That province has no statutory responsibility in respect of the regulation of Rainy lake.

The total expenditures on the investigation of damage claims, lake of the Woods, are as follows: for Manitoba, $1,547; for Ontario, $4,370; for the Canadian government, $2,230, making a total of $8,147. Apportionment of the payment according to the agreement of November 15, 1952, is as follows: the Canadian government, one-third; Ontario, approximately one-ninth; and Manitoba approximately five-ninths.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister add a word of explanation to the remark he made a moment ago, which interested me. He said the department was carrying out studies with a view to bringing down the cost of living in the north. Could he give just one or two indications as to nature of those studies?

Mr. Lesage: One of the main factors in the high cost of living in the north is the cost of transportation, and of course the cost of hydroelectric power which is higher than elsewhere. The cost of transportation affects the price of every commodity.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thought it might be that.

Mr. Hodgson: Does the dominion or the province control the water in the lake of the Woods?

Mr. Lesage: It is a tripartite agreement between Canada and the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba. There is a statute covering the subject, and a board has been created under the statute.

Mr. Hodgson: Who controls the administration? Who lifts the stoplog out of the dam, and who puts it in?

Mr. Lesage: The board.

Mr. Hodgson: The dominion government?

Mr. Lesage: No, the board.

Mr. Hodgson: The board that is set up by the three governments?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I just want to say to the minister: If he can bring down the cost of living in the north, what are the chances of bringing it down in the rest of the country?

Mr. Lesage: I shall sit on a special committee with the hon. member, whenever he wishes, and we will discuss that.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the minister for a word of explanation concerning the international executive of the world power conference. What is the world power conference? What is its purpose, and by whom are we represented?

Mr. Lesage: This amount is provided annually, and has been for many years, to take care of Canada's share of maintaining a small permanent headquarters in London, England. It also provides for Canada's share of printing the conference report. The contribution is £100. This executive council studies the world power situation, and makes a report which is useful to our division. We participate in this conference, at which there is a complete exchange of information about the power situation in the various countries throughout the world.

Mr. Churchill: Have we a representative on the executive council?

Mr. Lesage: There is a national committee in Canada of this world power conference. It is made up of representatives of this department and representatives of industry. This national committee sends a representative to the world power conference when it meets.

Item agreed to.

Water resources division—

314. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $377,400.

Mr. Herridge: This item is of great interest to my constituents and, I know, to the people of British Columbia generally. I see the vote is $4,100 greater than last year. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, this will be the tenth year that these investigations have been undertaken. I should like the minister to inform the house as to the total cost of the investigations to date, including this estimate. What is being undertaken by the investigation this year, and how long is it expected it will take to complete the investigation of the Columbia watershed area? If the minister can give some information, I would appreciate it.

Mr. Lesage: The expenditure since 1944-45 has been $2·4 million, excluding the proposed estimate for this year. Now, it is believed that it will take two years to conclude the investigations. After this year's program we expect that the investigation as a whole with respect to field activities will be 85 per cent complete, and the office studies necessary for the compilation of the report will take another two years.

Mr. Herridge: That means four years in all?

Mr. Lesage: The expectation is five years in all.

Mr. Herridge: Another five years before the report is completed?

Mr. Lesage: Five years, counting the present one.

Mr. Herridge: Before the report is completed?

Mr. Lesage: I should say four, after the present year.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you. What steps are taken after the report is completed by those conducting the investigation? What is the next step in the development of this area?

Mr. Lesage: I believe we will look at the report first before taking the next step.

Mr. Herridge: Who considers the report and then makes a recommendation?

Mr. Lesage: The report of the engineers will be made to the international joint commission, which will report to both governments.

Mr. Green: In recent months there has been a great deal of publicity in British Columbia concerning the possibility of a power development at Mica creek on the big bend of the Columbia river. Discussion was commenced, I believe, because of statements made by General McNaughton, who is chairman of the Canadian section of the international joint commission. Can the minister tell us just what there is in all this publicity? Some of the dispatches would lead one to believe that a huge dam would be built there within a matter of the next year or two, and that there would be power for the whole of the interior of British Columbia, as well as some arrangement whereby power would go to the state of Washington.

It does seem to me either that those dispatches are very much exaggerated or that the minister is wrong in stating tonight that it will be several years before a report comes in, and then several more years before anything is done about it. We can almost see that dam going up right now in British Columbia; and it is a very important project. It may mean the settling of hundreds of thousands of people in the interior of the province. I would like to have a more definite statement from the minister as to just what is in contemplation. The department must know a great deal more than he has told us.

Mr. Herridge: Before the minister replies may I supplement the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, because I was going to ask a question along the same lines as that asked by the hon. member. I must say that I am confused by the minister's answer when compared with the published statements of various members of the government of British Columbia.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, one of the ministers in that government announced publicly that the Mica dam is to be commenced within eighteen months. The minister of lands and forests last week, in addressing the city council of Trail, announced that he had given the green light to the Kaiser Corporation of the United States to commence building a dam at Castlegar.

Mr. Lesage: Who said that?

Mr. Herridge: The minister of lands and forests in the government of British Columbia. And at the present time a surveyor and engineer of the Kaiser Corporation are now in the area of the Arrow lakes making surveys. According to the Trail Times I received this morning, these surveys are being made in connection with the dam for which, according to the minister of lands and forests in the government of British Columbia, the company has received the green light. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, we find this very confusing.

Mr. Lesage: Of course it is not up to me to explain the declarations and statements of ministers of the present British Columbia government. That would be asking a bit too much of me. The only thing I know is that field investigations are taking place on the Columbia river. It is an international river. A reference has been made by the government of Canada and the government of the United States to the international joint commission. That body has appointed a board of engineers, and some of the engineers of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are on that board of engineers. They are working to prepare a report, and the field investigations will not be terminated before two years have expired. It will then take two years to complete the office work, and the preparation of the final report.

It might very well be that someone might say that Mica dam would have a capacity of so many horsepower. That could be said by someone who might know. But Mica dam is only one of the possible dam sites. What the international joint commission expects is a comprehensive report of all the power possibilities of the Columbia river.

Now, as to the concurrent work that might be done on a permit from the British Columbia government—what the hon. member has said is quite possible. I am not informed in the matter. The only thing about which I am informed is the progress and the work of the board of engineers who are making the investigation for the international joint commission, and for which we are supplying the funds.

Mr. Green: Then we can take it from the minister that, so far as the dominion government is concerned, it does not expect there will be any actual power development on the Columbia river until these investigations have been completed, and the international joint commission has had the opportunity to decide what it will permit. Is that correct?

Mr. Lesage: Not exactly. There might be some interim report from the international joint commission which at a certain time might say, "Here is a dam site where we know power could be developed at the present time without any danger of upsetting the general plan. We know that this would be an individually operated site." That may be one of the conclusions in connection with which General McNaughton might have mentioned the Mica dam; I do not know about that. There might be some individual development of dam sites. However, up to now there is nothing definite, and the general picture is the one I mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. Green: These investigations are being made, as I understand it, by engineers in the minister's own department. Apparently they have not reported anything to him about the Mica dam site, have they?

Mr. Lesage: They have reported some of the possibilities to me.

Mr. Green: Have they reported to the minister any actual plan for the development of power at that or any other site on the Columbia river in Canada?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed now by one of the engineers that a plan is being obtained from an engineering company for the possible development of that dam site.

Mr. Green: Under whose auspices is that plan being obtained? Is it the dominion, the provincial government or a private corporation that is paying for it?

Mr. Lesage: It is paid out of funds that the government provides for the international joint commission investigation.

Mr. Green: The dominion government is getting a report from some outside engineering company. Is that right?

Mr. Lesage: No. The international joint commission is. It is the engineering board that is getting it for the international joint commission.

Mr. Green: What is that?

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. Lesage: The engineering board which has been set up by the international joint commission to make the investigations which have been going on since 1944.

Mr. Green: Does that mean that in all probability this development at Mica creek will be undertaken fairly soon?

Mr. Lesage: I cannot say. There is no reason to assume that at the moment. I do not know. The international joint commission will have to look at the plans. The engineering board will have to look at the plans which will be supplied before making any recommendation to the international joint commission, and then the international joint commission will have to make a recommendation to us.

Mr. Green: Has the international joint commission any jurisdiction over the Columbia river at Mica creek? The river does not flow into the United States for several hundred miles from that point, and I wonder what right the United States would have to a voice in the construction of a dam in Canadian territory at Mica creek.

Mr. Lesage: I shall make it quite clear, I hope. The two governments have asked the international joint commission to make a study of the possible power development on the whole Columbia river.

Mr. Herridge: The United States government and the government of Canada.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, the United States and Canadian governments. The international joint commission has asked the board of engineers to make a field investigation, to prepare a report and to submit it to the international joint commission; but of course that does not take away from the provincial government of British Columbia its jurisdiction over natural resources, and of course water power is a natural resource of British Columbia.

Now, if the government of British Columbia wishes to develop some power on that part of the Columbia river, which would not affect the rights of the United States on their part of the river, there is no reason why that could not go on.

Mr. Green: Just in the same way that the United States constructed great dams on the Columbia river below the United States border, I presume?

Mr. Lesage: Exactly. The study that is being made does not change the jurisdiction at all.

Mr. Green: Is it a fact that the power potential of the Columbia river system is about three times the potential of the whole St. Lawrence system?

Mr. Lesage: Well, it all depends on what you call the Columbia river system and what you call the St. Lawrence river system. If you include tributaries in both instances, well, I do not know which would be the greater. What has the hon. member in mind, the Columbia river alone? And if the Columbia river alone, is it on the Canadian side only, or both on the Canadian and United States sides? As far as the St. Lawrence river is concerned, does it include the international rapids or all of the power which can be developed on the United States side of the St. Lawrence? It is difficult to answer the question because it is not specific.

Mr. Green: I shall put it this way. In the committee on external affairs last year General McNaughton told us that the Columbia river system had over three times the power potential of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Herridge: I have one question. I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the minister's answers, which were as clear as possible. Is it right to assume that no dam or public work of that nature could be built on the Columbia river or any part of its system that affects the levels of waters at the international boundary without a recommendation from the international joint commission?

Mr. Lesage: It is difficult to answer a question when it is not qualified. Works could be constructed downstream or upstream, and they might affect the level of the water by increasing or decreasing it. What has the hon. member in mind?

Mr. Herridge: What I have in mind is this. I presume from the minister's answers to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that it is safe to say no dam or work of any nature could be constructed upstream in Canada above the 49th parallel, on the Columbia river or on any of its tributaries, if that dam or other work affected the level of waters at the international boundary, without a recommendation from the international joint commission.

Mr. Lesage: It might increase the level, of course, if the dam were built. For instance, take the building of a dam just north of the boundary where the Columbia comes back into Canada. The building of a dam there would have the effect of raising the waters on the United States side. The international joint commission would have jurisdiction then over that. Where it would not have jurisdiction would be if the water were held back by a dam so that the level of the water downstream would be lower. Then the international joint commission could not, as I understand it, prevent the building of the dam, but an action for damages might lie for those who were affected by the works.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to follow this up for a moment, because it is an interesting question to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, myself and a good many other members from British Columbia. I understand the minister to say that it would not require a recommendation from the international joint commission to build a dam or other works on the Columbia river, or on any of its tributaries, if the water level at the international boundary was lowered for a certain time of the year. That is quite contrary to my understanding of the boundary waters act. I understood there had to be a recommendation of the international joint commission for any disturbance of the level of the water at the international boundary.

Mr. Lesage: The director of the water resources division died two weeks ago.

Would it be possible to allow this item to stand so that I can study the question? I would not like to mislead the committee. This is a very difficult question of jurisdiction and I am sure hon. members will appreciate the circumstances under which I have to work.

Mr. Hodgson: Before leaving this item I think it would be well that members of the committee and the minister be reminded of the Chicago water steal when they dropped the levels of lakes Huron, Michigan and Georgian bay by 20 feet a number of years ago.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that item 314 be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Water resources division—

315. Fraser river—50 per cent of the cost of investigations to be carried out by the "dominion-provincial board Fraser river basin" (formerly under Department of Public Works), $165,000.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the work under this item has been under way for some years. Can the minister tell the committee what progress has been made? As I understand it, it is an investigation of the whole Fraser river basin.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, this investigation has been going on since 1948-49 and at our request we have been having an investigation made to determine how long the investigation is going to last.

Mr. Macdonnell: You are having to investigate the investigators.

Mr. Lesage: We are trying to obtain a definite idea of how long this is going to take.

Mr. Green: That is quite funny, but really the minister's department should be able to give us a better report than that on the progress made with this investigation.

Mr. Lesage: I can, of course, give an idea of the progress that has been made but I thought I would mention that the investigation is being investigated. These investigations by the board were authorized in January 1949 to determine improvements for water resources of the Fraser valley in the interests of fish, wildlife, water power, flood control, irrigation, reclamation of wet land and other beneficial purposes.

The dominion-provincial Fraser river basin board, made up of the officials of the provincial government of British Columbia and the government of Canada, undertakes the work. Fifty per cent of the cost is provided by public works and the balance by the province. The expenditures during the fiscal year 1949-50, in round figures, were $36,663; 1950-51 $76,768; 1951-52 $80,447; 1952-53 $103,695, and the forecast for 1953-54 is $114,000. The work proposed for 1954-55 by the Department of Public Works of Canada covers aerial photography, bathymetry, and sedimentation, $76,000; this department $13,250; Department of Fisheries, Canada, hydrometric stations $5,000; Department of Agriculture Canada (P.F.R.A.) damsite investigation $60,000; department of lands and forests, that is the British Columbia department, $74,000. The board will study river pollution, domestic water supply, the provision of dikes, land-use basic mapping, and there will be $30,000 for administration. That program has been studied by the board and we are bearing 50 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, the idea of the investigators being investigated has amused me just as it has the minister and I would like to pass on to him for his edification an old rhyme which goes like this:

> Larger fleas have smaller fleas
> Upon their backs to bite 'em;
> And these again have other fleas,
> And so ad infinitum.

Mr. Lesage: In this case there is no fee for investigating the investigation because we ourselves are investigating the investigation.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether the minister is prepared to let us know what if anything is being done on what is commonly known as the north fork of the Fraser or McGregor river in regard to flood control, and also if any thought has been given to co-operation with the provincial government in support of hydroelectric power at the same time as this control set up is considered.

Mr. Lesage: I am informed that any work being carried out on the McGregor river is part of the investigation being made by the board to which I referred a few moments ago.

Item agreed to.

Water resources division—

316. To provide for a contribution to the cost of constructing a dam on the Conestogo river near Glen Allan, Ontario, for the purposes of flood control and water conservation, in accordance with the terms of an agreement entered into between Canada and the province of Ontario, $1,000,000.

Mr. Purdy: I wonder if the minister could give us some particulars in regard to this agreement. There was $1 million last year on this item and I notice there is $1 million again this year. Is this a revote?

Mr. Lesage: Very little was spent last year and this will be a revote.

Mr. Purdy: Can the minister give us some details of the agreement and the proportion of the contributions?

Mr. Lesage: There was an agreement reached by the province of Ontario and this government about the construction of a dam on the Conestogo river near Glen Allan in Ontario. The agreement was made on September 15, 1953, whereby Canada will contribute 37½ per cent of the estimated cost of $5,400,000 for the construction of this dam and the maximum contribution by Canada will not exceed $2,025,000. Under the provisions of this agreement the province is permitted to make arrangements with the local conservation authority, which in this case is the Grand river conservation commission, to underwrite a portion of the cost of construction. The province intends to enter into an agreement with the Grand river conservation commission whereby the commission will assume 25 per cent of the total cost of construction. Owing to delays in the execution of the agreement between Canada and the province of Ontario, and between the province of Ontario and the Grand river conservation commission, progress on this work has been somewhat less than was originally anticipated. As a result very little was spent last year. That is why our share for the fiscal year 1954-55 is expected to be approximately $1,000,000.

Mr. Pallett: I would like to ask the minister if this project is now under way and, if so, when it is estimated it will be completed.

Mr. Lesage: The work is not yet under way because we only received the plans and specifications from the province on March 8 last and we have studied them. We have asked for more information from the government of Ontario and we expect to receive it soon.

Item agreed to.

Engineering and architectural division—
319. To provide for general investigations by the Northwest Territories power commission of the electric power requirements of settlements and industries in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $1,000.

Mr. Trainor: I note on page 391 there is an appropriation amounting to $21,160 for work by the Red river basin investigation commission and it appears that this is not being renewed. May we take it that that means that the work of this commission has been completed? If so, are the recommendations contained in this report to be implemented in the near future? I should also like to know whether this commission has held any public hearings, because I understand that there is some controversy over its findings. I wonder whether any opportunity has been given for the presentation of the opinions of those who did not agree with the findings?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, what item are we on?

The Deputy Chairman: Item 319.

Mr. Trainor: The matter has to do with appropriations that are not required for 1954-55.

Mr. Lesage: I came to this department in September, 1953. If my memory serves me right, it was about at that time that the report was received with regard to the Red river. It was handed to the department and to the province of Manitoba, but it was understood that the matter would be referred to the Minister of Public Works so that he could consider what works, if any, would have to be undertaken. With the transfer to the Department of Public Works of the report on the Red river investigation, this department no longer has any jurisdiction over the report.

Mr. Trainor: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that answer is quite good enough for the citizens of Winnipeg.

Mr. Lesage: I think the hon. member could ask his question of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Trainor: The citizens of Winnipeg want some assurance that the 1950 flood is not going to be repeated. They want some assurance that measures are being taken to prevent a repetition of that flood.

Item agreed to.

Northern administration and lands branch—
320. Branch administration, $124,626.

Mr. Simmons: As I understand it, this item covers the cost of the Ottawa head office administration of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories. It is rather difficult to figure out how much of this cost is for the Yukon and how much is for the Northwest Territories. However, there is one point I should like to bring out and that is that this item not only covers the cost of head office administration on federal matters for the two northern territories but also includes the cost of head office administration of the territorial government of the Northwest Territories and it does not include the cost of the territorial head office administration of the Yukon Territory. It seems to me that the reason for this is that the government of the Northwest Territories, on the territorial level, is carried out mostly by federal employees who are paid by the federal government and there is practically no territorial civil service, whereas the government of Yukon Territory, on the territorial level, is carried out by Yukon territorial civil service who are paid by the Yukon territorial government. For instance, this item we are now discussing covers the cost of a considerable staff in Ottawa who perform the clerical and accounting work for the Northwest Territories territorial government. Similar work for the Yukon Territory is done at Whitehorse and in the Yukon Territory by employees on the staff of the Yukon territorial civil service who are paid by the Yukon territorial government from money taken out of the pockets of the residents of the Yukon Territory.

In addition, the federal government pays the school teachers' salaries and the cost of running the schools in the Northwest Territories, except in Yellowknife, whereas in the Yukon the school teachers' salaries and the cost of running the schools are paid by the taxpayers of the Yukon Territory. We have the same thing, I understand, for game protection. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to complain of these things but I would ask the minister and the hon. members of this committee to bear them in mind when considering the provision of funds for the development of the Yukon Territory.

Canada's north holds the key to this nation's future strength and greatness. Its possibilities are just beginning to be widely understood. There are in all of Canada no more virile people than are to be found there, nor is there a potentially more valuable area.

There are government actions that stimulate and encourage incentive on the part of the individual Canadian. These are measures that show a practical understanding and recognition of the vital importance to the future of this country of combining the spirit of private enterprise with the wealth of natural resources yet to be developed. If this process is helped along and given freedom to operate properly, Canada can and will attain a level of prosperity never before experienced anywhere in the world.

In the general area of northern British Columbia and the Yukon there is a veritable inland empire "on the make". The foundations of a great northern industrial community are there. Preliminary investigations and surveys have disclosed a wealth and variety of natural resources previously undreamed of. These include many kinds of metals, besides huge reserves of coal, iron ore, asbestos, and other resources, plus an immense potential of hydroelectric power. It takes little imagination to envision the industries of the future, such as smelters and manufacturing establishments, supporting many thousands of people in that part of Canada's northland.

One cannot overlook or fail to mention the vast and stirring project that promises to usher in a new era of development and settlement in that northern part of Canada. Certainly I for one am confident that the production potential of that Yukon-northern British Columbia area, with its wealth of minerals and other resources linked to huge waterpower developments, will prove to be an enormously influential factor in future national budgeting.

I have in mind, of course, the proposal of the Ventures-Frobisher interests to develop in Canada, for the use of Canada in Canada, between 4½ million and 5 million horsepower of hydroelectric energy, generated from the upper waters of the Yukon river watershed and waters in northern British Columbia. I was extremely glad to hear my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra this evening ask questions of the minister with regard to this matter. The plans of these Canadian concerns include the largest waterpower development ever yet visualized in Canada or in the Americas. Not only will all Yukon river water be available in the Whitehorse area but waters from other watersheds east and west of the main Yukon river can, by planned diversions, be utilized under high heads as well.

The Ventures-Frobisher interests have been carrying on field surveys and investigations for well over a year, and these are continuing. Over a quarter of a million dollars have already been expended to date on these preliminary steps. Ample information will thus be available to the provincial and federal governments concerned when the moment arrives for the issue of necessary preliminary licences to proceed with development.

[Mr. Simmons.]

The advantages and stimulation that will be provided to local mines by the establishment of smelters and metallurgical plants in the north are quite obvious. The plants will be built to accommodate everyone. In addition to local ores, raw ores will be brought in from various parts of the world for processing in Canadian metallurgical plants, which is a wonderful conception from the Canadian standpoint.

I understand that the Ventures-Frobisher interests through their subsidiary company, Quebec Metallurgical Industries Limited, have already begun their 1954 survey program and that this program includes detailed surveys for design of initial power plants, so that by fall it will be possible to begin actual preliminary construction work. However, some form of preliminary licence is required before any actual construction could be permitted.

The construction of power plants, producing between 4½ million and 5 million horsepower, with industrial plants to use this power in the Taku river area of British Columbia, will without doubt have a tremendously favourable impact on Canada's export trade. Even with a conservative estimate of a million tons of ore annually being treated in the plants, the volume of business that results will be tremendous and will mean purchases of Canadian mineral products running into the hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

The extent of the contribution which the northland can make to the growth and strength of all Canada staggers the imagination. But that development must rest on the firm base of individual freedom and private enterprise plus government encouragement and alertness to the special needs of the north. The northland's future will come to full flowering through the triumph of the human spirit, struggling with and winning over the tough challenges of nature, unhampered and undismayed by any restrictive practices.

Mr. Macdonnell: With respect to the organization of the department, I see that we have item 320, branch administration, and then I turn over the page and find item 323, operation and maintenance, item 325, also operation and maintenance, and item 327, another item for operation and maintenance. Does that indicate that there are four different branches? Will the minister indicate the organization?

Mr. Lesage: This is the northern administration and lands branch. There is the northern division and the lands division. Item 323 is operation and maintenance for the Northwest Territories. Item 325 is operation and maintenance of forest conservation and wildlife management in the north. Item 327 is operation and maintenance in the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Macdonnell: These are all separate organizations, separate branches?

Mr. Lesage: Separate functions, not separate organizations.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Harris: Would you rise and report progress, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

PASSAGE OF BILL BY HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AUTHORIZING UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions, I should like to make a short statement about the St. Lawrence seaway project.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: According to press reports, which have been confirmed to us by the embassy in Washington the Wiley bill which would provide for the establishment of a United States authority to participate in the St. Lawrence seaway project, was passed today by the United States House of Representatives and our own newspapermen in the press gallery have been anxious to have some statement about it from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) or from me and have been told that any statement should first be made here in the house.

It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the legislative processes in the United States are such that several steps yet remain to be taken before this bill becomes law.

As hon. members well know, the governments of Canada and the United States have for several decades now made every effort to get the St. Lawrence seaway and power project under way. In the past, several agreements have been negotiated by representatives of both countries, but for one reason or another difficulties have cropped up which prevented these agreements from being brought to fruition.

In view of these perennial difficulties and of the very urgent need for additional hydroelectric power in the province of Ontario, the Canadian government, in 1951, undertook to construct, maintain and operate an uninterrupted deep waterway between lake Erie and the port of Montreal provided arrangements were made for the concurrent development of the power project in the international section of the St. Lawrence river by fully qualified and authorized agencies of Canada and the United States. It was after this undertaking was made by the Canadian government that the governments of Canada and the United States submitted joint applications to the international joint commission for the development of the international rapids power project. This application was considered and approved by the international joint commission, and the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission and the New York state power authority have been designated by the Canadian and United States governments respectively to do this work.

The undertaking of the Canadian government, in 1951, to construct the whole seaway was given parliamentary sanction when the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act was passed. The government's position has not changed since then and we are still prepared to undertake alone the construction of the seaway. However, as I stated in my memorandum of January 9, 1953, to the ambassador of the United States in Canada, the government was and it still is willing to discuss any specific proposal the United States government might wish to put forward once an entity is designated and authorized to proceed with construction of the United States share of the power works and provided that such discussions do not delay either the power or the seaway project.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that every hon. member in this house will welcome the decision of the United States House of Representatives today, not only as an indication of the possibility of an early decision in regard to this long-standing question but also as evidence of an understanding of the importance of this as a mutual undertaking between two nations whose friendship today is an example to the whole world. It does seem to me there has been some misunderstanding both in Canada and in the United States, in regard to what is proposed in connection with the navigation canals on the St. Lawrence.

On a number of occasions discussion of this subject has arisen and has created the impression that an entirely new venture is contemplated in the arrangement for a 27-foot depth of the canals on the St. Lawrence. As we consider this subject and express our hope of success, may I point out there is nothing new whatever in this scheme. On the contrary, this is a very old question. The St. Lawrence canals are old canals. They have been there for 100 years. They are part of a canal system connecting the ocean with the head of the lakes. In the past there have been canals in the St. Lawrence, across the Niagara peninsula and at Sault Ste. Marie. With the constant dredging of the St. Lawrence river, in the past we have been able to maintain an even depth for all navigation right to the head of the lakes.

In more recent years there has been great construction at different times in what is known as the Welland canal; there has been a deepening of the canals at the Soo, and there has been a deepening of the river depth in the St. Clair river; but we are long years behind in bringing the St. Lawrence up to the standard of the whole system that was established 100 years ago. If this project goes ahead, as I hope it now will, we will simply be bringing to a uniform pattern a navigation system stretching from the Atlantic ocean to the head of the lakes, which, at all times, should be regarded as an integrated navigation scheme. Perhaps it would remove some of the resistance that has from time to time been raised against this undertaking if that thought were borne in mind.

So far as this navigation project is concerned, the importance of it is that it has become associated so closely with the power development. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has indicated that the government of Canada has expressed its support of the program for the development of the power. The development of these power sites on the St. Lawrence is now long overdue. I would point out that it is not only the government of Canada that has been dealing with this subject. In 1946 the government of Ontario entered into negotiations with the government of the state of New York, both governments recognizing it was possible for them to construct joint power plants along the St. Lawrence.

The problem that arose, however, was the necessity for obtaining permission to use water that was part of an international system of navigation. It is only for that reason there has been any delay in the construction of power sites on the St. Lawrence. As hon. members know, I am able to speak on this subject with a personal knowledge of what took place. The government of Ontario and the government of the state of New York were ready to proceed with the construction of these tremendously important power plants on the St. Lawrence in 1946. The use of the water for navigation has constantly presented a problem. It is important we bear that in mind. I think, therefore, it is important that the government of Canada not only welcome what is now taking place, but indicate and express the hope, which in fact has been expressed by the Prime Minister tonight, that these proceedings will move forward rapidly to a conclusion.

I believe there is another reason why we should hope the power development, which is so important to Ontario, as it is to New York, Canada and the United States as well, should proceed as rapidly as possible and also that this development take place as a joint development. These two nations stand today as a unique example of the way nations, with an intense pride in their own authority and their own strength, can co-operate for their common good. Surely, at this particular time, with all the uncertainty and all the antagonism that is being developed in other parts of the world, it would be a very happy augury for the future if these two nations were to develop joint power production on the river which, shall we say, does not divide them but keeps them together. May it be shown also that we have found the way in which, to our mutual advantage, we can use that waterway for the carriage of important trade to the inland waters of this continent. I believe that, for us and for the world, that would be a bright and shining example of the kind of international co-operation out of which will grow real hope and peace.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether I might ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a question? Before I do so, I would like to say that throughout this house generally members will welcome the statement the Prime Minister has made tonight. We also welcome the fact that he has made it here in the house at the earliest opportunity. I feel, too, that members generally will support the position taken by the government that, if necessary, Canada is still prepared to go it alone, but that Canada is equally prepared to enter with the United States into a joint development of the seaway project.

My question is this. Is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether the possibility of a joint project, as a result of the passing of the bill in Washington, is likely to alter the time schedule? Will it make any change in the time that the undertaking of the seaway project can begin?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not always easy to try to peer into the future. I see no reason to believe it would in any way lengthen or delay the time when an effective start could be made. On the contrary, it seems to me that this expression from the House of Representatives in the United States, that there is a substantial majority that approves the carrying out of the project, will be a help in the removal of any further obstacles that the opponents of the project might try to put in the way.

Mr. Knowles: Does the Prime Minister feel that on a joint basis it might get started even sooner than if Canada were to go it alone?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I did not say that. What I meant to say was that there were still some things that have to be done in the United States. As the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, it is necessary, in order to have this kind of seaway, that there be a dam extending from one shore to the other and that that dam be built by the authorities that have been authorized by the respective governments. With respect to one of these authorities, that of the United States, though it has obtained a licence from the federal power commission, it is a licence that has not yet got beyond the period when it can be questioned in the courts. I understand that a writ of certiorari respecting it can still be applied for up to May 19, and that if it is applied for it may take some little time to dispose of. It is hoped it could be disposed of before the supreme court adjourns for the summer vacation.

Now, as soon as the United States authority is in the position to go ahead—and, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) knows, it has been its desire to go ahead since 1946—we know here that the Ontario power commission is disposed to go ahead. And we know that as soon as the dam can be started, if no arrangement is arrived at that would not delay the construction of the seaway, this government would be in a position to go ahead itself on the Canadian side and provide the canal required. That is the situation.

I think that this vote, following the majority vote that had already been registered in the Senate on another bill that is somewhat different but is generally along the same lines, does indicate that there now is a majority of the representatives of the American people who want this thing dealt with at this time, and who want it dealt with as a joint undertaking.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a moment to join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in expressing gratification in respect of the bill passed under which the United States has indicated that it will join with Canada in the building of the St. Lawrence waterway.

When I say that, I realize there may be some parts of Canada which will not feel that they would receive the same benefits from the building of this great project as will be received by Ontario. Even so, I am convinced that the sooner this project can be built, the sooner will Canada realize the fulfilment of a very great undertaking. I think it is in the interests of our great country that this project be proceeded with and completed as soon as possible.

But let me say while I am on my feet that I hope the program will be completed with the greatest possible expedition, and furthermore that in the process of building the seaway we buy just as much of the equipment as we possibly can from Great Britain, because I understand that they are prepared to fabricate the great head gates, and all that sort of thing. I believe it would be to our advantage to see that Great Britain is given every possible order that we can give them for supplies.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we will go on with fisheries, rather than northern affairs, to be followed by agriculture.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National parks branch—
National parks and historic sites services—

304. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,397,820.

305. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $3,640,735.

306. Grant to the Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

307. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $10,000.

308. National battlefield commission—to provide for special works at national battlefields park, Quebec, $6,000.

Canadian wildlife service—

309. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $437,271.

310. National museum of Canada, $305,681.

Engineering and water resources branch—

311. Branch administration, $63,156.

Water resources division—

Water resources division (including federal share of expenses of the Lake of the Woods control board)—

312. Administration, operation and maintenance, including grant of $350 to the international executive council, world power conference, $669,597.

313. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $91,500.

315. Fraser river—50 per cent of the cost of investigations to be carried out by the "dominion-provincial board Fraser river basin" (formerly under Department of Public Works), $165,000.

316. To provide for a contribution to the cost of constructing a dam on the Conestogo river near Glen Allan, Ontario, for the purposes of flood control and water conservation, in accordance with the terms of an agreement entered into between Canada and the province of Ontario, $1,000,000.

Engineering and architectural division—

317. Administration, operation and maintenance, $438,868.

318. To provide, subject to allocation by treasury board, for the design and planning of deferrable projects, the acquisition of sites and the initiation of construction, $100,000.

319. To provide for general investigations by the Northwest Territories power commission of the electric power requirements of settlements and industries in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $1,000.

Northern administration and lands branch—

320. Branch administration, $124,626.

END OF VOLUME IV
