HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 24, 1949

The house met at 4.30 p.m.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO BE PRINTED IN HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Prime Minister of India, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in the chamber of the House of Commons on October 24, 1949, be included in the House of Commons debates and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does this motion mean that the address of the Prime Minister of Canada and your own address in reply, Mr. Speaker, will be included?

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand that is the usual practice. The whole of the ceremony will form a part of the record of today's proceedings.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTION OF USE OF PUBLIC ADDRESS SYSTEM—OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO MEET DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion to you, and through you to the house. It is one that has been made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) on many occasions. We have had the great privilege of having as our guest today the distinguished Prime Minister of India. I happen to be fortunate in the location of my seat in the house, but very few of the members, and no one in the galleries, could hear him. I think in this day and age of scientific development there is no reason why we should not have a public address system. I insist, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that other arrangements be made.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): May I say that I tried to listen to the remarks of the Prime Minister of India. I am sure everyone in this section of the house wanted to hear what he said, but none of us could do so. May I say further that I am sure every hon. member of the house would like to have the privilege of meeting the Prime Minister of India. Magistrate W. H. Ellis, of Medicine Hat, is in India at the present time, and I have had letters from him in which he has made reference to Prime Minister Nehru and has said many good things about him. I should have liked to have the privilege of meeting Prime Minister Nehru. I have not had that opportunity, and I could not hear everything he said. I think that something should be done to enable every hon. member of the house to hear what is said in this chamber.

Mr. Speaker: I will look into the question that has been raised. It is unfortunate that there was not an amplifying system in the house today. I can assure hon. members that the matter is receiving consideration. The former Speaker went into it at considerable length. He spent a good deal of time on the matter, and I am sure he will be pleased to act on any committee that may be appointed to go into it further, or co-operate in any other way.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat has stated that he would like very much to have met Pandit Nehru. May I tell hon. members that it has been my custom, since you have done me the honour of electing me Speaker of the house, to invite a number of hon. members of the house and members of the press gallery to my chambers when a distinguished visitor comes to Ottawa and calls upon me. There have been four or five distinguished visitors this session, and on each occasion I have invited thirty or forty hon. members. The house will realize that the Speaker's chambers are not large enough to accommodate all hon. members at one time; but I hope to continue the custom of inviting thirty or forty on each occasion when a distinguished visitor calls upon me here. May I add that if at any time any hon. member would like especially to meet a distinguished visitor who is in Ottawa, I shall be pleased to make that arrangement for him.

I thought I should make that statement to the house, so hon. members may know the system I have adopted.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and French of further correspondence with the premiers of Saskatchewan and Quebec with respect to amendments to the British North America Act.

Mr. Drew: Will it be placed on Hansard?

Mr. St. Laurent: The former correspondence was printed as an appendix to Hansard. I think it would be the desire of most hon. members that these letters also be printed as an appendix. If Your Honour will give instructions to that effect, I think it will meet the wishes of all members of the house.

Mr. Speaker: If that is the pleasure of the house, I shall be glad to do so.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—UNITED STATES—AMOUNTS CONTRACTED FOR, 1948-1949

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What amounts of American exchange were contracted for, each week, through the Canadian banks, acting on behalf of the foreign exchange control board, covering the period from August 1, 1948 to October 1, 1948, and August 1, 1949 to October 1, 1949, by all importers?

2. What were the total contracts outstanding for the sale of United States dollars for forward delivery on (a) September 19, 1948, or nearest date of record; (b) September 19, 1949, as indicated on final reports as of that date?

3 What were the total contracts outstanding for the sale of United States dollars for forward delivery covering the importation of coal on (a) September 27, 1948; (b) October 11, 1949, or date of record nearest but subsequent to September 19, 1949?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. New bookings by foreign exchange control board of United States dollar sales for forward delivery:

	1948
August:
2—7	$ 8,703,226
9—14	11,594,293

(b) As of September 19, 1949, including contracts booked after that date at rates of exchange in force prior thereto in accordance with section 7 (1) of P.C. 4838 of September 19, 1949—$174,235,607.

3. (a) $9,719,833; (b) $14,955,451.

WHEAT—SELLING PRICE IN ENGLAND

Mr. LaCroix:

1. Are Canadian wheat and Canadian wheat by-products selling in England at a lower price than in Canada?

2. If so, for what reasons?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Canadian wheat: No. Canadian wheat flour: Yes.

2. The British ministry of food purchases Canadian wheat and flour on the basis of the Canada-United Kingdom contract price of $2 per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur, Vancouver or Churchill, plus carrying charges.

Wheat and flour are sold in Canada on the same basis. Because of a British consumer subsidy on bread and flour (for use other than bread) Canadian wheat flour including subsidy is resold at a lower price in England than in Canada.

NAVAL SERVICE—ANTI-SUBMARINE ESCORT SHIPS

Mr. Isnor:

1. Have plans been prepared during the past twelve months for new naval anti-submarine escort ships?

2. If so, who prepared such plans and specifications?

3. Has work been started on these ships?

4. If so (a) what number of ships are to be constructed; (b) what are names and addresses of shipyards where the work will be carried on?

5. Of what type and size will these vessels be?

6. What will be estimated (a) cost; (b) time to complete work; (c) number of men employed?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. Designs prepared by Department of National Defence, and working plans are now under preparation by the contractors in consultation with officers of the department.

3, 4, and 5. Contracts have been placed for three anti-submarine escort vessels (classed as major war vessels, and replacing the frigates and corvettes of world war II), construction of which is expected to commence late this year or early in 1950 at the following shipyards: Halifax Shipyards Limited, Halifax; Canadian Vickers Limited, Montreal; Burrard Drydock Company Limited, North Vancouver.

6. Estimated: (a) Construction cost $8,000,000 per ship. (b) Under normal conditions, three to four years. (c) If as in (b), 1,500 to 1,800 at shipyards.

QUEBEC CITY—ST. JOACHIM RAILWAY LINE

Mr. Maltais:

1. Who owns the railway line between Quebec city and St. Joachim?

2. Is part of this line used by any other corporation or individual?

3. If so, what is the agreement or arrangement between the owner of the line and the company or individual operating trains thereon?

4. Is the Canadian National Railways negotiating for the acquisition of the said line, or considering taking over the line and either operating same or giving running rights over it to some other operator?

Mr. Chevrier:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The Quebec Railway Light and Power Company.

2. Yes.

3. The Quebec Railway Light and Power Company performs train operations over its line. Such operations include the handling of Canadian National through equipment between Quebec and La Malbaie on an interline basis.

4. No.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL A. G. WYGARD

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Is Lieut.-Colonel A. G. Wygard, supplementary reserve, one of the group of officers representing Canada on the united nations mission for India and Pakistan?
2. If so, is he a Canadian citizen, either by birth or naturalization?
3. If by naturalization, when did he apply for and receive Canadian citizenship?
4. What service did Lieut.-Colonel Wygard have in the Canadian army?
5. When was he placed on the supplementary reserve?
6. How long has Lieut.-Colonel Wygard resided in Canada?
7. Did he, at any time during world war I, serve in the armed forces of any country at war with Canada? If so, in the forces of what country, and what rank did he hold?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, by naturalization.

3. Applied 29th July, 1943. Received naturalization certificate 28th February, 1944.

4. Appointed lieutenant August 1942, and employed with directorate of military intelligence. Wygard continued in intelligence work for the balance of the war, serving in Ottawa; Washington, U.S.A., and London, England. He was promoted to captain in May, 1943; to major in May, 1944, and to lieutenant colonel in August, 1945.

5. 4th March, 1947.

6. Since 12th July, 1940.

7. This department has no record of this officer having served in the armed forces of any country at war with Canada during world war I.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY—APPLICATIONS FOR RATE INCREASE

Mr. Fulton:

1. Does the dominion government telephone service base its rates for service in whole or in part on telephone rates charged by commercial telephone companies?
2. If not, on what basis are its rates assessed?
3. Is the dominion government opposing or otherwise the applications of the British Columbia Telephone Company, a Bell Telephone subsidiary, and the Bell Telephone Company for increases in telephone rates?
4. Is the dominion government or the Department of Transport to be represented in any way before the board of transport commissioners on the hearing of the above mentioned applications? If so, how is it to be represented?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. In part, yes. The monthly rental is lower than a commercial company would charge. The long distance toll rate must necessarily be equal.

2. The monthly rental rate is assessed according to conditions prevailing in the area.

3 and 4. No. Under section 52 of the Railway Act, any aggrieved party may appeal to the governor in council. It would be inappropriate for the government to be represented by counsel at the hearing of a case upon which it might later be called to sit in judgment.

It might be added that information in the department indicates that the British Columbia Telephone Company is not a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY

Mr. McLure:

1. In what Ottawa building are the offices of the custodian of enemy property located?
2. What is the annual rental paid for office space by this branch of government?
3. How many persons are presently employed in the office of the custodian of enemy property and what is the total annual salaries paid these persons?
4. What is the estimated value of the property over which this branch of government still has supervision (a) property taken over in world war I; (b) property taken over in world war II?

Mr. Bradley:

1. Victoria Building, Wellington and O'Connor streets.

2. $37,386 (including $7,107 for Vancouver branch).

3. (a) 141 employees (including 17 in Vancouver and 4 in London, England); (b) $429,330.76 (total salaries for the three branches).

4. (a) World war I, $1,908,563.46; (b) world war II, $99,136,201.63.

HOUSING—RECONSTRUCTION PROJECTS—ALLOCATION FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1950

Mr. Green:

What allocation, if any, has the treasury board made for reconstruction projects under vote 890 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950?

Mr. Winters: Nil.

*BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY—APPLICATIONS FOR RATE INCREASE

Mr. Church:

1. Will the dominion government be represented by council before the board of transport commissioners hearing the application for increased tolls by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada?
2. If so, who has been appointed to do so?

Mr. Chevrier: This information has been given in an answer tabled today in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

Mr. Church:

1. Does the statute of 1948 increasing the capital stock of the Bell Telephone Company from one hundred and fifty million dollars to half a billion dollars, contain any provisions regarding increased tolls and rates?

2. If so, what were the provisions of the statute in this connection?

Mr. Chevrier: The information requested in this question may be secured by obtaining a copy of the statute from the library or any other source. I believe it is clearly stated, and is an established rule of this house, that a question seeking information contained in documents readily accessible to the questioner, such as statutes, published reports and the like, is not one that should be answered in this way. Therefore I ask that the question be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—REPRESENTATION OF WESTERN CANADA ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received representations from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce asking that western Canada be given representation on the board of directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines?

2. If so, has consideration been given to such representations?

3. What is the result of such consideration?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. Three members of the board of directors of T.C.A. are appointed by the government and four by the C.N.R. There are no vacancies on the board at present, but in the event that any may occur the C.N.R. has been asked to consider the suggestion that western Canada be represented on the board.

3. See answer to No. 2.

NEWFOUNDLAND—PUBLIC SERVICE PENSIONS

Mr. Higgins:

Have there been consultations between the federal government and the government of the province of Newfoundland with respect to the detailed application of term 39 of the terms of union, relating to public service pensions?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

NEWFOUNDLAND—CLARENVILLE BOATS

Mr. Higgins:

What is the position with respect to the taking over and operation by the government of the Clarenville boats, the property of the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: No developments have taken place with regard to the operation of the Clarenville boats since the date of union of Newfoundland with Canada. The Clarenville boats are still the property of the province of Newfoundland.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

KILLARNEY, MAN., POST OFFICE

Mr. Ross (Souris):

1. Did the federal government purchase property in Killarney, Manitoba, for a post office? If so, in what year?

2. What was the purchase price?

3. Did the federal government, or agency thereof, pay rent for said property following the purchase?

4. If so, to whom?

5. What amount, and for what period of time?

HOUSING—TRENTON, ONT.—AIR FORCE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Who owns the land on which the air force housing development at Trenton is being built, and how much land is in the entire development?

2. Under whose auspices was the development initiated, and who is responsible for the whole development at present?

3. How many homes have been built, and how many homes will the entire development contain?

4. What contractor or contractors obtained the contract for the first project called Middleton Park?

5. What was the contract price per unit, and what was the total contract price?

6. What contractor or contractors obtained the second contract, and for how many homes?

7. What is the contract price per unit on this second contract?

8. What architects prepared the plans for project No. 1 (Middleton Park)?

9. What architects prepared the plans for project No. 2?

10. What was the total cost of installing services for project No. 1, and what does this cost include?

11. Who financed the Middleton Park project, and what was the total cost of the project, including land, services and homes?

12. What is the rate of interest being charged on the money used to build this project?

13. Who is financing the balance of the development, and at what rate of interest?

14. What is the rental scale for all classes of air force personnel at Middleton Park?

15. Are rents charged, economic rents?

16. Are they subsidized in any way? If so, to what extent and by whom?

NEWFOUNDLAND—PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. Higgins:

1. What public buildings of the province of Newfoundland have been taken over by the federal government and where are they situate?

2. What is the value of each such public building taken over?

3. What buildings in Newfoundland are being rented from the province of Newfoundland by the federal government, where are these buildings situate and what is the rent being paid for each such building?

4. What buildings in the province of Newfoundland other than public buildings have been rented by the federal government?

5. Who are the owners of such buildings, what is the rent being paid for same and by what department or individual are such buildings occupied?

6. Has the federal government purchased any buildings in Newfoundland?

7. If so, what was the purchase price of each, where are they located and by what department or individual is each such building occupied?

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR JOINT OPERATION OF HOUSING PROJECTS AND LOANS TO HOME OWNERS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That, it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and in particular to provide that the assembly of land for residential purposes and the construction of housing projects for sale and for rent under arrangements by which the capital costs and the costs of operation of such projects will be shared seventy-five per cent by the federal government and twenty-five per cent by the provincial governments be undertaken jointly with the said governments; and further to authorize the making of loans to prospective home owners in addition to basic joint loans under the act, in amounts not exceeding one-sixth of such basic loans; to authorize an increase in the loans that may be guaranteed for home improvement and home extension purposes under the act, and to increase the aggregate amount presently authorized for loans and losses under part I of the act, the funds for the said purposes to be provided out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND—DONATION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Is it the intention of the government to make a donation this year to the United Nations international children's emergency fund?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Yes. Item 779 in the further supplementary estimates which I tabled on September 28, 1949, provides an amount of $1,075,000 for the international children's emergency fund.

INSECT PESTS

ANSWER TO QUESTION RESPECTING TERMITES IN TORONTO AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): On Friday last the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture. In the absence of both the minister and myself the Prime Minister said the matter would be brought to the attention of the department, and I have an answer now which I should like to give to the house.

The termite problem in Canada is confined to an area in Toronto east of Yonge street and south of Danforth. These insects are found only within an area of three and one-half miles by one and one-half miles, definitely affecting a total area of approximately 250 acres. They occur in eight separate locations of varying sizes, most of them considerably distant from each other. Termites were first encountered in Toronto in 1940. Since then they have been under observation by officers of the Department of Agriculture. A thorough and systematic survey in 1948 and 1949, using 600 natural baits at various points throughout the city, gave no suggestion of spread of consequence in Toronto itself; and 1,500 similar baits at various points throughout the southern counties of Ontario failed to show a single occurrence. The results of the study and survey substantially confirm the opinion of the leading termite specialist of the United States Department of Agriculture who studied the situation, that the insect had been present in Toronto for many years and may have been native to the locality upon which the infested part of the city has been built.

During the period in which termites have been known to occur in Toronto, officials of the Department of Agriculture have kept the city of Toronto fully informed, through the commissioner of buildings and by conferences with the mayor from time to time, and have kept the authorities of the province of Ontario informed in detail through the provincial entomologist. In co-operation with the latter, bulletins of advice with respect to the control of this insect have been made available to all concerned in the quantities required.

The results arising from studies of termites in the United States over many years were reviewed by officers of the Department of Agriculture, and, in light of Toronto conditions, certain changes in the building code of the city were recommended to the suitable authorities with a view to avoiding infestation in further construction.

The point of view of the Department of Agriculture has been that control of these insects, and permanent measures to be taken in protection of buildings in Toronto, are the responsibility of those whose properties are affected, and that the department holds itself responsible only for investigation of the problem, tendering of advice, and direction as to what should be done to ameliorate the condition. The department has suggested that in each of the infested areas meetings might be held at which small-scale demonstrations of protective measures be undertaken, and is quite prepared to co-operate by providing the advisory services necessary. This is the usual method of approach to such a problem in the control of insects in agriculture which are from their nature manifestly a matter of local concern.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I should like to remind the intelligentsia of this house that these termites have a habit of crawling, and that they are always looking for new fields of activity. I should also like to remind the parliamentary assistant that the time for having meetings expired before the by-election; therefore he is too late.

Mr. Wylie: As a western member, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture this question? In view of the statement he just made, can he tell the house how many termites are going to vote in the by-election today being held in Toronto?

Mr. Cruickshank: That will depend on the social credit vote.

Mr. Graydon: You are a little bit slow, but you are good.

COMBINES

BAKERY FIRMS IN WESTERN PROVINCES—QUESTION AS TO PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Is the Minister of Justice in a position to give a measure of enlightenment, equal to that given just now on another matter by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, in answer to my question as to the prosecution of bread companies in western Canada?

Mr. Graydon: Termites have gotten into that too, I suppose.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I am informed that charges have not yet been laid. Counsel recently reported to the department that the lengthy task of preparing the case for trial is now nearing completion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister utilizing the services of the attorneys general of Saskatchewan and Alberta in the preparation of the case?

Mr. Garson: No. The usual privilege of prosecution was extended to the two provinces, as in all cases of the kind, and neither province wished to exercise that privilege. The case is being handled by counsel in Alberta, instructed by the Department of Justice.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, October 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. Irvin W. Studer (Maple Creek): Those of us from far-away places, Mr. Speaker, would like to suggest a few things this afternoon in connection with the budget, the amendment thereto and the amendment to the amendment. The reason we should like to do so is that we come from an area in Saskatchewan which at most times is in such a position that the budget is of extreme interest to it, as it is to other parts of Canada. We who come from the wheat-growing area of Canada, inasmuch as wheat is one of the products that create considerable wealth in Canada, think that interesting items like the budget enter into our situation. We think that the amendment also affects us, as does the subamendment. For this reason, for a little while this afternoon, we should like to continue the debate which was started last spring.

We have been told that this budget has changed little from what it was last spring. I think all of us will realize, however, that if the budget has not been changed, the amendment is different from the one that was proposed last spring, as is the subamendment. Regardless of all the lost markets we have heard about, a continuation of what I believe was stated to a considerable extent last spring, and the effect the different policies of the government have had on us since that time, we would suggest that possibly the situation is not quite so different as has been suggested to what it was at the particular time last spring when the budget was offered for our consideration.

This amendment as well as the subamendment are of great interest to us because it appears to me that the adoption of certain amendments or subamendments can change the entire economy of the country. One of the things done by this government of Canada, which is now and has been for some years in power, is this. It has created a balance in all its operations—in its laws, and in everything that affects the balance of the economy of this country. The government did not concentrate its efforts along one particular line, to the detriment of some other particular line. For instance, it had regard to agriculture, industry, and every line in the general economy of Canada that one might care to mention. This particular balance is the secret of good government. In my estimation it is the reason why opposition members are here in smaller numbers than they were last year. It keeps them in a position where one could say they are "fanning the air," because they have most certainly changed their amendment and subamendment from what it was last spring. Here is the amendment that the opposition offered last spring. For the benefit of those of us who are newly arrived here, the amendment offered by the opposition, to be found at page 2188 of Hansard of March 31, 1949, reads as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that the government does not possess the confidence of the country.

A subamendment was moved by one of these splinter parties which reads as follows, as reported on page 2192 of Hansard:

> regrets (a) the failure of the government to remove the sales tax; (b) the action of the government in removing the subsidy on flour milled for domestic purposes, thus adding to the cost of living, and (c) the failure of the government, despite rising national income, to make any provision to improve the living standards of the millions of Canadian people compelled to live on income below the income tax exemption levels.

The amendment of this year is considerably different. It will be found on page 1023 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to prevent the present decline in our trade with the sterling area and is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of inviting the nations of the commonwealth to a conference in the immediate future for the purpose of working out arrangements to preserve and enlarge those traditional markets on which jobs and opportunities for Canadians very largely depend.

One of the splinter groups again moved a subamendment, which is to be found at page 1027, and reads as follows:

> Give immediate consideration to a reduction of tariffs sufficient to encourage an increase in imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries.

These opposition groups have changed their position. Last spring one of them said that the country did not have any confidence in the government. They have changed their position to one that is a shadow of what it might have been had we not had as good a government as we have had during these past years. Much of what is contained in the amendment and in the subamendment has been in existence in the operations of the government. I do not think that any government in power in Canada could make any particular move in regard to the operation and ramification of business in the world today without having a conference with members of other governments in other parts of the world. I do not believe that this government would ever leave anything undone in regard to free trade that would be to the benefit of this country. If it is possible to import something that this country needs, and if it will not injure someone in this country, I am sure that it will be done. As I see it, it should be kept in mind that if we are to import into Canada goods that are produced by people in other countries who have not the same standards of living that we have it will most certainly lead to unemployment in this country. If our workers receive $1.25 or $1.50 an hour and the workmen in some other country are receiving much less to produce a particular article, to import that article would certainly mean that we would be lowering our standard of living and creating unemployment in this country. Therefore, again I come back to the balance that this government has always had in view in the entire economy of this country.

We do not wish to reduce the standard of living of any of our labouring people. We wish to raise it. We wish also to raise the standard of living of people in other countries so that when we trade with one another we do not do it to the detriment of our people. That is the Maple Creek view of what this situation can lead to in this country of ours. The balance which the government has used in its operations is proved by the overwhelming majority which is evident in this parliament at this session. I hope that the government will continue its operations in the same manner. Some reference was made the other night to the happy expression on the face of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I would suggest that that happy expression was due to the fact that he did not take the advice of the opposition in the past years.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that in the budget debate, as on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, hon. members can talk about all situations and bring them before the parliament of Canada. During this session we have heard many speakers talking about their constituencies and about what is produced in various areas. Some hon. members have referred to iron ore, lumber, oil, coal and uranium. Some other hon. members spoke of apples, peaches, grapes, wheat and other grains, livestock and beef, and all the good things of this world. Every constituency has its differences. They are all affected by duties and tariffs. We are affected by them in Saskatchewan. We are interested in tariffs and duties. I am interested particularly because there is a hundred and eighty miles of border between my constituency and the state of Montana. In that area, we know, there are many things that can be obtained on the other side of the line at a lower price than on the Canadian side. On the other hand, there are many things in Canada that the people of the United States would like, which cost less in Canada than they do on the other side of the line. We know that in Canada our freight rates are lower than they are in the United States. We can haul our grain cheaper to Fort William and Port Arthur than they can haul it a similar distance in the United States to Duluth. There are compensating factors in connection with duties, tariffs and free trade.

To come back to the subamendment, I do not think there is any argument against free trade to the largest extent possible provided that no particular class or industry in Canada suffers as a result. We sometimes wonder at the attitude of some of our splinter parties, particularly our C.C.F. friends, in regard to this matter. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) moved the subamendment which calls for free trade. He said that the Liberal party should bring into existence right now something that it has preached for fifty years. I would ask the hon. member: How many years have the C.C.F. been preaching free trade? If I remember correctly, it was not very many years ago that party said that free trade was absolutely obsolete in this country, that it was not up to date; and yet we see a change of mind today and our friends are talking about free trade.

The other day the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) said that the late Mr. Woodsworth of respected memory changed his mind about the constitution. I would suggest that it is not only the hon. member for Moose Jaw and some others who have changed their minds; most if not all of the members of the C.C.F. party have been changing their minds throughout the years of their existence. I believe Canada is fortunate in that it did not adopt, either provincially to any extent, or particularly federally, the advice that has been tendered to it. I think the people of Canada have made up their minds that they are not going to have any part or parcel of socialism. I would suggest to our friends that they continue to change their minds, and after a few more years they may be of the same mind as the Liberals. Taking everything into consideration for the betterment of all the people of Canada, they cannot do otherwise.

Some years ago the doctrine of self-sufficiency was preached in this country. It was said that we had enough coal, iron, lumber, and everything else that entered into the economic life of Canada, to build up our own economy without depending to any extent on any other country. All we had to do was elect the C.C.F., bring their policy into existence, and we would have everything. We were told we could be self-sufficient within our own country.

I am glad to see however that they have changed their minds. They also changed their minds with respect to certain policies they had in 1934, one of which was called the use-lease system of owning land. We heard about that system in Saskatchewan and it was called the useless-lease policy. However, under the use-lease system all the land would belong to the state, and one would lease over a period of ninety-nine years. If they have not changed their minds about that, at least they have not said much about it since that time.

If I do not understand it correctly, I should like to be corrected with respect to their attitude concerning the first year of the last war. My recollection is that out in Saskatchewan the matter came into prominence when we were told that the war then taking place in Europe, and in which eventually we became involved, was not our war. We were told that it was a capitalistic war—"Why do the people of Canada send their sons overseas to die? Why fight and die for the capitalists?" That is what we heard in Saskatchewan.

If we had followed that policy—and again they changed their minds—there would have been no Canada or commonwealth, as exemplified in the proceedings which took place in this chamber this afternoon. I say therefore that our government is to be commended upon not having followed the advice and the prophecies of those parties during that period of time, when they tried to tell us that the whole world was out of step, except them. That was the impression they tried to leave in Saskatchewan, and the impression which has been left almost up to this date by them in the dominion House of Commons.

The Liberal party is not encumbered by socialistic thinking because they know that civilization has by-passed socialism, that socialism has no place in Canada and, for that matter, possibly no place in any other country. Civilization has now advanced to a position where we have everything necessary to give far and beyond what socialism ever had to offer.

Does anyone wish to tell me that when we achieve socialism we have reached the end of the line, that there is no further progress nations can make? I suggest that these people might change their minds again with regard to socialism, both the people of Saskatchewan and those who are here in the House of Commons. What we can strive for, what we can advance to, and the standard of living we can attain is something beyond anything offered by any socialist country in the world.

Our C.C.F. friends have never ceased to be surprised that Liberals are still here. They continue to criticize and to offer their policies to people in all parts of Canada, policies which they have suggested we here in the House of Commons should adopt. I make the prediction that if this continues, and if these people continue giving their advice and making their promises for the next five years there will not be any opposition in the House of Commons. The Liberal party will have to form their own opposition—and possibly we would then make real progress, without hindrance.

However, let it not be assumed that they have not made a contribution to this Canada of ours, despite the fact that none of their prophecies has ever been fulfilled. They have made a contribution because out in Saskatchewan the people have been sorely tried at times. There have been crop failures after crop failures in many localities. The people have suffered, and when people are suffering they are in a position to accept something which may not be what they would wish to have over a long period of time. However at a given moment they may accept something as a palliative for the time being.

During the last fifteen years the people of Saskatchewan have been sorely tempted to adopt another philosophy of life, sorely tempted to import into Canada, not some of the things we need for the benefit of all our people, but a new ism which has been held out to them as a solution for all the ills of our country. The same thing is taking place today—day after day, in various parts of Canada. I would suggest again that they change their minds. The people have been tempted—and I am not going to say that I have not been tempted along with others—during times of depression, at times when there have been crop failures and suffering, times when we have had to go without things which the people in Saskatchewan need.

At times we have been sorely tempted, and in being tempted we have tried to determine which policy would be most beneficial to us over a long period of time. There is in Saskatchewan a man who speaks frequently over the radio, and almost invariably concludes his subject by stating, in effect, "You have been born into the old parties; you have to think yourself into the C.C.F."

The people in Saskatchewan—indeed people right across Canada—are thinking their way right through the C.C.F., and are determining for themselves that there is another ism to which they can cling, and which can be adopted in Canada, something which will make us self-sustaining and help to build a bigger and greater economy which will result in a higher standard of living. It will not be socialism; it will be Canadianism.

There are many people in Canada, some of them on our own government benches, some in leading positions in the official opposition, some who are leaders among the splinter parties, if they may be so described, who, if directed along correct lines, could build up the greatest economy this world has ever known, and thus be of benefit not only to Canada but to other countries. In my view the benefit which would result in other countries would be as important as that resulting to Canada.

Our C.C.F. friends in Saskatchewan and here have talked about promises the Liberal party did not fulfil. I have heard speaker after speaker from the splinter parties—and if there had been some from this party I would not excuse them—who have picked up pieces of newspaper in an effort to substantiate their arguments, pointing out whether or not it was correctly quoted. Surely there is something lacking if we have to substantiate our arguments on pieces of paper of one kind or another. Have we not sufficient evidence to determine a policy without that sort of thing?

After all, as I see it we are here to conduct the business of parliament. We know that tariffs, customs and free trade are two-way propositions. We must keep in mind that we are an exporting country, and that we export about 75 per cent of our wheat and high percentages of our other foodstuffs. As an exporting country we must consider not only what we would like to do, but that there is someone in some other country who may wish to buy our food and who will have some views to express. That is why there might have been some merit in the amendment offered by the Progressive Conservative party to the effect that there be a conference. No one would have any objection to that—but, as I have already intimated, such conferences are continually in process.

At the risk of boring the house, I would refer again to conditions in my part of the country. Our difficulty is not so much one of exports; rather, it is the plight in which people find themselves when they wonder how they are going to get along for another year. They know the only thing that has kept them in existence has been the policies of this dominion government. During the past few years the government has not only encouraged the production of commodities required in other parts of the world, but made possible the continued existence of those people during years of crop failure.

I would suggest that the government give serious consideration to increasing the crop-failure payments in some of the isolated areas where the people are sorely in need of assistance. I am told that at least some of the money that the dominion government puts into the pockets of these people is taken right out again by the Saskatchewan government. Irrespective of that situation, the fact is that some of these people have suffered continual crop failures over the last five years. In some areas there have been two, three or more consecutive crop failures.

When a crop is produced in that area it is a high-protein crop. As everyone knows across the line in Montana if the farmer produces a crop containing more than 16½ per cent protein he gets 15 cents additional for his wheat. The people in that area know of that and they wonder why something could not be done here. In Canada no consideration is given by the wheat board for high protein content and no benefits accrue to these individuals who might otherwise receive them.

When the crop failure plan was brought into operation in 1939 it was provided that a maximum payment of $500 would be paid for a complete crop failure. Everyone knows that today $500 will not buy half of what it bought back in 1939. It might be said that these people should move out of this area, but the fact is that there is no place for them to go. They simply want to be placed in the position where they can carry on for another year.

Any money that is paid out by the dominion government in this area will not be wasted, and these people would not want it to be wasted. There has been paid out in the Swift Current area over a period of years a total of $25 million in the way of assistance. The assessment in those same 16 municipalities totals around $28 million. But during that same period over $200 million of new wealth has been produced in that country. It might be said: If that is so, why do they need consideration? The trouble is that this production is only at intervals; it is not spread evenly over the years. There is not the stability there that is present in other parts of the country. We may produce wealth for one, two or even three years, but then there will come a period of years when practically nothing is produced.

Not only our farmers but our businessmen want stability. I have on my desk petitions signed by thousands of people, including the businessmen in the area. They ask for this assistance because they say that is the only way they will be able to continue to carry on. It is not asked for as a gift. We believe it will be an investment because it will be repaid. There are other countries which have taken much longer than ours to rehabilitate themselves and put themselves in a position where some stability exists. The expenditures we have made under P.F.R.A. have been made wisely. Over 40,000 dams and dugouts have been built and are being used for irrigation purposes. We talk about the south Saskatchewan and the St. Mary river and the innumerable other projects that are being carried on, but we must not forget what is being done on little farms here and there in the way of small dams and dugouts.

These holes are dug in the ground in order to catch the water that runs off when the snow begins to melt in the spring. Dams are placed across the coulee so that the water from the melting snow is caught in the spring. That water is used for irrigation purposes by means of a pipe running out from the bottom or by pumping the water out over the dam. Over 75 community pastures have been set up in order that this section may have areas of reserve grass which can be used during the dry years.

Part of the money is being used for scientific research. Men with the necessary knowledge are investigating the possibilities of growing different types of grasses and crossing various native grasses, even the sage-brush. Efforts are being made to find different grasses that can be grown in that country. Then contour method of farming is being advocated. This is really ring-around-a-rosy farming instead of going straight up and down so that the water may be caught and not permitted to run off in the springtime.

This all takes time. I can assure the house that this money will be well spent and it will be repaid in full. We would not accept it as a gift. We will return it to you, not only as money but in the form of assured permanency. After listening to what we heard today about hungry people in all parts of the world we must realize that the day is coming when every acre on earth must produce to the full. That is necessary if we are going to have any stability on this earth of ours. Hunger creates unrest and the extermination of other peoples.

Canada stands unique among the nations of the world. We are able to maintain a high standard of living because of our ability to produce such tremendous crops of grain and other products and have such quantities available for export. Our duty is to produce food to take care of as many people in the world as we possibly can.

Therein lies security for Canada. Millions and billions of people in the world are not going to stand idly by and see countries like the United States and Canada continue with their high standards of living unless our countries make some effort to alleviate the suffering that is present in other parts of the world. The United States and Canada have approximately 160,000,000 people who have a very high standard of living and we must do our part. This is the atomic age when we are no farther from Asia or China or from many other countries than one province was from another fifty years ago. These things should be done for security reasons if we do not want to do them from humanitarian motives. Let us give immediate consideration to what is happening in other parts of the world and let us produce as much grain and other products as we can so that as many as possible in these other countries may be cared for.

We ask that consideration be given to these things. One other disability that we face is the differential in freight rates. There are in the freight rate structure gaps which have not been closed up in certain sections of my constituency and the result is that farmers have to pay a cent or more per bushel to ship out their grain. This is due to backhauls and other factors that enter into the cost of operation.

It has been demonstrated by the university in that area it costs $5.37 to prepare an acre of land for cultivation. This would include the cost of the seed, the cost of preparing the land and all the rest of it. That may be small when compared with the cost in other parts of the country, but I point that out for one reason. Because of our lower costs we can make an enormous contribution to the welfare of Canada. We could make great advances in a short period of time and for this and other reasons I submit that we are entitled to consideration.

I believe there are over 600 returned soldiers who have taken up land in that area. It may be asked why they did that. They did it because they felt there was something there in the future. Even the returned man who risked his life for his country was able to see that. He is usually a pretty bright fellow. When he returns he is familiar with the experiences of his father, and he would hesitate to settle in that area if there were not a future there. He sees the same vision that many other people of that area see. He is trying to do his bit to bring about the progress of the country, and at the same time his own progress, so that the area will be an asset to the whole country.

We like to present the situation in the west, but that does not deter us from trying to understand the situation in the east. If you understand our problems and we understand yours, there is nothing that can stand in the way of the Canadian people and their parliament or prevent them from achieving the stability and permanence which are their objectives.

I should like to discuss another subject for a few moments. References have been made to the large number of members in the house and coupled with that regret has been expressed in various parts of the country that there are no women members. I am sure we all regret that women are not represented in the house, but I have not heard any of the members say that they are willing to resign to make room for a woman, nor have I heard myself say so. There are no women here, but that does not mean that the influence of women is not present. We can certainly say that the maternal influence has been much in evidence in Liberal governments of the past. Women have intuition and men have not, but because of their influence did we not introduce family allowances specifically for women? There are other social measures which affect them, and I do not believe any other country in the world has anything comparable. Women's influence is present in the house, and I know it is here with me because I have not said anything since I have been a member of the House of Commons that my wife has not told me to say. We want the influence of women to continue, and as time goes on we want it to grow so that all the people of Canada, women and men, will be satisfied with this government.

I think most people were pleased this afternoon to hear the wonderful expression of good will towards Canada from our distinguished visitor. I think he hit upon one secret of success for Canada in the attempt he made to speak the French language. I believe that is expressly what this country needs. I think the French-speaking people of Canada are to be congratulated on the wonderful attempt they are making to place their situation before us, and their ideas about what they believe the policies of Canada should be. The successful manner in which they present their views is a compliment to them. Many hon. members are making an effort to learn French, and it cannot do otherwise than add to their culture. It certainly takes nothing away from an individual and always enriches him. I should like to see that carried on further. I should like to see us learn what we can from the French people so that we may understand their ideas and their culture.

(Translation):

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to join other members of the house in addressing you briefly in French. The wonderful and successful effort made by the French-speaking members in the use of our language should encourage us to do likewise with regard to the French language. In order to really understand the destiny of Canada, it is necessary not only to know one another, but we must also fully understand our problems. Then we from western Canada shall visit you in the east. You from the east who have relatives and friends in western Canada will want to visit them, and us too, and at the same time get acquainted with our problems. We shall thus be in a position to do our utmost to make Canada a greater, a more prosperous and happier country.

(Text):

I suggested to the French-speaking people that they come out to the west and see us because they have many friends and relatives there. While they are out there we will treat them in the same way that they treat us when we are in the east. No one on earth could treat us better than the people of the eastern provinces when we come down here to see them.

The government, with its overwhelming majority, will appear still greater in the eyes of the people of Canada by reason of the way in which it treats minorities. When we have an overwhelming majority we wish to extend every courtesy to those who may be in the minority, not only throughout the length and breadth of Canada but also the minority in the official opposition, and our splendid splinter parties. Someone told me it is not necessary to have splinter parties. Sometimes we wonder why there are such things. Eventually they come around to our way of looking at matters. We sometimes wonder why they would not rather be a part of the ocean on which the ship of state sails so majestically instead of continuing to be something that the tide washes in and then washes out again. We look to them to be a part of Canada, to place themselves in the position where they can make their contribution to Canada and be such Canadians as to merit the love of all. If there is one thing necessary in Canada it is the true love of our country and I should like to see that developed.

In the words of Sir Walter Scott:

> Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!

I should like to see that spirit develop in our land from one end to the other so that in times of danger within and danger without the people of every province of Canada will rise as one man and battle unto death for Canada. If we can do anything to develop that spirit I think we will have made a great contribution to Canada.

I believe that Canada needs a flag. A flag is the symbol of unity between the individual and his country, and therefore I advocate a flag for Canada. It is our common wish to build a greater Canada. The people of Canada have a vision of what can be accomplished in a country so large and with so many natural resources, a country that has almost everything to make it the greatest in the world.

Now that Newfoundland has become a province of Canada and we have Canada united from Vancouver island to Newfoundland into one great entity, which I think was the vision of the fathers of confederation, I hope eventually it may be said of the present leaders of the country as it has been said of the fathers of confederation that they exhibited great vision for the future greatness of the country. Over one of the portals of this parliament building are carved these words: "Where there is no vision the people perish." Let us work together so that our advance and our betterment may be such that it can be said of our leaders, as it was said of the fathers of confederation, that they set their eyes toward the rising sun; that they laid their foundations upon the rock; that they builded better than they knew.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), which I enjoyed. I feel quite proud to be one of that splinter group to which he referred; and I can assure him that a splinter is a bad thing if it gets beneath your skin. However, I have my own speech to deliver, and I have been asked by the government to hurry along so that we may get on to other business.

I want to take this opportunity to bring before the government two matters of great importance to my constituents. The first is in connection with the setting up of new communities in the constituency of Selkirk. I refer to such V.L.A. settlements as those at Roblin Park and Rivercrest. In some cases these settlements contain a hundred homes or more. One of the qualifications required was that the veterans should have families, and I think the average is about two children per family; but nothing has been done to provide these children with schooling. There is no school for them; there is no schoolteacher, and that is bad business. I cannot speak on this subject as an educator; far from it. I can only look at it from the point of view of a school trustee, since I happened to be chairman of a small school board for thirteen years before coming here. Looking back to the thirties I still feel ashamed when I remember how we would offer a teacher $45 a month to teach forty children in eight grades.

Returning to the subject of school districts, however, we have these settlements established with no provision for the pupils and no teachers to look after them. We have the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pushing the construction of new homes in urban districts such as I represent. In the suburban municipalities of St. James and West Kildonan many new homes have been built within the last few years, but the school districts concerned have been given no help to enlarge their schools to accommodate the children coming from crowded city areas. These school districts are in financial difficulties now trying to make ends meet. Some of the old schools are out of date but cannot be replaced because of lack of funds. Some time ago the Winnipeg Tribune published photographs showing the dilapidated condition of a school built in my constituency sixty years ago. It was falling apart; it was a regular fire trap. After I saw the photographs in the newspaper I visited the school; and I do not think the gentleman who wrote the article exaggerated in any way.

What is the solution to this problem? The law of the land says every child must have an education; and it must be remembered that today people are demanding better educational facilities for their children than they themselves enjoyed thirty or forty years ago. I know education is a provincial responsibility; we have heard that in this house repeatedly. But the situation is getting beyond the provincial governments. If teachers were paid proper salaries some of the best scholars would be attracted to the teaching profession, but that is not the case. If our school districts are to have sufficient funds to build extra schools or enlarge the present buildings, if every child in every province is to have the opportunity to get an education, then I say it is time we had a dominion-provincial conference on education to see what help the federal government can give the provinces or the school districts to permit them to carry on their work in a satisfactory manner.

The second matter I want to bring up is the discrimination against the prairie provinces under the freight rates as they exist today. For many years western Canada has been forced to pay freight rates from 15 to 18 per cent higher than rates for similar commodities in Ontario and Quebec. Railroad rates affect everyone in the west, whether they be farmers, workers, businessmen or anything else. They enter into the everyday life of the people. Produce is shipped east or west; merchandise comes from east and west, mainly from the east. Why should we have to pay more than our neighbours? For years we have argued that the prairie freight rates should be lower than those in central Canada. We have a flat country, with very few rivers; we have practically no natural obstacles. Hauls are long on the prairies, and most of the produce is moved in carload lots.

I want it to be perfectly clear to hon. members that if the railways need additional revenue to meet increased expenditures caused by higher costs and wages, that is quite all right; but why make the west the scapegoat? If we must have increased freight rates let us all bear a share, and not have the prairies foot the entire bill. Let us find a proper basis for obtaining increased revenues, if they are needed, so the burden will not be borne unequally by the people of Canada, particularly by those in the west and the maritimes, in order that the workers may get the increased wages they deserve and the railways may have the additional revenue they require to operate efficiently.

The progress that has been made by the railroads during the last thirty years never seems to be taken into consideration. I am speaking of this from personal experience, because more than thirty years ago I worked as a machinist in the railroad shops. In those days an engine made one divisional point, going perhaps 120 or 130 miles, and was then serviced. Now a locomotive makes at least three divisional points before being serviced. In those days box cars were built to hold 60,000 pounds. Now they carry 80,000 pounds, some even 100,000 pounds. Freight trains rolled along in those days with fifty cars. Now when you look out on the prairies you see these large engines hauling 100 cars. All this development and improvement must have saved money for the railroad companies.

Let us look at the discrimination that exists on the prairies and see what rates we pay as compared with the central provinces. In the west where there is no water competition, and where truck competition has been kept under supervision by the provincial government boards in order to avoid any real competition with the railroads, the railroads have been able to charge the full amount authorized by the board of transport commissioners. I would mention an example put on the record by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) some time ago when he talked about barbed wire. He showed that on barbed wire shipped from Montreal to Vancouver the freight cost 95 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. Blackmore: Seventy-five cents.

Mr. Bryce: It is 95 now. For the same 100 pounds of barbed wire, if it were shipped only half the distance, shipped to Calgary, the freight would cost $1.98 per 100 pounds.

Another example was put on the record by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) when he talked in the house about paint. On paint from Montreal to Vancouver, the freight is $1.50 per 100 pounds. But if you send it just to Calgary, it is $1.98 per 100 pounds.

The average rates from prairie points on the shipment of butter in carload lots work out to approximately $2.47 per 100 pounds to Montreal. But the average rate from stations in Ontario and Quebec to Montreal is about 60 cents per 100 pounds. It can therefore be seen that there is a tremendous difference, although the mileage is decidedly longer.

Let us look at freight rates on carloads of lumber. You can move a carload of lumber west from Megantic, Quebec, a distance of 600 miles, for 24 cents per 100 pounds. But if you try to ship a similar car of lumber from Golden, British Columbia, for a distance 600 miles east, it will cost you 40½ cents per 100 pounds.

I can go on quoting different rates to show the discrimination that exists, but before I go on I should like to say that the rates on livestock, which mean so much to the province from which I come, are also discriminatory. The rates on livestock are as follows:

Distance	Ontario and Quebec cents	Prairies cents
200 miles	22	24½

We must remember that the freight cost on the movement of livestock to our central market at Winnipeg is not the only cost to the producer. The price paid to the producer is the price paid at Toronto or Montreal less the freight to those markets. I believe that confederation originally was meant to be an association of provinces equal in every respect. Confederation in fact has given the provinces political equality, but so far I do not believe that it has given us economic equality; and I think that the railway rate structure is a glaring example of that failure.

Discriminatory rates are really bad and it is up to the western members, no matter to what party they belong, to start a fight for the correction of this injustice to the west, as we are carrying far more than our share of the load.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I say that after the hon. member for Selkirk has completed his speech, we intend to move to go into supply this evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, may I resume where I left off before the dinner recess. Trucking competition in the central provinces has secured lower rates for many people. As I have already said, the provincial governments have boards which supervise the trucking industry, and in most cases railroad rates have been the yardstick which guided them; but I see that the Canadian Pacific Railway is going to take no chances on any competition developing in the prairies. They are right in the trucking business and will most certainly maintain railroad rates, and at the same time no double establish a monopoly in the trucking business in the west.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet published by the Canadian Automobile Transportation Association from which I should like to quote. It reads:

> Railway buys truck competitors in western Canada. C.P.R. takes over 2,700 miles of routes from independent truckers. Six independent trucking organizations have been purchased by the Canadian Pacific Railway since December, 1947. These purchases have been consummated by the C.P.R.'s wholly-owned subsidiary, the Canadian Pacific Transport Company.

I should also like to quote from the speech of Mr. John Magee, executive secretary of the Canadian Automobile Transportation Company of Toronto, who spoke at Winnipeg on December 3, 1948. For the benefit of hon. members who may wish to look it up may I say his speech will be found in the December 1948 issue of "Highway News". I shall quote part of his remarks:

> You all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway, acting swiftly in a series of purchases which began in September, 1947, has taken over an important segment of the trucking industry in western Canada. The last company acquired was Dench of Canada, one of the biggest long-distance trucking operations in the west with headquarters in Calgary. Following the Dench acquisition (in April, 1948), a breathing spell apparently was necessary to permit digestion of the six highway operations acquired up to this time. There is every indication that once this digestive process has been completed, a new series of trucking purchases will commence.
> All of these purchases have been quietly consummated by the least known of the C.P.R.'s wholly owned subsidiaries, Canadian Pacific Transport Company. They enabled the C.P.R. in the short space of eight months, to snuff out competition on 2,100 miles of trucking routes in western Canada.

With Dench of Canada providing the backbone of the C.P.R.'s highway operations in the west, the railway is now in control of long-distance trucking services commencing at Winnipeg and extending westward, not only through Manitoba but through Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, as far as Creston on the southern trans-Canada highway. A hundred and fifty miles further along the highway, O.K. Valley Freight Lines—the first highway operation purchased by C.P.R.—commences at Osoyoos and extends westward to Princeton, two hundred and twenty-five miles from Vancouver.

No one should have difficulty in understanding why the trucking industry is so concerned about this problem. At stake is the independence and integrity of an industry competitive with the Canadian railroads. A trucking industry controlled through purchase by the C.P.R., or any other railway, would not be a trucking industry at all—it would merely be a branch line operation of the railroads run on a branch line basis. By buying out motor truck competitors on 2,100 miles of highway, and by its intent to buy out still more of its motor truck competitors, the Canadian Pacific Railway is leading western Canada backward into a new era of transport monopoly.

Further on he says:

Here is how a trucking purchase is consummated, C.P.R. style—and this actually happened here in Manitoba in December of last year. You take one trucking firm with two trucks valued at $3.167 and owning warehouse property valued at $390—a total of $3,557. To that you add payment for goodwill at an additional figure of $11,443, with a total purchase price of $15,000. Can you blame the operator for selling the two trucks?

That has always been the way that mighty corporations have followed in blazing their trail to industrial monopoly—big prices to the firms that will sell today and then tomorrow, companies which have retained their independence, can be forced to sell at 50 or 75 cents on the dollar. We have seen it happen in other industries—we would be living in a fool's paradise if we did not act now to prevent it happening in our industry.

I have always thought that our utilities such as telephones, hydro-power plants and other necessary public services, should be provided at cost and I have always advocated that. But when I see the Canadian Pacific Railway, a so-called private enterprise corporation, starting out to establish a monopoly in the trucking industry in western Canada, than I say: if we are to prevent a monopoly, let us have some of the competition that private enterprise calls for and advocates so strongly.

Another matter in connection with the railways that I want to raise my voice about is the changing of the freight rates on purebred livestock going to the fairs. This is a serious blow to the purebred livestock industry. In the time at my disposal I do not think I can do justice to this important matter, but I should like to quote from an editorial by Mr. James Gray, an ex-member of the press gallery and a westerner from Winnipeg. He is the editor of the Farm and Ranch Review, and he has this to say, with which I think the farmers in the west will agree. He heads his article:

The railways kill a goose

And goes on to say:

The effect of the recent boost in special livestock freight rates to the fairs is a shattering blow to the purebred livestock industry of western Canada. It will drastically reduce the livestock exhibits at all the provincial fairs immediately. In the long run it cannot help but create great differences in the quality of livestock from area to area.

To show purebred livestock is in itself a losing proposition. The expense of feeding, grooming and transporting stock costs far more than any breeder can hope to win in prize money. But shipment of livestock to interprovincial shows has worked wonders in a general improvement of breeds all across the prairies. Through the years, a substantial trade in purebred stock was developed. Many a farmer went to the fairs with but one idea in mind, to see and compare the best with what he was producing. On the educational level alone the exhibitions were very much worth while.

All this came about as a result of concessions by the railways in freight rates. An exhibitor who could ship 20,000 pounds of prize cattle in one car paid the standard rate for the first move and then half rate for subsequent moves. But the railways have now cancelled this rate and are demanding full freight all around the fair circuit. Here, in tabular form is how the old rate compared with the new, on a shipment of purebred cattle from a farm at Selkirk around the western fairs.

Selkirk to Brandon	$44	$54	$58.32
Brandon to Calgary	48	58	123.12
Calgary to Edmonton	24	30	64.80
Edmonton to Saskatoon	32	40	84.24
Saskatoon to Regina	22	28	58.32
Regina to Selkirk	free	free	75.60
Total freight	$170	$210	$464.40

No industry in western Canada has more to gain from livestock raising than the railways. It is imperative that the special rates for show stock be restored or the plain truth is that livestock shows as we have known them are a thing of the past.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter in connection with railroad rates or freight rates that western farmers are complaining about, and that is the freight rates on their implements which the railways are now asking—that is, that 6th class freight be charged. The highest rate that has ever been charged for machinery was in 1920 when the rate rose to 92·5 cents per 100 pounds. The recent rise in rates makes the rate $1.08 per 100 pounds which is 16 per cent higher; and if the railroads get implements into the 6th class rate, the rate will have advanced 42 per cent above the highest it has ever been.

The freight cost to Winnipeg, my nearest town, was 82½ cents per 100 pounds in 1939. After the 21 per cent increase we paid $1. At the present time, after the 8 per cent increase we are paying $1.08, and if a change is made to the class 6 rate we will be paying

$1.32—and points farther west will pay considerably more. Some may think that this will not make much difference. Let me place some figures on Hansard so that there may be no misunderstanding. I have chosen for this comparison four ordinary farm implements used every day. The comparison on these implements of the respective freight rates is as follows:

	1939	After 21%	After 8%	Class 6 rate
3-furrow plow	$ 9.68	$11.73	$12.67	$ 15.48
8-foot one-way disk.	20.42	24.76	26.74	32.68
8-foot binder	15.51	18.80	20.30	24.81
12-foot combine self-propelled	64.00	77.60	83.80	102.43

No government, not even the present Liberal government, can ignore any longer these grievances I have raised. The federal government must assume responsibility for some help to education, either one way or another. If confederation is to have any reality then there must be equality of treatment for all provinces; and one of the best ways to begin is to remove the discrimination which exists in freight rates. It is the responsibility of the Liberal government to make this possible.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the debate there is one observation I should like to make. Through you, sir, may I pay a humble but sincere tribute to the Speaker of this chamber upon his eloquent address of thanks made on the occasion of the visit of the Prime Minister of India today. Those of us who were in the chamber can as Canadians be proud of the excellent and delicate way in which Mr. Speaker thanked the very famous gentleman from India who spoke to us this afternoon.

On motion of Mr. Adamson the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Administration of the Transport Act—

454. Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada —administration, maintenance and operation, $610,880.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when we were dealing with this item the other evening a number of questions were asked, and I should like to bring down the answers.

First may I deal with the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre concerning the crossing at Talbot avenue. I find that at Talbot avenue in Winnipeg there are two crossings, one over the East Selkirk branch of the Canadian Pacific railway and the other over the Molson cut-off branch. The board's files indicate that protective signals have been installed at both crossings, and since the installation no accidents have occurred. These crossings appear to the board to be adequately protected. However, if the city of Winnipeg is not in agreement with that view they are free to make application to the board. The point I wish to make is that no application is before the board, and therefore the case cannot be considered.

Then, the hon. member for St. John's East asked regarding the standardization of the gauge of the Newfoundland railway. He felt the railway services were not adequately conforming with an article in the terms of the agreement. The officers of the Canadian National Railways have made a complete survey of the railway in Newfoundland, and they think the time has not yet come to standardize the gauge of that road. If conditions change at a later date I can assure the hon. member that the Canadian National will be willing to give the matter careful consideration.

Further in regard to the adequacy of service, I might say that after surveying the position the Canadian National has come to the conclusion that new terminal facilities are required at North Sydney, and already plans and specifications are in the making for the construction of these facilities. I am not in a position to say how long it will take before they are completed but I can assure the hon. member that the Canadian National Railways are giving careful attention to the question of additional traffic that may arise because of union with Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: May I ask a question with regard to the adequacy of the service between Port aux Basques and North Sydney? Is it the intention of the Canadian National management to provide a larger boat or to add another boat? The accommodation on that run is most inadequate at the present time, and I speak from actual knowledge. I have seen what is happening on this run, and so has the hon. member for St. John's West. There are times on the run from Port aux Basques to North Sydney when passengers have to lie on the floor during the night. When the sea is rough, as happens quite often in the gulf of St. Lawrence, it is not very pleasant for people who are seasick to have to lie around on the floor, and it certainly is most unpleasant for those not seasick. Is any provision being made to take care of that?

There is another matter I should like to draw to the attention of the minister about which he may not have any knowledge. For some reason or other a limit is placed on the number of people who may go on the boat for the run from North Sydney to Port aux Basques, but there is no limit on the number who may go on the boat for the run from Port aux Basques to North Sydney.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad the hon. member has brought these matters to my attention and I shall see that the Canadian National Railways officials are apprised of them. Answering his first question, may I say that I have no indication that the Canadian National Railways are going to place an additional boat on that service.

I should like to deal now with the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in connection with the sittings of the board of transport commissioners and the royal commission on transportation. Order in council 1487 provided for a general investigation. I am informed by the chairman of the board that after that body was established notices were sent out to the railroads and the provinces and others who might be particularly interested in the investigation. I presume the provinces and railroads were not in a position to make submissions to both the board of transport commissioners and the royal commission and decided to make submissions to the latter. The board of transport commissioners thereupon decided to make a study of the waybill factor with which they are proceeding at the moment.

The board feel that it will not be possible for them to complete their investigation until the report or the recommendations of the royal commission have been handed down. In a moment I shall refer to when that is likely to be. That is why it has been found necessary to delay in regard to public hearings. If after the recommendations of the royal commission are handed down the board feel that public hearings are necessary, they will hold them. It is not possible at this time to say whether such hearings will be necessary.

The chairman of the royal commission informs me that regional hearings have taken place in most of the provinces and that the general argument by the railroads and the provinces will take place in Ottawa early in November. The commission has been proceeding with great dispatch but it is difficult at this time to say how soon the official report will be handed down. I wish I could give more definite indication. The best information I have is that the argument will take the greater part of a month or perhaps two months. Then the commissioners will have to read the evidence and get their recommendations in order.

Mr. Green: That would mean that it could not be before the new year?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any question of that; it would be quite impossible to have the findings of the royal commission ready before that time.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know how long it will take the commissioners to read the evidence, but I would think some months. In answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley I would say that hearings will be resumed early in November and I think they will take the whole of November and perhaps part of December. I think I am quite safe in saying that in view of the voluminous evidence it is impossible to expect the official recommendations before the year is out.

Mr. Green: As I understand the minister's statement, once the royal commission has reported, the board of transport commissioners will carry on with the task set for them by the order in council?

Mr. Chevrier: The board of transport commissioners are carrying on now with their task. The explanation I gave a moment ago was in answer to the question as to why they did not hold public hearings. I think I gave the reason why they did not, but I repeat they are carrying on with the study of the waybill factor. When the report of the royal commission comes down they may then decide to hold public hearings.

Mr. Green: Then it will be some months after the report of the royal commission is handed down before there will be a decision by the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Chevrier: I would think so.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is British Columbia to be adversely affected with regard to the cost of transportation until this report is brought down?

Mr. Chevrier: British Columbia has been favourably affected by the removal of the mountain differential.

Mr. Cruickshank: We do not quite agree with you.

Mr. Chevrier: That is what you wanted.

Mr. MacInnis: I am wondering if I heard the minister correctly when he was answering the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. Will the royal commission on transportation report to the government or to the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no doubt about that; they will report to the government.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the government then study the report or will it be referred to the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Chevrier: I assume the government will do as it has done in all cases, give consideration to the report and then decide what action to take upon it, if any.

Mr. Stick: The increase in traffic and the congestion on the Newfoundland railroad has been brought about by the reduction in rates, which were practically cut in two. I understand that the Canadian National have had officials down there going into the matter. At present the administration of the Newfoundland railroad is being carried on from Moncton and I submit that better service could be provided if this were done from St. John's.

Mr. Chevrier: The superintendent of the Newfoundland railroad, now part of the Canadian National Railways, is located at St. John's.

Mr. Cruickshank: Has British Columbia gained this last year in the equalization of rates across Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot answer that to the satisfaction of my hon. friend because the investigation with reference to discrimination has not yet been completed. That is still under study by the board of transport commissioners pursuant to order in council 1487.

Mr. Cruickshank: Until that decision has been rendered, will the adverse rates to the province of British Columbia be held in abeyance?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot give further satisfaction to the hon. member. That is a matter for the board of transport commissioners to decide.

Mr. Cruickshank: Who controls them?

Mr. Isnor: The discussion on this particular item has been quite broad in its scope and I trust—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I wonder if we might pass this item and proceed to the general item. I think the discussion has been getting away from item 454, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. If it is agreeable to the house we might proceed to deal with general administration, because we are dealing with all sorts of things under item 454, and that is not regular.

Mr. Isnor: Just before you do that—

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps we can deal with your point on item 453, departmental administration.

Mr. Isnor: Is item 454 the next one?

Mr. Chevrier: We have not dealt with the first item, 453, departmental administration, because at the time of the discussion the committee felt that we should deal with item 454, and I raised no objection. I wonder if we could not get on with the general discussion now. Could we not pass item 454, proceed with item 453, and get on with the general discussion?

Mr. Graydon: I have one point to raise which comes directly under item 454. It will not be a general matter. Perhaps the minister would accept my observations and then we could proceed with the other item.

Mr. Chevrier: I am quite satisfied if we do not get into a general discussion, but in order to have some understanding I wonder if the committee would not allow item 454 to pass so that we may proceed with item 453. Perhaps the hon. member could then bring up his point on the general item and I could deal with it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There are some subjects having to do directly with item 454, the board of transport commissioners, which I think should be put before the committee before the item is passed. If I understood the senior member for Halifax, the matter to which he refers has a direct bearing on this item. If not, I have something I should like to bring before the committee.

Mr. Isnor: In reply to the hon. member for Cumberland, my point is fairly broad in its scope, and that is why I am wondering whether the minister will permit me to go on. I am going to deal with existing shipping conditions, and also with one or two other matters.

Mr. Chevrier: I think we should proceed with the general item if we are going to deal with shipping, or we can complete the discussion on item 454. It makes no difference to me.

Mr. Green: Let item 454 stand.

The Deputy Chairman: It is the practice to have a general discussion on the departmental administration item. We have not had that general discussion. We have spent some time on item 454, but there are no questions that any hon. member might ask on item 454 that could not be dealt with in the discussion on item 453. If the house is prepared to pass item 454 then we will be ready to go on with item 453 and have a general discussion. We could follow another course. We could let item 454 stand and go back to item 453, or perhaps the best course would be to finish the discussion on item 454 if there are only one or two questions to be asked. Perhaps the hon. member for Cumberland would like to ask his question now. Then we may be ready to pass item 454, revert to item 453, and have a general discussion.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have a matter to put before the committee which comes directly under item 454, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. I refer to discrimination against shippers in the maritime provinces. The matter referred to has to do with the shipping of lumber over Canadian railways to United States points. Canadian producers of lumber in the maritime provinces, in view of the serious condition of the overseas lumber markets, and the exchange situation with Great Britain, have to look to the extension of their markets in the United States before deciding how much in the way of lumber operations they can carry on in the current 1949-50 season. I should like to quote from a letter I received a few days ago from a lumber operator in the maritimes, reading in part as follows:

> A few days ago I discovered that Canadian railroads moving goods for U.S.A. delivery are permitted to use the U.S.A. freight rates from origin to delivery point; hence all U.S.A. exports carry U.S.A. rates. For instance, if I ship a carload to Windsor, Ontario, the rate is 41 cents but if I ship a car to Detroit the through rate is 70 cents. That means that the C.N.R. gets the 70-cent rate for merely delivering the car across the river on its own lines. On top of that will be the 8 per cent plus the 6 per cent for exchange differential. It is little wonder we in the maritimes are out on a limb, for having no local consuming market all goods must be sent long distances, and our goods are heavy. Since most of our goods go to New England or quite close to the border points we get all the shock.

Lumber producers and other shippers in the maritime provinces have a most serious grievance. I think it is sufficiently serious for the minister to see that it is put directly before the management of the railways, and before the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. In this instance the Canadian National Railways are exacting from the producers in these difficult times almost double the rate, and all they do is to take it across the river from Windsor to Detroit.

I should like the minister to give special consideration to this matter. It applies not only to shippers of lumber but also to shippers of potatoes and other commodities from the maritime provinces. As is pointed out in the letter, lumber products are heavy and they carry a heavy freight charge in relation to the value received. There would appear to be direct discrimination against lumber producers. The railway is exacting almost double the charge for moving the product from the Canadian point to nearby United States points.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Chevrier: I agree with the hon. member that at first blush there does appear to be discrimination, but I am informed that the reason for it is that the movement from the maritimes to Windsor carries a local through Canadian rate whereas the movement from the maritimes to Detroit is based on the international rates, and international rates are approved by the interstate commerce commission. As the hon. member knows, rates in the United States are 60 to 70 per cent higher than they are in Canada. I presume that is the reason for the apparent discrimination, but in view of what the hon. member has said I shall ask the officers of the board of transport commissioners to see if there is not any way to rectify the inequality.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand the minister to say that the Canadian National Railways get the benefit of the increased charges exacted by the United States freight rate schedule rather than the shipper of Canadian goods? As I said a few moments ago, they are endeavouring to carry on their operations under trying conditions due to the difficulty of shipping lumber to their usual British market.

Mr. Chevrier: The Grand Trunk Western railway gets the benefit of the increase.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Then do I understand that the Canadian National does not get any portion of the increase from 41 cents to 70 cents, in this movement from maritime province points to Detroit as opposed to Windsor?

Mr. Chevrier: It does, through its American line, the Grand Trunk Western.

Mr. Graydon: I have an unusually pleasant observation to make with respect to the minister and the board of transport commissioners, arising out of a subject with which I dealt in a previous debate. In parts of Peel and the adjoining counties along the lake shore between Toronto and Hamilton there is, as the minister knows, a commutation rate structure covering points from Oakville to the union station in Toronto. That has been in operation for quite a number of years. It may surprise the minister to learn that some 700 commuters from Oakville and intermediate points go to Toronto every morning and back again every evening, so this is quite a substantial traffic from a passenger point of view. Recently, as the minister knows, the railways have substantially increased the commutation rates in that area, as well as the rates in other such areas throughout Canada. I should like to mention just a few of the old and new rates, to show the general ratio of increase which has been made applicable right across the board. The rates on twenty-ride tickets have been raised in these cases, for example:

	Old Rate	New Rate
Clarkson to Toronto	$5.50	$8.50
Lorne Park to Toronto	5.15	7.50
Port Credit to Toronto	4.50	6.50
Lakeview to Toronto	3.80	6.00
Dixie Road to Toronto	3.45	5.50

The minister will see that these increases are substantial, not only in dollars and cents but in percentage as well. A strong and efficient association has been formed by the commuters, known as the lake shore railroad commuters' association, whose energetic president is Captain Earl Hand, K.C., who is also a constituent of mine. Captain Hand, together with some five hundred others who belong to that association, has been very active and has made representations not only with respect to the increase in rates, which they think are out of line with what might be normally expected, but also with respect to the service the railway is giving, about which they complain bitterly. As one instance they point to the old, wooden, gas-lit coaches used on these trains, on which they say the light is so bad it is hardly possible to read a newspaper. They also tell me that the emergency lighting equipment on some coaches consists of coal-oil lamps. There is no air conditioning, and you can imagine the temperature of these cars last summer after they had been standing in the sun all day, with the passengers boarding them at 5.20 p.m. on their way home. In their own language they indicate that it was practically the same as taking a Turkish bath. From the point of view of safety they point out that in the event of an accident involving these match-box cars in which some 700 passengers are carried a terrible tragedy could result.

I mention this in order to suggest to the minister that the board of transport commissioners deserve a pat on the back for the action they took after representations were made earlier this month. On October 13 the board ordered that the tariffs which were about to be put into effect should be suspended until further notice from the board. I am not going into the whole matter this evening, because, if there is such a principle as sub judice with respect to the board of transport commissioners, I might offend that rule if I were to deal with the matter in any detail during this general discussion. Nevertheless I want to pay tribute to the board for having issued that order and having suspended those increases. I hope they will make a thorough and comprehensive investigation and inquiry, and require the railway to show cause why under present conditions these rates should be increased at all; or, if they must be increased, why those increases should be as drastic as I have indicated.

As I said in the beginning, it is not often I have the opportunity to put in a good word for the board, although I realize that sometimes their task is not pleasant, that sometimes it is subject to criticism which no doubt they at least feel may be unreasonable. This time I want to commend them for their prompt action, and I shall give them even greater commendation later on if they are able to keep these rates where they are at the present time.

Mr. Knight: I suggest that if we go back to item 453 that will open up a general discussion, and those of us who have questions concerning the board of transport commissioners may have to wait a long time to have them answered, so if I may I should like to get one short question in now. It has to do with the control of pipe lines. I understand the board of transport commissioners is the body which will administer the regulations under which pipe-line companies will operate. I am ignorant on the subject, but I should like some comment by the minister upon it. I am aware that the company will be running its pipe lines to its own refineries, but I also understand that there are other refineries on the route of this particular line; and I am wondering whether these other refineries will be able to make use of that pipe line as a common carrier when it is not being used by the company owning it. I would point out that the supplying of oil in the prairie provinces is a seasonal business; and I am hoping that, if this pipe line is to be a public carrier to any extent, the seasonal aspect of the business will be taken into consideration, so that the company will not be allowed to use the pipe line when it is most economical to do so, leaving it for the use of the other refineries when the reverse is the case.

There are dozens of questions in regard to regulation which come to my mind, but I know so little about the matter that I would welcome a general statement, as I imagine other hon. members would, as to the probable set-up, or what may be in the mind of the minister in regard to the control of pipe-line companies as common carriers.

Mr. Chevrier: In connection with the control of pipe lines by the board, I am afraid

I cannot add much more to what I said in a previous session when the pipe-line bill was up for discussion. I think the house dealt pretty fully with the circumstances surrounding the applications which had to be made. The board of transport commissioners is the regulatory body as far as the various pipe-line companies are concerned. My hon. friend did not mention the pipe line that he was interested in. I believe the application of the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company has been approved and I think one other, but I am not quite sure of that.

Mr. Knight: I was thinking of the pipe line which would run down from Regina to Superior, Wisconsin.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company. Once the board has approved of the application and given a licence, I presume the company is authorized to build the line from the points mentioned in the application.

Mr. Green: What concerns me about the whole picture is who is responsible for deciding whether or not a pipe line shall go into the United States rather than be laid in Canada. I think that is one of the key questions that should be answered. As I understand the situation, it is not at all clear at the moment who is responsible for such a decision being made; and I think that the oil companies are the people who are making the decision. For example, with regard to the pipe line which is going to Superior, Wisconsin, in the United States, it would appear that that decision is made by the Imperial Oil Company, which means by the Standard Oil of New Jersey.

We have a similar situation coming up on the west coast, because apparently there is a plan to put in a natural gas line, from southern Alberta, which is to go right into the United States at the first convenient place. I should like to know whose responsibility it is to decide whether or not that is to be permitted. Does the board of transport commissioners have the power to say that this line may go into the United States and that line may not? Or does the government exercise that authority? Or just where does the authority lie? I think we must make absolutely certain that there is not any confusion as to who is going to be responsible for these lines going into the United States.

As I read the act, the board of transport commissioners have merely regulatory power. They are in a position to decide whether it is in the interests of Canada that such and such a pipe line should go into the United States. Personally, I think that responsibility must rest on the government; but I do not believe the government is accepting that responsibility at the present time. Will the minister explain just how that situation is handled?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. gentleman asks what jurisdiction the board has over these applications. I must say to him that their jurisdiction must be and is limited to Canadian territory. The application made by the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company was for a line running from Regina to Gretna, Manitoba, and that application was in due course granted. The board have no jurisdiction to grant applications to go into United States territory.

I do not know what happened, but I presume the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company made application to the interstate commerce commission, or whatever counterpart to the board of transport commissioners exists in the United States, and that the licence to build the pipe line in United States territory was granted. But the board have no jurisdiction in United States territory.

Mr. Green: Yes, but of course the effect is this. The board of transport commissioners did give permission for a pipe line to be built to the United States boundary. Then once that permission is granted, apparently the Canadian authorities just wash their hands of any further responsibility. But the fact is, nevertheless, that the oil or the gas goes to the United States. Somebody in Canada must decide, as a matter of policy, whether this oil and gas should be piped to the United States rather than be used in Canada to build up industries here and to give employment. I should like to know whether there is anybody, from the Prime Minister down, who is at the moment exercising any control over that question as to whether or not this Canadian oil and gas is to be piped to the United States rather than used in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot satisfy my hon. friend. All I can tell him is what the board of transport commissioners does and what this department does in connection with an application such as that. I know that, under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, the Department of Trade and Commerce has the right to license the movement of electricity or the fluid, or the gas or the oil. As my hon. friend knows, in the debate which took place some days ago in this house the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that he had granted a licence for this particular movement.

Mr. Knight: I had hoped that the minister would give a statement which would cover what I wanted to know. Let me be more specific. Let me state definitely the fear that is in my mind. We are to have a pipe line which is to convey oil from Edmonton down as far as the city of Regina. I am content to stop there. At the city of Regina there is a co-operative refinery which I expect will want to use oil transported by that pipe line. Unless we have regulation from somebody, I fear that that line may not turn out to be a public carrier at all, and that the co-operative refinery, in which most of us in the province of Saskatchewan are interested, will not be able to get oil from it.

Then I have a fear that, even if it is declared to be a public carrier, it may be operated in such a way as to be a disadvantage to a company other than that which owns the line. My experience of companies is that, if the same company that owns the line owns the refinery, it is only natural that the company which owns the line would perhaps get the better use of it.

The point I wanted to get at is this. Can we have the assurance that the board of transport commissioners, if that is the body which is to control these things, will look after things like that? Or will the whole thing be in the hands of Imperial Oil or Standard Oil or whatever it is?—and they are all the same. In that event the people of this country will not know anything about it until it is a fait accompli, and it will be just another instance of our natural resources going haywire so far as the public of this country is concerned. That is the fear that is in my mind, and I think that I have been specific about it now.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can satisfy the hon. gentleman with regard to his fears. The Pipe Lines Act which was introduced here last year made it mandatory that pipe lines carrying oil shall be common carriers. That is in the act. Not so as to gas companies. If there is any fear that there is discrimination in the public carriage of oil, I think that any party aggrieved can appeal to the board at any time in accordance with the ordinary practice under the Railway Act, because certain provisions of the Railway Act apply in this case.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is the government not prepared to state that gas and oil will be piped across Canada for the benefit of Canadians before being transshipped to the United States? The reason I am asking that question, Mr. Chairman, through you, is that it is an important issue. I have no brief for any particular company, although I sponsored a bill for a company last year. I am interested in British Columbia and particularly in my own riding. I want to see the interior of British Columbia developed. In the Peace river country we have great natural oil resources, perhaps more than in any other part of Canada. I hold no brief for any individual company. If the line is an all-Canadian route I do not care what company sponsors it. If the surplus is to be exported to the United States I am in entire agreement with it, and I defy any member of any party in British Columbia to dispute that. We want to develop our great Peace river country, northern British Columbia and northern Alberta. We want an all-Canadian route. I say that this government and this parliament have no right to grant a charter to any company to go down through the United States and then back into Canada with the tail end on the Pacific coast. I ask the members from British Columbia and Alberta to remember that when they vote. We want to develop our natural resources within Canada. I do not agree with any minister, parliamentary assistant or private member from any riding in western Canada who does not vote for that. We want to exploit our own resources. We want to build up the Peace river, northern Alberta and the rest of the provinces. I am speaking for western Canada now.

I do not agree with any company taking our natural gas and oil down to the United States and bringing it back into Canada at a time when we are crying for United States dollars.

Mr. Thatcher: It is silly.

Mr. Cruickshank: Of course it is silly. I am going to watch how the members from all parties in British Columbia vote on this question when it comes up. I am not going to go into details now. I have all the data here. Last year I sponsored a bill for a certain company which guaranteed to transmit oil and gas over an all-Canadian route, not all down through the states to Seattle and Portland and then bring the surplus into Vancouver. It goes through the centre of my riding and through the centre of the riding represented by the hon. member for Kamloops. It goes down through Yale. I am a good supporter of the government but hon. members do not expect me to stand and vote for this proposed measure because the government has not the courage to say that the natural resources of Canada should be developed for Canada and not for the United States.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member is twenty years too late.

Mr. Green: With regard to the proposed gas line to the Pacific coast, just what jurisdiction will the board of transport commissioners have over it? As I understand it, a bill has been passed in the Senate incorporating a company, and is to come up for consideration in this house presumably tomorrow.

Mr. Cruickshank: It will not get very far.

Mr. Green: If that bill should get through this house, the next step is for that company to apply to the board of transport commissioners for permission to build a line. In that hearing can the board of transport commissioners take into consideration whether or not the gas should be used in Canada? Are they the body which has the power to decide whether it is in the interest of Canada that a pipe line must go through Canada, or do they merely rule on the application as going through so much land? In other words, do they have merely a regulatory power rather than the power to make a decision as to whether or not this product should be used in Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend is right. After the bill passes this house the procedure will be as follows: An application will be made by that company to the board of transport commissioners, and the board will or will not grant the application, depending upon the circumstances. As I said a moment ago, they can deal with the movement from the source to the international boundary line, but they cannot consider a movement beyond that. I think they would take into account the availability of oil or, in this case, gas. I think, too, they should have some regard for the wishes or the policy of the province from which the gas or oil comes. For instance, I believe that the attitude of the government of Alberta, if it cares to make known its views to the board, will be given consideration. I do not see any difference between an application such as this and any other application to the board in so far as representations are concerned.

Mr. Green: That would mean that the board cannot decide whether the gas should be used in Canada or in the United States. Personally I do not think it is their job to decide that. It is the duty of the government to decide as a matter of policy whether these Canadian products should be exported at a time when we still need them in Canada. Certainly that question has not been dealt with by any responsible authority. I suggest to the minister that it must be handled by the government. The government must decide whether or not, as a matter of policy, this Canadian product is to go into the United States rather than be used in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: On the question of policy, the position is exactly the same as it is with reference to the export of fluid and electricity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce decides whether or not he will grant a licence and what conditions he applies to that licence. That took place with reference to the application of the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company. What will happen in connection with the application of the gas line that my hon. friend has in mind I do not know. It would be premature on my part to attempt to discuss it at this stage.

Mr. Green: Once these companies have spent millions of dollars to put in the line it is most unlikely that any governmental authority will refuse to give them a licence to export. The damage is done. Once they start spending their money it is too late to make a change.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the minister one question? Perhaps he will not answer it. He may say that it is a matter of government policy. But I shall ask it. I do not want to go into details because I intend to speak two or three hours on this subject at the appropriate time. Is it the policy of the government to encourage an all-Canadian route for gas and oil and eventually export the surplus to the United States? That is a fair question, and the minister should answer it.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt with that specifically the other evening. In so far as government policy is concerned, my hon. friend has provided the answer himself. That is announced from time to time in individual cases, and on its merits, and I am not going to renew the debate that we had the other evening.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In individual cases?

Mr. Knight: May I ask the minister how hon. members can be expected to vote intelligently on the granting of these applications unless they know to what extent the board of transport commissioners is to regulate these companies and what some of these regulations may mean? The minister says that if things do not run satisfactorily after the pipe line has been in operation, if injustices develop, we can go to the courts for redress.

Mr. Chevrier: What case is my hon. friend talking about? He says we cannot expect to vote intelligently, and I am wondering what case he is referring to.

Mr. Knight: No case in particular. I am talking about applications in general for permission to build pipe lines through this country, when applications are granted by parliament. How can members of the House of Commons be expected to vote intelligently on such applications unless they know whether or not there is to be a regulatory board in the matter? I do not know beforehand what those regulations are likely to be. The minister has suggested that if things do not go properly we can go to the board of transport commissioners and place the matter before them. But I submit that is too late, and that we should have the information now. It may be unreasonable, but that is the way I see it.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member seems concerned about his lack of information on a particular application. If he has in mind the bill which is now in another place, and will come here some time later this week, then I submit to him that that is a private bill. When it comes here it is discussed in the house and sent to a committee. He can go before that committee and get all the information he wants in connection with the bill.

Once the bill had passed the house, an application would go before the board. I do not know what the regulations are. Unquestionably there are some, and I shall be glad to get them for the hon. member. All I can say is that general principles are applied by the board in connection with these applications. In so far as the regulations are concerned, I believe I can get them and table them.

Mr. MacInnis: If I understand the discussion correctly, we are considering two matters, first a pipe line which has already been authorized, so far as the building of it is concerned. It is now being built from one place to another. The second matter is that we are considering a pipe line for another purpose which has not yet been authorized by the house. I think that is putting the matter fairly.

If we take the first pipe line first, it would appear that the government has no policy as to what should be done with Canadian oil. The oil is owned by Imperial Oil Company which, I understand, is a subsidiary of Standard Oil of New Jersey. It is decided to build this pipe line to Superior, Wisconsin—and not to lake Superior in Canada. So far as the government is concerned, they say that that is all right with them. If we take the government's policy on that pipe line we can be pretty sure what its policy will be on the other pipe line. It will be, whatever the company that has the line or is building it, whatever it wishes to do with the gas it owns. If it wishes to pipe it to Timbuctoo, that is all right so far as this government is concerned. The companies have bought the oil, they have bought the gas and that is all there is to it. I do not see why there is so much fault-finding, because that is the policy on which this government went to the country; that is free enterprise. Those who own can do what they like with what they own.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley has said that he wanted Canadian resources to be exploited in Canada. Canadian resources are being exploited in Canada, and exploited from Canada. But Canadian resources are not being developed in Canada, and that is what the hon. member for Fraser Valley would like. There is quite a difference between exploiting and developing.

Mr. Cruickshank: I meant that.

Mr. MacInnis: But why should you worry? You are getting what you voted for. I am quite sure that the minister cannot tell you what the policy is, what the policy in connection with the gas pipe line will be, because he does not know what the company's policy is, and the company has not told him that yet.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, I do not think the hon. member has any right to impute any motives to any person. By that last statement he imputes a motive to me, as minister, in that he says I have not been told by the company what is the company's policy. He has not the slightest right to say that. I know the hon. member is a gentleman and that he will not want to impute those motives to me. I am sure he did not intend to say that, but certainly that is what he said.

Mr. MacInnis: If the minister feels I did him an injustice, then I am quite willing to withdraw—and to withdraw completely. But if the minister will note what I said he will see that I did not refer to the minister, except that the government did not have a policy and the minister could not tell the committee what the policy is. That is what I said. But if the minister feels there is any reflection upon him either as a person or as a minister, then I will withdraw it completely.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think we should have a declaration from the minister.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has insinuated that we should be very careful how we vote.

Mr. Cruickshank: Louder. You are talking about me.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It appears that a good many members in this house are forgetful. I wonder where they think we would be today if it were not for oil we have been getting for years and years from the United States. It is no longer ago than the wartime period of 1940-45 when, had it not been for assistance received by way of oil from our good neighbour to the south of us, this country would have been dry, so far as oil is concerned.

An hon. Member: They looked after themselves first.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I live on the international border line. Down there I know that the oil allocated to Canadians along that border was more liberal in supply than to the citizens of the state of Maine. The pipe line going through the United States is the economical procedure to take. Why try to pipe oil from Alberta to Ontario and Quebec or the maritime provinces when it can go across the border at some point within a reasonable distance, and the oil we require in this section could come back across the border from the United States? I fail to understand why there is all this great worry about Canadian oil going to our friends to the south of us, when they have supplied 90 per cent of the oil brought to this country for years and years.

I have a friendly feeling toward the people down there, because they have done much to help us. Were it not for our neighbour to the south of us, we could not dispose of anything from the section of Canada in which I live. No one in central Canada wishes to buy the commodities or natural products of the maritimes. We are obliged to go to these people to sell what we have to offer. They have been very kind and considerate. If at this moment we are in the fortunate position where we could let some of our oil go south, it would only in some small way repay for some of the good things those people have done for us.

Mr. Cruickshank: My name has been brought into this discussion. I happen to have had the privilege, which my hon. friend did not have, of being born in the United States. Let me tell my hon. friend however that we do not owe the United States any more than they owe us.

The argument advanced by the hon. member is not as good as the delicious lobsters served in his district. They are good, but his argument is ridiculous. We have been the best customer of the United States. I well remember a brilliant young friend of mine in British Columbia, whose name I shall not mention, stating that our fish should be canned here, and our logs processed—and I know my hon. friend from the maritime provinces is particularly interested in fish and would like to have them canned in the maritimes. Why should not our oil be used within the province? I do not care which company is concerned, I submit that that should be done. Last year I sponsored a bill for a certain company, but I repeat that I do not care which company is concerned. This pipe line should go through Canada and serve the best part of Alberta and northern and central British Columbia and then the remainder of the oil could be sent to the United States. Is there anything unreasonable about that?

An hon. Member: Which is the best part of Alberta?

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not know, but I know which is the best part of British Columbia. The hon. member from a small district in the maritimes which is close to the United States border where the poor mounted police are working day and night to see that cigarettes and other things are not smuggled should not be talking to me about the development of Canada. All I am asking is that these pipe lines should go through Canada, no matter what company it is, so that this country may be developed. I know the premier of British Columbia has told us that there are immense resources in northern British Columbia still undeveloped.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member says that this pipe line should go through Canada, but what if the people in the United States had used that same argument about the pipe line coming up to Montreal? What if during the war the United States people had said that they wanted that pipe line to go through United States territory instead of going through to serve Montreal?

The Deputy Chairman: I would remind the committee that we are dealing with item 454, board of transport commissioners for Canada, administration, maintenance and operation. Because of the relationship of pipe lines to the board of transport commissioners some hon. members have taken the opportunity to ask the minister some questions. However, I am afraid that hon. members are now anticipating a bill that is to come before the house. I would ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and confine their discussion to the item now before the committee.

Mr. Cruickshank: I shall be glad to bow to your ruling but Imperial Oil will hear from me in the future.

Mr. Gillis: I agree with what you have just said. I think the time for this discussion was during the last session when seven or eight bills to incorporate these different companies were up for consideration. That is when these arguments should have been advanced. I remember standing in my place to protest against those bills and using practically all the arguments that are being used tonight. When the bill to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company is up for consideration the arguments that are now being advanced can be used to hold up the bill.

For the last eleven years we have been bringing up this business of piping gas and oil to the United States. The arguments tonight are about twenty years late. The same thing can be said about our iron ore rights. We have remote control over our oil by Standard Oil through its subsidiary, Imperial Oil Limited. All those rights have been voted away. I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley that the pipe line should be a Canadian pipe line, with feeder lines to the United States if necessary.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has been kind enough to agree with me, but the remarks he has been making are out of order. However, I think I should be just as generous with him as I have been with the other hon. members.

Mr. Gillis: I did not think I would be remiss if I was out of order for a few minutes, when we have been out of order all night. As I listened to the arguments tonight I could not help but remember the discussion of last session. When the bill to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company is before the house my radical friend from Fraser Valley can back me up in demanding that Canadian resources be developed in Canada.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to comply with your ruling, but as we are dealing with an item having to do with the board of transport commissioners I should like to ask the minister what authority that board has to determine whether the natural resources of this country, such as oil or gas, shall be transported by pipe line to the United States? Does this board provide adequate safeguards that these great natural resources are first made available to the people of western, central and eastern Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I have answered that on at least two occasions, but in order to make the record clear perhaps I should read subsection 3 of section 12 of the Pipe Lines Act, as follows:

(3) Upon the application, the board shall have regard to all considerations that appear to it to be relevant and in particular to the objection of any party interested, a public interest that in the board's opinion may be affected by the granting or the refusing of the application, and to the financial responsibility of the applicant.

I think that is the governing section in connection with these applications. Relative to these applications which so far have been dealt with, the board has had regard to a number of matters. First, it has had regard to the capacity of the proposed line, to how much oil or gas it will be able to carry. Next it has given consideration to the availability for transmission of a sufficient quantity of oil and particularly as to whether or not the construction of the pipe line will extend the market for the oil to be transmitted. I presume that latter item resulted in the discussion that took place here the other evening as well as some of the discussion that is taking place here this evening. It considers whether there is a market in the immediate locality where the oil is likely to be conveyed.

Next is considered the length and the estimated cost of the pipe line and the ability of the applicant to obtain sufficient funds to construct the pipe line. Consideration is given also to the attitude of the government of Alberta to the export of oil from that province by the proposed pipe line. Here I should like to state that under the Oil and Gas Resources Conservation Act of Alberta, as amended in 1949, the petroleum and natural gas conservation board may exercise wide powers, subject to the approval of the lieutenant governor in council, in respect to restricting, prorating or prohibiting the production of oil and gas. Under the Gas Resources Preservation Act, being chapter 2 of the statutes of Alberta, 1949, permission from the board is required before gas can be removed from Alberta for use elsewhere. I think in so far as gas is concerned the picture is quite clear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there anything about gasoline and oil?

Mr. Chevrier: I was referring to the part dealing with gas and oil. I understand that there is objection to gas, but not to oil. Then the board may consider petitions by interested parties and finally it may limit the time during which the pipe line may be constructed. Those are the various considerations that the board takes under advisement with reference to subsection 3 of section 12 of the act.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to ask a question. The minister has quoted certain sections of the act. I was told before that we were somewhat out or order, but the minister has quoted certain sections of the act. Will we have the privilege of putting in the sections which the minister omitted?

Mr. Chevrier: I was quoting from subsection 3 of section 12 of the Pipe Lines Act. The Pipe Lines Act was passed by this parliament. The hon. member can get it at any time.

Mr. Cruickshank: The minister has quoted certain sections. I should like the privilege of putting them all in at some time.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend knows he can put in any section he wants at any time.

Mr. Blackmore: There are several things I should like to tell the minister about the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Cruickshank: He has a lot to learn about this.

Mr. Blackmore: I want to do so in order that he will be on guard when he comes to consider the new adjustment in respect of freight rates. I think hon. members of the house would be astounded to learn some of the things that have been done under the guise of a freight rate structure in some of the provinces of Canada. I shall give a few items affecting my own province. Other hon. members will probably be able to present a similar array as to their own provinces. The examples which I am using are all used in a submission made by the Edmonton chamber of commerce in the year 1938 to the Rowell-Sirois commission. I say that so that hon. members will know that everything I am giving them is authentic, and was prepared by experts employed by the Edmonton chamber of commerce. I think there will be no question that these freight rates existed in 1938. If there have been substantial changes since that time the minister will be able to point them out. Let us bear in mind that since that time there have been two distinct advances in freight rates allowed all across the board with no allowance whatsoever being made for irregularities or inequalities suffered by any area or any province.

In the first place the ordinary consumers of Alberta are penalized for living in Alberta. To move flannelette blankets from eastern Canada to Vancouver costs $1.75 per hundredweight, but when they go to Edmonton the freight rate is $4.53½. Kalsomine costs $1 per hundredweight to move it to Vancouver from Montreal or eastern Canada and $1.33½ to move it to Edmonton, 500 miles nearer the point of origin. Lard and cooking oils cost $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Paints and varnishes are $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Shoes are $2 to Vancouver and $3.03 to Edmonton. Soaps are $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Wrought iron pipe is 70 cents to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. The above figures are all per hundredweight.

If it were only an isolated case of that sort one would imagine that it had just happened, but a list of such irregularities as the one I have in my hands makes it appear as though the whole thing was by design. The reduction for class rates is on a higher percentage in eastern Canada than on movements from eastern Canada to Alberta. That is the definite statement made by the Edmonton chamber of commerce at page 28 of their submission.

The primary producers of Alberta are handicapped by freight rates. To move barbed wire, of which we use a good deal, from Montreal to Vancouver costs 75 cents a hundredweight, but to Edmonton it costs $1.98 a hundredweight. Wire fencing costs $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Building paper and roofing costs $1.25 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Iron and steel bars cost 65 cents to Vancouver and $1.79 to Edmonton. Nails cost $1.50 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Structural steel, bolts and nuts cost $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Many other hardware items are treated similarly. Twine costs $1.30 to Vancouver and $2.33½ to Edmonton. Window glass costs $1 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton.

Alberta uses a great many agricultural implements, and British Columbia considerably fewer, but in one classification it costs $1.25 to move them to Vancouver, and $1.79 to Edmonton. According to another classification it is $1.50 to Vancouver and $1.98 to Edmonton. Galvanized or plain steel sheets cost 60 cents to Vancouver and $1.44 to Edmonton.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to hon. members of the committee, that that array of inequities constitutes an absolutely scandalous reflection on the board of transport commissioners. I doubt that they can be defended on any grounds of equity or logic.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may interrupt the hon. member on a point of order, I presume he has quite a lengthy speech on this matter, and I do not want to interrupt him unduly, but I think that first of all it should be brought to the attention of the chair that at the moment there is before the board of transport commissioners an application for a 20 per cent increase, an interim judgment having been handed down, and an appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of Canada. Since the matter is pendente lite I submit that it should not be discussed at this time. The hon. member is discussing the very matters that came up in that case. If the Chairman feels that he should be allowed to proceed I will listen, but I think we are proceeding right in the teeth of the rules.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the point raised by the minister is well taken. Now that the reasons have been stated by the minister I presume the hon. member who has the floor will refrain from discussing that particular point.

Mr. Blackmore: I will not proceed with the discussion, but I think hon. members will be a bit surprised to find that this discussion has been permitted for an hour and a half, and just as soon as a really adequate arrangement of the whole argument is presented the subject is sub judice. If there is any one thing that needs to be placed on Hansard so that the people of Canada and the members of the house can see the kind of thing that has been done by the board of transport commissioners, in support of whom we are passing an estimate, this is the very thing that everybody ought to know.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the hon. member that the provinces and boards of trade, and I presume the board of trade he is referring to now, had every opportunity and took advantage of it in presenting to the board of transport commissioners their arguments on the 21 per cent case, again on the 20 per cent case, and still further to the royal commission on transportation. What more could the hon. member wish by way of public hearings?

Mr. Blackmore: The trouble does not arise because of the fact that these arguments have not been presented effectively. The astounding thing to the house and to the country is that the board of transport commissioners has paid no attention whatsoever to the presentations that have been made, and have gone right ahead just as though they had not been made at all. Take the presentation of any of the seven provinces of this dominion which protested against the recent advance of 8 per cent. We shall find a case that is simply astonishing, yet no attention is paid to it at all. We had a similar presentation by each province against the increase of 1946, and again no attention was paid to it. The increase was allowed, and no adjustments were permitted to make up for the inequities which abound in the freight rate structure of this country.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that as soon as the sub judice principle is applied I am out of order. I am just a little astonished, however, that it has been applied to stop me while it was not applied to stop others, but I thank you for having permitted me to go as far as you did. Hon. members will be glad to know that I could produce five times as much as I have placed on Hansard tonight, and that I would be quite prepared to produce it had I not been called to order.

Item agreed to.

453. Departmental administration, $836,737.

Mr. Isnor: Under this item I desire to bring before the minister and the committee the question of the policy being pursued by the government with respect to shipping. I am not sure that the government has a definite shipping policy, but I am going to ask the minister that question and perhaps later on he will be good enough to advise us as to what policy is being pursued in respect of Canadian shipping. I refer him to the situation we have at the present time on the Atlantic coast. I am sure he is familiar with a great many of the facts, but I doubt if a person can realize the effects of that situation unless he is actually at or near one of our Atlantic ports.

I recall the position in which we found ourselves with respect to shipping in the early days of the war, and I am further reminded of that by the report of the Canadian maritime commission, which in its first report had this to say:

> In 1939 the Canadian fleet of regular ocean-going ships over 1,600 gross tons contained only 35 ships, totalling 242,000 gross tons. By 1947 this fleet had increased to 153 ships, totalling 983,000 gross tons, and a further 80 ships totalling about 560,000 gross tons were on charter to the United Kingdom ministry of transport.

That fleet placed us in fourth position among the shipping nations of the world. I recall that it was not unusual to see 50, 75 or 100 ships in Bedford basin, the inland body of water off Halifax harbour. Anyone who wished could go to Citadel Hill almost any morning and watch these ships sail out of the harbour in convoy at intervals of perhaps four minutes, with 15 ships sailing each hour. This would go on for three or four hours, until one could see 50, 75 or 100 ships moving out of that harbour. Today practically no ships are going out of Halifax harbour. The minister will say that war conditions were responsible for a great deal of the shipping that went through the port of Halifax. We recognize that, but we are concerned over what is being done to overcome the present scarcity of shipping through our ports; and when I say "our ports" I am not referring particularly to Halifax, because the same thing applies to Saint John and other Atlantic ports.

I recall that in 1942 I took strong exception to the personnel suggested for the maritime commission. It was not that I had any particular feeling with respect to the individuals mentioned, but I stressed the fact that on that commission we wanted a man from the Atlantic coast, a maritime man who understood our problems. The minister was rather put out with me because I spoke so strongly on the matter. He is smiling now, but he was rather cross because I kept insisting in that vein. Today I feel that I was justified in stressing that point, because now we find ourselves in the unfortunate position of not having a policy at all, as far as I know, or at least of not having any remedy which will help solve our shipping problems on the Atlantic coast.

I am going to ask the minister also to explain to the committee the results of the survey made by the commission. I understand they were asked to make a survey; and in fact this is mentioned in their report covering the period to March 31, 1948, tabled in this house. The commission was to conduct a survey which would include, first, the existing domestic and international shipping services needed to serve Canadian trade. That was one answer they were to give us, how that objective could best be reached. Second, they were to advise as to the most suitable ships for employment in Canadian services; and third, as to the operating costs of Canadian ships as compared with those of other registries. If I were a lawyer I think I would rest my case on those three points, but I am just an ordinary businessman, and it is from the business approach that I place my facts before the minister in the hope that later this evening he will be able to give a satisfactory answer, or at least let us know what is being done by his department and particularly by the maritime commission with respect to these surveys. According to this report the commission was formed——to co-ordinate the administration of shipping matters and recommend to the government policies for the preservation of the shipping and shipbuilding industries. The Canadian Maritime Commission Act provides that the commission shall recommend to the Minister of Transport policies and measures which it considers necessary for the maintenance, manning and development of the Canadian merchant fleet and shipbuilding industry; administer steamship subventions voted by parliament; and assume any other powers, duties and functions required by the Minister of Transport or by the governor in council. The act also authorizes the commission to investigate and study Canadian requirements with respect to shipping services, the type, size and speed of ships required for these services, Canadian shipbuilding and ship-repairing facilities and the costs of building ships in Canada and operating them under Canadian flag.

Those words "Canadian flag" bring to mind a thought I am going to place before the government. There is an item in the estimates to which I am not going to refer at length. It is item No. 488, dealing with maritime freight rates, which calls for the payment of $5,500,000 to carry out the purposes of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. If I may go back to 1923, in that year Hon. W. S. Fielding brought into operation a ten per cent preference on all goods entering Canada through Canadian ports, which was of material benefit to our ports, particularly those on the Atlantic coast. I am going to ask the minister and the maritime commission to consider a policy somewhat along that line and based upon that principle, except that instead of dealing with incoming freight it should deal with outgoing cargoes; that is, the payment of a subsidy or other assistance on freight shipped through Canadian ports in Canadian ships carrying the Canadian flag. I believe that if a policy such as that could be worked out it would be of real benefit to the shipping interests. Today we know that operating costs are high. In an article I read in Saturday Night of February 1, 1949, headed "Canada Must Have a Policy for Merchant Shipping," reference is made to the cost of operation; and it reads in part as follows:

As it has been officially announced recently by the chairman of the Canadian maritime commission, it costs about $950 per day under the American flag, $780 per day under Canadian flag, and $500 per day under British flag to run these ships or similar types.

As can be seen, roughly speaking there is a fifty per cent increase in the rate on the Canadian shipping lines over that of the United Kingdom shipping lines. Those are the figures supplied, I believe, by the maritime commission to the writer of this article, which goes on to refer to other ships as follows:

Italian and Norwegian vessels operate still cheaper. Although management is part of cash outlays, these figures exclude it and also depreciation and interest. Our competitors, therefore, operate at about fifty to sixty per cent of our costs.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member in order to ask this question? Did he say there was a difference of fifty per cent in the rates?

Mr. Isnor: No, in operating costs per day. I am quoting the figures.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the record will indicate that the hon. member said "rates". I am sure he did not intend that.

Mr. Isnor: No, I did not intend that. I thank the minister for correcting me. The costs per day are $500 as compared with $780, which would be roughly fifty per cent. Is that clear for the minister's officials? At least that is the way I interpret it.

As I have already stated, that is an important matter to us, and it is important from many angles. It is important not only to the ship owners or operators and to the crew but also to the trades associated with the shipping interests in any port. We have our longshoremen. In Halifax alone there is a waterfront population of something like 4,000. That includes of course not only those who unload the ships, check the freight and so on but those who supply provisions.

Of importance to any port are the shipyards for making repairs to ships. Just within the last few days I read that Halifax Shipyards Limited proposed to lay off 500 or 600 men largely because there is no repair work. So I say that this is an important matter, and I sincerely hope that the minister will be able to give some consideration to the suggestion I have made.

I am not an expert on shipping. I do not know whether it is possible or feasible to work out the suggestion I have laid before you but it is being done in respect to incoming freight and I cannot see any reason why it cannot be reversed. I cannot see any reason why something cannot be worked out by these officials. I have every respect for the officials of the Canadian maritime commission, but I feel that if they had the advice of a man from the Atlantic coast they would be in a much better position to handle these matters which I have placed before you. I shall leave that question with the minister, and perhaps he will be good enough a little later on to indicate what policy he proposes to follow and also what remedy he has for the difficulties experienced by our shipping on the Atlantic coast.

Coupled with that matter is one that has already been raised on the floor of the house by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and also by others. It has to do with the merchant navy. I couple the two matters, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that the one is linked up with the other. A large number of these young members of the former merchant navy are walking our streets today because of shipping conditions in our part of the country. I feel that something should be done for those young men. Last December an order in council was passed. I refer to P.C. 5983. I think I am correct in the number. If not, the minister will know the one I mean. It had to do with vocational training. It will be recalled that there were two restrictions in that order in council, one dealing with the age—restricting the applicants to age thirty—and the other dealing with the deadline, June 30.

The information given to the committee last Friday evening by the Minister of Veterans Affairs was to the effect that there were 770 applications received, 118 were rejected as being over age—I wish the minister would remember that figure, 118—100 applications were withdrawn, 195 were rejected on various grounds, 40 were still in the process of consideration, and 317 were accepted for vocational training and the benefits provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. But these young men come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport and it is to that department that I put the plea that an amendment be made to this order in council by striking out the age limit of thirty. Large numbers of these young men were too young to enter the regular armed services. They were perhaps sixteen, seventeen, seventeen and a half and under. We had a large number of them both on the east and west coasts. Then there were those who were too old. I do not know whether or not all the older ones care to take up vocational training but at least 118 are anxious to do so. These young men today, because of shipping conditions, are unemployed. From an educational standpoint I believe it would be well for the government to amend that order in council and to bring into effect a measure whereby they would be permitted to enjoy the benefits enjoyed by other members of the armed forces and to obtain vocational training. I hope I have made that point clear. I am asking the minister to remove both restrictions, the one applying to the age and the other applying to the deadline. If he does not wish to do away entirely with the deadline, I would suggest that he might be good enough to extend it to June 30, 1950, instead of having it as it now reads, namely, June 30, 1949.

I think I have covered, as briefly as I could, the points I had in mind, namely, what policy if any the government have and what remedy they propose with respect to our shipping conditions on the Atlantic coast; and in the second place, to give these young merchant navy men the opportunity to further their education by extending D.V.A. benefits so as to give them vocational training.

Mr. Robertson: I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members, and of the Minister of Transport in particular, a question which is of vital concern to my constituency of Northumberland, and particularly to my home town of Cobourg. It is also of great importance to a wide area of central Ontario. For some months we have heard repeated rumours that the Ontario Car Ferry Company, which operates the Ontario car ferries between Rochester, New York, and Cobourg, Ontario, would be discontinued. It has been proven that these rumours have real foundation because we have been told by the president of the Canadian National Railways that serious consideration is being given to the discontinuance of this car ferry service.

The Ontario Car Ferry Company is owned jointly by the Canadian National Railways and the Baltimore and Ohio Railway in the United States. The boats are under Canadian registry and therefore under Canadian management. They have been in operation for some forty years and have been used extensively for the movement of freight between Canada and the United States, and for passenger service between these two countries. I can understand that the minister might be loath to interfere in such a situation on the grounds it is one of internal management, but I suggest to him that it is not a question of internal management but one of operational service; and is one which should receive his serious consideration.

The services as performed by the Ontario Car Ferry Company are of vital importance to a wide area of central Ontario and a large part of New York state. For many years many tourists have entered Canada via the ferry and spread to all parts of Canada, particularly to all parts of central Ontario. We know they have left many thousands of dollars in Canada, and therefore at the present time are a source of much-needed United States dollars. I am sure other hon. members, particularly the hon. members for Hastings South, Peterborough West and Hastings-Peterborough, can bear witness to the fact that many tourists have entered their counties via the Ontario car ferry. Each summer many Americans make the pleasure trip across the lake and spend several hours ashore in Cobourg, spending many dollars in that town. The movement of freight by the ferry has been of great importance. Large quantities of pulpwood, newsprint, feldspar and such material pass from Canada to the United States, and large quantities of coal and salt proceed northward from the United States to Canada.

These boats performed a very vital function during the war and were on a twenty-four hour basis, both boats being in constant operation. In view of the valuable services that I have outlined it is not hard to imagine the anxiety with which the rumours have been heard in central Ontario. It is the considered opinion of the people in central Ontario that the management has been lacking in efficiency and in imagination.

The management is by remote control, with the traffic manager living in Montreal and coming to Cobourg about once a month. I understand that between $75 and $100 a month is spent on telephone calls to contact the traffic manager about various problems.

No effort has been made to secure new business, certainly not in the area which these boats serve. I think we could expect that signs of any such effort would be seen in that community. Much of the hard coal can be brought into central Ontario by the ferry if an effort by the management were made to secure this business. Many of the coal dealers in these areas have indicated their willingness to co-operate if any effort were made by the management to secure the business. We know that two of the large consumers of industrial coal in Cobourg bring their coal to that town by car ferry, having found it the cheapest and most efficient route. They are quite concerned regarding the possibility of discontinuance of this service, and they say that if such happens they will bring their coal in by their own boats, and therefore the railroads will lose this revenue.

I think it is reasonable to conclude that if these two large users of industrial coal find it profitable to do so, other industries in this area could be induced to do so if any effort were made by the management to secure this business. We know that large quantities of pulpwood proceed from Canada to the United States via the ferry. I think this business will continue in good volume. We do know that during last spring this volume of business fell off, largely owing to a strike in a factory in the United States which used this pulpwood. We can conclude that this is probably one of the reasons for the present deficit, and that it would be much less in the future.

It is our belief that the passenger service on these boats could be increased greatly. By proper advertising more people would be induced to travel by the ferry. We have had numerous excursions on these boats in the past, but at the present time little effort is made to secure this business. We have been told that a certain club in our town decided against holding an excursion simply because no effort was made by the management to secure this business.

The ferries are advertised as automobile transports, yet we know that any automobiles that are transported by this route have to be on hand about two hours before sailing time, and quite often people who have a reservation come to this area and find that there is no space available for their automobiles to take them to the United States. Certainly that is a definite sign that there is inefficient management.

We are informed by the Canadian National Railways that because of the operating deficit these boats must be removed. It is hard to get figures to correspond as to what this operating deficit is. I have had information from three sources, two of which are the Canadian National Railways and the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, and none of them correspond. It seems to me to be a most unusual fact that they cannot agree on what the deficit is. In view of the increased business which could be secured by proper management I do not believe the figures they quote are sufficient to warrant the discontinuance of this service.

It is also very difficult for us to understand why a service which in past years has justified the use of two boats should suddenly find itself in the position where there is not enough business for one boat.

A study of the carloadings of these ferries is very instructive. We find that business is as good today as it was a year ago on all movements from Canada to the United States. It is true there is some falling off in business in the carloadings from the United States to Canada, but when we study the situation we find that most of this falling off in business is on account of the marked decrease in the shipment of Canadian National Railways' coal by the ferry. We know that the greater part of the Canadian National Railways coal is now brought into Canada around the lakehead, necessitating a long haul rather than a direct haul to Cobourg through the ferry route. This would look to us as almost a discrimination by the Canadian National Railways against the Ontario Car Ferry Company. It is hard for us to believe that car for car it is cheaper to bring the coal by the long route rather than by the direct route across the ferry. I have been told that if the Canadian National Railways would import their coal in the same quantities as they did a few years ago the car ferry company could operate economically.

During the conference which we had in Montreal I asked the chairman in charge of finance this question: "Would the Ontario Car Ferry Company pay if both the Baltimore and Ohio and the Canadian National Railways made up their minds to make it pay?" He said: "Why certainly it would." I point out to you that, in my opinion, the two parent companies are not doing all they can to make this operation profitable.

The Canadian National Railways also point out that these boats are old; that they cannot be serviceable for very long. But I am informed on good authority that the hulls of these boats are in good shape; that the engines in No. 2 are quite satisfactory for some time, and that the boilers of Ontario Car Ferry No. 2 could also be made serviceable with some major repairs, which would allow it to carry on for some time. It would at least allow it to carry on long enough to prove or disprove our claim that, with proper management, they could operate economically. As for Ontario No. 1, the older of the two, we do know that another company looked at this boat not long ago with a view of putting it into operation at some other point. If that be so, then one might reasonably conclude that even this boat is not in too bad condition.

As I said before, these boats performed a vital function during the war. While the possibility of war is perhaps remote, nevertheless it is a factor we should consider. I believe these boats are vitally important to the defence of the continent. It is my opinion that the Canadian National Railways should not discontinue their operation until it is proven beyond doubt that they cannot be operated economically.

The citizens of central Ontario would not expect the operation to continue if heavy deficits continued to pile up, provided they were sure the company was receiving sympathetic consideration from the Canadian National Railways. It is our opinion that this is not so at the moment. The views expressed by me this evening are not only my own, but as well those of the people in central Ontario. A meeting was held at Cobourg some weeks ago at which all the counties of central Ontario were represented, and it was our view that these ferries still perform a function that is vital to central Ontario.

The delegation also visited the United States. We know that in the United States there is sympathetic regard for the value of these boats, and that they are making every effort to induce the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company to maintain this service.

My remarks are made in no spirit of biased criticism of the C.N.R., but with a hope of maintaining and continuing this service. I have a few suggestions to make which, if duly considered, will I believe do much toward making this a profitable operation. I suggest first that we have a young and energetic traffic manager, and that he be stationed at Cobourg where he would be in constant touch with the operation of the car ferry. I think it is important that he receive sympathetic support from senior officers of the Canadian National.

The town of Cobourg is prepared to offer the market building, located a short distance from the dock at which Ontario car ferries tie up, as a place where this traffic manager could carry on his operations. I believe he would be able to do a much better job if he were on duty there rather than operate by remote control from Montreal. In my view it would be a good thing if a committee of interested citizens of Canada and the United States were formed to assist the traffic manager in securing new business.

We in central Ontario did not know that a serious condition was developing in connection with the operation of these boats. Now that we have found it out we should have an opportunity to work with them to prove that the boats can be operated economically. I suggest that the C.N.R. should undertake to ship their full quota of coal by this route. We should expect 100 per cent support from the Canadian National. There should be a conference of all railroads affected to discuss rates and divisions of the railroads. For example, at the present time the Baltimore and Ohio are charging 55 cents per ton more on coal shipped by ferry than they are charging on coal being sent by self-unloaders to Canada.

Some determined effort should be made to secure an increase in passenger service. By proper advertising I am sure many more people could be induced to take this step. I am convinced we could get many more excursions to pass over the route. No effort has been made to increase these excursions. I took a trip not long ago on one of these boats, and was shocked by the situation on the other side. A person has to climb one hundred steps in order to go from the ferry to the city of Rochester. In view of the great difficulty this occasions even a healthy person, one can see that it would be absolutely impossible for either an invalid or an aged person to climb these stairs.

There should be better service for the transportation of automobiles, and I am sure if this were developed it would be a source of great remuneration to the company.

Then, if there is insufficient business for two boats, why not proceed with one. This would cut down operating costs and should make possible the economic operation of the service.

In brief, I believe I have set out the present situation of the Ontario Car Ferry Company. I would urge upon the minister that he consider my representations, and before approving any decisions by the Canadian National Railways to discontinue this service, if at any time in the future such decision should be made, that he refer the whole matter to the board of transport commissioners for investigation.

I base my request upon the following reasons:

1. Because of the discrepancy in figures concerning the deficit of the Ontario Car Ferry Company, as supplied from various sources.

2. Because there is no organized system to secure business for the Ontario Car Ferry Company. The only agents trying to find business for the company are those of the Canadian National Railways; and it is my opinion that they give to the ferry company only that business which they cannot handle themselves.

3. In view of the statement of the vice-president that the two parent companies could make this company pay, if they wished, then I say it is reasonable to conclude that possibly at the present time there is some effort to take business from the Ontario Car Ferry Company and this situation should be fully investigated before any decision is handed down in this regard.

4. In view of the appointment of Mr. Donald Gordon as president of the Canadian National Railways, and his taking office on January 1, I do not believe that now is the proper time to take such a radical course as that of discontinuing the service.

May I at this time thank the minister for his courtesy to me in arranging a meeting of my delegation with officials of the Canadian National Railways. He has been a great help to me in this regard. I would ask him to make sure that all phases of the operation of this service are looked into before the ferries cease operation.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not like the record to become encumbered with a number of questions which have not been answered. With that in mind I shall attempt to answer the questions of the senior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Northumberland.

The hon. member for Halifax raised the subject of the shipping policy of the government, and the present position in regard to the Canadian merchant navy. This is an important problem because at the moment the position is, I must admit, quite serious in many respects. This is due to a number of causes which I have already stated in the house. First there is the matter of increased cost of operation and construction of ships. The next is the lack of freight and the deterioration in freight rates; and the last, but not the least, is the effect of devaluation.

The operating cost of a Canadian flagship is the second highest in the world. The United States daily operating costs, exclusive of fuel oil and depreciation, amount to $972.52; the Canadian costs come second with $810.50; and those of the United Kingdom, the sixth highest in a list of nine countries, stand at $525.46. The lowest of all costs are those of Italy where it is $421.71.

Mr. Green: What are the Norwegian and Swedish costs?

Mr. Chevrier: I shall get those in a moment. The cost of constructing a United Kingdom ship is 25 per cent less than that of a Canadian ship. That is a serious condition which Canadian flag ship operators have had to deal with and meet. I referred to the decline in cargoes all over the world. That is a condition which is not peculiar to Canada alone. There are some 118 ships in our own fleet and at the moment 23 have been laid up. The United States have laid up 2,050 war-built ships.

Mr. Isnor: Out of how many?

Mr. Chevrier: There are 323 chartered United States vessels still operating, but whether the total is the addition of those two figures, I am not able to say. I am informed that there are about 250,000 deadweight tons under European flags and about 1,600,000 deadweight tons under North and South American flags which are at present demobilized. Those include 75 Greek-owned vessels. My latest information is that United Kingdom owners are complaining that current rates are unremunerative.

A third cause, that of devaluation, has placed the Canadian operators in a difficult position. The results of devaluation cannot be clearly seen at this moment because ships are chartered for months in advance and it is impossible to estimate with accuracy the difference that will occur in operation costs.

Another feature which has given the government a great deal of concern is the overall picture that must be considered, not only with respect to our own ships but with respect to the movement of commodities in bottoms from Canada to European and world markets. The whole shipping problem is of such magnitude that I am sure my hon. friend will not expect me to tell him what the policy is at the moment. The government is giving a great deal of consideration to a number of plans. I wish I could say what those plans are but I do not think it is in the public interest to do so. I want my hon. friend to know that careful consideration is being given to the best way to meet the present position.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will that policy be declared before prorogation?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any definite assurance as to when it will be. It certainly will not be in the immediate future because until the picture of the effects of devaluation is clearer than it is at the moment, any policy announced now would be simply premature.

Mr. Green: Will legislation be introduced at this session?

Mr. Chevrier: Legislation was announced in the speech from the throne and it is my intention to bring down legislation during the session.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to point out—

Mr. Chevrier: Will my hon. friend allow me to make the statement? I am trying to reply to the hon. member for Halifax on the general position. After I have completed it, if my hon. friend wants to ask any questions, he may.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to point out that it is urgent to a great many people that a policy be declared.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me tell my hon. friend that no one realizes more than I how urgent it is. The statement which he has made to the effect that it is urgent certainly does not add anything to the debate, as I see it. I am fully conscious of the seriousness of the problem. I said so a moment ago and I repeat now that to move into this position too quickly when one does not know what the effects of devaluation are likely to be might be far more serious now than in two or three months. I am sorry to say that perhaps more ships will have to be laid up, but the condition is not one peculiar to this country. To a large extent it is world-wide, and I do not think the government should be pushed into making an immediate decision when the problem is one that requires more than ordinary consideration.

My hon. friend suggested one or two remedies, one being something like vote 488 of the estimates. I am glad to tell him that that is a matter that will receive consideration. I am unable to see whether it would be of assistance at the moment. The rates he has referred to are fixed by world markets and I am not in position to state whether a subsidy paid to the shipper would be an answer to the problem. I think there is an answer, but I doubt if it lies along that line.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked what the Norwegian costs were. They are $506.68 per day, and apparently the Swedish costs are the same. There are 4,800 United States ships of 100 gross tons or over, making a total of 26,900,000 gross tons. I assume that of that 4,800 ships the 2,050 that I mentioned a moment ago have been laid up.

The hon. member also brought up the question of merchant seamen which was discussed the other evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Vancouver East. Perhaps the best way to handle that briefly is to say that the officers of the Department of Transport and of the Department of Veterans Affairs are governed by the terms of order in council P.C. 5983. They are putting into effect the conditions laid down in that order in council which was passed following a recommendation by the veterans affairs committee that merchant seamen under the age of 30 years who were receiving certain benefits and certain bonuses should be entitled to vocational training other than what was available prior to the passing of the order in council. Up to that time the only vocational training they were receiving had to do with their own calling and they were then entitled to vocational training of any kind such as that given to veterans of the armed services. As I said a moment ago, those two conditions, the one of age and the time limit of June 30, were fixed by the order in council and the officers of the departments are simply putting that order into effect. In order to change that an order in council amending those regulations would be necessary, and of course that would have to be a matter of government policy. In all fairness to the house I think I should tell the hon. member for Halifax, and the other two hon. members who raised the question on Friday evening, that I shall be glad to bring their representations to the attention of my colleague. I do not know what should be done. At the time that it was approved by the veterans affairs committee it was felt that the age of thirty was a fair one. Now there seems to be some injustice.

Mr. Isnor: Would the minister be good enough to have his officials consult with the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I should have included that in my undertaking because it was my intention that that should be done.

Mr. Isnor: Thank you.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Vancouver East raised a question about one individual who had been prejudiced by the fact that he could not apply within the six months' period. He referred to a letter which I had written. I presume again I was bound by the terms of the order in council; but, as I have stated I shall be glad, in conjunction with my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to look into the terms of the order in council.

I should like to deal quickly, but without disrespect when I say "quickly", with the representations made by the hon. member for Northumberland. He presented the case very fairly as to the operations of the car ferry between Cobourg in his constituency, and Rochester, New York. The difficulty with that service, as well as with some other services operated by the Canadian National Railways, is that it is not a paying proposition. Unfortunately there is more than one service of that kind, and more than one which will have to be regarded from the standpoint of the profit of the enterprise.

In this particular case it is a joint enterprise operated by the C.N.R. and the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, and in 1948 the operating results were such that the Canadian National Railways had to sell a substantial amount of its Canadian government bonds—I believe $80,000 worth—in order to pay the deficit. I realize that services of this character are of extreme importance to a community. The community has grown to rely upon them. Tourist traffic uses them, and it is a great pity that they should be cut off overnight, as it were, but I am afraid that I must put before the hon. member the position of the Canadian National Railways when it is face to face with keen highway competition.

The hon. member spoke about the terrible service on the other side and the hundred stairs he had to climb. Of course that is so, and I am glad he brought it up because the service is bad not only there but elsewhere, particularly in connection with the operation of ships. People do not travel by ship today as they did in days gone by; they travel by highway. They want to move quickly, and that is why the position is such as he pointed out. That is why it is difficult to operate at a profit. When operations have shown a loss over a period of years, surely the railway must give consideration to alternatives, and when the operation is a joint one then I suppose it must consult the other joint owner, which in this case is a United States corporation.

The hon. member made some most thoughtful and helpful suggestions. I thank him for having brought them to my attention and to the attention of the house. I can assure him that I will bring them to the attention of the officers of the Canadian National Railways. He has suggested that the whole matter be referred to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. I am unable to tell him at this time whether or not I would be prepared to do that. First of all I would have to be convinced that the board has jurisdiction in a matter of this kind. I am not so sure that it has, but if he will allow me to give it consideration in that respect perhaps I can tell him at a later date whether or not that is possible. I am sure he will understand it is impossible for me to do so at this juncture.

Mr. Robertson: I should like to point out one matter. The minister spoke about the sale of bonds. I believe those bonds were acquired out of operational profits of the Ontario car ferry in past years. Therefore I do not think it is too serious if they had to sell them.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I listened with a great deal of interest tonight to the hon. member for Halifax discussing the subject of merchant shipping. I was pleased to learn from the minister that the matter has been under active consideration by the government. I think it would be a great pity if any of our ships were allowed to lie up in mothballs as they have been recently in Halifax and in other seaports of the country.

I want to direct the attention of the committee to another matter this evening, the growing necessity for the establishment in Canada of a Canadian coastguard. It appears to me as a new member that this is a matter which has been given little, if any, consideration by the government. From the information I have obtained since I entered the house, and indeed since I came to Ottawa, it would appear that it has had very little if any attention. At page 987 of Hansard for 1948 there is an answer made by the Minister of Transport in reply to a question asked by the then member for Skeena, Mr. Archibald. The present minister stated at that time, speaking of a coastguard:

> The matter is one which has been given consideration not only by the Department of Transport but also by the government as a whole, and while the establishment of a coastguard deserves a great deal of sympathetic consideration, on the other hand when one considers the tremendous cost which would follow the extensive establishment of coastguards on all the coasts of Canada he cannot help but come to the conclusion that the cost would be entirely out of proportion to the matter to which my hon. friend referred.

To me at least, Mr. Chairman, that answer appears to have very little to commend it. To consider the question of cost when the matter of saving lives is at stake is not a very good answer for the government of the great Dominion of Canada to make, and particularly, I say to the minister, when so much money is being spent for other services that are not nearly so vital as the establishment of a coastguard. The minister also said at that time:

> I should bring to the hon. member's attention, however, the fact that at the present time the existing facilities for such service are marine service steamers, fishery patrol vessels, Royal Canadian Mounted Police vessels and also the search and rescue squads of the R.C.A.F., which are devoted almost exclusively to air rescue, but which oftentimes have come to the assistance of marine casualties.

Again I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is no answer. In my humble opinion it is not sufficient to have a number of services such as those outlined by the minister. What is vitally needed is one service whose sole responsibility it will be.

The need of a coastguard, I feel certain, is apparent not only to hon. members whose constituencies border the sea but to hon. members whose constituencies are on the great lakes and in fact, I am sure, to all hon. members. I feel certain that those living inland, whose livelihood is not dependent in any way upon the sea or the great lakes, nevertheless have great interest in the safety of our seamen both on the lakes and on the greater waters of the Pacific and the Atlantic. The present system of spreading the marine services among half a dozen departments is stupid, inefficient, costly and illogical. A coastguard properly constituted could very well handle a number of the duties now distributed among different departments under different administrations. These duties would include policing and revenue protection, rescue services, hydrographic surveys and the maintenance of navigational aids.

Several of these services now are being looked after by the marine section of the mounted police. I entirely agree that this is a great force, but it was not designed nor equipped for coastguard work. The marine section is primarily a police force and operates as such. The extraordinary arrangement of using policemen for sea duty, I have been told, has led to use of the expression, "Spurs on the quarterdeck". Do not think I am criticizing this great force in any way, Mr. Chairman. I am not. They have shown themselves to be first-class sailors. They have performed many missions which were really the work of a coastguard rather than police work. My criticism is directed not against the section but against the system. The sort of men in the marine section is shown by the fact that in the last great war 87 per cent of the personnel joined the armed services, most of them serving with the navy, where they played a great part in those frantic days when Canada's navy was expanding from practically nothing to the tremendous striking force it became by the end of the war. These men helped in setting up port defences, examination stations, seagoing patrols and many other routines which had to be established quickly. They were of the greatest value in training new recruits, since they possessed the type of knowledge most necessary, including engineering, administration and seamanship. Sixty-six Canadian warships were commanded by men of the section, while 28 warships had men from the section in charge of their engine rooms. It is a record of which they may well be proud; and it proves that Canada can find competent seamen for a properly constituted coastguard service, men who can do a more useful job for our country than is possible at the present time, with the marine services divided among so many different departments.

Hon. members are aware of the great services performed by the United States coastguard. They must be aware also of how often Canada is compelled to call upon that coastguard service, because we have none of our own. It should be humiliating to all hon. members and indeed to all Canadians that in this day and age, when Canada is setting herself up as a world power, we must rely upon the assistance of our great neighbour to the south, no matter how willingly that assistance may be given.

This is no new question I am bringing up. In my discussion and reading since coming to Ottawa I find that it has been urged on innumerable occasions. The Bovey commission reported some considerable time ago, in view of the representations made and evidence submitted—

—that an independent committee be set up by the government to study the proposal for a Canadian coastguard, and if formation of a Canadian coastguard is recommended, to outline its functions and organization.

However, this recommendation came to nothing; and, as was commented by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of July 12, 1946, "Trying to sell Ottawa a coastguard idea is like ploughing the sand". The provincial government of British Columbia has gone on record in favour of a coastguard service, as has the British Columbia command of the Canadian Legion. The Annapolis Royal board of trade and the Annapolis valley boards of trade have also endorsed the proposal. The Nova Scotia command of the Canadian Legion submitted that the establishment of a coastguard would be in line with the rehabilitation policy of the dominion government——in that it would provide employment for ex-naval personnel, many of whom would be particularly well qualified for work of this nature.

On January 15, 1949, the Vancouver merchants' exchange submitted a brief on behalf of the Vancouver Merchants' Exchange Limited, the fishing vessel owners' association, the Canadian merchant service guild, the ship owners' association (deep sea) of British Columbia, the British Columbia tow boat owners' association, the Vancouver board of trade, the salmon canners' operating committee, Lloyd's agency, the Board of Marine Underwriters of San Francisco Incorported, the Vancouver chamber of shipping, the coastwise operators' association of British Columbia, and the naval officers' association of British Columbia. This brief set out the geographical nature of the coast of British Columbia and the urgent necessity for the setting up of a coastguard. It is much too long to quote today, but I can assure hon. members that it was a very well reasoned argument. Apparently, however, it proved of no avail.

Then in March of the present year the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada added its voice to all the others in requesting the establishment of a Canadian coastguard service for both coasts and the great lakes. According to the Vancouver Sun of August 17, 1949, the fishermen's union of Vancouver made a demand upon the government for a coastguard service; and in another item appearing in the same newspaper in April, 1949, it is stated that representatives of thirteen coastal organizations met with Mr. J. C. Lessard, deputy minister of transport, and Mr. Jack V. Clyne, chairman of the maritime commission, to discuss the possibility of a coastguard for British Columbia.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Another strong and informed voice has joined the rising demand for a Canadian coastguard service. The dominion council of the naval officers' association of Canada, representing thousands of former naval officers from coast to coast, has unanimously endorsed such an undertaking. The action of the dominion council was taken last summer, during the annual meeting in Halifax. The council unanimously approved a resolution presented by the Halifax branch——urgently and strongly recommending the immediate formation of a Canadian coastguard service.

The resolution's preamble points out that the expansion of our naval and merchant service activities during world war II gave this nation a new sense of sea power and its attendant responsibilities, and that our responsibilities have increased with the addition of another seafaring province, Newfoundland. It holds that:

The present distribution of marine responsibilities among several government departments would seem to be less efficient than a unified co-ordinated service.

And that:

It is not in accord with national dignity to be repeatedly obligated to the United States coastguard.

The preamble also notes that a Canadian coastguard service would:

Provide a corps of trained and disciplined men under service regulations which would supplement the Royal Canadian Navy in the event of war.

A series of suggestions accompanied the resolution. They include the idea that a Canadian coastguard would carry out the duties of the following departments or agencies: R.C.M.P. marine division, which is held to be the logical nucleus around which to build a coastguard; fisheries patrol; Department of Transport marine and meteorological service, excluding certain port duties such as steamship inspection and examination of masters and mates; lifesaving and sea rescue duties; hydrographic survey duties.

The resolution stated:

It is considered desirable to absorb personnel of departments taken over, but it is strongly suggested that the qualifications for further enlistment of officers and men in the proposed coastguard service be fully as exacting as those of the Royal Canadian Navy.

And finally, the resolution stated:

In view of the record and experience of the United States coastguard service, we consider that it might well be used as a working model.

Here then, Mr. Chairman, is a considered opinion approved unanimously by a council representing thousands of former officers with wartime sea-going experience. Their number includes, too, many men who are at present actively associated with marine affairs in civil life. This resolution is one embodying much that has been discussed by branches of the association on both coasts. It is an opinion which should carry weight. I am quoting the demands of these organizations so that hon. members may understand that this is no isolated appeal but indeed one that comes from all sections of Canada, and should be heeded.

Coming to my own province of Newfoundland, I can speak from knowledge. I have no hesitation in saying that the establishment of a coastguard service in Newfoundland would be a godsend. The island of Newfoundland, not taking Labrador into consideration, has six thousand miles of coast line. As hon. members are probably aware, in a great measure we must depend on the sea for our highroad. If that highroad of ours has to be traversed, as it must, by small boats and in all kinds of weather—and the weather in Newfoundland varies as it does up here, of course—one can readily imagine the great value of a service such as the one I have suggested this evening, and what a great boon it would be to the residents of Newfoundland to know that they had a coastguard service of their own.

At the present time we are fortunate in having, as we have had for some time past, the assistance of the United States coastguard. They have given us wonderful help. There is no question about it, we owe a great deal to them and to their ships and planes. I understand that quite recently a branch of the search and rescue division has been set up in Newfoundland by the federal government. It consists of five officers, three non-commissioned officers and nine airmen. They are to have one Canso aircraft and one Norseman aircraft. In the newspaper article from Newfoundland that I read it is stated the force will co-operate closely with the United States Air Force rescue force and the United States coastguard. We are not ungrateful to our good neighbours to the south, the United States; but as a citizen of a province of this great dominion I feel that we should not have to depend on the services supplied by our neighbours for this work, no matter how willingly those services are provided.

In addition to assistance which we have received from the United States coastguard on numerous occasions when our ships get into difficulties, it means that one of our regular coastal boats must be taken off service or at times a ship belonging to a private firm has to be hired by the provincial government to render aid. As happened only within the last two weeks, a ship going about her lawful occasions and owned by a private firm had to be chartered by the provincial government to go to the assistance of two schooners which were in difficulties on our northern coast.

With Newfoundland the fishing country that it basically is, with a natural ancillary to that fishing industry being the operation of small boats, with the stormy weather—

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Before I call it eleven o'clock, may I ask if the committee would be prepared to pass item 453?

Mr. Green: No. The hon. member for St. John's East is not through.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall resume debate on the budget.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ADDRESS

Prime Minister of India

to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC

The Prime Minister of India was welcomed by the Right Honourable L. S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Elie Beauregard, Speaker of the Senate, and the Honourable W. Ross Macdonald, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. Prime Minister; fellow members of the houses of parliament: Our country is indeed honoured to have as its guest on this occasion the Prime Minister of India, Pandit Nehru. As Prime Minister of a sister member nation of the commonwealth I find it a most welcome and agreeable duty to extend to you, Mr. Nehru, a very warm welcome to this parliament and to Canada. You come to us, both as one whose deeds and thoughts have commanded widespread attention in these troubled times, and as a most distinguished leader of that great portion of mankind which constitutes the population of India.

I extend also a cordial welcome to the sister of our distinguished guest, Mrs. Pandit, who at present represents India as ambassador to the United States, and to Mr. Nehru's daughter, Mrs. Gandhi, whom it is also a pleasure to have with us on this occasion.

Just six months ago I was happy to announce in this house the understanding reached in London with regard to the continuance of India as a full member of the commonwealth in the event that India should become a republic. It was not only the peoples of the commonwealth who had waited to learn the outcome of the discussions. Others were watching, too; for much hung in the balance for the three new Asian members which as separate units had joined the family of the commonwealth of nations in 1947. Each was heir to an ancient civilization. Each was inspired by a strong national consciousness and by a great vision of the future as a member in its own right of the international community. Each, moreover, was keenly aware of problems at home and of difficulties in the world at large. Each felt it had a contribution to make in its own way, suited to the genius as well as to the needs of its people.

We in Canada feel that we have been able to achieve some understanding of these things, distant though we are from the great Indian subcontinent. When India, the largest and most populous of these new states, reached the stage where its desires with regard to its constitution prompted it to settle its future status in relation to other commonwealth countries, most people in Canada realized, I think, that the constitution of India was of course a matter for the Indian people to decide for themselves. At the same time we felt that any reasonable arrangement providing for the full membership of India in the commonwealth as a republic, if that form of constitution should be India's wish, would be welcome.

We Canadians were glad to learn that our association with India as a sister nation in the commonwealth was to continue, and, we hoped, was to become more direct and more mutually advantageous. We are happy that friendship, good will and understanding exist between India and Canada. We are conscious that we share with the government and people of India an unswerving desire for a peaceful world in which nations, both great and small, may pursue the well-being of their peoples.

On behalf of the members present and of the people of Canada generally, I venture to voice the hope that Mr. Nehru will carry back to India a message of greeting and warmest good wishes from us all.

We know of the signal courage, devotion and loyalty with which Mr. Nehru has served and continues to serve the people of India, and of the statesmanship and nobility of thought which he has brought to bear upon the great questions of human affairs in the councils not only of India but of the commonwealth and of the United Nations. We pray that he may long be spared to continue with his task and to see his hopes bearing fruit.

Fellow members of the houses of parliament, I present to you the Prime Minister of India, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru (Prime Minister of India): Mr. Prime Minister, I am grateful to you, sir, and the honourable members of this parliament for the honour you have done me in inviting me to address you, and for the warm welcome which you have been good enough to extend to me. I am happy to be in the capital of this great dominion, and to bring to you the greetings and good wishes of the government and people of India.

During the past twelve months it has been my privilege to be associated in important discussions with your Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and your Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We have had to consider many difficult problems together, and I am revealing no secret when I say that our point of view and Canada's were identical or very near to each other on almost every one of them. In particular I should like to refer to the spirit of understanding shown by your government and your representative at the meeting of dominion prime ministers, held in London last April, in the determination of our future relationship with the commonwealth. That spirit is in the great tradition of your leaders, Sir John Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and your last prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, who, happily, is still with us. That tradition has been one of association with the commonwealth, in complete freedom, unfettered by any outside control. Canada has been a pioneer in the evolution of this relationship, and, as such, one of the builders of the commonwealth as an association of free and equal nations.

India, as you know, will soon become a republic, but will remain a member of the commonwealth. Our past co-operation will not, therefore, cease or alter with the change in our status. On the contrary, it will have the greater strength that common endeavour derives from a sense that it is inspired and sustained by the free will of free peoples. I am convinced that this development in the history of the commonwealth, without parallel elsewhere or at any other time, is a significant step toward peace and co-operation in the world.

Of even greater significance is the manner of this achievement. Only a few years ago Indian nationalism was in conflict with British imperialism, and that conflict brought in its train ill will, suspicion, and bitterness—although, because of the teaching of our great leader, Mahatma Gandhi, there was far less ill will than in any other nationalist struggle against foreign domination. Who would have thought then that suspicion and bitterness would largely fade away so rapidly, giving place to friendly co-operation between free and equal nations? That is an achievement for which all those who are concerned with it can take legitimate credit. It is an outstanding example of the peaceful solution of difficult problems, and a solution which is a real one because it does not lead to other problems. The rest of the world might well pay heed to this example.

Canada is a vast country, and her extent is continental. She faces Europe across the Atlantic, and Asia across the Pacific. Past history explains your preoccupation thus far with European affairs. Past history also, as well as geography, explain the depth and intimacy of our interest in Asia. But in the world of today neither you nor we can afford to be purely national, or even continental, in our outlook; the world has become too small for that. If we do not all co-operate and live at peace with each other, we stumble on one another and clutch at each other's throats.

We talk of the east and the west, of the Orient and the Occident; yet these divisions have little reality. In fact the so-called east is geographically the west for you. During the last two or three hundred years some European nations developed an industrial civilization, and thus became different in many ways from the east, which was still primarily agricultural. The new strength that technical advance gave them added to their wealth and power, and an era of colonialism and imperialism began, during which the greater part of Asia was dominated by some countries of Europe. In the long perspective of history this was a brief period, and already we are seeing the end of it. The imperialism which was at its height during the last century and a half has largely faded away and lingers in only a few countries today. There can be little doubt that it will end in these remaining countries also, and the sooner it ends, the better for the peace and security of the world.

Asia, the mother of continents and the cradle of history's major civilization, is renascent today. The dawn of its newly acquired freedom is turbulent, because during these past two centuries its growth was arrested, frustration was widespread, and new forces grew up. These forces were essentially nationalist, seeking political freedom; but behind them was the vital urge to better the economic condition of the masses of the people. Where nationalism was thwarted there was conflict, as there is conflict today where it is being thwarted, for example in southeast Asia. To regard the present unsettled state of southeast Asia as a result of or as part of an ideological conflict would be a dangerous error. The troubles and discontents of this part of the world, and indeed of the greater part of Asia, are the result of obstructed freedom and dire poverty. The remedy is to accelerate the advent of freedom and to remove want. If this is achieved, Asia will become a powerful factor in stability and peace. The philosophy of Asia has been and is a philosophy of peace.

There is another facet of this Asian situation to which reference must be made. The so-called revolt of Asia is a striving of the legitimate pride of ancient peoples against the arrogance of certain western nations. Racial discrimination is still in evidence in some countries, and there is still not enough realization of the importance of Asia in the councils of the world.

India's championship of freedom and racial equality in Asia, as well as in Africa, is a natural urge of the facts of geography and history. India desires no leadership or dominion or authority over any other country. But we are compelled by circumstances to play our part in Asia and in the world, because we are convinced that unless these basic problems of Asia are solved, there can be no world peace. Canada, with her traditions of democracy, her sense of justice and her love of fair play, should understand our purpose and our motives, and should use her growing wealth and power to extend the horizons of freedom, to promote order and liberty, to remove want, and thus to ensure lasting peace.

India is an old nation, and yet today she has in her something of the spirit and dynamic quality of youth. Some of the vital impulses which gave strength to India in past ages inspire us still, and at the same time we have learned much from the west in social and political values, in science and technology. We have still much to learn and much to do, especially in the application of science to problems of social well-being. We have gained political freedom, and the urgent task before us today is to improve rapidly the economic conditions of our people, and to fight relentlessly against poverty and social ills. We are determined to apply ourselves to these problems and to achieve success. We have the will and the natural resources and the human material to do so, and our immediate task is to harness them for human betterment. For this purpose it is essential for us to have a period of peaceful development and co-operation with other nations.

The peace of one country cannot be assured unless there is peace elsewhere. In this narrow and contracting world, war and peace and freedom are becoming indivisible. Therefore it is not enough for any one country to secure peace within its own borders; it is necessary also that it should endeavour to its utmost capacity to help in the maintenance of peace all over the world.

The world today is full of tension and conflict. Behind this tension lies an ever-growing fear, which is the parent of many ills. There are also economic causes which can only be remedied by economic means. There can be no security or real peace if vast numbers of people in various parts of the world live in poverty and misery. Nor indeed can there be a balanced economy for the world as a whole if the undeveloped parts continue to upset that balance and to drag down even the more prosperous nations. Both for economic and for political reasons, therefore, it has become essential to develop these undeveloped regions and to raise the standards of the people there. Technical advance and industrialization of these regions will not mean any injury to those countries which are already highly industrialized. International trade grows as more and more countries produce more goods and supply the wants of mankind. Our industrialization has a predominantly social aim, to meet the pressing wants of the great majority of our own people.

This age we live in has been called the atomic age. Vast new sources of energy are being tapped; but men's thoughts, instead of being in terms of service and betterment of mankind, turn to destructive purposes. Destruction by these new and terrible weapons of war can only lead to unparalleled disaster for all concerned; yet people lightly talk of war and bend their energies to preparing for it. A very distinguished American said the other day that the use of the atom bomb might well be likened to setting a house on fire in order to rid it of some insects and termites.

Dangers undoubtedly threaten us, and we must be on our guard against them and take all necessary precautions. But we must always remember that we do not serve or protect mankind by destroying the house in which it lives and all that it contains.

The problem of maintaining world peace and of diverting our minds and energies to that end thus becomes one of paramount importance. All of us talk of peace and the desirability of it, but do we all serve it faithfully and earnestly? Even in our struggle for freedom, our great leader taught us the path of peace. In the larger context of the world we must inevitably follow that path to the best of our ability. I am convinced that Canada, like India, is earnestly desirous of maintaining peace and freedom. Both our respective countries believe in democracy and the democratic method, and in individual and national freedom. In international affairs, therefore, our objectives are similar, and we have found no difficulty thus far in co-operating for the achievement of these aims. I am here to assure the government and the people of Canada of our earnest desire to work in co-operation with them for these ends. The differences that have existed in our minds about east and west have little substance today, and we are all partners in the same great undertaking. I have little doubt that in spite of the dangers that beset the world today, the forces of constructive and co-operative effort for human betterment will succeed, and the spirit of man will triumph again.

I thank you again, sir, and the honourable members of this parliament, who shoulder a great responsibility, for your friendly and cordial welcome, and for your good wishes for my country. I realize that this welcome was extended to me not as an individual but as a representative and a symbol of my nation. I am sure that my people will appreciate and welcome the honour you have done them, and will look forward to fruitful harmony of endeavour between our two countries for the accomplishment of common tasks.

Pandit Nehru

(Translation):

Before I conclude, Mr. Prime Minister, I should very much like to say a few words in French. I am sorry I am not proficient enough in that beautiful language to speak at length, but I assure you we have a deep liking for it.

To you French-Canadians, I convey the congratulations and warm wishes of the people of India, to which I add my own.

Hon. Elie Beauregard (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Prime Minister of India, since you chose to conclude your brilliant speech in the language spoken by three to four million Canadians of French origin, may I on their behalf express their keen pleasure and offer you in French the token of their admiration.

Your accession to power coincides with India's entry into the large democratic family of the universe. Thanks to you, your great and diversified country, so rich in science, poetry and storied legend, peacefully takes its place within the council of sovereign nations. At the same time, you are resolutely entering into history.

You come from the Orient, whose patient philosophy knows the art of solving the most complex situations, an art which enabled you to sever your century-old union with the British empire and, almost at the same time, spontaneously to renew a link with the commonwealth.

At this very time of your visit among us, we, under different circumstances and in the normal course of our development, are peacefully making an almost identical gesture. In a few days, Canada, whose stature has grown during the last two wars without, however, leaving the orbit of the commonwealth, will be solely responsible for its destiny.

You bring the west a message of peace, of peace based on the equality of all men before God, before the law and before human conscience. You nevertheless wish India to become aware of its power, first of its economic power and then of the military power needed to protect that economic power.

You already know that America, whose mission is at present burdened with such a heavy responsibility, joyfully welcomes your message. Thanks to the high standard of living created by the industry of our neighbouring republic, the extremely varied races which are its components, merged together as though in a crucible, have become a proud and powerful nation. In this country, we also believe that this standard of living constitutes the best means of defence against the most pernicious "isms". Under the impetus it is certain to receive from you, your country, so plentifully endowed with manpower and natural resources, can rightfully aspire to full economic development.

Because of your academic training and of your public life, you belong to two civilizations. Both will benefit from the leading role which your high office will call upon you to play in world affairs. This is betokened by the eloquent speech you have just delivered before both houses of parliament, and that is the wish we express.

It is a great honour for me, Mr. Prime Minister, to express, on behalf of both the Senate of Canada and the French-speaking Canadians, the pleasure we have in greeting the first citizen of one of the greatest and oldest countries in the world, and the hope that your brief stay among us will serve to multiply the relations that must be maintained between two peoples whose economies are complementary, and who are both genuinely peace-loving.

(Text):

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald (Speaker of the House of Commons): Pandit Nehru, it is indeed a great honour for me, the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, to extend to you, the Prime Minister of India, the sincere appreciation of the members of our parliament for the eloquent and enlightening address which you have delivered this afternoon.

We realize that the words which you have spoken before the few hundred men and women who have had the good fortune to be present and to have heard you, and to have seen you, were in fact addressed to all the people of Canada. Thousands of Canadians this afternoon have not only heard your speech but also have heard the radio commentators describe this history-making scene in the Canadian House of Commons, when the Prime Minister of an ancient country of the east was received as a friend by the Prime Minister of a new country of the west—both countries being self-governing nations and forming part of one great peace-loving community, the commonwealth of nations.

Kipling said:

> Oh, east is east, and west is west, and never the twain shall meet.

However, it is too often forgotten that he also said:

> But there is neither east nor west, border, nor breed, nor birth,
> When two strong men stand face to face, though they come from the ends of the earth!

This afternoon we have seen the Prime Minister of India and the Prime Minister of Canada, two strong men from the opposite ends of the earth, standing face to face on the floor of the House of Commons of Canada and cordially greeting each other without any thought that there is either west or east.

May I, the First Commoner of Canada, express to you, the first Prime Minister of India, the appreciation of all the people of Canada for your presence here this afternoon; and may I extend to you the very best of good wishes for your personal health and happiness and for the general well-being of the people whom you represent.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENTS

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF SASKATCHEWAN AND QUEBEC

Premier's Office

Regina, October 15, 1949.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

You will recall that on September 20, I acknowledged your letter of September 14, and expressed appreciation of the fact that steps are about to be taken to remove the necessity of approaching the parliament of the United Kingdom whenever an amendment to the British North America Act is desired. In this connection I may say that we in Saskatchewan are still anxious to co-operate in order that this may be achieved.

Since the date of my letter, further attention has been given to the announcement contained in the fourth paragraph of your letter regarding the proposed request for an amendment which will be submitted to parliament at the present session. I must confess to considerable curiosity as to just what your government has in mind.

As the proposed amendment is described in your letter it would vest in the parliament of Canada authority to "amend the constitution of Canada." Then comes the limitation as follows:

> ". . . but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces, nor affecting the rights and privileges of the provinces, or existing constitutional rights and privileges with respect to education and to the use of the English and French languages."

May I make the general observation that the amendment as proposed in your letter would primarily vest in the dominion parliament authority to amend the constitution of Canada subject of course to the exceptions referred to. This would mean, as I understand the situation, that in the case of any amendment of the B.N.A. Act by the dominion being objected to by a province, the burden would be on the province to show that the amendment infringed the stated exceptions.

Coming to the exceptions, as stated in your letter, the first is clear enough, and probably also the last, dealing with education and the use of the English and French languages. It seems to us, however, that the phrase "affecting the rights and privileges of the provinces" is somewhat lacking in precision and might result in serious misunderstanding. The term "purely federal aspects," used in the fifth paragraph of your letter, does not entirely cure the situation even if "federal" is taken to be equivalent to "general" or "dominion." In our opinion the field that the dominion would occupy after the suggested amendment is indefinite at the moment, and we do not know what your government has in mind in the direction of constitutional development.

It may be presumed that the formula set out in your letter would cover the office of the Governor General of Canada, but a more interesting question arises as to section 9 of the British North America Act. This is interesting for the reason that section 92(1) denies to the provinces the capacity to alter the office of lieutenant governor and executive government in the provinces is performed in the name of His Majesty. Again would the formula cover the preamble to the B.N.A. Act?

Again it may be asked whether the formula would warrant the abolition of the Senate. Such an abolition would not "affect the rights and privileges of the provinces" as corporate entities; yet some of the provinces might take grave objection to the abolition of the upper chamber. Similar questions might be asked concerning the application of the formula to sections 53-57 and other sections.

You will understand that no complaint is being made regarding the action which your government proposes to take. We do think, however, that some further clarification might avoid disagreements in the future. May I request, therefore, clarification regarding (a) the exact scope of the proposed amendment; (b) whether your government has any developments in mind which can properly be disclosed. I may also add that some comment on the particular points raised in this letter would be greatly appreciated.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, October 21, 1949

Honourable T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

Your letter of October 15, with further reference to the procedure for amendment of the British North America Act, reached me after the debate on the proposed amendment had begun. I think I can best answer your request for clarification on the government's proposal by referring you to the text of my motion and the speech which I made on Monday, October 17, which appear on pages 828ff. of the daily Hansard for that date, and which I have pleasure in enclosing.

I shall ask my office to send you copies of the Hansard for the succeeding days of the debate so that you may follow the discussion in the House of Commons.

I agree that the phrase "affecting the rights and privileges of the provinces" is lacking in precision; this general language was used because we did not wish to attempt to determine in an arbitrary fashion the extent of the rights and privileges of the provinces, preferring to leave that for determination by the courts, in the event of any dispute, unless some agreement with respect to it is reached at the forthcoming conference.

As to your question whether this government "has any developments in mind which can properly be disclosed," I can only say that no consideration has yet been given by the government to any constitutional development or change which might be recommended to parliament under the new procedure contemplated by the address.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

Appendix

Office of the Prime Minister
Province of Quebec

Quebec, October 19, 1949

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Mr. Prime Minister:

I have brought today to the attention of my colleagues of the executive council of the province your letter of the 13th instant, dealing with the constitutional changes advocated by the dominion government.

You state in your letter:

"In your opinion this procedure and these precedents are unsound. To that opinion we can only reply that 'we respect your opinion without sharing it,' and that, as in the past, there is no obligation to ask for your consent or your acquiescence."

You also say:

"There is no doubt about our power to have this change of venue made without consulting the provincial authorities and without their acquiescence, 'except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language'."

You take special care to underline the words "our power."

You state further:

"We claim we also have the right to have this change of venue made, without the consent or acquiescence of the provincial authorities. We cannot therefore accede to your request to postpone all action until there has been an understanding with the provincial authorities."

Again you underline the words 'the right."

My colleagues and I have noted with surprise the particularly unfortunate tone you have given to your letter in connection with such a vital problem.

You state that you need neither the consent nor the acquiescence of the Quebec provincial government to make constitutional changes of paramount importance which deeply affect provincial rights, freedom and prerogatives, especially as regards the province of Quebec.

Let us tell you that we greatly regret such an attitude; that we are sincerely convinced that it is at variance with the spirit of the federative pact, and that it is not likely to facilitate the co-operation that is desirable and which we desire between the various governments of this country.

We feel constrained to reassert that the Canadian constitution is not the work of a moment, or the result of hasty decisions, any more than it is the achievement of any single political party or government. Our view is that all and every one of us can benefit from the example given us by the fathers of confederation who made it a point to make an exhaustive study of the project and to obtain, prior to any decision, the views and approval of the then existing administrations.

We believe that the vital and manifold problems involved in any amendment to the Canadian constitution are of such magnitude that they ought to be carefully examined and pondered before they are proposed and, still more, before they are agreed upon, especially in view of the fact that the amendments advocated by your government are the most important and momentous since confederation.

In our opinion it was only natural and legitimate that we should have asked you to postpone any legislation dealing with the federative pact, and to convene, as a first step, a meeting of the parties concerned so that all may examine in a spirit of co-operation the vital problems involved in any amendment to the British North America Act.

Once again, the Quebec government respectfully reasserts the stand and the statements contained in the two letters I wrote you in connection with this matter on September 21 last and on the 5th instant.

Yours sincerely,

Maurice Duplessis

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, October 21, 1949

The Honourable Maurice Duplessis, M.L.A.,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

I have received your letter of October 19 with further reference to the subject of amending the constitution in Canada.

It seems to me that we have both made our positions very clear, and that it would not serve any useful purpose to continue our correspondence until such time as we are in a position to extend invitations to the provincial governments to confer with us on this subject.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 25, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

CHINA

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On October 14 I asked a question concerning a statement which had been made by Hon. T. C. Davis, our ambassador to China. The essence of the question was whether the government would make a statement early in the week as to Canadian policy with respect to China. On October 17 the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) answered and said that Mr. Davis would be in Ottawa shortly and that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs returned from Lake Success he would make a statement with regard to Canadian policy concerning China. Apparently Hon. T. C. Davis is now in Ottawa. Yesterday he made a further statement to the press, to the effect that communist China wants to do business with Canada. He also said something about Canada recognizing China.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement today?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of his question. It is true that Mr. Davis arrived in Ottawa yesterday morning. Since my own arrival from Lake Success, which was late the preceding evening, I have been able to see him only for a few minutes, because of my preoccupation with other matters arising out of Mr. Nehru's visit to Ottawa.

Mr. Davis of course has been on the spot in China as Canadian ambassador there, and is fully familiar with the situation in that country. I am sure hon. members will appreciate the fact that the government does not wish to make a formal and complete statement with respect to Canadian policy toward China before full consultation with Mr. Davis, and that has not yet taken place. I might, however, say at this time that Canadian policy with regard to the recognition of any government, in China or elsewhere, will naturally take into consideration the usual requirements of international law. These provide that before a government is granted recognition it must be shown to be independent of external control by any other state; it must exercise effective control over the territory which it claims, and that territory must be reasonably well defined. If and when these requirements are met, then I believe, Mr. Speaker, that consideration should be given to the recognition of a government in China or in any other part of the world.

The Canadian government is in close touch with other like-minded governments on all aspects of the present state of affairs in China, and careful consideration is being and will continue to be given to all the implications arising out of the situation there, which is so important to peace in that area and indeed throughout the world.

I hope that the hon. member who has asked the question will be satisfied with this provisional answer, and that in due course I shall be able to add to it.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

VANCOUVER HEADQUARTERS—TRANSPACIFIC SERVICE—ALLOCATION OF PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to add anything to the short statement he made on Thursday last in regard to the transfer of Trans-Canada Air Lines shop work from Vancouver to Montreal? I am asking a question now because of the concern expressed in letters and telegrams received from Vancouver in the last few days.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, since replying to a similar question a few days ago I have made inquiries, and I find that of the maintenance staff Vancouver pay roll, T.C.A. is releasing 144 men. Thirty-seven of these 144 have seniority rights, which will permit them to transfer to other stations if they care to do so. In the stores department six men are being laid off, of whom three have seniority rights. These notices have been given and are effective progressively from November 1 to November 15. The greater proportion of those being laid off are quite junior in service, having been taken on within the past two years, since T.C.A. first began its program for a transpacific service.

The Canadian Pacific Air Lines have some 300 people on their staff at Vancouver, many of whom have been transferred on a seniority basis from other service points in Canada. However C.P.A. have taken a great number of new employees from the Vancouver area, and have made an informal arrangement with T.C.A. to give first preference to those laid off by T.C.A.

The situation is that T.C.A. had organized a transpacific headquarters at Vancouver. So far T.C.A. has been able to keep the men busy on major overhaul work, but now that that work is coming to an end it is necessary to cut the staff at that point down to the ordinary overhaul requirements of the air lines for domestic service.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question? In letters which I have received it is stated that the cut in staff would mean that some planes would have to make the return trip of 6,000 miles, to and from Montreal, without being overhauled.

Mr. Howe: I cannot say as to that, since it is an internal operating matter. But I would point out that a very considerable maintenance staff is being left, consisting of some 150 men, and I assume that that staff will take care of the overhaul duties to be performed at the Vancouver end of the system.

I think we all have sufficient confidence in the safety of operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines to believe that the staff is not being cut down to a point where overhaul cannot be taken care of at the Vancouver end to the extent required.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's ceremony in this chamber was most significant in many ways. It was significant particularly for the fact that a certain word was not used. The one word that was absent was the word "British". Yet it was the genius of British institutions and the British parliamentary system which made the ceremony possible. In fact it was essentially because of British ideals of freedom and self-determination that the meeting was possible at all. The very omission of the word "British" before "commonwealth" in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) emphasized, more clearly than any words could have done, the essential quality of British freedom which made it possible for the leader of a sister commonwealth country, embracing a republican form of government, to speak to us in a free parliament; because we are both dedicated to the principle of freedom of the individual and the dignity of man. We believe that these are inherent foundations of the British parliamentary system. Perhaps this omission of the word "British" was one of the most significant aspects of yesterday's meeting.

With reference to the budget, I should like to deal first with the income tax allowance to the holders of preferred stock. The concession which has been made—a ten per cent allowance to holders of preferred stock—is in itself a very small thing, but it emphasizes a principle of the capitalist system under which we live. I wish to say a few words about the effectiveness and efficiency of that capitalist system.

I have taken as an example one of the most efficient, one of the largest and I believe one of the ablest companies operating in Canada today, and I have made a breakdown of what that company has done and what the capitalist system, through the operations of the company, has produced for Canada. I refer to the Steel Company of Canada. I have chosen this company for several reasons. First, its capital structure is simple; second, it is probably the leader of the steel industry in Canada—a basic industry—and, third, its management is aggressive and the operations are carried on profitably.

The share capital amounts to 460,000 common shares and 260,000 preferred shares of equal value and almost equal rights, making a total of 720,000 shares. I have worked out what each one of these shares has meant to the whole economy of Canada in the ten-year period from before the war to the present time. In that ten-year period each share has produced more than $250 in wages. It has been responsible for $86 in improvement to plant; it has paid $83 in taxes, and each share has been responsible for fifteen tons of base ingot steel.

For this the owner of the company—the shareholder—received in dividends $31 in that ten-year period. It will be seen that nearly three times as much was paid in taxes as was received by the shareholder, the capitalist, in dividends. Nearly three times as much went to the improvement of plant, and over eight times as much went to labour in the form of direct wages. On top of this, the gross national product of the country was increased by every share to the extent of fifteen tons of ingot steel. It seems to me that that company is a pretty good servant of the country. It is going to take a lot of persuasion to convince me that any other form of enterprise can produce that much for $31. We are living in an era in which the capitalist system is abused frequently, is considered to be inefficient; but no government, no department of government, no group of civil servants, no other form of enterprise, could have performed such a service for the country for so little.

I should like to give one more illustration and show how the output of this one basic company has increased in the ten-year period. In 1939 the ingot output of the company amounted to ·708 net tons per share; in 1948 it was 1·894 net tons per share, an increase of 167·5 per cent. In 1939 wages and salaries per share amounted to $13.47; ten years later, in 1948, they amounted to $38.45, an increase of 192·9 per cent. Capital expenditures in 1939 amounted to $2.12 per share; in 1948 they amounted to $20.97 per share, an increase of 889 per cent. In 1939 total taxes per share amounted to $3.74; in 1948 they amounted to $10.74, an increase of 187·2 per cent. In 1939 the shareholders, the capitalists, received $3.03 per share by way of dividends; in 1948 they received $4 per share, an increase of only 32·7 per cent.

I mention these figures in order to show the efficiency of the system under which we live. We hear many diatribes against the capitalist system, but I defy anyone to point to any other system that can produce as much basic wealth, pay the same basic wages, and increase the national product of the country. I defy anyone to show me where anything else can be as efficient as a well-run capitalist company. So much for capitalism and its function as a servant to the country.

I come now to the question of our external trade, and I intend to quote from a report published yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) under the provisions of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act. Under schedule I there was a decrease of $117 million in the prohibited list from slightly over $200 million in 1947 to $83 million in 1948. On the quota list the decrease from 1947 to 1948 was from $220 million to $94 million, a decrease of $126 million.

Now to quote from the figures given under schedule III by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The total imports for the United States in 1947 were $572 million, and in 1948 they were $515 million, a decrease of $57 million. There was therefore a total decrease for the scheduled countries of some $300 million; in other words, our apparent trade to the scheduled countries was decreased by artificial means by some $300 million. These figures are approximate, being to the nearest million. They are in the nature of projections, because we assumed that the purchases would have continued at the same rate as for 1947, but I do not think that is quite accurate. However, it is the only figure we can count on. As I say, for the scheduled countries, that is chiefly the United States, there has been a decrease in imports of some $300 million.

For the non-scheduled countries there has been a decrease under schedule I from $11 million to $7 million for the prohibited list, and an increase under schedule II, the quota list, from $84 million to $113 million. There has been an increase of $29 million in the allotted list from $26 million to $55 million. The total increase for non-scheduled countries amounts to some $44 million. I mention these figures because they show that by government action a definite direction of trade has been attempted. But despite the action that has been taken, our trade is still in great unbalance as between the non-scheduled and scheduled countries.

I should like to refer to what has happened as a result of Marshall aid to European countries. The Canadian economy is unbalanced because of our great per capita production and our necessity to sell off the North American continent. It is essential therefore for us to find non-North American media of exchange. I should like to quote some E.C.A. export figures. Canadian exports to all areas amounted to £332 million; United States exports amounted to £1,365 million. Canadian exports to sterling areas amounted to £245 million; United States exports amounted to £488 million. Canadian exports to the United Kingdom amounted to £172 million; United States exports to £160 million. We see from these figures that Canada's exports under the Marshall plan to the whole sterling area were more than one-third of the total, and Canada's exports to the United Kingdom were more than one-half of the total of Marshall aid. On top of that we have seen how greatly the government has attempted to alter the normal pattern of Canadian trade by restrictions, embargoes, prohibitions and other methods. Yet our trade remains definitely unbalanced, and is presenting increasingly serious problems to the government, affecting the whole economy of the country.

Since the devaluation of the pound by 30 per cent the London Economist has estimated that is will mean to the United Kingdom only a three per cent rise in the total average cost in sterling of United Kingdom production. That is extremely encouraging from the point of view of the United Kingdom, but it is something which we must consider as having a serious effect on our economy. The danger is that we shall soon be selling less and less, and not that we shall be insufficiently paid for selling more and more. I want to quote a statement made several days ago in London by Right Hon. L. S. Amery. It is as follows:

> The only real and permanent remedy for the present world unbalance lies in creating a new balance by building up nation groups comparable to the United States, thus providing a market for an internally balanced expanding production. The natural way of doing so is by common currency arrangement, and by the flexible methods of tariff preference, and not by the clumsy restrictive devices of quantitative import restrictions and quantitative bilateral bargains. That is the solution clearly envisaged by the recent economic resolution of the Strasbourg assembly. It is even more the obvious policy for the British commonwealth.
> There are only two serious obstacles in the way. One is the attitude so far taken up by the United States administration and foolishly accepted by other nations, that all arrangements for mutual co-operation are "discrimination" and therefore anathema. The other is the very serious effect on Canada if she then finds herself excluded from all her natural markets and forced into the position of becoming a mere appendage of the American economy. That is a problem for Canada to decide. For her and for the United States, no less than for us, a solution of the world problem involves a fundamental change of outlook, but nothing less will meet the case, and, until it is achieved, no amount of conferences between statesmen will set the world right.

What does Mr. Amery's statement mean? I think the most significant words in it are those with reference to the Strasbourg assembly. There we have a group of European nations getting together. What is the first thing they do? What is the first problem on their agenda? To find a currency mutually acceptable to each other. Apparently they made great headway in that direction.

Our natural markets—and they must continue to be—are offshore markets, markets abroad, markets in Europe, and once the markets of the Orient. We see the Strasbourg assembly and the British commonwealth finding a method of mutual acceptance of currency, but we find ourselves still with our currency pegged to the United States dollar. There can be only one result. Progressively we are going to be shut out of market after market throughout the rest of the world. That is a very serious thing to contemplate. I realize the difficulty, but the government is taking no fundamental steps to sell to those countries which have been and still are our natural and historic markets. The United States has been a great market for many of our products, certainly the greatest market for products such as wood pulp and many of our base metals. At the present time we do a far greater business with the United States than with all the rest of the world put together. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the United States is essentially a competitive economy with ours. While they have a deficit economy we can sell to them, but just as soon as that deficit position fills up, just as soon as we find ourselves really competing with their industries, mines and farms, that market will disappear.

There are many devices which the United States has used in the past, and we have suffered from them heretofore. As the millennium does not appear to have arrived, it is altogether likely that she will use them in the future against Canadian products just as soon as they are a serious competitor in the United States market.

We in this party have suggested before now a universal currency. We have suggested convertibility. I have suggested a free gold market, some method whereby our currency can be used by the rest of the world—not just the sterling bloc but the whole of the world. The government apparently are frightened because of the effect of the impact of the world economy if we set our currency free. They have so stated in an apparently inspired article which appeared recently in the Financial Post, headed: "Why government didn't allow dollar to find own level".

I will not read the article but it expressed the fear of the effect on our dollar by speculators and others who would trade in exchange and cause wide fluctuations in the quotations of Canadian dollars in terms of United States exchange and thus upset legitimate trade between the two countries. I would point out that with a powerful central bank and the great number of extremely capable foreign exchange operators in the chartered banks, I should not be very much afraid of serious arbitrary fluctuations of our currency in the United States. We control the issuance of our own currency. That was the fear expressed in this article in the Financial Post.

The basic evil of exchange control does something else, I think; it restricts and inhibits the investment of United States funds in Canada. It is not that the restrictions themselves are particularly onerous; it is the fact that restrictions are there at all that does so much harm to the free investment of United States funds in this country. One way to correct our unbalance of trade with the United States would be to encourage the investment of United States funds here; yet because of these restrictions that investment is inhibited—despite what is probably the greatest boom in oil the continent of North America has ever seen, which is being largely financed by United States capital. I admit that this has brought to Canada a tremendous amount of United States capital which is very valuable; but in spite of this there is still some hesitancy in regard to such investments. The other day I was speaking to a lawyer, a citizen of the United States, who has an estate in Canada. He was doing everything possible to persuade the beneficiaries to maintain that investment here rather than liquidate it and move it out. Their argument was simply that while the restrictions in themselves were not particularly onerous, there were still restrictions on the free movement of capital. This they would not abide.

Now we come to the essential move which had been forecast for months, the acceptance of the specious argument of devaluation. Following the devaluation of the pound, and in fact the general devaluation of all currencies, we were forced to take similar action; but devaluation is not the answer. We still have a hard currency, even though it is worth only 90 cents. It is still a hard currency, and if you have none of it you are not going to buy even 90 cents' worth of our goods. It is of no use for a restaurant to decrease the price of a meal from $1 to 90 cents if you do not have even the 90 cents. This is another problem which arises from the continuous shackling of our currency to the United States dollar.

One of the recent names for inflation is devaluation. It is a word which conjures up, both in the mind of the seller and in the mind of the buyer, a sort of trick solution which is likely to bring something for nothing in international trade. The policy of devaluation is no answer to an unbalance of trade. Threatened by an external drain of real assets and gold, the monetary authorities do not resort to credit restriction and an increase in the interest rate. They devalue. Devaluation does not solve the problem. If a government is oblivious to the rise in the foreign exchange rate expressed in a free market, it can continue the policy of credit expansion for a considerable time, and even devalue its currency repeatedly; but the nemesis of the crack-up ending of the boom, if the credit expansion is carried to the extreme, will destroy its monetary system. Today credit expansion is an exclusive prerogative of government. Credit expansion, which is inflation in its purest form, is so popular that to speak against it is tantamount to committing political suicide.

The other day the minister took great pride in the reduction of the funded debt. That is a very good thing, and I think it should have been reduced a good deal more. But if we are faced with a major contraction of our north-south trade and at the same time lose our historic and natural markets abroad, we are going to find ourselves faced not only with currency expansion and inflation, but also with a trade unbalance the like of which no country has yet experienced. Our apparent prosperity and the extremely high level of our trade since the war form one of the great dangers we see ahead. We, and I particularly, have suggested over and over again that the problem of convertibility should be solved; that we should establish a common denominator, which has always been gold, to make our currency convertible. Many times in this house I have suggested a free market for gold in Canada, and I still believe that is one method we should have adopted.

I had hoped that a more realistic solution would be found when the so-called dollar talks were held in Washington. No matter how you devalue, no matter what you say your currency is worth, it will not be worth what you say it is until somebody else will freely buy it in the open market. That applies to all goods and services in world trade. The hatred of gold has inspired the superstition that omnipotent governments can create wealth out of little scraps of paper. The struggle against gold by all socialist and neo-socialist governments is a part of the great process of destruction which is the overriding symptom of the trend of our time. Autocratic controllers in the national treasuries fight the gold standard because they want to substitute autarchy for free trade, and, in extreme cases, war for peace and omnipotent government for liberty. This is the overriding principle which has driven governments ever since the end of hostilities.

We are in a position of apparent prosperity. Through the Marshall plan, we are the major sellers to the countries of Europe. These are in reality not true sales, however, but are partly gifts resulting from the generosity and foresightedness of the Marshall plan administrators. Eventually those sales will stop. The other day someone said that Europe could be self-sufficient in wheat within three years. This statement was made by an international authority on wheat. If that is so, our major export through the Marshall plan, namely wheat, will cease. If we can find no medium of exchange which will enable us to sell our wheat to the hungry countries in the world outside the North American continent, fifty per cent of our Marshall plan exports will cease, and we shall be left with an immediate unbalance of trade even before the end of ECA. There will then be no generous plan to help us out of our difficulties, and our historic natural markets will be gone. In the words of Right Hon. Mr. Amery, we shall be merely an appendage of the United States. That is the position I foresee in the comparatively near future, Mr. Speaker. I believe that difficulty can be solved only by finding some medium of exchange which will enable us to sell our goods to the rest of the world.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, were it not for the high degree of esteem in which I hold the hon. member (Mr. Adamson) who has just taken his seat, I would be tempted to make some caustic remarks concerning the general tenor of his statement. I believe it would be a good thing for the hon. member, however, to consider three questions. First of all: If there had been no gold created in the world, does he suppose mankind would have been able to live on the earth, or would the people have had to die because the Creator forgot gold? If all the gold in the world today were to be accumulated in Fort Knox, where a good share of it is already, I wonder if the hon. gentleman thinks the rest of the nations would have to give up and die because they could not get any of that gold. If, owing to some unusual or unexpected mishap while men were tinkering with atomic bombs, they were to discover some concoction the emanations from which were to decompose all the gold in the world, should we all die because there was no gold? The hon. gentleman, however, concluded his remarks on a more hopeful note, in that he implied it might be possible to discover some other medium of exchange.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I happen to attack the problem from the other point of view. I do not believe we need gold at all in this world. I believe the thing that counts is the resources of the world and man's ability to convert those resources into goods and services useful to man. If we could approach this monetary question from that realistic angle, what a difference it would make! We now live in an age in which man, with the wonderful technological skills and machines at his disposal, can produce more goods than all the people in the world could possibly use if they could all obtain everything they wanted. If some means could be discovered, upon which we all agreed, whereby we could distribute those goods to the people who need them, we would be on our way to a veritable garden of Eden in which all men could enjoy the good things of the world as the Creator unquestionably intended they should.

So much having been said with respect to the hon. gentleman's remarks, I will pass on to something more hopeful. I do believe there is a way out of our difficulty without destroying our freedom, without setting up dictatorships or bureaucratic controls which result in the destruction of goods and threats to punish men because they produce too much. I have been told that in the United States they are actually contemplating a measure under which a man who produces extra wheat next year, and is caught feeding it to chickens, will be punished. This indicates an anxiety on their part to see to it that no more is produced than under the present financial system can be consumed. I believe that is just as silly, just as useless, as it was to shoot cattle and drop them into the Mississippi river, or pile up surplus oranges and burn them, as was done at the beginning of the last depression. Evidently in the United States of America the same kind of mentality prevails today as that which plunged that great nation into the depression and dragged the rest of the world with it, where it remained until finally a war was necessary to rescue the world from the depression. Surely the time has come when someone with a little influence and prestige will say something that will light the way out of these difficulties.

I shall say something about this in the course of my remarks. It is not going to be as hopeless as the words of the hon. gentleman seemed to indicate. I do hope there is somebody in the Conservative party who is capable of learning that goods and not gold constitute the determining factor as regards money.

Everyone is worrying about a shortage of United States dollars. Britain needs Canadian dollars too. There is a shortage of hard currencies. Now, why is that? I shall not attempt to answer the question, because I have other matters to consider. It is astonishing, Mr. Speaker, that dollars can be short while goods are plentiful; for dollars are only tickets or claims to goods. Unless there are dollars to claim the goods, then certainly the goods appear worthless. Surely, if that is so, where goods are, dollars can be.

Reports are now circulating concerning surpluses in the United States which are embarrassing the authorities. They do not know what to do about these surpluses. There are reports of gathering surpluses in Canada which are going to confound the scarcity-minded people. At the same time, there are reported shortages in the have-not countries and the less developed countries. The fact that only yesterday the Prime Minister of India was in Canada recalls that medical investigations reveal that about ninety per cent of all the Indian people today are undernourished; that the average income of the wage earner in India is $26 a year. Famine stares them in the face on every hand, while in the United States and in Canada we are meditating on how to limit the production that we are to bring into being in the next year. Canada, fortunately, has not gone as far as the United States has, and never did become quite as foolish even in the last depression. I hope they never do.

It is reported in the Christian Science Monitor of September 21, 1949, that the FAO experts are contemplating the creation of a $5 billion fund to buy the surpluses of the world and render them available for purchase by the have-not nations with their own currency. This is a hopeful suggestion. The only thing that I think hon. members are asking with considerable anxiety is this: How far do we have to go in increasing our taxes or our debt in order to be able to supply the money which will be necessary to create a fund sufficiently large to buy the surpluses we are lucky enough to produce when we really turn ourselves loose in the matter of production. If the nation has to be penalized by being taxed for enough money to buy the goods that have been declared surpluses, then hope has departed from the world.

I should like to say a word or two that will guide us to some hope. In the parliamentary library there is a book with the title "Economic Tribulation", published in 1941, by Vincent C. Vickers. I fancy the name will commend the book to all. hon. members, whether they have just come to the house or whether they have been here before. From one of the chapters of this book, entitled "Democracy or Financial Dictatorship?", may I quote two excerpts? From page 59 of the book I quote as follows:

> Unless we can contrive and design and establish an improved and reformed financial system, which is the first essential towards a new and better economy in our own country, no satisfactory outcome of the war is possible; for where there is still widespread injustice and discontent there can be no ending to that war, unless it be a tangle of internal revolts and revolutions.

Therefore this man concentrates his attention on the financial system. Do we agree with him, or do we refuse to give any credit to this man? May I quote another passage from the same chapter, this time from page 65:

> Strenuous efforts have been made over some twenty-five years to patch up the money system in an attempt to make it last a little longer; but it has stood, and now stands, in the way of progress and social betterment, thereby creating universal unrest and a tendency to obtain by force what cannot be obtained otherwise. For the sake of our children let us take warning in time. Let us discard the policy of inaction and pretence and boldly face the fact that it is not the inevitable smoke of the galley-stove which assails our nostrils, but that a fire is raging in the hold and that the ship of state is in imminent danger. Our democratic system and our existing financial system can no longer live together. One of them must give way to the other.

May I now quote two short extracts from his recommendations? What does he think needs to be done to change our present financial system into that which would be better suited to this age of plenty in which God has placed us? From page 75 of his book I read two of several recommendations. These two are:

> 1. Any additional supply of money should be issued as a clear asset to the state, so that money will be spent into existence, and not lent into existence.

When we reflect that there is not a dollar that goes into circulation in Canada that is not borrowed from somebody—in other words, every dollar of our money is lent into circulation, and not one dollar of it is originally spent into circulation by the government—we find that there is some cause for careful study of our own financial system, if this man knows what he is talking about. I read the next recommendation:

> 2. The abolition of the debt system, where all credit is created by the banks and hired out at interest to the country.

You would think that he had his eye particularly on Canada, would you not? All he did was cast his eye on every country which is operating on the present debt-creating financial system which our government and our people seem to be absolutely enamoured of.

Who was this Vincent Cartwright Vickers that we should give any attention to his idea? From a note in the forepart of the book by Wilma Cawdor, his daughter, we learn that he was born on January 16, 1879, and educated at Eton and Oxford. He was deputy lieutenant of the city of London, director of Vickers Limited for twenty-two years, director of London Assurance. He resigned in January, 1939. He was made a governor of the bank of England in 1910 and resigned in 1919. He later became president of the Economic Reform Club and Institute. He is just about as experienced a man as our Graham Towers, on whose every word we all seem to hang with breathless adoration.

What does he say about himself? In his foreword which he wrote in the last months of his life in 1939 he said:

> I who write this need no proof of the importance of the money system to the very lives of the people and even to the future existence of the British race, so long as that system fills the position which it now holds in our national economy.

Again:

> I therefore decided to take the unprecedented course of offering to my readers my own qualifications for putting down before the British people the very precarious condition of our monetary system as it exists in this country today; that this our money system forms the most important part of our economic system, and that the nation's economic system forms part of our social system.

And again:

> Ever since that day in 1926, when, not in arrogance but with humility, I felt it my duty to explain to the governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Montagu

Norman, that "henceforth I was going to fight him and the gold standard and the Bank of England policy until I died"—(and well I remember the words of his reply!)—I have been an ardent money reformer. Some few years afterwards I resigned my long directorship of Vickers, Limited; since when I have spent much time and money in advocating the necessity for a reform of the monetary system.

And again:

I bear no ill feeling against my own class or any other class. I seek neither notoriety nor kudos. If someone can change my convictions I shall be only too ready to alter them. But in fifteen years nothing whatever has occurred to make me alter my views. I still believe that the existing sytem is actively harmful to the state, creates poverty and unemployment, and is the root cause of war.

And again:

This personal confession is merely to demonstrate that I have seen both sides of the picture. My opinions are based upon my own experience and knowledge. I am today in the unique position of being absolutely and entirely devoid of animosity and wholly disinterested. I feel myself no longer under any restrictions whatsoever, except to guard against doing harm to my country or giving offence to anyone.

These sound like good qualifications; one would feel prompted to listen to a man like that, would he not? Here is one man, eminently qualified, who frankly advocates government-created debt-free money to be spent into circulation, and not lent as is our money under our present financial system.

May I turn now to another man. This time I select Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, long-time chairman of the Midland bank in England. Reginald McKenna was one of the fourteen members of a committee on finance and industry appointed on November 5, 1929, by the British government as the Macmillan committee to inquire into banking, finance and credit. I should think that would be sufficient qualification at least to entitle him to some attention on our part—and probably to a little thinking about what he had to say. He, along with others, inquired into banking, finance and credit, and prepared the Macmillan report on finance and industry.

In January, 1936, in his annual report to the shareholders of his bank, he made a statement which is of great importance to all men of our race. His report is printed in the London Times of January 30—it is available in our parliamentary library to anyone who wishes to read it. May I read a passage from that report:

Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.

We learned that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused.

For money to be truly "sound" there must be enough of it to finance an ordinarily growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary movement of prices.

One would think that man was a Social Crediter, would he not? I suppose the Progressive Conservatives would eject him from their party if he made a remark like that. I am almost sure the Liberals would stop him from talking from the floor of the house. And if he did not, they would see that he did not receive any further nominations in his constituency.

Mr. Knowles: He would get an independent nomination—and win, as happened yesterday.

Mr. Brooks: Not bad.

Mr. Blackmore: Nevertheless if these Liberals and Conservatives are to be worthy of the responsibilities resting upon them in these trying times, they will have to give attention to the serious matters in this excerpt which I have quoted from Right Hon. Reginald McKenna.

Has state-created debt-free money ever been used successfully? Yes. Canada created $26 million in debt-free money during world war I. She spent the money into circulation to defray part of the cost of that war. We have never paid a five-cent piece in interest on that money; we do not owe five cents' worth of debt on it. Yet that money played just as important a part in the conduct of world war I as did any dollar gathered and spent by the dominion government. And it had no greater effect in producing inflation than had any other dollar thus gathered and spent.

There are people who will say that that $26 million helped cause inflation. What caused the astonishing inflation after this war, then? All the money used in this war was borrowed and gathered through taxation. Why the appalling prices from which we now are suffering?

Abraham Lincoln used what were known as greenbacks and with them he won the civil war in the United States.

Great Britain at the time of world war I resorted to treasury notes called Bradburys, and issued them to a value of £354 million. There was nothing behind those Bradburys more than certain securities. But they supported Britain's effort in the war, and with them she won the war.

Dr. William A. Shaw, secretary of His Majesty's treasury, and one of the best informed men in matters of finance, has told us that if Britain had been wise enough to continue using Bradburys from 1925 on, instead of going back to the gold standard, she would have won the peace too.

So there is such a thing as debt-free money. It has been used successfully. Yet there may be some room for uncertainty concerning each of these three; there may be room for argument. There is, however, a high degree of scientific certainty concerning the Guernsey island market house experiment. In 1815 the Guernsey islanders wanted to build a market house, but they found they were too far in debt to make it safe to borrow, and too severely taxed to make it safe to raise taxes. They decided finally to create 3,000 one-pound notes required for the building of the market house. This they did.

The whole story of this remarkable experiment is to be found in a volume available on the shelves of the parliamentary library, a book entitled "An Example of Communal Currency", by J. Theodore Harris, published in 1911. It is good reading; I commend it to Liberals, and particularly to Conservatives. I would make a special recommendation of it to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I should like to read certain excerpts from the preface on page eight which was written by a good socialist, if I recall, Sidney Webb. Probably all our C.C.F. friends will have some confidence in what he says. I quote as follows:

> Now Mr. J. Theodore Harris—having, I suspect, a warmer feeling for the incident than he has allowed to appear in these scientific pages—has done what perhaps I or some other economic student of the eighties or nineties ought to have done, namely, gone to Guernsey to dig up, out of the official records, the incident as it actually occurred. What is interesting is that he has found that the myth of the veteran Owenite or Chartist is, in all essentials, confirmed by the documents. The story is true. The Guernsey market house was built without a loan and without the payment of interest.

I am tempted to suggest to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) that he read that with meticulous care. If he reads it ten times, probably about the eleventh time the facts may begin to dawn on him. He is quite sincere; I think he will realize the significance of that statement. He is a young man who comes in here so cocksure that no one understands Social Credit; but I think he will find he has made himself exceedingly silly. I am sure this book will help him. I am sorry he is not in the chamber; I should like to see him try to answer that.

An hon. Member: He can read it in Hansard.

Mr. Blackmore: He can read it in Hansard and if he feels disposed he can get up some time and give a little talk when I am in a position to deal with him. I read again from the first words of the preface by Sidney Webb as follows:

> Those who during the past thirty or forty years have frequented working men's clubs or other centres of discussion in which, here and there, an Owenite survivor or a Chartist veteran was to be found, will often have heard of the Guernsey market house. Here, it would be explained, was a building provided by the Guernsey community for its own uses, without borrowing, without any toll of interest, and, indeed, without cost.

There has been considerable discussion about the Guernsey island experiment. A young man like the hon. member for Vegreville might be tempted when out on the hustings to give his own version of it which might not be as accurate as if he had studied this book ten times. I am going to quote now therefore from Sir Norman Angell, who is a recognized monetary writer. In his book, "The Story of Money", published in 1929 we find an account of the Guernsey island market house experiment which I think those who read this account in Hansard will feel safe in trusting. I quote from page 266 as follows:

> The story of the Guernsey market house has figured in many a currency debate, and has so often been taken as showing that it is open to a community to escape the burden of interest and the usual inconveniences of loans, that the history of what took place is worth noting. The records show that the meat market, of the island of Guernsey, still standing, was built without any loan at all merely by the issue of pound notes, created for the purpose and which were gradually paid off as the rents came in. The Guernsey States in effect said:
> "We propose to build a market house. We will issue one pound notes with which we will buy material and pay the workers. Those who use the house must pay rent or charges on these notes. As they come in they will be destroyed. Ultimately they will all be destroyed and the island will have the house."

And further from the same page:

> The island of Guernsey has its own parliament, "The States" (les Etats). On the 12th of April, 1815, it appointed a committee to consider a scheme for enlarging the market. That committee recommended the issue of state notes, first to the amount of £3,000 "Thus," as the report to the committee reads, "at the end of ten years, all the notes would be cancelled and the States would be in possession of an income of £150 per annum, which would be a return to the £3,000 spent by them. Looked at from all sides, the scheme shows nothing but the greatest advantage for the public and for the States."

> Mr. Webb's explanation, though entirely correct, might tend to obscure the facts which most concern us in this connection. It is not a question whether paper money devices will enable people to get things for nothing, but whether this method of credit expansion, even sometimes at the cost of raising the price level, may not be the best way of paying for them and whether paper money, anchored to general wealth, an index figure, is not a more just, more manageable and more efficient money, when wisely used, than one anchored to one commodity like gold. Guernsey's method had obvious advantages, and speaking broadly, achieved its objects and was successful.

I wish to comment on that passage. Sir Norman Angell seems to assume that a price rise occurred in Guernsey island as a result, but I challenge that assumption. I say that there is no evidence whatsoever in "An Example of Communal Currency" or in any report of the meetings of the finance committee that there was any rise in price. I quote further from page 271 as follows:

Why did Guernsey succeed where Rhode Island failed?

Briefly, because the Guernsey notes (to take those issued in connection with the market house) were very limited in amount, issued with reference to revenue-bearing property shortly to become fruitful, "goods moving into consumption." Each note stood for consumable goods, which, if not actually in being, were coming into being; and the issues were limited to the value of those goods (the goods, in the particular issue under consideration being the market house).

I wish to point out that Sir Norman has erred just slightly there. In another book of his called "Your Money", written seven years later, he gets just a little nearer to the recognition of the full truth about the real backing of money. It was not the market house which gave value to the money, it was the goods and services which were surplus in Guernsey island for which the people could spend money, when they got money for building the market house, without causing a rise in price. It was the resources of Guernsey island standing behind those goods, and the capacity to produce more goods, to absorb money as fast as the money came into circulation, that provided the backing. As long as there is a surplus of goods and services in the country not being bought by the money at present in circulation in that country, new money can be issued debt-free and wisely spent into circulation without any danger whatsoever of a rise in price.

That is the absolute truth concerning the real backing of money; it is far removed from the gold backing idea.

How much money can be created and used by the state? Enough money can be created and used, spent wisely into circulation, to enable people to buy the surplus goods on the market. If this is done and no more money is issued than enough to enable people to buy the goods, if that money is put into the hands of people who will buy, and is used to consume goods, then there will be no adverse results from the creation and issue of debt-free money.

Debt-free money can be used to distribute goods internationally. For example, we are now worrying about where we shall get the money to put into this huge $5 billion fund. Provided we have a large enough surplus of goods in Canada we can create enough debt-free money to put into that fund, and when spent it would buy Canadian goods that were surplus on the Canadian market. It would do no more harm than the money which is ordinarily spent in Canada to buy goods, let us say wheat, by a nation like France, or even the United States. If this device is used by an increasingly large number of states, then the financing of the international distribution of goods by the surplus-producing countries can be managed without debt and without taxation.

Similarly debt-free money can be used to distribute goods internally without additional taxation or debt, and without loss of freedom. I recommend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and to the earnest men behind him in the house, that they should set to work immediately to discover the uses of debt-free money so that when the Minister of Finance next goes to an international or an Anglo-Saxon parley at New York or London, or wherever the meeting may be held, he will be able to offer a suggestion that may have some possible chance of being of real assistance to men in these trying times.

As a means of dealing with the economic tribulation in which we find ourselves, I recommend the principles of Social Credit.

Mr. J. M. Dechene (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to ask you for the privilege of the floor, I do so not because I have a momentous message to bring to the members of the house nor because I have any remedy to offer as a quick solution of the great problems which this parliament, in common with other parliaments throughout the world, is called upon to face at the present time. I rise because I feel I have a duty to perform and an obligation to fulfil to the people who have again honoured me by re-electing me a few weeks ago after many decades in the public life of Canada. If I may be allowed to speak of myself for a moment, I was re-elected by the largest majority ever given to any candidate chosen to serve the great constituency of Athabaska.

If, in the course of the remarks I desire to address to the government and the members of the house, I sometimes speak of localities which may be strange to some of the new members of the house, if I speak of regions which they do not know, I wish to assure them that I do not do so because of any desire to speak about local and parochial issues, but because what I wish to submit to the government and to the House of Commons today concerns a great part of the northern sections of the provinces of western Canada, the northern parts of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. I shall mention names which may seem strange and unknown to you, but may I remind those of you who come from the provinces by the sea of the tremendous size of the western provinces and the great distances they cover. May I remind hon. members, for instance, that the constituency which I am representing for a third time is larger than the province of Nova Scotia, and that within its boundaries are to be found resources that would enable the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to meet all the obligations of Canada if we proceed to develop them as they ought to be developed.

The other day the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) warned the new members of the house of the feeling of frustration they may experience when they first come here, and the feeling that their time seems to be wasted. Let me remind them of the advice I gave to some of the young members of the Liberal party some years ago. I told them that changes in a country are not made just by talking about them. They do not take place from day to day. For instance, we are now discussing the matter of bringing our constitution up to date. Changes are brought about by discussion, debate, serious talk, and by seeding thoughts in the fertile soil of the intelligent minds of the Canadian people. Some day they bear fruit.

I have known young men to tell me how discouraged they felt at times, but ten years later they found, if they remained true to their ideals and carried on preaching in the desert, that what they had hoped for had come to pass. Personally I have reached the age of three score and ten and a little over, and I sometimes have a feeling of frustration. That is why I am on my feet today. I sometimes feel I have not done much to reward the loyalty which I have received from the pioneering population of northern Alberta. I sometimes feel I have not done enough, and I ask myself what more I could have done in order to serve them as they deserve to be served. I only have my voice left to tell you of their plight, their desires, their ambitions and their ideals. I hope hon. members of the house will bear with me for a few minutes today while I do that.

I have no written speech. It is in my heart. I hope to speak from my heart on behalf of the people I love and whom I wish to help. During the last election campaign my opponents said that Joe Dechene was too old. I gave the people a pledge that in the waning years of my life, in the evening of a life which I have devoted to them for over four decades, I would give them the best that was left in me, and they thought it was still better than was offered by much younger men who attempted to wrest the seat from me.

I speak on behalf of the people of my constituency this afternoon when I place before the House of Commons their plight in so far as railway communication is concerned, something we must have in western Canada. I refer to the through line north of the Saskatchewan river serving the constituency that I represent as well as those to the west and to the east of Athabaska. I am not suggesting the initiation of a new plan of construction. I am not asking the house or the government to undertake a new program of railway construction. I am only asking parliament, the government and the executive of the Canadian National Railways to fulfil their solemn pledge and to carry out their word of honour to the people I represent in this house.

This is nothing new, sir. Time is passing very quickly, but I should like to give the history of this matter. It began in 1909—and I was already active in politics then—when the government of Alberta had to meet the demands of the pioneer population which had spread throughout the northern part of the province, and decided to undertake a program of railroad construction by guaranteeing the bonds of the railway companies up to $13,000 or $15,000 per mile according to the type of ground they had to cover and the cost of construction. The lines whose completion I am now advocating were originated at that time, forty years ago, so I think we have been fairly patient. Gradually the construction proceeded, fifty miles, one hundred miles or one hundred and fifty miles. Later, when the Canadian Northern became part of the Canadian National Railways under a broad-minded man of vision as minister, who I think is still alive—I refer to Hon. Charles Dunning—and another man of vision as president, a great program of expansion was undertaken on the western prairies in order to serve those settlements which had been created. Hon. members will remember the bills which were introduced in this house providing for the construction of fifty miles of line here and fifty miles of line there.

When those bills were adopted and the money was voted by parliament, settlers poured into the newer portions of the country which were to be served by these branch lines. That became particularly true when drought struck the southern portions of Saskatchewan and Alberta and these people had to move out. I wish I had time to describe the plight of those settlers moving by the thousands across the prairies, coming to the north where they could hope for rain, in order to start anew. I know of men who left homes worth $10,000 and more, who had the finest equipment ruined by year after year of drought, and who moved to the north. I remember how the horses were played out because they had no feed left on the farms; but they moved slowly north, bringing with them a cow or two and the remnants of their furniture, seeking a new home in the north. And of course they went to the districts which were to be served by the proposed lines, which were not merely talked about but which had been arranged and contracted for.

Hon. members may ask why these people went to those districts. They went because the word of Canada and of the Canadian National Railways was behind the development of that country where they were trying to start again. I remember the women, whom I described in this house on a previous occasion. I saw whole caravans pass by my home in Bonnyville. One of these new lines served that town, and that was why I went there: to help in the development of a new region by those pioneer elements which after all are the lifeblood and backbone of this great country. I can remember those men leaning over in their seats, tired and discouraged; but the women sat looking ahead, as the women of Canada have always done, as they did during the first great war and the last war. They still had faith that they could conquer a new world and make another home for the children God had given them.

Then we had the Tory government. Unfortunately I have to come to this, though I do not like it. That was a government of cowardice, lack of vision and fear, which in 1931 stopped this work. That government left the settlers fifty, sixty, seventy-five miles from the nearest railroad. When I was in business in my town I remember cashing relief cheques every day not by dozens but by hundreds. People had to be provided with food and clothing because they could not raise anything and could not earn anything, and they were given relief instead of being put to work building those lines. I am sorry to be beating my desk; I am probably imitating an hon. member across the way, but I feel so strongly about these matters. The Tory government of 1930-1935—and I hope it may be the last Tory government this country will ever have to pay for—went so far as to pay the Tomlinson Construction Company, which had the contract for grading the line from my own town of Bonnyville around to St. Walburg in Saskatchewan, an amount of money to cancel the contract and stop the work, while people were starving all along that line through lack of work.

With all these drawbacks, with the work being stopped, and since most of these settlers had nothing left, you would hardly expect them to get by. But, Mr. Speaker, they have succeeded in developing that country. It is now prosperous, except for the fact that these settlers have no communication with outside markets. They have to carry their goods by truck or wagon for many miles; but along that one line of rail from Edmonton east to the towns of St. Paul and Heinsburg, on into Saskatchewan, to Battleford, Turtleford and St. Walburg, you can see farms with fine buildings. The men and women who went through Bonnyville years ago tired and discouraged now hold their heads high and have homes again. But they are saying to the people of Canada, "We came here on the strength of the word of the Canadian National Railways, an institution controlled by and belonging to the people of Canada. Now that the war has been over for five years we are asking you to come through and build these lines, and give us the access we must have to both east and west."

My time is passing quickly, and I am afraid I may not say all I want to say, though I am speaking as quickly as I can. I might read a resolution which appears in the official journals of the legislature of Alberta for 1932. In that year a by-election was held in the riding of Athabaska, during which a young Conservative, one of the ablest men in that north country—he is still alive—carried that seat because a majority of the people thought that after having elected a Liberal in the election of 1930, by electing a supporter of the government we might have that work continued, after Mr. Bennett and his ministers had ordered it stopped. But that young man came back in 1935 discouraged, and he never ran again. I was a member of the Alberta legislature at that time, as I had been for some years previously, and in March of that year I moved a resolution, which was carried unanimously, asking the government and the Canadian National Railways to fulfil their promises to the people of that northern country. Well, we wasted our time.

Then the war broke out. Of course we knew nothing could be done during the war; but those hon. members who have done me the honour of listening to me or who have read Votes and Proceedings and the Orders of the Day will have noticed that each year during and since the war, in order to keep the matter to the fore, I have placed similar resolutions before this house. I believe the time has come to fulfil that promise to the people. From 1909 to 1949 should be long enough to wait. During this time towns have grown prosperous. I could name you many in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore). There are Smoky Lake, Vilna, Spedden and St. Paul, Elk Point, and others in my own constituency which have developed into centres of population, although they were sixty-five miles away from the nearest railroad. Try to duplicate that anywhere in Canada. These towns have developed with all the facilities, churches, schools, and everything. The railroad was sixty-five miles away or more and goods had to be shipped by team or light truck to Bonnyville, my home town.

At a place called Abilene, the railway divides and one branch goes southeast to Heinsburg and the other branch goes up to Beaver River. At these points the Tory government stopped construction. I have never seen anything more desperate. Talk about frustration! I have heard the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) talk about frustration and I remember his eloquence when he pointed the finger of scorn at the treasury benches. I am reminded of the trestle over the Beaver river which cost nearly one million. It crosses the valley on cement piers over the water and only a small span of steel is needed. What a saving there would be for those farmers who are hauling their stuff to market if this bridge were completed. I say to the administration and to the new manager of the Canadian National Railways that we should go back to the days of Sir Henry Thornton, the days of construction. The time has arrived to complete this railway link, and I challenge any railway authority in Ottawa to say otherwise.

I have spoken with many railway officials. A short time ago I was speaking with a railway official in Edmonton who told me the line would not cost us two cents because of the business that will originate along that line. There will be traffic for Battleford, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, and even for the Hudson Bay Railway up to Churchill. Only a few miles along that line one finds the new oil field of Redwater. We have heard arguments about keeping all this oil in the west. Imagine! This field will produce about 750 million barrels of oil as prospecting indicates and a short distance away from it there are the vast resources of Leduc. Transportation is needed to develop these vast resources.

Twenty miles beyond St. Paul, and about fifteen miles west of the present Canadian National railway lines terminating at Heinsburg, a salt mine has been discovered. It has been developed and a great factory has been built. This mine is now serving the needs of the prairies without the necessity of importing salt from eastern Canada.

I am going to tell you something. The Canadian Pacific runs through that country between the main line of the Canadian National Railways and the Saskatchewan river. The line, which was built some years ago, runs from Lloydminster into Edmonton. It is taking about two-thirds of the traffic from the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian Pacific did very well to obtain this line; they must have good lawyers. Their railway line is only a few miles from the salt factory of which I spoke a moment ago. In spite of the necessity of hauling goods up and down the hills of Saskatchewan, many farmers are transporting their wheat, cattle and hogs south to the Canadian Pacific. In this way they receive a cent or two more. A highway is now being built from the town of Vermilion to Elk Point in Athabaska and unless the Canadian National Railways and Mr. Gordon become alive to the situation they will find that three-quarters of the traffic from that country will go south to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Do we want that to happen? If we do not, then during the course of the next few months steps will have to be taken to meet the situation.

Let me remind the house that the surveys have all been made and specifications have been prepared. The cost has been ascertained under present prices which are much higher than they were when the original plans were made. Unless these branches are built from Heinsburg to St. Walburg and from Beaver River to St. Walburg to close these gaps, all the oil, wheat and cattle shipments will be diverted to the Canadian Pacific. I am sure the Canadian Pacific hopes we will not bridge these gaps. Again I remind hon. gentlemen that the plans were prepared. Even the contracts were granted, so let us go ahead.

Often I have asked myself, what is the price of loyalty? What are the rewards of loyalty?—loyalty to your country, loyalty to your family, loyalty to your church, whichever it is. Loyalty is, I believe, the greatest virtue in the world. It is because of this loyalty, sir, that I am trying to obtain these things for the people of Athabaska which they ought to have. They deserve these things from this government. It is because of loyalty to these pioneer settlers that I am making this speech. Here I am talking about myself again. I could name forty places throughout that country, from Edmonton north, east and west, in which I was the first man to hold a public meeting; that was fifty years ago in some cases. The name of Dechene is still good, and the people know that I try to honour my obligations. It is for that reason that I am asking for the privilege of speaking to you today.

I should like to speak about something else for a few moments. Oil has been discussed in this house. There is one thing I wish to bring to the attention of the people of Ontario and Quebec, where the money and the great factories are. I would ask them why they do not move some of these factories or branches thereof to the source of power, which is in Alberta. It is so logical. What do we do now? We pay a bonus on coal and haul it all the way down to eastern Canada. There is talk now of pipe lines to bring the oil to the east. We have to do that because within a year the province of Alberta will produce enough gas and oil to supply the whole of the Canadian market. This will save over $300 million of valuable United States currency. These resources are there and only the transportation facilities, which are now being undertaken, are necessary.

One can see how foolish it is to move the power, whether it be gas, oil, or coal, hundreds and thousands of miles away. Would it not be easier and cheaper to bring the factories to the sources of power? These factories could be built on top of the coal seams of Alberta. Fifteen per cent of the coal reserves of the British empire, if we can still mention the empire, are in the province of Alberta. A short time ago at a place called Pickardville a gas well was discovered, but it was necessary to cap it because there was no market for the gas. The people of eastern Canada could actually benefit tremendously through cheaper manufacturing costs if the factories were moved to the source of power.

There is something else about which I have spoken in this house before. You will say this is a provincial matter, and in a way it is. I do not believe we should be parochial in our approach to these questions. This is the parliament of Canada. I am proud to be in parliament, sir, because with the little ability I may have it gives me an opportunity to speak from my little corner to the people of Canada as a whole. The Liberal party, which went out of power in 1930, passed the act in 1926. Finally it was accepted by Alberta, and the natural resources of Alberta, the lands, the gas, the mineral rights and everything else, with the exception of a few, were turned over to Alberta and Saskatchewan by an Ottawa Liberal government.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Edmonton Journal of March 25, 1924. It contains a picture of myself. I was a pretty good-looking fellow in those days. The headline reads:

Dechene urges cash reward for oil well.

Some said that I was foolish, but I felt that there was oil under my feet in Alberta, but I felt something else, and I still feel it. I do not care what I may be told. This tremendous wealth that is now being taken out of the bosom of the earth in Alberta, as I believe it will later be taken out of Saskatchewan, does not belong to any government. It belongs to the people of those provinces.

The other day a few hundred acres of land in Alberta were sold to one of the oil companies for over $3 million cold cash for just the right to search. No oil had yet been found there. What did the farmer who owned the land get? A smile, and not a very pleasant one. I stand on solid ground, sir, when I repeat that if it was a new matter for me to preach and to foster I would still not leave it entirely to Alberta. I was a member of the legislature of Alberta long before any living member here now from Alberta. There are possibly only two of the party who went out in 1921 yet alive, who are survivors of the disaster when the Liberal party was put out of office, and I am the only one left in public life. In those days I preached not only for the return of the natural resources but also for the return of the mineral rights to the owners of the soil.

Up in my country, as I told you, sir, there were settlers at Bonnyville and Cold Lake and all over that country, and some of them were ninety miles from the nearest railroad. They operated; they carried on. They felled the trees, picked the stones and developed this land. It was a difficult and tremendous job. Few people in this country would ever undertake the job or go through what these people went through, but they did it. They carved out farms in that country long before the railway came. They had to drive their cattle and their hogs sixty-five, seventy and eighty miles to the nearest town. Just the other day oil was found on some of this land or on the next quarter section, but the farmers in that area never got anything for it. It is too late now to talk about the return of mineral resources because so many millions of acres have been alienated; but something can still be done in Alberta and Saskatchewan, or anywhere else where these resources are found, to see that the farmers out of whose land this wealth is taken receive a royalty and that the whole royalty does not go to a provincial government to use it as it sees fit. At least five per cent of these royalties should go to the farmers, to the men, who by their sweat and hard work have developed these lands, and to the mothers who raised families of five, six, seven, eight and nine children under indescribable conditions. They showed courage and made sacrifices which it is beyond the greatest poet of the English language to describe. Why should they not get them? Let us think that over. Let us show the people of Alberta that the people of Canada, of whom I am a humble member, believe that right and justice should be done to this pioneer population of the northern part of Alberta.

I see that my time is nearly exhausted. We did not have much of a crop in our district this year. For some reason Nature did not smile on us as she usually does. That has happened for two years now. But we are carrying on as we did during the war. At that time we had a program entitled, "Canada Carries On". We shall carry on until these railroads are built. As I said, they were contracted for. What would you think of a man in business or of a firm or corporation who made a contract, signed it, and then under stress arranged with the other party to cancel the contract? You would say that man does not keep his word. You would look upon him as a quitter and say that you would not do business with him. Are we, the people of Canada and the government of Canada, going to give that kind of reputation to the Canadian National Railways. I say no. I make my plea to you gentlemen of the House of Commons this afternoon. My days in politics may not be long. There is not much for a man of my age to hope for except the last trip which will be a happy one I believe because of the love I have for my fellow man. When I was a young fellow in Alberta I had great faith in the destiny of that province. I saw a vision for the province. I knew—I do not know how I knew—but I knew there was oil under my feet. I knew of the wealth of its soil. I knew of the great ranches, of the cattle and the hogs, and of the wealth that would be taken out of the soil of Alberta. Later on when it was taken out of its bosom, as it were, I felt like a conqueror. I decided in my humble capacity to do my share to bring about development and progress. I thought that, when I had climbed one hill, I had reached the top, but it was only the beginning of the climb, and there were vast fields for development. Then I realized that we never reach the top. If we carry on with faith and loyalty to our country we pass on our vision to our younger people, many of whom I see in front of me this afternoon.

I have a vision of the mighty Rockies standing loyally as a sentinel. They are loyal because they never move from their post. They are guardians, as it were, of the wealth of the western prairies. It seems to me that God in His wisdom placed them there as a barrier to anyone who might invade the wealth of these great plains of western Canada. Perhaps He never overlooks anything, but did He foresee that the evil genius of humanity would find an instrument of war to fly over these mountains and bring disaster to humanity? I say that the people of Alberta have the Rockies as a guardian against war. If some modern enemy should try to cross the Rockies as Hannibal crossed the Alps, do not fret, the government of Canada, the Liberal government served by young men of vision and courage, will see that every protection is afforded. From the generous breasts of the buxom woman that symbolizes the western prairies we shall have the milk of abundance, the warm milk of abundance, of power, of oil, of grain, of everything to give to the rest of Canada and to the world. All that we are asking from you this afternoon through my humble instrument is to come to the help of this pioneer population and see that they are given all the advantages of production and transportation.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), who has just taken his seat, I too have something to say. When the budget was first introduced in March I said it was a good election budget. Today I think it is even better than that: it is a good after-election budget.

Before a budget is brought down there is a good deal of uncertainty. Only two parties know what is in it, and neither of them will tell. One is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and one often has to talk to the Other silently. Neither the right hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Howe) nor I used the election budget in our campaigns, because we had so many good things to talk about we never got that far down the list. The worst they could say about me was that I was an old man, just like the government. I came back and thanked them for that splendid tribute, because they could not have paid a higher one. Even though a man be up in years, if he has common sense and a Christian character to back up what he says, he is not afraid anywhere.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). I pitied him before he rose to speak, because he had a heavy task ahead of him. It was a man's job, but he measured up to it splendidly. We at the head of the lakes know him in industry as a man among men, a man who leads his executive to play fair with the workers in the big plant up there.

I know he said we should have more trade with Great Britain. We should; but I should like him or anyone else in the house to say how we are going to get it. How can we sell to anyone who has not the dollars to pay? Let me tell the hon. member how we can sell to Great Britain without receiving dollars in return. Let us do what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did during the depression, when there was too much butter. He did not dump it into the lake; rather, he sent it out to the various relief centres throughout Canada. A resolution was passed, about which I have some knowledge, thanking him for that splendid gift.

We can sell our wheat to Britain if we offer it on a loan basis, or give it to them free of charge. After all there is nothing wrong with that. We know what the plan of the Great Teacher was—feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick. If Britain has not enough wheat, what can be done? If we have more wheat than we need, what are we going to do with it? I leave those matters in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture.

The budget gives me certain reasons for assurance. I believe it has been made clear, both during the election campaign and since, that the dominion government is willing to do its share toward paving the trans-Canada highway from the Altantic to the Pacific. If the provincial governments play the game, then they will rise to the occasion, and we shall have a highway across this country. Fort William wants it dearly, because not altogether selfishly we have some things up there which we believe all Canada should have. We have the greatest wheat-handling machinery in the world; there is nothing like it to be found anywhere else. The head of the lakes is known as the world's bread basket.

I was amazed the first time I saw two big cars of wheat pulled into an elevator, turned up and down, and emptied in a very short time—and all without the use of any shovels. As I have often said, we have the greatest scenery to be found anywhere in Canada—scenery second not even to the lakes of Killarney. Stand on Mount McKay, and one would be enrapt with the beauty he would see. There we see Thunder cape and Thunder bay, and over yonder the sister city. With all this beauty it would be one of the greatest tourist attractions in Canada.

And what about fishing? Why, you people do not know anything about the attractions of fishing. You would forget even to say those bad words, because the fishing is so good. The assurance from the federal government that the trans-Canada highway will receive its full support brings comfort to us at the head of the lakes.

The second assurance in the budget concerns housing. Anyone who heard that dignified, athletic, young and brilliant Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) the other day would say at once that there was a coming young man who is doing a great job. The minister gave us the assurance that the little man, the man with the small income, one day before very long will own his own home. Let us say to the minister that we thank him for the work he is putting into his job.

We take encouragement at the lakehead from the hope given to us by way of support for our gold mining and other mining interests. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) is not in his seat, but let me say to him that we appreciate his getting out and seeing the gold mines for himself. While I was speaking a few days ago, where was the minister? He was away up yonder in northern Ontario making an inspection, and getting firsthand information so that he would know whereof he was planning.

Much discouragement has come to the gold-mining industry in the last five years. Many of the smaller men went out of business. Why? Because they could not make enough to pay their help. I trust that the gold mining interests will now be in a better position, having in mind the deflation of the dollar and the bonus.

The other day we were pleased when the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) moved a resolution sponsored by the teachers federation of Canada. As an Irishman he made a good speech—even though he is a C.C.F.'er. He did it well and his efforts are appreciated. I know that, like the rest of us, he wants to see every last boy and girl in Canada get an education that will help to fit them for the tasks of life. So his word of encouragement.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has done a splendid job in helping hospitals whose boards were becoming discouraged. I am looking for further advances in the way of social security and I have one suggestion to make. A pension should be provided for those suffering from arthritis and other incurable diseases. I know of a family that came from Saskatchewan the head of which is suffering from arthritis. He is unable to go to work and his wife cannot go out to work because she must look after him as well as three lively children. The province of Ontario cannot do anything for them because they come from Saskatchewan. I have tried to help them along with some of my friends. I hope the minister will see his way clear to provide pensions for those suffering from arthritis and other incurable diseases.

I would like to have spoken for half an hour on a statement made by a recent visitor to Fort William from the United States. This gentleman said that a revolution was coming in Russia. I did not think about what he said at that time, but since then I have given some thought to his statement. I have been thinking of the man who once led Germany. The country that treats God as a myth and leaves Him out will sooner or later come to trouble. This gentleman said that within three years Russia would have a revolution. We shall watch to see whether he is right. He was a steady-going Christian, a Presbyterian, if you know that kind of man, and he would not say that sort of thing without having some information to back it up.

I have a request to make of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I studied phrenology a little and I think that anyone with any knowledge of phrenology can learn more by looking at a man's head than he could otherwise. When I look at the minister I see the bump of perception is highly developed. I also see the bump of honesty and the bump of fair play fairly well developed. That is why I make my plea for the removal of the sales tax on hearing aids.

I have one and it has been of great help to me, but everyone in Canada has not the large salary I have. Many people cannot afford to pay $175 or $195 for a hearing aid. Many have to buy cheaper instruments, but they are dear at any price. As the minister's bump of fair play is highly developed I hope he will realize the need for the removal of the sales tax on these hearing aids. The duty has been removed already. The sales tax has been removed on wheel chairs, medical appliances and artificial limbs and it should be removed on these aids. I am sure if the minister does remove that tax more hon. members in this house will soon have the benefit of these hearing aids. The sales tax is eight per cent but the invoice is made out in United States dollars so it amounts to almost ten per cent in Canadian funds. It would be a great help if the tax were removed.

I congratulate the minister upon his budget. The minister should be thanked for being consistent in bringing down the budget. I think he held off as long as he could in order that more taxes would be paid and the national debt reduced. Of course there are others who thought there might be another reason for that. But he stuck to his task and brought down the same budget, with two added improvements. I wish him every success with it.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate for many reasons, one being that I am always ready to go on with the inquiry. This debate affords us a last opportunity to air the grievances facing the country. This government has obtained the greatest majority of any government since confederation. I believe the people should rule because after all is said and done we should have government of the people, by the people and for the people. But are we getting that at the present time? Do the people back in the constituencies know what is going on here? A great many people read Hansard and others depend upon the radio.

Public meetings are not what they used to be in the olden days. I remember when I was the head of the city going to meetings where there would be a couple of thousand people. I have spoken as often as seventeen times in one night, starting at the east end of the city and going through the different wards.

Since I entered this house I have always believed in certain economic principles. I have always felt that there are some economic truths that should not be forgotten. We should uphold the Christian religion. There should be continual security against external aggression. There should be safety for seaborne trade. There should be maintenance of internal law and order so that all men may reap what they have sown. There should be impartial justice. I have always believed that our judiciary should be free from interference or pressure on the part of the executive. Have we that now? I am very doubtful.

There should be sound finance and strict supervision of our national income and expenditures. We have now seen the budget —the same one as proposed last spring, with few changes. We are just holding a post mortem on it. The money has mostly been spent already with the interim supply that has been granted. I believe in an empire shipping policy and the continuance of the long-sighted development of our commonwealth trade, as suggested in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). Without that Great Britain and the dominions will perish.

I believe in the promotion of all measures which will improve the health, wealth, happiness, peace, welfare, comfort and social conditions of the people of this country. I believe in private enterprise and initiative as against state trading and the nationalization of industry. I should like to see the younger members who come here from the municipalities assert themselves once in a while and not be yes-men and nodders. That is what I called them a few years ago, yes-men and nodders who follow the government whether it is right or wrong. I believe that as private members we should not go with the multitude and do wrong accordingly. A nation should never threaten another unless it is willing and ready to make its threat real. What is the use of our boasting we have security when we know very well we have not? Let us tell the people the truth. You can ask the people to make sacrifices without fear, but in my opinion in some ways it is dangerous to offer them a bribe.

It is not the commonwealth's business to be the policemen of the world. If you trust the people they will trust you. Do not be afraid to tell the people you have made a mistake because the Canadian people do not expect their leaders or their members of parliament to be God and never legislate against human nature. Those are some of the principles which I have supported in the house for many years.

We are only holding a post mortem on the estimates because most of the money has been spent. It is the second budget we have had this year. I have a high regard for the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) because I have known him and his family for many years. I have a high regard for his fine human qualities of mind, head and heart, because after all the heart is the head. I want to call his attention to the fact that the government has put him in the position of a coroner conducting an inquest. The money has largely been spent, and we have had practically the same budget twice in one year. The House of Commons has not been asked to appoint the public accounts committee to examine the auditor general's report. You will find that he makes certain recommendations. We have had interim supply. We are now into the tenth month of the year, and the public accounts committee has never been convened.

The auditor general's report mentions a great many things, and one is the taking of Cook's tours of the world by certain people. Instead of one or two delegates a whole carload is sent. That is one matter the Auditor General mentioned recently. Why should we send a whole carload overseas in the manner indicated when they do not do anything when they get over there? When I was head of the city of Toronto we had a parsimonious controller. I refer to the late ex-mayor Foster who was then a controller. He called these trips joy-rides. That was his description of them. I do not call them that. I am glad to see those who get a trip enjoy it. I am not a man of that stamp, but I think there should be some economy, as the Auditor General told us a while ago, and not send a whole carload when one or two would do. Some are even sent overseas.

We used to have a parliamentary association that did things. It was one body where there was no politics. They took a joy-ride, as my friend Foster used to say, all over Europe. They were not satisfied to go to Great Britain but went all over Europe. Money has been spent in sending people to meetings of the United Nations. In fact, a former lady member of the house, for South Grey, Miss Agnes Macphail, proposed sending me to the league of nations. She said if I went over there I would be converted, but far from it. God forbid that as a humble member of the house I should ever be sent to the league of nations. I know what the league of nations did. They caused already two world wars, and the United Nations will cause another one. It will be strike three on the whole world if they get their way.

I sympathize with the Minister of Finance because he does not prepare all his own estimates; other ministers have a say in them also. Where do the two old parties stand today? In the by-elections yesterday only the two old parties made any showing, the Liberals and the Conservatives. I said the other day that the two old parties were like old soldiers; they never die. They are re-created and are being re-created today so that the policies may be carried on that were propounded by Sir John A. Macdonald, by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by a former leader of the government, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, whom I respect very much as a friend and for what he has done for the country. There was also a former minister of justice, the very able Mr. Lapointe. We have had Mr. Cardin, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, Sir Allen Aylesworth, Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, Sir Robert Borden. All these men were diametrically opposed to tearing up the constitution in the manner indicated by the action of the present heads of the government. I say as far as possible we should not forget the past because, after all, as Walter Lippmann says in his textbook on foreign affairs you can learn a lot from the past about education, political and economic matters, and especially about foreign policy.

One of the glories of the Victorian era was that the people kept the state. Now, according to some of the letters I receive, the state is keeping about fifty or sixty per cent of the people. They are looking after them from the cradle to the grave. I am one of those who support social services, but I believe there should be some other way of accomplishing the objective, and that as far as possible we should adapt ourselves to the conditions of the country and the ability of the nation to pay. We should consider the ability of small merchants and returned men to pay. Where does the government get the money? They get it from income tax and sales tax. That is where it is secured. It is a direct charge on the consolidated revenue fund.

What have we to show for it in the Toronto district? The people spoke yesterday in a Toronto riding. We have not had a cabinet minister from the Toronto district since 1935, nearly fifteen years ago. Look at the income tax and sales tax paid by the people of Toronto. Yet we have never had a minister from the Toronto district. It is the centre of the educational system, the financial system, and of trade and commerce. It is away ahead of anything else. Although there are four or five Liberal members representing that district today there is not one of them in the cabinet, and we will not have one as long as the present government is in office. The people have spoken. Troops from the Toronto district under Colonel Denison of the bodyguard saved the prairies —the Queen's Own, the Grenadiers. They went out there to Cut Knife pass, The Pas, and all those places and saved the prairie provinces. Those men marched across by lake Superior in the depth of winter, with the temperature 45 and 50 degrees below zero. All they had were biscuits and hardtack, yet during the Riel rebellion of 1885 they saved that country from being dislocated. Yet now, sixty-four years later, that Toronto district is not considered worthy to have a cabinet representative.

While the present budget is very good in some respects, in others it is very defective. It is true that the 8 per cent sales tax has been removed from fuel oil used for heating, and that the tax on cider and other wines containing 7 per cent proof spirits is reduced; but the tax reductions are very small. For 1948-49 the revenues of the country amounted to $2,771 million, while the expenditures were $2,176 million. Back in 1896, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier took office, it only required $36 million to run the whole of Canada; and dear knows we have not doubled in population since that time. Now they spend that much in a day. They count that day lost in which they do not spend more than that. According to these revised estimates, the revenue for 1949-50 is expected to be $2,550 million and expenditure $2,460 million. No change has been made in the personal income tax. That is too bad, because the small businessman and the wage earner were expecting that something would be done for them.

When we come to look at the housing situation we find that it will be difficult to qualify under any of the schemes suggested by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) or the central mortgage company because we have no cheap land left in the city of Toronto. Neither do we have a steam suburban railway service; and the government has taken too much money out of the pockets of the people. Refunds from the prior budget were supposed to be made six months ago, but now we find that an act of parliament will be required before the money that has been collected can be given back. That is unfortunate, because many people were looking for that money to help pay their income tax for the current year.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) calls for an inquiry into our trade position. Trade is falling off, and now our constitution is being tampered with by the federal government in the manner I indicated a moment ago. I quoted several Liberal ministers of justice and chief justices of Canada who were opposed to any such action, but the government are going ahead anyway. All this has happened since the election in June. Where are our ships today? They are tied up in our harbours because we are not exporting the maximum quantity of goods to the markets of the world. We should be sending forth products of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine, but our export trade is falling off and our ships are tied up.

Then I come to the dominion-provincial conference. There is no reason in the world why that should not be held immediately, before they make the British North America Act into a scrap of paper. Why not call this conference now? Most of the provinces have chosen new leaders within the last few years, so a conference could be called at any time. Why not call it here and now, while parliament is in session? Such a conference is very badly needed. It is a case of now or never, or perhaps of now and forever. Why should we have to wait months or years before such a conference is held? I can see no reason for the delay.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe speaks for itself. So does the report of the Auditor General, who has very little control over things now. Look at those in the other place. I asked the former head of the government many times if he would not arrange for a joint meeting with those in the other place to see if they could not be given more work. The Senate was never intended to be top-heavy as it is today; that was not the principle in mind when it was decided to have two houses of parliament. The other day I received a letter from a gentleman who said he had noticed in the Citizen that the Senate would not sit. He wrote to me and said, "The Senate will not work," and went on to express a little humour about our friends in the other place. I believe they have a great many able men over there, however, and if they were given more work this chamber would be relieved and parliament would not need to sit so long.

The amendment of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe deals with trade, and particularly with trade within the commonwealth. We all remember the depression of the thirties, when it was only preferential trade that saved this country in the early thirties. Under it the trade of Britain with Canada was increased by 45 per cent while the trade of Canada with Britain was increased by 44 per cent, and still both Canada and Britain traded with the whole world as well. We have had an example of the blessings of preferential trade. Now, they have hanged it on the sour apple tree alongside John Brown's body. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said that was a good place for it, but I believe it would be a good place for some of his policies. It would be a good thing if that were to happen to some of these Geneva pacts and the unilateral agreements that have been made with some countries.

Today, the Liberal party has gone back over one hundred years and is adopting unilateral trade. This was Mr. Fielding's policy and it was the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who in 1897 proposed a six cent per bushel preference on wheat. The United Kingdom was our traditional market and, because of inability to solve the sterling difficulties, we are losing that market. I can tell you that the time is not far distant when the government will have to face the country. I believe Britain will be starved under the present Attlee policy. Why should they be starved out when Britain is our best customer? Would any of the departmental stores, such as Eaton's or Simpson's, treat their best customers that way?

This house should adopt the amendment to have an economic conference with the rest of the British commonwealth in order to draft a policy to help the mother country. Such a policy would cover grain and all food products. The commonwealth countries have been our best customers, our steady customers, along with allied France and Italy. This conference could adopt a policy for the future which would avoid the United Kingdom being dependent on the United States for everything. After all, we are partners. I admire the people of the United States. It is a great nation, but it is well able to look after itself. We are just friendly competitors, and should be friendly competitors to that extent. We should stand by those who stood by us.

Was there anything more striking than the appearance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at the British industries trade fair in which there were those magnificent exhibits from New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, Rhodesia and other crown colonies? I believe the minister did a lot of good work in that connection, as did his predecessor who is now a senator in the other place. I hope that something will be done about that matter.

May I refer now to other matters that have come up here. I should like to say that the granting to women of the right to vote was started at the city hall in Toronto. A married woman only had a dower right in the property; she could not vote. We went to the legislature and had a bill passed which gave two votes per house, and that spread all over Canada. The provinces then prepared the federal lists. In view of what women did in the war we went to the premier of Ontario in 1917, Mr. Hearst, and he gave them the ballot in provincial matters. Automatically, women secured a federal franchise; that is the way it started.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—ENFORCEMENT REGULATIONS

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 60, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (enforcement).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that hon. members on the opposite side of the house are co-operating in getting this bill before the house. Since we have discussed this matter on previous occasions I am reasonably sure that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will give us a lot of help with it at this time.

The purpose of the bill is to repeal sections 43, 44, 45 and 46 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. If this bill passes, and the sections of the act now known as the national labour code are repealed, it will have the effect of giving the national labour relations board the right to enforce the act. This is the board to which employers and employees come when they have a dispute. The board hears all the evidence, understands the nature of the dispute, and is then in the best position of anybody in Canada to determine when either one side or the other may be committing infractions of the act. If the board decides that either employer or the employee is guilty of an infraction of the act it will have the right, under these amendments, to enforce the act by laying in the magistrate's court the information along with the evidence they have gathered. They will place the matter in the hands of the magistrate's court for the purpose of having imposed whatever penalties are contained in the act.

Some people argue that this would give the board judicial power. It does not. It is merely placing that body in the same position as the income tax department. The income tax department determines when an infraction of the Income Tax Act is committed. They have the right to initiate proceedings in the courts and have the courts fix the penalty which is contained in the act.

Since the national labour code was enacted we have watched it and we have seen how it works. One case was taken before the courts in Quebec, namely, the Hull Transportation Company v. the Brotherhood of Railway Employees. In that case, while there is no doubt about rank discrimination so far as discharge of members of a union for union activities is concerned, nevertheless the magistrate found in favour of the employer on the ground that the brotherhood did not prove their case on the basis of evidence, taking of course as his cue or precedent evidence as presented in a court of law for violations of the Criminal Code, and the matter was thrown out. The men remained dismissed. It has been my contention for a long time that legislation that is not enforced is not worth the paper on which it is written. If we are to have a national labour relations board we must give it some status. As it is constituted today the employer and the employee can appear before it. All the board can do is sit and listen, and no matter how unreasonable or unfair, or how many violations of the act are committed, the board is powerless to do anything about it. When the board institutes proceedings in the court on the basis of the evidence it has assembled the magistrate is in a position to determine the legality of that evidence and so on. If the employer or employee is not satisfied with the decision of the magistrate's court there is a provision in this bill giving them the right to appeal to a higher court.

Not wanting to talk this measure out, and wishing to give other hon. members an opportunity of saying something on it, I am going to rest the matter there. I think this is a step that is absolutely necessary to give the labour relations board some status so that those who come before it will realize that they are dealing with a body which has semi-judicial power and is in a position to determine who may be committing an infraction of the act. It gives the board the right to institute or initiate a prosecution in the court as the income tax department can do now. The motor vehicles acts in the provinces are enforced in that way. In my opinion, unless we are prepared to enforce this legislation, it is absolutely valueless as it is at the present time.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): I should like to speak on this bill. I had the privilege of being a member of the committee which studied the new dominion labour code two sessions ago. It has been a source of some wonder to me why so many bills amending this new labour code have been brought in both in the last session of the last parliament and in the first session of the new parliament. It appears to me that in spite of the very thorough and considered attention which was given to all these matters by the industrial relations committee and by the house in considering the labour code during not one but two sessions of parliament, it has been found appropriate to bring in substantial and important amendments to the code adopted after such care and attention. It would seem that hon. members feel that the labour code, and the provisions which have been placed in it, should not be given an opportunity to be proved by the test of time, and if they are to be found to be unwise or unworkable, or not what is required, then to change them in the light of experience. I would certainly prefer to see this labour code, as it was adopted by the last parliament, given an opportunity to prove itself or not to prove itself. If it appears, in the light of experience, to be not what the country needs, then it will be time to change it when the manner and extent of the changes which will be necessary become apparent from the experience of both employers and employees, the departments of labour in the provinces, and the Department of Labour of the federal government.

The bill sponsored by the hon. member deals, not strictly speaking with the question of enforcement, but rather with the procedure whereby punishment or sanctions may be applied to people or organizations which have committed breaches of the provisions of the labour code, and have committed what are termed improper practices or unfair labour practices.

The theory underlying the bill is that there should be set up in the board certain judicial functions which it does not have under the labour code as it now stands, and which in fact the board was never intended to have. The board, as envisaged by the labour code, is one which deals with the question of certification of bargaining agents for a group of employees, and other questions which proceed, not on a basis of legal rights and wrongs, but upon the basis of the provisions of the act relating to certification or the various regulations in relation thereto.

This is not a board which through its personnel or in the manner in which it has been set up, was intended to act as a court of law. The hon. member and some others may consider that the functions of a court of law are simple, and that any other body which could be picked could carry out those functions just as easily and just as thoroughly, and with the same competence as if done by a court.

I submit that is an improper simplification. Our system of justice and our courts of law have been developed over many centuries of use of the common law. The personnel of our courts are carefully selected from men who have spent their lives in the practice and profession of law. The proposal here is to substitute in a very narrow field a board which has neither the experience of nor the talent required for a court of law, but which in this instance would be asked to carry out the functions of a court of law.

Mr. Gillis: The same as the income tax branch. There is no difference.

Mr. Dickey: The income tax branch is not a court of law, but a court of law with special jurisdiction has been set up to deal with questions arising under income tax legislation.

Mr. Gillis: It asks for the same powers as the income tax branch now has.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member would not compare a labour dispute with a breach of the income tax law, would he?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Mitchell: I thought you knew what you were talking about.

Mr. Dickey: I submit the comparison is not a good one. In any event a special court, properly constituted, has been set up for that particular purpose. They have not established a board to adjudicate upon certain features in connection with the preparation of income tax returns, and then, after having set up a board for that purpose, turned around and given it the functions of a court of law.

The actual provision within the bill itself is that an employer or trade union may apply to the board for an order that any person, employee, trade union, employer or employer's organization has violated a provision of the labour code. Then the second subsection states:

> Upon receipt of such an application, the board shall by notice in writing, direct the party making the complaint and the party against whom the complaint has been made to appear before it.

In other words the board may call the parties before it. Then subsection 3 states:

> After hearing the evidence as aforesaid the board may, if it is of the opinion that there has been a violation of the provisions of this act, issue an order indicating the precise nature of the violation.

We find here the use of the technical term "evidence". I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that in dealing with matters of a criminal or quasi-criminal nature the question of evidence is a technical and difficult one. It is one which requires the attention of a judge or a court of considerable learning and wide experience, so that the laws of evidence may be applied fairly and properly and with justice to all parties.

It may be argued by the hon. member that when he uses the word "'evidence" he does not mean that anyone will be restricted by the rules of evidence, or anything of that kind. If that is so, then I submit it is most improper to ask parliament to legislate in a manner whereby any citizen of this country may be brought before a body given the powers of a court of law, and at the same time be denied through legislation the protection to which he is entitled under the laws of evidence before any other court in the country.

The power of the board is to issue an order indicating the precise nature of the violation. It is one thing to issue an order indicating the precise nature of the violation, but I am wondering if the hon. member intends that the board shall say who is responsible for that violation. That is certainly not set out in the bill. However, if that is the intention, then in addition to indicating the precise nature of the violation the board must be given power to indicate who has been guilty of the violation.

Mr. Gillis: That is the intention.

Mr. Dickey: From the next subsection it would appear that that is the real intention.

Mr. Gillis: That is the intention.

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friend says that is the intention. If so, I submit it should be set out in the language of the subsection, because it might be somewhat difficult to read that interpretation into the words used.

Subsection 4 states:

> (4) Where an order is made by the board pursuant to subsection three of this section, the chief executive officer of the board or anyone acting through or under him, may file such order, duly certified by the chairman of the board, in the magistrate's court of the jurisdiction in which the violation referred to in the said order took place, and the magistrate of the said court shall, by summons issued in the usual manner, thereupon direct the person, employee, trade union, employer or employers' organization against whom the order was made to appear before him and shall impose upon such person, employee, trade union, employer or employers' organization the penalty or compensation provided in this act for the violation specified in the order of the board. For the purpose of any proceedings taken under this subsection the fact of the violation shall be sufficiently proved in any court of law by the filing of the said order of the board certified by the chairman of the board.

The important aspect of that particular subsection is that, having set up the board as a court of law and giving it the responsibility of dealing with the evidence on which one of the parties bases its claim that a violation has been committed by the other party, of determining the precise nature of the violation and, I am informed by my hon. friend, deciding who is guilty of the violation—having assumed that responsibility, the board is then empowered to abandon the matter and to turn it over to the ordinary judicial authorities, to hand to a magistrate what amounts to a mandatory order to pass sentence upon the person who the board says is guilty of a certain violation. I submit that that is an absolute departure from our whole conception of the administration of justice in this country.

Mr. Gillis: What justice?

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friend says, "What justice"?

Mr. Gillis: Yes, I say, what justice?

Mr. Dickey: I am not going to discuss the administration of justice in this country. If my hon. friend is not satisfied with the way in which justice is administered in this country, I am sorry for him.

An hon. Member: Let him go to Russia.

Mr. Gillis: You get as much as you can buy, no more.

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friend is entitled to his own opinion, but that is not an opinion that is shared by anyone else in this country.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The remark that you can get as much justice as you can buy is strictly against all the rules of debate in this house and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid that remark reflects on the judiciary and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, if it is offensive to you, I will withdraw it.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It is offensive to everybody.

An hon. Member: No condition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has withdrawn the remark.

Mr. Dickey: I think it is improper to suggest by legislation or otherwise that the magistrates of this country are officials to whom any board or body can issue a direction to impose a sentence upon a person who has not been before them in the ordinary manner in which justice is dispensed in this country. The magistrate is to be ordered to pass a sentence upon persons who have not been before him and in connection with which he has not heard any evidence. The fifth subsection of the proposed bill reads:

(5) If, in the opinion of a magistrate, the order of the board is ambiguous or its meaning not clear in any particular, he may refer to the board any question or matter for clarification by the said board.

There is certainly nothing objectionable about that. Then the sixth subsection reads:

(6) The board may appeal from the decision or judgment of a magistrate.

I am completely unable to understand the purpose of that particular subsection except that it is absolutely improper. To state that the board may appeal from the decision or judgment of a magistrate is meaningless because I submit that in fact there is no judgment or decision which a magistrate can give. Under subsection 4 the magistrate is directed to pass sentence upon a party who has been selected by the board as being guilty of a violation. That is not in any sense of the word a decision or judgment of that magistrate. It is a decision of the board and the magistrate is simply the official who decides what penalty will be imposed upon the person selected by the board.

I submit that the only purpose that particular subsection could have is this: When parliament legislates its words are taken in context and construed strictly; when parliament purports to give the power of appeal, and the courts are construing that power they are inclined to say that parliament must have intended to deal with the matter of appeal in a complete manner and to set out the way in which the appeal is to be brought and the persons who are entitled to appeal. I submit that if this subsection is enacted by this parliament we shall have a strange system whereby a board would hear evidence, make a decision and then pass over to a magistrate a direction as to who shall be sentenced.

If the person sentenced by the magistrate tried to appeal his conviction the courts would say that parliament had intended to deal completely with the question of appeal in subsection 6 and that, as parliament had decided that the board could appeal, by inference it was meant that the individual could not appeal. If we pass this subsection I submit that we shall be laying ourselves open to grave danger of being accused of denying to citizens of this country, union members, employees or anybody else, who come within the purview of this legislation, the right to appeal a decision or judgment which that individual feels is unjust and by which he is aggrieved.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member knows that that is nonsense.

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friend says that I know that that is nonsense. I do not know that that is nonsense; I know it is absolutely correct. I should like to refer now to the sections which it is proposed to repeal and replace by the single section set out in the bill. The point to notice there is that the main subject matter dealt with in sections 43, 44, 45 and 46, which it is proposed to repeal, is in the main very different from the subject matter of the new section 43 which it is proposed to place in the act. Section 46, for instance, provides in general terms that:

No prosecution for an offence under this act shall be instituted except with the consent in writing of the minister.

It was felt by the industrial relations committee, and by the parliament that passed the act, that the minister should be consulted on questions of prosecution under the code.

Mr. Gillis: One-man dictatorship.

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friend says "one-man dictatorship"—

Mr. Mitchell: I do not believe the hon. member thinks I am a dictator. He is just kidding the troops.

Mr. Gillis: You may not always be there.

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friend seems to enjoy making these interruptions.

Mr. Gillis: So your speech will look intelligent.

Mr. Dickey: Thank you very much. The fact is it is a wise provision to have the minister consulted in these matters. The federal Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the ministers of labour for the provinces have heavy responsibilities with respect to matters of industrial relations. I think that the manner in which the labour departments of the federal government and the provincial governments have dealt with these matters should be a source of great pride and satisfaction to the Canadian people. It is proper that the officers who assume these responsibilities should have some right of consultation when parties to disputes believe they have been aggrieved to such an extent that they feel they have to resort to prosecution to secure their rights.

The final point I wish to make is that section 45, which it is proposed to repeal, sets out that:

> A prosecution for an offence under this act may be brought against an employers' organization or a trade union and in the name of the organization or union and for the purpose of such a prosecution a trade union or an employers' organization shall be deemed to be a person . . .

If we are going to have any machinery whereby the labour code can be administered and enforced, then trade unions and employers' organizations must be regarded as legal personalities. They must be regarded as persons who can be brought before the courts, and against whom or for whom judgment can be rendered. The bill would not have the effect of making enforcement of the labour code possible but of making it impossible, because the proposal is to take out of the act the provision which makes it possible to proceed against an employers' organization or some other body that is unincorporated. If that is done, then I submit that the elaborate and improper procedures which are proposed by the amendment would be absolutely ineffective except against individuals.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this measure. I think possibly what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) had in mind was to introduce amendments to the act whereby a dispute between labour and an employers' organization could not be prolonged for weeks, months, and sometimes years before a settlement is reached. If that were the purpose of the proposed measure then I would agree with it. I think there have been occasions when such proceedings have been dragged out so long that it injured the industrial relations of the country.

I am afraid I cannot agree with the bill as it is put before the house. I take it that its purpose is to clarify the enforcement part of the legislation, but personally I cannot see that it clarifies it very much. In fact, I hold the view that possibly it creates a little more confusion than there was in the first place. I want to review the language the hon. member for Cape Breton South used when he introduced the bill. At page 650 of Hansard of October 11, 1949, he had this to say:

> By this proposed change, if two parties came before the board with a dispute the board would have the authority to determine which party had committed an infraction of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The board would be empowered to declare one or the other of the parties guilty and then turn the matter over to the magistrate's court.

I cannot conceive of that being the best type of machinery to settle disputes. In the first place the board was set up as a labour relations body. If you attempt to convert a conciliation or labour relations board into a court then I think the purposes of conciliation and arbitration have been defeated. After the evidence is taken before the board it is to be turned over to a magistrate. I should like to read further from what the hon. member had to say when he introduced the bill.

> Whatever penalty this act empowered the magistrate's court to impose would be imposed by that court. This amendment would give the board some legal authority, and create respect for it in the minds of those who would be taking disputes before it.

I cannot conceive of that type of action. You would have the board taking evidence, and when the evidence was all taken and the board had decided which of the parties was guilty the evidence would then be turned over to a magistrate who would not even have heard it. Possibly I am not familiar with legal procedures, but I cannot understand how a magistrate could impose a sentence when he had not heard the evidence.

Mr. Harrison: They do it in Saskatchewan; that is the way they operate.

Mr. Johnston: I am not interested in that point. I cannot conceive of such a conciliation body being in a position to give a fair judgment. They may be able to decide which party is guilty and which party is innocent, but surely the board which hears the evidence and pronounces upon the guilt or innocence of the parties is the logical authority to impose the penalty. But that is not the set-up. When the board gets the evidence it is turned over to a magistrate who imposes the penalty.

I am not going to review the whole bill, but at this point I want to turn to the last two subsections. Subsection (5) provides:

> If, in the opinion of a magistrate, the order of the board is ambiguous or its meaning not clear in any particular, he may refer to the board any question or matter for clarification by the said board.

I suppose that procedure would be proper, but does it not indicate the ridiculous position in which you place the magistrate. He has to impose a penalty upon a party as to whom he has heard no evidence, yet he must go back to this board—for clarification of the things he should have been told in the first instance. Then to further confuse me I find this in subsection (6):

> The board may appeal from the decision or judgment of a magistrate.

In my view the board would not have anything to appeal. It would decide who was guilty or who was innocent. The board could not impose a penalty, and if no penalty was imposed what difference would it make? The position would be exactly the same as before. In my view the fact that the board could appeal the decision of the magistrate would render the magistrate almost powerless. Where would you go if your appeal was granted? Certainly you would not go back to the same magistrate. You would have to go to a higher court.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this bill would do away with the very foundation of unionism. Certainly in my judgment it would put an end to all forms of collective bargaining. Suppose this bill passed and a matter came up for collective bargaining between the workers and the company. If they knew this procedure would be followed, neither side would want to reach a decision, and then a conciliation board would have to deal with the matter. It would make no difference which way the board decided; the other party would feel aggrieved and would bring the matter before the government, either this government or any other. Then it would become a political football; and I do not think that is the best solution for our problems in labour relations. I believe collective bargaining would break down entirely, and for that reason I am afraid I must oppose this measure. I believe one of the most sacred rights labour has gained over all these years is the right of collective bargaining. I agree that in some cases disputes between labour and management have dragged out for weeks and months, perhaps for more than a year, without reaching a final decision. I think some arrangement should be made under which these decisions must be given within a certain period of time; otherwise that situation will endanger industrial relations in this country.

Having said this much, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need say more; but I shall have to vote against the bill.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, but I am constrained to do so by the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Whether or not this bill is good legislation, I do not think it is the bill the hon. member has been explaining to the house. The board mentioned in the bill is not a conciliation board.

Mr. Johnston: It becomes one.

Mr. MacInnis: No, it does not; it is the labour relations board that determines whether or not an offence has been committed, which is altogether different from a conciliation board. The point I want to make is that there are two objections to the present procedures as far as the trade union movement is concerned. The first is that under the act the offending party cannot be taken to court without the consent of the minister. Surely that is not the ordinary procedure in law. Surely an offence under the law is an offence, and a person has the right to take the other party to court when an offence occurs. He should not have to wait until the Minister of Labour decides whether or not he may go to court. In my opinion that is not the way British law, or for that matter Canadian law, is administered.

Mr. Mitchell: I think my hon. friend will admit that they have no laws like this in Great Britain.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know as to that. The minister can catch me very easily when he asks about something about which perhaps neither of us knows anything. He knows I cannot say that is not the case, because I do not know. I have seen those tricks played before.

During the present session I have heard strong demands made on several occasions in this house that we should change the law that now prevents a person bringing the crown into court without the consent of the crown. Surely if that should be the case when the crown is concerned it should not be different in regard to organizations which under this act are considered as individuals. Now let us look at section 46 of the old act. In my view it is rather strange that the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) should take the worst of the sections that are proposed to be repealed in order to show why they should not be repealed. Section 46 reads:

(1) No prosecution for an offence under this act shall be instituted except with the consent in writing of the minister.

That is the Minister of Labour.

(2) A consent by the minister indicating that he has consented to the prosecution of a person named therein for an offence under this act alleged to have been committed, or in the case of a continuing offence, alleged to have commenced, on a date therein set out, shall be a sufficient consent for the purposes of this section to the prosecution of the said person for any offence under this act permitted by or commencing on the said date.

As a matter of fact here the Minister of Labour is acting as a judge of the law he is administering. If he says there is no offence, there is no offence, no matter how aggrieved one party to the dispute may feel. He never has an opportunity to take the other party to court and find out whether or not he has a case unless the minister consents. We had a case of that kind a couple of years ago, when two boards of conciliation appointed by the minister reported in terms as explicit as they possibly could that the employing company was responsible for the trouble. I am not sure whether or not the minister was asked for leave to prosecute, but there was no prosecution, though in my opinion court proceedings should have been undertaken.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend said the junior member for Halifax was mixed up. I am afraid my hon. friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is mixed up. He starts to talk about the labour relations board, and then he speaks about a conciliation board. I am no waif and stray in these things. I believe I know which way I am going. I believe I know the philosophy of the American Federation of Labor, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the general labour movement of North America. I believe my hon. friend should stay with the labour relations board. I know the board about which he is talking. It was a political strike, the Canadian seamen's strike.

Mr. MacInnis: I am afraid the minister is putting himself in a spot right there. If I referred to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) instead of the Minister of Labour it was a slip of the tongue, and a slip of the tongue is no fault of the mind. The Minister of Labour says, "Oh, it was the seamen's strike." Just because the Minister of Labour did not like the seamen or their organization, they could not get their case taken to court.

Mr. Mitchell: I must rise on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: If you would sit down, you would not get into all this trouble.

Mr. Mitchell: I must rise on a point of order. I have never refused prosecution by any organization since this legislation has been on the statute books. I believe in conciliation and not the settlement of disputes before the courts.

Mr. MacInnis: That is not a point of order, that is an argument. After I am finished, the minister will have the remainder of the evening to make all the arguments he wishes. Then, he will have some evenings later on in the session, so he should not take my time in making arguments—arguments which, after they are made, have nothing in them anyway.

I merely rose tonight to make the two points, that the member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) was not considering the proper board and that we should not have a law on the statute books of Canada the enforcement of which is dependent upon the will of the minister.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there is five minutes remaining, but I cannot finish in five minutes.

I disagree completely with the approach of my socialist friends, and let me say that very frankly.

Mr. MacInnis: I disagree with the approach of my capitalist friend.

Mr. Mitchell: This is a free country.

Mr. MacInnis: Of course it is.

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister permit a question before he gets into deep water?

Mr. Mitchell: I have not said anything yet.

Mr. Gillis: With the minister's permission, I should like to ask him this question: This bill is not socialist philosophy, you know that. Are you aware of the fact that the bill was scrutinized and approved by the representatives of 300,000 industrial workers in Canada? That is their philosophy.

Mr. Mitchell: That is all right; my friend cannot speak for 300,000 people. I have heard a lot of things in election campaigns.

Mr. MacInnis: You said a lot of things in the election campaign.

Mr. Mitchell: That is all right; you do not like to hear these things.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mitchell: I disagree fundamentally with my hon. friends in the thought that you can negotiate labour agreements on the floor of the House of Commons. That was tried in Germany, and at the very moment it is being tried in France. My mind goes back to my old friend, Sam Gompers, who said, "The truth is still the truth, it does not matter what year it is." He said:

> I want to tell you, socialists, that I have studied your philosophy; read your works upon economics, and not the meanest of them; studied your standard works, both in English and German—have not only read, but studied them. I have heard your orators and watched the work of your movement the world over. I have kept close watch upon your doctrines for thirty years; have been closely associated with many of you and know how you think and what you propose. I know, too, what you have up your sleeve. And I want to say that I am entirely at variance with your philosophy. I declare it to you, I am not only at variance with your doctrines, but with your philosophy. Economically, you are unsound; socially, you are wrong; industrially, you are an impossibility.

Now, that is a quotation from the proceedings of a convention of the American Federation of Labor held at Boston in 1903.

In introducing this bill the other evening, my hon. friend used these words:

> If the dispute between the two parties cannot be resolved, the board is powerless to do anything except let the parties go back to fighting it out on the streets.

Mr. Gillis: That is as it is now.

Mr. Mitchell: That is, as it is now. What my hon. friend is preaching there, probably unconsciously—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mitchell: I say that analytically, not in a critical sense. The hon. member is preaching compulsory arbitration. He knows as well as I do that the labour movement of North America, even the 300,000 people of whom he has spoken, is opposed to compulsory arbitration. I am talking trade union language now. Let the lawyers, with all their faults from some people's point of view, speak about the law. My hon. friend knows that this bill has been on the statute books since 1948. I think it has worked reasonably well.

Mr. Gillis: It has not worked at all.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend says that it has not worked at all. Look at the picture to the south of us; look at the picture in other countries such as Australia, Great Britain, if you like, or New Zealand, that second heaven of my hon. friend. I believe the good sense used is responsible for our situation. I do not take credit for it, nor should this parliament altogether. The credit should go to the partners in industry. This piece of legislation was passed in 1948 after consultation with every province in Canada, after consultation with every trade union centre in Canada, and after consultation with representatives of industry and commerce.

By and large, I think we did not do a bad job. My friend was a member of the labour relations committee. He did not get everything his way, nor did I get everything my way. I think he will agree with me that is the genius of British institutions. In this House of Commons the spirit of compromise is the guiding formula on any question that comes before it.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the business before it at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I believe about fifteen minutes of my time remains. At six o'clock, I was speaking on the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), with reference to the immediate calling of an interprovincial conference as well as a meeting of the commonwealth countries and crown colonies to discuss the sterling situation which is causing so much trouble between the dollar countries and the sterling countries. The amendment speaks for itself.

As you know, a dominion-provincial conference could be called immediately. Most of the provinces have recently elected new prime ministers, although some of them are holding elections almost immediately. In my opinion, there is no reason why a dominion-provincial conference should not meet at once. I am surprised that the Prime Minister has not already called such a meeting. As my hon. leader very wisely said, there is no reason why such a conference should not be called immediately. You are going to make a scrap of paper out of the whole British North America Act. You have the cart before the horse. The conference should be held now or never, and now and forever or not at all.

I was referring to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). In it he spoke about calling a commonwealth conference immediately for the purpose of discussing with our best customer, Britain and the dominions and colonies—what? The sterling situation. Are we to toss our best customer clean overboard? She has been our best customer all these years. Hon. members will recall that preferential trade was started by the Liberals themselves. You are not supporting the Liberalism of the past.

As I say, this house should not be a rubber stamp. A great many of the younger members come up from the municipalities. We hope there will no longer be yes-men and nodders in this house. Dear knows we have had them long enough. While I am a party man, and support Conservative principles, I am not a bigoted party man—far from it. I think I have shown that ever since I first entered the house. An immediate conference should be called with the dominions and the crown colonies. All these countries should get together and map out a program so that we shall not lose our best customer. I do hope that something will be done about it.

In this debate reference has been made to many matters. During the debate on human rights and also on March 24, 1938—hon. members will recall that date—before the second war started, I said almost the same thing. I do not agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who said there is no great danger of a war for five years. He corrected that the other day. When you consider this fact, as I have already said, thanks to Russia the world is faced with two kinds of warfare. One is the atomic bomb which has been perfected by the United States. The Soviet union has devised a more powerful instrument, the cold, brazen, weaponless war and she conquers without destruction. By this method of warfare ten satellite countries have been subjugated and put behind the iron curtain. Let us face the facts and let the public know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about this problem. This should be read into the remarks of the Prime Minister the other day. They have got all these countries now behind the iron curtain, and under the threat of aggression they will have the entire world, including those countries of the UNO, in a restless fear of destruction. There is something new in warfare—this struggle for survival. This is only a war of camouflage and it lulls us into a false sense of security in the western country. This cold war and its technique is brilliant as applied by the communists. They know that fear is what scares the satellite countries. They have scuttled pretty nearly the whole of Europe and the rest take it for granted and have taken it for granted until recently. That is the situation which should be faced. There may be trouble in time. For that reason I am of the opinion that the Prime Minister was altogether wrong when he said that there would be five years without war.

I can say this, as I said before: democracy never dies; it perishes from neglect. Militant communism is on the march westward. I want to emphasize the very grave danger this country is in at the present time, as well as this continent and the whole world. Not since the days of Munich has the world outlook been so depressing. Not since the days of the barbarian invasion has Christian civilization faced such a menace as the ruthless advance of communism. These are times that try men's souls. The communists have overrun the Balkan states. Yesterday it was Poland and Austria. Today it is Czechoslovakia and Finland; tomorrow it may be Italy, China, Spain or France. Nations that have experienced the brutality of oppression are now experiencing the cruelty and horror of soviet nightmares. "Their fate", says H. H. Schlact, an American, "will be ours unless we wake up right now. In one generation our dauntless manhood has bled twice and many of them have died on foreign battlefields. They fought to destroy the roots of the insatiable ambitions of fiendish tyrants who sought to enslave humanity."

It is sad to contemplate that after such terrible conflicts we should be faced with such grave events. Russia has the largest army and the largest air force. She does not maintain this mighty military machine for defence; for no one threatens her. She maintains this mighty armada for aggression and attack and conquest. Russia will attack us when she thinks we are weak. She will never attack us if we are strong. While our lawmakers talk, ponder and debate our national security, Russia is relentlessly weaving her web of intrigue and violence wherever she can obtain a foothold. She challenges our physical courage. She challenges our moral fortitude. She challenges our culture and our church. Our democratic way of life is threatened by communist concepts.

Let us sound the clarion call for national defence. Let us summon every true Canadian, every Britisher and American, to fight for national defence. There is little time left; there is no time for timidity. To be free we must be strong. Preparedness is not a war policy but an insurance policy for peace.

In the debate on foreign policy in the British House of Commons Mr. Churchill distinctly said that he never consented to what was done by inviting Russia to come in on the Pacific ten days before Japan collapsed. He never consented to that. That was the idea of the United States. What did she do? Russia was invited in, although Japan was already beaten. This is all referred to in the debates of the British House of Commons on July 21, 1949, and takes up sixty pages of Hansard. I am sorry I have not time to read it tonight. Russia went in there. At that time she had half a million troops in Manchuria. She has now overrun the whole of Asia. She has China and many other places.

I now wish to refer to the Bell Telephone matter. I have about five minutes of time left to deal with that particular matter. A committee of the House of Commons considered this matter two years ago. As a Conservative I strongly opposed the Bell Telephone bill in the house. I was the only one who opposed it on division when the bill was passed. The time has come for the government to be represented by counsel before that body. I remember away back when I was a young alderman in council in 1909 Hon. Mr. Justice Mabee, chairman of the railway board, heard the case at the city hall. At that time the board of control would not do anything about it, and as a young alderman I took the case myself before Mr. Justice Mabee. What did he do? He issued a flat rate for greater Toronto. Citizens were paying as high for telephone bills as $185 a year for business phones, and $95 to $100 for resident phones in the suburbs. Mr. Justice Mabee passed a flat rate for the whole of greater Toronto. He was once a great Liberal and a great chairman. I have every confidence in the judges, but you need somebody who will take over and do what the late Mr. Justice Mabee did. We have another opportunity of taking up these matters. I do say that the government should be represented by counsel before the board of transport commissioners when this case is heard. They should oppose the rate; they should oppose any increase. I moved in committee that there be no increase for three years. The workingman will not be able to have a phone—no one will be able to have one. Their stock was at 140 and it went to 183. Then it was split five for one and was quoted at 25. Now it is 42½—and you can see the results.

It has only been in Ontario and Quebec where they have any jurisdiction, because the other provinces have their own telephone systems—and have made a success of it. I say in conclusion that the case should be fought, because these increases are going to have a serious effect. I can remember when the hon. gentleman who used to represent the constituency of Davenport, and I, pointed out that in the villages and towns of western Ontario signs stating "Closed Until Monday" were posted. I pointed out that the telephone system was part of the post office department in England, and that over there they had boxes on the street from which a person could phone for a taxi. And it was as a result of this action, along with that of the hon. member who used to represent that constituency, Davenport, Mr. MacNicol, that we got telephone boxes on our streets in our cities and towns.

For the reasons I have stated I say the government should be represented by counsel and should oppose any increases for three years. There should be no increase at all. The public cannot pay it, and it simply means that the working class in Canada will not have phones—or if they do have them, will have them only at prohibitive prices.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to stick as closely as possible to the matters coming within the scope of the budget. I listened to it on a previous occasion and heard it discussed. I am not unmindful of the fact that since that time there has been an election at which the government was returned to power with a substantial majority. Nevertheless I believe considerable criticism can be levelled at the budget, as such.

The first point I should like to make is one we have made on many occasions, namely that the budget as brought in by the minister is merely a bookkeeping statement for the past year. We have recommended from time to time—and I repeat it tonight—that in a country which has just been through a war, and which is still in the process of bringing its economy back to a peacetime basis, where there is considerable unemployment throughout the country, in addition to bringing in a statement showing expenditures and anticipated surpluses the minister should also bring in a capital budget. The government has taken the position from time to time that, while it does not agree with the principle of having the government in business, where free enterprise failed they have been prepared to take up the slack. They have been doing that to some extent, but not in the manner in which we would like to see it done. I say the minister should be setting aside large sums from surpluses which have accumulated from budget to budget since the war. He should be picking out those spots in Canada where the economy needs a lift, and where the edge has been taken off industry. He should be presenting to the house a plan to be effective from coast to coast whereby, although he might not step on the corns of free enterprise, he would take action where free enterprise has failed to make good where it felt it was not profitable to invest money. Thereby he would give us a national plan across the country under which we would spend in given areas certain sums from our surplus, to enable the people in different parts of the country which are considered depressed to make plans for the future.

This would give employment offices an opportunity to plan employment. In my opinion that kind of budget is absolutely necessary. I notice that in some provinces, particularly in Nova Scotia, that kind of action is now being taken. In addition to the regular budget of the last session of the Nova Scotia legislature, the premier introduced one just as I have described.

This is one respect in which the minister's department has fallen down. He did not consult with the other departments—public works, mines and resources, or any of the others—nor has he given us any idea of what the government had in mind in the depressed areas.

The second point to which I would direct the minister's thoughts is connected with the removal of the 8 per cent sales tax on fuel oil. The assumption by most people is that they are going to receive the benefit immediately of an 8 per cent reduction in the cost of fuel oil. I believe I am safe in saying that the majority of distributors, those who sell to the consumers, never knew there was a sales tax. So far as I can gather it went directly to the oil companies. Whether that saving is going to be passed on to the consumer remains to be seen. I suggest that some time before the end of the session the minister should make some decision in this matter. I believe the assumption in his department was that in taking off the 8 per cent sales tax the saving would be passed on to the consumer. Today however there is no indication of that, and some decision should be made in the matter. I shall have more to say about it at a later time.

May I now direct a few words to the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), who spoke in the house last evening. He is a new member, and as I sat and listened to him I noted that most of his discussion was directed to ridiculing other groups not seated with the government. He made some disparaging remarks about splinter groups, and in his view it seems that it was because everyone was so far off the mark and so politically unwise that we now have this huge majority on the government benches.

Because he is a new member I forgive him for much of what he said. Before he is here long however he will find that the House of Commons is one of the broadest forums it has ever been my privilege or will ever be his privilege to attend. It is a forum in which one's measure is taken rather quickly. If one is inclined to be small or mean in his approach to problems in the house, or in personal attacks, he does not get very far in the House of Commons.

I thought that the hon. member's references last night to splinter groups were uncalled for. Let me remind him that, as far back as one can go in the records of history, one finds that it was the small groups, who were not self-seeking, who were not looking for something for themselves, but who were pioneering for social reform, who have been responsible for all the reforms in the history of the world.

It was only yesterday afternoon we sat in the House of Commons, with hon. members from the other place and the public at large —among whom was the hon. member for Maple Creek, I have no doubt—and listened to and applauded the Prime Minister of India. He was a splinter, he stood alone for a long time in that country. He spent over eight years in British prisons because he fought British imperialism. But despite that he carried on, he advanced his ideas and stuck by his principles. Today he is the oak tree of India, the man who will perhaps have the greatest influence on the future of the world.

I would remind the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) that that kind of approach in this House of Commons does not go down too well. We respect everyone's opinion in a matter of this kind, and sometimes I even agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I think he has the right to hold whatever opinion he wishes.

Last evening the hon. member thought that it was because of political immaturity and a nonsensical approach to things that the government was so large and the opposition so small. I would remind the hon. member that it is not good enough to get up and make statements of that kind in this house if he has not the necessary facts to put on the record to support them. When I went upstairs I picked up a western newspaper which I am sure is quite friendly to the government, a newspaper that would not want to put out propaganda. A report in this newspaper refers to figures put out by the dominion bureau of statistics which show that farm income in 1949 had increased by 14·7 per cent over the figure for the same period last year. I should like to read a few of these figures which might indicate why the government was able to influence the western vote in the last election. I am not suggesting that anyone was bribed, but I do suggest that these figures are thought-provoking. The article reads:

> Canadian farmers realized a cash income of $1,056,500,000 from the sale of farm products during the first six months of this year, according to preliminary estimates released by the dominion bureau of statistics.
> This was 14·7 per cent over the 1948 cash income of $921,400,000 for the same period and an increase of 45·9 per cent over the $724,300,000 received during the first half of 1947.
> In addition, supplementary payments amounting to more than $9,000,000 were paid out, during the first six months of this year under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, to farmers in the drought-stricken areas of the prairie provinces. This compares with nearly $10,000,000 in 1947 and more than $15,000,000 in 1948.

The first six months of this year would bring us up to June. The western farmers have received these benefits under prairie farm assistance, P.F.R.A., and all the other A.A.'s they have and I suggest that if everyone in Canada was treated as fairly by way of bonuses and subsidies and supplementary payments—it must be remembered that a large proportion of those particular payments went to the province from which the hon. member for Maple Creek comes—

Mr. Sinnott: Perhaps if they took as many chances things would be different.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member is a reeve now, so he should watch his dignity.

Mr. Sinnott: Labour never takes chances.

Mr. Gillis: I am not suggesting or insinuating anything; I am merely putting a few facts on the record and will allow hon. members to judge for themselves whether it was political immaturity and nonsensical arguments on the part of the splinter groups or irresponsible action that is responsible for the large majority the government has in the house. Or, on the other hand, was it the spending of the taxpayers' money in certain areas where the government was weak that had the greatest influence in sending to this house a large number of Liberal members from the prairie provinces? I ask the hon. member for Maple Creek to think that over.

From time to time we hear arguments that we are prosperous, that we are going forward, that we have a decentralized economy, that there is no monopoly and that everyone has an equal opportunity. That argument was advanced on several occasions during the war and has been since. It was said that there was a great levelling off of income in Canada and our provinces were assured equal treatment in the distribution of the national income. I should like to focus attention on this for a few minutes, not in a critical way but merely to provide some food for thought.

I have in my hand a little booklet that was issued in 1943 by the National Liberal Federation of Canada. This book contained a question and answer set-up which was attractively done and nicely worded. I intend to quote very little of it, but there are parts that have a bearing on the subject of commercial failures to which I should like to direct attention. The soldier was being asked what he wanted to come back to, what kind of Canada he wanted to come back to, and he is supposed to make this answer:

> I remember my father telling me how the little business he tried to start collapsed during the inflation of the twenties, and he had to begin all over again.

Then this statement is made:

> That will be avoided this time. To help pay for the war as it is being fought, your government has made such laws as 100 per cent tax on excess profits, heavy income taxes on large and medium incomes, compulsory savings on all taxable incomes, borrowings through six victory loans and through the sale of war savings certificates.

That was correct at that time. The statement continues:

> And your government didn't stop there. Price ceilings and controls have held down the cost of living, so that when you get back into civilian life you won't be shunted into a topsy-turvy world of high prices and uncertain values.

That was in 1943 when all the machinery described in that booklet was in operation. It worked at that time and it could have worked in the post-war period. When the soldier came out of the service he remembered that he had accepted literally the statements and promises which had been made in the literature distributed to him. Many of these boys went into small businesses. They took their gratuities and credits and set themselves up. I have in my hand some figures from the dominion bureau of statistics which indicate the trend in commercial failures in this country.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mind you, it is not Canada Packers who are failing. It is not Dominion Steel and Coal or International Nickel who are failing. It is the little fellow, the man who did not have much capital behind him who has been swallowed up by the octopus that is able to squeeze him dry. I know some of these boys who have taken what they had saved during the war to go into little businesses but who have been squeezed out because of a lack of capital. Here is the trend in commercial failures in this country as indicated by this article, which reads:

> Commercial failures in the first half of 1949 were the highest in number for the similar period since 1941, while estimated liabilities amounted to $8,725,000, a gain of 22·5 per cent over 1948 and "the highest for the first six months of any year since 1934 when the economy was just starting to recover from its lowest levels," according to the dominion bureau of statistics.
> Nearly all branches of business showed increases in failures. For example, as compared with last year, trade and manufactures increased 14 and 21 per cent respectively. Furthermore, all areas, except Ontario, shared the increase.
> Maritime Failures Double
> "There were eleven failures in the maritimes as compared with six last year," the D.B.S. report states. "Quebec showed an increase of 57 to record a post-war high of 380, while the number of failures in Ontario declined from 67 to 59 in the same comparison.

Then the article deals with the prairie provinces. That is not a good trend and, as I pointed out, I think legislation should be enacted to halt it. I mentioned a moment ago that many of our service personnel were encouraged to invest what capital they had in small businesses. The promise was made that the price control machinery and other such machinery as we had during the war would protect them, and would if it were still in existence. The right of the government to fix prices and regulate production and the allocation of materials and supplies to some extent would have protected them, but we did not live up to the promise. When we threw that machinery in the discard on the cessation of hostilities we left price fixing and the distribution of goods and services across the country in the hands of people who have sufficient control over everything that is produced and distributed in Canada to say who is and who is not going to get it, what price you are going to pay for it, and what the mark-up will be.

With that kind of machinery small businesses, which we should be encouraging and protecting, are gradually being pushed out of the picture. As the figures I have quoted are official, inasmuch as they come from a government bureau, I suggest that the minister should take the matter under consideration and try to devise some machinery whereby small businesses with limited capital may be enabled to remain in operation, because that is the kind of business that we want to encourage in Canada.

The next point to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister and the government is the matter of the distribution of income. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) suggested that income was distributed fairly equally across the country, and that the government had achieved a balance in the whole economy. I have some figures here which also come from the dominion bureau of statistics. They have to do with per capita income by provinces and indicate the standard of living. While it is not an accurate measurement, nevertheless it is a pretty good indication of what the standard of living is in the various provinces.

I should like to point out for the benefit of hon. members that the national income of Canada is far from being equally distributed and, mind you, the trend is downward since the end of the war. I wish to cite a few figures. In British Columbia and the Yukon, for example, per capita income has declined by 9 per cent from 1945 to 1948. Alberta has gone up by 14 per cent. Saskatchewan has gone up by 13 per cent. Manitoba is up by 3 per cent. Ontario has gone down 11 per cent. Quebec has gone down 3 per cent. New Brunswick has gone down 9 per cent. Nova Scotia has gone down 15 per cent, and Prince Edward Island has gone down 9 per cent. This is a matter which I should particularly like to draw to the attention of members from the maritime provinces. I have not the figures for Newfoundland but I imagine they are even worse. In 1948 the per capita income for British Columbia and the Yukon was $661, Alberta $643, Saskatchewan $601, Manitoba $610, Ontario $694, Quebec $506, New Brunswick $410, Nova Scotia $440, and Prince Edward Island $354.

These figures indicate to me that the per capita income of the maritime provinces is approximately 33 per cent below that of the rest of Canada. That means that the standard of living in those provinces is 33 per cent lower than it is in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not think that is right.

Mr. Gillis: These are dominion bureau of statistics figures.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is not an exact reflection of the standard of living.

Mr. Gillis: That is the per capita income and figures do not lie. I suggest that there must be serious planning by the government to increase the standard of living of the maritime provinces. Mind you, we are not asking for charity because that part of the country at the time of confederation was the most prosperous section of Canada. As I pointed out a few nights ago, since confederation there have been over 200 industries siphoned off from the maritime provinces and centralized in Quebec and Ontario, and that trend continued right up until 1943. Many of them were not small industries. One that was shifted into Montreal in 1943 was a plant that had operated previously at Trenton, Nova Scotia, and had employed some 1,600 men. It had been operating there for approximately thirty years. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), who was on the bench at that time, wrote a report on that particular operation which was a strong condemnation of governments which would permit the siphoning off of an industry of that kind. He stated that if one-third of the money spent on moving it into Montreal had been spent on modernizing the plant where it was it would have been a better operation where it was than in Montreal.

When I say we are not asking for charity, we are asking you, by establishing subsidiary industries in that section of the country, to try to give us back at least 50 per cent of the industries that were stolen from us. That is not charity; it is restoration.

Mr. Graydon: Restitution.

Mr. Gillis: Or restitution. There is a way that it can be done. The government is doing it now to some extent but someone else reaps the profits rather than the people of the maritime provinces. I said a moment ago that I would say something about coal. I listened to a discussion in the house about abolishing the smoke nuisance in the city of Toronto. I heard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) say that the intention of the railways is to replace, as rapidly as they can, steam engines with diesel engines burning oil. One of the basic industries of Nova Scotia is coal, and one of the largest customers for that coal is the Canadian National Railways. In effect the minister said that as soon as they can do it that market will be taken away. The development of the use of oil in Canada from coast to coast definitely shows that for steamships, railroads and domestic purposes oil is the coming thing in the near future.

Well, while you are solving that problem you are creating another: what are you going to do with the coal industry? I suggest the time has arrived when the government should be examining the possibility of other uses for coal rather than just burning it and letting it go up in smoke. The oil resources of this continent are not unlimited; anyone who examines the matter closely will see that. With the developments in the air, in which fuel oils will be necessary, and with the present trend to use oil for everything else, the resources of this country can be depleted very quickly. So I suggest that at this time the government should be probing the possibilities of producing oil from coal. The whole industrial set-up of Germany was based on the extraction of the by-products of a very inferior grade of coal, but very little is being done in that field in this country. During the past year or two the government have spent a great deal of money on research in other directions, but nothing has been done about research in that field, which goes to the very base of the economy of this or any other country. If tomorrow the United States decided to keep in their own country the twenty-six or twenty-eight million tons of coal we import every year, within a couple of months practically all our industries would be tied up. We do not have the fuel ourselves. Britain's big problem since the end of the war has been lack of fuel. When Henry Wallace came back from Europe two years ago, when the Marshall plan was being talked about, he made the statement that if we could send fifty, sixty or a hundred million tons of coal to Germany in order that they might get their own plants and factories into operation, that would be the best contribution we could make. Apparently we are not going to appreciate this problem until we run smack up against it some time.

In other fields the government is spending a good deal of money on research, and rightly so. I am not objecting to it, but I am going to make a comparison. In the development of atomic energy and jet engines, on the national research council, on agriculture, fisheries, forests, aerial photography and that kind of thing, the government spent $81,857,000 on research in 1947-48. But to provide for the fabrication, erection and equipment of hydrogenation plants to do the kind of research I am suggesting, the bureau of mines spent $4,500 on an engineering design. The expenditure for research in that field actually made in those two years was $3,090, which shows that the problem is absolutely not considered by those who are in a position to have that sort of research carried on. With the oil development in Alberta the coal industry of that province, which is represented here by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), will be nearly wiped out within the next year or two.

It is true that these are matters coming under provincial jurisdiction, yet I say it is time the national government began to pay some attention to that field, because the coal industry of this country is a great national asset. It can be used for many purposes; and I leave that thought with those who are responsible for it.

Now I want to offer what I believe would be an immediate solution for the problems of Nova Scotia, and what I think would give the maritime provinces generally a very great lift. I suggest that the government should be considering the immediate expansion of the steel plant at Sydney. I am not guessing on this; I have my statistics again. Iron ore in the United States, where they carry on some terrific steel operations, is running out. The greatest iron ore deposits in the world are over here in Ungava. I could quote statements indicating that before very long the major steel plants of the United States will be shifting to the eastern seaboard, to New Hampshire and Maine, in order to be close to the raw materials in Newfoundland, which they pretty well control now, by remote control, through front companies in Canada.

This government has given a great deal of money, by way of subsidies and grants, to the operating steel industry in Canada; that is, to Algoma, Stelco and Dosco, which are supreme in the field of steel. I have all the figures here, and I am going to summarize them. From 1939 to 1948 inclusive government subsidies to the iron and steel industry amounted to $51,776,483.65. That is not peanuts. Special depreciation allowance to Stelco, Algoma and Dosco from 1939 to 1948 inclusive amounted to $14,128,447.40. Net profits after taxes of the three operating companies I have mentioned, for the same period, were $58,981,586. The operation of these major steel plants has been quite costly to the taxpayers of this country; but the figures I have just given show that if it had not been for government assistance these companies would have had an operating deficit of some $7 million during that period.

What does this indicate? To me it indicates that an industry in which the Canadian people have such an investment—because after all that is our money—should have some measure of government management. There is no reason why a board of directors we never see, responsible to no one but themselves, should be spending this amount of public money in that industry and taking those profits because they are subsidized to that extent, without the government having some say in the spending of the money and the expansion of the industry.

The problem is not fabricated steel but raw steel. At that very point we have coal, and we have the iron ore just a few miles away across the gulf. We have the boats to carry the ore. Why are not the facilities expanded for the making of raw steel? Why are we now, under whatever measure of steel control we still have, compelling Dosco to ship that raw steel back to Stelco and to Montreal for fabrication? Why are we not going after the overseas market? There will be a market for raw steel overseas for a long time to come. The logical market for that part of the country is the overseas market; and I suggest that with this amount of public money invested in that industry the production of raw steel should be stepped up. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is a man for whom I have very high regard, a man who has carried a terrific load during the last ten years. On a good many occasions I have heard him say that steel was our main bottleneck, and that the production of raw steel would have to be increased. Why is that not being done? Why is not the government in a position to say to the operating company at the Sydney end of it, particularly, that they shall do nothing but turn out raw steel? Why is the government not in a position to say that the plant must be expanded? The government is paying out enough money, so let us step up the facilities and go after the overseas market.

My time is drawing to a close. I just wanted to leave these few suggestions with the government; but before I conclude I want to say this. During this debate, I have heard considerable discussion on the matter of trade. Much of the emphasis was on our export markets. A country that exports one-third of its total production will have to have export markets; there is no doubt about that. But what about the home market? What are we doing about that? I suggest that before any country commences advising the people in some other country what they should do, it should put its own house in order. There are ways by which we could create a greater internal consumption in Canada.

One of the things upon which I should like to focus attention is that of increasing our old age pensions. In this country there are approximately 200,000 old age pensioners. These people now receive $30 per month, with a supplement of $10 per month where there are extenuating circumstances. Why could we not step that up to $50 per month? Why could we not lower the age to the minimum that has been suggested, 65 and 60? Immediately someone will say that the bill for this would be tremendous. Fifty dollars per month is not a large sum of money, as anyone who is living in Ottawa knows. It will just buy the necessities of life for an old lady or an old gentleman. It will buy a bite to eat, and that is all.

If that additional $20 per month were given without a means test, it would mean those people would have $20 per month more to spend. There are 200,000 of them. All this money would go towards buying the essentials of life. The lowering of the age limit to 65 would lay off men and make employment for younger people who could produce more. In the final analysis, the younger people should be kept in the fields in which productivity is necessary. If we did that we would not be facing the problems that we are facing today, with no one responsible for the aged or the charitable contribution that the old age pension has become. You have to be old to get it, three score and ten. Then there is the means test, of course. I believe that is something we can do. The money would not go out of this country. It would be spent in this country. It would create employment for the younger people, who would produce more. It would start to turn the wheels of industry.

The thing which we must keep in mind is that it is necessary to keep up the standard of our people. If we are going to weather the storm that is ahead, we must have full production. All this talk one hears about communism, bolshevism, and all these other isms, does not bother me. I am not particular about the tags, and I never was. I like to see things done. If we can show the people in the outside world that our system is working, our people are happy and, basically, things are not bad, there is no need to fear any other philosophy. It is the little irritations, such as the means test in old age pensions, that keep the people upset. Those things make it easy for any demagogue who wants to come in and sell his line of chatter to them.

I have not sufficient time to go into this question of devaluation. I want to say emphatically, however, that so far as devaluation is concerned Britain was forced into it by the United States in order to sell her produce there and in this country. The devaluation of the pound was a last desperate move for survival on the part of the United Kingdom. It did not solve anything. The devaluation of our dollar by ten per cent raises by that amount the cost of everything that comes in from the United States. The minister should not be surprised. He has been devaluing the Canadian dollar since 1945—since 1939, in fact—in terms of purchasing power. In the field of food, in which about eighty per cent of the income of the lower income groups is spent, the dollar has been devalued by about fifty per cent. In the over-all picture, it has been devalued by about thirty-five per cent. In the field of housing—well, it has gone out of existence.

We should not be surprised or shocked, therefore, that Britain has been forced to make that move in order to assure economic survival.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you are getting restless. I do not want to impose upon the house. I hope the minister will read my remarks in Hansard and attempt to correct some of the injustices I have been trying to describe.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, this being the first time that I have had the honour and privilege of speaking in this house, it is fitting that I should do so in French. I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate you upon your accession to the high office which you now hold. I also wish to congratulate particularly the Deputy Speaker of the house who so worthily represented my constituency during the last four years before the present parliament was called.

It is my heavy responsibility to take his place as the representative of my constituency. I trust that bearing in mind the high standard which he set in parliament during those years, and fully aware of the responsibilities of my office, which I have accepted entirely, I shall not be the cause of too much disappointment.

Geographically speaking, the constituency I have the honour to represent is situated in the north of the province of Quebec, forming a semicircle around the great lake St. John. Father Jean de Quen set up the cross there more than three centuries ago.

The population of the constituency, almost entirely of French descent, is half agricultural and half industrial. The hydroelectric development at Maligne island and the imminent harnessing of the Peribonca river portend a great industrial future for my district. The farming community, sound and intelligent, has kept the best French traditions. It is a fact that the highest average number of children per family for the whole of Canada is to be found at Notre Dame d'Hébertville, a fine agricultural centre. That half the population of that locality should be of school age is therefore not surprising.

Aluminum production of Maligne island and the pulp mills of River Bend bring well deserved earnings to an industrious and law-abiding class of workers. At both latter points, the English-speaking people of my riding live in perfect harmony with the French-speaking population. This is a living example and a concrete symbol of that unity which must and does exist throughout Canada.

Lumbering, related and subordinate to the paper industry, is generally prosperous though at the present time there is a rather marked drop in employment, due to the uncertain British market. Moreover, pulp companies, having accumulated substantial reserves, have seen fit this year to do much less wood-cutting, hence the considerable rise in unemployment. It might be felt that unemployment insurance will come to the rescue of these men in their temporary difficulties but such is not the case. This timber industry does not fall within the jurisdiction of the commission and those who are deprived of their usual livelihood are in urgent need of help.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the government is not responsible for a situation like this one. I am confident however that once it is made conversant with the facts, the government will, in order to remedy the situation, immediately undertake certain public works which were planned during the past few years. Such projects already exist in many parishes of my county, particularly in St. Joseph d'Alma.

Up to now my requests have been favourably received by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and I wish to thank him for the first results obtained.

Since lumbermen are not exempt from the fluctuations of employment, they should receive the attention of the Department of Labour. The department should, immediately and without taking into account the representations of certain pulp and paper companies, apply the Unemployment Insurance Act to the lumbering industry. That would prevent a recurrence of what is going on at present.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about my elderly constituents. Most industries seem to have made it a rule to turn down requests for work from people over 65 years of age. If men can no longer earn a living at 65, then this is the very age at which the government should grant them a pension, so they will not come to want. All old people should be paid a pension without the means test—as is being done now in the case of family allowances—or without sacrificing any nest egg they have set aside for their old age.

Mr. Speaker, the members of all parties in the house are unanimous in proclaiming the autonomy of our country, both in the national and international spheres. But we should assert our sovereignty in the economic as well as in the political field.

Our trade policy must be resolutely and firmly directed towards Canada's best interests, even if it means the sacrifice of traditional markets often preserved for sentimental rather than practical reasons. The Geneva agreements and the Annecy negotiations are a step in the right direction. In this respect, I am happy to congratulate the government while urging that this policy be pursued still further for we cannot always expect to link two great economic powers. Fortunately, the policy of the government has put us in a better position to play the important part for which we are fitted in the field of trade.

Mr. Speaker, I know that in the minds of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and of the members of his cabinet, there is no room for any inferiority complex of a political or economical nature; it is in that spirit that I supported the government during the last election.

I do not belong to that generation whose only interest is to magnify the glories of the past, but rather do I belong to that generation which looks to the future, which, while it jealously guards the legacy left by its forebears, is anxious to enrich, improve, and develop it.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, because the present government is going in that direction, I have every faith in the future of my constituency and in the destiny of my country.

(Text):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, being a Liberal and a democrat at the same time I think my first words should be to congratulate those who were elected yesterday in the eight by-elections held in Canada. In a democracy everyone is entitled to his own political opinion, and in respect of their political platforms I think we should congratulate them and convey to them our best wishes for success in the course of their political lives.

Tonight I want to say a few words on an industry operating in my own riding. I hope that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will give my request his best attention. In February, 1947, I wrote the minister a letter asking him to do something on the St. Lawrence river in order that the ferry from Lotbiniere to Deschambault, my home town, would have greater facility in carrying fertilizer produced in my constituency. This fertilizer is produced by the Deschambault Quarry Corporation of St. Marc des Carrieres. It is called the Deschambault Quarry Corporation because this parish was a part of Deschambault, and the limestone of Deschambault was used by this corporation and built up a fine reputation for St. Marc des Carrieres. The company erected a plant and started to produce fertilizer from limestone dust. Its trademark is "Calco". This company has been distributing Calco for twenty-five years. Every year for seven months of the year it has been shipping around fifty to sixty carloads of Calco a day. They are making improvements so as to be able to ship in the province of Quebec and into Ontario nearly a hundred carloads a day. In each carload is forty tons, therefore quite a large amount of Calco is distributed to the farmers of the district. This company is distributing on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, in the county of the Solicitor General (Mr. Lapointe), the county of Nicolet, the county of Quebec, and on the north shore in the counties next to mine, and has been shipping into Ontario and the lower part of the south shore of Quebec.

As I said, the company has been shipping around fifty or sixty carloads a day. To that must be added the hundreds of trucks which carry this fertilizer onto the farmers' land during seven months of the year. If I ask for improvements, if I ask that the channel be dredged from the north shore of Deschambault up to the St. Lawrence to allow the ferry to transport this Calco, it is a request that should be granted. The letter which I sent to the minister on February 18, 1947, contained all that I have said about the Calco producing company of St. Marc des Carrieres. The minister answered on March 5, saying that a survey by his engineering staff was to be made, and he gave me the result of the survey on April 21, 1947. He said the cost would be around $400,000. That is a large amount of money to spend. But when we think of the thousands of farmers using that fertilizer so as to make the land more productive I believe we would agree that the cost is not too high. I should hope that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) might see that this work is performed next year.

I did not make any election promises. I have been working at this for a few years, because I have known it was absolutely necessary. I know my farmers want it, and that the farmers in the south shore counties along the St. Lawrence want it, too. I believe it is a necessity, and that the Liberal government should continue to give farmers the facilities they need to carry out their farming operations, and those operations of production necessary for the benefit of the Canadian people.

In the budget we see that the government is making many grants for many purposes including public health, research, physical fitness, scholarships, and scholarships to help the medical man attain a specialty in some branch or other of the medical field. For these reasons I believe I am entitled to speak briefly on a matter concerning which I spoke at the last session of parliament. I refer to the spread and enormous consumption of alcoholic liquors in our country. I know, and I am sure every hon. member knows, that if one wants to cure a patient of any illness or disease, the medical man must attack the evil at its source. If one concentrates his effort on the same symptoms he errs; he walks in a circle without attaining his goal, which is the betterment of his client.

With the permission of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) I should like to quote what he said in a speech delivered in the House of Commons on March 4, 1949. Speaking with respect to national hygiene he said, as reported at page 1149 of Hansard:

> For years I have tried to use the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne as a vehicle to talk to the members, and to try to bring before them the necessity for some action to bring about betterment of health conditions in Canada, and a definite health plan for Canada. For this I offer no apology. It is not so much because of my own interest in these matters as it is that I realize there are conditions in Canada—

And the hon. member proceeded to mention hospitalization and the lack of opportunity for treatment—> ——that make it a matter which should receive the attention of all members.

> We must recognize today that, with nations as with individuals, we are faced with the fact of the survival of the fittest, and if Canada does not raise the standard of health of her citizens to a maximum equal to that of any other nation she will fall by the wayside in international affairs. We must recognize a nation's health at its full value, not only from the human point of view, but from the economic side as well. We must realize that money spent on health is money saved.

And I allow myself to add that money spent on liquor is money lost. When he says we have to raise the standard of health of our citizens to a point equal to that of any other nation, we have to think that the best way to cure is to prevent, and the best way to prevent is to state bluntly, without any futile attack on anyone, the real situation concerning the spread of alcohol in our country.

Dr. R. G. Bell, who is an authority on alcoholic matters, stated in Toronto on March 2, 1949:

> As far as medical science can determine, there is no satisfactory solution for the alcoholic but total abstinence for the rest of his life—

This is a little drastic, but it is true.

> —and modern treatment is designed to make this possible.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

Let me quote another authority in this connection. In a letter sent to me by Dr. A. M. Campbell of Winnipeg, after I had made a speech in the house, he said:

> The menace of the spread of alcoholism to the character and health and future of our young people is one of the great questions of our times, and the means to combat it are so ineffectual.

I think he is right. And if the means are ineffectual, then I do not think everyone is taking the steps necessary to combat the abuse of alcohol in our country. Perhaps hon. members will recall that in a speech I delivered on February 22, 1949, I quoted Dr. Monin who was secretary of the comity of hygiene in France—and this goes back to pre-1900 days. He said:

> The truest word ever uttered on this subject remains perhaps that of Bucknill: "The drunkard drinks because he is insane. He is insane because he drinks."

Dr. Monin adds:

> Alcohol is a major factor in criminality. The investigations carried out by Mr. Yvernès show that the first principle violated by the drunk man is the respect of officials.

I do not see why a public man can utter sentences like these, and leave every facility to people within their own province to use as much liquor as they want, thus developing a lack of respect for the law, and giving even to children of fifteen years the opportunity to obtain liquor in any liquor dispensary, hotel or grill. If, as Mr. Yvernès said, the first principle violated by the drunken man is the respect of officials, then I do not see why we can talk about the respect we have for authority when we give such wide opportunities to everyone to obtain alcoholic drinks.

You know very well, Mr. Speaker, that a man intoxicated has no will power. I do not see why we are not taking the necessary steps—and I say "we", meaning that public authorities should have an understanding so that they might get together and stop the giving of these facilities to youngsters of fifteen years. Dr. Monin continues:

> Then come insults to policemen, destruction of trees, plants, fences, gross indecency, assault and battery, seditious cries, conditional threats, manslaughter through criminal negligence, arson . . .
> A tenth of all murders result from bar-room brawls. Of one hundred divorces granted in Denmark 24 are granted on grounds of drunkenness (Magnus Huss).

Dr. Monin says further on:

> In the corner of each brain, used to say Moreau (of Tours), madness lies dormant; the main thing is not to bring it to life.

I am using many quotations because I do not think I am qualified to speak directly on this subject. I am not a specialist but I think I should do my utmost to perform my duty as a public man to help Canadians to get rid of this pain in the side, if I may use that phrase. I should like now to quote the Temperance Advocate, which in turn quotes Mr. William J. Faulkner of the Message magazine of Nashville, Tennessee. Mr. Faulkner is referring to the way in which advertisers are trying to get the attention of the general public in order to increase the sale of liquor, and I quote from the article:

"We need to understand the habits of women and the younger generation. Train your publicity to catch the eye and develop the interest of the younger generation . . . Make youth liquor conscious . . . Make it smart to drink wine. Teach American women to drink." These were slogans adopted at the March, 1935, convention of 49 leaders of the wine and liquor industries in Chicago. And they are really making the younger generation liquor conscious.

It is high time that college presidents, deans, professors, and counselors organized their forces in a scientific attack on the major evil in our society. They must co-operate with the church, the home, the public schools, and the government in an intelligent nation-wide crusade against strong drink.

We in Canada should also co-operate with the church, the home, the public schools, and the governments if they want to, in an intelligent nation-wide crusade against strong drink. I should like to refer now to an article in the Toronto Star of October 12, 1949, by Robert Taylor, the staff correspondent. It reads:

Canadians spent $48 per capita last year for alcohol compared with $28.50 on medical care and death expenses, a survey by the dominion bureau of statistics reveals.

Each Canadian averaged almost as much for tobacco, $24, as for fuel, $27.

And again:

The magnitude of the Canadian booze bill may be gathered by the fact that it was considerably greater than the total amount the federal government spent in the same year on family allowances, war service gratuities, re-establishment credits, rehabilitation benefits, pensions for both wars, war veterans' allowances, unemployment insurance benefits, Prairie Farm Assistance Act benefits and pensions to government employees.

Here are some comparative figures showing the per capita expenditures on different commodities:

Food	$215.00	$75.60
Clothing	102.00	34.00
Household operations	78.00	60.50
Alcohol	48.00	15.00

Those increases are worth noting. An article in the Toronto Star of July 4, 1949, states that a hospital is going to be built in Toronto for the treatment of alcoholics. The article states:

The Ontario government is to "get tough" with those who do not observe the liquor laws.

But Ontario has been going right ahead creating alcoholics who will require treatment.

Ontario has been multiplying the liquor outlets which in turn multiply the number of drinkers and thus increase the problems of law administration.

What is the use of building hospitals to treat alcoholics when we provide the populace with every facility to obtain alcoholic beverages? If a man or woman succumbs to the lure of alcohol it is very rarely that he or she can overcome the longing without treatment. The main thing is not to start. I should like to quote now from another article which I consider is of great importance. I shall quote this in French and then give the house a general idea of what it says:

(Translation):

This article was published in the May, 1941, issue of the Jesuits' review and is entitled "Alcohol and Democracy":

Having been introduced on Tuesday night, Bill 56, amending the Alcoholic Liquor Act was voted on second and third reading by the provincial legislature.

And again:

Such is the true reform awaited with understandable impatience by all the honest citizens of this province and especially the new women voters, wives and mothers, who will judge of its merits by what it does and not by its promises. The new legislation seeks to reimpart to the Lord's day something of its Christian character, and to the night something of its original purpose. It also seeks to lessen the lying power of liquor advertisements, to divest night clubs and hotel rooms of some of their glamour, and finally make enforcement a little more effective. All these points have been won, at least in theory, by the public opinion campaign on behalf of temperance.

(Text):

It is true that a good job was being done against the enormous spread of the use of alcoholic beverages. I think the law should be enforced by the government and an effort made to get the public interested in this question of the sale of alcoholic beverages. In Quebec there have been cases where children of 15 years of age have been sold alcoholic beverages. I quote again:

(Translation):

And that in spite of unanimous, energetic and repeated protests from the highest religious authorities, parent associations and Christian labour movements, and in spite of 260,000 affidavits.

(Text):

We are now in the year 1949 and I believe that what that article says is still true. I quote again in French:

(Translation):

In any event a vigorous and intelligent temperance campaign is required more than ever before, so as to uphold the will of the government to prevent abuses and have the law respected, and also to lessen the effects of this shady and evil clause, until it is repealed.

(Text):

I believe in Quebec the law has not been enforced to its full extent, and I hope that the provincial authorities will at last open their eyes and see that the law is fully respected. I have here a letter written by Mr. J. Wilfrid Gaudette, general president of the Sacred Heart league, to L'Action Catholique to be found in the issue of March 25, 1949. He has also written repeatedly to the premier of the province of Quebec. I am glad that once in a while a man feels strongly enough about a subject to dare to put his finger on the evil without being afraid of reprisals of any kind from anyone, even from the government itself. Mr. Gaudette says in his letter:

For some time past, the Prime Minister has on many occasions, pointed out the need of action as regards law enforcement. In the case of the liquor commission law, it does seem that breaches give rise to much less scruples on the part of authorities.

An inquiry has recently been conducted in parishes about the observance of the liquor law in licensed establishments on Sunday. More than 300 parishes from 60 provincial counties have sent in replies. Over 50 per cent of the latter state that hotels, taverns and licensed establishments are breaking the law by selling liquor at all times on Sunday, in spite of the fact that the law only authorizes the sale of wine and beer between one o'clock in the afternoon and 9 o'clock in the evening, with meals comprising food for a value of at least 40 cents.

That article was published on March 25, 1949, and Mr. Gaudette added:

Law is being transgressed through the sale of liquor to minors. It is being broken through the sale of liquor to drunken people. It is being transgressed also through the sale of liquor without a licence. In the majority of the parishes which have answered our inquiry, it is said that the liquor commission have no control, that the action they do take, if any, is inefficient. When such abuses are reported to the authorities, they reply that those disorders are the result of the original sin. We are no longer at the time of the original sin. We have at least come to the deluge, which floods our province.

We know that each of our federations has its own special struggles to wage against the liquor racket.

I wish to mention particularly the tremendous and dignified work performed by the leagues of the Sacred Heart and the Lacordaire and Joan of Arc organizations in my province. I believe they deserve to be entirely successful and I hope that their work will be fruitful and that the authorities will help them.

As I said a while ago, we need organizations strong enough to face up to anyone.

It is not by sitting back idly that we shall reap success. We therefore urge that every league, every member of such an organization and anyone able to hold a pen write to the Prime Minister and to their member of parliament and support our request: observance of the law.

The Canada Temperance Union has submitted a request published by L'Action Catholique under date of February 11, 1949:

Request to the federal government by the Canada Temperance Union.

In a memorandum submitted yesterday to Prime Minister St. Laurent, the Canada Temperance Union recommends the appointment of a royal commission to investigate the Canadian liquor problem. A delegation of 12 representatives from religious and temperance organizations met the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon and submitted to him a six-page memorandum.

I understand why certain people would like to restrict the use of alcoholic beverages. Autonomy should not be a factor in my opinion, when we are out to curb mass poisoning, and the unreasoned and unreasonable use of alcoholic beverages.

I have an article from the Toronto Star of the 3rd of March, 1949, stating that 30,620 "drunks" were convicted in Ontario in 1948. It reads in part:

Out of the Ontario government's expanding liquor business came 30,620 convictions for drunkenness in 1948 . . .

I do not quote that to sling mud at any province of Canada. I merely do so to arouse public opinion. I want everybody in Canada to know what the situation is and to realize that it is time to rise in force and make the public authorities conscious of the danger confronting our population. That is why I do so. That is why I repeat the same things I said in my first speech on liquor consumption. I want to return to that question, and I hope I shall not be the only one to come back to it, because the time has come when everyone should face his responsibility for the betterment of our Canadian society. I have an editorial from the Ottawa Journal of March 15, 1949, and I note that the danger is present in other provinces. The title of the editorial is:

Still Debauching the Indians

It reads in part:

A disturbing story comes from Alert bay, a small British Columbia settlement 299 miles northwest of Vancouver, with some 600 white residents and a reservation of 1,800 Indians. Greedy and unscrupulous white men are taking liquor into the area by speed-boat and bootlegging it to the Indians at $10 to $25 a bottle, with the result that drunken Indians are a major problem and, according to the Indian superintendent, "it is neither fit nor safe for a woman to walk down Alert bay's one street at night."

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the evil is spreading its tentacles into other parts of our country. I have a calculation made by Mr. Gaudette, the president of the Sacred Heart league. A question was asked in the letter sent to every municipality as to how many quart bottles of milk the amount of liquor consumed in the country in 1947 would provide? The answer was that it would amount to 635,433,900 quarts of milk for the children. I have here a release from the same league and by the same man, Mr. J. Wilfrid Gaudette, president of the Sacred Heart league of the province of Quebec, on collective temperance, which was distributed by the episcopate of my province. It reads:

(Translation):

Lawgivers, and in them all whose duty it is to approve and enforce the laws, will understand, we are sure, that in the interest of the public it behooves them to practise and respect the virtue of temperance. Need we recall that any person in authority is responsible not only for his own wrongdoing but for leading others astray; he is also accountable for his failure to do good or preventing others from doing good. Finally, he is responsible for all the evil he does not prevent when he can and should do so.

(Text):

The bishops and archbishops of my province have given this warning, and I hope that at last it may be understood and heeded by provincial authorities throughout Canada. I hope we may all face our responsibilities and take steps to see that drinking, which is increasing even among youngsters as well as grown people, is discouraged.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, before I speak briefly on the budget, may I devote a few minutes to outlining a problem which, though not of national concern, means a great deal to a part of my province.

In the house, I have the privilege and the honour of representing the constituency of Charlevoix. Extending over a distance of 140 miles from Château Richer to the Saguenay river, it is largely peopled by French-Canadian catholics. I also wish to state that my constituency is proud of its local history since from there many pioneers set forth to share in the development of certain parts of the lake St. John district and of the north shore.

Because of its topography, my constituency is partly agricultural and partly industrial. Indeed, the lumber industry plays an important part and a growing number of men skilled in that kind of work are to be found in certain municipalities.

This constituency, which borders on the St. Lawrence, is served by a very primitive railway line. The Canadian National has a branch running from Quebec to La Malbaie and, in fact, La Malbaie is actually the terminal of the only railway line in that area. This situation is assuredly unsatisfactory, much more so because its improvements can easily be justified both from an economic point of view and from that of the development of Charlevoix county. As was stated by my friend from the Saguenay and north shore regions, and as is known to the majority of the members of this house, our district is on the threshold of great developments which will probably have a tremendous bearing on the economy of this country.

So, I think it is time that, at the request of my fellow citizens, I should bring to the attention of the government the transportation problem as it exists in my constituency. In the near future I intend to ask the proper authorities that improvements be made as regards the line now linking Quebec with La Malbaie. I shall first request that the Canadian National start negotiations with the Quebec Railway, because in my opinion present arrangements between the two are now inadequate and greatly handicap the service we want. I shall then ask that this service be extended from La Malbaie to the municipality of Clermont and that it be made a daily service, since a line is already there and the people of Clermont are entitled to and should obtain such a service. Finally, since the matter of opening a new outlet to the lake St. John and Chicoutimi districts is now being discussed, I shall also request that the line be extended from Clermont to Port Alfred, and that its eventual extension into the county of Saguenay be considered.

This proposal is far more justifiable than that submitted in Quebec city to the royal commission on transportation by the council for the economic development of the Saguenay. I will have the opportunity to prove it at some other time, but meanwhile I wish to quote a thought from Le Feuillet de la semaine, a small local newspaper full of common sense published at Baie St. Paul.

Let it be known, nevertheless, that we refuse to be treated as second-rate citizens, as poor relations. We will never submit to being set aside.

(Text):

It is almost a commonplace to say that the prosperity of this country and the high standard of living enjoyed in our land is closely related to our foreign trade. One who has followed the legislation of this government will soon be convinced that this very important part of our economic life has been dealt with in an effective way. I have learned from many reliable references, and in my short experience in business, that external trade is of paramount importance to the successful development and the welfare of this country. To support this statement I want to quote part of a monthly letter published by the Royal Bank of Canada in June, 1946, which illustrates the importance of external trade to the welfare of Canada. This has reference to the theory of self-sufficiency in Canada, and says:

To dispose in one paragraph of the bogey of what would happen if Canada were so foolish as to adopt a policy of self-sufficiency, contrast the actualities of the past twenty years with what might have been under a nationalistic economy. If Canada had not exported, there would have been an average of $1,365 million a year less entering the flow of money, a reduction of about 27 per cent in the national income, or nearly $10 a month smaller purchasing power for every man, woman and child in the country. If there had not been exports of $8,537 million of farm products in the 19 years preceding 1945, there would have been $614 less income per year per farm.

In other words, Canada just cannot continue on her present standards, much less can she raise them, without foreign markets for her goods.

It is based on the fact that, although Canada is rich in many natural resources, she is lacking in quite a few important commodities. When I refer to an abundance of natural resources, I mean that in certain products, such as wheat, newsprint and different metals, Canada has large surpluses. In many cases a foreign market is necessary in order to liquidate the surpluses. On the other hand, it is no less true to say that we lack certain vital products such as steel, coal, coffee or sugar, as well as certain specialized manufactured goods. This country has to import many items which are necessary to our daily life.

In the last two or three decades this external trade has made great strides, Mr. Speaker. From a value of slightly more than $431 million in 1914, our exports have jumped to approximately $2,750 million in 1947. When one goes over the maze of statistics concerning this period, one is impressed by several features which seem to have a direct bearing on the future of our national economy. I find that up to recent years our exports have been chiefly in the field of primary products, usually referred to as raw material or semi-processed material. Of course, by the very nature of these products they generally react more violently to price cycles than manufactured products.

I refer now to the statistics for the year 1921 which show that Canada received $311 million for 120 million bushels of wheat, whereas in 1939 Canada received approximately $109 million for 163 million bushels. If I pushed my study further I could illustrate this trend with other farm products or with metals. Helped by the impetus of the last war, however, it is interesting to note that our exports in the last few years have been made up of a larger proportion of manufactured goods. I believe this is a new trend which indicates a greater diversification of our national economy. In view of present world conditions, this certainly affords ground for satisfaction. It is likely this diversification will permit Canada to open new markets. I believe the agreements made at Geneva and at Annecy will also help this country to obtain new markets for the exportation of these new products which Canada seems to be manufacturing in larger quantities.

However, Mr. Speaker, although my remarks might indicate that our foreign trade seems to have become re-oriented, I should like to say at once that we should not neglect our traditional markets, which have always been in the commonwealth. It is well known that the greatest trade exists among the most-developed nations. I believe I am right in saying that this government was very much aware of this principle. When I look at the assistance this government has given Great Britain in the form of mutual aid, I consider it not so much a gift as an investment in the long run economic development of this country.

On motion of Mr. Maltais the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is private members' day, but I understand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has consulted the leaders of the opposition parties with a view to moving to go into supply, so that he can ask for interim supply. If there is no objection, that will be the first order, and then we will revert to private members' business.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 26, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has passed the following bill, to which the concurrence of this house is desired: Bill Y-3 of the Senate, intituled an act respecting the British and Foreign Bible Society in Canada and Newfoundland.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, we cannot consider a bill with respect to so-and-so "in Canada and Newfoundland". Surely that day is gone. The greater includes the lesser, of course. Surely we cannot have it that way now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was merely informing the house that I had received from the Senate a message, which is not debatable, informing this house that the Senate had passed a bill, the title of which I read.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then I think it should be referred back to them, and they should be told to get their English straight.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—BANKING AND COMMERCE—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the name of Mr. Follwell be substituted for that of Mr. Bennett on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

That the name of Mr. Hellyer be substituted for that of Mr. McLean (Huron-Perth) on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE ACT

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 117, to provide for the dissolution of marriage of persons domiciled in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland.

Some hon Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of the bill is to give to the Exchequer Court of Canada jurisdiction to deal with divorce actions in the case of persons residing in Quebec and Newfoundland. Jurisdiction as to alimony, care of children and other matrimonial causes will remain in the provincial courts of those two provinces.

This bill does not establish divorce courts in Quebec or Newfoundland, or interfere in any way with provincial rights. It does not change the grounds for divorce. It does not make available to persons residing in Quebec or Newfoundland anything not now available to them, but merely transfers the hearing of divorce petitions filed by persons residing in those two provinces from parliament to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to introduce the bill? Carried. Mr. Knowles moves, seconded by Mr. Coldwell, that this bill be now read a first time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Dropped.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Never.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

QUESTIONS

OLD AGE PENSIONS—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Bertrand:

1. In 1948, what was the total amount paid by the federal government for old age pensions in the province of Quebec?
2. What was the total amount paid by the government of the province of Quebec for the same year?

Mr. Claxton:

1. For the twelve months January 1 to December 31, 1948, the government of Canada paid the following amounts for old age pensions and pensions for blind persons in the province of Quebec:

Old age	$ 16,015,515 53
Blind	923,954 21
Total	$ 16,939,469 74

2. The amount paid by the province of Quebec for the same twelve-month period would be approximately one-third of the amount paid by the government of Canada, as follows:

Old age	$ 5,338,505 17
Total	$ 5,646,489 91

Note: This amount might be slightly increased or decreased on account of adjustments between the province of Quebec and the other provinces.

NORTON, N.B., MAIL COURIER—ROUTE 6

Mr. Brooks:

1. Were tenders called for the carrying of mail for rural route No. 6, Norton, King's county, New Brunswick?
2. If so, how many tenders were received, and what was the amount of each?
3. To whom was the contract awarded?
4. Is he a veteran of either the first or second world war?

Mr. Rinfret:

1. Yes.

2. Stanley O'Leary, Norton, N.B., $1,200; Herbert Harold Tait, Norton, N.B., $1,250. (Mr. Tait subsequently reduced his tender to $1,175 in a letter to the department dated 27th August, 1949, which date was after that set for the closing of tenders, namely, 29th July 1949.)

[Mr. Speaker.]

3. To Stanley O'Leary, on 23rd August, 1949, for $1,200 per annum.

4. No record.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—AUTHORITY TO EXAMINE MAIL

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the foreign exchange control board, the Bank of Canada or any other government department or agency authority to delay, open, read or censor first-class or airmail addressed to or from the United States or any other foreign country?
2. If such authority exists, are any private letters being so interfered with, and for what purpose?

Mr. Rinfret: No department of government or other agency has authority to delay or open first-class or air mail for censorship purposes. The Post Office Department has authority to open letters under section 51 of the Post Office Act.

No letters which do not contravene regulations issued by the Postmaster General under the powers conferred under the Post Office Act are interfered with.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REPRESENTATION OF WESTERN CANADA ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received representations from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce asking that western Canada be given more adequate representation on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways?
2. If so, has consideration been given to such representations?
3. What is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes.

2. Representations were received subsequent to appointment by the governor in council on October 10 of Mr. William Parker, of Winnipeg, to the board of directors of Canadian National Railway Company, to be effective November 1, 1949.

3. See answer to No. 2.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I., POST OFFICE—SPECIAL ALLOWANCE TO STENOGRAPHERS

Mr. McLure:

1. How many stenographers are employed in the Charlottetown post office and postal district office?
2. Did the stenographers all receive a special stenographic allowance of $5 per month?
3. Has this allowance been discontinued? If so, when?
4. Will the stenographers in Saint John, Halifax and Montreal offices have their allowance discontinued?

Mr. Rinfret:

1. One in Charlottetown post office; one in Charlottetown post office inspector's office.

2. Yes.

3. Yes; 1st October, 1949.

4. Yes.

NEWFOUNDLAND—NATIONAL HARBOURS

Mr. Higgins:

1. Has the province of Newfoundland requested the federal government to investigate the desirability of establishing one or more national harbours under the national harbours board?

2. If so, what areas have been designated for the establishment of national harbours?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

POTATOES—EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Hatfield:

1. How many bushels of Canada grade 1 table potatoes were exported from Canada to the United States during the period from September 15, 1949, to October 17, 1949 inclusive?

2. How many bushels were exported through each port of exit?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Canadian exports are compiled on a monthly basis, that is, all customs entries received in Ottawa on the last day of the month are included in that month's summary. The tabulation system does not permit the segregation of entries for part of one month and part of another. There will be no tabulation of export shipments for the month of October until November 15. The latest information available is for the month of September:

Exports of potatoes, n.o.p. (except seed) to U.S.A., 117,877 bushels.

2. Not published by ports of exit.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NEWFOUNDLAND—NATURAL RESOURCES AND ECONOMY—STATISTICAL DATA

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What effort has been made by the government of Canada to collect and make available statistical and scientific data about the natural resources and economy of Newfoundland, since April 1, 1949?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

PLASTER ROCK, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. Hatfield:

1. Was a piece of land purchased at Plaster Rock, New Brunswick, in 1939, for the purpose of building a post office?

2. Were plans, specifications and tenders called to build a post office in 1939 at Plaster Rock?

3. If so, why was the building not built?

4. What was the post office revenue at Plaster Rock in the year 1939?

5. What was the revenue of the post office at Plaster Rock in the year 1948?

6. Has there been any action taken in regard to building said post office in the last year?

IMPORTS OF FILMS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Herridge:

1. What amount of American dollars was used in payment for United States films imported into Canada for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949?

2. Did the United States film industry offer to render any particular service to Canada on account of continued unrestricted import of films into Canada?

3. If so, what form did these services assume and what is their estimated value to Canada?

Mr. McIlraith: Return tabled.

BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS—EXPRESS, FREIGHT AND PASSENGER RATES

Mr. Church:

1. What are the functions of the board of transport commissioners regarding freight and passenger rates?

2. Have they exclusive jurisdiction over these matters?

3. If so (a) why has a board of professors and one judge been appointed for the same purpose; (b) what jurisdiction has the said select board over freight and passenger rates?

4. What is the cost to the country of this royal commission?

5. In what year was the board of railway commissioners, now called the board of transport commissioners, given jurisdiction over the telephone and express companies rates?

Mr. Chevrier: Return tabled.

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

Mr. Shaw:

1. What to date has been Canada's total financial contribution to the international refugee organization?

2. Who are the Canadian representatives on IRO?

3. Are IRO funds utilized to pay travelling and related expenses of displaced persons desirous of taking up residence in Canada?

4. How many displaced persons who have established residence in Canada had their travelling and related expenses paid in full out of IRO funds?

5. How many had their expenses paid in part?

6. Have any Canadian sponsors of displaced persons been reimbursed in whole or in part for money spent to bring displaced persons to Canada?

7. What is the general policy of IRO in determining which displaced persons should receive financial assistance to enable them to reach Canada?

IMMIGRATION—GERMAN NATIONALS

Mr. Shaw:

1. Under existing immigration regulations, what type of evidence is accepted as proof that a German national did not agree with nazi doctrine?

2. Have any German nationals who served in the German army during world war II been admitted to Canada as immigrants?

3. Have any persons other than German nationals who served in the German army during world war II been admitted to Canada as immigrants?

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a day or two ago I spoke to the leaders of the different parties and indicated that I would like to ask the house today to allow me to move to go into committee of supply in order to provide for a further month's interim supply. All of them told me that they would have no objection to my doing so. Of course this action would require unanimous consent of the house, and, if I may have that consent, I should like to make that motion. It is understood, of course, that if these proceedings take a relatively short time we will then resume the ordinary business and take up private members' motions.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $114,516,603.83, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, except items 43, 419 and 452, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; a sum not exceeding $5,012,437.50, being three-twelfths of the amount of item 559 as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950; a sum not exceeding $2,446,984.33, being one-twelfth of the several items, except item 681, to be voted, as set out in the supplementary estimates (Newfoundland); a sum not exceeding $5,876,758.33, being one-twelfth of the several items to be voted as set out in the further supplementary estimates, and a sum not exceeding $2,302,500.00, being nine-twelfths of items 779 and 935 to be voted as set out in the further supplementary estimates laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950.

He said: The committee will recall that prior to the dissolution of the last parliament six-twelfths of the general items had been voted, and additional items for certain special activities for which additional amounts were required in the early part of the year. Last month parliament voted one-twelfth of the general items, including the Newfoundland supplementaries which had been tabled. This made in all seven-twelfths of the general estimates, together with the full amount for certain items.

Today I am asking for an additional one-twelfth of the general items, including the supplementaries, and additional amounts for three items. These three items are item 559 in the main estimates, which provides for advances to national harbours board for the retirement of maturing bonds of Montreal harbour that become payable on November 1; item 935, which is a similar item relating to national harbours board maturing bonds, and item 779, which provides for a payment of $1,075,000 to the international children's emergency fund. The interim supply I am asking today, together with the amounts that were previously voted, would cover eleven-twelfths of those particular items.

The form of the bill to be founded on this resolution will of course be the same as other supply bills which have been passed by the house from time to time on previous occasions. The passing of this bill will not result in the voting of the full amounts of the items, and will not prejudice the rights of hon. members to discuss any of the items when they come up for consideration later this month. Of course I give the usual undertaking that such rights and privileges will be respected, and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of the measure which will be brought before the house.

Mr. Church: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one question about this interim supply bill. The money will have to be paid; there is no doubt about that at all. I want to ask the minister whether the interim supply bill will include a sum sufficient to recoup municipalities for the services they provide to crown properties. For example, I mentioned last week that in 1905 the Whitney government in Ontario for all local improvement roads, sidewalks and so forth paid money for all crown properties in the right of the province all over Ontario. I suggested that the dominion government would be well advised to pay for similar services throughout Canada. Other cities are providing the same services for crown properties as Ottawa does. Ottawa gets half a million dollars, while they receive nothing.

Mr. Abbott: Nothing is contained in the main estimates, or in the supplementaries which have been tabled, for items such as those referred to by the hon. member. The whole question of crown properties in municipalities has been under consideration for some time. I think the Prime Minister indicated to the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities that it was hoped to be able to make a statement at an early day as to what government policy might be in that regard.

Mr. Fleming: Will the statement be made before the end of the present session?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to make any particular comment on this course of action, except to say it is becoming so prevalent as to amount to the following of a precedent. Many people seem to feel that parliament has some control over expenditures, but the experience of the last several years has been that the control is more theoretical than actual. Within the last few months we have granted power to the government, in advance of any accounting, to expend tens of millions, and have ratified expenditure about which we know nothing.

Just before I came into the chamber I secured a copy of Durell's Parliamentary Grants, for the purpose of referring to the days when things were otherwise. It is still the authority as to the responsibility of the executive to the House of Commons, but it is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. At page 20 I find these words:

> The proper office of parliament, as Mill points out,—

The author is quoting John Stuart Mill.

> —is "to watch and control the government, to throw the light of publicity on its acts, to compel a full exposition and justification of all of them which anyone considers questionable, to censure them if found to merit condemnation . . ."

This function is the responsibility of members in all parts of the house. I do not condemn any party, but as a private member I say we are not discharging this function. Somebody will say to me that we have a public accounts committee. Reading Durell I find that there are three stages in finance —estimates, expenditures and accounting; and that there is a duty on the part of parliament to examine expenditures. I sometimes believe that if the government were to include in the estimates an item of $5 million for which there was no justification whatsoever, under our present system of examination in the House of Commons it could be passed. This is a serious matter.

When one looks back over the years when government was less complex than it is today, when hon. members now on the other side of the house were on this side—

Some hon. Members: On both sides.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the reverse was the fact, there was an examination of expenditures.

Mr. Lesage: A good opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not discussing the matter from that point of view. It is all very well to talk about a good opposition, but with the hundreds of millions of dollars expended today, and without members on the opposition side of the house having the necessary techniques and experts available to study the estimates, we in the House of Commons cannot discharge our responsibilities.

I rise solely for the purpose of suggesting that if we as members are to discharge our responsibility, the time has come to depart from parliamentary tradition, if you will, and make available to the opposition experts who will assist in the analysis of these accounts, without which an examination of the expenditures becomes a haphazard farce.

Somebody has said: What about the public accounts committee? There is no institution in Great Britain more effective than the public accounts committee. The reason is that it is a committee composed of members of the House of Commons—and I am quoting again from Durell:

> . . . who have shown their interest in financial questions, even though, as opponents of the government, they might during the investigations of the committee obtain further facilities for criticizing its policy. It is recognized that the question of public accounts is a national and not a party question, and, as such, the investigation is made in the public interest and from a financial, not a political, point of view. Discussions in the house itself on financial questions, on the other hand, are apt to follow party lines, and the real issue is apt to be obscured.

I granted that the withholding or granting of supply is an important function of parliament, I suggest that something must be done in order to improve the techniques whereby members of the house can discharge their responsibility instead of pretending to discharge it when as a matter of fact they are unable to do so.

In the United Kingdom—and it may seem an unusual course to follow—the chairman of the public accounts committee is a member of the opposition, the purpose being to ensure a complete investigation of all expenditures made or asked for from parliament. My purpose in speaking at this time is to suggest that a committee be set up along the lines of the public accounts committee of the United Kingdom, which has done great work. That it is not actuated in any way by party considerations is indicated by the fact that the chairmanship is bestowed upon a member of the opposition.

If we are to discharge our responsibilities, we must be given information which today is unavailable to us. We ask these questions on the order paper day by day; we get some information, but not enough to give us an intelligent grasp of any one feature of these expenditures. For that reason I ask the government to give consideration to making available to those who are in opposition—and equally, of course, to members supporting the government—the services of experts, including the Auditor General, in order to make possible an intelligent examination of the accounts.

I did not rise to protest what was being done. What is in fact being done today is only a short-cut, the course that is followed in connection with all estimates. In one case we may talk about them in detail. On a motion such as this, of course, we do not discuss individual expenditures, but in any case there is not that examination which, with over-all expenditures of $2,500 million, the people of Canada have a right to expect on the part of members in all parts of the house.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not rise either to oppose or to support the argument made by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I merely wish to point out that the public accounts and the estimates are two different things. The estimates before us represent moneys not yet appropriated or expended, so that a discussion of the estimates is quite different from a discussion of the public accounts.

I have been in this house a fairly long time, and if there is any one thing which in my opinion you cannot keep free from political bias it is the public accounts, when the public accounts committee meets. That is quite natural, because when the public accounts committee meets, the opposition of course is looking for scandal or wrongdoing, and the government will do everything in its power to see that they do not find what they are looking for. There will be objections to giving information, and all that sort of thing. I believe we could have a committee on public accounts that would properly analyse these accounts if we set about it in the right way.

I believe there is a great deal to be desired in the way the estimates are dealt with in this house. We give too much time to a few departments, and hardly any time at all to a great many others. Every year as long as I have been here we have spent afternoon after afternoon and evening after evening on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. We have minutely examined every cutworm and every boll weevil in the prairie provinces, and we have investigated thoroughly the various functions of that department. But when we come to the estimates of other important departments, they go through this house at the rate of about a million dollars a minute, with no consideration whatever.

I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre to this extent at least, that we should attempt to devise some effective means of dealing with both the estimates and our public accounts.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps before the Minister of Finance replies I might briefly contribute two thoughts that have struck me.

The first has to do with the form of the estimates, to which attention has been drawn in previous years. That form is not such as to lend itself to a thorough analysis of our expenditures. Two years ago the Auditor General submitted to the public accounts committee detailed recommendations with respect to the form of the estimates and other matters, which he said would enable hon. members to conduct a detailed review and to fulfil their duty of satisfying themselves and the public that the expenditures sought by the government were proper. In the intervening two and a half years no action has been taken with respect to those useful and comprehensive recommendations coming from the Auditor General, and I would urge on the minister that the time has come when they should be given attention. They were the product of much thought and long experience on his part, and should receive consideration by the government.

My other thought has to do with an alternative procedure which has been tried by this house on previous occasions; and I mention this particularly in the hope of interesting the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The one exception to the ordinary rule that estimates are considered only in committee of supply, so far as I am aware, has been with respect to the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, since a standing committee on external affairs was first set up in 1945. In each of the intervening sessions the estimates of that department have been referred to the standing committee, and I am prepared to say that they have been given more careful review and more thorough analysis there than the estimates of any other department have received in committee of the whole house. The simple reason is that in the committee it has been possible to question officials of the department. The under-secretary has been there, and members of the committee have been afforded an opportunity of eliciting firsthand information which has been of the greatest value to them.

It is utterly impossible to carry on a detailed review and analysis of proposed expenditures, running into billions of dollars, under the clumsy, awkward procedure the house follows in committee of supply. As every hon. member well knows, it is impossible to examine properly these heavy proposed expenditures in a committee which includes all members of the house, where there is no opportunity to direct questions to officials; where it is possible only to ask questions of the minister and to obtain from him information that he in turn has obtained from the officials sitting before him.

I am reminded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that on at least some occasions the accounts of Canadian National Railways have been reviewed by the sessional committee on government-owned railways.

There, it seems to me, we have two useful precedents which justify wider application of the method there pursued; and I do urge that consideration be given to extending this practice, and in particular that the minister be good enough to study the extensive recommendations made by the Auditor General to the public accounts committee in 1947.

Mr. Pouliot: I am sure the members of the government will appreciate the suggestions that have been offered by the hon. members who have just spoken.

The estimates are divided into two parts. In the first part the various items are listed, and in the second part there is a detailed statement of expenditures. In order to understand the whole thing, one must read the reports of the various departments which throw light on the items appearing in the estimates.

As to the public accounts, I shall give some comfort to the minister by reminding him that some years ago, on my protest, in which I was supported by the member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the former member for Davenport, Mr. MacNicol, I succeeded in having the public accounts reformed. No member of the opposition had complained before about the fact that during the war no item less than $25,000 was mentioned in the estimates. It was only after the three of us complained to the then minister of finance—Mr. MacNicol called it an outrage—that we succeeded in obtaining this reform of the public accounts. The government should be given credit for that.

If the opposition wish to scrutinize the public accounts, they could divide themselves into various groups—in fact I believe that has been done. These groups could specialize in various departments and become familiar with certain aspects of public business. They could ask pertinent questions of the government. Questions on picayune matters should not be asked, and the members should abstain from theorizing during discussion of the estimates. The purpose of the committee of supply is to allow members to obtain supplementary information about the estimates that are before the committee. If we are to have never-ending speeches and repetition of the same thing by the same people every time an item is called, then there will be no end to the discussion.

The reason the discussion of estimates takes so much time is that so many members have no sense of proportion as to what is important and what is not. They waste much time on small detailed matters. If the members would consider the whole aspect of the matter in the first place, and then get down to particulars by asking questions so that they would be informed instead of trying to inform the government, more rapid progress would be made, and the procedure in passing the estimates would be more satisfactory to the members of the committee and to the public at large.

Mr. Graydon: The member for Temiscouata has provided one of the best arguments I have heard for a change in our system of studying the public accounts. What the member for Eglinton said a few moments ago was only too true—that the two committees which have been examining the estimates of the railways and of the Department of External Affairs have worked to the benefit of both departments and of members of the house. I am in some agreement with the suggestion of the member for Temiscouata that if estimates are discussed in a committee there is a disposition to deal with them in a more businesslike manner. This is not so in the committee of supply.

Many of these items in the estimates are details that call for the immediate attention and presence of the officers of the department concerned. I do not think it is quite good enough to follow the old system, which has been followed for so many years, of proceeding in leisurely fashion in committee of supply with an examination of perhaps one department, and then, at the last moment, having a tremendous rush to complete the business before the house. No one is given a fair opportunity of dealing with the items in question. In at least some of our departments I believe we could well adopt the system suggested by the member for Eglinton, that is, the method which has worked so well in the external affairs and railways and shipping committees.

If the matter is dealt with in a standing or special committee, there is an opportunity for questioning of the departmental heads. In the committee of supply all one gets is an echo from the departmental heads through the ministry. The departmental head whispers something to the minister, and the minister pipes it back to the house. It would be much better if we were able to direct questions to the departmental officers. From my experience, the echo system of cross-examination does not work out very well, There are two other reasons why this change should be made, to enable us to examine the departmental heads from time to time. One has to do with the amount of time that the house ordinarily sits each year. I believe the length of the session could be cut down, without affecting the quality of the work done, if the major part of the estimates were brought before appropriate committees. Perhaps it would be proper to have the administration item for each department considered in the committee of supply, but the other items should go before the appropriate committee. If we did this I believe it would shorten our sessions and increase the efficiency of parliament.

Moreover, with about ninety new members of the house, and with a large proportion of the membership supporting the government, I can readily understand that there must be many members who are anxious to have more to do. It is difficult for a party with a hundred and ninety members to provide subject matter for discussion for the ordinary member. Every member, no matter in what part of the house he sits, has a responsibility to discharge to his constituents. They have sent him here for a specific purpose, namely, to do his part, along with the other members, in providing good government for Canada. Under a system such as I have suggested, I believe these members would find a way in which they could use their respective talents. It would make members feel they were part and parcel of the parliament of Canada, and not simply listening members for ninety-nine per cent of the time that parliament is in session. There should be something more for a member to do than just to sit and listen. He ought to have an opportunity of participating in the actual work of parliament, and it is for that reason I have made my suggestion.

I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has given consideration to calling a meeting of external affairs committee for the purpose of considering the estimates of that department. His answer may be that he is not the officer responsible for calling the committee, but if the government intends to call the committee this year it ought to be done fairly soon, because it may be only a matter of weeks before the session concludes. I believe the committee ought to have a reasonable time to deal with the matters which will come before it.

Mr. Church: This is the second interim supply bill we have been asked for, and it simply means that we are only holding a post mortem on these expenditures. In answer to the hon. member for Peterborough West, the minister expressed the hope that all of the estimates would be passed by the end of October. Next Monday is the end of October, and here the government are asking for another bill. The businessmen of the country expected some reduction. After all, it is important to the country. We can find no reduction in the expenditures. The Auditor General has been forgotten.

I want to thank the hon. member for Temiscouata for his remarks about the former member for Davenport, Mr. MacNicol, and myself. Years ago we did support here a new system in respect to interim supply and the public accounts. The principle of the bill before the committee is simply this. It means taxation without representation, the very principle upon which the thirteen original American colonies seceded, after the Boston tea incident. I do say that the public accounts committee should have been called to inquire into these expenditures. We are only holding a coroner's inquest into them. This is the second interim supply bill this session. I say that we should have some system whereby the Auditor General, the House of Commons and the public accounts committee should exercise some control over all these expenditures. They are the forgotten people, so far as the government of Canada is concerned.

Mr. Coldwell: In this committee this afternoon we have listened to a discussion similar to others we have heard over a period of years. I would remind the committee that in 1945 or 1946 there was general agreement that some attempt should be made to refer as an experiment some of the estimates to appropriate committees in order that they might be looked into by those committees and reported to the house. The government agreed to that procedure, and so did the party which I have the honour to lead; but my recollection is that it was not agreed to by the official opposition at that time. I am glad we have had this afternoon this suggestion made by several members of the official opposition, because I feel that this is the way these estimates might be dealt with more effectively. Perhaps we can get general agreement in this chamber to try the experiment of having the estimates of some departments dealt with in this way.

While I am on my feet, may I say that the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon stated that we could elicit information from the government by way of questions. But may I point out that we do not always get information from the government by way of questions. Indeed, the answers to questions sometimes exemplify the old proverb that some people can use words to conceal their thoughts. I know that some time ago I asked a question and it was answered on October 12. The question was:

1. Did the government of Canada at any time from July 1, 1944, to July 30, 1949, make any offer to the government of Saskatchewan to help finance the trans-Canada highway on a fifty-fifty basis?

The Minister of Agriculture, from one end of that province to the other during the recent election campaign, said this had been done.

2. If so, when was the offer made, and by whom?

The answer given by the minister of reconstruction was as follows:

1. Possible bases of financial participation were indicated publicly and discussed between ministers of the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan.
2. Answered by No. 1.

Yesterday I obtained a return of all the correspondence that had taken place on this particular matter between the federal government and the provincial government. In that correspondence I can find nothing that would warrant any statement of the type which was made by the Minister of Agriculture and which I was trying to verify. So when we are told that we can elicit information from the government by way of questions, I would point out that it has been demonstrated over and over again that we do not always get the information we ask for. I think the idea put forward by the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for Eglinton, the hon. member for Peel and others is something that the house and the various groups in the house should consider and try.

I support what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said with regard to the need of assistance to the opposition groups in the way of research and so on. In these days when we have so many activities and so many complex problems to deal with, it is impossible for individual members to dig up the information that is required. The advantage that the government has in dealing with these matters is perfectly obvious. There are the ministers, the ministerial assistants, the deputies and all the departmental officials. When a question comes up for discussion in the house, or when something is likely to be dealt with in the house, the ministers have all the assistance they require to get the information together for their own purposes. That is true not only in connection with the business of the house; I think many of us have reason to know that it is also true when public matters are being discussed in the country, whether it is during an election period or between elections, that the government side of the house has had an advantage all the time with regard to information. I hope that some way can be worked out to deal with the matter. The hon. member for Lake Centre suggested a way when he spoke of what was done in the British house with respect to the discussion of estimates; that procedure is rather different from the methods that we have been discussing this afternoon, but it indicates the attempt that has been made in what we sometimes call the mother of parliaments, to see to it that the public expenditures have a thorough investigation. Out of this discussion this afternoon I hope that something constructive will result.

Mr. Graydon: May I just point out to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that I think he must be labouring under a misapprehension—

Mr. Coldwell: No, I am not.

Mr. Graydon: —on the question of the committee being set up on estimates. I think it was in the year 1942 or 1943 that I made my first speech in the house advocating that particular procedure. I remember only one member of the house, and he did not happen to be on our side, who objected to the procedure which I suggested. I have repeated that suggestion and have taken substantially the same position today. I never heard anyone in our group who opposed me on the position I took. Perhaps the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is mistaken, because on many occasions we have asked for this procedure, and I have not heard of any division on it.

Mr. MacInnis: On that point, may I point out that the opposition agreed to the abstract principle when it was raised, but when the matter was put in concrete form and the committee was offered, they refused to accept it.

Mr. Graydon: That is not true.

Mr. Coldwell: That is quite right.

Mr. Graydon: When was that?

Mr. Abbott: I have listened with a great deal of interest to this discussion, and I want to thank all those who have contributed to it for the objective way in which they have been considering the problem of an examination of the proposed public expenditures. I am not at all times in agreement with all the views expressed by my friend the hon. member for Lake Centre; but with a good many of those he has expressed today I am in agreement. I must say I do not think the House of Commons satisfactorily discharges its responsibility of examining in detail the estimates of proposed expenditures for a year. I have been here for eight or nine years now, and for seven or eight of those years I have been closely connected with the Department of Finance. As hon. members know, the estimates for the year in considerable detail are tabled in the house early in the session. If parliament commences in January, they are usually tabled by the middle of February. They set out the proposed expenditures of the government for the year. Departments are opened as rapidly as possible, but for understandable reasons there is considerable delay in getting all departments entered so that they can be discussed. Moreover, when we do come to consider the estimates themselves, my experience has been that the discussion rarely relates to the particular item of expenditure under consideration. It usually relates to agriculture in general, or to transport in general, or to something else; but it does not relate to the particular thousand-dollar item or million-dollar item which may be before the committee.

If I may say so, in my experience in the House of Commons, with only one or two rare exceptions, I have heard no suggestion made to reduce any item under consideration. That, again, is understandable. I made a statement once in the house that the only place where reductions in expenditures were made was in my office. I said that, because that is the place where treasury board meets, and where we consider the expenditures of the various departments.

I do believe that the practice of consideration of departmental estimates can be better organized than it is at the present time. My hon. friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) quite properly pointed out that the function of the committee of supply of the house, to examine proposed expenditures, is quite different from that of the public accounts committee, whose function it is to consider expenditures long after they have been made, in order to see whether or not they were properly made—and if they were not properly made to make a recommendation as to how the practice should be changed in the future.

Then, as to the suggestion that expert assistance should be made available to afford members of parliament in general, and perhaps members in opposition groups in particular, an opportunity to know what the real details of estimates are, let me say, as I said before, that the individual items and the details in the book of estimates itself are available early in the session.

I cannot speak for departments other than my own, but with respect to my own department I can say—and I feel it applies to other departments as well—that any member of parliament who asks either the minister or the permanent head of a department for information as to the details of a particular item in the estimates will receive that information.

I receive such requests fairly frequently from members—not as often as one might expect—but I do receive them, and endeavour to see that the information asked for is furnished.

So, if I may venture to offer the suggestion, I believe the remedy in great part lies with ourselves; and if we do not take up too much time debating matters other than those relating to public expenditures, and if when we do consider the estimates and restrict our discussion to the particular item before the committee, then perhaps the proposed expenditures will receive more detailed consideration than they do at the present time.

Just one final word as to the suggestion that we change the system, and that we have the estimates considered by special committees of the house. That procedure has been applied in only one case, namely in respect of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. They have been referred to a special committee.

Mr. Graydon: And those of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Abbott: That committee considers the budget of the Canadian National Railways, not the estimates. The committee on railways owned and operated by the government is each year furnished with the capital budget of the railways and, I believe, with the operating statement. But those are not estimates; they are the regular railway budget. They are not departmental estimates voted by parliament.

The only items upon which the house is bound to vote, and which are considered in special committee, are the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. I am not a member of that committee, but I am told it has proved to be a most satisfactory committee. Perhaps it has been particularly satisfactory because foreign affairs in this parliament, as in the parliament at Westminster, have been dealt with almost entirely on a strictly non-partisan basis. There is never any question of partisanship entering into a discussion of external affairs. I have been told that in considering the estimates in that committee, as has been the case in the house, not too much attention is paid to the particular item in the estimates under consideration. Perhaps under the estimate for an embassy in some European capital the discussion is likely to range over Canada's policy with respect to the United Nations, or something else of that kind. However, as I say, I am speaking only from hearsay. I am personally not satisfied that the committees system can be used generally under our British parliamentary system.

The point has been made that permanent officials should be made available before these committees to be examined as to details of expenditures. In a special case I think that is all right; but we must not lose sight of the fact that under our system the responsible minister must come to parliament, state his policy, state his items of expenditure and take the responsibility for them.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has suggested that the minister is only the echo of the deputy minister, who gives the minister the information. I think that is not a fair statement, nor is it accurate. When we are in committee of the whole considering the estimates of a department, the minister of that department will have his officials in front of him. Then, when a question comes up, we will say, in connection with the experimental farm at Lethbridge, the amount to be spent and what it will be used for, the minister may consult his deputy minister, or whoever the official may be. But the minister gives the information to the house and takes the responsibility for it.

I must confess that I believe if we were to engage in any widespread system of committees examining expenditures, and of submitting permanent civil servants to long attendance before those committees to furnish details of departmental estimates, we would find that the public service might be seriously interfered with, aside altogether from the propriety under our system of questioning permanent officials on matters of policy.

Another reason I have always felt it is not desirable to delegate to committees the responsibility which rests with the House of Commons in connection with the detailed consideration of expenditures is that every single member of the house is entitled to look at the expenditures and to ask questions with respect to them. That is the traditional right of any member of parliament. I do not think we can delegate that right to any committee.

I am not saying that for certain special types of expenditures or special public services it might not be desirable, as obtains in connection with the estimates for the Department of External Affairs, to have the estimates in such cases referred to appropriate committees for consideration. However, I do not think that that can be accepted as a substitute for the general consideration which should be given in committee of the whole.

I was impressed by the suggestion made the other day by the hon. member for Peel that, in arranging for the introduction of departments, such departments should be entered as promptly as possible, and that the items for administration of as many departments as possible should be called in fairly early rotation, so that a general discussion could take place with respect to several departments in the early stages of the session. Admittedly many of the items appearing in departmental estimates do not call for extensive consideration. But if, instead of taking up eight or ten days in committee of supply to consider the estimates of one department, we were to alternate with others, I think it would be a better system. For that reason I would thoroughly agree with the views expressed the other night and repeated today.

I believe this has been a most helpful discussion. Hon. members who have presented their views have done so in a wholly objective manner. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has stated frankly that he does not place the blame on any party or group, and that this was a matter concerning which the responsibility rested with parliament. That is a view which I share completely, and I believe if we will all co-operate we can improve upon our present system of considering estimates and expenditures.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words in connection with just one of the matters raised during this discussion. In doing so I wish to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre with respect to supplying of expert assistance to opposition groups to help us in our scrutiny of the estimates.

The minister's reply to that suggestion was that it is possible for any of us at any time to go to any department and obtain the information we might seek. I would confirm the statement he has made. I have done it many times myself—indeed I believe some of the best speeches I have made in the house have been those in connection with which I have obtained all the necessary information from government departments. I can think of one particularly when I spoke about old age pensions,—and I have spoken on that subject many times—in which the research was done at my request by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I found it quite useful and I know the same thing could be done in other departments. There is quite a difference between going to a department to ask for information or research and going to try to get someone in the department to tell you that certain things are wrong with the department. I do not think the employees in the minister's department would feel called upon to do that.

Mr. Abbott: I would hope not.

Mr. Mitchell: Page Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Coldwell: All right.

Mr. Abbott: That is the function of the opposition, not the civil service.

Mr. Knowles: There is the answer right there. The minister hopes that the employees in his department would not do that.

Mr. Abbott: They are under no obligation to do so.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Labour said that that is the function of the opposition.

Mr. Mitchell: All I said was, "Page Mr. Douglas".

Mr. Knowles: All we are suggesting is that members of the opposition should have some assistance in doing their job. I hope the minister will give further consideration to that suggestion.

Mr. Abbott: I understand it is the intention again this year to refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to hear the Minister of Finance say that it is intended to refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the standing committee on external affairs for review.

I should like to make one or two brief comments on the observations of the minister with regard to the conduct of affairs in the committee on external affairs and in committee of supply. The minister said that it was not proper for members of the house to delegate their responsibility, and I take it that he meant to a committee. There has never been any suggestion that any member of the House of Commons was delegating his responsibility to that committee when the estimates of that department were referred to it. The estimates were referred to the committee after there had been some opening discussion in the house and what the committee did was to sift the items. I wish to say to the minister that I do not think the information to which he referred as hearsay is accurate. Certainly it is not complete because in that committee—I speak from personal experience because I have been a member of it since its beginning—there has been a detailed review of every item. Information was asked for by members of the committee and supplied by the departmental officials. Breakdowns of the items were supplied and we were given information as to expenditures in previous years. With the figures right in front of us we were in a position to compare the proposed expenditure with the actual expenditure in the previous year. As I say, the committee carried on the task of sifting. When the items came back to the house there was no restriction on the right of any member to obtain whatever information he thought he should obtain. But considerable information had been obtained already and considerable time of the house was saved by the work done in that committee.

In this connection I should like to call attention to a specific recommendation made to the house in 1947 by the public accounts committee. I have already mentioned the fact that the Auditor General made lengthy and detailed recommendations on this subject with the view of ensuring that the House of Commons would carry out its traditional responsibility to review proposed expenditures before voting supply. The Minister of Finance has drawn attention to the distinctive functions of the public accounts committee. It does review expenditures, but unfortunately that review cannot be made until at least a year and a half after the expenditures have been made. The work of reviewing estimates is an entirely different matter. It was with that in mind and after hearing the Auditor General that the public accounts committee made a recommendation to be found at page 551 of the proceedings of the committee for 1947. This recommendation reads as follows:

> Your committee is also of the opinion that the government should explore the desirability of establishing a standing committee on estimates.

Let us be frank about this matter. If one committee is charged with the responsibility of reviewing the estimates of all departments it will have a heavy task to perform. There are limits to the time that an hon. member can devote to a committee, but it seems to me that that recommendation at least points to the direction in which the house must proceed in modernizing its procedure if a really serious attempt is to be made to discharge our responsibilities as members of the House of Commons in the voting of public money.

Much could be done, and the Auditor General has pointed this out, to improve the form in which estimates are presented to the house. At the present time the information given in the volume of estimates is of only two kinds. There is the proposed expenditure or estimate for the current year which the government asks the house to vote, and then in the second column is shown the amount which was voted by parliament in the previous year.

Mr. Abbott: And the details at the back of the book.

Mr. Fleming: I am referring to the nature of the information. The details given in the later pages are of the item to be voted but nowhere in the volume is there information as to the actual expenditure in the preceding year. Surely that is the sort of guide that hon. members need to assist them in deciding how much should be voted for a particular item for the current year. It should not be too difficult to get that information. The Auditor General recommended that that information should be given in the printed volume of estimates. He pointed out that it would save much time by eliminating the asking of questions about actual expenditures.

Mr. Abbott: In my experience it has seldom been possible at the time the estimates are printed to have available the actual expenditures in the preceding year. My hon. friend will appreciate that the estimates for the fiscal year are usually prepared in November or December. As a matter of fact I am writing to the departments today asking them to have their departmental estimates in for consideration by the treasury board by the end of November. However, they are seldom finalized, if I may use that word, until the middle of January. It is not always possible to have available at that time the actual expenditures in the previous year, but that information is almost invariably available when the item comes up for consideration in committee.

Mr. Fleming: I had that point in mind and I was just going to speak about it. The suggestion was made that as the printed volume was prepared toward the end of the fiscal year it would be possible at that time to give actual expenditures for eight or nine months of the fiscal year, with an estimate of anticipated expenditure for the balance of the year. That was also discussed in the public accounts committee.

Then with regard to obtaining information in the committee of supply, I have had some experience with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare for several years. In an earnest attempt to save the time of the committee I asked the minister —this is a matter of record, at least for 1947 and 1948 and for other years as well—when the first item was under consideration to supply the committee with a breakdown of expenditures in the preceding year. With that information it would not have been necessary to ask questions on each individual item. However, each time I have been met with a firm refusal by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I was forced to take up time on each item to ask for the corresponding expenditure in the preceding fiscal year. I say that was a ridiculous waste of time. There is no reason at all why a minister, coming before the committee of supply with his estimates, should not be in a position at the very outset to supply the committee with a complete statement of the actual expenditures of the previous fiscal year item by item. That will save the committee of supply much time.

I should like to refer to two of the recommendations of the Auditor General to be found at page 429 of the proceedings of the public accounts committee of 1947. The second recommendation is in these words:

> There may have been a time when the committee of supply minutely examined estimate items, but demands now made on the time of the House of Commons are such that complete examination of estimates is impracticable. Estimates should now be presented in such a form that members do not have to guess purposes to which votes will be applied.

In his third recommendation he says:

> It is suggested that, instead of members of parliament having to seek explanations from ministers, "details" printed with the estimates should be in narrative form, setting out (a) the objects and purposes of the items; (b) explanations of increases; (c) the acts, if any, which will regulate application; (d) the anticipated revenues; (e) comparisons with previous years, and (f) such other information as is necessary to permit members to familiarize themselves with the purposes and implications before items are called by the chairman of the committee of supply.

These recommendations were the product of the thought and long experience of the Auditor General, one of the most respected officials in the entire public service of Canada.

I have one final comment to make on the minister's suggestion—and I cannot refrain from calling it a bogey—that we are challenging the principle of ministerial responsibility whenever we propose that a committee of the house should be established. Surely when the committee is simply appointed by the house, has to report back to the house, and the house takes the responsibility for everything that is done, it cannot fairly be said that there is any breach of the principle of responsibility.

In this parliament above all previous parliaments it seems to me more necessary than ever that members should be afforded every opportunity to obtain information, and to see that the house, with its large government majority, functions efficiently, and that the fullest possible information is made available in order that the house may study the problems before it.

I think that will apply particularly to the voting of supply. There are nearly one hundred new members in the house, every one of whom, along with those who have been here before, will profit by additional information and in other ways from the opportunities afforded in a committee of eliciting useful information, which are not afforded in the big committee of supply with a procedure that is so clumsy, in relation to a task of this kind, as to make it impossible for us to discharge our duties properly.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I believe the discussion this afternoon has been one of the must useful that has taken place since the beginning of the session. In replying to the remarks that have been made, the Minister of Finance said that a large part of the remedy lies with the members. The whole debate has taken place on a basis that is in keeping with the importance of the subject that has been brought forward. I think we can go further, however, and say that the whole remedy lies with members of the house because this is the only place, subject to the concurrence or otherwise of another place, in which the remedy for the situation can be found.

I do not think that the discussion should be allowed to end where it is now. Many constructive suggestions have been made, and the fact that they are constructive has been shown by the response of the Minister of Finance to what has been said. There are some points which perhaps have not been sufficiently emphasized in relation to what has taken place in the last few years. The system under which the house is called upon to exercise its greatest responsibility, that of providing supply, is one that was devised for a time when expenditures authorized by the house were smaller than those of some of the individual provinces today in their own fields.

At a time when expenditures placed before the house were only a small fraction of what they are now, it may well have been possible to examine each item and to consider it in that measure of detail that is consistent with the need for actual knowledge of what the item means before it is passed, if that approval is to mean anything. The minister has said that when items come up for discussion a great deal of time may be spent upon one department, and in the case of another department spending as much or more hardly any time at all may be devoted to a number of items. There is a simple explanation for that fact. In the case of agriculture and other departments where a number of members have a ready knowledge of the type of things for which the money is appropriated, it is much easier for them to ask questions which are related to the real purpose for which the money is set aside. But with the increasingly complex requirements of government administration, and with the many completely new fields into which government has entered in the past few years, there are many items about which most members have little information from their own past experience. Consequently, without an extended cross-examination of the minister as to the details that lie behind even a very large item, it may not be possible to secure a clear picture of the purpose for which that amount is included in the estimates.

I think there is a misconception in the suggestion frequently made in the house that it is not in keeping with our parliamentary system that there should be a delegation of ministerial responsibility to committees. There is no suggestion of delegation of ministerial responsibility if a subject under consideration by the house is placed before a committee so that members of the house may have all the information they should have before they are called upon to ask the minister those questions which will bring out all the facts that the house should have before reaching a decision. On the contrary, our system implies full knowledge of all essential details in the possession of every member, whether or not he is a supporter of the government. That is the very foundation of our parliamentary system. No matter how intricate the subject may be, no matter how long it may take to obtain the essential information, our system can only function if every member of the house is able to obtain information which enables him to reach a decision with full knowledge of every relevant fact.

Now that this discussion has arisen this problem should be met and a solution found. Our whole system has advanced through examination of the procedure and developments related to the expanding responsibilities of the government and the parliament which is called upon to approve the actions of that government. There is a great difference between the public accounts committee and the examination of the estimates, which was emphasized in the first instance by the hon. member for Lake Centre when he dealt with this subject. The reports of the Auditor General themselves constitute the strongest possible argument for an improvement in our system of dealing with estimates. Year after year the Auditor General refers to some item where the procedure should have been different; and in a number of instances large and important items are referred to in a way that indicates quite clearly that hon. members were not aware of what really were the details concerning those matters. If this subject is to be dealt with effectively we must approach it on the basis of the scale of governmental responsibility today, and seek to find a solution that will make it possible for hon. members to fulfil their responsibilities and also to avoid unnecessary debate, which could be eliminated if the necessary facts could be obtained in another way. One of the most important problems facing this parliament is to find a way of shortening its sessions, without in any way limiting opportunities for debate. It will become increasingly difficult for men and women across Canada to offer themselves as candidates for parliament if the sittings of this house continue to increase in length year by year. The effective use of committees of the house is one way in which the session could be shortened, at the same time permitting parliament to discharge its duties more efficiently. If these estimates were referred to the committees whose activities relate to their subject matter, there would be no delegation of ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Abbott: I said a delegation of parliamentary responsibility, not ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Drew: There was a time when we mentioned ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Abbott: I did not mean to suggest that it was a delegation of ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Drew: Then let me say there would be no delegation of parliamentary responsibility, because the very existence of the committees indicates quite clearly that their activities have never been regarded as a delegation of parliamentary responsibility. This whole system of committees is embedded in our parliamentary system, and has been for many years; and the purpose for which committees have been provided is to give hon. members an opportunity to obtain information that will facilitate and expedite the business of the house. If a committee dealt with the estimates of a particular department and the experts and departmental officials were brought before that committee, with plenty of time at their disposal the members of the committee, representing both sides of the house, could obtain essential information in a way that is not possible here in the house, where a member may only ask questions of the minister. Then the minister quite frankly finds it necessary to lean over and ask his departmental officials for the answer. He is given that answer either orally or on a slip of paper, and that limited information is what comes back to the member.

Let us not pretend that this system is nearly as satisfactory as one under which members from both sides of the house could ask appropriate officials exactly what is involved. I want to emphasize that I do not think anyone on this side has been suggesting that such questioning should relate to whether the officials think the department could be better operated or better run, but certainly those who are called upon to discuss these questions have the same right as the government itself to know whether there might be an alternative method of presenting these figures, whether they could be presented in simpler form, or whether they could be placed before the house in a way that would provide more information. That is the sort of questions that might be asked. When that information was obtained the various details could be secured which would make it possible for those members in turn to be fully prepared to come into the house and deal with the estimates in a way that would save time here.

As was pointed out, the estimates of the Department of Agriculture take a very long time. Probably they would take a very short time if the committee had the opportunity of examining them in advance. Hon. members belonging to that committee could obtain the information they require, and then would be able to present their opinions as to what should be done and, of course, in the general discussion of the estimates they would offer suggestions as to how the administration of the department could be improved or changed.

We must remember that the public accounts committee can only deal with accounts which are practically two years old. What is essential here is that hon. members be placed in a position where, with equal efficiency, they can deal with the items they are required to pass upon, concerning future expenditure. As has been pointed out on a number of occasions, there is a great difference between our system and that of the United States. However, we can perhaps consider what happens there, because they are handling enormous sums of money. All their estimates do go before committees, where they are subject to the most searching examination.

Mr. Abbott: They come from committees.

Mr. Drew: And they come from committees.

Mr. Abbott: They originate in committees; that is the difference.

Mr. Drew: There is a difference in the system. They do not, Mr. Chairman, originate with the committee, they originate with the officials who place the estimates before the committee. Then the committee deals with the estimates, after which they go to congress. They originate in the very same place that they originate here.

Under our system, the minister takes the responsibility of presenting the figures that have been prepared by his officials. In the United States the officials prepare the figures in precisely the same way, and hand them to the committee without having them dignified by the formality of being put forward by the minister.

Mr. Abbott: In the United States, there is not responsible government; that is the fundamental difference.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that difference, but in the end we come back to the responsibility of the minister. We must remember that, as the minister himself has pointed out, we are talking about the responsibility of parliament as well. We have not only a system of responsible government, but we have a system of responsible parliament and that also is different from the United States system. Under our system of a responsible parliament, just as under our system of responsible government, there is that essential difference. In the end, however, we must assume the responsibility; in one case, the minister for presenting the figures, and in the other case, the members for passing them.

Under our system of responsible government, the minister has the opportunity of asking each official any detail that he wants. Every member of this house, Mr. Chairman, has a duty to have every essential fact before he passes upon the figures that have been presented by the minister. With the tremendous expenditures that are now put before us, there is no way in which this house will be able to deal effectively with this subject, unless some procedure is devised by which essential information may be obtainable which is not made available in this house. I repeat that we have not an opportunity of examining the experts. The experts are here to advise the minister, as quickly as possible and as comprehensibly as possible, in regard to questions that are asked on the floor of the house. That procedure does not elicit the information which each of us should be able to get.

Now, as an alternative method of obtaining information from departmental officials, which was partly implied by the minister, I feel sure that legitimate objection would be raised if a constant unorganized effort were made to obtain this kind of information. It would create confusion. I am not suggesting for one moment that there is any desire to prevent the members obtaining the information. One could easily imagine, however, the confusion that would result if, according to their own whim, any one of the members at any time attempted to detach officials from a department for the purpose of conducting his own inquiry into those accounts. It could create confusion which might impair the efficiency of any department.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the discussion that has taken place this afternoon indicates that now is the time to tackle this problem. The minister admits that we have passed the time when the older system fully meets our requirements. Many of the members have made it quite clear that they do not believe they can obtain the information they should have in this way. Above all, there is a necessity for using another system to shorten the inquiry which takes place in this house, and which in many cases is lengthened simply because of the system we now have.

While it is not possible to put this forward in the form of a motion, in view of the statement made by the minister that the answer rests with ourselves, I do urge that he give immediate consideration to the advisability of setting up a small select committee of this house to consider and recommend an improved procedure for examining and dealing with estimates of expenditures placed before this house. If that is done, then the work of the minister as well as the work of the members will be facilitated and we shall have started back towards a responsible parliamentary system. It is all very well for us to talk about a responsible parliamentary system, but the test of our responsibility is the extent to which we pass supply with knowledge of those facts that assure that we have accepted our responsibility.

Mr. Abbott: I just want to make one comment in connection with my hon. friend's remarks. I know that the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) wants to say something. In part, what I had in mind when I said the remedy lies with ourselves was that, before we go too far in changing our system, I would appeal to the hon. members to make use of what already exists. In this book of estimates which I hold in my hand, there are over two hundred pages in fine print. Those pages contain details, rather specific and comprehensive details, of the various services. Before I was a parliamentary assistant and before I was a minister, I was a private member. I am free to confess that even for those departments in which I was interested, I never took the time or trouble to examine any of the details of an item until that item came up in the house. Perhaps I was an exception, but I do not think so.

I believe it is fair to say that the majority of members, through pre-occupation with other important matters, do not spend a great deal of time studying this volume which is tabled every year about February 15. I agree with my hon. friend that if every member of parliament went haphazardly to the heads of the different departments and requested specific information about every item, it would mean a very heavy burden on the department. If any member of parliament, however, takes any single item in this book of estimates and, after examining the detail in the back of the book, desires further detailed information about that item, I can assure him that the departmental officials will give him every bit of information that they give to the minister of the department concerned. That does not mean, of course, that there will be time available in the house for the careful, detailed consideration that perhaps some members would want to give. I simply say this: do not let us condemn the system or the lack of information until we organize our own debates so as to facilitate the discussion and as long as we fail to make use of the information which is available.

Mr. Fraser: I see the Minister of Labour has just come in, and I wish to take one item in his department to illustrate something that I have said a number of times in this house. The estimates do not give the full details for any department. Even if you look in the section for the department concerned, you cannot find all the expenditures of that department.

Although the Minister of Labour is responsible for unemployment insurance, we have to go to the public works department to find added figures with regard to the unemployment insurance commission. It is quite a chore to go through all these items to find the details for one item. There is page after page for buildings that are rented by the Department of Public Works in the province of Ontario, which are put at the disposal of the Minister of Labour. The Department of Public Works pays for the construction of those buildings in some cases, the improvements, repairs, rents, salaries of cleaners, furnace men, the coal, water, light and elevators; everything in connection with the building. Those amounts, however, are not chalked up against the Department of Labour. If our estimates and our accounts were run in the way a business company would run them, we would not have estimates in this style. We would have estimates that would be easy to read and that any businessman could check easily on the minister's items alone instead of having to go to other sections.

I notice under unemployment insurance you go all down the line, Fort William, Galt, Gananoque, Gloucester township and so on, page after page. After checking for other items, in Ontario alone there is almost $600,000 extra that we have to check into in the unemployment insurance section of the minister's department. The minister shakes his head.

Mr. Mitchell: I will answer the question if my hon. friend wants me to.

Mr. Fraser: I believe I am right. I am something like the Minister of Finance. I have not gone into all these details.

Mr. Abbott: Why go into all the details now? I was thinking of when I was a private member.

Mr. Fraser: The minister goes into all the details now because it is his responsibility. When he was a private member of the government party he said, Let the minister do it, not me. But in opposition it is different. We want to catch the minister on something that is wrong.

Mr. Abbott: You cannot do that. That is attempting to achieve the impossible.

Mr. Fraser: The minister stated that in few cases have members asked for a reduction. I am one of those who have. I see that the Minister of Labour wants to get to his feet.

Mr. Mitchell: No, I do not. But I will answer my hon. friend.

Mr. Fraser: I have here the public works estimates, and in them, all the way down, one thing will be noticed. Let us take Toronto alone.

Mr. Abbott: Before the termites got there?

Mr. Fraser: Yes, this was before the termites got there. They have there a number of buildings. A number of them are unemployment insurance commission buildings, and so it runs. Here is one building, $58,000. But that is not in the minister's own estimates for that department. If the minister wants to answer me, I will give him the opportunity.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member for Peterborough West is talking as a businessman, and I appreciate that fact; and I think he will agree with me that most government businesses are run in reverse, even the restaurant.

Mr. Fraser: Unbusinesslike.

Mr. Mitchell: There you get a $2 meal for 75 cents. I do not go there often.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Mitchell: For obvious reasons. I will let the hon. member draw his own conclusion.

Mr. Abbott: To keep your girlish figure.

Mr. Mitchell: May I say this to my hon. friend. I think all hon. members will agree that my organization co-operates with all hon. members to the best of its ability.

Mr. Fraser: Yes. I made no reflection at all.

Mr. Mitchell: I understand that. If my hon. friend were a businessman, he would perhaps dictate a memorandum to one of his staff if he wanted to get some information. As to my department, that is all you have to do. You do not even have to put a stamp on the letter. You do not have to write a long letter. You just have to say that you want to know what is going on in Peterborough, and we will tell you. It is just as simple as that. Might I also say this to my hon. friend. It is estimated that every minute this House of Commons is in session it costs $60. I think his little speech will be chalked up as expenses against the city of Peterborough unemployment insurance. I do not say that in a critical sense. My hon. friend and all other members can rest assured that as to my department—and I am sure the same is true of every other department—if you want information in advance, we will get it for you. If you write to the wrong department, we will see to it that the letter is sent to the right department. We cannot be any fairer than that.

Mr. Fraser: I asked for a little bit of information, Mr. Chairman, but the minister got to his feet and never answered my question at all. He got off on the wrong track. He switched back on something and he chalked up some money against me. I do not know what it is, but I figure that the time the minister took will also be chalked up against him; and he has taken more time in this chamber than I have. But I am asking the Minister of Finance now if he does not think that the whole estimates of a department should be put down in the book of estimates for that department and not spread out by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Abbott: I will answer my hon. friend in this way. It is not necessarily an argument that it is right, but for a great many years the Department of Public Works has acted as the government landlord, as it were. It has purchased buildings, maintained them and repaired them for other departments. That has been one of the traditional functions of the Department of Public Works. I think that in some cases—and my colleague the Minister of Public Works will correct me if I am wrong—there is included in the departmental estimates an item to reimburse the Department of Public Works for expenditures which are made on behalf of that department. Offhand, I cannot answer whether that is the case with the unemployment insurance commission but I am inclined to think that it is.

Mr. Fraser: I could not find it.

Mr. Abbott: Possibly we should make some changes in that system. That is the sort of thing I should be glad to consider. I have listened with interest to the opinions expressed here, and I should be glad to discuss with the comptroller of the treasury and the departmental officials whether the method of set-up of the accounts can be changed to make them more clearly understandable. In fairness to my own department and to my own officials, I want to say that I am convinced that the public accounts today are presented in a clear and comprehensive fashion. In my personal experience I have had a good deal to do with seeing to the presentation of accounts; and as public accounts go, I think the public accounts of Canada are clearly presented and clearly understandable. That does not mean that they are perfect. It does not mean that there cannot be made changes which would make them clearer still. In answer to my hon. friend with respect to public works items, I can simply tell him, what he well knows, that that has been the method, probably since confederation, of presenting these figures.

Mr. Fraser: I understand that. But during the first years of confederation little money was spent. It was a matter of only a few million dollars. Now the figures are up into the billions, and I really believe that a change should be made. I mention the fact that the Department of Public Works takes care of a number of other departments but at the same time the treasury officers of the Department of Public Works are paid for by the Department of Finance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That applies to other departments.

Mr. Fraser: That applies to the other departments; but because of the fact that it applies to the other departments, it does not at the same time give a true picture of any department because a number of officials in each department are paid for by a different department. I feel that even those treasury officers should be charged up to the proper department.

Mr. Abbott: I will answer my hon. friend in this way. He is dealing with an accounting matter, namely the provision of treasury officers in the Department of Public Works or in any other department. They are in effect performing the functions of internal auditors, and in an ordinary commercial corporation they would be charged up to the corporation.

Mr. Fraser: That is right.

Mr. Abbott: But in this case the corporation is the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Fraser: That is right.

Mr. Abbott: In a private corporation the internal audit in the sales department or in the manufacturing department is not necessarily charged up to that department as such. It is probably charged up to general overhead because that is what in fact it is. I am not an expert accountant, although I have considerable knowledge of accountancy. As I say, there may be a clearer way of presenting these estimates, but I do not think it is misleading to have the treasury officers who perform the function in the Department of Public Works charged up to that department and the treasury officers in the other departments charged up to those departments. It all comes back to the same place in the end, that is, to the taxpayers of Canada generally. As long as the system is understood by those who are considering it, I do not think there can be a great deal of misunderstanding on that point.

Mr. Green: Does the Minister of Finance not think that a greater use could be made of the public accounts committee? We have an Auditor General who is exceptionally capable, one of the senior officials of the government, who reports—

Mr. Abbott: To parliament.

Mr. Green: And he reports directly to parliament. Each year he brings down a very comprehensive report, in my opinion a report which is well worthy of study. Then nothing happens. I think once or twice that report has been referred to the public accounts committee; but the discussion in committee has been more or less at random, and certainly not undertaken in a thorough way.

It does seem to me that is one of the great weaknesses in our system of checking expenditures. I realize that in the past the public accounts committee has been used as a political committee. I remember different questions being referred to it—such as the Bren gun inquiry, in which I took part myself. Then, there have been conducted by that committee other inquiries which were political in their nature.

But it does seem to me there is work of a non-political nature which could be done by that committee, namely carefully reviewing the report of the Auditor General. There are 50 members on the public accounts committee, and if they were given the opportunity to review the public accounts they would acquire a pretty fair knowledge of the expenses incurred by the government. They would be able to make many suggestions which would help cut expenditures, and improve our whole method of conducting the business of the country.

As the minister knows, the government has never willingly given the public accounts committee any work.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend allow me to answer at this point?

Mr. Green: I suggest the minister himself might well take the lead in asking the public accounts committee to go over the report of the Auditor General.

Mr. Abbott: I want to answer the hon. member on that, because I think unintentionally he has not been quite fair. This matter of the public accounts committee is one place in which parliament, as distinct from the government, can exercise its responsibility.

As my hon. friend knows, the public accounts committee is a standing committee of the House of Commons, and it is open to any member to ask that the committee be called together. And so far as I am aware—and this is certainly true since I have been Minister of Finance—no government has refused, or been reluctant to move to have the public accounts for a particular year referred to that committee. I know that, without the slightest fear of successful contradiction. I assert now that this is the place where parliament, as distinct from the government, can exercise its responsibility.

The Auditor General is an officer of the House of Commons, and the public accounts committee is a standing committee of the house. It is open to my hon. friend or to any other member to ask that that committee be set up and organized, and that the public accounts be referred to it—and I personally would be very happy, and have always been very happy, to refer the public accounts to that committee.

Mr. Green: I was trying to be helpful. I was not criticizing the minister.

Mr. Abbott: What is that?

Mr. Green: I was not trying in any way to be critical of the minister.

Mr. Abbott: But the point is that it is not the responsibility of the minister to ask that the public accounts committee be organized, or that the public accounts of Canada be referred to that committee. That is the responsibility of members of parliament.

Mr. Green: But there is quite a difference between any private member asking that the public accounts committee be called, and then going into that committee without being in a position to see that an effective check is made of the public accounts, and the government calling that committee together. The government has a great majority on every committee. What I was suggesting is that it should take the lead in arranging that the public accounts be considered by that committee. If the minister does not wish to do it that way, then perhaps it could be done by getting the leaders of the different parties in the house together, and having them agree that the public accounts be referred to the public accounts committee, and an attempt made to go carefully into the statement of the Auditor General.

I am confident the results would be beneficial to the minister himself, if that kind of check were kept on expenditures. It would also give private members of the house who served on the committee a much better knowledge of the way government business is carried on in Canada; and I believe that eventually, within a year or two, the result would be that members of the house generally would be far more proficient when considering estimates. However, that is only a suggestion.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps my hon. friend and I have been talking at cross purposes. Let me make myself clear. The Minister of Finance has a great many responsibilities; but the responsibility for the calling together of the committee on public accounts and referring to that committee the public accounts of Canada is not one of them.

It is open to any member of the house to ask that the committee be called together. The Minister of Finance has not the slightest objection to having the accounts of the past year or of any other year referred to that committee, and would willingly facilitate that procedure. But I repeat that it is not his responsibility.

Mr. Green: Can the minister suggest a way in which this could be worked out effectively? I understand his position is that he personally does not feel he should have to do it. But surely there should be some way in which it could be worked out?

Mr. Abbott: I am not an expert on procedure, but I believe I did suggest a way. The hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman), is perfectly well aware of what has to be done to have the public accounts committee brought together. And, as I have said, the minister will facilitate in every way the consideration of the report of the Auditor General before that committee.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: If it is done in the way in which the minister suggests, then that means that the opposition will be considered to be walking into that public accounts committee looking for a fight.

Mr. Abbott: Not necessarily.

Mr. Green: And the government members would come to the committee prepared to put up a defence. Other parties in opposition would be considered as also looking for trouble. Of course that is the wrong attitude in which to get results in the committee. What I am suggesting is that a warlike committee—and warlike committees have their points—is not the most effective. A businesslike committee would be more desirable. Certainly we could not have the committee meeting in a businesslike frame of mind if it must be called together by some member of the opposition demanding such action.

Mr. Fraser: I believe it was the former prime minister who said only a few years ago that any member could call the public accounts committee together, but on his own responsibility—and he stressed that feature.

Mr. Abbott: If I may just intervene again—let us try to have this clear: The public accounts committee is a standing committee of the House of Commons. I quite agree with the hon. member that when it is examining public accounts it should not be functioning with the attitude of a fishing expedition or a scandal-finding committee. It should be attempting to work in a constructive and objective way.

If, as I suggested, the Whips were to get together—and that is what I meant in my suggestion when I referred to the hon. member's colleague from Grenville-Dundas—the desired result could be accomplished of calling the committee together.

Perhaps it is an unfortunate coincidence that the public accounts committee seldom sits, with the exception of sessions preceding elections. I do not know why that is so—probably in the past it has always been in the hope of uncovering something to discredit the government of the day. I agree that that is not the way in which the work of the committee should be approached. But I repeat that it is a committee of the house and not a committee of the government. It is not the responsibility of the government to initiate a reference to the committee on public accounts.

The government, and I speak only in my capacity as the Minister of Finance, responsible for the accounts, will co-operate in every way for a proper consideration of the accounts before the public accounts committee—and so far as I am concerned, I will make it as non-partisan as possible. But I wish to make clear what the legal and practical situation is.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra touched upon a point I mentioned when I spoke as the second speaker in this debate. I am at a loss to understand how we can accomplish what he would like to do. He says that these accounts would be examined in a non-partisan or non-political spirit. While it is desirable, with the composition of this or any other house being as it is, I submit that that is quite impossible. If the hon. member means anything he means that the opposition will not look for anything, that they will just go over the accounts; they will not be looking to see if expenditures have been properly made or if expenditures have been made that should not have been made. If any such expenditure has been made, the government is not going to try to prevent the facts coming out. That is not being realistic about the matter. I agree that there is no difficulty in getting any standing committee set up, but if the public accounts committee is going to examine accounts in the way the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has mentioned, several things will have to be done. Perhaps one thing would be to have the committee composed fifty-fifty of government and opposition members. There might be difficulty there because that is not the way the other committees are set up, but if it is the intention to examine these accounts without fear or favour perhaps that is the first thing that will have to be done.

Mr. Green: Does the hon. member not think that private members on the government side of the house who were on a committee of that type would be just as ready as an opposition member to point out where they thought mistakes had been made? The hon. member is taking it for granted that the government members are all going to try to hide everything.

Mr. MacInnis: If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will tell me what the purpose is of the inquiry in the public accounts committee then I will say whether or not I think private members on the government side will be as anxious as he is to bring out everything.

Mr. Green: Check the auditor general's report.

Mr. MacInnis: I cannot see members on the government side trying to find out if there is anything wrong with expenditures that have been made. I think that is asking too much.

An hon. Member: That would be a miracle.

Mr. MacInnis: That would be a miracle and that kind of miracle does not happen. If the proceedings of the public accounts committee do not give a true picture then it is up to the opposition to bring out the facts. As I said before, we might as well be realistic about it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well if we could get back to what the discussion was really upon this afternoon, the voting of interim supply. Growing out of the discussion of interim supply the hon. member for Lake Centre in a clear and extremely useful proposal pointed out that it would be highly desirable if in examining the estimates we were able to adopt a procedure similar to the efficient system employed in Westminster. It was suggested that we would then be able to prepare ourselves to consider the estimates and assume our responsibility for supply. We would then have before us the essential facts which we should have before us before accepting our responsibilities. It was in relation to that proposal and the suggestion for improving the system of examining our estimates and assuming our responsibilities for supply that I proposed to the minister the consideration of setting up a select committee to consider the improvement of our system for examining these estimates before we pass upon them and to make recommendations thereon.

I realize that the subject of the public accounts committee has also been under discussion, but I do not think we should confuse the two things. The public accounts committee deals with what has passed, and what has considerably passed. It is important that we should deal with that. So that there may be no doubt about our position, we propose to insist upon the calling of the public accounts committee at the next session when we will be able to deal with exactly the same accounts that we would deal with this session. That is why we are not insisting upon the calling of the public accounts committee during this autumn session.

Mr. Abbott: I think the hon. member is quite right. We would not have time to go into them at this session and we can do the same thing at the next session.

Mr. Drew: The only reason we are not asking for the calling of the public accounts committee is that the last public accounts that are available are those presented by the Auditor General up to March 31, 1948.

Mr. Abbott: I announced the other day that the new ones are in the hands of the king's printer.

Mr. Drew: We will be able to deal with the accounts that are before us now during the next session. Having said that, and having supported what has been said by other members in regard to the desirability of a wider use of the public accounts committee, I emphasize that my proposal for the setting up of a select committee did not relate to the public accounts but to the examination of the estimates so that we might be really prepared to assume the greatest responsibility that we are called upon to assume as members.

When the Minister of Finance says that at the back of this book are a number of pages containing details, and suggests that perhaps we do not examine those details, I think hon. members will recall that when estimates were under examination before hon. members displayed a considerable knowledge of the details. It is the necessity of going behind those details that we are discussing. No one has suggested any impropriety in the form; what is being suggested is that there should be an easy and workable method by which essential information can be obtained.

Let us take one example, the Department of National Defence estimates for the equipment and supplies required by that department. Under broad reference in each department expenditures of some $218 million are provided for. No one can tell by examining those items what are the essential details, and yet these items equal the total expenditures by the government of Canada a comparatively few years ago. All that is suggested is that we find some mechanism by which hon. members can in an orderly way, and assuming their responsibilities for supply, find out what the details are so that when they come into the house the items can be discussed with full knowledge. It was in relation to that suggestion and only to that suggestion that I made the proposal for a select committee.

Mr. Bater: Possibly as a new member I should not get up on this occasion, but I have listened to the statements made this afternoon, some of which have indicated that hon. members think the sessions should be shortened. I say now that I will not go back to my constituency and say that I am in favour of more business of parliament being done in some of the little anterooms in this building. I contend that open discussions in this chamber are the very pillars of democracy. The very essence of our parliamentary system lies in the fact that we have the right to say: Mr. Speaker—or Mr. Chairman—we would like to know this or that, or we believe this or that. With these four galleries around us, I maintain that this chamber is the place in which to transact most of the nation's business. I quite agree that possibly there should be adopted some method whereby we can become more rapidly familiar with the operations of the various departments, but I think each party can make a start by instituting study groups if they wish to acquaint new members with the workings of the different departments of government. It is suggested that the proposed plan will shorten the sessions of parliament, but let me say that at times the percentage of attendance has not been very high in some quarters of the house since the session began. Perhaps they want a still shorter session. I would not like to see the system changed so that more would be done in committees and less in the house.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, my colleagues and I are fully prepared to support the proposal that a committee be set up for the purpose of endeavouring to determine more effective methods of dealing with the estimates. We quite properly disagree, however, that we should guess, as it were, what the possible outcome might be of such action. It has been indicated this afternoon that all the estimates should be referred to committees of the house. Naturally we hold individual opinions as to the result of such an action. Personally I find it extremely difficult to agree that, by referring all the estimates to various committees, satisfactory results would be obtained. I think of the multitude of new committees that would have to be set up. I think of committees sitting concurrently and making it utterly impossible for an individual member to attend all of them, or even to attend when matters of special interest to him were being considered. I can conceive of such committees sitting morning, afternoon and night in order to accomplish their purpose.

Some emphasis has been laid on the necessity of shortening our sessions. I am not quite so certain that that should be our objective. In my opinion the objective should be greater efficiency, and not necessarily shorter sessions. Of course, if the two could be achieved in one move that would be fine, but those of us who have been here for a considerable period of time realize that we really move swiftly during the last month of any session of parliament. Will any hon. member say that our most effective work is done during that period or that the word "efficiency" would be a proper one to associate with our actions at that time?

With respect to the information that is available in connection with the estimates, I would be the first to admit that there is far more information available than I have made use of. Agriculture was referred to this afternoon. I am not unmindful of the fact that, quite apart from the details of the agricultural estimates that are supplied, we have the report of the Department of Agriculture, and we also have detailed information as to the operation of such activities as P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. Personally I think there is a good deal of information available if we avail ourselves of it. I would hasten to add that there are a number of things that could quite properly be referred to committees, but speaking for myself I cannot see that efficiency or satisfaction will result from referring all our estimates to the various committees that exist now, or that may be created at some future time.

Mr. Abbott: I want to conclude by saying that I think we have had a most helpful discussion. I do not think members of the committee expect me to express any specific views as to the different suggestions that have been made, but I shall be very glad to consider, between now and the next session, what the government might do to expedite the efficient study of the estimates. I think with the co-operation of all parties we should be able to effect some improvement in our system.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1950, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $114,516,603.83, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items, except items 43, 419 and 452, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950.

2. The sum of $5,012,437.50, being three-twelfths of the amount of item 559 as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950;

3. The sum of $2,446,984.33, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items, except item 681, as set forth in the supplementary estimates (Newfoundland) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950;

4. The sum of $5,876,758.33, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items as set forth in the further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950; and

5. The sum of $2,302,500, being nine-twelfths of items 779 and 935 of the further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950.

Ways and Means

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 118, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1950.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—$114,516,603.83 granted for 1949-50.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear, is it not, that in no case have we yet passed twelve-twelfths of any single item?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. The highest proportion is eleven-twelfths in certain special items which I have indicated. The total being voted under this bill will be $130,155,283.99.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the minister the same question I asked before, changing only the month. Does he expect to have all the estimates through by the end of November?

Mr. Abbott: I have never assumed the qualities of a prophet, but I am hopeful that we will be nearing the end of this session, if not at the end of it, by the end of November, and I would hope that by that time the estimates will have been passed and the final appropriation bill put through the house.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SUGGESTED ADVISABILITY OF INTRODUCING A DECLARATION OF RIGHTS

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights to assure amongst other rights:

1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of parliament;

2. That habeas corpus shall not be abrogated or suspended except by parliament;

3. That no one shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, and in no case by order in council;

4. That no tribunal or commission shall have the power to compel the giving of evidence by any one who is denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards;

And that as a preliminary step the Minister of Justice do submit for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to degree to which fundamental freedoms of religion, speech and of the press and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the individual are matters of federal or provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should point out that this resolution may be out of order on the same grounds as the resolutions previously moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). The first portion of the resolution contains these words:

—immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of introducing a bill or declaration of rights—

This, of course, does not constitute an instruction to the government. However, I would ask hon. members to look at the last paragraph of the resolution. The words "immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of" do not apply to or govern the concluding portion of the motion, which requires unconditionally that as a preliminary step the Minister of Justice shall submit a question to the Supreme Court of Canada. This purports to convey a direct order to the government to do something which could not be done without an expenditure of public money. I would think the first part of the resolution would be in order, but in my opinion the latter part would be out of order; and if part of a resolution is out of order the whole resolution is out of order.

Unless anyone would like to offer any comments, I am prepared to rule now that the resolution is out of order.

Before calling the next resolution may I state that I regret finding it necessary to declare a resolution out of order merely on technical grounds. I have given the matters some consideration and have spoken to the chief of the orders and notices branch suggesting that, when a resolution is handed to him which appears to be out of order on the ground that it would involve the payment of public money, he should bring that point to the attention of the hon. member who has filed the resolution. The hon. member could then quite easily change a few words and the resolution would be in order. As a matter of fact I have almost come to the conclusion that in future, when a notice of motion is out of order on technical grounds, I will give the hon. member an opportunity to modify his resolution, provided he does not widen its scope. I believe that would be only fair. I do not believe resolutions coming under the heading of notices of motions should be ruled out of order on mere technical grounds.

CIVIL SERVICE

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON PROPORTION OF FRENCH CANADIAN APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the establishment of a special committee, during the present session, to examine the advisability of granting to the French Canadians the proportion and classes of civil service positions to which they are entitled.

(Translation):

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to draw the government's attention to the important problem of French Canadian representation in the federal civil service and to point out the necessity for essential reforms in the operation of the whole machinery of the commission.

Need I add that my intention is not to blame the present administration for conditions that existed before it assumed power? On the contrary, I am pleased to note that since Mr. Mackenzie King's successor took up his duties, the situation about which my fellow citizens rightly complain today has somewhat improved. On the other hand I submit, and my claims are based on indisputable facts which it would be too long to recall here, that French Canadians hold neither the number nor the class of federal civil service positions to which they are entitled by their population figures and do not receive fair treatment from the parties responsible for the allotment of positions.

We have had sufficient proof of this in the apparent interest of the previous administration in this matter. I might recall that a group of members from the right headed by the former Solicitor General, was assigned the task of investigating the causes of and of suggesting a remedy to this increasingly alarming situation.

No report was ever published on this investigation. I would ask the government today to appoint an official committee comprising members from all political groups in this house, in order to carry out a full investigation on the situation as regards the French Canadian people in the federal civil service and to submit conclusions to the house.

The best way to promote national unity is to grant minorities their just dues. My fellow-citizens ask for no favours, no privileges. They do not care for that. All we want is a tangible recognition of our rights. If we look into the past, we find that in 1918, civil servants numbered 54,169 of which 41,618 were permanent. Sessional paper No.

301,919, of 1918, gives an individual list of 16,184 permanent employees, of which 3,493 or 21·58 per cent were French-speaking. From this date onward, the representation of French-speaking Canadians in the federal civil service has unfortunately been reduced. Thus, the Auditor General's report for the year 1945 shows that French Canadians held only 12¼ per cent of all positions commanding a yearly salary of $2,400 or more.

As far as deputy ministerships are concerned, the percentage of French-speaking deputy ministers dropped from 14·28 in 1918 to naught in 1946.

Today, out of 19 deputy ministers, we have three, exactly half of what we are entitled to.

The 1941 census showed that the total population of Canada reached 11,506,855 and that the French-speaking population was 30·27 per cent of the whole.

However, in 1946, according to a table prepared by the Ottawa Journal under date of April 4 of that same year, out of 37 officials who were deputy ministers or held comparable rank, five only were French Canadians. The former received $313,500 annually, against $38,500 for the latter. Among these was the Dominion Archivist, Mr. Lanctot, replaced in 1948 by Mr. Lamb. This caused Mr. Eugène L'Heureux to write in Le Soleil, on September 16, 1948, that Canadians of good will found this appointment somewhat surprising, to say the least, and that the principle of alternation should have been respected by choosing Mr. Donald Fee as Archivist and Mr. Marion as his assistant.

Mr. L'Heureux continues:

That would have been fair and reasonable. After all the official bilingualism which must form the very basis of our confederation does not require that key positions be divided into French Canadian territories and English Canadian territories but, as far as possible, the alternation of French and English Canadians in all positions.

Otherwise it would be admitting that one group is qualified for certain functions but unqualified for others. We cannot admit that. In the first place it is contrary to facts and in the second place, it goes against our pride.

To let French Canadians predominate at the Archives, for instance, while they are excluded from the Department of Finance would be an utterly unacceptable solution of the public service problem. We want our share, and no more than our share of influence and salaries, in each of the federal departments whenever we are qualified on the score not only of ability but also of educational training and practical experience.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, I can prove that only two French-Canadian names appear on this list, two out of fifty-seven. It is a scandalous proportion, against which we shall never cease to protest.

Civil Service

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, if it is acknowledged that we are entitled to three supreme court judges out of nine, why are we not granted the same treatment in the different departments of the federal government? Here are a few examples of the manner in which French Canadians are being treated in certain departments. I have chosen five at random. They are probably neither the worst nor perhaps the most important.

(Text):

The following table illustrates my next point:

AGRICULTURE

Employees receiving salaries at annual rates of $3,000 or over:

Administration service, 19—2 French Canadians.

Science service, 240—9 French Canadians.

Experimental farms service, 240—18 French Canadians.

Production service, 397—54 French Canadians.

Marketing service, 179—12 French Canadians.

Special service, 57—0 French Canadians.

Total, 1,132—95 French Canadians (less than 9 per cent).

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Employees receiving salaries at annual rates of $3,000 or over: 102—3 French Canadians (less than 3 per cent).

AUDITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE

Sixty-two—1 French Canadian (less than 2 per cent).

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Administration and special projects, 33—2 French Canadians.

Mines, forest and scientific service branch, 494—26 French Canadians.

Lands and development services branch, 112—4 French Canadians.

Indian affairs branch, 60—5 French Canadians.

Immigration branch, 61—7 French Canadians.

Total, 760—44 French Canadians (less than 6 per cent).

VETERANS AFFAIRS

One thousand six hundred and ninety-three—135 French Canadians (8 per cent).

It means that out of 3,749 civil employees in five departments only, receiving an annual salary of $3,000 or over, 278 only are French Canadians, a small fraction over 7 per cent. As I said before, we are not asking for any privilege or favour; what we want is fair treatment in every department. We must not forget that. The salaries and wages paid to 125,337 permanent and temporary civil service employees for the year ended March 31, 1947, are $223,777,000.

Because they do not have their rightful number of civil service positions, the French Canadians are each year losing millions of dollars, besides the influence they could exert in the federal administration in the best interests of the country. The Chambre de Commerce of Montreal submitted to the Gordon commission, appointed by order in council on February 15, 1946, a quite exhaustive brief dealing with the federal civil service and with the place which French-speaking Canadians occupy therein. The businessmen and members of the professional classes in the Canadian metropolis deserve to be warmly congratulated and thanked for having brought to light facts too little known by the general public and particularly by the English-speaking community.

Consequently, the Chambre de Commerce submits, in the summary of its findings, that the decrease of the French Canadian representation in the civil service is due in part to the development of certain abuses in the civil service, more particularly the creation of powerful groups within the service and the failure to recognize official bilingualism; it therefore asks—that the powers of the Civil Service Commission be increased so as to prevent the natural creation of powerful groups in the public service from being an obstacle to the appointment of civil servants of French Canadian origin to high executive positions.

Secondly, it suggests that bilingualism be officially recognized in the service.

The act of 1919 establishing the charter of the Canadian civil service did not take into account the requirements of official bilingualism.

Through this error, the classification of civil servants is a source of serious injustice and disagreement. The case submitted by the Chambre de Commerce will illustrate that fact. The bilingual typist and stenographer are both in the same class as the unilingual typist and stenographer. They draw the same salary although they are required to know two languages instead of one. Often the bilingual stenographer is called upon to do translation work in spite of the fact that she is supposed to be qualified only to take shorthand in both languages. She is thus expected to do the job of a translator although she is not paid as such.

More than ever, and I expect the situation will grow worse, the federal government intervenes in the affairs of the private citizen. More than ever the French Canadian people must keep in touch with the various departments. Every day the government must deal with the French Canadian citizens on matters related to taxation, to import permits, to rationing, to unemployment insurance or to family allowances. I wish the government would always do it in French in order to avoid much trouble and much discrimination.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall resume the debate on the motion of the Prime Minister concerning amendments to the constitution. If we dispose of that we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply concerning housing. I will not announce anything further than that.

Mr. Green: Is the government not taking up tomorrow the notice of motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, not tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 27, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, October 27, 1949

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 27th October, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

OTTAWA WINTER FAIR

JERSEY CATTLE—AWARD TO MEMBER FOR FRONTENAC-ADDINGTON

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, from time to time hon. members rise in the house on questions of privilege to pay tribute to those outside the house who have had important successes in various fields of Canadian activity. I rise to perform an even more pleasant task, namely, to indicate to you and to the house that one of our own parliamentary group, the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Aylesworth), has been successful this week at the Ottawa winter fair in his showing of Jersey cattle, and has won the award given to the premier Jersey exhibitor. I should like to express to him, on behalf of all members, including yourself, sir, our congratulations upon the signal success of Frontenac Jersey farms. They have won in the Jersey class more prizes than any other exhibitor at the Ottawa winter fair.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sure that all hon. members will feel that a most satisfactory situation exists when members of this house give such a good example to their fellow Canadians by raising the standards of our dairy herds. There are others who are doing likewise in other fields of agricultural production. This is both a good example and an encouraging aspect of our community life.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to say something on this matter, but, as usual, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is ahead of me. Yesterday I had the privilege—we are speaking on a question of privilege—of being the guest of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) at the Ottawa winter fair. I congratulate the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Aylesworth) upon having won the award he did, with cattle which are almost the equal of those to be found in Fraser Valley. I want to say, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I enjoyed the show very much. May I add that I think the Canadian government would be well advised to have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police continue to put on their musical ride throughout Canada and the United States. It is one of the finest things I have ever seen. It is a credit to Canada, and is one of our greatest tourist attractions.

PRIVATE BILL

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the first reading of Bill No. 116 (from the Senate) respecting the British and Foreign Bible Society in Canada and Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. Thatcher:

1. By what amount was the over-all Canadian federal debt reduced during the first nine months of 1949?

2. As of October 1, 1949, what was the total Canadian debt?

Mr. Sinclair: The phrase "over-all debt" is not generally used in classifying the Canadian debt. However, to ensure that the hon. member secures the information he is seeking, the answer which I am now tabling gives the figures for the total liabilities of Canada and also the net debt of Canada.

1. Total liabilities

December 31, 1948.....	$17,278,514,916.85
September 30, 1949.....	17,027,764,399.05
	$ 250,750,517.80

2. Net debt

December 31, 1948.....	$11,758,680,442.20
September 30, 1949.....	11,495,881,920.78

Questions

WHEAT PRODUCERS' CERTIFICATES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many wheat producers' certificates issued in each of the years 1940 to 1948, by provinces, are outstanding?

2. What is being done to locate the owners?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. The following shows outstanding producers' certificates as at September 30, 1949:

1940 crop

Province—Number of producers' certificates (estimate)

Manitoba, 2,500; Saskatchewan, 7,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 7,500; total, 17,000.

Manitoba, 1,700; Saskatchewan, 7,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 5,000; total, 13,700.

1943 crop

Manitoba, 5,000; Saskatchewan, 18,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 17,000; total, 40,000.

Manitoba, 4,500; Saskatchewan, 17,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 16,000; total 38,000.

1945 crop

Manitoba, 1,200; Saskatchewan, 3,700; Alberta and British Columbia, 3,100; total, 8,000.

1946 crop

Manitoba, 1,500; Saskatchewan, 6,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 7,500; total, 15,000.

1947 crop (old basis)

Manitoba, 2,500; Saskatchewan, 7,500; Alberta and British Columbia, 6,500; total, 16,500.

1947 crop (new basis)

Manitoba, 4,000; Saskatchewan, 15,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 11,000; total, 30,000.

1948 crop (deliveries to March 31, 1949)

Manitoba, 11,000; Saskatchewan, 44,000; Alberta and British Columbia, 35,000; total, 90,000.

2. After producers have had a reasonable time in which to surrender certificates following the announcement of a payment, the payment department endeavours in several ways to get in touch with producers who have not surrendered the producers' certificates concerned. Notices are sent out to producers who, according to the records of the board, hold certificates upon which payment has been authorized. Generally these notices bring a good response in the form of:

(a) The surrender of the certificates concerned;

(b) Advice that the producers' certificates have been lost;

(c) Advice that the producers certificates are now the property of an estate;

(d) Advice that the producers concerned are located elsewhere.

In the case of certificates which have been lost, the necessary alternative forms are dispatched. The board's legal department gives prompt attention to payments on producers' certificates where estates are involved. The payment department makes the necessary alterations on its records where new addresses of producers concerned are received. Generally the notices sent out by the board have produced satisfactory results.

When the volume of outstanding producers' certificates has been reduced as far as possible by means of notices and the following up of these notices, lists are prepared of the outstanding producers' certificates and these lists are made available to elevator agents at the delivery point concerned, who are in a position to acquaint producers of the payments which are available to them.

WASHINGTON MONETARY TALKS

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

Who are the Canadian representatives on the committee or committees set up as a result of the recent Washington conference?

Mr. Claxton: No formal committees have been set up as a consequence of the tripartite economic discussions held in Washington in September, 1949. However, there have been informal talks on customs procedures and on the sterling area's dollar expenditures on oil and petroleum. Canada has been represented at these two sets of talks by members of the staff of the Canadian embassy in Washington.

NEWFOUNDLAND—ASSISTANCE TO SECONDARY INDUSTRIES

Mr. Higgins:

What is being done by the government to assist secondary industries in Newfoundland?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, this question, standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), appeared on yesterday's order paper. For some reason that is not apparent, it does not appear on today's order paper. It was not answered yesterday, but the answer is available today and is as follows:

In accordance with the terms of union, the interdepartmental committee on Newfoundland secondary industries and purchasing was established in January of this year. It is comprised of representatives from eleven federal departments and agencies, and was given the task of (a) stimulating the purchasing of federal government supplies and services from Newfoundland secondary industries; (b) providing Newfoundland industries with a clearing house to which particular problems can be directed; (c) acting in an advisory capacity to the government in dealing with problems of these industries.

An office is also being maintained in St. John's, Newfoundland, by the Department of Trade and Commerce for the purpose of giving Newfoundland businessmen information and advice. Through this office local manufacturers can directly place their inquiries with the committee in Ottawa.

Local purchasing offices of the Department of Transport and the Canadian Commercial Corporation have also been set up in St. John's for the purpose of contracting for local requirements. The Department of Public Works and the king's printer have made special arrangements for the purchase of supplies, stationery and printing. The co-operation of the C.N.R., particularly with regard to placing orders for stationery and printing in Newfoundland, has also been assured.

The United Nail and Foundry, which is unable to obtain its full requirements in nail rod from Canadian mills, is being paid an equalizing subsidy on rod purchased in the United States. Payments to date amount to $6,651.88. Dawes Nail and Hardware was asked to make a submission for similar treatment, but none was received.

Newfoundland manufacturers receive invitations from the federal government in Ottawa to tender on materials that may be required throughout Canada. It was apparent in the latter cases that some of the Newfoundland industries would be temporarily handicapped in competing with mainland manufacturers. The government, therefore, recently directed its purchasing authorities to place contracts with Newfoundland manufacturers whose tenders are within fifteen per cent of the lowest bid. This measure is to apply until March 31, 1950.

The government has been disappointed in the number of tenders submitted by Newfoundland manufacturers. It should be emphasized that small industries in Newfoundland must use their own initiative in finding a solution to their difficulties. The government is anxious to assist them in every way, and will give sympathetic hearing to specific remedies which they may put forward.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BUTTER HELD IN STORAGE

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many pounds of butter were in storage in Canada as at October 1, 1949, or most recent date?
2. How many pounds of butter belong to the government by purchase as at that date, and what was the cost per pound?
3. What storage charges have been incurred by the government up to that date (a) in total; (b) per pound?
4. What is present cost of government holdings in butter per pound including all charges?
5. What commitments have been made for sale of government holdings?
6. If any commitments, at what price per pound, and to whom?

POWDERED MILK HELD IN STORAGE

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many pounds of powdered milk were in storage in Canada as at October 1, 1949, or most recent date?
2. How many pounds of powdered milk belong to the government by purchase as at that date, and what was the cost per pound?
3. What storage charges have been incurred by the government up to that date (a) in total; (b) per pound?
4. What is present cost of government holdings in powdered milk per pound including all charges?
5. What commitments have been made for sale of government holdings?
6. If any commitments, at what price per pound, and to whom?

CHEESE HELD IN STORAGE

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many pounds of cheese were in storage in Canada as at October 1, 1949, or most recent date?
2. How many pounds of cheese belong to the government by purchase as at that date, and what was the cost per pound?
3. What storage charges have been incurred by the government up to that date (a) in total; (b) per pound?
4. What is present cost of government holdings in cheese per pound including all charges?
5. What commitments have been made for sale of government holdings?
6. If any commitments, at what price per pound, and to whom?

CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION— LIVING ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Fraser:

1. In what countries is Canada represented by (a) a high commissioner; (b) an ambassador; (c) a minister; (d) a chargé d'affaires?
2. Who is the incumbent in each case and what was paid to him for the year ending March 31, 1949, in (a) salary; (b) living and representation allowances; (c) travelling expenses?
3. In what commonwealth or foreign capitals has the government purchased living accommodation for any such representative, and in each case what was the amount paid?
4. Were alterations made to any of the above living accommodation? If so, in each case, what was the total cost of such alterations?

British North America Act

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to ask the responsible minister about a question I put on the order paper nearly a month ago. On September 29 a question standing in my name was passed as an order for return. The return has not yet been brought down. I should like to ask the responsible minister when I may expect it.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I have no recollection of the matter, but I shall make inquiries.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed, from Thursday, October 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Garson.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I intend to discuss the proposal for the amendment of the British North America Act from the point of view of Canadians who live on the Pacific slope.

The province of British Columbia entered confederation in 1871 by an agreement between the young Dominion of Canada, then just four years old, and the crown colony of British Columbia. That agreement was contained in addresses to the queen passed by the parliament of Canada and by the legislature of the colony. Members who are interested may refer to page 77 of volume V of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927.

Some of the terms of the agreement are still of considerable interest. One had to do with the construction of a railway to the west coast of Canada. The paragraph dealing with the railway reads as follows:

> The government of the dominion undertake to secure the commencement simultaneously, within two years from the date of the union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky mountains, and from such point as may be selected, east of the Rocky mountains, towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and further, to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of the union.

The railway was not built within the ten years; as hon. members know, it was finally completed in 1885.

[Mr. Fraser.]

There is another interesting provision having to do with transportation, as follows:

> The dominion will provide an efficient mail service, fortnightly, by steam communication between Victoria and San Francisco, and twice a week between Victoria and Olympia;—

Olympia is now the capital of the state of Washington.

> —the vessels to be adapted for the conveyance of freight and passengers.

There was also provision for the payment of subsidies to the province of British Columbia. It is interesting to note that at that time the population of the province was estimated at 60,000, some 34,000 less than that of Prince Edward Island. It has increased twenty times, now almost 1,200,000. Provision also was made for the province to give large areas of land to the dominion, known as railway lands, the purpose being to further the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway.

There is also the following provision in the agreement respecting representation in this parliament:

> British Columbia shall be entitled to be represented in the Senate by three members, and by six members in the House of Commons; the representation to be increased under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867.

The colony accepted the British North America Act of that time; in other words the basis of the union was the British North America Act as it stood in 1867. Right from the start British Columbia has been the province most remote from Ottawa. I dare say half the present members of this house have never been in that province. The Prime Minister had not been there until 1948.

Mr. Cruickshank: He had good results after he went there, though.

Mr. Green: He may not have such good results the next time. Largely because of its remoteness from the capital, the problems of British Columbia have always been the least understood of those of all the provinces. Of necessity, therefore, we must always be on guard against undue centralization of power in Ottawa.

In the past our rights have been protected largely in two ways. In the first place the British North America Act has been interpreted by the decisions of a court which we have regarded as impartial, and by and large those decisions have favoured the provinces. It is significant that when the question whether or not the dominion had the right to abolish appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council was argued in the courts, the government of British Columbia was represented by counsel to argue against that proposition. I repeat, the appeal to the privy council has been one protection. Another has been the fact that the British North America Act could be amended—at least so we thought—only after consultation and the most careful deliberation.

Protection for our province is most important, and it is now being removed by doing away with appeal to the privy council and changing the method of amending the British North America Act. These changes may prove detrimental to our province. I hope that will not be so, but there is a real possibility that we may find ourselves in that position. Regardless of the party to which we in British Columbia belong, we have always believed there would be a conference between the dominion and the provinces before any request was made for amendments to the British North America Act. It is significant to note the attitude taken by the attorney general of British Columbia —who, by the way, is a supporter of the Liberal party—when the speech from the throne appeared in the press last September. I have here a dispatch which appeared in the Vancouver Sun under date of September 16, 1949, giving the reaction of Mr. Wismer to the suggestions with respect to amending Canada's constitution. The heading reads, "Wismer approves Ottawa conference." The article goes on:

Prime Minister St. Laurent's plan to have the Canadian constitution amended at home, rather than by reference to the British parliament, drew favourable comment here today from Attorney General Gordon Wismer.

Mr. Wismer made it clear that he could not as yet speak for the provincial government as a whole, since the cabinet has not considered the national government's proposal.

This is the part of the statement I wish to emphasize.

He stressed that in any plan for altering the constitution within Canada, adequate provision must be laid down for safeguarding provincial rights.

British Columbia has long been a strong fighter for provincial rights against encroachment by the federal authority.

And, he said, he would presume that even in any changes touching federal matters alone, it would be provided that the provinces should be consulted first.

Actually that was the program of the Prime Minister before the house sat, namely, that the provinces would be consulted before any attempt would be made to amend the constitution. We find that clearly set out in the letter from the Prime Minister to the provincial premiers, which appears at page 870 of Hansard. The paragraph dealing with the Prime Minister's statement to the electorate of Canada reads:

I stated also that it was the intention of the government, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method of amending the constitution in Canada which would be satisfactory to all Canadians.

I believe that is the program that should have been followed. Had the Prime Minister done as he said he was going to do, there could have been little quarrel with his actions. But that is not what the Prime Minister is doing in the resolution now under discussion.

Mr. St. Laurent: And what the hon. member has cited is not all the Prime Minister said about it, either, in the letter from which the hon. member quoted.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister may speak again in this debate, but I defy him to show me and the house anything in his letter stating that his election pledge was that he would make certain amendments without consulting the provinces. There is not one word to that effect in his letter.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will satisfy the hon. member's challenge.

Mr. Cruickshank: You go on and make your speech; the Prime Minister will make his.

Mr. Green: I would not try to mumble for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: Don't try to speak for the Prime Minister; you are not capable of it.

Mr. Green: I repeat that the resolution now under debate is not the plan the Prime Minister announced to the people. He says now that eventually he will consult the provinces, but first he is going to get certain powers to amend Canada's constitution. The Prime Minister is going to ask the government of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act to give the dominion power to amend the constitution, except—first—as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the province. The second exception is as follows:

—or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, as I read this resolution, this second exception is tied up with educational and language rights. I take it from the speeches made by the Prime Minister that that was not the intention, but clearly that is the way the resolution reads. If it was not intended to restrict these provincial rights to education and language, then further words should have been added to the resolution. The part of the resolution with which I am dealing reads as follows:

—or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language.

If it was intended that these should be separate exceptions, I suggest to the Prime Minister he should have inserted the words "or granted or secured" before the words "to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language." In any event, as I understand it, the second exception is this general one:

—rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province . . .

The third exception concerns schools and the use of the French and the English language. Those were the exceptions contained in the resolution as it was originally presented.

As the result of an amendment moved by the C.C.F. party, the Prime Minister added two more exceptions, one being that the dominion was not asking for the power to change the provision in the constitution which calls for a session of parliament once every year or the provision which calls for an election every five years. He made a proviso to the fifth exception that, in the event of real or apprehended war, an election could be postponed beyond the five-year period unless one-third of the members objected. I do not think very careful consideration was given to this proviso, because it means that with the house constituted as it is the Liberal members could extend the life of the parliament for more than five years, and the opposition parties, even though they combined, would be helpless to prevent it.

This resolution can easily, of course, be forced through this house; and I have no doubt that it will be. It will then be accepted by an obedient Senate, and the United Kingdom government will pass the amendment in the form requested by this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should refer to the other place as the "obedient Senate."

Mr. Green: I shall substitute the word "Liberal" for the word "obedient". The United Kingdom government will pass the amendment in the form in which it is requested by this parliament, and the dominion will then have the power it seeks in this resolution, before having consulted with the provinces.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this house, that the folly—I repeat that word—the folly of this post-election program of the Prime Minister's is clearly shown in several ways. In the first place, the main argument he submits is that he is bringing the Canadian constitution home, and that he is removing one of the last badges of colonialism. In the Montreal press of October 14 the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

Now, he said, was the time to remove the "final badges of our former dependent condition."

This main argument advanced by the Prime Minister is nothing more or less than a spurious argument, because he is still leaving large parts of our constitution with the United Kingdom government. More is being left with the United Kingdom government than when the resolution was first presented, because the government has accepted the C.C.F. amendment. Yet, while doing this, the Prime Minister has also actually had the temerity to argue that he is taking no more power than he already possesses.

In his letter to Mr. Duplessis, which will be found at page 874 of Hansard, we find this statement:

We believe we already have the right to have such amendments made without consulting the provincial authorities,—

Actually the plan now being followed probably makes more remote than it would otherwise have been, the time when Canada will not have to go to the United Kingdom for an amendment to her constitution.

The folly of this post-election program is shown also by the fact that the provinces are being deprived of the right to be heard upon certain matters which, while exclusively federal under the British North America Act, actually concern the provinces. For instance, consider the composition of the Senate. One of the main reasons for having a Senate in our parliamentary structure was to protect provincial as well as minority rights. For example, Quebec and Ontario have equal representation in the Senate, although their populations differ. The maritime provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick each have ten senators, whereas the province of British Columbia, with practically twice the population of Nova Scotia and certainly more than twice the population of New Brunswick, has only six. By the way, that is a most unfair situation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: The composition of the Senate is a matter which vitally affects all the provinces. It may be that some members of the Senate should be appointed by provincial governments. Personally I believe some arrangement of that kind would be a good thing. The point I am emphasizing is this: By this amendment the provinces are being deprived of the right to be heard on some of these questions which, under the British North America Act, would appear to be purely federal.

The folly of the program is also shown by the attitude of the various provincial governments, and their attitude is extremely important. We need only to look at the letters written by the premiers of the various provinces to realize that many of them are in grave doubt as to the course being followed. First there is the letter from the premier of Nova Scotia, who asked that the passing of the bill abolishing appeals to the privy council be delayed until after the conference with the provinces. Then there is the letter from the premier of Quebec, in which he raises points which are clearly worthy of the most careful consideration. There is the letter from the premier of Ontario, in which he says:

> I am frankly in some doubt as to the advisability of dealing with the matter piecemeal without first attempting general agreement.

There is the letter from the premier of Manitoba, in which he says:

> The government of Manitoba feels that there might be differences of opinion as to whether a proposed amendment to the constitution related only to federal matters or affected provincial interests, rights, or jurisdiction. Before agreeing to any specific proposal, therefore, our government will examine carefully the manner in which the provincial position is to be protected.

Then there is the letter from the premier of Alberta, which I will not read, but which clearly sets out excellent reasons why the conference should have been held before any amendment to the act is put through.

As I said a few minutes ago, there was the immediate reaction of the attorney general of British Columbia; he said that certainly there should be a conference before any amendment was made. The premiers of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick do not raise the question. Apparently these three Liberal premiers are taking everything on faith. But there is a most interesting letter from the premier of Saskatchewan, which is to be found in Hansard of October 24, just last Monday, at page 1107—and I hope my C.C.F. friends will be able to square this letter from the premier of Saskatchewan with the attitude they have taken in the house on this question. Mr. Douglas writes:

> I must confess to considerable curiosity as to just what your government has in mind.

Further on he says:

> In our opinion the field that the dominion would occupy after the suggested amendment is indefinite at the moment, and we do not know what your government has in mind in the direction of constitutional development.

Then, in connection with the Senate, he says:

> Again it may be asked whether the formula would warrant the abolition of the Senate. Such an abolition would not "affect the rights and privileges of the provinces" as corporate entities; yet some of the provinces might take grave objection to the abolition of the upper chamber.

And he asks the Prime Minister for further clarification of the attitude of the dominion. The reply of the Prime Minister of Canada to the premier of Saskatchewan is certainly well worthy of attention. The Prime Minister uses these words:

> I agree that the phrase "affecting the rights and privileges of the provinces" is lacking in precision; this general language was used because we did not wish to attempt to determine in an arbitrary fashion the extent of the rights and privileges of the provinces, preferring to leave that for determination by the courts, in the event of any dispute, unless some agreement with respect to it is reached at the forthcoming conference.

The Prime Minister himself obviously does not know just what is meant by those words "the rights and privileges of the provinces".

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: Not now. I will later, if I have time.

In effect, the provinces are being ridden over rough-shod. The field in which they may make submissions is being narrowed, and in order to prevent an invasion of any rights they may still have, they are being put in the position of having to fight before a dominion court, the Supreme Court of Canada. Premier Douglas clearly sets that out in his letter. He says:

> May I make the general observation that the amendment as proposed in your letter would primarily vest in the dominion parliament authority to amend the constitution of Canada subject of course to the exceptions referred to. This would mean, as I understand the situation, that in the case of any amendment of the B.N.A. Act by the dominion being objected to by a province, the burden would be on the province to show that the amendment infringed the stated exceptions.

There is grave danger in treating the provinces in this way.

Finally, not one reason has been given for all this haste. The dominion has in view no actual amendments to the Canadian constitution. The Prime Minister explained that also in his letter to the premier of Saskatchewan, the final paragraph of which reads as follows:

> As to your question whether this government "has any developments in mind which can properly be disclosed," I can only say that no consideration has yet been given by the government to any constitutional development or change which might be recommended to parliament under the new procedure contemplated by the address.

The Prime Minister gave no pledge to make an amendment without consultation with the provinces. He has no mandate to do so; yet he is forcing this resolution through now, although the conference is to be convened here in a matter of a few weeks to deal with a portion of this constitutional problem.

It all looks so unreasonable that one may well wonder about it. This action by the Prime Minister, on the face of it, makes one ask the question: Why is he going at it in this way? I believe that there is a good reason. I believe that the government is seeking this power at this session so that when the provinces meet here in January they will find, in the first place, that they have little power left, and, in the second place, that they can prevent an invasion in the expected fields only by fighting in the supreme court. I believe the government is of the view that at that time public opinion may well have been stirred up against the provincial premiers, thereby hampering them in their attempt to see that the provinces of Canada get fair treatment. I believe it is hoped, as a result, that the provinces will have to fall in line with the dominion proposals for dealing with the matters which are excepted in this resolution. The dominion government also hopes that the provinces will be softened up, to use a colloquial expression, for the negotiations concerning the renewal of the tax agreements, which negotiations must take place shortly. In other words I believe the hope of this government is that the provinces will find themselves looking right down the loaded barrels of two guns—one, increased power of the dominion, and the other, the fact that any disputes must be settled by a court set up by the dominion.

It is a clever, cunning, loaded-gun policy. It may work, but it is no way to promote harmony and unity in Canada. Earlier prime ministers have declined to go so far. I believe that this action of the present Prime Minister of Canada may well prove to be irresponsible, and I intend to vote against his plan.

Mr. Knowles: Before the hon. member takes his seat, will he permit the question I sought to ask him a moment ago? Is it not so that in the letter from Premier Douglas, from which the hon. member quoted, there is this sentence:

> You will understand that no complaint is being made regarding the action which your government proposes to take.

Mr. Green: The premier of Saskatchewan was trying to let down lightly his friends here in the house. While he does say that, I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre can get much comfort from the rest of the letter.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is aware that that letter was written by Mr. Douglas—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Graydon: You can't get Tommy off the fence in that way.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member not aware that Mr. Douglas' letter was written on October 15, before any statements were made by this party in the house, and that Mr. Douglas' first letter took the same position?

Mr. Graydon: Is the hon. member on the Speaker's list?

Mr. Green: In answer to that I would point out to the hon. member that if he reads the second letter he will see very clearly that his own premier of Saskatchewan is much concerned about what is going on, and furthermore believes that nobody can tell exactly what the dominion government has in mind. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his associates here are keen on getting more power into the hands of the dominion government so that they can bring in their nationalization and socialistic plans. They are willing to swallow anything with that objective in mind.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, at the outset let it be fully understood that in common with all other members of the Social Credit group I agree that the power and the right to amend the British North America Act ought to reside in Canada. We also maintain, however, that every precaution should be taken to ensure that in Canada there shall be an unimpaired British North America Act to amend, before any Canadian agency or agencies begin to amend Canada's constitution.

Two fine old English sayings come to mind as one looks at this measure: first, don't tear down any man's house before you provide him a better one to go into; second, don't jump from the frying pan into the fire.

As I see it, passage of this measure will unhinge the British North America Act. In passing this measure it looks as though this parliament would be setting the stage for the tearing down of the Canadian people's house —its constitution, its British North America Act—before having found an acceptable plan for the construction of a new house.

There may not appear to be any sufficient reason why the present dominion government should aim to do a thing of that sort; but let it be borne in mind that the British North America Act and the Australian constitution are two of the finest constitutions in the world. The reason why they are so admirable will become manifest as I proceed. International centralizers, therefore, desire to destroy the British North America Act and the Australian constitution. I hope we do not wait too long in Canada before we come to realize that there is a body of mischievous men in the world definitely designing to establish a world centralized state, in which nations like Canada and Australia will be merely minor provinces.

We live in an age of centralized totalitarian thinking, and fascist feelings are in the air everywhere. We collide with them in this house. We collide with them every time a C.C.F. member rises to speak on almost anything.

Any matter pertaining to a nation's constitution ought to be approached with the utmost gravity. In dealing with no other subject is it more important that the speaker be absolutely objective, that he seek realistically to face facts and actualities. In participating in this debate I shall do my best to be grave, realistic and honest, setting aside all possibility of prejudice.

There are many aspects of the situation confronting us at present, each of which ought to receive the most careful, cautious and appraising consideration. Every Canadian, of whatever situation in life, ought to take solemn warning that while this matter is being dealt with in this house the whole future destiny of Canadians trembles in the balance. Especially should all provincial premiers, members of provincial legislative assemblies, all municipal officials, all service clubs, all chambers of commerce, all boards of trade, all women's institutes and other women's associations, and organizations of labour—all of these should go on the alert instantly and insistently. There are exceedingly important historical scenes in progress on the Ottawa stage today.

From the point of observation from which I now view this drama it would seem to appear that particularly the premiers of the more powerful provinces might be well advised to counsel together to determine how best to manage not to leave Premier Duplessis to bear an undue measure of the burden and the brunt of needful provincial self-assertion.

May I turn to a contemplation of certain aspects of the whole general constitutional situation as it now confronts us? Everyone who has given thought to human relationships knows that the strong forever seek to impose their will upon the weak. Men have developed democracy to restrain the strong and protect the weak.

One of the secrets of successful democracy is checks and balances. Before we give too much consideration to the passing of this measure I urge upon the members of the Liberal party, whom Canadians have placed in absolute power, that they consider carefully what could easily happen to the checks and balances in relation to Canada's constitution if a certain kind of amendment should be made to the British North America Act.

Especially are constitutional checks and balances essential where large areas and populations are concerned. Especially is it necessary to have constitutional checks and balances in Canada. Each dominion of the British empire struggled for sovereign power to enable it successfully to resist the efforts of any central government to oppress it. In the United States, the states sternly defend state rights, to enable them to force the central government to give them something like justice.

On the other hand every enlightened person also knows that successful human achievement depends upon co-operation among men. Every enlightened person knows, too, that men are prone to refuse to co-operate even when they have the opportunity so to do, and even when co-operation would be in their own best interests.

That is granted. I am fully aware of that. So were the fathers of confederation. So were the designers of the United States constitution. So were the designers of the British constitution, unwritten but fully understood. If the states of the United States have too much power, they might easily disrupt the union. If they have too little power, the union might easily disrupt them. Those who are thoroughly familiar with conditions in the United States know how tragically the central power in the union has disrupted a large area of the United States.

In Canada the central power in the union has disrupted the provinces, particularly as to their economic lives. The union is not attempting to change policies that have injured the provinces. I ask all hon. members of the Liberal party to bear that in mind, and challenge that statement if they think they can. There is no indication that the federal government is contemplating salutary changes of policies. Rather the indications so far are that the federal government is planning policies even more harmful to the provincial economy. Under existing circumstances, only greater provincial power has any chance of warding off most serious injuries with yet more serious consequences.

I know it can be argued that if you once give Ottawa absolute control over every province in Canada there will never be any breaking away by any province. I am quite agreed as to that. There has been no breaking away of the southern states from the central body in the United States. But what has happened to the southern states? What has happened to their lives? What has produced the share-croppers there? Do any hon. members want to see a lot of share-croppers in the various provinces of Canada? That would be a mighty easy thing to bring about in this country right now; much progress has been made in that direction already in many of the provinces.

The first question to be considered is this: Are strong provincial governments essential to a prosperous and powerful Canada? I maintain that strong provincial governments are essential to a prosperous and powerful Canada. Quebec will insist upon constitutional powers and authority to guarantee her discretion in matters of language and education. Hon. members will notice that this measure is carefully worded to disarm Quebec. The rest of the provinces presumably do not matter so long as Quebec supports the government. As long as Ontario has provincial leaders of sufficient experience and courage, she will equally insist upon the same discretionary sovereignty to safeguard language and education in Ontario, as well as property and civil rights. British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Alberta and the others ought to, and must, have similar powers of discretion to safeguard property and civil rights against the injurious incidence of federal policies, particularly federal policies as regards freight rates, tariffs, finance, land settlement and immigration, and industrial development which up to the present time has been unduly concentrated in Ontario and Quebec.

I am tempted to make a brief aside here and draw the attention of all hon. members and the people of the country to the fact that during the recent war, when there was an admirable opportunity to decentralize industry, very little decentralization took place. The impression we all got was that as soon as the war was over the government took pains to destroy what little decentralization had taken place. In other words, all the new industries were placed right here in Ontario and Quebec. From the standpoint of the other eight provinces, this was most disastrous. Anyone who is well informed on the question knows that.

What are the provinces going to do about the matter? What recourse have the maritimes and the four western provinces, other than increased constitutional guarantees of provincial discretionary power and authority? All any hon. member needs to do in order to get plenty of evidence to support what I am saying is to read the submissions made by those provinces to the Rowell-Sirois commission. I think anyone who reads those submissions will come away a sadder and wiser man. What can be thought of a federally supported and imposed freight rate structure which permits any railroad to charge $1.75 per hundredweight for moving flannelette blankets from eastern Canada to Vancouver, for example, and to change $4.53½ per hundredweight to move them to Edmonton, a shorter haul by more than 500 miles?

Let it be borne in mind that these inequities in freight rates have to do with railways over which the central government has had and still has absolute control. Hon. members who did not hear me speak on October 24, as reported on page 1090 of Hansard, I believe would be well advised to read that speech—not because of any particular quality of its own, but because of the astonishing things that are in it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: I hear some silly laughter. Some people would laugh if they saw their mothers being killed. Inequities almost as glaring and hurtful to provincial economy can be cited in relation to federal policies in each of the important fields of tariff, finance, land settlement, immigration—think of the Japanese problem in British Columbia—and industrial development which has centralized industry in Ontario and Quebec, and incidentally centralized power there. It may be argued that if more power were concentrated in Ottawa, the federal government would clear away those inequities; but the fact is that Ottawa has absolute power over each of those aspects of national life, and yet flagrant inequities have developed right under the nose of Ottawa, and perhaps with the consent and connivance of Ottawa.

Again I ask: what possible recourse has any province, western or maritime? In this house Ontario and Quebec can outvote all the other eight provinces put together. In his speech the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made a good deal of the privilege the provinces would have of sending members to the house to protect their interests, but what chance would 106 members from eight provinces have of standing up and asserting their rights against 156 members from Ontario and Quebec? I have no feeling of unkindness toward the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; I am merely pointing out the situation which exists and which constitutes one of the facts that enter into this whole matter. I repeat that Ontario and Quebec can outvote by fifty votes all the other provinces put together.

Anyone who supposes that this fact has not had an injurious effect on the other provinces just has not learned anything yet. Unless tremendous industrial development can be stimulated in the western and maritime provinces, the population growth of those provinces will never give the eight provinces enough members in Ottawa to enable them to demand and obtain the simple human privilege of plain and obvious economic equity. I make that statement without fear of successful contradiction.

The conclusion is irresistible. Canada is made up of vast areas, and widely varying territories and conditions. If Canada is to become prosperous and powerful, the provincial governments must have constitutional guarantees of essential discretion.

The Prime Minister has iterated and reiterated since September 14, and he stated it before, that there was no desire or intention to impair the safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction. These words are extracted from the letter of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), dated September 14, 1949, to each of the provincial premiers, which is to be found at page 870 of Hansard.

The declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should be weighed and assessed in the light of several relative considerations. First of all what has been the tendency of the Liberal party as a whole in Canada in the last fourteen years? Has its tendency been (a) towards decentralization of power in Canada and in the world; (b) towards maintaining the status quo in Canada and in the world; or (c) towards centralization of power in Canada and in the world? There is no question that the Liberal party has definitely worked towards centralizing power both in the world and in Canada. That cannot possibly be questioned.

Let us first look at the matter from the point of view of Canada. May I draw the attention of hon. members to a document entitled "Proposals of the government of Canada", dated August, 1945, which was submitted to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. I should like to read four short extracts from page 48 and page 49 of that publication. They are:

> The dominion government proposes that after the war the provincial governments should by agreement forego the imposition of personal income taxes, corporation taxes and succession duties, leaving to the dominion government the full and exclusive access to these revenue sources.

May I comment on that statement by saying that if such a policy were implemented it would mean that the financial and economic independence of every province in Canada would be utterly destroyed. Every province would completely lose discretion in any matter, except under the direction and guidance and at the will and with the consent of the central government. No check would exist in Canada as far as provincial governments were concerned. I continue to read:

> . . . the dominion proposes an agreement under which the provincial governments would commit themselves not to withdraw before an initial trial period of say three years.
> It will clearly need to make full use of its power—

Meaning the dominion government.

> —to impose national taxes on personal incomes, corporations and estates.
> Exclusive jurisdiction over taxes on incomes, corporations and estates is also necessary in order to protect Canadian interests abroad.

There is the attitude of the Liberal government in 1945. Does it indicate any desire on the part of the government to include "the fullest safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction", as related to the all-important class 13 of section 92, "property and civil rights in the provinces?" May I pause a moment to point out that although there are several important instances under section 91 where the dominion has overriding power, there is only one class in section 92 which gives the provinces any chance in the world to stand up to the dominion, and that is class 13. Just look at the attempts to invade class 13 as indicated in the four proposals I have read!

Will the Prime Minister repudiate the pronouncements at pages 48 and 49 of the documented proposals of the Dominion of Canada? Let him rise in this house and tell us whether he repudiates the statements contained in that document.

Will the Liberal party repudiate them? We have quite a number of Liberals in the house. Will they repudiate these statements? Will the Liberal machine outside the house and the visible and invisible forces that control that machine, repudiate these statements?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: It is easy to laugh it off, but it is a grave reality. Let no member of the Liberal party pretend that there are not hidden forces governing the Liberal machine.

Satisfactory answers to each of these questions ought to be forthcoming. Such answers ought to be demanded by all Canadians as a solemn and binding commitment. Until such repudiation and commitment are in our hands how can anyone rely upon the Prime Minister's declarations and his protestations of a desire to "include the fullest safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction"? There is an old saying that actions speak louder than words.

The document from which I have just quoted indicates the Liberal attitude four years ago. Have we any documents prior to that time? May I recall to the minds of hon. members the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations? The commission was appointed by a Liberal administration—and was probably told pretty well what it was expected to do! It was appointed by order in council on August 14, 1937, and submitted its report on May 3, 1940.

The dominion-provincial conference to consider the report was called on January 14, 1941.

The documented proposals of the government of Canada of August, 1945, are founded on the gist of the financial proposals of the Rowell-Sirois commission.

Does anyone question that statement? Let me read from an article in Canadian Business of January, 1941, on the Rowell-Sirois report. The article reads:

> Plan 1 provides that the provinces would cease to use the following forms of taxation, the personal income tax, corporation taxes, succession duties.

There is an asterisk beside corporation taxes referring one to a footnote which reads:

> The dominion would pay annually to each province a sum equal to the tax which that province would have received had it collected from mining and oil producing companies, 10 per cent of the net income which was derived from mining, smelting and refining of ores and oils produced in the province.

It sounds surprisingly like the proposals of the dominion government to which I referred, does it not? Then the article goes on to deal with what the new grants are and reads:

> Plan 1 provides that:
> (a) the provinces would surrender all existing subsidies;
> (b) the dominion would pay annually a national adjustment grant according to need, which would be irreducible, but revisable every five years on the recommendation of an independent advisory finance commission.

You can be very sure the "finance commission" would be appointed by the federal government and would consist of men who were ready to do the will of that government. I continue to read:

> (c) The dominion would provide emergency grants in dealing with abnormal conditions subject to the recommendation of the finance commission, which grants would be made for a year at a time only and reduced or suspended as soon as conditions justified it.

I should like to draw from a statement to be found further on in the same article, which I think will impress every hon. member of the house. The article sets out what the adjustment grants were for the various provinces. Prince Edward Island was to have a national adjustment grant of $750,000. Nova Scotia was to have $800,000; New Brunswick, $1,500,000; Quebec, $8 million; Manitoba, $2,100,000; Saskatchewan, 1939 basis, $1,750,000, and Ontario nothing, Alberta nothing, and British Columbia nothing. That does not sound like very good reading, does it? That is what was recommended by the Rowell-Sirois commission, and apparently with the complete consent and approval of the Liberal government.

Did the Rowell-Sirois report advocate centralization? Here is what some of the grand old Liberals of earlier days said; I quote from an article by W. R. Motherwell, a fact-facing article, written on January 14, 1941, and appearing in the January 23 issue of the Western Producer.

Perhaps some of the younger members of this house may not remember who this man was. He was a grand old Liberal reformer from the west, premier of Saskatchewan for a good many years, Minister of Agriculture in the federal cabinet at Ottawa for a number of years, one of the finest men I ever met and one of the clearest thinkers. He was a Liberal. He was honest in stating what he believed and could give very good reasons for so believing. Listen to what he said concerning the Sirois report.

> In view of this, why should we now relinquish voluntarily, some of our present sovereign provincial authority, to build up a still more dominating central power, sometimes even now, not exercised too wisely or too well.

There can be no doubt about what he thought. Further on in the article he said:

> Then why, I repeat, should we now increase the further centralization of power in Ottawa (except for increasing our war effort) when they seem to have, or to take, more power than they can administer wisely and well as in the above cited cases, which should, in my humble estimation, be remedied forthwith.

Between those two statements he had listed a number of flagrant cases of mismanagement by the federal government in handling power; and no man was in a better position to know about some of those cases of mismanagement than was Hon. W. R. Motherwell.

The whole Sirois report indicates the trend towards centralization that has consistently characterized the Liberal party since at least as far back as 1937, when the Sirois commission was appointed. Many other illustrations might be given to show that the Liberal party is a party of centralization. What did the Liberal party do with Pattullo and Hepburn, the premiers of British Columbia and Ontario respectively, because they had the courage to combine with Premier Aberhart of Alberta to wreck the dominion-provincial conference in January, 1941? They were not the only premiers who were opposed to the Sirois report, as I could show by a number of quotations; but they were the men who stood out and had courage to do the thing that had to be done. What did the Liberal party do then? They put Pattullo into oblivion. Where did Hepburn go? It may be said that he retired because of ill health. Well, almost anyone would have ill health after the kind of treatment the Liberals mete out to any man who does not do just what they tell him to do.

Now we have evidence enough to warn us what to expect or suspect in any leader of the present Liberal party in Canada, not judging from what they say, but judging from what they have done.

Is the manoeuvre with which we are now faced, of making a request to the British government, merely a trick to achieve by devious means what the Liberals have failed to achieve by less devious means over the last fourteen years? The suggestion deserves serious attention. What are the possibilities, in case the people who are behind the throne of the Liberal party do mean to centralize power, as I do not doubt?

The proposed measure is more than an amendment of the British North America Act. It constitutes a revolution; it means the utter wrecking of the British North America Act. Anyone who believes otherwise is simply leaving out of consideration many important factors.

What gives permanence and stability to the British North America Act as we know it today? It is the fact that the act was passed by the British parliament. That is the hinge on which it hangs. We have had arguments back and forth as to whether the act is a pact or a statute. However you look at it, the act is given stability by the fact that it is a statute of the British parliament. Is that not so?

If the governments of the provinces met together in a constitutional convention and drafted resolutions they all accepted, and which the people of Canada accepted, you would be able to hang the British North America Act on the hinge of the decisions of that constitutional convention. But no provision has been made for calling such a convention. It is not to be done; it is not proposed. Consequently when this address is acted upon by the British parliament the hinge of the present British North America Act, the anchor or mooring, so to speak, will be swept away and the British North America Act will become a ship adrift. Let us be sure that we are fully aware of that fact. There will be no anchor for it. There will be no appeal to the privy council; that will have been abolished. There will be no appeal to the United Kingdom parliament, because that will have been abolished. There will be no constitutional convention to provide anything in Canada upon which the British North America Act can be hinged. Then can anyone tell me what will be the anchor of the British North America Act? The federal government will be in supreme control with potentially unlimited powers, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). Why? Because no plan will have been prepared for a new Canadian constitution. The provinces will desire a constitution that will genuinely establish and adequately safeguard provincial rights and jurisdiction. The nation could be plunged into a state bordering upon the chaotic, for no one should imagine that after taking this step the Canadian government intends to give the provinces the sort of thing the provinces want and must have. This government will probably come before the provinces in a convention and say, "Now, boys, it is this—or else!" A state of emergency will then have come into being.

Then what? Will not the federal government invoke the peace, order and good government clause of section 91 to deal with the situation? In order to gain some idea of the sort of thing that is in the minds of some of the men who are drafting Liberal party policy I suggest that hon. members take the proposals of the government of Canada from which I read a short time ago and turn to page 10, in the latter part of the first column and the first part of the second column, where we find clearly indicated just the sort of thing that would be contemplated. I have not time to read the passage; I shall have to leave it for hon. members to read for themselves. Would not this move give the federal government plausible arguments for a policy to "displace the authority of the provinces in relation to a vast field in which the provinces would otherwise have exclusive jurisdiction?" I refer to a statement by Lord Haldane, bearing upon a certain judgment. I quote again from page 10:

> The overriding powers enumerated in section 91, as well as the general words at the commencement of the section, may then become applicable to new and special aspects which they cover, of subjects assigned otherwise exclusively to the provinces.

There are very few fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction at the present time. If the dominion government were to invoke that clause contained in section 91, no provincial rights would remain inviolate.

No sane man would ever demolish his house before he had another to replace it. The nation's house is its constitution. No sane nation would contemplate wrecking its constitution before making sure it had another to replace it. That is the solemn fact which faces us.

What is the nature of the change proposed for the British North America Act? If we read section 91, and connect up the passage preceding where this clause is to fit in with what follows, we shall see quite clearly that when I say the dominion government would be given absolute power by the adoption of this address, I am speaking with complete moderation.

British North America Act

What are "the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces"? Anyone who will read section 91 of the British North America Act will discover that it contains many responsibilities, things that cost money, things that are a lot of trouble to administer, but no power in any one of them. There is no assurance of financial means by which to discharge those responsibilities.

As I have said, only one clause, clause No. 13, gives the provinces even a vestige of effective power in asserting those rights, and that clause has to do with property and civil rights. I have indicated already that the invasion of the fields of corporation taxes, personal income taxes and succession duties, virtually destroys the effectiveness of that power. How can a province assert any control over property and civil rights when it has no authority over the taxing power? The central government could pass laws affecting bus lines or trucking companies for example in a province that would make it impossible for them to successfully compete with the railroads. There is nothing to prevent that.

Then, there are alarming considerations in clause 10 of section 92, the only one which gives the province its powers. Let me read clause 10 of section 92.

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:
> (a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other—

That would include bus lines.

> —or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province:
> (b) Lines of steam ships between the province and any British or foreign country;
> (c) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

What would happen to the Alberta oil industry which has been built up with such care and tremendous expenditure on the part of the provincial government, if the federal government—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Now, I am speaking as an Albertan who knows. You just do not know "shucks" about Alberta. All you know is enough to make silly giggles.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I must remind the hon. member that he has exhausted his time and will need the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Blackmore: I do not believe I have exhausted my time, but if you say I have, Mr. Speaker, it is all right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I am informed by the Clerk that the hon. member's time has expired. Unless he has the unanimous consent of the house, he cannot continue.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: I have just this to say, that even under the British North America Act and clause 10 of section 92, which gives the provinces their rights, the dominion government is now empowered to exercise an overriding control in property or civil matters in any province in Canada. I believe that can refer to any kind of property you wish to name. When you consider the impact of dominion financial measures involving the dominion's power over interest, loans and banks, and when you consider the power of the dominion in respect of tariffs, you realize that any industry in any province could be utterly destroyed by measures passed here by this federal government.

If we now give that same federal government more power, what can you expect? I urge, Mr. Speaker, that all people throughout Canada, high and low, give this matter the most careful consideration and bring whatever influence they can to bear upon the Prime Minister and the government to defer this matter for at least three or four months while we think it over.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this matter at any length because I would be compelled to go over many of the arguments advanced by other hon. members. I would have to refer also to the great leaders of the past which has been done by previous speakers. I rise at this moment, Mr. Speaker, to register the opinion of a layman from the cradle of confederation, my province of Prince Edward Island, on this motion.

The question before the house is a motion by the right hon. the Prime Minister requesting an humble address to His Majesty the King for an amendment to the British North America Act of 1867. After listening to the debate, one would be forced to conclude that that is not all. I have listened to and read a great many of the speeches that have been made in the house on this constitutional question. Some of the speakers are the ablest lawyers in Canada, but some extremely good addresses have been made by laymen I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if an unbiased vote were taken on the arguments that have been brought forth on this motion, the motion would be defeated and the arguments dispersed to the four winds of oblivion. However, I do not believe it is possible to have an unbiased, nonpartisan vote.

In all the speeches that have been made in favour of this motion, I have attempted to find one democratic reason for the haste in bringing this matter forward at this session. The haste may be caused by the desire to fulfil some underground promises made during the last election. If no promises were made, then some undertaking must have been given to some of the people in this country that, if elected, there would be a complete severance of our ties with the British commonwealth of nations. Anyone is free to draw his own conclusions. After listening to the debate on this question, I have every reason for drawing my own deductions.

The motion before the house, then, concerns the securing of authority to change our constitution or, as the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has said, practically throwing away the British North America Act. When one considers this in conjunction with other legislation, namely the abolition of the right of appeal to the privy council, one asks the question, Why? It is simply because this government, or at least some of the members of it, have outgrown their British commonwealth pants and now wish to strut around with their thumbs in their vests, declaring to this country that we are old enough and big enough to carry on our own business. Perhaps that may be true. They have a perfect right to those thoughts. But beneath it all there is one determination and there is a submerged and real danger in it for the provinces of Canada.

The present Liberal government have been returned to power with a large majority. They have a mandate from the people; this large majority gives them that mandate. I hope that it has not awakened in their minds the unholy desire for centralized power and control at Ottawa to the detriment of the provinces, both from a political point of view and otherwise. I also hope that this determination to scrap the last vestige of a tie with the mother country will not result in the passing or the endeavour to pass this motion.

Each of us must think in terms of his own province and what it would mean. The Liberal party at the present time appear to have made up their minds to get a still stronger stranglehold on the provinces and on the affairs of each individual, as it were, so they can dictate provincially, without the possibility of a come-back from any of the provinces; because they do not intend at the present time to ask their advice with regard to changes that are to be made.

As I see it, the picture is this. We seem to be heading straight for a soviet Canada; it looks as if we want to sovietize Canada. It is not far off if we continue to bring in legislation of this kind, whereby an election need only be held at the will of the government in power which can practically control things and tell people how, when, and why they should vote. All this can be looked upon as probable, having regard to the undue haste to get this legislation through. It is not what they are really wanting at the present time. It is only that they must have power, more power and still more power, control, and centralization of everything at Ottawa.

Canada has already obtained its independence. This fact is recognized by everybody. But with this independence, is it Canada's desire to break off all connections with the British commonwealth of nations? I do not believe that the citizens of this country have that desire. There is, however, something else we should consider in connection with this matter. We must look to the future. Canada occupies a unique position, being the connecting link with Britain and with western Europe and, through Britain and western Europe, with the United States. That position must be preserved. While we may have the right to sever the link, why do it at the present time? I would ask the Prime Minister that question.

Through the administration of justice lies the hope for the future. Justice is our common bond with all nations. Prince Edward Island, the cradle of confederation, did not join the union in 1867 or, as it is sometimes called, the pact or agreement; but it matters not what you call it. There was a three-cornered pact anyhow between the provinces, the dominion as it was formed, and the mother country. We did not join in 1867 because the terms offered to us were not considered to be satisfactory. However, we could not be coerced to join because the power to deal with the matter was left to the legislature of our own province. But in 1873, after being wooed by the other provinces, and after better terms were granted, our province entered the union. When we entered it, our province knew that they would have the protection of the terms of the British North America Act in case of non-fulfilment in a large degree of the terms under which they entered confederation. Now all this will be done away with if this motion passes and if the ideas in passing it are carried into effect.

On Monday last we all listened to an address given in this chamber by the Prime Minister of India. Let us take a lesson from India. I think the example set by India ought not to be overlooked. India was granted complete independence a little over a year ago and is now what might be termed a republic. Yet the right of appeal to the privy council would seem not to be done away with. If this is so, is it not a tribute to the value of the relationship that still exists?

I know that if the celebrated lawyers in this house would look up their weekly notes for the month of August, they would find a summary of an important case that India appealed to the British commonwealth of nations.

The passing of this motion in an arbitrary way, without the consent of the legislatures of the ten provinces, opens the door to the removal of many of the rights of minorities which the British North America Act seeks to guard.

At the present time Britain is experiencing hard going. This hard going is the result of her stand in the last war. She is fighting for her very existence today. A move at this time to further separate this country from Britain will no doubt be interpreted as a break in the solidarity of the British commonwealth, which will no doubt give pleasure to some places and to some individuals.

This is so great a departure from our present system that the whole question should be given a great deal of study, and time should be given for consideration. The question is not one on which all people can make a hasty decision such as we are asked to make at this time.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make any extended remarks. In closing I just wish to say through you, sir, to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that the motion will carry, as he knows, because of the rubber-stamp voting power; but with the weight of argument clearly shown by former speakers in this house and the precedents established by Canada's builders of the past and the agreement of the three parties to the contract this motion should be delayed in order that all parties to our confederation may have a voice in the matter. Then when you decide to put this motion before all parties to the contract you will know that democracy will reconfederate Canada.

Again, should this motion be adopted, giving the government the power to amend its own constitution, without consulting the provinces, one hates to anticipate what the future may evolve. I should like to suggest that should this motion carry the opposition should bring in a minority report in the form of an address to His Majesty the King so that the rights of the provinces of Canada will be given back to them and not destroyed.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in approaching this subject, and in discussing it in the house, some hon. members have put on 1949 glasses when they should look at the constitution through 1867 glasses, and that hon. members are approaching this subject with what they would hope to see in the constitution rather than what is actually in it.

The other day the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) cited some of the remarks I made in a speech in Montreal. From them he gathered that there was a division in the cabinet on this matter, and that the government should proceed cautiously. From my remarks I think hon. members will see that there is no division in the cabinet on the matter. The hon. member for Broadview was referring to a speech that I made in Montreal. Curiously enough the words that he attributes to me were cited from an English newspaper of Montreal and were placed in quotation marks. On that occasion I had no written speech. I had only notes, and the remarks I gave were in French, so I do not see how people could quote me the way they did. In this speech I am reported as having said that Mr. Duplessis is fond of grandiloquent speeches. I do not remember using those exact words, but if I did not I should have.

In that speech reference was made to another speech that had been made by the premier of Quebec in which he recalled to memory what the St. Eustache patriots did in 1837 to obtain a responsible government; also another event of 1841. What I said on that occasion in reference to the patriots of 1837 was that they did fight for the recognition of responsible government, and they also asked the right, the sacred right as a matter of fact, to choose their own representatives. I added to that and said that on June 27 the people of all Canada did the same thing as the patriots of 1837, and chose the representatives they wanted to represent them in the federal house for the next four years. I said further that the people from the various provinces, and particularly from the province of Quebec, having elected Liberal members to represent them, one would not expect that these same members would be treated as strangers when they go back to their own province as we have been by the premier of Quebec.

In that same speech Mr. Duplessis said that in 1867 representatives of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia got together to discuss the constitutional problems.

What I said was that there was no province of Quebec at that time and there was no province of Ontario. There was only one province of Canada, and the provinces had been created by the Constitutional Act. On that occasion I cited a friend of Mr. Duplessis, Sir Thomas Chapais, who had this to say on the constitution of the provinces.

I quote from Thomas Chapais' "Cours d'histoire du Canada", volume 8, page 213:

. . . especially that part of confederation which affects more particularly the French-Canadian group. We owe them (the fathers of confederation) a debt of gratitude for creating—in the welter of conflicting interests and the intricacies of constitutional problems—a little homeland, the province of Quebec, so dear to us, to which they have given such vitality. Indeed, as far as what was known as Lower Canada, their main achievement is the establishment of a provincial state, of a legislature that is truly ours, where we are the guardians of our closest interests. We have thus been able to achieve an end which the French-Canadian group had struggled to attain, for a whole century, amidst innumerable perils and dangers.

Taking Sir Thomas Chapais as authority, I showed that neither the province of Quebec as such, nor the province of Ontario as such existed in 1867, and that it was only through the enactment of the British North America Act that they came into being.

(Text):

Mr. Duplessis went on to say that the provinces retained to themselves the full authority to deal with matters pertaining to the protection of their rights and privileges. As a matter of fact, as I have just said, the provinces did not exist at that time; therefore they could not have agreed, and they could not have given or retained any powers whatsoever. Mr. Duplessis said: "It was a compact." He went a little further than that. He said: "It was a notarial act." On that occasion I said: "If it was a notarial act he should produce it." As to the matter of a compact or a contract I shall come back to that in a moment. Mr. Duplessis said: "It was a compact that could not be changed without the full consent of the parties concerned." I shall also deal with that a little later.

The premier expressed fear that changes in the constitution, as advocated by the Liberals at Ottawa, might reduce provincial autonomy. I have emphasized the point, and I do so again, that in the motion before the house there is not one iota of a change in so far as rights and privileges of provinces or of minorities or of religion or what-have-you are concerned. We are endeavouring only to find a procedure whereby in Canada we shall be able to do what is done at the present time in London. We have no intention of changing by one iota the rights that are contained in the constitution at the present time. We wish only to add to the constitution machinery of procedure whereby, if at some time in the future there is any necessity to amend the British North America Act, it will be found there instead of being absent from the text.

This brings me to the other remark made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I am supposed to have said that "This—extending the French language to all Canada—will be done when the constitution is amended", the reference being to section 133. I did not say anything about amending section 133. I drew the attention of the population of Quebec to the fact that section 133 protected the French language in the federal government at Ottawa, in the federal courts and in the province of Quebec. There is no guarantee under section 133 for the use of the French language elsewhere than in Quebec and Ottawa. I said that it could not be claimed that Canada is a bilingual country. I said also that I would fight in the future—not at this time, because no change is contemplated in section 133—to have Canada known as a bilingual country and to have section 133 amended if necessary so that the French and English languages would be official throughout Canada.

Then a word with regard to the extension of social security benefits, which was referred to also by the hon. member for Broadview. All I said was that I did not recognize the right of the premier of Quebec to use the allowances paid by the federal government to the children of Quebec to buy schoolbooks which up to then had been furnished gratuitously by a Liberal government.

We have to go back to 1837, 1840, 1864 and 1867 to find out what the real spirit of the constitution was. Mr. Duplessis said:

(Translation):

We need a strong confederation based on the spirit that inspired the confederation pact.

(Text):

I was asking what spirit had guided the fathers of confederation when they adopted their resolutions. Mr. Duplessis said that the fathers of confederation would never have consented to the subordination of the French Canadian people under a law which could be changed at any time. I am not attempting to say today what might have happened at that time if those people had had such a thought. I can only point out what in reality they have put it in the agreement and in the law. Mr. Duplessis said that it would be impossible for them to survive if the legislature disappeared. There is no intention to have the legislature disappear. On the contrary, we are seeking to create a procedure, or to have the provinces agree as to what procedure should be followed in connection with questions that concern them. That is the whole question.

British North America Act

What is the spirit and letter of the British North America Act? The preamble of the act is quite illuminating. It reads:

Whereas the provinces of Canada—

It does not read "the provinces of Quebec and Ontario"; it reads "the provinces of Canada". As Mr. Duplessis said, the Union Act of 1840 united the two provinces into one province. The preamble continues:

—Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion—

I draw the attention of the house to the difference between the French and English versions of that preamble, because this is probably what has brought about the idea of a contract. The French text reads, at least as I find it in Chapais' book:

(Translation):

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to enter into a contract for the purpose of forming a federal union which would unite them into one dominion.

(Text):

The English text says that there is a desire to be federally united into one dominion. After the fathers of confederation had expressed their desire the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, granted their request or, at least, the greater part of it. As I said the other day, it is just like a group of students who desired to have a holiday but which could not be enjoyed until the principal of the school said it was all right.

The constitution is divided into a number of sections. The preliminary sections are Nos. 1 to 8. The executive power of the federal government is covered by sections 9 to 16. The legislative power of the dominion is covered by sections 17 to 57. The provincial executive power is covered by sections 58 to 90. The distribution of the legislative powers as between the federal and provincial governments is dealt with in sections 91 to 95. The judicature is dealt with in sections 96 to 101. Then there are sections dealing with revenues and other miscellaneous matters. Those constitute the letter of the constitution.

In 1864 there were two divergent views about what the constitution of Canada should be. It was argued by some that there should be a legislative union, but that argument was put aside because it was felt that a country like Canada with different languages, different religions and different races could not be governed by the one government.

Others wanted omnipotent provincial legislatures, but that was also put aside. The fathers of confederation adopted a middle course and decided on a federal union with federal and provincial governments. What was the spirit that inspired them at that time? Section 90 reads:

The following provisions of this act respecting the parliament of Canada, namely,—

I drop down a few lines:

—the disallowance of acts—

And again:

—shall extend and apply to the legislatures of the several provinces as if those provisions were here re-enacted and made applicable in terms to the respective provinces and the legislatures thereof, with the substitution of the lieutenant governor of the province for the Governor General—

et cetera. It would appear that in 1867 the fathers of confederation gave to the federal government the power of disallowance of all acts passed by the provinces. The fathers of confederation gave to the federal government a supervisory power over what was to be done by the provinces. That is incorporated in the act of 1867 and has not been changed. It shows what was the intention in the minds of the fathers of confederation. Section 91, as everybody knows, has to do with federal powers. It reads:

It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces—

Therefore the residuary power is given by the fathers of confederation to the federal government. Section 91 goes on to say:

—and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms in this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated . . .

A list of subjects follows. The third one is the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. I emphasize the words, "by any mode or system of taxation". On the other hand, section 92 reads:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

And No. 2 reads:

Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

There is some sort of overlapping power as far as direct taxation is concerned. There is no doubt in my mind that both the federal and the provincial governments have the right to tax directly. At this point I should like to cite the case of John Deere Plow v. Wharton as follows:

The form in which provisions in terms overlapping each other have been placed side by side, shews that those who passed the Confederation Act intended to leave the working out and interpretation of these provisions to practice and to judicial decision.

That is a decision of the privy council. Proceeding with the discussion of the various powers, and having in mind what was said by the members of the privy council in the case of John Deere Plow v. Wharton, I wish to draw the attention of the house to section 96, which reads:

The governor general shall appoint the judges of the superior, district, and county courts in each province, . . .

There again the fathers of confederation decided in 1864 that the judges of all superior courts, all district courts and all county courts should be appointed by the federal government and not by the provinces. Therefore they gave the right to the federal authority to appoint those judges.

When it is pointed out that, according to the decision of the privy council, any interpretation which is not clear should be submitted to the courts, we are faced with the objection that it is advantageous for the federal government to do that because it appoints all the judges. The federal government appoints all the judges because it was so decided by the fathers of confederation in 1867. When the argument is advanced that we should have federal judges on one side and provincial judges on the other side to decide on some point of the constitution, I say that is impossible. I say there are no such things as federal judges or provincial judges. There is no such thing as a judge with a federal mentality or a judge with a provincial mentality, and if there is any such person should not be allowed to preside in a constitutional case because he has prejudged the case, and that should not be done.

Section 101 reads:

The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada . . .

That is what we have done with our supreme court. I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that, whereas in all cases of civil jurisdiction, according to article 92 the power to create civil courts has been given to the provinces, with the judges to be appointed by the federal government, in the case of the Supreme Court of Canada, the general court of appeal for Canada, the maintenance, creation and organization of the courts and the nomination of judges are matters given to the federal authority. I say again this power is according to the spirit of the fathers of confederation when they wrote the constitution.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) pointed out another instance which shows what the spirit of the fathers of confederation was. According to section 92, paragraph 10, of the British North America Act, it is sufficient for the parliament of Canada to declare that something is for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces for that matter to fall under federal jurisdiction. That again shows that the fathers of confederation wanted it to be that way. Otherwise they would not have written it the way they did.

Another clause which shows exactly the same trend in their minds is section 118 which reads:

According to section 118, the federal government has to pay the provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures the amounts therein enumerated. The provinces were not satisfied with the amounts set out in section 118, and on four or five occasions they asked that they be increased. There again I say that the purpose and spirit of the fathers of confederation is in the act at the present time, and has been there since 1867.

As to amendments, the fathers of confederation after making the various provisions they have made, and that I indicated a moment ago, provided for the amendment of the provincial constitution by the provinces themselves. Therefore they gave some thought at the time to the question of amendments. They did not, however, incorporate in the constitution any provisions as to what was to be the procedure to be followed in the case of amendments. We therefore have to go back to the general law that the authority which is empowered to pass a law also has the power to amend it; and I will go even further than that and say, to put it completely aside. Therefore we have to go back to the imperial parliament in London in order to bring about any amendment to the act. It has been argued that the provinces should be consulted. There again I go back to 1867, 1869 and 1870, and I look at what the fathers of confederation have done. Taking the first two amendments, one of them, if I am not mistaken, dealt with the increase of the subsidies to be paid to the provinces, a purely provincial matter. The fathers of confederation did not go to the provinces to ask for their consent. In the first two amendments the fathers of confederation did not even come before parliament to ask for assent. They acted on their own, as a government. Are we going to accuse the fathers of confederation of having acted contrary to the ideas they had themselves expressed in the constitution, because in 1869 or 1871 they did not seek the consent of the provinces?

Are we going to accuse them of attempting to destroy the work they had done in previous years? Why therefore should we be accused today when we do exactly what the fathers of confederation did at that time? Why are we faced with an accusation of that kind, when the fathers of confederation at no time consulted the provinces in regard to any amendment?

Some of the amendments made in later years were opposed by the provinces. Now let us transpose ourselves to London, where the authority for amendment rests. It is the British parliament which has had to decide up to the present how amendments were to be effected. They have decided who had authority to suggest any amendment. One after the other they have accepted the amendments which have been forwarded after receiving the approval of both houses of this parliament; and they have consistently refused to even consider any amendments suggested by the provincial legislatures. In three or four instances, one concerning British Columbia, two concerning Quebec and I think one having to do with Prince Edward Island, after resolutions were forwarded from this parliament representations were made by the provinces asking that the amendments should not be passed. The imperial government refused to consider those objections, and adopted the resolutions exactly as they had been suggested by this parliament.

What happened in 1943, when there was an amendment of the act which I think had to do with redistribution? On July 22 of that year Mr. Price, speaking in the parliament at Westminster, said:

> I entirely endorse what the hon. gentleman has just said, that we ought not to discuss the matter, but I think we ought to ask why a sovereign parliament in one of our great dominions has to be before us at all. I really think it is an anomaly, and, though it may not be possible to get rid of it at this moment, I hope my right hon. friend may be able to give us an assurance that at some future date, as early as possible, it will be got rid of.

Then on July 26, 1943, Mr. Anthony Eden had this to say:

> I think it is quite clear to the house that this bill deals with a matter which is entirely within the discretion and judgment of the Canadian legislature. In a sense, therefore, this is a purely formal bill.

Then I come to Mr. Beverley Baxter, for whom I know some of my hon. friends on the other side have great respect. He had this to say:

> It should be possible to pass a resolution in both houses here and in Canada that in future any alteration or amendment to the British North America Act should be done solely by the Canadian parliament, that the Canadian parliament should itself make any alteration in the Canadian constitution, and that this house should forgo forever any further passing of any act or measure affecting any of the dominions.

So I say that as the act stands now, with the meaning that has been given to it by the fathers of confederation, the right to amend the whole constitution rests with London, except in relation to provincial constitutions. As someone has said already, we wish to repatriate the right of amendment; but at the present time we desire to do it only with respect to that portion of the constitution dealing with the federal field. We want the provinces to get together with us, not to examine the rights and privileges of anybody, not to make a new delimitation of the powers or privileges of the federal or provincial governments, but to devise a new procedure. We want to get together and agree if possible on some procedure we can incorporate in our constitution, for our Canadian purposes, so that at some future time we may not have to ask ourselves whether or not it is necessary to get the consent of the provinces to amend our constitution. We want to know what the procedure will be for the future, and we want to discuss it with the provinces on friendly terms. We will agree to give the provinces necessary guarantees, if they want them, in regard to language, religion and education.

So I fail to see how the provinces, or the minorities in the provinces, will be protected any the less by what we are doing than if we did not do it at all. We want an agreement to protect the rights of those minorities. Is the premier of Quebec going to refuse to meet with us and discuss what further security or what other guarantees we can give with respect to provincial rights concerning education, language and religion?

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): The proposed address concerning the amendment of the constitution appears at page 828 of Hansard, but since it is rather lengthy I shall not take time to read it. However, I wish to offer some comment with respect particularly to education and taxation, and to indicate my disapproval of the procedure that has been suggested by the government. In discussing this proposal the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to a statement he made last May:

> A method should be worked out to amend our own constitution. It is our intention after the election to consult the provinces as to the method by which amendments to our constitution shall be made.

This government received a mandate to proceed with the question of amending the constitution, but only after consulting the provinces. With that I may be in some measure of agreement. The principle was approved at a conference in December, 1935, and I should like to bring this to the attention of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. That conference adopted a resolution moved by Hon. L. A. Taschereau, K.C., the then premier and attorney general of the province of Quebec, which emphasized that a method for amending the constitution should be devised by representatives of the dominion and provincial governments before any steps were taken in that direction. According to correspondence between the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers, at least six of the premiers, a majority, disagreed to some extent with the procedure proposed by the government. In the closing part of his letter, the premier of Alberta stated:

> We strongly urge that this whole matter be held in abeyance pending the conference which you propose to convene at the close of the present session of parliament. It seems to us that this is the only way in which future conflict can be avoided and the unity of Canada, which we all desire, preserved and strengthened.

I believe that is very important. It is the keynote of the greater part of the correspondence from the various premiers.

I should like to refer particularly, however, to the letter from Premier Campbell of Manitoba, since he is the premier of my native province. This letter is found at page 875 of Hansard and is dated October 6, 1949.

> The government of Manitoba would be pleased to discuss with the federal government and the governments of the several provinces the questions mentioned by you at any time and place that is mutually convenient.
> Your letter indicates that your government has already decided to ask the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act so that the parliament of Canada would have authority to amend the constitution of Canada, but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the rights and privileges with respect to education and to the use of the English and French languages. The government of Manitoba feels that there might be differences of opinion as to whether a proposed amendment to the constitution related only to federal matters or affected provincial interests, rights, or jurisdiction. Before agreeing to any specific proposal, therefore, our government will examine carefully the manner in which the provincial position is to be protected.
> The main purpose of the conference, as I understand it, would be to try to evolve a method of making, within Canada, amendments to those provisions of the constitution which concern both federal and provincial governments. The government of Manitoba realizes that a conference such as this will be dealing with difficult and complex constitutional problems, and that progress towards a solution of them can be made by representatives of Canada and the provinces meeting together. Our government is therefore of the opinion that a preliminary conference, comprising constitutional experts, though not necessarily limited to them, would be useful in clarifying many of the issues involved. We would consequently welcome the calling of such a preparatory conference, and will be glad to participate in it.
> I assume that the Manitoba government will be furnished with an agenda for either the preparatory conference or a dominion-provincial conference in sufficient time to afford us an opportunity of discussing items on the agenda and to enable our representatives to make full preparations.
> Yours sincerely,
> Douglas Campbell

I believe that clearly sets forth the position of the premier of Manitoba, and the same principle is embodied in the letters from the premiers of the other provinces.

Added to that, the premier made a detailed speech which he delivered in the Manitoba legislature on March 24, 1949, in which he said this was his first full speech on the subject of dominion-provincial relations since occupying his present position. He also says he will deal with the benefits which Manitoba secures from the present agreement between Ottawa and Manitoba as well as criticisms of the agreement. I quote from his speech:

> During the depression period of the 1930's, several of the provinces of Canada found it to be impossible to provide for their people.

Further down on this same page, he says:

> This situation existed throughout that entire period despite the fact that the government of Manitoba had imposed a level of taxation which was higher than that imposed by any other government in Canada, and despite the fact that the services provided to Manitoba people were at a level much lower than that which would be considered satisfactory under modern conditions.

I turn now to page 8 of the premier's detailed speech.

> —it is significant to point out that the two plans which were submitted to the dominion-provincial conference by the province of Ontario recognized this principle explicitly by providing that payments should be made to the provinces in accordance with need.

I believe that is a rather significant statement to be embodied in the speech of the present premier of the province of Manitoba.

On page 11 of his speech he states:

> The government—

That is the government of Manitoba.

> —definitely agrees that a conference should be held as soon as practicable, but, to our mind, the timing of the conference is fundamental, and we are consequently of the view that it should be called immediately after the next dominion election. I am, therefore, prepared to state to the house now that this government will take the initiative in asking that a conference be called as quickly as possible after the dominion election.

In the last paragraph, he says:

> —it advocates a procedure for obtaining a still better tax agreement.

The premier of Manitoba has been fairly consistent, according to this detailed speech delivered in the Manitoba legislature on March 24, 1949.

Mr. Cruickshank: Did we not hold an election on June 27?

Mr. Ross (Souris): That speech is in keeping with the letter he wrote in reply to the letter received from the Prime Minister of Canada.

Speaking of education in the province of Manitoba, it may be realized that approximately seventy-five per cent of the entire cost of education in that province is borne by taxation on real estate. I have been greatly concerned about that matter ever since I was associated with municipal affairs, and have continued to be concerned about it since coming to Ottawa. Under such a system, equality of education is not possible for the youth of this land. Year after year the policy of assessing land which brought in no revenue, and endeavouring to collect taxes from that land, has been followed.

Mr. Hunter: Speak to the motion.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Was the hon. member referring to me?

Mr. Hunter: Yes.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I suppose the hon. member is not a bit concerned about education in Canada.

Mr. Hunter: I am concerned about the question before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I presume I am quite in order, Mr. Speaker, because this motion distinctly deals with matters between the dominion and provinces; and the municipalities, who are to large degree responsible for education, have no recourse other than through their provincial government.

I am going to give you one concrete example. A school board in Manitoba increased its budget for 1948 by fifty per cent over 1947. That increase of fifty per cent in that budget actually meant an increase of seventy-five per cent on the farm land and other real estate within that consolidated-school area. I suppose that concrete example could be repeated in many places. Not only that, but in that same school area a number of farmers, living along the river bank, on land which was among the highest in assessment, lost three entire crops as a result of floods. One can imagine the position in which it put those people.

Owing to the fact that seventy-five per cent of the cost of education in that province must be borne by real estate it is absolutely impossible, as I have said, to have equality of education, especially when you compare that with the other provinces. I profess to know something about what has happened in Ontario in the past years. I will repeat what I have said in this house and on the hustings. I know the statement has been disputed on the hustings by people in high office; but, since some of those people are here today, they can deny it if they will. When the leader of the opposition was premier of Ontario and minister of education, the grants to school districts were greatly increased. In some of the more difficult areas these grants were increased to as much as ninety per cent. Imagine what a municipality could do for other services when it was relieved of that proportion of the cost of education? I make that comparison because I think that is something towards which we should be striving.

To me it has been an exceedingly important matter. Last fall at the municipal convention in Manitoba Mr. Morton, the municipal commissioner, pointed out the financial difficulties that many municipalities were getting themselves into. In his speech to that great convention he stated that they were then the sum of $3 million poorer in realizable assets than they were in the year 1945, and that for the immediate past year they had an operating cash deficit of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. That situation has a distinct bearing on the type of education that these people can provide for the youth of the land who happen to live within that province, and I think it is a most important matter.

Then I want to make some reference to an organization known as the Manitoba teachers' federation. Their brief has been endorsed by what is to me the greatest and the most influential organization in Canada, namely, the Canadian Legion. Nobody will dispute what that great organization did throughout the war years in assisting the government of the day in various aspects of the problems which they had before them. First of all, this federation points out:

> . . . a new definition of education which involves the all-round development of the child and an emphasis on citizenship, make the educational perspective of 1867 and a narrow interpretation of the provisions laid down in respect to education in the B.N.A. Act untenable today.

I agree wholeheartedly with that statement and with many others in their presentation. They say:

> Migration of population within our country, accelerated immigration as witnessed in the past two years, and an apparent inability on the part of provincial authorities to meet the demands of the situation, accentuate the need for the federal government to study the problem in the interests of the nation as a whole.

They go on to state:

> We are faced with a national problem. To the degree that the education of Canadian boys and girls is deficient or insufficient, we reduce the prosperity of our nation and increase the vulnerability of our national security.

Further on they state:

> Federal aid for education is a need born of a shift in taxation. Meeting this need may involve fiscal control—safeguards in the spending of funds from the federal treasury—but not policy control.

They make the point extremely clear that while they must have federal aid in the matter of funds, the policy should remain with the various provinces. They state:

> In any plan of federal assistance it would be understood and agreed that the expenditure of funds by the government of Canada would in no way be deemed to confer upon any minister or official of the government of Canada any right of supervision or control over any school or educational institution with respect to which any federal government funds are expended.

Their officials state:

> Why should we not match the family allowances with grants to the provinces on a per pupil capita basis earmarked for education and conditional upon the province not reducing its budget for education?

I have pointed out that this suggestion had been endorsed by the Canadian Legion. They had asked for federal grants for education. I am sure nobody will dispute the standing of the Canadian Legion in this great nation of ours.

Mr. Cruickshank: Do not bring it into politics now.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not bringing it into politics. I am trying to keep this discussion on a non-political basis. I am pointing out what a controversial subject this could be as between the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. Cruickshank: And you are directly opposing the opinion of your leader.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is a good friend of mine and he is an able man. He is capable of making his own speech on this matter, and I am sure he can do it justice.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hope I do better than you are doing.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have stated, Mr. Speaker, that I am wholeheartedly in favour of federal aid for education. I have pointed out the great difficulties that now exist, from the financial point of view, in the various provinces throughout this country and the effect this fact has upon the municipalities within those provinces. My sympathy is not only with the municipal corporations in the province of Manitoba but with many municipal corporations in other provinces of Canada. Those people who find themselves in office and responsible for the administration of municipal affairs are finding the position difficult today not only with respect to education but with respect to many other matters; and in due course the provinces find it difficult to adjust matters with them as they should be adjusted. The only recourse is a conference between the various provincial governments and the dominion government.

In debate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated:

> Whether or not the granting of financial assistance by the federal government to the various provinces could be arranged in such a manner as to avoid exercising any direct or indirect control over the field of education, which is essentially within provincial jurisdiction, is a question offering greater possibilities of controversy.

I am sure we all fully realize that situation. I want to emphasize that statement made by the Prime Minister in order that those people who are seeking this assistance may realize some of the difficulties which lie ahead of them.

I am inclined to agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) this afternoon, when he pointed out that this procedure for the amendment of our constitution should be the concern of every community organization within every province throughout the Dominion of Canada. I think that the various provincial governments, whose premiers have spoken as they have, should have the wholehearted support of every chamber of commerce and of every other like organization throughout this nation. There is no reason in the world why this government could not let this matter stand in abeyance for a few months, as they have been asked to do by the majority of the premiers of the provinces of this country. No harm would come of it; on the contrary, I am sure that much good would accrue to the various municipal organizations as well as to the provinces, ultimately bringing about greater equality of education for the youth of this great nation which, by the way, is the greatest asset of any nation at this time. I shall be forced to vote against this procedure, as it is now proposed, although I believe wholeheartedly in certain amendments to our constitution at this time.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate at this late date; and even at this time I am buoyed up with the hope that the remarks I make may be a contribution to the general objective which we all have in mind. I intend, if I can, to strip of all complexities and so on the whole matter of difference between us, to try to find out just wherein we differ and how serious that difference may be. In doing so I shall not quote from anyone.

I see that you are becoming nervous, Mr. Speaker; you anticipate something. Shall I continue?

Mr. Speaker: It is expected that the house will receive a message from the Senate.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am told the officials are waiting outside. I move the adjournment of the debate.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

An act to amend the Department of Justice Act.

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1950.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Garson.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose just before the dinner recess I had begun by saying that I had no intention of quoting anybody, be they great men or otherwise, but that I intended, in laymen's language, to try to find the exact difference between us as to this problem which, in my judgment, is a simple one, and can be put in words of one syllable. I said I had no intention of quoting great men. I hope I am not cynical, but in my judgment the word "great" has been used altogether too loosely.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

There is no difficulty in being a so-called great man in an expanding economy or in an expanding geography as, for example, the occupation of the middle and western portions of the United States and Canada. In my time greatness has been exemplified by only three men. Two of them are dead. The direct representative of one of them honoured this chamber by his presence just the other day. The second one died in the achievement of that to which he had devoted his life, and in an endeavour in which he lost his life. The third one is still living. I trust that politics will not find in him the feet of clay which we find in most of these people to whom at one time or another we have attributed greatness. If I were asked to choose the man in the Dominion of Canada who most nearly deserves the right to that appellation I would have only one choice. He is not a statesman; he is not a soldier. I think the greatest man whom Canada has produced was that eminent doctor, Sir William Osler. I say that because we must judge people by their contribution to the world and to humanity, and for that quality of high courage in times of adversity. Therefore I think the men I have mentioned qualify.

I said to you, Mr. Speaker, that I would endeavour to find just where we differ. It is a fact that the trouble in which we now find ourselves arises because the fathers of confederation did not provide us in our constitution with a method of curing the ills which were inherent in it. People much more accustomed to research than I am, and more industrious than I am, tell me that the confederation debates are singularly silent on the subject. One can scarcely believe that was an accident. I do not think the fathers of confederation did not contemplate what would appear after the event as something of great simplicity, namely, a method of amendment. Therefore my conclusion is that perhaps with some deliberateness they omitted mention of the method of amendment in their reported debates, and thought that was one thing that they might just as well leave alone at the moment because they might get into the difficulties which are now apparent in the discussions of the problem which confronts us today.

Just what is our problem? No amendments to the constitution are contemplated at this time. In so far as I have heard or have read, no major changes are necessary. By that I mean division of authority and that kind of thing. A major amendment is necessary in connection with the very matter of amendment itself. Therefore we come down to a simple position of difference. Some of us say that it should not be done without consultation with those authorities who gave us all of our authority. Whether that was by agreement, pact, treaty or something else, I do not care. From all the speeches to which I have listened I would say that we are very nearly unanimous in the opinion that the constitution of Canada, both dominion and provincial, should be amended by Canadians, and that we should not be put to the necessity of going through certain motions which in these modern days are nothing but motions; in other words, the elimination of the red tape, because that is all it is, in having this sort of thing done.

I am not going to criticize anyone. I am not going to say that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said one thing before the election and now does the other. I express no bad faith in any member who has spoken nor shall I, I hope, in any member who votes on this measure. Coming down to the crux of the problem, the nub—I like that word, and I am sure it is one that has been used quite often by the Prime Minister in practising his profession—we come down to one thing only. We all agree that Canadians should amend their own constitution. We are not agreed as to method. I know that the obvious reply to the things I am saying is that we have debated this matter for eighty-two years. All the major parties—I hope my friends to my left will forgive that expression—

Mr. Gillis: Considering where it comes from we will.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sorry, but I did not hear you; perhaps it is just as well. The two major parties, if again I may use that expression without offence, have put themselves on record more than once in favour of the broad principle. Here we are sitting in this House of Commons, some 260 odd—there may be the odd vacant chair, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot see them; from your point of view you may be able to see the odd vacant seat but I cannot see them at the moment—trying to do what? We admit that we are all in favour of the broad principle, and yet we are fighting over matters that in themselves are perhaps of little consequence, but in the sum they add up to what? They add up to one very simple thing; that is, should we consult the other interested parties now or should we move on our own now and consult them at a later date?

That is the only problem before this house at this time. I go back to where I was a moment ago. I realize that someone may say, "Well, if we have been at it for eighty-two years it is time we got some action". There is validity in that argument, but it is immediately answered by the suggestion I offer; that if we have been at it for eighty-two years, another six months is not going to hurt anybody, particularly when we know that immediately after the conclusion of this session the interested parties are going to meet and talk to one another. Then it may be said that because of certain things we have seen in the newspapers there is no object in calling such a conference. In my judgment that argument has no validity whatever. We all know that if we who differ carry on these controversies in the newspapers, as one is being carried on now, it does not help the situation when people get together in order to try to solve their difficulties. So the argument that there is no use doing this thing, having this conference, I discard immediately. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is not here. I am sure he is better occupied in whatever he is doing than he would be in listening to me, but if he were here I am sure he would be the first to agree that in the history of labour relations, the history of conciliation, everyone starts out by saying, "This is rock bottom, beyond which I will not go". The fellow on the other side says exactly the same thing. But time works wonders, and in time they come together. You may introduce a conciliator or an arbitrator, but in time practically all matters are resolved to the general satisfaction of both sides, and business life goes on in the community. So I hope no one will say that just because A says this is a matter of life and death, and there he is going to stand, he necessarily means that. He is nothing more than a smart David Harum who thinks he is in a horse trade, and he is trying to convey the best possible impression to the audience before the trading really starts. In my judgment that is where we are today.

I had no intention of speaking on this matter this evening. I know everyone says that, Mr. Speaker, but in this case I mean it. I am not suggesting that I have a more exacting conscience than anyone else, but I speak in this simple way tonight after having given the matter my best thought and believing that it is my moral duty to say what I am saying, in an endeavour to preserve the idea of conciliation so that our Canadian way of life may not be subjected to jolts from which the country may suffer for a long time. Even in my time to call a man a compromiser was to insult him. Then we had the expression "the middle of the road", and we thought, "What a weakling. He will not stand by his principles, but goes down the middle of the road. He will compromise with anybody". Today to credit a man with the ability to compromise is to pay him a great compliment. That is one of the changes in the thinking of our people within the last few years. I agree most heartily that to call a man a compromiser is indeed not a reflection upon him but definitely a compliment.

So what is our position now? I have no intention of entering upon any legal discussion, but there is a point that has been bothering me. Once we have stepped into the field we are taking over in this bill, then whether or not we like it or whether or not we know it we are undertaking to define a statute which the privy council has been busy defining ever since 1867. It is so easy to say that we are dealing only with those matters which are not within the jurisdiction of the provinces. To me that means nothing. Perhaps that is an exaggeration, but to me it is not an exact phrase, nor is it an expression which can be accurately interpreted to this House of Commons. With the complexity of our life, business and governmental, new situations are bound to arise from time to time, so you can never put that line down on a piece of paper and say this is it. Someone may say, "Well, now we have the Supreme Court of Canada to determine that line, as in times gone by we have had the privy council." That is not enough. If by our legislation we say that the line goes here, I put it to any lawyer on the opposite side of this house: on what possible ground can the Supreme Court of Canada say the line does not go here? In the matters with which we are attempting to deal, this house is and at all times will be the highest court in the land, and the supreme court might very easily find itself incapable of rectifying something after the event.

Now, why consultation? I am not going to suggest any great scheme to the house. I am not going to say we should follow the United States system, under which two-thirds of the states must ratify any amendment. I have never been greatly interested in any amendment there with the exception of one, the amendment having to do with liquor, because I am always following amendments of that kind. You cannot put down any rule and say, "This is what we should do". That is the purpose of consultation.

Let us look at the matter from its worst aspect. I am not going to advocate anything which will give any province an advantage. Let us assume that, after this conference, the worst happens. The worst can only be that we are back where we are today. Nothing can put us back of that position. Whatever has been achieved up until now is finished business. If the conference is a complete failure, we do not lose anything but merely start from the position in which we are now. I make this statement: Anyone who says that we cannot gain something in the way of unity or peace, is prejudging the participants in that conference in a way in which he has no right to judge them.

All of us here, certainly those of us in the legal business, have participated in arbitrations and conciliation boards. People sometimes think those boards arrive at some strange decisions. They see that two people go one way and one goes another way. They overlook the fact that in Canada many of these compromise decisions between two great factors in our industrial life are unanimous decisions. I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will agree with that. Even if two people go one way and one another, we have achieved something, because that is democracy functioning in a proper manner. Broadly speaking, the majority is entitled to rule.

I am not suggesting to a great—I have used the word "great" again and this time very respectfully—constitutional lawyer such as the Prime Minister that it is as simple as I have suggested. Even I, one of the police court variety of lawyers, know that you just cannot go to the ten provinces and say, "Vote, and we will abide by the decision of the majority." Many more considerations enter into the problem. If a meeting with the provinces is held, the worst that can happen is a disagreement. I still have enough faith in humanity and in the people who will be gathered together to believe that, although they may not complete the plan, they are bound to make some progress. At the very worst, Mr. Speaker, they will find their points of disagreement and put a circle around them, so we will all know what the position is.

Coming back to the problem we have to solve—I am not speaking of rules or words or motions or amendments to the amendment which to me, sir, are the trivia in this whole matter—I am asking what we have to lose by consultation. Eighty-two years have gone, and if it happens to be eighty-two years and six months it will not hurt anybody. By the time you and I, sir, have achieved that age we will wonder why everyone wasted so much time talking about it. I believe there is something to be gained by such a conference. I ask the Prime Minister; if there is something to be gained, why go headlong into this business now when it is bound to make the situation worse? Some provinces will be able to say, "You did not consult us; you bulled your way through because you had the strength." I realize, sir, that is not parliamentary language, but I do think it expresses what will be in the minds of many people who are very keen about the matter of provincial rights.

Provincial rights, sir, were arranged at Quebec and Charlottetown. They came into our act in 1867. The ordinary man in the street is not bothered much in his business by provincial rights and says, "Why should I be interested in that?" The point I make is this: what was done at that time made a federation. What we do now may improve federation. A failure to have that conference now may not destroy, but may injure the federation in this dominion of Canada which we all love so much.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): The house, I take it, is about to make its decision, and my remarks will have that fact in mind. I have no extended remarks to make at this period of the debate.

The debate has been characterized thus far, I think, by much learning, the product of much research in matters legal, constitutional and historical. I shall confine what I have to say at this stage of the debate to certain matters, and my remarks will not be characterized by the approach of a lawyer. In common with my colleague, the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), I am trying to think of this problem, not as a lawyer, but as a Canadian who wishes to see, above all else, harmony and unity prevail in Canada.

We have achieved complete unanimity in this debate, sir, in our desire to obtain within Canada the right to amend the constitution in whatever respect may be approved by the Canadian people. As the debate has proceeded, however, it seems to me that the different approaches to the question of the means and method have assumed a depth of cleavage which may be more apparent than real and which is, I think, to be deprecated. It is for that reason that in these few closing remarks I hope, if it lies within me, I may be able to make a conciliatory and reasonable contribution.

In the first place, there is an issue as to Canadian harmony presented by this address. We know quite well, sir, in view of the stated positions of the ten provincial premiers, that at least five of them have openly expressed disapproval of the government's proposed method of meeting the problem of finding a formula for the amendment of the constitution. What they are asking is very simple. They are asking that they be consulted. At the moment, it amounts to that. In the face of that reasonable position on the part of the provincial premiers, surely to press forward now and ignore that request is to invite disharmony and, perhaps, a major showdown in relations between the dominion and the provinces. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that ought to be avoided at any reasonable cost, especially when it appears that that could be accomplished so easily.

Why draw ourselves up now representing the federal authority in a sort of battle array? That is not going to achieve the desired formula for amending the constitution. If a conference is held, the people of Canada will have a full opportunity of judging as to the reasonableness of the position taken by those who participate in that conference representing the dominion and the provinces. The people will be the judges and this parliament, I submit, will be in an infinitely better position after such a conference to proceed with its part in this enterprise of achieving within Canada the right to amend our own constitution.

The Prime Minister talks about achieving complete autonomy in respect of our relations with Great Britain. Surely these provinces have a right to express in a conference their concern, which honestly and sincerely exists, as to whether the result may not be an interference with their provincial autonomy within the spheres confided to them by the constitution. Why needlessly create national strife within the Canadian family? Surely the Canadian method is a better one than that. Surely the Canadian method is to sit down together as fellow Canadians and to talk over this issue which is of joint concern. That, sir, it seems to me is the issue in regard to national harmony.

The second issue is as to statements made by the Prime Minister preceding the general election. I am not going to labour this point because it has been referred to already. I simply take the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made on the radio on May 19, when he said:

> It is our intention, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

The Prime Minister, in the course of one interjection in this debate, has suggested that he had something additional in mind in making that statement, and that he was making an exception as to matters that he says are federal. But the fact of the matter is that he did not mention that reservation. He has referred to his mandate. Part of the mandate he has received certainly was based upon an acceptance, by at least certain portions of the electorate, of his statement that I have just quoted. I am quite sure that we who respect the Prime Minister are justified in urging upon him that he should not leave an undertaking of that kind unfulfilled; because certainly, Mr. Speaker, if words mean anything, those words mean that the provinces were to be consulted before the government addressed itself, after the election, to this question of amendment of the constitution. If there was a reservation in the mind of the Prime Minister, he did not state it; and the people of Canada, acting upon the statement that he did make, gave him a mandate in accordance with his statement, not in accordance with any reservations that were in his mind with respect to those matters that he calls federal matters.

The third issue, Mr. Speaker, is this. We who unanimously adopt the view that Canada should have within her own borders the right to amend her constitution must not be guilty of defeating that purpose; and I maintain that the procedure that the government is inviting the house to follow will defeat our purpose. Surely the purpose cannot be simply to segregate certain matters that the Prime Minister refers to as federal matters and say, if we do not go any further, at least that will be something worth while, when the very method that is being followed is one that is going to prejudice, if not doom, any attempt to bring about a comprehensive method of amending the whole constitution. It just means that, if there is not agreement at that dominion-provincial conference that is to follow this session, we shall still have to go to Westminster to obtain amendments with respect to a large area of our constitution.

If there is anything in the Prime Minister's argument—and I do not think there is anything in it—that the fact that it is necessary to go to Westminster is a relic of colonial days or days of our dependency, then what is being done here is to continue that very state of dependency. Surely the sensible objective here, Mr. Speaker, must be a comprehensive formula that will embrace all parts of the constitution; and nothing should be done at this date in seeking some lesser objective—and I am afraid in this respect in a shortsighted way—to prejudice our hope of fulfilling that larger national objective.

In this debate an answer has not yet been given from the government benches to the question why, when our constitution is an entity, an attempt should be made now to break it up or to divide it. We are not making any contribution in this measure to a definition of matters federal. A conference with the provinces would have some hope of bringing about a better definition in that field which in times past has been a field of conflict.

I wish to say one word about the amendments that are before the house. I am not going to spend much time on the position taken by the C.C.F. because we know that their policy all along has been in favour of centralization of more power here in Ottawa. But I point out here that the fact that the C.C.F. can introduce an amendment to the Prime Minister's resolution and that, after further study, the Prime Minister can find it possible to accept the principle of the amendment, and then in his amendment to the amendment, propose to make some further changes, indicates quite clearly that this subject has not been considered as carefully as it ought to have been considered. There has been too much haste. We shall not achieve that completely adequate consideration in our approach to this important problem unless we do the obvious and reasonable thing, namely, allow this subject a place on the agenda that is to be laid before the dominion-provincial conference.

There is no safeguard in either the amendment of the C.C.F. or the Prime Minister's amendment to the amendment, because they simply leave the position as it is at the present time, on the Prime Minister's own argument, namely that at least in matters outside section 92 of the British North America Act, or those matters that relate peculiarly to the constitution of the provinces, it will continue to rest within the power of parliament—which means simply a majority of the two houses; a majority of one in this house and a majority of one in the other place—to bring about amendments at Westminster. It does not matter that you put up a two-thirds rule in this amendment, as the Prime Minister's amendment to the amendment proposes, because it will still rest, on his argument, within the power of parliament or of a simple majority thereof to ask Westminster to bring about another amendment to the constitution that can overnight wipe out the two-thirds rule that he is speaking of. The Prime Minister says that you have to leave it to the sense of responsibility of parliament not to do that. I cannot quite follow the Prime Minister in his reasoning. He is not prepared to leave there this question as to whether the life of parliament ought to be extended in view of a national emergency. He is not prepared to leave that simply to the good sense of the majority of the house. He wants to create a two-thirds rule there. At the same time he says that good sense will prevent the majority from going some other way. I cannot square these two positions that the Prime Minister takes. It seems to me that they are directly contradictory.

Sir, for the same reason, what is being done here in excepting from the scope of the proposed address matters pertaining to the rights of minorities and provincial rights with reference to education does not safeguard those rights. We need to put those rights on a solid basis of constitutional guarantee. On the Prime Minister's own argument, sir, we are simply leaving these rights exposed to action on the part of the majority of the two houses of parliament. According to the Prime Minister's argument all Parliament has to do is to pass another address asking for a further amendment to the constitution at Westminster and it will be enacted there, because, he says, these matters such as section 133 assuring language rights are matters that lie within the competence of parliament to pass an address upon, on which Westminster without further question, without any consultation with the provinces, will amend the constitution in the form asked for by this parliament. Has not the time come when consultation should be had with the provinces seeking a comprehensive method of amending the constitution and placing those sacred rights, without which there never would have been confederation, beyond the power or beyond the reach of arbitrary action on the part of a majority in this house and a majority in the other place? The time has come, sir, when these rights should be given a further guarantee and consolidated in our constitutional fabric. In my submission, the argument of the Prime Minister has itself necessitated some further guarantee of those rights. It is not proper to leave them in the position in which the attitude taken by the government now leaves them.

Sir, can this problem not be approached on the part of all who bear governmental responsibility in Canada in the spirit of confederation, the spirit of the fathers of confederation, the spirit of give and take, of sitting down together, and freely exchanging views in the manner which characterized their deliberations? In those days had there been an attempt on one side to ride the high horse, to take the proud attitude, we would never have had confederation. Surely the great and imperative need of this time is for a renewal of the spirit of confederation. I say, Mr. Speaker, this is not the time to let our attention be diverted from questions of high import to the whole well-being of the Canadian economy by an attempt on the part of any to pursue local feuds with a particular province. Surely the subject before us is one of far too great importance to Canada.

I turn now, sir, to say just a few words in conclusion. I said I would try to be conciliatory and approach this question in a spirit of reasonableness. It is in that spirit that I do impose on the generous consideration of the house while I make these closing remarks.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I urge this house to consider the consequences which the passing of this resolution would involve. Every member who has spoken in this debate has stated that he advocates the right of Canada to amend the British North America Act, without having to go to Westminster for that purpose.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) proposes that we should ask the Westminster parliament to amend the constitution by conferring on the Canadian parliament the right to amend Canada's constitution as regards matters to which he refers as federal matters without consultation with the provinces. He also contends that, after the passing of this amendment, the Canadian parliament will be able to amend the constitution as regards those same subjects without consulting the provinces. He adds that the provinces have no power with regard to those matters which he holds to be federal matters.

He maintains that it is possible, by this resolution, to divide constitutional subjects into matters that come under the jurisdiction of parliament and matters that are exclusively within the scope of the provincial legislatures.

The Progressive Conservative party claims that the government should first consult the provinces, that the British North America Act is not an ordinary statute which can be lightly amended, but legislation which it is not desirable should be amended by a simple majority of both houses—that is to say a majority of one in this house and a majority of one in the Senate—without prior consultation with the provinces.

The Prime Minister has announced his intention of conferring with the provinces in the near future. He has invited the provincial premiers to discuss with representatives of his government means of amending the constitution with regard to matters pertaining to both parliament and the provincial legislatures.

Yet, he refuses to consult the provinces with respect to this resolution before having it sanctioned by the Canadian parliament and before submitting it to Westminster.

As a Canadian, Mr. Speaker, I submit we, in Canada, must above all else seek harmony, understanding and agreement. We must strive to protect the rights of minorities and the rights we believe were guaranteed by the constitution. We must protect those minority rights today, and seek harmony, understanding and agreement. We must approach those subjects in a spirit of conciliation. I urge upon the Prime Minister to refrain from hurting the feelings of many Canadians and from thus creating disagreement and disunion in the Canadian family. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the spirit of understanding of each and everyone; I plead for a spirit of agreement; in short I plead, on the part of all, for the spirit of the fathers of confederation.

(Text):

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the house. It does seem to me that people reading today's Hansard may be a bit surprised at what is happening in this House of Commons on this occasion. All but one of the speeches that have been given thus far today have been opposed to the motion and the amendments that are now before the house. While the arguments of those who are opposed to what is taking place have varied, in the main the contention has been that we should not take even this first step of getting the right to amend our constitution in respect of federal matters without consulting the provinces. I am fairly certain that if this debate concludes shortly and the votes are taken the subamendment and the amendment and the motion will all carry. I hope that those who read today's Hansard will not think that the arguments that have been put forward have not been considered by the rest of us. The fact of the matter is that those who are interested in this subject should read the record of the debates for the previous days in which this matter has been before us, last week in particular, and also Canadian history since 1867. It seems to me that that answers the negative argument put forward today.

The fact is, as has been said a number of times by those who favour this resolution, that out of the eleven times our constitution has been amended, eight of those amendments have dealt with matters exclusively federal and on every one of those eight occasions there was no consultation with the provinces. That was true whether it was being done by those who were close to confederation, by a parliament that included some of the fathers of confederation themselves, or whether it was done by parliaments made up of various parties down through the years.

In view of that established precedent I submit that if we were now to reverse it we would be bedevilling constitutional matters in this country for a long time to come. It has taken long enough to get to the point where we can discuss ways and means of amending our own constitution here in Canada, but if when we are seeking the power to amend our constitution with respect to federal matters we should do what has never been done before, go to the provinces to get that right, they would insist on telling us how to use that right every time we wanted to use it.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Despite all the pleas that have been made in terms of unity and harmony, despite all the plausible arguments that have been put forward, it seems to me that it is the responsibility of this parliament to pursue the course that has been proposed by the measure now before us. Offensive though it may be to my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party, I cannot help but feel that the pleas that have been made that we should go back to the provinces are designed to have the effect of creating disunity in this country at a time when what we want is unity with respect to this whole matter. For my part I deplore the sort of thing that has been going on.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member is entirely wrong on that.

Mr. Knowles: The appearances are very clear. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), like others who have spoken in this debate, threw the word "centralizers" at us in this group as though he thought it might hurt us. The fact of the matter is that it is those people who want to keep things on a completely provincial basis, it is those people who want ten separate labour codes instead of a national labour code, it is those people who want the kind of constitution that keeps taxation decentralized, it is those people who want a constitution which keeps us from having over-all national social security—those are the people who have made it possible for the big interests to centralize power in the centre of this country and exploit the Canadian people both in the have and in the have-not provinces.

If we are ever going to raise the living standard of our people, if we are ever going to have a country in which our people are Canadians from coast to coast, enjoying the rights and privileges that our people should enjoy, we shall have to get over this provincialism. We shall have to begin to think in broad Canadian terms, such as men like Mr. Cahan and Mr. Meighen—I quote them in particular because they are the high priests of my friends to my right—have tried to proclaim in this house and in the country in times past. I cannot deplore too strongly these speeches that have been made that have the appearance of creating unity but which in effect produce disunity. It seems to me that it is time we acted like grown-ups, like Canadians, and pursued the course that is proposed in the motion and in the amendments before the house at the present time.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Garson) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker before the question is put I should like to make a short statement which will take only a minute or two. We are faced at this point with the necessity of making a difficult decision. In the first place we find ourselves opposed to the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) because we feel it is objectionable. At the same time the amendment as amended contains some desirable things. We are in favour of what is contained in the C.C.F. amendment as amended. We feel that it makes less objectionable something which we have felt to be objectionable.

Under the circumstances we feel that we should support the amendment, but on the understanding that our vote is for what is contained in the amendment, namely, entrenchment in our constitution of the things which ought to be entrenched. Our only criticism is that it does not go far enough; it does not go so far as to entrench other things like provincial rights that ought to be entrenched.

Under the circumstances, while we are going to vote for the amendment as amended we want it understood that in no way should that be interpreted to mean that we are supporting in any way the resolution as it will be amended by the amendment. There is just one other thing by way of explanation. The vote we give now will have to be interpreted as being confined to this one thing. While we would like to see the resolution defeated, we are practically certain that faced with the preponderance of Liberal support it will pass. That being the case, being practically certain that it will pass this house, our thought is that we might be able to make one stroke that will render it a little less objectionable.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Knowles) as amended, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: The question is now on the original motion as amended.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Three Rivers:

That the said proposed resolution be amended by striking out all the words after the first word "that" and substituting therefor:

"This house is of the opinion:

1. That an humble address should be presented to His Majesty the King praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom providing for an amendment to the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada by the parliament of Canada.

2. That as a condition precedent to the presentation of such address the scope and form of the amendment prayed for should be made the subject matter of a conference of the dominion and provincial governments and the subsequent approval of the parliament of Canada."

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am objecting to the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) voting, as he was not in the chamber when the question was put. I base my objection on rule 67.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may rise on a point of order but it should be settled after the vote is taken. However, if the hon. member was not in the chamber when I read the resolution, he should not vote.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Before the count is announced, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Standing order 43 reads:

No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

There are two other paragraphs, but that is the principal one. I draw your attention to the fact that the mover of the amendment spoke on the main motion on October 17, as recorded on page 847 of Hansard, and therefore his amendment should have been ruled out of order and no vote should have been taken. That is why I am not voting.

Mr. Fleming: On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I will take that into consideration later.

Mr. Fleming: I did not speak on the main motion; I spoke on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the right hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Mitchell: I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment, and that goes for the last amendment too because I was interrupted.

After the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: I should like to refer first to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). Citation 67 of Beauchesne's second edition reads:

> If a member was not present in the house when the question was put by the Speaker, he cannot have his vote recorded.

I am glad the hon. member for Calgary West brought this matter to my attention because I did not see the hon. member come in after the question had been put. Hon. members will realize that it is difficult for the Speaker when he is reading a resolution to see what members come into the chamber after he starts to read the resolution. But I would point out this citation to all members and ask them to note that a member should be in the house and should hear the question read from the beginning. See Canadian Commons Hansard, 1891, page 4457. I did not give my ruling at the time because of citation 84 of Beauchesne, second edition, which reads:

> The Speaker, when his attention has been called to a breach of order in the course of a division, has directed that the division should proceed, and has dealt with the matter when the division was completed.

May I refer now to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). If the hon. member had raised the point of order before the question had been put, I would have considered it, but as I had started to put the question I did not think I could then consider whether or not his point of order was properly raised. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said that he did not speak on the original motion. If he did not speak on the original motion, then the point of order was not properly raised.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, there are several other aspects of this whole situation to which I should like to draw attention because in my judgment they require cautious and appraising attention. This afternoon I went into some detail in respect to certain of these aspects, but there are others I should like to deal with.

I should like to know, and I think the people generally in the country would like to know, why the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) delayed his letter to the provincial premiers until September 14. If the election had occurred on August 27 or even on July 27 there might have been good reason for the delay, but these letters went out on September 14, which was just about two weeks before the measure appeared in the Votes and Proceedings of this house. These letters were sent out during the holiday time when, as is well known, a large number of the provincial cabinet ministers would be absent. It was so late that it was impossible, except with great inconvenience, to call provincial caucuses together to discuss the matter. One would imagine that an address to the British parliament for permission to change the British North America Act was an everyday occurrence. As a matter of fact, I rather fancy, when history is written and appraised, it will be found that the proposed address is one of the most important measures ever put forward in the history of the Dominion of Canada. Possibly it will prove to be the most important, perhaps even more important than the British North America Act itself.

Under these circumstances how can one possibly justify the delay in the sending of the letter of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the provinces? No answer has been given and no hint that would enable anyone to form a logical conclusion that might justify the action of the Prime Minister.

Here is another aspect of the matter. Why was the Prime Minister's letter of September 14 so absolutely full of inexplicit references and instances of faulty coherence that it would almost defy a commission of Philadelphia lawyers to state what the letter meant? I have not the time nor the opportunity tonight, and I do not believe it is in order, to analyse the letter the Prime Minister sent out, which was written in his office presumably by the best educated men in the Dominion of Canada. In that letter there are errors of coherence for which I believe any high school teacher would pluck a grade 12 student if he wrote an essay in that fashion on any grade 12 examination in Canada. I am prepared to take the letter and proceed with a complete analysis of it to show the truth of what I say, if that is desired. To say that the Prime Minister is not well enough trained in English to write a better letter is simply ridiculous. We are left entirely to the conclusion that he must have prepared the letter, full of inexplicit references and instances of faulty coherence as it is, and therefore with a lack of clarity of meaning, by design. If he did it by design then I must say that the matter is serious enough to occupy the house and the country for some days yet.

There is a third consideration. Why was the measure introduced as an address rather than as a resolution? Hon. members of the house who have been here before know quite well that any measure can be introduced as a resolution. If it is so introduced, hon. members have a chance to ask all manner of questions concerning the purpose of the resolution, the meaning of it and so forth, in committee, but inasmuch as the measure was introduced as an address we have not that opportunity and consequently cannot inform ourselves as people in the high court of parliament should inform themselves before forming a conclusion on a matter of such tremendous portent.

Again, why is the measure brought in now rather than in 1950? Various speakers in the opposition have raised that question time and again, but the Prime Minister has never condescended to attempt to give an answer. It is astonishing that we could not wait until 1950 to introduce the measure. It is a matter that requires careful study. I would say that any justice of the peace or small-town lawyer would take the first opportunity to raise that question. Surely hon. members of the house would be held responsible if they did not raise it. I contend there is no conceivably adequate reason for the speed and the promptness with which the measure has been introduced in the house.

Another consideration is that the requested amendment of the British North America Act presented to the house is not an amendment that even remotely resembles any other amendment ever asked for in Canadian history. All through the debate, Liberal and C.C.F. members have made much of the fact that other amendments have been sought in times past, and some eight of them, if I recall correctly, have been asked for without consulting the premiers of the provinces. All those eight put together are not one-tenth as important as this measure.

I said this afternoon that the measure is not an amendment but is a revolution. The measure proposes to destroy the British North America Act, according to any common-sense interpretation of the situation. That is a matter that needs to be studied carefully. There is no precedent in Canadian history nor in the history of this parliament for the submission to the British government of such an amendment.

There is another consideration. The federal government has never seriously attempted to employ its power over currency, credit and banking to improve economic conditions in Canada. Such power was specifically given to it by section 91. It has only been used once in a while in Canadian history, and never consistently. It was turned over to the banking concerns and allowed to go at that. That is just neglect of the wonderful power that was given to the federal government under section 91 of the British North America Act. If the federal government had endeavoured to use the credit of Canada as it should have used it through wisely employing its ability to use currency and banking, then I contend that there never would have been any need for the federal government to try to invade the provincial taxation fields of personal income tax, corporation taxes and succession duties.

The whole C.C.F. position, the whole Liberal position, and probably the Conservative position—I hope not but I am afraid so—in respect to these three invasions of provincial rights of taxation has been that it is impossible for the dominion government to get the money otherwise with which to carry out the social service program that the dominion government deems advisable at the present time. Invasions of taxation fields would not be necessary if the dominion government were disposed to use the credit of Canada, because if the dominion government would use the credit of Canada it could easily make what is physically possible financially possible for all Canadians. The extent of the benefits which could be derived from that course of procedure would require hours and hours of discussion to elaborate and clarify. Consequently I shall only mention it in passing. Suffice it to say that during all the long history of Canada the federal government has consistently neglected this most valuable of all the powers given to it under section 91 of the British North America Act.

As I said a moment ago, all the social security measures proposed by the dominion government could be provided without additional taxation, debt or regimentation by the wise use of Canada's credit. All the disabilities now suffered by the provinces with regard to freight rates, tariffs, financial policy, and industrialization could be ameliorated and ultimately removed. All the hardships occasioned Canadians by reason of the tremendous debts which we have accumulated could probably be abolished in forty years by the wise use of Canada's credit without even noticeably affecting Canadians at all.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of the house require much more time for discussion, obtaining information, and study of this measure and its implications than we have had up to the present. So also do the provincial cabinets and legislatures, and so do the people of Canada. In order to provide the time and opportunities requisite for adequate study, I believe this measure should be considered in committee of the whole. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low):

That the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider this resolution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): If no one else desires to speak to this motion, I must say that I have my doubts as to whether it is in order. It seems to me this is a self-contained motion, completely different from the motion now before the house; and I believe such an amendment cannot be moved. Certainly I should like to hear arguments both for and against the motion before giving a ruling.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I have it on the advice of one of the greatest authorities on the subject in Canada that this motion is entirely in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Church: I have an amendment to move.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), has moved in amendment that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider this resolution. There is no provision in the rules for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on a resolution of this type. I refer hon. members to standing order 48 and to citation 394, Beauchesne, second edition. In my opinion this is not an amendment: see Beauchesne, third edition, citation 375. Therefore the proposed amendment is out of order, and I so rule. The question now is on the main motion.

Mr. Church: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson):

That the resolution be not adopted.

I think that is quite in order. There are precedents for it, and I propose to speak to it.

Mr. Speaker: This proposed amendment is a direct negative of the motion, and a vote against the resolution as amended would have the same result. See Beauchesne, third edition, citation 341. I must therefore rule this motion out of order also. The question is on the original resolution as amended.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think you and all hon. members will agree that the debate on this resolution has been generally on a pretty high plane and carried on in a dignified manner, as is befitting in a matter of this importance, in spite of the fact that some rather extraordinary speeches have been made today.

There are a few points about which I would like to make the position of the members of our party somewhat clearer.

This resolution has to do with the age-old question of what is the nature of our constitution and what are the rights of the federal authority and of the provincial governments. In that respect there have been, and still are, three theories, each of which has the support of a certain number of members of this house and of Canadians throughout the country. One is that the provinces must agree to all amendments, that this constitution is to be regarded as a contract, no word or comma of which may be changed without the consent of the contracting parties; and it is said in a rather loose way that the contracting parties are the provinces. The amendment moved by the official opposition makes it quite clear that when they say "the provinces" they mean the provincial governments; and that has been the implication of most of the speeches by those opposing the resolution. They have spoken of "the provinces" and in their minds the provinces mean the ten provincial premiers. According to that theory, nothing can be done without consulting these ten premiers.

As to what is meant by consulting them, that too is rather indefinite. When an attempt was made during the last session of the previous parliament to determine whether by consulting the provinces was meant securing their agreement, or in other words to reach the situation where any one of them exercised a veto, that proposition was voted down even by the most enthusiastic proponents of the theory that there should be consultation. However, in spite of the negative vote given at that time, it would seem that several of those who participated in that vote would still like the impression to be conveyed to many that they do mean securing the agreement of the provincial premiers.

The other theory is that parliament is entitled to ask for any kind of amendment without reference in any way whatsoever to the provincial authorities. As a matter of fact that is possibly the technically legal position, but that is not and has never been the position of the party of which I have the honour to be leader at the present time. The position of our party is, and always has been, that at confederation the sovereign powers of the Canadian nation were allocated, part of them to the central parliament and part to the provincial legislatures, with anything unprovided for in that specific allocation left within the general powers of the central parliament; and it has been the view consistently held by the Liberal party that provincial powers should be respected. The corollary of this respect for all the portions of the national sovereignty allocated to the provinces is—our party has contended—that the powers allocated to the central authority can be exercised by that central authority through the members elected by the people to represent them in the central parliament, without any control by the provinces or, I should say, by the premiers of the provincial governments. For a long time, that was the traditional view of the official opposition.

In that respect, I should like to put on record a letter which in its day was confidential but which today forms part of the history of this country and is published with the correspondence of Sir John A. Macdonald. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said that the word "great" had been used quite loosely. There are still many of us, even on this side of the house, who do not feel it is used any too loosely when applied to Sir John A. Macdonald.

On the 14th of May, 1886, he wrote to Lieutenant Governor Richey of Nova Scotia the following letter:

Ottawa, 14th May, 1886

My dear Richey:

I see your ministers are going to dissolve.

The permission to grant or refuse a dissolution rests with you, as well as to fix the time for holding the elections. As important issues are, it is said, to go before the people, you should, I think, insist that they should not be taken by surprise and that ample time should be given them for consideration.

Your legislature's legal term of existence expires, I take it, on the return day of the writs of election, and no election need be held until after that day.

Should your ministers found their advice for an early dissolution, on the ground that they desire an immediate expression of the will of the people as to their remaining in the confederation—you will, I have no doubt, feel it your duty as a dominion officer, to decline to allow that subject to enter into consideration at all. The representatives of Nova Scotia as to all questions respecting the relations between the dominion and the provinces sit in the dominion parliament and are the constitutional exponents of the wishes of the people with regard to such relations. The provincial members have their powers restricted to the subjects mentioned in the B.N.A. Act and can go no further. I write you confidentially, but if necessary you will be supported by the whole weight of the dominion government.

Yours sincerely,

John A. Macdonald

I am going to repeat that.

The provincial members—

And that would include the members of the provincial governments.

—have their powers restricted to the subjects mentioned in the B.N.A. Act and can go no further.

When we talk about the provinces in that general way, one would think that we did not mean the group of people inhabiting a certain determined territory but who are, nevertheless, Canadian citizens and are, as such, represented in the Canadian parliament. Those people have as their spokesmen, with respect to those portions of Canadian sovereignty assigned to the central authority, the members they elect to represent them and to speak for them in this house. When we hear the assertion that a letter written by a provincial premier represents the views of four million or more Canadian citizens—well, we are entitled to ask the fifty-seven Liberal members who are here from the province of Ontario if they have anything to say about it.

Forty-five years later, the attitude of those who are now the official opposition, through their spokesmen, was not so much different from that expressed by Sir John A. Macdonald in this letter to the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia. I quote the remarks of Mr. Guthrie, the Minister of Justice in the government headed by the late Viscount Bennett. Speaking in this house on the resolution moved by Mr. Woodsworth, as reported at page 1473 of 1931 Hansard, Mr. Guthrie said:

However, I agree that the time has come when we should seriously consider this whole question of amendments to the Canadian constitution.

On the next page, 1474, he said:

My contention has always been that in all matters appertaining to the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada the parliament of Canada has the right, and should have the right expressed, to make such amendments to the constitution as it shall see fit.

That was in 1931. It was a reassertion in which all the members of the Conservative party who were in the house at that time—there were more of them then than there are now—acquiesced. That is what we are proposing to do by this resolution; that and no more. We are proposing to have it expressed that parliament has the right to make such amendments to the constitution in all matters pertaining to the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada as it shall see fit.

Now, that being the extent to which we propose to go now, I am met with the charge that I am breaking two pledges, one made in this house I think in February of this year, and the second in a speech made over the radio from Moncton on May 19, 1949. Let us deal with them in chronological order. The pledge was supposed to be contained in the words cited by the leader of the opposition as set out in Hansard at page 962, and are as follows:

> The procedure which I believe would be required to deal with a question of the kind would be similar to that which was followed at that time, some twelve or fourteen years ago.

What I said in May has again been cited.

> The record of Canadians in two world wars demonstrated beyond any question our ability and our capacity to bear the responsibilities of full nationhood. But our adult nationhood is not yet fully recognized in our constitution and our laws... A method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada.
> That won't be easy. We do not want the Canadian constitution to be too rigid, but we do want to make sure it contains the fullest safeguards of provincial rights, of the use of the two official languages, and of those other historic rights which are the sacred trusts of our national partnership.
> It is our intention, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

The effort is made to interpret that language as a statement that we were abandoning the traditional policy of the Liberal party of dealing, without reference to the provinces, with those matters which by the constitution have been allocated to the central parliament. I never would have given such an undertaking because I feel some responsibility with respect to the future of this country, and I feel that it would be a grave error, at any time, to subject the exercise of the powers given by the constitution to the central authority, represented by the elected representatives of the ten Canadian provinces now, to the control of gentlemen selected to administer those portions of the Canadian sovereignty that have been allocated to the provincial legislatures.

In February of 1949, in this pledge supposed to have been given to the House of Commons, I said the procedure we would follow would be similar to the procedure that had been followed at the time of the 1935 or 1936 dominion-provincial conference. All hon. members know that the recommendation made at that time with respect to amendments with regard to purely federal matters was that they were to be made by simple act of this parliament, and that it was only with respect to matters that were not within the exclusive jurisdiction of this parliament that there was to be another procedure.

Some hon. members have said: But you did not make any restriction. You said you proposed to call a conference of the provinces. We do propose to call a conference of the provinces. The letter read by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and which, in his view, is so incoherent, is a declaration to the premiers of the provinces that we wish to have a conference with them to deal with those matters which are the ones usually referred to when we speak of substantial amendments to the constitution, namely, those which might effect the transfer of powers from one jurisdiction to the other. But there never was any statement made that there would be no other amendments to the Canadian constitution than those that may be of joint concern to dominion and provincial authorities until we had established a procedure for dealing with that portion of the knotty problem.

One hon. member said: Why go about it in this way? Why do it piecemeal? Perhaps the hon. member who put that question has some friends in the editorial office of the London Free Press. Here is an article from the London Free Press of October 19 which contains this statement:

> The government is apparently determined to go ahead with its project of transferring to Ottawa the power to amend those parts of the constitution entirely within federal jurisdiction before calling the conference to decide the method of amending the constitution regarding matters under provincial or mixed jurisdiction.

The hon. member's friend goes on to say:

> There is no doubt that this procedure is contrary to logic.

With that statement I do not agree. But he goes on to say:

> But it has the advantage of reaching some definite conclusion within a predictable period. With Premier Duplessis clinging stubbornly to the compact theory of confederation, which insists that no jot or tittle of the B.N.A. Act can be changed without the consent of all the provinces, prospects for agreement at any conference are not particularly roseate.

That is why, after eighty-two years of efforts, I ventured to say there might be some Canadians who would prefer to get half a loaf at this time rather than to risk getting nothing at all.

For that I am taken to task by another great newspaper, the Montreal Gazette, which insists that the constitution is being torn into shreds, that it is being torn right down the middle, and that ultimately, when it is hung on the wall, it is going to hang in a crooked fashion because we are grabbing a half loaf before our guests come to the table at which we are inviting them to meet us.

I am not greatly impressed. I have been here now for some time, and I remember many occasions when there have been the loudest of assertions in this house that the aim of the government was good, that what we were proposing to do was all right, but that we were going about it in the wrong fashion. Those who were here in 1946 will remember that everyone just deplored the inequities that had been brought about under the British North America Act with regard to representation of portions of the Canadian public in this House of Commons. Everyone wanted to see that unfair situation remedied. Everyone was convinced that it was conducive to national unity to remove an injustice of that kind. But, it was said, you must not do it until you talk to the premiers; it is all right, as a matter of fact, but you are going about it in the wrong way. Well, we went about it, and it was done; and the representation of the Canadian public in this House of Commons is on a basis fair and equitable to every part of the country.

During the last session when it was suggested that we have this parliament approve the union of Newfoundland with Canada, it was said that that was a grand thing, something that everyone had been in favour of ever since the first days of confederation; it was something that was going to be a grand thing if only it could be done, but you must not do it in that way; that was the wrong way. Again it was said that the right way was to go and talk to the provinces represented by the premiers of the then nine provinces and, if you get their blessing, so much the better; but your chances of getting it did not seem to be good, and you should not endanger national harmony by disregarding the views of those dear provincial premiers who should exercise their control over the manner in which we exercise the powers allocated to this parliament by the constitution. Well, we went ahead; and I am glad to see even members of the opposition from the tenth province of Canada sitting in this House of Commons in this parliament.

Almost immediately after that there was in the house another general expression of opinion by the opposition that since the provincial governments and provincial legislatures did not see fit to take over rent control, it was a good thing to maintain rent control for a further period in the country, but that we were going about it in the wrong way. It was a splendid thing to retain control over steel and over one or two other things but we should not have all that in the same bill. That was the wrong way to do it. It was said we wanted the thing done but we did not want it done in the way the government was proposing. Well, it was done in the way we were proposing, and an opportunity was given for the Canadian public to say whether we had been proceeding in the right way to do the right things. When I am told again on this occasion that what we are doing is the right thing, but we are doing it in the wrong way, I rather feel that there is a majority of the Canadian people who would like to see it done now, and that is the way we are proposing to do it, and I think that is the way the Canadian people will be glad to see it done.

I wish to state once again that the whole situation is and what we are proposing to do and what we are not proposing to do at the present time. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said that it is going to be difficult to get agreement as to where the line is to be drawn between those powers allocated to the central authority and those which were allocated to the provincial authorities. I am in full agreement with him, and do not think that if we had a conference that lasted for twelve months, or if we had twelve conferences that lasted for twelve months each we would get agreement with the provincial premiers as to exactly where that line is to be drawn because, as the hon. member said, the circumstances of the times change the picture in which that line has to appear.

Our proposal is based upon the assumption that there is a line, but that it would not be fair for us to attempt arbitrarily to draw that line. We shall have it declared in general terms, that we have the power, without consulting the provinces as represented by the ten premiers, to deal with those things that are on our side of the line. If, it is felt, we attempt to do anything which anyone feels crosses the line or impinges in any way on something that is outside our jurisdiction, there will be the courts to decide whether we are right or whether we are wrong.

Some hon. gentlemen say that that is not good enough. Well, that is the best that human ingenuity has been able to devise throughout the hundreds and thousands of years that there have been disputes between human beings. The only other way is to resort to arms. Happily for us, the other way, the trial of strength, has long since been abandoned in our domestic affairs.

The moving appeals made to us today, some made before today, in the course of this debate, that we do nothing now, do not create a very profound impression upon me at this time. I was surprised at the different tone used, for instance, by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when we were discussing the previous matter before this house, and when the doctrine of stare decisis was not only sacred but something which had to be written into the statute itself, to find him in this debate not only disregarding the doctrine of stare decisis, which is a doctrine under which a decision is applied to another like case, but disregarding the formal judgment rendered in the very matter that he was discussing, that this parliament has the right, without consulting anybody, to make the Supreme Court of Canada the court of last resort for all Canadians.

There has been not only something which could be invoked as stare decisis, but there is res judicata on that question, and that judgment was rendered after certain provinces, or I should say the representatives of the provincial governments, stated their case before the courts of justice, first of all, before the supreme court and then before that other great court which at the time was the court of last resort. In the heat of argument I think that sometimes rules of logic are forgotten if they do not happen to fit the requirements of the argument that one wishes to make.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We have another precedent on that, have we not?

Mr. St. Laurent: There have been many precedents in this debate where the rules of logic were forgotten, and though I cited to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) an editorial from the London Free Press I do not admit their first assertion that our procedure is devoid of logic. It seems to me that our procedure is quite logical. We say that we wish the right to deal with the Canadian constitution to be here in Canada and to be exercised by Canadians, and everyone says that that is a splendid thing. We say that there are three series of matters which may require amendment from time to time. With respect to one of them the right to deal with such amendments has been in the constitution since 1867. If that piecemeal right to make amendments to the British North America Act means tearing the act in two, well it was torn in two before it was put into the statute book, because when it was put there it was put there with the express provision that all these matters that were of purely provincial concern could be amended by the provincial legislatures without consulting anybody else.

As there are certain matters which are under the exclusive control of the provincial jurisdiction, so there are certain matters that are under the exclusive control of the federal jurisdiction, and there are others which are of joint interest to both, as would necessarily be the transfer of authority from this parliament to a legislature, or from one or more legislatures to this parliament. We say, well, now, before we tackle this difficult problem of getting a procedure agreed upon whereby things that are yours or things that are ours can be transferred from one to the other we shall put ourselves in the same position in which you are. We are not going now to deal with matters with which the provincial authorities have any concern. We are going to get right away for the federal parliament the position the provincial legislatures have had since 1867 with respect to these matters that are of our exclusive concern, and then we shall meet the provincial representatives and shall discuss with them the procedure to be agreed upon by us all as to how we can deal in Canada with the other matters with which they cannot deal under the present subsection 1 of section 92 and which we shall not have the right to deal with under the new subsection 1 of section 91. Until we do reach an agreement we shall still be in the position that, if amendments are required, they will have to be made by the parliament at Westminster. But, up to the present time, of all the amendments that have been made only two were of the character that would in future require a pilgrimage to London. All the others in the nine other cases are matters that Canadians would settle in their Canadian parliament for their Canadian fellow citizens.

It will be much preferable to secure agreement on the method to make the future amendments, and when we do secure that agreement we shall have to make one more pilgrimage to the parliament at Westminster to get that agreement written into the Canadian constitution. That agreement should provide the guarantees that are not there now for provincial jurisdiction, provincial rights, educational rights, language rights, for the right of members of parliament to have at least one session every twelve months, and the right of the electors to pronounce upon the individuals to be their representatives in parliament at least every five years. This resolution will not give those guarantees, but it will not give the parliament of Canada any right to touch any of those entrenched matters. If and when we can get agreement with the provinces we will have one last amendment made by the parliament at Westminster that will truly entrench those rights and provide the best possible safeguards for provincial jurisdiction, provincial autonomy, provincial rights, minority rights and the democratic right of the whole Canadian people to pass from time to time its judgment on those who exercise this sovereign authority.

British North America Act

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a question. I want to say that I think he has been very fair about this resolution. The Prime Minister has been most kind in answering the questions asked by the opposition. My question—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Church: My question has to do with the decision of the privy council on matters of grace in 1947 which was based upon the Statute of Westminster.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Church: Will the Prime Minister clarify the matter? Are we to follow such a course? We have only staged a sham battle on this side of the house against this.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Church: That is all it is. We have only staged a sham battle against this resolution. I asked the Prime Minister to kindly answer my question.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will give the best answer I can. By virtue of a bill which was adopted in this house, all appeals must now terminate in the Supreme Court of Canada and cannot go beyond that court.

Mr. Church: Shades of Wallace and Dalton McCarthy and John Ross Robertson! We only staged a sham battle against it here.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. St. Laurent) as amended, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Mitchell: I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It has been brought to my attention that several hon. members, after declaring their vote, left the chamber before the vote was announced. That is irregular, and I draw the fact to the attention of hon. members so that in future they will remain in the chamber after casting their vote, until the result has been announced.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall go into supply, taking the Department of Transport and the Department of Veterans Affairs. From eight to nine o'clock we will take private and public bills. Some time during the day we would like to have second reading of Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants. I understand that after second reading this bill will be referred to the standing committee on fisheries.

Mr. Green: What about the notice of motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I believe that will come up on Monday.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS BY MR. LAING

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In today's issue of the Ottawa Citizen I am credited with the following statement in reference to the constitutional issues before the house:

A sincere and final attempt is being made to re-establish federalism in Canada.

What I said was that a sincere attempt is being made to consolidate federalism in Canada. Again I am reported as having said:

You can't have eleven separate governments if the country is to be run in an efficient manner.

What I said was that you cannot have eleven separate governments all of equal stature and maintain either federalism or efficiency. In making these corrections—

Mr. Laing: —to be critical of the reporter, because unfortunately for me I am not a member of the legal profession—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, may I ask where the speech was made that is being corrected? Was it in this house?

Mr. Laing: —unfortunately I am not a member of the legal profession in either of the categories delineated yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAYS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, November 2 next, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before this motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion for which I believe there will be general support from members in all parts of the house.

I think that all who carry the appellation "private members" are grateful for the extent to which we have been granted our rights as private members during the course of this session. In fact we have had more private members' days, both with respect to private members' resolutions and with respect to public bills, than has been the case since before the war. Because of that fact I do not think the government can be criticized for suggesting that it is time they should take Wednesday afternoons. Nevertheless one of the questions that could come up on a Wednesday afternoon is of interest to all members of the house and of great interest throughout the country. I refer to the motion which was under discussion a week ago last Wednesday, having to do with federal aid to education. As a matter of fact when that debate was interrupted—and I point out that it was interrupted, not adjourned—the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was speaking; and from his remarks it would seem that he expected, as certainly the rest of us expected, there would be another opportunity for hon. members to speak to that very important question.

It is an easy matter to word an amendment to the motion which would have the effect of giving us just one more Wednesday, and also the effect of putting the order for resumption of the debate having to do with education at the top of the list for that Wednesday. In order to achieve this dual purpose—which, as I say, I am sure will meet with general support—I move, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "November 2 next," the following words:

"notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 15, public bills and orders shall have precedence over notices of motion, and that on Wednesday, November 9,—"

If my amendment should carry, the motion would then read in this way—and I think I should put it on record so that the effect of the amendment will be clearly understood:

That on Wednesday, November 2 next, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 15, public bills and orders shall have precedence over notices of motion, and that on Wednesday, November 9, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

As I have said already, the amendment would accomplish two purposes. In the first place it would give us one more Wednesday as a private members' day. It would put off the application of the Prime Minister's motion until Wednesday, November 9. In the second place it would reverse the order as between public bills and orders, on the one hand, and notices of motion, on the other, for next Wednesday, so that the first order to be called then would be the item at the top of the list of public bills and orders, which reads:

October 19—Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Knight:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

I think it is generally agreed, Mr. Speaker, that one of the most interesting debates this session, and one most lacking in partisanship, was the one on this subject which took place on October 19. Hon. members in all parts of the house have been made aware of the nation-wide interest in this question by the telegrams and communications they have received. We should like to hear the rest of the Prime Minister's speech; and I feel that it would be meeting the wishes of the house if the government were to accede to this amendment. I do not believe it is the sort of thing that should be made an issue, in terms of something we must fight about at this time. If I am wrong, if hon. members in all parties do not agree with me, that is the end of it. But I am sure the subject to which I refer is one in which we are so keenly interested that hon. members will want to support the amendment.

I want to make it clear that even I would not have the nerve to ask for further Wednesdays in blank form merely in order that we might go through the various motions standing on the order paper. But having regard to the importance of this subject, and the wide interest taken in it, I hope the government will consider granting us one more Wednesday for this purpose.

Before I sit down I wish to call the Prime Minister's attention, if it has not been done already, to the fact that he was paid a well-deserved compliment on page 4 of the current issue of Toronto Saturday Night, where it is pointed out that he has shown himself this session ready to accept good suggestions from the opposition.

Mr. Fleming: What about last night?

Mr. Knowles: Last night the Prime Minister accepted good suggestions and turned down some that were not so good. The last sentence in the paragraph to which I refer reads:

The house gives him top marks for his attitude.

I echo that sentiment, and I hope there will be granted this further opportunity for the discussion of the proposal respecting federal aid to education which so many of us support.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I may still obtain sufficient marks from the house, even if I do not succumb today to the cajoling flattery of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member recognizes that during this session more time has been given to these interesting academic debates than was given to them in any session since before the war, and that notwithstanding the fact that when they came here on September 15 most hon. members hoped that the session would be short, though they knew there was quite a large volume of public business to be transacted. They know now that there is still a large volume of public business to be transacted.

The hon. member proposes that the rights some fifteen hon. members would have under the standing orders, to debate matters which they consider of great interest, be taken away and that priority be given to the continuation of the debate—having to do with a very interesting subject, it is true—on a motion made by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). Hon. members will realize that unless we sit until next summer there is little prospect of the hon. member's motion being reached again, unless we take away the rights given by the rules to the fifteen other members who have resolutions under the heading of notices of motions. Though the subject matter of the resolution of the hon. member for Saskatoon is extremely interesting, I am sure that there are other members who feel that the matters they propose to bring before the house, if and when they have an opportunity of doing so, are also interesting. I do not think that it would be a good precedent to have the house decide that any one of these academic resolutions submitted by hon. members should have precedence over the other. The rights of each member are equal, and when there is an opportunity for those rights to be exercised, it seems to me that they should be exercised according to the provisions of the standing orders.

This being so, I believe if it is proper that we should now take the time that would otherwise be given to these academic discussions and devote it to the transaction of urgent government business which has to be accomplished before we can reach prorogation, it should be without any qualifications. There should not be a day especially set aside for the continuation of the debate on the resolution of the member for Saskatoon.

This does not mean that the subject cannot be discussed in the house. Hon. members who are interested in discussing it know that, for instance, in the budget debate there is wide latitude as to the subjects hon. members may discuss. At various times discussion on the estimates provides ample opportunity for discussion of matters of this kind. I believe that the interest of each one of us in educational matters, as well as in properly safeguarding the rights and jurisdictions of provincial governments, can be discussed.

So far as I am concerned I am quite content with the four minutes' participation I had in the debate a week ago last Wednesday, and am willing to reserve for some other time any further remarks I might have to make on the subject. I therefore feel that we cannot accept the suggestion of the hon. member. I hope that we shall not have to have a recorded division on the amendment.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I believe a strong argument can be made in support of the debate being continued on the notice of motion of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). I do not recall any other private member's notice of motion in respect to which the Prime Minister felt he was called upon to state his position. There were many members who hoped that the fact that he did take four minutes to indicate his approval of the general purpose of the motion which was discussed on October 19 indicated that we were to hear something further on the subject which might produce positive results.

When this notice of motion was before the house I pointed out that, desirable though its purpose was, and strongly as we advocate the acceptance of the principle of the greatest possible support of education throughout the whole of Canada, this is only part of the whole relationship between the dominion and provincial governments. If we are to reach the objective which is in the minds of so many hon. members, of all the provinces being financially in a position to provide adequate standards, then there must be an agreement that goes beyond education itself.

I had hoped that when the Prime Minister saw fit to take part in the debate on the motion of the member for Saskatoon we might have some indication from him that he recognizes the importance of this matter and is prepared to meet those whom he described last night as "those dear provincial premiers". After all, "those dear provincial premiers" are the heads of governments with whom consultation will be necessary if the purpose of this motion is to be achieved.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should discuss at this time a former debate, whether it took place last night or on a previous Wednesday. The question is on the amendment which is now before the house.

Mr. Drew: I am not discussing the merits of the debate. I did not know those words were hidden away for ever in some mortuary. In fact I have no intention on other occasions of recognizing any such limitation. After all, the words were the expression of an attitude toward those who must be consulted. I had hoped that the provinces would be consulted. I feel, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that there is an argument in favour of the members being permitted to continue the debate on that particular motion.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): My colleagues and I are particularly interested in the amendment which is now before us. The Prime Minister's motion, by giving precedence to the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers, writes finis to private members' day. Under normal circumstances that would not concern us very much. In this particular instance, however, things are not quite normal.

On Wednesday, October 19, when we were considering the motion of the member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), five members were able to participate in that debate. We of the Social Credit group were particularly anxious to have the opportunity of placing ourselves on record in this matter, but, because of the limited time, we were unable to do so. The Prime Minister indicated that he had spoken for four minutes and would rest content with that. But to speak even for four minutes is very different from having no opportunity at all to take part in the debate. I repeat that we wish to have an opportunity of advising the house that our group wholeheartedly supports the resolution for the equalization of educational opportunity. We are wholeheartedly in agreement with the proposal that that should come about as a consequence of federal aid.

Mr. Speaker: I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is out of order in discussing the so-called educational notice of motion. The hon. member's remarks should be directed to the amendment now before the house.

Mr. Shaw: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We consider that the amendment to the Prime Minister's motion is of such vital consequence, not only to our group but to the house and to the country, that we should support it, to the end that opportunity be provided of completing the debate which was started on Wednesday, October 19.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I regret that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took the position he did on this amendment, and also that apparently we could not, within the rules of the house, discuss the question of extending private members' day in any other manner than by an amendment to the Prime Minister's motion.

I want to call the Prime Minister's attention to two reasons that he gave, neither of which in my opinion warrants his refusal to grant us this one extra day. The first was the fact that it would extend the length of the session. All the amendment calls for is one afternoon—three hours sitting—to be devoted to this question. I doubt if there is an hon. member in this house who is so anxious to make this a short session and get back home that he would wish to get away one day earlier rather than have three hours devoted to a discussion of this question.

The second reason was that it would deprive other members who had resolutions on the order paper of an opportunity of debating theirs, and would give preference to the motion of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). May I call attention to the fact that within the last week some fifteen or twenty of those private members' resolutions on the order paper were allowed to stand when the opportunity came for them to be presented. I submit to the Prime Minister, through you, sir, that the resolution with regard to federal aid for education is of sufficient national importance to warrant its being given some precedence. On one occasion the Prime Minister himself said that there is no subject of greater national concern than that of education, and I am quite sure that that is his point of view.

As has already been mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the remarks of the Prime Minister when he closed the discussion a week ago last Wednesday led us to believe that on some future occasion he would continue discussion of the subject. As reported at page 946 of Hansard, he began his short speech by saying:

> Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible for me during the two or three minutes remaining before six o'clock to attempt to deal at all adequately with the resolution before the house.

And in closing he remarked:

> It may be that there are other hon. members who would wish to participate in the discussion of this problem, and perhaps at this time the most convenient thing to do would be to adjourn the debate.

I submit, sir, that there are 60,000 teachers across Canada who want the Prime Minister to complete his remarks on that subject. There are numbers of members in the house who, I am sure, want to express their opinions.

We have already been given to understand that a dominion-provincial conference will be called at the close of this session. Education is one subject that I am quite confident should be discussed at that conference; and if so, I think the members of this house should have the opportunity of placing before the government their opinions on the subject. I regret that the Prime Minister did not leave it entirely to the house to decide; I think it is a question that the members of the house should decide for themselves.

Mr. Fleming: The Prime Minister has referred to the volume of government business yet to be transacted. Will he be good enough to indicate to the house now what government measures are to be brought forward this session, apart from those that are already on the order paper?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have not the complete list here, but even if there were nothing more than the estimates, that would be a large volume of business.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Speaker: On division.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. At what date is the dominion-provincial conference to be held?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is a matter which is not to be determined by the federal government alone. Correspondence is now going on between the federal government and certain provincial premiers for the purpose of trying to find a date which will be convenient for all concerned.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

453. Departmental administration, $836,737.

The Deputy Chairman: At the close of the previous sitting we were considering item 453. If I recall correctly, the hon. member for St. John's East had not completed his remarks. He may do so now.

Mr. Higgins: When we adjourned some nights ago I was referring to the desirability of the establishment of a coastguard for Canada, and I was referring to the need of it in our own province of Newfoundland. I had remarked that the main industry of Newfoundland is fishing, and that a natural ancillary of that fishing industry is the use and operation of small boats. In view of the extreme changes in weather that we have at various times of the year, and with our extended coast line, which at various places is a rough one with little protection in the way of harbours, I submit that the establishment of a coastguard service is of the utmost importance to the province of Newfoundland.

I should like to refer you, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members, to an editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of August 27, 1949. It reads as follows:

> It was in the morning news yesterday: The United States coastguard cutter Coos Bay cleared Halifax harbour early today heading into the choppy Atlantic on a mercy dash to the liner Parthia.
> A doctor, a portable respirator and a converter were flown to Dartmouth (just across the harbour from Halifax) by an American coastguard plane "after the Parthia sent out a plea for assistance" for a passenger suffering from infantile paralysis. The doctor and equipment were rushed across Halifax harbour from Dartmouth aboard the cutter which had been ordered into Halifax to make the final mercy dash. The United States coastguard cutter immediately headed into the Atlantic toward the Parthia.
> It is what newspaper people call a great human interest story. But it is more than that. It is still another demonstration of the efficiency and value of the United States coastguard service . . . and of our own lack of such a service.
> For Canadians it is not a pleasant spectacle—the spectacle of all this activity in the very port upon which a major part of the organization of a Canadian coastguard service should be based for operations in Atlantic waters; all this activity of a coastguard service that is not Canadian at all, but upon which we rely for the performance of much of the work which we should be doing for ourselves.
> Through the years running into decades we have been indebted to the United States coastguard service for a thousand and one aids to our ships and shipping, promptly rendered and capably performed. While it is highly creditable to the United States, it is humiliating to Canadians that their own country should persist in this reliance upon the services of another country. It does something to Canadian pride, Canadian dignity.

I quote this editorial, which is couched in language much better than I could use, so that hon. members may understand, even those whose constituencies do not touch on the sea or on the great lakes, that this is a matter which concerns the dignity of this nation. It is about time that we asserted the dignity that the world expects of us.

So that hon. members may be aware of the history, the functions and the duties of the United States coastguard, I shall detail them as briefly as possible.

Alexander Hamilton, first secretary of the United States treasury, recognized the need of a floating police service as part of the national fiscal organization and in 1789 congress passed an act regulating the collection of duties on vessels and imported goods. In the following year, construction of revenue cutters was authorized. The service, however, never had a statutory designation, and was variously known as the revenue cutter service, the system of cutters, revenue marine, revenue marine service, and even revenue service.

In 1915 the lifesaving service was combined with the revenue cutter service to form the United States coastguard. In 1939 the bureau of lighthouses was transferred to the coastguard, and in 1942 the functions of the bureau of marine inspection and navigation were transferred to the service.

The United States coastguard is really part of the navy in war and of the treasury department in time of peace. The coastguard has grown to be a sea-going handy man having an interest in safety of travel on or over the sea as well as protecting federal interests at sea.

I shall detail for hon. members as briefly as I can the major functions of the United States coastguard. They are as follows:

Lifesaving stations all along the United States coasts; aids to navigation, consisting of lighthouses, buoys, radio beacons, radar beacons, and the tenders and personnel to maintain them; Loran—the new electronic navigation system used by ships and four out of five transatlantic air lines; direction-finder stations publications, such as notice to mariners; patrolling cutters: weather stations and plane guard at sea, probably to expand to thirteen in north Atlantic, as recommended by PICAO; rescue cutters; federal functions in Greenland; federal functions in Alaska: air-sea rescue: coordinating agency, maintaining continuous record of all vessels and planes at sea, thereby facilitating expeditious rescue in case of emergency; communications system—radio networks over all United States teritorry, telephone system completely covering United States coast line; merchant marine inspection and safety: supervision of safe construction and outfitting of all merchant ships, United States; supervision of safe operation by regular inspections and checking for proper maintenance of safety devices.

Who knows, Mr. Chairman, that if we had a Canadian coastguard service and one of its functions was the inspection of all safety devices on ships, what might have happened in the case of the Noronic? Who knows if that awful tragedy might have been averted if we had a Canadian coastguard service? I continue with the list:

Licensing and certificating of merchant marine personnel, and discipline of merchant marine personnel; international ice patrol: keeping track of ice in north Atlantic during ice-menace season, issuing appropriate warning; icebreaking in harbours and great lakes: prevention of smuggling; flood relief; miscellaneous: enforcement of provisions of Alaska seal treaty; enforcement of provisions of international whaling treaty; enforcement of harbour pollution act, fishing laws, transportation of federal representatives, mails.

That is a long list of the duties performed by the United States coastguard service. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is it possible for a police force, no matter how good it may be—and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have a record second to none as a police force—to discharge the duties I have just enumerated? The coastguard is a sea service, a service for seamen, a service that cannot be undertaken by a land based force or a force which is really the minor wing of a land force, no matter how good that force may be. I therefore respectfully submit that the necessary steps should be taken immediately to set up a proper and efficient coastguard service for Canada, a service that would be able to take care of the many and varied duties that only a service of that kind can perform, a service of which in the years to come all Canadians might be justly proud.

When the question of saving life is at stake, cost should not be considered. For the sake of economy, for the sake of national pride, for the sake of humanity, we should have a coastguard service equipped and manned for the numerous sea-going duties now undertaken by the United States coastguard service. Too long have we let Uncle Sam do our work. It is about time that we did it ourselves.

In conclusion I trust that I will be pardoned for giving the committee a little poem from the official book of the United States coastguard, entitled, "The United States Coast-Guard—its History, Vessels, and Doctrine". The poem is entitled, "Coastguard Cutter", and reads as follows:

When she steams into the harbour
People don't flock 'round like bees;
For she ain't no grim destroyer,
No dark terror of the seas.
And there ain't a load of romance
To the guy that doesn't know,
In a ship that just saves vessels
When the icy northers blow.

But the men that sail the ocean
In a wormy, rotten craft,
When the sea ahead is mountains
With a hell-blown gale abaft;
When the mainmast cracks and topples,
And she's lurching in the trough,
Them's the guys that greets the cutter
With the smiles that won't come off.

When the old storm signal's flyin',
Every vessel seeks a lee,
'Cept the cutter, which ups anchor
And goes plowing out to sea,
When the hurricane's a-blowin'
From the banks to old cape Cod,
Oh, the cutter, with her searchlight,
Seems the messenger of God.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for St. John's East upon having entered the lists in support of our contention that we should have a Canadian coastguard service. He did it exceptionally well, and as one who has been here for five years I will tell him that he might find it advantageous if he were just to put the speech away in mothballs for another year—because he will be able to pull it out again and use it next year, I am sure. It will be just as instructive then as it is now—and I congratulate him upon having made it.

I think that next year our Canadian seamen, if they get into trouble, will be singing "God Bless America"; and if they ever reach the point where they cannot sing that, then they will have to sing "Nearer My God to Thee".

In what I say I am not critical of the Minister of Transport, because he runs a pretty good service, having in mind what we give him. He has a couple of lifeboats out on the Pacific coast. Of course they are small, and they cannot go anywhere in a big sea. They are pretty dangerous; if one got out in a big sea in one of those boats he would freeze to death—and if he happened to help anyone else, that person would perhaps freeze to death too. There is no radar on them; I hope there is a compass, although I am not sure. They do, however, perform a useful service, and are handled by capable men. They go out to service our lighthouses, at points where landings with supplies can be made only with small vessels. They look after the lights around the channels. I have no criticism at all of the service they are rendering out there. My only comment is that while they are useful adjuncts to a lifesaving service, they are not useful as a coastguard.

Last year I made a speech in the house on this subject. I pointed out to the minister that we could obtain vessels suitable for this purpose; that good vessels were still available from the United States navy for $15,000 which cost about $385,000 to build. They are equipped with aids to navigation, such as asdic, radar, and a 1,200 horse power diesel engine. I can assure the committee that they are extremely seaworthy—boats on which one could put a tow-winch, and, if a vessel were in difficulty, pass a line to it.

I feel that the coastguard in Canada is not something that should be under the Minister of Transport. In my view the Minister of National Defence should be the man to handle that problem. For some unknown reason this year the Department of National Defence saw fit to send two seaworthy ocean-going tugs and have them stationed alternately at Winter Harbour on the west coast of Vancouver island. They were given instructions to look for Japanese mines, and, if any showed up, they were to go out and destroy them. They were careful never to do anything constructive—and this is where I take exception to what is being done by the Department of National Defence. Any time we suggest to them that they do anything constructive in return for the $375 million or $400 million that is appropriated to them, and suggest that they provide us with rescue facilities along our coast line, they say: "Oh, no; we are destroying Japanese mines, and certainly we are not going to be useful to anyone."

The Deputy Chairman: May I point out that we are discussing item 453, Department of Transport—not the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling that to my attention. But the Minister of Transport gets so much abuse—and he is a very good friend of mine—that I sometimes feel that the abuse is not entirely justified. I was just pointing out through you, sir, that I think he should be making this speech himself, and saying that it is his colleague the Minister of National Defence who should be doing all this.

As I have pointed out, the Department of National Defence provided us with two vessels last year which, in extreme emergencies, could have acted as coastguard cutters. But when we got them up at Winter Harbour we found that evidently they had been told not to do anything, and they made very sure to follow out instructions carefully.

Perhaps I am reaching somewhat into the functions of the Department of National Defence, but I suggest that the Department of National Defence could provide the service for which we are asking. I cannot think of a better place to train young Canadian seamen than to put them on a boat 120 or 130 feet long, send them out to sea and teach them how to pay out a tow-line in a heavy sea if someone is in trouble. You do not make seamen by putting them in the aircraft carrier Magnificent and teaching them how to run an elevator. That is not the way to train them. To make sailors you have to get them into small boats. I suggest that the Minister of Transport talk to his colleague and see if he cannot sell him, not a bill of goods but something for the good of Canada. It seems to me that for the $375 million we are spending in the Department of National Defence we should have a coastguard service and get some real value for our money.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who is much closer to the inner circle of government than I am, has offered some comments which I am afraid will cause discouragement out on the Pacific coast, because many agencies out there had hoped that an improved coastguard service or sea-rescue service would develop during the forthcoming year.

I know that some improvements have been made in the matter of small vessels operated by the Department of Transport. These, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, spend most of their time in replenishing supplies and looking after aids to navigation around our coast. There has been, however, a growing demand in recent months for an adequate coastguard service along that coast.

Whether it should be under the Department of Transport or some other department may be a debatable point. At the present time, however, the Department of Transport is charged with the responsibility of looking after our shipping and of supplying aids to navigation, lighthouse services and all that sort of thing. Therefore I submit this is the appropriate time to raise the question of the need for a coastguard service.

I am glad the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has referred to the activities of the two small naval tugs stationed on the west coast of Vancouver island last summer. One of those tugs was asked by the R.C.A.F. to proceed to the rescue of a vessel in difficulty some 300 miles off the coast of Vancouver island. The tug proceeded but turned around and came back, the reason given, as stated in the News-Herald of October 8, being that the captain of the vessel learned that a United States coastguard vessel was proceeding to the ship in distress, and also that there were numerous other fishing vessels in the immediate vicinity. Therefore the naval tug turned around and went back. Three days later the ship in distress was towed into harbour by a United States coastguard cutter. The suggestion that fishermen who are earning a livelihood on the sea, and who are exposed to the dangers of the Pacific, should have to leave their lawful occupation to stand by another ship seems fantastic unless the ship is in dire necessity and there is no other rescue vessel available.

As has already been said, there are many different government agencies and departments with ocean-going vessels on the Pacific coast that are in some measure responsible for protective service. There are fishery patrols, Royal Canadian Mounted Police vessels, hydrographic service vessels, ships of the Department of Transport, and so forth. There are also the sea rescue squads of the R.C.A.F. and the naval vessels, but they are not co-ordinated in spite of an effort that is being made to reach some degree of co-ordination.

It is essential, if effective rescue facilities are to be provided, that all these agencies be co-ordinated under one head, and that some individual have authority to order a government vessel to proceed to the scene of a wreck or to a ship that is in distress. That would seem to me to be one of the main functions of a coastguard service.

I know that to install a coastguard service in any way comparable with the most efficient service maintained by the United States would run into a great deal of money, perhaps more money than the government would feel justified in expending at the present time. Nevertheless, with the resources that are now available, it should be possible to have these services co-ordinated to a higher degree than is the case at the present time, and thereby have a more efficient service. It should be possible for some individual to be able to order a government vessel of a different service, which may happen to be in the vicinity, to proceed to the scene of a marine disaster. Such power does not exist at the present time.

The R.C.A.F., which receives information about disasters, can advise a vessel of another department of that disaster, but they do not have power to instruct it to proceed to carry out rescue work. Without going to a great deal of expense to set up a complete coastguard service, I hope that the minister will look into the matter and see if it is not possible to achieve a higher degree of co-ordination of all these existing means—

Mr. Chevrier: That is the whole point.

Mr. Pearkes: —of rescuing life at sea. There is one other point akin to the question of a lifeguard service. In 1948 representatives of the Department of Transport attended an international convention concerned with the safety of life at sea. I believe they approved of the general agreements drawn up at that convention. These agreements are not to come into force until the first of January, 1951, but I believe there is a provision in them that they will only come into force on the 1st of January, 1951, provided that at least twelve months before that date not less than fifteen acceptances of the convention, including seven by countries each with not less than one million gross tons of shipping, have been deposited. I should like the minister to say whether an acceptance has been deposited by Canada, or whether Canada intends to endorse the agreement signed by her representatives before the first of January, 1950. That is the date by which it will be necessary for our acceptance to reach the international convention if we are to comply with the twelve months deadline prior to the 1st of January, 1951.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the hon. member immediately that Canada is a signatory to the convention and intends to accept it. I have not looked into the legal question as to whether or not it will be necessary before the next session of parliament to bring down a convention, or whether amendments to the Canada Shipping Act will suffice.

Mr. Pearkes: That would not be too late for it to be accepted by the 1st of January, 1951?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to place before the minister a matter of serious and direct concern to at least 5,000 of my constituents. I refer to the maintenance of an adequate and suitable steamer service on the Arrow lakes. I have mentioned this subject before. It is not a very glamorous one from a news reporter's point of view, but when I speak of this subject I think of the farmers, the fruit growers and the lumbermen of that district who make their living by hard work.

For the information of hon. members, in order that they may understand the situation existing at the present time, I think I should inform them where the Arrow lakes are and relate some of the history of the service. The Arrow lakes are an extension of the Columbia river running from Arrowhead, which is about 35 miles south of Revelstoke, to Castlegar on the south, which is about 25 miles north of the international boundary, in all a distance of over 100 miles. The first service on the Arrow lakes and the upper Columbia was provided in 1865 when the steamer Forty-nine was used to transport miners' supplies and equipment to the Big Bend north of Revelstoke.

In 1894 several men incorporated what was known as the Columbia and Kootenay Steam Navigation Company, and proceeded to build several steamers, the first of which was the Columbia. Then they built the Lytton and the Kootenay. These steamers served to develop the district for a year until in 1895 the first stern-wheelers were built, the old Nakusp and the Trail.

In 1896 the service was taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway. This company increased the fleet by building the Rossland and the Kootenay, later the Minto in 1898, and the steamer Bonnington in 1911. During the period from 1896 to 1911 there was ever-increasing traffic. I lived in the neighbourhood of that lake for the greater part of those years. This was the main artery of travel, giving people in the interior of British Columbia access to the coast. As a matter of fact the traffic increased to such an extent that the C.P.R. built the palatial steamer, the Bonnington, in 1911 to accommodate it; and a reference to the minutes of a directors' meeting of the Canadian Pacific Railway of that date indicates that this route was very profitable.

Then with the completion of the Kettle Valley railroad in 1916 the situation changed. From that time on the major portion of the traffic from the southeastern interior, both passenger and freight, was carried over this railroad to the coast. Since then passenger and freight traffic has gradually declined, and finally brought about the decision to dispose of the Rossland, Kootenay and Bonnington, so that today all we have left of the fleet on the Arrow lakes is the 51-year-old stern-wheel steamer Minto. There are only two stern-wheelers operating in any province in Canada, as far as I know; one is the Moyia on the Kootenay lake and the other is the Minto on the Arrow lakes.

As the situation grew worse from year to year organizations in the lake district complained to government departments and to various officials, without result. During the period of the war the people decided to do the best they could with the service that was being given in the district; but since the war there has been an increasing demand from the residents of that area for an improved and continued service on the Arrow lakes, which demand has been stimulated during the last year by fears that in the near future the Canadian Pacific may turn over the service to other interests. Boards of trade, farmers' institutes, fruit growers' organizations and other associations in the area are united in wishing to see the service continued and improved by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because they are of the opinion that no other company could give a satisfactory service for the whole area.

When I was a member of the provincial legislature I used to receive resolutions from various organizations with respect to this matter. I brought it to the attention of the provincial government, where I was told that this was a matter of federal concern, that it had nothing to do with the provincial government. So when I arrived in Ottawa I took it up with various departments of government, including the Department of Transport. On the first occasion the minister told me that since these lakes were entirely within the confines of the province of British Columbia he was of the opinion that this service came under provincial jurisdiction. Now I want to read the minister's reply to a letter I wrote and a query of mine in the house during the latter part of 1947:

Dear Mr. Herridge,

When the estimates of my department were before the house you raised the question of the service being given by vessels operated by the C.P.R. on the Arrow lakes. You will remember you also wrote to me in the matter about the same time.

I placed before the board of transport commissioners your representations that the frequency of the service on the lakes should be increased both for the carriage of passengers and freight and also your suggestion that this service be brought under the operation of the Transport Act, and consequently under the jurisdiction of the board.

Section 12, subsection 4 of the act is, in part, as follows:

"The provisions of this part shall not apply in the transport of goods or passengers

(a) between ports or places in British Columbia".

The board have carefully reviewed the situation in the light of your observations, and have reached the conclusion that the operation of ships on the Arrow lakes does not lend itself to regulation under the Transport Act. Accordingly the board have expressed the view that the act should not be amended as suggested by you.

I felt I should inform you of the position taken by the board in this regard.

With best wishes.

That is signed by the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may interrupt the hon. gentleman, Mr. Chairman, he has been permitted to go on for some time now, but my impression was that he was entirely out of order. In view of the letter he has just read, which clearly indicates that the board of transport commissioners have no jurisdiction in the matter and that in order to have jurisdiction the Transport Act would have to be amended, I submit with deference that this is not a subject which comes under the item now before the committee.

Mr. Herridge: I think the minister is correct on that point, but that is not the point I am really going to make in concluding my remarks. I would like to read a letter I received from the secretary of the board of transport commissioners in reference to this matter, under date of May 19, 1949:

Dear Sir,

I have for acknowledgement your letter of May 10 addressed to the board's director of operation in the above noted connection.

That is, in respect to C.P.R. steamer service on the Arrow lakes.

I have been directed to state that the board is of the opinion that it has no power to prevent the disposal by the C.P.R. of its boat equipment to private interests and is therefore not in a position to assist in this matter.

That is signed by Mr. P. F. Baillargeon, secretary of the board. The point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is that I have been told repeatedly this does not come under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. I am of a different opinion, as I think a good many people are, and I am appealing to the house because under these circumstances we have no other recourse. I want to quote from the act of incorporation of the original company to prove that this steamer service does come within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. I am referring to chapter 87, 53 Victoria, an act respecting the Columbia and Kootenay Railway and Navigation Company, assented to April 24, 1890. This is the preamble:

Whereas a petition has been presented stating that the Columbia and Kootenay Railway and Navigation Company has undertaken the works hereinafter described, and that it will facilitate its financial arrangements if it can lease such works to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and praying that authority so to do may be conferred by the parliament of Canada; and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition; Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think he is pursuing the discussion of a case which does not come under the item now before the committee. Following the remarks of the Minister of Transport on a point of order, the hon. member said he would come to a different conclusion and that he agreed with the point of order raised by the minister. I permitted him to continue his remarks, but I see he is still discussing the same case. So I would ask him to be kind enough to confine his remarks to the item before the committee; that is, departmental administration, Department of Transport.

Mr. Herridge: This is the only opportunity I may have to prove that this steamer service comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament and that the department should do something about it, and I believe that properly comes under the item administration. I shall not be long, and as I am not in the habit of taking up the time of the house unnecessarily, I would like to proceed with my appeal to the minister and the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I have heard the appeal before, but I have no objection to hearing it again if it pleases my hon. friend.

Mr. Herridge: The minister is very kind, but I hope this appeal will bear more fruit than my former efforts. Section 2 provides:

The following works, being those which the company by its said act of incorporation is empowered to undertake, own and operate, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. . . .

This is the point I want to make.

. . . that is to say: A railway from the outlet of Kootenay lake, in British Columbia, through the Selkirk range of mountains, to a point on the Columbia river as near as practicable to the junction of the Kootenay with the Columbia river in that province. . . .

I am going to abbreviate as much as possible, but the act goes on:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed in any way to affect or render inoperative any of the provisions of the said act of incorporation which authorized the said company to undertake, own and operate the said works as aforesaid; but hereafter the same shall be subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, and the provisions of the Railway Act.

I believe the act of incorporation clearly indicates, Mr. Chairman, that this steamship service is the concern of this parliament and should operate under the Railway Act or some other act coming within the jurisdiction of the minister.

I should like to consider the incorporation act in relation to clause 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which deals with the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures with certain exceptions. One of the exceptions is contained in clause 10 and reads as follows:

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

Surely my argument is sound.

I know that in recent years, Mr. Chairman, considerable losses have been incurred in the operation of these steamers. I have discussed the matter with the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway as well as the officials of the Department of Transport. I found them all sympathetic in a general way but I am of the opinion that, as this service without doubt comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament and therefore under the Minister of Transport, consideration must be given to proposals for continuing it for the people affected.

I remember the early days when these people settled on the lakes. The Canadian Pacific and other companies sold land to many of them. They cleared the land, bought timber holdings and settled there on the assumption that the then satisfactory service would be continued. I do not think this government can blandly overlook the situation in which those people now find themselves.

I raised this question in 1947, as the minister mentioned. To him it is a repetition. After I heard a member of the Progressive Conservative party thanking the minister for a subsidy given a steamer which operated entirely on a lake situated within the province of Ontario, I asked the minister if he would give consideration to the granting of a subsidy for the service on the Arrow lakes. At that time he said yes.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am appealing to the minister to have his department investigate this situation to ascertain whether it is necessary to bring this service under the transport or other act. I suggest for the immediate future, a subsidy should be provided for the maintenance of the service and for its improvement. Not only do these steamers serve the towns, the isolated hamlets, lumber camps, fruit farmers, and residents along the lakes, but if the government has vision they can be of great value to Canada as a tourist attraction. I do urge that the minister have his department investigate this question and confer with the officials of the Canadian Pacific, the company concerned, with a view to granting a subsidy. The minister is granting a subsidy of approximately $405,000 this year to steamships on the west coast. Will he say what he intends to do about these proposals?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will excuse me if I do not take up too much time replying to his request for consideration of the service on the Arrow lakes. The matter received considerable attention last year and was referred to the board of transport commissioners. After a careful investigation, they came to the conclusion it was a case which did not come within their jurisdiction. Furthermore, the board felt that the Transport Act should not be amended so as to bring this service within the jurisdiction of the act. I do not believe I can add very much to what was said then.

There is, of course, the question of the essentiality and convenience of the service to the public, which is another matter. The hon. member suggests that consideration be given to a subsidy. The maritime commission administers subsidies, and the owner of the service should make application to them, just as other steamship operators do. After a careful study of the facts and circumstances, if the maritime commission would recommend either that a subsidy is or is not warranted, if such an application is made then I believe my hon. friend will have gone as far as he can go in so far as the services over which I have any control are concerned. I do not believe he can expect much more than that. I shall be glad to facilitate the application of the owners of the service if they care to make one.

I should not like to leave the matter of the coastguard service without some general remarks in reply. I am grateful to the members for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) and Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) for their contribution to this debate. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni was right when he said it is not the first time the matter has been up for consideration.

I wonder if the member for St. John's East realizes just how tremendous this problem is? This is a large country with an ocean on either side of it. It is not an easy matter to patrol our coasts and the great lakes as well. It is not a problem which can be solved merely by words, or by criticism of what is being done.

Some of the members of this house apparently do not realize how much we are doing. The member for St. John's East referred to the United States coastguard cutter coming to the assistance of a certain ship in the Atlantic region. That coastguard cutter forms part of the north Atlantic ice patrol, towards the maintenance of which Canada pays a certain amount by virtue of an international agreement. When that cutter came to the assistance of our ship, it was a direct result of the contribution Canada made towards the cost of the ice patrol.

I could read to the house a statement of the number of casualties that have taken place on the east and west coasts, as well as the great lakes, and inform the house how many of those have been looked after by our own people, but the list is too long to put on the record. I should like to take one or two examples. In 1946-47 on the Pacific coast there were 120 casualties. Seventy-five of them needed no assistance and the remaining 45 were looked after exclusively by our own ships. In 1947-48, on the west coast again, there were 95 casualties, 60 of which needed no assistance and the remaining 35 were taken care of by our own ships.

Mr. Green: Would the minister indicate what he means by "our own ships"? Does that include salvage vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it would include ships of the Department of Transport, salvage vessels, fishing vessels and R.C.M.P. vessels. On the west coast in 1948-49, there were 95 casualties, of which 62 required no assistance.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, would the minister explain what he means by "casualties"? It has a certain connotation, and when he says a casualty would require no assistance, what does he mean?

Mr. Chevrier: Casualty does not mean the loss of life. It would include a ship that is stranded at sea by reason of engine failure or a ship that has been rammed by another ship.

Mr. MacInnis: Then, "casualty" refers to ships and not persons.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Of the remaining 33 casualties in 1948-49 which required assistance, 32 were looked after by our ships and one by the United States coastguard. The same thing could be said of the east coast. By my remarks, I do not want to minimize in any way the value of the service rendered by the United States coastguard. I think on many occasions I have taken the opportunity to write to those who are in charge of this service in the United States, to thank them for the assistance they have given Canada. I can think of one particular occasion on the great lakes when they were of great service to us. I should not like anyone in the house to think that Canada is not extremely grateful for what is being done by the United States coastguard service. What I want to bring to the attention of the committee is that Canada is doing something in this matter.

Mr. Isnor: Will the minister be good enough to put on record the figures for the east coast operations?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. On the Atlantic coast in the year 1946-47 there were 67 casualties, 55 of which required no assistance and 12 to which assistance was rendered—again by government vessels, by fishermen and salvage companies. In 1947-48, on the Atlantic coast, there were 98 casualties, 84 requiring no assistance and 14 requiring assistance, all of the 14 being looked after by our own vessels. In 1948-49, on the east coast there were 84 casualties, 53 requiring no assistance and 31 requiring assistance; 2 of the 31 were assisted by United States coastguard vessels. That completes the list to date for the Atlantic coast.

I think the problem is chiefly one of co-ordination. I think it was the hon. member for Comox-Alberni or the hon. member for Nanaimo who put his finger on the main point when he said that these facilities that we have on the east coast, on the west coast and on the great lakes might perhaps be brought together more than they are at the moment. Consideration is being given to the further co-ordination of these services, perhaps under the Department of National Defence, perhaps under the Department of Transport. I do not know which of the two departments is the better qualified. But in view of the seriousness of the problem a committee has been established by the government. This committee is composed of members of departments which are concerned, such as Mines and Resources, Fisheries, R.C.M.P., Transport and the three divisions of National Defence.

The object of this committee is to ascertain whether improvement can be made on what exists. I think the committee, for instance, will study what might be the maximum facilities, what would be the minimum, to meet the situation and what would be a middle position; and consider the possibility of co-ordination of all existing services under one head to establish responsibility for locating the vessels on the east coast, the west coast and the great lakes, for getting in contact with them, for keeping in contact with all government vessels, be they Transport vessels or those of other departments, and indicating to those vessels where a ship is in distress, and indicating how quickly the ship can be relieved, and matters of that kind.

To those members therefore who have interested themselves in this problem I can say that their efforts have not been in vain. I am not able to announce anything concrete at this time but I think the committee will be pleased to know that an attempt at least is being made to study the problem and to see what the best possible solution is at this time.

Mr. Decore: I want to draw the minister's attention to the Canadian National Railway line which runs east from Edmonton to a point called Heinsburg. It so happens that this railway line runs through a thickly-populated farming area, but there is a gap of some 39 miles from Heinsburg to a point called Frenchman's Butte in Saskatchewan. The result is that the farmers' cost of production is considerably higher than it would otherwise be. I understand that the reason this line was not completed was the coming of depression years and the war.

Conditions have now changed. Quite significant developments have taken place along that line which I think are of importance to our Canadian economy. It so happens that along this line the famous Redwater oil field has been discovered. This is the largest field not only in Alberta but in Canada. Farther along the line there is a salt mine which has been developed only within the last year. The result is that there is quite a considerable strain on rail transportation. As the people in my constituency are affected, is the minister in a position to give us any information on whether the Canadian National Railway Company has any intention of completing this gap some time in the near future?

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the hon. member for Vegreville for his interest in the unfilled gap between Heinsburg, Alberta and Frenchman's Butte, Saskatchewan. The Canadian National Railways have been giving some careful study to this line, not only in 1949 but in 1948 and 1947; and, I must tell my hon. friend, they have it fairly high up in their priority list. But the Canadian National Railways follow a careful pattern and put branch line construction in two categories: those which the management feels it should recommend on the basis of improving or rounding out the system and serving territories without service, which lines can be economically justified; and those which can be regarded as colonization or development projects. With regard to the latter, they would probably look for government assistance if it was felt that a line was justified.

This line evidently would not fall in the latter category; it would fall in the first category. Until the Canadian National Railways can recommend to the government that it is a profitable line from the point of view of revenue operation and so on, I do not think I would be justified in bringing it down. But I can tell my hon. friend that the discovery of the oil wells and the salt mines are two features which should add considerably to the chances of construction. They certainly should add to the economic advantages. The best I can say at this time is that the Canadian National Railways have the matter under careful review and that they have it fairly high up in their priority list.

Mr. Argue: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister some of the gaps in railway lines that exist in my constituency and in areas adjacent thereto. It seems to me that in the past a pattern was followed of building branch lines out from the cities of Moose Jaw, Weyburn, Estevan and the town of Assiniboia and not joining those branch lines in order to give the best possible service to the people in that area. With the branch lines existing as they do, the result is a long freight haul for livestock going to market, with shrinkage in weight, and possible loss in grade. For the farmers along these lines who have to use them for that purpose, it is an expensive method of shipping livestock. It means, too, varied and inefficient passenger service. For instance, going from the town of Valmarie to the city of Moose Jaw, only some hundred and seventy-five miles away, one must spend two nights on the way to Moose Jaw. The territory that I represent seems famous for having many gaps between various branch lines. I mention the gap between Neptune and Radville, a distance of some sixteen miles, and the gap between Willow Bunch and Assiniboia, a distance of thirty miles. The people in that area have been promised that the Canadian National railway line would be completed and extended. They have been promised that for many years. There is a town of St. Victor which exists beyond the railway line, and which has no railway service. That inland town sprang up there because the people of the district felt that the Canadian National railway line would be extended in the future. I might mention also the gap between Cardross and Dunkirk, a distance of nineteen miles, the gap between Neidpath and Swift Current, a distance of thirty miles. The tracks have been laid between Neidpath and Swift Current, but the line is still termed "under construction", and there is no train service between these two points. I might also mention the gap between Minton and Big Beaver. I had representations from people in that area asking the government to do what it could to see that that gap is bridged. I want to mention specifically and especially the gap between Mankota and Valmarie, and bring that to the attention of the minister.

A few years ago the Minister of Agriculture made the statement that it was his understanding that that gap would be bridged as soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway undertook branch line construction. In this house two years ago, the Minister of Transport himself said that that was his understanding; that that was one of the first programs for branch line construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It seems to me that the people in that territory have waited far too long for the bridging of that gap. I wonder whether the statement of the Minister of Agriculture will be fulfilled and that gap will be bridged.

Can the minister tell me whether or not the program will be undertaken at any time this year, ten years from now, or any time in the future to bridge that gap? The people in that area are getting pretty discouraged about the whole matter, and they would like some concrete undertaking, if possible, that that gap will be bridged.

Mr. Chevrier: I can tell my hon. friend immediately that if he understood a statement of mine made two years ago to mean that this gap would be bridged he is entirely mistaken. I do not think I would ever attempt to make a statement of that kind concerning the Canadian Pacific Railway. What I did tell my hon. friend—and I speak now of course only from memory; I have not seen the record—was this, that I would take the matter of the Mankota-Valmarie line up with the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, although I made it quite clear to the committee that no jurisdiction lay with me in so far as that company was concerned. I did take it up with them and I presume I wrote my hon. friend along the lines of the reply that I received from the Canadian Pacific Railway, which I think was to the effect that at that time there was no intention of filling the gap because they felt their main task was to rehabilitate existing lines and purchase new equipment such as box cars, diesel engines and the like. I do not know on what basis the Canadian Pacific Railway proceeds, whether it follow the same course as the Canadian National Railways or not. The Canadian National Railways proceed along the line I mentioned a moment ago; if a line is economically justified it is likely to be placed on a list where the railway will sooner or later recommend it. If it is not considered to be a profitable undertaking from a straight operating standpoint but there is great pressure for it, I think the railway would then ask if the government is prepared to assist. These are the two bases. But dealing with the lines mentioned by my hon. friend, in so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, the position is just as I related it to the hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. Argue: If I might just make an observation in answer to the minister I would say that I am sorry—and I am not asking him to lay down the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that he has to inform me that the Canadian Pacific Railway has no definite intention of building the line in the near future.

May I refer to Hansard of July 2, 1947, at page 4999 and read what the minister said:

> I am informed by the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that just as soon as they begin branch line projects the Mankota-Valmarie line is one of those which will be considered.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not what my hon. friend said. My hon. friend said that I had made the statement. How could I possibly interpret the Canadian Pacific Railway policy? I could not. What I did was to pass on to my hon. friend the information that the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway gave me. I did that only as a matter of courtesy to my hon. friend because I have nothing to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is clear that in that statement I was passing along to him what the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway had told me.

Mr. Argue: I accept the minister's explanation completely, and I did not mean to infer anything else. I am sorry that the Canadian Pacific Railway is not in a position to tell the people of the area that that gap will be bridged and that they will get efficient train service.

Mr. Lennard: I rise to support hon. members who this afternoon have advocated a Canadian coastguard service. I am interested in the great lakes and in lake Ontario in particular. I might tell the minister, through you, sir, that so far as lake Ontario is concerned these facilities are available under another department. The only service that I know of at the moment is harbour patrols. I believe there is a harbour patrol in Hamilton and in Toronto, but these are only small vessels for lifesaving purposes. Under another department of the government we have stations at Hamilton, Toronto and possibly Kingston. There are ships and personnel available. With no great additional expense I believe that on lake Ontario at least we could have a coastguard service operated by the department of defence.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, this matter of a coastguard is of course of interest to many hon. members coming from the maritimes, the lake districts, and the west coast. At the outset I want to say how much I was impressed by the words of the hon. member for Nanaimo. One of our biggest problems in this connection is the matter of co-ordination. If we could get several departments working in conjunction with one another in arranging this service we think that it could be much more economical than it is at the present time. I believe that it would give a much better service to those who are interested. I speak particularly now of the bay of Fundy district and of our fisheries and our lifesaving service. For quite some time the department has had under discussion the establishment of a lifesaving service on Grand Manan island. At the same time we must maintain a fisheries patrol boat there twelve months of the year. Although these men have busy times I believe there are many days when they can find little to do. But with two services and two crews the department is left open to criticism from many people. In fine weather there would be very little use for lifesaving equipment. At that time the same boat could do the fisheries patrol work. Then, in the stormy weather you would have two crews on one boat to take care of some very serious condition that might arise.

I believe that by combining the two services under the Department of Transport or under the Department of Fisheries we may expect much better results at a smaller cost. In his statement this afterinoon the hon. member for St. John's East has indicated that perhaps our fishermen in Canada were not treated as fairly in the matter of government services as are the fishermen in the United States. In the matter of a coastguard service that may be true, because I believe the coastguard service in the United States is better than ours.

However the hon. member has been here for only a short time. I believe if he would look over the situation carefully he would find that this government has done a great deal for the fishermen on both coasts. I would refer particularly to the breakwaters and wharves built on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and in the great lakes area. Today the cost of those wharves and breakwaters would maintain in Canada a lifesaving service second to none. If one travels down the coast of Maine or any of the other New England states he will travel hundreds of miles before he will find a breakwater built and maintained by the federal government of the United States. They just do not do that for their fishermen. On the other hand, down where I live I feel the department and the government have been more than good to our people in the matter of wharves and breakwaters. The government has been generous, and you may be sure those services are appreciated by the fishermen who use them. In addition to that we have cold storage and other services, and I believe the government has tried to be helpful to the fishermen.

I have heard the matter of lighthouses discussed on both sides of the border, and have travelled on the waters both sides of the border. They may have better buoys and lighthouses in the New England states than we have in Canada. However I believe we have done a good job on the bay of Fundy and along our coast line. It is being improved as time goes on, and we hope it may be improved to an even greater extent.

I feel that several departments have tried to be helpful, and have done much for our fishermen. Then, reference is made to lifesaving equipment by the hon. member for St. John's East. When he says that such equipment is of great assistance I would support him. However, in many sections of the maritime provinces our boats are not equipped with radio-telephone facilities; and without that equipment lifesaving equipment may be available within five miles, and yet that fact not be known. Before the service can be made to work effectively or the way in which we would like to see it work, our fishing boats must be supplied with radio-telephone equipment, in order that they may get in touch with one another.

I should like to refer to something that happened in my county last fall. A young veteran of the last war had his arm caught in a lobster hoist. He did not have radio equipment on his boat, but within hailing distance there was a boat that did have radio-telephone. They wired to Grand Manan, and when he arrived at North Head breakwater a nurse and doctor were in attendance. The young man was unconscious at the time. Without the radio-telephone service there is no doubt he would not be here today. Since that time he has been appointed to the customs service, and is getting along well on Grand Manan island.

I believe that radio-telephone in all branches of the fishing industry is one of the greatest things that could be installed, and would be most useful in a time of disaster. I believe if we could combine the two crews in one boat it would be more economical than having two boats and two crews. This could be under the direction of the Department of Transport or the Department of Fisheries, and if we had this service we would go a long way toward assisting fishermen on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, I know there are a number of hon. members who wish to speak in this debate, and they may be assured that I shall not detain the committee long in what I have to say. I shall be objective in my remarks, and conclude them as quickly as possible.

All hon. members are sent here for a purpose, and I recognize this item as one of the greatest importance to the people who sent me here. From the number of members who have spoken in regard to it, I would judge that it is of considerable interest to many constituencies.

The hon. member for Vegreville has just touched upon the Heinsburg gap, and I have noticed that the minister has some difficulty in pronouncing the name of Frenchman's Butte. That is in my riding and this particular gap is of special interest to me. In view of the discussion which has taken place I believe the minister's answer has covered the situation fairly well, and anyone who is interested either in my constituency or anywhere else may read in Hansard the exchange between the minister and the hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. Thatcher: It is still a gap.

Mr. Harrison: As the hon. member for Moose Jaw has said, it is still a gap, and we are keenly interested in its completion.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): He knows all about missing links.

Mr. Harrison: As some hon. members have indicated, we are not asking for new lines—and I want that to be clearly understood. Contracts were let; and then between 1930 and 1935 the government of the late Viscount Bennett saw fit to give the contractor a sum of money to release the government from the obligation of continuing with this construction.

Meantime many people had gone into and settled in those parts of Canada, with the understanding that the line was under construction and that if they stayed there they would be able to get their produce to market. I was pleased to note that the minister said one of the points which would be considered was as to whether the line was economical to operate, and that under that classification possibly the Heinsburg gap would not be considered.

I suggest that in the line farther north between Barnes Crossing and St. Walburg we have a line which is economical for the simple reason that it also was to connect up with the C.P.R., which runs to Prince Albert, and from Meadow Lake through to Bonnyville, and the C.P.R. were to have running rights on the C.N.R. when the C.N.R. was built. This would give the C.P.R. direct connection from Edmonton to Prince Albert.

An official of the C.P.R. who surveyed the economic possibilities of the line at that time, and was stationed in the town of Meadow Lake, gave voice to the idea that it was an economic proposition.

Just to give some idea of how far the economy has come since that time, I have here a letter from the president of the board of trade at Meadow Lake which I received this week. I believe in my maiden speech I made mention of the grain shipped out of Meadow Lake. Since then some hon. members have doubted whether that would be possible. The president fortifies my first remarks, to the effect that there have already been a million bushels of grain shipped out of the town of Meadow Lake up to the 15th of October this year, and that there will be over two million more shipped from that point. Part of this grain comes from the territory not served by the railway; and, as I mentioned before, a million dollars' worth of grass seed was also grown along that line last year.

At the time the economic survey was made the town of Meadow Lake, for instance, produced little grain at all, possibly 100,000 or 200,000 bushels at the outside. At the present time the president writes me that a whole trainload is going out of the town of Meadow Lake every day. The hon. member for Vegreville mentioned the Redwater oil fields as being along this line. The town of Meadow Lake alone uses some 3,000,000 gallons of gasoline in a year, and it is just one point on the line. There are many other towns. As a matter of fact, within my constituency there are some 20,000 people in the region adjacent to it who would ship their products thereon.

Therefore there is no doubt about the economic factor. The other consideration is the fact that the government at one time committed itself to construct the line. They built most of the grade and left a small gap. There is no steel on that part of the grade.

As a result of the action of the government at that time, people settled there, and in spite of the transportation difficulties are now out-producing any other part of Saskatchewan. It is necessarily very good land, and there is no doubt about the economic value. That is one point I want to bring to the attention of the minister. I am not going to ask him, as the hon. member for Vegreville did, when it will come about. I know that he will make proper representations to the Canadian National Railways. As I have said, the action of the C.P.R. hinges entirely on when the C.N.R. line is constructed because the C.P.R. have running rights over the C.N.R. line when it is built. As soon as the

C.N.R. line is constructed the C.P.R. will no doubt extend their lines from Meadow Lake to Bonnyville and then run over that line.

The official of the C.P.R. to whom I have referred made a survey of the economic possibilities of the land some years ago and said at that time that when the line was completed his company intended to run a daily train between Edmonton and Prince Albert each way. If it was economically possible at that time it is ten times more so now. I think I have taken up as much of the time of the house as is necessary to place the case of the people of that district before the minister.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we have had a most interesting discussion this afternoon on the question of a coastguard. I have nothing to add to it because the ground has been well covered, but I think the minister can be quite sure that there is great interest, in the coastal areas of Canada and also in the great lakes area, in the establishment of a coastguard service for Canada. I should like to suggest to him that he ask the standing committee on marine and fisheries to go into the question. That committee has to meet at this session in order to deal with the bill being brought in by the Minister of Fisheries, or at least we were told last night that was probably what would be happening.

Mr. Mayhew: That is right.

Mr. Green: I think the committee could perform useful work if it also gave consideration to the question of a coastguard. Practically every hon. member who has spoken today on the subject is a member of that particular committee. I do not believe it would be wise to let the matter drag along. I believe if the standing committee on marine and fisheries were to consider it there would be far more chance of getting something done at an early date than if we merely have a discussion now and drop the matter. That is particularly so because it is a job of co-ordination, a matter of getting different departments together. The interdepartmental committee which the minister mentioned has been considering the question for quite a long time.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it has not. It is just a recent appointment.

Mr. Green: I have a press dispatch from Vancouver dated April 16, 1949. It reports that the minister's deputy, Mr. Lessard, and the chairman of the Canadian maritime commission, Mr. Clyne, met representatives of thirteen coastal organizations in Vancouver to discuss the possibility of a coastguard service for British Columbia. Apparently Mr. Clyne is chairman of the interdepartmental committee. He said at that time that they were there to listen to arguments for a coastal search and rescue service, that they had an open mind, and that a committee had been set up to study requests for such a service made by persons and organizations on both coasts. Will the minister tell us whether there has been any report to him yet by the interdepartmental committee? Will he also say whether he has any objections to having the problem considered by the standing committee on marine and fisheries?

Mr. Chevrier: As to the first question, there has been no interim report. As I indicated a moment ago, the matter is under discussion by the committee. It is a tremendous problem and one which it is not easy to determine without consideration of many factors. The hon. member seems to think we are going to have a discussion and then drop the matter. Perhaps he could have said that last year but certainly not now when, following the debate of last year and for other reasons, it was decided to set up a committee. Therefore the matter is not being dropped; on the contrary it is being studied by that committee.

With reference to the second suggestion, I do not think that it would be proper, when one committee is already dealing with the matter, to submit it to another committee for consideration.

Mr. Green: One would be a house committee and the other is an interdepartmental committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I know, but without having gone into it fully I would rather be inclined to await the report of the interdepartmental committee before submitting the question to a house committee.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to request the government to oppose, through a representative with the board of transport commissioners, the proposed rate increases suggested by the Bell Telephone Company, which, to my mind, do not seem reasonable. I believe it is the government's duty to so act, for not only shall we have to pay more for our own telephones, but the increase in rates will perforce be a charge upon federal, provincial and municipal governments, a charge which will have to be borne by each and every one of us through taxation. Consequently, I believe that we should do everything it is humanly possible to do in order to force the Bell Telephone Company to show proof of the absolute necessity of this increase in rates before the request is granted.

In the spring of 1948, the Bell Telephone Company submitted a petition to parliament for an increase in its capitalization.

This application was granted only after a promise was made by Mr. Munnoch, K.C., the representative of the company before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraphs, as you will see at page 15 of the committee report under date of May 11, 1948. This was a reply given to Mr. Campbell, a member of the committee, and it reads as follows:

Mr. Campbell: A while ago, I asked a question that went unanswered. What I wanted to know is this: The company is going to spend $1,000,000 on rights of way, $42,000,000 on land and buildings, $97,000,000 on the building of centrals, $95,000 on the building of stations, $86,000,000 on city lines, $26,000,000 on trunk lines and $15,000,000 on general equipment, which adds up to $362,000,000. Can you meet those expenses and still maintain your present rates?

Here is Mr. Munnoch's reply:

Mr. Chairman, if I may reply, I would say that the total amount of the capital we are requesting will not all be issued at one time. It will be issued from time to time, as required for new facilities of the kind mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

As new facilities develop, they will become productive, that is to say they will yield revenues. It is impossible to say what will happen to telephone rates, but I can say that at the present time the company has filed no application with the railway board for an increase in rates and has made no preparation for filing such an application. We have carried on through the war period, and by reason of economies and technological improvements in telephony, we have been able to maintain our present rate structure since it was established in 1926. Now, as to the future, as long as by economies and technological development we can maintain our rates, we intend to do so but if the economic conditions under which the company has to operate compel us to seek higher rates, then the company will seek them. Such, in so far as I can describe, is the situation at the present time.

As far as I am concerned, I never believed that promise made by the Bell Telephone Company and I voted against the second reading of the bill asking for that increased capitalization, as will be seen on page 3506 of Hansard, volume IV, 1948 session.

The foregoing statement by Munnoch calls for a very close scrutiny. If the Bell Telephone Company was able to maintain its rates without change from 1926 to 1948, what has happened between 1948 and 1949 for the company to decide suddenly to ask for increased rates? Has the company lost some of its efficiency? Has it stopped advancing in the way of technical progress? Have its operation costs increased more in one year, from 1948 to 1949, than in the previous twenty-two years, that is from 1926 to 1948? Has it ceased making profits?

No, Mr. Chairman, by its present attitude the company is turning its back on the Canadian people, as represented by one of its parliamentary committees. I believe the only answer we should give to that monopoly is to have the federal government socialize it and in my estimation, Mr. Speaker, if we want to destroy the forces of communism, we must give satisfaction to the people who pay for public services; that is the best means at our disposal.

You know as well as I do, Mr. Chairman, that the Bell Telephone Company purchases all the material, all the technical equipment it needs from the Northern Electric Company without calling tenders from any other company.

I submit that part of the so-called "operating expenses" are distributed to the Northern Electric Company, a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company, made up of a few shareholders of the latter company. The profits of the company are not disclosed; they dare not distribute the profits of the Bell Telephone Company to its shareholders. And that is why, last year, the company increased its capitalization in order to spread out over a larger number of shares the profits remaining after the leakage intentionally directed towards the Northern Electric Company. The intention behind all this is to be in a better position to ask for an increase in rates, the shareholders supposedly earning practically nothing. An attempt is being made to conceal from the public the actual dividends earned and even to prevent the public from benefiting from this company's profits. It is a social injustice about which I appeal to the members of this house and, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the country as a whole. Since 1927, the Bell Telephone Company has never divulged the slightest part of its profits to the public, and has never effected any important revision in its rates.

Once more, do we wish to prevent the increasing communist forces from invading our country? Let us give the man in the street, who wants to live and breathe freely in this sunny land of ours, the means of living here; and let us give the people of Canada public utilities genuinely concerned with the people's interests.

As I said in this house in 1938, I maintain that part of what is called "operating expenses" is distributed to a Bell Telephone Company subsidiary, the Northern Electric Company, which has only a few shareholders. Profits are concealed by the directors. They do not dare distribute them either to the Bell Telephone Company nor to its shareholders. These tactics serve to cloak the real dividends. In this way, the public cannot benefit from the profits accumulated by the company. It is a social injustice, and typical trust behaviour.

In its issue of December 29, 1936, Labor, a Washington publication, supplies interesting details concerning those reprehensible practices:

> The federal communications commission has investigated the Bell Company and another manufacturing concern which is one of its subsidiaries, the Western Electric Company Incorporated. The investigators found that about $500 million of the Bell Company's value equipment is watered stock, sheer water.

Cyrus G. Hill, the board's chief engineer, explained how the American Telephone and Telegraph made such tremendous profits. He stated:

> The Bell Telephone Company buys 92 per cent of its equipment from Western Electric, thus preventing all competition and making it possible for Western Electric to charge whatever they want. The money simply passes from one of the Bell Telephone Company's coffers to another.

Reference is made in the same article to the instrument commonly known as the French phone.

> Because of extra charges, the company has made an additional profit of $24 million. The extra charges were made on the grounds that these telephones entailed additional expenses for the company. This claim is unfounded, said Mr. Hill. Actually, the new telephone permits colossal economies, by doing away with manufacturing costs of wires and other expenses totalling more than $85 million.

That is the method used in the United States.

The part played there by the Western Electric Company Incorporated in relation to the American Telephone and Telegraph Company is the same as that played in this country by the Northern Electric Company in relation to the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

I have here a document which clearly shows how the Northern Electric Company is controlled by the Bell Telephone Company. I have managed to obtain the list of shareholders of the Northern Electric Company. It is quite short. It shows that there are only two big shareholders: the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the Western Electric Company Incorporated. The first holds a block of 456,640 shares and the second a block of 353,130. The Western Electric Company is that very company mentioned by investigator Hill's report.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to stress the fact that no Northern Electric Company shares are available on the market. No one can buy them. They are all held by the people I have just mentioned.

On the other hand, I am not the only one to allege that the Bell Telephone Company has the absolute monopoly of a great public service. Here is a reply given in 1938 by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was then minister of transport, as reported on page 935 of Hansard, volume I, 1938 session. I quote:

> We must all recognize that the Bell Telephone Company has a monopoly of a great public service in the districts in which it operates, and it is entirely sound government to provide that a public service monopoly shall be regulated as completely as possible.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. LaCroix: Therefore,—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I have listened to him with much attention since he began his remarks, and I notice that they do not relate in the least to item 453. He is now discussing monopolies, asking whether the government should not do something to prevent them. We are now on item 453 of the Transport estimates, and I do not think that it is in order to ask the minister (Mr. Chevrier) to state his views on the matter of monopolies.

Mr. LaCroix: Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, I shall conclude by saying that I hope the government will take whatever action is necessary for the protection of the public, in seeing that it is properly represented before the board of transport commissioners.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind all hon. members that there has been a lengthy discussion on item 453. I think I have given all the necessary latitude to hon. members to discuss general matters. Several members have raised points which, perhaps, could have been more properly raised on specific items. If any progress is to be made, I would venture to suggest that this general discussion should not last much longer. I understand that a few more hon. members wish to take part in the discussion, but I would ask the co-operation of all the members to facilitate the early passing of this item. Then, we could carry on with a discussion of the other items.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to pursue the subject mentioned by the last speaker. The subject I am going to raise is not covered by any item in the estimates, so that the only time I can raise it is on the general item. I am bringing the matter forward now because I desire to secure a statement of policy from the minister on employment on public works projects falling within the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport.

The minister knows something about the question I am raising because I wrote to him about it early in the session. It has to do with employment at the Sydney airport, and it appears as though many men would be required on that work. There are many unemployed in the area. According to the telegrams and letters I have received from both individuals and organizations, anyone applying for employment at that airport is obliged to go to the two defeated candidates in the riding, one a druggist and the other a local magistrate, and secure from them a slip entitling the person to employment.

I should like to point out to the minister that the government maintains a chain of employment offices across this country known as national employment offices. In these offices there is a veterans' counsellor who is supposed to see that the veterans get preference in employment, particularly on public works projects. These offices have a list of all the unemployed in the community, and know the trades or vocations for which these people are fitted. The officers in these employment offices know the men who have been unemployed the longest, and generally try to give preference to the men with families.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

As a result of the sort of action I have brought to the minister's attention, men have left employment, secured a slip and taken a job on this construction project. If we are going to justify the maintenance of these national employment offices, then I think it should be the policy of the government to give employment through them. The minister, who has supervision over public works projects, should notify all concerned to that effect. I believe patronage is a throwback to the past. We are starting to build Canada as a nation. We are going to amend our own constitution, and I believe it is time that vicious system of patronage, which creates unrest and disunity in a community, was abolished. I should like the minister to tell me whether it is his policy to route employment on projects under his supervision through the employment offices.

Mr. Chevrier: I believe my hon. friend knows full well that that is not the policy of the department.

Mr. Knowles: I believe it is the other way round.

Mr. Chevrier: What did I say?

Mr. Knowles: The member just asked if it was not the policy of your department to route employment through the national employment office and you have said, "No, it is not."

Mr. Chevrier: It is not the policy of the department to exercise patronage in connection with any of these jobs. I told my hon. friend, and I thought I had satisfied him, that the point did not arise on that project. Why? Because the contract for the work at the airport was given to an individual contractor. Once the contract is given out, I can tell the member immediately that neither I nor the officers of the department assume any control over the employment of men by the contractor; that is his responsibility. We exercise control over the work. I would be greatly surprised to learn that any of our officers had given instructions to the contractor.

As I indicated in my reply to the hon. member, if he can tell me of such a case I shall be glad to look into it immediately. In the instance mentioned, I do not see how the question could even arise since the contractor is the one who employs the men. The information I received concerning his method of procedure is to the effect that he secured his workers through the employment offices of that district. If my hon. friend shakes his head that that is not the case—

Mr. Gillis: That is not the case.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, I have no authority in that regard because, once the contract is given out, the responsibility lies with the contractor.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to argue with the minister, but he is cutting corners. The minister let the contract. During the war there was a clause in those contracts outlining the basis upon which employment should be given. If use is not made of these employment offices for that purpose, they should not be there. Money is being wasted. If someone outside looks after employment, the veterans' counsellor is rendered impotent so far as doing the job he should be doing is concerned. The contract is let by the Department of Transport, and there should be some understanding as to the basis upon which employment is granted.

I am not asking favours. I am merely asking the minister to see that the facilities provided by the taxpayers' money are being used. I believe the project at Sydney will be fairly large, with a couple of million dollars being spent on it. The employment offices in that district are efficient, and I know they would do an excellent job if there were no interference. I know it is not the minister's policy, and I know no official of his department would issue those instructions. But it is the unwritten law that defeated candidates or members in a riding who represent the government have the patronage, and that old system goes on. It is outdated, however. You replaced it with your employment agencies, and I think it is time we started them to work. If it is not the policy now, I believe that in future, with regard to any contractor who is doing a public works project, there should be a clause in his contract to the effect that anyone employed on that particular job should, so far as possible, be obtained through the employment agencies. Those agencies have lists and all that kind of thing. While the minister assured me that it is not the policy of his department—and I believe him—at the same time he has now made a public statement to that effect and it goes across the country. That is why I asked him that question.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): If it is good to attack the minister, it should also be good to say some good words in his behalf. I should like to say that there is no patronage in my part of the world. We have six big airports up there. We are spending millions of dollars. But I have not been consulted, nor have any of the members of my organization which, Mr. Chairman, is the Liberal organization in the district. I hope that you are not going to bar Liberals from working on these projects. I want to say that in the northwest country there is not any patronage. That goes for my friends from the Yukon, the Cariboo country and along the northwest staging route where important work is being done. In fact, a little bit of patronage might help one out somewhat.

Mr. McLure: A few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, you said that we should not take too long on this item. A good many things have been said today. As to the coastguard, I must say that is a matter I spoke on here once before but it has been put away in mothballs, as someone said today, for safekeeping. I hope the minister will be in a position to look into the matter of the coastguard service on the Atlantic. I rise at this time, however, to speak on another matter. I had intended to do so earlier, but I could not get an opportunity inasmuch as I could not catch the eye of the Chairman, not being able to jump up as quickly as can some of the other hon. members.

I should like to have brought this matter to the attention of the committee at the beginning. It has to do with the item before us, item 453, and is with regard to the amount of money that is being spent in Transport. The total vote in the main estimates this year is $76,147,629. That is an increase from last year. I am glad to see the increase because in my constituency we hope to get an increase in the various subsidies, grants and so on and the work to be accomplished there. In addition to this $76 million, however, we have in the details a report giving us what the money is spent for, but it does not give us the details for the total amount. There is some $11,414,429 in the main estimates for which we have no details whatsoever. We do not know what it is being spent for, only under one name and one item.

Let us take, for instance, the item we are dealing with. There is an amount of $836,737 that we are voting on. On that item, we have details for $357,655. But we are voting the whole amount, and there is an amount of $381,632 as to which we have no details whatsoever. We are asked to vote the usual blank cheque for it. While it does not seem to be a great deal of money in these times, I think this committee should have some idea as to how this money is being spent or misspent. It is all under the one item called temporary assistance. On several occasions I have brought this matter to the attention of the committee. I believe the committee should have some idea as to where this money is going and how it is being spent. If it could not be done for the year that is being voted, we might have it for the past year.

In this connection I might also say that if we cannot have all the details, we should have a certain amount of them. I know that in some departments—and possibly it is so in the Department of Transport—they are no more guilty with respect to these amounts they ask a blank cheque for than are others; the Department of Transport is no more guilty than all of the others. But there may be certain reasons that they cannot give or do not give a breakdown or give any details at all. On former occasions I have brought this matter to the attention of the ministers of some other departments. I believe that this committee is entitled to know at least some of the details with reference to the item. I know full well that it is an important vote especially in an election year. I know that if I were in the government I would be looking out and trying to get as large a proportion of it as it was possible to get. But I still think we ought to know how this money is being spent or misspent.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just say this in reply to my hon. friend. Dealing with item 453, I think all the details that can be given are to be found on page 274 of the estimates. There is a detailed list of permanent assistance. It is true there is not a detailed statement of temporary assistance because it is temporary and it is not possible to give the same information as for permanent employment.

Mr. McLure: I know that.

Mr. Chevrier: If you add the two together you get a total of $836,737, which is fairly detailed; it is fully detailed as to permanent employment.

Mr. McLure: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: May I complete my reply. With reference to the statement which the hon. member makes that some $11 million is to be found in the estimates, for which there are no details, let me say this. I have not added them up, but I would take it that the temporary assistance accounts for a large portion of that. In any event, this is the manner in which our officers have to prepare the estimates for the Department of Finance. It may not be the correct method but the departmental officers in Transport have to follow this form. As I said, it may be that it would be well to change that method but they have to satisfy treasury first of all; and having done so I think that is as far as I can go, other than to call it to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McLure: I quite understand the view that the minister takes of the matter, which is quite correct in one way; that is, in this total vote of $836,737 the full details are given for $357,655. Last year there was a similar vote for temporary assistance. If we had even had a breakdown of what it was last year, how much went for wages to this person or that, or what was purchased, it would be something. I know that in preparing the estimates he probably cannot tell what the temporary assistance is going to cover; but it could be detailed from last year's estimates. It does not seem fair to have to vote this large amount of $131 million, a blank cheque for all the departments. It is a lot of money to vote without the committee or the house knowing how it is spent or to be spent.

Mr. Chevrier: As I said a moment ago, the method that is followed in this estimate book is a method approved of by Finance. I shall be glad to bring my hon. friend's comments to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Thomas: Can the minister tell me whether or not any consideration has been given to the building of a spur line from Edmonton to Devon? Devon is right in the home of the Leduc oil fields. Contrary to the publicity given to the Redwater fields—

Mr. Chevrier: Is it Canadian National or Canadian Pacific territory?

An hon. Member: Canadian Pacific.

Mr. Thomas: I believe it is Canadian National, but I am not quite certain. The fact is that the town of Devon has absolutely no rail outlet. It is right in the middle of the Leduc field which is, contrary to some opinion, a great deal larger than the Redwater field. As a matter of fact the Leduc field contains 294 wells, as compared with 127 in the Redwater field, and produces 27,466 barrels of oil weekly as compared with 13,408 barrels from the Redwater field. The Redwater field does have an outlet to the Canadian National Railways running into Edmonton. Can the minister tell me whether or not anything has been done about this spur?

Mr. Chevrier: If it is Canadian National territory I am sorry to have to tell my hon. friend that I am not familiar with it. I am not aware that any consideration has been given to it. If it is in the territory of the Canadian Pacific Railway I would not be aware of it in any event, but I shall be glad to inquire and find out what the situation is.

Mr. Thomas: The reason I am not quite certain of it is that it is west of the main line between Edmonton and Calgary over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it is also south of the main line of the Canadian National Railways between Edmonton and Calgary. I could not say exactly just in which area it comes.

Mr. Chevrier: It appears to be Canadian Pacific, but I shall look into it.

Mr. Knowles: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on the point that was raised by the hon. member for Queen's, concerning which the minister made one or two comments. I would agree that the practice referred to is not one which should be laid at the door of the present minister. It is the same practice that is used in all the departments. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Queen's has raised this point on one or two previous occasions, consideration might be given to it. I am glad to know that the minister will take it up with the Minister of Finance to see if greater detail can be given in so far as temporary assistance is concerned. The phrase "temporary assistance" includes a great many civil servants now known by that interesting phrase "temporary permanents". Some of them have been employed just as long as some of the people who are listed as permanent employees. It would remove the feeling that we are voting a lot of money for which there is no detail if at least this practice could be followed, namely, the listing of temporary permanent positions in the same detail as the permanent positions are listed. I would agree that it is a matter of policy in building up the estimates, but I am glad to know that the minister will take the matter up with the Department of Finance.

The other I should like to say is that I support wholeheartedly the protest made by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency against the attempt to get an increase in telephone rates in Ontario and Quebec. I was not able to follow as closely as I would like to the remarks that he made in his own tongue; but I noted in particular that he had something to say about the assurance given to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines by Mr. Munnoch in the session of 1947-48, to the effect that the Bell Telephone Company, at that time, had no thought of increasing its rates. I noted also what he had to say about the relationship between the Bell Telephone Company and the Northern Electric, at the same time saying that that relationship was similar to one between the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Western Electric in the United States. One of the reasons—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend but I hope he will not take advantage of this estimate to go into a discussion on Bell Telephone rates. Surely there can be no reason for that. My hon. friend can discuss it in a number of other places, but why we should get into a debate on that at this time is certainly beyond me.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister say it is not in order here?

Mr. Chevrier: I am asking my hon. friend not to persist. If he insists, all right. I do not think it is in order.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister will indicate an item in his estimates on which I might discuss it—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is any item in my estimates under which it can be discussed. As I said in the house previously, I do not think the government has any jurisdiction over the application of the Bell Telephone Company for an increase in rates. It is true that the board of transport commissioners has; but it is only by way of appeal, under section 52, that the government might be directly concerned.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government is concerned because the board of transport commissioners is related to and comes under the Department of Transport. The government is concerned because it would have to be the final referee if there was an appeal under section 52. The government is also concerned because its own telephone bill will go up if the increase is allowed. It seems to me—

Mr. Chevrier: If the government were making an application for an increase or were increasing its own telephone rates my hon. friend would be quite in order because we operate telephone lines and telecommunication systems. It does not follow—

Mr. Knowles: What I said is—

Mr. Chevrier: Excuse me. It does not follow, because the Bell Telephone may increase or may be authorized to increase their rates, that the government telephone rates will be increased.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry the minister misinterpreted what I said. What I said was that if the rates of the Bell Telephone Company go up in Ontario and Quebec it will cost the government more money for the telephones that they have right here in Ottawa and throughout these two provinces.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have special contracts.

Mr. Knowles: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Chevrier: I ask you to rule on this question, Mr. Chairman. If your ruling is to the effect that the hon. gentleman can discuss this matter then we are likely to have a debate on the application which is now before a court, a matter which is sub judice and should not be discussed.

Mr. Knowles: Before you make your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I make two submissions. The first is, whether or not I am starting a discussion which is going to take time, whether or not it will result in a long discussion, is no point of order at all. On the point as to whether the matter is sub judice, I suggest that the application has been filed but has not yet been set down for hearing, and until the board of transport commissioners does set it down for hearing—in fact I might even argue that until they actually start hearing it—it can hardly be said to be before a court of record.

Mr. LaCroix: I do not think any petition has actually been presented yet.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it has. I am aware that it has been.

Mr. Knowles: There we are. Now we know that the government is interested.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to let my friend get away with that statement. "Now we know that the government is interested" is not a fair statement.

Mr. Knowles: If I gave any offence to the minister I shall withdraw it. I meant something entirely different from what the minister took from the statement.

Mr. Chevrier: Then my hon. friend should say what he means, and we would not get into these entanglements.

Mr. Knowles: I mean that this whole business of these telephone rates, and the whole question of matters before the board of transport commissioners, is not something apart from the administration and the concern and the interest of the government. The minister says he knows that the petition has been placed before the board of transport commissioners. I submit that anything that he, as a minister of the crown, is connected with is a subject that can be discussed on the floor of parliament.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, it will be found that item 88 in the book of estimates refers to an item in the Department of Finance for telephone service at Ottawa. We do have dealings with the telephone company, and that would be one item the hon. member could use to discuss the matter.

Mr. Knowles: Not unless it comes before the board of transport commissioners starts to hear the application.

The Deputy Chairman: As I said before, we had a fairly long discussion, which amounted almost to a general discussion, on item 454, which was carried the other day, and which dealt with the board of transport commissioners. The subject the hon. member mentions might more properly have been dealt with at that time. Of course we are having another general discussion on item 453 which, as I said a while ago, thus far has lasted several hours. The minister has brought to the attention of the hon. member who has the floor the fact that this matter is now sub judice. As the hon. member will know, if that is so—and perhaps he might take the word of the minister for it—he might refrain from discussing the question further.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer, and I cannot go into the fine points as to when a subject is or is not sub judice. I could hope that some of the lawyers, about whom I frequently say unkind things, would turn the other cheek and come to my assistance. The board of transport commissioners has not set a date for the hearing of the application—maybe it will never be heard. How you can take the minister's statement that a petition has been filed as proof that the matter is sub judice seems to me to be going too far. As a matter of fact my hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency was permitted to make a lengthy speech in the matter on this very item.

The Deputy Chairman: May I interrupt; I did not make a ruling. I did not say the hon. member was out of order—yet. I merely asked the co-operation of the hon. member to conclude this discussion as soon as possible. I understood when he rose he was to speak only a few moments in the matter.

Mr. Knowles: I would have been finished by now.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member say he is finished?

Mr. Knowles: No, I said I would have been finished by now if the minister had not interrupted.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member may go on, taking into account the remarks I have made.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish to have a ruling on two points, first that under this item we cannot have a discussion of Bell Telephone rates. I do not think there can be any doubt about that. I submit, with respect, that this is not the place, of all places, to discuss the question of monopoly or the rates of the Bell Telephone Company. Secondly, the moment an application is filed before the board of transport commissioners, whether a date is set for the hearing or not, the matter is then in the hands of the board of transport commissioners and, of necessity, is sub judice. For those two reasons I submit it should not be discussed.

The Deputy Chairman: I wish to be fair to both parties. Therefore since it is close to six o'clock perhaps this point of order raised by the minister may stand, and a ruling may be given later.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of the house. I happen to be the sponsor of the last bill on the order paper, under private bills. I understand that the first private bill is likely to provoke some debate. Mine is a simple non-contentious matter. The bill simply changes the name of a society by dropping the two words, "and Newfoundland". I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of the house to call this bill first.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to call Bill No. 116, No. 32 on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting the British and Foreign Bible Society in Canada and Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 66, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company.

He said: In moving second reading of this bill—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Maybank: I shall get my voice in a moment. So far I have only said about four words of any importance, and they were not controversial. I shall speak a little louder from now on. In moving second reading of the bill, I would simply say that it is an incorporation similar to a number that have passed the house already. Following upon the discovery of so much oil and gas in Alberta, there were a number of combinations of persons who came before parliament to ask that they be granted charters by way of special act in order to pipe oil and gas from Alberta to other parts of this continent. I believe in the second last session of parliament certain applicants came forward but were stopped until the government decided on a general policy. The general policy was decided upon, as many hon. members of the house will recall, toward the end of the last session of the last parliament.

A bill was passed, which we call the Pipe Lines Act, with a view to regulating the whole business course of any such companies, and in particular the route that any pipe line might take. Following upon the passage of that measure, as many hon. members of the house will recall, several companies were incorporated. There was one company—I do not know whether its name last session was the same as in the present bill, but I think it was—which failed to receive its charter at that time. I believe I would be correct in saying that it was because of the fear that it would route its line to certain parts of the United States. Whether or not I am right in that perhaps does not matter, but that is my recollection.

The same people are now seeking a charter. The bill before the house is either exactly the same as the other bills which resulted in charters to these various other applicants, or else it is so close to them that there is not very much difference. I have noted myself this evening for the first time in the powers set forth in the bill that the company is taking the power to route its lines anywhere within or without Canada, which is different from another bill I sponsored last session. Of course the fact that they are asking for such power, and that they might be given such power, by no means determines that any line will be taken outside Canada. The policy that parliament set forth in the Pipe Lines Act last year was that all such decisions as to routes and many other things were to be determined by the board of transport commissioners, which was given power to hear and decide upon all applications of that sort under the Pipe Lines Act.

Therefore this bill is merely an incorporation, and it does not imply that pipe lines will be built outside Canada. At the same time, I think it would be right for us to assume that in this case, so far as the transport of gas out of Alberta is concerned, a pipe line will probably be routed below the forty-ninth parallel if the board of transport commissioners agrees. At any rate, it is right that we should assume that, because certainly I do not wish to tell the house that it will not be so. I do not know whether or not it will be. The information that has been given to me is that five different pipe lines have been surveyed, and I understand some of them are outside Canada. I suppose the facts will all be laid before the board of transport commissioners and it will determine where the route will go. Therefore it is just as well to assume that an application will be made to the board of transport commissioners to permit a line to be built outside Canada.

Mr. Green: Did the hon. member say five lines have been surveyed; and by that does he mean surveyed in the engineering sense?

Mr. Maybank: Yes, five different routes have been considered and sufficient survey made of them that there are plans of all five to be placed before the transport board. That is what I intended to say.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I may ask a supplementary question, are they to be placed before members of parliament, too?

Mr. Maybank: My information is that all these plans will be available to the committee of this house, so the answer to that question is yes.

My next comment is that in connection with pipe-line routes and everything else related to the transmission of gas or oil, in addition to the control of the transport board the province of Alberta is exercising control. That province, for instance, requires that gas shall not be taken out of the province until the needs of Alberta are met. The mere fact that a group of applicants are granted incorporation by this house does not mean that any gas can be taken out of Alberta without the consent of the government of that province. Indeed I am quite sure every hon. member knows that this parliament could not give any such right, in any event. Probably it is also well known by hon. members that Alberta is undertaking to exercise careful and strict control with respect to gas and oil.

There is one other control I think hon. members might keep in mind when considering any arguments that may be advanced in reference to gas being exported from the country. No gas can be taken out of the country except under permit granted by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. There can be no export of gas or electricity—electricity does not come into this question, but it happens to be in the title of the act—without permission of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Any permit of this kind given to a company is an annual permit, and renewal could be refused if there were any tapping of the line outside Canada, or anything like that. It would be a simple matter, of course, to turn the valve on the Canadian side and prevent any gas going across the line if there were any attempt to evade the conditions of the permit. One might look upon any pipe line going from the southern part of Alberta west across the United States to somewhere near the Pacific coast and then north into Canada again as transporting gas in bond through the United States. There would be an analogy to the transport of goods in bond.

That is practically all I have to say at this moment. This is a mere incorporation, such as we have granted many other people. The people seeking this incorporation will be in competition with many others to whom we have given the privilege of transporting oil and perhaps gas, and this bill involves nothing more than that. Those who are concerned with respect to the route this pipe line may take need have no more fear concerning this particular company than any of the other companies this parliament has already set up, and in addition there are the several controls I have mentioned. All the facts that I have not had time to mention—and indeed many that I would not even know—can be brought forward if second reading is given and the bill is referred to the appropriate committee. I do not urge the bill strongly upon the house, except in this way. When first one group and then another are granted the right to endeavour to persuade the transport board to permit them to construct pipe lines, it is hardly fair to refuse the same right to others in the same position. It seems to me that when reputable people come forward asking only that which has been given to others, and subject to proper controls, surely it is fair to give that group the same rights we have given others.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member name the companies he referred to, which have been granted incorporation to carry oil and gas to the west coast?

Mr. Maybank: I did not say—

Mr. Cruickshank: You said several companies.

Mr. Maybank: I do not think I said any company had been granted the right to transport oil or gas to the west coast. Last year we incorporated a company called Western Pipe Lines and gave that company, subject to the approval of the transport board, the right to lay down lines anywhere in Canada, which would include the west coast.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to correct the hon. member, because I do not think he wants to give a false impression. As far as I know the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited is the only company on the west coast.

Mr. Maybank: I did not even know that company had been incorporated.

Mr. Cruickshank: But I am from British Columbia.

Mr. Maybank: I accept the apology, of course, but I really do not think it was necessary. As a matter of fact I have always found people from British Columbia pretty decent fellows, and everyone else likes them, so there is no need to apologize. I did not know any charter had been granted to a company specifically for the transportation of oil to the west coast.

Mr. Cruickshank: It was.

Mr. Maybank: I thought they were given power to lay down pipe lines anywhere in Canada, subject to what the board of transport commissioners might say. Certainly that was the case with the company I mentioned a moment ago, Western Pipe Lines; that is what it says. I do not think they went west; I believe this is the company which is bringing oil from Alberta south of Winnipeg down to Duluth.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is oil.

Mr. Maybank: Yes, not gas. I can see that the hon. member who has been so continually interrupting keenly desires to make a speech, and I feel that I shall be imposing upon him if I prevent him from doing so any longer. I do not want him to break the harness that so far has held him back; I have said practically all I wanted to say, so I yield my place to him.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) has said, this same bill was before the house last year, at which time it did not come to a vote and did not pass; and I trust it will receive the same treatment on this occasion. I am opposed to the passage of this bill because it would grant a charter to this particular company to construct a pipe line which, in my opinion, would be prejudicial to the interests of Alberta, British Columbia, the city of Calgary and Canada as a whole. I propose to discuss this bill under those three general headings. Naturally, I am here representing the constituency of Calgary East which contains a large section of the central part of the city of Calgary. The interests of my constituents in Calgary must be one of my prime concerns. I believe that the construction of the pipe line proposed by this bill would be prejudicial to the interests of the people in Calgary East.

First, perhaps I had better say something about the source of supply which this company proposes to tap. I understand that the main source of supply the company intends to use initially is a large gas field in the Pincher Creek area. Two very deep wells have been drilled there, and have disclosed the existence of a large gas field. As I remember, these wells are between eleven and twelve thousand feet deep, and each of them is rated as being capable of producing approximately 400 million cubic feet of gas per day. There is no doubt that there is a large amount of gas in the Pincher Creek area.

The proposed route runs from this Pincher Creek gas field through the Crowsnest pass and thence into the United States at Kingsgate. From there it goes down to Spokane and then west to a point between Seattle and Vancouver. The company proposes to supply the cities of Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma and Portland in the United States, with a branch line running to Vancouver, British Columbia. As was indicated by the sponsor of this bill, five routes have been surveyed by the company. The route they propose to construct is the cheapest one, and is the one I have indicated. One of the five alternative routes runs entirely in Canadian territory just north of the United States boundary. From all I have been able to learn about it, I doubt that it is a practicable route. The other three routes go through the United States for part of their length.

I should like now to say something about the general situation in Calgary so far as gas is concerned. As most hon. members probably know, the people of Calgary have done most of their heating and cooking for a long period of time by means of natural gas. There are a very few electric stoves. A good deal of the manufacturing industry in the province is based upon the use of natural gas for power and heating. Originally the source of supply of gas for Calgary was the Bow Island field between Lethbridge and Medicine Hat. That field was commencing to play out when the Turner valley gas and oil field came into existence as a big producer in 1926. For the past twenty years, our chief source of supply in Calgary and southern Alberta has been the Turner valley. It is now estimated that the Turner valley field will be exhausted within ten years.

In support of that proposition, I should like to read a statement made by the Hon. Mr. Maynard, the attorney general of Alberta, before a sitting of the board of transport commissioners held in Ottawa on September 21 and 22 in connection with an application by another company to export gas from this country. Mr. Maynard's statement reads in part as follows:

> We are very much concerned with the situation in the south. The city of Calgary at the present time is supplied by the Turner valley and it is estimated that the gas reserves of Turner valley will be exhausted in approximately ten years. And if that is the case, then Calgary will have to be supplied by some other gas field.

There are two gas fields available in the south at the present time from which the city of Calgary could be supplied: Jumping Pound field, a little west of Calgary, and the Pincher Creek field in the southern part of the province.

We felt that the gas in the southern part of the province should be reserved to supply not only the city of Calgary, when the reserves of Turner valley are exhausted, but any other southern community, and should also be retained for the supply of other Canadian communities, such as Winnipeg and Regina, and so on.

That is the attitude taken by the attorney general of Alberta just a few weeks ago in connection with the piping of gas supplies in the Pincher Creek area to foreign sources.

I do not think there is any question that the building of the proposed pipe line to take gas from the Pincher Creek area will prejudice the long-term supply of the people in Calgary and southern Alberta. It is bound to shorten the length of time which people in that area will be able to make use of gas. I think there is no question, either, that it will prejudice them so far as price is concerned. The projected consumers in the American cities and Vancouver will be prepared to pay more for the gas than is being paid now for it for industrial and domestic purposes in southern Alberta. The argument is advanced that the price paid by those people will be not only the price of the gas itself, but the cost of the transmission of that gas.

The advantages of gas, from the point of view of handiness, cleanness and so forth, are so great in comparison with solid fuels such as coal or fuel oil that there is no question but that the people on the Pacific coast would be prepared to pay considerably higher prices than those the people of Alberta have been accustomed to paying. For those reasons, I believe the construction of this proposed pipe line would be prejudicial to the best interests of Calgary and southern Alberta as a whole.

I should like to turn now to the case of Alberta and British Columbia generally. First, only a small part of the length of the proposed line would be in Alberta and British Columbia. In other words, it would serve a minimum number of people in those two provinces, as compared with other projected schemes. In my opinion, if a gas line is built through Alberta and British Columbia it should be one which would serve the maximum number of people in both provinces, rather than the minimum. The second consideration is that the whole Crowsnest pass area in Alberta and British Columbia is supported almost entirely by coal mining. The building of this gas line through that pass would adversely affect the prosperity of that coal mining industry. From what I have been able to gather, the result would likely be the closing of about half the mines now in operation in that area owing to cutting off the markets. Another consideration is this. If this line were to be put through, as is proposed, once the line went outside Canada at Kingsgate it would pass out of our control as far as Canada is concerned and out of the control of Alberta or of British Columbia as far as the provinces are concerned. The line then going on into the United States is under United States control and gas which is going through it is under their control also. If there is any question of the failing of the gas supply, I do not think there is any doubt as to who first is going to get whatever gas is going through that line. It is all very well to say that the regulations put through by the board of transport commissioners, by the Alberta government, or by anyone else you will, are designed to ensure that Canadian needs will be served first. But once that gas has passed out of this country and is in the United States, if there is a matter of allocation of that gas as between United States cities which need it, and where there are people who are likely to be cold if they do not get it, and Canadian cities, I think one would need to be naive indeed to accept the suggestion that Canadian cities would get it. I do not think there is much question that the gas, once it is in the United States, would go to the United States cities.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The Americans kept us going in oil during the war.

An hon. Member: And we kept them going in fish and lumber.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) said that it would be a simple matter, as I think he expressed it, to turn the valve and stop this gas from going there. To begin with, it must be remembered that in this pipe line the valve would also be serving Vancouver; and if you turned the valve to prevent the gas from going to the United States, you would also be cutting off Vancouver from its supply. Therefore I do not think it would be so simple to turn the valve.

Mr. Mitchell: What would my hon. friend be doing for a shirt now if we did not get cotton from the United States?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think that interjection by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has much to do with gas. As a matter of fact, I think the kind of gas that he is most familiar with is not the kind of gas that goes through a pipe line.

Mr. Mitchell: Nor is what I am listening to now.

Mr. Harkness: Another consideration in that regard is this simple one. Where you are situated on a railroad, a road, a gas line, an oil line or anything else, it is much better for you to be near the start of it or along the route of it rather than to be at the end of it. If you are at the end of it, you are always likely to get the worst of the deal if there is any question of shortage difficulties or anything else along that line.

There is one other point I should like to mention in this regard, Mr. Speaker. As far as I can make out, only one gas line to the Pacific coast is a practical proposition at this time. Two of them could not operate profitably. There is not sufficient market. So it is probably going to come down to the point that a decision will have to be made some place, either here, by the board of transport commissioners, by the Alberta government or by somebody else, as to where this one line is going to run and who is going to build it. I am opposing this line because I should not even like to see it as a contender. I think that it would be so much worse than any of the other projected lines I have heard of that, as I say, I should be exceedingly happy if they had no charter and were not even contenders for securing the right to build a pipe line.

In that connection, may I say that a line through the United States such as is proposed would retard development in the northern part of British Columbia and in northern Alberta. On the other hand, a line running from the north central part of Alberta down through the north central part of British Columbia would have more influence than anything else I can think of in opening up a vast tract of country that at present is undeveloped. If the gas line to the coast and Vancouver were built along that route, it would mean the development of whole new large communities, in much the same manner as they have developed where oil fields have been discovered in Alberta during the past twenty years; for instance, in the Turner valley field, the Leduc field, the Redwater field, and so on. If on the other hand, a pipe line such as the one proposed by this company is built, you will have no development in that northern area. I have heard the argument put up that if gas is found in large quantities in northern Alberta and in northern British Columbia, it should be piped along through to Edmonton and put into the Alberta grid system which is proposed, and from there out to Pincher Creek and from there out to this other route to the Pacific coast. That sort of proposal would kill development in the north. It would take away the incentive on the part of large numbers of oil companies to drill further wells in the northern part of British Columbia and in Alberta, for this reason. Once the possible market for about half the product which a man drilling a well may expect to produce—in other words, the gas—is removed from it, a great deal of the incentive to drill in that area is gone. In that respect gas is quite a different commodity from oil. No matter where you find oil, you can transport it to market by some means or other unless you are in an extraordinarily inaccessible location. You can take it out by barrels, trucks, tank cars or, if you have enough, you can build pipe lines. But as to gas, there is only one way of marketing it and that is through a pipe line. If the pipe line which is built—and I am quite convinced that one will be built, Mr. Speaker—is not through the central part or northern part of Alberta and British Columbia, it means that the development of a great deal of our north country is going to be held back for a great period of time.

I should like to say a word or two more in connection with the way in which the building of a pipe line through that northern area would stimulate development. In order to construct the pipe line, a good deal of road would have to be built. In order to keep it maintained, those roads would need to be kept open. You, Mr. Speaker, know the effect the building of a road has on the development of any area. It opens up the area; it enables people to get in and it enables them to get their products out to market.

Another important factor is this. Once a gas line is built, the cost of building an oil pipe line along the same route would be much less than it would be if it were put through initially or by itself. You would have the route developed. You would have your maintenance of roads and so forth. The whole thing could be done much cheaper. I think there is little question that large oil fields are going to be discovered in the northern part of Alberta and British Columbia. As a matter of fact, only two weeks ago a large well was brought into production at Normandville; that was an oil well with a considerable amount of gas in connection with it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Normandville is just south of Peace River.

Mr. Harkness: Yes. A gas line through the United States would make the cost of gas in Vancouver and in other southern British Columbia points greater than in the United States cities immediately to the south of them, for this simple reason. The prices people in Vancouver would pay would be the cost of the gas plus the cost of transmission. The further the gas is transmitted, of course, the greater the cost will be; and with Vancouver on the end of the line, naturally it would pay more. On the other hand, a line through British Columbia entirely would have just the opposite effect. The people at the end of the line would be United States cities, and they would be the ones who would pay the higher price, with a relatively lower price in Vancouver and in the rest of British Columbia.

There are a few aspects of this matter which I should like to bring to the attention of this house, and which I think will affect the general national interest. The first is that the gas in southern Alberta is the most economic source of gas to transport to Regina, Winnipeg and other points east. Whether we shall eventually have sufficient gas reserves there to be able to supply Toronto, Montreal and other eastern cities nobody knows, but a number of people think so. In any event, I think it has been established that that gas can be taken more cheaply from the southern part of Alberta than from the northern part. The distance is less; the terrain is easy. Therefore the gas reserves which we have in the southern part of Alberta should be retained in this country and not exported across the border.

Next, an all-Canadian line would enable a considerable number of new industries to be started in this country. I have been given to understand that if the way is cleared for a twenty-four or twenty-five inch gas line to be constructed entirely on Canadian territory it would give rise to a new mill in Canada for the production of sheet steel to make pipe, and it would also result in at least one plant, and possibly more, being put up in order to manufacture valves, pipe fittings, compressors and other machinery necessary for the construction of such a line. On the other hand, if a large part of the length of any gas line which would be constructed is run through the United States there would not be sufficient markets for the pipe and other things needed in Canada to justify the setting up of factories for its production. We shall continue to have to buy it from other sources.

That brings to my mind another important fact, namely, the United States dollar situation. If the line runs entirely through Canada and gas is delivered to the Pacific coast cities of the United States, they will pay a price which includes the entire cost of transmission in Canada; in other words, the money that they will pay will be paid to us and thus result in a considerably greater number of United States dollars coming into this country than would be the case if part of the line ran through the United States.

The construction of a line entirely in Canada would have an important effect on employment and wages. There would not only be the increased amount of employment provided by the factories I have mentioned, but all of the wages paid out for the construction of this line would be paid in Canada, and not a major part of them in the United States. All of the wages for maintenance would be paid in this country instead of a large portion of them across the border.

From the point of view of employment and wages it is considerably to the advantage of this country to have the line run entirely through Canadian territory.

I shall mention one other point, Mr. Speaker, and then I shall conclude. If the whole line is in Canada, with the entire cost of the transport of gas paid in this country, you have to quite an extent an effect like that of a tariff. It would protect Canadian industry and Canadian wages. Let me cite an example to show what I mean. In Calgary we have a nitrogen plant which produces nitrogen products used in explosives during the war. At the present time it produces fertilizer. I am told that that plant uses more natural gas every day than all of the domestic users in the city of Calgary. In other words, it is the biggest industrial user of natural gas in Calgary and in southern Alberta. If the proposed pipe line crosses into the United States at Kingsgate it would be quite possible to construct there, not far across the United States border, a similar plant to make nitrogen fertilizer, and the fertilizer so made—they would pay approximately the same cost for gas as the Calgary plant does and the distance to transport it would be just about the same—could compete on advantageous terms so far as we are concerned in that market in the United States and in a lot of markets of the rest of the world. On the other hand, if you had a line running through Canada to Vancouver then down into the United States a nitrogen plant put up there would have added on 10 cents, 15 cents, or 20 cents extra per thousand feet of gas for transmission costs. As a result of course the Canadian plant would have that much advantage in the world markets.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I think that in the interest of Canada as a whole, and in the interest of Alberta and British Columbia, and particularly the people of southern Alberta, this bill should be voted down.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, of all the addresses that I have listened to since coming to parliament the address by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) is without question the most laborious. When I recall what has been said by Alberta members in this house and by the provincial administration of Alberta itself, it seems to me that if the hon. member for Calgary East were to return to Calgary tonight in all probability they would fry him in oil because he is underselling the great potentialities of Alberta. In fact he has well nigh admitted that they have not gas. As a matter of fact it is a very good job that people who are interested sufficiently in bringing a gas line from Alberta to the Pacific coast are not here tonight to listen to the hon. member for Calgary East because I am sure if they were they would not invest a nickel in the project.

I am from British Columbia and I want to say that I, as one British Columbian, would be tickled to death to have gas piped from Alberta to the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this house. It is all very well for those in Calgary and Edmonton, who are enjoying the comforts of very cheap fuel, to sit back and talk about the potentialities fifteen or twenty years from now in the province of British Columbia when we may or may not have gas coming from that area into the great city of Vancouver.

I am supporting this bill because there are about twelve very simple reasons why I should do so, and I am going to enumerate them in the short time that is at my disposal. I am intensely interested in the prospect of having natural gas made available to the thousands of consumers in Vancouver. I am particularly interested that such natural gas be available to these consumers at the cheapest possible rate. It would appear that the only immediate prospect of obtaining such natural gas is from Alberta, despite the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. MacDougall: The cheapest route over which to build and maintain—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: On a question of privilege, I should like to point out to the hon. member, who apparently did not hear my speech, that I made no argument whatever against exporting gas to British Columbia—none whatever. It is the Canadian route about which I argued.

Mr. MacDougall: We will come to that. The cheapest route over which to build and maintain a pipe line from Alberta to the lower mainland of British Columbia is naturally over that part of the rugged Rockies which is the most suitable terrain—and the Rockies are not going to be moved tomorrow.

If part of that route should prove to be through the United States I, as a native-born Canadian, do not think that the price of gas in my constituency should be higher in order to follow a more costly route, though that route might be through only the Dominion of Canada.

I am satisfied that the Alberta government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in whose hands the export of gas rests, will impose suitable restrictions if the line goes through the United States, to ensure that the consumers on the Canadian Pacific coast will be served first, and consumers, for that matter, in the interior of British Columbia, who can be reached from the line, such as in the area of Trail, and the great Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

I am in favour of this company or any other bona fide pipe line company receiving a charter from this government. I understand this bill, as stated by the mover, is identical as to form with other pipe line bills, and has been approved as such by law officers of the crown. Whichever company succeeds first and provides cheap gas to British Columbia is, so far as I am concerned, completely and entirely satisfactory; and I hold no brief for any company in any particular sphere thereof. I do not think that any company composed of responsible people should be refused a charter by the government, thus creating a monopoly or monopolies for the company or companies already incorporated and who may or may not perform after the incorporation has gone through.

I am therefore, Mr. Speaker, heartily in favour of this government's granting the present charter.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I believe there are a good many points that have been overlooked in this debate. This evening I shall not say too much either pro or con, although it was my opinion that an all-Canadian route would definitely be preferable.

I have in my hand telegrams passed between the Hon. Gray Turgeon and the premier of Alberta, which I should like to place on Hansard. This is the telegram from the Hon. Mr. Turgeon to Mr. Manning:

> I should be glad to have answers to following questions as sponsor of the Alberta Natural Gas Company bill asking for charter enabling company to apply to board of transport commissioners also the government of Alberta and the government of Canada for authority to export gas from Alberta to Vancouver, British Columbia, and other parts of Canada, and to the United States.
> Question No. 1. Is the government of Alberta opposed to the incorporation by the parliament of Canada under provisions of the Pipe Lines Act of the Alberta Natural Gas Company or any other bona fide company seeking power to build a pipe line under the Pipe Lines Act? The answer to this question would be based on the assumption that the ultimate intention of such company after receiving due federal and provincial authorization is to supply natural gas from Alberta to consumers in British Columbia and any surplus supply would go to consumers in the United States Pacific northwest.

Question No. 2. Has the Alberta government decided to prohibit the export of natural gas from any particular areas or sections of the province of Alberta?

Question No. 3. What is the general policy of your government in regard to export of gas from Alberta? I would greatly appreciate receiving reply today, Monday.

In his reply Mr. Manning had this to say:

Replying your telegram October 17, the following are the answers to the questions as enumerated in your wire.

Answer to question No. 1: The Alberta government is not opposed to the incorporation of the Alberta Natural Gas Company or any other bona fide company under provisions of Pipe Lines Act but on the contrary feels very strongly that no bona fide company should be refused incorporation in that refusal would deprive the province of its right to deal with any or all legitimate companies interested in exporting gas and would restrict such dealings to those particular companies favoured by parliament for incorporation.

Answer to question No. 2: The Alberta government has not decided to prohibit the export of gas from any particular area of the province but has announced that it will not approve the export of any gas until fully satisfied that there are sufficient available reserves to meet the present and future domestic and industrial requirements of Alberta. The discovery of new reserves and/or integration of present fields could completely change the prevailing situation in any particular area.

Answer to question No. 3. The policy of the Alberta government respecting the export of natural gas is three-fold: First, to prohibit any export until fully satisfied that there are sufficient available reserves to meet Alberta's present and future domestic and industrial requirements; second, when satisfied that surplus exists over and above these requirements sufficient to justify export under sound conservation and proration practices the government will approve the export of such surplus with each application being considered on its own merits and in the light of all prevailing factors.

Third—

And I would call the attention of hon. members to this particularly—

It will be a condition of any export permit that Canadian requirements must be given first priority.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

FISH AND FISH CONTAINERS—MARINE PLANTS—EXPORT AND IMPORT REGULATIONS

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on October 13, I made a brief statement on the occasion of the first reading of the bill. I shall make a further statement this evening explaining its purposes. May I say at the outset that it is our purpose to have the bill go to the committee on marine and fisheries where I am sure it will receive proper consideration and give all interested persons, both those in the house and those outside the house, an opportunity to discuss it. We have no control, of course, as to when the committee will hold its sittings, but we would hope that it would not convene too soon so that people from the outside sections of Canada might have an opportunity to attend, if they desire to do so.

At the present time the inspection of fish is authorized by two acts of parliament, namely the Meat and Canned Foods Act and the Fish Inspection Act, the latter covering fish other than canned. It is the latter act that now requires revision.

On moving second reading of the bill I should like to outline to the house the reasons for the revision, and the general principles of the bill. Two very important reasons exist to make revision necessary and desirable. On the one side is the need to help the further progress of the fishing industry itself. On the other is the legal weakness in the present act. A few words of explanation as to each of these are called for.

Some parts of our fishing industry have been asking for increased inspection services from the federal government. Within the industry, and particularly in its national organization, the fisheries council of Canada, there have been continuous discussions now for several years on the problems of the quality of product as it reaches the consumer. In canned fish, distribution and good quality are relatively easy problems to overcome. But in other types, fresh, frozen and cured fish, the main markets are far from the sea, and the product is very perishable. The industry has nevertheless increased its sales of these types, but the progress has been slow, and it has given serious attention to ways and means of guaranteeing quality to the consumer. In September, at a national meeting of the industry in Ottawa, a set of proposals was presented to the government aimed at a fuller development of the fisheries potential. Among others, the industry recommended that the government take certain steps to ensure proper handling of products.

The present bill is one instrument for aiding the development of good quality products. It is, however, only one, and other complementary steps are equally necessary. This country has already had much experience in agriculture as to methods of quality improvement. In many other perishable commodities, such as dairy products, livestock, fruits and vegetables, quality has greatly improved in the past two or three decades as the Department of Agriculture developed technical services for the farmer and instituted systems of inspection. The present bill before the house contains nothing revolutionary. All its provisions are already in effect for other food products, and are to be found in existing acts of parliament, such as the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, the Dairy Industry Act, and the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act. The present bill asks the house to do for fisheries what has already been done for agriculture in the matter of inspection.

I mentioned before that inspection alone is not sufficient. There is a good deal of educational and demonstration work necessary among fishermen and processors and handlers of fish in certain regions. Such work always has to precede the institution of inspection. The Department of Fisheries today has inspection operating for products such as canned salmon and lobsters, salted and pickled fish, oysters, smelts and some others. For other types it offers voluntary inspection to the industry. Almost universally, however, courses of instruction, field interviews, and circulars have preceded the introduction of inspection. Usually also there has been a period of voluntary inspection preceding the compulsory. Today inspection regulations are screened through the industry before being made effective.

I mention these matters to emphasize two points, that education and demonstration work has to precede inspection, and secondly, that the fishing industry is consulted in the preliminary stages of consideration of any regulations to be made under the present act. I should like the house to note that particularly, because it is not the act itself as much as the regulations under the act that will affect the industry. We have promised the industry that we will discuss with them the regulations to be imposed under the act before they go into effect.

The existing act, which the bill under consideration would replace, has been on the statute books since 1914. It was first passed in order to improve the quality of pickled herring on the east coast. Under the authority of the existing act regulations have been made from time to time, and today regulations are in effect in respect of several varieties of pickled and salted fish, oysters and scallops produced on the east coast. The act has also been applied, and regulations thereunder have been made, in respect of whitefish which constitutes the principal commercial fishery in the three prairie provinces. It has not been applied to British Columbia, where inspection of canned fish alone takes place under the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

The authority of the parliament of Canada to legislate on this subject is derived from several heads of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, but principally from head 2, the regulation of trade and commerce. Because the provisions of the existing act were not confined to export and interprovincial trade, some doubt arose as to the constitutional validity of the act. An expedient was adopted in 1932, and carried through to the present time, that when the act was to be applied to certain provinces they would enact enabling legislation, so-called legislation by adoption, whereby the provincial legislatures validated those parts of the act that might be within provincial legislative jurisdiction. This type of enabling legislation has been used for some of the acts dealing with agricultural products, and was also adopted for the Fish Inspection Act.

This type of enabling legislation has been successfully challenged in some of the provincial courts, and as a result most of the federal acts dealing with agricultural products were revised, and quality control statutes enacted by the parliament of Canada in respect of agricultural products are restricted more or less to export and interprovincial trade.

The present bill seeks to do the same thing for quality control of fisheries products. Prior to the introduction of the bill, informal discussions took place between officials of the Department of Fisheries and the provincial fisheries departments or divisions for the purpose of co-ordinating the federal and provincial legislation on quality control of fisheries products, and making the necessary administrative arrangements so as to be able to carry out the inspection program, not only at producer but also at wholesale and retail levels.

These discussions were held prior to the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, and included every province except Newfoundland. The Fish Inspection Act is one of those acts whose application to Newfoundland has been deferred. Under the confederation arrangements, consultations with the appropriate Newfoundland authorities are to be held before the act is applied in that province.

The bill will not become law immediately on royal assent, but will be brought into effect only on proclamation of the governor general in council. This will serve the purpose of timing the application of the revised act in order to co-ordinate it with any similar provincial legislation that might be enacted to cover sale and inspection within the province.

Before the introduction of the bill the fisheries council of Canada, representing the fishing industry, was consulted at its annual meeting in Ottawa in March of this year. The general view of the industry expressed by the council was to the effect that the government should have the necessary authority of parliament for any regulatory measures designed to improve the quality of fisheries products. The industry, however, is more concerned with the type of regulatory measures that may be proposed from time to time. In practice, no regulation affecting any particular section of the industry is made until the opinion of such industry has been obtained and carefully considered. The Department of Fisheries is conscious of the fact that it is only by complete co-operation of industry and government that the problems of the quality of fisheries products will be solved.

If I may just add one word, personally I think nothing is more needed in our fisheries today than the assurance of high quality fisheries products when they reach the table; and I feel sure this can be achieved with the refrigeration facilities at our disposal. It is our desire and determination that this shall be carried out, in co-operation with those engaged in the industry as well as the provincial governments.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency on Vancouver island adjacent to the constituency of Victoria, which is represented by the minister; and it affords me the greatest pleasure to be able to extend congratulations to him on this occasion, when he is introducing a measure in this house for the first time as a minister of the crown. This is a particularly happy occasion because as far as I know the legislation he is introducing is generally acceptable to the fishing industry, and that applies to the packing companies, the co-operatives, the small fishing concerns and the fishermen themselves. All these organizations are anxious to see the great industry of fishing put on a firm basis, improved in efficiency and made comparable with the other industries to which the minister referred, such as agriculture. If there is any criticism of this bill it may be that it should have been brought in earlier, but the minister did not have an opportunity to do so. So again I want to extend my congratulations to him on taking the first opportunity, since be became minister, to introduce this legislation.

As I said, I believe the general principles of the bill will be acceptable to the industry in all parts of Canada. The minister has said that this legislation will be referred to the standing committee on fisheries, whose members will have an opportunity to go through it section by section. I have only glanced through it, but with great surprise I noticed reference to the grading of fish. I am sure the minister realizes that as far as British Columbia salmon is concerned there is only one grade, and that grade is superb. I have frequently seen you, Mr. Speaker, partaking of meals in the parliamentary restaurant. There at times you have been able to enjoy the deep red-blooded spring salmon from British Columbia. At other times I have seen your face fall when you have been presented with colourless, anaemic looking fish coming from other parts of this country. Then I noticed that reference is made to supervision over the management of boats. I know the prowess of the minister in sailing small boats, because he comes very close to my home and goes fishing in Brentwood bay. There he manages his own boat, so I think he will appreciate that there is danger in suggesting too much management from Ottawa of boats which may be operated on either the Atlantic or the Pacific.

These are matters which perhaps can be better dealt with in committee, unless the minister cares to assure us that he does not question the excellence of our British Columbia fish, or the ability of our fishermen to handle their own boats.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Coming from Nova Scotia, one of the great fishing provinces of Canada, I am naturally interested in this legislation. I assure the minister that because of my high regard for him I would be inclined to support the bill just because he has introduced it, unless it is shown to contain some weakness. I was pleased to hear my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) say that all the fish coming from the Pacific coast are superb; but if it were possible to make a test in the parliamentary restaurant as between the superb fish coming from British Columbia and fish from the maritime provinces, especially the salmon, while the British Columbia fish would still be recognized as superb, I am sure the maritime fish would be even more superb. I am quite sure no one about to enjoy a fish meal in the restaurant—and there are not many of them —would fail to ask for maritime province fish as his first choice.

Mr. Knowles: When you want a real meal you choose Lake Winnipeg goldeye.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There are the British Columbia fishing interests, the great Nova Scotia fishing interests and we now have perhaps the even greater Newfoundland fishing interests. In fact every part of Canada is interested in commercial fishing to some extent. The minister has pointed out that, in this country, we desire well-graded fish of the highest quality. The Canadian population should be encouraged and educated to use more fish than in the past. The fishing industry has been the forgotten industry in Canada, but it is being recognized more and more as the years go by. There is a great deal yet to be done.

I believe the province of Nova Scotia has been more instrumental in advancing the interests of the fishing industry than any other section of Canada. It was through the efforts of the province of Nova Scotia, approved by the Ottawa government, that the commission headed by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan was appointed. This commission recognized that the fishing industry had been neglected and recommended that a special fisheries department under a separate minister be established. For many years the portfolio of that department has been tossed about from one person to another. I am glad that, at least as long as this government is in office, the responsibility of this ministry will rest upon the shoulders of my good friend the present Minister of Fisheries.

I have had some communications with respect to this legislation, one of which was from the fish packers association of the maritime provinces. This association has given study to the proposed legislation. They have some objections to certain provisions in the bill and have certain additions to propose. If this bill is referred to the special committee, as the minister indicated, that organization will have an opportunity of making representations and I am quite sure will be given full consideration.

In the maritime provinces there is an organization called the united maritime fishermen's association. That association has just held its annual meeting in my home town, Amherst. No doubt, as usual, they invited the Minister of Fisheries to attend. The objectives of the fishermen of this association are to secure quality products, fair prices, cold storage and refrigeration storage facilities, and the education of the consumers so that they will relish and use a greater quantity of fish than in the past. These men have been engaged in what was the forgotten industry of Canada.

I have seen on the wharves in Nova Scotia the fishermen come in with their boats loaded with fish. At times, the prices they were able to secure were as low as fifty cents a hundred pounds. Those days are gone, I hope forever. Even under those conditions, the fishing industry has been able to survive in my province. On behalf of Nova Scotia, I give this legislation my support, subject to its being referred to the special committee for improvement to meet the requirements of the fishermen, the processors and the consumers.

Mr. Donald Smith (Queens-Shelburne): In common with the other members who have spoken, I should like to compliment the minister on his able presentation of the bill. I did not know, until it was brought to my attention just now, that it is the first bill the minister has introduced. I certainly congratulate him on his presentation of it. I should like also to join with the member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) in bringing to the attention of the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) the delicate flavour of the Atlantic salmon. I just wondered, when he was applying the adjective "superb" to the salmon to which he is apparently accustomed, whether or not he had ever had the opportunity of tasting our most delicious, super-superb Atlantic salmon.

As another of the Nova Scotia members, I too am interested in the fishing industry and in any measure brought up in this house or any other house which I feel would be of some benefit to that industry. I certainly wish to give it my wholehearted support. May I say that I should have liked to see more members present tonight, in order that I could bring to the attention of so many of those who have spoken earlier on the subject of agriculture the fact that we in the east have a subject of interest. We have supported any measure we felt would help the west or any other agricultural part of Canada, and I should like to see more members present tonight so that I could plead with them for the support of the fishing industry, which is of particular interest to the easterner. I feel that the support we have given them, and are going to give them at all times, should be given to us in turn, when measures for our assistance are brought before this house.

The hon. member for Cumberland mentioned the low prices which our fishermen have received for their products. Of course, that was true, but I hope those times have gone forever. Our fishermen have not suffered from drought as the western farmer has, but they have suffered from drying up of markets. In this business which we share with our Newfoundland friends, there have been times when, after a season's arduous fishing, our people have found themselves in debt to the provisioner and supplier. The vessels would come into port with what was known in those days as a "broker"—owing to the condition of the market the vessel did not pay expenses.

I believe anyone who knows our Nova Scotia fishermen knows that they are enterprising and versatile. Through the use of their natural skills, they managed to earn a few dollars in other fields. The fishermen and their families worked in their gardens, in many cases among the rocks, to grow enough food to tide them over the winter. My point is that these people did not ask for much direct help. As a matter of fact, they received very little aid during those hard times. The salt-fish bonuses provided by the Nova Scotia government were of some assistance in trying to offset the low prices paid for fish. As I recall, I do not think the federal government was asked to contribute to those bonuses. In other words, the fishermen have always managed somehow, through their own hard work, to carry their burdens on their own shoulders. I do believe that where people are trying to support themselves they should receive the support of the nation when the time arrives that those people feel they have a case worthy of support, financial or otherwise.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Vote C.C.F.

Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I am not talking politics, as I would remind the hon. member, but I do want to cover a few more points before I turn to the essence of the bill itself. I want to say first that until recent years those engaged in the business of buying and marketing fish were for the most part men who had learned the fish business "the hard way", having eventually graduated from the dory to the office desk. Cold storages, large and small, have been built all along our coast and today the fresh fish industry is of the utmost importance.

Those in the fish business realize without being told that good markets for their fish depend to a great extent on the quality. There has been little tendency to try to market poor fish, and I believe in general that regulations in respect of inspection of fresh fish as well as salt fish, as indicated in this bill now before us, will be welcomed by all. As an indication of this fact, and also for the sake of the information contained in them, I should like to read some excerpts from these letters. The first one I want to read is from the manager of one of the smaller plants down on our shore. He says in part:

> In noting the content of this bill, it appears to be leading in the right direction. We believe the inspection of fish as has been carried on in recent years, particularly of canned lobsters and pickled herring, mackerel, etc., in containers, has brought beneficial results to all parties concerned, and with the inspection improved and extended we would hope for increased sales and more satisfied consumers.
> It is not clear to me whether the act requires an inspection certificate to accompany every shipment of fish or marine plant, leaving the shipper's establishment. If it does, we fear that would cause delay in shipments, unless there is an inspector stationed at every shipping plant, as fresh fish shipments are mostly what we call rush shipments, to catch the first train or other means of transportation, so the products will arrive at destination as quickly as possible, which means better state of preservation. If at any point the inspector causes delay in transit of fresh fish for inspection purposes, the act will defeat what it proposes to aid.

I do not doubt for a moment that that is a live subject in the minds of the minister and the officials of his department, but it is an important point; and I expect that points brought out by means of letters such as this will be cleared up.

Then I should like to read a small part of another one; it is from a plant which is a little bit larger than the one whose letter I have just quoted. The writer says in part:

> In our minds there is only one method of inspection. It should start in the boats, from there to the fishermen. If they do not take proper care of their fish, they are of an inferior quality when they reach the wharf. The next inspection should start on the wharf and carry it through the plant and the processing of the fish—from the time they are taken in the plant to the time they are either shipped out or placed in the freezer. This is also my belief—fresh fish should be by express—no freight shipments. It would also be necessary to have inspection of the fish on arrival at the wholesaler's and from the wholesaler to the retailer, which means it is necessary, in order to obtain a good quality of fish, to have an inspection from the time the fish is caught until it reaches the consumer. This I believe is one of the impossible things to do as it would require a large number of inspectors, also very heavy expenses. We would think that one of the most important inspections would be from the retailer to the consumer as the producer is well aware if he ships out poor quality he is going to receive complaints and his business is going to suffer.

He winds up the paragraph with one little note that strikes a nostalgic chord in my soul. He says:

> "I am not going to talk any more on fish as I have to smell it every day."

That particular smell of fish from the plants down our way is not the least bit unpleasant because the plants are all clean and their fish smells good. I like the smell.

To go a little further, I have the same document as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) had. I think it should be pointed out to hon. members here that this association of fish packers of the maritime provinces:

> . . . is on record with the department for several years recommending the inspection of fresh, frozen and smoked fish and has asked that inspection commence at (or before) the fish are landed, continuing throughout handling and processing and ending only when the fish are packed ready for transportation. This would guarantee that the fish were in good condition when landed, that they were handled and processed in a sanitary plant where proper sanitation and hygienic requirements as to plant equipment and personnel are observed throughout the entire process.

Having read those excerpts, I hope there will be no doubt in the minds of hon. members that this bill is really welcomed down our way.

I should like to say just a word about the inspectors. Before this bill is passed, I hope some amendments will be brought about by the committee, because there are some clauses in the bill which I and some others in the house do not agree should be put in it at this time. I believe that really serious thought should be given to the matter of appointing qualified inspectors. Fishermen find it difficult to believe that a young man, just out of school, can learn to judge the qualities of fish merely by attending a short course provided by the Department of Fisheries. Wherever possible, appointments should be made not so much on scholastic standing as on the experience an applicant has had in the fishing industry.

It is our good fortune in Queens-Shelburne to have on the job now some inspectors who combine high educational standards with practical experience. I am informed by those who should know that the best inspector of pickled fish in Nova Scotia is one who would have a difficult time qualifying by educational standards alone. I suggest that there is an important place for those with high educational standards, who are to be engaged in office and administrative work in the department. But I also suggest that the men in the field who are to be given the power to approve or disapprove of the quality of fish for export to other provinces and countries should be appointed with the preference given to those with practical experience and knowledge.

Now I want to say just a few words about the latter part of the bill. As will be noticed, it relates to the inspection of fish and marine plants. Some of our inland friends may not even know what we mean by a marine plant. I should like to say that I am glad the bill recognizes the importance of marine plants by including them in the regulations. To many hon. members who may not know it, may I point out that the gathering and processing of Irish moss and kelp is an industry of some significance on our coast, and it is also an industry which has great possibilities for the future. In Clarke's Harbour, Shelburne county, there is a factory which buys kelp and processes it for export to Rockland, Maine, where finally various drugs and compounds are derived from it and they are sold all over the United States. The local manager of that plant told me last summer that, in the few years it has been running, upwards of $400,000 had been paid out in wages to the gatherers of kelp and to those who work in the plant preparing the kelp for shipment. That amount may not seem large, but I want to assure hon. members that it is a considerable amount when it is distributed in that small community of Clarke's Harbour.

I think this kelp industry is one that has great possibilities. It is hoped that the day will soon come when the derivatives can be extracted, packaged and exported from this little Nova Scotia community as well as from others, and I understand that some thought is now being given to that industry. I am informed that the particular growth of kelp on this coast contains a very high proportion of the substance required for the market, a much higher proportion than the growth along the coast of Maine; this fact accounts for the export of our kelp to that state. It is hoped that the research and marketing services of the Department of Fisheries will be directed toward an inquiry into the possibilities of this kelp industry. It might be proper for the biological division to investigate the methods of gathering kelp. It may be that seasonal restrictions will be found necessary in order that the plants will not be cut during their reproductive stage.

The gathering of Irish moss is an industry which likewise has great possibilities. It is a growing business down our way. In Shelburne there is a plant which processes it. In my home town of Liverpool the Best Yeast Company just recently put in a little side plant in which they are making this Irish moss into a delicious gelatine dessert. That is just a sample of what can be developed from Irish moss alone. What I have said about the part that could be played by the fisheries department in connection with kelp is of course also true of Irish moss. It is proper that this bill should contain some provision for the inspection of marine plants. Like the inspectors for fisheries, I really hope that the inspectors who will be appointed will know their job and will do it effectively.

Before closing my remarks I would reemphasize the need of carefully examining the qualifications of the candidates for inspectorships with regard to their practical experience and knowledge, and that preference be given those who possess these qualities. I am convinced that by so doing we can expect a much happier acceptance of these new regulations by the fishing industry, and that the purpose of the bill will be better served.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): As a member also who represents a fishing riding, in this case a west coast riding, I, too, would like to say a few words and to congratulate the minister, not only as Minister of Fisheries but also as the minister from British Columbia as well, on the introduction of this bill. The fishing industry in British Columbia has for many years realized the importance of insisting on a high quality for their products and, long before the government actually entered the field of grading and inspection, they themselves had in the industry an arrangement to grade and standardize their products.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) mentioned quite rightly that our fish is superb. It is superb at the time it is caught, but a lot can happen to fish between the time it is caught and the time it arrives in the housewife's kitchen. I think all members appreciate that when fish is caught it is very good, but when fish is stale it is very offensive. One of the reasons why the housewives of Canada have not used as much fish as perhaps they would want to is that occasionally they do get bad fish. That is one reason why I think the fishing industry on the west coast, which has always insisted on quality, will welcome this bill, because the government can do what industry cannot do. The government can see that everyone lives up to the standards which are set in this bill.

It is noteworthy too, I think, that it is the industry itself, not just the west coast industry but all the industry in Canada, which has asked for this bill. Some years ago there seemed to be a conflict between the fishing industries on the west coast and on the east coast. They found, as most people do find, that conflict is not of much value, and some years ago they got together and formed this very active body known as the fisheries council of Canada. This recommendation which is made by the fisheries council of Canada is an indication that west coast fishermen and the east coast fishermen can work together for the mutual benefit of the entire fishing industry.

There is one thing which I should like to mention in regard to the minister's speech, which has been commented on very favourably, but there was one thing which the minister's speech lacked. He was too modest to mention other things which he has done in the last year to aid the problem which is most serious to the fishing industry. Out on the west coast, and I am sure on the east coast as well, the actual job of catching the fish has been pretty well solved. The great problem is disposing of the fish in a good market. Before the war, of course, our British Columbia fishing industry had a very profitable European market. It is, however, agreed that here in Canada we could absorb pretty well our entire fish catch from both the east and west coasts if our consumption were anywhere near the consumption of fish of some of the European countries. As a matter of fact, as the minister pointed out, one of the reasons why we have not got that high consumption of fish is that it has been so difficult to get good fish into the central part of Canada where the big markets exist. The minister has done much more in this last year, as we of the fishing ridings know full well, than introduce a bill for the grading and inspecting of fish.

One of the great problems of course has been to transport fresh fish. The research branch of the Department of Fisheries has done excellent work on mechanical refrigeration cars, cars which will take fish down to Winnipeg or Toronto. These cars have made trips now from the east coast to the west coast and from the west coast to the east coast, and the fish carried by them has arrived in perfect condition. Work is now going on in the development of modern cold storage plants. I think the one we have in Vancouver is a model for the entire nation. Other work has gone on into pickling and grading of fish, work which has been greatly helped by the research work done by the research department of fisheries on the west coast and, I imagine, on the east coast as well.

However, the great job in Canada as far as the fisheries are concerned is selling more of our very excellent fish from both the east and west coasts to the people of Canada across the whole ten provinces. In that regard I think the minister is well qualified to be the Minister of Fisheries at this time. Those of us from the west coast know that in his own private business he has been immensely successful in marketing his product across western Canada, including the prairie provinces. We who represent fishing ridings hope that he is going to be as successful marketing British Columbia fish across the prairie provinces as he has been in his own private life.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to address the house on fisheries this evening. As I said before when speaking on this matter, fish and fishing are of prime importance to our newest province. I was interested in reading what I presume to be the last bulletin issued by the fisheries council of Canada. It is headed:

> Prime Minister Pledges Government Support to Full Development of the Fisheries Potential.

It includes part of the address given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the fisheries council meeting in Ottawa on September 9, I believe. At that time the Prime Minister said:

> The commercial fisheries implements the true significance of Canada's motto "From sea to sea."

He said that he thought that both federal and provincial governments could make profitable investments in the industry to improve and enlarge its output. He said:

> Canadians can consume much more fish than they have in the past. When there is a domestic market it is a safe thing to rely on in trade. I hope the domestic market will provide increasing opportunities for the disposal of Canadian fish.

Then the Prime Minister added:

> The federal government does not want to replace you, step into your field or become a competitor. But there are ways and means whereby the federal and provincial governments can contribute to the further development of the industry. They have done so in the past but I feel there is room for more in the future. You can count on us for serious consideration to any recommendations of your council in the interest of the well-being of the whole Canadian economy.

I presume the Prime Minister meant the government. That was a most encouraging address of the Prime Minister, followed of course as it was by the various recommendations as contained in this official bulletin. I presume hon. members have received this bulletin. I do not imagine that they have all read it. On the second page we have this statement:

Prime Minister Backs Honourable Mayhew Announcing Government Policies.

There are some wonderful policies outlined in the bulletin. To the hon. members who have not read it I seriously suggest that it is their duty to do so, because fish and fishing are going to be increasingly more prominent in the affairs of this house than they have been in the past. I think the minister will agree with that statement as well.

When I spoke on this matter before, I made reference to the minister, and I should like to amplify my remarks. It is a great pleasure to do so. When I made my remarks before I did not know the full import of the visit that he made to Newfoundland in July of this year, but from the information I have obtained since, and I have obtained it from unimpeachable sources, I have learned that in July the minister, accompanied by his deputy and by his chief economist, visited the province. In the time at his disposal he made it his business to get every shade of opinion from the heads of industry right down to the fishermen themselves. I am told he spared no effort to obtain a full and complete picture in the time that he could spare to round out his knowledge of the fishing industry in Newfoundland. I can assure the house that the general impression created by the minister on that visit to Newfoundland was that he intended to understand the industry, so far as Newfoundland was concerned at least, from top to bottom. He spared no effort, and certainly did not spare himself in obtaining or endeavouring to obtain every possible fact that would aid him in guiding his department along the lines he intended to adopt in the future.

I am sure the minister will agree with me when I say how much the people of Newfoundland thought of his deputy minister, Dr. Bates, who accompanied him. While my knowledge of the fishing industry is not nearly as complete as that of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay (Mr. Ashbourne), who is not now in his seat, or indeed as great as that of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), I am told that in the short time he was there Dr. Bates did a very thorough job in so far as organizing the Newfoundland fisheries department was concerned, and is continuing to do that job. I see the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay is now in his seat, and he will be able to amplify any remarks I have made concerning the minister and Dr. Bates.

I feel confident, with the interest the minister and his deputy have shown, and with their co-operation with the Newfoundland fisheries board, the province of Newfoundland has every reason to be satisfied with the future, in so far as the federal Department of Fisheries is concerned. I am certain the minister, his deputy and all the staff of the department are going to co-operate fully with the fisheries board and fishermen generally in Newfoundland. The fact that these gentlemen are showing such an obvious interest is a happy augury, so far as we of Newfoundland are concerned, for the future of our industry.

I hope I shall be pardoned for dealing generally with the bill, because I believe it is to be referred to a committee, and a complete discussion will take place there. There are however a few observations I should like to make now. The life of the Newfoundland fishermen, like the life of fishermen in the other maritime provinces, is no bed of roses. It is probably much easier in British Columbia where everything is perfect; but I can assure the house that in Newfoundland the fisherman's life is by no means perfect. He has to work long and hard hours, for which his returns are by no means great. The Secretary of State and the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay will know very well that the return for these long hours of hard labour is very small indeed. In fact if I were to make a guess at it—and my guess would not be a too well-informed one—I would say that, having paid for his supplies for the year, the average Newfoundland fisherman would be very fortunate if he had a return of any more than $400 or $500. That is my assumption—and even that amount is higher than it has been in the past. I know that what I shall now say is not within the purview of the bill now before us, but if it were possible in years like the present one, where many parts of Newfoundland have suffered from what we call blank years in fishing, and where a large number of our fishermen will have nothing to look forward to for the next six months, until the fisheries open up again, if there were something in the nature of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which was passed to assist prairie farmers in bad times, it would be a very wonderful boon not only to the fishermen of Newfoundland but to all fishermen throughout this great dominion.

Dealing first with our own particular problems in the industry, I would turn first to salt codfish. Here the most important factor is that of the exchange situation and its effect upon our sales, and upon the sales of all maritimes fish in European markets. If a normal catch is to be marketed to the best advantage, it is necessary that half that catch be sold in Europe. This is not the problem of only one year; it is a continuous one. It may be that some hon. members are not thoroughly familiar with the manner in which our fish are now marketed. It means that the government of Newfoundland has had to put up dollars in London, and the sterling is converted in that way. It is not, as you will note, a condition which can continue forever, if the province has to arrange marketing in that way. Therefore I say it is a serious condition. Unless some arrangements are made for the convertibility of sterling it will mean that not only the Newfoundland fishery but indeed the whole fishing industry dealing in salt codfish will come crashing down around our ears. That is what will happen; there is no question about it.

Mr. Stick: Does the hon. member know that the exchange situation has been taken care of for this year?

Mr. Higgins: Yes.

Mr. Stick: Then he has not made that clear.

Mr. Higgins: I am sorry; I said that I believe it is a continuous condition. Certainly it has been taken care of this year; there is no question about that. But it is a matter which has to be taken care of every year; and that is going to mean, with the small financial prospects of Newfoundland, a very real problem in the future. Certainly it has been taken care of this year, and I believe the government up here made some arrangements in that connection. I am not very clear in the matter, but I believe they did provide assistance in some way. However hon. members on the opposite side of the house who are more conversant with government policy will probably be able to explain that better than I can.

Another phase of this industry which might very well be mentioned in connection with fisheries in Canada is the need for research, both biological and investigational, to determine bodies and movements of fish, and technologically to improve the finished product. I note that in this fisheries council of Canada bulletin there is the heading "Council Meets with Government and Resolves Recommendation"—and this is part of the recommendation which I presume the government is now going to carry into effect:

> Government should intensify biological and technological research to be carried out in co-operation with industry's research programs and establish closer contact between the research board and the industry through local advisory committees or other acceptable means.

That is most important, and I am so glad to know the department and the minister are planning to put that into operation.

Another important factor is that of fishermen's equipment, particularly in the shore fisheries. This needs improvement very much, and I submit to the minister that the government might very well give a lead in this connection. I notice also that in the bulletin there is a heading to the effect that the minister is being backed by the Prime Minister.

And there is the following statement:

> On May 5 the minister issued a statement of policies at the request of the prime minister announcing that in co-operation with industry the government should—

And two of the recommendations are:

> (a) The improvement of fishing methods and types of boats and gear;
> (b) The improvement of shore plants and techniques in canning, freezing, smoking, and in special cases encourage the establishment of reduction plants and improve and develop the bait service.

That is another excellent factor in the program, and I hope it will be carried out as apparently the minister intended when the bulletin was printed.

Another matter that would be of great value is the improvement of harbour facilities, breakwaters and so on, and also improved aids to navigation. From the point of view of the Newfoundland frozen-fish industry, the main requirement, as I see it, is that Canada be alert to make agreements with customer countries which will facilitate the growth of the industry. It is virtually a new industry, having come up in Newfoundland only in the past decade. It has been soundly built, and compares in equipment and quality of product with that of any other country.

I am not going to read too extensively from the bulletin to which I have already referred because I do not want to deprive hon. members of the pleasure of reading it, but hon. members will notice that on the last page there is a reference to refrigeration and cold storage. That has particular reference to the point I am making as to frozen fish. Hon. members might very well read it at leisure.

Another matter that comes within the purview of fisheries generally, although people are rather doubtful about it, is our sealing industry, but we regard the seal as a fish. In 1948 there was a fleet of twenty-five ships crewed by 1,500 men. It is a source of income to these men and to many others engaged in shore processing. The value of the fishery in 1948 was about $1,500,000. It is a traditionally Newfoundland fishery in which considerable capital is invested, and it provides a welcome activity between fishing seasons.

Operators are experiencing great difficulty in selling their product owing to exchange restrictions and regulations. Because of such restrictions they are virtually obliged today to sell in Canada. I understand the Canadian position is that we are importing edible oil far above the amount of marine oils produced, and paying United States dollars for a great deal, if not all, of it. At a time of unbalance between Canadian and United States dollars, the wisdom of such a policy might well be challenged.

The only remaining part of our fishing industry which I wish to mention is whaling. In 1948 there were eight whalers which brought 751 whales to our two whaling factories.

Mr. Applewhaite: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Higgins: Certainly.

Mr. Applewhaite: Would he be kind enough to explain to us the connection between the subjects which he is dealing with and the inspection of fish and marine plants?

Mr. Higgins: I agree entirely with the hon. member, but I believe you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that I prefaced my remarks by saying that the bill was going into committee, and if there was no objection I proposed talking generally on the matter. If there is objection, I have not very much more to say in any event.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Has the hon. member leave of the house to carry on in the manner in which he has proceeded so far? I have my own doubts as to whether or not what he is saying now has any connection with the bill before the house. If he has the consent of the house he may carry on.

Mr. Mayhew: There will be ample opportunity in a day or two to go into all the arguments that the hon. member has put forward. Personally I should like to see us get the bill through tonight and refer it to the committee. We could have these general discussions, which are most interesting and helpful, on the estimates. I think generally the hon. member has been out of order except when he was praising the minister.

Mr. Higgins: May I thank the minister for his remarks. I should like to make two further points that are also not quite appropriate to the bill, but which are important. The minister promised me, when we were discussing first reading of the bill, that he would answer some of my questions. He told me at that time he was going to answer them on the second reading of the bill. I want to add two more if I may. I have a Canadian Press dispatch from Halifax, dated October 20, which reads:

> A spokesman for the Canadian Atlantic Fish Exporters' Association said tonight the organization is dissatisfied with the Annecy trade agreement because Canada missed a chance to aid the salt fish trade. The association, representing most salt fish exporters on the Canadian Atlantic seaboard feels that Canada's fishing industry might be endangered by the failure of the agreement to provide any "appreciable reduction" in duty on salt fish exports to Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

I have one further question to put to the minister if he is going to make a reply to me tonight, and I believe he will because at page 750 of Hansard he said he would. I should like him to give the house his views on the recommendations of Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited of October 5. I am most grateful to the house for giving me the privilege of talking in such a free manner when I was really off the subject matter of the bill. I should like to say in conclusion that I entirely agree with all the provisions of the bill. I hope that when the bill is discussed in committee any objections will be voiced freely. Personally, I see no objection to it in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say. As a matter of fact, I think that the minister is in a most unusual position in introducing this measure in that no one has any criticism to offer. And far be it from me to insert a discordant note into a debate where the minister is concerned. I rise only to speak because I am an expert on fish.

Mr. Green: You had better sit down then.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not an expert in catching, packing, or selling fish. I am merely an expert in eating fish, and that is with experience at both ends of the country.

An hon. Member: Both ends of the fish?

Mr. MacInnis: People do eat both ends of the fish. I was born on the Atlantic coast, and for the first twenty years or so of my life, with the exception of the first year, I lived pretty much on fish—the lowly herring and potatoes. You cannot really appreciate good herring—and there are good herring on the Atlantic coast—unless you have eaten them together with Prince Edward Island potatoes. I realize I have to be careful because I am now living on the Pacific coast, and represent a constituency in which many fishermen reside. We produce good fish on the Pacific coast, and we also produce good potatoes.

I do agree that if fish packing has continued as it was done when I was a youngster, there is a great deal of scope for inspection. I do not wish to cast any reflections on any other province, but we used to import herring into Prince Edward Island; we bought it for family use by the half barrel, and sometimes it would be what we called rusty herring, which was not very good eating. I am sure this bill will overcome that sort of thing. It provides for the inspection of fish and marine plants; and if there is anything the inspectors cannot do under the provision of this bill it is only because those who drafted the bill could not think of it. If I read the bill correctly, I was rather surprised that it should receive so much support from my free enterprise friends on both sides of the house. With the exception of the provisions for inspection and what the inspector can do, all the rest of the sections deal with the penalties provided for offences under the bill. This legislation is going to the standing committee on marine and fisheries, I understand, where it can be fully discussed, and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) can get answers to all his questions pertaining to the bill, if not to all the matters to which he referred this evening.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, like one of the members from Newfoundland who preceded me, I am going to speak for only about two minutes. My reason for rising is that I represent perhaps the largest fishing town in Canada. Steveston not only has more fishing boats operating out of it than any other community; it also has the largest canned fish factory in Canada. But more than anything else I rose to congratulate the minister, who comes from British Columbia, because of the confidence this legislation will give the fishing industry in general. I believe we catch the best fish in the world, but it is something else to sell the best fish in the world; and I think that is what this bill will help us do. Most of the men who fish in my part of the country are veterans, who have thousands of dollars tied up in their boats and equipment, and the confidence this legislation will give them will be a great thing not only for the industry in general but for these men and others like them throughout Canada.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, we have heard from British Columbia a number of times, from Newfoundland and indirectly from Prince Edward Island. I am rising because I do not see any other hon. members here from New Brunswick who represent fishing constituencies, and I should like to say a few words on behalf of the fisheries of our province. I congratulate the minister on this bill, which I think will be received with general satisfaction in my province. When it goes to the committee I am sure there will be ample opportunity to discuss all its provisions.

I should like to point out one thing, however; that is, that while we may not be the greatest fishing province in the dominion, in the past we have had great interest in the fisheries of the country. Our province supplied three successive ministers of fisheries, but I was always amazed that in selecting a minister, instead of choosing one from some fishing constituency, a lawyer representing some inland constituency was usually chosen. Now, however, we have a minister who knows something about fishing, and the ministry of fisheries is no longer an orphan, as it was for fifteen years. In the past it was a sort of stepping-stone for ministers who were on their way to other and what might be termed more important portfolios. But the portfolio of fisheries is very important and is becoming more so; and I am sure that is realized by the present minister.

I want to point out that in New Brunswick we have the largest sardine factory in the world. I want to point out also that the smelt fisheries of New Brunswick are considered at least as good as, if not better than, any in this country. I would point out also that the oysters found in Northumberland strait are second to none in the world. Finally, and this was my reason for rising at this time, I want to mention the Saint John salmon. The hon. member for Queens-Shelburne (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) mentioned that Atlantic salmon were superior to the British Columbia variety, but they did not specify, as they should, that Saint John harbour salmon are the finest to be found on the Atlantic seaboard. Hon. members from British Columbia said that British Columbia fish were the finest to be found anywhere, and tried to lead us to believe there were no poor fish in that province. Surely it would be taxing the credulity of hon. members too much to expect them to believe that statement.

I am sure that when this legislation goes to committee it will receive careful consideration. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) brought out a point which I am sure interests and worries all of us; that is the matter of markets for our fish. I do not doubt the minister will see that the fish are packed as attractively as possible; we know we can produce the finest fish in the world, but the great problem the government will have to consider is the finding of markets for these fish after they have been caught and placed in these splendid containers for which provision is made in this bill.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to obtain some information. I agree with the principle of the bill, so I have no criticism to offer at this time. The minister said this legislation would go to the fisheries committee, but he also made the observation that he was going to permit sufficient time for representatives of the industry from both east and west to be present when that committee is set up. I have in mind that this session may last only about another month.

Mr. Chevrier: Not at the rate it is going now.

Mr. Gillis: The minister has been here a long time, and he knows that when the session reaches a certain stage matters will be steam-rollered through pretty rapidly. That is exactly what I have in mind in asking the minister not to allow the calling of this committee to run into the next couple of weeks, because it would not give the committee time to consider the matter before the steam-roller tactics commenced. I should like to see the committee called as soon as possible, so that we may give this bill proper consideration.

Fish inspection is all right in its place, but it will not cure the ills of the fishing industry on either the east or the west coast. There are some defects in this bill. Representatives of the industry have submitted a brief to many members of this house pointing out changes that are necessary. I should like to see this bill passed at this session, so that the department can get on with the work the bill is designed to carry out. Can the minister give any assurance that he will arrange for the calling of the committee as soon as possible?

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Since the representatives of all the provinces have had something to say, I think I might say a few words on behalf of the province of Prince Edward Island. I welcome this bill, and I am glad that the minister has told us it will be referred to a special committee of the house. A full opportunity will be given in the committee to go into the details of this measure. At the present time, of course, we need compulsory inspection, and not inspection in one place and not in another. However, the regulations as well as the bill itself can be dealt with in committee.

In closing my remarks, I should like to say that it was a pleasure for me, although sometimes slightly embarrassing, to hear the hon. members from the different provinces boasting of the qualities of their fish. I should like to draw your attention to the fish of Prince Edward Island. While the other hon. members have been fighting for second place in the quality of their fish, it is not necessary for me to say any more than to name the different varieties of fish from Prince Edward Island for all to agree that they are first in quality.

Let me first mention those delicious bivalves, the oysters. Prince Edward Island oysters have no superiors. Next, I shall mention our scallops. If one is so inclined one can taste these nearly every day at the evening meal in the parliamentary restaurant. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) led you to believe that the people of Prince Edward Island eat nothing but herring. I am sure you will agree with me that if we do, they are at least fattening, if I am any example.

In addition to herring, and before I mention anything else, let me speak of our lobsters. So far tonight nothing has been said about the superiority of the lobsters in other places. Our lobsters, owing to good regulations in the packing and fishing, have taken the top place in the markets of the world. I could go on to describe the wonderful mackerel, fresh or processed. They are fit for the table of a king. Our halibut and cod, likewise. Then, we come to the smelts. When I was mentioning shellfish, I might have mentioned that our clams and quahogs have a class and distinction of their own. If any of these products are marked with the words "Prince Edward Island product", they are accorded a place superior to any other.

I might also mention a provision in this bill concerning marine plants. The Irish moss industry in our province has been exceptionally flourishing because of the excellent quality of the product. Then, the buyers began to buy any quality without inspection and, as a consequence, the markets have somewhat soured on the product of the east and are turning back to the moss found in the Mediterranean. I might say that the regulations in connection with sea plants will be a help and a delight to those who participated in the Irish moss, kelp, dulce and seaweed industries. I wish to say again that, when the bill is in committee, I am sure all the good points will be brought out and we will probably be able to add some other beneficial provisions.

After all, we can regulate the fishing industry; we can tell people how to fish and how to process the fish; but if the industry is to survive, the thing it must have is markets for the various types of fish.

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay): Mr. Speaker, I consider that this legislative action will not only assist, but protect one of the important industries in the Canadian economy. As I said when this measure was introduced as a resolution, I consider it is a move in the right direction. I should like also to add my congratulations to those already given the Minister of Fisheries this evening.

Before this bill is given second reading, Mr. Speaker, I should like to avail myself of the opportunity of saying that I am in accord with the principle of this bill. It will be going to the special committee of this house, and no doubt there it will receive due consideration. I believe that the present trend is toward a closer watch over important industries such as fishing, and a recognition of the importance of producing clean, wholesome food. We can readily agree, I think, that constant vigilance is essential to ensure that the best possible article is produced, not only so that those participating in the industry can make a success of it but that the consumption of fish may be increased. I fear that oftentimes the high nutritive value of this product is either not generally understood or not fully recognized by those who purchase this important article of diet.

To ensure the maintenance of a suitable standard of excellence so that the product will enjoy the confidence of the public, I consider inspection a necessity. We know, Mr. Speaker, that for some time our competitors have had inspection of their fish. In certain countries, I understand, it is inspected right from the time it is taken out of the boat until it is exported. That is really a good idea. As we know, from the time a fish leaves the salt water or the fresh water, as the case may be, until it goes into consumption, there is a gradual process of deterioration. In order to protect the person who is to buy this fish and to see that he gets it in good condition, inspection is necessary. Naturally we want people to eat more fish. We know of its high protein value. Today being a fish day, I think it is an opportune time for this bill to be passed. By having a definite program of inspection, Mr. Speaker, I think that we shall be able to build up an industry which will give greater remuneration to the man who catches the fish and which will also in time aid in our Canadian economy.

Salmon was mentioned here this evening. We in Newfoundland pride ourselves upon the excellence of our salmon. In fact, Mr. Speaker, in the past, in the autumn of the year, we in Newfoundland have been getting twenty pound and twenty-five pound salmon, taken from the net, which were fit for a king; they were perfect. By looking after our salmon, our cod and every other source of food which can contribute to our people's well-being, I believe that we are assisting in the improvement of the general economy of the country and that, by so doing, our people will be able to enjoy these rich products of the sea which I think they sorely need.

There was a time when the people in Newfoundland used to eat a great deal of herring. I believe that the herring is one of the most important food fishes that we have. The act that was introduced and put upon the statute books in 1914 I believe had to do with the inspection of herring and other pickled fish. Some of the details embodied in this bill now before us were in that act at that time. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I approve of the principle of the bill. Before the Newfoundland fisheries board was established and before we had any regular, definite government inspection there, there was a time in Newfoundland when the board of trade themselves furnished an inspection certificate with certain codfish which had to be exported. Naturally anyone who buys a perishable article such as codfish will have a greater sense of confidence when opening up credits, and when paying money against shipments, if he can count upon an effective system of inspection.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I wish to speak only briefly tonight, Mr. Speaker. Since this bill was introduced by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), it has been carefully studied by all hon. members from centres that are interested in fishing. I can assure you that I have looked it over carefully and that there are many clauses in the bill with which I do not agree. It has been discussed at great length among the members from New Brunswick, and I can speak for that province.

One criticism I have to offer in connection with this bill is that it gives to fisheries inspectors far more authority than I think it should give. We have today many young men who joined the fisheries department within the last two or three years and who perhaps have not the knowledge of the fishing industry that they will have at some future time. To give to them the authority that it is proposed to give them by this bill would, I believe, leave the department wide open to criticism.

When young men step in and tell older men who have been in the business for fifty or sixty years how they should run their business, they are not met with open arms. With regard to the fishing industry, the agriculture industry or any other industry, my idea is that regimentation is not the solution to the problem. I believe that what we need in our fishing industry today are inspectors qualified to meet fishermen, to work with them and to be of assistance by reason of knowledge they might have which they could pass along to the fishermen. When you approach the matter in the other way and say that you must not do this and you must not do that, the fishermen resent it. I know that to be the fact. I have worked with them for many years. I do not believe you will find in Ottawa any officials to whom more authority is given to enforce regulations than is given in this bill to inspectors in connection with the inspection of fish.

Several hon. members have spoken of inspection and grading. I am much in favour of a better product in the fishing industry. If this industry is to survive, it will survive on quality. That should be the aim of every person who is interested in the industry. He should strive to improve the quality of the product. I believe that is right. But to date I believe the department has had the cart before the horse. Inspection should take place before the fish are ever taken from the boats.

To explain what I mean in a brief manner, let us take, for example, the sardine industry. A boat will come in loaded with sardines. The sardines are taken into the cannery, in which hundreds and hundreds of dollars are expended on labour. Hundreds of pounds of tin plate are used. Thousands of gallons of edible oil are used. After that process has been completed, the inspector will draw samples and tell you if the product is fit for human consumption or not. Why all this labour and all these materials should be wasted, I fail to understand. The inspectors with the fisheries department should be qualified to go aboard that boat at the cannery, inspect the fish there and follow them through until they are completely processed. Until we get a system of that sort, we are certainly going to be criticized by the people who are in the canning industry. I think we shall also be criticized by the general public because of the fact that good labour and good material are unnecessarily wasted.

Once more I want to emphasize my belief in quality. As I stated before, if this industry is to grow to the extent that we should like to see it grow, I believe this can be done only through quality. Fishermen are reasonable people. I worked with them for many years. They like to be advised, but they do not like to be pushed around. Fishermen are an intelligent group. As young men they started out to work for themselves; they have never worked for somebody else for wages; they have always been out on their own. To that extent I would say that they are perhaps a little bit more independent than the ordinary person you meet. They are reasonable if they are talked to in their own language; but they are stubborn if you start to push them around. There is one other clause in this bill that I want to mention briefly. It is in connection with fish that may be seized by an inspector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but as he knows he must speak to the principle of the bill on second reading and not refer to clauses.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Today fisheries inspectors have great authority and if they suspect there might be something wrong with certain types of fish they can seize them. They have authority to hold them for a period of two months. I often wonder, in regard to fresh fish, live lobsters, shellfish and anything of that kind, just what condition they would be in after an inspector had held them for two months. Again I wonder if they were put in cold storage and kept there for two months who would be responsible for the cold storage charges. It is matters of this kind that are bothering the fishermen and men connected with the fishing industry today.

What I should like to see the Department of Fisheries do, and some day I hope they will do it, is to take these young men whom they have in their employ and teach them to the point where they will be able to go out with the fishermen and be helpful. Instead of being a police officer, be a teacher. When we get that sort of set-up in our fisheries department I believe that they will be doing a lot to encourage the fishing industry.

As I said before, these young men are honest; they are fine boys; they are conscientious; but their knowledge of the fishing industry is limited. They have not had the experience. A course of two or three weeks in any part of the Dominion of Canada would not give them sufficient knowledge to go out into the industry today and try to help those engaged in the industry. I do hope that the department will seriously consider the suggestion that instead of an official being a police officer he should go out to assist the industry. May I give one example. In my own province we have a provincial fisheries department. It is very small. There are only two or three in that department. We have one young man there today who has had a lot of experience in the fisheries of our province. For example, some fishermen will rig up a trawler and go trawling. They will go out, drag for several days, and their equipment will not work properly. There is something wrong. The fisherman cannot find out what it is. He calls this young man. I have known him to go out and stay out for four or five days in the bay of Fundy with these men until he found where the trouble was, and rectified it for them. He has gone to different places in the province where they have problems and he has been of great assistance to the fishermen. Today this young man is held in high regard. When we find other inspectors with the federal department who are as qualified and are willing to go out and assist men in the business we shall find little criticism from the fishermen. But as long as the department takes the attitude that it is a police department, that you have got a tough bunch to work with, just so long will these men resent that fact and, I fear, perhaps co-operate less than if they were treated as men are treated in other industries in this country.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have very few words to utter in this chamber tonight. I would describe this house tonight as a house of the east and the west. Much has been said about the quality of the fish from the different provinces, and it is always of the highest quality. Nothing has been said from the new province with regard to our quality. I would like to say this: when you are judging fish, the taste will tell.

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I am just going to ask a question, but first of all I want to say a word in connection with what the previous speaker has just said. He mentioned the east and the west; but I think tonight all hon. members have forgotten the Saskatchewan whitefish that are sent to New York. I am just going to ask the minister whether this bill, and the act when it is passed, will apply to the inland fish as well as to coastal fish.

Mr. Mayhew: Yes, it does.

Mr. Ferrie: I should like to ask the minister this question. Will they be inspected in the lake?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferrie: I meant to say at the lake. Will they be inspected at the lake?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I must inform the house that the Minister of Fisheries will close the debate if he speaks now.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Before the minister speaks I should like to say a few words.

Mr. Ferrie: I asked a question.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate. We must stick to the rule. Mr. Speaker, what I have to say is this. I presume that this bill, which is only a repetition of an act which is in effect at the present time, and the regulations that are in effect, is devised for the benefit of the fishermen, because the fisherman is the most important man in this whole set-up, not the Minister of Fisheries, not the fish merchant, but the fisherman of whom I represent thousands in my district.

Mr. Stick: You are not the only one.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And others.

Mr. Stick: Exactly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We had the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) telling us that fish in British Columbia was superb. It would seem to be so from the fact that the regulations do not apply to them. It would also seem that the fishing industry should be a model for the fruit industry, because when we were discussing the fruit industry we found that it was not quite perfect.

In regard to the regulations for inspection of lobsters, we heard the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) saying that assistance of an educational nature was the most important, and not so much inspection. The inspectors should be educators. I believe it is the intention of the department to have the men go around and help teach the fishermen the right way to do things. We found that when co-operative methods were introduced in the lobster business in Newfoundland it was the most beneficial thing that had happened to the lobster industry in the whole history of that province. The value of the lobster to the fishermen increased tremendously. We have to get fishermen into the organization. The minister knows that at present the codfishing industry is controlled by the fisheries board and the merchants. It costs $10,000 to join the fish merchants export association. What I want to point out is that the fisherman has not yet been given the position that he should have in this whole picture. I would suggest to the minister that he give consideration to the appointment of a representative of the fishermen themselves on the fisheries council, or on whatever body is to be in charge.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of delaying the house or delaying the second reading of this bill, but I do want to answer the hon.

member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) about the date of the meeting. I have not the setting of the date of the meeting, but I think there will be ample time for the committee on marine and fisheries to have a meeting a week from Monday. There will also be ample time for anyone from any part of Canada to get here who may want to come. Again it will give us time to give the bill all the study it deserves and get it back into the house to have third reading before the house prorogues.

There are several things that I should like to say, but I think I shall have time to say them on the estimates. I do not want to get into a discussion tonight on whether the best fish are to be found on the east coast or the west coast. I think we have starfish at both places. When this bill is in operation—and it will probably take a year before it is in operation—it will mean, I think, a quality of fish better than anything we have had before. Quality in fish is the selling point—and sales regulate any business with which I have ever been connected. I believe if we can get quality in our fish there will be no difficulty in getting sales. We have the greatest potential cold-water fisheries in the world and we can make this industry one of which Canada will be proud.

We cannot pay too much attention to the development of our fisheries, our forests, our farms, our mines—indeed all our natural resources—and the maximum attention will be paid to our fisheries.

When the estimates are before the committee I shall answer all the questions which have been put to me. I have here the answers to the questions asked on Thursday night by the hon. member for St. John's East, but those answers will require some time. Perhaps he would be content if I were to put them on record when we are considering the estimates, on the understanding that he may have them in the meantime if he wishes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

453. Departmental administration, $836,737.

Item agreed to.

Canals service—

455. Canals service—administration, $81,400.

Mr. Green: Let it stand.

Mr. Chevrier: Stands.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday next the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will proceed with the motion to set up a special committee on atomic energy. Then the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) will proceed with the resolution concerning the National Housing Act, 1944; then the resolution to introduce the measure to assist in the construction of the trans-Canada highway. That would be the program.

However, during the day I should like to move to go into supply, and call one item in the Department of External Affairs, because we shall try to have the minister for that department here one day to have a general discussion on his estimates. At the moment it is difficult to have him here. Therefore if I can get into supply I would call one item.

If we conclude all that business we will take up Bills 64 and 65.

Mr. Low: When do you propose to continue the budget debate?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Tuesday.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

453. Departmental administration, $836,737.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 31, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS —TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I now table copies of further correspondence with the provincial premiers with respect to amendments to the British North America Act. Perhaps it would be desirable to have them printed as an appendix to Hansard, as was done before; and if you would so order, sir, I believe that would meet the wishes of most hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: With the approval of the house I shall make the appropriate order.

(For text of further correspondence, see appendix, page 1319.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1949, TABLED—AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance I wish to table the Public Accounts of Canada and the report of the Auditor General of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949.

It is regretted that copies for general distribution are not yet available, but they should be available within a few days.

NATIONAL TRADE MARK

APPLICATION TO COMMODITIES—TRUE LABELLING AND DESCRIPTION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 133 (from the Senate), respecting the application of a national trade mark to commodities and respecting the true description of commodities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 134, for the relief of Cicely Manley Sampson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 135, for the relief of Paul Paquette. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 136, for the relief of Joseph Simon Adelard Barrette.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 137, for the relief of Edith Daisy Steer Catto.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 138, for the relief of Gwen Pollock Harris.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 139, for the relief of Sonia Eagle Davies.—Mr. Weir.

Bill No. 140, for the relief of Evelyne Louis Steinwold.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 141, for the relief of John Gilbert Speak.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WHEAT—FREIGHT RATES—VANCOUVER TO LAKEHEAD—SHIPMENTS THROUGH CHURCHILL

Mr. Wright:

1. How much additional freight was paid by the wheat board on wheat shipped to Fort William and Port Arthur from points tributary to Vancouver during each of the crop years, from 1939-40 to 1948-49, inclusive?

2. During the same crop years, what surpluses accrued to the wheat board through lower freight rates from points tributary to Port Churchill on wheat shipped to the Port of Churchill?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Wheat crop	Additional freight paid gross	Additional freight paid net
1939	$2,015,615.44	$2,015,615.44
1940	3,543,171.31	3,543,171.31
1941	1,027,883.68	1,027,883.68
1942	896,073.57	896,073.57
1943	940,181.74	852,167.83
1944	1,664,226.17	1,660,651.48

Note: During the war years from 1939 to 1944 the ocean shipping was such that only a very small quantity of wheat could be exported through Pacific coast ports. Under these circumstances substantial quantities of wheat were moved eastward from delivery points having a freight differential in favour of Vancouver.

Wheat crop account	Additional freight paid gross	Additional freight paid net
1946	361,019.79	21,331.80
1947	686,184.63	16,674.74
1948	396,708.73	24,084.76

Note: From August 1, 1945, to date, the bulk of additional freight paid on the eastern movement of wheat from delivery points in the Vancouver freight rate area has been recovered in board sales. The principal recoveries were from the United Kingdom and from the agricultural supplies board in respect to feed wheat shipped eastward.

1948	46,658.69

Note: The figures shown above deal exclusively with the freight saving on wheat shipped to Churchill as compared with the freight which would have been paid on the same wheat had it been moved to the lakehead. These figures do not take into account the diversion charge paid to elevator companies in respect to Churchill shipments. From August 1, 1939, to July 31, 1949, the Churchill diversion charges were as follows:

From August 1, 1939, to July 31, 1940, 1½¢ per bushel.

From August 1, 1940, to July 31, 1947, 1¢ per bushel.

From August 1, 1947, to date, 1½¢ per bushel.

The following table shows diversion charges paid by the board on wheat shipped to Churchill:

Crop year Crop account	Diversion Premiums Paid
1939	$ 5,707.77
1940	457.24
1941	——

SALES TAX—ICE CREAM

Mr. Knight:

1. Has the government received widely spread representation requesting the abolition of the sales tax at present imposed upon ice cream?

2. If so, what action has been taken by the government in regard to these requests?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. Yes.

2. None.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

R.C.A.F.—FLYING RISK ALLOWANCE

Mr. Johnston:

1. Is flying risk allowance being continued in the air force? If not, when will it be restored?

2. Have there been any changes in the allotment of this allowance? If so, what are they?

3. What branches of the air force receive this allowance?

4. Under what conditions is risk allowance given?

5. What is the amount payable?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, as follows:

(a) Active service during the war, flying pay (now risk allowance).

Officers—General list, $2 a day; Non-flying list, $2 a day for each day of flying on duty in service aircraft.

Other ranks—Aircrew, $0.75 to $1 per day dependent upon qualification, e.g., pilot, air gunner, etc. Non-aircrew, $0.75 per day for each day of flying on duty in service aircraft.

(b) Peacetime service—Risk allowance (formerly flying pay), payable under conditions stated in answer to question 4 and at the rate stated in answer to question 5.

3. Aircrew officers, aircrew trainees, and crewmen (other ranks) who fulfil the conditions stated in answer to question 4.

4. Risk allowance is payable to:

(a) Aircrew officers on the strength of units whose normal function is flying.

(b) Aircrew officers not on the strength of flying units, provided they fly as members of an aircrew for not less than eight hours per month.

(c) Personnel undergoing flying training, for the full period of such training.

(d) Other ranks who form part of the crews of aircraft in accordance with established quotas, ranging from one crewman for every four two-seater aircraft to four crewmen for each multi-engined aircraft engaged in photographic operations and fitted with Shoran equipment.

5. $30 per month for all ranks.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—IMPORTS OF UNITED STATES COAL

Mr. Brooks:

1. What quantity of United States coal has been imported for use by the Canadian National Railways, Atlantic region, for (a) the calendar year 1948; (b) the year 1949 to October 1?

2. What quantity of American coal is on hand for use by Canadian National Railways at Campbellton, New Brunswick?

Mr. McIlraith:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. (a) 272,625 tons; (b) 151,282 tons.

2. The stockpile at Campbellton includes coals of Canadian and United States origin. Quantities are not separated, but United States content is estimated to be about 18,248 tons.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has the government received a request from Mr. Samuel Baron, Canadian director of the Textile Workers Union of America, for a royal commission to investigate conditions in the Canadian textile industry resulting from devaluation?

2. If so, has the government given consideration to this request?

3. Has any decision been reached?

4. If so, what is the nature of the decision?

5. Will the government consider the appointment of a royal commission to investigate all phases of the Canadian textile industry, including capitalization, profits, wages, and working conditions?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. The government believes that it is as yet too early to assess the results of devaluation on our trade with the United Kingdom in textiles. Therefore it does not feel that such a royal commission should be appointed.

5. No.

AGRICULTURE—RECORD OF PERFORMANCE INSPECTORS—LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION

Mr. Viau:

1. Did the Department of Agriculture request through the civil service commission during the years 1948 and 1949, applications for record of performance inspectors?

2. If so, how many are to be employed in the various centres throughout Canada?

3. How many for each province?

4. How many in each province are required to have a knowledge of both the English and French languages?

5. Were applicants for Manitoba required to have a knowledge of both the English and French languages? If not, why not?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Prince Edward Island, 4, 1 vacant; Nova Scotia, 5; New Brunswick, 5, 1 vacant; Quebec, 37, 3 vacant; Ontario, 81, 7 vacant; Manitoba, 2; Saskatchewan, 3; Alberta, 3, 1 vacant; British Columbia, 8.

4. A knowledge of the English and French languages is not required in any province with the exception of Quebec. In this province seventeen are required to have knowledge of both English and French languages.

5. No. In order to give adequate service to breeders operating under the policy in Manitoba it has not been found necessary to require a knowledge of both the English and the French language by the inspectors.

INDIAN HEALTH SERVICES—FEES FOR MEDICAL CARE

Mr. Shaw:

1. Does the Department of National Health and Welfare (Indian health services) have a set schedule of fees payable to the medical profession across Canada for the care of Indians when such attendance is rendered on a fee for service basis?

2. Are all accounts submitted by members of the medical profession for service rendered to Indians, paid in accordance with this set schedule?

3. If not, under what circumstances is a different schedule applied?

Mr. Claxton:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. See answers to Nos. 1 and 2 above.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

YORK TOWNSHIP, ONT., POST OFFICE—FOREST HILL

Mr. Noseworthy:

What consideration is the government giving to the provision of a post office for either or both the village of Forest Hill and the township of York?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

IRRIGATION—ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, agreements and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan since January 1, 1944, in connection with irrigation development within these provinces?

IRRIGATION—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all orders in council passed since January 1, 1944, setting forth government policy in relation to irrigation development in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

YORK TOWNSHIP, ONT., POST OFFICE—FOREST HILL

Mr. Noseworthy:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the office of the Postmaster General, and individuals and organizations, in Forest Hill and York township, between January 1, 1946 and October 25, 1949, relating to the provision of a post office in Forest Hill and/or York township.

ATOMIC ENERGY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE INTO OPERATIONS OF CONTROL BOARD

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to examine into the operations of the atomic energy control board; that the said committee be empowered to sit during the sittings of the house and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and to report from time to time; that the said committee consist of Messrs. Breithaupt, Brooks, Coldwell, Bourget, Gibson (Comox-Alberni), Green, Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth), Low, McCusker, McIlraith, Murphy, Pinard, Stuart (Charlotte), Winkler.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving that a special committee of the house be appointed to examine into the operations of the atomic energy control board, it might not be out of place for me to recall briefly the developments that have taken place in this field in Canada.

Canada's association with the development in nuclear physics dates back to Lord Rutherford's investigation of radioactivity at McGill university in 1899. In Canada, as elsewhere, this research was at first largely a matter of concern of the physics departments of the various universities. It was pure research concerned with driving back the frontiers of human knowledge rather than with any so-called practical application of the knowledge thus gained.

The theoretical equivalence of mass and energy had come to be accepted early in this century. However, it was not until 1939, with the discovery in Germany that, under certain conditions, the atom of a particular isotope of uranium would split into two nearly equal parts, that the matter began to assume practical implications. This split, or fission, as it came to be called, was accompanied by an enormous release of energy. Very soon the theory was advanced that the process might be made to propagate itself as a chain reaction.

Calculations made at the time showed that a few pounds of uranium undergoing fission might release energy equivalent to something like 20,000 tons of T.N.T. Thus the possibility opened up of a new weapon of war of fantastic power relative to anything which had been previously used. When world war II broke out, the possibility of producing a weapon based on a nuclear chain reaction became of immense importance to all governments. If this could be done, obviously the nation which succeeded first might well gain a decisive advantage.

From 1940 on, information on the possibility of producing an atomic weapon was interchanged between Britain, the United States and Canada. Towards the end of 1942, plans were made for an important section of the work to be carried on in Canada, and accordingly a joint laboratory of United Kingdom and Canadian staff was established in Montreal under the administration of the national research council. In addition to carrying out the research work in the Montreal laboratory, and other research in the national research council in Ottawa, in the laboratories of the Department of Mines and Resources and at the universities throughout the country, Canada contributed many men to the scientific work on projects in the United States and in the United Kingdom. We also set up the necessary control of radioactive substances under the metals controller.

A further development was the decision to build a pilot plant for the production of plutonium by a heavy water reactor at Chalk River. I might say that the scientists had worked out two or three alternative possible methods for producing plutonium, which is a new element possessing explosive properties. The United States, which was carrying the development burden at that time, largely because of its great resources in money and productive capacity, undertook to try out two or three possible methods, but this method of using the heavy water reactor was not one of them. It was suggested that Canada try it; so that line of development was undertaken as a Canadian project. This plant was approaching completion on schedule when the war ended. We then found ourselves in the very fortunate position of having in existence facilities capable of carrying forward research in atomic energy, but not so large nor so expensive to operate as would make their continued use prohibitive in peacetime.

The atomic energy control board was established by the Atomic Energy Control Act, 1946, to administer the atomic energy program in Canada and continue the control of radioactive material. As hon. members will recall, the board reports to the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research, as does the national research council. The chairman of that committee, of course, represents the committee on the floor of the house and tables the annual reports of the board.

Shortly after its formation the board was made responsible for the control and administration of the Chalk River plant. In order that large scale research on the production and application of atomic energy might be carried on in Canada, the board decided that this plant should be completed and maintained as a research establishment. It requested the national research council to operate the plant on its behalf.

The plant and the associated residential village are located on expropriated areas totalling about ten thousand acres, of which the village accounts for slightly less than one square mile and the plant site for the other fifteen square miles. A quite small proportion of the plant site is actually occupied by the plant proper, the remainder assuring isolation from privately owned property. The fact that the property adjoins one end of the large Petawawa military reserve reduced the amount of land which had to be expropriated, that end of the reserve being unoccupied. The plant consists of approximately one hundred-odd buildings and structures, along with the outside steam, air, power, water and sewer lines serving them.

Of most of the buildings it need only be said that they are of conventional type, built for semi-permanence. All are on concrete foundations, and most are of wooden frame construction. There are, however, a number of structures which, by their nature, are of a permanent type. Into this category fall the power house, filtration plant and pile building, all of which are of concrete, steel and brick.

The pile building is the central feature of the project, but it will be realized that the details of the pile are still of a secret nature and cannot yet be disclosed. Recently, however, the pile has been referred to by the director of reactor development of the United States atomic energy commission as having the most advanced design and performance of present known reactors.

In order to house plant personnel, a spot on the Ottawa river six or seven miles away from the plant was chosen for the site of a village. Although this extent of separation of plant and village may have been unnecessarily large, the site chosen is considerably more attractive than those available nearer to the operating area. At the village, housing units were provided in single dwellings, mostly of the wartime type, in multiple dwellings, in staff hotel and dormitory blocks. The village has a population of nearly two thousand. There is not sufficient living accommodation in the village to house all the employees, but more houses are being built each year, and it is hoped to remedy the situation within a few years.

I should like now to say something about atomic energy in general, and then speak of what is going on in the plant.

When the first bomb was dropped, it was realized that an unbelievably large source of energy, which it had been thought would never be practically available, had actually been tapped. It was, and still is, impossible to say just when or how this reservoir of available power will be harnessed in a large way to peaceful pursuits, but it is certain that the world's potential source of energy has been increased many thousandfold by this development.

To give a practical illustration, I hold in my hand a small cylinder of natural metallic uranium. It has been calculated that if every bit of this very heavy metal could be turned into energy, we would get the same quantity of power that could be developed by about 500,000 tons of coal, or about the power we now get out of the large Shipshaw plant in one year. Of course this cannot be done at the moment, but there is little doubt that some day we shall be able to fly to remote areas, in one small aeroplane, more potential power in the form of nuclear fuel than can be hauled today in a hundred railway coal cars, and one does not require an extraordinary imagination to envisage what that may mean to future development. But there are many problems to be solved before commercial atomic power is an economic reality. Chalk River is working vigorously on the fundamental problems involved, and is keeping in as close touch as possible with what is going on in other countries.

While commercial atomic power is definitely not just around the corner, there are immediate dividends in connection with radioactive isotopes and their use in medicine, biological research and industrial applications which some people feel may ultimately yield greater and more significant returns than all the conceivable applications of ordinary power.

Radioactive isotopes have three main uses. They are useful as tracers in research and analytical procedures. They hold great promise in the field of medicine for clinical use as a radioactive source, and they have almost limitless possibilities in the broad field of industry, for control and other purposes.

Perhaps a few examples would be helpful. For instance, iodine is known to concentrate in the thyroid gland; hence if a compound containing radioactive iodine is given to a patient, the course of its path through the body may be traced and the rate of accumulation in the thyroid can be determined by instruments outside the human body which record intensities of radiation. It can easily be seen that in a similar way, where treatment by radiation has proved helpful, it may be possible in the future to carry that radiation to the proper tissues by radioisotopes.

There is surely an immense field for the use of tracers in research work in chemistry, in biology and in medicine. In determining just what happens in biological processes, the tracer techniques provide a new tool as potentially novel and useful as was the microscope when first introduced. In the treatment of disease there is a future so hopeful that many believe the benefits from medical research alone will some day repay manyfold all our considerable expenditures.

I could go on giving you scores of examples of the use that is now being made of radioisotopes by Canadian scientists, but time will not permit. I do want to say, however, that in the field of agriculture also the experiments being carried out in western Canada have already given most important information about the way in which plants take up elements from fertilizers, where the various nutritional elements in feeds go, and how they are assimilated. It is predicted that the use of tracers will have a profound effect on agricultural science and production.

But perhaps the greatest quantitative use of tracers will be in industry. Even today isotopes and radiation are being used in scores of industries, in chemical plants, in metallurgy, in textiles, in the oil industry, and in thousands of plants, particularly in the United States where intensive studies are being made everywhere to see if industrial processes cannot be improved and costs cut down by use of this new technique. For instance, in mixing chemicals, tracers can indicate accurately how much of each type is in the final product. Again, where raw materials from different parts of the world go into one product, and where quality is effected by blending, tracer techniques can provide easily the definite answer wanted as to just how much of each ingredient is in the final product. In metallurgy the uses are obvious and many. In studies of the wear of bearings it has been possible to detect the migration of atoms of metals from one piece to another, information that it was heretofore impossible to obtain. Also the phenomena of annealing, grain growth, and transformation of one type of iron into another can be closely studied. I could go on with other uses, but I think it is hardly necessary for me to do so.

I should now like to say something as to what is being done at the moment at Chalk River. The pile is running satisfactorily; the project is producing, using and distributing a series of radioisotopes, and the research and engineering staffs are extremely busy on an extensive series of investigations on the chemical, biological, medical and industrial uses of isotopes. The project is also carrying on fundamental nuclear investigations on the effect of radiation on structural material which are necessary before commercial atomic energy plants can become a practical economic reality.

I might say that for the most part the materials that are used in ordinary construction cannot be used in handling radioactive material, since they absorb radioactivity from the material, hence a whole technology of new materials must be worked out as we adapt atomic energy for commercial use.

In the field of radioactive isotopes the situation has more immediate promise. Chalk River is now making dozens of different kinds and is regularly distributing to Canadian universities and institutions quantities of many of the more important radioisotopes, such as radioactive phosphorus, sodium, carbon, calcium, iodine, etc. In addition, of course, even larger quantities are being used in the national research laboratories at Chalk River and elsewhere.

From what I have said I hope that hon. members will appreciate that the Chalk River project is not an ordinary industrial undertaking. It is really an exploration expedition into a land of great promise. We have a professional staff of about 195, an additional 965 non-professional employees, and, besides the output of isotopes and plutonium, many original scientific papers are being issued, and these are rapidly establishing the scientific quality and reputation of this Canadian scientific centre, which even now is a place to which the great scientists of the world come for discussions and information. While the tangible and immediate results in production, in research and in development are impressive and worth while, I would like to remind the house that the ultimate results of the best research can seldom be immediately discerned. We know by experience that where we have first-rate research in any field there is almost sure to be an overflow into adjacent fields, and the unexpected harvests are often the most valuable.

I suggest to the house that this rather large enterprise started at Chalk River in a time of war is turning out to be an absolutely first-rate effort that will continue in the years to come to be a credit to Canada in every sense. I suggest that the committee will find its study of the work being carried on in the field of atomic energy of absorbing interest. Although I have been intimately associated with this work from 1942 to the present time, I would hesitate to lay claim to any scientific knowledge of the subject. I say that so that members of the committee will not be so ambitious as to hope to be able to master the science in a few sittings. The committee can count on the fullest co-operation from the atomic energy control board, from the national research council, from the staff at Chalk River, and from the government as a whole, in any direction that will facilitate its work.

Hon. members may have noticed that the powers of the committee as set out in the resolution do not include the power to send for papers and persons. The reason is that we have secrecy provisions in the field of atomic energy which are common to Canada, the United States and Great Britain. The agreement between the three powers provides that certain classifications of information—a smaller class now than during the war years—must be kept wholly secret. Certain communications come to me which I am not at liberty to disclose to anyone else. Therefore we think that difficulties might be presented if the committee had the power to send for papers. All the information about atomic energy is in the hands of officers of the government. I can give the members of the committee the assurance that any member of the government the committee wishes to question will be presented before the committee, and that any papers that may be called for will be presented to the committee, provided that they are not still on the classified and secret list. With this assurance the committee should have no difficulty in working within its present terms of reference.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those happy occasions on which every party in the house is in agreement. As I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this afternoon and looked around the chamber I thought that one very promising feature of the occasion was the interest being taken in this debate. It recalled to my mind the debate which took place in 1946, when the bill was passed setting up the atomic energy control board. At that time barely a handful of hon. members stayed in the house, even to listen to the minister. Perhaps the reason for that was that the hon. members, like Canadians generally, were overwhelmed by the immensity of the development of atomic energy, and particularly overwhelmed by the power of the atomic bomb. However, in the intervening three years we seem to have developed. It is a hopeful aspect of the matter that so many hon. members are interested today. I believe the public generally are also greatly interested in this question of atomic energy.

The official opposition can hardly oppose the setting up of this committee, because we have pressed for it from the time of the first debate in 1946. Throughout we have been supported by the members of the C.C.F. party and of the Social Credit party, and have been grateful for that support.

The situation of course, Mr. Speaker, has been an anomalous one, because from the start in the United States they have had a committee of congress. In fact they have had three committees: a committee of congress, a committee of the defence forces, and a committee chosen from scientists and from the business world. These three committees were set up as watchdog committees to check the operations of the United States atomic energy commission. In Canada we have had nothing of the kind, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce alone of all hon. members—perhaps there have been one or two others—has been the only one in Canada really in touch with the development of atomic energy. That has not been entirely wise, particularly because Canada has been concentrating on the development of atomic energy for peaceful uses.

I am sure that the setting up of the committee will give the members of the committee a better understanding of the potentialities of atomic energy. Further it will be noticed that power is given to the committee to report back to parliament. In that way all hon. members should get a better understanding of atomic energy. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in a country where we have a democratic system of government it is essential that on all public questions parliament should be kept informed to the greatest degree possible.

I hope also that as a result of the setting up of this committee the Canadian people will get a better understanding of the potentialities of atomic energy. Much interest is now being taken in this subject, as I said a few moments ago. Of course that interest was heightened by the announcement a few weeks ago that the Soviet union is now able to make the atomic bomb. I am confident that that impressed itself on the minds of the Canadian people, just as it did on the minds of hon. members. Furthermore, Canadians have always taken a deep interest in new developments, because we are still a pioneering people, and perhaps take greater interest in new things than any of the countries of the old world.

Although Canada has been working in the industrial field with regard to atomic energy, there has been little opportunity for our people to follow what is being done. Consequently there has been much lack of knowledge, and great confusion with regard to this question. I am sure the position today is that as a result there is no public opinion behind the plans of the government with regard to atomic energy. In the long run the burden of making decisions concerning atomic energy, or any other question, rests squarely on the shoulders of the people as a whole, and not solely on members of the government or members of parliament.

The minister has pointed out that Canada is in a favoured position with regard to atomic energy. Of course this is true. There are several ways in which we have been particularly favoured. In the first place we got in on the ground floor. As the minister said today, Canada has been involved in the development of atomic energy since 1940. We were in at the start with the American and the British. I hold in my hand the declaration on atomic energy which was made on November 15, 1945, nearly four years ago, by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Canada. It was an historic declaration. I suggest to hon. members who are here for the first time that they would be well advised to secure a copy and read the statesmanlike declaration made at this time by the leaders of these three countries.

Canada has been a partner from the start, although I notice in the press of today an indication that we are not quite a full partner. Apparently the United States is not yet in a position to make full disclosure of the developments in that country for industrial uses. I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce was quite correct in taking the stand he is quoted as having taken, to the effect that so far as Canada is concerned she proposes to continue supplying the United States with uranium, although the government of the United States had not yet received power to pass on all the information available in that country. Apparently part of the agreement between the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada was that such information should be exchanged. This agreement expires at the end of this year, and Canada has now offered to carry on her part by continuing the supply of uranium. I feel confident that in due course the United States will make arrangements to give Canada and Great Britain any information that may be available for industrial uses.

We are also in a favoured position—and in this instance a more favoured position than the United States,—because we have the raw materials. We have the uranium in Canada, and also the hydroelectric power with which to produce heavy water,—one of the essential components in the use of atomic energy in the industrial world. I do not pretend to know anything about the scientific end of this business, nor do I suppose many hon. members who will serve on the committee will know much about it, even after we have completed our deliberations. Certainly, however, Canada is in a most favoured position in being able to supply the necessary raw materials.

We are in a favoured position too, because the Canadian people from coast to coast are interested in prospecting. In these days one ing into one's own back yard, in search of never knows when a prospector may be peer-uranium. There seem to be only a few who are successful, but the urge to go out to find uranium is now very much like the old urge to go to the Yukon to find gold. This urge to prospect is a good thing.

Then we have the scientists and engineers. I believe tribute should be paid to Canadian scientists for the part they have taken in the development of atomic energy. In this connection one must also pay tribute to Canadian universities, of which ten, according to the annual report of the atomic energy control board for the fiscal year 1948-1949, are co-operating with the board. These are the universities of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba; McMaster university, the university of Toronto, Queen's university, McGill university, Macdonald college and Dalhousie. All have rendered excellent service—and there may have been others.

Finally, Canada is a member of the atomic energy commission of the United Nations, and we shall continue to hold that membership even when not a member of the security council. As I understand the situation, the eleven nations which have representatives on the security council, and Canada, constitute the atomic energy commission of the United Nations.

Canada appears to be the leader in the industrial field. I have before me a press dispatch containing a speech made three or four days ago by Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, president of the national research council and chairman of the atomic energy control board. He is quoted as saying:

> Canada's experimental work so far has placed her in the forefront of the nations in the industrial field. Canada's main interest is in the peacetime application of atomic energy.

Today one need not dwell on the potentialities of atomic energy. The minister has placed on record some startling statements concerning those potentialities. In a speech delivered on May 28 he made this remarkable statement about atomic energy:

> Canada is in the front line of this the most exciting scientific venture of all times.

A somewhat similar statement has been made by Dr. Mackenzie. Last Saturday a statement was made by Kenneth F. Tupper, the new dean of the faculty of applied science and engineering at the university of Toronto. Dean Tupper has been associated with the work at Chalk River, and, in the course of a statement somewhat similar to that made by the minister, he pointed out one great difficulty, namely, that because of the military uses to which atomic energy can be put, the development for industrial purposes is being held back. In other words the need for some military control is making it more difficult to develop atomic energy for peacetime purposes. He said in part:

> The peacetime use of atomic energy for fuel or power awaits the solution of its international control . . . Until we have achieved a state of assured world peace, nations will not forgo the hoarding of nuclear fuels for possible military use.

The article goes on to say:

> Dean Tupper, who since 1947 has been director of the engineering division of the atomic energy project at Chalk River, said there was not the slightest doubt that atomic energy could be used for fuel.

So we shall still be hampered by the failure of the nations of the world to agree on some method of controlling atomic energy, in a military sense.

Concerning what this wonderful development may mean for Canada, we of the official opposition believe that, to as great an extent as possible, atomic energy should be used in Canada for Canadians. We do not say that it must not be supplied to other nations, but we urge that it be used in Canada for Canadians to the fullest possible extent. We believe, too, that in this field Canada can be of great help to other nations. There is a significant paragraph in the declaration on atomic energy made in 1945 by the three leaders. It reads as follows:

> Representing as we do the three countries which possess the knowledge essential to the use of atomic energy, we declare at the outset our willingness, as a first contribution, to proceed with the exchange of fundamental scientific information and the interchange of scientists and scientific literature for peaceful ends with any nation that will fully reciprocate.

I hope that this is still the policy of the Canadian government, because I have no doubt that the declaration expresses Canadian feelings. The developments in Canada may be the means of helping not only Canadians but the peoples of all nations. I sometimes wonder if creating better means by which nations can help other nations, may not be the only way to bring about world co-operation and indeed to do away with war.

In conclusion I should like to say a word or two about this special committee. We realize that the setting up of the committee is in the nature of an experiment. It is a special committee and as such will pass out of existence at the end of the present session. We hope that if the work of the committee is successful the government will have it appointed again in the session of 1950. Some comment has been made on the fact that no power is being given to the committee to call witnesses or to send for papers, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce explained that this afternoon.

I do not think the government need worry about the committee. The importance of the subject is clearly realized, not only by members who are to serve on the committee, but also by the house at large. Personally I feel it a great honour to be chosen to serve on the committee and I am confident that all other hon. members who are to serve on it feel the same way. I think the minister will find that a deep sense of responsibility will be shown by the members of the committee, and I am sure that they will take up their work in a spirit of service to their fellow Canadians.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) I feel that while this debate may not be the most important of this session, the subject under discussion is probably the most important we could discuss at this or any other time. None of us know much about atomic energy, but some of us have been interested in it from the time the first bomb fell on Hiroshima.

I had the good fortune in December, 1945, to be invited to attend a meeting in New York called by the New York Nation, to which a number of scientists who had been instrumental in splitting the atom and in making the bomb had been invited. My contribution this afternoon will to some extent be made upon the basis of what I learned at that time, and the information I have been able to obtain since from the bulletins issued during the last several years by a group of atomic scientists.

It is true that in the United States they have several committees dealing with atomic energy, one being a congressional committee; but I hope that our committee will not follow the course pursued by the committee of congress, which has been mainly one of witch-hunting and has been of little value in the field of atomic energy. Indeed I would go so far as to say that it has been distinctly detrimental to the best interests of the development of this great power in the United States and throughout the world.

It is important that members of parliament, even those with scientific and engineering knowledge as limited as my own, should have some understanding of this most important problem. As I think I said in this house in 1946, the discovery of atomic energy is the greatest discovery made by man since the discovery of the use of fire. It has promise of great development, for good or for evil. I saw a paragraph in a recent atomic energy bulletin, the "Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists" for August and September, which I think is worth putting before the house, because it emphasizes the difficulties faced by a legislative body such as this when dealing with a matter of this kind and formulating policies in regard thereto. Referring largely to the activities of the congressional committee in the United States, the bulletin states:

> If the democratic system of government is not to become a mere shell, through the incapacity of the legislators to understand some of the most important things about which they legislate, some changes are needed. In the first place, the legislators must be provided with really competent advisers, whose integrity, independence, and competence they trust. It will also be necessary for the AEC to take the responsible members of the committee more intimately into its confidence than it seems to have done, so that the committee will not suffer from the sense of bafflement which only aggravates the elements of pettiness and pique which are so often present in our political life. Beyond this, major political parties or at least their congressional representatives, could perhaps give consideration to introducing some representation of scientists and technologists into their inner councils, and even into congress (if a constituency can be found willing to have such an unorthodox representation, and if scientists are capable of that degree of public spirit and political ambition). A few competent scientists and engineers, scattered over the benches of the majority and of the opposition, might enable committees dealing with scientific and technical matters to lift future investigations of the AEC—and the AEC should be probed by congress often and deeply—to a much higher level than Senator Hickenlooper has achieved.

I think that statement is perfectly true. We do not want to descend to the level to which they have descended in the United States. We want to be in position to listen to the advice and information which can be given to us by people whom we can trust. After all, I believe we have a group of men and women working in the scientific field in this country, at Chalk River and in the national research council, which in proportion to our population is one of the best in the world. In one of these bulletins—I cannot just put my hand on it at the moment—I remember reading an article by Professor Harold Urey, one of the modern atom scientists. Discussing the difficulties that had arisen in the atomic energy commission of the United Nations, he went on to say that the technical problems before that commission were elucidated by the one man who understood them intimately, and he named General McNaughton, Canada's representative on that commission. Consequently we do not have to be ashamed of what Canada has done and is doing in this field.

I am happy indeed to have an opportunity of serving on this committee. I know that many other hon. members envy some of us the opportunity we have been given in this connection. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) remarked that this matter had been brought to the attention of the people of Canada once again by the announcement, two or three weeks ago, that Russia had succeeded in making an atomic bomb. If I may refer to the conference I attended in New York in December, 1945, I remember distinctly that Professor Szilard and others who spoke on that occasion prophesied that within a measurable period of time—some of them said within five years—the atomic bomb would no longer be a secret resting with one, two or three countries. After all, if scientific knowledge is to be useful to the world, it must be made freely available. I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra quite meant this, and if he did, I do not go along with him; but I understood him to say we should endeavour to use our knowledge of atomic energy purely for the good of the Canadian people.

Mr. Green: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not think the hon. member meant that, though that interpretation might have been placed upon his words. This is a world problem, and I am one of those who believe that no amount of blacking out on the part of Russia, the United States or any other country can prevent scientific knowledge from passing around the world and becoming available to all first-class scientists. This, I think, has been illustrated by the fact that recently we have learned that the atomic bomb is no longer the secret of any one nation.

I refer again to the most recent of these bulletins I have already mentioned, that of October, 1949—and here I am quoting an authoritative document in this particular field. The board of sponsors comprises J. Robert Oppenheimer as chairman, Harold C. Urey as vice-chairman, and among the members such names as Albert Einstein, James Franck, E. U. Condon, and a number of others; therefore it can be regarded as an authoritative document in regard to these matters. These scientists give a new warning to the world. In a letter signed by Harrison Brown, James Franck, Joseph E. Mayer, Leo Szilard and Harold Urey, they quoted from an article in the New York Times of September 28, 1949, in which General Walter Bedell Smith, former ambassador to the Soviet union, speaking of Russia's production of atomic bombs, was reported to have stated:

> I said a month ago at the governors' conference in Colorado that they would probably test the bomb in a few months. However, I believe that it will take Soviet Russia at least ten years to get to the point of mass production that we have now reached. I know that American techniques and industrial skills are far better than the best the soviet can offer. There is no reason for the soviet to reach, in less than ten years, the mass production that we have reached now.

Commenting on that statement, they say:

We, the undersigned, are aware of the problems involved in the large-scale production of atomic bombs. To our regret we have to say that the above statement, attributed by the New York Times to General Bedell Smith, has no basis in fact.

That is signed, as I have indicated, by the scientists I named. In our discussion of this important matter I do not think we should concentrate upon the atomic bomb. I had hoped that long ere this the United Nations would have reached agreement on a plan to control it. I think I understand fairly well the plan that was approved by the assembly of the United Nations, the only people voting against it, if I remember rightly, being the Soviet union and the nations associated with it or under its domination. That plan has not been made effective. Last Saturday night, in the weekly report from the United Nations at Lake Success, given by our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), I noticed a new suggestion, a modification of that plan, so in the light of more recent events perhaps the nations are reconsidering the situation.

I believe we must have world control of atomic energy in some form, with adequate inspection, and no iron curtain to keep inspectors out of any country at all. We must have free access, for inspection, to all factories, industries, and so on, producing atomic energy materials. In this way we can probably approach the time when atomic energy may be used for the good of mankind. I do not think any of us in the house this afternoon could have helped being greatly impressed when the Minister of Trade and Commerce held in his hand a small cylinder of uranium and told us that, turned into energy, it could replace hundreds of thousands of tons of coal, if mankind could but reach the stage at which that energy could be so utilized. In some respects it is almost a terrifying thing, not only from the point of view of war but from the point of view of peace. It means that if this comes about—and I should not say "if", because it will come about—it will mean a complete revolution in our society, a complete transformation of our industrial processes, a greater industrial revolution than that which occurred when coking coal was first used for the manufacture of steel, starting the industrial revolution of almost two hundred years ago. I think perhaps that thought was in the mind of one of the men who split the atom when he spoke in New York, as I heard him speak, on the occasion to which I have referred. I have in my hand a transcript of his speech; and on that occasion Dr. Leo Szilard, one of the famous atom scientists, said:

On the third day of March, 1939, Dr. Walter Zinn and I performed a simple experiment on the seventh floor of the Pupin building at Columbia.

After two days of preparation, everything was ready and all we had to do was turn a switch, lean back and watch the screen of a television tube.

If flashes of light appeared on the screen, that would mean that neutrons were emitted in the fission process of uranium, and this in turn would mean that the large scale liberation of atomic energy was just around the corner.

We turned the switch and we saw the flashes. We watched them for a little while and then we switched everything off and went home.

That night there was very little doubt in my mind the world was headed for grief.

This crucial phenomenon was independently discovered just about the same time by Anderson and Formi, and by Halban, Joliot and Kovarski. They used different methods, but arrived at the same conclusions; and I have, therefore, good hopes that my own plea of not guilty will receive merciful consideration in the heavenly court of justice.

The first use to which this great new potent energy was put was the mass destruction of mankind.

A little later in the same address, the same scientist said this:

Let me try, then, to reduce to a simple formula what I believe to be the difficulty that we have to overcome.

Politics has been defined as the art of the possible. Science might be defined as the art of the impossible. The crisis which is upon us may not find its ultimate solution until the statesmen catch up with the scientists, and politics, too, becomes the art of the impossible. This, I believe, might be achieved when the statesmen will be more afraid of the atomic bomb than they are afraid of using their imagination, because imagination is the tool which has to be used if the impossible is to be accomplished.

I hope this committee will have the effect of bringing the challenge to us in this House of Commons and making us consider the impossible, not only in the field of science, but also in the field of social relations, based upon the scientific implications of atomic energy and the like. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in appointing this committee I believe the house is taking a proper and logical step. It is taking a step which is essential for the well-being of our country. By informing the members of the House of Commons on the atomic energy problem, we shall enable all hon. members to do something about informing the people of the country about atomic energy and its possibilities.

I know the difficulties that have arisen—the determination on the part of the Soviet union, for example, that there must be no interference with her national sovereignty; that the factories of the Soviet union must be under the control of that country and not subject to any world authority. This is bedevilling the situation today, perhaps in part because of a lack of confidence among the great nations of the world. Whether for this or for any other reason, I believe Canada should do as it has done; it should join the other democratic countries in demanding that this great power be subject to complete international inspection under United Nations authority. Every facility for inspection should be given without let or hindrance.

Of course this does mean that at least we have moved some distance along the road towards the day of the parliament of man, when national sovereignty as we have known it will have ceased to be a problem to the peoples of the world. Retaining our special national culture and our national attributes, we may yet find a way of overcoming international difficulties.

As I said in the beginning, in the field of science it is impossible to maintain secrecy. As Szilard points out, certain scientists discovered how to split the atom about the same time as he did—Joliot and Kovarski in France; Halban in another country, and the others he named. No doubt by that time the Germans and Russians had also learned that part of the secret.

At the same conference I remember an address of Dr. Henry DeWolf Smyth, who, as many hon. members will recall, wrote the report on the first atomic bomb explosion in New Mexico before the bomb was dropped on Hiroshima. He has something to say which I think we should bear in mind in this young country. It has a particular bearing upon the resolution moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) in the field of education. He said:

> The most important technical resource of a nation is neither raw materials nor equipment, but educated men. Obviously we will need an increasing supply of such men in the post-war period. Under wartime policy the training of such men practically stopped. The policy of the selective service has made students in the sciences almost non-existent. The resumption of training must be encouraged in every possible way. The scientific men from the universities on the wartime projects should be returned as soon as possible to their normal activities of teaching and research. The welfare and safety of this country can be assured only by leaving them free to pass on what they have learned to a new generation of educated and trained men. If we lock our scientists up in secret laboratories, neither they nor the country will develop. The free interchange of ideas, nationally and internationally, is the strength of science, as indeed it is of every other department of men's lives.
> Ideas are a common inheritance from thoughtful men in all countries and all civilizations. To speak of continued secrecy in the field of thought and discovery is to deny our moral birthright and the very tradition which has brought us this far from savagery. Secrecy in any field of peacetime is fatal to man's growth and to any hope for a world society.

The tragedy is that, owing to a lack of confidence among the great nations of the world, secrecy has been enjoined in many areas of scientific research. But it seems to me that in our own country, with the development of groups of scientists, young men in our universities trained in science, with a national research council and the Chalk River project, we have a remarkable opportunity to develop more and more able scientists to the end that atomic energy may be brought under human control and utilized for good, not only in our own country but in the world generally.

When we say that atomic energy should be utilized for the good of our country and for the world generally, let us bear in mind the fact that politics must keep up with science so that legislators and scientists may march side by side. Atomic energy is bound to bring in its train industrial revolution. We must guide the political and social revolution to keep pace with it, so that we shall not fall into the kind of disaster experienced after the industrial revolution of years ago; or, indeed, that the world may not fall asunder and mankind perish in the flames of war.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am in that unfortunate position in the speaking list that when an important topic of this description comes before the house, by the time it is my turn to speak there is little left to say. This is particularly true when I am preceded by eloquent speakers who have given great thought and study to the problems before the house. This afternoon therefore I do not intend to take up much time, but there are perhaps a few things that have not yet been said. Those only I wish to stress.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we welcome the setting up of this committee. When it was proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) some time ago we felt that it was a desirable thing to do. We thought that the government's acceptance of the recommendation showed that they too sensed the great importance of getting before the people of Canada certain information which they should have. In spite of the fact that atomic energy investigation and development in this country have remained almost entirely "top secret" to date, the people of the country ought to know certain things.

The reason is quite plain. Nations are governed by the attitudes of the masses. If we expect our people to behave in a sensible way, sensible attitudes must be cultivated amongst them. The only way in which such sensible attitudes can be cultivated is to get before them as much information as possible. That means that the government cannot continue for any length of time to keep things locked up in the secret list entirely. That was one of the great reasons why at the time we felt constrained to support the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the official opposition in asking the government to set up this committee.

It is only natural that the atomic energy board, having regard to its very nature, should let out to the people and to the members of this parliament as little information as possible. By the very nature of things, it is an ultra-conservative board. The setting up of this committee is going to go a long way toward helping the people of Canada to get what they should have and therefore toward helping them reach a sensible attitude.

I should like to explain just what I mean by a "sensible attitude". I have heard what has been said by people who have been influenced by the sensational aspects of reports of the development of atomic bombs for destructive purposes for war. There can be no settled state of mind where people are swayed by the emotional and sensational aspects of such reports. It is therefore important that the people be let in on as much of the information as it is possible for them to get.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) quite eloquently and well, I thought, brought out the point that, if we are seriously to attempt to prevent the widespread application of atomic energy for destructive purposes for war, we must see to it that the people are in possession of the facts as far as we can possibly get those facts to them. They are in this position. They are the victims of a world-wide campaign, on the part of the enemies of free men, which is designed to get people to do, under the threat of war, what their enemies usually get them to do under the duress of warfare itself. I am satisfied that one of the reasons why Russia and her satellities are not prepared to submit to international control of atomic energy, and particularly the inspection part of it, is that they hope to obtain, under the threat of war, what they would normally be able to obtain under the duress of war if they thought they could lick the world. That seems to be the way they have been carrying on for years.

I feel quite satisfied that they do not want to go to war and they do not want to see atomic energy let loose upon the world, because they know that they would be amongst the victims, the same as other people. If Canadians, the people of the United States and of the other democratic countries can be influenced to do, under the fear of war, things that the enemies of free men want them to do, then those enemies have accomplished their purpose without having to resort to the force of arms. As free men in a free country I think that our duty ought constantly to be to seek out the source of our enemy's power and strength and then, before he starts using or realizing on that strength for his own purposes, to see to it that his powder is wet so it will not go off. One of the best ways of making sure that his powder will not go off is to have a well-informed people with a sensible attitude. I believe that attitude can be settled fairly well if this committee performs its functions as I think it will; and I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, that we are happy that this committee is being set up.

There is one other thing I should like to mention before I sit down and it is this. I hope that the terms of reference in the resolution itself are broad enough so that the members of the committee may investigate production of uranium in this country. When I say "investigate production" I mean this. I am aware of a good many places where uranium ore could be produced in much greater quantities than it is being produced today. Why it is not being produced is something that I think ought to be generally known by this House of Commons; for there is no element known to man today that is so important as uranium. If there are discouragements to the production of uranium, I think we should know it; if there are not sufficient encouragements to the production of uranium ores, then I think the members of the House of Commons ought to know it. If the investigation is conducted on a scale broad enough so that this phase can also be studied, perhaps out of the work of the committee may come certain new and better encouragements to the faster production of uranium ores for our stockpiles—not for war purposes; I am not by any means so greatly concerned about that as I am for peacetime purposes.

I echo the sentiments of my hon. friends who have spoken before me. Let us concentrate as far as is humanly possible upon the peacetime aspects of atomic energy. After all, they are the ones which contribute to the happiness and prosperity of the people and therefore they are the ones which should receive our greatest study. But at the same time let us not overlook the fact that there is every possibility that our enemies have the atomic bomb. Let us therefore be wise in what we say and do with respect to reserves of those things which might help to make us equal in a world where there is no complete friendship amongst nations.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): For a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the house the cause and effect of this proposed resolution, if we pass it. I referred to the matter the other day, in connection with what has been done so far. The resolution of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who has taken a great interest in this work since the fall of Japan, reads as follows:

> That a special committee be appointed to examine into the operations of the atomic energy control board; that the said committee be empowered to sit during the sittings of the house and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and to report from time to time . . .

So far so good; but if you look a little closer at the work of the committee to be appointed you will see that all they will be doing is collection of some information about this very grave question that confronts the world today. It is either extinction of the human race or something else in the way of peaceful use of this great power. We have to look at the cause and effect of the resolution. Canada has spent considerable sums of money on a plant in the Ottawa valley. Canada, along with United States, has made a study of its effects in peace or war, which is the right thing to do I suppose. I called attention to this matter after the fall of Japan:

> The main point to remember about the atomic bomb is that its use may depend on the gradual restoration of a more civilized world. Humanity may have to face the question—which is the least unendurable, a vast physical destruction or the surrender of the whole of mankind to a diabolical tyranny such as the world has never seen?

That is correct. It is quite true that the atomic weapon cannot be separated from the great problems of peace and war. You cannot separate them by appointing a committee with very limited power. We are a nation of only eleven million people. We have not the capacity or the method and manner of handling this problem. It is quite true, as I say, that this atomic weapon cannot be separated from the whole question of war and peace.

> The atomic bomb—as it is popularly called—is a more dreadful weapon than any that have so far appeared (there may be worse coming). But it is, after all, just a weapon. Thus we are driven back to considering the causes of war.

The resolution does not go far enough in that connection. They should consider the whole problem if they are to consider it at all.

I am reading now from the Dean of Chichester's address which appeared some time ago in Everybody's magazine which is edited by a very great man Mr. Pote in England. He called attention to a very great situation which confronts the mother country. He is also backed up in what he says by a man whom I regard as one of the greatest men of England, the Most Rev. and Right Hon. Cyril F. Garbett, Archbishop of York, who spoke in the cathedral at Victoria, British Columbia, just a week ago yesterday. In that address as reported in The Canadian Churchman of the Church of England, he called attention to what was going on in the world. The report of his address reads in part:

> "Our age does indeed need good news. We live in an age of crisis; millions of people are sorrowful, anxious and worried. People are more worried perhaps than at any other time in history.
> Over mankind hangs the danger of the atomic bomb with all its awful possibilities. There is the deepening shadow of atheistic communism blotting out both faith and freedom.
> The Christian faith has good news today—it has news of God.
> Christianity teaches that God is the living Lord, infinite in His love for humanity. God is not an impersonal power.
> Sometimes people ask, is man of any value? The Christian faith replies, "Every man and child has value in the sight of God and God cares for them."
> He told the congregation this life was a school preparing people for a great life after death. "God was ready to help and individuals and nations have failed because they did not ask for that help."

I might call the attention of the house to the fact that Canada has made a study of this problem since the fall of Japan. The other day the western powers announced that Russia has produced an atomic bomb. She knows all about it. She has also got more deadly weapons than that at the present time. I am not one of those who believe what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day about the whole question, that we would have no war at least for five years. I notice he is not in his seat today. Therefore I have to be careful and not misquote what he said. I understood him to say that war is not probable for about five years. I noticed something in the press and in Hansard about it. He said there would not be another war for that period of time. I referred to it the other day and at the session last spring, and he did not correct me. I believe he was too optimistic in his statement. I believe he was, for many reasons. May I ask this question. If we appoint this committee to secure this information firsthand is Canada secure or is she not? I say she is not secure on the sea, on the land or in the air, and we are now faced with a deadly weapon which may destroy the whole human race. With the limited power given to this committee I doubt whether we can accomplish anything.

I hold in my hand a picture of the United States atomic energy plant. It is a peaceful looking village away down in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. That manufacturing plant is the birthplace of the atomic bomb. Russia knows everything that is going on down in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. She knows more than we in Canada do about it. We are supposed to get our information from the UNO. If we are depending on the UNO we are leaning on a weak reed. We have had some of it before. We have had two wars in one generation. It may be three strikes and we are out this time. When the western powers announced that Russia had the atomic bomb, Russia prepared a new peace offensive, if you please. That is what they have always done. Germany did the same thing, and we had two wars in a single generation. Russia is now doing it. They have adopted a peace offensive at the UNO, and the writers have been giving effect to it. The time has come when we should be wide awake on this question. This whole matter started on August 6, 1945, by an event which, as is stated by the Dean of Chichester—

—shocked the world. The bomb that dropped on Hiroshima revealed that man had in his power a means of destruction so vast and so sudden that it could conceivably wipe out, without a word of warning, the whole industrial capacity of a nation. Since then, still vaster weapons of destruction are in the making.

This is by the same people. He continues:

Blotting out the civilization of continents closely packed with human beings, like Europe or North America—

And, in Canada, Montreal, Toronto and other large centres.

—seems to have come within the range of possibility. Small wonder was it that in most countries, immediately after the war—

Continues the Dean of Chichester—

—there arose a demand that humanity must instantly discover either a means for controlling the monster it had created, or else eliminate altogether such fiendish devices. Indeed, there were not a few who said that since war had become so manifest an absurdity the only thing that sensible and reasonable people all over the world could do, was to abandon war altogether.

No doubt it would, if the majority of people in the world were sufficiently reasonable and sensible—and, what is supremely important, prepared to act together with insight and vigour.

It is quite true that the atomic weapon cannot be separated from the whole problem of war and peace.

Then he goes on to ask: Why do wars happen? He asks this question: What is it that causes these wars? I say one of the causes is pacifism. Only the other day Mr. Churchill said in the British House of Commons, in a debate on foreign affairs, that Britain never consented to Russia's being asked to come into the Pacific—and Mr. Churchill said the same thing three or four years ago. Russia had nothing to do with the Pacific before they were invited. And they were invited by whom? They were invited by the United States a week before Japan fell. The late President Roosevelt and General Eisenhower invited Russia to come into the Pacific.

What did Russia do? Immediately, in less than three days, they landed 500,000 troops in Manchuria. They must have gone up by way of Alaska to cross. What further did they do? They caused this whole situation—communism, and all that kind of thing—in Asia. They have China by the throat now—with the British fleet away up the river, something which never happened before in four centuries.

They were invited to come into the Pacific and have caused all kinds of damage. The Dean of Chichester refers to the condition in Asia, and to the fact that Russia now has most of Europe in its grasp, and it may be that Asia is in the same position. He points out that humanity has but one choice, and then continues:

Fortunately the west can confront Russia with overwhelming strength in industry, munitions and manpower, and has established a lead in atomic research which will be immensely difficult for the Kremlin to overtake. It is our duty to do all in our power to preserve that lead.

Yet, assuming that a balance of power in our favour is maintained, the question remains, "Is this sufficient to enable the world to settle down? Is it conceivable that there can really be a secure and contented world while Russia holds half Europe in thrall? Can genuine peace be established while Europe is half slave and half free? Again, is not more than Europe involved? If Asia, besides China and including India, Burma and the East Indies, come under the Russian grip can there be world recovery?" These are questions for the second stage of the conflict in which we are all at present engaged. When retreat is forced on Russia somewhere, the scene may brighten everywhere.

So I say it is a duty to encourage peace-loving countries. And do not forget this one fact, as the Dean of Chichester points out:

It is not armaments that make wars, but the people who have control of the armaments. Wars are not caused by things but by the mind of man. The United States, Great Britain, France, Holland, Belgium, and Norway had greatly reduced their armaments after the first world war. Denmark had practically abolished armaments altogether. This did not save any of these countries. There was another country, populous and powerful, that was bending all its energies to the preparation of war,—

And he was referring to Germany—

—which was greatly encouraged in its preparations by the weakness of the peace-loving countries and their obvious unwillingness and unreadiness for war.

Britain abandoned the finest army, navy, and air force the world had ever seen, after the first war. The result was that when another war came she had nothing. Then, he continues:

The truth is that wars in modern times are caused by the emergence of a group of determined men who are able to rouse and mobilize within their nation a passionate desire to expand and dominate. They aim at indoctrinating their people with a conviction of superiority, an imposing idea that they are destined to rule the world, because of their great strength and particularly because they alone possess the true political philosophy for which the whole of mankind is waiting. The kindling idea, universal in its scope, and simple in its expression, plus the sense of destiny, are essential to the war-machine. Men and women need a great cause, or what appears to be a great cause, if they are to be keyed up to endure the vast sacrifices that war, and preparation for war, demands.

The idea may be—in fact generally is— an illusion, masking the inner essence, which is the love of power and more power. That is the real driving force of those who have managed to get control of the national mind and the national resources. But without the idea—the world view—that control can never be obtained. Of course, ruthlessness is also essential. The idea kindles the idealist, the concentration camps and the purges keep the less convinced and the feebler folk tied to the chariot wheels of aggrandizing power.

It was thus that Napoleon spread the rule of fire and the sword across Europe, with the slogan of "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." It was with the glorification of kultur that Imperial Germany set out to conquer the world. "National Socialism," combining national destiny with what sounded like a broad philosophy of human equality, welded the German people into a devastating military machine under the fanatical leadership of Hitler.

I have almost concluded what I wished to say in this connection. Let me ask this question: Are we secure, or are we insecure? I say we are not secure, and for the reasons I have given. We can do little or nothing to prevent an unfortunate situation from developing, as that great man Churchill, who is the voice of England, has said.

Dr. Garbett preached in the constituency of my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) the other day, and called the attention of the Canadian people and of the empire, of America and of Great Britain to what is going to happen if atomic warfare succeeds. Are we secure on land, on sea and in the air? I say we are not. We are doing just what we did after the first war. At that time we liquidated the finest army, navy and air force we had ever seen—and now, after this war, we make the same mistake.

What about coming wars? For no doubt a war will come. It may come like a thief in the night, the way the first and second world wars came. I can remember being laughed at in this House of Commons when I quoted from the thirty-seventh chapter of Jeremiah. I referred to that chapter on September 10, 1945—and they did not laugh then. What I said was:

Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land?

When the war came, some of the pacifists in this house said: "What is the use of our sending across an army every few years when we can get all the defence we require from Washington?" There may have been some reason to say that at the time, but I can tell you that, unless we get rid of our present way of thinking, the third war will come before we know it. It will come as the other two came, like a thief in the night. Canada will be found unprepared on land and sea, and in the air, as far as the necessary atomic energy for defence purposes is concerned.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I was rather disturbed when I read this motion, which was to the effect that a special committee was to be appointed to examine into the operations of the atomic energy control board.

It seemed to me that the motion was rather restricted. I wanted to know how this examination was to be related and how it was going to tie in for instance with industry, with external affairs and with national defence. One could scarcely consider the operations of this board in a vacuum; they have to be related to other branches of government. In his speech when introducing the motion the right hon. gentleman cleared up some of these doubts when he told us that the committee would get the fullest co-operation from the government as a whole and that any member of the government whom the committee wished to call would be brought before it. However, I feel that if this committee is to do the job which we hope it will do it will have to get information which perhaps has not been published hitherto. I have never been impressed with the necessity for setting up such a committee without its having reference to other branches of the government.

As the minister said, in 1945 the bomb was burst over Hiroshima. We had found the secret of atomic fission, we had split the atom, and once we had done that we had to find ways and means whereby we could unite the world. We failed to do so, and we shall probably fail again in the predictable future. That being so and without falling into that error of which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has spoken, of being the victim of a campaign of fear, I say that we are faced now as we were faced then with the simple elementary choice of life or death. The fact is that I am afraid for my family and I am afraid for my neighbours' families. I am afraid for that woman in Japan who some fifty years from now may give birth to some sort of distorted monster when she hoped to give birth to a normal child because her ancestors had been subjected to atomic radiation in Hiroshima. There is great reason for fear in the world today.

There is another reason why I was somewhat disappointed with the minister's statement. He has the habit of taking the most important facts and treating them with insouciance, a habit which I find to be on occasion delightful; but I do not think today was the time for him to play the part of Pollyanna. I think it would have been more appropriate if he had taken the role of Cassandra.

I think I am correct when I say that the danger from the use of atomic energy is greater than it was some years ago. I agree with my leader when he says that we should not concentrate on the atomic bomb. Nevertheless that aspect of atomic energy must get more consideration today rather than its relation to medicine or industry, useful as they may be. Consideration must be given to the military aspects of this matter whether we like it or not.

No sane person treated the explosion of the first bomb with enthusiam. There was nothing but the utmost gravity. Indeed, Dr. Urey, on behalf of some of his fellow-scientists, approached the President of the United States a month before the bomb was exploded and suggested that further atomic development be postponed. I do not know the reason for that request, but I think perhaps it was that he felt the world was morally incapable of handling such a source for good or for evil. But for reasons that we do not know the high command decided to go ahead and use the bomb.

One or two months later, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), there was a meeting of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States. They issued a declaration on atomic energy, and I should like to quote one portion of that as follows:

> Faced with the terrible realities of the application of science to destruction, every nation will realize more urgently than before the overwhelming need to maintain the rule of law among nations and to banish the scourge of war from the earth.

Those hopes have not been realized. There is no rule of law among the nations. The scourge of war is still an ever-present fear among the people. The fact is that in the world today national security is an obsolete idea. We have to recast our minds accordingly. What then is going to be the role of the committee? Will the committee approach this problem of atomic energy in the light of the policy which we have pursued in external affairs?

Theoretically there are several avenues which may be open to us, but there is only one which I think is practical. It was hoped in 1945 that we could have one world, but owing to the intransigence of Russia that hope largely disappeared. Russia alone cannot be blamed for its disappearance. One world was possible if we followed logic and reason. But human instincts are stronger and they have made it impossible to have one world.

Humanity has exercised its inalienable right, the right to be stupid. We have exercised that right to the uttermost. If we continue to exercise that right we are going to have to pay a penalty greater than the most pessimistic of us ever believed would be imposed. Had it been possible to have some degree of international control, the atomic bomb and whatever secrets there are associated with it would have been in the hands of a central authority under the aegis of the United Nations. But if that control was to be successful, supervision would have to be exercised over the activities of other nations, and that supervision is not possible, again in large measure due to Russia.

In any event I am not sure that I am in complete agreement with the theory of an international police force because such a force might lull the innocent into a sense of false security. Then we have had the concept of a balance of power. This has been present in the world since the days of Athens and Sparta. It prevailed up until the days of the last war, but it has never worked. The results of such a policy, war, have been inevitable. What policy then are we going to pursue?

I think there is only one we can follow, and it is certainly not based on the concept of one world or the maintenance of international law and order. We must accept the situation as it is and be determined to try to maintain our security; we must accept the fact that there are two worlds, those who are with us and those who are not.

Our security will depend upon our having such a preponderance of force that any potential aggressor will think twice, indeed three times, before he does anything. We can only keep that preponderance of force, we can only exercise authority in the world when we retain the confidence of the smaller nations, when they are clear in their minds that atomic energy will not be used as an instrument for the furtherance of national policies.

Atomic energy has to be considered in the light of these matters. Already we have created a nucleus in those nations which are signatories of the North Atlantic treaty. I think the time has come when we must definitely make up our minds that national sovereignty is one of the great evils in this world and that, while the time is not ripe to surrender it fully, nevertheless for our own defence we should approach these nations which are already allied to us and say that we are willing to surrender that part of our national sovereignty dealing with national defence, asking them to do the same for the good for all. Perhaps the greatest question mark in that regard would be the United States. Mark you, I am asking for only a limited surrender of national sovereignty. I would be willing to go further, but I do not think that would be practical at the present time, so I suggest only that we surrender that part of our sovereignty dealing with defence.

In the Soviet union there is what we call the iron curtain, which we rightly condemn. There we have a situation in which scientists, physicians, authors and artists are compelled to hew to the Marxist-Leninist line, or they are on the outside. That may give us certain advantages, because if science is to produce any results at all it has to be free and unfettered, and obviously that is not the case in the Soviet union. There may be one exception to that however. I suspect that those scientists working on atomic energy have been completely and utterly free from any party-line doctrine.

In the United States, however, we have the situation to which the leader of my group referred. There they do not have an iron curtain, it is true, but they are conducting a witch-hunt, creating an embryonic curtain of fear behind which men prominent in science will no longer contribute their science and skill for the benefit of the nation as a whole. Instead they are going into other fields of endeavour, and as a result the nation is the loser. There we have the situation where an accuser may say, "I do not like your views; therefore you are a communist," and that word having been attached to an individual, his future becomes rather uncomfortable. There is a situation which, thank heaven, does not exist in our country. I believe we have been remarkably free from that type of hysteria, and I think it is something of which the people of the United States will rid themselves in good time.

How will this committee consider atomic energy and its implications in regard to our defence? For instance, what kind of army, navy and air force do we need in the light of atomic discoveries? What sort of army, air force and navy do we have as the situation exists today? Is it possible for this committee to work adequately without considering this other branch of government? What should be the place of private enterprise in this new technology? What is the status of research in industry? How is it being helped by the government, as it may have to be since that type of research can be so expensive? More important, what reservoir of trained scientists do we have or are we producing in Canada? What is being done to aid pure research, which is so vitally important, in our universities and laboratories? What endowments have been granted by the national government to ensure that research work goes on through the years? What is being done in connection with medicine? Above all we have to consider in terms of immediacy this whole problem of atomic energy and the evil uses to which it may be put. I sincerely hope this will not be a partisan committee; and there is no necessity for that. In the past, quite rightly, the government has invited members of the opposition to accompany the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, as observers. The government still takes the final responsibility for policy; nevertheless I think those delegations may have received some benefit from the advice tendered by the members of other parties. That was a good idea. That practice has been halted for the time being, but I hope it will be renewed later on. I believe the same should be true in connection with national defence. If we are to have a committee that will be adequate, any question concerning national defence should be outside the purview of party politics. That is a matter which affects every person in this country, and I believe that ultimately this committee will have to be broadened to deal with the whole question of national defence and perhaps also our external policy. That, of course, will make it a vastly different committee from that now envisaged, and obviously a most important one.

We are living, I think, on borrowed time. I may appear to be unduly pessimistic; but when a man of the stature of Harold Urey can reiterate after four years that he is even more afraid, I see no reason why I cannot admit my fears, too, without being accused of pessimism. The threat is there; and if we are to meet it we may have to travel new, uncharted roads. We may have to be a little more original than we have shown ourselves in the past, because always we have been content that other nations should lead and we should follow behind. Our future is at stake; the welfare of Canada is at stake; and I see no reason why we cannot give that sort of leadership, in dealing with these matters of national sovereignty, which I have already suggested. Otherwise I am convinced that we can say with Macbeth:

> And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
> The way to dusty death.

Motion (Mr. Howe) agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway company to issue securities not exceeding $19,766,890 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1949; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $19,766,890 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time before the first day of April, 1950, the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

GOLD MINING

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING EMERGENCY PAYMENTS TO OPERATORS—PRODUCTION OF GOLD IN CONCENTRATES

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in respect to the manner of calculating the amount of assistance that may be paid operators of gold mines, as prescribed by the act; also to empower the governor in council to prescribe by regulation, in the case of a mine producing gold in concentrates during one period and not producing bullion from such concentrates until a later period, the time when the gold shall be deemed to have been produced and the manner in which the cost of production thereof shall apply.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the purchase by the government of Canada of the Temiscouata railway and that the Minister of Finance may, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, pay any amounts, not exceeding in the aggregate four hundred and eighty thousand dollars, that are payable under the terms of an agreement dated the 14th day of October, 1949, between His Majesty the King in the right of Canada and the Temiscouata Railway Company at such times and in such manner as are set out in the agreement.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR SUBSIDY TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM QUESNEL TO PRINCE GEORGE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to grant to the province of British Columbia a subsidy of fifteen thousand dollars per mile, but not exceeding eighty-two and seven-tenths miles, towards the construction of a line of railway from Quesnel to Prince George in the province of British Columbia.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on Friday I announced that at some stage today we would move to go into supply to call one item, that of the Department of External Affairs. As all hon. members are aware, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is spending most of his time at the United Nations meetings. Arrangements are being made for him to be here one day in order that we may have a general discussion on the first item of his estimates. Perhaps we shall be successful in having this Friday set aside for that purpose.

Mr. Green: Next Friday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Friday next; although it is not definite, we hope to succeed in our attempt.

INCOME TAX—DEDUCTION OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the desire expressed by the Minister of Public Works to go into supply at least some time today so that one item of the Department of External Affairs can be called. Before Your Honour leaves the chair, however, there is a grievance concerning which I should like to speak, in the hope that I can bring the matter to the attention of the government with sufficient force that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will do something about it.

Early in this session I directed a question to the government concerning the matter of trades union dues, with particular reference to the question of their deductibility for income tax purposes. The reason for my question was that this matter was the subject of a decision by Mr. Justice Angers of the exchequer court on June 8 of this year, following which certain announcements were made by the officials of the income tax department which I felt were discriminatory against trade unionists. On September 27, my question to the government was answered by two ministers, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I indicated at the time that the orders of the day did not permit the remarks or further questions that I might like to make in reply to their answers, and I said I would raise the matter at a later date. It is for that reason I am rising now.

As hon. members are aware, there was a period of time, particularly during the years 1945, 1946, 1947, when lawyers, doctors and teachers were permitted to deduct their professional fees from their income before computing their income tax. This right was accorded to those people under the provisions of section 6 (1) (a) of the Income War Tax Act. That section reads as follows:

> 6. (1) In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of (a) disbursements or expenses not wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income;

The section is put in the form of a double negative, but turning it into the positive it means that if anyone can show that certain expenses were wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income, they can be deducted. Since it was possible for doctors, lawyers, and teachers to claim that their professional fees were necessarily laid out in order to pursue their profession, they were allowed to deduct those fees.

During those same years trade unionists felt that the same right should be accorded to taxpayers who pay trade union dues. This position was taken particularly by trade unionists in closed shops or in what has, in the meantime, come to be known as the Rand formula type of shop. Despite the fact that trade unionists contended that their case was comparable with the case of doctors, lawyers and teachers, the income tax department refused to allow the claim of trade unionists in those years. One particular trade unionist, Mr. Cooper by name, of the city of Winnipeg, a moving picture projectionist, made his claim upon the income tax department for the deductibility of his trade union dues for the taxation year 1945. Having been turned down, he went through the procedures prescribed in the act.

When after Mr. Cooper had done his best but the income tax department stood firm and refused to grant him the right to deduct the fees he had paid in 1945, he took the case to the Exchequer Court of Canada. The documents in the case were actually given to the exchequer court by the income tax department on February 3, 1948, and on April 23, 1948, Mr. Cooper filed his statement of claim. The case was heard on September 7, 1948, and judgment was rendered on June 8, 1949. When that judgment was given by Mr. Justice Angers, it was in favour of Mr. Cooper. He was given the right to make the deduction that he had sought, and was also awarded the costs of the action in full.

The result of that decision by the exchequer court establishes clearly that during the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 trade unionists had, legally, the right to deduct their fees for income tax purposes. But, although the decision of the court established, retroactively, that trade unionists really had that right back in 1945, 1946 and 1947, they were in fact denied the exercise of that right during those years because the income tax department interpreted the Income War Tax Act the other way.

Mr. Graydon: They had it; then the government took it away from them.

Mr. Knowles: That is precisely what happened.

Mr. Graydon: Why did they do that?

Mr. MacInnis: You had better ask the government.

Mr. Knowles: That is for the government to answer. The act made it clear that people who laid out moneys wholly and necessarily for the purpose of earning an income could deduct those expenses from their taxable income before computing their income tax. The income tax department ruled that in the case of doctors, lawyers and teachers, that provision included the right to deduct their professional fees.

Mr. Abbott: Not if they were on salary.

Mr. Knowles: I beg the minister's pardon.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Knowles: In 1945, 1946 and 1947 they were permitted to do so. If necessary, I can quote some of the minister's words back at him. The minister knows that the matter was brought to a head by the Bond and Rutherford cases where lawyers contended that they had the right to make that deduction even if they were on salaries.

Mr. Abbott: And that was upheld by the court.

Mr. Knowles: And that was upheld by the court. So that is the way the matter stood during the years 1945, 1946 and 1947.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure I am right when I say that the income tax department interpreted the law as not permitting the deduction of professional dues such as lawyers' fees to the bar society or union dues by men who were on salary. In the Bond and Rutherford cases the courts held that the legislation was broad enough to permit such a deduction. The law has been amended to bring into effect what was for years considered to be the law and what has been the law in England for years.

Mr. Graydon: It is very technical, is it not?

Mr. Abbott: It is very technical, but the law is that such deduction should not be allowed. Salary and wages have always been net income.

Mr. Graydon: I do not think the government is right—

Mr. Knowles: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the floor.

Mr. Abbott: I just wanted to correct a statement of fact.

Mr. Knowles: I am still not satisfied with the statement the minister made because, as a matter of fact, in an answer he gave to me on September 27 this year, he referred to the fact that the decision of the exchequer court in the Bond and Rutherford cases was one of the reasons why, in 1948, the government amended the act to bring it in line with what they had wanted all along.

Mr. Abbott: With what it had been doing all along.

Mr. Knowles: I can tell him that during those years lawyers were applying for this exemption—although some of them did not know about it until I raised the matter here in the house—and were getting it; and teachers were also applying for it and getting it. Teachers were getting their federation fees allowed as a deduction before and during the year 1947, and there are teachers in this house who can testify to that fact. I also have on my desk a bulletin of the Saskatchewan teachers' federation for the year 1948 or 1949, I forget which it was, reminding teachers that they still had that right; but the teachers' federation later on was informed that that decision had been changed.

What I am saying is that for the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 certain people did get an allowance for their professional fees, and those people included at least some of the members of the groups that I have named. During that period of time the desire of trade unionists to have the same right accorded to them was expressed in a number of ways, notably by the claim of Mr. Cooper made first on the income tax department and then by way of appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada. It is a strange coincidence that Mr. Cooper filed his statement of claim on April 23, 1948, and on May 18, 1948, a resolution was introduced in this house to change the Income War Tax Act for the year 1948 with respect to that matter, so as to bring into effect the principle that the minister enunciated a moment ago, by way of an interruption.

I recognize the difference between the principle as it obtained in the wording of the act up until the end of 1947 and the principle that the government has had written into the act since then. Whatever the intention of the government may have been in the wording of the act up to the end of 1947, the principle was fairly clear, namely, that expenses necessarily involved in the earning of income were deductible. The principle that has been written into the act effective as from January 1, 1948, is that expenses are deductible only if they are expenses incurred by people whose income is gross, from which other deductions are made. The corollary of that new principle is that if your income is in the form of salary or wages it is regarded as net and no deductions of this kind are now being allowed.

It is true that the minister achieved that purpose by the amending bill that was put through this house in 1948. That bill has in it a section, 3 (1), which amended section 6 of the old act by adding a new subsection, which reads as follows:

> (6) In computing the income from an office or employment, no amount is deductible for a disbursement or expense laid out for the purpose of earning the income; Provided that, where a taxpayer is an employee of a person whose principal business is the transportation of goods, passengers, or goods and passengers, and the duties of the employment require him regularly,
> (a) To travel, away from the municipality where the employer's establishment to which he reports for work is located and away from the metropolitan area, if there is one, where it is located, on vehicles used by the employer to transport the goods or passengers, and

(b) While so away from such municipality and metropolitan area, to make disbursements for meals or lodging, amounts so disbursed by him in the taxation year to the extent that he has not been reimbursed and is not entitled to be reimbursed in respect thereof may be deducted in computing his income from the employment.

The effect of that section was to provide certain exceptions to the newly-written-in principle, but at the same time it did establish the principle that salaries and wages were in most cases to be regarded as net. That principle has been carried forward into the new Income Tax Act which has been in effect since January 1 this year, and the section laying down that principle is now 12 (1) (a) which reads:

12. (1) In computing income, no deduction shall be made in respect of

(a) an outlay or expense except to the extent that it was made or incurred by the taxpayer for the purpose of gaining or producing income from property or a business of the taxpayer.

I point out that under the old Income War Tax Act the old section 6 (1) (a) talked about income, and expenses involved in earning an income; and it was under that particular definition of income that Mr. Justice Angers felt that trade unionists ought to be treated in the same way as doctors, lawyers and teachers. But in the new act, section 12 (1) (a) talks not about income in the broad sense but about gaining or producing income from property or a business of the taxpayer. It seems that under that section and under certain other prohibitions, the situation has now been made clear in the act; or at least it is clear that the government wanted it that way and feels that it now has a wording that says you may not get this deduction unless you are a lawyer working for fees or a doctor working for fees, in which case if you have a gross income from which other items are deducted as expenses, then you can deduct your professional dues. In other words, a line is now drawn through the doctors and through the lawyers. Some of them are permitted to deduct their fees to the medical society or the law society and others are not. There may be the odd case of the trade unionist who is the owner of a plant at which other trade unionists work, in which case he might be permitted to deduct his trade union fees whereas his brother trade unionists who work for him would not have that right. What I am trying to suggest in this is that the line is unfairly drawn when you try to draw it between gross income from fees and net income from wages or salaries. Surely, the lawyer who is employed by a firm has to pay out the cost of his law society fees just as much as the lawyer who is working on individual cases. Surely the same thing holds for doctors. The doctor who is employed in a hospital or by a firm and is on salary has to pay his fees to the medical society in order to carry on that work. Surely he should have the right to a deduction just as much as the doctor who works for gross fees from patients. Similarly, it seems to me, the fair thing to do would be to admit that in the case of teachers who are members of a teachers' federation and have to be—in some provinces there is a law which requires them to be members of the federation—the fees that they pay to that federation should be accepted as an expense in connection with that business.

Mr. Graydon: Don't forget the farmers.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, if they are required to belong to an association of a similar nature they should be in the same class. The point is that the same principle should be applied with equal fairness to all.

Mr. Abbott: There are not many farmers on salary.

Mr. Knowles: My point is that in principle the trade unionists have a very strong case.

The minister may say that I am jumping to conclusions, or that I am drawing an unwarranted inference, but it does seem strange to trade unionists that just at the time that their claim was being pressed, even taken by Mr. Cooper to the Exchequer Court of Canada, the law was changed. Prior to that time it was possible for others to have it. Attention was drawn to this fact by previous exchequer court decisions, as in the cases of Bond and Rutherford. Then on April 23, 1948, a statement of claim was filed in the Exchequer Court of Canada by Mr. Cooper, and lo, within a month, on May 18, the minister introduced in this house a resolution to take away that particular right to deduct these professional fees from doctors and lawyers on salary, and from teachers in almost all cases—a right which trade unionists were in the meantime trying to get for themselves as well.

I feel that the time has come for the government to reconsider this whole position and introduce the necessary legislation to give that right to all of these people who have to pay out a fee of the various kinds that I have named in order to carry on their profession or their work, and that that fee should be allowed as an income tax deduction. The amount of money involved is not great. The Cooper case to which I referred involved a tax amount of $35 when it was all through. Mr. Cooper spent a great deal more than that as costs of the case, but the government was ordered to reimburse him to that extent. In most cases the amount of money involved is not great. It is one of those little things where a principle is at stake.

I can tell the minister that there is support for this proposal not only among trade unionists. There was an exchange here a moment ago with reference to farmers. May I tell the minister and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that I have before me a couple of editorials from the Western Producer, a farm paper, in which they came to the support of the position of trade unionists as well on the basis of simple ordinary justice.

Earlier this afternoon the minister and I had some disagreement but we reached a certain amount of agreement in that we both know that the principle which the government now seeks to pursue is that if your income is gross in the form of fees out of which you have to pay rent and other expenses then you can include as one of your deductible expenses your professional fees; but if your income is a salary or wage, then it is net, and you are not permitted to deduct either your dues to the law society, or dues to the medical society or to the teachers' federation or to a trade union.

I point out to the minister that that supposedly ironclad principle that salary and wages are net is upset immediately. The very clause I was quoting a moment ago which laid down this principle includes in it two of the exceptions. One of the exceptions is the case of people who are engaged as employees of transportation companies and have to be away from home. Their board and lodging away from home, if it is paid out of their net salary, can be deducted for income tax purposes. I agree, in fact I fought for that right. Another exception is that of a salesman whose business it is to sell negotiable contracts. Another exemption is that of a clergyman maintaining a manse or residence in which he has to hire a housekeeper. Another exception, if I dare mention it, has to do with ourselves. A certain portion of the net income that we receive for being members of parliament is treated as covering expenses which we have to incur in connection with our spending so much time at Ottawa, in order to earn the rest of it; therefore it is not taxable. The same applies to the provincial legislatures.

Mr. Abbott: For some others. It does not apply to members of the government.

Mr. Knowles: I do not see the minister offering to trade positions with any of the other members of his party because of that difference.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member might be surprised.

Mr. Knowles: The same situation applies in the provinces if the legislatures wish to make it that way. In other words, the point I am making is that the government lays down this principle which is supposedly ironclad, which provides that salaries and wages are net, and that there can be no deductions from them of that kind, and then we immediately make these various exceptions in the act, with most of which I thoroughly agree. Since we have gone so far as to admit that there are these many cases where an expense is necessarily laid out for the purpose of earning a taxpayer's income, I contend that we should do the same thing for trade unionists, along with doctors, lawyers and teachers who were getting it until the trade unionists also tried to get it.

The other day I picked up a little squib in the Ottawa Journal, which is dated September 30, commenting on the answer the government gave to my question on an earlier date in these terms:

> Decision of the government that labour union dues are not deductible for income tax purposes is understandable: otherwise it might be accused of granting special privilege to one class of Canadian citizen.

I thought that that was about the high point of misunderstanding of a request being made on the floor of this parliament. No one is asking for special legislation for one group, namely, trade unionists. We are simply asking that they should have the same consideration that other groups of people have had on identically the same principle, namely, that it is an expense necessarily and wholly laid out for the purpose of earning their income.

I think that states the case. I could argue further about the wording of the act as it was before, and as it is now. I am not satisfied that a case could not be made out under the present wording. It would hinge on the question how to define the word "business". Is it not your business when you are employed as a worker? Is not a printer's work his business, just as a lawyer's work is his business? Though one might try to argue that, the government has certainly made it clear that what they have been trying to do is to overtake the law as they previously wrote it, in view of the decisions made by the exchequer court. Mr. Justice Angers of the exchequer court made it clear in his decision that the law provided that doctors, lawyers, teachers and trade unionists should have that right, and step by step that right has been taken away from most of these people, but it has not been taken away from certain others. I know how careful one has to be when mentioning our own position in the House of Commons; but it does seem to me that since the principle has been recognized, and we all agree with it, that a portion of our income is necessarily laid out in connection with our work and should not be subject to tax, we should fight all the harder for others to have exactly that same right, that same guarantee. And so, Mr. Speaker, to bring this matter to a head—because I feel it is important, and because I believe it is one to which this house should ask the government to give consideration—I wish to move an amendment to the motion now before you, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to make it possible for taxpayers to deduct trade union dues from income before computing the amount of income tax to be paid."

Mr. Speaker: Before the question is put, I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, I know, is always most anxious that not only his motions but any discussions he has in hand should be in order, has read citation 467, Beauchesne, third edition, where, about a third of the way through the paragraph, it states—

When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance, and it is not necessary to move an amendment for that purpose; provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates—

And this is the pertinent part to which I would direct the hon. member's attention—

—nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means.

Does not this discussion relate to a resolution about to be proposed to the committee of ways and means?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, if I may have a word on that, I was going to say—

Mr. Knowles: Is this on the point of order?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I was going to speak in answer to the hon. member respecting what I might describe as the merits of his presentation, and point out that there is, of course, the fullest opportunity to discuss the question he has raised when we are in committee on the resolutions which I tabled with my motion to go into committee of ways and means and, secondly, when the bill based on the resolutions is introduced for discussion in the house.

This is not a new question. It has been up time and again before the committee. It has been argued before me and before my predecessor, Mr. Ilsley. We have heard arguments both for and against wages and salaries being considered as net income, as against gross income. There is nothing new in it. The only thing that is new is that a judge of the exchequer court held that an interpretation which had been placed on the Income War Tax Act was not a correct one, and that one was entitled to deduct union dues, among other things, from salaries. The law was amended to bring into effect what had always been considered the law.

I was going to suggest however that there are other proceedings before the house on which this could be discussed appropriately. I am sure my hon. friend was entitled to bring forward his grievance respecting a certain section of the community, but I doubt whether his amendment, in the form in which it appears, is in order, for the reasons Mr. Speaker has indicated.

Mr. Knowles: If I might rise to the point of order, beginning at the point where the Minister of Finance left off, I would point out that if it is not in order to move the amendment it would not be in order to make the speech.

Mr. Abbott: Oh yes.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently the Minister of Finance thought I was entitled to make the speech, but not entitled to move the amendment.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): He did not say that.

Mr. Knowles: Well, if it is not precisely what he said, it is certainly the spirit of what he said. I would point out that citation 467 does not stand in the way of my amendment because of the part which says that an amendment must not relate to any decision of the house during the current session because, as has been pointed out, the decision—so far as the house is concerned—was made by an amendment to the Income War Tax Act in a previous session.

Then, as to the question Your Honour has asked, may I say that the very point about which I am complaining is that there is no resolution included in the ways and means resolutions presented by the Minister of Finance which deals with the matter I have raised. That is exactly my grievance—namely that despite the requests I made to this effect last year, and despite my questions earlier in this session, and the fact that there has been an exchequer court decision, and despite editorials in newspapers and general interest, it has not been proposed at all.

The citation at which Your Honour is looking with a quizzical eye contains this expression—

Nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means.

As I have already said, that is exactly my grievance—that there is no such resolution to be proposed by the minister, or anything like it.

While I am on my feet, speaking to this point of order, may I direct Your Honour's attention to two rulings recorded in the very book in Your Honour's hand. One of these is found at page 699, a ruling given on May 9, 1916, by Mr. Speaker Sevigny, the headnote of which states—

Any member of the house may bring before it, on the motion to go into supply, any matter which, in his opinion, may be detrimental or advantageous to any section of the population.

The other ruling to which I have referred is a lengthy one of May 10, 1929, by Mr. Speaker Lemieux. It is recorded at page 797 of the same book, and its theme is the same as the one to which I have just referred, namely, that wide latitude is the rule, when it comes to the expression of members' grievances on going into supply. The part of this decision by Mr. Speaker Lemieux to which I direct Your Honour's attention particularly is found in the last paragraph on page 799 where it states—

I have come to the conclusion that the expression of any reasonable grievance on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair is a sufficient reply to bring a member's speech under the provision of standing order 37. I cannot conceive a case where he could then be irrelevant. It is not necessary that his observations should deal with the subject matter of the resolutions to be considered in committee. The member objects to anything being considered at all until he has had a hearing.

I am contending that Speakers in the past have taken the position that when there was any doubt, the benefit of wide latitude should be given to members raising any reasonable grievance, provided always that they did not contravene any other rule.

I would submit on the point about which Your Honour has asked the question—and I have noted that you did not rule upon it—namely the reference to a resolution going into committee of ways and means dealing with the same subject, that that is precisely the reason for my raising it at this time. I have done so because there is no proposal such as mine in the resolutions put before the House of Commons by the minister at this time.

So far as the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair to go into committee of ways and means is concerned, which involves another debate, namely the debate on the budget, there is already an amendment and a subamendment, and no further amendment or subamendment would be permitted.

Therefore I am left with no way to bring forward an amendment of this kind other than by doing it on a motion to go into supply either today or some other day. I am confident that the amendment which I have moved is fully in order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word or two in order to emphasize more definitely the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he first spoke, that if the amendment is not in order the discussion is not in order. I should like to quote citation 488 of Beauchesne, second edition, as follows:

When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance, and it is not necessary to move an amendment for that purpose; provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved,—

The discussion and the amendment are on exactly the same footing and, if the amendment is not in order, the discussion is not in order. That is really the only logical conclusion anyone could draw. If a thing is not in order when the amendment is moved, it surely could not have been in order before the amendment was moved. The citation continues:

—shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session,—

There has been no decision of the house during the current session.

—nor to any item of the estimates,—

I do not think there is an item in the estimates under which this matter can be discussed.

—nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

I do not think any of those points interfere with the present discussion and the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Does not the hon. member think that the discussion and the amendment relates to a resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means? I say now that I agree fully that, if the amendment is out of order, the discussion also is out of order. I do not think there is any doubt of that. I am rather of the opinion that both the discussion and the amendment relate to a resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. MacInnis: Will you please state what resolution you refer to, Mr. Speaker? A series of resolutions have been placed before the committee by the Minister of Finance, but there is no resolution dealing with trade union dues.

Mr. Abbott: May I say just a word on that. There are two resolutions to be placed before the committee of ways and means. One is that the Excise Tax Act be amended in certain particulars and the other is that the Income Tax Act be amended in certain particulars. The income tax resolution sets out a number of ways in which the Income Tax Act is to be amended, but all the amendments do not necessarily have to be preceded by a resolution. It is perfectly true that the resolution having to do with the Income Tax Act does not propose that that act be amended by permitting the deduction of expenses from salaries and wages for income tax purposes, but the particular section which is referred to is being amended in other particulars. There will be the fullest opportunity when the income tax resolution is before the committee to discuss this matter.

Mr. MacInnis: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is debarred now from moving his amendment because of the resolution referring to the Income Tax Act, will he be in position to move that same amendment when that resolution is before the committee?

Mr. Knight: I should like to speak on this amendment.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I must decide whether or not the amendment is in order. If it is not in order, then any discussion will be out of order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only way in which an hon. member could move to have expenditures increased—the object of this amendment would be a decrease in revenue to the Department of National Revenue—would be by a private member's resolution. There is actually one on the order paper moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) in which he asks that consideration should be given to the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to permit certain deductions to be made. The amendment moved by the hon. member reads:

> This house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to make it possible for taxpayers to deduct trade union dues from income before computing the amount of income tax to be paid.

The motion standing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act.

I do not see how a private member, even at this stage, can move to change a budget resolution which is actually before the house except by means of a private member's resolution.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Seeing that I have not succeeded in having the house go into committee of supply, I think at eight o'clock we had better revert to the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters).

Motion (Mr. MacInnis) agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR JOINT OPERATION OF HOUSING PROJECTS AND LOANS TO HOME OWNERS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and in particular to provide that the assembly of land for residential purposes and the construction of housing projects for sale and for rent under arrangements by which the capital costs and the costs of operation of such projects will be shared seventy-five per cent by the federal government and twenty-five per cent by the provincial governments be undertaken jointly with the said governments; and further to authorize the making of loans to prospective home owners in addition to basic joint loans under the act in amounts not exceeding one-sixth of such basic loans; to authorize an increase in the loans that may be guaranteed for home improvement and home extension purposes under the act, and to increase the aggregate amount presently authorized for loans and losses under part I of the act, the funds for the said purposes to be provided out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister not going to make his statement now?

Mr. Winters: I have a short statement I intended to make, but I had rather expected the house might prefer me to make it in committee, so hon. members could ask questions. However, I am in the hands of the house as to when I should make the statement.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister is not going to speak—

Mr. Winters: Very well; I shall make my statement now.

The resolution deals with the proposals for dominion-provincial housing arrangements. It also makes provision for a change in the National Housing Act whereby loans will be made to home owners who have constructed or purchased houses at a price which is considered to be fair and reasonable. On September 21 I made a statement on these two matters, and I doubt if there is much I can add which will be helpful to hon. members at this resolution stage. I propose to make a more detailed statement at the time of second reading after hon. members have had the opportunity of reading the bill.

We are establishing a pattern for long-term housing development by making provision for joint participation by the dominion and the provinces, together with such participation by the municipalities as the provinces deem desirable. The legislation which we intend to introduce is of an enabling character. It does not commit the provinces. It will enable this government to enter into arrangements with respect to housing projects with any province which considers that joint participation between the two governments is desirable to develop housing within that province. We have no knowledge of the extent to which provincial governments will participate in arrangements contemplated by the legislation, and it may well be that certain provinces will feel that the type of assistance proposed is neither necessary nor desirable for that province. Conversations have taken place with each province in order to determine a general pattern of arrangement which may be suitable. No commitment was sought from the provinces at the time of the conversations. We believe that the province is the best judge of whether the type of arrangement now proposed is desirable. We have already had indication from some provinces that the contemplated arrangement is a suitable basis for joint co-operation. There is no room for the suggestion that the proposed enabling legislation is binding upon the provinces unless they wish to take advantage of it with respect to specific projects.

I would like to emphasize that although financial participation by the municipalities may not be necessary, nevertheless full co-operation of the municipalities will be sought. Hon. members can be certain that neither the dominion nor the provinces can proceed very far without advice and co-operation of the municipalities. The arrangements provide that if any proposed project is deemed to be reasonable, the dominion will be prepared to proceed with the provinces in land assembly, the building of houses for sale, and the erection of rental housing either on an economic or a subsidized basis. I would point out that the dominion will be dealing with the ten provinces, or as many of them as find the arrangement acceptable, and they in turn will be dealing with the municipalities. It is likely that in the actual development of projects the three levels of government will work closely together. However, the federal government is not prepared to consider proposals from municipalities unless there is clear indication that the provinces concerned find such proposals acceptable.

Dealing now with the proposed amendments to the home ownership provisions of the National Housing Act, the changes we are suggesting would have the effect of making it easier for prospective home owners to acquire homes, because they will result in reducing the down payments to approximately half the present amounts. Because it is desired to avoid a stoppage in the number of new starts, and because anticipation of legislation of this kind has had that effect to some extent in August and in September, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with the approval of the government, is indicating to builders and home owners terms and conditions and amounts of loan which will be available if these amendments are passed. I am sure that hon. members will agree that this technique is a desirable step because it would be unwise to create a condition which would interrupt the usual flow of fall starts. Tentative approvals for N.H.A. loans are being given, and this is one important reason why I am anxious to make rapid progress with the legislation.

The other matter dealt with in the resolution relates to part IV of the National Housing Act dealing with home improvement and home extension loans. Hon. members will remember that the home improvement section of the act has not yet been proclaimed. Even yet suppliers of building materials, particularly those in the plumbing and heating field, are having difficulty in maintaining a flow of new materials sufficient to look after the needs of new construction. The government feels that encouragement of the use of these materials for home improvement should not be given at this time by proclamation of that part of the National Housing Act. However, we do feel that if and when conditions change, the government should be in a position to arrange for the immediate proclamation of the home improvement section of the National Housing Act. The resolution makes provision for higher maximum loan to be available to individuals who wish to improve their homes. That section of the act which was passed in 1944 provides that the maximum loan for the improvement of a home is $2,000, and for each other unit in the same building an additional loan not in excess of $1,000. Since 1944 there has been an increase in the costs of construction. Therefore, we propose that these limits should be increased to $2,500 and $1,250 respectively. A corresponding increase of 25 per cent is proposed for the appropriation section of Part IV. A similar adjustment is being proposed for the maximum amount of loans under the home extension section of the National Housing Act which has been proclaimed and is in operation.

The bill will contain other changes to the National Housing Act, but the three matters which I have discussed are the major amendments which are proposed.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will welcome this opportunity afforded by the government resolution to discuss what is still, by long odds, Canada's No. 1 internal problem, the housing crisis. The members listened with interest to the statement which the minister has just made. They will recall that when the minister made a similar statement in the house on September 21 he said he hoped to put the resolution before the house relatively soon. That was on September 21, at the opening of this session, Mr. Speaker, and on October 31 this first opportunity of debating the resolution is given to the members.

This evening the minister said he was anxious to make rapid progress with the legislation. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the house not only shares his anxiety, but probably anticipated any desire on his part, or on the part of the government, to make rapid progress with whatever proposal the government has for solving this still serious national crisis which confronts us. If the minister is looking for rapid progress, I am sure the house will exercise every endeavour to assist to that end, when it is satisfied that this measure promises some assistance in meeting the problem. The house would have been glad to see some earlier evidence of anxiety on the part of the government to make that rapid progress for which the minister now hopes.

Some days ago I asked the Prime Minister when we might expect the introduction of the resolution. I do not recall the exact date, but I think it was about three weeks ago. In his answer, the Prime Minister gave as the reason for the delay in introducing the measure the fact that some correspondence was pending with the provinces. He said the government hoped to receive further answers from the provincial governments. The minister's statement failed to make any reference to correspondence with the provincial governments, and indicated that no commitment is sought from those governments by the federal government. I am going to ask the minister if, in the course of discussing this resolution, he will table the correspondence with the provincial governments, because it seems to me that that correspondence, in view of the reference made to it by the Prime Minister, should be before the house in its approach to the resolution and to the bill that will follow.

In common with the minister, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to attempt to anticipate the provisions of the bill. I propose to reserve my observations thereon until I have seen the bill.

I think it is fair to say that the minister's statement tonight was a rather cautious statement. It did not seem to promise the new heaven and the new earth that characterized so many of the glowing promises in regard to housing with which the government deluged the country during the last election campaign. It may be that, when the bill appears in the house, it will be an improvement on the brief preview to which the minister has treated us tonight. If it is going to make even a fractional attempt to fulfil those government election promises, it will have to be very much bigger and more far-reaching than the minister's statement indicated.

Hon. members will have their own ideas about the particular promises made by the government in the election campaign which really influenced the result. My own experience in that election campaign satisfied me that people wanted housing and health insurance. The people were greatly concerned about housing conditions. I may say, too, Mr. Speaker, with some confidence, that so far as the housing issue is concerned this government certainly was not re-elected on its past performance. It may have been elected on its promises, but it certainly was not elected on its past performance.

An hon. Member: It was elected on its record.

Mr. Fleming: We of His Majesty's opposition have taken careful note of those glowing and unrestrained promises made by the government during the election campaign. So far as our voices can be effectively heard in this chamber, we intend to hold the government to its promises. We will place the responsibility for curing the housing crisis in this country squarely upon the shoulders of the government because that is where it belongs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, we intend to hold them responsible for curing those ills.

Mr. Whitman: Do not worry.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, we will have an opportunity of measuring the progress, if any, that this government makes on this problem in the coming months and years.

When we look back on these post-war years from 1945 to 1949 inclusive, we can say that so far as housing is concerned they will go down as the wasted years—

Mr. Whitman: No.

Mr. Fleming: —the years of opportunity that were wasted because the government of the day had neither the courage nor the discernment to tackle this problem and ascertain what was involved in it or to measure up faithfully to the promises it made to the people. Now let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that the wasted years have run their course and that we are now approaching a time when the government is going to appreciate the seriousness of the problem and will attempt to find a solution for this housing crisis. If so, it will be the first time that we shall have seen adequate action to meet the problem.

This problem did not burst upon the country suddenly. The development of it throughout the country was there for anyone to see who gave it any thought. The record during the past five years has been a record of failure, a record of broken promises. After we make all allowance for the conditions that existed we will not be able quickly to forgive or forget the want of frankness on the part of the government in its statements to the people of Canada with regard to housing conditions.

From your experience in the last house, Mr. Speaker, you will remember that when we assembled in the early days of the 1946 session we had fresh in our minds a statement made by a minister of the crown in Brandon. It was one of those glowing statements full of optimism. Between the 1945 and 1946 sessions, he used these words:

> We can truthfully say that, in this country at least, the worst is past.

Those were the words uttered by a minister of the crown—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: —speaking about housing conditions in 1946.

Mr. Cruickshank: The worst was passed on June 27.

Mr. Fleming: The members who sat in the last house will recall that, in the early days of the session, we were treated to some more of these optimistic pilgrimages into dreamland on the part of the former minister of reconstruction and supply, the predecessor of the present minister of reconstruction. I cannot say that without also extending to the present minister my sincere sympathy for having to take over a department in which such a botch had been made with regard to housing.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member will never take it over.

Mr. Fleming: He has the sincere sympathy of the house for having been handed such a lemon by his predecessor. This lack of frankness was again displayed by that same minister on that occasion. What he had to say, you see, was that the picture was looking better. It was a picture he saw through rose-coloured glasses.

Then, sir, it was just three or four months later that the same minister, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), came into the house on July 22, 1946, and made a confession of abject failure in meeting the housing problem. What he said on that occasion was that our immediate shortage, our emergency shortage—he was not speaking simply of a housing deficit in Canada—is 150,000 houses. By spring it will be 180,000, even if we build 60,000 houses this year. He was budgeting for a deterioration of the situation. Hon. members who were cackling and crowing just a moment ago when I mentioned that the minister who at Brandon in January, 1946, had said that the worst of conditions were past, apparently agreed with that statement; as I have said, those who were cackling and crowing will do well to recall that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) speaking in July, 1946, in this house budgeted for a continual worsening of the situation by 20 per cent within the then coming months.

Mr. Cruickshank: We could build a house while you are talking.

Mr. Fleming: If hon. members will have regard to the facts emanating from government sources, even if they do not do what we have asked for and grant a committee of the house, so that it may be possible to bring facts before the committee, to bring people before a parliamentary committee to make their statements as to their knowledge of this housing situation, nevertheless hon. members would not be wasting their time if they would increase their knowledge—and I am speaking of hon. members opposite—of estimates emanating from government sources as to the shortage of housing in this country.

I spoke about the government estimate as to the situation three years ago. In a speech to the Canadian Construction Association last January—and it is January, 1949, that I am now speaking of—Mr. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is the government in housing, had this to say:

> The number of household groups, including not only families but also individuals who maintain households, exceed the number of front doors by approximately 350,000.

Then he went on to say, dealing with what he described as the existing emergency:

> It would be my guess that the immediate need is of the order of 150,000 units.

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce said in this house three years earlier that the then immediate emergency shortage was 150,000 units. Here is the man who probably wrote the speech that was read on that occasion in the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —who said in January of this year:

> It would be my guess that the immediate need is of the order of 150,000 units.

The same deficit three years later! Progress by this government in three precious years in spite of all this boasting and these promises —absolutely nil!

Mr. Cruickshank: About 57 to 27.

An hon. Member: Is that all you care about—seats instead of housing?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Fraser Valley yonder who is exercising his lungs so vociferously would do well to contribute some of his intelligence and some of his vocal effort to meeting the housing shortage and to telling the government opposite to get busy and perform some of their numerous housing promises.

The statements by the government sources did not end there, for in April of this year a statement was made publicly by General Young, the vice-president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is quoted in a Canadian Press dispatch of April 28 of this year. He said:

> Canada's housing situation is getting worse instead of better.

He says it is getting worse instead of better; that is at the end of April of this year. Let hon. members opposite laugh that off if they choose to do so.

We do not need even to go behind the statement made by the present unfortunate Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). He himself, speaking on this subject in the house on September 21 last—and mind you, he is following in the footsteps of a minister who was given to optimism without restraint—said, as reported at page 118 of Hansard:

> New housing, even at the present record rate of production, is barely keeping up with current needs and making no important inroads into the backlog.

That is just how serious the housing situation still is in Canada. How serious has it been in these post-war years at any time? It is just as serious now as at any time in these difficult post-war years.

What is the nature of this problem, Mr. Speaker? I make no apologies for saying, as I have said in this house on previous occasions, that the problem has short-term and long-term features; and in any serious attempt that is made in this chamber to write new legislation to cope with this problem we must have regard to both the short-term and long-term aspects of it.

The short-term aspect, of course, is this immediate emergency shortage that I have referred to. The long-term aspect embraces not only the immediate emergency shortage but also the necessity for widespread improvement in housing in Canada that is not immediately classed within that emergency shortage that I have referred to, and the necessity of eliminating much of the substandard housing in this country which is being occupied today and is affording some measure of shelter to some people but which nevertheless is substandard housing by any civilized Canadian standard.

This is a social problem, not simply a financial problem, and it is a social problem of the first magnitude. Bad housing breeds disease and crime. Slum clearance brings economic gains as well as great social gains. On the short-term aspect of it, we see some characteristics of this problem that must fill every Canadian with alarm. My colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), speaking in this house several weeks ago, quoted some advertisements which appeared in a newspaper in my city; they were newspaper advertisements of housing accommodation available but not for families with children. That is a shocking situation, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: That is Toronto.

Mr. Fleming: That is a shocking situation in Canada. There is not a member in this house who does not view with horror a situation of that kind. It is having a profound effect, sir. Every hon. member in this house knows that it is exercising a profound social influence at the present time on the homes of this country.

A release of the dominion bureau of statistics of August 4 contained these interesting figures:

> The estimated number of families in Canada in June, 1948, was 3,088,000, an increase of 46,000 over June, 1947, and 562,701 or 22·3 per cent more than at the 1941 census. The average size of family in 1948 was 3·8 persons as compared with 3·7 in 1947 and 3·9 in 1941. In each region, a decline in size of family took place between 1941 and 1948. This is reflected in an increasing proportion of families in the small-size groups, the percentage of families from two to four persons constituting 74·4 per cent of all families in 1948 as compared with 70·8 per cent in this category in 1941.

Every member in this house knows that one of the factors that have entered into that situation is a lack of housing of the kind that Canadian families ought to enjoy.

It is a matter of the most profound shame to this country that the brunt of this problem has been thrown upon the veterans, those to whom this country owes the most.

On this aspect of home ownership, the minister has made some point of assistance to home ownership. We of the Progressive Conservative party believe that there are great social and economic benefits attached to home ownership, and that these are abundant justification for assistance on the part of the government through loans of the kind that we have under part I of the National Housing Act, and other kinds of loans which we hope will be forthcoming under this legislation, in making it easier for people to acquire their own homes; but let us not close our eyes to this inescapable fact, that the high cost of construction today, coupled with emergency conditions faced by many families, has compelled large numbers of Canadians to buy homes, many of which are beyond their means, I am sure; beyond their means, certainly, unless we have in this country an assurance of a high level of employment and a high measure of economic activity in the years ahead.

Let me deal with the subject of housing for rental. There is a need of housing of this kind of great proportions in Canada today. This question of giving assistance in the form of low-cost housing by arrangements with the provinces cannot be adequately weighed, it seems to me, unless the house is also acquainted with the government's plans with reference to rent control. Certainly this whole question of housing for rent is inextricably interwoven with the problem of rent control. I hope that before the debate on the resolution stage is closed the government will give a clear statement or announcement in the house as to precisely what it proposes to do with regard to rent control, because there are great numbers of people in Canada who are today living, particularly in the overcrowded urban centres, in a condition of great uncertainty as to what faces them on March 31 next, when the present legislative measure expires. If there is to be any attempt to fob off this problem onto the provinces they need adequate warning of that fact. Sir, I reiterate my plea that the government, in fairness to the house, make its intention and its policy in that respect known before this present debate has run its course.

In his statement the minister said that the government has no intention of dealing directly with the municipalities. Nevertheless, the minister is aware that the municipalities are the governments that have had the greatest problem in relation to housing conditions, because these conditions have been literally on the doorstep of municipal governments, and those who have been suffering from lack of housing have, in the first instance, almost invariably gone to their local government pleading for some assistance.

It would profit this house nothing to try at this stage to engage in a discussion on the niceties of the constitutional aspects of responsibility at the three respective levels of government. Whatever may be said about these technical features, the fact is inescapable, sir, that the problem of improving housing conditions is, and has been throughout this entire post-war period, completely beyond the powers of the municipalities to meet. It has been beyond the power of the provinces to meet. They have not had the resources to cope with them, especially when under the emergency powers such wide legislative power has been vested in the government at Ottawa.

Whatever legislation emerges from parliament's consideration of this subject at this session, I hope that we shall keep before us at all times the necessity of preserving the local feature in administration, because the local governments are in the best position to give oversight and effective administration to plans of this kind.

In considering steps that ought to be taken I do say that representations made by such bodies as the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities are entitled to respect, to have great weight attached to them in this house. This association is composed of those representatives of the people in their municipal governments who have had this problem literally on their doorsteps day in and day out throughout the entire post-war period. Many of the suggestions put forward by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities to the government have had very great weight, and I am inclined to suspect that they had some effect in moving the government to take action of the kind that they are taking at long last as contemplated by the present legislation.

When we are talking about assistance to the municipalities I hope, sir, that we have taken some considerable step forward since those days not very long ago when unhappily this government was saying to the municipalities: "We will not contribute to the solution of your problem. We are not going to be parties to any subsidy. Any assistance we give to clearing up improper and substandard conditions in any part of this country will be confined to contributions under section 12 of the housing act"—very limited contributions indeed. There is no provision of assistance there toward anything but the assembling of land. Well, sir, at the same time this government, by its policies as administered through Wartime Housing Limited, was literally compelling municipalities to contribute subsidies to the cost of housing erected by that dominion agency, compelling the municipalities which had no choice in the matter, because they had to have housing, and Wartime Housing Limited was, in those days, the only place that they could get housing for rent. That government agency dictated the terms that the municipalities should contribute subsidies in the form of contributions of land and provision of services; yes, and if that was enough, by exacting, in lieu of taxes, payments that very often were little more than a half or a third of the taxes that these same properties would have borne had they not been owned by a government agency.

These municipalities, sir, have had a very unfair share of the load to carry all these years, because the influx to our great urban centres was not the result of any deliberate policy on the part of these municipal governments. The influx into the urban centres occurred in the course of expansion of war production, the result of federal policies almost exclusively; and these municipalities were not in a position financially to meet the need on the scale that then emerged. They were always faced with the possibility that, with the curtailment of war production, there might be an exodus of industrial workers from their areas. In many municipalities, even those that have enjoyed the most rapid growth in these post-war years, there has been a great deal of uncertainty as to how long they could expect it to continue. That has been an additional reason, sir, why the municipalities could not be expected, and were in no financial position, to cope with the problem.

What is government policy with regard to assistance? I am bound to say, sir, that we have not yet a clear and unequivocal statement of government policy in this country. There was nothing lacking in clarity, there was nothing unequivocal in the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in Montreal on October 27, 1947, when he said this:

> No government of which I am a part will ever pass legislation for subsidized housing.

He was quite content at that time that the government of which he was a member should compel municipalities to contribute subsidies if they wanted low-rental housing built; but he was not prepared at that time to be a member of any government that itself made any contribution to subsidized housing, or would pass legislation for subsidized housing.

It has not been made clear in the vague statement made by the minister on September 21, or in his brief statement in the house tonight, whether the government is still adhering to the policy declared by the Prime Minister, or whether there is in the legislation now about to be introduced some assistance to housing by way of subsidy. We are still waiting for a statement in that regard. At page 119 of Hansard for September 21 the minister talks about public-sponsored housing projects as being within the intent of the government to assist by this new measure. But we are still wondering what this policy is.

We find a good precedent for courageous action, in the neighbouring country to the south of us, in meeting the housing problem as it exists over there. In July last President Truman signed a bill which had been passed by congress, and which embraced these five leading features:

1. A slum clearance program in which the federal government will put up $1 billion in loans and another $500 million in grants to assist localities.

2. A low rental housing program to be handled by local authorities, designed to provide 810,000 units in the next six years and commit the federal government to annual maximum subsidies of $308 million over a 40-year period.

3. A broad housing research program designed to improve the construction of housing, and at the same time reduce costs.

4. Farm housing aids providing for loans and in some cases grants to improve and rehabilitate farm dwellings with the federal government commitment estimated at $325 million.

5. A 60-day extension as from last June 30 of temporary authority for the government to insure loans by private lenders up to $2,500 for repairing and remodelling existing structures; a 60-day continuation of authority to insure mortgages for construction of small homes up to $5,000; and a $500 million increase in the amount of mortgage insurance that the government can issue for single-family and multiple-dwelling units.

Thinking in terms used by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the house in recent days, I suppose we could say that half a loaf is better than no bread. At the present time the best one can say about the statement by the minister on September 21, and his statement tonight, and after reading the resolution before the house, is that at best it looks no better than half a loaf, in comparison with the whole loaf promised by the government during the election campaign.

An examination of this resolution discloses that it falls into four parts, and, without risking wearying the house, I shall speak briefly about it.

The first part of the resolution has to do with the assembly of land for residential purposes and the construction of housing projects for sale and for rent under arrangements by which the capital costs and the costs of operation of such project will be shared 75 per cent by the federal government and 25 per cent by the provincial governments in projects undertaken jointly by them.

I believe the minister is quite justified in saying that no pressure should be brought to bear upon the provinces to compel them to enter into projects of this kind. Nevertheless, I affirm that every encouragement should be given to provinces to embark with the federal government upon co-operative measures of this kind. One can welcome this evidence of co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments. For years we have been waiting for the dominion government to appreciate the necessity for seeking co-operation with the provincial governments in addressing itself to this housing problem. And at long last we can welcome this present evidence of willingness on the part of the federal government to co-operate with the provincial governments.

May I say personally to the minister that, to the extent that he has been responsible for this change of front and this change of heart on the part of the government of which he is a member, I congratulate him—and I believe the whole country will congratulate him—most heartily. It is the only approach that promises the massing of the governmental resources of this country to meet that portion of the problem which is a governmental responsibility.

I have one or two further observations to make. The minister's statement of September 21 went farther than his statement of tonight. I trust that does not mean that the government has receded from the scope of the legislation which on September 21 he indicated its desire to introduce. On that date the minister indicated a willingness on the part of the government to look into the problem arising from the shortage of serviced land in the municipalities, and the problem which arose through lack of tax revenue from properties owned by the government or its agencies. In urban centres $600 would be a very modest amount to provide services for a dwelling unit. As a matter of fact in many places in Canada it must be very much more than that. This has been an almost prohibitive cost, so far as most municipalities are concerned that have to face this housing problem within their own borders.

On the subject of payment in lieu of taxes, I hope that before this debate has run its course the Prime Minister, or someone on behalf of the government, will make the statement the government has promised to make as to its policy on this subject. We know the British North America Act has the effect of exempting properties owned by the crown in the right of the dominion from either provincial or municipal taxation. But this does not prevent contributions by the federal government or its agencies, equivalent to what the taxes on those properties would be.

Here is a problem from which there is no escape. These municipalities cannot see more and more of their land falling under dominion ownership, or ownership of dominion government agencies, without feeling the effect of this cramping of their limited tax base. If the government is going to meet this problem at long last, I am sure the House of Commons will welcome it; but the house will want the assurance that the government is not going to meet it in the way they used to tell us they were meeting the problem when they were permitting Wartime Housing Limited to make very limited contributions in lieu of taxes—contributions that very often were not half or even a third of the taxes the same property would have borne had it been in private hands.

On September 21 the minister made reference to the necessity of giving more assistance through the act to co-operative house building, but in his statement tonight he made no reference to that. The resolution is silent in so far as any assistance to co-operative house building is concerned. It seems to me, however, that this new measure will be sorely lacking if there is not some provision in it to make the present provisions of the act more useful than they have been in the past—because in the past their usefulness has been completely limited. If one looks at what has been done in the way of co-operative house building in other countries, and he will think naturally of Great Britain and Sweden, he will see that in times past our government has overlooked a real opportunity.

Before I leave this subject of joint action and joint contribution on the part of the dominion and the provinces, may I recall to members of the house that the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, after studying the statement made by the minister on September 21, urged that for at least the first three years of this period the dominion government should go further and encourage a greater measure of participation in the program throughout the country by assuming one hundred per cent of the cost for that period. The recommendation of the federation was as follows:

> The federation, therefore, urges the federal government for the first three-year period following the enactment of its low-rental housing policy, to assume the full costs involved in projects commenced during this period; and, thereafter, to require provincial financial participation to the amount of 25 per cent of the annual deficit costs of any further low-rental projects which may be commenced. And, moreover, that, during this three-year initiation period, the federal government, in those municipalities where no approved local housing authority exists, proceed itself to construct demonstration low-rental housing projects.

Having regard to the informed source of that recommendation I think the minister should be asked by the house to give it serious consideration and to make a statement as to whether the government will accept it, or, if not, why not.

The second aspect of the resolution is found in these words:

> —and further to authorize the making of loans to prospective home owners in addition to basic joint loans under the act, in amounts not exceeding one-sixth of such basic loans.

That problem can be clearly understood because it concerns the difference between the cost of construction of a new home and the mortgage available today under part I of the National Housing Act. It will not be forgotten that it is federal legislation that creates that problem, that is, section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (c) of the National Housing Act. I have said before that there has been far too rigid and unsympathetic administration of the National Housing Act. In determining the loan value, regard has not been had for the high cost of construction; the percentage which has been authorized under part I of the act has not been based on the high cost of construction; it has been determined by the government agency administering that legislation. That is how that problem of the onerous difference between the cost of construction and the mortgage loan arose.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Ontario, under an enlightened Progressive Conservative government, addressed itself one and a half years ago to that very problem because of a lack of action on the part of the government at Ottawa. Why should any province have had to find a solution for that problem, seeing that the problem was well within the legislative competence of this parliament to solve? The federal government was well equipped with funds and surpluses to meet the financial side of the problem, but there just was not enough sympathetic regard on the part of the government opposite for the extent of the housing crisis in Canada to make them undertake resolutely to find a solution.

What the government of Ontario did was to pass legislation under which provincial loans up to a maximum of $1,250 were made available under second mortgages, or one-half of the difference between the mortgage loan under the act and the cost of construction. The provincial government attempted to fill in the gap created by the dominion government.

What the government is now proposing by this legislation is simply to undertake to do what the government of Ontario has been doing for the last one and a half years. One will welcome this prodigal home. At long last one can say that we welcome the adoption by this government of a good example even though they waited one and a half years to follow it.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: A number of hon. members are calling, "Time," but I would remind them that according to standing order 37 the minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister are not bound by the forty-minute rule.

Mr. Fleming: I can assure some of the restless hon. gentlemen opposite that I shall not be long, but I do not intend to spare the feelings of the supporters of the government any more than I have been.

I welcome this indication that the government at long last intends to follow this good example. Hon. members will wish to know why it has taken the government one and a half years to decide to follow this example. Hon. members will wish to know why this government has permitted this problem to exist, not only for one and a half years but prior to that time as well. This problem was pointed out to the government in this house in sessions prior to 1947. Of course they were smug, they were satisfied just as they are today, and they followed the course of just letting the people who were faced with the housing problem worry about it.

The other two features of the resolution probably do not require extended comment. I assume provision will be made to increase the amounts now named in the act to cover assistance for home improvement and home extension, and then a consequent provision for increase under Part I of the act by reason of the second feature of the resolution.

There is one other aspect of this problem which I hope will not be lost sight of, the necessity of encouraging research. Ways must be found of lowering the cost of construction, and research must be carried on with a view to improving methods of construction. There is a limit to what the people in the different municipalities want in the way of standardization in construction, but none the less, under conditions such as we face today and in view of the high cost of construction, research into methods of standardized production and various types of housing must be encouraged.

Perhaps it is not amiss to commend the example set by those municipalities which have taken advantage of the present opportunity to re-examine their building codes with a view to determining, in the light of increased knowledge made available through research, how those codes can be changed to take advantage of new and improved methods, at the same time making it easier for people to build houses.

Again I commend to this government the example of the Ontario government, to which I have referred, which in its legislation of one and a half years ago did not stop at the feature I have already mentioned but went farther to meet other aspects of the housing need. I take advantage of the opportunity to remind hon. members that the head of that forward-looking, progressive government which brought in that legislation was the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). That shows what can happen in a province which is blessed with good government under a Progressive Conservative leader.

With all due respect for other provincial governments, Mr. Speaker, you do not find them taking resolute measures of the kind I have referred to. What are these measures which I commend to the attention of the government and invite them to copy? I referred to the first feature, meeting the need for additional mortgage financing by way of second mortgage. The second feature was provision for financing approved building developments where a new method of construction is applied resulting in a substantial reduction in the cost of housing. Under that provision guarantees of up to $2 million were offered.

The third feature was participation with municipalities in the financing of redevelopment including slum clearance, where this appeared to be a sound policy. That provision was designed to provide rental accommodation on a larger scale, and sums up to $15 million were allocated for that purpose.

Let me just interject here that it was under these provisions that the now well-known Regent Park development was undertaken in the city of Toronto. Limited assistance—altogether too limited—was given by the federal government under section 12 of the housing act in connection with the assembly of land, and I remind hon. members that this housing project was commended by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he went to Toronto and viewed it on February 21 last. At that time he called it "a landmark in Canadian housing"; and that was made possible by legislation of the province of Ontario introduced, as I have said, by a forward-looking, progressive and intelligent government.

The fourth feature of that Ontario program was an offer to pay one-half the cost of lands and services up to a limit of $300 per house, for a tentative ten thousand houses under municipal low-rental projects.

It will probably interest hon. members to learn that since this legislation came into operation one and a half years ago 10,000 mortgages have been approved and sums have been advanced in excess of the $10 million originally appropriated, so that an additional appropriation of $5 million was made available to carry on this worthy endeavour to meet the housing problem.

Always in connection with a problem of this kind there must be something more important than the terms of any legislation that may be passed by this parliament. That is the spirit put into the administration and enforcement of such legislation by the government charged with the duty of administering it. The drive necessary to derive the utmost benefit from existing housing legislation has been woefully lacking in this country in recent years. We had to complain as early as 1945, when different departments had this problem all tangled up. At least three departments were playing with it then; and whatever steps were taken to improve the government's approach to the problem—and I say this without the slightest fear of contradiction—were taken in every case in response to suggestions and demands that came from His Majesty's loyal opposition in the last house.

If this government is to make a serious effort to carry out the promises it made to the people during the election campaign we shall expect it to put behind this new program, or this addition to the old program, such drive and vigour as unfortunately it has not yet put behind the housing legislation this parliament has enacted. I am sure nothing but the most sustained drive to make this legislation fruitful in the production of homes for Canadians will satisfy this parliament and the Canadian people.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I offer no apology for being proud of what the young minister has done since coming into office. He has shown one of the qualities of a true statesman; that is, co-operation. In the animal kingdom, you know, any animal not willing to co-operate soon passes on. We have the horse, the cow, the sheep and the goat today because they were willing to co-operate for the good of all; and that is just as true of the politician and statesman. If he is willing to co-operate with others who are striving for the betterment of mankind he will have plenty of friends.

I also congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on his speech. He always makes a good speech and always has something to say. The statement of the minister this evening was short, just as the down payment that will be required from these young householders will be small. He said a great deal in a very short time. During the summer months, instead of going with his wife and family to enjoy a cool holiday, he was holding conferences with representatives of the provincial governments. On the strength of those conferences we made certain promises; I know I said that if I were not mistaken the minister would bring this matter to a head, and he has done so. Don't I remember how I had my hair pulled, figuratively, when the dominion government stepped into this provincial housing scheme to build wartime houses. I was told very pointedly that a year after the war they would be a burden on the cities in which they were built. I am as sure now as I was then, Mr. Speaker, that it was not a mistake. Perhaps I am more sure now. Those houses are worth more today than they were then. Of course, I do not give the minister credit for seeing that far ahead. When this statement was made by the minister, I know young householders who started saving because they wanted to have a home of their own. They wanted to pay for it. I think the minister is wise, therefore, in requesting that the debate on this matter be not too lengthy. We should have it right away. I know I have had a heart-burning when a young husband and wife with one, two or three children have been unable to find a house. Let us have this thing, and have it right away. As we would say to the old Ford, "Let us step on the gas." This measure should be enacted as quickly and as thoroughly as possible. I commend the minister for it.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I thought when the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) began speaking the minister had done so well in the matter of housing that nothing further need be done. By the time he had finished, he had come to the conclusion it was time to do something. Ordinarily, I am not in favour of extended debates on the resolution stage of a measure. I do not think it is the proper time to have a debate because we do not know the contents of the bill that will be founded upon the resolution. I am going to depart from that rule tonight in view of the great importance and urgency of the question which we are now discussing, the question of housing.

If the proposed bill is of sufficient scope to meet the housing needs, it will be welcomed by the people of Canada as no other measure will be welcomed which this government may propose at this session. I am going to trespass on the time of the house because I do not believe the proposed bill will be of sufficient scope to meet the housing needs of the people of Canada. I am basing that opinion on the resolution itself, on the statement the minister made on September 21 outlining the government's intentions, and the addition to that statement which he made tonight. I do not believe that what is proposed will come anywhere near meeting the situation. It is not my intention to criticize as much as it is to try to show the minister and the members of the house the urgent need for housing which exists in every part of Canada. It is a need which is beyond the ability of the individual family, the ability of the municipality, or the ability of the province to deal with adequately.

I admit at once that there are some good points in the resolution and the proposals contained in the two statements. Despite the fact that constitutionally housing is a matter for the provinces, the federal government is assuming a responsibility perhaps greater than it has assumed up to now; that is all to the good. There is the hope, which I hope is well founded, that the provinces will co-operate and that the municipalities will also co-operate so that we can have a housing development participation by the three governments. Up until now the provinces, perhaps for sufficient reasons in most cases and insufficient reasons in some cases, have refused to co-operate in the matter of low-rent housing.

Another important point is, of course, that the federal government is assuming the major share of the financial burden. The fact that the government hopes to use the co-operative movement is also a good omen. From the concluding paragraph of the minister's statement on September 21, I do not believe that the government itself has yet realized the amount of assistance, not only the amount of assistance but the amount of initiative, that will be required before the problem is solved. The concluding paragraph of that statement reads as follows:

> The policy as enunciated by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in 1946 is the keystone of our present policy; that is, the creation of conditions favourable to a large housing program by private individuals and companies. Only to the extent that housing needs are not being met is it proposed that the dominion and the provinces will enter the field.

Now, if that is the government's policy up until now, they might as well have no policy at all so far as sixty-five per cent of the people who need houses in Canada are concerned. If there is anything that should be clear to the government by this time, it is that private enterprise will not or perhaps cannot provide houses for those who need them most. During the past four years this has been tried, there has been complete failure despite all the assistance and encouragement the government has given private enterprise.

That the minister himself has doubts of private enterprise's ability to provide the housing needs of the people, I think is made clear by the concluding words of the paragraph I have just read. They are as follows:

> It seems to me that only by the co-operative efforts of all levels of government and the house building industry can we maintain our high volume of new residential construction and increase it beyond its present level.

That is not consistent with the first part of the statement which says that the government will only step in when private enterprise has failed. Perhaps this is an afterthought that the government is now going to try to co-operate with the provincial governments and with private enterprise. I am not hopeful of results even in that way.

Let me point this out. I believe there is abundant evidence to prove that private enterprise can build homes for only those who can pay high prices. In the city of Vancouver last summer there were between three hundred and four hundred houses ready for occupancy at one time seeking buyers. Those were homes in the $10,000 to $40,000 class. But the people who need homes in Vancouver cannot purchase houses at those prices, and they could not purchase them even if the down payment were reduced. As a matter of fact, they could not purchase those homes even if there were no down payment at all, because they could not make the monthly payments that would be required on houses of that price. That is the problem that is facing the people of Canada and that is the problem that is facing this government.

I should like to quote from various statements from individuals and organizations evidence showing the urgent need for housing in this country. Before I do so, however, let me draw the attention of the house to some figures that were given in an article by Professor Leonard Marsh in the Canadian Journal of Economic and Political Science of February, 1949. The title of the article is "The Economics of Low Rent Housing." The writer says that no family should try to build a house or to buy a house costing more than twice the annual family income. He then pointed out that on that basis 20·7 per cent of those needing homes cannot afford to buy any kind of house; that the next 12·7 per cent cannot afford to buy a house costing more than $3,000 to $4,000; that the next 20 per cent cannot afford to buy a house costing more than from $4,000 to $5,000; and that the next 12·1 per cent cannot afford to buy a house costing more than from $5,000 to $6,000. Here you have 65·5 per cent of those requiring houses in Canada who cannot afford to buy houses priced higher than $6,000.

In my part of the country few houses are being built today which cost less than $6,000. I doubt if any houses at all are being built for less than that. There may be perhaps some three-roomed houses being built for less than that, but I do not think that a house of more than three rooms can be built in western Canada—that is, if it is a modern house—for less than $6,000.

I now want to point out the situation in Vancouver. In a submission made to this government by the Vancouver housing association under date of February 18, 1949, I find the following:

> Owing to the tremendous influx of population, the housing situation in British Columbia, already serious at the close of the war, has steadily deteriorated during the last three years, in spite of the relatively high rate of building activity.
> In the city of Vancouver alone, the number of houses built has fallen over 2,000 short of the estimated increase in the number of families in each of the last two years.
> 2. It has become impossible, as a result, to enforce even a minimum standard of health regulations, and slum conditions are steadily spreading outward from the core of our cities.
> It is unnecessary to stress the cost, not only in terms of family misery, but in dollars and cents for the community, brought about by these conditions, with their inevitable consequences of ill health, broken homes, juvenile delinquency and social unrest, involving in turn high hospital, penitentiary, police, fire, social assistance and other welfare expenditures.

After the election, along with some other members of parliament representing Vancouver constituencies, and directed by the manager or secretary of the Vancouver housing association, we visited some of the worst tenements in the city. We did not visit a great many; we did not have the time to do so. But I am sure that those who were with me will agree that none of the tenements we visited were fit for human habitation. Yet there were families, including young children and old people in large numbers, in those slum tenements.

In a statement issued as late as September, 1949—that is, just last month—the Vancouver housing association mentioned those conditions:

A survey of 1,000 lodging houses by the city health department early this year revealed the following facts: 14·7 per cent of all occupied accommodation were basement or attic rooms; 133 rooms had no window or skylight. Half the lodging houses contained children. There was an average of one bath or shower to every eight persons. In 10 per cent of the houses, there was only one toilet for eleven or more persons. In 20 per cent of the cases the plumbing was graded as poor, in 37½ per cent fair. Thirty-two and one-half per cent of the houses were in poor structural maintenance.

Then the statement goes on to say:

One of the most significant points brought out by these tours—

It referred not only to the tours of members of parliament but to those by aldermen of the city as well.

—is the inevitable tendency for the low income families with children to gravitate to the worst accommodation, and it is, of course, just these families who suffer most harm from bad housing and environment.

I am not over-drawing the picture in Vancouver. Vancouver is of course—depending on the parts of it you visit—a city of beautiful homes. Perhaps in no other city of Canada can you find so many beautiful and fine-looking homes; but perhaps in no other city of Canada can you find slums that will compare with ours. The people in my city are therefore concerned about housing. So far as I have been able to learn, they are not satisfied with the proposals made by the government up to now. While those proposals are an improvement over what has been done to date, the people do not believe that they are sufficient to meet the need.

The next publication I want to quote from is entitled "Layout for Living". It is the official organ of the Community Planning Association of Canada with head offices in Ottawa. This publication is speaking for the whole of Canada in the matter of housing. On page 3 I find the following:

In every province there are thousands more families wanting accommodation for rent than there are dwellings to be rented. True, the federal government has built tens of thousands of rental houses since the war—but they are all for veterans. The only houses being added now to the rental supply (and open to all families to try for)

are renting at $50, $60, $70 and up per month. The federal government has offered guarantees to private builders if they will do more rental housing, but even with this it seems almost impossible to get a new apartment to pay for itself if the rent is less than about $70. Yet two-thirds of the urban families in rented shelter in 1948 were paying no more than $30.

These are dominion bureau of statistics' figures.

For this important group of Canadian families—about one in every four of all our families—very little housing has been built since the depression.

That is the situation I should like the minister and hon. members to visualize. I am satisfied that if hon. gentlemen critically approach the problem they will come to the conclusion that the legislation before us is not adequate to deal with it as it should be dealt with.

The next quotation I should like to read is a statement by the chairman of the federation of mayors and municipalities, which appears in the Vancouver News-Herald of August 31, 1949. Mayor George C. MacLean of St. Boniface, Manitoba, said:

Canadians would be greatly disappointed if the only result of the recently concluded trans-Canada housing tour is to be some sort of federal-provincial arrangement to reduce the required down payment for home purchases.

There he was referring to the housing tour made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). I continue:

This is no solution to the housing problem at all. It simply means a lower initial payment—but a higher annual carrying charge. It will encourage some people to begin buying their homes, but it offers no relief to that large aggregation of average workers who, even if no initial equity were required, would still be unable to finance the cost of a minimum standard low-cost home.

He continued:

Broadly speaking the maximum which the average worker's family can afford to put out for shelter does not exceed $25 a month and as the facts show, many can't afford even this.

Compare that with the statement in the Canadian community planning association booklet where the rents are from $50, $60 to $70 and up per month and you will appreciate at once why the working people of Canada can find no comfort in the proposals made by the government.

The next publication I wish to quote from is the report of the Canadian welfare council, 1948. On page 5 I find the following:

A word first about living costs where the index now stands at 153·3.

That was in 1948. It is much higher now. I continue:

Agencies in our family division during the past winter attempted to evaluate what was happening to families under their care. The report of this study shows a sharp increase in the number seeking assistance to pay for food, clothing and essential medical and dental care. More mothers are going to work to help make ends meet with a consequent neglect of children. Increased debts, problems in caring for aged members of the family, older children leaving school for blind-alley jobs, and friction within families, were all reported by most agencies.

And second a comment on housing which is still to be regarded as Canada's number one social problem. Here the point to emphasize is that, although a record number of houses was built in 1947, our national position today is hardly less serious than it was a year ago; nor, if the number of families continues to increase at present rates, are we likely to be any better off next year than we are now.

That situation has not improved in any way whatsoever since this report was published.

At the first session this year I put some questions on the order paper, and they were answered in the form of a return which is to be found in Votes and Proceedings No. 38, for the first session, 1949. The information was given by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. My first question was:

How many houses (family units) were built in Canada in the year 1948?

The answer was:

Housing units built in Canada in 1948 numbered 81,243 including 5,146 housing units added by conversion.

My second question was:

How many houses (family units) were constructed with financial assistance under the provisions of the National Housing Act, during the same year?

The answer was:

The number of housing units completed in 1948 with financial assistance under the provisions of the National Housing Act numbered 11,939.

Hon. members will see the small number of people who took advantage of the National Housing Act. The great majority of those who buy or build houses do not need the assistance of the National Housing Act.

My third question was:

What was the total amount of financial assistance?

The answer was:

The total amount of financial assistance through loans approved under the National Housing Act in 1948 amounted to $101,642,194.

Or an average of $8,512 per family unit.

My fourth question was:

How many houses (family units) were built for rental?

The answer was:

It is estimated that 25 per cent of all housing units completed in 1948 were built for rental (Housing Bulletin No. 12, dominion bureau of statistics, page 3). Those built in 1948 with financial assistance under the National Housing Act numbered 1,599.

The need today, Mr. Speaker, is for rental houses. In 1938-39, 45 per cent of the houses built were for rent. In 1948 only about 30 per cent were built for rent, and the greater proportion of them were veterans' houses; therefore not more than 13 per cent of the houses built were rental houses. My time has almost expired, but, as I said before, I want to give the minister and the house the feeling as I find it in my city and province and also as it appears to me throughout the country. Despite any criticism I have made, I do not wish to conclude my remarks without expressing my appreciation of the intention of the government as indicated by the minister to assume 75 per cent of the cost of low-rental housing, in co-operation with the provinces.

Again the question is: Will the provinces co-operate? I believe the premier of British Columbia stated in the legislature early this year that he would be willing to co-operate with the federal government. I believe also that the city of Vancouver acquired the legislation necessary to set up a housing authority. It would appear therefore that at least in British Columbia there can be co-operation on the three levels of government.

If our people are to be adequately housed, in my opinion and in the opinion of all those authorities whom I have quoted tonight, there is no alternative to government assisted housing, except a more equitable distribution of the national income, so that more people will receive incomes which would permit them to build their own homes out of savings over a period of time or out of current earnings.

I mention that possible alternative—but there is no hope at the present time that we shall see a more equitable distribution of income. As a matter of fact there is a growing resistance to wage increases. Let me in concluding tell the house that we must make up our minds that if we do not pay for decent housing for those who cannot provide homes for themselves we shall pay for the poor homes in which they are compelled to live. Perhaps I cannot put that point better than it was put by the citizens committee on housing in Halifax, Nova Scotia, not so long ago. This is what they said:

Housing of the poor we are going to provide, let us make no mistake about that. It is only a question whether we shall house them in hospitals, mental institutions, reformatories and jails; or whether we shall house them in cleanly, light and sanitary surroundings where both body and soul will have a chance. Which shall it be?

I have taken up the time of the house to place these matters before the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) in the hope that, if he has not drafted the bill to be founded on this resolution, he will give consideration to what I have said. If he has drafted the bill I hope he will scrap the draft and prepare a new bill which will more adequately meet the need of homes for the people of Canada.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the beginning to the new Minister of Reconstruction and Supply

(Mr. Winters) that I have greater hopes of seeing beneficial progress through the National Housing Act under his regime than I had under the administration of the minister who preceded him. I do not say this because of any thought that the minister who held the portfolio before had not sufficient knowledge of house construction. I have thought however that perhaps he was a little more set in his ways than the present minister would be.

I believe the measure before the house this evening will make some improvement in the operation of the National Housing Act. I am wondering, however, whether the actions of the federal government in being so ready to participate in joint operations with the provinces arise from a motive of wishing to improve housing conditions—as I hope may be the result in the long run—or whether it is to get out from under some of the difficulties as they have developed under the operation of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Perhaps they want to get in on some of that oil money of yours.

Mr. Johnston: Maybe the time will come when they will not need any other assistance —and I hope that time may come soon. As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said with respect to Ontario, I may say concerning Alberta that the province is under excellent management—and that cannot be gainsaid by anyone.

Mr. Hansell: Oil or no oil.

Mr. Knowles: Gas or no gas.

Mr. Johnston: It is hard to say what will be in the new bill. None of us, with the exception of the government, knows what is contemplated in the legislation. Therefore we must be content with what the minister said today and on September 21, and must accept those statements as some indication of the legislation he proposes to bring down.

One thing of which we may all be sure is that there is a national emergency in housing. This is not a new problem, because the emergency has existed for a number of years. I was interested in the statement the minister made on September 21 when, at page 118, he used these words:

> This year's housing production will be higher than ever before. It is likely to reach a record high of approximately 100,000 units in 1949.

I looked over that sentence several times, because he had been speaking of the operation of government-planned housing, and of the amendment to the National Housing Act. I wondered whether he contemplated that 100,000 units under the National Housing Act —because I do not think he could have meant that. I think he meant general housing production in the country would be 100,000 units.

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Johnston: I see the minister nods his head, so that would seem to be correct. I hope his estimate is accurate, because he is much more optimistic than I am—indeed more optimistic than quite a number of other people.

I was interested the other day in an article appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of October 13, 1949, which makes reference to the number of houses built in Canada and states that there are 46,326 more families in their own homes. That sounds good—but it is a long way short of the minister's contemplated 100,000. The article I am about to read does not confine itself to operations under the National Housing Act, but refers to the total number of homes built, and goes on to say:

> The first seven months in 1949 saw another 46,326 families in their own homes, a 10,000-home improvement over the housing progress of a year before.
> This was reported by the bureau of statistics yesterday in its monthly housing bulletin. It showed however—

And take note of this—

> —that fewer new homes were started this year than last. Starts during the seven months of 1949 totalled 49,285 compared with 49,452 in the first seven months of 1948.

The minister is going to have to do a lot of building if he reaches that 100,000, or if he reaches only 50 per cent of it. I am going to say to him that if he achieves 75 per cent of his estimate he will be doing a good job—provided, of course, he sees that decent houses are built. I think the need for housing in this country is greater today than it has been for some years past, and there are several reasons for this. First is the rapid increase in population with the resultant increase in all family formations. This, combined with immigration, has created a tremendous housing problem.

Then there is the obsolescence of existing units. Many houses are deteriorating at a very fast rate. I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) tell us about the wonderful houses which had been built at the beginning of the war and how well they had stood up. I know the hon. member is not a betting man and neither am I, but if he were I would bet him ten dollars that I could show him houses within two miles of this building which have practically collapsed—if they have not, it is a miracle. I refer to the houses over in Hull.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no.

Mr. Johnston: Oh, yes. I saw those houses six months after they were built and you could not close a door in them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member should see them now.

Mr. Johnston: Do not make any mistake about it, I was in them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I know many people who are living in them and they are satisfied.

Mr. Johnston: I suppose that as they cannot get anything else they must be satisfied.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What are the odds on this ten dollar bet?

Mr. Johnston: We should benefit from experience. It is not often that I have spoken critically of the government's housing program and I am hopeful that the minister will accept criticism a bit more readily than his predecessor, providing the criticism is not destructive. We should turn our attention to some of the conditions that have been allowed to exist under the National Housing Act to see if some improvement cannot be made. My mind goes back to a housing project to which I have referred on other occasions, the one carried out by the Bow River Construction Company. I should like to indicate some ways in which past failures could be prevented.

First, there was never a trusteeship set up for the down payments that were made. I raised this question about two years ago when I pointed out that it was wrong to permit people to make deposits on houses to a real estate agent or builder who could spend the money any way he liked. In some cases the contracts were not completed and the prospective home owners lost their down payments. I hope the minister is taking this under consideration and has made provision for a trusteeship to cover these down payments. The prospective home owners should have some protection for the money they pay in.

I am not laying all the mistakes that have been made on the doorstep of the government, although they are their responsibility. One other great mistake in the past was the lack of proper supervision. I know that the minister cannot go around and personally inspect all these buildings, but when I spoke on this question four or five years ago I pointed out that this was one of the great mistakes that were being made. I can recall at the moment one instance where an inspector accepted a house for the government in which inferior lumber filled with knotholes had been used for the floors. The floors were completely covered with paper, this inspector admitted that he had not seen them, yet he passed the house as being No. 1.

These are mistakes which the government can avoid without any additional expense. When the government lets a contract it should see to it that the builder is properly qualified both from the financial point of view and in experience. That condition was not insisted upon in the past. I have here a booklet entitled, "The Integrated Housing Plan", which has been put out by the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation. I should like to know if the government recognizes this booklet as being authentic? I should like the minister to indicate whether people can place reliance in this booklet which I got just the other day.

An hon. Member: Who printed it?

Mr. Johnston: It is sent out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Ottawa, Canada, and is marked, "RCM-3". Apparently the minister has not yet given his approval to this and I do not know whether he intends to. Is this authentic, Mr. Minister?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to know before I quote from it.

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Mr. Johnston: Under "credit" it states:

> The builder's credit rating must be sound,—

That would be sound.

> —and he must satisfy the lending institution and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that he is able, both financially and by virtue of experience, to undertake large-scale building operations.

Then I should like to refer to the builder's qualifications. Apparently this pamphlet is being sent out to prospective buyers all across the country. It is a government publication, but in the past this government has let contracts to persons who did not know the first thing about building. I do not think I can give a better example than that of the Bow River Construction Company. Speaking from memory, this company was given a credit rating by Central Mortgage of over $125,000, and I think I am conservative in making that estimate. The president of the company told me that they had not one cent to start with, and they certainly had no building experience whatever.

It is things like these that have caused difficulty. It is things like these that the government can correct without spending one cent. In most cases where building failures have occurred it will be found that they were due to negligence through lack of proper inspection. When people receive government pamphlets like this they put a great deal of confidence in them, and they should be able to do so. When they have the government's word that they have employed a competent contractor to build the houses the people naturally expect that their investment will be safeguarded, and they should have every reason to expect that. When I am speaking of failures, hon. members may think the project undertaken in Calgary by the Bow River Construction Company was the only one, but there have been others. There have been failures in Halifax, in Vancouver, in Winnipeg and in Toronto. However, I believe the Bow River construction failure was perhaps outstanding, and I spoke on it at some length in this house. I should have thought the government would have benefited from that criticism, but I was amazed when I read the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, September 29, and saw this heading: "Have down payment on homes held in trust, judge suggests." I was interested in the heading and I read on:

> Toronto, September 29 (CP). Judge Ian Macdonnell, presiding at a judicial inquiry into the failure of the big suburban Pelmo Park housing project, suggested yesterday legislation providing that down payments by home purchasers be kept in trust, may be a means of preventing similar losses.

I heartily endorse that recommendation; it is something I suggested a long time ago. Then the dispatch goes on:

> Judge Macdonnell said that although there are many other cases of builders failing to complete homes after receiving money for them, "it is not illegal . . . it may have to be cured by some trustee provisions."
> An auditor's report yesterday disclosed that the Kershaw Construction Company, whose Pelmo Park housing project failed last May, had a deficit of $135,051 during the previous eight months.

Then notice this:

> Fifty-four would-be home owners lost a total of $93,553 on the project.

Just because this government failed to accept criticism in the spirit in which it was offered over a year ago, more than $93,000 was lost by those people who invested all their savings in order to get homes.

Mr. Warren: That was a provincial company.

Mr. Johnston: I don't care what kind of company it was; that practice is carried on by this government under the National Housing Act. The next heading is, "Depositors lose all," and the article states:

> The auditor's report said the total assets of the company—$86,700—did not represent anything any of the 54 depositors could realize.

So the assets were in such form that the down payments of the purchasers could not be recovered in any way. However, when I remember the estimates made by Central Mortgage and Housing with respect to the Bow River Construction Company, and remember that the president told me they did not have a red cent to start with, I am just a little doubtful of that estimate of $86,700.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): You sold them too well on the social credit theory.

Mr. Johnston: I do not know what that has to do with this; but my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) says this is Liberalism in practice. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the government will benefit by these past experiences. Speaking of these failures, I want to make one other point. This may not come under the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), but at least it concerns him. I believe provision should be made in our legislation so that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could be prosecuted in the ordinary provincial courts. I took up this question some time ago with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who agreed that there should be some court where both the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and—I was going to say the Manufacturers Life—these other institutions could be jointly prosecuted. As it stands today, when you have Central Mortgage and Housing in partnership with a lending institution, no matter how disreputable that lending institution may be, there is no place where those two bodies may be prosecuted. We had a good example of that in Calgary. When we tried to bring them before the court the judge said, "Oh, you cannot prosecute Central Mortgage and Housing in the provincial courts. They are a little god unto themselves, and you must go down to the exchequer court." Then the minister stood up here and said they were a little god unto themselves, and we could not prosecute them without their consent. So there we were stuck. How does the ordinary man get justice? I remember someone saying here the other day that you could find justice if you had the money to pay for it. That may be somewhat exaggerated, but certainly there are cases in which the ordinary man cannot get justice, and this is one of them. I have a great deal of hope for the new minister, though I will tell you in a year or so how it works out. I do trust that he will make some provision under which the courts of this land will be made available to those who are investing their money in these homes.

I hope I am wrong, but I am a little afraid that, with all the emphasis being laid on co-operation with the provinces, the dominion may be endeavouring to get out from under these embarrassing questions and pass them over to the provinces. I believe the suggestions now advanced may ultimately result in a good system of co-operation, if the proper steps are carefully taken.

Let me speak for a moment about low rental housing. One of the things proposed by the minister in his speech of September 21 was the lowering of the down payment by one-sixth. That is going to assist some people to come in under these housing projects. That one-sixth, of course, has to do with the difference between the cost of the house and the amount of the loan. It will be of great assistance in reducing the down payment, and to that extent will be a benefit; but the point I particularly want to mention right now is the purchase price. In the little pamphlet I referred to a moment ago it is mentioned that the price must be fair and reasonable and in his speech the minister emphasized that point. This brings me to the matter referred to the other day by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), when he emphasized the sanctity of contracts. I like that expression; but no government in this country has had less regard for the sanctity of contracts than this government under the National Housing Act as administered by the former minister. I want to repeat that; no government has had less regard for the sanctity of contracts than this federal government under the National Housing Act, as administered by the former minister.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Illustrate.

Mr. Johnston: Illustrate? Let me refer to the contracts that were let in Calgary, which ranged anywhere from $6,600 to $8,125. Now, the end price was set; the contract was drawn up; the mortgage was drawn up; and everything was fixed including the escalator clause and the maximum of it was set, too. Then, when the people who bought those houses and signed those mortgages and contracts asked the government to fulfil that agreement, the government said: We have nothing to do with it. All they were asking was that the government abide by the contract. The government itself had set that price. These men had the contracts literally thrown in their face, and they lost all the money they put into them. When we talk about the sanctity of contracts, let us make that apply to this government as well as to any other concern in the country.

I am leaving out about seventy-five per cent of my notes, Mr. Speaker, because my time is running short. I shall have to take those matters up in committee.

Mr. Fleming: Give us some more of those illustrations.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, I want to refer to that illustration. I should like to go back and read some more from Judge Ian Macdonnell's statement of Thursday, September 29.

> Angus McClaskey, the Ontario regional supervisor of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, said his organization put up twenty-five per cent of the first mortgages on the Pelmo homes.
> He said the corporation has been faced with this type of problem for two years and "has come to the conclusion that the solution does not lie in the relationship between the purchaser and the mortgage company."
> "We feel that as a corporation we cannot undertake to police vendor-purchaser transactions. We think this matter lies within the field of provincial legislation."

At this point, may I ask, is it any wonder I am suspicious? This is one of the supervisors of Central Mortgage and Housing, one of the officials concerned with the provincial-federal relationship, who is trying to get out from under some of the difficulties.

The article continues:

> "Possibly there should be amendments to the Mechanics' Lien Act or in a licensing system for builders."

This is passing the buck to the provinces.

May I stop at this point to indicate one of the other recommendations I made a few years ago—when I mentioned it to the minister he said he was going to give consideration to it but whether he has, I do not know—and it was this: When we have contractors handling millions of dollars, then I believe those contractors should be bonded. They should not be licensed, they should be bonded. If that action were taken, it would not cost the government any more, even if the government had to pay the bonding fee. It would relieve the government of a great deal of responsibility because the bonding company would see to it that the conditions of the contract were carried out.

> Mr. McClaskey said it would be impractical for the crown corporation to hold money in trust for would-be home owners.

Now, that is quite contradictory to what Judge Macdonnell recommends, and contradictory to what I believe is in the minister's mind. Mr. McClaskey does not think it feasible to provide a trusteeship for these down payments, and in that I strongly disagree with him.

> He said the corporation tried to do this in conjunction with its integrated housing program for veterans. Under this plan, money from purchasers is held in trust. Builders are required to give the corporation a waiver on all liens, . . .

I come to this question, Mr. Speaker, of reducing costs. It does seem to me that these houses are costing more money than is necessary when they are built on a large scale.

There is a difference between a private contractor who is building a house, or perhaps two houses, and a man who is building twenty, forty or fifty houses. There is a great deal of difference in the cost of operation, for instance, in digging the basements. There is a great difference between having a machine come to dig fifty basements at once and having a machine come to dig one basement at a time. In large-scale operations a profit of $500 per unit is a tremendous amount. A great deal of money can be made at that rate. Five hundred dollars' profit for a contractor on a single unit is not too large. I would not think it was out of line at all, but of course it would depend on the type of house.

By means of research in the construction field, we could find new methods of construction. I could point some out to you, but my time is slipping by. Proper building inspection could be provided, and it would materially lower the costs to the government and the builder. Then, we could have proper control of the financing. I refer particularly to the mismanagement of finance by the lending institutions. I shall not dwell on it at this point, except to say that some of these lending institutions—I was going to say appropriate money, but that would not be the right term—are confiscating money which belongs to the purchaser for which the lending institution has never performed one bit of work. I do not think that should be permitted. I shall deal with that at length on another occasion.

I believe there is another point at which we could very well lower the cost of housing, and that is by the government cutting out some of these burdensome sales taxes which apply to items used in home construction. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the government could well afford to do that and the country would appreciate it. I believe the builders, too, would benefit if this government were to appoint a royal commission to investigate housing. I know the minister's answer to that, because I have it before me in the form of a press statement. He does not intend to appoint a royal commission. I have a clipping of the editorial before me, but I shall not bother to read it. It refers to the Canadian Construction Association and Ottawa building contractors who do not appreciate having a royal commission investigate this matter. Despite those two objections, I do not know whether the minister is very determined in his viewpoint. I believe there is a good deal of advantage in having a royal commission investigate the housing problem. Because it is so urgent that we have homes for our people to live in, because it is a financial problem and the government and the taxpayers indirectly have such a large financial investment in this project, I believe it would be well worth having a royal commission look into these housing projects.

I intended to speak at some length, Mr. Speaker, on low-rental projects. A great majority of the people in this country cannot afford to pay the rents that are being required. You know it is a strange thing that the people who live in the poorest houses in Canada receive an income so low that the low rents of today are simply far beyond their reach. This housing problem with which we are faced today is not going to be solved by the type of house that is being built today. I have not the time to go into that matter, however.

Perhaps I could just take one moment to read a section from this circular which I received from the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. It contains the views of that organization on low-rental housing.

> The federation, over the years, and more urgently during recent years, has urged the federal government to initiate a national program of subsidized low-rental housing. It again points out, that, as of the moment, the federal authorities, themselves, estimate that there are 300,000 more family units in Canada than there are houses to accommodate them. The great bulk of these families are low and average wage income families.
> Moreover, according to a recent survey of the dominion bureau of statistics, nearly two-thirds of the urban tenants of Canada were paying less than $30 a month; of these, about one-half were paying less than $20 a month; and 5 per cent were paying less than $10.
> Measured in terms of the demonstrable unmet need for housing accommodation; and the rent-paying capacity of those who comprise a major part of the population; there can be no question that the greatest housing need in Canada today is that for low-wage income families. Unable to afford the economic rents of new housing at the prevailing high construction costs, their housing needs cannot be met save by some form of subsidized housing.

May I interject and say that I agree with them wholeheartedly. Then they go on:

> Meanwhile, the housing problem worsens for low-wage income families. Less and less housing accommodation is available to them because the proportion of new family formations is greater among them than among any other economic groups. With no new housing at all being constructed for low-wage families, congestion becomes greater and greater and conditions, already deplorable, become completely intolerable. The situation has reached the point where any further delay in at least a start on low-rental housing projects can only be regarded as a national calamity.

I think that is sufficient to show what an organization such as the national executive committee and advisory board of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities has to say about this condition and it requires no further explanation from me to show how great a need there is for this emergency housing program. I am aware that the minister appreciates all these things. I am aware that he knows of these conditions because I think they prevail in abundance down in his own neighbourhood. And there are many of those conditions in the rest of Canada. But sympathy is not enough. It is going to take a great deal of daring on the minister's part. He is probably going to have to step away from those old conservative ideas which the former minister of reconstruction had; and he is going to have to be a little bit more liberal in his views and actions. I have great hopes that the present minister will do something to meet the situation. Time alone will tell.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I had also intended, Mr. Speaker, to speak at some length tonight. In view of what has already been said, however, I shall restrict my remarks to about five minutes, and I shall keep to the resolution and to the statements which the minister made tonight. I feel that the minister took a step—true, it was a faltering and hesitant step; it was a cautious, and even ambiguous step; but it may have been a step.

Mr. Fleming: Forward or backward?

Mr. Thatcher: I hope it was forward. One had to examine his statement carefully, but I think the step he took was a forward one. It seems to me that in this debate on the resolution, and on the bill when it comes up for discussion, we must keep one fact in mind, namely, that in 1945, according to the government's own advisory committee, there was a shortage of 750,000 homes; and that, according to the statement the minister made some weeks ago, approximately the same shortage still exists. In other words, little progress has been made in meeting the backlog.

I assume that the statement which the minister made today, and the resolution that he has placed before us, is the government's answer to the housing problem. I think it is fair for hon. members tonight to ask themselves and to ask the minister this question: Does this resolution, or does the bill which is to be introduced, offer any tangible solution to the housing problem which is facing us? I hope it does, but from the minister's language tonight I am not quite sure. For instance, the minister said:

> The legislation which we intend to introduce is of an enabling character . . . We have no knowledge of the extent to which provincial governments will participate in arrangements contemplated by the legislation . . .

What does that mean? Does it not mean that before any action on housing can be taken the various provincial legislatures will have to be called together? That may be four, five or six months from now. Then if any action is to be taken, each of those legislatures must approve and give leadership. In other words, the minister is leaving the prime responsibility up to the various provincial governments; and it looks to me—although I may be wrong—as though action might not be taken until late next spring, if ever, because some of the provincial governments may not be financially able, or may not desire, to take such action on housing.

Exactly what is the government proposing in this resolution? I think there are two main proposals. First of all, the minister is proposing in effect that the down payment should be cut in half. I want to say at once that I think many citizens will welcome this step because formerly they found it difficult to finance the down payment. But the lower down payment is going to mean higher carrying or interest charges, and in the final analysis it is also going to mean a higher cost to the purchaser. The lower down payment simply means a higher mortgage, and many Canadians today cannot even handle the mortgage charges which national housing has at the present time.

Then there is this additional factor, as I understand it, in the province of Ontario. I understand that Premier Frost and his government have for some time carried second mortgages.

Mr. Fleming: For two and a half years.

Mr. Thatcher: If I have read newspaper reports correctly, Premier Frost is now suggesting that, when this legislation goes through, the Ontario government will discontinue the practice of carrying second mortgages. What does this mean? It means that the average citizen in Ontario, which is the most populous province of Canada, and the province where the housing situation is most acute, is not going to be any better off with regard to the down payment than he was before. What the federal government is taking over, the Ontario government is leaving off. I therefore suggest that one of the main proposals of this resolution may not be effective. The second major proposition which the minister suggests is this. He says:

> The arrangements provide that if any proposed project is deemed to be reasonable, the dominion will be prepared to proceed with the provinces in land assembly, the building of houses for sale, and the erection of rental housing either on an economic or a subsidized basis.

I was pleased tonight to hear the minister, and through him the government, at last use the word "subsidized". I hope it means what it purports to mean. I hope that the government really is anxious to do something about subsidized housing; although, as I said when I started, the phrasing is so ambiguous that it is hard to tell. I do not know whether the legislation which the minister is contemplating is going to mean a great many more houses for Canada. Certainly the minister was rather dubious on September 21 when he introduced the legislation. As he is reported at page 121 of Hansard, he said:

> No one can estimate the amount of additional housing which these proposals will create.

Then he went on to say:

> The measures proposed today should be helpful.

I would think they should be or why would he be bringing them before the house? He goes on to say:

> They may have the effect of increasing the total number of completions.

They may have, he says. Was there ever such a lack of enthusiasm on the part of a minister when bringing in legislation to meet an acute and desperate problem? If there was, I have not seen it. The minister seems to be anything but enthusiastic. There was one other feature of the statement he made last September 21 which worried me a little. This is what he said about government policy:

> The policy as enunciated by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in 1946 is the keystone of our present policy; that is, the creation of conditions favourable to a large housing program by private individuals and companies.

In other words, although the minister admits that private enterprise from 1945 to 1949 has not been able to solve our housing problem, he says that government policy is still the same. I am a little concerned, then. Surely by this time we can see that, if this housing problem is to be met, private enterprise must at least be supplemented by government spending on a substantial scale. The C.C.F. group would suggest a three-point program for improving the acute housing shortage. First we suggest a large-scale program of subsidized low-rental housing. I might say, as was pointed out earlier this evening by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), that we are not the only ones who have made such a proposal. The mayors association suggested it in 1947. The Canadian Legion suggested a similar program in 1948. The Canadian welfare council have proposed it. Many organizations have suggested low-rental subsidized housing on a substantial scale. I hope that the minister is prepared to embark on this type of housing but I am not sure—

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Whose money would we use?

Mr. Thatcher: Partly federal government money.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I thought it was C.C.F. money.

Mr. Knowles: Many Liberal candidates suggested it.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Mr. Thatcher: In the second place, I would suggest that private home building should be financed at interest rates of 2½ per cent or less. Even in the United States, private home building is financed in many cases at 2 per cent or less. In New Zealand about 30,000 homes have been built and financed at interest rates of 1 per cent or 1½ per cent. If New Zealand can do this I see no reason why Canada cannot do likewise. I believe the cost to the dominion government of borrowing money is between 2½ per cent and 3 per cent at the present time. Certainly the money should be lent at least at cost, and not at 4½ per cent as Central Mortgage and Housing are charging at the present time.

In the third place, Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. group suggests that some genuine effort should be made to bring down construction costs. I think it is feasible that, by large-scale housing projects, construction costs could be reduced. The Canadian Congress of Labour suggested it the other day.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would you bring down the price of hardware?

Mr. Thatcher: Yes, bring that down also. I was interested to note a reply which the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) gave, when he was asked to investigate the high cost of housing. According to the Canadian Press—and I quote the Montreal Star—the minister said this. The heading is:

> New Housing Inquiry Plea Rejected
> Winters Says Problem Closely Watched

How gratified those Canadians who have been living in two or three rooms since 1945 will be to note that the problem is being watched. We think that more effective action should be taken. Let me say that we welcome the steps which the minister has suggested tonight. They are the first tangible steps we have seen any member of the government take recently, but we do not feel that they are yet the answer to the housing problem which is facing this country.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fleming: Some of us had hoped that the minister might make some reply to the remarks that have been uttered in the house tonight. He has not done so, and for that reason I take it that it is necessary to ask some of the questions that were indicated in the remarks of hon. members tonight. What policy is the government going to adopt in regard to rent control?

Mr. Winters: I am not in a position to enunciate government policy. That is a matter that will be announced in due course by the appropriate member of the government, one of my colleagues.

Mr. Fleming: Is the house, either at the resolution stage or at a later stage on the bill, not to be told what the government's policy is to be in regard to rent control? Are we to be expected to deal with apparently the one measure in regard to housing that the government intends to bring in at this session, legislation that is to have a direct bearing on the building of houses for rent, without having any indication given to us as to the policy, if any, of the government, in regard to the continuation of rent control? Everybody throughout the country is asking; what is the government's policy on rent control? Tenants are asking it; landlords are asking it; provincial governments are asking it; and this government maintains a sphinx-like silence. Are they to take the house into their confidence on this question?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Does the hon. gentleman suggest that we hand back rent controls to the provinces?

Mr. Fleming: No, I do not suggest that, but if that is the policy the ministers are going to adopt I do suggest that they make up their minds, and tell the provinces so that the provinces will have some warning to take steps to meet the problem that will thus be created if this government fobs that problem back on them. If this is what the dominion government is going to do, let them make up their minds and say so. It will be a bad enough situation when it arises. If the government is going to throw that problem back on the provinces the very least they can do is to give the provinces some warning of it.

What kind of treatment is this to give to the House of Commons, Mr. Chairman? Here is the one chance we have had this year to talk about housing. Here is the one measure that the government brings forward for action by the house, and we are not to be told what the policy of the government is in regard to the continuation of rent control. Surely that is treating the House of Commons with a measure of disdain and contempt to which it should not submit.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): There are half a dozen ways of asking the same question which has already received a proper answer.

Mr. Fraser: What is a proper answer?

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It will be announced in due course.

Mr. Fraser: That is the kind of answer we generally get to all our questions.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): We cannot rely on your questions.

Mr. Johnston: In his statement on September 21 the minister said that they were planning to co-operate with the provinces. He suggested that possibly some of the provinces might not see fit to co-operate with the government in the proposed legislation. What will be the position of the dominion government in regard to those provinces that do not co-operate with this new plan?

Mr. Winters: I do not think I should be put in the position of anticipating what anybody might do with respect to this legislation. When I made my statement on September 21 I said that all the provinces, that is, the appropriate ministers with whom I spoke, were co-operative and that they all viewed the problem as a serious one. While I have no assurance about what they will do with respect to this enabling legislation I am hopeful that all the provinces who have a problem will take advantage of this legislation. Some of them have already indicated that they would. There are others who have given no indication one way or the other. All we can do at this stage is wait and see what happens.

Mr. Graydon: During the minister's discussion with the provincial premiers was rent control discussed?

Mr. Winters: My answer to that must be that it was not discussed officially, because at all times I was obliged to take the position that I take here tonight, namely, that I am not responsible for problems of rent control.

Mr. Graydon: I take it there was some talk on it.

Mr. Rooney: In listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton tonight I made some notes. One of the main points was that he suggested the setting up of a research department to study building costs. Is it not a fact that the minister is doing this work under the research department of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? If I remember correctly, $5 million was allotted for that work.

Mr. Winters: That is right. Under section 27A, part V of the act, there is an amount allotted not to exceed $5 million to cover cost of research, including research into building costs. So far, since the act came into effect approximately $1,250,000 has been spent for research purposes.

Mr. Johnston: Of what does the research consist?

Mr. Winters: It is set out in part V of the act, which is a long part. I would suggest, with due respect, that hon. members look it up. There is ample opportunity to read it.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad the hon. member for St. Paul's has raised this point, because it has just exposed the fact that there has not been behind the administration of this act the drive it requires. I should add for the information of the hon. member that I did not advocate the setting up of a research department; I did not use the word "department" at all. I advocated intensive research, but hon. members will see that we have not been getting it. Provision was made for $5 million in 1945, I believe it was, and we see how little drive there has been behind research in that period of time, when only a fraction of that sum has been spent.

A moment ago the minister completed one of his answers with the characteristic words "wait and see". We are getting tired of that in the House of Commons. I am tired of being asked to wait and see in connection with this matter of rent control. I cannot get an answer from the minister. He says—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has had ample opportunity to ask questions of the minister. The minister has already stated that this is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course. The hon. member should be satisfied with the answer.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: If he is not, then I do not think the resolution now before the committee calls for any announcement on rental control. As it states, the resolution before the committee deals with amending the National Housing Act, and I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to that resolution.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I have two things to say in reply to your statement: First, I am not satisfied—and let me make that clear. You suggest I should be satisfied, and I say I am not. And further, I do not see how anyone can be. In the second place, I say this—and let the minister deny it if he will; let him stand in his place and deny it—that we cannot discuss a resolution of this kind which contemplates a measure of assistance in respect of house-building and renting without knowing what the government's policy, if any, is in regard to rent control. Those two things cannot be separated; it is not possible to do so.

I turn elsewhere in the house. Perhaps someone else might be able to supply the information, if the minister is not prepared to do so. For instance, we have in the house this evening Liberal members from Toronto —but they have not participated in the debate tonight. I am sorry they have not. For instance, I had hoped—

An hon. Member: Give them a chance.

Mr. Fleming: They say they cannot, do they? Are there restrictions? Are their mouths stopped by the government? They have had ample opportunity tonight, if they had wanted to rise in their places and speak. These are the members who last spring were so full of determination to beat the housing problem! Yes, they were going to have it beaten before the snow flies—and we are told we are going to have snowflurries tomorrow. Yet the housing problem is still with us.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are getting a lot of wind tonight.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Rosedale sent out a letter recently to members of the House of Commons asking them to bring forward evidence respecting the necessity for continuing rent controls. I should think this should be an appropriate opportunity for him to address the committee on the subject. Then, there is the hon. member for Spadina, who had a good deal to say about housing during the election campaign. The government was going to do great things! Then, at a conference between members of the Liberal party and the mayor of Toronto about two months ago the hon. member for Spadina, speaking on behalf of the assembled Liberal members, assured the mayor that the government was going to carry out its promise, and that we were going to have housing.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot permit the hon. member to go on like this, with that—

An hon. Member: Stuff.

The Deputy Chairman: —sort of speech. The hon. member should ask the minister his questions, or speak to the resolution before the committee. I must ask him to return to the subject matter of the resolution, and not to deal with matters completely extraneous to it.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I am talking about housing. Is not this resolution one which concerns housing?

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member would talk about housing it would be quite in order.

Mr. Fleming: I affirm that it is in order for members to discuss promises made before the election, in which they stated what they were going to do in the House of Commons, if elected, to improve the housing problem. Surely this resolution relates to the housing problem.

I would like to know what my hon. friend from St. Paul's has to say on this subject tonight. He has a very serious housing problem in his riding—a very serious one. I had hoped the hon. member would take the opportunity to say something about housing in his riding,—

An hon. Member: Give him a chance.

Mr. Fleming: —and how this government is failing to meet it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the resolution carried?

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you the chairman?

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for St. Paul's was on his feet. After him I wish to speak.

Mr. Fleming: I sat down because I thought the hon. member for St. Paul's had something to say.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Eglinton completed his remarks, or is he acceding to the request of the hon. member for St. Paul's to address a question?

Mr. Fleming: I thought the hon. member was rising to speak and I sat down to permit him to do so.

An hon. Member: What courtesy!

Mr. Fleming: Has he a question?

Mr. Fraser: He can't say anything. You have stopped him.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Go on with your speech, if you have something to say.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Surely this is the time for those to whom I have referred, and others who are familiar with housing conditions in their ridings, to stand in their places in the House of Commons and demand effective action. If the action they deem necessary to meet housing conditions in their riding includes the continuation of rent control beyond March 31, then let them rise and say so. This is their opportunity.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What a lecture!

Mr. Henry: Speaking as one from Toronto, we are perfectly satisfied that we are getting action.

Mr. Fleming: Does that include rent control?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Peterborough West has the floor.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister a question as to who is allowed to buy or rent a house from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There seems to be some difference in different sections where these houses are put up. I know of veterans who served overseas for five years, who have had their names in from one to three years or more, and who have not yet received houses. These are veterans with two or more children. Still they have not houses, while others who have come from outside have been given them. That does not seem right.

I have complained to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in my own constituency and also here in Ottawa, but have received no satisfaction. There should be provision for the veterans. I have in mind one case where the veteran has had his application in for two or three years, and has been refused a house. He has been told that he will have to go to the wartime prices and trade board and get a notice from them saying that he has to get out of the house he is in. Despite the fact that Central Mortgage knows that he has had notice from his landlord to get out, they say that he must get this notice from the wartime prices and trade board. Must veterans be put out on the street before they can obtain these houses? It looks to me as though there is a lot of favouritism going on, and the veterans feel that way also. Can the minister tell the committee what the regulations are in regard to this matter and if they are the same throughout Canada?

Mr. Winters: There is a point-rating system which has been carried on throughout this entire operation and which is subject to close scrutiny by the Canadian Legion. So far as I know, this system is acceptable to the Legion and I have yet to hear of an instance where the Legion has said that there has been discrimination against any veteran. This point-rating system takes into consideration a man's service overseas, the number of children he has, the type of accommodation in which he is living, the length of time he has been in the district and other factors. Every effort is made to administer this system fairly in the interests of all concerned.

It is understandable that there will be those who feel that they have a high classification in one category, but when the over-all picture is viewed it is found that some other veteran has prior right to a vacant rental house. As I say, it has been administered fairly and I believe that belief is held by the Legion.

Mr. Fraser: Does the minister feel that an outsider should get a house before a man who enlisted from the district? I do not think that is right.

Mr. Winters: Other things being equal, I do not think it is fair.

Mr. Shaw: Is there any way by which inspections can be speeded up? I know of a number of houses where the completion was held up unnecessarily for a period of weeks because the necessary inspections were not made. The individual owner was not in position to make the payments necessary to carry on. I know of cases where it has taken twice the normal period to complete the houses that it would have taken had the builders been allowed to carry on with an unbroken continuity.

Mr. Winters: I presume the hon. member is referring to houses built under joint loans by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and a lending institution. Under that arrangement the inspection is the responsibility of the lending institution. We have been trying to impress upon them the necessity of adequate and prompt inspection and are hopeful that we are coming closer to getting that.

Mr. Graydon: Does the research department of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation collect data on the need of houses in various parts of Canada? I ask that question in order to ascertain if the information is available should hon. members desire it.

Mr. Winters: The research department of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation carries on studies on a dominion-wide and area basis.

Mr. Noseworthy: Is Central Mortgage taking any steps to prevent a repetition of the Pelmo Park incident?

Mr. Winters: The project referred to by the hon. member is somewhat the same as the one referred to by the hon. member for Bow River. In that case the arrangements made were the normal arrangements that would be made between an ordinary purchaser and a lending institution, although part of the money involved is federal government money.

Mr. Johnston: The minister's answer sounds all right on the surface, but as an actual fact there is not a great deal of relationship between the purchaser and the lending institution. Alterations are actually made in a house after the purchaser has signed the agreement with the mortgage company. The only thing in the form of a contract between any of the parties is the agreement entered into with Central Mortgage and Housing.

The minister says that this is the normal relationship between the purchaser and the lending institution, but as a matter of fact there is very little relationship as far as the purchaser is concerned. The initial work is between Central Mortgage and Housing, the lending institution and the contractor, and in some cases the house is started before the purchaser buys it. With conditions like that existing, I do not think the minister's answer is applicable to the question asked.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister table the correspondence with the premiers on this subject?

Mr. Winters: I shall be glad to table that correspondence subject to the usual reservation that we shall obtain permission from the provinces.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister indicate the policy under this measure in regard to payments to the municipalities in lieu of taxes?

Mr. Winters: As I stated on September 21, we will pay grants in lieu of taxes on the basis of the normal level of taxes in the particular municipality, subject to approval by the provincial department of municipal affairs or the equivalent department.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will any definite arrangements be made with the Newfoundland government under this resolution to provide for the clearance of slum areas in St. John's and the building of five hundred houses, according to statements that have been made?

Mr. Winters: The bill that will be founded on this resolution will apply equally to Newfoundland. I think the hon. member is referring to operations that would be carried on under the slum clearance section of the present act. There is no reference to that section in the resolution.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That would be under the present act.

Mr. Winters: Under the present act.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Winters thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will resume the debate on the budget.

Mr. Graydon: And if we finish?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will try to get into supply and call one item in external affairs.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENTS

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

Office of the Prime Minister
Province of Quebec

Quebec, October 26, 1949

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

I have submitted today to my colleagues of the executive council of the province the letter which you forwarded to me under date of October 21 and which I have received Monday morning the 24th.

In your letter you say:

"It seems to me that we have both made our positions very clear and that it would not serve any useful purpose to continue our correspondence until such time as we are in a position to extend invitations to the provincial governments to confer with us on this subject."

Indubitably our respective positions have been made "very clear" The government of the province of Quebec reiterates the statements made in the letters which I sent you under date of September 21st last and October 5th and 19th instant.

As you are no doubt aware, our legislature usually undertakes in January to give consideration to the very important measures on the program of our annual session. Will you kindly let me know when the Canadian intergovernmental conference which you propose to call in order to deal with constitutional matters is to be held?

This information is necessary to us, and we should like to have it as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. Duplessis

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, October 29, 1949

Hon. Maurice L. Duplessis, M.L.A.,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

I have submitted your letter of the 26th instant to my colleagues in the government and we feel that it would be desirable to hold the proposed dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada early in the new year.

Since other provincial governments, like the government of Quebec, will no doubt wish to make plans for their legislative sessions, I am writing today to the premiers of all the provinces suggesting that the conference begin its sessions on Tuesday, January 10, 1950, if that date appears to be generally convenient.

I should be pleased to have your views on this point.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

THE FOLLOWING IS THE TEXT OF A LETTER SENT TO ALL PROVINCIAL PREMIERS WITH THE EXCEPTION OF THE PREMIER OF QUEBEC:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, October 29, 1949

My dear Premier:

I have received a letter from the premier of Quebec inquiring as to the date proposed for the dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada.

I have replied today to Mr. Duplessis suggesting that the conference begin its sessions on Tuesday, January 10, 1950, if that date appears to be generally convenient.

I should be pleased to have your views on this point.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 1, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

REPORT OF COMMISSION APPOINTED TO INVESTIGATE INCIDENTS ON CERTAIN SHIPS AND OTHER RELATED MATTERS

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, following disciplinary troubles on several of the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy, I appointed a commission to investigate and report on the causes of these incidents and other related matters. The commission consisted of Rear Admiral E. R. Mainguy, O.B.E., chairman; Mr. L. W. Brockington, C.M.G., K.C., and Mr. Louis C. Audette, members. I believe everyone will agree that the reputations and personalities of the members of the commission created respect and inspired confidence.

The commission has made its report, and its recommendations are being examined. As the report itself points out, several of its recommendations had already been carried out before the report was made, and many others are well on the way to being implemented. Although the report might be regarded as confidential, it has been decided that in this case the general interest would be served by making its contents public. As hon. members have expressed interest, it would probably meet the wish of the house if a copy of the report were tabled.

I should like to take this opportunity of expressing warmest appreciation to the members of the inquiry. Each of the three members brought to this task outstanding qualifications. The report is a highly constructive and useful document of general interest, and it will be of great value in the work of developing the navy on sound lines. Its findings should prove invaluable in furthering the great reputation and traditions of the Canadian navy, earned so magnificently in time of war by its major contribution to victory at sea.

TRADE

CONSULTATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture. As the deputy ministers of those two departments have recently returned from the United Kingdom following a conference, will either of the ministers state whether any new agreements or contracts are contemplated?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The deputy ministers of trade and commerce and of agriculture went to the United Kingdom to place the views of this government before the officials of the corresponding departments in the United Kingdom. The government is now waiting to hear the views of the ministers on the representations that were made.

Mr. Fraser: When will the minister make a statement to the house?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY BILL—QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): The hour from eight to nine tonight is reserved for private bills, and I notice that, according to the order paper, item No. 49 will be considered tonight. This item reads as follows:

Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66 (letter E of the Senate), intituled: "An act to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company."

Will this bill be referred to one of the standing committees of the house in order that they may make a detailed study of it? As I see it, the bill creates a huge franchise for the private promoters, and there is no control over rates. The Bell Telephone bill a few years ago was referred to a committee for detailed study, although it came from another place.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is my understanding that the bill will be referred to the appropriate committee of the House of Commons, which I believe is the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO ABOLITION OF RECEIVING LICENCE FEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Some announcements have been made outside the house by private members supporting the government to the effect that the licence fee for receiving sets is to be done away with next year. Is that correct?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I have no information, Mr. Speaker, except what I have seen in the papers. Persons who make statements of that kind do so entirely on their own responsibility.

Mr. Graydon: In other words, they are talking through their hats.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it the intention of the government to set up the radio committee at the present session, so that we can find out?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Graydon: No; there is a question to be answered.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Possibly I should answer that question. When it becomes the intention of the government to set up a radio committee, an announcement will be made in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say to the Prime Minister that private members should not announce radio policy outside of this parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent: It may perhaps be the privilege of the hon. member for Lake Centre to lecture other private members; it is not mine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Graydon: If you applaud that, you will applaud anything.

Mr. Cruickshank: Get a new leader.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR IMPROVED PARKING FACILITIES IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Owing to the scarcity of parking space for civil servants and employees of the government, would it be possible to use the excavated dirt and other material that is being taken from the site of the new veterans affairs building and use it at the back of the confederation building to make parking space, instead of hauling all this material over to Hull?

Mr. Cruickshank: That is the best one you have asked yet; that is sensible.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Lots of dirt.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): It may be possible to comply with the request made by the hon. member; but having received no notice of his question, I shall have to look into the matter further and give a proper answer later during the session.

UNITED NATIONS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF ADDRESS OF MR. MARTIN AT LAKE SUCCESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Has the attention of the government been called to the report in this morning's Ottawa Citizen of a speech made yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who is second in command of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations at Lake Success? Speaking to students of the university of Montreal international relations club, who were visiting United Nations headquarters at Lake Success, the minister said that the United Nations "will gradually assume legislative character," and that "the International Court of Justice will assume responsibilities similar to those held by national supreme courts." Does this represent government policy, or not?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but though I did my best, I could not hear the hon. member's question. I shall have to read it in Hansard, and then I will attempt to give him an answer.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, October 25, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I intend, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the question of oil in Canada, its history, its growth, and finally its markets. I want to make it plain that I am speaking entirely on my own, because on the question of markets I know I shall be in disagreement with many members of the house, and perhaps even with members of my own party.

But before proceeding to do this, conscious as I am of the latitude which I have in the budget debate, I want to pay a well-deserved tribute to some men whom I do not know. In the newspapers last week I noticed a report that two old friends of mine had been elected to the hockey hall of fame. The trustees, or whoever control that organization, must be fairly old, because they have elected as one of their executives Mr. Donald H. Bain, of Winnipeg, familiarly known as Don Bain. In the days when I was a boy he was the greatest hockey player that western Canada ever produced. He then formed the Winnipeg skating club, and today at seventy-five he is one of the best figure skaters in Canada. The other man who was elected is an old friend and opponent of mine, Mr. Art Ross, of the Boston club. I can assure you, sir, that he was the fastest stick man I ever came in contact with. He has done much for the present game. The net that is now used in hockey games was an invention of his.

Having spread this kind of oil, probably I had better turn to the oil in the province of Alberta with which it is my intention particularly to deal. It is only in recent years that oil production in Alberta has been quite active, but the history of it goes back fifty years, to two old-timers, Lafayette French and Kootenay Brown. Near Pincher creek they found some Indians around a slough. They were skimming from it an oily substance which they were using internally as a purgative and rubbing on their old and withered joints to loosen them up. These men drilled a shallow well from which nothing came; but it will be remembered that that well was on the site on which the Gulf Oil Company have now discovered what is easily the largest wet gas field ever discovered in Canada, and perhaps the largest ever discovered in the world.

In 1914 a company which had been organized locally drilled in the Turner valley. They went down to only 2,700 feet, because in the banks of the Sheep river was a seepage of gas. The promoter of that little company was the smartest man I knew then, because he took greenhorns there to look into the oil situation, shoved a stick into the ground on the edge of the river, lit the gas flare with a match, and fried a couple of eggs. That was his first step in the promotion of this company. It is a well known fact that in the early days of the round-up on this particular seepage the old cow hands did their cooking without the aid of wood or other fuel of the kind.

Later a company incorporated in Calgary found oil near this same Sheep river. They drilled to 2,700 feet and found oil and gas in what became known as the Dalhousie sand. A few years later a local company, now known as the Royalite company—it was local capital—with the assistance of Imperial Oil, which owned Royalite, drilled a well and found wet gas. So far as we in southern Alberta were concerned they found it just in time, because we were running out of natural gas. For years, from this old No. 4 Royalite well, that whole southern area was supplied with gas. It was a wet gas—which simply means a gas holding a liquid in solution. After the liquid was removed it was known as a white product. In other words, it was as colourless as the purest water you can find. We are still getting some of the white product from that area.

In 1924, I think it was, Bob Brown and George Bell went down the flank, as they said; and that was the first discovery of crude oil in western Canada. That field reached its peak in 1942, when it produced 30,000 barrels a day. From that discovery the field has already yielded 100 million barrels of crude oil and 1,500 billion cubic feet of gas. I do not know what these tremendous figures mean. A ten-dollar bill is the limit of my thinking in a financial way. I have difficulty in understanding millions and billions.

That field is now pretty well gone. It is estimated to hold 25 million barrels of oil and 500 billion feet of gas. The house might be interested in knowing just what the operation is down there now. Up at the top the first well was drilled to roughly 6,000 feet. There gas was found. Brown went down the slope and found crude oil. Other people have gone further down the slope and have found salt water, which is not much good to anyone. The point is that in order to get your oil to the surface, gas is your major if not your only motive power. What they try to do is to hit that crude oil by going down from the top. Remember, the surface of the ground is all level; what I am speaking of is in the rock underneath. There they found what is called Madison limestone, and it contained crude oil and gas. Therefore you see mother nature working. There is salt water at the bottom, oil next, and above that the lighter material, shall I say, in specific gravity; this is at the top. It is put there at a pressure of perhaps 2,000 pounds to the square inch. Therefore with the gas pressing on the oil on top, and the water pushing from the bottom, up the pipe comes the oil, and that is how they get it up. It is later refined into gasoline. That is the standard way in which all oil comes to the surface. Of course when the motive power is gone you can put it on the pump and make a considerable recovery in that way.

Perhaps ninety per cent of the oil wells in California are now pumping in the old way. It is the same principle as the operation of your water pump at home, but on a larger scale; and it is operated by a walking beam which simply goes up and down. It is the same walking beam which drills the hole. In other words, in the old days all holes were drilled by what were called standard tools or standard equipment. This simply means that you have a great long piece of sharpened steel—and when I say sharpened I do not want hon. members to think of a knife; it is wrinkled as it were on the end, and it pounds, pounds on the rock. That is the way all oil wells were drilled prior to the discovery of the rotary machine, which simply means that you have what is called a rotary table put in, and your works above, and that spins the pipe in the centre, called the drill pipe. At the end of the drill pipe away down you have what is known as a bit, and it whirls away and grinds up the rock rather than simply pound, pound. It is infinitely faster. Now that they have caught up with their equipment I do not know of any standard rigs that are working in the oil fields in the province of Alberta to get the oil to the surface.

Then they put on what we call a Smith separator. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not named after me. The principle is very simple. It is by the quick expansion of this gas that the liquid is thrown out. It goes down into the bottom of the separator, while gas comes out the top. The gas which is expelled, still containing some oil, is then taken to what is called an absorption plant. That plant takes the remaining liquid from the gas, and it too is a white product or distillate. That gas then goes to what is called a scrubbing plant, where the sulphur is scrubbed out of it. The gas in that area is not sweet; it is sulphurous. By this treatment the sulphur is removed from the gas, which is now dry. It then goes into the pipe line on to Calgary or other points. But it cannot all be used. They pipe it back into the ground with the remaining oil, by the use of compressors, and then it serves two purposes: it maintains the motive power in the ground to lift the oil, and it also is the cheapest storage you can get in order to use it again. Then it comes back to the city of Calgary to be burned in furnaces.

I may say, sir, that I built my first house in Calgary in 1912, and although we live on a coal bed, I have never since burned a pound of coal for cooking or heating or anything of that kind.

After that an intensive search was carried out, but it was all on the eastern slope of the rockies, either in the foothills or in the eastern mountains themselves. To give you an idea of costs, sir, there is one hole that was drilled sixty miles north of Jasper, in connection with which a company, or several companies joining in drilling the one hole, spent $1,250,000 cash and got nothing. I mention that to show the cost of drilling wells.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Gulf Oil drilled down in the Pincher creek area at this great cost, and discovered two wells. Both are between 12,000 and 13,000 feet deep—over two and a half miles. Both cost over $1 million. Therefore I say—and this is fairly good proof of it—that people who hazard capital in this way are entitled to a good return in the mining business; they regard oil as a mining business, and so do I.

In the meantime a comparatively new instrument has come into use; I refer to the seismograph. It is the instrument that is used to record an earthquake in Turkey, for instance, or in the middle of the Pacific ocean, or the Argentine, or some other place. But in oil operations it is used in a different way.

Science has advanced this business very appreciably and very fast. You have a seismograph crew who go out with a small derrick on the back of a truck, and you drill down to bedrock. In most parts of Alberta that is not very far. Then down that hole you put a charge of dynamite. You explode the charge; and on your instrument, which perhaps will be a couple of hundred yards away—it is an electrical affair—you find that the noise of the charge striking the various strata of rock has been recorded. The result is that you know roughly where the Devonian limestone is. That is where our production comes from now. With this instrument the prospector can record to a matter of two or three inches, for a mile deep in the earth, the depth of the rock they are looking for. Then they will go out laterally, and in that way they can find whether the Devonian is deeper there or at some other point. It will be kept in mind that the surface is flat. They find whether the Devonian is deeper, or higher. If it is higher, they keep going that way, because they are looking for what they call a "high", because the oil and gas, the lighter products, will be at the highest place in whatever structure you have below.

So they keep going in various directions until they will say, "Here is a structure where the high is so-and-so. We have taken it so many miles. There is the low; that is probably where you will get your water." Then you drill. You get something, because that is a rock which has small interstices in it, and it will hold something—it may be salt water, or it may be oil. If it is oil you are in luck; if it is salt water, you are out of luck. But you do know you have been drilling toward a basin or container which may contain oil.

Today, therefore, all the large United States companies are in there with seismograph crews, and many Canadian companies are doing the same thing. Some people think we are giving our birthright away to the United States. I noticed a few days ago in a Calgary paper that the Calgary firm of Tanner Brothers paid something over $980,000 to the provincial government for one quarter-section of land. That is Canadian money; it has no reference to any big shots from the United States who go in there. This represents the highest price ever paid for so-called oil lands in that area.

Perhaps I should now say something I had intended to say later. The provincial government get that money in cash, as a bonus for signing the lease. They also get, for the lifetime of the use of the property, a dollar an acre in rental. They get 12½ per cent gross out of everything produced from that land. So that the province of Alberta is not going to go broke so long as we have a continuation of discoveries anywhere within range of the base which has been set from time to time.

I should like to go back to the question of discovery. The Leduc field was discovered in 1947. It will be recalled that up to that time we had what might be described as showings of oil, some of which were perhaps slightly commercial, in various parts of the country. This indicated that the discovery of oil was moving north. Leduc is twenty miles from Edmonton, and now there are many people in the world who know where Edmonton is but who, before the discovery at Leduc, did not know that Edmonton was even a place on the map.

This is the centre of the discoveries now being made, and it has proved to be a very large commercial field. It was the discovery of Leduc by Imperial Oil which caused them to sell their ownership of the company which operated under the name of International Petroleum, in order to get development money for this Alberta situation. This they did to an extent somewhere in the neighbourhood of $90 million.

This development has gone on. The drilling at Leduc is comparatively shallow—roughly a mile. If hon. members will just think of a mile in distance they will understand fairly well where production is coming from at the present time. Then they found this bend in the Saskatchewan river just west of Edmonton. They went on north and east some forty or fifty miles and found Redwater. Since then they have made a number of discoveries. For instance, Golden Spike has the largest depth of saturated sand that has yet been found in Alberta, and I believe almost as large as any which has been found in any part of this continent.

Hon. members will see that the situation is now looking up. I should like to mention one field discovered since we came to Ottawa to attend this session. I refer to the Normandville field, which is about thirty miles south of Peace river, in the constituency of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). This field is away by itself; there is nothing near it, and it is brand new. By the amount of porosity that is indicated—and porosity is simply another way of referring to the interstices in the rock in which of course the oil is found—the prospect would look good for this discovery. It has good porosity; and the tests already made would seem to indicate that it should go to at least a thousand barrels a day. The wells to which I have been referring are thousand-barrel wells.

The oil people have learned, as other people have learned, that there is only so much beer in a barrel. You can turn a beer barrel upside down and take the beer all out, but you cannot turn an oil field upside down and get all the oil out. In fact it is considered an excellent recovery in any oil field to get 60 per cent of the oil that is there. So these wells are operated on what is known as oil-gas ratio, or gas-oil ratio, whereby they will have the longest life, and whereby this motive power will not be drained away quickly, leaving too much oil underground. This oil, of course, will never be recovered once the motive power is gone.

Today Alberta is producing about 70,000 barrels of oil a day. Someone may ask: How much is that? Well, it is enough to supply western Canada. When I say that I am not including British Columbia, I refer only to the three prairie provinces. Strangely enough the prairie provinces consume more than what one would normally expect to be their share, judging by population. But they absorb more per man than any other part of Canada, owing to the fact that in those provinces farming has become so completely mechanized. It is not the motor cars and trucks which use these large quantities; it is the farm machinery which uses the greater part of it.

The oil is taken from the ground, and is of no use to anyone in its natural state. It is of different gravities; I think the correct term is "Baume". The higher the degree your measuring apparatus indicates is, the more light oil there is in it and therefore more gasoline and less of the heavy ends or heavy products which are not nearly as valuable and which today are a drug on some markets close to the refineries in western Canada.

What is refining? It is a matter of heat. I know they have done excellent things and made many improvements, but refining simply means to take the crude oil and heat it to a certain degree when it begins to give off a gas. That gas is separated and you obtain lighter or more volatile products. One of the top products now obtained is propane.

I am sure the farmers of Alberta were glad when they began to bottle this propane gas under pressure a couple of years ago. It is now used in hundreds and hundreds of farmsteads in Alberta. I speak with positive knowledge of that province, but I understand that a good deal is used in Saskatchewan as well. Instead of the farm wife having to get out the poker to stir up the coals and bring in some more wood to burn, she simply turns a tap the same as a housewife in Ottawa would if she is burning gas. It is not particularly expensive, and, with normal use, one bottle will last a small household for a couple of months.

You increase your temperature and you obtain other things, including gasoline, the most valuable product that we have. As you go higher and higher you get your distillates and diesel and fuel oils. Last of all you get down to the road oil, and if your crude has an asphaltic base you get quite a lot of almost pure asphalt. This is not much good to you, because there is no market available near the refineries.

In other words this process is similar to that carried out with the old copper still. A man would get his mash ready and go into the bush. He would light his fire, cook his mash, and run the vapour through the little curlicue and produce a product which perhaps many of you have drunk as bootleg whiskey. That is exactly the same process as is carried out in an oil refinery.

How are we fixed for refineries? Two have been operating in Calgary for some years, and they have proved to be a good investment. British American Oil have one in Moose Jaw, and Imperial Oil have one in Regina. There is a small co-operative plant at that place, which incidentally has gone into the production of oil, as they have several producing wells in Alberta. In Brandon there is a fair-sized one; in Winnipeg there is a small one, although this is known as a skimming plant which in the true sense of the word is not a refinery. Then there is one in Edmonton, and McColl-Frontenac are building a second refinery there.

Hon. members might be interested in the history of the Imperial refinery in Edmonton. It was first erected at Corpus Christi on the gulf of Mexico. It was then moved to Whitehorse. Hon. members will remember that during the war the United States put a pipe line across the mountains from Norman Wells to Whitehorse, and this refinery was moved up there to refine the crude oil to meet the needs of the army. After the war that pipe line was junked and Imperial Oil bought the refinery and moved it by truck 1,600 miles down the Alaska highway to Edmonton. They re-erected it there, and they di dnot have one piece of steel over. So this refinery has been moved from Corpus Christi to Whitehorse and finally to Edmonton, where many fine things from Calgary finally come to rest. They are now apparently robbing the north of what little they have.

What are we going to do with our oil? This is where I may be in disagreement with certain people. I have consulted the producers of oil in Alberta on this matter. I hope I shall not be out of order if I say a word or two about the pipe line from Edmonton to Gretna, Manitoba. I make the simple statement that I am all in favour of it. We in Alberta are looking for markets for our oil, and I am doing my best to represent here the interests of the people of Alberta.

I know that sound economics means that you must get your goods to the nearest available market. We are told that this oil could be sent to the Canadian head of the lakes for another $10 million, with a half million per year additional upkeep cost. I think those figures are right. I know all the arguments about having this Canadian product disposed of in Canada, and I am not going to repeat them. But if in the development of this field we can send our crude oil to nearby points in the United States while you people in the east are getting your oil to Sarnia from nearby fields; in other words if Alberta can achieve a balance in crude oil, then the Alberta oil industry will have made a greater contribution to the welfare of the Dominion of Canada than almost any other industry I can think of.

I am far from saying that this product should not be used in this country. I note that special Canadian tankers are being built to move the oil from Superior to Sarnia or other areas. If refineries are built where there are no markets for your finished product, you are bound to have the heavy ends as a drug on the market. There will be no use for them. The Lloydminster field on the border between Saskatchewan and Alberta produces a heavy grade of crude, but that field has suffered a terrible set-back. Why? They have no market for many of their products. The Husky Company have the refinery there, and while they obtain some lighter ends and some gasoline from their heavy crude, they are under a considerable handicap because there is no market for the heavier products.

Remember that oil will not flow all the time; it must be helped. You can readily see that if it is of the consistency of molasses, there will be certain mechanical difficulties in your way. I take a back seat to no one in believing that we should produce all the oil we can in this country, but I do not carry my patriotism or my sentimentality to the point where I contend that we should cripple the sale of a product in competition with other products because with this all-Canadian scheme you are going to have an increase of two or three cents in the price. Who is going to pay it? There are only two sources from which the money can come, namely, the producers of the oil in Alberta, or the consumers wherever the gas may be sold. Referring to other forms of transportation, some may ask: Why not have the refinery in Alberta and ship by rail? But the cost of transportation by rail is at least 150 per cent more than the cost by pipe line.

It must be remembered, however, that you cannot send all these different products through the pipe line. Some of them simply will not go. Strangely enough, in the pipe line running from the Turner valley to the refinery in Calgary you can send crude oil, and then you can turn in the white product. It will travel in the same pipe line to Calgary, and the admixture of one with the other at the end of the line will not cover a matter of fifty feet in the twenty-five mile line. It is an amazing thing. It is done by controlling the pressure of the flow, thereby maintaining the consistency.

There is only one more thing that I wish to say about oil, and it has to do with the matter of foreign exchange. I have said that at the present time we are producing, refining and selling about 70,000 barrels of oil per day. Multiply that figure by roughly $3 and you have at least $200,000 a day that the people of Canada as a whole are saving in United States funds. Formerly we got our crude oil from the United States. It is true we got some from the South American republics, but the South American oil was owned by United States companies. Therefore a dollar saved is a dollar gained in that business. Within an appreciable time we may strike a balance between oil for eastern Canada coming from nearby fields to Sarnia, and oil from Alberta—and I hope from Saskatchewan—moving into the United States.

I will go even further than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He spoke about oil for Sarnia as the reason for the pipe line. I know perfectly well that pipe line is aimed at the Chicago area, and I am glad to admit it, because we want the best market we can get. In that way we can certainly do ourselves more good so far as United States dollars are concerned.

I am out on a limb now. There is no question about that so far as I am concerned. I speak only personally, but I know I am speaking for the oil producers of Alberta. I hope that production will increase—and it shows every sign of doing so—to such an extent that before this session of parliament is over we shall have enough oil coming up every day to supply the whole of the Dominion of Canada, and a market already established for our surplus. I think that is a realistic view of the whole oil situation, and I do not want there to be any doubt about where those who come from Alberta stand. Somebody will say: Smith, you are looking after your voters. But if they are all United States citizens they have no vote in Canada, and at any time I will take my chance with the Canadians who have.

I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking up so much time on one subject. I have not mentioned gas, but I will have a shot at that tonight. I have made these remarks because I believe oil is a matter of great interest to the members, and of tremendous interest to the country at large. I have spoken only of the oil which we bring up in pipes. In the region of the Athabasca river—and I was up there only recently—there are the tar sands which many authorities have pronounced the greatest reservoir of oil in the world. As a Dominion of Canada enterprise we have had bad luck with the project. While I have been a member of parliament I believe we have built two extraction plants, and by the time they were ready to operate them they were destroyed by fire. The province of Alberta is spending a good deal of money in that area today, and they say they are making some progress with the extraction of oil. It is not that the oil is not there in tremendous quantities. The difficulty seems to be to separate it from the sand. That is where we have fallen down. Water transportation is available there. Granted that the scientific problem is solved, it seems to me that in the future we may expect that there will be continuous development not only in Alberta but in Saskatchewan, and certainly in the Peace river district of British Columbia. They are now discovering oil in the region extending south from the old Norman Wells.

It seems to me that all these things added together mean that we have a basic product with which science is doing and can do much. The future, not only for that part of the country but for the whole dominion, as a result of the discovery and development of this great industry, is something that no one here can contemplate. My imagination simply is not good enough to envisage it.

In my office some time ago the most prominent chemical engineer in Canada was speaking to a geologist of a company for whom I was acting, and he asked him if he could find some salt. The chemical engineer laid down certain conditions as to the finding of the salt. In the same hole there had to be natural gas, and the find had to be beside a railway track. The geologist said that he thought it could be done, and asked the chemical engineer how much he needed. The answer was that he needed a bed of at least six feet of salt. My friend was in Ottawa the other day—he is interested in pipe lines—and he not only found the natural gas right beside the Willingdon line in northern Alberta, a little east of Edmonton, but he also found a great quantity of salt. I saw pieces of it in my office, and it was as clear as the clearest of window glass. He found not only six feet of salt but a thousand feet. My chemist friend tells me that salt and natural gas are two of the most important elements in the making of many things such as plastics, and so on. This is something that is not merely in its infancy; it is in swaddling clothes.

I close with the thought that I am happy to live in Canada. I think we shall be contributing our share, in a land we love so much, if we contribute as much as some of these private enterprise people; and if we do, we shall not need to worry about the future.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of the budget in the house is always of great interest and importance to the people of Canada because from it they derive a knowledge of the status of our present financial requirements as well as the country's future prospects. In recent days and weeks we in Canada have been greatly concerned with the serious deterioration in the dollar position of the sterling areas. We realize that this is not just a problem of the British people but, in view of our trade relations with the United Kingdom, it is also a problem for Canadians as well as the other peoples of the world. I am sure that the people of Canada were glad to hear the statement made by the Minister of Finance after the recent conferences in London and Washington, to the effect that those who took part in the discussions agreed on certain policies which it is hoped will assist the sterling areas in selling goods to Canada and the United States. If this were achieved, the result would be a balancing of accounts without further loans or Marshall aid. Although we are concerned, we are confident that the world-wide devaluation of currencies will finally be adjusted to a level which will permit Canada to continue its trade relations with other countries in a normal manner.

Although I am a new member of this house, I understand that hon. members have the privilege, during the budget debate, of discussing various topics. Might I mention first the fact that this parliament will probably go down in history as a landmark because of its attempt to change our constitution. Most Canadians feel that, although the British North America Act was a masterly piece of work in its origin in 1867, conditions in Canada have changed and this act does not meet the expanding needs of this country. We must recognize, however, that the British North America Act was originally a very delicate compromise between the English and French-speaking Canadians. It is my submission that any contemplated changes in the act must necessarily take cognizance of these compromises if unity in Canada is to prevail. We do not know exactly what the premier of Quebec meant when he said that this was a matter of life and death. This statement, however, illustrates the difficulty we will encounter. Unfortunately, the premier of my own province of Alberta has chosen to follow in the footsteps of Premier Duplessis.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Low: The hon. member is not stating a fact.

Mr. Decore: I intend to bring to the attention of this parliament a matter which I consider of importance to the future of this country. We in Canada have made great strides in our social welfare program for the benefit of the Canadian people. I should like now to express my views about education. When I say I desire to express my views on that subject, I should say they are only my views and not the views of someone else.

It seems to me that when it comes down to the basic necessity of living, the basic element of human progress, education is one of the most important factors. Nothing could be more desirable or more far-reaching than the attempt of this parliament to improve the opportunities of education for young Canadians. After all, those young Canadians will be the fathers and mothers of our future generations. This country needs men and women with a high level of education, so that they will be better qualified in discharging their responsibilities as citizens.

Canada today is playing a gigantic role in the destiny of mankind. Canada is, in fact, a new nation with a great future before it. So far our natural resources have only been tapped, and we require men with skill in science and the technical knowledge to develop those natural resources. Educated men and women are required by this country in case, at some later date, it is necessary to defend it. After all, the educated citizens of this country will place higher values upon, and have greater appreciation of the fact that the freedom we are now enjoying has been handed down to us as a result of centuries of struggle. We have spent billions of dollars in trying to protect our democracy and our international position. Today we are heavily burdened with international problems, but this should not prevent the consideration of the advance of human welfare.

Education is the foundation stone in the structure of our democracy in Canada. It is the greatest weapon against poverty and hardship. For that reason, I feel that eventually we should adopt, as a basic principle, recognition of the fact that education is a national concern. During the past few years the people of this country realized with a shock what war and steadily rising prices had done to our schools. The constant financial pressure had made it difficult for many communities to keep abreast of the requirements of education. For a number of years I served as a member of the school board and noted, in my own town of Vegreville, the overcrowded classrooms and inadequate equipment. There was not much we could do about it because the taxpayer was already overburdened.

In my constituency today there are a number of districts where schools have been closed owing to a lack of teachers, or where the instructors are not qualified in the art of teaching. Many of the teachers have migrated to better jobs at better pay. When I speak of teachers I speak with some feeling because, during my younger days, I taught school. I am not here to champion the cause of teachers, but we must have an abundance of good teachers in Canada if our standard of education is to be at a satisfactory level. Able men and women must be encouraged to go into the teaching profession. I know of children who have attended my classes in public school who, although they possessed the ability to become some day great leaders of this country, were unable to pursue advanced studies because of financial difficulties.

This government has already gone a long way in aiding Canadians by the introduction of family allowances and the program to provide educational facilities for veterans. I believe the government should be prepared to go farther than that, eventually. When I suggest that this parliament should give some aid to provincial governments for educational purposes, I realize that some provinces are more fortunate than others because of the richness of their natural resources. The province of Alberta is indeed most fortunate in this respect. The wealth that is now pouring into the treasury of the provincial government as a result of the discovery of oil is, in fact, an embarrassment to them.

In our province of Alberta there is no earthly excuse for the government not making more substantial grants to education which would be in keeping with the requirements and the expanding needs in that province. The farmers upon whose land oil is discovered receive little direct benefit from the discovery because few of them have mineral rights. All that these farmers receive is the rancid smell of oil twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, plus a little compensation for the use of their land. It is for this reason that I believe the royal commission now investigating the question of education in Canada, among other things, will make an important contribution to the solution of this problem. Some formula needs to be worked out by means of which more opportunities will be created for education for our young Canadians.

I am not suggesting at all that this parliament should in any way encroach upon the subject matter of education which is now within provincial jurisdiction. I sometimes wish, though, that this parliament had some means of controlling the propaganda that is being fed to our children. When I say this, I am referring to something which has taken place in my province of Alberta. In 1937 a book was published by McDougall and Paterson called "The World of Today". This book was authorized by the minister of education, at that time the late Mr. William Aberhart, for the use of Grade IX pupils.

On page 321 of that publication you will find the following:

> Some people feel that the capitalist (competitive) system is out of date in this modern world, and should be modified or replaced entirely by a system better fitted to deal with the problems of today. Three of these plans are especially interesting: the Communist (as in Russia), the C.C.F., and Social Credit.

I am sure that we have no objection to our children's knowing something about Social Credit theory, if they can only find out what it is, or about the C.C.F., the Conservatives, the Liberals or any other political party. But the fact remains that thousands of students in that province were subjected to this type of vicious propaganda. They were subjected to the idea that our so-called competitive system is out of date and should be entirely replaced by one of these three doctrines. It was only after this book had been in use in our province for some years, and after considerable pressure had been exerted on the minister of education and on the government of our province by individuals and various organizations, that this book was finally revised in 1940. I have here with me both of these books in case any hon. member should be interested in looking them over.

The revised copy in use in Alberta today is so similar except for the changes that I have already mentioned, and some cartoons that have been left out, that the old original copy is still used by a great many students in grade IX in the schools in our province; these books are handed down by their brothers and sisters who used them in previous years.

It is not my intention to be disrespectful to any hon. member or to any political group in this house. However, I have heard of expressions coming from some of my Social Credit friends—and when I say some of them, I mean just some of them—to the effect that my election to this house was made possible by the communist vote of the Vegreville constituency,—

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Decore: —and I intend to deal with this matter. The insinuations are quite clear, Mr. Speaker. Such statements cast a reflection not only on the nine thousand people who voted for me in the election of June 27 but also on all the people in that constituency, numbering some 60,000.

We have in this house representatives from all parts of Canada, from Vancouver island to Newfoundland. I do not think that hon. members in this house should be left with the impression that whenever anybody mentions the constituency of Vegreville, they should associate that constituency with communism. I feel that I have the responsibility of defending the people whom I represent should any politician in this house or outside it choose to brand those people as communists simply because they chose to discard the kind of representation they had there for the last number of years.

Over half a century ago when these people came in from central Europe and settled on land around Vegreville, one of their chief characteristics was their deep religious feeling and devotion to the church. The first institutions which they built upon their arrival were churches where they could go and worship God. Today in this constituency you will find many churches of various denominations. The two main groups are the Orthodox and the Greek Catholic, both being churches of the eastern or Byzantine rite.

The village of Mundare, situated within my constituency, has been and is today the centre of the religious life of the Ukrainian Greek Catholics in Canada. Mundare is the cradle of the Basilian order which produced such outstanding religious leaders as Their Excellencies Archbishop Basil Ladyka of Winnipeg and Bishop Neal Sawaryn of Edmonton. Other outstanding religious leaders of the Greek Catholic faith came from this place called Mundare.

I might also mention in passing that in the early pioneer days a man by the name of Father Kryzanowsky came there as a missionary; he was responsible for putting Mundare in the position it holds today. Father Kryzanowsky has been highly respected by Canadians of various denominations and racial origins. He was closely associated with that great missionary and humanitarian of western Canada, the late Father Albert Lacombe. I mention this because the people in my constituency, regardless of the church to which they belong or of what their views may be, resent any such scurrilous attack made or insinuations cast by any such politicians.

It has been said that the fact that no communist candidate was running in Vegreville constituency in the election of June 27 was the reason my election was made possible. I want to tell this house something about this matter. In my constituency there are elected to the provincial legislature about six or seven provincial members who are either wholly are partially dependent on the vote from my constituency. In the provincial election held last year, all those members who were elected from my constituency were Social Credit candidates.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Decore: Some of my Social Credit friends and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) say "hear, hear". I want to remind the hon. member that there was no communist candidate running, and I would ask him this question. Was it the communists who elected those Social Credit members at that time?

Mr. Shaw: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, I made no interjection whatsoever; and in the second place, if he wants an answer to his question, I would tell him this. The communists voted Liberal provincially last year.

Mr. Decore: Is that the reason why most of the Liberals lost their deposits?

I should like to remind this house of another incident that took place in 1940. In 1940 a by-election was held in the Vegreville provincial constituency, which is in my constituency. At that time the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who is the leader of the Social Credit group in this house, was elected to the provincial house by acclamation. Was it the communists that in 1940 elected him by acclamation to the provincial house?

An hon. Member: No; there was no election.

Mr. Decore: It was by acclamation. I should like to take my Social Credit friends—

An hon. Member: They would not go with you.

Mr. Decore: —back to the year 1938. That was the year when, in the constituency of Edmonton East a federal by-election was held. That was the time when Orvis Kennedy, the Social Credit candidate, was elected. I do not hear anything from my Social Credit friends. None of them says "hear, hear" this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Decore: In fact, I notice that they are blushing; and they have good reason for blushing. Let me tell this house why. After the results of the election were known, there was in Edmonton one of the most enthusiastic demonstrations ever held in its political history. According to the Edmonton newspapers, communist supporters and other speakers addressed the crowds at the Kennedy committee rooms; Mr. Kennedy thanked Jan Lakeman, the Alberta communist chief, for his support and called him to the platform to address the crowd.

May I quote further from the Edmonton Journal.

Mr. Low: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Vegreville is reading into the record something that is absolutely false, and he knows it.

Mr. Decore: Do you want me to produce it?

Mr. Sinclair: Where is your privilege?

Mr. Low: I say that in all kindness to the hon. member.

Mr. Sinclair: Where is your privilege?

Mr. Low: I am challenging the hon. member to produce the evidence of Mr. Kennedy thanking Jan Lakeman or any other communist for his support.

Mr. Sinclair: That is not privilege.

Mr. Decore: I accept the challenge.

Mr. Low: I challenge the hon. member.

Mr. Decore: I accept the challenge. At this time may I quote from the Edmonton Journal of March 22, 1938. This is what it says:

> Others who addressed the cheering crowd at the Kennedy headquarters were N. B. James, M.L.A. for Acadia; Leslie Morris, Toronto, national secretary of the communist party of Canada; Hon. E. C. Manning, provincial secretary; Hon. Lucien Maynard, minister of municipal affairs.

What a grand and glorious victory that was!

Mr. Low: On a question of privilege, I challenge the hon. member to substantiate by evidence that his statement is correct. I state exactly what he said, "that publicly at that meeting in Edmonton in 1938, Mr. Kennedy thanked Jan Lakeman for his support."

Mr. Sinclair: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Low: I challenge his honesty on the statement he has made. He has answered my challenge by evading, as he always does.

Mr. Decore: I am referring to newspaper clippings.

Mr. Low: A newspaper clipping does not mean anything.

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget that Tim Buck supported Mackenzie King in 1945.

Mr. Decore: At no time in the political history of Canada, to my knowledge, did any political party,—

Mr. Gardiner: He supported the C.C.F. in 1949.

Mr. Decore: —whether it be Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F. or any other political group, celebrate together with the communist chiefs an election victory with such enthusiasm and gusto as happened in Edmonton East in 1938.

In view of what I have said, may I humbly make this suggestion to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), that they should be the last of all people to impute communism to someone else. It seems to me that people living in glass houses should always undress in the dark.

Most of us who know anything about the communist leaders in this country know something about their tactics. If you dare to disagree with a communist on his political views you are immediately branded as a fascist or a war-monger. Should anyone dare to disagree with some of these politicians to whom I am referring, they are immediately branded as a communist or next to it. Although they profess to hold divergent views it is my submission that their tactics are the same.

The suggestion that the Liberal party in Canada, or that a Liberal candidate in Alberta, entered into any kind of understanding with the communist leaders is of course nonsense. We of the Liberal party believe in combating communism not necessarily in the manner and style prescribed and proposed by our Social Credit friends. We believe that by showing that our democratic way of life here in Canada is superior to what they have in Russia we can convince people far more effectively.

In the 1945 election there were in Canada 119,000 communist votes. On June 27 there were slightly over 32,000. Something happened to the 80,000 communist votes, in fact it is only a little over one-sixth of the 1945 election. I believe that if any party or any group has shown the way to combat communism in Canada, the Liberals certainly have.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two to my French-speaking Canadian friends.

(Translation):

As a representative of western Canada, I am very pleased to meet here so many French-Canadian members from the eastern part of the country.

There are a great many French-speaking Canadians in my constituency and I am happy to tell you that they wholeheartedly supported me at the last election.

Fortunately, there are only two official languages in this country, French and English. If other languages are officially recognized, I should be tempted to use them all.

We in western Canada are deeply anxious that unity should prevail in this country and judging from what I have observed during the short time I have been here, our nation is destined to become even more powerful and united under the leadership of our great leader, the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent.

(Text):

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the budget presented to this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) the other evening was not essentially a new one. In the main it was the budget presented March last, prepared for re-presentation. On June 27 the people of Canada endorsed the resolutions contained in the original budget. The people of Canada endorsed the tax proposals of the Liberal government, and to that extent I do not wish to take exception to the present budget. But if the forecasts and opinions contained in the budget of the Minister of Finance of March last were not justified by events, then to that extent the budget of March was not endorsed by the Canadian people.

One may look through the budget of last March with great care, but nowhere in it will one find a suggestion that Canada would in a few months be facing a very serious trade crisis. On the contrary, the Minister of Finance took a very optimistic point of view. I might recall the statements which the minister made in referring to European countries when he said:

> Their own ability to buy is increasing, and in the meantime is being supplemented from this side of the Atlantic.

Then the further statement:

> The Canadian government has taken and will continue to take all feasible steps to encourage the expansion of British trade with Canada.

These statements, and others like them, served only one purpose. They served to lull the people of Canada into a false sense of security in relation to our trade prospects. One cabinet minister after another went back and forth across this country telling the electorate that we would not be facing a trade crisis; that the C.C.F. were always talking blue ruin. It must have been a shock indeed to the electorate to find that within twenty days after the election we were facing a very severe and very real trade crisis, a trade crisis to the extent that our best customer, Great Britain, announced that she was cutting by 25 per cent imports of goods from dollar countries. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is reported in the Regina Leader-Post of June 18 under the headline:

> Howe Tells B.C. Liberals he is Stuck for Something to Sell

as having said:

> Canada's post-war domestic economy is expanding so fast, Trade Minister Howe said Friday, that he is stuck for something to sell on the overseas market.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is reported in the Leader-Post of June 24 as saying at Qu'Appelle:

> There is no evidence to support the contention of M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader, that Canada is losing the British market for food, Agriculture Minister Gardiner said here Thursday night.

I hold in my hand a quotation taken from a radio speech delivered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this party, on May 13, entitled "Coming Crisis in Trade",

> Our best customers have always been Britain and western Europe, yet we are rapidly losing these markets today. Last year Canadian exports to Britain fell off by $64 million. In the first three months of this year exports in Britain dropped still more, from $175 million to $139 million. We have not suffered from this trade crisis yet, but in a few months we shall feel the full impact.

How very true was that prophecy by the leader of this group, that while we had not suffered up until that time from the trade crisis, nevertheless in a few months we should feel the full impact. Just two months from that date, almost to the day, the announcement was made that we would be losing 25 per cent of our market in the United Kingdom. Apparently to some extent the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has changed his mind, because he was reported in the Montreal Gazette of October 1—

Mr. Gardiner: That was not agricultural products; it was 25 per cent of our dollars.

Mr. Argue: A reduction of 25 per cent in British purchases in dollar countries.

Mr. Gardiner: Not of food from Canada.

Mr. Argue: I am not trying to leave the wrong impression at all. I am just quoting what the minister said as reported in the Montreal Gazette of October 1:

> We are trying to maintain Canada's markets in Britain, but there is no certainty that we can do so.

Yet on June 24, he said there was no evidence at all to support the contention of the C.C.F. that we were losing the British market for food.

The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), speaking in the budget debate, said there was serious objection to implementing the C.C.F. amendment calling for a reduction in tariffs. He said the government had always maintained a balance between various groups in this country. Yes, they may have maintained a balance, in the past, but in my opinion that balance was always weighted very heavily against the farmer and the consumer.

Tariffs have protected industries and big business resulting in higher costs to the producer, higher prices to the consumer. The hon. member said, as reported at page 1071 of Hansard:

> If I remember correctly, it was not very many years ago that party said that free trade was absolutely obsolete in this country, that it was not up to date; and yet we see a change of mind today and our friends are talking about free trade.

The hon. member was referring to the C.C.F. However, if he had inquired more diligently he would have found that our position in respect to trade today is the same position we have taken since the inception of the C.C.F. movement in Regina in 1933. I quote this from the Regina manifesto:

> Canada is dependent on external sources of supply for many of her essential requirements of raw materials and manufactured products. These she can obtain only by large exports of the goods she is best fitted to produce. The strangling of our export trade by insane protectionist policies must be brought to an end.

We are objecting there to a high tariff protectionist policy. Then it goes on to say:

> The old controversies between free traders and protectionists are now largely obsolete.

They are obsolete because the Liberal party claimed it was the party of free trade and the Conservative party claimed it was the party of protection. But when either of these parties was in office there was little difference in tariff rates; both were parties of high tariffs. So that the controversy between the two old parties was a sham battle, and made the issue on that basis with respect to tariffs obsolete.

Quoting again from the Regina manifesto:

> In a world of nationally organized economies Canada must organize the buying and selling of her main imports and exports under public boards, and take steps to regulate the flow of less important commodities by a system of licences. By so doing she will be enabled to make the best trade agreements possible with foreign countries, put a stop to the exploitation of both primary producer and ultimate consumer, make possible the co-ordination of internal processing, transportation and marketing of farm products, and facilitate the establishment of stable prices for such export commodities.

Our stand in relation to export-import boards as set out in the Regina manifesto of 1933 is exactly our stand in this regard today. As far back as 1938, in the budget debate of that year the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moved the following amendment:

> That this house further regrets that the proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance on June 16 disregard the pledges of the Liberal party to the Canadian people contained in its platform of 1919 and subsequent years, which declared, among other things, that the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the costs of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress of our country.

So back in 1938 this group moved an amendment in which it asked the Liberal party to implement its own platform of 1919 calling for a reduction of tariffs. We are moving again today in this budget debate substantially the same motion, saying that the government should give immediate consideration to a reduction of tariffs sufficient to encourage an increase in imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries. So that the stand of the C.C.F. party with respect to tariffs is perfectly clear. We believe that tariffs should be reduced, and reduced substantially. We believe that by reducing tariffs at the present time we can increase the purchases of British goods by Canadians and thus help to alleviate the difficulty we are finding in maintaining our markets in Britain.

In dealing with the trade crisis which we face we should consider some of the underlying causes. It has often been pointed out that one of the reasons Britain has faced a dollar problem in the post-war period is that during the war she sacrificed her foreign investments. In order to stop fascism Britain sacrificed her investments abroad—investments which were necessary to her peacetime well-being. Between the wars those investments earned her £200 million annually. The income from those investments to a large extent was used to pay for imports obtained from Canada, the United States and other dollar countries. Today that investment has shrunk to almost zero.

On top of Britain's losing her investment income, she suffered terrible physical destruction during the war. Because of that physical destruction she has had to meet heavy costs for reconstruction. In spite of these handicaps Britain's recovery has been magnificent. Speaking in Toronto on May 30, Harold Wilson stated that Britain had increased her production by some 40 per cent by volume over a pre-war year. British exports in the first quarter of 1949 were running 50 per cent higher by volume as compared to 1939. Industrial production in 1949 was 30 per cent above 1946. Mr. Wilson also pointed out that Great Britain had changed an over-all deficit in world trade of $2·4 billion two years previous to a slight over-all surplus toward the end of 1948. British recovery has been truly remarkable. No other country in western Europe has made such rapid and sustained progress.

I think we should look at our record, at what we have done to improve trade and to help Britain recover from the devastation of war. We all know that Canada and the United States made large loans and gifts to Great Britain and other European countries to help in their reconstruction. As the Minister of Finance pointed out, a great deal of the success that we shall obtain in solving our trade problem depends on the North American nations accepting a greater quantity of goods from Europe and sterling areas. For a time Canada and the United States were accepting an increasing quantity of goods from the United Kingdom.

Great Britain had a trade deficit with the United States of $932 million in 1947, but had reduced that trade deficit by more than 50 per cent to $455 million in 1948. If Great Britain throughout 1949 had been able to continue to reduce her trade deficit with the United States at the same rate as in 1948 she would have ended this year with no deficit in respect to her trade with the United States. Great Britain's position for the first quarter of 1949 in respect to trade with the United States was almost the same as it was in 1948, no better or no worse. British imports to the United States in the first quarter of this year were at the annual rate of $280 million, but during the second quarter of this year they dropped to an annual rate of $163 million, a 42 per cent drop as compared with the first quarter of the year.

The causes for that drop in British exports to the United States cannot be blamed on the policies adopted by the government of Great Britain. As the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech a few days ago, there was a decline this spring in the rate of activity in the United States. Thus, when the United States was facing a recession, business reduced its purchases of British goods. The dropping off of British exports to the United States was not brought about because Great Britain was not producing; it was brought about largely because the United States went through a period of recession or a decline in the rate of activity, as the Minister of Finance put it. Last March the Minister of Finance did not visualize a recession on this continent when he said:

> I do not expect in the near future any serious decline in the high level of expenditures in North America upon which our present prosperity is based.

Certainly in the light of future events that statement was not justified. Events have shown that the free enterprise system that this government supports went through a recession and that that recession to a large extent was responsible for the trading crisis that faced the United States, Canada and Great Britain in July of this year. There was another major cause for the shrinkage in British exports to the United States. Sir Stafford Cripps, speaking in the United Kingdom debate on September 27, had this to say:

> There was another factor of great importance. In the spring of this year an attack had been launched upon the exchange rate of sterling and this attack had been developed through the summer. As a result people began to doubt the rate, to speculate as to the likelihood of its being changed, and as a result business of all kinds fell off. Buyers postponed making payments, in the hope of a more favourable rate of exchange. North American holders in fact transferred into dollars as much sterling as they could as quickly as they could. These were factors which led to the increased drain on our reserves in the second quarter of the year, and that increased drain itself of course accentuated the tendency to regard sterling as over-valued.

In other words, there was an attack by business interests and the financial press on this continent on the pound sterling. North American holders of pound sterling transferred their holdings into dollars as quickly as possible. The attack on the pound sterling by business interests on this continent contributed substantially to the situation that made devaluation necessary. Exports of aluminum from Great Britain to the United States dropped from £346,000 per month in the first three months of 1949 to just £5,000 in July. Agricultural tractors, which Great Britain had been shipping to the United States at the rate of £417,000 in the first quarter of 1949, fell to zero in July. Those exports fell to zero largely because the business interests on this continent had launched an attack on the then prevailing rate of exchange.

Is there any assurance that such an attack will not develop at some time in the future? There is not. If business interests on this continent decide that the pound sterling should be devalued at any time in the future, from the experience we have had in the past all they would have to do is to stop buying goods, transfer their sterling holdings into dollars, and then a further devaluation will be made necessary. In his budget speech the other night the Minister of Finance took note of the effects a sharp down-turn, as he put it, in economic activity on the American continent would have, when he said:

> Any sharp down-turn in American economic activity and in American willingness to import cannot but have sharp and embarrassing repercussions all over the world.

But there is no assurance that the United States is going to maintain full employment, full production and the expanding economy necessary if trade is to be free throughout the world? Referring to the devaluation decision the minister said:

> It was agreed that the solution must be sought primarily in a rapid and substantial increase in dollar earnings through an expansion of trade.

I contend that devaluation, instead of bringing about an expansion of trade, will in fact bring about a contraction in trade. A 30 per cent devaluation of the pound sterling in relation to United States dollars means an increased price of 44 per cent to the British consumer of goods bought in the United States. That is certainly going to mean a substantial reduction of British purchases of United States goods. The same thing will be true to a slightly lesser extent in British purchases of Canadian goods.

Then with respect to the British attempt to increase exports to this continent, Great Britain following devaluation can reduce by thirty per cent the price of her exports to the United States. But should Great Britain, for example, reduce the export price of British automobiles to the United States by 30 per cent, then she must increase the quantity exported to the United States by 43 per cent in order to obtain the same number of dollars that she has been receiving before devaluation. It is certainly doubtful to what extent Great Britain can increase her earnings of United States and Canadian dollars by reduction of price, since following reduction in price she must increase the quantity sold to earn even the same number of dollars as she earned heretofore.

Rather, I believe the chief result of devaluation will be a further loss of the British market. The United Kingdom labour and industry publication of September states:

> If the large current trade surplus of the dollar countries can be increasingly offset by rapidly increasing imports from non-dollar countries, and by a healthy flow of dollar investments to these countries, it is possible to envisage once again a "one-world" trade pattern, in which multilateral trade, balanced by freely flowing capital from surplus countries, can operate once again on the basis of stable, convertible currencies.

The statement is made that one of the chief objectives of the British government must be to change its import purchases from the dollar areas to the non-dollar areas. The result to Canada of such a policy is already being felt. Great Britain has entered into bilateral agreements with Russia, Denmark, the Argentine, Sweden, and numerous other countries for the purchase of such commodities as coarse grains, bacon, butter, beef, newsprint and pulp. Great Britain must continue to buy increased quantities of goods from other countries in order to conserve her supply of dollars. At home the British are rapidly increasing food production. Production of food has increased, on the basis of calories used in the diet, from a total of 31 per cent pre-war to 37 per cent in 1948-49. Great Britain is rapidly increasing her production and her acreages of bread and other grains. While she has reduced her production of beef and pork, nevertheless Canada has not gained thereby since we are exporting to Great Britain little beef, and only a small fraction of the bacon that we exported during the war.

A press statement in the Regina Leader-Post of August 31, 1949, reads:

> When Strachey went to the food ministry three years ago, Britain got about 35 per cent of her food from Canada and the United States. Today that figure has been cut to 12 per cent, three-quarters of which is accounted for by the Anglo-Canadian wheat contract.

Instead of supplying the major part of 35 per cent of the British food diet, Canada is now supplying only 12 per cent, three-quarters of which is accounted for by the Anglo-Canadian wheat contract, and we are able to sell our wheat to Great Britain this year only because the United States has made $175 million available to Britain for the purchase of our wheat.

Therefore we see that the chief results of devaluation will be a further reduction in our exports to Great Britain, accompanied at the same time by a general over-all shrinkage of trade, and a reduction in the British standard of living. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) talked about positive measures, but he never said what the positive measures were. He said:

> With regard to the longer-term and more positive approach, it was agreed that the objective for all of us must be the achievement of a pattern of world trade in which the dollar and non-dollar countries can live together within one single multilateral system—a system under which a balance will be achieved by the expansion and not the contraction of trade.

I contend this statement is wholly without foundation. Devaluation means a contraction of trade. The minister in the same speech seemed aware of the possibility of contraction when he said:

> . . . we cannot afford to overlook the possibility of short run declines in the absorptive capacity of the American market.

He admits that there is a possibility of a recession in the United States in the future, but then he adds that the government has a program to maintain full employment and prosperity in Canada. The minister said:

> . . . we have already taken steps to give still greater encouragement to housing construction, and we are in the midst of discussions with the provinces regarding both the magnitude and the timing of extensive work on the trans-Canada highway.

I wonder why the minister did not include the irrigation development in Saskatchewan about which we have heard so much for so many years. Apparently that is not to be one of the projects to be undertaken to maintain full employment in Canada. In speaking of the trans-Canada highway he referred to the magnitude and the timing of this extensive work. I did not know that its construction was tied to the minister's theory of cyclical budgeting. I thought the government's stand was that Canada needed a trans-Canada highway, and that the government would help in the completion of it with all dispatch. But surely the minister does not believe that Canada can maintain full production and full employment at a time of recession in the United States and still follow the policies that are being followed by the government today.

If Canada wishes to maintain full production and full employment at a time when there is a recession in the United States, then it will necessarily mean the reimposition of rigid government controls. The present government is against controls. Therefore I can only assume that, if there is a recession in the United States, it is going to overflow into Canada and there is nothing that this government will do about it.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in answering a question today, referred to two of the deputy ministers who have been in Great Britain discussing our trade problem. I should like to point out that those gentlemen were in Great Britain discussing the possibility, as I understand it, of concluding a bilateral agreement for the sale of such commodities as bacon, cheese and eggs. The Minister of Finance read us a lecture in March of last year about the evils of bilateral agreements. Notwithstanding the minister's lecture the government, and I compliment them for it, are still trying to maintain bilateral agreements even if they are for reduced quantities. Why should we and the government expect Great Britain to sign bilateral agreements with us for the sale of our commodities if we will not do exactly the same thing for the British and sign bilateral agreements for the sale of British goods in Canada? I believe through bilateral agreements we have one positive method by which we could increase our purchases of British automobiles, farm machinery, textiles and other manufactured goods. The government should not set itself against adopting new and, if necessary, radical changes in its trade policy, if by that means it could cope with the present reduction in markets. In my opinion, the government should have no hesitation in accepting the amendment of the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) calling upon it to reduce tariffs and to implement a policy of freer thade, something that the government and the Liberal party have been talking about for many years.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I hope the hon. member is not quoting him as an authority.

Mr. Argue: I believe the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) would be a much better authority than the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

I have one other suggestion to make before I conclude.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has exhausted his time and cannot continue without the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Argue: I should like to leave one other thought with the house, and that thought came to me when the Prime Minister of India was addressing the joint houses of parliament a short time ago. India has large sterling balances in London. As a sister nation in the commonwealth, India would like to exchange those sterling balances for dollars and increase her imports. I believe this government should consider taking over part of India's sterling balance in London, as a means of helping to improve our market situation. We would be helping Great Britain solve her serious dollar crisis, and at the same time we would be helping to raise the standard of living of millions of our fellow human beings who reside in the sister nation of India.

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to another speech from a member of the group I designate as the unlucky thirteen. For many days we have listened to their speeches, and now I have to speak on an amendment to the amendment which is a typical C.C.F. amendment. As a matter of fact we have a half-Conservative and half-C.C.F. amendment to the government motion. It suggests that we—> —give immediate consideration to a reduction of tariffs sufficient to encourage an increase in imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries.

The party in question sponsoring the amendment knows quite well that the government of the day has, for many years now, given consideration to that very thing. The amendment means absolutely nothing. This group knows the government has been doing that, and is still doing it. It is also well known that the government intends to get as much for our western wheat as it is possible to obtain. This amendment does not go far enough, if my hon. friend wanted to secure something for the western farmer. There is no question about it, the westerner feels that he is buying everything on a closed market and selling everything on an open market. Ninety per cent of the people west of the great lakes are natural free traders.

If my friends of the C.C.F. could have brought forward a suggestion that we have two kinds of money as well as being a bilingual country, everything might be all right. We have not got two kinds of money. We cannot use sterling on the one hand, and the dollar on the other. I should point out that in many announcements the government has made it quite clear it does not believe in bilateral trade agreements any more than does the British government. That government has clearly stated that it intends to get out of bilateral agreements as fast as possible. Our government of the day has made it clear that it believes in multilateral trade. That is all I intend to say about that, except to say that the member introducing the amendment was the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher).

At page 1027 of Hansard, the member for Moose Jaw said:

> Hon. members of the Liberal party will see that there are no strings attached to that amendment. Anyone who believes in freer trade should have no difficulty in voting for it. I call upon my Liberal friends to vote the way they have been talking for the last fifty years.

I shall suggest to the hon. member for Moose Jaw, who is a fairly young member in the C.C.F., that sometime he read the prayer of that old gentleman whom we all used to respect, the late Mr. Woodsworth. He said:

> We have learned how imperfect is our knowledge, how narrow our vision. May we be willing to welcome truth from whatever source it comes. May we endeavour to follow the truth at whatever cost.

My hon. friend from Moose Jaw knows that there are strings attached to this resolution. He knows that any member of this house who votes for that amendment is voting no confidence in the government of the day. The same use would be made of a vote for this amendment as was made of a vote recorded in this house previously on the matter of the means test. It was a very unfair use, and many people who do not know the rules of this house—

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am in order. I am not going into a previous debate at all. You are out of order. A very unfair use was made of that vote by the leader of the C.C.F., the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). His statement is reported in the press as follows:

> Speaking from a prepared text in support of Harvey Hotrum, C.C.F. candidate in the Toronto Greenwood federal constituency—who, incidentally, lost out.

> —Mr. Coldwell said, "the Liberal government already has broken faith with many of those who supported it with their franchise last June." He said that, because of the oft-repeated Liberal promises, "many old age pensioners thought by voting Liberal they would make sure the burden of the means test would be lifted. However, in the House of Commons last week not one Liberal had the courage to vote for this simple but needed reform."

I would suggest that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar follow the precepts of that great leader, Mr. Woodsworth. That is not telling the people what the facts of the case are; it is a misleading statement. Every member of this house is put in the position of having to explain the rules of this house to his constituents, and the effect of voting for an amendment of that sort.

Sometimes I think the rules committee—as a young member of this house perhaps I should not be making these suggestions—should consider tacking on at the end of amendments to the budget motion or any other motion, "This is a vote of confidence in the government", or "This is a vote of non-confidence in the government". I know that in my constituency, seventy per cent of the population are foreign-born, and all these things have to be explained. I know that the same misuse will be made of that vote all throughout Saskatchewan as was made in the speech by the leader of the C.C.F.

In a report appearing in the Ottawa Citizen, the leader of the C.C.F. is reported as follows:

> He pointed out that not one Liberal member had supported the means test for pensions "yet many promised such support in election speeches."

I may say that not only is every member of the Liberal party to whom I have spoken in favour of what has happened in connection with social services, but expects further things to happen when the government has had time to perfect the scheme. We do not want any imperfect schemes such as the one that was adopted in the province of Saskatchewan. We do not want a half-baked scheme brought into this house.

Then my friend the leader of the C.C.F., speaking to the Canadian Congress of Labour, said: Not only do I represent labour but we also represent that great group of agriculturists in this country.

Mr. Sinnott: That is nonsense.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, he assured labour, at the Canadian Congress of Labour meeting, that he represented the agriculturists of this country. If he represents agriculture, then I represent the Hottentots. Let us look at the C.C.F. membership in this house. There are some good fellows in the C.C.F., although they are sometimes hard to find. But the C.C.F. have one bona fide farmer sitting in this house. There is one fruit grower and there is a half farmer, as you might call him, who just spoke; that is a total of one and a half farmers and a fruit grower. None of the rest of them are agriculturists. That is their total agricultural representation in this house.

If you take it constituency by constituency, and province by province, you will find that in many of the provinces where there are many agriculturists, the agriculturists have no representation in the C.C.F. The people of the country may be astounded to know that the Conservative party in this house have a representation of farmers which is fourteen times as great as that of the C.C.F. party. I would suggest that my friend the leader of the C.C.F. should follow the suggestion that was made by Mr. Irvine at Winnipeg when he said: We no longer represent the farmers; it is obvious that we do not; we should come out in true colours as a labour set-up. Then of course they would not represent all of labour by any means.

Some of us who have been sitting in this house as younger members would much rather have heard older members speak. We feel that we do not know it all by any means, that we have a great deal to learn, and that we are here to learn. But we have been getting such a barrage from the corner over here to my left that we have not learned a great deal.

I checked up in the Parliamentary Guide to ascertain the complexion of the members that now represent the C.C.F. in this house. You will excuse me, Mr. Speaker, for dwelling on the C.C.F.; I do so because in Saskatchewan certain events are happening now and certain events are going to happen again. We gave them a start in that province, and we do not want to see the rest of our beloved country filled with them. Whom do they represent? On a check-up we find that, of the membership of the C.C.F., eight were born outside Canada altogether. That is all right. We welcome immigration. We always have done so and always will. But those men have reached maturity outside Canada. They made up their political views outside Canada. There are many of us Canadians here of English-speaking stock, whose ancestors have been here for possibly five generations. I have driven around the Gaspe peninsula with the Hon. J. E. Perrault, my old friend who is unfortunately dead. He used to be minister of roads in Quebec. I met the people of Gaspe peninsula. I spent three pleasant days there. They had a terrific storm. I watched those people under every circumstance, and they were a fine people. They had been in there for three or four hundred years.

As I say, we have a group here, eight of whom made up their political minds outside Canada altogether, who are coming to this country now and telling us that we are all wrong, that we should set up a new system, and that they have the answers. I can just imagine, and I have been doing it since away back in 1914, what in the world the English-speaking people or the Scotch on the Clyde would say if we sent over there a little group of Canadians who said: You are all wet over here; let us get a new government; your whole system is wrong, and so forth.

There is no question about this matter, because I am referring to the leader of the C.C.F., who wrote a book. Some people say that when you go into politics you should never write a book. This is a book by Major J. Coldwell, and he gives a military command "Left Turn Canada". On page one he says:

> As a young man and a student my interest in political affairs was aroused . . . as a participant in college debates when I had to argue against well-informed young radicals . . .

He must have lost the argument, I think. He continues:

> To these early discussions I attribute my present views.

So he brought them here; after being defeated in debate by radicals in England, over here he comes and we have to start all over again.

We have in Canada splendid people from every country. In my constituency many nationalities are represented. Many of those people are advancing splendidly. We have people from the old country who are at the head of a good many affairs. The latest appointment to the position of head of the Canadian National Railways is a demonstration of the truth of that statement, and we welcome it. But these men do not turn around and try to tell all other Canadians that their system is wrong and that they have got to change things. When we start to dissect any group it is fair to ask these questions: Where did they get their opinions? Are their opinions reasonable and are they logical? That is the proper approach; it is not personal. I think these gentlemen are wrong and I have no hesitation in saying so.

I want to say this. In this house I do not intend to indulge in any personalities. I do not think we are sent here for that purpose. Some sharp debates are going to take place. I think that is helpful. As long as they are conducted fairly, without anything personal in them, no harm is done, and that is the proper method of debating. But unfortunately, before I came to this house—and I think I should clear the decks on this matter—my friend the leader of the C.C.F. had certain things to say about me last session. I was not in the house to defend myself and had no opportunity of doing so, but I am here now.

The debate in question took place on March 10 of this year and is reported in Hansard, volume 2, pages 1342 to 1349. It took several pages of Hansard, and it all related to things that happened twenty years ago. I do not know that it is going to help this house much for me to try to settle this debate but it will at least clear the decks and show the people what's what.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) apparently had boasted that he had been offered a cabinet position by the then Liberal government of 1929. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) successfully proved that he had not. Then I was pulled in as the innocent lamb in the whole thing. I did not care whether he had or whether he had not. Here is what was said about me. I am reading now an extract from Hansard of March 10, 1949, at page 1344:

> The only part of Mr. Thorn's letter that I shall read is that which affects me and which reads: "We proceeded to congratulate them, and when we had completed doing that, Carl Stewart"—

That's me. I continue:

> He was subsequently minister of highways and I think he was wholly responsible for the wreck, if I may put it that way, of the Conservative party in that province.

I want my Conservative friends to get that. I continue:

> In the last election in 1945 he was the Liberal candidate in the Yorkton constituency.
> "Mr. Stewart said, 'Now boys that you have congratulated us we would appreciate you leaving, as when all is said and done, we are elected members and we wish to discuss our plans, and while we appreciate your assistance during the election, that is all behind now, and we don't need your assistance here.'
>
> "The three of us immediately began to splutter,"—

That is, Mr. Coldwell spluttered, Mr. Thorn spluttered—

> "and the other members present at once began to assure us that they didn't want us to leave, the two exceptions being Taylor and Stewart.
>
> "By this time you had become quite annoyed—

That is, Mr. Coldwell.

> "—and you proceeded to give Carl Stewart one of the best dressings-down he ever had, and Carl sat and took it. He never said one word back and he never got any encouragement from any of the members to say one word."

Referring to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) he said this:

> "He paid tribute to the straightforward and clean-cut campaigns of the Progressives and Independents."

Of which I was one. At least I got a compliment there.

I continue:

> "He assured me that he quite realized that we did not get behind the Conservatives in their campaign to vilify the Roman Catholics and to pep up the K.K.K. organization."

That is what my hon. friend read in the house concerning myself. I have asked the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to table in the house the whole of Mr. Thorn's letter. I wrote to him and I wish to table my letter to him.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member cannot do it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Then I shall read it into the record. It is dated October 3, and reads as follows:

> Not having been a recipient of Hansard in recent years, I was very surprised when I got down here to read your comments about myself in the 1949 session, and learn you had referred to a letter written to you by Mr. G. W. Thorn, barrister of Regina.
> These happenings were, of course, twenty years ago, and I cannot see what object you had in making the remarks about myself in the altercation which took place between yourself and the Right Honourable Minister of Agriculture.
> Have you any objection to forwarding me a copy of the letter of Mr. G. W. Thorn which, apparently, you are willing to table in the house and which, apparently, was not confidential as you used part of the letter.

I shall read the reply of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is dated October 5, and reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Stewart,
> In your letter you asked me two questions: (1) What object I had in making the remarks about you in connection with the altercations which took place between the Minister of Agriculture and myself.
> If you have read the record, as I think you have, you will have noted that, referring to the setting up of the Anderson government, he said: "I am not so sure that he (meaning myself) did not put them in." I thought I had to quote that part of Mr. Thorn's letter which indicated who, in my opinion, was responsible for the entry into the Anderson cabinet of Dr. Stipe and yourself. That was one reason. The other was,—

I want the house to get this.

> The other was, of course, that from time to time I have been informed that you had made the statement that you had thrown me out of the room in which the discussion occurred at the Kitchener hotel. These were the considerations that were in my mind and which I thought justified my references to yourself.

Of course I never made any such statement, and never mentioned it before he said it in the house. I continue:

The second question you ask me is if I would forward to you a copy of Mr. Thorn's letter, which you state I was willing to table in the house. I did not offer to table Mr. Thorn's letter in the house, although I had earlier offered to table a letter from Dr. MacLean, from which I quoted. I was under no obligation to table either letter, and I refrained from making the same offer regarding Mr. Thorn's letter as I had made in connection with Dr. MacLean's, because it contained certain comments and recollections which, while I think they were accurate, I am sure you would agree would be better left out. For exactly the same reason I am not forwarding you a copy of Mr. Thorn's letter, as I think no good purpose would be served.

I did not get a copy of Mr. Thorn's letter. Of course, if any hon. member had wanted Mr. Thorn's letter tabled at that time under the rules my hon. friend would have had to table it. Anybody could have asked for it.

Mr. Homuth: No.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Yes. He was reading from a letter. I am right on that. I have looked it up. In any event I could not see the letter. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made an attack on a former member of parliament who was not in the house at the time. He refuses to produce the letter. What was the record of Mr. Thorn? My hon. friend knew it very well. If he had been giving to this house the word of a reliable man there might not have been any objection to it; but I happen to be a past president of the law society of Saskatchewan. I also happen to have been recently re-elected by acclamation a bencher of the law society. It is our duty to discipline members of the law society of Saskatchewan. I also wrote to Mr. Thorn to get a copy of this letter but could not get it.

What is the record on the law society records of the province of Saskatchewan of the authority quoted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in this house? I will read it. G. W. Thorn was reprimanded by the benchers on May 22, 1946, for neglect of his client and failure to reply to a complaint. There have been complaints of every conceivable nature against this man for years, justified from the point of view of the client and very detrimental to the profession as a whole, no one of which has been serious enough to warrant disciplinary action. Ever since he has been admitted there have been complaints, usually of sharp practice, cruel zeal in pursuing honest but poor debtors and excessive charges and generally taking advantage of poor and ignorant people. None of these have been formal complaints but have come to the notice of the secretary by letters and interviews.

As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar knows, Mr. Thorn is one of the biggest capitalistic lawyers in the city of Regina. He has got the first two dollars he ever made and owns a block and charges high rentals. That is the authority whom the leader of the C.C.F., who is out for social justice, gives to this House of Commons. I want to say that the statements made in Mr. Thorn's letter are absolutely untrue. There were eleven members elected at that time. We were elected as Independents and Progressives. There are many Liberals in this house who used to belong to the Progressive group. As a matter of fact there were 65 sitting in this House of Commons at one time, and one of them is now sitting in the Senate. In any event, that was the organization. Eleven were elected of whom I was one. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was not elected. He was not even a candidate. He was only a member of the Progressive executive. He had no authority to dicker with anybody for a cabinet job because he was not elected. He was not elected for the city of Regina and never has been. He had to chase up to the city of Rosetown where there was a Progressive movement in order to get elected. Thank goodness I have been able to run in my own constituency, and whether I got beaten or elected I have always run in the same place. All he was told was that we, the elected members, would have to make a decision. And every one of the elected members there was elected in opposition to a Liberal. Our instructions were plain from our own committees and our own seats, and we followed them. We formed a coalition government, just as a coalition government had been formed in Manitoba, where even the C.C.F. joined in, and in British Columbia where they have a coalition today.

Now he says I wrecked the Conservative party. To my Conservative friends I say this, that I never heard one of the Conservative ministers with whom I was associated ever make any such statement, or even imply it. As a matter of fact, when it came to a general election, in accordance with my duty as a coalition member I spoke in more Conservative seats than any member of the government, apart from the premier and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—only he had a better organization than we had.

The only thing that did happen is that, without letting the government know—and remember this, that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who is flailing the Conservatives, took a job from the Conservatives in that very government as a commissioner to inquire into the civil service, and was paid for his work. I have the figures here. He took that job, and then after the government was in he turned around and formed a labour party, without telling any of us and without suggesting that we were doing things wrong. It was easy to form a new party in Saskatchewan in those days, because we had drought over three-quarters of the province in four consecutive years. In addition to wheat being down to 22 cents a bushel, we had that drought. It was easy to form a party then, a despondent party. But you can see what happened since. Since we have had a Liberal government and prosperity the C.C.F. have waned in Saskatchewan. And that is a natural consequence.

But so far as the Conservatives are concerned I wish to say this—and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar well knows this—that when it came to the final analysis of that government, when we needed $3 million for relief, I was the member of that government chosen to come down to tangle with Mr. R. B. Bennett, and the one who managed to persuade him to pay $3 million, or our cheques would not have been cashed. I had to do that job.

I am pleased to say that a lot of Conservatives in Saskatchewan still appreciate the roads I built out there. Not only that, in my constituency when my candidature in this election was announced the Conservatives in my home city of Yorkton took down their bills and vacated their committee rooms. So I do not think the Conservatives felt quite as badly about me as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would like to make out.

Then, in addition, I have not relied upon my statement in this matter. I have written giving the version that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar gave of this affair. I wrote to a C.C.F.'er who sat as a Progressive member then, and to two other independents of Conservative leanings. I have all those letters here. They show absolutely that what Mr. Thorn says is incorrect. I am prepared to table these letters, but under the rules of the house, namely citations 265 and 269, I cannot table them without unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Granted.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Now, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has not always thought ill of me, apparently, according to what he said in the legislature. I do not know whether his great zeal to make a point out of the Minister of Agriculture led him astray or not. However, I have here an issue of the Yorkton Enterprise in which reference is made to the Theodore meeting of October 17, 1938, wherein the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said—and this was 1938, long after I am supposed to have done these things to some people in Regina—that I was one of the best Progressives in the west. And if he likes I will quote the whole article—

An hon. Member: Let us have it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Here is what he says—and I do not want to take up too much time on this, because there is a lot more. This is the quotation from the Enterprise, the editor of which, incidentally, is a cousin of the Minister of Fisheries. He says:

> A year ago when M. J. Coldwell, national leader of the C.C.F. party, spoke in Yorkton in the interests of A. P. Swallow in the provincial election, I put this question to Mr. Coldwell at the conclusion of his address:
> "In your public appearances in Yorkton has The Enterprise 'covered' your addresses fully and fairly?"
> Mr. Coldwell replied:
>
> "The Enterprise is one of the few papers in Canada which invariably reports me fully, accurately and at length."

All right; now they quote you at length. Kenny goes on to say:

> I was at Theodore on October 17, 1938, when the C.C.F. held their convention. They tried to nominate in the afternoon but couldn't make a decision. Charles Beck, Senior, was an exponent of Social Credit in those days. Mr. Coldwell admitted he would like—

And the Social Crediters will enjoy this—

> —to see the convention choose a fusion candidate. He felt the Social Credit was O.K., but William Aberhart apparently didn't like the C.C.F. . . . Speaking in support of the C.C.F., Jacob Benson, C.C.F., M.L.A. for Last Mountain who had previously been the C.C.F. candidate in the Yorkton constituency, said in part:
> "I am glad to be here associated on this platform with Carl Stewart. I had the honour of sitting with him in the legislature. I said once in Yorkton and I repeat it here tonight I cannot understand why they defeated Mr. Stewart in 1934 because he did more for Yorkton in his five years in Regina than was done by all his predecessors for Yorkton in the legislature."

Then, we will get to the more interesting part—because the C.C.F. have claimed I am really C.C.F. sometimes. This speaks about fusion. This editorial continues:

> Mr. Stewart was in a virtual hive of C.C.F.'ers that night. Here is what he said:
> "Some say I am riding three horses. As a matter of fact, six horses came all harnessed up for me before the election began. I am not bound to any political party. My father was a Liberal and my mother a Conservative and I am a Progressive."

I think between the two of them they made an independent—but one should not say that.

> "I do not believe that people are so much concerned with the name of a party as they are with action."

And just who were those C.C.F. that sat on the platform and applauded this statement by Mr. Stewart? M. J. Coldwell, national leader of the C.C.F.; G. H. Castleden, the C.C.F. nominee for Yorkton; Jacob Benson, C.C.F. member for Last Mountain—

And so on.

And what was it again these people wanted? Remember their two, and only two, resolutions? They said give us $1.03 a bushel for our No. 1 Northern wheat f.o.b. Fort William and $6 per cultivated acre for lands which do not produce either because of crop failure or crop curtailment policy.

That is the report of that meeting. In addition, when I decided to quit running it was because they had completely undermined my organization. I sat in the following legislature as an independent alongside C.C.F.'ers for five years. During that time I went after the C.C.F.—it is all on record. I could not see their policy on socialism. While I sat in opposition to the Liberal party, I could not follow the other policy of the C.C.F. I could not follow them fully. The papers in our province were filled with what I had said at that time about the C.C.F.

I went back to my constituency and called a special meeting because I wanted to clean this all up so that it would not come up again. At that meeting I gave the complete history to the people of my constituency. At that meeting were seven of the C.C.F. executive. Then I left the meeting and told them to decide from the record what they would do. That meeting, which included seven of the C.C.F. executive, voted unanimously in approval of what I had done during the five years in the legislature. I thought that that was the democratic thing to do when I decided to quit.

The C.C.F. said that I could go to their convention and speak. I said that I could not, that I could only tell them what I had said before, that I am not a believer in all-out socialism. I believe in reform and I think every good Liberal believes in reform. The C.C.F. simply said, "All you have to do is to sign a membership card and you can get in." I said that would be all right provided it did not bind me to anything. They were going to allow me to speak to the convention, the local group.

The fact is that they would not do that even if you paid them a dollar. I could not even get in to the C.C.F. meeting. My hon. friends in the C.C.F. can have such chaps as Richards of The Pas and these other fellows whom they keep on hand right up to the federal elections and then they call them communists and kick them out. That is just the difference. The C.C.F. meetings are closed meetings. You have to pass their doors almost as you would pass through the doors of the Kremlin.

[Mr. Stewart (Yorkton).]

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I object to further time being granted and I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: We will remember that.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is all right; I will have another forty minutes later on.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: The point of order has to do with the documents which the hon. member asked to table during the course of his remarks. I was not clear from the way those documents went back and forth from one table to the other whether they were being tabled as parliamentary documents or whether they were being placed on Hansard. If they were being placed on Hansard there were several of us who shouted "No", so the hon. member did not have unanimous consent to place those letters or documents on Hansard.

So far as the tabling of documents is concerned, I would call attention to citation 316 of Beauchesne, second edition, which says:

The same rule—

That is the rule having to do with the tabling of documents.

—however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

The last sentence reads:

Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the Speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

I know that on former occasions when hon. members have been asked to table documents and have consented to do so the former Clerk of the house returned them, stating that as they were private documents they could not be tabled. My point of order is twofold. I contend that if the hon. member was asking permission to table the documents he would be out of order. If he was asking that they be printed in Hansard I contend that that could not be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On the point of order, I looked at the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when I suggested that they should be tabled, and the hon. member nodded his head. I took it for granted that there was no objection.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, "No".

Mr. Speaker: I do not know of any rule that permits documents such as the hon. member has mentioned to be tabled in the house. My recollection is that the rule applying to the tabling of documents applies to public documents only.

Mr. Knowles: What about the request that they be placed on Hansard? Is it understood that the hon. member did not have unanimous consent for that?

An hon. Member: Yes, he did.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was in the house when the request was made to have the documents inserted in Hansard and did not agree, there would not be unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: I said, "No", and several of us here said, "No".

Mr. Gardiner: On the point of order, I have listened to all the discussion and the same thing happened as happens almost every time that extra time is asked for. When the request was made there were two members of the C.C.F. party who said, "No". I took the trouble of looking over there at the time and both hon. members were smiling. When it was suggested again that the house give unanimous consent, no one said "No" the second time and the letters were presented to the Clerk and, I presume, are going to be printed. I submit for the consideration of my hon. friends that these things are done in order to save time. The hon. member would have a perfect right to speak again for forty minutes on the main motion when he could read the letters into Hansard. I would suggest that they be allowed to go in.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not mind whether these documents go into Hansard, but there is no doubt that when the request was made of the house the answer was "No". I do not know whether the minister listened the second time, but I heard hon. gentlemen near me say, "No" each time the question was asked.

Mr. Speaker: In view of what has been said by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar may I consider that the hon. member now has unanimous consent to have these documents inserted in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The letters read as follows:

Invermay, Sask.,
10th October, 1949

A. C. Stewart, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Carl:

Your honourable friend went back twenty years to find a little dust so that he might make dirt out of it; but then he has spent most of his years word-mongering. "With words we govern men," said Disraeli, 'Tis too true; words, too often failing to square with facts, are the stock in trade of those who would hold arbitrary authority over others. You have the facts of the incident pretty well as they took place in Regina at the meeting referred to in your recent letter.

M. J. Coldwell was trying at that time to keep too many doors open to give anyone a dressing down; in fact he was almost brought in the back door as public service commissioner for Saskatchewan. Some of those who spoke on his behalf, and were supposed to know him better than you or I, said he could qualify under veterans preference, as he was a major; and that name his mammy gave him has fooled a lot of people since. To me he never was more than the chocolate major.

Kind regards to all and good luck,

Sincerely,

J. R. Taylor

A. C. Stewart, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Carl:

Yours of October 7 to hand, and I was indeed surprised to hear that Mr. M. J. Coldwell had quoted Mr. Thorn as to the inside discussions we had whilst deciding which would be our proper course to pursue as elected representatives.

My recollection of these discussions is to the effect that—and we Independents and Progressives were all agreed—the Liberal government at that date was to be defeated in the house on the first vote taken. This was the policy which we had been elected upon, and we were duty bound to act accordingly.

We undertook to listen to the advice of all those parties more or less interested, or thought they were interested in our behalf, but when it came down to the method of decisive action to be taken, it was only natural that we assumed this responsibility amongst ourselves rather than being influenced by any outside parties.

I have no recollection during all the time that I have known you—namely, some thirty years—of your ever having received a "dressing down" and remaining quiet thereafter. My impression was always that the greater the "dressing down," the greater retaliation undertaken. For that reason I cannot help but think that Mr. Thorn—or whoever made the statement—was in error.

Sorry you are working so hard. Hope it soon eases off for you. Am working pretty hard myself, but will soon be off for my annual holiday. We are starting out for the west coast, and then south. Not sure just where we will stop for the winter. Best wishes and take care of yourself. Am feeling good myself but need a long rest.

Yours sincerely,

R. Stipe, M.D.

Creelman, October 16, 1949

A. C. Stewart, Esq., K.C., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear A. C.:

Your letter received, and I may say that my memory is none too good for events of far more recent date than those referred to in your letter. However, as I recollect, paragraphs 3 and 4 are about as it happened. I don't remember any "calling down" that you got; for the rest I couldn't say.

With regard to the charge that you were responsible for the wreck of the Conservative party, that is something that shouldn't bother you too much in your present position.

Well, how are your wife and family? What are the boys doing? They were great little scrappers. I am enjoying good health, and wife and seven of a family all well and doing well.

Glad to hear from you again.

Yours truly,

S. Horner

Mr. Speaker: May I point out that a point of order should be raised at the time the irregularity complained of is taking place. We have been discussing whether or not the hon. member had unanimous consent to do something which took place about fifteen minutes ago. If the point of order had been raised at that time it would have been much easier for the Speaker to decide whether the hon. member had unanimous consent. I mention this so that in future we shall not have this difficulty. I repeat that the point of order should be raised at the time objection is raised, and not afterward. See Beauchesne, third edition, paragraph 261.

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege, may I say that I agree fully with what Your Honour has said, but the difficulty was that it was uncertain whether the hon. member was asking to table the documents or to have them placed on Hansard. We could not tell because they were being carried back and forth between the table of the house and the Hansard desk.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order could have been taken at that time.

Mr. Knowles: I agree.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

Mr. Cruickshank: Explain, please.

Mr. Benidickson: In moving second reading of the bill, I think some explanation should be given to the house. Most hon. members who were here in the last parliament will recall that the house took certain action with respect to the many companies that were coming forward with plans for the development of the greatly expanding oil industry in Alberta. At the last session the house passed the Pipe Lines Act. This laid down the principle that any company desirous of having an interprovincial or international pipe line would be obliged to follow. Hon. members will recall that it was laid down, as far as this parliament was concerned, that jurisdiction in that respect would be given to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada.

At the last session of parliament several bills incorporating companies under the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act were passed. Some of those were for the transmission of oil and some for the transmission of natural gas. The terms of the present bill are almost identical with those of a bill sponsored at the last session by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), namely, Westcoast Transmission Company Limited. Those who were members of the house at that time will recall that considerable concessions were given to the sponsor of the bill and to those associated with the company during the last stages of that session, in that the rules of the house were waived for its rapid passage. I want to point out that the powers requested in the bill of which I am now moving second reading, namely, Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, are identical with the powers asked for in the other bill I have mentioned.

I wish to make it clear that the passing of this bill does not in any way establish routes for the transmission lines for this company. As I say, as far as federal jurisdiction is concerned, under the direction of this parliament it was ordered in the last session that routes must be decided upon by the board of transport commissioners. I think hon. members are also aware that public interest is additionally protected in that the province of Alberta has established most effective control now of its natural resources in the form of oil and natural gas.

In the light of developments in that province, the Alberta government last year passed an important and effective act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Preservation, Conservation and Effective Utilization of the Gas Resources of the Province". I am not going to go into it in detail because I imagine that, if the present bill is proceeded with and we are able to examine the petitioners in one of our committees, hon. members of that committee will want to give the Alberta act considerable attention. I may say in passing that the Alberta government has the most direct control of the export of oil or natural gas from that province.

If we are to take the precedent of the case of the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, the board of transport commissioners have taken the stand that, before anybody can come before it and secure authority under the Pipe Lines Act, he must produce evidence that he has satisfied the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta, and that that board has satisfied itself that there is a surplus of gas in the province for export and has given authority to the corporation to export gas therefrom. In that connection I should like to read one of the sections of the Alberta act which I think will indicate to hon. members the effective control that has been established, and quite properly so, in that province. Subsection 2 of section 7 of the Alberta act reads:

> The board shall not grant a permit for the removal of any gas from the province unless such gas is, in the opinion of the board, surplus to the present and future needs of the people of the province.

In addition, hon. members are probably aware that a further public control is established at the dominion level in that any person desiring to deal in oil or natural gas in an interprovincial or international way must obtain from the Department of Trade and Commerce another permit under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. This is an additional public control. Therefore I say all that is sought in the bill is the right of this group to have corporate status, which this parliament has said they must have by act of parliament, and which is required before they can go to the Alberta board for the right to export and in turn go to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada.

I should like to inform the house that the bill has nothing to do with routes. There is nothing in it that establishes a route. I am advised by the group of Canadians who are associated with this company that they are most anxious to emphasize in the first place the maintenance of ownership of the project in Canada, and in the second place that they are prepared to do whatever it is ordered they shall do by either the public body of Alberta or the public body of the dominion —the board of transport commissioners, as far as the route is concerned. The incorporators are anxious to get into this line of business. Before they can do so, parliament has said that they must have corporate status, and that is all that is being asked.

As further evidence that there is no attempt in this measure to interfere with the desires and the rights of the province of Alberta, where these resources lie, I should like to place on the record a telegram that was sent to the premier of Alberta, when a similar bill was being considered in the other place. This telegram was sent by Senator Turgeon on October 17 to Premier Manning of Alberta, and reads as follows:

> I should be glad to have answers to following questions as sponsor of the Alberta Natural Gas Company bill asking for charter enabling company to apply to board of transport commissioners, also the government of Alberta and the government of Canada for authority to export gas from Alberta to Vancouver, British Columbia and other parts of Canada and to the United States. Question No. 1: Is the government of Alberta opposed to the incorporation by the parliament of Canada under provisions of the Pipe Lines Act of the Alberta Natural Gas Company or any other bona fide company seeking power to build a pipe line under the Pipe Lines Act? The answer to this question would be based on the assumption that the ultimate intention of such company, after receiving due federal and provincial authorization, is to supply natural gas from Alberta to consumers in British Columbia, and any surplus supply would go to consumers in the United States Pacific northwest. Question No. 2: Has the Alberta government decided to prohibit the export of natural gas from any particular area or sections of the province of Alberta? Question No. 3: What is the general policy of your government in regard to export of gas from Alberta? I would greatly appreciate receiving reply today Monday.

Premier Manning replied on October 17 as follows:

> Replying to your telegram October seventeenth, the following are the answers to the questions as enumerated in your wire. Answer to question No. 1: The Alberta government is not opposed to the incorporation of the Alberta Natural Gas Company or any other bona fide company under provisions of Pipe Lines Act, but on the contrary, feels very strongly that no bona fide company should be refused incorporation in that refusal would deprive the province of its right to deal with any or all legitimate companies interested in exporting gas and would restrict such dealings to those particular companies favoured by parliament for incorporation. Answer to question number two, the Alberta government has not decided to prohibit the export of gas from any particular area of the province but has announced that it will not approve the export of any gas until fully satisfied that there are sufficient available reserves to meet the present and future domestic and industrial requirements of Alberta. The discovery of new reserves and or integration of present fields could completely change the prevailing situation in any particular area. Answer to question number three, the policy of the Alberta government respecting the export of natural gas is threefold, first to prohibit any export until fully satisfied that there are sufficient available reserves to meet Alberta's present and future domestic and industrial requirements; second, when satisfied that surplus exists over and above these requirements sufficient to justify export under sound conservation and proration practices the government will approve the export of such surplus with each application being considered on its own merits and in the light of all prevailing factors; third, it will be a condition of any export permit that Canadian requirements must be given first priority.

I read this into the record to assure hon. members that the public interest is being protected at the provincial level in Alberta. What is required here is simply the granting to this company of a right similar to that which has been given to other companies, to go before the Alberta board and find out when they and others will receive attention for the request to export gas and oil from that province.

If we were to follow the procedure of last session, a bill of this type would be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It would be my hope that after second reading that procedure would be followed now. At that time the officers of the company, including its technical advisers, engineers and the like, could be examined by the members of this house. They would be in a position to give any details connected with the company's plan.

The point I wish to emphasize is that this parliament has already authorized certain companies to proceed to corporate status in order to do the same thing this company proposes to do. I say I think it would be contrary to the public interest if there were any tendency to close off the granting of rights to companies such as those granted required corporate status in the late stages of the last parliament, leaving those few companies in the position of holding a monopoly. That would be avoided, Mr. Manning says, by giving the greatest number of companies the opportunity of presenting their proposals to the conservation board in Alberta. That board, together with the board of transport commissioners and the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, acting under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, could then decide what was in the public interest as between the various companies who might have schemes for the development of these important resources in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Cruickshank: Might I ask the hon. member a question? I congratulate him on his very able presentation of a poor cause. The hon. member said that the bill I happened to have the privilege of sponsoring last year was similar to his bill. It was the only bill before the parliament of Canada for an all-Canadian route, and I should like him to tell me where the similarity is in the two bills.

Mr. Benidickson: In answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), in the section of the bill that outlines the authority the company is seeking from this parliament, and which, in the case of the Westcoast Transmission Company bill sponsored by my learned friend, is section 6, and with respect to the bill I am sponsoring is also section 6, the words are identical. Both sections include the authority "to have pipe lines; to sell, convey or otherwise dispose of and turn to account, any and all interprovincial or international pipe lines."

I would also advise my hon. friend from Fraser Valley that shortly after the bill he sponsored was passed in this house, on May 11, 1949, an application was filed with the board of transport commissioners by the Westcoast Transmission Company, and on a map they indicated their desire for authority to take gas and oil from Edmonton to Macleod and down to the border. There was an extension shown on the map filed with that application which would indicate the company had some further plans with respect to the United States. The board of transport commissioners, of course, only has jurisdiction with respect to the Canadian territory.

Mr. Cruickshank: I appreciate very much the honour my friend accorded me when he called me his "learned friend." I would not go quite that far. There are one or two questions I should like to ask the hon. member. Are the directors of the company now being sponsored, the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, citizens either of the province of Alberta which is going to supply this gas or the province of British Columbia which will derive the benefit of it?

Mr. Benidickson: It is rather difficult for me to answer questions at this stage of the bill. I believe the member for Fraser Valley could get this information more properly either when we reach committee of the whole or in a standing committee to which the bill might be referred. I may tell my hon. friend, however, that there are some very well known and highly thought of persons in the province of Alberta who are interested in this bill. On the spur of the moment, I can think of Mr. Bruce Smith, K.C.; Mr. Walter Sprague; Mr. Murray Montague and Mr. Hales Ross, all of Edmonton, as Alberta persons interested in this bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not question the integrity—

Mr. Wylie: This is not the question.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am just doing a little questioning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may ask questions of a member who previously had the floor, with the consent of that member. I understood the hon. member to say that he thought the questions should be asked in committee. If he does not agree to answer the questions now, it is out of order to ask them.

Mr. Cruickshank: Am I to understand that the member sponsoring this bill is not prepared to answer questions concerning a non-Canadian route as compared with an all-Canadian route, now or at any time?

Mr. Benidickson: I am only too pleased to abide by the rules or, with the consent of the house, to answer my hon. friend now. I must remind him, of course, that when he sponsored the Westcoast Transmission bill to which he has referred he made no word of explanation to the house as to the purpose of the bill nor was he asked any questions.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): I should like to say a few words about this bill. As you know, the city of Medicine Hat is vitally interested in the natural gas in this country. I am becoming just a little confused by all the bills that are being presented to this house. At the last session of parliament a bill was passed concerning the Westcoast Transmission Company. Last week we discussed another bill concerning the Alberta Natural Gas Company. Tonight there is a bill to incorporate the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. Just where we are going to get off at, I do not know. I agree with the telegram that was read by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). I agree with the reply from the premier of our province. I was going to put it on Hansard tonight if the hon. member had not done so. I feel, however, that this is something that should receive serious consideration; I think perhaps it should receive more consideration than a bill coming into this house every week.

To review part of the history of natural gas in Alberta, may I say this. The first gas well in Medicine Hat was drilled in 1883. I believe that Medicine Hat, in the southern part of the province, was the first city in Alberta to discover gas. I am sure some hon. member will correct me if I am wrong in that statement, but I believe that I am right. The discovery of gas in Medicine Hat was unique. It may be recalled to many hon. members here that a portion of the south Saskatchewan river never froze up during any winter, and that when someone went up to this opening in the river and lit a match to light a cigarette, it went into flames. I may say further that in the early days of Medicine Hat and the south country many people, when they went on a picnic, took along a shovel, dug into the ground about four or five feet, lit a match, and they had natural gas with which to cook their meals.

Today the situation is changed. We in the southeastern and southern part of the province believe that we have sufficient gas for our heating, our cooking and our industries for quite a number of years. But it must also be remembered that at the present time Medicine Hat is drilling wells nine miles from the city limits. What does that mean? It means only one thing, Mr. Speaker. It means that the pressure in our gas wells is being reduced. It means that the residents of Medicine Hat must pay more in the way of taxes in order to get, as an hon member said the other night, our cheap fuel. That goes to show that we must be extremely careful about the exportation of any gas from the southern part of our province.

It is true that in the northern part of Alberta we have many fields that are not yet explored. But it must also be remembered that, before any gas line goes through any part of the United States to heat the city of Vancouver, we must be prepared to look after our own heating needs and the present and future needs of our industries.

In the city of Medicine Hat today we have only about four lights burning all day long. No doubt many members in this house will recall articles they have read to the effect that Medicine Hat was the only city in Canada which had lights burning twenty-four hours of the day. The reason those lights were left on all day was that it cost too much to put them out; it was cheaper to let them burn. The only lights we have burning all day in Medicine Hat are about three at the C.P.R. station. I am speaking about natural gas lights. All the others have been replaced by electricity. Any time that any dignitary came to our city, the first thing we thought of was blowing off a gas well, in order to show him what we had in the city of Medicine Hat. Under the gas conservation board, which I certainly believe in and which I think we should have had many years ago, there is no more blowing off of gas wells. You may recall, Mr. Speaker, the flares that we had in Turner valley. When I was with the Department of Agriculture years ago, I can remember sleeping on top of the hill at Cochrane, northwest of Calgary, which is well known to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). You could see that flare for miles. We now have no more flares. It must also be remembered that the burning of those flares reduced our oil production. It must be remembered that maybe ninety per cent of the possible oil production of Turner valley is still in the Turner valley field owing to the waste of gas in years gone by. That is rather hard to believe.

I might mention Bow Island, a small town between Lethbridge and Medicine Hat. In the early days Bow Island had an abundance of gas. What is happening at the present time in the Bow Island field? That field is being repressured from the Turner valley field. Those are things that many people do not realize but the citizens of that area realize them. We in a city like Medicine Hat certainly realize them, because we depend on the production of natural gas for our livelihood. If it were not for natural gas in Medicine Hat where would Medicine Hat be? An hon. gentleman says that we would be in the dark. I say quite definitely that is so, but may I say to that hon. gentleman and to every other hon. member that if it were not for natural gas there would not be any city of Medicine Hat. We have no farming community around Medicine Hat sufficiently large to support a city of 15,000 or 16,000 people. There is no need for me to go into that, because I have spoken on irrigation every time I have risen in the house, and I do not know why I am not speaking on irrigation now. However, this is a natural gas bill.

Mr. Knowles: It is a pipe line; you can run water through it.

Mr. Wylie: It is true, as the hon. member says, that it is a pipe line and we might run water through it. I wish we had some pipes to run some water through them. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in his sojourn in the west during the last two weeks, has seen fit to bring water through some of these pipe lines.

Getting back to natural gas, may I say that we in that south country believe we should protect the industries that we have in southern Alberta. We believe that we should protect the industries that we expect to have in the near future. Before we ship natural gas outside Canada we must supply our own people. Whether this company intends to go beyond the borders of Canada I do not know. I do not believe it was stated by the hon. member who introduced the bill. When these bills are introduced we should know whether the gas is to be exported beyond the borders of our own country, or whether it is to stay within our borders. That is one statement that should be made when the bills are introduced. If we have an abundance of gas we should use it in this country for the benefit of our own citizens. When we have a surplus of gas we might discuss exporting it. Until we are in a position to do that, we should keep it inside the borders of this country.

Mr. Pouliot: How can you establish that you have a surplus of gas?

Mr. Wylie: I am glad that the hon. member for Temiscouata brought up that question. I was just about to deal with it but I did not know how to approach it. Now that the hon. member has asked the question may I say I believe, and everyone in Alberta believes, that if we have a surplus of natural gas we should export it. Up to the present time we have no experts to tell us that we shall have a surplus of gas. Until that is done we should look after our own industries and our own requirements first. In saying that, I do not mean that we should keep it in Alberta. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) is just a little bit jealous of our natural gas.

Mr. Pouliot: Give him the surplus you have.

Mr. Wylie: No doubt, Mr. Speaker, anyone who is in the lumber business and produces sawdust for heating would want to protect the industry. May I say to the hon. member that if he ever tried natural gas he would never go back to sawdust.

[Mr. Wylie.]

Statements are made in the house that we in the west are enjoying cheap natural gas at the expense of the rest of Canada. I do not agree entirely with that statement. It is true that we are enjoying natural gas at a cheap rate. I say that we are very fortunate to be living in Alberta.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): And that they exported the hon. member.

Mr. Wylie: In spite of the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni we are glad to live in Alberta and that he lives in British Columbia. What is the situation in the south country, not only in Medicine Hat but in Lethbridge and Calgary?—I might say even in Red Deer. I could go further north than that. I could go to Edmonton. I could cover all the small towns east of Edmonton down to Camrose from which my good friend comes and perhaps down to Vegreville. They are all supplied with natural gas, not the kind of gas hon. members are thinking of. Natural gas is one product that we in Alberta must protect.

Mr. Pouliot: Will the hon. member please give me a definition of natural gas? Tell us the quantity and give us an idea of the reserves.

Mr. Knowles: Definition or exhibition?

Mr. Pouliot: The number of gallons that could be used in future years.

Some hon. Members: Gallons?

Mr. Wylie: I have no better definition of natural gas than the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not talking about it; I am asking for information.

Mr. Wylie: You have got the information. May I say that all we need to do in this south country, in the city of Medicine Hat or the adjoining country, is to drill a well in the ground about 1,000 feet deep and we have a gas well. Every once in a while if you wish to make a blow-off, just ask the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

But, seriously, getting back to this pipe line bill—

Mr. Pouliot: Are you for or against the bill?

Mr. Wylie: I am for the bill. One thing I do believe in is this: I believe in private enterprise, right to its roots. Why should any company have a monopoly on the export of gas from our wonderful province? If any hon. members want to introduce a bill to incorporate a company, that is certainly their privilege. I would not object to it; but I do object to the export of natural gas from Canada until everyone in the country has been supplied with it.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): That is what your premier said.

Mr. Wylie: We must look after the future requirements of our country. So that in answer to my hon. friend—

Mr. Pouliot: Which one?

Mr. Wylie: The hon. member for Temiscouata. He has asked if I am opposed to this bill, and I say that I am not. I believe we should have two or three companies in the field, because competition is what we all want, I hope.

Mr. MacInnis: What a hope!

Mr. Wylie: We certainly do not want to permit any one company to have a monopoly. About this bill I have only one thing to say and it is this—

An hon. Member: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Wylie: I can talk till nine o'clock if you want me to.

Mr. Cruickshank: You are doing a good job; keep going.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wylie: I do not oppose the bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wylie: You may laugh if you like; you may think that because I am speaking I am opposing it. In that you are wrong. But I believe in competition, and I am trying to tell the house that we have a situation we must protect. The situation in Alberta today is worth the serious consideration of the House of Commons and the other place.

The fact that some of these bills may pass the other place is no reason why they should pass here without consideration. We must look after the needs of our own people, and must not export natural gas to any other country until Canadian requirements are met. When I refer to Canadian requirements I do not mean the east or the west: I mean both.

I will support the bill—

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Wylie: Why not?

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Let's toss a coin.

Mr. Wylie: May I say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who is supposed to be a good Liberal—

Mr. Fraser: "Supposed" to be?

Mr. Wylie: Just how good, I don't know; but he believes in competition. I do not believe in monopoly, and it is for that reason I give my support to the bill—and to the bill which was up last week. I propose, too, to support the bill concerning the Westcoast Transmission Company.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is only one bill before the house.

Mr. Wylie: Those are the three bills I am glad to support. I am sorry to have transgressed the rule, and am glad Your Honour has corrected me. My support is given because I believe in competition. If we gave only one company the right to transport our gas we do not know what the poor people at the end of the line would have to pay for it, while we in Alberta would be getting cheap gas.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would you believe in an all-Canadian route?

Mr. Wylie: Yes, I do.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Wylie: Why not?

Mr. Knowles: The effects of this gas are becoming apparent.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want only ten minutes of explanation.

Mr. Wylie: You will have your ten minutes when I have finished.

Mr. Cruickshank: Keep going.

Mr. Wylie: But I am glad the hon. member for Fraser Valley has brought up that point, because I do support an all-Canadian route.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Wylie: If you had listened to my speech you would have known why, without asking the question. I have always supported an all-Canadian route for any pipe line. I have said more than once that I believe our own people should be supplied first with natural gas, and that only the surplus should be exported. I am sure the hon. member must have heard that, and I am surprised at his asking the question. I hope the hon. member will support me in the contention that no natural gas should leave Alberta or Canada until we are satisfied that our present and future requirements are filled.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, after the very fine speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat there remains very little for me to say. Governments begin to die the moment they are born, and this bill is a demonstration of that principle.

In the debate on second reading one is not permitted to discuss the various sections of a bill but is limited to the principle. It is difficult to limit oneself in that way. No village council would operate in this haphazard fashion in respect of a natural resource belonging to that village. Fortunately the position indicated here did not obtain in connection with the power development in the Niagara district. A section was inserted in the municipal act requiring a vote of the people.

I am surprised to see this high court of parliament attempting to pass this bill tonight. Only a few days ago we had an important discussion concerning our forests. We have parted with our natural resources in a frivolous manner. I am surprised that this bill does not take over the heavens above, the earth below and the waters under the earth. Nothing seems to be left out of the statute. There is general legislation known as the Pipe Lines Act, but in my opinion it should be called the pipe dream act. That would be a far better title for it because that is just what it is.

How does it come about that this particular bill was introduced in another place without any discussion? There were only five or six words said in the other place on this particular bill. This bill seeks to give away the natural resources of this country. It strikes me as being funny that a minister of the crown or an hon. member who is going to be a minister should introduce this particular form of bill.

We cannot refer to the sections of the bill on the motion for second reading, but I must say that this bill is different from any I have ever seen and I have been a member of this house for some few years. The bill seeks to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company, but it is not limited to that. It deals with 75 to 100 other matters. I am precluded from mentioning individual sections, but one section of this bill seeks to set this company outside the provisions of the Companies Act. An attempt is being made to make this a special act. It is proposed that the company shall not be subject to the provisions of sections 158, 163, 180 and 190 of part III of the Companies Act.

They are seeking by a private bill to do something which is the most ridiculous proposition I have ever heard put forth in this house of parliament. In addition they are trying to take this company out of the Companies Act and many other statutes. Two of the incorporators of the company live in Ottawa, and why not? The third incorporator lives in Wilmington, Delaware. Ottawa is a good place for an incorporator to live in who is seeking almost everything.

Mr. Benidickson: On a point of order, the hon. member is referring to a bill which was introduced last Friday evening by another member, a bill to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company. From what I have heard of the hon. gentleman's remarks, they do not apply in any way to the bill that I am introducing.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think the hon. member has been referring to both bills.

Mr. Church: The hon. member represents a northern Ontario riding, but let me tell him that I remember back in 1909 and 1910 when Sir James Whitney made a great mistake in connection with northern Ontario when he refused to electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad. If that had been done, instead of power in that part of the country costing $60 per horsepower, it would have been available at much cheaper rates. The hon. member who has interrupted me is a very nice young gentleman; he is quite popular with his colleagues. If that great mistake had not been made the people in his part of the country would have had the joys of living instead of the different companies being owned holus-bolus by corporations in Montreal.

I asked a responsible minister if this bill was going to a committee, and he said it was. However, it went to a committee in another place and there was practically no discussion. The bill was read the third time and there were only nine or ten words of discussion on it. I am surprised at a bill being offered to this house that seeks to give away the natural resources of this country. There are some other matters I should like to refer to later and as it is nine o'clock I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I intend to devote most of my time to a discussion of the international situation referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his budget speech on Thursday, October 20. However, I should like first to comment briefly on the internal situation. A nation cannot hope to solve its international problems unless it first sets its own house in order, that is unless it first establishes a balanced economy in which the purchasing power of the people is maintained at a level sufficiently high to buy the total production of the country. Then and only then will a nation be willing to accept freely imports from other nations in exchange for its exports.

Unfortunately that has not been the situation in the past. Invariably nations have endeavoured to maintain favourable balances of trade in order to maintain a high level of employment within the country. In other words, what they have really been trying to do is to lay their unemployment problems on the doorsteps of other nations. That has created a great deal of international friction.

That was the situation in Canada and in many other highly industrialized nations prior to the war. The war created a tremendous market for practically everything that could be produced, and we had a sellers' market after the war, owing to the great backlog of demand for both capital and consumer goods. Money remained plentiful in the post-war years largely because there was an accumulation of war savings, large sums of money were being paid out for reconversion, and large foreign credits were being granted.

But today we find the situation has changed considerably for the reason that the accumulation of savings, in so far as the people in the low-income groups are concerned, have largely been spent, that the reconversion program has been pretty well completed, and that foreign credits are largely exhausted. Marshall aid ends in 1952 and we find that the nations of Europe are doing everything in their power to establish balanced economies so that when Marshall aid ends they will be in position to pay for the imports they require.

In his speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) referred to the high level of income, production and employment, but at the same time he warned that we cannot expect that high level to continue in the future. He warned that owing to the decline in international trade the high level of activity might not be maintained. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), speaking before the annual meeting of the exporters association at Montreal on he 20th of October, issued a similar warning Both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have pointed out that for that reason the government have measures under consideration for the purpose of maintaining a high level of economic activity in the country. We in this group agree it is most necessary that the government keep in mind and have ready a program for the purpose of picking up any slack, but we are afraid that the program the government has in mind may not be adequate for the purpose of maintaining the purchasing power of the people at a level sufficiently high to buy the total production of the country and the imports that are brought in in exchange for exports. If the program is inadequate, then a recession will be inevitable.

I know that many people oppose the idea of the federal government going ahead with a program for the purpose of maintaining the purchasing power of the people, whether it be by national projects or other means. The reason they oppose the program is that they are afraid such a program will mean an increase in taxation. Obviously, if the purpose of the government program is to maintain the purchasing power of the people at a high level, that program cannot be financed in its entirety by taxation because an increase in taxation would reduce purchasing power and defeat the very thing that the government was trying to accomplish. For the same reason a program of that kind could not be financed by borrowing the savings of the people. Therefore we are interested in seeing that, when a program for the purpose of maintaining the purchasing power of the people is introduced, it will be financed in part at least by monetary expansion. It is interesting to note that, when the governor of the Bank of Canada made a broadcast on post-war finance on the program "The Shape of Things to Come", he frankly admitted that if a recession were to develop after the war it might be necessary to finance government projects in part at least by monetary expansion. The only point on which we would differ with the governor of the Bank of Canada would be that, if the government found it necessary to indulge in monetary expansion, the government should use national money, debt-free, instead of borrowing from the chartered banks.

I am not going to expand that point because the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) dealt with it very fully the other night. I want to turn to the international picture that the minister drew when he spoke in the house on the budget. I think it is most unfortunate that the Minister of Finance has created the impression in the past that the responsibility for solving the dollar crisis rests predominantly on Great Britain and the sterling area. In my opinion, nothing could be further from the truth. I think that the Monetary Times in their September issue dealt with the matter very effectively on page 10, where they said:

> If there is less than a complete realization of the jeopardy in which our overseas export trade stands today, the statesmen at Ottawa must assume some of the blame. Their utterances on the subject in recent months have often been less than candid.

Finance Minister Abbott's statement, following his return from London, that the dollar problem "is the problem of the United Kingdom and the other sterling countries", was more likely to lull than awaken Canadians to the fact that it affects them too. There appears to be an impression prevalent that Britain and the other countries in the sterling area must buy in North America or die. Such an assumption overlooks substantial evidence that Great Britain and her sterling associates can achieve viability by trading amongst themselves with very little dependence on North American produce. The bilateral deals which Britain has made with Australia and Argentina is positive proof of the trend in that direction. It is not wide of the mark to conclude that Canada would find it more embarrassing to lose its markets in the sterling area than it would be for other countries to forego our natural and manufactured products. It is foolhardy for Canadians to look on the dollar shortage as entirely the problem of the British and the commonwealth countries using sterling. The problem is as much ours as theirs and if this country is to avoid suffering grievously in loss of markets Canadians will have to put forth their best efforts to assist in finding a solution.

I think it is unfortunate that the government did not realize the truth of that statement in 1944 and 1945 when we were discussing port-war international trade problems. At that time the government insisted that the main responsibility for establishing a balance must rest with the debtor nation. Along with the United States of America they put heavy pressure upon Great Britain to sign international agreements which they must have known that Great Britain would never be able to comply with. Consequently step by step we have had to release Great Britain from a number of its commitments. I would say that unquestionably the main responsibility for solving the problem rests with the United States of America for the simple reason that the United States of America is the great creditor nation of the world. Unfortunately the pre-war record of the United States in this regard has not been a good one.

That was brought out very fully in 1945 in the evidence before the banking and commerce committee of the house at the time we were discussing the Bretton Woods agreement. Again quoting from the Monetary Times, page 14 of the August issue, we find a clear picture of the role that the United States has played and is playing as a creditor nation. I quote:

While Germany and Japan for the moment are prostrate, Britain is no better off since the United States has come forward to dominate the world trading scene. Larger, equally vigorous, and with infinitely superior techniques, America until very recently has been completely selfish in search of world trade, often completely ruthless. In her own way, she also is determined to rule by establishing a system which all others must adopt whether they like it or not.

I would say that was the very basis of the Bretton Woods agreement, and to a lesser degree of the Geneva trade agreement. Mr. Rasminsky, when he appeared as a witness before the banking and commerce committee in 1945, frankly admitted that the record of the United States as a creditor nation in the past had not been one to create confidence, but he stated that he believed that the United States since then had a change of heart. I would point out that it will require far more than a change of heart. It will require a fundamental change in policy; it will require a policy which recognizes the fact that international trade is an exchange of goods and services between nations on a basis of mutual advantage, and not merely an exchange of goods for money.

Mr. Blackmore: It will require a change of head as well as a change of heart.

Mr. Quelch: One of our main reasons for opposing the Bretton Woods agreement was that it had a definite pro creditor bias. Whilst it imposed penalties upon debtor nations unable to balance their payments with the fund, it placed practically no pressure whatsoever upon creditor nations. At that time we were told, so far as that was concerned, it would be looked after later on when international trade agreements were signed. We did have the Geneva trade agreement later. There may be some advantages contained in that agreement but, on the other hand, it embodies a policy known as a policy of non-discrimination which, in reality, is a very vicious policy of discrimination against an importing nation, especially a debtor nation. It definitely restricts that nation's right to determine its own source of supply.

I realize that it is often argued that nations did not have to sign the Bretton Woods agreement or the Geneva trade agreement if they did not wish to do so. They signed them voluntarily. On the other hand, let us not forget that those agreements were made the price that European nations had to pay in order to obtain post-war assistance. For instance, in order to obtain the benefits of the United States loan, Great Britain had to agree to convertibility of sterling in 1947. She had to agree to a policy of non-discrimination. I am satisfied that the people of Great Britain knew quite well they could not make convertibility work in 1947. I am certain also that the people of the United States knew Great Britain would not be able to do it.

What happened? The pound was made convertible in 1947 and in a few weeks Britain was forced off convertibility. In the meantime, serious damage had been done to her trade. So far as non-discrimination is concerned, a policy of that kind is bound to have a restrictive effect upon trade. The London Economist puts it very clearly in the issue of August 7, 1949.

So long as dollars are a hard currency, some degree of discrimination is inevitable. To insist on complete non-discrimination is, in these circumstances, to insist that all commercial exchanges shall proceed at the pace of the slowest.

I think that is self-explanatory. If a nation has a favourable balance of trade with one nation and an unfavourable balance of trade with another nation, the logical thing for that nation to do is to restrict its imports from the nation with which it has the unfavourable balance and to expand its imports from that nation with which it has a favourable balance. Under the non-discrimination clause of the Geneva trade agreement, if that nation restricts its imports from one nation it is compelled to restrict those imports from all other nations, whether or not it has an unfavourable balance of trade. True, there are escape clauses but they expire within a year or two. The nations realize that and are doing everything in their power to get their trade balanced before that time comes.

Ever since the war this group has insisted that creditor nations must accept payment in goods. In the past we have criticized Canada's policy of demanding payment in dollars for exports to the sterling area instead of taking goods. We have warned that the result of the government's policy of insisting on payment in dollars from the sterling area was bound, in the future, to breed a policy of economic nationalism within the sterling area and a consequent loss of markets to Canada. It is interesting to note the extent to which that has already taken place. I have in my hand a copy of "Foreign Trade" dated August 27, 1949. On page 350, we find these words:

London, July 27, 1949: Results of the policy of substituting soft currency countries for dollar countries as sources of supply for imports into the United Kingdom are apparent from the trade returns for the first six months of the current calendar year. Typical Canadian products like oats, beef, poultry, apples, canned tomatoes, canned salmon, chilled and frozen fish and linseed oil have disappeared entirely from the list of imported commodities.

Note that practically all those commodities are agricultural ones.

The same article continues:

The same influences have reduced imports of flour, eggs (shell, liquid, and dried), bacon, sausage skins, asbestos, lumber, furs, mechanical pulp, seeds, rubber footwear, leather, chemicals, paperboard, kraft paper and refined copper.

There is a list of over twenty-five commodities. Then the writer points out a list of some eleven which have increased, but the reductions are many times greater than the increases.

Of course that situation, Mr. Speaker, was bound to develop. As long as Canada demands payment in dollars instead of being willing to accept imports, then Britain and the sterling area lacking dollars are, of course, compelled to get their imports from those countries that are willing to buy from them. In the same way, of course, either the United States will have to buy more from Canada or, on the other hand, we shall have to buy less from the United States.

I know it is argued that the United States cannot possibly consume its total production and therefore has to export more than it buys. There, again, I think the London Economist sets out that situation quite well in its issue of September 3, 1949.

If the U.S.A. insists on producing more than it consumes and investing less at home than it saves, then it should lend abroad until a higher level of consumption is attained at home.

I believe that is self-explanatory. Let me point this out, however, that foreign investment is not the long-term solution. It is only a temporary one. If you have a favourable balance of trade with a nation and you therefore carry on a large degree of foreign investment in that country, the time will come when you will actually have to accept more imports than you export in order to accept payment for the interest on your investment. The last stage, therefore, will be worse than the first. For this reason foreign investment cannot be looked upon as the solution to an unbalance of international payments.

Of course, Canada faces an entirely different situation from that of the United States. The United States has an extremely large over-all balance of payments. Last year, it was approximately six billion dollars. In a special report issued by ECA, I notice that since 1914 the United States has had a favourable balance of trade of over $108 billion. It has been the consistent practice of that country in the past to export more than she buys.

Canada is, of course, in an entirely different situation today. We only have a very small over-all balance. We have a large deficit with the United States and a large surplus with the sterling area. Apparently the government is at last beginning to realize that there is some truth in the principle affirmed by this group in the past, that Canada must be prepared to accept imports in exchange for exports instead of demanding dollars from the sterling area in order to pay our deficit to the United States. We must balance our trade unilaterally with the sterling area and unilaterally with the dollar area.

I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has made that clear even though perhaps the Minister of Finance

(Mr. Abbott) does not recognize that fact. I say that, because of a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the annual meeting of the exporters' association in Montreal on October 20. I quote from a report of his speech in the Montreal Gazette:

> If Canada, without further loans, is to hold her current trade status with Britain after the termination of Marshall plan aid in 1952, then Canada must increase purchases from that country by an annual $365 million.
> That is approximately the trade balance in Canada's favour. In the year ended last September, Canada bought from Britain $325 million worth of goods and sold $691 million.

At another point the same report reads as follows:

> On the other hand, Canada's balance was adversely affected by trade with the U.S. While Canada shipped $1,550 million worth of goods in the same twelve-month period, she imported about $2 billion. The $450 million deficit was collected from the rest of the world through Marshall aid dollars.
> "Obviously, our policy must be to export more to the U.S. or alternatively to buy less from that country."

He points out that in order to solve our difficulties with the sterling area we shall have to accept more imports from that area, and in order to solve our deficit with the United States we shall have to buy less from them or they will have to buy more from us. In other words, he is suggesting that we solve our balance of payments difficulties unilaterally with the sterling area and unilaterally with the dollar area; and that is the stand this group has always taken in the past.

In the past the government has always insisted on multilateral trade based upon the convertibility of currency. I notice that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) took that stand when they spoke on the budget the other day in this house. Let me point out that it is absolute nonsense to advocate the convertibility of currency until we have established a system of international trade that will ensure a balance of payments; because even if you had a balance of payments tomorrow and you decided to bring about convertibility of currency, how long could you remain on a basis of convertibility of currency if nations immediately, as a result of convertibility, insisted that other nations pay them in dollars instead of taking goods?

Unless we lay down a basis which would ensure a balance of international payments, I would say that you would not be able to have convertibility of currency for more than a few days; because just as soon as nations started to demand the convertibility of their foreign credits into dollars, you would force those nations off convertibility. How can you talk about convertibility in a world in which at the present time the dollar area has a favourable balance of payments with regard to the sterling area of over $6 billion? How can you convert sterling into something that is non-existent? When the sterling countries have a deficit of over $6 billion, you are suggesting that the sterling area should convert sterling into dollars that do not exist. Therefore, first of all, before you dream of convertibility you must lay down a basis to ensure the balance of your trade.

The dollar crisis has been still further aggravated by the fact that somewhere in the neighbourhood of thirty per cent to forty per cent of Great Britain's exports are unrequited; that is, those exports are used for the purpose of paying war debts. Those exports, therefore, are not available to earn dollars with which to buy goods they require from the dollar area. Let me point out that for that situation we cannot blame the socialist government in Great Britain, because that situation developed long before the socialist government were in power.

At the end of the war Britain owed $12 billion to $14 billion in sterling for war supplies. Since the war she has paid in the neighbourhood of $3 billion against that debt, that is about £750 million. It may be argued that that problem is entirely the problem of Great Britain. On the other hand, I am not sure it is the problem of Great Britain. I would say it is largely due to the fact that Great Britain fought longer and, in many ways, harder than any other nation in the war; and when she was fighting, she was fighting not merely for herself but for her allies at the same time. If in the early years of the war Britain had stopped to count the cost of that war, we might well have lost it. Then I think we would all agree that it would be definitely the responsibility of this country.

When I say that Britain fought harder than any other nation, I mean in this way. We on this side took the stand that there should be a common war effort, that we should pool our resources for common use against the enemy; and therefore so long as any one of the allies reduced their standard of living down to the bare minimum required to maintain their efficiency, and made the rest of their production available for use against the enemy, that is as far as any one of the allies should have had to go. That is as far as we in Canada went. That is as far as the United States went. But Great Britain went much farther than that. Great Britain not only reduced her standard of living down to the bare minimum and made the rest of her production available for use against the enemy but, in addition, she pledged her future production to the extent of $12 billion to $14 billion in sterling. That is something that none of the rest of the allies had to do. As I say, she pledged her future production to the extent of $12 billion to $14 billion in order to get supplies for use against the enemy, on behalf of all the allies. Today therefore those debts should unquestionably be readjusted. There is no logical reason in the world why Great Britain should have to stand the full burden of that cost. I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the strong stand he took at Washington on that very subject.

I now want to say a few words with regard to devaluation. I do not think devaluation is a subject about which anybody can be dogmatic. I do not think that anybody can definitely say that if you have a devaluation of 30 per cent it definitely means this or means that, because there are so many other factors that enter the picture, so many actions that may be taken by the government which may either increase the result or decrease it. I would therefore be hesitant about being too dogmatic about what the effects of devaluation might be.

I think one thing is clear. Devaluation was not entered into by Great Britain voluntarily. Great Britain devalued as a result of pressure that was exerted upon her by the international monetary fund, the United States, Canada and some of the European countries. The kind of pressure I am referring to is the campaign of propaganda that was carried on for over a year to the effect that Great Britain would have to devalue sterling. Consequently it apparently became a recognized fact that before long Great Britain would have to devalue. Consequently, as was natural, organizations held up their purchases pending the time when devaluation would take place, in order that they could buy at lower prices. That fact helped to precipitate the crisis in Great Britain.

It has been argued by the people who were insisting upon devaluation that devaluation was necessary in order to get the prices of sterling area exports down so that more goods could be sold to the dollar area. Surely if the dollar area were really sincere in that attitude, then the dollar area first of all should have taken steps to reduce their tariffs and to streamline their customs regulations. How can any great creditor nation justify high tariffs whilst at the same time criticizing other countries' prices as being too high? That is, if they are really sincere when they say that they want to increase imports from those nations. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we in this group intend to support the C.C.F. amendment for a reduction in tariffs.

In the Christian Science Monitor, under date of October 24, I noticed a reference to a special report from ECA. In this report it is stated that on 260 products that Europe is particularly equipped to manufacture, United States tariffs are over 25 per cent. The report goes on to say:

> There still exist, despite the lowering of many American tariffs, high or prohibitory rates on a wide range of products, many of which have a high sales potential in U.S.A.

Then the writer points out that the United States must be prepared to buy annually at least $2 billion more from Europe than at present. I would point out therefore, Mr. Speaker, that when people try to suggest that the dollar crisis is a problem of the sterling area, I think we are justified in saying that it is predominantly the problem of the United States because they are the great creditor nation of the world today. I would say that if Canada and the United States fail to reduce tariffs and to simplify their customs procedure, they will be guilty of a deliberate breach of faith; because it is clear it was the dollar area that was insistent upon devaluation for the purpose of getting the price of sterling goods down. Devaluation has taken place. The prices of goods are down. Now, are we going to facilitate the importation of these goods by carrying out our side of the bargain in reducing tariffs and streamlining customs regulations?

Mind you, it is not a question that you can defer till next year. The time factor is important. If we wait too long the effect of devaluation may be lost, because prices have a way of adjusting themselves so that the effect of devaluation may be pretty well wiped out. Then again, I doubt very much whether the real purpose of the financial officials, who were insisting upon devaluation, was the importation of more goods from Europe. I doubt very much whether they are really interested in importing more goods from Europe. I am satisfied that behind the demand for devaluation there was the desire to bring about a deflationary policy in order to have a reduction in prices and in general wages. Probably they feel that is the only way it can be brought about, and also in order to expand foreign investment abroad, because naturally with devaluation America will be able to invest in Europe at considerably lower cost. I would say that in all probability the United States of America was far more interested in having devaluation for the purpose of facilitating expansion of foreign investments than they were in expanding imports into their country.

Mr. Blackmore: And get a great stranglehold on the world.

Mr. Quelch: I want to say a few words about the effect of devaluation on Canadian agriculture. It would appear that if Britain sells at prices existing prior to devaluation she will have to sell in Canada approximately 20 per cent more in order to get the same amount of dollars. Naturally then she will have fewer dollars to spend. If we in Canada sell farm products at the same price they will cost Britain approximately 20 per cent more, and in all probability have the effect of reducing our sales to Great Britain. If we, on the other hand, reduce our prices to meet sterling competition then our farmers will probably receive somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent less. Therefore, from the point of view of agriculture, it is not a very happy picture.

Of course I realize it may be argued that the farmers will receive 10 per cent more for the products exported to the United States of America; but, on the other hand, machinery imported from the United States of America, or machinery manufactured in Canada with high United States content will cost the farmers of this country considerably more.

Last week I received a letter from my local dealer to the effect that since devaluation the price of tractors has already gone up $185. That is going to be quite a serious increase in costs to the farmer without any guarantee that they are going to get any increase in prices to balance these increased costs. Therefore, in view of the uncertainty of the whole agricultural picture, the government should make known to hon. members at the earliest opportunity just what their stabilization program is. I recall that in the house the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that as a result of government policies the farmers from 1942 to 1948 received less for their produce than they would otherwise have received. I say, as a direct result of government policy. That was the statement the Minister of Agriculture made in the house. He went on to say that that was being done in the name of stabilization. Since the government's stabilization program from 1942 to 1948 had the effect of keeping agricultural prices down, the farmers are interested in knowing whether they are going to be guaranteed the stabilization of agricultural prices in the future. The only legislation on the statute books today guaranteeing stabilization is the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and the Agricultural Prices Support Act expires on March 31, 1950. Therefore the farmers are justified in having an assertion from the government as to just what their stabilization program is to be in the future.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Some hon. members may say, "Well, you have forgotten the international wheat agreement." It is true we have that, but there is no very great guarantee behind the international wheat agreement so long as we have the unhappy international trade picture, because embodied in the international wheat agreement is a section which states that if any nation is unable to purchase its quota it can be relieved of the responsibility of buying it. The only reason that Britain is able to buy our wheat today is that ECA provides the dollars. If in the future Britain is not able to find dollars to buy our wheat then, under that section in the international wheat agreement, she can be relieved of the obligation to buy it and seek it from the Argentine or Australia or from some other countries.

Some hon. members may say, "Well, you have talked about the losses that the farmers have suffered. Do they amount to very much?" I have not time to go into the whole picture, but I shall just deal with one commodity to show the losses suffered by the farmers of western Canada in particular as the result of the government's stabilization program. I hold in my hand a return that was tabled in answer to questions asked by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) on February 28 and October 3, 1949. This return shows the quantity of wheat sold to Great Britain, the quantity of class II wheat sold, and wheat sold to the Canadian consumer, and the prices at which that wheat was sold. I note from a computation made from these figures that the total losses suffered by farmers on wheat sold to Britain in the first three years of the British wheat agreement amount to $384,935,416. The total loss suffered by farmers as a result of subsidizing Canadian consumers during those years amounts to $123,661,952. Therefore the total losses suffered by farmers as a result of subsidizing the British and Canadian consumers during the first three years of the British wheat agreement amount to $508,597,368. That is just on wheat alone in the first three years of the British wheat agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Quelch: I shall conclude in a few words. Some hon. members argue that you cannot compute the losses on the British wheat agreement until the end of the fourth year, because there may be gains in the fourth year. The gains in the fourth year cannot be very great, because in the fourth year we have agreed to sell Britain 140 million bushels at $2 a bushel. During that period wheat cannot fall below $1.68 a bushel because that is the floor price under the international wheat agreement. Suppose wheat fell to the floor, to $1.68, then we could not gain more than 32 cents a bushel. On 140 million bushels it would amount to $44.8 million. So that in the fourth year, if the price of wheat did fall down to $1.68, we would gain $44,800,000, which would mean that the net loss for the whole four years would be $463,797,368. But on the other hand there is a possibility that the price of wheat will not fall to $1.68. The price of class II wheat until very recently—perhaps it still is today—was $2.40 a bushel. Therefore instead of there being any gain in the fourth year there may be further losses, in which case the losses would be higher than $500 million.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say I trust that the government will at a very early date give the house the assurance that the stabilization of agricultural prices is a permanent policy of the government for the future as well as for the present.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I wish to take the opportunity afforded by this debate on the budget to bring to the attention of this house a matter which vitally affects my constituency of Lanark, and which is a matter of importance to the whole of Canada. In my constituency there are eleven woollen textile mills. The effect of the devaluation of the British pound to date is that in some of these industries business is at a standstill, and the factories are now running on short time. These are days of high living costs, and it seems unfair to textile workers to be on a short week, or to be shut off night work, while those not affected by devaluation are working a full week. Customers of woollen textiles are not buying at the present time, and therefore there is not sufficient work to keep the mills running a full week. My interest in this matter is that of the representative of a constituency in which there are eleven textile mills manufacturing woollen textiles. It is a very important industry in Lanark.

I have no interest or stock in any industry of this type, and my concern is solely that of the representative of a constituency where I feel textile workers may be thrown out of work, and textile manufacturers will have difficulty in maintaining their business.

The mills in Lanark are mainly composite mills. They import wool at the same price as the English mills, and completely process the wool in their factories. Before devaluation Canadian woollen and worsted cloth mills had difficulty in competing with English prices. Even then Canadian mills were not able to run a full week. The production of Canadian woollen and worsted cloth for the first six months of 1949 was about 10 per cent lower than in 1948.

This condition will now become worse, because since the depreciation of the currency British and foreign mills are in a better position to compete in the Canadian market. The only result of this can be lower production for Canadian mills and unemployment for Canadian textile workers.

I made the statement that Canadian production has been decreasing, and that imports are increasing. Great Britain had a very large share in this market in 1948. I give the house the following table showing the production of woven fabrics in wool, in linear yards:

Year	Canadian Production	Importations from Great Britain	Importations from other countries
1946	29,270,000	10,656,000	263,000
1947	27,217,000	10,256,000	3,940,000
1948	26,400,000	15,888,000	1,572,000

It will be noted that while Canadian production in 1946 was 29,270,000, in 1948 it had fallen to 26,400,000. The Canadian woollen textile industry and the Canadian textile industry have given employment to 180,000 people, and of those 180,000 people 18,000 are employed in the woollen textile industry. My colleague, the hon.. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), feels somewhat diffident about speaking in the house, owing to a temporary disability in his voice. But he has spoken many times in the house about the textile industry. He is a textile manufacturer, and knows all about the trade, and assures me that this situation is so serious that not only will there be 18,000 woollen textile workers out of employment, but many hundreds of other workers in allied industries will be affected in the same way. He assures me that his own plant is on the verge of closing down. Manufacturers do not close their industries just for the pleasure of it, because it costs a lot of money to have a plant standing idle. A maintenance staff must be kept at all times. It is only because of economic difficulties that these mills are either closing down or operating on short time.

There is one thing of which I am very proud in connection with our woollen textile mills and that is that they were developed by families in a small way, in the beginning. I think all of them today are still owned by those families. In these circumstances the head of the industry takes a personal interest in all his employees.

In my constituency, with the eleven woollen textile mills, a large number of people receive employment. One can readily understand that these eleven mills constitute a very important industry, when concentrated in one constituency. The industry has been built up over a long period of time, and has had to meet difficult competition because Canadian tariffs have not always offered sufficient protection.

In spite of the difficulties this industry has had, and which it has faced, it has made progress to the point where it is now one of the important industries in Canada. I quote from a review published in the Globe and Mail of October 1949 with respect to the woollen textile industry in Canada in 1947. This is a review of a government publication entitled "Woollen Textile Industries in Canada". The review in the Globe and Mail from the Canadian Press under the heading "Textile Industry Has Busy Year" states:

> In a busy booming year, the Canadian woollen textile industry produced goods worth $125,039,169 in 1947, the bureau of statistics reported. Production was 16·3 per cent higher than in 1946.
> The industry comprised 206 different plants, employing 18,593 persons with a total pay roll of $29,371,352 during the year. The year before, 208 plants in the industry employed 17,620 persons who were paid $24,418,748. Production in 1946 was valued at $107,539,253.
> Biggest item in the industry was the production of woven suitings, dress goods, overcoatings and cloakings, and the output of 26,022,348 yards was valued at $53,185,146. The production was slightly lower, but the value $6,554,428 higher, than in 1946.
> Greater quantities of carpets, mats and rugs were produced, the value being $8,687,766. The bigger production during the year involved higher imports of wool, yarns, and piece goods. Total imports jumped from $61,451,933 in 1946 to $77,923,937 in 1947. Exports declined from $5,317,000 in 1946 to $3,772,240 in 1947.

So it is very apparent that this is an important industry. I bring the seriousness of the situation in the textile industry to the attention of the house without any desire to create the impression that we should revert to a system of high and unwarranted tariffs. I would point out however one thing the government should do to encourage a healthy and stable woollen textile industry in Canada, and that is to open discussions with the British government with the object of facilitating the purchase by Canadian manufacturers of British textile machinery needed in our textile industry so that it may compete with the great outside competition.

During the war years the textile industry of Canada contributed much to the war effort. This was made possible through the co-operation and skill of both employees and management, and the full capacity utilization of the machinery for production. In some cases today that machinery is obsolete or practically worn out as a result of having been used 24 hours a day during the war. Many of the companies that desire to replace their machinery find they are unable to purchase it in the British market, notwithstanding the fact that British exports of textile machinery in 1948 increased by approximately 54 per cent in volume as compared with 1938. Exports of British textile machinery to Canada increased only 12 per cent in volume in the same period. I find on reviewing British trade figures that the exports of British textile machinery to Sweden increased by 367 per cent in volume in 1948 as against 1938. The volume of exports to Denmark increased 342 per cent in the same period, and the exports to Portugal were up over 497 per cent. My source for this information is from the accounts relating to trade and navigation of the United Kingdom for each month during the year 1948 covering British exports of textile machinery. With the permission of the house I should like to place further figures on Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the permission of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blair: The table follows:

British Exports Textile Machinery

	Volume (Tons)		Value (Pounds)

Canada	1,818	2,039	307,403	791,482

I believe everybody in Canada is sympathetic toward any trading program that will help the people of Great Britain establish themselves as one of the great nations of the world, but the livelihood of 180,000 textile workers in Canada is dependent upon the success of the textile industry in this country. One of the main exports by Great Britain to Canada is woollen textiles and these are being imported into Canada in increasing quantities to replace Canadian-made woollen textiles. British textile products and those from European countries are manufactured with lower labour costs than are similar products in Canada. It is possible also that the Canadian textile manufacturer may have to compete against some form of subsidization which will mean still less business for the Canadian textile mills. The result will be that the whole textile industry in Canada will suffer.

The standard of living in Canada is today at the highest point in our history and our customs tariff should be adequate to maintain that standard of living. The duty on imported woollen textiles is now lower than when our standard of living was at a lower level. Not only are these goods produced in Great Britain for lower wages than are paid in Canada; food subsidies are also paid which reduce the production costs of British textiles.

Before devaluation the wages paid for the production of Canadian woollen textiles were 170 per cent of the British rates; they are now 220 per cent. This more than balances any advantage the Canadian textile producers might have through buying wool in sterling areas. Most of the raw wool used by both the British and Canadian textile producers originates in sterling areas, principally New Zealand and Australia. With the currencies of those countries being devalued it meant a cut of 23 per cent in the cost of wool imported into Canada, but that did not make any change in the price of wool going into Great Britain.

Since devaluation there has been a rise of over 23 per cent in the price of wool in the sterling areas which in fact wipes out any advantage to the Canadian purchaser from the devaluation of sterling. When the Canadian government devaluated the Canadian dollar 10 per cent in terms of the United States dollar it modified the sterling devaluation in terms of Canadian funds. Great Britain is now able to cut the prices of the textiles she sells in Canada.

Even before devaluation British textiles held a strong position in the Canadian market when the sales were about three and a half times greater than pre-war in terms of value and were much greater in terms of volume. On the pre-war market British textiles made up 36 per cent of British sales in Canada, whereas in 1948 they were 48 per cent. This was the result of a concentration of exports to one area. Imports of British textiles are in direct competition with types made in Canada. There should be a greater diversification of British trade in Canada and, as I have mentioned before, it should be sought through textile machinery which the Canadian industry is trying hard to secure.

At page 559 of Hansard a question was asked whether Canada was losing her domestic textile market to Great Britain owing to devaluation, and if there had been any layoffs in Canadian textile factories or wage reductions owing to devaluation. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in his answer that there was no evidence to show that the Canadian textile industry was losing its domestic markets to Great Britain, and that there had been no layoffs or wage reductions reported.

I should like to quote from an article appearing in the Toronto Telegram of September 29, 1949, in which Mr. K. L. Markon, vice-president and general manager of Monarch Knitting Company, supported the claims of union leader Sam Baron that the devaluation of the pound is menacing the jobs of thousands of people engaged in Canadian textile industries. The heading of the article is:

Pound devaluation seen hitting jobs "thousands" here

The article reads:

K. L. Markon, vice president and general manager of the Monarch Knitting Company Limited yesterday supported claims of union leader, Sam Baron, that the devaluation of the pound is menacing the jobs of thousands of people engaged in the Canadian textile industry. In a prepared statement Baron, Canadian director of the textile workers union, C.I.O.-C.C.L., called for the immediate establishment of a royal commission to investigate conditions in the industry and possibly offset a major layoff. Markon believed this to be a sound idea.

Claiming that the industry is the largest single employer of labour in the dominion, engaging 100,000, Baron produced figures to support his fears of mass unemployment.

Then there is a subheading reading:

Costs are lower

The article continues:

In the cotton industry, Baron claimed British exporters are offering cotton yarns on the Canadian market at roughly 10 per cent below the price on the home market. The effects will be greater in cotton piece goods and knit goods, he predicted.

"For instance, a British line of underwear that was being sold wholesale at $6.25 a dozen only a week ago is now being sold at $5 a dozen. The same applies throughout the woollen industry," he continued. "The most striking example of this is the hosiery industry where, even before devaluation, the majority of plants were working only two or three days a week because of British exports."

Markon said the information given by Baron was "substantially correct, particularly in regard to the woollen industry."

Head of one of the largest companies of its kind, manufacturing woollen, worsted and cotton knit goods, including hosiery, Markon said the woollen industry was in a "difficult position" before devaluation.

Then there is a further subheading reading:

Tariffs too low

The article continues:

"That difficulty was partly caused by various means used by British authorities to stimulate exports to Canada, such as indirect subsidies and export quotas, also by the fact the American economy was protected by tariffs while ours was not protected as much."

Markon, whose firm engages 1,100 workers, explained that prior to the devaluation, the company because of competition from Britain was forced to lay off some employees, particularly in the hosiery department, "and is going to be worse now."

"The textile industry seems to be bearing the brunt of things and this doesn't seem to be fair particularly in view of the fact the industry is the largest employer in Canada," he concluded.

I agreed with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when he said there would be some dislocations in Canadian industry as a result of the unexpected degree of devaluation of the British pound. I question, however, the wisdom of any policy that asks any industry to bear the full brunt of the effects without making any evident effort to fully appraise the situation in the light of recent events. How often have we heard from our western representatives the story of the sacrifice they made in wheat. I agreed with them. Why should the wheat farmer stand the full cost of our assistance to Great Britain? I say now: Why should the textile industry be placed in the same position?

We must build up our Canadian economy. We cannot have social security without taxes. We cannot have taxes without employed people to tax. What good is it for us to have busy textile workers in Yorkshire, England, when our own textile workers are walking the streets? The Canadian textile industry, operating in a less protected market than manufacturers in the United States, has even before devaluation been subjected to such competitive stimulants as indirect subsidies and export quotas by the British government. Now they are to be faced with additional competition arising from advantages accruing to British manufacturers as a result of devaluation of the pound. This industry is one of the largest employers of labour in Canada, and many Canadian homes are dependent upon it for their very existence. This industry played a most important part in the war effort of Canada, and in my opinion it is essential that it be maintained as a healthy, virile industry as part of our economic defence plans of the future.

To the degree that the Canadian market can absorb British textiles, I agree that every encouragement should be extended as a means of helping Great Britain earn dollars to buy our primary products. I submit, however, that it is not in the national interest for the textile industry to be forced to close its doors, and for workers, who have given many years of their lives to developing this trade, to be thrown out on the street to look for work wherever they can find it. Unless external conditions and factors today threatening this vitally important industry are closely studied, and their effect constantly observed by the government, the conditions I have just warned about are not beyond the realm of possibility.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon-Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, my riding is in the eyes of the world today because it constitutes the northwest frontier of our nation. It looks out upon the old world of Europe and the more ancient world of Asia across the Arctic ocean. The constituency of Yukon-Mackenzie River is much larger than the territory of Alaska which will, we are told, soon be the forty-ninth state of the United States of America. It is an area in size nearly equal to all of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. It is one-fifth as great in area as continental United States of America.

With this vast region as a background, I hope that I may be pardoned if I take some time of the house to convey to you the hopes and aspirations of our people, and something of their handicaps and difficulties. My address must be heard in the light of the status of our constituency of Yukon-Mackenzie River. It is in Canada but is not a province of Canada. It is for the most part a vast unorganized domain. It is a land of opportunity. Down north we have a land which should present great opportunities for the youth of Canada. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I say "down north". Yes, all our rivers run down towards the north, the mighty Yukon river and the still mightier Mackenzie river. I am amazed to hear in this house and various cities in the east expressions of fear and despair when our great northland is mentioned. If eastern Canadians, especially the hon. gentlemen of this house, could travel with me throughout the length and breadth of my riding, they would realize that in Canada we have only made a beginning upon the development of our natural resources.

When it is realized that in the riding which I have the honour to represent, much of it unexplored, there is such a small scattering of people and so little industrial development as compared with the possibilities, it will become apparent that this house should concern itself with a more intensive policy of northern development and also with a sane project for moving numbers of people into the northland to places where they could live and thrive. In addition to this, a substantial increase in population in these areas is a direct contribution to the defence of Canada.

Originally, the Northwest Territories covered all that portion of the country from the Hudson bay westward within Canada outside of the provinces. Then in the nineties, upon the discovery of gold in the Klondike valley, the Yukon Territory was established under the Laurier government. It is governed by a commissioner, appointed, and a territorial council of three elected members who have a three-year term of office. The seat of government is at Dawson, Yukon. The Department of Mines and Resources at Ottawa is responsible for the business arising from the general administration of the territory under the Yukon Act and ordinances passed by the territorial council.

For administrative purposes the Northwest Territories were divided into three districts, namely, Mackenzie, Keewatin and Franklin, by order in council of March 16, 1918. In accordance with the Northwest Territories Act, the Northwest Territories are governed by a commissioner, a deputy commissioner and five councillors appointed by the governor in council and operating from this capital. The commissioner and council has power to make ordinances for the government of the territories under instructions from the governor in council or the Minister of Mines and Resources, subject to any act of the parliament of Canada applying to the territories. The future I eventually see for the Mackenzie River district is an entirely new set-up with an elective body. Our people feel that, while the present administrations are good, and while able men are giving of their best efforts, sooner or later we should have responsible government throughout in keeping with the Canadian tradition of responsible government.

Let me say and repeat that we believe the present executive officials are doing excellent work. Yet, the north wants to have a thoroughly elective government and, sooner or later, I am hoping to see it brought about. We advocate nothing new in this regard. You had the same request a century ago when the wilds of Upper Canada came under responsible government; later when, in 1905, Alberta and Saskatchewan came into being as provinces; before that when a provincial capital was set up at Winnipeg. Representation by population was an early battlecry in this country and along with it went "no taxation without representation."

I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words in regard to the electoral district of Yukon-Mackenzie River. At the last session of parliament the Mackenzie River district in the Northwest Territories was annexed to the Yukon electoral district, notwithstanding the many protests by the peoples of the Mackenzie River district and the Yukon territory. They did not want it and still do not want it and have a legitimate cause for complaint. The communities are scattered and there is little community interest between the peoples of the Mackenzie River district and the Yukon Territory—no more than as between the St. Lawrence river watershed and the Columbia river valley in British Columbia. If I might give an illustration: It is my opinion that the present federal riding is too large and unwieldy, and that it was a mistake to make such a large electoral district. A candidate travelling about it at election time must use aircraft almost exclusively and the cost is exceptionally high.

I believe you will agree that, in view of the circumstances I have outlined, it would be well to amend the redistribution act to provide for subdividing this vast riding and allowing two members—one for the Yukon proper and one for the Mackenzie and eastern sections of the Northwest Territories from the Mackenzie mountains to the Hudson bay. It might be argued that the population does not justify this adjusted representation, but it must be borne in mind that the populations of both areas are rapidly increasing and the economic conditions must necessarily always be different.

The future of Yukon Territory and Mackenzie River district is dependent upon the development of its mineral resources. These are among the last remaining reservoirs of minerals on the North American continent. As the minerals in the older areas become depleted and as the demand increases, it will become imperative that the mineral wealth of our north country should be developed. Portions of the Pre-Cambrian shield lie within the Mackenzie district and geologists claim untold wealth is still to be taken from this source. So far, this area has only been scratched. Indications are that vast sections of it are mineralized and present favourable opportunities for the prospector and developer.

In 1896 the fabulous Klondike gold discovery was made. This was the poor man's opportunity because he could begin to produce gold from the placer workings by his own strength and effort and with little or no capital. Perhaps because of this and the remoteness of the area placer mining remained the prime mining interest in the Yukon Territory for many years. Since then, many opportunities for lode mining have been discovered. One of the most important of these lies in the silver-lead-zinc deposits of the Mayo-Keno area in the Stewart river district. Some of the ore from this district is so rich in silver and lead that it can be shipped to the smelter at Trail, British Columbia, in the same condition in which it is taken out of the ground without being put through the concentrator. I would ask you to consider how rich this ore must be when it can stand the cost of transportation and the many handlings by truck to Mayo Landing; by river boat to Whitehorse; by train to Skagway; by boat to Vancouver and thence by rail to the smelter at Trail, British Columbia, in its raw state and without concentrating.

I am now informed that the mining company at Mayo Landing expects to ship 15,000 tons of silver-lead ore and concentrates next year, the largest amount ever to be shipped from this district in any one year. This means employment for men. It means an added market for the goods from the warehouses in Vancouver and other places. It means adding millions of dollars to the silver treasury of the world. Mr. Speaker, it surely does not sound like depression.

I note, Mr. Speaker, that in 1948 several million dollars' worth of silver bullion was shipped to the United States of America. Some of this goes to other countries where they use our silver for coinage and for jewelry; and right here I would suggest that it would be a nice gesture on the part of the Department of Finance to strike off a few Canadian silver dollars—not a few but let us say $1 million a year for a few years, to make the people of this country more silver conscious, but not enough to upset our currency here. In a country like Canada, with silver mines in Ontario, British Columbia, Quebec and the Yukon which in all produce many million dollars' worth of silver each year, surely we should have a larger silver coinage in our country.

The development of this area has only begun. There are many other areas of equal importance in the Mackenzie district and Yukon Territory awaiting development. There are indications that one of the largest iron ore deposits in North America lies in the Selwyn mountains of central Yukon. Prospectors and geologists have found indications of widespread deposits of lodegold, tungsten, copper, tin, molybdenum, silver, lead, zinc, antimony and coal. It is known that the huge copper deposits of southeastern Alaska extend into the Yukon. At Whitehorse there is an interesting copper belt which was mined during the first world war. To date Yukon Territory has produced nearly one-third of a billion dollars in gold and silver—I repeat, one third of a billion dollars of new wealth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say something about the mineral potentialities of the Mackenzie river district. It is known that a great part of the Northwest Territories is covered by Pre-Cambrian rock. This same rock formation supports the mining industry of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba. Its potentialities in the Northwest Territories, where it has hardly been scratched, are immense. So far we have the pitchblende and the radioactive mineral deposits at Port Radium on Great Bear lake. The magnitude of this operation is known throughout Canada. We also have the lode gold operations of the Yellowknife mining district on the north side of Great Slave lake. Tremendously interesting deposits of lead and zinc are being investigated on the south side of Great Slave lake, at Pine Point, and of radioactive minerals in widely scattered areas to the northeast of the same lake. Copper deposits along the Coppermine river near the Arctic coast have been known for many years. Let me here, Mr. Speaker, pay my tribute to Gilbert La Bine, the Canadian prospector who discovered uranium ores in my riding, whose work was so valuable to Canada and the world in strengthening the bonds which make democracy and the democratic countries of the west a subject which is so much discussed among the nations today. And when I pay tribute to Mr. La Bine I do so because he is typical of the whole race of prospectors who are finding the hidden wealth of the northland, and making it possible for great industries to be built and great new sources of revenue to be created for our country.

Mr. Fleming: He is a distinguished resident of Eglinton riding.

Mr. Simmons: That is fine. Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories and Dawson in the Yukon Territory are centres of revived gold mining activity. Yellowknife is the hub of the mining industry in the Northwest Territories and today is a flourishing and thriving modern town. Three important gold mines are operating in this vicinity: the Con-Rycon mine, the Negus mine and the Giant Yellowknife.

The first gold brick was produced in the Northwest Territories and poured at the Con mine of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company in September, 1938. Yellowknife mining district has produced to date well over $25 million in gold. These mines and others under development contain vast quantities of gold. Engineers have blocked out ore which assures operations for many years to come. At present more than one thousand men are employed in the gold mines there. There is every indication that production will be increased as further properties are being prospected and developed.

Dawson city is the hub of gold mining in the Yukon territory. It is probably the oldest producing placer gold mining camp in the world. This year the production of gold has been very active as it has been in the past for many years. This summer's operations alone produced well over 50,000 ounces of gold up to the end of August. By the end of the dredging season this fall there will be many more thousands of ounces of gold to be added to the quantity given here. Eight dredges are being operated by the Yukon Consolidated Gold Corporation in the Dawson district.

Oil resources along the Mackenzie river at Norman Wells are deserving of attention and are considered to be very important. Oil reserves in the Norman Wells area, estimated by United States government experts and checked by Canadian authorities, are placed at 60 million barrels. There are sixty productive wells in this area and from 1942 to the end of 1948 they produced nearly 3 million barrels. There is a small refinery at Norman Wells which turns out the fuel requirements for the Mackenzie river district.

I have told you something about the mineral resources of my constituency. We have sufficient indications to know that there lies a practically untapped reservoir of mineral wealth awaiting development for the benefit of the area and of Canada as a whole. Its development will depend upon the provision of adequate transportation facilities and cheap power.

In the Yukon Territory the Department of Mines and Resources have undertaken the construction of an all-weather highway from the Alaska highway near Whitehorse to Mayo and Dawson. A good start has been made and it looks as though the Carmacks-to-Mayo section will be completed this fall.

I would call attention to the urgent need of having the remaining sections of the road between Whitehorse and Dawson completed by the end of the 1950 construction season. I would also call attention to the urgent need of the early provision of cheap power for the Mayo-Keno mining area so that the mineral resources of the district may be adequately developed.

Electricity for operating the mines is now produced by diesel engines, and the diesel oil is brought in from the outside at high cost. Transportation also complicates the shipping and storage problem. If the mineral wealth is to be exploited at depth, it will require cheap power. This can only be provided by means of hydroelectricity. I understand that the Department of Mines and Resources during the past summer has been investigating the possibility of hydroelectric development in the Mayo river canyon. I hope that the government will be able to push this project through in the same manner as was done on the Snare river project for the benefit of the Yellowknife mining district in the Northwest Territories, which has proven of great benefit to that district.

The needs of the Mackenzie river district for the development of its mineral resources are similar to the Yukon Territory. They are the provision of adequate transportation facilities, the lowering of present transportation costs and the provision of cheap power. A good start has been made by the construction of the Mackenzie highway, by which freight can be hauled both incoming and outgoing between the Northern Alberta Railway at Grimshaw, Alberta, and Hay River, Northwest Territories. What is now urgently needed is the extension of this highway to give year-round communication with Mills lake and Yellowknife; and also to put the Alberta section of the Mackenzie highway in good repair so that there will not be a repetition of the difficulties encountered by truckers this past season, which proved so very disastrous to the fishing industry on Great Slave lake.

One of the present main difficulties in getting supplies to Yellowknife and down the Mackenzie river is the lateness in which Great Slave lake gets free of ice. When the river is open in the late spring the ice remains in the lake and piles up at the outlet. In addition, winter travel over the ice is made hazardous by pressure ridges. The construction of an all-weather road to Mills lake will detour the ice piled up at the outlet to Great Slave lake, and the rapids at Fort Providence, and extend the shipping season on the Mackenzie river by at least six weeks each year.

The present costs of transportation into the Mackenzie river district are too high. This affects the cost of living and the cost of mining. Everything which can be done to lower these costs will encourage the development of mining and other industries and raise the standard of living of the people. The mining companies and the stores and trading posts have large amounts of capital tied up in maintaining large stocks of supplies on hand because of the shortness of the navigation season, which necessitates stocking about nine months' supplies each year. This increases the cost of operation of the mines. If an all-weather road was constructed into Yellowknife via Mills lake it would enable the mining companies, stores and trading posts to maintain lower inventories of supplies and thereby reduce costs of operations. This would be the equivalent in one way of raising the price of gold. Therefore for the good and welfare of the Mackenzie river district something should be done to lower the present freight rates either by improving transportation facilities, providing more competition or competitive routes or by means of a subsidy. It is hoped that the government will take the matter of constructing the all-weather highway to Mills lake into immediate consideration, so that an early start can be made on construction next spring.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to tell you something about the economic plight of the natives, both Indians and Eskimos of Yukon Territory and the Mackenzie river district. In this modern day when we are giving Indians in some sections of the country the ballot, it is only fair that the Eskimos should receive the same consideration. Great work can be done for the native peoples of our land.

In this connection I wish to commend the church organizations in my riding, and also the lands and development services branch and the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of National Health and Welfare, for the great work they are doing among the native population. But still greater work can be accomplished. In my journeys through the riding last summer as far north as Aklavik, Northwest Territories, I observed that the church was extending a helping hand to the natives of this country in leading these people to better standards and citizens. They are dependent entirely upon trapping and hunting for a living. You will understand in many areas something of what has happened, Mr. Speaker, when I tell you of the recent decline in fur prices. Silver fox pelts have dropped from $20 to $5 and even as low as $3. Muskrat skins have dropped from $3 to 80 cents, and may go lower. Other furs have declined in price in a similar manner. To make matters worse the hunting in some areas has also declined. As a result of these conditions the natives of the north are now experiencing exceptionally hard times, and I must say that the family allowance has been, and will be, a godsend to them.

It is hoped that the government will continue to deal sympathetically and helpfully with these matters and extend relief to these unfortunate people where necessary. It would be best, where possible, to give them opportunities of earning what relief is given. In this connection I would like to see them given employment on the various construction projects in the northland. Very often when government contracts are awarded to construction firms, labourers are brought in from distant places to do the work. Many of our Indians and Eskimos are excellent workers, and if encouraged and treated as Canadians they would perform valuable services wherever such projects are carried on. It may interest the house to know that some of these Indians and Eskimos are splendid mechanics. I have found many of them to be energetic, thrifty men, good businessmen and good Canadians.

The time has come when racial discrimination in the north should be put aside and all our citizens who obey the laws and help to build up a better country may be treated with equality. Many of the settlements in the north could be improved by the provision of graded roads, ditches, sidewalks, better water supplies, and sanitary arrangements; in other words a general tidying-up. It would be an opportune time to provide these facilities so that the natives could improve their communities and at the same time work for wages to supplement their incomes from trapping.

As I have said before, in districts where roads, airfields and weather stations and other projects have been or are being built a greater proportion of native people should be engaged on the work, as many of them are good mechanics and operators and they should be given every encouragement to acquire and practise trades.

A new era is dawning for the north. It is going to be opened and its resources developed, and the pace is going to be accelerated. Therefore let us see that the native inhabitants also benefit from these developments. We must help them wisely and sympathetically to adapt themselves to these changed conditions, and we must provide better hospital and medical care. We must also see that the game, wildlife and forest resources of the north are properly managed and protected. Do we know as much about these resources as we should? Do we know why the game and fur have been so depleted in certain areas? Have we figured out how to improve this situation? I would ask the government these questions. The mines and settlements in the Yukon and Mackenzie river districts look to the forests for building logs, lumber and fuel. The forests give protection to watersheds and wildlife; therefore our forest resources must be adequately protected and managed for they are vitally essential to the economic life of the northland.

At this time I wish to thank the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for the attention being given food production in the Yukon and Mackenzie river districts. As you know, we pay heavy freight rates on food products and other commodities brought in from the outside. Therefore if we can produce some of the staples within the northland, we add to the prosperity of the people.

All along the Yukon and along the mighty Mackenzie are scores of settlements which buy meats, flour, butter, lard and the many products of the farm. All must come in at great cost to the consumer. At Fort Simpson, Northwest Territories, there is an experimental farm operated by the Department of Agriculture; but long before it was established the Roman Catholic mission there had conducted a successful farm like any farm one would see in the Ottawa valley. This farm has been in operation for nearly sixty years, and has been engaged in dairying, and the production of pigs, poultry and grain.

Yes, grain ripens there at Fort Simpson, junction of the Liard and Mackenzie rivers, north of the 61st parallel and slightly west of the 120th meridian. At Fort Good Hope, slightly south of the Arctic circle, there are records of grain being matured; certainly there are fine potatoes and root crops, lettuce and many garden varieties.

At Aklavik in the Mackenzie river delta, within the Arctic circle the Anglican mission maintains a garden and has a few cows, a tractor, plows and other farm gear and has cultivated fields of oats—not always successfully but well enough to provide local fodder supplies for the livestock.

At Pine creek in the Yukon Territory, 100 miles northwest of Whitehorse on the Alaska highway, there is an experimental farm operated by the government. This farm was established a few years ago under the expert management of Mr. J. W. Abbott, formerly of Fort St. John, British Columbia. The first year, 1946, witnessed a very poor crop indeed —spuds the size of marbles, turnips all tops and no body, barley very short and poor, and oats a failure.

In 1947, the crop of potatoes was fairly good, showing improvement as the soil was opened to the sun and cultivation. In 1948 several hundred dollars' worth of garden stuff was sold to the local merchants in Whitehorse, besides keeping a good supply for the farm and employees. Now in 1949 Mr. Abbott is buying livestock for the farm which is producing hay, oats, root crops and vegetables and promises to be quite productive.

I do not say this is a ranching country, but if we can produce a tonnage of food there on the land one hundred miles northwest of Whitehorse and at various places along the Mackenzie river, what a benefit it will be to the economy of the north! At all events these experiments are revealing the possibilities and we are getting exact data on weather, hours of sunshine and soil conditions.

A number of farms have been successfully operated for some time on a small scale at other places in the north, such as at Yellowknife, Dawson, Stewart City and various other places in the Mackenzie river district and the Yukon. On the Pelly river a farm has been operated successfully for many years, and one year as much as 2,300 bushels of oats were harvested.

This is a bright picture for the future of the north, and it may well be that a large population can eventually be established on lands north of the Peace river block in British Columbia and in the Yukon and Mackenzie river areas. These experiments will give us some guide as to the feasibility of settlement, and I hope that there may be larger grants next year for the experimental work now undertaken in the north.

If time will permit, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention one or two other matters which are also of prime importance to the economy of the northland. The commercial fishing industry on Great Slave lake, 340 miles south of the Arctic circle, in the Northwest Territories, has become one of the world's greatest inland commercial fishing areas. This lake is the fifth largest on the continent and commercial fishing in this area was first started in 1945.

The commercial catch limits for trout and whitefish together from Great Slave lake were increased in June of this year to a total of five million pounds for the summer fishery and to a total of four million pounds for the winter fishery. During last winter season well over four million pounds of fish were taken by 302 licensed fishermen under special catch limits. A high standard of quality is maintained and all shipments are inspected at Lower Hay river. Importers in Chicago, New York and Detroit speak highly of the fine quality of the whitefish and trout from Great Slave lake. This industry is dependent upon the proper maintenance of the Mackenzie highway to transport their products to the railhead at Grimshaw, Alberta.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the great Alaska highway which you have all read so much about. In travelling about the country I find that there exists in certain quarters an apparent misconception of the value of this highway from an economic point of view, and I should like to take this opportunity to correct this erroneous impression, and point out that the Alaska highway and its feeder roads, such as the Haines cut-off and the Atlin road are vital to the defence and economy of the north and to the North American continent as a whole.

The Alaska highway supplies a main trunk road which is of major importance in opening up the country and from an economic and defence point of view that is of paramount importance. In addition to its value to industry and defence the Alaska highway and its feeder roads provide a tourist attraction equivalent to any place on the North American continent. I may tell the house that the Alaska highway, so important in a defence way, is, in these times of peace, a busy commercial thoroughfare, and is opening up a great new country throughout its 1,600-mile length from Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to Fairbanks, Alaska.

It is indeed a credit to Canada and also to our good friends from the United States of America who made such a wonderful job of constructing it. It is a great scenic highway, and you have magnificent lakes and rushing rivers, mountain peaks and ranges, and everything that delights the lover of the outdoors. There are good stopping places at intervals along the highway, gas stations and garages, and the traveller need have no fears.

The Canadian portion of the Alaska highway from Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to the Alaska-Yukon border, a distance of 1,223 miles, is maintained by the northwest highway system of the Canadian army and I wish, at this time, to commend them for the excellent job they are doing under the command of Brigadier Connelly, in keeping this highway open.

The hon. the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) recently made a trip to the Yukon and Mackenzie river district. I would assure him that the people of the north were deeply gratified by his visit and feel that he will now be able better to understand their problems.

I also wish to compliment the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon his excellent budget. It means a great deal to us because of the large appropriations which are essential in so vast a riding. With an able and experienced man bringing down such a budget the people of the north have the utmost confidence in this government and in the future of the nation.

On motion of Mr. Knight the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we hope we may be able to conclude this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 2, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

FOOTBALL

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA CITIZEN—ODDS ON EAST-WEST FINALS

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In this case it is a matter of very personal privilege, because I am being bothered. This morning's Citizen—I notice at the top of the page it says it has been an independent paper since 1844; I want it on my side—says that I have fixed the odds in the east-west football match at three to one on the Calgary Stampeders. I am asking one to three. My telephone has been ringing every ten seconds for the last hour, as a result of calls from people wanting this sucker money. I want them to know that I am not betting that way.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCOME TAX—AUTHORS AND WRITERS

Mr. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth):

1. Are authors' and authors' fees subject to income tax?
2. Are authors' and writers, whose main income is derived from other sources, subject to income tax?
3. Are authors and writers whose income from writing is less than 25 per cent, obliged to estimate in advance, their earnings from this source, and complete and file income tax remittance form T7B?
4. Does the ruling on authors' fees apply alike to all sections of Canada?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. (a) No, if the balance of the income of the author or writer is, to the extent of three-quarters or more of his total income, from salary, wages or other remuneration.

(b) Yes; if the balance of the income of the author is not, to the extent of three-quarters or more of total income, from salary, wages or other remuneration.

4. Yes.

IMMIGRANTS—RELIGION—CONTAGIOUS DISEASE

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Of the 261,260 immigrants brought into Canada during 1946, 1947 and 1948, how many were (a) Roman Catholics; (b) Jews; (c) Protestants?
2. Of the 54,733 displaced persons brought into Canada during 1946, 1947 and 1948 (a) how many had contagious diseases on arrival at Canadian ports; (b) how many at North Bay, Ontario?

Mr. Maybank:

1. (a) and (c) No statistics are kept of the religious affiliation of immigrants. (b) 14,416 of Hebrew racial origin.

2. (a) and (c) No statistical record of this information is kept. (b) Information not available.

RENT CONTROL—FEDERAL POWER OF ENFORCEMENT

Mr. Henry:

1. Is there a lawsuit pending in the Supreme Court of Ontario in which certain property owners ask that court to find that the federal government has ceased to have legislative power to enforce rent control in Canada?
2. What steps is the federal government taking to be sure that all possible facts will come before the court in evidence to enable the court to properly decide whether or not the federal government has power to continue rent control in Canada?

Mr. Garson:

1. Yes.

2. The Attorney General of Canada has instructed leading counsel in the action, and the crown will be guided by his advice in the conduct of the litigation.

NEWFOUNDLAND—SURVEYS—FIELD PARTIES

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What were the localities in Newfoundland where field parties were located for the purpose of conducting (a) geological surveys; (b) topographical surveys; (c) geodetic surveys?

Mr. Maybank:

(a) Geological surveys: One-mile mapping in the Terrenceville, St. John's, Hodges Hill and Bonavista areas, and in the Labrador iron belt. Reconnaissance mapping started by the Newfoundland government was continued.

(b) Topographical surveys: Parties were engaged in establishing control for mapping on the isthmus connecting Avalon peninsula to the main island, in the Bonavista area, and on the Quebec-Labrador boundary.

(c) Geodetic surveys: Precise levelling was carried out by one party in an area starting at St. John's and extending along the coast of Conception bay, and thence inland to Bonavista. Triangulation was carried out by one party on the Fogo peninsula south of St. John's.

Questions

INCOME TAX—COLLECTIONS, 1946-48

Mr. Cardiff:

1. What was the amount collected in income tax during the years 1946-1947-1948?

2. What was the cost of collecting these amounts in each of the above years?

Mr. McCann: The total net revenue collected by the taxation division, Department of National Revenue, from federal income tax, excess profits tax and succession duty in each of the fiscal years ended 31st March 1946, 1947 and 1948, also the cost of collection in such years, were as follows:

Fiscal Year	(1) Total Net Collections	(2) Cost of Collection
1945-46	$1,453,373,330	$11,796,342
1946-47	1,435,731,759	13,734,591
1947-48	1,317,706,891	19,627,980

PUBLIC SERVICE—EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYEES FROM GARNISHEE OF SALARIES

Mr. Knight:

1. Are federal government employees exempt from legal action designed to garnishee their salaries?

2. If so, by what statute is such exemption provided?

3. Does such exemption apply to all federal government employees, and if not, to what categories does it apply?

Mr. Garson:

1. Salaries or wages of federal government employees cannot validly be garnisheed.

2. There is no statutory exemption, but the provincial statute authorizing garnishee proceedings does not extend to employees of the government of Canada.

3. Yes.

NEWFOUNDLAND—CHARTING OF HARBOURS

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What ships have been employed this year in charting the harbours in Newfoundland?

2. What harbours have been thus charted?

Mr. Maybank:

1. The Acadia, the Cartier and the Henry Hudson, of the Canadian hydrographic service.

2. Fogo, St. Anthony and Port aux Basques harbours.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—ROYAL ROADS

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. What was the total expenditure in connection with (a) Royal Military College; (b) Royal Roads, in each of the years 1947 and 1948?

2. What was the cost of (a) pay and allowances for military staff and personnel; (b) civilian staff salaries; (c) supplies of all and every nature and kind, giving particulars; (d) services, including utilities; (e) maintenance; (f) any other expenditures not hereinbefore specified?

3. How many civilian employees were there in each of the above colleges in each of the said years?

4. How many military personnel were on the staff and establishment in each of these schools in each of the said years?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Argue:

1. What combines or alleged combines have been reported by the commissioner, under the Combines Investigation Act, to the Minister of Justice, since 1935?

2. What corporations were involved in each combine or alleged combine?

3. In what instance have prosecutions been undertaken?

4. In what instance have prosecutions been successful?

5. What was the penalty in each case?

FEDERAL BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS

Mr. Winkler:

1. How many boards and commissions are there under federal jurisdiction?

2. How many officers are there on each of these boards and commissions?

3. How many are full time and how many are part time occupations?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

NATURALIZATION—LIEUTENANT COLONEL A. G. WYGARD

Mr. Pearkes:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents and papers connected with the application for naturalization and the issuance, on February 28, 1944, of a naturalization certificate to Lieutenant-Colonel A. G. Wygard.

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

UNITED NATIONS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF ADDRESS OF MR. MARTIN AT LAKE SUCCESS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked me a question about a report in the Ottawa Citizen of a speech made at Lake Success by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I have here the report which appeared in the Citizen of November 1, and I should like to read the relevant passage so that the words quoted may be in their proper context. The portion of the report to which I refer reads as follows:

Many persons have criticized the United Nations as a mere debating society, Martin said. But the fact that the countries come together to air their grievances was ample justification for the body.

Then this is quoted:

"Just think of the world tension that would exist if the Yugoslav question were not being discussed in the United Nations," he said.

He pointed to United Nations work in Palestine and Indonesia as examples of its success in keeping conflicts from becoming widespread war.

Then there is another quotation:

"We have begun here the kind of organization that will some time exist as surely as our federal and provincial and city governments exist."

That is the end of what is stated as a quotation. The report goes on:

The United Nations will gradually assume legislative character and the International Court of Justice will assume responsibilities similar to those held by national supreme courts.

From this report I think it will be apparent that the minister was not stating government policy, or policies of any kind, but was attempting to make a forecast of the kind of development of international co-operation which those who desire to see lasting peace and security in the world would hope for some time in the future.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has a report been made by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on alleged violations of the act in the flour milling industry? If so, will the minister table it?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend did not give me notice of this question. I shall be glad to give a reply tomorrow.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the minister tell the house whether Mr. F. A. McGregor, commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, has resigned, and if so, whether his resignation has been accepted.

Mr. Garson: I shall give to the hon. member for Vancouver East the reply that I gave to the previous question. I shall be glad to give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Graydon: There should not be very much trouble in answering that question.

Mr. St. Laurent: When the hon. member becomes Minister of Justice, perhaps he will deal with these questions.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

QUESTION AS TO IMPLEMENTING OF REPORT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Will the Minister of National Defence make a statement as to the extent to which the recommendations of Admiral Mainguy's report are being implemented?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I could not make a full statement on the orders of the day, but I can say that a survey of the report would indicate that there are approximately forty or forty-one specific recommendations. Thirteen of these recommendations had been carried into effect before the report was given to me. Six others are being proceeded with immediately. Four constitute part of a long-term program. The remaining eighteen are dependent on government policy, or are still subject to consideration. I shall be very glad indeed to deal with these matters more fully when the estimates of the department are under consideration, which I hope will be at an early date.

Mr. Pearkes: Would it be asking too much to ask the minister to tell us which of the recommendations have already been implemented? Merely to say that so many have been implemented does not really convey any information to the house.

Mr. Claxton: It would require a lengthy statement to deal with the recommendations, and I do not think it is the practice of the house to have such lengthy statements made on the orders of the day. If it were the wish of the house, I could spend half an hour or an hour going into them, either now or later, but I am sure it would not meet the hon. gentleman's wish. I can say that the report itself indicates that many of the recommendations have been carried into effect. These are matters which were receiving consideration both before the incidents which gave rise to the inquiry occurred, and after it commenced.

With regard to some of the more important recommendations, such as the Canadianization of the Canadian navy, of course I am in complete agreement with that, and will see that everything is done to implement it. One of these recommendations dealt with the putting of a maple leaf on the funnels of the ships of the Canadian navy. I had already given instructions to that effect, before the inquiry was set up, and that course was being taken as the ships went in for refit. Another recommendation has to do with officer training. There I might put it to the house that the officers who were largely concerned in any of the incidents were officers who had been trained under a system different from that which is now in effect, and which is much more genuinely Canadian than anything before, but has not yet been in effect long enough to produce any considerable number of officers for the navy. That, however, is coming. I could deal with other matters, but since it is hoped that the estimates of this department will be reached next week, it would be much more convenient to go into them then, and into any other matters relating to the report.

Mr. Pearkes: What about the training ship?

Mr. Claxton: H.M.C.S. Ontario has already been set aside as a training ship. That is one of the recommendations which had already been carried out.

CROWN PROPERTIES

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made some weeks ago in the press that it is the intention of the government to make payments to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown properties throughout the country, will the Prime Minister at this time say whether this legislation will be put into effect before the end of the present session of parliament?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The recent press statements referred to by the hon. member were not authorized by the government. I should not like to add anything today to what was said on the subject on October 26 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), as reported on pages 1154 and 1155 of Hansard. Perhaps it might be well to recall it to the attention of hon. members. He said:

> The whole question of crown properties in municipalities has been under consideration for some time. I think the Prime Minister indicated to the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities that it was hoped to be able to make a statement at an early day as to what government policy might be in that regard.

Then the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked this question:

> Will the statement be made before the end of the present session?

The Minister of Finance replied, "Yes."

TRADE

PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS OF MR. DONALD GORDON IN NEW YORK ON NOVEMBER 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Yesterday I handed in a question for the order paper. The chief of orders and notices told me that I would have to bring the question up on the orders of the day or on a motion to go into committee of supply. My question for the order paper was as follows:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to an address delivered by Mr. Donald Gordon in New York as reported in a Canadian Press dispatch appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday morning, November 1, as follows:

> "Gordon calls on U.S. to Assume Role.
> North America, and particularly the United States, must assume the new role of furnishing a ready import market for the goods of other nations.
> Only by this action can the dollar shortage be effectively and permanently overcome, Mr. Gordon said in an address prepared for delivery before the 36th national foreign trade convention.
> Coupled with the opening of markets, North America also must supply development capital for less advanced reasons.
> Mr. Gordon said that, while past measures had served to fill the dollar gap temporarily, the fact was that North America's export surplus to the world must be eliminated or at least greatly reduced by increased imports if the dollar-short countries were to be placed on a sound basis."

2. Is this government policy, or is it not?

3. As head of the national railways was Mr. Gordon authorized to make this statement?

Did Mr. Gordon make this statement on behalf of the government, and did he go there for this purpose, or not?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry, but it is not possible to state government policy after the hon. member has read some newspaper report in tones that we cannot hear.

Mr. Church: I think that if they all came home from New York, the whole carload of them, there would be some hope of world peace.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 1, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I was amazed and disappointed at the answers which were given—or rather were not given—by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to the questions of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The country as a whole will be very uneasy until the answer to these questions is forthcoming; for it has been reported from very reliable sources that Mr. McGregor has resigned as commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. I know not whether the rumour is well founded, but if it is, I shall say this, by way of tribute to the man and to his work, that his services will be sadly missed by this country as a whole, for he is a man who has done splendid work. He has stood up squarely against what I personally consider to be forces of iniquity. He has not only faced the enmity of those great forces which he has been trying to investigate—and under handicaps—but he has stood up against laggard negligence in high places in regard to his investigations.

I propose today to bring against this government a general indictment in that it has not protested, for the protection of the consuming public in this country, against the depredations of combines formed in restraint of trade and for the deliberate purpose of consolidating their forces in order to exploit the public for their own profit.

Perhaps there is some justification for the common talk that prosecutions are often taken against the little man, and that he is shown no mercy. He must keep within the bounds of propriety—yes, and within the bounds of law. But when dealing with the public, if you are big enough and sufficiently consolidated you can do almost anything, and do it with impunity. I shall not go as far as one of my colleagues went the other day when he said that one could get the measure of justice for which one could afford to pay; but I do say that immunity is sometimes enjoyed by these combines. And as it is so enjoyed it is nothing short of a national disgrace.

Let me remind the house of four particular cases which I have in mind. In the past there have been submitted to the house certain reports, known as McGregor reports, having to do with alleged combines in the dental, optical and bread-baking industries; and I understand the report is now ready but has not yet been tabled in respect to the flour milling industry. A question was asked in the house today in regard to that report, but was not very satisfactorily answered.

An hon. Member: Not answered at all.

Mr. Knight: No, not answered at all. Whether or not proof of illegal activities in this latter case has been found, I do not know; nor shall we know until the report has been tabled.

What has been the fate of these reports? What action in the interests of the people of Canada has the government taken in these matters? So far as practical results go, none. A feeble and anaemic attempt at prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act was made in the case of the dental combine. I believe it was Mr. Ilsley who reported to the house that, because of legal technicalities, the matter had been dropped. In the meantime some of our aged people on small incomes are going without dentures. A dealer in dental supplies in my own city of Saskatoon was refused supplies from his wholesale house unless he agreed to sell the articles supplied him at prices dictated by the combine. This is not a matter of conjecture; it is a matter of proven fact.

Is this what my hon. friends on the government side of the house mean when they talk to us about freedom of enterprise? This gentleman, who happened to be a personal friend of mine, was forced out of business and out of the exercise of his profession by the depredations of these people.

In the matter of optical supplies, old age pensioners have been doing without the spectacles they need. I am glad to be able to say that in my own province the load has been taken off the back of the individual, or off his purse, since the government of that province began furnishing, along with free hospitalization and medicine, glasses to old age pensioners requiring them. But the high prices impose a heavy load upon the social services branches of that government.

The general public has become increasingly the victim of these high prices, some of which may be attributed to the depredations of these combines. The cost of living is high enough now, goodness knows.

If I might digress for a moment from the particular subject in hand, I would refer to an article appearing in my Saskatoon paper which I read this morning, and having to do with price increases. It says—

> An increase of six or seven cents in the retail price of a pound of coffee was forecast today as a result of a five-cent boost—

And it will be noticed that the boost is only five cents.

> —in the wholesale price. The retailers expect the new prices will take effect at the beginning of next week.

When compared with these other combines to which I have referred, this is only small potatoes; but it is an indication of the trend of the times. When these people were asked to explain a six or seven cents increase in the retail price in view of a five-cent increase in the wholesale price, one retailer explained that these were additional operating costs which the increased price would impose. The consumers are now paying an average of sixty-five cents per pound for coffee.

Let me return to the McGregor reports, which, I say, are tremendously important. With the exception of the action taken in the dental case I do not know of any action having been taken in the others. And so these commercial highwaymen carry on their nefarious trade under the benevolent eye of this government. I shall be told that the eye of the government is not benevolent in that regard. Well, we can judge only by their lack of action. I shall be told that the statute known as the Combines Investigation

Act is not a piece of legislative machinery at all, but so much legislative scrap. With that I agree. I shall be told it has no teeth. Whose responsibility is that? Who drew up the legislation? Has this government no law officers of the crown? They have known of this inefficiency for years. Why has not the situation been remedied?

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Should we shoot them without a trial?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knight: May I anticipate the hon. member's query? If he is going to ask if he may ask a question, may I say that I am not prepared to permit it at the moment.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: He said no.

Mr. Knight: I do not know what comment the hon. member wished to make, but I fancy there are cabinet ministers who ought to be able to defend themselves without the help of backbenchers across the way.

There has been too much delay in these matters. To a layman the process of law is inconceivably slow. The man in the street, the ordinary chap like myself, thinks to himself, with some justification: We have in Canada a legislative body to make and to amend the law. We have here, we hope, an executive body to carry out that law. The reason we can get no action is that the government is apathetic and has not the will to act.

I would ask whether or not that is a reasonable supposition for the man in the street to entertain. The process of law operates slowly, like the mills of God. We are told that though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceedingly small. May I say that the analogy applies only to the first part of that statement, because it seems to me there is always an escape somewhere for these culprits between the upper and nether millstones. They can find loopholes somewhere in the drawn-out and tortuous proceedings.

That word "tortuous" is a good word. It makes me think of a couple of good lines—I think they are from Horace, although I am not certain. In any event they relate to the story of the young Roman who for hours faced his tormentors—and I presume they would correspond to the crown prosecutors of today—but who stood firm and refused to divulge the name of his partners in guilt, and omne tempus sciebat quae tortor pararet—during all the time he was keenly aware of what the tortor was preparing for him. The culprits in this combines matter do not appear to be worrying unduly over what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is preparing for them. I have no doubt that when the Minister of Justice was studying law his parents and relatives were proud of him, but may I say to him that when the Romans had a tortor in the family they did not tell anybody about it. A tortor was a twister of the rope—in short, a hangman.

In view of the answers that we did not receive this afternoon I am going to suggest that the prisoner at the bar is not the guilty party so far as these combines are concerned. The only bar at which they stand is the bar of public opinion. The real prisoner at the bar has been this man McGregor, this investigator of combines in this country, who has resigned. He is the man who stood staunch and true in the face of iniquity and in the face of great odds, knowing, too, perhaps all the time, what was to happen to him. Has it happened? I cannot say much more about this until I have the facts. I have directed some general indictments of negligence against the government—I almost said criminal negligence, but I am not just sure that the word "criminal" would be parliamentary.

I should like to say a word or two about the companies which supply us with gasoline and fuel oil. The parity of their prices is not wholly coincidental. On October 13, 1949, Hon. J. W. Corman, attorney general of Saskatchewan, addressed the following letter to the Minister of Justice:

Dear Mr. Garson:

On behalf of the government of Saskatchewan I respectfully draw your attention to a news item appearing in the Regina Leader-Post, September 24, 1949, which reads in part as follows:

"A price boost ranging from one cent to 1·3 cents per gallon on gasoline and a half cent per gallon increase on light fuel oils, effective immediately, due to devaluation of the Canadian dollar, was announced Saturday by A. A. Turner, Saskatchewan manager of Imperial Oil Company.

Other major companies are expected to follow.

The increases in gasoline and fuel oil prices is a reflection of increases made in Alberta crude oil prices, made to permit Alberta fields to come back into balance with world prices following devaluation of the Canadian dollar.

'The effect of devaluation was to reduce Alberta crude prices below their competitive level,' he said, 'and current adjustments made up the difference'."

As reported on page 880 of Hansard of October 18, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) asked the following question:

I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, a copy of which I have sent him. Can the minister state whether he will comply with the request of the attorney general of Saskatchewan that an investigation be made under the Combines Investigation Act into the recent price increases in crude oil, gasoline and fuel oil?

I should like to quote what I consider the only pertinent part of the minister's reply, as follows:

I do not think I should publish the letter before he receives it, but I shall be glad to have it tabled tomorrow.

The next day a copy of the minister's letter to Mr. Corman was tabled. The gist of the contents of the letter written on October 18 by the minister is contained in one paragraph. Hon. members should remember that this is the reply of the Minister of Justice of the Dominion of Canada to a request that an investigation be made. The paragraph reads:

We do not think from the information we have that the increases in prices to which you refer were the result of an agreement. It would appear to be the action of the largest company in the industry setting prices which its competitors later followed.

The oil companies must have been encouraged when they saw that answer. They must have felt more secure after that particular statement was made. However, Mr. Corman was not pleased with the answer he received, and he made a public statement on the matter, part of which I should like to put on the record of this house as follows:

I am still of the opinion a prima facie case for an investigation has been made out. The Minister of Justice has evidence pointing to the fact that all major oil companies raised prices in Saskatchewan at exactly the same time, by exactly the same amount and gave as justification exactly the same phony excuse, devaluation. That would be enough circumstantial evidence to send a man up for trial on a murder charge and, when backed up by a request from a provincial government should be sufficient to justify an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act.

The minister states that, from information he has, he does not think the increase in prices by the oil companies was the result of an agreement. He does not say what information he has nor how he got it, but in any event it is not necessary to prove an agreement. The act uses the words "tacit arrangement", and a combine exists if that tacit arrangement has the effect of (1) "fixing a common price or resale price"; (2) "enhancing the price of an article"; (3) "preventing or lessening competition in purchase, sale or barter".

So much for Mr. Corman's reply. The oil industry has been much in our minds lately, and apparently it is much in the minds of some of those who live outside our country. While on a fishing trip this summer I was in Calgary, and I remember picking up a copy of the Calgary Herald which contained a news item accompanying a picture of a number of United States magnates who were up there discussing how best they could dispose of our Canadian oil. I know that in the panicky expediency of our immediate dollar situation we seem to be prepared to part with almost anything for United States dollars, but I hope that we shall not too readily sell our natural resources birthright for a mess of pottage, either from the United States or anywhere else.

As I say, we are paying a lot of attention to oil these days. I think it is even more vital to our economy than United States dollars. This parliament has been giving favourable consideration to applications that have been made for permission to build pipe lines to transport oil from place to place. I supported most of those applications wholeheartedly. However, the price of oil was recently raised all over the country, and the reason given was the devaluation of our dollar. Of course that action did not receive such hearty support. The government recently introduced a budget resolution to do away with the eight per cent sales tax on oil, and I think most hon. members will agree with that. The oil men have been attacking this sales tax, and there is no doubt that its imposition bore heavily upon certain oil fields, notably the one at Lloydminster. As I say, that is all right, and I supported it. I believe that action was necessary, because they were competing with coal which was not under the burden of that particular tax. Most of us welcomed the taking off of that tax. I say we welcomed that encouragement of the oil industry.

One of the large oil companies has received a licence from this government to transport oil outside of our national boundaries, and I believe that that is against the wishes of the majority of the people of this country. I have no doubt my backbencher friends on the Liberal side will rally behind their Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), just as our Saskatchewan friends rally behind the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), irrespective of what they say or do. They have to demonstrate their faith in the men who lead them.

These companies have obtained valuable considerations. Their business will be greatly augmented and their profits greatly increased. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) looks with unsuspicious eye, with naïveté on this setting of prices. But how are the companies prepared to reward the consuming public for this favourable consideration? This brings me to the specific matter which prompted me to speak today, although this other question, which I consider much more important, has arisen. I wish to consider particularly the extent to which the situation which I am now about to describe is the direct result of the pronouncement of the Minister of Justice that he could see no evidence of combined action in the recent rise in the price of oil. I suspect it has something to do with it. A company selling fuel oil will feel much more comfortable when they know they have the Minister of Justice, if not on their side, at least looking upon them with some benevolence. He is smiling at me now, and I hope in the same spirit. At any rate, I wish to state the following facts which I shall prove.

In my home city of Saskatoon many people, and among them myself, have changed from coal to oil for the purpose of heating their houses. They have done so not only because it is a clean fuel but also because many people believe that, with oil wells upon their doorstep, it will follow ipso facto that a supply of oil will always be available, and at reasonable prices. Like the Minister of Justice, they are perhaps somewhat naive. They must have been startled out of some of their naivete by the news of Wednesday last when an announcement was made that fuel oil, which is costing Regina consumers 14·6 cents per gallon, was to be sold to Saskatoon consumers at 18 cents per gallon.

Even hon. members from eastern Canada know something about the geography of that part of the country, and have some idea of the distance between those two places. Of course inquiries were instituted, and notably by our local newspaper in Saskatoon. I should like to quote from a news report appearing in that paper. I do so because it presents the situation more clearly than I can, inasmuch as they are on the ground. It is from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of October 27, 1949. I shall not read it all because time is slipping along, but the pertinent part is as follows:

Information obtained showed that Imperial Oil, Hi-Way Refineries and Husky Oil were the three main wholesalers of domestic fuel in this city. Imperial Oil transported crude oil from the Lloydminster field—

If I may break off there, it is rather interesting to note the expense these companies have to deliver oil to my door in Saskatoon. It is an interesting point when you are thinking about whether there might be any collusion between them. The article continues:

—to Regina for refining and then shipped a portion of the domestic fuel here for consumption. Hi-Way also obtained crude from the Lloydminster field and refined the fuel oil at its local plant.

That is at its Lloydminster plant, which I had the pleasure of seeing about a month ago. I hope you have the picture. I continue to read:

Husky's fuel oil was refined at its Lloydminster plant and shipped to Saskatoon. Also obtained were freight charges said to be paid by the three firms. Imperial reportedly paid 3·22 cents per gallon to transport crude from Lloydminster to its Regina refinery and a further five cents per gallon to ship domestic fuel from Regina to Saskatoon;—

It looks like a lot of freight to ship a gallon of oil from Regina to Saskatoon. I expect that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is paying some attention to me, will know whether refined oil carries a higher freight rate than crude oil. It appears that it is costing eight cents per gallon to take it from the point of production at Lloydminster to the refinery at Regina, and then back to Saskatoon. The article continues:

—an over-all freight cost of more than eight cents per gallon to deliver fuel oil here.

Hi-Way Refineries were said to pay 2·3 cents per gallon to transport Lloydminster crude to its Saskatoon refinery.

They have a small refinery in Saskatoon. The oil is brought there from Lloydminster, refined, and delivered by truck to homes like my own in Saskatoon. The article continues:

Husky Oil was reported to pay 4·44 cents per gallon to ship refined fuel from its Lloydminster refinery to this city.

There you have the situation. You have a tremendous diversity in the cost that each of these companies has to pay to deliver a gallon of oil to my door, but the price of the oil is the same, 18 cents a gallon to me, and 14.6 cents to my friends in Regina.

The newspaper report went on to say:

Few officials of the firms involved were available for comment. Those available declined to make any statement.

Like the minister today they declined to make any statement until they had further considered the matter. I wonder why they would need time to consider it. I wonder why the minister should take time to consider the matter of the resignation of the combines commissioner. I am going to suggest that the officials of these companies needed time for exactly the same purpose that the minister needed time, to consult their colleagues and then to come out with a definite answer agreed upon by the whole lot. If that is not collusion then I do not know what collusion is.

I do not blame the officials of these companies for not making any statement rashly, because it is certainly a situation which needs careful explanation. I wish to draw attention to the fact that there is a great difference involved in the expense borne by each of these firms to deliver oil at Saskatoon; and yet, as I said before, the price is exactly the same. I presume the minister would not call that collusion, but just one strong company setting a price which the others are inclined to follow. As to the validity of that argument, I shall allow the house to pass its own judgment.

I can give you the judgment passed upon the matter by editorial comment in the west, again in the same newspaper to which I have already referred. The editorial is too long to give in full, but I shall read some of the parts relevant to the argument which I have already advanced. It reads:

With the disclosure that we are paying 3½ cents more for a gallon of fuel oil than Reginans, the smell which surrounds the whole oil industry in this province becomes even less delectable than it was a couple of weeks ago when Mr. Corman asked for a federal investigation. It will be recalled that the attorney general's request was prompted by a rise in the price of oil products announced simultaneously by all the companies. This, thought Mr. Corman, constituted a first-rate case for the investigation of the industry under our federal trust-busting act. In a rather weak and unsatisfactory statement—

Hear, hear.

—Mr. Garson disagreed with this contention. He did not think there was any evidence to indicate the existence of an "arrangement" between the companies to restrain trade or control prices. What was more likely, he said, was that Imperial Oil, by virtue of its hugeness, was the price leader in the oil industry, and that the smaller companies simply followed its lead. He pointed out that unless the existence of an "arrangement," tacit or formal, can be proved, our anti-trust laws cannot be applied.

So the matter stood until a few days ago when we discovered that, whether by "arrangement" or not, we in this city are paying a good deal more for our oil than we should. The wrathful reception accorded this news is entirely justified since this city enjoys advantages which in all justice should provide us with oil at a price well below that in Regina.

Saskatoon is supplied by three oil companies—Imperial, and the two independents, Husky and Hi-Way. Almost all the oil used here comes from the Lloydminster area.

That area is not very far away.

Imperial carries its share of this crude to Regina, refines it there and returns it to Saskatoon. On the other hand, the oil sold by the independents is refined either in Lloydminster or in Saskatoon. Thus, to deliver an oil product in Saskatoon costs Imperial a great deal more than it does the independents. In fact, according to figures provided by the railway, Hi-Way enjoys a freight advantage of 53 cents on each hundredweight and Husky an advantage of 31 cents.

Yet the price of oil is the same to the consumer in each case.

Yet despite this our oil prices are based on the cost of carrying crude from Lloydminster to Regina and returning oil products to Saskatoon. In other words, our independents are accepting the Imperial price. On the face of things, even allowing for more efficiency in Imperial's refining processes, the independents should be able to sell oil here well below their big competitor. Under conditions of free competition this is precisely what would happen.

I draw the attention of hon. members to the last line of that paragraph: "Under conditions of free competition this is precisely what would happen". I regard this as particularly intelligent editorial opinion; and in the view of that editor, price competition among these companies is not free. In other words, in regard to prices there is no competition.

The newspaper goes on to analyse the position of the independents in the matter. These companies realize that in a price war, Imperial, with its world-wide resources, could and would simply put them out of business. There is no reason why the independents should seek any price war. Why should they be dissatisfied with the present situation, when it contains so much that is in their favour? As very little chickens, they are content to bask in the warmth and protection of the mother wing.

This is the situation in my native city, but I expect similar conditions prevail in other parts of Canada. I feel that the whole matter—and by that I do not mean only the oil business, but also these other things—is of such vital importance to my own constituency that I considered it worthy of a public airing here; and I feel that it is even more important as a matter which involves the country as a whole. However, I am well aware that companies of this kind cannot be shamed into action. I well remember how the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) used to tell about reasonable prices. We would plead with him to see that the great interests of this country should not exact too much profit, and he would tell us he was quite sure that the mere publication of these things would shame these people into decency. May I say that shame and profits do not mix. So I know companies of this kind cannot be shamed into action which would interfere with their profits. We have a government in this country which has as one of its major functions, as I see it, the protection of the people as individuals, protection from those who would twist the law in order to exploit them. I call upon the government to take immediate remedial action. By so doing it has an opportunity to allay the suspicion, now often present in the mind of the man in the street, that he has no protection from the depredations of those who bring together money and power in a combination with which he is unable to cope.

If I may direct one last word to the minister, if the resignation of Mr. McGregor has not taken place I wish the minister would deny it, so that our minds may be at rest on this particular matter.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to take part in this debate, but in view of the spirited attack we have just heard, particularly in reference to myself as minister, I think it behooves me to take some cognizance of the remarks of my hon. friend, and to attempt, albeit extemporaneously, to reply to them. Without the privilege of examining the report of his speech in Hansard to make sure I am answering every detail, I think it is not unfair to say that his attacks fall under three heads, as I understood them; first, with regard to dental supplies; second, with regard to optical goods, and third, with regard to the letter I received recently from the attorney general of Saskatchewan, relating to petroleum products.

Mr. Argue: And flour.

Mr. Garson: Well, flour is the subject concerning which I was asked these questions, to which I replied that, having had no notice of them, I should like to bring down an answer tomorrow; I must adhere to that position.

I want to go into the matter of dental supplies in some little detail, because it has a bearing upon all these other matters. In that instance the report of the commissioner was published in July, 1947. It alleged that seven manufacturers and seven wholesalers of dental supplies, all members of the Canadian Dental Trade Association, had formed and operated a combine which had effect throughout Canada. Most of the companies had their headquarters in Toronto. Two had headquarters in Fort Erie, Ontario, and one each in Montreal, Halifax and Vancouver. Several had branches in different parts of Canada. In 1945 these companies controlled about eighty-seven per cent of the dental supply business in this country. In the report handed to the Minister of Justice in 1947 it was found that these companies had agreed upon common wholesale prices for their products and had restricted the entry of any new wholesalers into the field; and that these activities had limited competition, to the detriment of the public.

My hon. friend alleges tortuousness and deliberate inaction by the government in these matters—I take it he is referring to my predecessors in office as well as to myself, since I hope he is not picking on me personally. His allegation is quite contrary to the facts. In the dental supplies case the facts were that the report was turned in, and then, on the instructions of the then Attorney General of Canada, a charge was laid in Toronto under section 498(d) of the Criminal Code of Canada for conspiring to lessen competition—that is, a charge of conspiracy. Mr. D. L. McCarthy, K.C., one of the outstanding counsel of Canada, was retained as senior crown counsel. He was assisted by two other gentlemen, both extremely competent counsel: Mr. Peter Wright and Mr. D. A. Keith, both of Toronto.

The trial was held in February and March of 1948, before Mr. Justice Barlow, with a jury. It took quite a long time. I understand that on previous occasions it had not been the practice of corporate defendants to call for a jury, but in this case they asked for a jury trial. That immediately presented difficulties in the prosecution of the case, because in a jury trial it is necessary to read all the exhibits verbatim. In a case of this kind, where the evidence for the crown consisted almost exclusively of over 1,800 separate documents seized under search warrant from the files and premises of the accused companies, it meant that the physical business of reading the exhibits to the jury took a great deal of time, protracted the trial and made for a complexity and confusion which by no means facilitated the proving of the crown's case.

The evidence was tendered merely on proof of seizure. That is, the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had gone in and made these seizures, and the documents were tendered as evidence on the basis of having been seized, under the conspiracy principle that documents found in the possession of an accused, which are of an incriminating nature, are evidence against him. This evidence was accepted by the judge on this basis at an early stage in the trial. Upon completion of the crown's case, however, the trial judge accepted the defence argument that these documents were insufficiently authenticated, and directed the jury to render a verdict of not guilty.

In giving this direction he indicated that he was not satisfied with the proof in relation to these documents, on some or all of the following points. First, that the persons purporting to write the letters and so on, as evidenced by these paper writings seized, had in fact written the letters which the paper writings purported to indicate that they had written; second, that such persons were in fact officers of the accused companies; third, that the accused companies had authorized such persons to perform the acts complained of; and fourth, that the companies themselves in fact existed. That is, the corporate existence of the company, as the judge held, had not been established satisfactorily.

The crown in that case contended that all of these points had been abundantly established by the interlocking circumstantial evidence of possession which had been tendered in these 1,800 documents which had been filed. Therefore, in the face of this judgment—and again I bring this forward as an example not of any neglect of duty or tortuousness, but of the diligent performance of duty—crown counsel was instructed to enter an appeal against that judgment. Argument was heard by the Ontario court of appeal in September, 1948. Judgment was reserved, and was delivered on February 28, 1949.

In upholding the ruling of the trial judge Chief Justice Robertson of Ontario said that the criminal acts charged must be brought home to the companies and that the proof required in the case of a company differs somewhat from that required in the case of an individual conspirator. In explaining this statement, he held that the mere possession of documents by a company to the extent that the documents were upon the premises or even in its files might not, without additional proof, afford grounds for an inference that their contents had come to the knowledge of someone in the company having authority to deal with the matters to which the documents related. The chief justice went on to say that one objection common to all the letters was the absence of evidence that the writing of them had been authorized by any of the accused companies or that anyone having authority to bind the company had any knowledge of the sending of any of these letters, or of their receipt, or of their contents.

The point that I want to emphasize here that there was no lack of any diligence on the part of the Department of Justice, in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, or on the part of Mr. McGregor and his officials in that department, or on the part of crown counsel. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that if this judgment is permitted to stand and if in cases of this sort it is necessary as part of the crown's case that we should prove that the acts which are referred to in documents seized in that way have been authorized by the board of directors in a formal manner, we think it will be almost impossible to administer the Combines Investigation Act. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) referred to the dilapidation in the legislation. If dilapidation exists in any respect at all, it exists more by virtue of this one decision than by any other circumstance.

I cannot anticipate my own legislation but I think it is not improper for me to say that within a matter of days now we shall be bringing down a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act, by one of the sections of which we hope to cure the situation in which this matter has been left by the decision of the Ontario court of appeal. As to the dental supplies case, I do not see how the most carping critic of this government, or of the Department of Justice or of myself as its minister, could indicate that we could have done any more than we have done or could have been any more diligent in any way than we have been.

The next point my hon. friend refers to is the optical goods case. He says that there have been poor results there, with which he is dissatisfied. May I outline for a moment or two, as briefly as I can, what was done by the department with regard to the matter of optical goods. In that case the report of the commissioner to the Minister of Justice was published in April, 1948, and it alleged that a combine existed throughout Canada in the manufacture and sale of optical goods. The report stated, first, that a Canadian company, with branches across Canada, and its parent company in the United States had substantially controlled the optical goods trade as a "merger, trust or monopoly"—those are the technical terms used in the report—to the detriment of the public; and second, that the same two companies, together with a related patent-holding company and some twenty-five optical goods wholesalers throughout Canada, had combined to lessen competition to the detriment of the public. The agreements were based upon licences granted under eleven patents on spectacle frames. These patents covered more than seventy-five per cent of all optical goods. Licences were issued under the patents to wholesalers and retailers: optometrists, opticians and doctors. The licences specified the persons to whom sales could be made, the types of products to be sold, the types of lenses to be used with the patented frames and the prices at which frames and lenses could be sold at wholesale and at retail. The report also dealt with the subsidiary price-fixing arrangements between manufacturers and wholesalers of lenses.

Prior to the investigation the Attorney General of Canada, on the advice of the commissioner, took action in the Exchequer Court of Canada under the Patent Act to have seven of the patents declared invalid. They were in large part the basis of this arrangement and that was an alternative mode of attack. Counsel had advised that the patented features were not sufficiently novel and ingenious to be patented. Since these proceedings began in 1943, two of the seven patents have been declared invalid; two have been dedicated to the public, the patentees having abandoned their defence, and entry of judgment will be made shortly; one patent has expired; and the other two are still before the exchequer court, Mr. Justice Thorson having reserved judgment following the trials which were held in October, 1947, and May, 1948. If all these patents are declared invalid, the main support, foundation and basis of these arrangements complained of will disappear. Similar action is also pending to expunge from the register two key trademarks on optical goods.

During the investigation the parties involved cancelled all the retail patent licences and most of the wholesale patent licences, thus further reducing the basis of control. Since the report was published, the patent-holding company cancelled its remaining wholesale licences and apparently abandoned entirely its operations in Canada.

Now, sir, apart from these patent attacking cases, the Minister of Justice submitted the optical goods report of the commissioner to an eminent counsel in the city of Ottawa,

Mr. J. D. Watt, K.C., for an opinion, as to whether we could likely succeed on a prosecution based upon the optical goods report. Counsel advised us that in his opinion, on the various points involved, the matter should be deferred until after the court of appeal had given judgment in this dental case. The matter had been referred to him before the court of appeal had given judgment, but after the first trial had been held in the dental case. He said, in effect "that he was not prepared to give an opinion until after the court of appeal has pronounced upon these points that have been raised in the trial court judgment in the dental case."

Since appeal court judgment has come down the counsel has recommended that no charge be laid in this optical goods matter. His principal reasons were the difficulty of proving continuity of possession of many of the documents obtained during the preliminary inquiries in the war years, the death and incapacity of certain key witnesses, and the difficulty of proof of corporate authority for making the agreements and the arrangements involved, since the dominant companies are United States companies and it is not possible to secure reliable witnesses in Canada to testify in this respect, and also the fact that there had been a fairly complete abandonment of the arrangements which constituted the basis of that case. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, hon. members would understand that if, we will say, in this optical goods case it is necessary, in respect of matters which were claimed to be conspiratorial in nature and contrary to the law, to prove that the board of directors of the various conspiring companies formally sat down together and authorized these things to be done, we would have a very difficult time ever acquiring evidence to prove facts of that sort.

It appears then that while we admit there are strong reasons of public policy, such as those my hon. friend mentioned this afternoon, against the practice of abandoning a prosecution of this sort merely because all of the restrictive arrangements in the face of these activities have been withdrawn; and particularly, as in this case, where they had operated for some time; yet these evidentiary difficulties, in the face of this court of appeal judgment in the dental supplies case are so formidable that we considered in this case we should follow the opinion expressed by a highly competent counsel.

Now may I turn for a moment to the matter of the increase in the price of oil products and the letter which was written to me by the attorney general of Saskatchewan, complaining about that increase and asking that we institute an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act to determine whether or not that increase had been the result of an agreement to fix prices, which is what we have to prove in order to secure a conviction. The first point that I would make in that connection is that Mr. Corman's own letter quoted a press dispatch which indicated that the increase in price of petroleum products was the result of devaluation of the Canadian dollar. It would seem that this point, which is made in Mr. Corman's letter—I do not know whether he was expressing agreement with it or not; I think the general tone of his letter rather implied that he disagreed with this news dispatch—but what he quoted, whether he agreed or disagreed, is not without some pretty substantial foundation. The fact is that in Canada today 87 per cent of all our crude oil requirements are still imported and for the most part from dollar countries. The Canadian price at parity of exchange, apart from the question of transportation and the like, is equal to the United States price when the United States dollar is equal to the Canadian dollar. If you take a typical imported barrel of crude—I am speaking from memory now; I do not vouch for this figure—I think you will find that the price was $2.53 a barrel. When you devalue the Canadian dollar by 10 per cent it means that that price of $2.53 in United States dollars becomes approximately $2.80 in the new devaluated Canadian dollar. When the price of imported crude, which constitutes 87 per cent of the total amount of crude consumed in Canada, goes up about 25 cents a barrel it establishes a market price for Canadian oil; and unless we are going to ask our friends in Alberta to be kind enough to take less than the market price for their oil, which I am informed they have strongly signified their unwillingness to do, then the price of crude generally in Canada rises as a result of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar in precisely—I should not use that word; it is too strong a word—in much the same way, shall I say, that the price of Canadian wheat rose by 18 cents. I did not hear the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) or the attorney general of Saskatchewan complain about that rise in the price of wheat, any more than I have complained, because we all represent agricultural communities, and we are glad to see our producers get as favourable a price as possible, but devaluation has much the same effect in relation to the price of petroleum and of wheat.

It is quite true that the situation on the prairies—and the hon. member for Saskatoon dealt with this in greater detail than I shall be able to do because he had a prepared speech —is technically different perhaps in a sense because the crude oil is not imported. Yet the domestic crude oil has a market price just the same as imported crude oil, and recent legislation of the Alberta government authorized the conservation board of that province to restrict the production of oil to the amount for which there is a demand so as to make certain that such oil as is produced shall have the market price. This leaves the price of domestic crude greatly affected if not established by the price of imported crude from dollar countries.

My hon. friend asked what knowledge I had about this matter that I referred to in my reply to Mr. Corman. Well, sir, it obviously was not any knowledge that I personally have, because I am sure that my hon. friend would be the first to agree that with the other duties I have to perform I cannot keep a personal eye upon the fluctuations in crude oil prices or the operations of the combines investigation administration in relation to the petroleum industry.

The first step I took in relation to Mr. Corman's letter—and a very obvious one—was to call in consultation Mr. McGregor and discuss with him the letter of the attorney general of Saskatchewan to see if our combines investigation office, which tries to keep itself fairly well posted in respect of these developments in all industries as well as it can, had any information which would indicate that the increase in price bore any earmarks which, coupled with the information we had, would indicate that it was the result of an agreement to fix prices. I was informed we did not have any such information, and moreover that it was thought, not only by the combines branch but by marketing experts in the Department of Trade and Commerce, that the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, in itself, could very well account for the change in the price of petroleum products in much the same manner that it had accounted for the change in the price of wheat.

Therefore in the face of those facts, and especially when the letter of the attorney general of Saskatchewan bore on its own face an explanation as to why the price of petroleum products had gone up—and why they would have gone up, whether there had or had not been a combine—it did not seem wise to incur the large expenditure involved in an inquiry of this sort to investigate a matter which seemed perfectly explicable in the terms of the very letter demanding the inquiry—and especially when the facts which we had here confirmed that impression.

I have taken somewhat longer than I had intended. I am sorry to have trespassed upon the time of the house, but I thought it was desirable to place upon the record some factual answer to the rather strong and yet somewhat vague charges made by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). Because, had I not done so, it would not have been fair to Mr. McGregor and the others in his department for whom my hon. friend seems to be so solicitous, and whom he appears to admire so much.

Mr. Knight: Would the minister permit a question before taking his seat?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knight: He has made no reference to the report on the flour-milling industry.

Mr. Garson: That is right. I said before that I would not make a statement until I had checked the matter.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is it not correct that optical appliances used in the optical industry increased very definitely in price after the report of the combines branch was brought down? Prices increased in the hands of wholesalers, or those who exported the articles to Canada. This has been represented to me by certain dealers in Nova Scotia as a matter of actual fact. They have pointed out that there were very definite increases in the prices of these articles after the report of the combines branch was brought down.

Mr. Garson: I should not like offhand to admit that my hon. friend is correct in his statement, but certainly offhand I would not contradict him. If he be right—as he may very well be—I would make this suggestion, that not all high prices are necessarily the result of price-fixing agreements. Such price-fixing agreements could be stamped out at the manufacturing or wholesale level, and if under conditions of relative prosperity such as we have at the present time retailers who have been in the habit of receiving certain prices for their products think they can get those prices, or perhaps a little more, then even on a competitive basis if the demand is sufficiently great they may be disposed to raise their prices—and this not necessarily as the result of any agreement or monopoly, but rather due to the fact that the competing firms do not have to cut prices in order to get all the business they want.

The Combines Investigation Act does not purport to do anything more than attack efforts to prevent competition operating. But if unrestricted competition be present, and prices still rise, it is beyond the purview of the combines branch.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This increase, it is represented to me, was in defiance of the report brought down by the combines branch.

Mr. Garson: Oh, Mr. Speaker, I do not like to contradict my hon. friend, but I think he is quite wrong in that. As regards any of the matters in this optical goods case which came within the purview of the report, my impression is that all alleged illegal activities have ceased, and that if there have been any increases in prices since that time it has not been due to any of the restrictive practices condemned in the report. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity in the budget debate to speak briefly concerning the present condition of the textile industry in Canada. Last night I listened with keen interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), who pointed out that his county is most seriously affected by any change in relation to this industry.

Like the hon. member for Lanark, I have no interest or stock in any industry of this type, nor have I ever acted nor do I act now as solicitor or in any other capacity for any textile industry or company. I am speaking about the condition of the textile industry because of a full-page paid advertisement which appeared in the Belleville Ontario-Intelligencer, the issue of Saturday, October 8, 1949. The city of Belleville is located in the constituency of Hastings South, which immediately adjoins my own riding. In large type at the bottom of this full-page advertisement appears the words—

This is a paid advertisement published by Malcolm Robb, 15 Campbell Street, Belleville, Ontario.

Mr. Robb is a barrister practising in the city of Belleville; and while I do not know his political affiliations I do know from sessional paper 144-G of April 26, 1949, that he has drawn very large legal fees from various departments of the dominion government. I note for instance that in 1947 his fees from the Department of Agriculture amounted to $1,839, and in 1948 from the same department they amounted to $2,176. In addition he received fees from various other governmental departments. In the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 he received from the Department of National Revenue $5,561. So I take it from these fairly reasonable fees that Mr. Robb at least is not unfriendly to the present government. I do not know whether he is carrying on a one-man fight to destroy the Canadian textile industry, or whether he is simply a front for other interests.

This paid advertisement is addressed to farmers, housewives, merchants, workmen and manufacturers, and in large type at the top of the page appear these words:

The high tariff boys in the textile industry are at it again.

I have carefully looked through the budget speech of the Minister of Finance and have failed to find any tariff changes affecting the textile industry. To date I have received no petitions or letters in regard to the tariff on textiles. This paid advertisement contains a report which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail but the date is not given. This is an interview with Leslie Biggin, president of the Canadian Wool Company Limited, and I quote:

The devaluation of the British pound (sterling) by 30 per cent, followed by the devaluation of the Canadian dollar by 10 per cent, he says, has as net result put Britain "in a 24 per cent better position to dump British textiles into Canada than she was last week." The difference between the previous rate of $4.04 and the present rate of $3.08 is 96 cents which represents a reduction of 24 per cent.

And again:

The whole industry is now on a free trade basis with Britain. Already for the first seven months of 1949 British exports of wool fabrics to Canada averaged 54 per cent above the monthly rate during 1938. Worsted fabrics have been exported to Canada at a rate of 74 per cent above the 1933 monthly rate. In the month of July 1,729,000 square yards of wool fabrics were sent to Canada from Britain.

And further down:

Here is an item published in the London Times recently and dated Canberra, Australia, September 12:

"The government has asked the tariff board to investigate the effect on Australian industries of imports of knitted and woven piece goods, hosiery and underwear. Australian manufacturers have been protesting against the volume of these and other textile imports chiefly from United Kingdom.

We cannot depend upon our government asking our tariff board to conduct any investigation; therefore, we should immediately jump to our own defence by demanding an investigation if the industry is to survive.

Field Marshal Sir Stafford Cripps, with his able assistant, General Harold Wilson, who have so ably conducted the attack on Canadian industry, can now with the ammunition which they have provided themselves, plus the additional ammunition furnished by Ottawa, really turn on the heavy artillery. Unless something is done and done immediately the imports of British textiles will increase by leaps and bounds in the coming months."

The plan advocated by Mr. Robb in his paid advertisement is simply that Canada should not be engaged in the manufacture of textiles. Apparently Mr. Robb—this is borne out by his advertisement—is of the belief that Canada should be interested only in the primary industries of mining, fishing, agriculture and lumbering, and that no industry has a legitimate place in the economy of the country if it cannot survive without tariff protection. I am sure that this theory will be of particular interest to the industrial city of Belleville, the large town of Trenton and other manufacturing and industrial towns and villages in the county of Hastings.

If it is correct that in principle tariffs are set up to protect the standard of living of a country, then such tariffs should be regulated to a higher or lower degree as the standard of living increases or decreases. Mr. Robb goes on to state in his advertisement that the textile industry complains that it is on a free-trade basis with Britain, and he goes on to ask if that is such a terrible fate if the industry has any legitimate place in the economy of this country.

It is quite apparent that Mr. Robb is not interested in whether textile or other mills and industries close because they cannot survive the competition from abroad, nor is he interested in the unemployment that would naturally follow the closing of such mills or industries which cannot survive competition from abroad. The advertisement goes on to state:

Here's your chance for democratic action. Stop the textile high pressure group. Clip out—sign and mail the proper coupon to Frank Follwell, M.P., Ottawa—no postage required.

That is the hon. member for Hastings South. The advertisement then sets out five printed letters, all addressed to:

Frank Follwell, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

One is from a housewife, one is from a farmer, one is from a merchant, one is from a workman and one is from a textile worker. The letters are both interesting and amusing. For instance, the draft letter from the merchant to the hon. member for Hastings South reads in part as follows:

I am dependent for my livelihood on the prosperity of the people in my community.

I would rather have as customers farmers making $5,000 to $6,000 a year than textile workers making $22 a week. I would rather have as customers a railway man making roughly $300 a month moving the goods of this country to the export market than a textile worker making $22 a week. I would rather have as a customer a lumberman or worker in the newsprint trade who are highly paid, than the textile worker who is poorly paid.

I am sure it will be welcome news to the farmers of the county of Hastings, in which I reside, to be told that they are making $5,000 to $6,000 per year. I am sure that when the inspector of income tax at Belleville read that statement he must have nearly fainted. The reference to the weekly wage of $22 paid to textile workers is far from correct. I am advised by persons who are thoroughly familiar with this industry that textile workers receive, not only high wages but wages that are higher than those paid in other industries of a similar nature. The average wage is from $36 to $42 per week for a five-day week. The letter from the textile worker reads as follows:

Please don't think I am a textile worker because I want to be. I can't get a better paying job.

The textile industry, notwithstanding its tariff protection, does not pay high wages. It can't pay high wages because Canada is not a sensible place to be in the textile business. There is too little population spread over too large an area and none of the raw products are produced in any quantity here. The textile makers of Canada, even with high tariffs, can't compete with British textiles even after the British have paid the cost of transport across the Atlantic and trans-shipment across Canada. At least they say so, and it is probably true.

Now the reason why I can't get a decent paying job is because of the high tariffs on textiles. I should be in a high paid job in a natural Canadian industry shipping to the export market. But since by our tariffs on textiles we keep England and other countries from earning hundreds of millions of Canadian dollars, they can't buy hundreds of millions of dollars of the natural products of this country and I can't work in making such products at good rates of pay. It is just that simple.

Mention is made in that letter that Canada is not a sensible place to be in the textile industry. That sounds rather strange to me when I remember that last night the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) placed figures on Hansard to show that the textile industry in Canada employs no less than 180,000 workers. No doubt the majority of those workers have dependents, and a fair estimate would be that at least 500,000 Canadian citizens are dependent on the textile industry for their living. In the riding of the hon. member for Lanark there are eleven textile mills employing a large number of both men and women. Those mills are located at Perth, Smiths Falls, Lanark, Almonte, Carleton Place and Appleton.

I doubt if you will find another county in Ontario that has more prosperous towns and villages than the county of Lanark. Its prosperity is reflected in the good stores, well kept homes, schools, churches, community centres, good roads and everything else that helps to make a community prosperous. There can be no question that the textile industry in the county of Lanark is of great value to the economic life not only of that county but of all eastern Ontario, and in fact all of the Dominion of Canada. I submit that such prosperity could not exist on wages of $22 a week as suggested in this paid advertisement.

The five letters to which I have referred all urge the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) to resist tariffs on textiles. I wish to make it plain that I am not suggesting in any way that there is a tie-up with the hon. member for Hastings South in this so-called one-man war by Mr. Robb. That will be for the hon. member for Hastings South to explain. No doubt he has received many of these sample letters as printed in the Belleville paper. I for one am interested to learn just what the hon. member for Hastings South, who is a supporter of the government, is going to recommend to the government in response to the letters he has received. Is he going to suggest or recommend to the government that the whole Canadian textile industry, with some 180,000 workers and at least 500,000 Canadians dependent on it for their livelihood, be wiped out? I ask further whether it is the policy of Mr. Robb and the hon. member for Hastings South to advocate the removal of all tariffs, including presently existing tariffs that benefit many industries both in the city of Belleville and in the county of Hastings?

The present member for Hastings South is a former mayor of the city of Belleville. During his term as mayor he and his colleagues were quite successful in persuading several large new industries to locate in Belleville or immediately adjoining the city. Belleville is fortunate in having main lines of the two main railroads running through it. It has good water and highway transportation, cheap hydro, and other facilities that made it attractive to large industries looking for a new location. In addition, the city of Belleville is ideally situated for the distribution of manufactured products to large centres east and west of the city. These new industries have brought added prosperity not only to the city of Belleville but also to the county of Hastings, and to all of eastern Ontario. The hon. member for Hastings South deserves full credit for his share of the work and effort in obtaining these new industries for his home city, but would they have located in Belleville, or anywhere else in Canada, if they were not protected by adequate tariffs from competition from abroad? These new industries naturally spread large sums of money throughout the city and the surrounding district. Every citizen has benefited in some way, a condition that has done much to add to the general prosperity of Belleville, the county and the whole region. The textile mills in the county of Perth have created exactly the same condition. Even Mr. Robb, who inserted this advertisement, has received benefits from these new industries.

I should like to ask how Mr. Robb or the hon. member for Hastings South would feel if a lawyer in another city started a campaign advocating a policy whereby the old and the new industries in Belleville and vicinity would be deprived of their tariff protection, and suggested that as far as Belleville and the county of Hastings were concerned they could revert to the primary industries of farming and lumbering. In my opinion you are never going to build a strong nation in this manner. Surely the whole problem must be looked at from a national viewpoint. For instance, in my riding there are various types of mines producing minerals for industry. If it were not for tariff protection these mines would not be operating.

I have had the opportunity of examining the yearly statements issued by some of them, and I was amazed to see the total amount of wages paid, the amount paid to the two national railways and to other carriers, the amounts paid in royalties, for trucking, maintenance, repairs and all the other hundreds of expenditures that enter into a modern industrial concern. These mines have benefited the whole county of Hastings, including the city of Belleville. I wonder whether either Mr. Robb or the hon. member for Hastings South would be in favour of abolishing the tariff protection enjoyed by these mining concerns, and thus have the mineral products now produced in Canada imported from the United States, thereby using more United States dollars.

In my opinion, if Canada is to develop into a great nation she must have other great industries in addition to the primary industries. No doubt all Canadians would like to purchase motor cars, electrical equipment and many other commodities at the prices paid for these articles in the United States, but would there be many Canadians who would be satisfied to see the huge motor car factories and the large electrical industries closed? Surely it is just as logical to advocate the closing of the automobile factories and the factories producing electrical products as it is to advocate the closing of the textile industries.

You have all seen and read the slogan, "Buy made in Canada goods to keep Canadians busy". It always struck me as a very good slogan. The British government has recently urged the textile industries in Great Britain to sell more goods to Canada. Their goods are produced under conditions of much lower wages than our own. In addition to food subsidies, which also reduce the production cost of Great Britain's textiles, the government offers to provide dollars for sales propaganda in an effort to increase the volume of exports to Canada. Naturally, as these imports increase, the market for our made-in-Canada merchandise decreases. There is a growing feeling on the part of Canadian business that it is time we in Canada called a halt to subsidization of the British socialist experiment. I agree in every way with the remarks made last night by the hon. member for Lanark, and I repeat his closing words that it is not in the national interest for the textile industry to be forced to close its doors, and to force the thousands of workers in this industry out on the street to look for work wherever they can find it.

Before I finish I should like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General, and I regret he is not in his seat, the urgent need for a post office building in the village of Madoc. The present post office is in exactly the same condition as it was before I was born. The building is far too small. There is a long list of persons waiting for boxes, but they cannot be installed because there is not sufficient room to instal any more. There is only one wicket at which you buy stamps, mail letters, receive mail, and so on. The space in the office for the use of the public is not sufficient. As for the space for the use of the staff and the four mail carriers who operate routes from the village, it is simply impossible for them to properly carry on their duties. The amount of business transacted through this office warrants a proper building.

During the election the Liberal candidate assured the voters that if he were elected Madoc would not only have a new post office but the federal government would also build a new hospital and provide us with an airfield.

Mr. Rowe: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCann: What for?

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): The Liberal candidate was the only man in the riding who had an aeroplane.

I wish also to mention to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) the matter of rural mail delivery in the township of Chandos, in the county of Peterborough. Several post offices in this township receive and send out mail only once a week. In a township which today has hydro, good roads and school buses it is hard to understand why delivery of the mail should still be in the horse and buggy stage. I have had considerable correspondence with the department in reference to this matter, but for some unknown reason the department still believes that delivery of mail once a week is sufficient. I wonder how the Postmaster General would like to receive his daily papers and all his mail once a week, or to receive a letter on Saturday and mail a reply, and not have that reply leave the post office until the following Saturday. The location of the various post offices in this township is quite suitable for rural delivery; and if mail could be delivered to these post offices at least three times a week it would remedy a situation which is totally unnecessary and becoming absolutely intolerable. Again I might say that during the election campaign the Liberal candidate promised that if he was elected he would soon see that the township received proper mail service. I quite realize that these were only election promises, but I would not like to think that, because a riding elected a member opposed to the government, any part of that riding would be penalized in such a vital matter as the delivery of mail. I can assure the Postmaster General that many people are watching and waiting to see just what attitude his department will take and what if anything will be done to improve the mail service in that township. I would urge him to look into the matter and make the necessary adjustments so that the people of this township may have mail service at least three times a week.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): I should like to take this opportunity to offer the government a few suggestions which I consider necessary to remedy a practice most detrimental to our farmers and to agriculture in general and which is being kept up by the income tax division. If, because he is no longer able to cultivate his land, or because he wishes to increase production, an old farmer decides to give it to his son, when the value of his land exceeds $4,000, the farmer is assessed 10 per cent on the first thousand, and from 12 to 14 per cent thereafter up to about 25 per cent.

On the other hand if the farm is handed over as wages the son has to pay the same taxes as if he had received the full amount during that same year. That is what I am told in a letter which was written to me by an experienced agricultural engineer, Mr. Ludger Massé, of Charlesbourg, in my constituency. I quote:

> We in Quebec have, what unfortunately does not exist elsewhere, a family-type of agriculture in which the son and daughter from the age of ten on take an active part. On the farm there is work for the very young child as also for the old man who though he has retired, can still make himself very useful.

It is clear that when the son settles on a farm he does so in poor circumstances and has to get by on a small income during the first years of his married life. Later on when his children are old enough to help, he expands his activities, he raises more cows, hogs and chickens, and raises vegetables. In short he does farming on a larger scale. That is the time when he can manage to pay his debts and give his children some degree of education. Later when his children marry and leave the farm he will have to help them. If only one of the children wishes to settle on the farm, the father will have to mortgage his property to help him. And when he wishes to leave his farm to his youngest son, if he gives it to him, he will have to pay the income tax, otherwise the son's income will be taxable because of this bequest, not as a right to his father's estate but as salaries accrued for ten, fifteen or twenty years, all subject to taxation within that one year.

You know that a great many farms, though owned by the same family for generations, are still debt-ridden. It seems to me that a farm bequeathed by a father to his son should not be taxed, for it is not an income, but simply the continuation of ancestral ownership, and to my mind the annual income from the farm should merely be considered as applying to one man instead of another.

You know as well as I do that farming is not a commercial venture like others. It is not a get-rich-quick undertaking. It is rather a lifework which entails much labour, and self-denial, and deprives a man of much of the leisure which the humblest worker can enjoy without hindrance. Workers demand high salaries and a limited number of working hours; the farmer milks his cows every morning and evening, does his chores as he did years ago, and yet the capital invested in his farm is always subject to the vagaries of weather, disease and insects and therefore never free from risk.

A tax such as this, in the case of a farmer who, in the autumn of life, bequeaths a possession representing endless privations and small savings rather than real profits, has nothing in common with taxes on annual yearly incomes among other categories of citizens. For in the case of the farmer it represents a capital built up over the years, through hard work and the unpaid labour of family members. To my mind, that is utterly unfair.

As for wages allowed a farmer's children when they work free of charge on their father's land, the Quebec office allows a certain amount to be deducted from annual income. The calculation is easy when revenue is established according to "net assets", that is money received and money paid, but the income tax division does not readily accept that system and prefers by far the balance-sheet system, including inventories and assets accumulated during all the business years, plus an arbitrary charge for cost of living. It is on that basis that farmers' tax is computed. This balance-sheet system results in flagrant and inadmissible cases of injustice.

I could mention the case of a resident of St. Laurent d'Orléans, Mr. Odilon Gosselin, who, in his lifetime—more precisely during the 28 years he was the owner of a farm—was not able to do more than bring up his family of 5 children and put aside from $5,000 to $7,000. However, upon receipt of a notice of assessment, Mr. Gosselin went directly to the Quebec office and had his tax assessed by an assessor at the amount of $1,169 for the years 1940 to 1946. Mr. Gosselin thereupon came to see me. We managed to have the assessment changed so that the last statement received showed an amount of approximately $450. Nevertheless, in order to check the two methods, I used the very same figures as did the gentlemen from the taxation division. I based my computation on the net asset for each year, allowing Mr. Gosselin all deductions he was entitled to for each year and we reached the conclusion that he owed approximately $149. This shows that there are certain difficulties in the preparation of tax returns. Actually, in the case of Mr. Gosselin, they will not accept the returns on the net asset basis.

During the summer, I went over an income tax return compiled by a notary who showed that his client owed the treasury, as at December 23, 1948, a sum of $127.68, including interest and penalty. The return had been approved and the Ottawa office of the income tax division had long since sent out its receipt when the farmer concerned, acting on the recommendation of various people who had availed themselves of my services, submitted me copies of his return. After checking them, I noticed that he had not been allowed the statutory exemptions. I therefore filed an amended return and, as a result, towards the end of July, the treasury department refunded this gentleman the full amount he had paid in December 1948 towards his 1946 assessment. How many returns have not been reviewed? How many returns are not reviewed after having been compiled arbitrarily or without sufficient knowledge? People are thus paying income tax unfairly.

Finally, it is obvious that, in general, income tax assessors are really unaware of the farmers' situation, of agricultural bookkeeping and of various factors of rural life that must be taken into consideration. It should also be pointed out that many assessors do not do their work as thoroughly as they might; by that, I mean that they do not take the time required to compute the tax properly, from the point of view of the taxpayer rather than the tax collector. After all, the taxpayer is mainly concerned, since he must pay. The tax collector could not live without him. Therefore, if anyone is to benefit from something, it should be the taxpayer.

Great pains are being taken to organize a "basic herd" which will be used by only 3 per cent of our farmers, because most of our livestock is used for the production of either milk or beef.

Moreover some accountants are of the opinion that farmers are opposed to income tax and refuse to pay it. I can assure you that this impression is false and that the great majority of farmers are willing to pay whatever they owe. However, they never had and still do not have sufficient information and explanations to understand this complicated matter. In addition, several farmers have been rudely requested to file their returns. The forms used were rather curt; and a large number of people were vexed by them. I have some 300 files in my office. I could read certain letters which are sent out to taxpayers, letters which are nothing but scarecrows.

The farmers of this country did not receive the preliminary information that was required, with the result that most of them were caught offguard and declined to give any answers rather than give the wrong ones. Besides, I can state that in Quebec, the accountants will have nothing to do with farmers' returns. We are therefore justified in asking the income tax department to appoint qualified technicians in this particular field.

In addition, we might ask that these same employees be given full discretion to carry out their duties according to their judgment and their knowledge of the case. Their work should not be hampered by bureaucrats who know less than their subordinates.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, allow me to suggest to the government that the Income Tax Act be amended by,

(a) abolishing taxation when a farmer makes a donation of his land, or parts of his land, to a member of his family, with a view to intensifying farm production;

(b) allowing income tax deduction, for children of farmers working on their parents' land without remuneration, an amount corresponding to wages paid to farm labourers in western Canada;

(c) appointing agricultural scientists or other persons acquainted with farm problems as income tax assessors for farmers.

I emphasize this last point because everyone in the province of Quebec, especially among the farming community, knows that the assessors sent by the Department of National Revenue have absolutely no knowledge about or experience in agriculture.

In most cases those people, who are sincere —I do not question their personal merit— come to rural districts, call on farmers and make an assessment. If we insisted that assessors be people with at least some knowledge of the problems which the farmers have to face, I think the situation would certainly improve and we would do justice to our farming community.

Our farmers are not more reluctant than others to pay their income tax. However, they want to deal with men who, being acquainted with their needs and their situation, can draw up a statement based on the farmer's real profits, when, under certain circumstances, there are any profits.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I feel almost at a loss, Mr. Speaker, to find something to talk about this afternoon in view of the fact that so many subjects have been discussed up to the present time. Being one of the 262 members of the house, however, I feel that I must have my little say also.

Before going on to my main subject I should like to associate myself with the impassioned plea made some days ago by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) when he asked the government to fulfil their promises with regard to the building of a railroad line to fill the gap between Heinsburg and Frenchman's Butte, and also the Bonnyville line. While neither of those branches is in my constituency, Heinsburg is just across the north Saskatchewan river and many of the people in my constituency are obliged to go there in order to market their products. With the support of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore), the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison), and the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), I am sure that we should finally get some action in having those gaps completed. The government made promises years ago and many elections have gone by since that time; those promises have been reiterated time and again. Let us hope that they will soon be made good.

While speaking of railroad lines I should also like to mention, for the benefit of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), another railroad in the southern end of my constituency and in the northern part of the constituency of Acadia; that is the Bulwark northeasterly railroad. On many occasions the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and I have visited the minister in connection with this line and so far we have not found any rails laid. I may say that some years ago the grade of that particular branch was built, but so far no rails have been laid and no trains are running. I hope that in this case also some action will soon be taken.

Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) made a speech on a subject that I believe is of interest to everybody in Canada today; I refer to oil. Some people might say that I am actually soaked in oil, but that is not quite correct, although I have oil over practically all of my constituency. One of the places mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West yesterday, Lloydminster, is of particular interest to me because I landed there on January 10, 1914; and in getting out of town to go out on a farm I almost froze to death. Since that time we have developed quite a thriving oil industry there instead of being dependent on farming as the sole industry. We have several wells producing there, but I am sorry to say, because of conditions over which the companies operating there have no control, they are not able to take all of the available supply of oil out of those wells. Some relief was given to those companies recently by the removal of the eight per cent sales tax on oil for heating purposes. The Lloydminster people and I greatly appreciate the action of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the government in removing that eight per cent sales tax. But there is one other item that we should like to see removed also; that is the exorbitant freight rates that those people are obliged to pay on the output of those wells. If something is done to meet their requests—and I believe the government feels that it should be done and I hope in the near future it will be done—then the Lloydminster field will be in a much better position to contribute something really worth while to Canada. If this problem is taken care of—that is, if the discriminatory freight rates is removed—then in the Lloydminster district we shall be able to supply quite a good deal of the oil that is now being supplied by importations from the United States. I hope therefore that in the near future—perhaps in this budget or soon after it is adopted—something will be done.

Another item of interest in my part of the country is that rumour that the C.B.C. are going to have the receiving licence fees increased. I understand that they have made representations to have the fee doubled. Already I have received dozens of letters as well as resolutions from boards of trade all over my constituency vigorously protesting against any such increase. At the present time many people feel that they are not getting value for their money. In some cases the complaints are over programs presented and in others they are not getting good reception. Therefore, we feel that the licence fees are already too high and there is no need to have them increased any further. Not so long ago the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) suggested that the fees be cut out altogether and that money for Canadian Broadcasting Corporation purposes be taken out of the federal treasury. Perhaps that would be a much better way to finance the organization. Perhaps some paring down of expenses would also help out in that regard.

The question of aid to education has also been discussed. For many years on different occasions I have brought this matter to the attention of the house, but up to the present time little action has been taken along that line. I am quite satisfied that the people in general do not appreciate the importance of education and of the teaching profession in formulating constructive rather than destructive ideas in the human mind. I am quite satisfied that the schools of today could do much more to bring about peace in the world in the future than any of the big world-wide organizations that are operating at the present time. If we train our young people properly —when I say "properly" I mean teaching them to be true to their country, true to real Christian ideals and to many other ideals along that line—we shall not have the trouble in the future that we have had in the past of trying to avoid wars.

The destinies of the nations of the world are being determined in the classrooms of this and other countries to a far greater extent than they are being formulated in our parliaments or in other world organizations. It is our duty to see first of all that proper schools are provided and then proper equipment in the schools, and last of all that we have teachers who are a credit to our democratic system. In some of our schools and universities we find that the teaching given there is not all in the interest of our democratic way of life. Every care should be taken to see to it that the proper kind of teachers and professors are placed in charge of those schools. I am well aware that the supply of money has a lot to do with providing these things. I am also well aware that the present method of taxation is not sufficient to take care of all the needs of education. As I, and this group, have advocated on many occasions, federal aid should be forthcoming to the provinces for the purpose of education. By that I do not mean that the federal government should take over the control of the running of the schools or anything of that kind. That is a provincial responsibility. The grants provided to the provinces should be given without strings attached so that they can be administered in the best interest of education in the provinces.

Let me turn to the matter of old age pensions. I feel that we are not doing our job properly in this regard. The matter of old age pensions comes under the heading of welfare. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is not in his seat today. I understand he is looking after other duties. He seems to be proud of the system we have. In the Ottawa Citizen of October 26, 1949, there appears a Canadian Press dispatch from New York as follows:

> Canada's Health Minister, Paul Martin, said last night, healthy nations like Canada and the United States should give help and ideas to countries less advanced in their health plans.
> Canada, he said, in an address prepared for delivery to the American public health association, is determined not to permit "lack of money to lead to neglect of health."

I would call special attention to this lack of money.

I was very glad to read that statement of the minister because in the administration of the department we find that the lack of money has a lot to do with citizens being denied services to which they are properly entitled.

Further on he said:

> We are determined to keep abreast of the advances of medical science and to be impatient and intolerant of anything that debars our people from the best of health care.
> A federal survey near the end of the war showed that Canadians were "one of the healthiest peoples in the world . . . But we also found some health statistics that gave us little cause for pride."

I might call the minister's attention to figures that were presented to the house by the then minister of national war services, Mr. LaFleche, which showed that out of 93,000 men who were examined for service in the air force and air crew only 15,000 were able to qualify. In my opinion, that is not the kind of health standard that we should have in a country like Canada.

I am very sorry that up to the present time the government has not seen fit to increase the old age pension to at least $50 a month. That can be done. The old age pensioners of today are the senior citizens. They are the ones who have been most active in building up Canada. It is quite true that an amendment was passed last year which improved things a little; but because the government neglected, possibly deliberately, to increase the income ceiling many of the old age pensioners of today are unable to take advantage of that legislation. Many of them have been sadly disappointed when they found that the increase in the pension was absolutely of no use to them.

There is another matter to which attention should be given before this session closes. I refer to people who are unable to provide proof of age. Some other method, perhaps an examination by medical doctors or some other system, might be used so that these people are not denied their pension, as many of them are at the present time. During my years in the house I have found that several people, mainly European by birth or extraction, who came to Canada some years ago, were unable to find any record whatever of their age. Apparently births were not registered in those countries in those days. When we tried to search the records of the shipping companies or the bureau of statistics census records and so forth we were unable to find any trace of these people. Perhaps the spelling of those names, or something of that kind, may be responsible. There is no earthly reason why some method should not be devised so that these people can get the pension to which they are properly entitled. They are Canadians now. They came to Canada and did their share to build up this country, and something should be done before this session closes to see that a method is found to deal with them.

I now come to the recipients of war veterans' allowances. I think we should see to it that these men and their wives get the treatment that was recommended for them by the veterans committee and others last year. That is also denied to these people. As suggested in the case of the old age pensioners, the ceiling on income should also be increased. At the present time the amount is $1,100 a year. If any of us here were to place ourselves in the position of these burnt-out veterans we would very soon take the proper means to make available the full amount of the pension. In my opinion the amount provided is certainly not sufficient.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who is a great humanitarian and always trying to do his best—even though he sometimes supports a government program which is not in the best interests of the people of Canada—made a plea to have the sales tax removed from hearing aids, and other equipment of that type. I support the hon. member in his request. I feel, too, that every support should be given to the plea made today to break up all monopolies and cartels existing in this country—because many people are denied the right to purchase many of the dentures and optical goods and other things required by them, simply because prices are too high.

There is one other class of people I shall not forget, namely those who are crippled with arthritis, infantile paralysis or any of the other dreaded ailments. Many of us who have full use of our limbs and our faculties find it difficult, under conditions over which we have no control, to make a living. When we think of these other people who in many instances are crippled and unable to help themselves, we must realize it is the duty of all Canadians to be their brothers' keeper. Canada can provide that help, and before the session closes I trust that something along this line may be done.

I come now to the subject of agriculture, and do so because it is the subject about which most people seem to have forgotten. I do not believe the consumers in Canada appreciate the work done by our farmers in this and every other country. The work of a farmer is a seven-day job, and with long hours during certain seasons of the year. He works for poorer pay than those in any other occupational group in the country.

Many farmers have less accommodation, poorer homes, less bathtubs, less telephones and less of the many other comforts of life than many other people making a good living out of the products of the farmers' labour. During the election campaign we heard of the good things the government was doing for the farmers of Canada. Perhaps we should have been told of some of the things the government was not doing for the people, in which event a different view might have been taken with respect to the government's agricultural policy.

Agriculture has been discussed in the house on many occasions, and it is my intention today to continue that discussion, because I believe that until Canada has a healthy agricultural industry we shall not have the prosperity throughout the country to which we are entitled. Many observations might be made about agriculture, but before proceeding further may I state that the farmers have on their side the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

[Mr. Fair.]

In the Ottawa Journal of February 10 we find a report headed "War Sacrifices of Farmers Entitle them to Fair Prices", and stating—> Canadian farmers were "entitled now" to prices which would justify their wartime sacrifices, agricultural minister Gardiner said last night. He was speaking to the annual meeting of the Ontario concentrated milk producers association at the Chateau Laurier. More than one hundred and fifty delegates are attending the two-day session, the largest in several years.

> Because there have been declines in the United States, people here are suggesting that food prices should drop to that level, forgetting that prices there rose during the war to a peak never experienced here. The whole idea in preventing high food prices in Canada during wartime was to allow a "levelling out" afterwards, Mr. Gardiner remarked. He was "inclined to agree" with the popular statement that consumers did not appreciate what farmers did during the war in keeping the cost of food down.
> Mr. Gardiner said he was "surprised that farmers had not been able to sell that idea fully."

I would suggest to the many new members from both rural and urban constituencies that they do their best to bring about better conditions for agriculture in Canada in the future. Agriculture has never enjoyed that prosperity to which it is properly entitled. Let us get busy, even at this late date, to improve that situation. The article continues:

> People are inclined to forget that farmers, and dairy farmers in particular, were asked to hold their hand on prices during the war—at a time when they might have charged almost what they wanted.

That is the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture; and I am satisfied that if he did not have so many opponents around the cabinet council table we would have much better conditions for agriculture in Canada. Indirectly, we would have better conditions for Canadians as a whole.

The question of wheat has not been discussed in the house for some time. While some may get tired of listening to discussions concerning wheat, and the losses borne by farmers in this connection, I have not yet noticed any of those people refusing to eat either white or brown bread. It must be remembered that all of that comes from wheat, and that the farmers are required to grow that wheat.

In this connection I feel that the farmers in the prairie provinces—because they are the only ones affected—have taken a trimming which the people of Canada do not realize. For a few moments I shall deal with the British wheat agreement. I do not want anyone now or at any other time to suggest that Social Crediters are opposed to that agreement. We favoured it right from the start. It was our belief that we owed a moral obligation to Britain, and we were not slow in making our stand known. At the same time however we did make it clear that because this was a gift of the people of Canada to the people of Britain, through the government, then the people of Canada as a whole should stand any losses suffered by the farmers in delivering wheat under this contract.

Many people feel that farmers have received much more than that to which they are entitled. Both last session and this one I have made inquiries, and through the order paper of the House of Commons I have secured certain information which I shall now place on record, in order that there shall not be any attempt to contradict or misrepresent the figures I am giving. I am satisfied these figures are authentic, and anyone wishing to check them may do so by looking up the records of the house. That should be sufficient proof.

These figures deal with losses suffered by farmers under the British wheat agreement during the first three years of operation. During the year 1946-47 the Canadian wheat board on behalf of the government delivered to Britain 169 million bushels at a price of $1.55. At the same time the wheat board sold what is known as class II wheat at an average price during that year of $2.41 a bushel. This means that up to the present time the Canadian farmer has taken a loss of 86 cents a bushel on the wheat delivered to Britain in that crop year. Let me make it clear that the $2.41, and other prices which I shall quote on class II wheat, are average prices for the average grade, while the price I am quoting for Britain will be that of No. 1 northern. That should be understood because I am making a conservative estimate of the losses. The loss on wheat delivered to Great Britain that first year amounted to $145,340,000.

During the second year of 1947-48 a total of 170·6 million bushels were delivered at a price of $1.55. The price of class II wheat for that year was $2.77. Just figuring on the basis of the 170 million bushels and leaving off the 600 thousand, at $1.22 per bushel we find that the farmers took a trimming to the extent of $207,400,000. For the third year of 1948-49 we delivered 146,142,802 bushels at a price of $2. During that year class II wheat sold at $2.22, so we have another actual loss of 22 cents per bushel amounting to $32,195,416. During the first three years of the wheat agreement the total losses amounted to $384,935,460.

We are not complaining about that, but we shall complain plenty unless those losses are made up from the federal treasury. There was no other occupational group in Canada which had their production confiscated at a price set by the government. Other operations were paid for on the basis of cost-plus or something of that kind, and their production was sold in most cases at prices that were not set by the government.

I intend to discuss now the wheat delivered to Canadian millers for consumption within Canada, which went on for many years prior to the period I intend to deal with. During the crop year 1946-47, 29,041,927 bushels of wheat were delivered to millers in Canada at $1.25. The price of class II wheat at that time was $2.41 per bushel. Our farmers lost $1.16 per bushel on those deliveries or a total of $33,688,635. In the latter part of that year there was an increase in the initial payment to the farmers, and in that period there was delivered to the millers for consumption in Canada a total of 24,573,939 bushels at a price of $1.55. The price of class II wheat during that period was $2.41 so that we suffered a loss of 86 cents per bushel or a total of $21,133,587.

In the crop year 1947-48 we delivered to millers in Canada 49,342,532 bushels at a price of $1.55. Class II wheat was selling at $2.77 per bushel so we accepted a loss of $1.22 or a total of $60,197,889. In the 1948-49 crop year we delivered to millers for consumption in Canada 39,281,098 bushels at a price of $2. Class II price during that period was $2.22 so therefore we lost 22 cents per bushel or a total of $8,641,841.

The total losses on wheat delivered to Canadian millers for consumption within Canada amounted to $123,661,952. When this amount is added to the amount of losses suffered under the British wheat agreement we have a total loss of $508,597,368 up to the end of the 1948-49 crop year. If anyone wishes to check these figures he will find that they have been furnished in a return made in this house.

We have been told that the farmers suffered practically no losses, but I think half a billion dollars is quite an amount for the farmers of the prairie provinces to take as a loss. That is not a very happy story for the farmers of Canada and I am one of those who delivered several thousand bushels to the pool. I know my costs of production and I know of the losses that I suffered on those deliveries.

In addition to these losses it must be remembered that ceiling prices were placed on our coarse grains at a lower figure than could have been obtained outside the country. It must also be remembered that the hogs and cattle that were fed those coarse grains were delivered on the basis of the prices fixed for wheat under the British agreement. I shall not attempt to estimate the losses suffered by our farmers in that connection, because I do not know how they could be arrived at. But if we could make an estimate I am sure it would make the farmers still more unhappy.

On many occasions I have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—on the last day of last session I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—whether the government was going to make these losses good, but up to the present I have not received a reply. Before this session ends I hope we shall have some indication from the government as to what they intend to do about these direct losses suffered by the farmers.

Our farmers suffered further losses because they were not permitted to ship their cattle to the United States market until a few months ago. There again I am not going to try to estimate their losses because I do not know just how they could be arrived at. We have heard a lot about the loss of markets and many people deny that such a thing exists. The Minister of Agriculture was in London last December when he had quite a bit to say about the products that we could sell except for their inability to find the dollars with which to buy them. I have a rather long quotation here which I had intended to use but time will not permit. However, I think I should quote at least a portion of it. Canada's Weekly of December 24, 1948, reports a speech made to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in London by the Minister of Agriculture as follows:

> They are taking 140 million bushels of wheat and 50 million pounds of cheese from us because they must have them and we appear willing to provide them for fewer dollars than any other will supply them.
> All this is bringing me to wonder if an unknown economist, or was it an Abraham Lincoln or some such individual as Churchill, was not right when he said that he would rather have the money in his pocket tied to the unthinking inanimate substance called gold which cannot change its mind than to the manipulations of some small group of crackpots who fancy themselves as economists or statesmen.

I am glad to note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is in the house. I am quite sure that when the Minister of Agriculture was referring to crackpots he was referring to the experts and advisers in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. Those crackpots were advised away back in December, 1945, what the results of their iniquitous legislation would be, but that went through with the support of practically everybody in the house except Social Crediters. Today they are wallowing in the mire that they created themselves. Therefore it is no wonder that conditions are as they are when there is so much manipulation for the gain of those who control the monetary system of our country. A little further on the minister had this to say:

> I am not convinced that this latter statement is correct—

He is dealing with a statement made by one of the members of the British parliament in connection with the Marshall plan creating more communists in Europe.

> —but I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with the will of those who have empty stomachs when it is preventing surpluses of food to get to them. It might be a good thing for everybody if they would close down the United Nations meetings long enough to permit of the United Kingdom and United States experts getting together and settling some basis upon which dollars and sterling can be converted to allow nations like Canada to produce food to feed the starving millions and distribute it.

In that regard I would recommend to any who are interested in this subject the wonderful speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). There is more food for thought in it than all the great world conferences provide in a whole day's proceedings. I see that my time is passing by, and I shall not be able to say everything I wanted to say. Before going further I want to point out that Canada has been a rather faithful follower of the United States in many ways. In yesterday's Ottawa Citizen there is an Associated Press dispatch from Washington. The heading is:

> Truman Signs Long-Range Farm Measure

The article reads:

> President Truman yesterday signed long-range farm legislation which permits the United States government to support prices of most products at or near wartime levels. The measure, passed by the present democratic congress, replaces most major provisions of the so-called Aiken law enacted by the Republican 80th congress. The Aiken law permitted somewhat lower supports for major crops.
> The new law gives the secretary of agriculture authority to support virtually every farm product at 90 per cent of parity if he thinks that is advisable. Truman and agriculture secretary Brannan have indicated they favour 90 per cent supports, as a general rule, to keep agriculture prosperous.

That is what the United States intends to do for its farmers. Will Canada follow the lead taken by the United States? What are we doing here for the future? Even though the farmers of Canada have paid a very expensive premium for crop and price insurance in the future, what has the present government provided? I find that we have provided the Agricultural Prices Support Act, which will expire at the end of March, 1950, unless the legislation is renewed. There is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which does not operate yet to the satisfaction of many of our farmers. I do not think it even operates to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). There is also the international wheat agreement. In my opinion, the government will have to go much farther than any of those measures. During the past ten years, as I said before, we have been contributing to an insurance fund for the preservation of our industry. During the next ten years we should at least get the benefits we have paid for in full in the past, by way of assured markets and guaranteed prices.

If people are of the opinion that the farmers of Canada are more prosperous than they should be, I ask them to investigate present conditions on many of our farms. They will find that, while the farmers have paid off quite a percentage of their debt in the form of mortgages and so forth, the farms are in a run-down condition, and also in many cases the machinery and other equipment. You cannot tell exactly what a farmer's financial standing is by looking at his mortgage debt because there are many other factors that should be taken into consideration. I feel it is the duty of the government to keep our basic industry prosperous. They may say again that they cannot find the money, but if that difficulty should present itself then social credit will provide the answer. Social credit has provided a reply to any argument that has been put forward in the house by any of the former ministers of finance.

An hon. Member: And the present one, too.

Mr. Fair: If they want a solution I am sure there are men in the Social Credit group who are familiar with the money question, and who can give them an answer, thereby contributing to the creation of a more prosperous Canada.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take the same privilege as most other hon. members have taken, under the latitude allowed members speaking on the budget, of bringing conditions in my own constituency to the attention of the house, hoping thereby that remedies will be provided in the near future. First of all I should like to register my approval and support of the amendment to the amendment which is to the effect that immediate consideration should be given to a reduction of tariffs sufficient to encourage an increase in imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries.

You will notice that the amendment to the amendment does not mention any given commodity, and I am glad of that for reasons that I shall explain later. It is quite possible that a wholesale indiscriminate reduction of tariffs would upset our economy. I understand that the trade unions have already brought to the attention of the government the dangers involved in an indiscriminate removal of tariffs in that it could quite well upset our domestic economy with the result that there would be unemployment and chaos, and it might be followed by bankrupt factories. That is why we emphasize in our approach to tariffs and controls the need for the government to establish an import and export board whose purpose would be to encourage imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries, and at the same time keep a protective eye on our own domestic production so that the chaos anticipated by some of the trade unions would not take place.

Among other duties, the board would advise the government which goods could be imported, and naturally which could not be imported. They would advise as to the amount of tariff necessary to maintain the rigid control that would protect our own industries. They would advise as to the amount of the tariff, and also on what commodity it should be levied. At the same time they would keep a careful check to see that no hardship would be suffered by workers or industries in Canada. In other words, their duty would be to maintain a balance between imports and exports, plus a balance between the countries that benefit by our import and export trade. For instance, unfortunately as far as England is concerned, there is a variation between ourselves and the United States. We are taking far more from the United States than they are taking from us, and we have the reverse position in our trade with Great Britain.

It will be the duty of the board to try to balance that situation, and in that balancing to try to bring about better relations between Canada and the countries in the sterling area. It would also call for a great deal of switching of trade relations that have been carried on for many centuries. Some people will object to that, but in the last two or three years we have broken such relations with some of the English firms that have been dealing with Canada for a long time. I particularly mention those firms in Lancashire making shirtings, who shipped for many years to the shirt factories of Ontario. Last year I was talking to one manufacturer in Manchester who informed me they had not shipped a single yard of shirting to Canada—not, as one hon. member said yesterday, because the shirting trade in Canada is having its own difficulties, but because of the unfair competition of shirtings imported from the United States at prices lower than either Canada or the United Kingdom can produce this material.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Now that the pound has been devalued has not that condition corrected itself?

Mr. Jones: Unfortunately not; we still have not re-established that trade. Devaluation should make it easier, but so far Canadian importers have not taken advantage of that situation, according to a recent letter I had from that firm.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): But it is on its way.

Mr. Jones: It may come; but I am satisfied that the setting up of an import-export board would prevent that situation from again becoming top-heavy. Now with devaluation of the pound we may go to the other extreme and upset the balance of trade which would control the situation. From my personal knowledge the United Kingdom needs our exports. They need our wheat, just as they need almost everything we can produce. Contrary to the opinion held by many people, the plight in which Great Britain finds herself today is not due to the Labour government but entirely to conditions following the war. I tried to discover any way in which any other government could have improved the present position in England, and from all sides I was given the same answer, that this could not be helped, that it was inevitable and they had to suffer as a result.

Mr. Fraser: You must have been speaking to your socialist friends.

Mr. Jones: No, I did not stay with the socialists all the time I was there. Looking at it from that point of view, we must realize that the war was not Britain's war. She was truly in the centre of it, but it was a war for civilization, and a war with a tremendous price. I sometimes wonder if payment of that price has been fairly divided among the nations who took part in the war. In other words, I believe we all have a moral responsibility, for the collapse of Britain would not only bring about the collapse of the main part of Europe but seriously upset the United States and particularly Canada.

It was stated in this house recently that someone in the United Kingdom had said she was looking to other sources to purchase wheat, particularly in the sterling areas. In the Ottawa Citizen of November 2, which is today, I read this dispatch:

> The Daily Telegraph says today that Britain will discontinue purchases of Canadian newsprint next year and may cut imports of Canadian bacon and eggs by 25 per cent.
> The newspaper reports that two Canadian representatives were "shocked at the severity of the cuts proposed" when they conferred with British officials last week. The Canadians were J. G. Taggart, deputy agriculture minister, and Max Mackenzie deputy trade and commerce minister.
> The Telegraph says that timber imports from Canada also may be pruned.
> "The decision to allocate no money for newsprint was influenced by the fact that alternative supplies are available within the sterling area," the Telegraph says. The chief alternative source is Scandinavia.

I mention that not as a warning but to show the need for immediate improvement in our trade relations with the United Kingdom before they establish themselves in other world markets and we lose that trade for good.

On motion of Mr. Jones the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 UNTIL CONCLUSION OF BUDGET DEBATE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): By leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That the provisions of standing order 28, respecting the committee of ways and means, be suspended until the debate on the motion made by Mr. Abbott on Thursday, October 20, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and any amendments thereto, be disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall continue with the debate on the budget.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 3, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BRITISH COLUMBIA APPLES

DISTRIBUTION TO MEMBERS—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in this morning's Citizen certain derogatory remarks are made about me which I think are unfair, and I shall quote them. They are as follows:

. . . and, for the first time some members of parliament could recall, George Cruickshank (Lib.—Fraser Valley) didn't jump up to say that British Columbia could have produced something better.

The reference is to apples. I did not see this report. One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) saw it. We do not boast, and we have never boasted, particularly the member for Fraser Valley, about anything from British Columbia, but my hon. friend arranged to have flown from British Columbia these typical examples of what we produce and they are now on the members' desks. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have it recorded that they are but a small example of what we can produce.

Mr. Fulford: Too bad they are not like Ontario apples, and do not taste as good as they look.

Mr. McIvor: We are learning, Mr. Speaker, that there is something quite red which comes from British Columbia, and it is very good, and we say thanks.

Mr. McCusker: I wish to thank the hon. member for telling us what these are. Many hon. members were under the impression that they were Newfoundland cranberries.

Mr. Jones: In order to correct the record, may I say that these apples were not grown in the Fraser valley; they were grown in the Okanagan valley.

Mr. Cavers: Coming from a fruit-growing area in the county of Lincoln, I should like to express my thanks, and the thanks of other hon. members, to the hon. members from the province of British Columbia, and also to the fruit growers of that province, for the fine specimens of apples we have received today. I certainly intend to sample them and compare their taste with that of the fine taste of the apples grown in Ontario.

MARITIME PROVINCES

DINNER TO MEMBERS FROM PROVINCES BY THE SEA—MANITOBA SEAFOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege may I say that in today's Ottawa Citizen it is reported that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) tendered a dinner, and I quote:

. . . given for the express purpose of getting members from Canada's "seagoing" provinces better acquainted.

There were Liberals from British Columbia, the Yukon, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

My point of privilege, sir, is that Manitoba should have been included as a "seagoing" province. Since she has a coastline almost equal to that of the province of British Columbia, she should have been included as a Canadian maritime province. I have visited many of the world's seagoing ports, as far as the east coast of Africa, and I assure hon. members that the facilities of the port of Churchill, and the port of Churchill itself, compare favourably with anything else I have seen. The disadvantages have been well advertised, but not the advantages. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the Minister of Fisheries, and to hon. members from the maritime provinces of Canada, that before this parliament terminates the members of the maritime province of Manitoba, including my good friend the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward), will tender to them an invitation to a seafood dinner, of which the pièce de résistance will be white whale steak, caught in Hudson bay and processed in the great salt-water port of Churchill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed considerable latitude today in connection with questions of privilege, but I hope hon. members will not expect me to continue to do so.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer a certificate of the election and return of the following member, viz:

Of J. Eugène Lefrançois, Esquire, for the electoral district of Laurier.

Questions

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many old age pensioners, by provinces, are now in receipt of the maximum old age pension?

Mr. Martin:

Province	Old Age	Blind	Total
Alberta	12,189	378	12,567
British Columbia.	20,458	506	20,964
Manitoba	12,918	473	13,391
New Brunswick..	7,438	925	8,363
Newfoundland (maximum $30)	4,215	23	4,238
Nova Scotia	6,590	785	7,375
Ontario	65,304	1,832	67,136
Prince Edward Island	1,085	75	1,160
Quebec	52,876	3,361	56,237
Saskatchewan ...	11,384	410	11,794
Northwest Territories	19	1	20
Yukon Territory.	75	—	75
	194,551	8,769	203,320

The above information, except that relating to the Northwest Territories, was furnished by the provincial old age pensions authorities.

Note: Figures for all provinces, except Quebec, are as of September 30, 1949. Figures for Quebec are as of October 31, 1949. As of dates shown, all cases had not been reviewed by provincial old age pensions administrations in the light of the 1949 amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act.

MINES AND RESOURCES—IMMIGRATION SETTLEMENT OFFICERS—LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION

Mr. Viau:

1. Did the Department of Mines and Resources, during the years 1948 and 1949, request through the civil service commission applications for immigration settlement officers?
2. If so, on what dates and when were applications filed?
3. How many are being employed in various centres throughout Canada (a) temporary; (b) permanent?
4. How many for each province?
5. What are their duties?
6. How many in each province are required to have a knowledge of both the English and the French language?
7. Were applicants for Manitoba and Saskatchewan required to have a knowledge of both the English and the French language? If not, why not?
8. What are the names of the immigration settlement officers selected for the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan?
9. What are their qualifications and ages?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.
2. (a) May 21, 1948; (b) October 30, 1948.
3. (a) 4; (b) 4.
4. Quebec, 2; Ontario, 2; Manitoba, 1; Saskatchewan, 1; Alberta, 1; British Columbia, 1.
5. Under direction, to report upon opportunities for the establishment of immigrants in farming or small business enterprises; to advise and, if required, to assist immigrants in becoming suitably established; to prepare reports on specified areas; to conduct correspondence and perform other related duties as directed.
6. Quebec, 2; Ontario, nil; Manitoba, nil; Saskatchewan, nil; Alberta, nil; British Columbia, nil.
7. No. It was not deemed necessary in order to give satisfactory service to require applicants to possess a knowledge of both English and French languages.
8. The following persons were appointed by the civil service commission: Manitoba: William Cox McCullouch; Saskatchewan: William Robert Sinton. Both these men are veterans of the first great war.
9. W. C. McCullouch: Immediately prior to his appointment to the Department of Mines and Resources, Mr. McCullouch was settlement supervisor at Winnipeg under the Veterans Land Act. He is fifty-one.

W. R. Sinton: Prior to his appointment in the Department of Mines and Resources, Mr. Sinton had extensive experience in agriculture, and from 1946 until 1949 was employer representative on the court of referees, unemployment insurance commission. He is fifty-one.

NEWFOUNDLAND—PUBLIC WORKS—ENGINEERING BRANCH STAFF

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1 What staff is now employed by the engineering branch of the Department of Public Works in Newfoundland?
2. What are the names of those employed?
3. What salary is paid to each?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1, 2 and 3.

Name—Position—Salary per annum

Gerald Millar, engineer, grade 6, acting as district engineer, $5,040.

A. E. Cameron, grade 1, $2,880.

G. Bannister, maintenance supervisor, grade 2, $2,340.

J. Dicks, maintenance supervisor, grade 2, $2,340.

Miss M. M. Downey, stenographer, grade 2A, $1,500.

Note: G. Millar on loan from Ottawa headquarters. A. E. Cameron on loan from Ottawa headquarters, but he will shortly be transferred to Newfoundland staff as an engineer, grade 2.

NEWFOUNDLAND—BRIDGE OVER PLACENTIA GUT

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Has there been an examination or investigation with a view to the construction of a bridge over Placentia gut at Placentia, Newfoundland?

2. If so, what report has been made on this matter?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. Survey of the site and preliminary report only have been made.

CENSORSHIP OF BOOKS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Who is the examiner of publications or censor in the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise section?

2. How many (a) books; (b) journals; (c) comics, have been denied or refused admission by the said examiner or censor during each of the years 1948 and 1949 to date?

Mr. McCann:

1. There has been no position of examiner of publications since the retirement of the previous incumbent on July 17, 1942. Censorship in the broadest sense is not exercised by the customs division, but the department is responsible for the administration of item 1201 of the Customs Tariff, which prohibits the entry of publications of a treasonable, seditious, immoral or indecent character.

2. The following publications have been classified under tariff item 1201 during the years 1948 and 1949:

	1948	1949
(a) Books	45	81
(b) Magazines and newspapers	23	22

(c) Under the provisions of the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, periodical publications unbound or paper bound, commonly known as comics, but not including bona fide supplements used with newspapers, are prohibited entry.

TRADE AGREEMENTS—CANADA-SPAIN

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have any trade agreements been negotiated or completed within the last year between the republic of Spain and Canada?

2. If so, what are the particulars thereof?

Mr. Claxton:

1. No.

2. No. Answered by No. 1.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—RETENTION OF INSURABILITY DURING ILLNESS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the unemployment insurance advisory committee or the unemployment insurance commission received from an actuarial expert, at any time since January 1, 1948, any recommendation with respect to the request that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended so as to make it possible for a recipient of unemployment insurance benefits to continue to receive such benefits even though he becomes ill after being awarded the same?

2. If so, what are the terms of such recommendations?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. No. The unemployment insurance commission has received a preliminary report in regard to sickness insurance from Mr. A. D. Watson, actuarial adviser, Department of Insurance, but this report contains no recommendations.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL HARBOURS—OPERATING EXPENSES AND REVENUES

Mr. Isnor:

1. What was the ratio of operating expenses to operating revenues for all harbours under control of the national harbours board, for each of the years from 1936 to 1948?

2. What was the ratio of operating expenses to operating revenues for each of the harbours under control of the national harbours board, for each of the years from 1936 to 1948?

3. Have tariff schedules been increased at any of the harbours since 1938?

4. If so, what was (a) the year or years increases were made; (b) the amount of increases; (c) the name or names of ports affected?

Mr. Chevrier: Return tabled.

SPONGES—PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Since April 1, 1948, how many contracts have been made by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, or any other government agency, to cover procurement for the armed forces, or any other government requirements, of (a) sea sponges; (b) synthetic cellulose sponges?

2. With reference to each such contract, what is the name of the supplier, what are the types, sizes and quantities of sponges supplied, and what is the contract price for each such type, size and quantity?

TRADE

PRESS REPORTS OF REMARKS OF MR. DONALD GORDON IN NEW YORK ON NOVEMBER 1

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has sent me a note asking if I would make a statement in answer to a question he asked yesterday on the orders of the day, and which unfortunately I was not able to hear.

The question has to do with a report of a speech attributed to Mr. Donald Gordon in New York. As it appears at page 1,370 of Hansard, the question is as follows:

Is this government policy, or is it not? As head of the national railways was Mr. Gordon authorized to make this statement?

The report, as I read it, is a statement which Mr. Gordon is supposed to have made before the convention of the national foreign trade council in New York. The first part of the question is: Did he go over there for the government? He did not go there for the government. I assume he went there on invitation as deputy governor of the Bank of Canada.

The other part of the question is: Is this government policy, or is it not? It does not purport to be a statement of policy, as I read it. I suppose it is the fruits of Mr. Donald Gordon's experience as deputy governor of the Bank of Canada. However I think it is a statement with which many of those who believe in the value of world trade would be inclined to agree. It seems to me it does not differ very much from the statement attributed to Mr. Acheson, secretary of state for the United States, along the same lines, the report of which many of us welcomed this morning.

Mr. Church: I thank the Prime Minister for his courteous reply.

CONSULTATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture. The United Kingdom press and the Canadian press state that United Kingdom buying in Canada is to be cut. Will the minister make a statement to clarify this situation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to this same question a few days ago. Representations have been made through officials of our government to officials of the government of the United Kingdom, and ministerial decision is expected in due course. After a decision is made it will be communicated to the house.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY—RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER AND DEPUTY COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) the following question:

Has a report been made by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on alleged violations of the act in the flour milling industry?

The answer is yes. Then the question continued: "If so, will the minister table it?" The answer is yes.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked this question:

Will the minister tell the house whether Mr. F. A. McGregor, commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, has resigned?

The answer is yes. The question continued: "and if so, whether his resignation has been accepted." The answer as of today is yes.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the minister answer a supplementary question? Has one of the deputy commissioners under the Combines Investigation Act also resigned?

Mr. Garson: The answer is yes.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Further to the answer given by the Minister of Justice, will he table the correspondence between Mr. McGregor, the deputy commissioner, and himself, and the replies, if any, before tomorrow afternoon, when apparently the proposed amendment to the Combines Investigation Act will be discussed?

Mr. Garson: The council meeting at which the resignation was considered was concluded at two o'clock this afternoon, and my letter has not yet been written to the commissioner. I shall be able to table his letter and my reply tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: Will the report to which the minister referred be published within fifteen days of its receipt by the minister, as required by the act?

Mr. Garson: The report in question will be tabled on Monday next.

Mr. Knowles: When did the minister receive it?

Mr. Garson: Some time ago.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the minister does not keep the law.

(Translation):

FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

REMOVAL OF IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leopold Demers (Laval): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question which I consider urgent and highly important.

Since the removal of import restrictions on certain foods, particularly on vegetables, the Canadian market, especially in Montreal, has been flooded with American products selling at less than production cost in Canada. Here is my question.

Is the government considering steps to protect gardeners in the Montreal district from this ruinous state of affairs?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member from Laval, I must say that the government does not contemplate any special steps in this regard. I would call the hon. member's attention to the seasonal tariff protecting this category of food products.

(Text):

ARMISTICE DAY

QUESTION AS TO SITTING OF HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Will the Prime Minister indicate whether the house will be sitting on Armistice day, and whether Armistice day is a legal holiday?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will answer the second part of the question first. Armistice day is a legal holiday. To answer the first part of the question, may I say that, in conformity with the practice which has prevailed for several years when parliament is in session at this time, the house will sit on November 11.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "THE ENSIGN" OF NOVEMBER 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): On a question of privilege, I should like to refer to an article which appeared in The Ensign of November 1. This article which appears on the first page is headed: "So far, so good". It refers to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), and it congratulates both the government and the hon. member upon this legislation. It goes on to say:

> Congratulations are in order in connection with the proposed changes in the criminal code to ban crime comics and to tighten the prohibition of obscene publications.

I should like to send to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) a couple of books that have been sent to me by some of my constituents—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I stated earlier that I had been allowing considerable latitude when questions of privilege were raised, but I asked that I should not be requested to do so in the future. I do not think this is a question of privilege that should be raised at the present time.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday I had quoted a Canadian Press dispatch which had appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. I was drawing attention to the trend in Great Britain and other countries in the sterling bloc to seek commodities from other than dollar countries—in other words, to seek them in the areas where supplies were available. I mentioned such things as newsprint, bacon, eggs, timber, and so on. In the same edition of the Citizen was an editorial which I should like to place on Hansard. It reads:

> A forward step in British colonial administration is the establishment of university colleges in the West Indies, Nigeria, and the Gold Coast. These have completed their first teaching sessions. Emphasis is on practical studies like rural science, so that graduates may accelerate the economic development of the colonies.

Those two articles show quite clearly the desire of Great Britain to break away from the dollar areas in purchasing her requirements, and to find these elsewhere. This curtailment may affect us considerably in the near future. In pursuance of this policy, Great Britain has developed large areas in Africa for the growing of groundnuts, which play a great part in the economy of the country. By developing these lands and seeking new markets in sterling areas, the British are following a logical course from their point of view. These facts are too self-evident to need further emphasis.

Our position is just as clear and simple. We must put up a fight to retain the British market, and we must do so before it is too late. I was pleased to see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is taking a progressive step to retain the last segment of this market by arranging a contract for $3 million worth of apples. While this is going to cost the Canadian people some money in the current year, I think in the long run we shall gain through retaining a market that is one of the best markets British Columbia ever had. The fruit growers in my district are pleased with the action taken by the government, and would welcome any further action that would make this market a permanent one. I believe the amendment to the amendment would have that effect and I appeal to hon. members on both sides of the house to support it. As I see it, the situation calls for urgent action.

Another subject I should like to deal with is one that was raised a short while ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who referred to the tremendous growth in population in British Columbia during the past few years. This has brought a considerable problem in its wake, one being the increased cost of education to the municipalities. Many of the British Columbia municipalities find themselves unable to keep a reasonable balance between the cost of education and other services needed in a community, such as roads, sidewalks, light, power, sewers, and so on.

The first charge on a municipality is that of providing educational facilities; then if there is anything left it is used to provide the other services. As I say, this unusual growth of population in British Columbia has placed an unfair burden on some of the municipalities. In some cases the municipalities are left with insufficient funds to carry out immediately necessary projects such as waterworks. Many of them have borrowed to the legal limit of around twenty per cent, and of necessity have had to leave undone many essential works that may be needed, such as sewers, waterworks, roads and so on.

I have in mind one very progressive municipality in my riding, the town of Enderby. The officials wrote to me a short time ago and pointed out that that municipality had been faced with the usual growth of population throughout the province. They stated that their education costs were worrying them, because they had had to increase their school accommodation, as well as the teachers' salaries. The general cost of education has gone up in the district. On top of all this they have to build a new hospital. This could not be avoided, because the old one was simply a firetrap and completely obsolete. They are now compelled to renew their waterworks. Enderby is not a very large town, and during the war, or even before the war, they were in difficulties. They were in difficulties in the thirties, and the government helped them out. Therefore their credit would not be considered the best. Today they must have a new waterworks plant which will cost $178,000. It is a must. They have written me asking whether I know of any means by which they can get money from the dominion government. I made inquiries, and found that no such funds are available. I also discovered that there is an act under which something might be done to assist them. It is the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, under which municipalities were allowed to borrow money at two per cent for self-liquidating projects. Under it $30 million were made available for municipalities. Up to date $7 million have been used; the remaining $23 million were frozen by action of the government in 1940, when further access to the fund was denied. In the first place I believe it was a mistake to deny access to it. I understand that the fund was reopened for the benefit of the province of Quebec, which borrowed money for three or four years afterwards. It was a good act. I am going to ask the government to reconsider making it operative again, and thus give a break to the municipalities.

The position of the municipalities today in a province such as British Columbia is almost as serious as it was during the depression. They must grow, and they must have the facilities to take care of that growth. They must look after the health of their people, and they must have access to money bearing reasonable interest. Self-liquidating loans of this type are a sound financial investment; but more than that, they would bring untold returns by way of improvement in the health and general economy of the community. This is particularly so in the case of towns such as Enderby, which need more than the legal amount they are allowed under the municipal act, or possibly more than they could get on the open market.

I would not advocate the making of loans to the same extent as was done twenty or thirty years ago. I have in mind one town in the province of British Columbia which was compelled to borrow money over a fifty year period. After eighteen years the project for which the money was borrowed had no asset value whatsoever. It happened to be wood stave pipe. For thirty years following the loss of use of the project they had to continue to pay interest at the rate of six per cent. I am not referring to projects of that kind; I have in mind self-liquidating projects which will return the money to the government within a reasonable number of years.

These municipalities do not expect charity. They are not willing to accept assistance of that kind, but they do seek a fair break in getting access to this money. I would go further and suggest that sound self-liquidating projects of this nature should be able to borrow money anywhere at two per cent, directly from the Bank of Canada, if you wish. After all, the wealth of Canada is not in bank credits but in the numerous progressive communities of our land. It is in our wheat fields, our mines and our timber. To my mind, the function of the Bank of Canada is to make funds available at a low interest rate in order to promote the development of these areas, thereby adding more tangible wealth to our economy. I think that the rules governing the operation of the Bank of Canada should be altered if there is to be substantial immigration to Canada in the near future. With access to that money we could have the 500,000 houses we need, and also the municipal improvements that we seek.

During the last war, British Columbia municipalities prepared plans for rehabilitation and reconstruction of their communities. The plans called for the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars, and the assumption was that the government would make funds available at a low rate of interest. So far as I know, most of them are still in abeyance. To my knowledge the bulk of the plans were sound; they were prepared by qualified engineers, right down to the blueprint stage so that they were ready to proceed. I am satisfied that unless the government change their present policy and make this money available, these plans will remain in abeyance for all time to come, because they call for a greater expenditure than any participating municipality could borrow legally on the open market.

I should like to point out that the government is doing its utmost to speed up the housing plans of the dominion. Criticism has been levelled against the government for not acting rapidly enough. I believe it is folly for the government to accelerate the construction of houses unless the municipalities in which the houses are to be built are assisted in securing the facilities necessary to service them. That is why places such as Enderby must have access to funds to which I have referred.

In Hansard of June 11, 1947, both the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) made valuable contributions in discussing the merits of the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. I do not intend to quote from their speeches, but anyone who has any doubt about the merits of the legislation, and the benefits to be derived therefrom, can read the record. It is true that the act was designed to meet emergent conditions created by the depression, and that the conditions today are somewhat different. Speaking generally, this may be true, but fast growing municipalities are faced with the same problems of finance now as those which confronted them during the depression. The municipalities to which I refer are those which were incorporated and laid out for a population of from three to four thousand, and which now suddenly find themselves compelled to take care of a population of eight to ten thousand people without a single acre of new land being added to their taxable areas. One drawback is that the area of land within the municipality does not grow according to the increase in population. Assessment values, therefore, do not increase sufficiently to compensate for the population increase.

Having regard to the limited area incorporated, the argument may be advanced that the dominion government has no direct responsibility to assist these municipalities. May I point out that the average municipality carries between twenty and twenty-five per cent of its property tax free. Of course that includes churches and dominion and provincial public buildings. The cost of providing services to these tax-free assessible properties is carried by the other seventy-five or eighty per cent of the population who pay taxes. Many of these buildings are the property of the dominion government. I was pleased to hear the suggestion made—although not a promise—that money may be available to compensate municipalities for the services they provide to public buildings. These buildings receive, and expect to receive, police protection, road protection, fire protection, sewer and water services, and they would be the first to kick if they did not get them.

The other reason why the dominion government should assist municipalities is a simple one. In my riding we have a dominion experimental farm. Naturally there are children living there, and there is no dominion government school for them to attend. They attend the school at Summerland. The school board quite rightly feel that the dominion government should assist by taking care of some of the cost of educating children whose parents do not pay taxes because they live on dominion government experimental farm land. The same could be said of caretakers and others living on dominion government premises whose children attend school. The principle is not new, because already this government takes care of the cost of educating the Indian children who attend the very same schools.

When all these things are considered, it will be seen that the dominion has a direct interest in the welfare of the municipalities; therefore I feel justified in asking the government to bring into operation the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Under this legislation a municipality could borrow a portion of the $30 million on a pro rata basis, in relation to the population of the dominion. In other words a town of 3,000 could borrow approximately $9,000, and so on. But the legislation also contained a clause under which a municipality which might not qualify otherwise could borrow up to $200,000, an amount far greater than would be available on a per capita basis. It may be necessary to broaden the act to provide a far larger amount for distribution than $30 million, but I do feel that in this act the government have an instrument that should not be withheld at the present time. Either make use of it and distribute the remaining $23 million, or broaden the act and carry it even further. I understand that one province would not take advantage of this legislation when it was available; but if no other province wants it, I think I can say on behalf of the British Columbia members that we should be glad to take the whole $23 million for municipal improvements in our province, though I understand the maritimes would like some of the money also.

Before concluding my remarks on this subject I would point out that no municipality which borrowed money under that act is in default with respect to either principal or interest, though most of the municipalities which took advantage of it were regarded by the orthodox finance houses as being on the borderline of sound finance.

I want to deal with one other subject, and in doing so to make a suggestion to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I have been receiving quite a number of letters from people in my riding who have a member of the family taking medicinal drugs, originally under the supervision of a doctor but later, presumably after a period of training, being permitted to take them without going either to the doctor or to the hospital. Sometimes the cost of these drugs is very heavy. In one instance I had brought to my attention it costs $60 a month, or $700 a year, for the drug in question; but when they claim exemption in respect of income tax they are refused. On the other hand if the person concerned had the same amount added to his doctor's or hospital bill, it would be allowed as an exemption. I merely ask the minister to consider changing the act so that anyone who is so unfortunate as to be obliged to take these drugs and to meet these heavy expenditures, while not directly under the supervision of a doctor or hospital, may claim the same exemption that would be granted if these amounts were added to the bill of the doctor or the hospital.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the budget I wish to deal with only a limited number of points that arise in this connection, since in fact this budget was under discussion earlier this year as well as during the present session. The figures before us are virtually the same as those which were under consideration earlier in the year. We must recognize that in most cases a large part of the expenditure already has been made and that the government is committed to those expenditures; no practical result, therefore, can follow from suggesting substantial changes in any of these items.

There are, however, certain aspects of this budget which should be of particular concern to members of this house at this time. As we look through the estimates which give the detailed amounts covered by the budget as a whole we find that the Department of National Defence spends more than any other single operating department of government. For that reason alone, if there were no other, it would be the duty of every hon. member, before passing upon the budget as a whole, to examine carefully how that very large amount is being spent.

Expenditures for national defence take on a new importance in view of the fact that Canada has assumed responsibilities in connection with the preservation of peace. It has been said in this house on a number of occasions that the hope for peace depends upon the combined strength of the free nations joined in the Atlantic security pact, and therefore the estimates before us have a special meaning at this time. But apart from the importance which may be attached to these estimates for that reason, there is the fact that the taxpayers of Canada are being called upon to spend nearly $400 million on national defence during the current financial year. It is the duty of hon. members of this house to take whatever steps may be regarded as necessary to ensure that this enormous sum will be properly expended and put to the best possible use for the purposes for which it is asked.

The actual estimates for the Department of National Defence amount to $375 million, but with the supplementary estimates and civilian expenditures associated with national defence activities we can take the round figure of $400 million as the amount to be expended this year by the taxpayers of Canada on the defence of their country and as one of the member nations of the North Atlantic security pact. For this reason the members of this house who are considering the expenditure of these large sums should at the earliest moment give full consideration to the meaning of the Mainguy report—especially when one examines the purpose of these expenditures and the effectiveness of them. Requests have been made on a number of occasions for a standing committee on national defence. Such a committee has not yet been set up, and on different occasions the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has indicated an unwillingness to set it up. If there ever was a doubt in the minds of the members of this house that there should be a committee of this house on national defence, it would be removed by a careful reading of the Mainguy report.

It is necessary to remember that this report does not cover the function of the navy as part of our national defence organization. It deals with a limited part of the activities of the navy, as is indicated in the opening part of the report. On the first page, in their submission to the Minister of National Defence, the commissioners state that their conclusions are unanimous. Then they go on to say:

> In an attempt to assist you, the government of Canada and the officers administering the Royal Canadian Navy, we were requested to find out and record what happened on the occasion of each of the incidents of alleged mass insubordination which occurred in the three ships concerned. We were further instructed to make appropriate recommendations, if we reached the conclusion that there were things which could and should be done to improve conditions of service, the relations between officers and men, the machinery for the ventilation of grievances and other collateral matters. We were also asked to consider whether there should be changes in regulations, conditions of service, and the training of naval personnel.

That indicates the positive limitations of this inquiry. The Mainguy report is so far-reaching, and so important in what it presents to the members of this house, as well as to the people of Canada, that we could well bear in mind that as to the organization of the navy for the particular duties assigned to it, the suitability of the ships, and the general composition of our naval forces, we receive no information. The report deals with the limited problem that was placed before the commission. I think it is proper to say that the commissioners have, by their report, demonstrated the value of inquiries of this kind. It shows what can be done in a constructive way to advance the defence services of this country by exposing to public examination those things which the people of Canada should know, and particularly, and above all, which the members of this parliament, the supreme authority for expenditures of this type and for the organization of our defence forces, should know.

The report deals with a number of subjects. I should like to refer to some of the findings, because they have a direct bearing on the discussions that have taken place from time to time on the general problem of national defence.

On page 10 referring to consideration of the situation on board H.M.C.S. Magnificent, the report has this to say:

> The complaints concerned unsanitary conditions and the presence of bedbugs, defective showers, overcrowding and inadequate arrangements for late-comers at meals. There was some ground for all these complaints. It was apparent that some of the matters complained of were adjusted. Overcrowding could not be dealt with at all during the cruise. Some fumigating was done to make the living quarters more sanitary. We are of the opinion that a good deal more of explanation could have been given of the reasons why some things could not be done. Reference has been made to the alleged lack of the proper planning of aircraft operations. It is true that a number of flights were cancelled for reasons which were not apparent to the men concerned. Apparently the aircraft handlers took some pride in their work and were quite willing to do extra tasks if they knew they contributed to the objects of the cruise. They felt that some of the changes were capricious, whereas many of them could have been easily explained but were not. The medical evidence suggested that some of the unhappiness and restlessness on board a ship which everyone called "unhappy" could be attributable to the tropical heat to which many of the men were not accustomed. This appears reasonable.

I should like to point out, in regard to this particular quotation, that all the matters to which reference is made are matters of administration, which means that, if the organization of our navy is in any way effective, they must have been brought before the Department of National Defence over and over again. If they were not, then there was a complete breakdown in the administrative organization of that department. These are conditions which any ordinary process of inspection, or any attempt to find out what was being done with extremely important equipment, would disclose very quickly.

I turn to page 41 of the report. In the intervening pages there is a tremendous amount of useful information and extremely useful recommendations. On page 41 there is a reference which may be regarded as a summary of the important recommendations contained in the report. On that page I read the words: "The Nelson tradition is overdone". No one in this country, Mr. Speaker, is more anxious than I am to see our defence organization and every aspect of our defence preparation truly Canadian, but I should think that the navy of the United States, or the navy of any other country in the world, would be proud of the Nelson tradition, which was one of outstanding success in that great branch of the service. It is not a question of continuing to follow an ancient pattern. Nelson fought in ships under sail, and undoubtedly Nelson had an able force, recruited under very different methods from those described in this report. I am not now referring to the invention of the radio. In those days people had different views as to methods of encouraging enlistment in the armed forces of the time, but so far as the tradition was concerned, it was one which seemed to be good. I have found that our friends in the United States—and I mention the United States because we must recognize that that country provides the great central strength of our combined system of defence of the free world—at all times have been only too willing and too anxious to embrace the traditions which they inherited in earlier days from another land. I find that they study with enthusiasm the events which led to success in that branch of the service in an earlier day. But there is one Nelson tradition which in this house has been preserved. Every time an hon. member has raised some question in regard to national defence, has sought further information about it and advocated an inquiry by a committee of the house set up for the purpose, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has followed one well-known Nelson tradition; he has put the telescope to his blind eye; he has refused to see the subject that was being discussed. This particular Nelson tradition is not one that has borne very useful results in this particular case, and I think every hon. member will agree that it might well be abandoned; that we should put the telescope to the good eye and begin to appreciate these extremely important responsibilities.

I should like to refer to a statement which appears on page 42. There is the positive statement of these men that, according to the reports they received, the present actual complement of officers and men—and this was stated by several witness—was inadequate for the existing commitments and tasks of the navy if it is to concentrate on training, as it must do.

The report goes on to make certain suggestions which the commissioners believe would be helpful in meeting the situation. In the next paragraph on page 42 the report says that there are too few ships available for adequate training. My information is that certain steps have been taken to improve that situation, and that one of the ships which had been used for other purposes is now being used for training purposes.

On the next page, under the heading "Recruiting", there is a statement which has a direct bearing on the expenditures of public money. This is what the three commissioners found:

> In our opinion, and in the opinion of almost every witness, the recruiting methods were bad. Many officers complained that the organization of advertised recruiting had been left almost entirely to professional advertisers and specialists in commercial radio, who have known nothing of the navy, however skilled they may be in the sale of consumers' goods to a coy and jaded public. We propose to deal with this matter at some length, as we join with the men and officers whom we have examined in the belief that "soft soap operas" do not contain the virility, dignity and patriotic appeal which should be used to persuade young Canadians to serve their country.

That is something that every hon. member has observed. Looking at the advertisements for the navy, many people might imagine, until they read them more carefully, that they were advertisements for a world cruise in which the greatest possible comfort would be available for all who took this special opportunity. As the report points out, our young people are ready to assume their full responsibilities. They are a virile, courageous and energetic group of young people who are prepared to perform the tasks that are involved. What this report points out is to suggest that this is just some pleasant episode in which the crew are taking part creates an entirely wrong approach in seeking enlistments in the navy. The report suggests that it is desirable that an appeal be made to the real spirit of our people to take their share in the duties of nationhood. That general recommendation is one which certainly should have a bearing on the question of the continuance of some of these radio broadcasts, which give the impression that the appeal is being made for something in no way related to naval training or naval service.

On page 53 there is another reference in regard to recruiting, which follows a number of intervening pages that deal with this matter in some detail. It is as follows:

> In recruiting, what is sometimes called the "bed of roses" approach, and what is sometimes called the "beer and skittles" approach should be eliminated. Naval officers themselves should be invited to take far more interest and a much greater part in recruiting campaigns. Neither the design nor the content of publicity should be left to commercial advertisers. Every naval officer examined criticized what has been done. While their criticism may be fair, their abstention from this activity in the past placed an unjust burden upon those whose duty it was to shape the programs. A consultation between naval authorities and officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would probably produce some good ideas. In any event, we have sufficient faith in the youth of Canada to believe that they will not shrink from rigours if they know they are essential to national service.
> Nor do we think either, that they need to be molly-coddled before they will offer themselves in their country's needs. In the picturesque phrase of one journalist who wrote about the navy, they will not run away from the sea if they realize that "the navy is a challenge and not a chesterfield." If they are told that the navy, while treating its men and their dependents fairly, and paying them good wages and giving them wholesome food, is nevertheless a career for a "man," hard to enter but honourable, patriotic and adventurous, we do not believe that young Canadians will fail to respond to the appeal of their country.

That is the end of the quotation, but it is a quotation which should be in the minds of all hon. members in examining the very large sums being spent on advertisements of this kind, and on the soap operas to which this report refers.

Then, at page 60 there is another item of importance in discussing this whole subject, and it comes under the heading of "Laundries". This may seem unimportant in itself, but it is very important to people who require facilities of that kind. I quote the following from page 60:

> We received most vigorous evidence concerning the absence of proper laundry facilities at Esquimalt. The situation, in our opinion, demands immediate attention. In spite of frequent representation by responsible officers, over a period of years, no laundry yet exists in Esquimalt.
> There is a naval laundry at Halifax. Esquimalt should be given the same facilities immediately.

The point I should like to make is that this refers to repeated representations by responsible officers. There again, if that is something that needs to be done, and has needed to be done for some years, then there is definitely some breakdown in the organization, and a breakdown in the chain of responsibility in the over-all administration of this service, if that has not been acted upon. While in this particular instance it deals with the absence of a laundry, it is quite possible a much more serious subject might receive equal treatment under the same system of administrative responsibility.

Then at page 67 we find the very strongest emphasis placed upon training that should be given in the matter of the relationship between officers and men, and the requirements of full instructions in the humanities. There, again, is something that stems from the top, and for which those in the highest position of responsibility must assume responsibility in respect of everything that has happened.

At page 70 the report deals with recreational facilities ashore, and makes this finding:

> Shore facilities for the recreation, entertainment and education of Canadian sailors are very inadequate, especially on the west coast. They are somewhat better at the east coast. Many of the men are aware of what the United States authorities do for the officers and men of their navy. We had the privilege of visiting the Seattle Naval Air Station Recreational Building at Seattle. When we compared the magnificent facilities for the playing of games, for the carrying on of hobbies, for sea bathing and for reading at Seattle with the dinghy surroundings, the poor quarters and the lack of equipment at Esquimalt, we could not be anything but envious for our country's sake.

I feel sure that the word "dinky" is the word that was originally intended, when they refer to "dinghy surroundings". I should think "dinky" would be the only appropriate word.

Mr. Abbott: No, "dingy".

Mr. Drew: Oh, I thought it was probably "dinky".

Mr. Abbott: I would think it was "dingy", which is a good English word.

Mr. Drew: There is another reference at page 71 under the heading "Films at Sea" and this again makes the finding that a great deal more could be done to provide films at sea, that this whole matter should be dealt with, and that the national film board should be brought into this general picture. They say much greater use could be made of the film board, although the ordinary educational films are not popular with men at sea. I quote this statement from page 72:

> Many of them told us, however, that they would be interested in travel films and particularly in films depicting life in countries to be visited on their various cruises.

Then at pages 72 and 73 we find the conclusions which, at this time, I do not propose to read in detail. However, they are conclusions which relate to the whole question of the proper expenditure of our money, and what we are getting for this enormous sum that we spend. One finding which I believe will be welcomed by every hon. member is that in paragraph (l) at page 73, which states:

> We do not believe that there are any so-called "subversive" forces at work in the navy or that any such elements were responsible for the incidents. Like many other similar happenings, they passed through the usual phases of discontent, exaggeration of grievance, folly and thoughtless action.

The whole report, Mr. Speaker, is simply a finding within a limited field to the effect that there has not been effective administrative supervision of our naval services. There is no one in the house who has had contact with the members of the Royal Canadian Navy who does not realize that the personnel of that navy commands the admiration and respect of the people of Canada. It should be a matter of concern to every member in the house, wherever he sits, to make sure that appropriate steps are taken to deal with the findings in this report.

The point however which I should like to emphasize in this budget debate is this: This report opens only one window to the whole national defence department. What we see here indicates the urgent need for similar inquiry into every other aspect of our defence organization and administration in Canada. Across this country young men and women in the permanent and non-permanent units of the navy, the army and the air force are doing a splendid job within the limitations of the opportunities afforded to them. In any one of the naval, military or air stations across Canada we can see young men and women carrying themselves in a manner that justifies the pride of every Canadian in those who wear the uniform of Canada. The least that we can do as members of parliament is to accept the responsibility of making sure that the $400 million of the taxpayers' money that is being spent for national defence is spent in the best possible way.

Nothing will contribute more effectively to the efficiency and high morale of those young men and women than to be sure that what money is being appropriated for this purpose is being put to the best possible use. I have no intention of reviewing in detail the many incidents that have occurred or going back over the discussions which have taken place in the past, but it will be recalled that in response to repeated requests for a standing committee on national defence the hon. members of this house have been given over and over again reassuring statements as to the complete efficiency of every operation in every branch of the department.

Those members of the press who had the opportunity to accompany the very small military and air forces which took part in Operation Eagle gave to the Canadian people a report which could be described only as disturbing, to use the mildest possible word. Following on the very emphatic assurances which had been given as to the quality of equipment and the readiness of certain of our forces to play their part, a report was given to the people of Canada by highly experienced veterans of the war who are now in the press service of Canada describing what could only be termed a fiasco.

This was no reflection on the men who had taken part in that operation. On the contrary, the press reports emphasized the excellent drill, the excellent spirit and the high morale of those who had taken part. But the reports emphasized also the inadequacy of the equipment and the fact that the units concerned were certainly not ready to go into action with the equipment they had. That was another small window opened to the situation in the army.

In the case of the air force, in spite of reassurances about the availability of equipment, the same press reporters informed the people of Canada about the inadequacy of the aircraft available for that particular operation. There again a very small window was opened through which the people of Canada could get just a peek into the actual situation in that great force.

Let no one suggest that anything that was said by these reporters was in the way of reflection upon those who are in these services today. Nowhere in the world are there men and women in uniform more capable of undertaking the tasks placed before them, but they can only do the job for which they are trained and for which they are given the essential equipment and supplies.

Without going into further details of this uniform and unanimous report of those who attended Operation Eagle, it does point to the necessity of an inquiry which will make it possible for the hon. members of this house to pass upon the estimates of the Department of National Defence with an actual knowledge of what the facts really are. Our whole free system rests upon knowledge of the facts. We do not prove that we have a working democracy merely because members representing all the constituencies in Canada are permitted to come and sit in this chamber, with the right to speak under the rules of this house. What determines whether this is really an efficient democracy is whether the members of this house are able to make their decisions with full knowledge of every essential fact in the possession of the government itself.

Perhaps because of the secrecy of the war years, which is something that no one can criticize to the extent that it became necessary, there has been a continuing tendency to regard essential information as the particular knowledge of the government unless by accident members of the opposition happen to find out about it or happen to make inquiries which bring it into the open for discussion in this chamber.

The whole history of our system demonstrates that it rests for its effectiveness upon knowledge of every essential fact, and that in peacetime the opposition—may I say hon. members supporting the government as well—are entitled to all essential information in the possession of the government. No one will question the necessity under circumstances of grave international uncertainty for some measure of secrecy—I will go further and say a high degree of secrecy—in regard to the military aspects of the development of atomic energy. But that relates to preparation of highly secret defence requirements which every hon. member of the house accepts. So far as the organization of our defence forces and their suitability for the tasks that they may be called upon to undertake are concerned there is no reason for secrecy as to a single detail. There is no reason why every hon. member of the house should not have available to him for the purpose of reaching conclusions all information that is in the possession of the government.

This is not a new subject. Over and over again in the past the same arguments have been made, and the advances that have taken place throughout the years have been as a result of the appointment of committees of some kind which could inquire into the real requirements of our defence forces, and their efficient organization for the tasks they might be called upon the undertake. The modern army system in Great Britain, which we in Canada have followed to a considerable extent, came about as a result of the findings of the famous Esher committee of 1904. Demands have been made since the time of the South African war for an inquiry into the organization of the forces, the suitability of training, and their ability to undertake any tasks they might be called upon to perform in the future. It was not until that committee was appointed that the errors that had been so apparent in the South African war were overcome, and an effective reorganization took place under the modern general staff system. Other famous and important inquiries followed at different times. After the first world war General Otter made his famous findings known as the Otter report. In it was laid down the appropriate organization of the land defence forces of Canada, and the way in which they should be trained for the tasks they might be called upon to undertake.

It was not for some years that effective steps were taken to bring about the necessary reorganization, and in the meantime much had happened. In 1933 and 1934 extensive inquiries were conducted by the conference of defence associations, a body which embraced both permanent and non-permanent officers of the defence services of Canada. It was as a result of their recommendations that the reorganization took place which made it possible for Canada to mobilize its forces effectively at the outbreak of the last war.

Another war has passed. Four years have elapsed since it ended. The evidence is now clear on all sides that it is essential that there be an examination of the over-all plan of national defence, the suitability of the organization of our forces for that plan, the effectiveness of the training that is undertaken, and the proper expenditure of the money devoted to this purpose. There is no occasion to go into the past. We are confronted today with the necessity of spending enormous sums of money, approximately $400 million. Only a few days ago it was indicated to us that a bill would be presented for the unification of the defence forces of Canada. Unification undoubtedly is highly desirable, but unification will not be very effective unless the forces which are unified have themselves been placed in proper relationship to other forces, having regard to what is conceived to be Canada's particular place in the general over-all picture today.

It is only by the assessment of our requirements that we can know whether our money is being properly spent. It is an enormous sum of money by any standard, and every hon. member of the house has a duty to make sure that we know that it is being properly spent. If unification is to be effective, then there must first be an understanding of what the tasks are of the various forces which are to be unified under a plan of that kind. In the past few weeks we have seen a demonstration of the problems of unification. It may be worth while for us to remember that these problems were brought to the light of day by a committee where evidence was given about the organization of the defence forces, and the related requirements of the various defence services.

Many people may feel that in the Washington inquiry into certain problems of defence in the United States there was too full a discussion of various matters connected with national defence. I believe that nothing but good can come from a full discussion of that kind because the officers of the different departments were free to express their opinions, and to place before congress and the people of the United States what they regarded as the correct relationship of the army, navy and air force in their combined responsibilities. It is not a sufficient answer to say that the system in the United States is based upon committees, and that those committees initiate legislation, and initiate findings which are acted upon by the executive. I am not speaking about procedure but about the result. I am speaking about the fact that in the sister democracy of the United States members of the house of representatives and of the senate are able to make their decisions with a knowledge of the facts as placed before a committee by the highest experts of the different services of that country. After all, they did not hesitate to discuss the advantages or disadvantages of the B-36. They did not hesitate to discuss the capabilities of their most modern jet fighters. They did not hesitate to discuss the limitations of their aircraft carriers, their battleships and their cruisers. They did not hesitate to discuss the relationship of the army to the navy and air force in the defence of freedom. Out of that discussion will come a decision based upon actual knowledge, and undoubtedly future errors which might seriously threaten their defence will be overcome by that very exchange of information and public discussion.

I know a motion could be placed upon the order paper that in the opinion of this house it is desirable that a standing committee on national defence be appointed for the purpose of considering our problems in connection with national defence. I also know that placing such a motion upon the order paper would not assure me the same opportunity to discuss this subject that is assured me at this moment. I also know that such a motion can produce no greater results if at this time the government is not prepared to accept the lesson of the Mainguy report and recognize that the time has come to appoint such a standing committee.

We had reasons given why this could not be done. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that any reason for not setting up a standing committee on national defence was swept into the discard the moment this government set up a committee on atomic energy. If it is appropriate to set up a standing committee of this house to examine the question of atomic energy, which has the very highest military potential as well as great peacetime possibilities for the welfare of society, surely it is equally appropriate that there should be a standing committee on national defence to examine the whole subject. That committee could examine our military forces to see how they should be constituted in order that we might make the very best use of our money. It could examine how the forces can be most efficiently integrated, how the minister may be best advised by his military officers, how the chain of military responsibility up to the chief of staff of each of the main services can best be carried out to avoid what was found in this recent inquiry. These are things a committee of this house can do. These are things it is the duty of members of this house to consider; and I submit that hon. members have no right to give the government a blank cheque for $400 million unless they have an opportunity to learn what really are the facts.

When I mention the figure of $400 million I recognize that at this point we cannot expect to have the appropriate information for the consideration of the estimates this year. Most of the money has been spent already. However, I do urge the government, and I do urge the minister in the interests of the efficient operation of his own department as well as in the general interests of the people of Canada, that an undertaking be given that a standing committee on national defence will be set up this session so that it may start its work and hon. members may have some assurance of adequate information when they are called upon to consider these estimates in the session to be called in the new year. That is the only way we can have an assurance now that we will be able to fulfil our responsibilities at that time.

I do hope the minister will regard this report as something that will be helpful to him. I hope he will not be satisfied to simply tell us of the things he has done already and what he intends to do to implement the recommendations of this report. Because of what this report has disclosed I hope he will assure us that we shall have the opportunity to obtain this information, and that in addition to the officers of the department experts will be obtained who can advise that committee on the most effective way in which the money provided in the estimates may be spent upon the defence forces of this country. We want to know that this large amount is being properly spent and that the waste disclosed in the Mainguy report is not being continued over a much wider field, throughout the whole of the defence services.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to the subject matter of the amendment introduced on behalf of the opposition, to remind hon. members that we have urged that at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth be called for the purpose of doing everything possible to solve the trade problems that exist between those nations. It has been pointed out already that if we succeed in solving those problems within the commonwealth we shall have found a solution to the wider problems which confront the dollar-sterling areas today. This is a subject with which every hon. member of every party must be greatly concerned at this time. In presenting his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) gave assurances that the government is dealing with the matter. We have placed before the house a proposal which offers one practical and effective way of dealing with this problem as it should be dealt with, at the earliest possible date. Let us find ways of tackling this question which can gain the support of all hon. members. It is not sufficient for us to have bland reassurances from the minister that this will be solved. We have a right to know how it will be solved. We have a duty to suggest how it can be solved; and we know there is a problem to solve.

I am not going to go back and read the assurances that were given just a few months ago, when members of this government told the people of Canada there was no trade problem. I need not recall to hon. members the repeated statement by the Minister of Finance that there would be no change in the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar. I need not recall the fact that even the word "ridiculous" was applied to suggestions that soon we would be called upon to face this problem. There is no need to refer to those now. The ministers of this government are quite properly telling the people of Canada today that there is a crisis ahead.

Mr. Abbott: No minister said there was a crisis ahead of us.

Mr. Drew: If the ministers have not used that expression, then they simply failed to use an expression which properly describes what they have said. If they do not believe there is a crisis, then the proper ministers should speak to Mr. Donald Gordon, who described the crisis fully in New York a few days ago. There have been those who have suggested that this government places great reliance on the statements of Mr. Donald Gordon, and the confidence of the government in his statements has been indicated by his recent appointment. Mr. Donald Gordon gave a speech which should be re-read—I do not want to suggest to the minister that he re-read it.

Mr. Abbott: I saw it before it was delivered.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, we now know that these statements by senior civil servants are, in fact, statements of government policy. In future we will bear that in mind. I believe it is important to know that the Minister of Finance saw Mr. Gordon's statement. We shall all re-read that speech in the light of that knowledge. Since the minister saw it before it was delivered, it can be taken for granted that Mr. Gordon at least wanted to know that there would not be any disapproval of what he said. If that is the case, we can examine Mr. Gordon's speech knowing that, to put it in its mildest form, the government did not disapprove of what he said.

Mr. Abbott: The Minister of Finance certainly did not disapprove of what he said.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance certainly did not disapprove, and this is his budget. The Minister of Finance did not disapprove of a speech which gave a clear picture of recurring crises in the history of the world, brought us up to the present crisis, and pointed out that the only way to meet the crisis was for North America to buy more from Europe in the years ahead. It is that crisis to which I refer. If the Minister of Finance has not used the word crisis, he has certainly approved of the description of the crisis by a senior civil servant who discussed his speech with the minister in advance.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Gordon is not a civil servant.

Mr. Drew: I am not going to go into the definition of the appropriate description of employees of the Bank of Canada. The word "civil servant" is a word of which anybody can be proud who occupies a position in the public service. Since the Bank of Canada is an agency of the government or is presumed to be performing a public service, I would have thought the term was reasonably appropriate in this case. We need not quibble as to whether he is a civil servant. In this case, he would appear to be a government spokesman.

Mr. Abbott: That is not the case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Drew: Although Mr. Donald Gordon before going to New York consulted with the Minister of Finance and submitted his speech to him—

Mr. Abbott: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Gordon, as he has done in the past, was good enough to send me a copy of his speech. I think he sent it to a great many people. I read it with interest, as I always read his speeches. It represents his own views. I happen to concur in them, but it does not represent a statement of government policy and was not put forward as such.

Mr. Drew: Mr Speaker, there is a clear principle involved in the statement that has just been made. Our system of government is one which accepts the proposition that the government is one, and that the statement of the appropriate minister is a statement on behalf of the whole government in regard to a matter that is the responsibility of that department. The Minister of Finance has stated that he approved Mr. Gordon's speech, so that whether he was the government's spokesman or whether he was merely putting forward his own opinion, we may read that speech with the knowledge that the Minister of Finance, the minister responsible for the budget statement of Canada which we are now considering, approves of that speech. We may examine it in that light.

Mr. Abbott: I sometimes approve of the speeches of the leader of the opposition, but not often.

Mr. Drew: I know that there have been occasions on which the Minister of Finance approved, because I was interested in hearing him repeat some of the arguments I had used about letting the Canadian dollar go to another level when that decision was actually made. I also recognize that, in the very nature of things, we shall not always agree. I am hoping that in this particular case the Minister of Finance will agree with the proposal that has been put forward, that a positive step be taken to meet what was described in a speech that was approved by the Minister of Finance as a crisis.

If there is to be an effective solution of that problem it is essential that those who have two different parts of this problem to deal with should get together as soon as possible. There was one feature of Mr. Gordon's speech which, perhaps, does call for some attention. Mr. Gordon was speaking in New York. Undoubtedly he was really making an argument that the United States should buy more from Europe, but in using the appropriately courteous terms he used the expression "North America". Now, that expression indicates a general tendency to bracket Canada and the United States as two countries with the same dollar problem. One frequently sees clear evidence that the discussion of this subject is based, in many cases, on the idea that although we may be a nation with about one-eleventh of the population of the United States, nevertheless, standing side by side with the United States, our problem is the same.

Our problem is not the same. Our problem is a different problem and it is of vital importance to the future of Canada that we begin to deal with this problem as a different dollar problem from the United States dollar problem. Today Canada is actually at the crossroads in the relationship between the United States and Great Britain in the economic field. If we proceed to regard our problem as the same problem which confronts the United States, we may find that the United States has solved its part of the problem while we are left with no satisfactory solution. The reason our position is so different from that of the United States is that we have one striking similarity to the United Kingdom. We have a very unbalanced economy.

When I use the term "unbalanced" I do not mean adversely unbalanced, I mean the contrary. We have been expanding and developing for years, exporting far more than we import. We have been a great supplier of foodstuffs, of raw materials and of partially fabricated materials from those raw materials. In more recent years we have become a great industrial nation, and with the dramatic discoveries of oil and iron in this country in the past few years we shall become an increasingly important industrial nation. The prospects of this country were never brighter than they are today, so long as we do not forget that we have built up our whole level of production on the basis of export. We export more than one-third of all we produce; whereas the United States exports only a very small proportion. The United States has an almost completely self-contained economy. True, they buy from us such things as paper, pulp, wood products, minerals and certain of our industrial products as well as agricultural products, but to a great extent they are self-reliant or potentially self-reliant. On the other hand, we in the northern part of this continent must buy from outside Canada huge quantities of the goods we require. No matter what our population may become we shall always be a great importing nation, and for that importation we shall depend upon enormous exports.

In discussing this subject there is one feature of our export position which we must never forget and which places us in a different position from that of the United States. Before the war our great markets were overseas. In the last few years before the war, when the impact of war preparation did not have its effect upon exports and imports, in the year 1937, out of every thousand dollars worth of exports from Canada $370 worth went to the United States, and $630 worth overseas. Of that $630 out of every thousand, $372 was paid by the United Kingdom and $104 was paid by the rest of the nations of the British commonwealth. Thus we find that out of every thousand dollars of exports to the whole world $476 was paid by the nations of the British commonwealth. That was our great export market; also, these exports were going to nations which produced many of the things that we required as well. That proportion of export business had a very important bearing on the whole internal structure of this country.

Because we have relied on overseas exports from the earliest days our rail lines, our internal shipping lines, the services associated with them and the seaports have been built up to carry our trade to the outside world, and particularly to the United Kingdom. Any substantial loss of that overseas trade cannot simply be compensated for by a corresponding amount of exports to the United States. We want the highest possible export to the United States of goods that we produce; but it would be disastrous for this country if we became entirely dependent upon the United States as the one place outside Canada where we could sell the goods we produce. That has no relationship to our friendly association with the United States. It has to do with the situation that would result from the loss of that export business. Think of what it would mean to our railways; think of what it would mean to all these shipping services; think of what it would mean to the internal ships that carry these goods to the seaports; think of what it would mean to the people at the seaports; and think of what it would mean to the men and women working on the ships themselves which carry these goods to the different markets of the world. It would have the most serious consequences on the whole economy of Canada. Therefore one of our most urgent requirements is to find a way of meeting that problem.

Only yesterday a Canadian Press dispatch carried the story that the two Canadian representatives who visited Britain in the past couple of weeks were shocked at the severity of the cuts proposed by the British government in the purchase of Canadian foodstuffs. Today we read in the press it is expected that there will be a cut of $100 million in certain lines of foodstuffs; but what is even more serious, as we look at this picture, is that nearly all of the purchases which are now being made in the sterling area are being made with Marshall funds. Unless we take effective steps, and take them soon, to meet this problem, then we shall have found no effective way to sell to the sterling area when Marshall funds come to an end. The time, therefore, to take the steps is now, and the time to meet the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the other partners of the commonwealth, is right now while we still have time to work out an effective solution before we are confronted with the actual withdrawal of the buying power which exists today. That is the reason for our proposal. It is the only effective way it can be done.

We have before us a subamendment calling for an over-all reduction in tariffs. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members have not before them sufficient information to vote on the subamendment with any knowledge of what the effects of it would be. Already we have had reports from different ridings of what the effect is of the differential between the revaluation of the pound and the revaluation of the dollar. The fact is that for all practical purposes the United Kingdom has reduced our tariffs by a net 20 per cent within these past few weeks. We certainly should know what the impact would be on Canada generally and on employment in Canada before we support any general resolution of this kind, no matter how sincerely desirous every one of us may be to assist the United Kingdom and the other nations of the commonwealth at this time.

We shall not have greatly contributed to the solution of this problem if we follow any course which weakens Canada at this time. It has been pointed out that in the textile industry alone 500,000 Canadians are dependent for their livelihood on a business which is feeling the new competition. The answer to that may be given in different ways. The answer will doubtless be found by the appropriate examination of the subject by those directly concerned in this business. But today the indication is that the manufacturers in Britain are finding it possible to sell their products here under the new circumstances. A dollar-sterling board has been set up in Canada and a dollar-sterling board has been set up in Britain for the purpose of stimulating this business.

I submit there is not sufficient evidence before the house at the present time for us to deal with a recommendation of this nature, because already we see evidence that the opportunity to sell here in Canada has been greatly changed in these past few weeks to the advantage of those in the sterling areas. All of us will certainly welcome their opportunity to sell in our markets.

I should like simply to refer to the amendment before the house, which reads:

> This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to prevent the present decline in our trade with the sterling area and is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of inviting the nations of the commonwealth to a conference in the immediate future for the purpose of working out arrangements to preserve and enlarge those traditional markets on which jobs and opportunities for Canadians very largely depend.

I submit that when the purpose of this amendment is examined it will be found it is one which can be supported by every member in the house; and that, in so far as any expression of regret is concerned, no member of the opposition will suggest that that is a want of confidence motion in the ordinary sense, but merely an expression of our regret that this has not yet taken place. We do urge members of the House of Commons to support this recommendation, that Canada take the initiative, with its special dollar problem, in bringing together the nations of the commonwealth to find a solution of the trading arrangements upon which the common prosperity of this great partnership will depend in the years ahead.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members will not expect me to agree with everything the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said in his interesting speech; but with the general objective in his concluding remarks I am sure each of us would agree.

With regard to his references to the subject of national defence, and particularly to the Mainguy report, I am glad to hear him say that the report demonstrated the value of inquiries of this kind. And I might ask this question: Who asked that the inquiry be held? The suggestion did not come from any source except myself. Who made public the report of the inquiry when it was made?

Mr. Drew: "'I', said the sparrow".

Mr. Claxton: I find we are on all fours with respect to some of the conclusions, but I am rather surprised that the fact that the inquiry should have been instituted, carried out effectively and promptly and resulted in such a useful report, and that this report should instantly have been made public, should not have been the subject of some word of appreciation.

May I say a word or two with respect to the report itself. At page 1 I find these words:

> Without in any way controlling our activities, directing our inquiries, or attempting to shape our conclusions, you were kind enough to add to your instructions a number of most valuable suggestions. We wish to thank you for the honour of our appointment and for the helpful observations with which it was accompanied.

That is the end of this quotation from the opening passages of the report, addressed to myself.

So that hon. members may have before them some of the suggestions to which reference was made, I should like to read from a memorandum I gave to the members of the committee when it was set up. This memorandum of suggestions will show why the inquiry went into the subjects it did, and made some findings which have been surprising to hon. members. Some of their findings and their report were made in response to specific inquiries, but no effort was made to limit the scope of the report in any way whatsoever.

In this memorandum I said:

> While no suggestion is made as to the form or tenor of the report, it is considered that it would be useful if its contents could cover the following questions which are included among those raised in the minds of many members of the public.
> (a) Is there any indication that any one of the incidents was the result of the action of subversive elements?
> (b) Is there any indication that any one of the incidents was planned some time in advance?
> (c) Is there any indication that the three incidents were the result of concerted action of men on two or more of the vessels? (For example, even if there was no direct evidence of this, it might appear that one or two men taking a leading part in spark-plugging the action had been together in a group at some time at Esquimalt. If there was anything in this, it might be desirable to make a detailed comparison of the service careers of at least some of the men.)
> (d) In each case had any of the grievances or complaints subsequently voiced by the men been made either formally or informally to their officers? If so, had any action been taken to remove the cause of such complaints or to explain why it was undesirable or unnecessary that any action should be taken?
> (e) Is the procedure laid down for making complaints adequate, understood and used?
> (f) Is the relationship between officers and men such that the men really do go to their officers and speak frankly to them?
> (g) In each case did any of the ship's junior officers, chief petty officers, petty officers, leading seamen or other senior ratings know of the complaints or grievances before the incident? If so, what action did they take? Did they bring the matter to the attention of the appropriate authority and explain the action they were taking to the men?
> (h) Did any of the officers or senior ratings know in advance that the men were going to take the action they did?
> (i) If they did not know, how was it explained that this should be the case in view of the close and continuous association between officers, senior ratings and ratings aboard ship?
> (j) When did the men first begin to discuss the action they subsequently took? Was the action taken the result of an accumulation of grievances, whether real or imagined, or did it result from some particular incident, or was it due to a combination of a number of grievances which culminated in the action taken?
> (k) Did the men thoroughly understand the machinery for voicing grievances?
> (l) Did the men thoroughly understand the impropriety of the action they took?
> (m) What reason do the men give for not following the regular procedure?
> (n) If it is considered useful, some general reference might be made to the general character, bearing, background, training morale, sense of duty and education of the officers and men.
> (o) Reference might also be made to any relevant facts or views about the conditions of service ashore and afloat, including accommodation, food, recreation, leave, pay and allowances.

It must be quite obvious from the scope of the questions in this memorandum that the answers which might be given to some of them at least were anticipated by the officers at naval service headquarters and myself. In view of these incidents it was exceedingly important in the interest of our national defence and of our naval services to establish beyond question what the facts were, why the incidents occurred and how the conditions which gave rise to them could be met. It was not only important to find that out, but also to get from the three members of the committee which made the inquiry, a group which enjoyed the most complete respect and confidence, views on these questions which would be useful in presenting the matter to the public and which would reinforce our own efforts to see that conditions in the navy were made as good as they could be.

It is important to recall that the members of the inquiry made some general findings. On page 3 they said this:

> Although this report in the very nature of things is bound to be critical, it must not be assumed that there are not many reasons for great national pride in the achievements of the Canadian navy past and present, and in the men who inherit and guard its traditions. It is certain also that wisdom, experience, and the passage of time will, by their own momentum, work many great and lasting improvements. We were asked to find out what was wrong with the navy. If, therefore, we have stressed what is wrong, it should not be forgotten that a great deal is overwhelmingly right.

The members of the inquiry saw some 238 witnesses and in accordance with the directions that had been given they had officers and men in and obtained their views in the frankest and freest possible way on everything relating to the incidents and the state of training and discipline and the conditions of life aboard the ships. This was done with the purpose of endeavouring to rectify a condition which clearly was wrong, and it was done with the thought that a full disclosure and a full and frank report would enable the people to judge exactly what was the situation.

I must say that the members of the inquiry did a magnificent job and in tabling the report the day before yesterday I thanked them in the name of the government for having done a great bit of work. This is more than a report dealing with certain incidents; it may well constitute an historic document dealing generally with the questions of naval traditions and discipline and the all-important relationship of officers and men.

The report contains some thirty enumerated recommendations, but in addition there are a number of others. As I said yesterday, when the estimates of the department are under consideration I shall be glad to take up any of the points mentioned in the report and discuss them in detail with hon. members. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to some seven or eight different pages in the report, but before dealing with what he said I should like to call the attention of hon. members to one significant fact that must be taken into consideration when evaluating and considering the problem of organizing the navy after the end of the war. At page 5 of the report there is a table showing the number of officers and men and the number of ships in the Canadian navy in 1939, the total personnel being 1,585 and the number of ships, 16. During the war the personnel was built up to a peak of 93,034 and the number of ships increased to 956. At the time of the report the personnel totalled 8,813 and the number of ships 54.

These figures will show hon. members something of the problem of reorganizing the Royal Canadian Navy on a post-war basis. I might say from my own knowledge that the navy has suffered one handicap in comparison with the army and the Royal Canadian Air Force in that the proportion of officers and men who were in the service before the war is smaller than is the case in the other two services. This means that the navy has fewer officers and men who have long experience, particularly experience of service in peacetime.

One striking fact I might mention is that the navy has increased in size some 25 per cent in the last two years, which represents a large job of training, of manning ships and settling down to the routine of working the ships. The navy has been operational to a larger degree than the other two services and unquestionably this has imposed a strain upon it, which is referred to in the report. I am not saying this by way of an answer or by way of an excuse; I say it because it is necessary in order to understand the problems that the navy has been faced with and to be fair to the officers and men who did a great job during the difficult period.

I think it would be more convenient to deal with these specific points mentioned by the leader of the opposition when the estimates are under consideration, but perhaps I should refer to some of them. He referred to the fact that on page 10 reference is made to some of the conditions on board H.M.C.S. Magnificent and expressed some surprise that the conditions there described should not have been brought to the attention of naval service headquarters or of the minister himself. Some of us have been on great ocean liners and I venture to say that we probably would not be surprised that cockroaches are occasionally found on some of the great luxury vessels. The fact that that condition existed for a time in the Magnificent was not brought to my attention.

Had that been done, no doubt I would have caused the appropriate officer of the navy to give instructions to destroy the cockroaches, but I think it is somebody else's job to look after cockroaches. I certainly would have expected that the officers of the Magnificent, if that condition existed, would have been competent to deal with it without its having to be reported to me. Quite a few of the other complaints and grievances are of a rather similar character. Put together they present a certain picture, but from my own service experience in the army, if our unit had been interviewed at length in the sympathetic fashion that the officers and men of the Canadian navy were interviewed, you would have had a picture of a most disastrous and appalling situation, whereas I venture to say our unit was one of the best in the Canadian army. Therefore I think it is necessary in considering the report to take into account the fact that the members of the committee making the inquiry were asked to do just this kind of job so that all of us would see the whole picture.

As to recruiting, which is dealt with at page 43, the leader of the opposition (Mr.

Drew) followed the members of the committee of inquiry in referring to "soft soap operas". Here again I must say I am not going to enter the lists on the side either of the committee or of the leader of the opposition on the question of the appreciation of the value of advertising of any type. It is a matter on which everybody has an opinion, and one opinion is frequently as good as another. I can speak, however, about recruiting advertising from one point of view, and that is that it produced results. The fact that the navy is the first of the three services to be up to its present establishment in men is striking evidence that the navy got the men it needed, and is continuing to get them. At the present time we have a waiting list for enlistment in certain classes of the navy. We are going to continue to recruit men even if the present establishment is maintained, because there is a wastage of about sixty-six men per month.

Not only did we get the men, but before and during the inquiry we also conducted investigations to see how the men were liking the life. I have talked with a good many of them myself and these investigations, made by people in the services and outside, have shown that by and large the recruits we have been getting for the armed forces have said, after they have been in service for a matter of some weeks or months, that generally speaking they have found conditions of life much better than they expected, indicating that we are not painting too bright a picture of world cruises and the like.

In the light of the report, I have looked again at all the navy advertisements in the last week, and have gone over them in detail. I can assure hon. members that there is very little in the way of advertising of "world cruises" indicating that it is going to be a "pleasant episode". The advertising has been aimed at young Canadian boys and men from the age of seventeen up who want a career of usefulness and service to their country where there will be opportunities for them. That is the note that has been emphasized. That is the appeal that has been made, and the fact that the response has been good indicates that we have not been shooting wide of the mark.

I have also compared our advertisements with those of other services, those of other countries, and those of the R.C.M.P., to which reference was made. I must say that from my examination of our advertisements I feel they are suitable for the job, well framed and fair, that they have painted an honest picture, and have obtained results.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister indicate how much money that recruiting has cost?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: I would have to get the figure for the hon. member. Reference was made at page 60 of the report to the fact that we did not provide laundry facilities at Esquimalt. That is an important thing, but I would not have thought it would warrant particular attention at this time in a budget debate. I have looked into that matter, and I find that, whereas laundry facilities are provided for officers and men of the armed forces at most places, at Esquimalt provision was made in the service's program for last year or the year before, and before it reached me it was taken out by officers of the service on the ground that there were other things which had a greater priority. That is one of the recommendations which depends on treasury action, and which I think should be carried out. I am sure if it had been brought to my attention earlier I would have seen that it was carried out.

With regard to recreational facilities, to which the leader of the opposition referred, quoting from page 70 of the report, I have not seen the building that the members of the committee of inquiry visited at Seattle, but I have seen the recreational building in H.M.C.S. Stadacona at Halifax. I know of no better recreational building in any service in any part of Canada. I think it is the equal of anything I have seen in any university with the possible exception of Hart House. I have never seen anything to better it in a Y.M.C.A. or community hall. That is the situation at Halifax. If the building at Seattle is better, then it must be a very fine place, and rather like a good club with all kinds of specialized equipment. The building at Halifax has a swimming pool, a track, a large drill hall floor for badminton and other games and for dances, bowling alleys, billiard tables, ping pong tables, and two rooms containing a large library and a very large record library of serious and jazz music. Altogether it provides a good place for men to seek their quite proper entertainment and recreation.

At Esquimalt we hope to construct a similar building, but there again it is a question of priority. During the last two and a half years I have put the emphasis, so far as our construction program is concerned, on the building of married quarters. I felt that came first, that the one essential thing we needed to do was to enable the officers and men of the armed forces to be united with the members of their families in their own homes in good communities. To that end we started a building program, and have increased the number of married quarters from what it was at the beginning of 1947, 1,100, to a total of 7,400 or 7,500 when the present year's program is completed. Each of those quarters relieves the situation with respect to civilian housing, because it enables a service family to make room for a civilian family. We put that first and this program of constructing married quarters has been much bigger, in proportion to the size of our armed forces, than anything I know of being done in any other country. We felt that was needed, because we wanted to create conditions for a good life for our men, particularly our married men, particularly veterans, and more particularly those who had been separated from their families for some time.

The next priority we considered was the building of barrack accommodation to replace some of the barracks that were in bad condition. Two of the worst in the armed forces were those at Halifax and Esquimalt. We have done work on the building at Halifax, and I hope the appropriation for next year will permit us to do what must be done at Esquimalt. This kind of consideration is a question of priority. This year, in the services and through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, we have some $90 million available for the construction, maintenance and repair of buildings. That represents an enormous construction program. When we shall have met the need for married quarters and for more barrack accommodation, undoubtedly we can move forward with regard to recreation; and that will enter into the long-term program.

Then the hon. member mentioned films. The arrangement in all three services is that films are provided to service units through the canteen or other funds raised by the men themselves. It has not been the practice at our ordinary service centres to provide films out of public funds. I think hon. members will agree that this seems reasonable in view of the fact that the men themselves have to pay if they want to see films. But in all three services arrangements are made for the circulation of good films obtained from the agencies on a hire basis. The film society in the navy, which is a voluntary organization, apparently has not been as active as it might have been, and at the time of the incidents I understand Magnificent was not taking films from the film society. At the present time it is, however; so is Ontario, and so are most of the other principal units in the navy. That is largely a matter of internal management, and we will see that greater facilities are provided for securing co-operation in this respect and also for making available more films of the film board and other serious films. However, that is not a very great matter.

Then the hon. member referred to Operation Eagle, which I think perhaps I should deal with again when the estimates of the department are under consideration. However, I venture to say that no word of criticism has been or could be uttered about that operation from the point of view of the performance, the ability and the state of training of the officers and men of the P.P.C.L.I. In the second place I do not think a word of criticism has been offered or could be offered about the skill and state of training of the officers and men of the air force, either regular or auxiliary. In the third place I do not think anything has been said or could be said in criticism of the work done by the staffs who planned and carried out the exercise. I make these statements believing, from my discussion with people who were there, either press or otherwise, that they are in accordance with the facts. It was those three things the exercise was designed to test, and the reports by my officers indicate that in these respects the exercise was very successful indeed.

As for equipment, of course the reports did not indicate to us anything we did not know. We have no packet aircraft, and I do not think any country in the world has them except the United States. They are still being modified, and they cost well over half a million dollars each. In this exercise we did use some seventy-two aircraft of a type suitable for the purpose. We did not use any Vampires because it was not an exercise in which we were using Vampires; and to criticize the exercise for not using Vampires or not having one type of equipment or another seems to me about as relevant as criticizing a rifle shoot out at the Connaught rifle ranges because we were not using 5·5 guns. This exercise was planned as a battalion exercise, to test co-operation between the men of the battalion who were doing a parachute jump, and air force units. It produced some very interesting results, which will be profitable in future training.

The exercise was criticized on the ground that the parachutes were patched. There are no patches in the parachutes. In the Canadian forces, as in the United States, if on examination—and parachutes are examined after each use—a parachute is found to have any sign of wear or scuffing of any kind, an entire panel is replaced by a new panel. It happens that the new panels in this case were white and therefore showed up, since the other panels were camouflaged. Apparently this caused someone to say that the parachutes were in bad repair, or were patched.

Mr. Drew: Was that the cause of the report that some patches had been made with parts of women's clothing?

Mr. Claxton: If such a report was made it was completely unjustified and untrue; and I am sure the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) does not believe it.

Mr. Drew: I think the minister knows the report I mean.

Mr. Claxton: I am sure the leader of the opposition does not believe any such report; and if it was made it was not true. Then I saw one suggestion somewhere that machine guns were being used which were obsolete, and in fact that they were of the first world war type. The reference was to Vickers guns, which I am advised by my officers are still the best and most effective type of gun for a particular purpose. They had the appropriate number of Vickers guns and all other types of weapons for an exercise of that kind.

Mr. Harkness: The complaint was that they were lacking in sights, I think.

Mr. Claxton: I never heard that complaint and never saw it in the newspapers. That report was never brought to my attention; therefore I am not in a position to say whether or not it was justified. It is a new point, which I shall look into. I did see some suggestion that we were to blame because the guns lacked ammunition. I should point out that the guns were firing blanks, and the only effect of any lack in the blanks available at any point would be that the noise would not be as loud as otherwise. However, there is no shortage of blank ammunition in Canada, nor was there any shortage at the scene of the exercise. Some of the reports indicated that the guns had jammed, and that is quite true. The Vickers gun is equipped with a special lock for firing blanks. This lock is not as well machined as the gun itself and sometimes it jams. When it does the soldier clears it. If he does not, he stops firing blanks. We have considered it is not worth while making up a new set of attachments for firing blanks just to meet this particular difficulty with which we are familiar.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Were there any Ross rifles there?

Mr. Claxton: There were no Ross rifles. I do not want to spend more time on this subject now. The hon. leader of the opposition closed his speech with a reference to the reports of a number of other committees, stating that all those reports had been useful. He mentioned them in support of his plea that there should be a committee of this house on defence. He referred to the Esher committee of 1904. I might point out that was not a parliamentary committee. The leader of the opposition referred also to the Otter report; that was not a parliamentary committee. He referred to the excellent work done by the council of defence associations, which is not a parliamentary committee. The fact is there has not been a parliamentary committee on defence which made a report, either in the parliament at Westminster or in this parliament. It has not been considered, by any government at any time, that that was a desirable way of doing it.

Now, that is not my decision. It is the view of the government. It has been the view of all governments up until now. I indicated the reasons for it during the discussion of a motion by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for the appointment of a committee on social security. The reasons are the same, and they are general. So far as I am concerned, I would welcome a committee on defence or anything else, but I do not believe that is the proper method of conducting business in parliament or of running the defence forces of this country. I believe experience in other places supports that view.

The leader of the opposition on this and other occasions gave the impression that the members of the opposition had consistently been refused information about the defence forces and defence matters. That statement would paint a picture of requests coming from members of the opposition almost daily. I should tell this house that, so far as I know, I have never received a private request from any member of any of the opposition groups that I have not answered. With regard to questions put in the house—I have not had an opportunity of checking my own records or those of the department because I have been in the house ever since the leader of the opposition raised the point—I believe I am right in saying that only one request for information has been refused in the last year and a half, and that was made by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). It was refused on the advice of my advisers, after the most serious consideration, for reasons which were made clear at the time. It is not the practice and has not been the practice, in this or any other country which has the parliamentary system of government and particularly at Westminster, to give specific information about the strength or the trained strength of the units of the active forces.

The reason for that has been made plain on a number of occasions. I believe that reason has appealed to the good sense of the majority of hon. members as well as to the people throughout the country. So far as I am aware that is the only bit of information, certainly it is the only type of information, that has been the subject of an inquiry that has met with such a reply.

The leader of the opposition said they would be failing in their duty if they did not have an opportunity of making an examination of the over-all plan, the suitability of the forces, effectiveness of training, and the proper expenditure of money. It seems to me those are all proper matters for discussion at any length, and in any detail, in the consideration of the estimates of this department. That is the type of matter which has been discussed when the defence estimates have come before this house on previous occasions. I shall welcome a discussion of them to the fullest possible extent when the estimates of the department come before this house, which I hope will be at an early date. I hope we can have then a debate on defence matters. I shall be glad indeed to give every possible bit of information about anything relative to the work, aims or objects of the defence forces that we do not believe is contrary to the national interest. So far as I am aware, that has been limited in the past only in the way I have indicated.

It seems to me that the best time to take all this up is on the defence estimates rather than on the budget. Certainly I did not come here today expecting to make this speech. In conclusion, I should like to say that I have been in this portfolio for two and a half years. In that time, I have met most of the officers and many of the men in the armed forces in Canada; I have visited the units, active and reserve, and I have been proud to be associated with them in this work. It has been a work full of interest and full of difficulties, as is indicated by the subject matter of this report as well as by events in other countries. It is a work in which we can show results, and there are signs which give encouragement.

With regard to organization, I believe I can say without fear of successful contradiction that in the work of unification, co-ordination and the streamlining of our forces, navy, army and air forces, the Department of National Defence of Canada has made more progress than any other country in the world. I believe that in the all-important question of the training of officers we have, in the various plans in effect in Canada, subject to such adjustment as we will make particularly in regard to executive officers in the navy, more candidates for commissioned ranks in the three services training to our standards than any country in the world. With regard to the general work and training activities of the armed forces, we are making steady progress. Recruiting for the active forces is proceeding at the rate we want, so that the target for the army will be met in September and for the air force in December of 1950. With the continued support of the members of this honourable house and the constructive, useful criticism of the loyal and all other opposition, I believe we shall build up our armed forces in a way which will redound to the credit and security of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, for the record may I add my congratulations to those which have been extended to you by hon. members. I have always felt that in your appointment it was a friend appointed. It must be apparent to all that you are carrying out the duties of your high office with dignity and all fairness.

I also desire to congratulate the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne As a newcomer to the house I was told by one of my friends to read a certain book written by George W. Ross entitled "In and Out of Parliament" in which he said that you should get up as soon as you can, because if you are going to get thrown out of the house you may as well get thrown out early.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I had a wonderful apple presented to me. Some time ago we had peaches and other fruit presented to us. I sent to St. Paul's in Toronto to see if we had apples or any other fruit. After they had made their report the consensus was that we had only one apple tree and they could find only a couple of apples on it. But in St. Paul's, when you visit there, what we can give you is hospitality and good will. When you visit Toronto, whether you come by rail or water, you will land in St. Paul's riding, the very centre of the capital of the banner province of all Canada, which I have the great honour to represent.

It was with a feeling of pride in our government that I listened to the terms of the budget which was presented to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Throughout the years of the war and in the years prior to and since the war the Liberal government has built up a consistent record of wise and honest administration, which I maintain is again reflected in the present budget. Under the long and brilliant leadership of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Canada has grown and prospered and has become one of the major nations of the world today. I suggest, sir, that under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the torch will be carried high and his name will go down in history along with King, Laurier and Macdonald as one of the greatest leaders since confederation.

In the time at my disposal tonight I propose to direct my remarks to that portion of the budget relating to housing, in this sense, that the federal government, as well as rendering financial aid in one form or another, should also give serious consideration to the location and type of future housing projects which more and more are becoming all-important factors in our national housing problem. Relief for our people in the matter of housing has been, and still is, one of the most pressing needs. It is one to which the federal government, through its crown company, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, under the capable direction of Mr. D. B. Mansur, has extended all possible aid in money and materials in an effort to speed up construction of homes for the people. In spite of this, the scarcity of dwellings, or living accommodation of any kind, within the means of the average person, still continues. One needs only to read local newspapers to realize the situation.

I am sure we all agree with the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) that the housing shortage, which started during wartime and continued into the post-war years, gives every promise of becoming a long-term peacetime problem. Therefore, any approach to the problem should be made with that end in view, and will require the joint efforts of the three levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal, together with private endeavours.

Methods used to solve an extreme housing shortage during periods of emergency cannot be applied with the same success when the need remains continuous for a lengthy time, and will only bring further additional problems.

Up to the present, for the most part, we have largely attempted to meet the situation by the building of small dwellings on the outskirts of our towns and cities where land was readily available for the purpose. If we continue to solve our problem in this manner when we are faced with a long-term housing shortage, will it not have the effect of creating additional problems, such as transportation, schools, roadways, sewers, and water for communities already overburdened with taxation, and will it solve the dwelling needs of the majority of citizens? I personally do not think so as the large percentage of those citizens belong to that vast group of workers who must go forth daily to their work, individuals and married couples where both husband and wife must work. Housing units for this class of citizen should, therefore, be located within easy distance of their work. In any city or large town, I believe it will be found that the greatest number of persons are employed in the downtown section of the community. This is why in our cities and towns we find people living in deplorable conditions in overcrowded rooming houses or in run-down small houses in our so-called slum areas of our downtown sections. The only remedy offered these people in the matter of improved conditions is a single family unit miles away from their work on the outskirts of the city, which in most cases would be out of the question financially, even with assistance, and in addition most of them do not require or want a house.

As a resident of the city of Toronto, I have recently made a partial survey of conditions in that area as they relate to housing, particularly in St. Paul's riding, which I have the honour to represent. To illustrate my point I would like to briefly outline some of my findings.

Toronto is the second largest city in Canada, covering an area slightly over forty square miles, with a population of 670,000. The assessed value of its taxable property is $1,172,000,000. St. Paul's riding, covering an area of almost five square miles, cuts through the centre of the city from the Toronto harbour on the south almost to Eglinton avenue on the north, a distance of four and a half miles. It has a population of 72,347 and the assessed value of its taxable property is $356,694,000—30·43 per cent of all the assessed property value in the entire city. This may be a reason why St. Paul's is called the richest riding in Canada.

Within the southerly area of St. Paul's is located the heart of Toronto's financial district, with its skyscrapers and many large office buildings, its docks and warehouses, and a large percentage of the city's hotels, theatres, hospitals, government buildings, and business establishments, some of which are: the union station, the dominion public building, the postal terminal, the harbour commission building, the Royal York hotel, the King Edward hotel; the head office in Ontario of the Bank of Montreal, which has just moved into its $8 million buildings, and the Royal Bank of Canada; the head offices of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the tallest building in the British empire, the Bank of Nova Scotia's new building under construction, the Imperial Bank of Canada, the Bank of Toronto and the Dominion Bank; the head offices of the Canada Permanent Trust Company, the Toronto General Trusts Corporation, the National Trust Company, the Chartered Trust and Executor Company; the head offices of the Canada Life Assurance Company, the Confederation Life Association, the British American Life Assurance Company; the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada; the three daily newspaper offices and plants—the Toronto Daily Star, the Globe and Mail and the Telegram—the Metropolitan building, the National building, the university of Toronto buildings, the Royal Ontario museum; the two great department stores, the T. Eaton Company and the Robert Simpson Company; Maple Leaf Gardens, St. Michael's hospital, the Toronto General hospital, the Women's hospital, the Wellesley hospital, the Mount Sinai hospital, the Hospital for Sick Children now under construction.

From the foregoing list of large companies and institutions one can readily see the vast number of persons who would be required to staff them. For example the two largest departmental stores employ a combined total of 21,850 people. At Christmastime there is an additional 8,000, making roughly 30,000 people working in these two stores. In addition there are countless other large and small businesses and factories too numerous to mention. In passing I might say that the university of Toronto has 3,000 employees, with 13,700 students.

In all there are literally tens of thousands of workers employed in the downtown section of St. Paul's riding. This fact is borne out by the following figures received from the Toronto transportation commission. The commission carries in the city of Toronto approximately 960,000 people in the normal week day, of which number a total of 240,000 people are carried daily into the downtown section of St. Paul's riding.

In other words, one-quarter of what they carry in the city of Toronto is carried daily into St. Paul's riding, which I have the honour to represent. Unfortunately the residential areas surrounding this downtown business district have never undergone any change in the way of remodelling or rebuilding in order to meet the ever-growing demand caused by the ever-increasing number of persons employed in that section. The many city blocks of residences, large and small, in the central, east and west sections of my riding were all built years and years ago. They are long since obsolete even for the purpose for which they were built, let alone for the purposes for which they are now being used, which are rooming houses for the large ones, and families too large for the small ones. In addition, there are row after row of old stores, with one or two storeys over them which are used for dwelling accommodation, and which are in many cases actually unfit for living in or for any other use.

extreme, and with them all the undesirable features of conditions associated with so-called slum areas. Yet, all available living accommodation in this central and downtown area is fully occupied, whether good or bad, and high rentals are being obtained. For example, a recent newspaper article stated that three dwellings on Jarvis street had been condemned as a firetrap. Yet one hundred persons are still housed there.

Consequently, the majority of those thousands employed today in the downtown business district, in order to find accommodation, are compelled to live north, east, and west, many miles from their work, travelling anywhere from one to one and a half hours each morning and night.

Evidence of this exit of population to the outside areas may be found by glancing at the population figures of Toronto proper, and the population figures of its adjoining municipalities, in a ten-year period, and particularly in the past three years, as follows:

Year	Population of Toronto
1939	649,123
1946	696,550
1948	670,035

One is amazed to find that in a city which appears to have prospered and expanded in business to such a large extent, the population has increased by 21,000 in ten years, and it is startling to note that in the past two years, from 1946 to 1948, it has decreased 26,000. The records of adjoining municipalities, sometimes referred to as greater Toronto, for the same period, are as follows:

Year	Population of Suburban Toronto
1939	219,234
1946	275,273
1948	317,133

Here we have an increase of nearly 100,000 in population, over a ten-year period, and in the past two years alone, from 1946 to 1948, an increase of 42,000.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the amazing increase in population in the suburbs, as compared with a decrease in population in the city proper this past two years, is due almost entirely to the housing policy which has been in vogue during the period under review. The record of building permits issued for new houses throughout the entire city of Toronto in the past three years has been practically nil in comparison with those issued for the suburban areas, as follows:

City of Toronto: Year	Number of Permits Issued
1946	225
1947	174
1948	144
1949 (9 months)	161

Greater (or Suburban) Toronto:

Year	Number of Permits Issued
1946	5,061
1947	5,097
1948	6,914
1949 (9 months)	7,974

This present trend of rapid building to the outskirts, due to our housing shortage, has greatly increased shortages in other public services in Toronto, foremost of these being transportation, and all that goes with it.

The city of Toronto owns and operates one of the most modern and most efficient transportation systems on this continent, carrying last year an amazing total of 311 million people. It is, however, placing an unbearable load on the system, and a great hardship on the people. One can readily see why it takes from one to one and a half hours for persons to reach their homes from the downtown section. I can give no better illustration of the seriousness of the present transportation problem with which we are faced in Toronto than to quote the following statement by the assistant general manager, Mr. H. W. Tate, which appeared in the Globe and Mail of October 21:

Creeping Cars
Yonge Trams on Horse Era Schedule

In the evening rush hour, street cars on Yonge Street are travelling within the limit that was set for Toronto's first horse-drawn street car in 1861, H. W. Tate, assistant general manager of the T.T.C. told the Empire Club yesterday.

When Toronto got its first horse-drawn car there was a stipulation that it should not exceed six miles per hour. "In 1949, on Yonge Street, in the rush hour, we are not exceeding that," Mr. Tate said. He added: "In the winter, the cars sometimes don't make it."

"The T.T.C.," he said, "has to turn out a good product or it cannot sell it. The product is car-miles and bus-miles. The present service on Yonge street," he said, "cannot be regarded as modern transportation.

When the Yonge Street line was rebuilt in 1921, North Toronto had a population of 12,000. Today, it has 80,000 and the northern suburbs have grown as well."

Since the rapid spreading-out of the city's population to homes in the outskirts and suburbs, Toronto has been continually expanding its transportation facilities in a vain effort to meet the ever-increasing strain, until now, in order to give its population efficient service to any worth-while extent, it is forced to commence the construction of a multimillion dollar subway. As well as transportation, though possibly to a lesser degree, other public services, such as schools, roads, sewers, water, et cetera, are also being seriously affected.

In the foregoing, Mr. Speaker, I have given some results of my survey of housing conditions today in Toronto, to support my belief that if we continue to follow the same building policy in solving a long-term housing shortage problem as when it was considered a wartime emergency, we will only be adding more problems, as severe as the one we are trying to cure.

The reason, of course, for the dearth of building in city centres is the lack of vacant land especially in the downtown sections. Yet, in order to provide housing within reasonable distance of employment for that large percentage of the population who work in our downtown areas, present accommodation must be increased. What is the solution? One, two or three storey dwellings will not provide it. The area is too small, the demand too great. There is only one answer—it can be met only by tearing down the old buildings and erecting modern, multi-storey, low-rental apartment projects.

The main objection raised to building in the downtown and central sections of the city is that property values are too high. To me this is one very good reason why the city cannot afford to have this valuable property occupied by slum type buildings of very low assessed value. Though the tenant is paying high rental, the city receives low taxes because they are only based on the value of the buildings. If these dwellings were replaced by apartments, ten to twelve storeys in height, the same land areas would thus house hundreds, rentals would be greatly multiplied and the city would receive the taxes it should from this valuable property. With so many people needing accommodation in this area, it is a crime to allow such valuable property to be occupied by so few.

If such projects were carried out, in addition to providing suitable dwellings for a large majority of those in need, they would also serve the purpose of commencing slum clearance.

It has been said that now is not the time to proceed with slum clearance, that this should wait till construction costs are lower. On the face of it this seems true were it not for the fact that the land now occupied by so-called slums is badly needed. If now is not the time to undertake large-scale building projects because of prevailing high building costs, it seems to me by the same token that it is not the time for the individual to be purchasing or building a home. I am informed that modern apartment projects, if properly planned and constructed, can be built at no greater cost per apartment unit than a single-family dwelling. When built in an area already developed, the costs involved are partially offset by the fact that all utilities and services, such as roads, sidewalks, sewers, water, et cetera, are already installed.

I believe every Canadian should be able to own his home if he so desires, and there are many who do; but I believe also that there are just as many who neither require nor want a house. For many individuals and family groups the problem of shelter is not met by the single-family house, and apartment buildings providing living and housekeeping facilities best meet the need. Probable reasons for the trend towards apartments may be found in increased living costs, high taxation and in the changing pattern of living brought about by the influence of present-day civilization—smaller families, employment of both husband and wife, increased dining out, the radio, movies, automobile, child care in day nurseries and nursery schools, new methods of food and meal preparation. These and many other influences have wrought changes in people's living habits.

Apartments, properly built for light, air and view, equipped for housekeeping, varying in size and facilities and providing a wide degree of flexibility, can satisfy all requirements of urban and suburban living. For families with children the apartments can be arranged to contain sufficient space for fulfilling primary functions of household life—cooking, laundry, entertaining, reading, study, games, and outdoor recreation. Efficiency units, so-called, consisting of one room with kitchen, bathroom, dressing and storage space will provide an answer to the young married couple both of whom may work, or to unmarried individuals.

In facing a long-term housing problem I feel we should build wisely and well, keeping in mind the day when the demand for housing will fall off or when the supply will be greater than the demand. Well-constructed buildings, modernly equipped, centrally located, at low and moderate rentals, are always in demand in times of depression as well as in prosperity, whereas row after row of small single-family units on the outskirts are usually the first to lose their appeal when the supply of houses is plentiful.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I urge provincial and municipal authorities to grasp the hand of the federal government in accepting the financial aid so generously extended in the proposals laid down by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). I also urge that the aid to home owners should be merged with housing aid to that vast number of persons for whom the early development of multi-storey apartment projects is the only solution. We must face this problem with vision and courage now and so plan the future that urban and suburban housing aid shall go forward hand in hand.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this evening is to deal exclusively with three or four matters which have been alluded to during the course of this budget debate. Were it not for the fact that certain rather fallacious arguments have been advanced, arguments bolstered by deceptive evidence resulting in wholly erroneous conclusions, I probably would not find it necessary to participate in the discussion at this time.

The first matter to which I should like to refer has to do with oil. Perhaps this could be designated more properly as the farmer in relation to oil, or still more properly as mineral rights in relation to the farmers of my province of Alberta. At least two assertions have been made during the course of this debate which may well leave the impression that farmers living in the province of Alberta are, as a consequence of the policies of the government of that province, being deprived of all but, as one hon. member said, a smile and not a very pleasant one. I should like to quote from page 1122 of Hansard of October 25, 1949. Speaking at that time the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) made this assertion:

> The other day a few hundred acres of land in Alberta were sold to one of the oil companies for over $3 million cold cash for just the right to search. No oil had yet been found there. What did the farmer who owned the land get? A smile, and not a very pleasant one.

In the first place no land was sold to any oil company. The company only purchased drilling rights. Secondly, I emphasize what he said, namely, that no oil had yet been found. This is the speech in which the hon. member for Athabaska made an earnest plea for the completion of a certain line of railroad in northern Alberta. In that connection the hon. member for Athabaska has our whole-hearted support. This is the speech in which the hon. member assailed the Conservative government under the late R. B. Bennett for having discontinued operations on that line during the first five years of the depression. After assailing the government of that period he said that then the war came. This is the speech in which he forgot to mention that there were four years and some months of depression between the defeat of the Conservative government and the outbreak of the war with a Liberal government in office, and nothing was done to hasten the completion of that railroad. I mention that simply because he forgot to—or did he?

I should also like to quote from Hansard of November 1, 1949, page 1329. In this instance the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) was speaking, and he said:

> The farmers upon whose land oil is discovered receive little direct benefit from the discovery because few of them have mineral rights. All that these farmers receive is the rancid smell of oil twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, plus a little compensation for the use of their land.

I suggest to the hon. member for Athabaska and the hon. member for Vegreville that they ought to hold a caucus and endeavour to come to some agreement with respect to what the farmer in Alberta does or does not get because in one instance the hon. member for Athabaska said he got nothing but a smile, and not a very pleasant one at that, and in the other instance the hon. member for Vegreville said he got some slight compensation, including the rancid smell of oil. I will show that they are both wrong.

What are the facts, Mr. Speaker? After all, facts mean far more than the imaginary wanderings of some minds. When the resources were returned to the province of Alberta in the early thirties, 51 per cent of such resources had already been alienated by the government of Canada. Therefore the province of Alberta only had 49 per cent to deal with. The government of the province of Alberta owns the mineral rights on considerable land in the province. That is a fact. It is also a fact that certain farmers own mineral rights on their lands in the province. On lands where the province owns the mineral rights, drilling rights are sold to oil companies. Tenders are called for and bids considered. It is a fact that millions of dollars have gone into the public treasury of the province as a consequence of the sale of these rights. The company drills, and if it strikes oil 12½ per cent of all production goes into the treasury of the province of Alberta. To be used for what purpose? To be used for the welfare of all the people of the province of Alberta to build roads, to provide better and more extensive health services, to provide educational services, for debt reduction, tax reduction, and also for other purposes.

Where does the farmer stand who does not own the mineral rights? Is it true that he gets nothing but a smile, and not a pleasant one, or very limited compensation? I wish to refer to some of the facts as they are found in an official publication of the government of the province, entitled "Surface Rights". The part to which I wish to refer reads:

> Under the common law which was in force for many years in Alberta, as well as other provinces of the dominion, the title to mines and minerals always included the right of entry and reasonable use of the surface for the purpose of working the minerals, including oil and gas. The owner of minerals had a vested right to use as much of the surface as might be required for his operations without any compensation to the surface owner or without liability except for negligence. In carrying out a program of oil development, which is so necessary in any country, provision must be made in the public interest whereby those engaged in the development might enter upon the land where development work is to be undertaken. However, the government—> —is convinced that the owner of the surface is entitled to full compensation as he would be in case a canal, a railway, a highway, a power line, a coal mine or any other thing required in the public interest would cause him any damage or inconvenience.

Referring to the government of the province of Alberta.

In 1947, Mr. Speaker, an act known as the Right of Entry Arbitration Act was passed which provided for the setting up of a board of arbitration in the province of Alberta with wide powers to deal with the matter of compensation to surface owners. What factors are taken into consideration by that board? They are, first, the value of the land; second, the amount of land which may be permanently damaged by the operator's operations; third, the adverse effect of the right of entry on the remaining land; fourth, compensation for severance; fifth, compensation for the nuisance, inconvenience and noise which may be caused by or arise from or in connection with the operations; and finally such other factors as the board may from time to time deem proper, relevant or applicable.

This legislation shows one thing. It demonstrates the intention and desire of the government of Alberta to give the board of arbitration all necessary leeway to deal with applications from the standpoint of equity and justice. Let me cite five cases that were dealt with by the board of arbitration in order that we may see whether the farmer gets just a smile, and not a very pleasant one, or something comparable. This is the first case: payment for one well, $1,188, plus annual compensation of $420 for the life of the well. Case No. 2: $1,288 as the first payment, and $428.50 every year thereafter for the life of the well. Case No. 3: $1,551 as the first payment, and $461 every year thereafter, in each case for one well. Case No. 4: $1,400, with $500 payable every year thereafter for the life of the well. Case No. 5: $2,000 the first year, with $700 per year thereafter for the entire life of the well. From the information I have given it will be readily seen that from a quarter section of land on which four wells are drilled—and that is not at all uncommon—the farmer would receive an average of approximately $6,000 the first year and $2,000 for every year the wells operate, which might be twenty years. The farmer also enjoys the right to continue to farm his land during that time. After all, once a well is brought in, very little of the farm is taken out of production. As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) says, it amounts to only a few square feet. And I must emphasize that these are cases in which the farmer does not hold the mineral rights.

Further in his speech the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) advocated that all farmers on whose land oil is found should be paid royalties. I think the Calgary Albertan, which supported the Liberal party with all its vigour during the last campaign, dealt more effectively than I could with that suggestion. I refer to an editorial under date of October 28 of this year, under the heading, "Don't Pension a Few Northern Farmers." The editorial states:

> It is unfortunate that a man of the stature of Mr. J. M. Dechene, Liberal M.P. for Athabaska in northern Alberta, should be so far off the beam on this matter of oil royalties. In parliament, the other day, he said the oil belonged "to the people, not to the provincial government," and the provincial government should give a big slice of its royalty income (he suggested 5 of the 12½ per cent) to the farmer under whose land the oil was found. He wanted something done "to see that the farmer out of whose land this wealth is taken receives a royalty."
> Except on C.P.R., Hudson's Bay and certain other freehold land, the great bulk of the oil is owned by the provincial government, which is all the people of Alberta. The farmer who owns the surface has no more right to the oil under his land than the farmer who lives three hundred miles away. It is not his. It belongs to the government and thus to all the people. If the government gives him a slice of its 12½ per cent royalty it is depriving all the other rightful owners of their just income. It is robbing 99·9 per cent of the farmers to give a modest and entirely undeserved fortune to ·1 per cent of the farmers.
> The only way that the real owners, meaning all the citizens of Alberta, can benefit from their ownership is through the provincial government. It is taking many millions of dollars a year out of the oil industry, and rightly so. That money can be used to permit the reduction of taxes, which we strongly oppose. Or it can be used first to pay off the provincial debt and then to build roads, schools, hospitals and other capital assets which all the people of Alberta could enjoy. That use of the oil money we strongly support. But never, never should the province use its royalty to pension off a few farmers in Mr. Dechene's constituency, who have no more right to it than anybody else in the province.

I think that editorial is rather significant. I must add that the Liberals in Alberta are finding it desperately difficult to make election issues. Why, they even grabbed this, which the C.C.F. leader could not drop soon enough after he had picked it up the first time. The Liberals are using this and endeavouring to make capital out of it. The other day that same newspaper, the Albertan, dealt with the Liberal leader in Alberta and his criticism of oil policy. First it deflated him editorially; after deflating him it dissected his arguments, and then exposed them to the ridicule of the public of that province. That was how it dealt with Mr. Harper Prowse, leader of the Liberals in the province of Alberta.

The government of my province believes that in dealing with this most important question sense, reason, good judgment and good business practices are the things that count. Obviously to the Liberals of that province these things, at any rate in relation to oil, have all gone with the wind. Before leaving this matter I want to refer to another editorial, which also appeared in the Albertan. I am always pleased to be able to quote that newspaper to Liberals, because I cannot forget how strongly it supported them during the last campaign. An editorial under date of October 25, referring to Liberalism and oil, had this to say in part:

> It was during the Borden administration, when the Alberta government was Liberal and so was the Senate. The Alberta government, it seems, wanted to give the Shell Oil Company exclusive oil rights for the whole province in return for a payment of $5,000. But it didn't have the power to do so, so it asked the federal government to give it that power. The enabling legislation went through the commons but the Senate turned it down.

So, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to condemning whatever may be done in the province of Alberta in connection with oil, such condemnation should not be voiced by the Liberals.

Now I come to matter No. 2. The day before yesterday, November 1, a certain textbook was brought into this house. I did not see the book, but I know all about it. It is called "The World of Today", by Paterson and McDougall, and has been used in the province of Alberta. Incidentally, this matter is not new in the House of Commons. It was brought into this house over eight and a half years ago by the hon. member for Athabaska, who used almost the same arguments that were used the day before yesterday and drew the same fallacious conclusions. Eight and a half years ago, Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Lethbridge took these arguments and buried them about six feet deep under logic and truth. Now, eight and a half years later the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore), in a politically ghoulish fashion, exhumes the bones of that argument and makes an effort to cloak them with the same arguments that killed the thing eight and a half years ago, leaving the same type of impression—at least, first he tried to breathe life into the thing and failed miserably.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Shaw: All right, I will deal with it. I am going to deal with it not from the standpoint of what he said, but from the standpoint of what he did not say, which is often more important. He did not tell this house that Mr. Paterson was the editor of the Ryerson Press in Toronto, or that Mr. McDougall was principal of the normal practice school in Edmonton. No, he wanted to leave the impression that the writers were probably members of the Alberta government. He did not inform this house, and I ask my friends to listen, that Saskatchewan, under a Liberal government and with a Liberal minister of education, used the same textbooks for years. He did not indicate that, Mr. Speaker. Undoubtedly, he did not know—or did he?

This is significant. At page 1329 of Hansard, after referring to this book, he quoted the following from it:

> Some people feel—

Notice that.

> Some people feel that the capitalist (competitive) system is out of date in this modern world, and should be modified or replaced entirely by a system better fitted to deal with the problems of today. Three of these plans are especially interesting: The Communist (as in Russia), the C.C.F., and Social Credit.

He referred to this book after saying he did not mind having his children learn about these different things, but that it was vicious propaganda. I would ask my hon. friend if it is not a fact that some people do feel, as it says here, that there are alternatives to the capitalist or competitive system. You have heard that said in this house. I cannot see anything vicious in that. Like my hon. friend, I taught school for many years. I tried to give my pupils both sides of the question. I told them there are some people who believe there are alternatives to the capitalist system. I gave them the truth, the whole truth, and let them form their own opinions. What he did not seem to know, Mr. Speaker, or it would have wrecked his whole argument, is that Social Crediters have not advocated the implementation of a system to take the place of the capitalist or competitive system, if you want to call it that. Let him remember that. I repeat that he does not seem to realize that there are two sides to every question, not only here but in all events of our everyday life. I am not so sure that I would want him to teach my children if he were going to deal with only that one side of each question.

Reference was also made, Mr. Speaker, to education. No group in this House of Commons has taken a firmer stand than we have in support of federal grants in aid to assist the provinces in establishing equality of opportunity in the field of education. Let me make that quite clear. The hon. member for Vegreville said at page 1329 of Hansard:

> In our province of Alberta there is no earthly excuse for the government not making more substantial grants to education which would be in keeping with the requirements and the expanding needs in that province.

Obviously, in making that statement, the member for Vegreville was not aware of one or two things. First, from the fiscal year 1934-35 to 1948-49, educational grants in the province of Alberta increased from $2,269,-286.41 to $9,829,000. In other words, our assistance to education has increased much more rapidly than has the income of the province of Alberta. In order to assist in the equalization of educational opportunity in my province, the government, in many districts, is paying as high as eighty-five per cent of the cost of education. Those are the more remote, less prosperous areas. That is one effective method of bringing about equalization of educational opportunity.

We realize, Mr. Speaker, and admit that the revenues of our province have increased quite rapidly during these past few years. But we believe in facing the situation realistically. We are not unmindful of the fact that the present government of Alberta took over the affairs of the province in 1935. At that time we had $158 million of debt; $95 million of it given by the Liberal government between 1905 and 1921. It is that period which the Bank of Canada characterized in its 1937 report as the period of waste, extravagance and loose administration. The farmer government of that province gave us another $63 million in debt. Of course, $51 million of our total debt accumulated as a consequence of the depression—a depression which we feel justified in attributing, at least in part, to some of the asinine financial policies of the dominion government.

The government of the province of Alberta realizes what a good many Liberals do not seem to realize, namely, that the gas and oil resources are a wasting asset. I think that should be underlined. It is quite conceivable that within forty years the oil and gas fields in my province may be completely depleted. All one has to do is look at what has happened in Turner valley to visualize what could occur in my province, if the government were to heed those who have neither vision nor good business judgment and load the budget with a burden of fixed charges right up to the level of revenues. I ask some of our critics to consider that. If that were done and, after forty or fifty years, the revenues were down or falling materially, it would leave the province with that burden of fixed charges and nothing with which to pay them. The government of Alberta wisely takes the stand that a portion of the present income from gas and oil must be used to create other assets which will be well enough developed at the end of forty years to enable the services of the province to be carried on uninterrupted. With the depletion of these oil and gas fields the revenues would go, Mr. Speaker. That, I contend, in the field of provincial or any other administration, is nothing but vision and good business practice.

We have heard in this house, in the province of Alberta, and from the Liberal leader and his followers, that we should pile up a burden of fixed charges by utilizing the resources which we have now in their entirety for current activities within that province. Well, I say to you that we contend vision has been displayed in dealing with the matter. We have increased the grants to education in the province by almost five times. We still say, however,—and this is in keeping with part of my hon. friend's remarks—that we must have federal grants in aid in order to assist in the equalization of educational opportunity across this country.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, Mr. Speaker. In a speech on Tuesday, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) made reference to something which I had said previously in the House of Commons, as reported at page 1330 of Hansard. I would not refer to it at all of course if it were not almost laughable. I quote:

> However, I have heard of expressions coming from some of my Social Credit friends—and when I say some of them, I mean just some of them—

Of course he should have named me.

> —to the effect that my election to this house was made possible by the communist vote of the Vegreville constituency, and I intend to deal with this matter. The insinuations are quite clear, Mr. Speaker.

I interject here to say that he is wrong. There were no insinuations. I made cold, blunt, hard statements that were true. There were no insinuations. I continue with the quotation:

> Such statements cast a reflection not only on the nine thousand people who voted for me in the election of June 27 but also on all the people in that constituency, numbering some 60,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you notice what he has endeavoured to do. He has endeavoured to take my assertions and portray them as a reflection upon the 60,000 people in his riding. Out west we call that buncombe. He did not take the figures which I gave in this house in my last speech and endeavour to break them down or destroy them at all. I know that Vegreville constituency. I know that it embraces a fine part of the province of Alberta. I know its people. Thousands of these people are good citizens, energetic, sincere, honest, one hundred per cent Canadians. The hon. member's statement to the press on October 6 to the contrary notwithstanding, I know these things from personal experience.

Notwithstanding the fact that the great majority of these people are as I have described them, there are, and he cannot deny it, between three thousand and four thousand communists within his riding. And whether these communists are of Anglo-Saxon, French or Ukrainian origin, they are still communists. They are traitors to democracy and traitors to the democratic concept of human organization. The hon. member did not in any way, shape or form refute the concrete evidence which I put on the record, Mr. Speaker.

I hold in my hand a circular which was circulated by the thousands in the Vegreville constituency during the last election. This circular is headed:

> Voters of Vegreville Constituency!
> On election day, June 27, you will need to make a choice. On that day you will be marking your ballot for the man you want to represent you in the House of Commons for the next four years. You will be judged throughout the country by the man you choose.

After a vicious attack upon the former member for Vegreville, Mr. Hlynka, they went on to say:

> The Labour-Progressive party calls on the people of Vegreville to defeat Anthony Hlynka on June 27. Vote against him! Put him out of office! Send this war-mongering, pro-fascist back where he belongs!

Then they go on to show that they have no love whatsoever for the Liberal party. They say:

> The Labour-Progressive party is campaigning in every constituency for peace, democracy and security. In Vegreville constituency we decided not to nominate a candidate in this election. We decided this because we do not want to split democratic opinion in the constituency as then Hlynka might get back in. We say to all voters in Vegreville: Stand united! Vote united! Defeat your main enemy—Hlynka.
> We greet the decision of the C.C.F. to also not contest this constituency. We urge all C.C.F. supporters to actively campaign against Hlynka and to help defeat him.
> Go to the polls on Monday, June 27, and vote against Hlynka!

There were and there are between three and four thousand communist supporters—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: The hon. member should live in Vegreville.

Mr. Shaw: —in Vegreville. Since I spoke in the house in reference to this matter I have had scores and scores of letters from that constituency confirming what I had said before.

I asked specifically if there were any evidence to indicate that the Liberal candidate condemned this or whether he said publicly that he did not want their support, and to date I have not been able to get any evidence of that. He may be able to present it, but it is most significant that up to the present time he has not produced any such evidence.

In his speech the hon. member made certain references to such things as, for example: in 1938 in Alberta our candidate at that time who was elected, Mr. Orvis Kennedy, thanked Jan Lakeman, the communist chief, in the province of Alberta, for his support. When the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) undertook to pin him down on that and produce his evidence he found it utterly impossible to do so. In fact, the hon. member for Peace River even went so far as to question his honesty in connection with it and still he could not produce one iota of evidence to back up his assertion.

In the early days of our movement, that is in its infancy, it is conceivable that a few communists may have wormed their way in, but it did not take any more than a good political delousing to get rid of them. What the Liberal party needs in certain parts of its organization today is a complete political delousing to get rid of the communists. They can make their insinuations on the floor of the House of Commons, but I ask any Liberal in this house if he can produce evidence of propaganda published by the Social Credit party containing the pictures of communist leaders. I have in front of me propaganda published and distributed within the last six years under the authority of the Liberal association containing the pictures of some of Canada's outstanding communists. That occurred within recent times. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, we say that at least in certain quarters of the Liberal party a good political delousing would do them a lot of good in order to get rid of the communists, who are still within certain sections of that organization.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Speaker, I know I have not the unanimous consent of the house. Actually I did not expect it from some hon. members; therefore I shall not impose upon the house.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks on Friday, October 26, as recorded at page 1223 of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated that hon. members interested in the subject of education could discuss it in this debate. I am going to follow his suggestion, and shall take a rather unusual line for one who is not a member of the government party. I suspect that much of what I shall say tonight will be used against me at some future time in York South. Nevertheless I am interested in education in Canada, and in order to lay that ghost of suspicion which is abroad, that the federal government dare not touch education without stepping on provincial corns, I propose tonight briefly to review the extent to which the federal government is involved in educational work at the present time.

First of all, I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is not in the house. It is not often I can compliment him; but I wish to pay tribute to him and to his assistants for the good educational work carried on by the Department of Labour under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act of 1942. The minister and his assistants deserve high commendation for their administration of that act, and particularly I suggest for the great measure of co-operation with the provincial departments of education they have been able to develop and maintain.

The vocational training branch of the Department of Labour from 1937 to March 10, 1948, has had an enrolment of approximately 918,000 students, young and old, and during that period has spent approximately $65 million of federal money on vocational education in Canada at the secondary school and university level. That money has been spent to assist students at the universities, to assist unemployed youth training in the country, to provide courses in forestry, to provide vocational training for the armed forces during the war, training for war industry during the war, pre-matriculation and vocational courses for veterans, apprenticeship training and training or re-training of older unemployed.

All this educational work, even that for which the federal government itself was directly responsible, has been carried on in the very closest co-operation with the provincial departments of education. I note in the Canadian vocational training report that an agreement known as the vocational schools assistance agreement was made with the provinces in 1945, and that it provides, first, an outright annual grant of $10,000 to each province; second, an annual grant of $1,910,000 for a ten-year period to be allotted among the provinces; and, third, a dominion contribution of $10 million to be allotted among the provinces for capital expenditures on building and equipment for vocational training purposes.

All projects which were to be assisted under that agreement were to be approved by the minister before April 1, 1948. I wish now to quote a paragraph from the vocational training report for the past year, which states:

> At the meeting of the vocational training advisory council which was held on October 4, 1948, various members drew attention to the fact that increased costs for new buildings and higher operational costs of vocational schools, have reduced the value of the grants which were provided under the vocational schools assistance agreement.

The availability of dominion funds has given a notable impetus to vocational education in Canada, and has been responsible for an active program of development in practically all provinces. Many projects have not been completed, and some have not even been commenced.

The council felt it was in the interests of Canada that facilities for vocational education should be strengthened and developed as speedily as possible. It is recommended that a further grant of $5 million be made by the dominion for capital expenditures, to be distributed on the same basis as the earlier capital grant, and that the annual grants be increased from $2 million to $4 million.

Then the report goes on to say:

As of March 31 these recommendations were still under consideration.

I submit that that recommendation of the advisory council is worth special consideration at this time, and I would urge the Minister of Labour to proceed immediately with the implementation of his council's recommendation. Let me give one example, one with which I am most familiar because it pertains to my own riding of York South.

In York South, with a population of well over 100,000 people, we have three collegiate institutes, but no technical school. Today there are well over a thousand pupils in that riding wanting technical education, but none is available. The school board had planned to build a vocational school which would accommodate a thousand pupils, provided a federal grant is available. Unfortunately they were unable to complete their plans so as to get under the wire by April 1, 1948. In any case I understand the $10 million had all been allotted for approved projects before that. So, without federal assistance, York township will be forced to build a school to accommodate 600 pupils instead of 1,000, a school with one gymnasium instead of two, a school of that size without any auditorium.

This is just one example of many such cases throughout Canada. Unless the government will act and act quickly thousands of young people will be deprived of the opportunity for vocational education. This is not a matter in which we can afford any delay. Young people want education now; they do not want to have to wait three or four years while the government is getting around to the consideration of one of its own council's recommendations.

I pass now from the Department of Labour to the Department of Veterans Affairs in order to show just how deeply the federal government is already involved in education. Up to September 30, 1949, the Department of Veterans Affairs had assisted 55,260 veterans in under-graduate courses at universities, 6,000 in post-graduate courses, and another 85,900 veterans in vocational training at the secondary school level, making a total of 147,160 veterans who have received allowances and tuition from that department.

That is no slight contribution to education on the part of a government which normally is supposed to be keeping out of education entirely. The Department of Veterans Affairs paid $116,685,595 in allowances, over $30 million in tuition fees and nearly $15 million in supplementary grants to universities to compensate the universities for the difference between the payment of fees and the cost of educating these veterans.

I should like to digress for a few moments to say that since coming to this house I have had occasion to refer to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) and his superintendent of educational training, Mr. Jamieson, a considerable number of individual cases. In my opinion both the minister and the superintendent are handicapped by narrow, rigid regulations that I certainly would have opposed to the best of my ability on the floor of this house had I been here when they first came into effect. Nevertheless, I want to add that, subject to those overriding regulations, every single educational case that I have referred to the minister and his superintendent has received the most sympathetic consideration possible. I am pleased to say that in several cases, notwithstanding the limitations of ironclad regulations, ways and means of assisting students have been discovered.

I turn now briefly to the Department of National Defence. I have been unable to put a price tag on the educational work done by that department, but reference to their report for the current fiscal year shows that during last year there were 4,119 army, navy and air force personnel taking undergraduate and post-graduate courses in thirty colleges and universities in Canada and in twelve colleges and universities outside Canada.

I should like to take a few moments of my time to refer to the educational work that was carried on by the Canadian Legion educational services during the war, and is still being carried on by that organization. I have been unable to get any figures to show the extent of their work overseas during the war, but in Canada and Newfoundland during the war years the C.L.E.S. had an enrolment of 215,818 in their correspondence courses and spent $3,130,941. In addition to those correspondence courses, there were nearly half a million members of the armed forces registered in the oral classes that were conducted by the C.L.E.S.

This same organization purchased in Canada for distribution among the forces in Canada and Newfoundland over 3 million library books and carried on 92 courses of study at the matriculation and university levels. One remarkable feature of the work of that organization is the fact that they were able to get the co-operation of the departments of education of all the ten provinces. More than that, every department of education in Canada accepted their certificates of achievement and every university in Canada accepted their senior matriculation certificates for university entrance. I am told that up to the present time there are approximately 11,000 veterans in veterans' institutions, in the federal civil service, and elsewhere who are still taking courses of the Canadian Legion educational services.

Another department involved in educational work is the Department of National Health and Welfare. In 1946 that department appropriated $100,000 for the provision of scholarships and the extension of educational facilities in the seven schools of social work in Canada. For some mysterious reason, I presume known only to that still more mysterious body known as the treasury board, that amount was reduced in 1947-48 to $50,000, and it still stands at that figure. The result is that practically the entire grant has been used for the extension of school facilities and practically none is available for scholarships. I am sure that everyone interested in education in Canada, except possibly the treasury board, is anxious to see that $50,000 raised to the original $100,000 in the next estimates.

The national research council has also given direct aid to education. When that council was set up in 1916 one of the first things it did was to set aside $5,500 of its appropriation for research into medicine and pure science. Over the years that amount has been gradually increased until in 1948 there were 178 scholarships provided by the national research council of a value of $160,150. In addition to that there were grants in aid paid to 17 universities and educational institutions to the value of well over $200,000.

The Department of Trade and Commerce, through the bureau of statistics and especially through the education division of that bureau, has been making its contribution to education. It is true that in the educational field the dominion bureau of statistics unfortunately is limited by its charter to the compilation of educational statistics, but even that in itself is of immense interest to education across Canada. Only in the publications of that branch can we find educational statistics from all the provinces brought together and properly correlated.

I want to repeat the plea that I made in this house over five years ago. It is high time that we had in Canada a federal education office that would do for Canadian education what the federal office in Washington does for education in that country. I believe that the charter of the education branch of the dominion bureau of statistics should be broadened and that sufficient help should be provided in order that that division may be able to do some of the things that need to be done, things that are either not being done at all or are being done in a haphazard fashion by volunteer organizations.

For instance, there is the whole field of research in education for the benefit of the country at large. It is true that the provinces are carrying on a great deal of educational research, but there is no federal agency in that field. I understand that the Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association have been spending about $10,000 a year for the past few years in research on school health projects. My information is that that will be discontinued this year. Here is a field of research that will pay national dividends in the future and such a project should not have to rely on private and public campaigns for funds to carry on.

There is another research project being carried on through the co-operation and support of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the labour congresses. This is a project the purpose of which is to discover to what extent our schools are giving the training best suited to the needs of our communities. If we had a federal bureau of research in education, projects such as these could be carried out for the benefit of the nation, and the research work that is done by the provinces could be correlated and made available for the use of educationists all across the country. We need a federal institution for educational guidance. Most of the schools in the larger centres have educational guidance officers, but educational guidance officers should have a knowledge of, and be able to benefit by, the experience and the data collected by the employment offices all over Canada. Educational guidance today cannot be successfully carried on within the limits of any one province.

We no longer educate boys and girls to remain citizens of any one province. At least one out of every three students educated in our provinces earns a living in a different province from that in which he or she was born and educated. We need some agency that will compile and keep up to date the vast number of government publications which could be of inestimable value to the schools of the nation if only teachers knew what these publications were, and how and where to get them. These publications, valuable as many of them are, are left to gather dust in some back office or storeroom just because we have no agency to provide us with a list of the material of that nature that could be made available for use in our schools. There is no list available today of all the educational institutions in Canada. Guidance officers have been asking for such a list. Nowhere today can you get a complete list of all the educational institutions. I suggest that is a job for an office such as the educational branch of the dominion bureau of statistics. It is impossible today to find a list of what scholarships are available. Pupils have a knowledge of the scholarships established by their own schools or their own communities. It is impossible for a student in any one school to know even what scholarships are available within his province. There is no way in which a student can find out what scholarships are available throughout Canada for which he could compete. I suggest that is another job that could be done by the educational branch of the dominion bureau of statistics.

I want to turn for a few moments to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have not time to deal at any length with what I consider to be some of the excellent features of its programs. If I had an hour instead of forty minutes in which to make my speech I could really inform Liberal members of the house of just what a good job the C.B.C. is doing on a very small budget. I want to mention—and again I regret I have not time to develop the subject at any length—the educational work that is being done by the national film board. I want to refer to one paragraph from my prepared speech that has a particular connection with schools. The board maintains a complete visual aid service for schools, including films, film strips, glass slides, flat pictures and posters, and I am told that these aids are used in most Canadian schools. There are more than one thousand schools in Ontario alone making use of them. Some idea of the extent of their work may be gathered from the fact that in ten years the film board has produced approximately 2,500 films, and has established a film library of more than 400 films in French and English. They have assisted in setting up 250 film councils and film libraries. There is a regular monthly showing of Canadian documentary films in some 500 theatres. The motion picture association of Canada estimates that in 1948 the national film board Canadian newsreel audience totalled 60 million people, and about 320 million in the United States.

I have not time to touch on the educational work that is being done by such organizations as the national museum where I understand about two-thirds of the exhibits have to be kept in the basement because of lack of space. Nor have I time to deal with the national art gallery where again over half the pictures in their possession have to be stored in back rooms and basements because of lack of space to display them.

In the few minutes remaining at my disposal I want to turn to the broader issue of federal aid for education at every level. I submit there is now no question whatever about the feasibility of federal aid for education without interference with provincial rights. Two departments of the federal government have spent well over a quarter of a billion dollars in the past ten years on vocational education at the secondary school and university level. There has been no friction with the provincial governments on this score. The federal government has spent nearly $162 million in educating veterans. This work is now nearing completion, and the government will not be required any longer to spend these millions of dollars on their education. I submit that millions should now be available for aid to education within the provincially controlled schools of the nation.

For 1946 the total cost of provincially controlled schools in Canada was $186 million. An annual federal grant of $50 million to be allotted among the provinces would give education in Canada possibly the greatest fillip it has ever received with the exception of the educational work that was done in the forces during the war. That certainly would bring us closer to a realization of equal educational opportunity for all Canadian children; and that opportunity, I submit, should be limited only by the ability of the student to profit by it and the ability of the nation to provide it.

So I do urge the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to include on the agenda for the dominion-provincial conference to be held in January the question of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in the matter of federal aid to education, thereby providing wider educational opportunities for more Canadian boys and girls. As I have said, no longer can there be any question of the willingness of provincial governments to accept federal aid for education, nor is there any question of their readiness to co-operate with the federal government in the administration and use of such aid for the benefit of those who are to be educated.

There can be no question as to the lack of equal educational opportunity in Canadian schools. Municipal and provincial governments, with the ever-increasing financial burdens which our constitution lays upon their doorstep, can no longer meet the educational requirements of our youth. Educational facilities vary as between province and province and even as between municipality and municipality within the same province. The educational opportunities available to a Canadian boy or girl today depend to a large extent upon the chance of being born and educated in one of our wealthier municipalities or provinces. That principle, I submit, is wrong, but it can be remedied only by aid for education given from the federal treasury to the provinces.

The inequalities of educational opportunity in Canada are ably set forth in a brief prepared by the Canadian teachers' federation, from which I should like to quote briefly in conclusion. In that brief, which was presented to the members of the cabinet last spring, they ask:

> Is the government aware of the following facts?
> (1) That one out of every ten persons engaged in teaching Canadian children holds only a permit or temporary certificate, i.e. without the minimum professional qualifications normally demanded.
> (2) That the children of Canadians living in rural areas depend for their education upon the teachers whose services are purchased at an average salary of $1,207, whereas city children are taught by those with an average salary of $2,120. (Quebec not included in these averages because the figures are not available.)
> (3) That rural teachers are a transient group, the majority moving from one school to another (or out of teaching altogether) every two years or less, whereas the average tenure for teachers in urban schools is ten years.
> (4) That the latest available table (1947) showing median salaries reflects to a considerable degree the qualifications of teachers and gives some indication of the geographical differential in the matter of educational opportunity.

These statements are much more eloquent than I could possibly be with respect to the need for consideration at the next dominion-provincial conference of the question of federal aid to education.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I intend to deal with only one or two subjects, since it is not necessary for me to review at any length those important matters already dealt with by other members of the Social Credit party. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) dealt most effectively with the agricultural problems of this country, and it is not necessary for me to repeat his arguments because he expressed the views of this party. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) ably dealt with the problems of foreign trade, pointing out the difficulties and suggesting remedies, and I need not discuss that matter.

I want to deal with a domestic matter which is becoming increasingly important. The hon. member for Acadia dealt with the condition of our trade relations with foreign countries, but that is not the only trade condition which is bad, or which is affecting this country. Some of our industrial concerns are facing trying times, entirely because of the policies of this government. Only the other day I saw a clipping from a United States publication, American Business, in which it was prophesied that by the end of 1951 over sixty per cent of the small businesses which had been started since the war, principally by returned men, would face failure. That is unfortunate because these men have invested their entire savings in these businesses, hoping to be able to make something of their lives after having fought in the war. It is interesting to note that I am not the only one concerned over the failure of businesses in this country. The other evening the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) described the situation which exists in his constituency and the adjoining riding. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) also dealt with the situation in his constituency. Both hon. members referred to textile and woollen industries, which they said were laying off workers as a result of the devaluation policy of this government. But the matter of devaluation should be considered very carefully by the Conservative party, I think. Even before the Liberal party decided to devalue the dollar, the Conservative party had advocated the lowering of it. In the house tonight, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party reiterated his stand on that matter. I do not mention that in any spirit of criticism of the old line parties; I mention it to point out that this condition which exists in some of our industries and in the two constituencies to which I just referred is a condition which is brought about by the policies of this government as well as by the policies or suggestions of the Conservative party.

When the question of devaluation was brought up in the house, the Social Credit party opposed it. You will recall that back in 1945, when the Bretton Woods agreement was considered by this house, it was followed by the Geneva and Havana trade agreements. The results of these trade agreements are the very conditions about which we are complaining today. The Conservative party, which is complaining about the deterioration in business and the closing up of factories, advocated those policies which have resulted in these conditions. The Conservatives supported the Liberal party on the Bretton Woods, Geneva and Havana trade agreements and those are the things that are causing the difficulties today. I think it would be well worth while if everyone in this house seriously considered the policies we are pursuing today, lest they have greater repercussions than those we have mentioned.

There is another industry, too, which needs a little attention. It is not only the industries in the constituencies to which reference has already been made that need attention, but in western Canada there is a business that is threatened with closing as a result of the policies of this government. It is the potteries at Medicine Hat in which two hundred and eighty people were employed, two hundred and thirty of whom have been laid off. I have just been handed the Medicine Hat News, which speaks about this very plant under the heading "Alberta Cabinet Hears Problem of Medalta Workers." This article is contained in the Medicine Hat News of Monday, October 31, 1949. It says:

> The layoff developed a week ago as a result of devaluation of the pound sterling which resulted in eastern markets being offered British hotel and restaurant ware at twenty per cent under Canadian prices. Medalta is the largest Canadian manufacturer of this particular line, eighty per cent of its production being hotel ware.
> It was forced to close production on all but a few special decorated lines, 230 of the total work force of 280 being laid off. On Friday some forty persons were called back to work with receipt of a large C.N.R. order. This staff is still on the job with no prospect of any greater increase in employment.

That is just another case in another part of Canada in which we find a failure in business due to the policies of this government.

Still further west, there is another industry which is facing grave difficulties. It was not more than two weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, that I had in my office a man engaged in the shipbuilding industry on the west coast. He pointed out some of the difficulties facing the shipbuilding industry in Canada. He said that this industry in Canada, so far as the west coast was concerned, was almost a thing of the past. His particular company was endeavouring to get into another line of production, so they would not be forced to close up entirely. Those are conditions that one views with alarm. They are conditions that have danger signs attached to them, and we should heed those signs.

I should like to read an extract concerning the shipbuilding industry which I believe was taken from the Ottawa Citizen. The heading is, "Government Studying Ways to Help Sagging Shipping Industry."

> The government is considering ways of helping Canada's sagging shipping industry, but the policy is not expected to take shape for at least several months.

May I interject to say, Mr. Speaker, that almost anything can happen in those several months. Unless the government has a policy at hand, disaster may be the result. The articles continues:

> Transport Minister Chevrier told the Commons last night that a number of plans are being considered on how to bolster the vital shipping industry.
> "I wish I could say what those plans are, but I do not think it is in the public interest to do so," he said.

Farther down, the same article reads as follows:

> Mr. Chevrier said he fully recognizes the seriousness of the shipping situation. But it was not a problem faced only by Canada. The same was true of every country in the world.
> Increased cost of operation was one of the difficulties. Another was lack of freight and deterioration in freight rates. A third was devaluation.

Again we find in this shipbuilding industry the results of the policy pursued by this government. It seems to me that if this continues our country is in for a very bad time. For the ministers to say they are considering plans is not good enough. The government should have a definite plan to remedy this situation.

I should like to speak of another industry, one which is important not only to western Canada, but to Canada as a whole. It is facing grave difficulties and it is going to take more than just giving the matter consideration to remedy the problems facing the coal industry of western Canada. The member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke about the condition in which that industry found itself in eastern Canada. I can assure him that the coal mining industry of western Canada is facing just as serious conditions as those faced by that industry in other parts of the country.

When we live in a country possessing about fourteen per cent of the world's known supply of coal, it seems to me we should be in a position to take advantage of that great industrial asset. No nation, at least up until today, has had great success industrially without using coal. There is talk about oil, but I believe the backbone of industrial power on the North American continent must be coal. We should, therefore, give every consideration to the maintenance and prosperity of that industry.

One of the conditions facing us in the west, and the same condition is facing the east, is that there is not the market locally for all the coal we can mine or all the coal we are mining. Even today, a great many coal miners are only working three or four days a week. In the interval, they have been living on their unemployment insurance. These benefits are nearly exhausted, so they will have to turn to relief. The prospects now are not very bright for anything else. The Canadian coal mining industry is in a deplorable state. It almost faces extinction unless something is done immediately to relieve that condition. There is a good market in Canada and why we do not take advantage of it is more than I can tell. In the central part of Canada, in the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec, we have an excellent market. Some hon. members may say to me, there may be some reason for your statement; they may say to me, the mines are so far off that it is not economically feasible to have the coal shipped down here and compete with coal coming from the United States. A condition has arisen in the United States through the coal strike which is being felt by all the industries in Canada. Should we allow our coal mines to be closed down and become dependent on a foreign nation for power to run our industries in central Canada? It seems to me to be the height of folly. Even though it might cost Canada a few million dollars to increase the subsidy on coal coming down here, I believe it would be a good investment in order to ensure the continuance of the production of the industries in central Canada. Even though a strike is on in the United States and even though devaluation of the dollar has taken place, yet it does not compensate the western coal dealers in sending coal down here to compete with United States coal. This is a time when we should be considering that problem seriously.

There is another important factor which should lead us to the preservation of our coal mining industry in Canada, namely, what would happen to us in time of war. We had an unfortunate experience of that during the last war when we were so short of coal because the United States refused to ship us any more inasmuch as they needed it themselves. If we allow our coal industry to close down, what will happen to us in a time of great national need? Just what happened during the last war. In this instance I do not think we should rely on a foreign nation for our coal supply.

There is another problem which will face us if we allow our coal industry to close down. Seven hundred thousand people are employed in the coal industry. If we allow the mines to close, even though oil production is increasing in the west, when we have a market here in eastern Canada, then we shall be faced with a tremendous unemployment problem, a problem that the federal government will have to face sooner or later, because unemployment is becoming quite serious. It was estimated that there were over a hundred thousand employable unemployed on July 4. It is quite safe to say that there are at least 250,000 unemployed in Canada today. We cannot afford to have that number of unemployed climb much higher without serious repercussion in the country.

The cost of transportation is one of the difficult problems that we face in western Canada in order to obtain a market in central Canada. There are several factors which contribute to that high cost. The present freight rate alone on coal coming from the west is $8.33 a ton. On top of that we have the increased freight rates. The house will recall that the last increase the railways were asking for was 20 per cent. They received 8 per cent, but on coal they were allowed a straight 8 cents a ton flat increased rate. Just at a time when we really need a lower cost of transportation we have an increase in freight rates which could have been prevented by this government, making it still more difficult for us in western Canada to get our coal down to eastern Canada. It is true that the federal government pays a subsidy of $2.50 a ton on this coal; but even with that subsidy it is not possible to lay that coal down here and compete with Pennsylvania coal. If we allow that condition to prevail there is only one thing that is certain, namely, that our mines will close down.

It costs us between $16 and $18 a ton to lay down bituminous coal in Ontario. I should like to read a little clipping from the Financial Times of Friday, October 28, in regard to that question. It reads as follows:

Pressure Mounts for Coal Policy as Imports Stop
Consumers Discover for Themselves High Transport Cost—Subvention Fails to Make Canadian Coal Fully Competitive

The article goes on to say:

Inquiries have therefore been made in Calgary and Edmonton, about the possibility of shipping coal from the foothills to Ontario. It was thought that increased costs of United States coal might finally have succeeded in making Alberta coal competitive in the east.

This does not seem to be the case, however. Although the would-be buyers of Alberta coal were favourably impressed with the prices that were quoted, and with the quality of the coal that was described to them both as to cleanliness and heating value, the cost of transportation threw all considerations out of gear. It costs $8.33 per ton, in carload lots, to get coal from Alberta to Ontario; and this after the subsidy paid by the government of $2.50 per ton.

Approximately one of every three tons of coal consumed in Canada is produced in this country. Particularly in the maritimes and, of course, throughout the western provinces, Canadian coal is burned to a very great extent in Quebec and to a greater extent in Ontario, the coal is almost exclusively American. Most of the anthracite burned in Canada is American but, in the case of bituminous coal, the business is competitive, or would be competitive if the freight costs enabled Canadian mines to compete. At $8.33 per ton this is, of course, not likely, considering that United States coal comes to Canada largely in lake boats at much lower rates.

There are others who are concerned with the probable failure—I should not say "probable", I should say almost certain failure—of the coal mining industry, particularly in western Canada. It would not be an entire loss if the federal government were to raise the subvention on coal. They pay $2.50 a ton, but I am sure they could at least double that amount and still make it worth while from an all-Canadian standpoint. When you remember that we ship in $41 million worth of anthracite and $97·9 million worth of bituminous, making a total of $138·9 million from the United States each year, you can see that it would be a tremendous saving of United States dollars, and once again we would have the provinces both east and west coming to Canada's aid in the United States dollar shortage. I say even if we had to pay a much higher subsidy it would be to the federal government's financial advantage in the long run to increase the subsidy on western coal so that we would be able to put the coal down here in eastern markets and compete with the coal coming from the United States. The time has come, Mr. Speaker, for the federal government to consider a national coal policy, having in mind the things which I have suggested.

We are not overlooking the fact that oil is a keen competitor in the field of producing industrial power. We must recognize that probably oil development is going to be a very serious problem which must be dealt with in competition with coal. But from the standpoint of safety alone of the Dominion of Canada in time of war, and in other emergencies, it would be well worth our while to see that the coal mines of western Canada and Nova Scotia are kept in operation. In order to do that, it may be necessary to extend the research in the processing of coal, in an endeavour to extract oil or other by-products from it.

In a time of great emergency, in a time of war—particularly another war—it is very possible that this North American continent may become so isolated that it, including the United States, would not be able to get oil from any other outside source. It may stand us in good stead if we have developed the process in this country whereby we can get oil from coal, or use the coal in its natural form. In my opinion we dare not allow our coal mines to go.

I wish to read a brief article in connection with this subject entitled "Coal Industry Must Pay Attention to Oil". I read this to show that those who are interested in coal-mining, including trade unions and others, are vitally concerned and recognize fully the competition that will come from oil. This dispatch from Sydney, Nova Scotia, states:

The coal industry must become a coal-into-oil industry or it is due for a serious and permanent decline, the United Mine Workers (C.C.L.) district 26 told the dominion coal board today.

In a brief, the union said the coal industry is headed for a decline because of the tremendous growth in the use of oil by industry, railways and residential consumers. The board is holding maritime sittings to hear various views on the industry.

It presented figures to show that in 1947 the maritimes consumed oil equivalent to 1,000,000 tons of coal, and that since 1943 oil consumption in the maritimes had increased by the equivalent of 350,000 tons of coal. During the same period coal consumptions declined by 600,000 tons.

The brief said the first step in development of an oil-from-coal industry in Cape Breton should be construction, at government cost, of a demonstration or pilot plant for experimentation. Fuel oil from coal now costs not more than three cents per gallon more than natural oil, the brief said. Operation of a commercial hydrogenation plant for experimentation would soon reduce this gap.

There is a good deal of truth in that. But whether the statement is based upon fact or not, surely our research branch in the dominion government could make very material progress in connection with the hydrogenation of coal in order to take the by-product of oil from it. This was done in Germany—in fact Germany almost conquered the world because of her highly mechanized armed forces which operated on oil produced from coal. So that what Germany could do, surely we could do, too.

There is one other subject with which I wish to deal briefly, namely that of old age pensions. I do not think I could go to sleep tonight and rest comfortably if I did not say a word for our senior citizens in Canada. I say this, not because I am partial to the subject at all—although I confess I am—but because it is within our physical potentialities to produce so much in this country that everyone should have the highest possible standard of living. That being so, I am not advocating anything the country cannot economically or financially do.

Our old age pensioners receive a maximum of $40. If every old age pensioner in Canada were to receive that maximum pension, they could not have anything but a very sub-standard living. When one considers the high cost of rent, coupled with the exceptionally high food costs—and they are still going higher and higher—there does not need to be any argument to convince every member in the house that it is an utter impossibility for human beings to exist decently on $40 a month.

But the old age pensioners of Canada do not all get that much. The Social Credit party—others too, but at least the Social Credit party—has advocated a minimum pension of at least $50 a month. We would be a sorry nation indeed if we could not produce enough in this country to give our old age pensioners at least that amount. These are the people who so faithfully worked all their years to build the Canada of which we are so proud; yet we turn them aside, with little thought, and with $40 a month, expecting them to exist on that pittance. It must indeed be an irritation and humiliation for these people to eke out their living on such a small amount.

We also advocate that the age for old age pensions should be lowered to 65 years for men and 60 years for women, and that when a husband qualifies for old age pension the wife too should automatically qualify. The reason is obvious. Usually the husband is the breadwinner, and when he has reached the age of three score and ten he is not capable of producing a living then for himself and his wife. As so often happens, however, the husband gets $40 a month—if he is lucky enough to get the maximum—and then the two of them must live on that $40. This makes it absurd.

Surely it should not require argument in the House of Commons to convince members that two people cannot live on $40. One could not have a decent living on it, so we should not expect two to do it. We say therefore that when the husband qualifies for the old age pension the wife should qualify automatically.

I believe old age pensions should be non-contributory. The only ones in Canada who are going to require assistance in their old age are going to be those who cannot possibly earn sufficient so that they may save enough to take care of themselves in their declining years. How in the world could we expect those people to contribute toward an old age pension?—and they are the only ones who will need it. It seems absurd to ask them to contribute out of their meagre savings so that they may obtain a pension upon reaching the age of seventy years.

Each one who at the present time is receiving an old age pension is contributing every day of his life very materially, because each time he buys an article from his old age pension allotment he is making a substantial contribution to the income of Canada, and to the consolidated revenue fund. Therefore let it not be said that the old age pensioners, or those who will come under pension provisions in years to come, are not making their contributions, even at this time. We say therefore that the old age pension should be non-contributory. I do not want to keep the house any longer, but I did want to say those few words.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Thatcher), which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSING

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE RESPECTING RENT CONTROL

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I could have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions, I should like to make a statement respecting rent control.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: For some time now the government has been considering what action should be taken with respect to rent control when the present legislation expires. As hon. members are aware, the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, 1947, will expire on March 31, 1950, or sixty days after parliament first meets during the year 1950, whichever date be the earlier.

Just about a year ago—to be exact, on October 23, 1948—I wrote to the premiers of each of the provincial governments, advising them that the federal government was prepared to vacate the field to any province which might decide to undertake rent control. I offered, on behalf of the government, to make available to any province the records, information, experience and staff of the rentals administration and also, subject to parliament's approval, to pay the cost of any provincial rental administration for one year. At the same time I reminded the provincial premiers that the constitutionality of federal rent control had been questioned and was before the courts, and referred to the situation that would arise should federal rent control be held to be invalid.

None of the then existing provinces was prepared to undertake rent control. On the other hand, when Newfoundland joined Canada it retained its own system of rent control.

In offering to vacate the field to the provinces a year ago the federal government was not seeking to relieve itself of responsibility for rent control. It was motivated solely by concern for the situation that would arise should rent control be held to be beyond the constitutional powers of the federal authorities. It believed at that time that the sudden end of rent control would result in unnecessary disruption and hardship, and it offered to put the matter beyond doubt by giving the provinces an opportunity to introduce legislation that could not be successfully challenged in the courts.

May I say at this point that the advice which the government receives from its law officers is that the existing federal regulations with respect to rent control are valid. But in a matter which concerns the welfare of so many Canadians the government would not be discharging its responsibilities to the people of Canada as it should if it did not take every precaution. It is possible that the courts would decide that our regulations are unconstitutional. We cannot disregard that possibility.

If there was uncertainty about the position a year ago, there is at least the same degree of uncertainty today. The government has therefore decided to refer the question of the validity of the rental regulations to the supreme court, in the hope and expectation that a decision will be given before the present legislation expires. As I have said, the law officers of the crown are of opinion that the rentals regulations are valid. They are also of opinion that both the law and the facts support the view that it lies within the authority of parliament to extend these regulations for a further period. Counsel will be instructed by the Attorney General of Canada to press this view before the court. The order in council making the reference is being prepared and when approved will be tabled in this house.

If no unfavourable decision is given, the government at the next session will ask parliament to grant a further extension of the rentals regulations. The government intends to continue with its program of orderly decontrol as rapidly as conditions warrant but we do not believe that this program can be completed before March 31, 1950. Let me make it quite clear that the purpose of clarifying the legal position is not to perpetuate federal rent control. On the contrary, the purpose is to confirm our authority to proceed in an orderly way towards the eventual withdrawal of all controls. This has been our firm policy towards wartime controls in general and rent control is no exception.

Should the supreme court find that the rentals regulations are now beyond the powers of parliament, then of course a different situation arises. I am accordingly writing at once to the premiers of the provinces acquainting them with our intention and offering to assist in the preparation of what might be termed "stand-by" legislation if they wish to present such legislation to their respective legislatures.

After the most careful consideration of all the alternatives, the government believes that this course of action is the best. We believe that gradual and orderly decontrol is the right policy. At any time, however, that policy could be frustrated by an adverse decision of the courts. Such a decision might come at a most inconvenient time when the provinces might not be in a position to act as they see fit in the interests of their residents. By referring the question to the supreme court before the present legislation expires and by giving ample notice of our intention to do so, such a situation can, we hope, be avoided.

I should add that the federal government, of course, continues to stand ready at any time to vacate the field of rent control to any province which makes a formal request to that effect. We do not wish to stand in the way of any province which desires to operate in the field of rent control.

I also wish to take this opportunity of announcing some further measures of decontrol.

We have made some progress in the direction of decontrol since the end of the war, but a very high proportion of tenanted dwellings is still subject to the rentals regulations and maximum rentals are undoubtedly still well below the levels that would be established in a free market. Before the rentals regulations are completely withdrawn I hope that there will be some further improvement in the housing situation, and I think it fair to say that no other country is overcoming its housing shortage more quickly. Nevertheless, it seems probable that rentals might well settle eventually at a level substantially above the present maximum levels provided in our regulations. Sooner or later the adjustment must be made, and, as I have said, it is our policy to permit this adjustment to be made gradually rather than abruptly.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The rentals regulations are accordingly being amended as follows:

(1) Rentals for rooms, parts of houses and the like, in which a tenant is required to share toilet facilities or some other similar equipment, may be increased by not more than 20 per cent. I should point out that there have been no previous general increases in maximum rentals for this kind of accommodation since the introduction of rent control. Landlords of such accommodation are also being given the right to terminate any lease on six months' notice. These changes do not apply to per person rates, that is, to rates which include services such as the provision of furniture, linen and so forth. There is already a sufficient degree of flexibility in the present regulations applying to per person rates.

(2) Landlords will be permitted to offer a term certain lease for not less than one year in consideration of a rental increase of not more than 20 per cent in the case of unheated self-contained dwellings and of not more than 25 per cent in the case of heated self-contained dwellings. This lease must contain a clause permitting the tenant to terminate it at one month's notice. If the tenant refuses the offer the landlord may require him to vacate under the laws of the province and the accommodation then becomes free of federal rent control.

(3) Landlords and tenants may enter into term certain leases of not less than two years' duration at any rental upon which they may agree. The rentals administrator has already given approval to about 2,500 joint applications by landlord and tenant to enter into such two-year leases. Hereafter these two-year leases will not require the specific approval of the administrator.

(4) Landlords who owned accommodation prior to November 1, 1949, will be enabled to gain possession for their own use as a residence on giving six months' notice declaring their need. Until now landlords have had this right only in respect of accommodation which they owned prior to November 1, 1947. The rule that such notices may not expire during the winter months is also being withdrawn. It is not retroactive, of course, so that none of the notices already given will expire during the coming six months' period.

These are the major changes being made at the present time. They will become effective by orders of the wartime prices and trade board, as from December 15, 1949. A number of other sundry changes are also being made and they will be announced in the usual way when the orders themselves are completed and published.

May I add one final word to which I hope the press will give some prominence. In order to carry out the changes which have been announced it will be necessary to print and distribute many thousands of forms. They will be made available as quickly as possible. Even under the most favourable circumstances, however, some time will elapse before every rentals office in the country has an adequate supply on hand. This necessary delay will not in any way affect the rights of landlords or tenants because, as I have said, the orders do not become effective until the middle of next month. My advice to the general public therefore is to wait for a further announcement by the rentals administration before applying to local offices for the forms and other details.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. Speaker: The house will now resume consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott that I do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. Blackmore: May I move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: There are six government resolutions on the order paper and we intend to proceed with those six resolutions tomorrow. I shall give merely a tentative order because I could not get in touch with all the ministers concerned. The first would be No. 13, under the name of the Minister of Transport, concerning the Temiscouata Railway; second, No. 14, a measure to authorize the governor in council to grant to the province of British Columbia a subsidy for the construction of a railway; the third item would be a resolution under the name of the Minister of Agriculture, presenting a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act; No. 4 would be a resolution under the name of the Minister of Finance to authorize the Canadian National Railways to issue securities not exceeding a certain amount; and the last would be a resolution in the name of the minister of reconstruction concerning the trans-Canada highway. If perchance we concluded all that business, we would go into supply and take up Transport. I am sorry; there is one resolution I omitted and that is No. 12, in the name of the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 4, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER AND DEPUTY COMMISSIONER—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table correspondence between Mr. F. A. McGregor and myself relating to his resignation, and correspondence dealing with the resignation of the deputy commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, Mr. Ian MacKeigan.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the resignation of a minister or a high official, letters are sometimes read. The minister has tabled the letters in this case. Could they be printed in Hansard so that hon. members might have access to them?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Garson: I would have no objection to that, if it meets with—

Mr. Howe: Oh, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was there not a memorandum attached to Mr. McGregor's letter, and if so, is that also tabled?

Mr. Garson: Yes, quite right; the memorandum is there.

Mr. Coldwell: Do we understand that all the correspondence is to be printed?

Mr. Howe: No; the custom is to table letters of resignation. It is not the custom to print such correspondence in the records of the house. This is the resignation of an officer of a department. The letters have been tabled, and my hon. friend can get them from the Clerk.

Mr. Coldwell: Will they be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Coldwell: I submit that this correspondence is of sufficient importance to justify its being printed in Hansard and made part of the record.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is not unanimous consent to have the documents printed in Hansard.

Mr. MacInnis: Is there any reason why they should not be read by the minister, if they are not printed in Hansard?

Mr. Harris (Danforth): As one minister seems to have one idea in the matter, and another senior member has another, let us clarify the situation and get this group together as one unit. I think the Minister of Justice should clarify the situation. Let us have it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Garson: I am—

Mr. MacInnis: In view of the fact that there is objection to placing the correspondence on Hansard, should it not be read to the house?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. MacInnis: In a case of this kind, where there is so much public opinion in regard to the matter.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, it is this. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked me whether there was any objection so far as I was concerned to the publication of these letters in Hansard. My answer is that there is none.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): So far as the government is concerned.

Mr. Garson: Just a moment. I understand, however, that before the letters can be published in Hansard as my hon. friend suggests, there has to be unanimous consent of the house, and as it is apparent that there is not unanimous consent, I am afraid it will not be possible to comply with the hon. member's request.

Mr. Coldwell: Who is objecting? Is it the understanding that there is unanimous consent to the tabling and printing of the documents?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: It is apparent that there is not unanimous consent of the house to have them printed in Hansard; therefore I cannot order that that be done.

Mr. MacInnis: Who is objecting?

Mr. Mitchell: I am.

Mr. MacInnis: What are you hiding?

Mr. Mitchell: On a point of privilege, the hon. member for Vancouver East has suggested I have something to hide.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): That would be something new.

Mr. Mitchell: I ask him to withdraw that. At one time during the last war, as the hon. member for Lake Centre will vividly recollect, I had twelve ranking civil servants resign in a week. The fact that a civil servant hands in his resignation does not necessarily mean that the correspondence must be put on the record.

Mr. Coldwell: Again I say that the officer who has resigned was the chief commissioner under one of the important acts of parliament, ranking as a deputy minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order; there is nothing before the house. An announcement by a minister is not, strictly speaking, debatable.

[Later:]

QUESTION AS TO REPORTS ON INQUIRIES—TABLING OF REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. As reported on page 891 of Hansard of February 5, 1948, the then minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley, speaking in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, said:

> I can tell the house at the present time six major inquiries are being proceeded with, that the report in one case is expected before long and the other should be made within the next few months.

Has the minister received any other reports than the two already made public, and the third which is about to be made public? If so, what commodities or industries were reported on, and when were the reports received by the minister?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is no.

Mr. Knowles: Is the Minister of Justice now in position to answer the question I asked yesterday, namely, the date on which the flour milling report was transmitted to the Minister of Justice by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Garson: December 29, 1948.

Mr. Church: May I ask the Minister of Justice if this whole matter is not one of property and civil rights and employer and employee, which would come within the jurisdiction of the provinces and as such would not apply federally?

Mr. Garson: If I understand my hon. friend's question correctly, my answer would be that it has been the view of lawyers that the Combines Investigation Act is perfectly within the powers of parliament to enact under its control over the criminal law. I think I am right in stating that that has been so found by the privy council.

Mr. Church: And for that reason it has failed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question about the withholding from parliament of the report in connection with the flour milling industry which was received on December 29, 1948. What was the justification for withholding such a report, when under the statute it should be tabled in parliament within fifteen days? I see that is one of the reasons for Mr. McGregor's resignation, and I think the House of Commons is entitled to an explanation.

Mr. Garson: I think that the hon. member's question is clearly one which, under the rules, cannot be asked on the orders of the day, especially without notice. Certainly it is a question which I could not answer within short compass. If my hon. friend will refer to the letter which I have written to Mr. McGregor in reply to his letter of resignation, he will find a condensed account, it is true, but nevertheless an explanation of the point that is bothering the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, surely—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Howe: It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The statute says that the House of Commons should have the report within a certain time. I ask why it was not tabled as required by statute.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): State your question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lake Centre has asked his question, and the Minister of Justice has given an answer. The answer may not be satisfactory to the hon. member, but the rules provide that a minister may even decline to answer a question, and of course no debate is allowed on an answer. I think the house will have to be satisfied with the answer which has been given.

Mr. Coldwell: The Minister of Justice has said that the reasons are set forth in his communication. I submit that is all the more reason why these letters should be published in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz.:

Of Marcel Monette, Esquire, for the electoral district of Mercier.

Of James M. Macdonnell, Esquire, for the electoral district of Greenwood.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INSTITUTION AND CONDUCT OF PROSECUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Garson: This bill is designed to carry into effect three recommendations of the combines investigation commissioner which are designed to strengthen the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act and the related legislation contained in section 498 of the Criminal Code. The bill proposes no changes in the definition of offences or in the basic pattern of the legislation. It contains a number of provisions which are intended to remove certain procedural and evidentiary difficulties that have been encountered in combines proceedings, namely, difficulties arising out of the judgment of the Ontario court of appeal in the dental supplies case.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STEEL INDUSTRY

UTILIZATION OF CANADIAN IRON ORE—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the government has noted certain news stories, particularly one which appeared on page 7 of the Montreal Gazette of this morning, foreshadowing the building of a fully integrated steel plant in the New England states to utilize iron ore from the newly-discovered deposits in Canada? Will the government consider taking all necessary steps to protect the interests of the Canadian people in the utilization of this great resource, and place before parliament proposals for the establishment of an efficient steel industry in this country for the utilization of Canada's iron ore?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have looked up the clipping referred to, and I notice that it deals with a statement by the vice-president of the federal reserve bank in Boston to the effect that an integrated steel mill will be built in the New England states. The report reads:

> If and when such a mill is established, there's an immediate ore supply available from Belle isle, Newfoundland.

Then the report goes on to say that, later on, the mill will be able to get ore from Quebec. I can see no reason for objecting to the building of a fully integrated steel plant in the New England states. Iron ore mines in Newfoundland have been for many years supplying iron ore to Great Britain, Germany and other European countries. Those mines are also the sole suppliers of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, in Cape Breton. I am sure that if another outlet for the ore can be found we shall all be happy to see the Belle isle operation enlarged.

So far as the Labrador iron ore mines are concerned, I understand that the plans call for an initial production of 10 million tons of iron ore per year. I believe the total requirements of all Canadian steel mills total about 5,500,000 tons per year. It is obvious that our steel mills can be supplied with all the ore they require, and, if a new market convenient geographically to the mines is available, it would provide a desirable outlet for that ore.

We have an integrated steel industry in Canada, which has been expanded by nearly 100 per cent within the past ten years, and is still expanding. The Canadian industry obtains part of its iron ore requirements in Canada and part in the United States. Regardless of how much iron ore this country produced, our steel industry would continue to obtain its ore from both sources, because of the desirability of having a number of different types of iron ore with which to make the steel. Therefore, I see nothing alarming in this newspaper report, nothing that threatens in any way to jeopardize Canada's interests in iron ore or in steel.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES—CORRESPONDENCE WITH ATTORNEYS GENERAL OF PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Is the Minister of Justice in position to give us any report on the replies received from the provincial attorneys general in response to the inquiry he was making of them with respect to obscene literature and comics? Can he indicate when we can expect to be able to proceed with Bill No. 10?

Temiscouata Railway

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Having received notice of this question only about two minutes ago, I shall have to draw upon my memory in replying to it. The only acknowledgment to our letters of inquiry which we have received so far has been from Mr. Duplessis, premier of Quebec. It was merely an acknowledgment and an undertaking to go into the matter and advise us further.

In my letters to the provincial attorneys general I suggested that the matter was one of some urgency, and that we should like to have the replies as soon as possible. I even had the temerity to suggest that if possible we should get them not later than November 15.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEWFOUNDLAND—BRIDGE OVER PLACENTIA GUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Arising out of the answer I received yesterday from the Minister of Public Works, I wish to ask him a supplementary question. I was inquiring as to the investigation that had taken place in Placentia, Newfoundland, with regard to a bridge over the gut there, and the answer I received was that a survey of the site and a preliminary report only had been made. Has any action been taken on that report since the investigation was made before May 27?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): If the hon. member will put his question on the order paper, I will endeavour to answer it.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the purchase by the government of Canada of the Temiscouata railway and that the Minister of Finance may, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, pay any amounts, not exceeding in the aggregate four hundred and eighty thousand dollars, that are payable under the terms of an agreement dated the 14th day of October, 1949, between His Majesty the King in the right of Canada and the Temiscouata Railway Company at such times and in such manner as are set out in the agreement.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I might have the permission of the house to make my statement in committee of the whole.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this resolution seeks approval of the purchase of the Temiscouata railway, payment by the Minister of Finance of a sum not exceeding $480,000 for the acquisition thereof, and, finally, sanction of an agreement entered into by His Majesty the King and the Temiscouata Railway Company in respect of the purchase of the railway.

I should like to deal with the facts concerning the purchase of the railway and the agreement which followed, and give a brief history of the railway and the reasons which prompted the government to request the Canadian National Railways to acquire the Temiscouata railway.

The Temiscouata railway extends from Riviere du Loup in the province of Quebec to Edmundston in the province of New Brunswick, a distance of eighty-one miles, thence westerly along the Saint John river to Connors, a total distance of 113 miles, sixty-nine miles of which are in the province of Quebec and forty-four miles in the province of New Brunswick.

The Temiscouata railway connects with the Canadian National railways at Riviere du Loup and at Edmundston, and with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Edmundston. The total mileage of the railway, including sidings and other tracks, is as follows: The main line from Riviere du Loup to Connors, 101 miles; running rights over the Canadian National railways between Edmundston and Baker Brook, 11.9 miles, or a total operated mileage of 113; sidings and other tracks owned, 9.3 miles, making a total for all tracks of 122.3 miles.

The railway from Riviere du Loup to Edmundston was opened to traffic on January 1, 1889. The section from Edmundston to Connors was built subsequently and opened for traffic on November 10, 1891. The capital structure of the railway is made up of 10,000 shares at $100 each. The authorized capital is $1 million, and the full amount of that capital has been issued. Added to that is an issue of five per cent consolidated mortgage income bonds, due in 1950, amounting to £586,948, which was authorized and issued, and which at par would amount to $2,856,336. That is at the time that the pound was at $4.80, I believe.

Mr. Green: Pounds or dollars?

Mr. Chevrier: At the time that the pound was $4.80. I make that point now because at the time of purchase the bonds were valued at $2,362,000.

Mr. Green: Is that dollars or pounds?

Mr. Chevrier: That is dollars. No dividends have been paid on the capital stock since issue, and no interest on the bonds since 1930. Prior to 1930 only partial interest was paid on the bonds. The operating results of the railway have not been good, particularly in the years 1943 to 1948. I have a table which perhaps I might summarize fairly quickly. For instance, in 1943 operating revenues amounted to $319,000 and operating expenses to $304,000, but because of other expenses the net corporate income of the Temiscouata Railway Company was only $208. In 1944 the net income was $315. In 1945 there was a deficit of $272. In 1946 there was a net income of $9,821, and in 1947 a net income of $1,161. In 1948 there was a deficit of $156.

The traffic handled over the railway was small. I refer to the years 1943 to 1948. The total tonnage varied from 180,943 in 1943 to 192,081 in 1948. The greatest tonnage carried was in 1946, when it amounted to 202,223 tons. The forest products which originated on the line accounted for over eighty per cent of the freight traffic I have just mentioned. The number of passengers carried varied from 37,245 in 1943 to only 11,670 in 1948. The present train service consists of a mixed passenger and freight train on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday between Riviere du Loup and Edmundston, and freight service only between Edmundston and Connors.

It has been evident for quite some time, at least two years if not more, that the Temiscouata railway could not continue to operate under present conditions. It has been able to operate only through assistance given by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and also because of the willingness of the employees of that railway to accept subnormal wages.

Mr. Green: How many employees are there?

Mr. Chevrier: I am coming to that. The average number of employees in 1948 was 144, with a total pay roll of $258,702. If the wage rate of the Canadian National had been in effect, the pay roll would have been $399,490, an increase of $140,000, or 54 per cent.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is it a standard gauge railway?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes. From the start the employees of the Temiscouata railway have been paid much lower wages than were paid on other Canadian railways; and, as I said a moment ago, this was one reason why the railway was able to continue to operate. The assistance granted the Temiscouata by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific in 1948 for special divisions of revenue and per diem assistance on equipment amounted to $73,400, made up as follows: Canadian National, $49,125; Canadian Pacific, $24,275.

It was evident in 1948, therefore, that the company could not continue to maintain the railway in a safe condition and operate it at present traffic levels, and they indicated that a a matter of business they would be forced to abandon operations and take what salvage they could get. The ownership of the railway is represented by an issue of bondholders' scrip held by a bondholders' committee with head office in London, England. That committee offered to sell those securities for twenty-five per cent of their face value. The face value of the bonds amounted to £586,918, which at par would amount to $2,856,336. At the then rate of exchange their face value would amount to approximately $2,361,950, and twenty-five per cent of that would be $590,480.

The matter of the purchase of the Temiscouata was given careful consideration by the government, and for the following reasons it was decided to purchase the railway.

The population served by the railway was estimated some time ago at 38,000, of whom 17,000 are served by other railways; and it is probable that a present-day census would reveal a much greater number of people depending upon the railway for transportation service. A number of lumber mills are located on the railway. The Fraser company have operated a large mill at Cabano for nearly fifty years. This mill cuts nearly ten million feet board measure of lumber per year. Smaller mills are located at Cabano, Notre Dame du Lac and St. Jacques. Also a number of smaller mills are located in the Squatteck district northeast of lake Temiscouata, and their products are hauled to the tracks at Cabano and Ste. Rose. The country between Baker Brook and Connors consists of good farming land, with considerable good lumber and pulpwood in the back country. Abandonment of the operation of this railway would seriously affect the people whom it serves, and create complications in the existing economy of the area served. It is considered essential in the national interest to keep this railway in operation.

Conditions along the lines of those existing at the moment in connection with the Temiscouata railway prompted the government some years ago to make similar purchases of railways in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec. A number of those lines had no net earning possibilities in their individual status, but their continued operation was considered to be essential in the national interest. The properties were acquired by the government at prices arrived at by negotiation with the interests holding the proprietarial rights, and they were incorporated in the Canadian government railways. Under the authority of chapter 16, 5 George V, acts of 1915, the government acquired some nine railway lines from private companies, totalling 407 miles, at an average cost per mile of $9,191. Under the authority of chapter 22, 6-7 George V, acts of 1916, the government acquired two additional lines of railway totalling 97 miles, at an average cost of $37,048 per mile.

Then there is the position in reference to competition. Highway competition is quite keen in that area. Several highways parallel the Temiscouata railway and bus and truck services are operated in competition with it, which have contributed in no small measure to the falling off of both passenger and freight traffic.

After giving this matter careful consideration the government requested the Canadian National Railways to purchase the Temiscouata railway at a price not to exceed $500,000. The owners, represented by the bondholders' committee in London, England, held a meeting and accepted the offer made by the Canadian National on behalf of the government, and called a special general meeting of the shareholders for that purpose. Meanwhile an agreement was drafted between the government and the Temiscouata, both of which were ratified at the special general meeting. That is the agreement referred to in the resolution, dated October 14, 1949; and parliament is now being asked to sanction it.

Mr. Brooks: What rolling stock is being taken over?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a lengthy list of locomotives, box cars, equipment and the like. I would have to get it for my hon. friend. I would be only making an estimate if I attempted to give the value now.

Mr. Brooks: It was the value more than the quantity I wanted to get, in order to compare it with the cost of the railway.

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing with the value, perhaps I can say that twenty-five per cent of the bonded indebtedness amounted to $950,000. As I stated, the Canadian National was authorized to make an offer not exceeding $500,000. They were able to purchase it for $480,000. The house will be interested in knowing that current assets, less the current liabilities, amount to $137,000. Furthermore, the Canadian National Railways indicated to us that, as scrap, the railway was worth about $240,000; so that, with the $137,000 cash to which I have referred, the agreement is an excellent one, I should think. This is particularly true when it is compared to the amount per mile which was paid for the other railways I mentioned.

Mr. Brooks: Is there any intention of scrapping any part of the railway? There is a rumor to that effect.

Mr. Chevrier: Not the slightest; it is intended to operate it.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I gather from the minister's remarks he expects this will mean another $20,000 loaded on to the Canadian National Railways operating deficit?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know what the exact amount will be, but it might be in that neighbourhood.

Mr. Hatfield: Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to improve that part of the railway from Rivière du Loup to Edmundston, and from Edmundston to Connors. I believe that portion of the railroad is the crookedest in the world. It goes around in circles. Is there any guarantee that the stations now on this route from Edmundston to Connors will not be closed? The transcontinental route parallels this part of the road from Connors to Edmundston.

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to the first question, it is the intention of the Canadian National to spend substantial sums of money, but what those amounts are I am unable to tell the committee. It will take a considerable sum of money to put the railway in fair condition. I cannot answer the second question. I should not think it is the intention of the railway to close any stations—certainly not at this time.

Mr. Hatfield: Can the minister tell us how much the railway intends to spend on improvements? In my opinion the road from Riviere du Loup to Cabano could be eliminated. Cabano is the largest revenue-producing station on the route. I suppose the member for Temiscouata would object to that. From Riviere du Loup to Cabano the route goes through a wilderness, so it does not produce any revenue. The remainder of the route from Edmundston to Cabano and from Edmundston to Connors should be kept in operation as a feeder to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, apparently this is the first time in about thirty-three years that action of this kind has been taken. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but that is what I gathered from his remarks. I suggest to him that he agree to have the bill referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection.

Mr. Green: The minister says he has no objection to that course being followed. It may be that we are establishing a precedent here, and the facts indicated by the minister certainly seem to warrant some sort of inquiry. I understood him to say that the government had instructed the Canadian National Railways to purchase this line; is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: Correct.

Mr. Green: In other words, Canadian National Railways did not recommend that the line be taken over; that is correct?

Mr. Chevrier: I made my statement, and it is quite clear from what I said.

Mr. Green: In fairness to the Canadian National Railways I think it should be pointed out that if the Canadian National is expected to provide a service which cannot possibly pay its way, the cost will have to be borne by the Canadian people as a whole. It would not be fair to blame the Canadian National if they have a deficit on this line. I think this should be borne in mind. We cannot expect them to operate profitably when such a railway line is handed over to them by the government. Will the minister table the agreement? We have had no opportunity of seeing it or studying its terms. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. Chevrier: There is at this stage. The agreement forms a part of a bill, and the whole matter will be referred to the committee for discussion.

Mr. Sinnott: We are dealing with a half million dollars now; can the minister tell us what has been the deficit of this railway line over the last five years?

Mr. Chevrier: It is on the record.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): From the statement of the minister it would appear this has been an unprofitable railway line, but probably a necessary railway operation. It would appear also that other railways have been taken over because they have been unprofitable to operate. I should like to ask the minister whether it is proposed to take over any other lines of railway that have been profitable over the years. I refer to two in my county, one running from Maccan to Joggins, and the other from Springhill Junction to Parrsboro. These lines have been operating at a profit for a good many years. The shippers have had to pay local freight rates which are excessive in comparison with what is paid for the same mileage on lines operated by the Canadian National.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware of any other lines that are being taken over—certainly not at this session.

Mr. Sinclair: I am more interested in the measure concerning the Pacific Great Eastern than I am with the Temiscouata railway. The Canadian National is taking over the Temiscouata railway but has refused on various occasions to take over the Pacific Great Eastern. May I ask the minister if the reason for this difference in approach is the fact that the Temiscouata railway already connects with the Canadian National, whereas the Pacific Great Eastern does not?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that enters into the picture. Perhaps I should say this to my hon. friend, that one is a provincial railway and the other is a railway which was authorized by the parliament of Canada. It is easier, of course, to take over a railway which connects at both ends with lines of the Canadian National, as does the Temiscouata. It connects at the northerly end with the Canadian National transcontinental, and at its southerly end with another line of the Canadian National at Edmundston. While that is not the only reason, it might well be one reason.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not believe the minister informed us as to the original capitalization of the Temiscouata Railway Company.

Mr. Chevrier: I did say that the share capital authorized at first was ten thousand shares at $100 each.

Mr. Coldwell: How much was paid up?

Mr. Pouliot: None.

Mr. Chevrier: A very small amount; in fact I believe the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is very close to it. Only one share certificate was issued, and that raises, of course, a legal problem. It brings the matter to parliament. Then there was a bond issue, which I mentioned, of £586,000. The equivalent in dollars was $2,856,000 when the pound was worth $4.80.

Mr. Coldwell: What is to be the disposition of this $480,000?

Mr. Chevrier: It is to be paid to the bondholders' committee in London who represent the holders of the mortgage bonds.

Mr. Coldwell: So we are really buying at a bankrupt price a railway that is insolvent?

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. Coldwell: Are we? That is the question I am asking.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think we are doing that, because the assets have some value. As I mentioned a moment ago, even if the railway were to be scrapped today; it is valued at some $240,000 or $250,000; and there are assets, the equivalent of cash, of some $136,000. The railway is therefore worth something as a going concern.

Mr. Coldwell: But we are not paying the full value of the original bond issue?

Mr. Chevrier: No. The offer which was made was twenty-five per cent of this value of $2,800,000, and the purchase price was, roughly speaking, twenty per cent of that, namely, $480,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Was this agreement put through before the depreciation of the pound sterling?

Mr. Chevrier: The agreement was put through before the depreciation of the pound sterling—I speak now from memory; but the agreement provides for payment in Canadian dollars.

Mr. MacInnis: I was called out just as the minister began to make his statement, and perhaps he has covered the point I have in mind. If the Canadian National Railways buy this railroad, will it be self-supporting from an operating point of view? Is the amount that we are to pay for the Temiscouata railway more or less than the estimated value of the present assets of the railway?

Mr. Chevrier: To answer the first question, the railway is barely self-supporting now, from the figures which I gave. For instance, I indicated that in the year 1943 the net corporate income was $208, and in 1948 the net corporate income showed a deficit of $156. But it is hoped that it may be made profitable.

Mr. Green: They are going to have to pay higher wages, are they not?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. As to the second question of the hon. member (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra had already asked the same question, and I answered it. My hon. friend will find the answer on the record.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I ask if a valuation was made of the physical assets?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes—$240,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In other words there is not much good will, is there?

Mr. Chevrier: When I say $240,000 I mean that the Canadian National Railways put that value on it for scrap purposes: if the railway were scrapped at a certain time in 1949, it would be worth $240,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I hope that it will not be thought that I am opposing this measure. I gather the reason for it to be that there are some people who are served by this line—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): —and that you are anxious to continue that service to those people. That is the main reason for this measure.

Mr. Chevrier: That is one reason.

Mr. Hatfield: It will be a feeder road to the Canadian National.

Mr. Pouliot: I will explain what the Temiscouata railway is. There are two arteries of the Canadian National Railways from Quebec city to the maritimes. One is the old Intercolonial, alongside the St. Lawrence river, and the other is the Transcontinental railway, which follows the Saint John river. Between them is the Temiscouata railway, which is the last link to the east between the Transcontinental railway and the Intercolonial railway. It starts at Riviere du Loup, a town of about 9,000 on the shore of the St. Lawrence, and goes direct to Edmundston. It covers a distance of eighty-one miles to Edmundston on the Saint John river, just across from the state of Maine. Then the railway follows the Saint John river to the west; it goes from north to south, from Edmundston to Riviere du Loup and then goes west to Connors. The whole length of the railway line is approximately 113 miles.

The Temiscouata railway has received a good deal of help from the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific in the way of freight rate reduction. The proportion of freight rate allowed by the major railway companies to the Temiscouata railway was larger, just to give some help and to permit the Temiscouata railway to keep going. It is important to realize that both great railway companies have understood the necessity of the Temiscouata railway, and have made certain sacrifices in order to help it. The Temiscouata railway celebrates its diamond jubilee this year; it is the sixtieth anniversary of its establishment. It has given valuable service to a population which is much larger than the minister has indicated. It helps the whole county of Temiscouata, the population of which is 50,000; and it also helps the county of Madawaska, the population of which is 35,000 or 40,000.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton suggested that the section from Riviere du Loup to Cabano should be dispensed with. In saying that he has proved that he is a great humorist. I could not take him seriously when he said that, because he knows the country, and he knows as well as anyone else that the Temiscouata railway is rendering great service to the population.

For instance, we might speak about the competition of trucks. We can put a great deal of furniture in a truck, but no one thinks of putting telegraph and telephone poles in trucks.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pouliot: In my district we regard that railway essential for heavy traffic. We need the railway. There are big industries in this area. Fraser Companies Limited have big mills at Cabano and Notre Dame du Lac. A large manufacturing plant of shoe-trees is at Notre Dame du Lac. There are many mills at Cabano and in the back country at Squatteck and in all the other places. They are all dependent on the Temiscouata railway.

I must pay a special tribute to those who built the Temiscouata railway. They had the spirit of the pioneers. It was a long time ago. The financing was done with English capital. I might explain to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that no shares were paid; the shares were there just for the picture in the financing until subsidies were paid by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald and other governments in the old days. Those shares were transferred as a collateral guarantee until the subsidy came. The Temiscouata railway was built, as were most railways of the time, by British capital and Canadian subsidies, because the shrewd English businessmen and the far-seeing politicians of the time understood the necessity for railways. Let me tell my hon. friend that the policy of Cartier, one of the great men of the Conservative party, was a policy of railways. He said: my policy, my program, is railways—and they must know it.

Here we have a railway which has rendered good service under unfortunate circumstances, and precisely because shares were not paid in full, as they should have been, it incurred hardships. The population needs the railway. I could show my hon. friend many resolutions passed by county councils asking for immediate consideration of this matter by the government. A delegation of big businessmen and lumbermen came here from my district to urge upon the minister and the government the importance of taking immediate action in connection with this railroad.

Now the time has come. I must express the appreciation of my constituents and of those of Madawaska to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and all members of the government who have understood the seriousness of the situation and have decided that the Temiscouata railway should at once be placed under the control of the Canadian National Railways.

The area east of Quebec has been forgotten for a long time; only those places near Montreal had a chance. Now, however, the men we have in power have an understanding of the situation and are taking the necessary measures to put the Temiscouata railway on the map.

Mr. Brooks: It has taken them a long time.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, it has taken a long time. As I said the other day, we have a new era, and I am glad we have a new leader. With the old one my people would never have got it.

I congratulate the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport and all those who are helping to complete the settlement of this important question. The other day I invited the hon. member for Cape Breton South to come to my constituency by automobile, and said I would drive him there. But if he comes next summer—either he or any of my colleagues—they will be welcomed in Temiscouata, and we shall all have a good ride on the Temiscouata railway.

Mr. Hatfield: I am in favour of the government's taking over this road. I believe that for the sake of the Canadian National Railways it could be made a paying feeder line. The Temiscouata railway gave over all the Edmundston part of their freight to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. I do not suppose they will permit the giving of any freight to the Canadian Pacific now; they will take all the freight that accumulates on this feeder road.

This is a feeder for the Canadian National, and I am in favour of it. But I do not see the advantage of maintaining the road from Riviere du Loup to Cabano, because I do not think there is any feeder freight in that district. Notre Dame du Lac and Cabano are big feeders on this road.

Mr. Green: Had there ever been a previous application to have this road taken over by the government?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, on many occasions, by the manager of the Temiscouata railway. I speak concerning the last three years.

Mr. Green: Any earlier than that?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware of any earlier than that.

Mr. Green: With whom were the negotiations carried on?

Mr. Chevrier: There were no negotiations. On several occasions the manager of the Temiscouata railway came to my office to tell me that if he did not have additional assistance he would have to throw up his hands. Following that, representations were made both to the Canadian National and to the Canadian Pacific to go to the assistance of the Temiscouata railway, which they did.

Mr. Green: But neither of them would take it over?

Mr. Chevrier: Neither of them would take it over. The assistance which was given, as I said a moment ago, amounted to about $75,000, and was divided at the rate of two-thirds by the Canadian National and one-third by the Canadian Pacific. While it helped, it was not sufficient.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe the people in the district in question are entitled to the services of the Temiscouata railway. It does seem to me, however, a tragedy that in the past thirty-three years we have had to load up the Canadian National Railways with other lines which had been established under private enterprise and ran into difficulties. My point is that in such cases the deficits should not be loaded on the Canadian National Railways. If the management of the Canadian National states that it does not wish to take the railway over, then, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the government should make provision for any deficit so that it would not stand as a further deficit on the Canadian National Railways. That system today is responsible for capital expenditures which should be removed from it. I believe this is a matter which is under consideration by the government, and I hope something substantial may be done about it in connection with another resolution which is on the order paper.

Apparently there are other railways in the same position. One hon. member this afternoon mentioned a railway in his constituency which he would like to see taken over—and he added that it was a profitable one. In any event, in circumstances such as these the losses should be segregated from those of the national railways as a whole.

Mr. Chevrier: The question raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, is a difficult one. If we do it in this case, we have to do it in all others. Under these circumstances we would find the estimate book cluttered up with items for railway services operating at a deficit, of which there are two or three or more at the present time. This is a matter concerning which advice is being sought by the government from the royal commission on transportation, and I hope it will be able to bring in some recommendation which will be of assistance. Whether or not it would be desirable to segregate losing projects from the general operations of the Canadian National Railways is a question to which I believe the commission is giving study. It is a problem which I am pleased to have raised at this time, but one which certainly cannot be solved in the resolution before us.

Mr. Green: Was the question of the purchase of this railway referred to the royal commission? The government has now embarked upon a new policy, at the very time when a royal commission is investigating the whole transportation structure in Canada. One of the things the commission was to investigate was the financial position of the Canadian National Railways. Yet here is a railway, which certainly will operate at a loss, and which is being loaded on to the Canadian National. Was the question of this purchase referred to the royal commission?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Hodgson: Will the wages of the men now employed on the Temiscouata railway be increased to compare with those of other railway men in Canada, after the line is taken over?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that that is the intention of the Canadian National, once the railway is given to them for operation.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I think many hon. members forget that all of these railroads were subsidized at some time or other, if not by this government at least by the various provincial governments. There is not a railroad in Canada that has not received assistance from the public treasury. The Canadian National has been referred to as a tremendous organization that took over a number of bankrupt or semi-bankrupt railroads some years ago, but the fact remains that all those railroads that were taken over had rendered great service in developing this country.

They made it possible for settlers to get into remote areas and develop the resources of the country. The fact that some of them fell upon evil days does not mean that they were not of great service to the country. The railroad now being considered has operated for sixty years in a very difficult part of Canada and no doubt has rendered great service. We seem to be in a sort of socialist era and I think the best thing to do would be to amalgamate these railroads, get them all under one management. I believe that this particular railroad could be brought under Canadian National management and with the resultant reduction of overhead and management costs it might pay its way very handsomely. I am much in support of the minister's bill.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I am more or less in agreement with what the hon. member for Cariboo has said. No doubt a great deal of the development in Canada has come out of the treasury of Canada through the cost of these different units which have been amalgamated and which are now known as the Canadian National Railways. To keep this matter apart, to put it on a separate basis, would make simply another entity, another downpipe into which this chamber would have to pour more and more funds.

All of us on all sides of the house must assume our responsibility for having formed these different railroad entities into the one organization. However, it is much easier to control one organization than it is to control two or three. I am of the opinion that we are caught with this. I am of the opinion that there are people along these lines who look to this organization to give them service, and I do not know if there is much we can do about it.

I suggest to the hon. member for Cariboo that there is no other organization better able to meet the problem set out in this bill than the Canadian National Railways. It has been my privilege in days gone by to criticize the management of that railroad for extravagance and other things, but let us be sensible. What else can we do? Is it not much easier for us to sit here and criticize one unit than it would be to deal with three or four units? Let us concentrate our efforts on keeping this Canadian National organization on an orderly footing. If all these units are split up it is likely to throw the whole country into a state of chaos. Let us co-ordinate all these activities, admitting all the time that we are in a mess, admitting all the time that we are in financial difficulties with regard to the ever-mounting cost of our railroads. At the same time we should keep together and see if we cannot tear down an edge here or an edge there and make it as economical an operation as possible for those who have to pay the cost, namely, the people of Canada.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Is there a road paralleling this railroad?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a highway paralleling the railroad. This railroad joins the Intercolonial with the Canadian National.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I was thinking that perhaps the hon. member should go to the premier of Quebec and have a highway constructed so that these lumber products could be brought out to the railhead at the other end. In British Columbia we truck 40 or 50 tons of logs as far as 50 miles. We find it much cheaper to do it that way than to put them on railroad cars. In fact, we consider that railroad cars are obsolete.

What I am afraid of is that in taking over this railroad we are assuming an obligation of $200,000 a year in perpetuity. I would hate to think that was the case. Would there not be a possibility of the lumbermen changing their type of operations down there? I can understand how they have been most useful to the economy of the country, but it seems to me that we are paying a rather heavy bonus when we assume this obligation in perpetuity.

Mr. Chevrier: The statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni might apply if the railroad remained in the position in which it is, but if the road is taken over it is quite possible that with improved equipment it might be operated profitably. I am looking forward hopefully to that happening.

Mr. Green: Is it not more likely that in addition to assuming the annual deficit the Canadian National Railways will have to make considerable capital expenditures? The minister has told us that he cannot give us any idea as to how much money will be spent by way of capital expenditures, but I think he should be able to tell us how much it is going to cost. The government must have some idea of how much will have to be paid out.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course the Canadian National will have to pay out a certain amount of capital at this time if the railroad is to be put in shape. In so far as the exact figures are concerned, if I am to give the figures we had better not refer the bill to a house committee but deal with it in committee of the whole. However, if the bill were sent to the committee these figures could be got firsthand. I can give them in a general way, but I think it would be more satisfactory to have them supplied in committee.

Mr. Green: Why not let us have them now?

Mr. Howe: This is the resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: If the bill is referred to the committee they can be given there.

Mr. Murphy: In answering a question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I believe, the minister said that the capitalization—I may be wrong about this—of this railroad was a million shares. I understood from an earlier statement that it was 10,000 shares.

Mr. Chevrier: So far as the stock capital is concerned, it is 10,000 shares of $100 par value or a capitalization of $1 million. The bonded capital is $2,800,000.

Mr. Murphy: I understood in answering the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the minister said one million shares.

Mr. Chevrier: That was an error and I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing it to my attention.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR SUBSIDY TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM QUESNEL TO PRINCE GEORGE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to grant to the province of British Columbia a subsidy of $15,000 per mile, but not exceeding eighty-two and seven-tenths miles, towards the construction of a line of railway from Quesnel to Prince George in the province of British Columbia.

He said: May we proceed in the same manner on this resolution?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to grant to the province of British Columbia, the owners and operators of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, a subsidy of $15,000 per mile for the construction of an extension from Quesnel to Prince George, the extension not to exceed eighty-two and seven-tenths miles. The Pacific Great Eastern Railway Company was incorporated in 1912 under charter granted by the government of the province of British Columbia. The charter provided for the construction of a railway from Vancouver along Howe Sound to Squamish, thence to Lillooet on the Fraser river, and then following the direction of the Fraser river to Prince George. A later provision was for a line from Prince George to a point in the Peace river block with the intention of connecting with the present Northern Alberta Railways.

The reasons for the construction of the Pacific Great Eastern were: (1) to provide an independent or direct route for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to the city of Vancouver; (2) to open the central portion of British Columbia; and (3) to provide an outlet for the Peace river country through Vancouver. The Pacific Great Eastern Railway purchased the Howe Sound and Northern Railway, which operated a line of railway from North Vancouver along Howe sound a distance of seven miles, and extended it to Whytecliff, making a total distance of 12·7 miles. The connecting line to Squamish was never completed.

Major construction started from Squamish, and was slow owing to difficult construction conditions. It was further prolonged by reason of the war. By 1917 approximately 180 miles north from Squamish were completed when construction virtually stopped. In 1918 the government of the province of British Columbia acquired ownership of the railway and undertook to complete construction and operate the road. By 1919 the line was extended 211 miles from Squamish, of which 180 miles were operated. Construction was continued until 1922 when the line was completed and in operation from Squamish to Quesnel, a distance of 347·8 miles. Some construction was undertaken beyond Quesnel, but this section was not operated. In 1929 operation was discontinued on the section from North Vancouver to Whytecliff. The line between Squamish and Quesnel has been continuously operated by the British Columbia government.

The government of that province has decided to extend the Pacific Great Eastern Railway by the construction of a line from the present terminus at Quesnel to connect with the Canadian National Railways at Prince George, a distance of 82·7 miles. The estimated capital cost of the extension is $8 million, or an average cost per mile of approximately $96,700. The construction of this extension will provide traffic for the railway and assist in developing the natural resources in the area consisting of large tracts of timber suitable for lumber, newsprint, pulpwood and plywood, mining possibilities, sections of agricultural and grazing lands, hydroelectric power potentialities, and sport and recreational attractions. The government of the province of British Columbia is proposing to develop hydro power in the Quesnel area, and the establishment of a pulp and paper business there. The government of the province of British Columbia has solicited dominion aid in the construction of this railway extension, and the resolution would authorize the governor in council to grant to the government of the province of British Columbia a subsidy of $15,000 per mile towards the construction of the extension, not exceeding 82·7 miles in length. The total subsidy payable would amount to $1,240,500.

There is a precedent for this practice. In 1913 the government proceeded in the same manner for the Ontario Northland Railway, and paid a subsidy of $6,400 per mile. The act, which was assented to on the 6th of June, 1913, provided for the payment of that subsidy for certain portions of the line as mentioned therein. If hon. members of the house are interested in looking at the precedent, the act is to be found in 3 and 4 George V, chapter 53, 1913.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): That was not the name of the line at that time.

Mr. Chevrier: No; the name of the line at that time was the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway. I am informed that the name has since been changed to Ontario Northland Railway, and that it is operated by the Ontario northland commission.

The resolution seeks the approval and sanction of parliament for the payment of this subsidy.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, as the member for the riding in which the southern terminus of this railway is situated, I feel I should say a word or two on the resolution. The Pacific Great Eastern Railway occupies a position in the province of British Columbia quite similar to that occupied by the Canadian National Railways in Canada. While the railway is now publicly owned by the province, it was not built by public ownership but rather privately. The securities were guaranteed by the province. When the company failed the province had to take over the railway and operate it.

It has not been a very profitable operation for the province. On the contrary it has been the largest single item of expense in the provincial budget. I believe that the people of British Columbia now have over $100 million invested in the line. The main reason for this railway being a losing proposition is the fact that it is isolated. The people of British Columbia often describe it as the railway which starts nowhere and ends nowhere. The hon. member for Cariboo, who represents the village of Quesnel in the northern section served by the railway, and I, representing the village of Squamish at the southerly end, might quarrel with this description, but the fact remains that the Pacific Great Eastern Railway does not connect with any other railway on this continent.

The original intent behind the railway was, however, a good one. The existing railway lines in British Columbia generally all run east and west. The most southerly line is the Kettle valley line of the C.P.R. which enters British Columbia at the Crowsnest pass just north of the United States border, and continues across British Columbia skirting that border. The main line of the C.P.R. comes into the Kicking Horse pass a little west of Banff, proceeds to Kamloops, and then down the Thompson and Fraser rivers to Vancouver. The next line, which is a part of the Canadian National system, is the old Canadian Northern line which, at Jasper, goes through the Yellowhead pass, and then to Kamloops and down the same route as the C.P.R. The old Grand Trunk line, now also a part of the Canadian National system, goes through the Yellowhead pass and proceeds straight west to the ocean port of Prince Rupert. The promoters of the P.G.E. therefore believed that there was an opportunity for a north-south line, cutting across these other lines and stretching from Vancouver into the northeast corner of the province, the area commonly called the Peace river block.

The railway was actually begun in the city of North Vancouver, which is on the north shore of Vancouver harbour; and, as the minister said, it continued some thirteen miles to the community of Whytecliff. Twenty miles of mountainous country then intervened, and no attempt was made to build the railway over that area. A new start was made at the small village of Squamish, at the head of Howe sound; and, as the minister stated, some 347 miles of railway were built in a general northeasterly direction, through the Lillooet country, through the Cariboo country, to the town of Quesnel. As the minister said, the ultimate hope was to connect with the northern line of the Canadian National at Prince George, which is roughly in the centre of our province though we generally think of it as in northern British Columbia.

One of the difficulties faced by the P.G.E., of course, is the fact that because of its isolation, because neither its terminal at Squamish nor the terminal at Quesnel has any other railway serving it, it has not had the traffic which it might expect. At various times various provincial premiers have tried to sell the P.G.E., either to private railway lines or to the Canadian Pacific or to the Canadian National. These latter two lines never showed much interest in it, no doubt for the reason that it did not connect with the existing Canadian National or Canadian Pacific systems. When Byron Johnson became premier of British Columbia in 1947 he declared that if he could not sell the P.G.E. he would try to complete it, so we would not have it as a white elephant on our hands for all time. The northern gap between Quesnel and Prince George now is being completed, a distance of some 82 miles through country fortunately not as difficult as the southern end. The estimated cost of completing this gap is around $8 million. When completed it will give the P.G.E. its first link with some outside railway line, connecting as it will with the Canadian National transcontinental system to Prince Rupert at the town of Prince George. This will help the P.G.E. and also the C.N.R., which will then have an exclusive opportunity to carry on its lines the traffic coming from the great Cariboo country.

Having announced this plan and construction having actually started, Premier Johnson then asked for federal assistance. I was very glad to give him what support I could. He first asked for an interest-free loan for the period of construction of the line, to commence bearing interest once the line was in operation. It was not thought desirable to set a precedent like that but, as the minister has just pointed out, it was found that in 1912 or 1913 the federal government of the day did help the government of Ontario with a subsidy of $6,400 a mile in the construction of the T. & N.O. railway. I think hon. members will agree that a subsidy of $6,400 a mile at that time would be at least equivalent to a subsidy of $15,000 a mile in these times.

As I have said, upon completion of this construction the P.G.E. will extend from the sea at Squamish to Prince George. That will be of great assistance to the Canadian National Railways, because it will mean opening up all central British Columbia as a traffic tributary to the northern line of that railway. The federal government, however, is giving still more assistance than this. It is expected that a greatly increased amount of traffic will flow south to Squamish when this new territory between Quesnel and Prince George is tapped. When the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) speaks I am sure he will detail the many resources of that area, where there are a great number of small sawmills, as just one example. So larger docking facilities will be required at Squamish, particularly an assembly dock at which the output of these small mills can be collected and sorted for deep-sea shipment to export markets. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was very helpful in this respect. In the supplementary estimates this fall the Department of Public Works has included an initial appropriation of $100,000 for the construction of such as assembly dock, the total cost of which is estimated at half a million dollars.

The P. G. E., of course, will never be a profitable operation until the other gap is also completed, that is the gap between the village of Squamish and the city of Vancouver. This is not included in the present plans. The country between Squamish and North Vancouver is quite mountainous; construction would be extremely expensive at this time, and present traffic would scarcely warrant it. However, Premier Johnson has announced that he will build a highway between Squamish and North Vancouver, so this railway at least will have a bus and truck outlet from its terminal at Squamish to the city of North Vancouver.

I want to warn hon. members, however, that when this subsidy of $15,000 a mile for this construction is passed, I do not think it will be the last time this house will be asked to help in the extension of the P.G.E. Premier Johnson's avowed purpose in connection with that railway is to do what was originally intended; that is, push it through the Rocky mountains into the Peace river block, where there is great traffic in wheat and in the finest anthracite coal in Canada, and where there are also potential oil fields. At the present time the Peace river block of Alberta and British Columbia is served by the Northern Alberta railway; but from the town of Prince George in British Columbia to Dawson Creek at the end of the line, traffic now must travel back to Edmonton for a total of 947 miles. In other words, wheat moving to Prince Rupert has to travel this distance of 947 miles, whereas the actual distance between the two points is only 160 miles. Completion of the next link between Prince George and Dawson Creek will shorten the rail haul from the Peace river block to the Pacific coast by some 750 miles. At the present time the provincial government is building a road between Prince George and the Peace river block, but heavy freight such as wheat and coal will never be moved efficiently by truck; it will require a railroad.

Once that is done, of course, there will be need for much greater port facilities at the town of Squamish, including grain elevators and coal docks. In addition, this will provide sufficient traffic to justify the construction of the last link between Squamish and North Vancouver.

As the minister pointed out, this railway has trackage facilities within the city of North Vancouver, and eventually there is no doubt that this last twenty miles between Squamish and Vancouver will be bridged by a railway not along the sea but down Capilano valley following the old logging railways into North Vancouver. This will be of very great importance to our own system, the Canadian National, because it will mean a three-way link with that system: a link at Vancouver, a link up in Prince George, and then a link away up in the Peace river country, with the Northern Alberta railway. It will give the Canadian National traffic in British Columbia which that line has never had.

I want to just mention this briefly, because when we are passing this appropriation I think we should be fully aware of all the implications, since we are committing ourselves to a policy of subsidizing the extension of this provincial railway. Today British Columbia is pretty well a C.P.R. preserve as far as the most lucrative freight traffic is concerned. The Canadian Pacific were first in the field, of course. When they came in with their main line to Port Moody, on Burrard inlet, they soon found they could do better if they moved further down, so they extended their main line 13 miles to the present site of the city of Vancouver. Nowhere along that waterfront are the C.P.R. lines more than 50 yards from the water, so they have a monopoly of the service on the Vancouver waterfront. As a matter of fact almost all the waterfront was owned by the Canadian Pacific. Since 1886 they have sold some of it to private concerns and some to the national harbours board, but the fact remains that as far as the south shore of Vancouver harbour is concerned it is pretty well a C.P.R. preserve. They got more than that. To make quite sure nobody else would have an approach to Vancouver they built a spur to the city of New Westminster, then came down the Fraser river to encircle Vancouver, so the city is completely surrounded by the railway. On the other hand the closest the Canadian National comes to Vancouver is some 15 miles, on the other side of the Fraser river at Port Mann. Our national railway actually has to come in over a United States line to reach the terminal in Vancouver; and that terminal is not on the waterfront. However, the national harbours board has a harbour board railway which does connect with the C.N.R. and go over to the north shore of the harbour.

The early leaders of the C.P.R. had thought they had completely bottled up Vancouver by having the Vancouver side of the harbour and the Fraser river as C.P.R. domain. They had forgotten that eventually a bridge would be built across the harbour to North Vancouver. The members from that area will recall how the C.P.R. blocked as determinedly as possible the construction of a railway bridge and the Lions Gate bridge. Those bridges were built and the harbour board railway does form a link over to North Vancouver. It connects with the P.G.E. North Vancouver yards.

I intend to advocate strongly that the Canadian National take over the Vancouver harbour board railway, so that the Canadian National will have the same domain on the north shore of Vancouver harbour that the C.P.R. has on the south shore. I am glad to say that this shore is now principally owned by the national harbours board. Then, when the P.G.E. links North Vancouver with Squamish, the Canadian National will not only have the north shore of Vancouver harbour as its domain, but it will have a profitable feeder line striking up through central British Columbia tapping the Lillooet and Cariboo district and linking it with the Canadian National at Prince George. It will link this part of British Columbia with the Peace river country by means of the main line of the Canadian National and the Northern Alberta Railways. This profitable line should then be bought from the people of B.C. by the C.N.R.

This investment which we are now making in the P.G.E. has long been needed. I believe it will be well worth while. Premier Johnson is to be congratulated on being the provincial premier who, at last, is doing something positive about the P.G.E. I think this federal government is to be congratulated also on helping him in this effort to expand the P.G.E.

Mr. MacInnis: I cannot do better, Mr. Chairman, than to begin with the remark that was made by the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) about this subsidy, that is that the house should be aware of all the implications of the subsidy we are now giving. I believe both political parties in British Columbia are committed to the building of this line, that is the coalition and the C.C.F., but, I think, we should be aware of the tremendous financial obligation the province is assuming in undertaking to build and operate this railway. The member for Coast-Capilano said the road has been a white elephant ever since it was first operated. I am of the opinion that it will still be a white elephant when this section of the road is built from Quesnel to Prince George.

I cannot see any possibility of the road paying for itself. I was rather surprised at the estimate for the construction of the eighty-two miles which, if I recall correctly, was approximately $8 million. I am not an engineer, but I am doubtful, having in mind the estimates for other construction work that I recall, that this estimate will prove large enough to complete the road. Even after this portion is completed and the road is in operation, a very large amount of money will be required to put the first part of the road in proper operating shape. The part of the road which is now operating is not a class one railway. I do not know how railways are classified, but I would say that this would be a class three or four railway. Trains can proceed only at a snail's pace. The rails are light, and before the road can operate properly the section between Quesnel and Squamish will have to be rebuilt.

I saw an estimate of the cost of that reconstruction—I am not giving it as a correct estimate—$50 million. Then, the section from Squamish to North Vancouver will be a very costly section to build. In addition to the difficulties of the terrain, there is the objection of the residents in that area to having the railroad go through the residential district. Perhaps one could call that a political difficulty in a certain sense, not in a party sense, but that political objection may prove more difficult to overcome than the cutting of the route through the rock. Those are important facts that we should keep in mind when we are discussing this subsidy.

I believe the financial possibilities of the P.G.E. can be understood from the fact mentioned by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano that John Hart, when he was premier of the province of British Columbia, tried many times to dispose of the road to the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific, and to United States interests. Now, anything that John Hart could not sell must have something wrong with it, because he is an able and a persuasive negotiator. If he could not get you to buy something it was because the intrinsic value was not there. He failed to get a buyer for the road.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Or to give it away.

Mr. MacInnis: Someone has said he failed to give it away: I do not know, that may also be true. As I have said, I believe the building and operation of this railroad is beyond the financial capacity of the province of British Columbia. I am sure that sooner or later we shall find that out. There is a large investment there now but it will be a still larger investment eventually, and some day this government will have to step in and take over that road. We might as well face that today as face it in five or ten years' time.

Why do I say it is beyond the capacity of the province of British Columbia? I admit at once the possible wealth of the area that is going to be tapped by the present extension—Quesnel to Prince George. Perhaps there is still greater wealth in the section—Prince George to the Peace river country. I believe that Canadian railways are going to be in a difficult position in the next few years. This is important for us as members of parliament, because if there is any country in the world in which railroads are essential, it is Canada. Owing to the commodities that are carried over our railways and the size of the country, railways in Canada are essential. Then we must make up our minds about one or two things. Either we are going to pay subsidies to our railways so that they can operate, or we are going to provide revenue for the purpose by higher rates. Here is where we meet the greatest difficulty: The competition facing railroads is increasing every day. The bus, freight truck and air line are faster and more mobile than the railways. The result is that they are taking the cream of the passenger, express and freight traffic. The only thing that goes over the railways is the long haul, heavy material that cannot be carried easily by truck or aeroplane. All the good paying freight, express and passenger traffic now moves over the transportation systems I have mentioned. As roadbuilding is improved—and there has been considerable improvement in roadbuilding in British Columbia during the past three or four years and there will be more in the future—that competition will increase.

I think the time has arrived when this government and the government of British Columbia should be realistic in the matter and start discussions with the Canadian National Railways. I think some arrangements should be made with the Canadian National Railways with the view of that company taking over the Pacific Great Eastern railway. As I said, we shall have to subsidize the railroads in any case. I think probably the ultimate solution is to co-ordinate all railroads and air traffic and have one complete system. That perhaps is in the future, but may not be so far in the future as we think. Before we put much more money into subsidies I think we should know exactly what we are doing, where we are heading and what the ultimate cost is going to be.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): As the member for the district through which the northern reaches of the P.G.E. are being extended I suppose it would be my duty to say something in support of this measure. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano has ably and brilliantly set out most of the facts and I would be duplicating what has already been said if I went over the early history of that railway. It was launched by the Conservative government of British Columbia and by a distinguished statesman, the late Sir Richard McBride. Although I happen to be identified with the opposing party, the longer I live the greater appreciation I have of the splendid vision and the statesmanlike character of the late Sir Richard McBride. It is true that there have been deficits and that the railway is not in a flourishing condition. Yet last year it paid $1 million in revenue, paid its operating expenses and paid for extensive improvements as well on the short section of it which is now built. But it stands as a living memorial to those who built it, and a rebuke to those who procrastinate, who are afraid to move forward, who see all the hazards and difficulties in that part of the country but have not the enthusiasm and youth of my friend the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, and the courage to step forward with a project which was well thought out in the beginning and which within the lives of men in this parliament will prove to be one of the greatest assets in the Dominion of Canada.

This railroad will be connected at Prince George with the Canadian National Railways; that action of course will vitalize it and will also vitalize that western portion of the Canadian National Railways from Jasper to the coast which is now not getting the sort of assistance it should have. That is an extremely rich part of Canada, yet the railroad service from Jasper to Prince Rupert, B.C., is of a limited character, and the required energy is not being put forward in developing the industries tributary to it.

I have heard some reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. While I am no champion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I want to say that when they put their line through southern British Columbia their directors and their men went in and developed the coal, the mines, the sawmills and the natural resources of that country, rightly or wrongly, and they laid the foundation for what exists in British Columbia today.

The great mining operation at Trail, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, had it not been for the genius of the late James J. Warren and the men who were around Shaughnessy, would be an abandoned mineral claim today instead of being the great operation which it is, employing thousands of men and pouring wealth into British Columbia and this country, being one of the greatest metallurgical plants on the face of the earth.

Up in northern British Columbia there are resources equal to those in the Kootenay country. All we need is to have operating our railways men with the imagination and genius of those who launched the railways elsewhere in British Columbia. As to losing money on this division, I repeat what I said a few minutes ago in this chamber, namely, that there never was a railway started in Canada which was not assisted either from the dominion treasury or from the treasury of one of the provinces. I will challenge any hon. member to check up on any of them and show me one instance in which lavish grants of money or great grants of land were not made. One needs to step only a few feet from the entrance doors of this building to see the Rideau canal. How did it come into being? Why was it built?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is what I want to know.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member for Calgary West knows a great deal about oil. He should study up on transportation.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The army went to work.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The Rideau canal served its day and generation as a great trunk system of transportation and it was built by the taxpayers of the then Canada. Today it is a tourist attraction and a beautiful one. It memorializes the early history of this land.

But to return to British Columbia, we have a situation there today which is unique in Canada or in the British commonwealth. My riding is nine hundred miles long and in one place it is five hundred miles wide. This summer I tried to proceed from one end of the riding to hold a meeting in the southern part. I had a motorcar, and I wanted to get in there so that the motorcar could be used in getting around to meet the voters and to give them the good gospel. I was obliged to travel two thousand miles to get to that meeting.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What brand of gospel is that?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Of salvation and light; of progress and development.

The town of Fort St. John is located fifty miles from the railway. It is quite a flourishing town as the Minister of Agriculture will know. He is one minister who comes around, sees us, and meets the farmers and the settlers at Fort St. John and elsewhere up through the Peace river country. Fort St. John is fifty miles from a railway, and yet that town is a modern and progressive place. I can take you to a soldier settlement which was put in there not so long ago, and which is seventy miles from a railroad. These men were put upon lands there which are extremely fertile. This year their crops were good, but they must haul those crops fifty miles, sixty miles, seventy miles, and in some other parts of the district one hundred miles, to the railroad.

I know young people in the Peace river block who were old enough to vote, and who voted for me in the last election, who had never seen a railway or a train or had never heard a train whistle outside the motion picture shows. I say that is not good enough for Canada. These railroads should be extended into these fertile areas. The old order of procedure was to build a railway and expect the settlers to come in following the railway. That was the order in Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and in southern British Columbia to some extent. Today we have in the Peace river country settled communities far removed from a railway; and this work we are going to do today in granting this subsidy or loan will be the first step in providing those far-flung communities with direct transportation to the Pacific coast.

I have here a record showing the acreage up in there which could be settled by families. There are millions of acres, but I shall not burden the committee with the statistics. As the hon. member for Peace River said the other day, we imported something like $230 million worth of coal from the United States, paid United States dollars for it, and depleted the resources of Canada to that extent.

The railway about which we are talking today would develop a coal area which would enable us to supplant American coal in the Canadian market. This is not a figment of the imagination; it is a fact which can be confirmed by geological survey, at the university of British Columbia or in the mines branch at Victoria. The information is on record.

I would refer the committee to a book published by the mines branch here in Ottawa entitled "The New Northwest", containing tables and statistics bearing upon all the natural resources of the area which this Pacific Great Eastern Railway will open after it is extended beyond Prince George. Not only is this a great farm area and not only are there great mineral resources, but also there is the greatest remaining stand of soft woods on this continent, which would then be near transportation and made available to the pulp and paper industry, to the sawmill industry and to industrial development generally. That is the first stage of the development of that country, should the railway be extended beyond Prince George.

The next step would be to send it farther up to Hay River, into that country where uranium is being produced, where oil is being produced, and where there is a vast area of agricultural, mineral and fishing resources available, awaiting good transportation to the markets of the world—and that would naturally be to the Pacific coast via Prince George and the Pacific Great Eastern Railway.

I do not wish to speak at greater length. I would hope however that the committee would endorse this move to focus attention on the Pacific Great Eastern, get it on its way and have it extended beyond Prince George up into the Peace river country and, later on, up to Great Slave lake, so as to service that great hinterland of northern Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, we have heard interesting talks this afternoon in support of the resolution. I think it is appropriate that I speak at this point, and point out to you and the members of the committee that we have now heard from the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, in whose constituency the railway starts; we have now heard from the hon. member for Cariboo, in whose constituency it stops: perhaps it is time we heard from the member through whose constituency the railway runs.

As a matter of fact about 250 miles of the present 340, in rough figures, run through the constituency of Kamloops. I agree fully with those who have spoken before me to the effect that we should know more about the implications of the resolution before us. I agree fully with what has been said by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano and the hon. member for Vancouver East, that probably this will be only a beginning. We in British Columbia certainly hope that it marks only the beginning of the completion of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. I do not think it would be an exaggeration to say that the railway will not serve its true purpose until it is completed up into the Peace river country.

Mr. MacInnis: Completed at both ends.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member says, "completed at both ends". I believe the most important part—well, no; perhaps it would be difficult to say which is the more important, for reasons which I shall indicate later.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are playing the middle against both ends, are you?

Mr. Fulton: As has been pointed out, the hon. member for Calgary West knows a good deal about oil. However his knowledge of transportation may have some gaps which should be filled in—and which I shall endeavour to do.

In the Cariboo range country there are, in extent, some of the largest cattle ranges in Canada. Those are the people in whose position I am most interested this afternoon because they have no adequate outlet by rail to their market in Vancouver. They have no adequate railway communications over which they can get feed grains. Their normal outlet for cattle to market would be through Vancouver. The place to which they would look for their feed grain required to bring their cattle to a marketable condition is the Peace river district.

Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary West, with his great knowledge of logic, will tell me which of those aspects is the more important—because, frankly, I confess that for my own part I cannot decide whether it is more important to complete the first outlet to the market, or more important to complete the line inland so as to prepare the cattle for market.

I do know however that we are now commencing with the construction of the railway to Prince George. It seems logical therefore to look as a next step for the completion of the railway up into the Peace river area. The hon. member for Cariboo has dealt with some of the resources of that country. It has been pointed out that that particular area is served at the moment only by the Canadian National Railways main line through Prince George up to Prince Rupert.

I would leave with the committee this point for consideration: It seems to me high time that the Canadian National Railways took a greater interest in the Pacific Great Eastern. I do not altogether agree with what was said by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano when, as I understood him, he implied that the Canadian Pacific had a virtual monopoly of the productive freight in British Columbia. Of course members from the coast and the interior of the province of British Columbia find to our cost sometimes that some people tend to think of the province as centering around Vancouver, and they forget the great productive areas of the interior of the province which produce large quantities of paying freight.

The Canadian National now serves the Okanagan fruit country and the lumbering country of the northern North Thompson valley, and the Prince George area. It serves of course the commercial and industrial plants of New Westminster and the Fraser valley, as well as sharing with the C.P.R. the freight revenues from the Fraser valley agricultural land. So the Canadian National has a very considerable stake in British Columbia.

The result of this expansion of the Pacific Great Eastern is to link that railway up with the Canadian National at Prince George. It it, in a sense, a gift to the C.N.R. I certainly hope the national railways will no longer continue to wait for things to fall into their lap in connection with this particular railway, and that they will show that interest in it which its potentialities as a revenue-producing line fully justify.

I trust the management of the Canadian National on their part will work in cooperation with the province for the completion of the railway up into the Peace river. In turn, I hope that they will press for, and cooperate with the province in the eventual completion of the railway to Vancouver, to link up with the other terminal of the Canadian National.

I have not much more to say. This is a project which in my view has been too long delayed. I turn to the debates of 1946 when the former member for Cariboo raised the subject. One is amazed upon looking at the record to find how often the extension and completion of the Peace River Railway has been promised, and how unfortunately promises have exceeded performance. It was pointed out in the debate that at one time the late Sir Henry Thornton promised to build a line into the Peace river country when the export production of wheat reached 10 million bushels. That figure has long been reached and passed, it being now away past 20 million bushels; but we are still waiting for the rail link with the Peace river.

I support this resolution on three grounds. First, because it will provide an intermediate link on the railroad which will help to develop our province. Second, because it will be a step in the development of our railroad system which will connect our interior with the prairies and Peace river markets, thus enabling our cattle ranchers to bring in their feed grain at reasonable rates from the logical place in which to get it. Third, because it will be one more step in the completion of the railroad to provide those people with an outlet to their logical market in Vancouver.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in the debate on this resolution, but as one member from the constituency through which this line will run and two other members who come from constituencies at the two terminals of this line have taken part in this discussion, and in a most able manner, I feel that I as a British Columbian who has only a general interest in this resolution should rise at this time to correct what possibly might be an inadvertent error by the hon. member for Vancouver East. The hon. member referred to the future costs of building railroads, and I think his statement in that connection is quite true, but he then implied that the Hon. John Hart, while being an excellent salesman, had failed in the job of selling the Pacific Great Eastern railway to the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. I think that statement created a wrong impression which the hon. member for Vancouver East did not intend to leave.

From what was said it might be assumed by the hon. members of this house that this railroad was more or less of a white elephant. I think we are all agreed that the future, not only of British Columbia but of Canada generally lies in the things that grow. During the last two years it has been my privilege and honour to be associated with the pioneers of the Peace river country. In this instance I am not boasting about my own specific constituency, but I feel I can truthfully say that the area through which this resolution will make possible the building of a railroad line is one of the finest areas on the North American continent.

Getting back to the failure of the Hon. John Hart to sell this railroad to the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, despite the fact that Mr. Hart is a very able salesman, I ask hon. members here what they would have done had they been the president of the Canadian Pacific or the president of the Canadian National? The presidents and boards of directors of those railroad companies knew perfectly well that the tremendous natural resources in that north country would have to move east over either of their railroad lines. They knew that if and when the provincial government or some private organization eventually completed that line their railroad lines would benefit. That being axiomatic, it is natural that they were prepared to wait until such time as these products did begin to move down to the ocean terminals at Vancouver or North Vancouver.

I am sure that if any one of us had been the head of either of these railroads and were asked by Mr. Hart to invest money to extend that line, knowing full well that if the line were completed the other two lines would be the beneficiaries, he would have waited until that development occurred. The extension of this line is going to provide a tremendous lift, not only to British Columbia but to the general welfare of all Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. Low: I want to support the resolution as it has been proposed by the Minister of Transport. I was interested in the speeches already made on this matter and am in full agreement with practically everything that has been said. I do not represent a constituency through which the proposed line will run, but I do represent a district which will contribute, perhaps indirectly, to the success of the new line when it is built.

The full value of the Pacific Great Eastern railway can never be realized until it is finally linked up with the Northern Alberta Railways, as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano so well said. That being the case, I can assure the minister that he has not heard the last of the requests for subsidies for railroads. He is going to hear more of these in the future, not only from those people who are determined to see a link built between Prince George and Dawson Creek, but also from those who are determined to see a link built between Hines Creek on the north side of the river and perhaps Hazelton and Prince Rupert to the west.

We are up against a real problem there and I should like to draw this to the attention of hon. members who may not know the situation. Northern Alberta Railways operate between Edmonton and Dawson Creek on the south side of the Peace river. There is a branch running from McLellan, just above Lesser Slave lake, up through Peace river and into Hines Creek on the north side of the river. A number of years ago this line was purchased by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National and has since been operated under their joint ownership but still under the name of Northern Alberta Railways. Because of the fact that both great railways of Canada are interested in its ownership and management, neither of them can ever come in and threaten the monopoly that exists. There has never been any serious threat from highway competition to the monopoly that exists under the Northern Alberta Railways owned jointly by the two great transcontinental systems. That situation is gradually being improved as British Columbia and Alberta build better highways. We hope that some time the competition will be great enough to needle the two old companies into doing something about the extension of these branches and filling the gaps so that there will be a northern system linking up with Prince Rupert north of the river and back into Saskatchewan, as has been so well put before the house on various occasions by the hon. member for Athabaska.

One thing that the minister ought to take into consideration is this. The fact that there is a monopoly today will require that the government take rather unusual action to get something done about the extension of these routes. There is no doubt in my mind that the traffic is already there. As the hon. member for Kamloops has so well stated—and it is a fact—the Peace river country today is producing over 20 million bushels of wheat a year, and that is only one product. It is also producing millions of bushels of oats and barley, thousands of head of livestock, much pulpwood and lumber, and in many sections seed production is now reaching great volume.

Have the railways lost their pioneering spirit? Have they grown fat and lazy in their middle age? They must be needled into a more venturesome spirit. I wonder if it would not be well to call in question their right to hold a charter if they do not get busy and fill these gaps so that there may be a western outlet, and thus prevent the long backhaul of over 500 miles around through Edmonton and out to the Pacific coast, where much of the produce has to go. If I were in the minister's seat today I would seriously consider calling their charters in question.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member if he is speaking to the resolution?

Mr. Chevrier: He is not speaking anywhere near it.

Mr. Low: Pardon?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member is not speaking to the resolution at this time.

Mr. Low: Perhaps I have been speaking about a corollary of the resolution. I started in by stating that the full value of the Pacific Great Eastern can never be realized until the link between Dawson Creek and Prince George is completed. That is a matter which must be considered in connection with this particular resolution. If the minister is going to lay down the principle of subsidy at the rate of $15,000 a mile to help to complete the link between Quesnel and Prince George, which I am told is a distance of some eighty-two miles, then he must also be prepared to give consideration to means by which he can make that subsidy, which will come out of the taxpayers' money, repay the people of Canada for advancing it.

It is not going to be enough to subsidize this small link. That does not help the situation materially although it may provide an inlet to the Pacific Great Eastern, but what are they going to do about an outlet on the south, as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has said? A link will have to be furnished there eventually. Furthermore, to obtain a sufficient volume of traffic without any question they will have to back in from Prince George to Dawson Creek. It is that aspect I want to emphasize now. I also want to stress the fact that eventually the minister is going to be approached for subsidies on these other links because they are just as important to the economy of Canada, and to the welfare of a great many human beings, as the link we are now considering. I support the resolution.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I assure you I will not keep you very long. I think I am in favour of the resolution, but I want to make sure that we go into it with our eyes open. To that end I should like the minister to answer three questions. First I want to know the basis of the subsidy. I know the amount, and I know the estimated over-all cost of the mileage. I wonder, for example, if defence might not be one of the reasons.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not hear that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I wonder if defence might not be one of the prime reasons for the resolution. One would suppose there must be an agreement between the province of British Columbia and the dominion government. I would think that agreement would be in writing. If there is one I should like to know its terms and have a look at it. I think the minister has already said that he intends to refer this measure to a committee.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I have not.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I beg your pardon. Then perhaps at some time the minister might let us know that. I have no hesitation in saying that the House of Commons may as well understand, as was so well put by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, that this is only the beginning. In order to have all these rich speculations and promises come true that have been made by various hon. members, it is going to cost a good deal more money than is mentioned in the resolution. It may run into a considerable sum. Even so, I am still in favour of the resolution. There is one rather major difficulty that is bothering me. If I am correct in assuming—and I have some support for doing so from what other hon. members have said—that this is the beginning of a major expenditure, then may I ask whether the minister or the government has considered an alternative scheme, namely, the one we are adopting in connection with the Temiscouata Railway. Would it not be advisable, owing to the major expenditures which are being undertaken, that the P.G.E. should also become a part of the Canadian National Railways for which system we are accustomed year by year to vote money to cover deficits.

I believe the hon. member for Cariboo said that there is enough coal for the whole of Canada in the area to which he referred. Apparently he has not followed the rate discussions which have taken place before the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada in times past as to the freight on coal to eastern Canada from areas much closer than this will be. The simple fact is that the freight on a ton of coal from that area to Toronto would be well above the $8.55 which is the rate from a closer point, even with a subvention paid by the dominion government to producers of coal in nearer areas. Therefore—and I speak most respectfully because I think the speech made by the hon. member was a fine one—with the exception of a market on the Pacific coast I do not think the coal we shall find there will be of any use to the rest of the Dominion of Canada. The prairies themselves produce the kind of coal they want, and I cannot see that within my time in any event we will be putting British Columbia coal into the heavy market here in central Canada.

Then someone spoke a moment ago about our having this railway, and the tremendous benefit it would be to the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. Well, it has been lying at their doorstep all these years; and while the hon. member for Peace River may be able to say that they have lost their pioneering spirit—as a matter of fact they have lost their shirt with it—and are afraid to take a chance, I do not think they are so dumb that if it would have been any advantage to them they would not have picked up this great P.G.E. railway, which is a white elephant now. There is no question about it; it has been a white elephant for a great many years. Yet I am still in favour of this legislation.

Now I put forward this proposition. It seems to me that we are now embarking upon a major venture, namely the revival of the subsidization of railway construction. If that be so, a great broad question immediately presents itself, as to whether it should not be taken over by the system we already own, which has very able men at its head. In fact some of them are so able they can go to New York and make speeches concerning things about which they know nothing. But I make that point, in regard to who is to be in charge of the operation of this line.

I conclude by saying I believe that is something to which a great deal of consideration might be given. No doubt the minister will be able to tell us that he has already considered that point, and will give his reasons for adopting this method rather than the one I have suggested. Finally, Mr. Chairman, I believe that even at considerable cost we should try to do something for those pioneers who have gone into this area, some of whom are from seventy to ninety miles from railhead, who bring in their goods as best they can and ship what they produce an extra five hundred miles around through to Edmonton. That is by Canadian National of course; much of it goes around through Calgary, because hon. members will find that the freight rate from Edmonton to Vancouver direct is exactly the same as the rate through Calgary. The people who have gone in there have done splendid things. They have won the highest prizes in the world with their wheat and other grains. They need encouragement, and the opening up of the area will do immense good not only to the people immediately involved but to all Canada.

Just in order to bring the hon. member for Kamloops up to date on my knowledge, or lack of it, in connection with railways, let me tell him that in 1905, when the only issue was the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, I supported my uncle, D. W. Bole of Winnipeg, who beat Sanford Evans. I was then a good Liberal; but I had done that much politically before he was born, so at least I had that much of a start.

Mr. Chevrier: There is always time to come back.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Winston Churchill has been the only person to prove the fallacy of that. It is a fallacy that you can change more than once; only Churchill could change twice and get away with it.

May I say also that I have attended more freight rate investigations before the board of transport commissioners than anyone else in this House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Perhaps that is why they are so confused.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is one thing I am happy about; I love my confusion and respect it more than I do my hon. friend's knowledge of railway matters. But may I conclude by saying that I approve of the bill. I think it is a step in the right direction; but following the major expenditures which were explained to us by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano I believe the matter will become much more serious, and finally I am quite sure this little railway will fold up, as all little railways in Canada are folding up, and that day we will have it as part of our national system.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may immediately answer the three questions asked by my hon. friend—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but in order to save time perhaps at the same time he would answer a question that comes to my mind. In the first place, is the traffic there? The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard thinks it is. The hon. member for Kamloops is quite sure it is there. I can understand that the livestock might be there and the oats might be there. As far as the coal is concerned, it is there but I am afraid it will stay there; it will not reach the markets in Montreal and Toronto.

But having said that much let me say this. I do not know of any province that has gripped the imagination of the Canadian people, especially those who have come back from overseas, as has British Columbia. Therefore I am of opinion that, having regard to those who will come after us, we must recognize that that province has the most marvellous potentialities, and that we from our places in this house should show some initiative and some drive to assist any undertaking which will help that province to properly look after those who are going there in thousands. We should help give them something to do; we should help provide an outlet for what they produce from the God-given resources that are to be found in that province. So from that point of view I am anxious to do anything that can be done to help our friends from British Columbia to develop those wide open spaces out there, and the tremendous natural resources of that province.

Someone to my left asked, "Are we getting fat and lazy in Canada?" My answer to the leader of the Social Credit party is, pray God we are not getting fat and lazy. We are ready to develop this country, because no other country in the world has such resources ready for development. It is our duty to provide some initiative, and one way of doing that is to support this bill. I notice the minister smiling. He is from Ontario, just as I am. I am thinking of the whole of Canada; I am not thinking of Cornwall or Toronto or any other particular place. We have a population here not nearly large enough to develop the resources which are at our doorstep, which should be developed for the benefit of the whole world, though I do not want to get on that strain.

Mr. Chevrier: I was smiling not at my hon. friend, but because I was waiting for the question he is going to ask. He is proceeding to make a rather lengthy statement.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): This will be a short session, and you will get the question quickly enough. I hope, Mr. Chairman, when the minister does get the question that he is qualified to answer it.

Mr. Chevrier: I am wondering whether the hon. member is qualified to ask it.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I am not quite sure, Mr. Chairman. I have never yet bragged about my qualifications, but I will match them not only against any member in this chamber, but also against the minister's. I do not want to brag, but I shall ask the voice of experience to answer my question in a moment. I do not know what the rush is. I was hoping we might sit here long enough for some of the members to collect their fifty days' pay.

The question I want to ask the minister is based on the following fundamental idea: Is the population now, plus the influx into British Columbia, large enough to warrant us, as members of this House of Commons, voting for this bill? I believe it is, and I am ready to vote for this bill. I am ready to vote for anything that will aid in the expansion of this country or that will enable us to absorb a greater population.

I now come to the straight question which the minister wanted me to ask. Is the traffic there? Are the livestock, oats, coal and other products in that area in such a quantity that they will find their way to a market? I know that the coal will not find its way to Toronto or Montreal, but a great deal of coal is consumed in the area between British Columbia and Winnipeg. Has that been measured? Has an estimate been made of the amount of coal that might be consumed, first in the area around Vancouver and, second, between there and Regina or Winnipeg? Can anyone say that the coal produced in this area can be absorbed along the line?

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that we are in this position: Canada has abundant resources, but an insufficient population. I think we should be seized with the idea of the magnitude of our responsibility to civilization. For that reason, after I receive a reply from the minister as to whether or not the traffic is there, I feel disposed to vote for this legislation.

Mr. Green: Before the minister replies to those questions, there are two questions I should like to place before him. Some remarks have been made this afternoon which were rather disparaging to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway. I think it would be unfortunate if the members of this house were left with the impression that the railway is nothing but a white elephant. It has had a great deal to do with the opening up of the interior of British Columbia. It is the most friendly railway in the country and I always enjoy riding on it. That has been discovered not only by the people of British Columbia; many tourists from the United States ride on the railroad because it is so different from the transcontinental lines. It has an attraction for the people from the United States as a railway on which to take a holiday trip. As the line is extended to the north, that will be even more true.

One other feature which the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) did not mention was the agreement between the province of British Columbia and the Grand Trunk Pacific to the effect that passengers and freight destined for Vancouver would be routed over the Pacific Great Eastern via Prince George. That was one of the main reasons why the province of British Columbia went ahead with the railway. When the Grand Trunk Pacific got into financial troubles and was eventually taken over by the Canadian National Railways, the main line to Vancouver went from Red Pass Junction down through Kamloops over the line of the old Canadian Northern. All that freight and passenger traffic which would have gone over the Pacific Great Eastern from Prince George to Vancouver was lost to the provincial government railway. The dominion certainly has a moral obligation to help the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, in addition to what benefit will be gained by the dominion as a whole through the help given to the railway. I hope that this payment of $15,000 for a few miles will not be considered as settling any obligation that the dominion may have.

Turning now to my two questions, I should like the minister to tell me what the policy of the government is with regard to subsidizing the road from Prince George north. Personally, I believe the government should be willing to offer the same amount of subsidy to the British Columbia government for construction from Prince George north into the Peace river country. It is almost unbelievable that a progressive people such as the Canadian people would not have insisted on a western outlet from the Peace river country many years ago. The minister's reason for taking over the Temiscouata Railway was to aid settlers. Thousands of settlers have gone into the Peace river country and been left to fend for themselves. I am asking what the policy is to be with regard to subsidizing the road north of Prince George.

The second question has to do with a proposal which is receiving consideration in the United States. It has to do with building a railway from Prince George to Alaska. I have seen a press dispatch dated October 26, under the heading "Bill for Railroad Canada to Alaska Signed by Truman". That is not a very accurate heading, but apparently what has happened is that the President has signed a bill which gives him the power to negotiate with the Canadian government with a view to extending the railway system which will now terminate at Prince George to the territory of Alaska. It further gives him power to cause surveys to be made, plans, specifications, cost estimates and budget requests to be prepared for the purpose of constructing a railroad connecting the existing railroad system terminating at Fairbanks, Alaska, with this railroad system extending from Prince George to Alaska.

A few days ago I asked the following questions of the government:

Have there been any negotiations between the government of Canada and the government of the United States concerning the construction of a railway through Canada to Alaska?

Have any surveys been made or authorized by the Canadian government in connection with such a railway?

The answer to question No. 1 was as follows:

There have been no formal negotiations, but informal discussions took place in September and October, 1942.

That was seven years ago, and apparently there have been no negotiations since that time.

The answer to the other question was:

Yes, the Canadian government authorized the United States army engineers to make a survey in 1942.

I do not know whether the United States engineers actually made that survey. I suggest that we should have from the minister some information concerning this United States proposal, because it seems to be one which might be of great interest to Canada. Half of the province of British Columbia lies north of the main line to Prince Rupert. Everyone in British Columbia therefore is vitally concerned with developments in that part of the province.

Mr. Chevrier: There is not a great deal of time left but in the few minutes that remain before six o'clock I shall try to cover the questions.

The hon. member for Calgary West put three questions to me. The first was: What is the basis of the subsidy? Is this a matter of defence? When he used the word "basis" I presume he was not concerned at all with the question of financial basis. I see that the hon. member is not in his seat now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: I think perhaps he meant the reason for the bill—if that was the reason.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is that, so far as I am aware, the only reason for a subsidy is the increased traffic which the owners and operators of this railway, the British Columbia government, feel they will get from this extension. Their chief engineer has advised my department that if this extension is made it is expected that nine billion feet, board measure, of standing timber suitable for the production of lumber, newsprint, pulpwood, plywood and other wood products are available in that area and can be taken down that railway to Vancouver and other centres. Then it is possible, probable even, that successful mining operations, such as in the Wells-Barkerville section, can be promoted; there are sections of agricultural and grazing lands than can be opened up to colonization; and last but not least, hydroelectric power potentialities are available in the Quesnel area. The British Columbia government are proposing to develop hydro power in the Quesnel area, and also the establishment of a pulp and paper business there, which will provide traffic for the railway and encourage development and settlement of the central area. So far as I am concerned, that is the basis of the subsidy—the increased traffic potential which will develop from the extension.

The next question asked was: Is there an agreement between British Columbia and the dominion government? There is none. The next question was: Why is this railway not taken over in the same manner as the Temiscouata Railway? Why was the Canadian National Railways not instructed to take this over? That matter was not even considered. There was no necessity for considering it because the government of British Columbia came here and asked for the subsidy. In fact, as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano mentioned, they first of all discussed a loan and after some further negotiations a subsidy was suggested from the dominion and that is the only proposal which arose at that time concerning the method of assistance. Of course the other question did not arise. I could go into that and give excellent reasons why there is a difference between the position with reference to the P.G.E. and that with reference to the Temiscouata railway, but I do not see that it is relevant in the circumstances.

Then the question asked by the hon. member for Danforth is answered, I think.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): It is already answered.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, That is what I was going to say. Let me tell my friend the hon. member for Danforth that I meant no offence to him a moment ago when I smiled. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows that I was smiling at him because of a remark that he had made.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): The record is clear; I am satisfied.

Mr. Chevrier: Two questions which were asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra are quite easy to answer, I think, although I know the answer will not be to his satisfaction. One was: What is the policy of the government with reference to further extensions? This resolution seeks authority for a subsidy for 82·7 miles of railway, and that is the only thing with which parliament or the committee is concerned at the moment. As to future subsidies, they will be considered at the time and the policy of the government will then be announced.

I hope that some day it will be possible to grant what has been asked by various members by way of extension up to Finlay Forks in order to meet the junction of the Northern Alberta railway at the terminus at Hines Creek and Dawson Creek on the north and south sides of the Peace river. I am not saying that will be done, but I hope it will be possible to do that.

As to the second question, with regard to the proposal of the United States, I understand that the bill to which my hon. friend referred has been passed by congress. Until representations are made on the official level by the United States government to the Canadian government, it is impossible to consider the question of a survey such as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Green: Would Canada participate in a survey?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the answer would depend on whether or not we are invited to participate. At the moment I am not aware that we have been invited. When we are invited, I presume we shall look at the position then.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 146, to authorize the granting of a subsidy to the government of the province of British Columbia in aid of the construction of an extension to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bills Nos. 15 to 59 inclusive and 67 to 103 inclusive:

Bill No. 15 for the relief of John Henniker Torrance.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 16 for the relief of Edith Harriet Black Hambly.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 17 for the relief of Margaret Reid O'Connell.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 18 for the relief of Alton Charles Bray.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 19 for the relief of Kathleen Gertrude Macartney Dorken.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 20 for the relief of Louise de Forest MacAlpine.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 21 for the relief of Jessie Fraser Blaiklock Stewart.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 22 for the relief of Alice Lafond Burnham.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 23 for the relief of Muriel Annie Elizabeth Hicks Kurtzman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 24 for the relief of Robert Walsham Herring.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 25 for the relief of Leta Helen Butler Waller.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 26 for the relief of Violet Blodwyn Young Murdoch.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 27 for the relief of Joseph Tannenbaum.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 28 for the relief of Isabel Christine MacLean Robinson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 29 for the relief of Marie Annette Vallieres Handfield.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 30 for the relief of Nicholas Kouri.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 31 for the relief of Viateur Fortier.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 32 for the relief of Lois Elizabeth Rolph.—Mr. Winkler.

Private Bills—Divorce

Bill No. 33 for the relief of Madeleine Dunn Landry.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 34 for the relief of Arthur Joseph D'Avignon.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 35 for the relief of Jessie Gwendolyn Paul Giroux.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 36 for the relief of Celia Maria Gabrielle de Costa Baxter.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 37 for the relief of Dorothy Amelia Beattie Harrison.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 38 for the relief of Rosaline Laham Anber.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 39 for the relief of Anna Starzynski Sztafirny.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 40 for the relief of Marjorie Claire Dickison LeMieux.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 41 for the relief of Dorothy Ruth Brown Bailey.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 42 for the relief of Lorne Bradbury Ashton.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 43 for the relief of Harry James Seaban.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 44 for the relief of Julia Seram Odenick.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 45 for the relief of Myrtle Elizabeth Howat Brammall.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 46 for the relief of Francis Gilmer Tempest Dawson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 47 for the relief of Imelda Poirier Tremblay.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 48 for the relief of Joseph Charles Paul Emile Chales.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 49 for the relief of Robert Mason Watson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 50 for the relief of Catherine Alexandra Mackenzie Mitchell.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 51 for the relief of Irene Filion Primeau.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 52 for the relief of Mary Jean Strachan Taylor.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 53 for the relief of Edna Kate Folley Dickenson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 54 for the relief of Gerald Geoffrey Racine.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 55 for the relief of Yvonne Marshall Balfry Corbin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 56 for the relief of Colleen Ethel Thornhill Clark.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 57 for the relief of Leith Albert Anderson Baldwin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 58 for the relief of Marie Jeanne Martin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 59 for the relief of Irene Emily Katerelos Stones.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 67 for the relief of Margaret Helen Milne Ward.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 68 for the relief of Lizzie Brogden Hibberd.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 69 for the relief of Eric Jeffrey Burn.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 70 for the relief of Agnes McIntosh McKillop McBride.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 71 for the relief of Elizabeth Audrey Beauclerk Quinlan.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 72 for the relief of Thelma Blanche Collins Geick.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 73 for the relief of Thora Beckingham Lock.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 74 for the relief of Hugh William Lloyd.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 75 for the relief of Linda Emilia Wilen Robitaille.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 76 for the relief of Brina Paskin Warshaw.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 77 for the relief of Thomas Hanusiak.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 78 for the relief of Loretta Waugh O'Dell.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 79 for the relief of Marie Rita Plante Boyer.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 80 for the relief of Dorothy Waxman Sherman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 81 for the relief of Laura Cohen Kaminsky.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 82 for the relief of Annie Marion Lesnichuk Krushelniski, otherwise known as Annie Marion Lesnichuk Krush.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 83 for the relief of Marjorie May Smart Birmingham.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 84 for the relief of Anna Sandberg Goldbloom, otherwise known as Anna Sandberg Gold.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 85 for the relief of Olive Frances Harper Morrison.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 86 for the relief of Delphis Brousseau.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 87 for the relief of Gladys McCarrick Bonnemer.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 88 for the relief of Bernice Beverly Corry Cohen.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 89 for the relief of Bessie Zinman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 90 for the relief of Marion Lillian Gargan Thomson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 91 for the relief of Mary Piekos Rynski.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 92 for the relief of Victor Chryssolor.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 93 for the relief of Blanche Ruth Serokey Smith.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 94 for the relief of Raymonde Belanger Skaife.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 95 for the relief of Elizabeth Maud Gwendolen Tobi Hearns.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 96 for the relief of Ruby Muriel Keith Gray.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 97 for the relief of Laurel Jeanne MacGregor Thomson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 98 for the relief of Edith Sara Hamilton Warlund.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 99 for the relief of Donald Duncalf Birchenough.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 100 for the relief of Joan Gertrude Fox Corbett.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 101 for the relief of Richard William Henry Wark.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 102 for the relief of Eileen Dorothy Richards Turner.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 103 for the relief of Janey Beryl MacPhail Shuttleworth.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Gagnon: Where is the mover?

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on Bills Nos. 15 to 59 inclusive and 67 to 103 inclusive, Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall the bills carry?

Mr. Cruickshank: No, I should like to ask a question in connection with this. First I want to know how many children are concerned in the first bill, and how they are to be provided for?

Mr. Knowles: There are eighty-one bills.

Mr. Winkler: We have no information on that here.

Mr. Gagnon: Louder.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not hear the answer.

Mr. Winkler: There is no information here on that tonight.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then, Mr. Chairman, if there is no information as to how these children are to be cared for, or as to how many there are, I object to any bill submitted to this committee without that information—and I am surprised that Quebec members do not object further.

Mr. Howe: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bills carry?

Mr. Cruickshank: No.

Mr. Gagnon: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Carried on division.

Mr. Cruickshank: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bills?

Mr. Cruickshank: On division.

Bills reported, on division.

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the third reading of Bills Nos. 15 to 59 inclusive and Bills Nos. 67 to 103 inclusive.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cruickshank: On division.

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to and bills read the third time, on division.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Winkler moves, seconded by Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria): that these bills be now passed and that the titles be as on the order paper. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cruickshank: On division.

Bills passed, on division.

MOTION TO RETURN EVIDENCE TO SENATE

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to return to that house the evidence, etc., taken before the standing committee on divorce, to whom are referred the petitions on which divorce bills Nos. 15 to 59 and Nos. 67 to 103 inclusive, were founded.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cruickshank: No—unless the hon. member explains the details upon which I asked the questions.

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the hon. member that the motion now before the house is one to return the evidence sent here previously in connection with the bills which have just received third reading.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bills Nos. 104 to 115 inclusive, 121 to 132 inclusive and 134 to 141 inclusive:

Bill No. 104 for the relief of Edith Cohen.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 105 for the relief of Ida Lindy Angel Katzman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 106 for the relief of Marian Latora Glendening Joncas.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 107 for the relief of Eva Nerenberg Anger.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 108 for the relief of Josephine Teweson Paul Bero.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 109 for the relief of Phyllis Elizabeth Ross Erskine.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 110 for the relief of Jeannette Mathilda Seymour Oswald.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 111 for the relief of George Bennett Gagnon.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 112 for the relief of Bertha Rudolph Holzberg.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 113 for the relief of Lillian Elizabeth Moore Bowen.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 114 for the relief of Laurence Bouchard Pappini.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 115 for the relief of Nana Rosenberg Taube.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 121 for the relief of Cecile de Mers Asheim.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 122 for the relief of Elsie Margaret Harding Lewin.—Mr. Winkler.
