Bill No. 140 for the relief of Evelyne Louis Steinwold.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 141 for the relief of John Gilbert Speak.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cruickshank: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think the mover should explain these bills.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, regardless of whether the attitude of hon. members is in approval of or opposed to the principle of divorce, these bills are here for second reading. They have been considered in the Senate divorce committee, have been passed by the Senate and are here for our confirmation. If any hon. members here tonight had heard the evidence of the four members of the Senate in our private bills committee yesterday, or if any of the members here had attended the Senate divorce committees, they would have been firmly of the opinion that the members of the Senate were discharging their duties in a very conscientious manner. Whatever the private opinion of any member may be, the part that we as members of the House of Commons take in this matter is merely judicial.

These bills have to become acts of parliament to become law, and therefore they must pass the House of Commons as a matter of form. That is entirely within our jurisdiction. But unless we have some fault to find with some particular phase of the evidence, I maintain that we have no alternative but to pass these bills. We are not here to discuss the principle of divorce. We are merely carrying out the law.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I not be permitted to ask the sponsor of these bills a few questions in explanation?

Mr. Speaker: When the Speaker is in the chair it is not in accordance with the rules of the house to ask questions. However, the hon. member would have the right to attend sittings of the committee and if he is a member of the committee he could ask questions at that time. I am sure he would get the answers then.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, since the last debate of the house upon bills of this nature, I have inspected some of the bills and some of the evidence in cases that had been taken. Then I went to the room on the other side of the building where a case was in progress. It happened that when I went there the case was being opposed.

I sat during the morning session and heard the evidence given at that time. I was unable to go back in the afternoon, but I discovered afterwards that the committee had divided on the question of whether or not a divorce should be granted, by a vote of four to three. Since then I have been told by a member of the committee that further evidence has come to light in that particular case indicating that one of the witnesses had not been telling the truth. Although the bill was sent over here, an application is going to be made to have it sent back so that this evidence can be taken and the committee consider the case again in the light of the further evidence being advanced.

So I think we can say that the cases being put before the house tonight, when we have no information at all about them, constitute something like a farce.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Did you attend the committee meeting?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, because I did not know it was on. I did not receive notice of it.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): It is in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In another case which I examined I noticed that the parties had celebrated a marriage in New York. They came back to live in Montreal and had another celebration of marriage there. They had a disagreement before the second marriage, and ten days later they separated, with the result that proceedings for divorce were subsequently taken. From my examination of the evidence it seems to me that there was collusion between the parties notwithstanding the fact that it had been sworn that there was not.

Mr. Winkler: Is the hon. member referring to one of the bills now before us?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might reserve his remarks until that particular bill is before us. Might I suggest to the hon. member that the question he is raising with regard to collusion might be raised when the bills go to the committee on miscellaneous private bills, to which they will be referred if they receive second reading tonight.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in years past I have been more or less pronounced in my views, particularly in respect to the way we have had to deal with divorces from two of the provinces. I do not agree altogether with the member of the private bills committee when he says that it is only a matter of form to put these bills through this house. As the House of Commons we perform a particular function. These bills constitute part of the law of the land. They represent the breaking up of a marriage in order that the principals may be legally married again. Whether this procedure is formal or not, we have a perfect right to prevent these bills from becoming law. That is our privilege as members of the House of Commons.

I must raise my voice in respect to the method used to deal with divorce bills. During the course of about three minutes tonight 82 of these bills were dealt with, and there are 29 of them in the next batch that is being presented to us. Within a very few minutes a total of 110 odd bills will have gone through. As far as this procedure is concerned, this chamber could certainly be described as a divorce mill.

It is true that the evidence is heard, and I think thoroughly, in the Senate committee on divorce. It is true also that members of the House of Commons have a right to go there to hear the evidence without the privilege of discussing it. When these bills are brought before the committee on miscellaneous private bills any hon. member can attend, but he cannot ask questions except with the consent of the committee which I suppose would be granted. The committee on miscellaneous private bills does not go into the evidence although it has the privilege of doing so.

The fact that the entire parliament of Canada, both lower and upper houses, has to deal with a subject like this is nauseating to me. We have implored the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government to devise some other way whereby divorce bills from these two provinces could be dealt with. I think that divorce comes under the heading of property and civil rights, which are provincial matters. If I am not right, some member of the legal profession can say so. However, that is a minor point.

Some other method should be used to deal with these bills. As far as I am concerned, if the issue has to be forced it can be forced by simply voting against the bill. If we turned down a couple of hundred of them in a batch, you bet your life something would be done. That is all I have to say tonight.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, as it seems to be out of order to ask questions I should like to say a few words on this motion. Twenty minutes of the time of the house has been taken up tonight with divorce bills. I do not know why the people of Fraser Valley elected me, but they certainly did not elect me to act as a judge on divorce bills.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: The name of the constituency of my hon. friend has been changed since he was here last to Coast-Capilano—think that over, but the name of my constituency is still Fraser Valley. I am being asked to decide for or against divorce bills. I am going to read some of these to the house because I have a little time. One reads:

No. 24. House in committee on Bill No. 15 (Letter G of the Senate), intituled—

I seem to be getting a lot of advice from nearby. I want to say to the house that I am not opposed to divorce in any way, shape or form, but not under present procedure. We have heard a lot in this house about dominion-provincial relations and our good leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), has told us that we can depend upon the judgment of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe that even in Saskatchewan there are judges who are capable of ruling in the best interests of everybody. There are important bills being brought forward by some United States interests that possibly may come up before nine o'clock.

I do not think I was elected to sit as a judge on divorce matters. If I was, I wish I had been left in Coast-Capilano or somewhere else out there. We can joke all we like about this, but the fact remains that the rights of the children may be involved and they should be of primary importance. No mover or seconder of any of these measures has told us what is to happen to the children or what alimony is to be paid.

We are told that that is of no importance because a certain committee of the other place, which must not be mentioned because of some legal rule, has considered these applications.

An hon. Member: The rule of stare decisis.

Mr. Cruickshank: "Subnormal" might be a good word. We are not allowed to mention it. I think any member is derelict in his duty if he has a family of his own and does not care a snap what happens to the children of his own or of somebody else's family. In my opinion it is no argument at all to bring a bill before this house and say that the matter has been judged in some other place by a certain committee. Let the sponsor of the measure come before the house and say what is the reason the divorce is being granted.

Mr. Winkler: Is that a question?

Mr. Cruickshank: Certainly.

Mr. Winkler: How could any member, unless he had a colossal memory, remember the evidence in all these cases and prepare himself to bring it before the house?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is all the same.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am very glad to answer that. It gives me another couple of minutes. The hon. member should come before the house with a written statement on each case, or not sponsor these bills. How does the sponsor expect us to know what is happening to the children or to the wives if he does not know? How does he expect us to know anything about it?

Mr. Winkler: He expects you to read.

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe he expects us to read it. Like many other members, I receive this evidence from the other place. Some of the volumes are fat ones and some are thin ones. Like every other member, I believe I pick out the thick ones because I think there might be something interesting in them. I wonder if the member who sponsors these bills would like me to quote in detail from one case that came from the other place last week. The evidence was disgusting. My friend asks why I should ask him to give me the details. I am asking him to give me the details because in that particular case there were eight children concerned. I wonder who is going to provide for the eight children.

An hon. Member: Family allowances.

Mr. Cruickshank: Family allowances, due to the great government we have, of which I am one of the firmest supporters and builders.

I believe in the sanctity of marriage, and I believe our divorce laws are not what they should be. I do not think one and only ground for divorce in Canada is sufficient. I think the Criminal Code ought to be amended to cover the situation. I am not a lawyer, but I believe it should be amended. I believe that no hon. member should advance some fifty bills at one time—you will have a chance over there when I am finished—and frankly admit that he knows nothing of the details, nothing of the parties concerned, and ask us to pass these bills without further information. More so-called important bills may come up before nine o'clock, but I do not think they are as important as these bills. In one case you are dealing in dollars and cents. Some company is going to make a lot of money, or it thinks it is. In this case we are dealing with—

Mr. Benidickson: Westcoast Transmission.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is an interjection by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. It is a small district somewhere in the eastern part of Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) allow me to raise a point of order?

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the whole discussion is out of order. We are not discussing the principle of divorce as such. We are discussing certain divorce cases. If the hon. member wishes to do so he can take each case in turn and discuss the principle of it, but I do not think it is in order to discuss the principle of divorce. That has been done before, but I think it has always been out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is an important one. I feel as he does that there has been too much latitude given in the discussion of these bills. As hon. members know, each bill refers to certain individuals, and the only question before the house is the principle in each bill. I do not think that should justify a wide discussion on the whole question of divorce and marriage. These are private bills, and they are strictly limited to the principle in each bill. I think that at this time hon. members should not discuss the general question of divorce, the grounds for divorce in Canada, and the law of divorce in Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling brought about by the correction of my friend from my own province. I am particularly interested in order No. 27;

House in committee on Bill No. 18 (Letter J of the Senate), intituled: "An Act for the relief of Alton Charles Bray." (Without amendment.)

I should like to know just what that means.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would discuss one of the bills starting at No. 104.

Mr. Cruickshank: I dislike to take up the time of the house. I am particularly interested in Bill No. 105—Bill No. 103.

An hon. Member: That is passed.

Mr. Cruickshank: Who is running the house?

Some hon. Members: 104.

Mr. Knowles: Bill No. 105, not order No. 105.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Janey Beryl MacPhail Shuttleworth; that is the one.

An hon. Member: Take your time.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then I will take order No. 108: second reading of Bill No. 106 (Letter O-3 of the Senate), intituled: "An act for the relief of Marian Latora Glendening Joncas." Surely that is all right. I am interested in knowing, as a good Canadian, just how many children are involved in this case, and I hope other hon. members will be interested for the same reason.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: Just a moment; I may be called to order by the Speaker but not by anyone else in this chamber. How many children are concerned in this case? I am surprised that some of the junior members of this parliament are not interested in the welfare of the children of Canada, as they should be. I want to know what provision is being made for the welfare of the children and of the wife. I want to know the details of this case; and when I am told that we can be asked to pass a bill without being given any information whatever as to the details, that is not my conception of what parliament is supposed to do. I would like the sponsor of this bill to give me that information.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not in order for the hon. member to ask questions nor for the sponsor of the bill to answer them at this time. As I have stated before, after these bills are given second reading they will be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. Hon. members may attend the meetings of that committee and if they are on the committee they can ask questions there.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sorry I did not understand your previous ruling, Mr. Speaker. I shall not ask those questions now, but for the next ten or fifteen minutes I should like to tell the house why I object to divorce bills being brought here, with no explanation as to the details in each case. I have the greatest admiration for the province of Quebec; some of the finest cheese in the world is produced in that province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hardly think it is in order, while dealing with one of these private bills, to discuss the whole question of divorce in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Just a moment. I do not mind being called to order by the Speaker, because after all he presides over this house, but certainly I am not going to be called to order by a junior member from Windsor or anyone else.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I am not calling anyone to order, if the hon. member is referring to me; and I am the member for Essex West.

An hon. Member: The hon. gentleman asked his question and it was answered. Now he is going on to make a speech, and I suggest that he is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) concluded his remarks? Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Cruickshank: On division.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): No, Mr. Speaker; not even on division. I am still speaking to the bill chosen by my hon. friend, No. 106, which has to do with the divorce of two people. I hope I shall not transgress your ruling when I say—because more people than you, sir, are listening to me this evening—that I believe people living in difficulty and trouble should have some way of separating from one another. That is just a silly thought that occurred to me, and I hope in expressing it I have not breached the ruling you just gave.

The point I am so anxious to bring out is that I do not think our problem here is so much these individual cases, though in the strict interpretation of the rules I am very much inclined to agree with what you said. I do think perhaps you are being a little strict, as a result of your long association with this House of Commons and having so often seen what is going on here tonight. However, I am anxious to make my personal position plain. Someone like the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) may say that I am speaking to my constituents. He spoke to his constituents during his whole address the other evening and did not say a word to anyone else; but I hope I do not transgress even that rule.

It seems to me our problem is not so much the rights or wrongs of this bill. I have not read it, but if I were a betting man I would bet ten to one a match was put up against a door, and when the dicks came back in the morning they found the match still there, so there was a charge of adultery and an action for divorce. I will admit that many of these cases are faked, but you do not do that in our courts just by putting a match against a door. You must go a good deal further than that. Ninety per cent of it is fake, and nothing else. I know some suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that this thing should be left to the exchequer court; and he got booed in the House of Commons. Of course he does not mind that; he has lived on boos all his life, and by that I mean he has been booing other people, not that people have been booing him.

So we have reached the position where we must admit that ninety per cent of the divorces in Canada are complete fakes. The old saying may be true, that the end justifies the means. My profession was the practice of law, though I had to quit that and go broke when I came down here to attend this House of Commons, with the huge fees we get here. Everybody gets rich once they are elected here; there is no question about that. We do not need a retirement allowance. We get $4,000 a year and we can live for the next forty years on what we save out of that.

The point I am trying to make is that today every man in this house is taking part in a farce. I have no doubt that in Bill No. 106 they had two matches leaning up against the door as proof, which is just sheer nonsense. When a fellow is in that game all he does is leave the place after he has been called on by the dicks, and he leans a match up against the door. Then the dicks come back the next morning and say, "Nobody came out of that room, because our match is still there."

No one in this House of Commons who has any experience in legal matters will accept this story of the match.

May I state my position? I believe in divorce. I do not mean the Los Angeles or the Reno type or anything of that kind. I am one of those who believe that, as the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has said, children need a father and a mother. It is only under very difficult circumstances that the parents should be separated. May I do this bit of bragging? I am in the law business and I know there is money in divorce, but I have yet to take one case. I am so annoyed with the whole business. I have made many arrangements by which husband and wife have been able, for a while at least, to get along. I have told people who have no children, "Go ahead and divorce yourselves or shoot one another; do what you like, I don't care. If you have some children, however, they are entitled to a break, and that break is a father and a mother". To me, there is no question of religion attached to it or anything of that kind.

An hon. Member: What about the ten commandments?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I suppose the hon. member means that commandment which speaks of coveting. I was not speaking about coveting. It says that thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his ox nor his ass. You thought you had me, but you did not. I am inclined to think that is the commandment the member is thinking about. I shall not enter into that.

I greatly respect the opinion of other people who have equally cogent reasons for a different view from my own. I come back again to this; it should not be a matter dealt with in the other place and confirmed by us so quickly. I have voted for divorce bills in the last six years. I confess I have done that because I think the committee in the other place has done a careful job. Instead of laughing at those men, I believe they have done an excellent and a tiresome job. Irrespective of the amusement we may get in reading the evidence in one of those cases, remember it has ceased to be amusing to those men who are giving their time every morning in the week and many afternoons in the week to listening to this evidence.

Mr. Howe: Not as much time as you are taking, though.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am dealing with a hundred, sir, and they deal with them one at a time. That is just an answer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because my remarks are confined to Bill No. 106. I do want to say that I think those men are doing a splendid job under difficult circumstances.

Turning to the subject of the bill introduced concerning the exchequer court, I believe that is too much to ask of the exchequer court.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might reserve his remarks on that bill for another occasion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): As always, I bow to your ruling. May I close by complimenting those hon. gentlemen who, at their age, may be assumed to have lost interest in that sort of thing, but I doubt it very much.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bills read the second time, and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, October 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, last Friday during this debate I read the correspondence carried on between Hon. Gray Turgeon and Mr. Manning, the premier of Alberta. For a moment, I should like to review the contents of the reply Mr. Manning made. The first point he brought out was that no bona fide company should be refused incorporation, and that the province should have the right to deal with any of those companies. Second, that the Alberta government will allow the export of gas, but only after it is satisfied that the reserves are sufficient for its own domestic and industrial requirements, and that a surplus exists, over and above those requirements, sufficient to justify export under a sound conservation policy. Third, that no export out of Canada will be allowed until the Canadian requirements are met.

I should like to enlarge just a little bit on the conservation policy of the Alberta government and the reasons for it. The first oil well was discovered in Canada in the year 1861; the exact location of it I do not know. The product of that well was used entirely for the kerosene that could be obtained out of it. Everything else was wasted. Since that time advances have been made and petroleum and petroleum products are now the base of over a thousand articles ranging from chewing gum to cosmetics. I trust the ladies will enjoy that because I can just see them smearing on crude oil for make-up.

After the discovery of the Turner valley oil field Imperial Oil spent $100 million in exploration before the discoveries of the Leduc and the Redwater fields. With such an outlay, it is quite readily understood why these fields have to be protected by a good solid conservation plan.

Any hon. members who have been down Calgary way, at least in the early years of the Turner valley field, will remember the glare of lights coming from Turner valley from the flares of natural gas that were burning night and day. As a matter of fact, I remember going to Calgary at one time—I think I was then about eleven years old—when I went to bed, and woke up in the middle of the night. I might add that the home in which I was staying was right below a cemetery which was situated on a hill. I woke up in the middle of the night, turned over, looked out the window, and all I could see were these tombstones sticking out of the red glare in the sky. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I thought my time had come. That gas was wasted during those years. I might say that that wastage was a direct result of incompetent legislation on the part of the dominion government. When the natural resources were turned back to the provinces, the Alberta government immediately put through conservation measures. Moreover, as a result of this lack of a conservation policy, many experts, in estimating the life of the Turner valley oil field, give it exactly ten years to go.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the hon. member name the experts?

Mr. Thomas: If the hon. member would like to have a look at my notes at a later date, perhaps he could find them.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is one of them Albert Hopkins, vice-president of Imperial Oil?

Mr. Thomas: I believe so. Thank you.

Mr. Cruickshank: What was that name?

Mr. Thomas: Albert Hopkins.

Mr. Cruickshank: That takes another minute. Who are the others?

Mr. Thomas: If the hon. members have finished with their little chat, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION TO OWNERS OF SLAUGHTERED CATTLE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to provide changes in the limitation of value determined by the minister in respect to compensation that may be paid owners of slaughtered cattle; to provide additional compensation in respect to certain cattle slaughtered before the commencement of the amending act but after March 31, 1947, and for the repeal of the basis of compensation provisions.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Gardiner: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to provide additional return to those stock owners whose cattle are slaughtered on account of tuberculosis and, when slaughtered, the carcasses are condemned outright as unfit for consumption and on which there is no salvage value. If the amendment were implemented, the return on an animal slaughtered would be approximately the same whether or not it had any salvage value. A higher rate of compensation has been provided for sheep and swine when slaughtered under the provisions of the act. The bill also provides for retroactive payments to stock owners who had carcasses condemned since April 1, 1947. Under all tuberculin test policies it is estimated that approximately 5,329 carcasses will be involved in the retroactive compensation. This number of condemned carcasses resulting from all tuberculin tests since April 1, 1947, originated from approximately 3,553 individual farmers' premises.

I may say that over a long period of years provision has been made for certain payments to be made on livestock that is slaughtered as a result of certain diseases. Certain diseases that affect horses have been covered by this act and certain diseases which affect hogs and sheep, and tuberculosis particularly with regard to cattle. The payments have been approximately the same over the greater part of the period; that is, the possible payments. The act has always stated that a certain limited value could be placed upon purebred stock and lower limited value on grade stock. But the act, as it has been over the years, has stated that the minister or someone on his behalf would set the value that was to be allowed for the stock, but not to exceed two-thirds of this certain valuation; that is, to illustrate, the value of a purebred cattle beast was limited to $150. But the total payment that could be made was only two-thirds of that. The amendments are asking as the maximum amount the two-thirds of the $150 and two-thirds of the price for grade cattle, and saying that that is the highest amount which can be paid. In other words, the minister or someone acting in his behalf cannot exceed those amounts in setting what the figure is. We do not have to value the animal, then take two-thirds of that, and then take a certain proportion of that two-thirds.

But we do go on to say something which is not provided in the original act. We say that, when an animal is condemned outright and therefore goes into the tank, the payment that is to be made on that animal is the actual valuation based upon the market value of the animal at the time slaughtered.

In order to determine what that value is for the period from April 1, 1947, down to the time this act is declared, we indicate that the method by which the value is determined is the average of the market price over the period of time, rather than trying to determine what the price of an individual animal would have been during that period.

From now on individual animals are dealt with on the basis of the market price. But for the period between April 1, 1947, and the present time that valuation is the average of the prices prevailing on the market over a certain period.

Hon. members may be interested in knowing why we go back to April 1, 1947, or how that date was determined upon. The fact is that during the war we were not carrying on many of these investigations concerning conditions in municipalities, in order to make payments. But since the beginning of April, 1947, we have been expanding our activities in connection with it. We went back to the first month in the year in which, when the act was drafted, a municipality which had been started in that particular month was still being examined into. That month was April of 1947.

When the act was drafted last spring we were still examining into payments which ought to be made in areas where we had started investigations on April 1, 1947. We said there would be discrimination if we dealt with them on any other basis. We go back to April 1, 1947, and make payments right back to that date, which will take in all the counties in Ontario and the municipalities in western Canada where investigations had been started. We are still continuing in those counties or municipalities.

That, I think, pretty well covers the intention of the measure. I have some information with regard to the number of animals affected, and if the committee is interested I shall give that information later.

Mr. Sinnott: I should like to say a few words in connection with this resolution, which states that it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to provide changes in the limitation of value determined by the minister. I am not going to elaborate upon the resolution; but, coming from an agricultural riding as I do, and knowing as I do about the tremendous loss to farmers, I am sure this bill will receive a welcome when it is put into effect.

When one part of a riding is within a T.B. test area, and the other part is not, the livestock in the area which does not have the T.B. test have only about half the value. I was informed by some people who had gone to a dairy sale in Winnipeg last fall that the animals they had at home were far superior to those offered at the sale, but that they would not bring the price of those at the sale because they were not in a T.B.-tested area.

When the bill is brought down and compensation is increased from two-thirds of the value to 100 per cent, I know it will go a long way toward helping T.B. areas, and to bring those which are not now in T.B. areas under the act. The reason is that compensation will be given according to the loss on cattle which occurs through condemnation by the doctor.

I am sure that throughout the whole of Canada the bill will receive wholehearted approval. However, there is something else I should like to mention, and that is Bang's disease, which in my opinion should be included in a bill of this kind. Bang's disease has not only destroyed thousands of beef and dairy animals but affected many human beings. Having had a dairy herd of my own some years back I know something of the terrific losses farmers throughout the whole of Canada have sustained from Bang's disease—and not too many people know about it.

This disease in a herd destroys the fertility of the whole herd and, as a result, in a few years one has nothing left with which to carry on. I had a herd of fifty head and, believe it or not, for three years, until the disease was stamped out, I had an increase of only ten or fifteen head. I should like to see the government in the coming year go a long way toward eradicating this terrible disease. It has taken a large toll of cattle and has curtailed the milk flow to all the cities of Canada.

I pass these points on to the government in the hope that they may take action in the future.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister to say, during his explanation of the resolution, that the department was not increasing the compensation for animals slaughtered. I remember very well statements made by the minister and his parliamentary assistant—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that we were not increasing payments for animals slaughtered. We did not pay anything before on animals slaughtered and sent to the tank, except an amount which was allowed. But on the animals which do not go into the tank, most of the beef is sold on the market. In addition to what is obtained from the government, the person who delivers the animal gets the value of it as well. Of those that go into the tank, there is nothing—except perhaps the hide and very little more. What we are doing now is to pay the full value of the animal which goes into the tank—which is a great increase over what was paid before.

Mr. Charlton: I understand that you are paying full compensation for animals which go into the tank; and on top of that you now say you are going to pay the beef price of that animal going into the tank. Heretofore the salvage value on a tanker has been nil; we realize that.

Previous to the election the minister and his parliamentary assistant made certain promises both inside and outside the house that the compensation paid to T.B. reactors would be increased. A reading of the resolution would seem to indicate that it is intended to change the compensation, but I understand that the valuation is to be lowered to what was paid before, that is, two-thirds of the value.

When this act was first enacted in 1903 the compensation paid was exactly the same as it is today. Under the act as assented to on August 13, 1903, the compensation paid was as follows:

Horses:
Grades, $150.
Purebreds, $300.
Cattle:
Grades, $60.
Purebreds, $150.
Sheep and swine:
Purebreds, $50.

Those are the valuations permitted by the present act before this amendment. A new amendment was assented to on June 6, 1913, under which the compensation for grade horses was raised to $200, and for purebreds to $500. The valuation for hogs and sheep remained the same. In 1918 the compensation for grade cattle was raised to $80 and for purebreds, to $250. In 1922 the compensation for purebred cattle was lowered to $200 and the compensation for grade horses was brought down to the old figure of $150, and $300 for purebreds. Then in 1923 the act was amended to its present form.

Is it reasonable that the compensation paid in 1949 should be the same as that paid in 1903? Too many times the farmers are expected apparently to bear more than their share of the burden for the benefit of the entire population. I am not suggesting for one moment that the farmers expect to get the total value of animals slaughtered because of T.B. It must be realized that back in 1903 the price of cattle was about one-third what it is today, yet the compensation is the same.

The government says that it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The fact is that it has been expedient for the last ten years, but nothing has been done about it. It was very necessary during that time because the price of cattle had increased considerably, and even in 1939 it was going up. The minister suggests that the farmers will be getting enough under this amendment when they receive the beef price for cattle going to the tank. I understand that taking into consideration all districts and all herds the average of cattle sent to the tank is nine per cent and that in very few cases will a farmer lose more than three or four animals to the tank. I have yet to hear of anyone who kicks about the loss of such animals; what the farmers are kicking about is the amount they get for compensation.

It has been only in the last few years, probably in the last three years, that beef prices have gone up to any appreciable extent. Previous to that time I do not suppose that the compensation paid for reactors would any more than cover half the cost of new animals. As I said before, statements have been made both in and outside the house by the minister and his assistant, to the electors of this country and to delegations that have come to Ottawa, that the farmers would get more than they were asking for. I do not think they will feel they are getting more than they are asking for when they are to receive only the beef price for tankers.

The compensation for sheep and swine is being raised, but that is a different matter as there is generally no salvage value there. No one keeps a diseased animal knowingly because he realizes it is a danger, not only to himself and his family but to any people who might be using raw milk from his herd. These men are interested in the general welfare of the country and are willing to go along with the tests and to see that diseased animals are destroyed. It would be practically impossible to measure the loss to farmers in dollars and cents when animals must be destroyed. A man may have built up a pure-bred dairy herd over a period of 25 years and may lose nearly the whole herd. No matter what compensation is paid, such a man suffers a terrific loss.

This is not only a problem for the farmer; it is a national problem. It is a case not only of getting rid of the diseased animal but of getting rid of animals which are disease carriers. The life of every human being in Canada may be affected and it thus becomes a national problem. I think the government should assume a little more of the burden and not place so much of it on the farmer himself. Certainly the compensation paid in the past few years has not come anywhere near covering the losses that have been sustained. I would have hoped that the minister could have seen fit to increase the amount of compensation as was promised prior to the election. As I said before, very few people have ever kicked about cattle that go to the tank. They are complaining about the amount of compensation. The bill is not before us yet, and I do not wish to discuss the matter further until we see the bill and know what its contents are. Therefore I am reserving judgment.

Mr. Gardiner: I may tell the hon. member that what is in the bill is exactly what the delegation was told would be in the bill last spring—just exactly what they were told would be in the bill.

Mr. Charlton: I may say then that the minister should have told his parliamentary assistant what was in the bill prior to the election.

Mr. Gardiner: He made the same speeches I made, and they were correct.

Mr. Charlton: You think he did.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): In rising to take part in the debate on the resolution, one of the first things I should like to say is that farmers have been waiting a considerable time for such action. Therefore we welcome the introduction of the resolution regardless of how bitterly we are disappointed in its contents. Apparently there is a vast gap between promise and fulfilment. I can recall that the delegations which came to Ottawa were told that they would receive full compensation, and possibly more than they asked for. If I understand correctly what the farmers of my area are expecting, I must repeat that they are going to be terribly disappointed. My colleague says that the election is over now, but there is another one in the offing. As the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth has said, we want to see the bill before we comment too fully upon it.

Nevertheless I should like to point out three things to the minister and to the house. I think that all Canadians are in accord with the broad principle of the elimination of bovine tuberculosis from Canadian herds. We welcome that as a health measure. It is a broad public health plan. We hear a lot about what the Department of National Health and Welfare is going to do, and this is only one of the steps that it is necessary to take for the prevention of disease in Canada. I also want to point out that a measure for public health should not be paid for by the farmers alone but by all citizens of Canada.

The minister has attempted to prove to the house that the farmers are not losing a great deal. I have before me a copy of the sales slips of the forty-four head of cattle I mentioned on a previous occasion in the house. They indicate the numbers of the animals, the weight, the price per hundredweight, and the amount the man received. It is only from the dairy herds, the milk cows, that a farmer is going to receive a continuous income through the sale of milk. Therefore I will take the sixteen cows out of the herd of forty-four cattle. Their sale at Canada Packers brought an average value of $91.76. In a previous discussion the minister told us that 10 per cent of the reactors went to the tank. This gentleman was lucky inasmuch as only one of the sixteen went to the tank. If he had been an average farmer, instead of receiving $91.76 he would have received $82.58. If you add to that the $38 that the government pays for these cows, the producer would have had a cash return from each cow of $120.58.

I think everyone knows that it is an impossibility today to buy even a fair grade cow for anywhere near that price. If I were to put the price at $200 I would be putting it conservatively. It would be nearer $240 or more.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask what was the date of that sale?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): These animals were slaughtered at Canada Packers on September 22, 1949. I can give the man's name if the minister so desires. We are reserving judgment, however, until we find out what is in the bill and hear more about it. I want to point out that 8,619 have already been sent to the abattoirs from the county of Middlesex, and if you put the loss on each one at $100 you have well over $750,000 lost in the county of Middlesex alone. I think that is too great a burden to ask the farmers to bear for the sake of public health in Canada. I want the minister to know that there is more to the question than the angle of whether or not the farmer is going to make a living.

We think unemployment insurance is a good thing. We believe in it. Its purpose is to take care of the labourer when, through no fault of his own, his means of livelihood are taken away. I do not think the farmer is in a different position. We pay awaiting returns to veterans who are trying to establish themselves on farms until such time as their income is large enough for them to carry on. These men are going to be awaiting returns for quite some time. Some of them are in such a position that possibly they will never go back into the cattle business. Young men, and some of them veterans, have started farming on borrowed money, and are in a desperate situation. The man who has been established for twenty years can get by, but the others are in a different position. I must say that, so far as I can see, the resolution introducing the bill is a bitter disappointment.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 147, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $19,766,890 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1949; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $19,766,890 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time before the first day of April, 1950, the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Canadian National Railways

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, those who were members of the last parliament will recognize this as the usual resolution preceding the introduction of a bill providing funds for approved capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railway system. However, I should like to make a short explanation for the benefit of new members, an explanation which needs to be made since the C.N.R. report and budget on which this resolution is based were presented and adopted at the spring session of the last parliament, when the new members of course were not here.

Each year the Minister of Transport presents to parliament the report of the Canadian National Railway system and the auditors' statement on that report. The report for the fiscal year 1948 was presented to parliament by the Minister of Transport on March 18, 1949. The budget for the current year is also presented to parliament by the Minister of Transport, and this year that was done on March 22. Both the report and budget are then referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. This year the committee first met on March 21 and had six meetings, calling before it the president and other officers of both the Canadian National Railways and T.C.A., the auditors of the national railway and T.C.A., and other witnesses. The annual report and auditors' report for the year 1948 and the budget for the year 1949 were unanimously approved by this committee in its final report to parliament on April 26, 1949. The present resolution is a natural consequence of the approval of the 1949 C.N.R. budget by this committee. I cannot do better than read the ninth paragraph of the report of the committee which can be obtained, bound with the proceedings of this committee, from the parliamentary library:

> The capital budget of the railway system for 1949 includes the following: additions and betterments, $24,500,000; new equipment, $8,700,000; Barraute branch line, $612,890; acquisition of securities and reitrement of capital obligations, $1,692,000; a total of $35,504,890. Against the latter amount there is available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization a sum of $15,738,000, leaving the estimated net capital requirements at $19,766,890.

That is the amount mentioned in this resolution. Since the C.N.R. system is publicly owned, it must now turn to the parliament of Canada for approval to issue securities to obtain this amount of new capital. This is sought in the first part of this resolution, which I shall read. I appreciate that it is a very long resolution, in three main parts. The first part reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $19,766,890 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made for capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1949; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid;—

The next part of the resolution is as follows:

> —to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $19,766,890 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness;

This part, then, authorizes the government to make temporary loans to the company secured by these securities, to enable the company to meet such expenditures, until the time is deemed suitable to float such an issue. For example, parliament authorized an amount not exceeding $85,882,200 on June 14, 1948, and it was not until September 15, 1949, that an issue of $70 million was floated of 2⅞ per cent coupon bonds, realizing 98·58 to the company. In the interval between June 14, 1948, and September 15, 1949, the government made advances under a similar clause in the 1948 resolution for the approved capital expenditures, which advances were recovered from the proceeds of the loan.

The first two parts of the resolution relate to capital expenditure and capital indebtedness. The third part relates to operating and income charges. This provision may be likened to a revolving fund provided by the government. It is logical to have this provision in connection with a publicly owned corporation such as this, because surpluses in any year have to be turned into the consolidated revenue fund at the end of the year, so the company has no cushion to meet current obligations. Since the budget approved by the parliamentary committee this spring envisages a net deficit of $37,800,000, it is obvious that current revenues of the system will not be sufficient to meet the current operating and income charges throughout the year, so this authority is necessary.

The final clause provides that all such current advances shall be reimbursed to the government from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament. I want to make it very clear that this latter deficit appropriation is not covered by this resolution nor is it in the bill which will follow it. When the exact amount of the deficit is known at the end of the C.N.R. fiscal year 1949 a separate resolution and bill will be presented to parliament to make good this deficit; and of course matters relating to the deficit can be discussed at that time.

In summary, therefore, this resolution is presented by the Minister of Finance as a consequence of the unanimous approval given by the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to the 1949 budget of the Canadian National system. It authorized the issuance of securities by the company for the approved capital expenditures in the budget totalling some $19,766,890. It provides that the government may make advances to the company secured by such securities, until such time as those securities are issued. It further provides for temporary loans to the system to meet current operating and income charges, where available revenues are found insufficient, such loans to be recovered out of the annual revenues, or if these are insufficient by deficit appropriation at the next session of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think it is usual when the Canadian National Railways comes before this house for financial provision, that an opportunity is given to the members of the house to make suggestions regarding situations prevailing on the railways which require improvement or change. First, may I be permitted with the utmost sincerity to congratulate my hon. friend on the manner in which he has presented this resolution this evening.

The matter I intend to bring to the notice of the Canadian National Railways is one that I have brought up on other occasions. It has to do with the employees of that railway, numbering about 102,000. I should like one thing to be done so as to raise the morale of the employees of the Canadian National Railways, and that is to make more adequate provision for basic retirement pensions.

On July 2, 1947, I pointed out that the basic pension provided for under the regulations applicable to the Canadian National Railways was $25 per month, a totally inadequate amount as a retirement allowance. I delt as well with the fund and the manner of setting up the fund. I am not going to say any more about that at the moment. After my representations, the minister—

Mr. Sinclair: The Minister of Transport?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Transport. He said that he would be glad to bring the representations to the attention of the directors of the Canadian National Railways. Having regard to the low rate immediate consideration should be given to an increase in the amount of the basic pension and secondly, as the provisions respecting awarding of pensions are determined in a large measure upon the continuity of service, a change should be made in those regulations to remove any injustices that may arise from too strict an interpretation of the regulations.

In due course, the minister did bring up the matter, and wrote me a letter stating in part—

> We have had to take the position that the basic pension cannot be increased because of the very heavy additional cost which would be imposed upon the company. It must be remembered that this pension is at the sole cost of the company—the employee contributes nothing towards it.

Various questions have been asked by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) relating to Canadian National Railway pensions. An examination of the answers indicates that approximately 60,000 of the Canadian National Railways' employees have no contributory pension and must depend upon the basic pension payable to them at the age of 65, amounting to $25. I recall only one previous occasion upon which I have asked for expenditures to be made, except where such expenditures would be self-liquidating. I feel, however, that this matter of increasing the basic pension does require attention. The basic pension was fixed in 1934, and it represents the only pension a considerable number of the retired employees receive, and it is totally inadequate.

By comparison with the present cost of living, the $25 basic pension has a purchasing power of approximately one-third of what it had in 1934. When one realizes that there are only 40,700 of the employees who contribute anything to their pension, some 60,000 employees who are working in the lower paid positions in the railway company will receive when they retire only $25 per month with which to support themselves and their wives. Employees who have been superannuated and who are receiving a non-contributory basic pension of $25 per month, number 2,743. Those who are receiving from $25 to $30 per month number 841; those receiving between $30 and $40 per month, number 664. These are extremely minor pensions after twenty-five years of service, particularly when one considers that many of these employees are unable to provide for their own security.

There are some who are contributing a portion of their wages to provide a part of their retirement allowances. Yet, even among those who contribute a portion of their wages and are receiving a retirement allowance based in part on their basic pension and in part on their contributions, there are 476 whose pension ranges from $25 to $30 per month, and 2,095 whose monthly pension is from $30 to $40. The need for action has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport by representatives of the railway trainmen who have contended that the rate of pension is too low and is a discouragement to that morale which those who serve on the railway should have.

Many men are being denied a pension to which they would be entitled in part because of the fact that they are unable to establish their proof of age, the census records not being accepted in proof of their age. The regulations should be amended to prevent injustices in this and other cases.

I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the matter be brought to the attention of the directors of the Canadian National Railways with a view to assuring that an adequate pension or at least an additional pension be provided for the many employees of Canadian National Railways who today are in the position, upon retirement, of receiving only $25 a month.

Mr. William Aspinall of Winnipeg, vice-president, brotherhood of maintenance of way employees, communicated with the minister last year and, according to a report appearing in the newspaper Labour published in Washington, among other things said that:

> The low paid man who has already been retired or will be retired within the next ten or twenty years is the worker who will receive a totally inadequate pension . . .

It was not until 1935 that he was able to make any contribution himself to his pension. Further on he wrote:

> The low paid workers, of whom there are many thousands on the C.N.R., are unable to maintain a semblance of a decent standard of living, let alone make a five per cent contribution to a pension plan, particularly the thousands who have families to support.

Mr. Aspinall asked that consideration be given to the increase in the amount of pension. I think this is a matter which deserves the serious attention of the directors of the Canadian National Railways. The total amount of the entire earnings that is today devoted to the payment of pensions is approximately 2·3 per cent, as I have been informed. I realize that there are continuing deficits in the Canadian National Railways. Sometimes it is hard to understand why there should be the large deficit. In 1948, with operating revenues of $491,269,950, the railway had a deficit of $33,532,000, whereas during the years from 1941 to 1945, while operating revenues at no time equalled those of 1948, there was a surplus each year, the highest of which was $35 million. Possibly the solution to meet the problem is that contained in the brief filed by the Canadian National Railways with the royal commission to the effect that the time has come to remove the unfairness that has resulted from saddling the Canadian National Railways with the overcapitalization resulting in an interest item that may account in considerable measure for the amount of the deficit.

I do not want to ask for expenditures that will increase the deficit, but I feel that this railway company, a national company, owes it to the employees who are unable to make a contribution to a pension for themselves—and I speak particularly on their behalf—that they be not required to retire on a basic pension of $25 a month at age sixty-five. It is unfair. I make this appeal to the parliamentary assistant, without labouring it; I ask that this matter should be reconsidered; and also that the regulations in connection with the administration of the pension should be submitted to the committee on railways and shipping owned by the government so that changes in the regulations may be made so as to remove many of the anomalies which cause discontent and annoyance among railway employees.

While I was looking this matter up I decided to look at the law in effect in the United States. In that country there is a railroad retirement act. The pensions provided for there are considerably larger than those prevailing in Canada. Within the last week or so at the eighth annual meeting of the legislative committee of the brotherhood of firemen and engineers, a recommendation was made that there should be establishment of a national pension plan for railway employees similar to that under the railroad retirement act of the United States. Whether that is so or not, I feel that this is a matter worthy of consideration by the standing committee of parliament. As a national employer, I feel that we should assure to the man that works the same fairness that is being shown by private enterprise, namely, the provision of a fair and reasonable retirement allowance so that when men who have worked over the years find themselves retired at age sixty-five, they should not have to look forward to only $25 a month.

While I am on my feet I should like to mention one other thing in that connection. I have in mind three or four railroad employees who are between forty-five and fifty years of age, who have become ill, are now unemployed and unable to work. I feel that consideration should be given to extending the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act to cover the unemployed period in the payment of benefits to those who by reason of illness or accident are out of work and unable thereby to provide for their families.

I have advanced these suggestions to the parliamentary assistant for the consideration of the board of directors, and also the consideration of the board that administers the pension fund. I do not think there is any member in the house who would not be willing to serve on a standing committee of the house to consider the matter fully and to revamp the regulations, so that recommendation might be made for an increase in basic pensions to a reasonable figure, and for the removal of anomalies which have the result of causing some employees, who otherwise would be entitled to pension, to be denied it.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member for Lake Centre would expect me to answer the points he has raised. The Canadian National Railways are of course under the direct management of the board of directors, and are the parliamentary responsibility of the Minister of Transport. The only responsibility the Minister of Finance or his department has at this time is to bring in this legislation, which actually implements the budget approved by the sessional committee this spring.

I am not suggesting of course that the remarks of the hon. member are out of order, since this is a resolution asking parliament to approve capital grants for the Canadian National. It is perhaps perfectly proper for the hon. member to voice any grievance he may have in connection with the railways at this time. I take it he wishes to inform parliament of these grievances, and also to draw the attention of the C.N.R. board of directors to these matters. I would suggest that the most effective place to make those recommendations would be, as he suggested during the course of his speech, before the sessional committee when it is called next spring to consider the 1949 report of the Canadian National Railways, and the 1950 budget. At that time the president and directors would be in attendance before the committee.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman, I did not rise, as I had intended a moment ago, because I wished the parliamentary assistant to have an opportunity to reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre before I took the liberty of rising to speak about an entirely different question.

In the constituency from which I come we have had a tremendous increase in population over the last thirty years. Today there are four constituencies where there was only one at the time I first had the honour of attending in this chamber. During that period of time, because of the change in the grade of the railway, and the putting in of grade crossings in the eastern end of the city of Toronto, it has been found necessary to close Riverdale station, one of the two stations which formerly served that area.

At the present time these 300,000 people are serviced by the main union station, which is many miles away from the suburban area. Otherwise they are serviced only with the one station at Danforth, which is neither adequate nor sufficient to look after that population. Furthermore, the population is growing very fast both to the east and to the north of the old Danforth station, so that within a few years we will have there another 100,000 people who will have to be serviced by this old and very small and cramped station. It will be quite unable to give the service necessary for the people living in that area.

It will be only a matter of a few years when it will become a dire necessity to build a station east of Toronto, perhaps in the location of the present Danforth station. The Canadian National Railways now own all that property, which was formerly used as a sorting yard. They have many acres of property there, and at one time a roundhouse was located on it. Most of it is now vacant. In due course a new station will have to be built at Danforth to service those people.

I make these remarks to place them on record now, so that consideration may be given as to what eventually should be done. At the same time I would emphasize that in the same very densely populated area there are four level crossings. One by one, as fast as it can be done, these will have to be eliminated of necessity. I speak particularly about the level crossing at Woodbine avenue concerning which an application now rests with the department from Toronto. Then there are the level crossings at Jones avenue and Greenwood avenue, and another one out in the township at Warden avenue.

In approaching this problem I was hopeful it might be treated in a broader sense than simply that of considering the railway and its difficulties and necessities. I thought another requirement in that same community might be hooked up, because for those 200,000 people we have no post office, so called. Of course we have some small postal stations, and some rented premises such as stores and that sort of thing. However there is no post office, as such, or as hon. members would understand post office facilities in a large community.

Further, we have no facilities in that area for the clearing of customs, for excise matters, or matters dealing with the various departments of government which have to be housed. In that western section of Toronto known in the earlier days as Toronto Junction or West Toronto there is a dominion public building which services the community. I know the Minister of Public Works is listening to me because he has heard this story before.

When consideration is given to the building of a new Danforth station, I suggest the Department of Public Works might at the same time consider the proper housing of customs, excise, immigration and post office services, all of which might be housed in conjunction with the new station, and in one substantial public building to serve this fast-growing community.

I address my remarks to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, whom I commend for his concise statement of a few moments ago, and also put on record some suggestions to be considered by the Department of Public Works. After all, the money comes from the treasury, and it would be unfortunate if these two problems were to be considered separately. The Canadian National Railways own the land, and that land would offer a logical location for the other services I have mentioned. I was anxious to place this position on the record and in due course, perhaps during the spring session, we may be told whether anything is going to be done. When the Minister of Public Works is dealing with his estimates perhaps he will indicate that he will give some consideration to the inadequacy of the services presently available in the eastern section of Toronto.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we all agree with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance in the statement he has made to the effect that inasmuch as this resolution calls for the advance of a considerable sum of money to cover the operations of the Canadian National Railways it would be in order to discuss almost anything related to that system. Also, I agree with him that we should not take advantage of that right to discuss the whole range of railroad matters, particularly matters with which the Department of Finance may not have any connection. However, I think the hon. member for Lake Centre was perfectly justified in taking a few minutes of the time of the committee—and that is all I intend to take—to speak about a very important matter in relation to the morale and efficiency of the Canadian National Railways. Indeed the hon. member was perfectly justified in basing his remarks upon the need for good morale and the highest efficiency in the national system.

It is hardly necessary for me to say how thoroughly I support the plea for the best possible deal for our railroad workers in the matter of pensions and pension rights; after all, I have raised such matters times without number. Nevertheless the parliamentary assistant greeted this as though it were almost a new subject, which makes it evident that we must bring this problem to the attention of the government in every possible way.

[Mr. Harris (Danforth).]

I feel that strong support should be given, certainly on an interim basis, to the plea that the basic pension of $25 per month be increased, and indeed that there be improvements right across the board in the Canadian National pension regulations. I must say that they are a little better than some of the other railway pensions in effect in this country, but that does not mean that they are satisfactory. I hope it will not take too many pleas of this kind; I hope it will not be necessary to raise this matter year in and year out before there is any improvement in the pension position of Canadian National employees.

I was glad the hon. member for Lake Centre had got hold of the United States railroad retirement act, and has looked into it and found what a good piece of legislation it is. I am glad that the hon. member now joins with me in suggesting that something of this nature should be brought into being in this country. It seems to me that here we get a little beyond a matter which the parliamentary assistant will say should be brought to the attention of the management of the railroad; here we get to something that is a matter of government policy. This is not something to be passed on to the railway management; it is something for the parliamentary assistant to pass on, not only to the Minister of Transport who is here tonight but to the Minister of Finance as well, and through them to the whole government.

I shall not take time tonight, partly because I have done it before and partly because I shall do it again on another occasion, to go into the details of the United States railroad retirement act. As has been pointed out tonight, that act is infinitely better than any railroad pension legislation we have in this country. Its administration by an independent board is much more satisfactory to the men and its benefits go far beyond the question of pension rights.

One of the things that appeal to me about this proposal of a railroad retirement act in this country is that it is something that the federal government could initiate without having to go through this dominion-provincial squabble. So far as labour relations are concerned, railroad workers come under federal jurisdiction. We hear talk all over the country and all over this house about everyone wanting to move in the direction of over-all social security, and I shall speak about that again on another occasion, but when it gets down to the question of doing something, the old problem of the constitution is always trotted out. That is not necessary so far as workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction are concerned.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member has no doubt noted that applications for workmen's compensation by railroad workers are contingent upon the province in which the injury takes place. It is not just a simple matter because they are under dominion labour legislation. They cannot interfere with the workmen's compensation in the various provinces.

Mr. Knowles: I grant that it may not be a completely simple matter, but one of the contributions that lawyers make at times is to confuse anything that is clear before they get at it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do not abuse me because you are dumb and I tell you something. I have given you the facts.

Mr. Knowles: I am not denying the statement made by the hon. member for Calgary West with respect to compensation, but—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member said that lawyers confuse things.

Mr. Knowles: When the hon. member interjects workmen's compensation matters into a question of adequate pension rights for railway workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction, he is confusing the situation. I continue to make my plea to the government that they look upon this as being one field in which they could get started in respect to an over-all social security plan. I hope that is not going to take too long. If it is going to take any time I certainly feel that the Canadian National could, in the meantime, give a lead to the other railroads in this country by making a substantial increase in the amount of their basic pension.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take advantage of this first opportunity I have had to congratulate the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance upon his presentation of this resolution. I should like to deal with one or two phases of the financial aspects of the resolution. I think it is obvious to all hon members that the resolution is divided into two parts. One part has to do with the estimated capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways and the other part has to do with unspecified advances to the Canadian National Railways and affiliated railway and steamship companies for operating deficits, and similar advances to Trans-Canada Air Lines to cover operating deficits in this year.

I have before me the reports of the committee on railways and shipping which sat this year to review the annual reports of the Canadian National and the Trans-Canada Air Lines, together with the budgets of the two systems. There are certain features in the resolution now before the committee which do not necessarily follow from the annual report adopted by that committee and recommended to the house last year. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant some questions arising out of those discrepancies. In the first place, what capital expenditures are to be incurred calling for the advancing by the government to the C.N.R. of nearly $20 million? If they are not capital expenditures, then what capital indebtedness is expected to be incurred? If it is capital indebtedness for replacement of equipment, will the parliamentary assistant give us some indication as to what extent it is not covered by depreciation in the ordinary way? That covers the first part of the resolution.

Coming to the second part dealing with the anticipated operating deficit of the Canadian National Railways, the budget of the railways indicated an estimated net deficit for the current calendar year of $37,800,000. I beg your pardon—

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: $37,800,000. The budgets of the various affiliated companies such as Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and so on, contain similar anticipated net deficits or surpluses. I wonder why it is not possible for us to insert a definite sum in the resolution now before the committee. It may well be that the actual deficit will be somewhat greater or less than the anticipated deficit in the budget of the company. With deference, I suggest it is not a sound principle to ask us to authorize the payment of an unspecified sum to the company by what is commonly called blank cheque legislation. I would much rather see the company confined, as it were, to the anticipated net deficit shown in their budget; or, if the parliamentary assistant has reason to believe that the net deficit will be less than shown in the budget, to ask in the resolution for authority to grant a specific sum in accordance with such lesser anticipated net deficit.

I do not think it is a sound principle to ask us to authorize a blank cheque, so to speak, to the railways so that they can run up a deficit of any amount, when they have given us a definite statement in their budget of what they anticipate their net deficit will be. If it were the case that we authorized a specific sum, and the net deficit in fact was slightly larger, it seems to me that the company could carry on in the normal way by normal borrowings. After all they have the credit of the government of Canada and of the Canadian nation behind them. Therefore they could borrow in the normal way of business if they had a slight excess in their deficit over what was anticipated and what was authorized by the advance to them from parliament. That borrowing could be financed until such time as a subsequent session of parliament authorized the making good of the difference.

I should like the parliamentary assistant to answer the question why we are not given a specific sum in the second part of the resolution so far as the C.N.R. and subsidiary or connecting companies are concerned. I would ask the same series of questions with respect to T.C.A., because the procedure in the committee was the same. We had the budget for 1949 and the anticipated surplus or deficit was shown. Finally, I think one might well ask why the second part of the resolution is not divided into two parts, because the Canadian National Railways and its affiliated companies are entirely separate, and are under the authority of a separate minister. As the bill to be founded on this resolution will deal in some detail with the various companies, and as discussion is bound to enter into some detail concerning them, it seems to me it would make for greater clarity if, instead of having one resolution, the second part of the resolution were separated, and instead of one bill we had two bills, one dealing with the anticipated deficit of the C.N.R. and affiliated companies, and another bill dealing with the anticipated deficit of T.C.A.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to make an extended statement on this matter, but I want to throw a different light on the question of industrial pensions.

Mr. Fulton: May I get an answer to my questions?

Mr. Sinclair: It does not matter to me when I answer.

Mr. Gillis: I shall only be a few minutes. As one who was employed in industry for twenty-six years, I have done a lot of thinking, talking and reading on the subject during that time. Pension schemes are inadequate throughout industry as a whole. In most industries there are no pension schemes. If we intend to find a solution to the problem it is not going to be done in the way suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. These palliatives must be retained until something better replaces them. We will be talking in the same way about industrial pensions one hundred years from now if we follow the course of action we have been. For example, in industry across Canada you have differentials in wages. You have large companies which make profits and can afford to pay adequate pensions. You have smaller companies which cannot afford to pay a decent pension. They can show you that by their balance sheets. Then there are essential industries that are uneconomic and have to be subsidized by the government. They cannot pay anything.

If you take all the basic industries of Canada, that is the position you find yourself in. If you maintain the practice of trying to provide for workers in industry on the basis of the workers and the corporations getting together to solve the problem, there is no solution for it. The Canadian National Railways must come before parliament every year for the purpose of having the taxpayers of Canada wipe out a deficit. I think it is rather nonsensical to ask them to increase their pensions, wage rates, and so forth. That is the problem that has to be solved. Every worker has one fear, the fear of insecurity. Where do I go from here after I reach the end of my years of productivity? If you can solve that problem you will have solved one of the major problems affecting all workers of Canada, farmers, fishermen and industrial workers. It is not going to be solved by trying to place the responsibility on industry and the workers themselves.

There are good examples right now in the United States. The coal industry has been practically paralysed for several months. They are wrangling in the steel industry. They are coming out of it in some kind of way at the present time, but they will repeat the performance next year. There is only one answer to the problem. If you intend to provide some kind of pension, and nothing under $100 a month is worth while, there is only one way it can be done fairly so as to equalize both the payment and the contribution, and that is by taxation. If the government of this country think that when workers reach a certain age, and have been in a given industry for a certain period of time, they should have a retiring allowance, then they should work out a social security tax for that purpose.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a contributory basis.

Mr. Gillis: You will be contributing when you pay your taxes. Everyone would pay an equal amount into that fund, and everyone would share equally in it when they reached the retiring age. Then you would have one national administration handling the fund. As it is now, with these piecemeal arrangements as between industry and industry, you have overlapping and millions of dollars wasted in administration, which a government department would offset. Unless we get down to thinking in those terms, in my opinion we are wasting time; there is no solution. On the basis of their balance sheets the Canadian National Railways are not in a position to pay any more, as far as I can see; and in the final analysis it is the taxpayers who have to bear the cost of wiping out this deficit year after year. I believe we have to get down to business and think more or less along these lines. It is simple enough; tax everyone, so that everyone contributes and everyone shares. You will have one administration, which will simplify bookkeeping and be more efficient.

I have lost interest in these business and industrial pensions. I know where the mine worker winds up. I know where the steel worker winds up—on the scrap heap, with a broken back. That is the thing that worries him all his life. He carries about $500 insurance, enough to bury him. He tries to pay for that, but there is no hope for anything at the end of the trail except a worn-out, broken body. Thousands of workers are in that position today. I merely make these observations in order that hon. members may come to think of these matters along these lines. The pulp and paper industry of this country has established a decent pension of $100 a month. That industry can afford to do so. If a man passes away and his wife is left behind she receives a death benefit of $2,500, and all the contributions her husband made are paid back plus interest.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is at age sixty-five.

Mr. Gillis: That is the retirement age. If we want to equalize the load and have everybody bear an equal share on a contributory basis, the only way to do it is by taxation.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I might answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Kamloops. His first request was for a list of the capital expenditures and capital indebtedness; but the hon. member sent me a note saying that he has now obtained that information. I listed those figures in my opening explanatory remarks, and they will be found also at page 336 of the report of the sessional committee. They will also appear in the bill which will be introduced after the resolution is adopted.

The hon. member's second question was why there was no limit in the second part of the resolution, that part which I described as providing a revolving fund. The C.N.R. deficit, of course, is only estimated at the amount mentioned, $37,800,000. It is quite true that this amount could be specifically mentioned in the resolution and in the bill, but I repeat that it is only an estimate. The hon. member mentioned that if by any chance this estimate was exceeded, the C.N.R. could follow the ordinary practice of borrowing. However, the C.N.R. cannot borrow from banks in the way other railways can; it is limited to borrowing from the government, as a check on its borrowings. That is why it was necessary to more or less give them an open revolving fund, but parliament has a further control when the deficit bill is presented in the spring.

Then the hon. member asked why it was necessary to have two separate parts of the bill, an authorization for this extra capital expenditure in the first part and in the second part the authority to draw on the government if need be in order to meet current expenses. In the resolution last year there was no specific limiting date on the second part of the resolution, as we have in this resolution. Here, toward the end of the second last line, we have the specific date, "before the first day of April, 1950." This was not in the resolution last year, as it was hoped to obtain authority for a perpetual revolving fund. At that time it was the opposition who objected, and asked the Minister of Finance to have a specific limitation of one year each year. For that reason we find it necessary to incorporate the authority for the revolving fund, which was granted last year only for one year, again in this bill.

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid the hon. member misunderstood my question with regard to the second part of the resolution. My question was not why there should be a second part. I quite appreciate that it is necessary because the advances are made only for one year, as we asked last session and as is being done again. My question was why the second part of the resolution was not divided into two parts, one dealing with the C.N.R. and the other with T.C.A. for the reason, as I pointed out, that the two systems are under the authority of different ministers. While this is admittedly purely a financial matter, nevertheless the bill founded on this resolution is bound to enter into some detail, and in the same way the discussion is bound to involve some details respecting the C.N.R. on the one hand and T.C.A. on the other. So I should have thought it would be more convenient, and would make for greater clarity in dealing with the matter, if we had two separate bills with respect to the two separate systems.

Mr. Sinclair: The obvious answer is that the annual reports and budgets of these two companies are considered by the one committee, and this resolution and the bill are founded upon the final report of that committee. It is quite true, as the hon. member says, that as far as the operation of these two companies is concerned they come under different ministers; but since the budget is examined by, and the recommendations come from, the one committee, and since this resolution seeks to implement those recommendations, it was considered advisable to have just the one resolution.

Mr. Fulton: Matters like trade agreements are considered by the banking and commerce committee. So are all sorts of other matters which you would not dream of incorporating in the same bill, though they are considered by the same committee.

Mr. Sinclair: The difference is, as I pointed out, that the two reports are sent to the committee at the same time; they are discussed by the committee at the same time and are dealt with together in the final report of the committee. Therefore it seemed to the Department of Finance that the convenient way would be to include them in the one resolution and the one bill.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member for Cape Breton South has changed his seat, and I have difficulty in locating him. It is going to come as quite a shock to him when he hears me say that I am largely in agreement with his remarks this evening. But while I say that, in the interests of those who control the capital in industry I think perhaps one should mention the tremendous steps that have been taken to provide security for their employees. I am glad the hon. member mentioned the pulp and paper industry; he gave very accurate figures in regard to what they have done. I agree with him in regard to the small chap who is not able to provide anything like this; that is understandable. I want to say that the steel company in Hamilton, Imperial Oil and various pulp and paper companies have made great contributions, unasked, without the use of force and without strikes, in an endeavour to provide security for the people who work for them.

I appreciate, and I agree with the hon. member, that this is not good enough. We must make it more general. I was going to refer to those who sit around me. I used to be able to mention those who sit opposite me, but now I am reminded of the charge of the light brigade, who had cannon to the right of them, cannon to the left of them and cannon behind them which volleyed and thundered. These fellows who shoot from my back I know do not intend to shoot me in the back, but they cannot speak from any other position than that which they have been assigned because of this tremendous majority of Grits in this House of Commons. So I say once more that I think this is the point the hon. member had in mind: we must devise some contributory scheme, be it by taxation or otherwise, by means of which we shall solve this whole problem of old age. Perhaps it is not altogether a problem of old age, but through injury or something of that sort there are those who have not the energy or the ability to keep themselves and their families. I had in mind some monthly or quarterly contributions.

I turn now to this resolution directly, and I think of something I said this afternoon, but I shall not quote that, Mr. Chairman, because I know there is a rule forbidding one from quoting anything said in a previous debate. I think the principle is the same, however. What we are doing is not so much considering these few dollars, although they are in the millions. I have been here long enough to know that a million does not amount to much, I mean broadly speaking; I do not understand it myself. At some time, we must come to the point of fixing this stupid capital structure of the Canadian National Railways.

This afternoon we did the same thing as we did in the past when we took over a bunch of broken railways. The man who put that through was Arthur Meighen who, in my judgment, is one of the greatest statesmen that ever lived. Putting that measure through killed him politically, but he was the man who did it. We found a lot of individual railways who could not look after themselves and we had Mr. Hanna, since gone, take them over. I was his personal solicitor, and if any of you knew him you can imagine some of the difficulties I had.

Later, in the history of this railway, we got Sir Henry Thornton. He bought a hotel in Paris for a million dollars. We needed that hotel as much as I need a third leg. Perhaps I need a third leg more because I have one bad knee, but we needed the hotel about as much as you normal fellows need a third leg. He did a great service, though. For the first time, he made a railway. Sir Henry Thornton put spirit into that company. He was expensive, but he put spirit into the Canadian National Railways, for which I think he will be long revered and long remembered. I am going to say this to the parliamentary assistant to the minister and to the Minister of Transport who, happily, is in his seat. I do not want any wrong inference drawn from that statement—I think he is more in his seat than any other minister, so I am complimenting him on that. What we have to do is solve this problem. Do we want to sit here year after year—

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is something in that statement. Incidentally, I think that is the brightest remark ever made in the House of Commons by the minister who just made it. Do we want to sit here year after year voting deficits?

Supposing any member of this house knew he had an overburdened capital structure which he could not overcome. What courage have you, what spirit have you to carry on, knowing that all you are doing is gnawing away at a great mountain of debt? Remember, this debt is owed to the Dominion of Canada. Why we do not take the bull by its horns or cut the Gordian knot—or whatever those fancy expressions are—and reduce that capital structure to what it should be, is something I do not understand. We should give these men a chance to operate the railway. Is there anyone on the ministerial benches who could tell me that his morale would not be affected by the tremendous mountain of debt in front of him, so that no matter how well he ran the railway he would have to come back to the House of Commons for millions of dollars more? Those millions are going to pay interest on a capital debt which is ours.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, indeed.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the hon. member tell me whether or not his party would support a revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways by way of amendment to the capital revision act?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No, but I will say this; I am not in a position to speak for my party, but I will support it. That is the largest undertaking I am prepared to give.

Mr. Thatcher: Some of the other parties, too.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You may be able to speak for your party, but I never knew you to be in that position before. I think I have given the largest undertaking of which I am capable.

My real point is that it does not mean a dollar to us. We vote these deficits by way of paying interest owing to ourselves. Let us give this outfit a chance to operate. Let us give them a bit of courage to do a better job. Now, they are operating under a wet blanket all the time. I believe I have made myself clear.

Mr. Knowles: On the question the Minister of Transport asked the hon. member for Calgary West—

Mr. Chevrier: I did not ask the hon. member, I asked the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Knowles: I am asking the Minister of Transport why, with the huge majority at his command, he does not bring in such a bill.

Mr. Hansell: I shall only take one minute. I have listened with some interest to the last few speeches. They have been clamouring for some solution to a problem which needs a little more money. They are asking, How on earth can we do it? They turn a deaf ear to the only proposals that are able to accomplish it, and those are the proposals that have been made during the past fourteen or fifteen years by the group that sits in this corner of the house. Social Credit is the answer. Let some jackasses laugh if they so wish, but they have not the answer and that is all there is to it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 148, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railway system during the calendar year 1949, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOLD MINING

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING EMERGENCY PAYMENTS TO OPERATORS—PRODUCTION OF GOLD IN CONCENTRATES

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in respect to the manner of calculating the amount of assistance that may be paid operators of gold mines, as prescribed by the act; also to empower the governor in council to prescribe by regulation, in the case of a mine producing gold in concentrates during one period and not producing bullion from such concentrates until a later period, the time when the gold shall be deemed to have been produced and the manner in which the cost of production thereof shall apply.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the minister going to make a statement on this measure?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The question has now been put. The hon. member can say the same thing in committee.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No, I do not think so; not on the resolution that is before us.

Gold Mining

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The question has been put. I think the hon. member can say the same thing in committee.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All right; but I do not think we should adjourn without a statement tonight.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I hope it may be possible to have this resolution passed tonight so that the bill may be distributed and discussion may take place on the second reading and in committee.

The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was passed to provide assistance to the mines in defraying part of the post-war increase in the cost of production during the years 1948, 1949, and 1950, during the time that the product they were producing was selling at a fixed price. It has been of great assistance to the mines and has enabled some of them to continue in operation where they would otherwise have been forced to cease production, with resulting hardships to mining areas.

Experience has shown that some amendments to that act are desirable, and the amendments that are proposed come under three headings. The original act provided assistance on gold produced in excess of two-thirds of the production in the base year; that is, in the year ended June 30, 1947. The first amendment provides that assistance will be payable to mines when, through no fault of their own, production has decreased below production of the base year. Assistance will be payable on one-third of total production in such cases. I may say that several mines have continued in operation in expectation that this legislation will be passed.

The second amendment in this bill is necessary because of the difficulty that occurs when gold is produced in concentrates. In some cases mines produce gold in concentrates during one year, but do not reduce the concentrates into bullion until a later year. As a result, costs of production of an ounce of gold have been considerably lowered in the year the bullion is produced, while the heavy costs of production take place in years when the ore is taken from the mine. This amendment provides that the governor in council may regulate the manner in which the costs of production shall be calculated, so that the assistance payment will be truly related to the actual cost of producing the gold.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you mean that, on gold produced several years ago and kept, you are going to go back?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No; gold which has been mined in one year and is in concentrate form and has not been reduced from the concentrate to bullion until a later year. It is much cheaper to produce gold bullion from the concentrate than it is to mine the ore. Consequently, the gold bullion will be related back to the year in which the ore was produced.

The third amendment recognizes the adjustment in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar and provides for the reduction in the amount of assistance payable to any mine during the year 1950, by an amount equal to $3.50 for each ounce of gold to which the rate of assistance applies. This amending act is to be retroactive to June 15, 1948, when the original bill came into force.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am going to move adjournment of this debate. It is two minutes to eleven by the clock that I am looking at.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we shall move to go into supply, call one item of External Affairs, and allow it to stand. Then we shall take up Bills Nos. 64, 65, 120, 133, and the bill based on the resolution passed this evening concerning the amendment to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. If we conclude this business, we shall return to supply and take up Veterans Affairs or Labour or some other department; I am not too sure yet which one it will be.

I should have mentioned that, at the request of many hon. members on account of events that will take place on Monday and Tuesday, we shall not discuss the budget on either of those days.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 7, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

ONTARIO CHEESE

DISTRIBUTION TO MEMBERS—NATIONAL CHEESE WEEK

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I should like to explain to hon. members of the house that the packages of cheese which were placed on the desks in their rooms are a reminder that this is national cheese week. Throughout the week a campaign is to be carried on across Canada to acquaint our people with the many advantages of eating more cheese. It would help a great Canadian agricultural industry and at the same time improve our diet. The cheese you have received is the gift of the dairy industry. It is fine old cheddar of the type that is so much appreciated by the people of Great Britain. I cannot guarantee that it was produced in Leeds county, but I can assure you that it is almost as good as if it were.

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

On the order for motions:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), under standing order 31, the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Standing order 31 provides that leave to make a motion of this kind must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded.

Mr. Graydon: I will be in first then, anyway.

[Later:]

On the order for introduction of bills:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker if I am now in order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have not concluded the ordinary routine of business.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz.:

Of Paul Leon Dube, Esquire, for the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska.

Of William Malcolm Mott, Esquire, for the electoral district of New Westminster.

Of Joseph Celestin Nadon, Esquire, for the electoral district of Gatineau.

Of Edgard Leduc, Esquire, for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier.

Of Arthur Masse, Esquire, for the electoral district of Kamouraska.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

J. Eugene Lefrançois, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Laurier, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. Edouard Rinfret.

Marcel Monette, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Mercier, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. Edouard Rinfret.

Paul Leon Dube, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska, introduced by Mr. C. T. Richard and Mr. A. W. Stuart.

Arthur Masse, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Kamouraska, introduced by Mr. J. G. L. Langlois and Mr. Joseph Lafontaine.

Edgard Leduc, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, introduced by Mr. F. P. Whitman and Mr. J. A. Bradette.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY—REPORT OF INVESTIGATOR

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to table the report of the investigator under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour milling companies?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yes, later this afternoon.

[Later:]

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): If we might revert to motions for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies, in English and in French, of the report of the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act, on the flour milling industry.

Rent Control

Mr. Coldwell: Since the minister has tabled this report, I should like to ask him a question concerning an item appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday. Mr. Donald Gordon is supposed to have said that assurances had been given, verbally and in writing, by Mr. Gordon and his officers of the wartime prices and trade board that certain privileges would be granted to the flour milling industry following decontrol measures. Will the minister table any communications of that kind which may have passed between Mr. Donald Gordon and the milling industry or any member of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. Garson: Not having received notice of my hon. friend's question, I shall take it as notice.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND LIFE OF ACT UNTIL MARCH 31, 1950

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 143 (from the Senate) to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

On the order for questions:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before you proceed with questions I wish to present a motion, if I may—

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, I have already been on my feet seeking the floor, and I do not think you should call questions until I have had an opportunity—

Mr. Coldwell: I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis),—

Mr. Graydon: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. Coldwell: —the adjournment of the house under standing order 31—

Mr. Graydon: On a point of order, before my hon. friend proceeds—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If this is a motion to adjourn the house on the rentals question, it is only fair that I should hear the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), as he intimated—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Graydon: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Under standing order No. 31 I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), to move the adjournment—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I rose to move this motion at the right time and in the right place. As an old member of the house I knew when to move it.

Mr. Speaker: Standing order 31 reads:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order No. 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

My trouble is that the next order is questions and not motions.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: Don't spoil it.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that we should take questions first.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, does the difficulty not arise because the house has changed the normal order of business for Monday? Does standing order 31 not make it clear that such a motion should be made after the daily routine of business, as provided for by standing order 15, has been concluded?

If you will look, sir, at standing order 15 you will see that subsection (2) reads:

> (2) The ordinary daily routine of business in the house shall be as follows:
> Presenting reports by standing and special committees.
> Motions.
> Introduction of bills.
> First reading of Senate bills.

After that has been completed, I submit, is the time to move the adjournment under standing order 31. We have completed that routine, referred to as the ordinary daily routine of business. The difficulty arises because the next items are those which would follow if we were pursuing the usual routine followed on Mondays, but the house has adopted a motion under which on Mondays, questions come first after routine proceedings. It seems to me quite clear that this is the time when the motion should be moved.

Mr. Speaker: I think that I had better go on with the questions.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY—COLLECTION OF FREIGHTS SINCE APRIL 9, 1949

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What amount of money has been collected by the Newfoundland Railway since April 1, 1949 (a) for freight on goods transported solely within the province; (b) for freight on other goods?

Mr. Chevrier:

The Canadian National Railways advise:

From April 1 to June 30, 1949:

(a) $767,119.

(b) $243,475.

Figures from July 1 have not been taken out, as they are not required for the railway's purposes, and to do so would involve taking staff off regular duties or special overtime assignment.

SCHOOLS OF SOCIAL WORK—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is there a grant for assistance to schools of social work? If so, what is the amount of the same for the year 1949-50?
2. Has the government received representations asking that this grant be made again for the year 1950-51 and subsequent years?
3. If so, has consideration been given to such representations?
4. What is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes—$52,500.

2. Yes.

3 and 4. The question is currently under consideration, but no decision will be finally made until the department's main estimates for 1950-51 have been considered and approved. Meetings are being held with representatives of the schools to discuss this matter on November 22-24.

MUSKRAT AND FUR FARM PROJECT, DELTA OF ATHABASCA RIVER

Mr. Dechene:

What progress has been made in the development of the great muskrat and fur farm project in the delta of the Athabasca river in the country tributary to Fort Chipewyan?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The area which it was proposed to develop is owned partly by Canada and partly by the province. While surveys and investigations have been made, the information obtained so far is not sufficient to enable a definite plan being made which would permit an agreement being entered into with the province for the joint development. Difficulties have been encountered in carrying out the necessary investigations and surveys owing to the high water levels. Negotiations with the province are being continued.

ELECTRIC POWER—EXPORT TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Church:

What is the total export of power from Canada to the United States by (a) Ontario; (b) Quebec; (c) all other provinces?

Mr. McIlraith:

Export of power from Canada:

	From Apr. 1, 1948 to Mar. 31, 1949	From Apr. 1, 1948 to Sept. 30, 1949
	K.W.H.	K.W.H.
From Ontario..	1,122,645,883	552,027,014
From Quebec...	649,346,632	326,072,896
From all other provinces	60,035,318	70,828,495
Total	1,832,027,833	948,928,405

NEWFOUNDLAND—FINANCIAL SURPLUS ON DEPOSIT WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Higgins:

1. What was the amount of Newfoundland's financial surplus set aside on deposit with the government on or after March 31, 1949?
2. What is the amount of the Newfoundland surplus still on deposit with the government?

Mr. Belzile:

1. $15 million.

2. $15 million.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NEWFOUNDLAND—PUBLIC WORKS—HARBOURS AND RIVERS

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What projects of work of a public nature dealing with harbours or rivers generally, have been undertaken in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949?
2. Where are they located and what amount of money was allocated to each?
3. Have any other projects been approved? If so, what are the details?

NATIONAL DEFENCE—ENLISTMENTS, DISCHARGES, ETC.

Mr. Fraser:

1. How many men and women have joined each branch of the armed services since August 1, 1945?
2. How many of these men and women have been discharged as unfit for further service?
3. How many of those discharged are now receiving allowances or pensions?

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Am I now in order to move my motion, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Graydon: I ask leave under standing order 31, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation created by the government's arbitrary action in authorizing a drastic increase of rentals.

There is hardly any need for argument with respect to the urgency of this matter. I fancy the statements that have appeared in the press throughout Canada and the discussions that have taken place will indicate only too clearly to this house that nothing this session, perhaps indeed for many sessions, has agitated the people of Canada so much as the drastic announcement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on Friday last.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has stated his motion. It is moved under standing order 31, which reads:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

The hon. member has stated the matter.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker—

The hon. member handed me a copy of his motion before I took the chair today, so I have the motion before me.

—who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

My difficulty in connection with this motion is that when the house rose on Friday the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), in stating the business for today, said:

On Monday we shall move to go into supply . . .

Therefore it would appear that the motion to go into supply will be made almost immediately, and as soon as the amendment now before the house is disposed of hon. members will have full opportunity to discuss the subject matter of the motion which has been presented to the house by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). Under those circumstances, and considering the meaning of the word "urgency" as being that it is urgent that the matter should be brought before the house as soon as possible, I think this matter is not urgent, since in a comparatively short time the house will have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. Graydon: May I say one word with respect to your ruling?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Graydon: I want to make only one observation. There is an amendment to the motion to go into supply. I suggest that you would have been quite right, sir, if there had not been an amendment before the house to the motion to go into supply, dealing with an entirely different matter. There may be an amendment to that amendment; the debate may go on all afternoon, and it could easily be that we would never reach this very important matter, which I think requires the attention of this house now rather than some time later on in the day.

Mr. MacInnis: May I respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you may have made an error as to the order of business when the house considers the motion to go into supply? Order No. 2 on today's order paper reads:

Resuming the adjouned debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles.

That is the first order of business, and no other business in connection with supply may take precedence over it. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, you overlooked that point.

Mr. Speaker: I did not entirely overlook it. It is quite true that I did not read the order in full, but as soon as the amendment is disposed of, hon. members will have every opportunity to discuss the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Peel. From the discussion that took place the other day it does not appear that the debate on the amendment will last much longer. I feel, therefore, that my first observation was correct.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RED RIVER, MAN.—REMOVAL OF ROCKY BARRIERS

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any charts or diagrams in the possession of the engineering branch of the Department of Public Works, or any other branch or department of the government showing the full cross-sections of the rocky barriers at Lister's Rapids and at Grand Rapids in the Red river, between Winnipeg and Lockport.

Also a copy of any reports, dated since 1867, or correspondence, dated since January 1, 1945, with reference to the removal of the said rocky barriers.

IMMIGRATION BRANCH—DISMISSAL OF ANTHONY MAHADEY

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports, documents and papers concerning the suspension or dismissal of Anthony Mahadey of Hamilton, Ontario, by the Department of Immigration.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REPORT OF A. D. WATSON ON SICKNESS INSURANCE

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of the preliminary report in regard to sickness insurance submitted to the unemployment insurance commission by A. D. Watson, actuarial adviser of the department of insurance.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all communications received by any minister of the government or by the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act, or his deputies, from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers Association; also from any flour milling companies, or any other organization or company, or from any persons on behalf of such organizations or companies, having to do with changes or suggested changes in the Combines Investigation Act and/or in the administration and/or enforcement thereof, dated at any time since January 1, 1946, and for a copy of the replies thereto.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) that the house go into committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles.

INCOME TAX—DEDUCTION OF UNION DUES

Mr. Speaker: The house may recall that before this debate was adjourned on Monday last, I invited discussion on whether or not the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was in order. Since then I have had an opportunity of studying this matter further.

It is quite true that wide latitude is traditionally allowed in respect of matters discussed and amendments moved on a motion to go into supply, and that grievances may be ventilated before the granting of supply. (See Journals, House of Commons, volume 66, page 246.)

On the other hand, there are certain well-established exceptions to this proposition. In particular, citation 467 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, makes it clear that an amendment to the motion to go into supply cannot relate to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means. At the present time there is on the order paper, appearing in the name of the Minister of Finance, a resolution to amend the Income War Tax Act and the Income Tax Act which is to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, and as the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also relates to the Income Tax Act, it would appear to be irregular in view of the aforementioned citation 467. Also, if the amendment is allowed to stand there would be two motions on the order paper on the same subject at the same time.

Notwithstanding what I have said, in view of the fact that such an amendment might be in order after the budget resolutions are disposed of, and also because there has been considerable debate on the proposed amendment, I feel that it would expedite the business of the house if the proposed amendment were entertained and disposed of at this time. In reaching this conclusion, I should like to emphasize that this should by no means be regarded as a precedent to be followed on future occasions.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): When we were dealing with this subject last Monday, I moved the adjournment of the debate. At that time I had no intention of resuming the debate today. I moved the adjournment of the debate solely in order to give Your Honour time to consider your ruling. In the meantime I have decided to say a few words on the amendment.

It is almost superfluous for me or anyone else to try to add to the clear statement made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he proposed the amendment. But if for no other reason than to emphasize certain points that are important in the question at issue, I shall say a few words.

Let me read to the members the amendment which is now before us. It is to be found on page 1292 of Hansard, and reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to make it possible for taxpayers to deduct trade union dues from income before computing the amount of income tax to be paid."

During the years 1945, 1946 and 1947, a member of a trade union was entitled to deduct his trade union dues from his taxable income. I say "entitled" but he was not allowed the deduction because the rulings made by the income tax branch denied him the right the law gave him. In 1948, a Mr. Cooper, of the city of Winnipeg I believe, a trade unionist, appealed the income tax branch ruling to the exchequer court. He won his appeal. The ruling of the court was that a trade unionist was entitled to include trade union dues as a deduction from taxable income.

It is interesting to note that the government's decision to amend the act in order to overcome the court's ruling did not await the court's decision. Mr. Cooper filed his claim with the exchequer court on April 23, 1948, and a resolution to amend the Income War Tax Act was introduced into this house in May, 1948, which took away from a trade unionist the right to deduct his union dues. The amendment was passed by this house and incorporated in the new Income Tax Act.

The practical effect of the change is that doctors and lawyers still have the right to deduct their association fees, while trade unionists and teachers have not that right. This seems to me to be class legislation, class distinction of the grossest sort. I know there is a distinction made in the act as between income from fees and income from salaries, but that does not make the provisions of the act any the less class legislation. I believe that distinction was condemned by the exchequer court in the Bond and Rutherford cases. It was also mentioned in the Cooper case.

The issue that has been raised in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite clear. Let me state it again. The Income Tax Act allows deductions of payments to associations if expended for the purpose of earning an income, if the income is earned by fees. The same deductions are not allowed if the income is earned by salary or wages. Under the law as it stood in 1945, 1946 and 1947, I pointed out that trade unionists were denied the benefit of the deductions by departmental ruling. In replying to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre earlier this session as to the intention of the government to allow trade union dues as a deduction from taxable income, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) gave the following answer, which appears at page 279 of Hansard:

> Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The judgment of the exchequer court in the case of Cooper v. the Minister of National Revenue was in respect of the 1945 taxation year. In respect of claims by taxpayers for that year, and for the years 1946 and 1947, which are not statute barred, the department will make adjustments in accordance with the exchequer court decision.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that reply is sheer sophistry. No one knows better than the minister that it is more than likely that any claims that might be made by taxpayers for the years mentioned are statute barred. The claims would be statute barred if they were not made within two months of notice of assessment; and I doubt very much whether there are any cases in those two years in which notice of assessment was not received by the taxpayer more than two months ago. Even then a claim would be allowed only if it was made when filing the income tax form and denied by the department.

Trade unionists found that it was useless to put down trade union dues as a deduction from their income tax, and they stopped asking for those deductions because they found that they were not allowed. I think the government should now indicate its willingness to accept the principle in the amendment, and I think the mover should withdraw it. That would enable the government to deal fairly as between persons in the various trades and professions in this country who must belong to an association in order to earn a living. If the ministers concerned do not indicate that they are willing to do that, I suggest that here is a question with regard to which every member in this house who calls himself a Liberal should be prepared to stand up and insist that the Liberal principle of no class distinctions and no discrimination should apply in our income tax laws.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that I agree with the principles expounded by the opposition. In this matter, however, I certainly feel that the Liberal party are making a distinction they should not make when they say that because a person is in the salary or wage bracket he is not entitled to deduct the fees which he pays to his organization. I cannot see any reason for such a distinction. I must say that I agree wholeheartedly with the amendment on this principle.

There certainly is no shortage of members of the legal profession in this house, and on a number of occasions I have heard those gentlemen say that they cannot follow the argument used by the labour union to the effect that their members must belong to an organization before they are entitled to work in their particular trade. I do not know too much about the barristers' organization, but I feel that they have some such organization which calls for the payment of dues before they are allowed to practise in certain provinces. In addition, when they move from one province to another I believe they have to pay additional fees. If that is not a correct statement I should like to be corrected, but I believe it is so.

It has been contended that we are not working under a free system if we must pay dues to an organization in order to work. For some time I have been in the labour movement, and on occasions have disagreed with the closed shop principle—not for the reason put forward by the lawyers, but because I have felt that it might tend to make a bit lackadaisical the leaders of the labour unions, who are responsible for going out and fighting for better conditions. That is my point of view on that particular question.

I certainly do not hesitate to say, in conformity with what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), that it is a matter of discrimination when we say that because persons are not salaried they are working in a free competitive way and are exempt from this income tax, whereas those who are compelled to pay union dues, or who pay them voluntarily, are not able to deduct them from taxable income. I support the amendment.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I want to say a word or two, Mr. Speaker, in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when the debate was adjourned on October 31. By virtue of the decision just given by you, sir, we have an opportunity to say a word or two upon it today.

This amendment has to do with the deductibility for income tax purposes of dues paid by union men into their respective union organizations. I am interested also in the fees paid by teachers to their professional organization.

At the outset I think I might put the amendment on the record. It appears at page 1292 of Hansard, and reads as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to make it possible for taxpayers to deduct trade union dues from income before computing the amount of income tax to be paid."

I am drawn into this debate by my desire to correct the impression which I think was given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last Monday night, namely, that the fees paid by teachers into their professional organization were not allowed as a deductible expense for the years 1945, 1946 and 1947, contrary to the position that had been maintained by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

First of all, the facts are as follows. During 1945, 1946 and 1947 at first—and I would have you note the words "at first", Mr. Speaker—doctors and lawyers were allowed deduction of these professional fees—but on their gross income, not on their net income—while teachers were allowed it all across the board. Afterwards, in the Bond and Rutherford decisions, it was agreed that doctors and lawyers were to have that right, even if they were on salary. At that particular point these three groups enjoyed deductibility on income across the board, but it was denied to men in labour organizations so far as their union dues were concerned.

On page 1288 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is reported as follows:

> The act made it clear that people who laid out moneys wholly and necessarily for the purpose of earning an income could deduct those expenses from their taxable income before computing their income tax. The income tax department ruled that in the case of doctors, lawyers and teachers, that provision included the right to deduct their professional fees.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague has made it clear, as will be seen by the paragraph above the one I have quoted, that he was talking about the years 1945, 1946 and 1947. Let us take a look at the reply of the Minister of Finance:

> Mr. Abbott: Not if they were on salary.
> Mr. Knowles: I beg the minister's pardon.
> Mr. Abbott: No.
> Mr. Knowles: In 1945, 1946 and 1947 they were permitted to do so.

Referring to the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in particular as it pertains to the teaching profession, sir, I should like to direct your attention to the following material. I shall quote from a letter from the Saskatchewan Teachers Federation dated September 23, 1949. This letter was written in reply to a question of mine. The letter reads as follows:

> It is quite true that the income tax department withdrew the right or privilege of teachers in Saskatchewan, and I may say in other parts of Canada as well, to deduct for income tax purposes the fees paid to their professional organizations.

Note this:

> The first intimation which we had that any change had been made was last spring—

Since this letter was written in September, 1949, the phrase "last spring" refers to the spring of 1949. I continue:

> —when teachers started writing in to us stating that they had been informed that S.T.F. fees were no longer deductible. Perhaps the quotation from a letter received from the Regina income tax office by a teacher in Moose Jaw may make the point clear:
> "It is further to be noted for the taxation year 1948 and subsequent years, no allowance can be made with regard to Saskatchewan Teachers Federation fees. Please be advised that Saskatchewan Teachers Federation fees were only allowed as an expense against salaried income with respect to school teachers—"

Income Tax Deductions

And I draw this to the minister's attention:

"—with respect to the taxation year 1947 and prior years."

This letter was dated April 14, 1949.

That should dispose of the statement of the minister with regard to these years.

Mr. Abbott: That was following the court's judgment.

Mr. Knight: On behalf of the Saskatchewan Teachers Federation, inquiry was then made by the Canadian Teachers Federation of headquarters at Ottawa, and Mr. Croskery in charge of the office applied directly to the deputy minister. He received a letter from the legal division of the department which confirmed the ruling handed out by the Regina office. I quote from the letter received by him:

Prior to 1947, in those provinces where under provincial legislation it was compulsory for the teacher to belong to the provincial federation, the membership fee paid by the taxpayer was considered a deductible expense.

However, in 1948 by legislation enacted by section 3, subsection 1 of chapter 53 of the statutes of 1948, assented to 30th June and applicable to the 1948 taxation year, a new subsection was added to section 6 of the Income War Tax Act. The new subsection 6 of section 6 of the Income War Tax Act requires that in computing the income from an office or employment, no amount is deductible for a disbursement or expense laid out for the purpose of earning the income. An exception is granted in the case of certain employees of transportation companies, where, subject to the requirements described in the proviso to the subsection, certain relief is extended.

Similarly, under the Income Tax Act, applicable as from the 1st January, 1949, section 5 of this act provides that in the computation of income from an office or employment, no deduction except those specified in the act may be allowed. Membership fees paid to an organization such as the teachers federation and to similar organizations are not among the allowable deductions.

In supporting my hon. friend's amendment, that is the thing to which I object, and which I would ask this government to take into further consideration. That was the new ruling—but note that the date of application is January 1, 1949. As an instance of how government business is done, the letter goes on to say:

We—

"We" means the Saskatchewan Teachers Federation.

We were very much disturbed about it, particularly in view of the fact that we had in our February bulletin advised teachers that the fees were deductible.

That means at the beginning of that year these people did not know that the deductibility which they had enjoyed over the years was to be taken away from them. The letter goes on to say:

It seems to us that we should be given some notices of such changes.

That is the case for the Saskatchewan Teachers Federation.

Another reason I am drawn into this discussion is that the Minister of Finance, in his genial way, and what some of his political enemies sometimes call his flippant way, made some remark about farmers' salaries, just as if farmers as such might not be interested in this particular matter. I propose to quote to him editorial opinion from a well-known weekly newspaper printed in my own city of Saskatoon, which serves almost entirely a farm public. The quotation which I am about to read is taken from the Western Producer of July 7, 1949.

The editorial, which is aimed at bureaucrats, is rather long; I shall not put it all on the record, but I shall take from it as I go along such passages as I consider relevant. I quote:

The activities of the bureaucrats have been exposed many times. The other day there was an interesting example of their methods. It may be worth reviewing here. Mr. Justice Angers of the Exchequer Court of Canada ruled that Joseph A. Cooper, a Winnipeg movie projectionist, was entitled to deduct union dues before making out his income tax for 1945. This case, it should be noted, had been pending for a long time. The decision was based on the parallel provision under which professional men have been allowed to deduct dues paid to their societies.

It was obvious that this ruling would affect thousands and hundreds of thousands who, over a period of years, had accepted the revenue department's ruling that such dues were not deductible. It may be asked: Why did they accept this in the first place? The answer is: How many working men are in a position to take the matter to the exchequer court? The department, acting as judge in their own case, interpreted the law in their own favour, pretty sure that no one would have the hardihood to challenge their decision. Luckily they were wrong when Mr. Cooper came along as challenger and succeeded.

The judge's decision caused quite a flurry in the Department of National Revenue at Ottawa.

Well it might. The editorial continues—and I would point out that this is the editor's language, not mine:

However, the back-room boys of the revenue department soon recovered their self-assurance. The very next day they came up with the announcement that it was too late for any but a few union members to get refunds from past taxes. They gratuitously admitted that union members would have made savings by deducting their union dues in past years. But as it is, they blandly asserted, the only union members who will now be affected by Justice Angers' ruling are those whose tax cases back to 1945 are still open—a mere handful. The department explained that Canadians are allowed sixty days in which to appeal their assessments. If no appeal is received the case is closed and once closed cannot be reopened. There it is. The moneys wrongfully extracted from workers by the revenue department as a result of its own erroneous interpretation of the law are now safe in the federal treasury and are going to stay there. The public once again has been trimmed and the bureaucrats can breathe a sigh of relief.

A few points may be noted. They say that after sixty days a case cannot be reopened. That is not true. A case can be reopened years and years afterwards, that is, if the officials can find any loophole whereby more taxes can be levied. True, it is closed against any discovery that the taxpayer has been overassessed as in the cases under review, but not if he is underassessed—a neat loading of dice in favour of the bureaucrats.

Another thing: the department had known for years that this matter of union dues was being disputed. They knew that there was a possibility that judgment would be handed down against them. If they were the servants of the public, as they are presumed to be, surely they should have intimated to this large class in the community that final judgment was still pending, should have kept their cases open and in the outcome, like true civil servants, should have come forward, cheerfully and apologetically with refunds to the people whom they are paid to serve and who pay them for their services.

As a last word:

The important point about all this is not the question actually involved. The important thing is the conduct of the department of revenue. It provides a working example of the new bureaucracy in action. It demonstrates that the men we thought were our servants—civil ones at that—do not themselves so interpret their position. They see themselves as masters—taskmasters—not only of the public but of the legislative and judicial arms of government.

So much for the quotation from that farm paper.

Mr. Gillis: What farm paper is that?

Mr. Knight: The Western Producer, of July 7, 1949, a weekly paper published in Saskatoon.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member that it is not customary to read long extracts from newspapers dealing with matters before the house.

Mr. Knight: Your warning came at exactly the right time, sir, because I had just concluded the quotation.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will endeavour to abide by the rules in future.

Mr. Knight: I shall wait until the time comes. I do take the matter seriously, and if it is against the rules to quote at such length, I shall not transgress again.

In conclusion, I want to support my colleague's plea for the deductibility of fees paid by union workers and teachers. If we support deductibility in the case of the worker, we cannot very well be opposed to it in the case of someone else. I care not whether a man works with his hands or with his brain; I plead for equality. Either let us permit the deduction of union dues, or let us not have it at all. If it is right that such fees should be deductible for one class, then they should be deductible for all.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be appropriate if I were to say a word at this point. I shall preface what I am going to say with the statement that I do not question for one moment the fact that in some cases union dues are necessarily incurred by an employee in order that he may work in a certain plant. It is necessary that a lawyer pay his law society dues in order that he may practise, and for the same reason it is necessary for a physician to belong to a recognized medical society and pay dues thereto. I do not doubt for one moment that it is in the interests of the teaching profession that teachers should belong to recognized associations and pay dues thereto.

Mr. Coldwell: Compulsory fees.

Mr. Abbott: Even if they were voluntary, I should think that the same principle would apply.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out quite fairly that there was a distinction between gross income and net income. As I said the other day, as I have said on numerous occasions in this house and as my predecessor before me has said, the principle of our income tax has always been that salaries and wages are net income. Salaries and wages are supposed to be set at a level sufficient to enable the salary or wage earner to pay such necessary expenses as car fare to and from work, and a number of other things I could cite which are necessary in order that he may carry out his duties.

It has always been permissible for an employer to pay such things as travelling expenses. If a lawyer is on a fee basis, he is entitled to gross his fees and deduct such expenses as rental, stenographic help, bar society fees and the like. If he is on salary his employer is entitled to pay his bar society fees and charge that as an expense of his operations. That happened in my own case. When I started to practise law I received a salary of $75 a month from the firm of which I am now a partner. The partners in the firm paid my bar society fees. When I became a partner, the bar society fees of the juniors were paid by the partners and deducted from the gross legal fees as an expense of doing business. There is no discrimination.

There is a practical difficulty in accepting salaries and wages as being gross rather than net. It has been found in Great Britain and here that it would be practically impossible to administer the act and check deductions from salaries and fees. There are a great many types of deductions besides union fees which could be made. I cited car fare, the cost of transportation to and from work; and there might be the cost of lunches if a worker was unable to get home, the cost of overalls or uniforms in certain types of work. Some employers do provide uniforms, overalls or tools, and charge them as an expense of doing business.

Those are the practical difficulties in the way. My officials have always believed, and I share that belief, that it would be practically impossible to work out a system of income tax on salaries and wages providing a scale to allow these general deductions from wages and salaries. In other words, it has always been regarded as necessary to consider them as net rather than gross.

Mr. Green: Would there be any difficulty in allowing the deduction of union dues?

Mr. Abbott: No, I should not think so; but if union dues are allowed as a deduction necessarily incurred for the purpose of carrying on business, I do not see how we could stop there. There are many other deductions that could be claimed, such as car fare to and from the place of business, which is perhaps an obvious example. These are the practical difficulties in the way. It is the view which has been taken of the matter in the United Kingdom, in the United States, and here.

There is an alternative practice which is followed in the United States and which we have considered. I am told they allow a blanket deduction of some 10 per cent from salaries or wages to cover such things as union dues, charitable donations, medical expenses and the like. It is a blanket deduction. For reasons which may have been good or bad, we have always resisted that, because we felt that the people who would be most likely to suffer would be the churches and the charities. Human nature being what it is, everyone would take the full 10 per cent deduction, but they might not make the donations which they otherwise would if they could get a tax credit by doing so and producing a receipt.

We have considered the matter, and perhaps it should be adopted. Perhaps it is something to which we will come. It is certainly administratively practical. There would be no difficulty in the department of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), in seeing that sort of thing was properly administered, because it would be automatic. Another objection to it of course is that people with larger incomes get a greater benefit. Taking it all in all, we have never felt it was a particularly desirable system to introduce in Canada, and that it was better to adhere to the old principle which, as I say, has been followed in the United Kingdom from the time income tax on salaries and wages was instituted, the principle that salaries and wages are net and not gross, and that the salary or wage should be sufficient to enable the employed person to maintain these necessary things such as the payment of union dues, car fare, and so on.

Mr. Graydon: Do you follow the United Kingdom on everything?

Mr. Abbott: No, we do not, but our Income Tax Act has been based in part on the practice of the United Kingdom because the principles are similar. We do not tax capital gains in Canada as they do in the United States. They do not tax them in the United Kingdom. Broadly speaking, the structure of our income tax laws has been based on that in the United Kingdom, and I think wisely so. In the United Kingdom income tax was first introduced under Pitt, and we have the benefit of long experience there with good courts to interpret the law. It has always seemed to us that we can usefully benefit from their experience.

I am putting these facts before the house because they are the facts. I have stated them on several occasions. My predecessors have stated them. They are the reasons why, up to the present time, we have felt it was not in the interests of the taxpayers as a whole to allow a general deduction from salaries and wages. There are two exceptions to that rule. I think the hon. member pointed out more than that, but there are two real exceptions. The first is in the case of railway employees. For years that was restricted to railway employees who are on what is known as a mileage basis. Then, for reasons which I need not go into, it was extended to the others. Broadly speaking, it was because it had been done by administrative decision, and once you have given something it is very hard to take it away. It was looked upon as traditional in the railway business. The railway unions are well organized. They have a scale of expenses established, and I am told it is easy to administrate and is adhered to.

The second exception is in the case of clergymen. That was introduced at the last session.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. I think the case of clergymen is dealt with in this year's budget resolutions. The other exception the minister has not mentioned is that of salesmen dealing with negotiable contracts.

Mr. Abbott: I announced in the house last year we were going to do this for clergymen. It was introduced in March, and it is again in the budget resolutions. That is the other real exception. There is a third case which might be looked upon as an exception, but in fact is not, the case of the commercial traveller. My hon. friend cited the other day the case of those engaged in negotiating contracts. I have forgotten the exact phrase, but that is the legal way of referring to the work of commercial travellers.

To put it simply, there is a prohibition in the law preventing an employer giving his employee a fixed per diem travelling allowance. In the case of commercial travellers it was found that just was not practical, and that, although they were on salary and could turn in actual expense accounts, it was extremely difficult and expensive for the employer. The amendment was introduced to enable the employer to pay to the employee a per diem amount for his travelling expenses, and the employer deducted it for income tax purposes.

The hon. member raised the case of private members of parliament who receive a tax-free expense allowance. Again that is an expense allowance paid by the government of Canada for expenses presumably incurred by members of parliament, and unquestionably actually incurred. Those who have been members know that very well. In effect, however, it relieves a member of parliament of the obligation of turning in vouchers to the treasury officers and obtaining repayment of these expenses. I do not consider that as a real exception to the general rule. It is simply an efficient way to enable the employer in each case to pay the actual expenses incurred for him by his employees.

On a number of occasions the government has considered the desirability of making the change requested by the hon. member, and has rejected it. There is no reason why it cannot consider it again, but I believe I should say frankly to the house that my own view, as I am at present advised, is that it is undesirable. I want to point out of course that the terms in which the amendment is drawn make it a motion of want of confidence in the government, and therefore I am bound to oppose it.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the minister's explanation. I wish to say I am still in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I speak in a dual capacity. I am a member of the bar of Newfoundland, and I also happen to be president of a Newfoundland trade union. So far as I can see, the justification for the deduction of trade union dues is just as great as that for the deduction of bar fees. From a practical point of view I see no difference. As to one other comment the minister made, namely, the allowance of 10 per cent that is made in the United States for donations to churches and charities—is that it?

Mr. Abbott: Charities, churches, union dues, other incidental expenses of that kind.

Mr. Higgins: Before confederation we had the same principle in Newfoundland except that it only applied to churches and charities. Of course we now come under the dominion income tax rules, and these deductions are not allowable. I believe that is correct. It would appear to me that the suggestion of the minister as to the reason for not allowing the 10 per cent is that he, or possibly the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), does not trust the taxpayer in making his return. We all know what an honourable and respectable gentleman the taxpayer is in making his returns in these matters. I still feel that particular clause should be included. As I said before, I am only speaking briefly, but I entirely agree with the remarks of all hon. members who have supported the amendment. I feel it is one that might very well be agreed to by all hon. members of the house.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the minister just made the observation that he considers the amendment a motion of want of confidence in the government. I am not particular whether or not it is, but I am glad that the discussion has taken place. I believe the minister made the best contribution so far to justify the necessity for the amendment. He stated if union dues were to be taken into consideration for purposes of exemption, then there were a lot of other items that the average trade unionist has to pay in order to maintain his employment and earn his wages or salary. That is absolutely right. Union dues would only mean $3 or $4 a year by way of tax exemption.

This is not a new question to the house. It was discussed in 1940, and I believe every year since then until an adjustment was made. My concern is that there are two most pertinent points that should be corrected. The first is the matter of discrimination. I believe that every hon. member of the house would want to see that removed. I do not think the minister wants to discriminate against anybody. The debate is timely because the budget resolutions must come before the house, and there is opportunity yet for the minister to correct that.

The second point, and I think it is more serious than the first, is the matter of who is working for whom. According to the decision of the exchequer court, for a number of years the income tax laws provided exemption for union dues. However, the income tax people did not understand that decision, or understood too well; in any event they failed to permit the deductions.

No one in this house can say that the interpretation of the law by the income tax department was correct, and the committee has been shown that the department has wrongfully withheld money which should be returned to the people we are now discussing. I think the time has come in this country when members of this house have to ascertain whether they are working for the civil service or whether the civil service are working for the people of Canada and are responsible to the representatives of the people. There are thousands of very efficient, very decent civil servants in this country, but there are many who take the attitude that this House of Commons and its members are just something to be tolerated for a certain number of months, until they can get us out of here; that we are just a bunch of dumb clucks who have very little understanding of what we are talking about. I think every hon. member realizes that. A great many of the civil servants are very nice, but there are others who have no time to talk to you and do not bother with you.

When the minister comes to his budget resolutions I hope he will tell the house that in accordance with the decision of the exchequer court the government will return this money which has been illegally deducted or withheld from these people. I think he can remove that discrimination; but now that this discussion has focused attention on this matter I would suggest that in addition to deductions for union dues there are other things that should be considered. A commercial traveller gets a car allowance, and all that sort of thing. I am not going all over it again; the minister has done it and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has done it; but I would give the example of the coal miner. Certain deductions are made from his pay every week, money he is obliged to pay. He has to make a payment as insurance that he will have a doctor in the event he becomes ill. He must make a hospital payment, or he cannot work. That mounts up to $52 a year. He has to buy all the materials he uses for blasting his coal underground. That applies to the rock miner also, and it runs into a good deal of money. The miner must pay approximately $4 a week in order to be employed underground in most of the mines in Canada. It seems to me those expenditures are as legitimately a tax deduction as the expenses of the lawyer who maintains an office, a stenographer, and so on. If the lawyer has to maintain his office and spend that money in order to earn a living he is entitled to that deduction; but I also think the trade unionist, the worker who is obliged to make these payments if he is to be employed by the company, is also entitled to a deduction.

That is all I have to say. I think the minister is fair enough to want to see that there is no discrimination as between two classes of people in this country, and that he will take steps to remove that discrimination.

Mr. Abbott: That is the principle followed in the relaxing of rent control.

Mr. Gillis: The minister lives in Montreal, which is a good Catholic city. You know, if you go to confession you are supposed to confess your sins and do penance. I do not know the minister's religion, but there are many good Catholics on that side of the house, and I suggest that they prevail upon the minister to correct what I consider a great injustice and return to these people money which has been wrongfully withheld from them.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel well enough to speak at length this afternoon, but I do want to express my support for this amendment. I believe it is logical, that it only gives justice to a group of people who are suffering from discrimination. I am not going to repeat the excellent arguments that were put forth by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I listened attentively, and I think they presented on excellent case.

I was also very interested to hear the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) express support for the amendment. In so doing I know he was expressing the views of the organized labour he represents. He has been a trade union leader for a good many years, and I am sure is fully in touch with what working people are thinking about this situation. Personally I cannot understand the discrimination, and that is really what causes me to rise at this time. There would seem to be discrimination against a certain class of people in this country, that is, the wage earner. I do not see why these wage earners, teachers and some professional people should be discriminated against as compared with lawyers, engineers, dentists, doctors, surveyors, architects and others who are permitted to deduct the fees they pay for membership in the organizations to which they are required to belong in order to practise their professions. Why should they be allowed to do that while a larger group of people, earning far less on the average, and whose deductions as a matter of fact are less, are not given the same privilege?

I thought the minister's remarks this afternoon were most interesting, and in many ways I agreed with him. I do not agree with those who say we should allow travelling expenses, we should allow hospital insurance payments, we should allow this and that. If we started on that course we would have a completely jumbled, unfair and unworkable income tax structure. In this instance, however, I do think the government is perpetuating an injustice involving a large number of working people in Canada in return for pettifogging saving, and I cannot understand why that is being done. In conclusion I would urge the minister to give further consideration to this question, and I trust that later this session there will be some amendment of his budget resolutions.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I am not going to speak at any length on this question, because the case has been very well presented by other hon. members and it is not necessary to repeat the arguments they have advanced. After having listened to the discussion, however, I am more convinced than ever that there is not a great deal of difference between the fees paid by lawyers or doctors and those dues which must be paid by union workers, teachers and others in that class. The minister mentioned some objections which I think are worthy of consideration, which would make it difficult to frame a workable income tax system in this country. On the other hand, let us consider the lawyer as a professional man. I have nothing against lawyers except the fact that they are one group who are permitted an income tax exemption in this regard. The minister said there were two classes of lawyers, that those who work on a salary were not permitted exemption for income tax purposes as far as their fees are concerned. In order to get over that the firm employing one of these lawyers pays his bar association fees and charges that payment up to the cost of doing business, and I think perhaps that is a proper thing to do. In any event a lawyer does not have to pay income tax on those dues; the firm paid it for him, and he is relieved to that extent. Doctors also are entitled to income tax exemption with respect to their dues. I am not sure whether the minister said the other day that doctors working on salary are not permitted this exemption.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct; they are not allowed the deduction.

Mr. Johnston: The same thing would apply to them. Conditions are entirely different as between these two classes. It is possible for a lawyer or doctor to earn a larger income and thereby take care of his dues. In the case of a workingman that is not possible. He has to belong to a union; he has no alternative. He must pay his union dues in return for the right to belong to that union and work in the particular plant where he is engaged. I just cannot see why those fees should not be deductible for income tax purposes.

The teachers, too, particularly in the province of Alberta, are bound to pay these dues. It is a matter of legislation. I believe the same is true of Saskatchewan. The teacher has no option but to pay these dues or else he cannot work. Nobody else pays the dues for him, as in the case of a lawyer or doctor who is working for a salary. This means that the teacher pays income tax on those payments. I cannot see any logical reason why union dues should not be deductible for income tax purposes.

The minister spoke of the method that was used in the United States, under which a blanket deduction of ten per cent is allowed. Such a practice might be commendable. I do not know enough about it to pass judgment on it. The fact is, however, that this practice is not followed in this country. If the minister believes that is feasible or practical, no doubt he will make that recommendation when his budget resolutions come before the house. Up to now, the condition has not prevailed in Canada. Personally, I am in favour of allowing these union dues as a deduction for income tax purposes.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I shall take only a few moments, but I desire to place myself on record in support of the amendment now before the house. I wish to comment on the minister's reply. The minister's objection is not so much to the fact that either school teachers or trade unionists are not entitled to deductions for fees paid to their associations or trade unions, but he pointed to the difficulty of his department ascertaining what deductions should be permitted. Then, the minister continued from that point by dragging across the trail another good red herring that has nothing whatever to do with this amendment. He pointed out that, if the government granted these deductions referred to in the amendment, they would have to make deductions for streetcar tickets, for lunches and so forth. Those things are not under discussion at the moment. The amendment before the house is not concerned with them, so let us stick to the issues that are raised by the amendment.

No matter how the minister looks at that question, he cannot evade the fact that his department is perpetrating the greatest discrimination between classes of professional and industrial people.

Mr. Abbott: I do not agree with that for a moment.

Mr. Knowles: That is the effect.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister admitted that in the case of lawyers—

Mr. Abbott: I did not admit any such thing.

Mr. Noseworthy: —who are maintaining offices, deduction of the law society fees for income tax purposes is permitted. He went on to point out that, in the case of lawyers who were working for a salary, the employer paid the fee and was permitted to deduct it from his income tax. In the latter case, the lawyer is not only exempt from taxation, but receives exemption from his fees to the society as well.

I doubt if the department would find so much difficulty in administering the act if trade union dues were deductible. The department has an excellent staff which is rather good at tracking down any salaried individual who tries to cheat the department out of a dollar in income tax.

Mr. Abbott: Glad to hear that.

Mr. Noseworthy: They have an efficient staff which, some way or other, is able to keep track of the salaried people in this country. In the case of Ontario school teachers, their fees to their professional association are deducted by the school boards or by the department of education and paid to those organizations.

Mr. Abbott: Why doesn't the school board pay it?

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister's officials could find out exactly what any teacher in Ontario paid by way of fees to his professional association.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend realizes that the school board could pay those fees?

Mr. Noseworthy: That holds true in practically all the provinces. In the case of trade unions, practically every local reports to its national office the number of dues-paying members and the amount that those members pay. I am confident that these astute employees of the income tax department could easily check up on any trade unionist who was trying to slip in a dollar more than he actually paid to his union.

I do not believe those are arguments against granting exemptions either to those who pay trade union dues or to the teachers who pay professional fees. These payments are obligatory, just as a lawyer, doctor or any other professional man has to pay dues to his professional organization.

Mr. Abbott: I agree; there is no difference of opinion on that.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister cannot evade the fact that he and his department are now perpetrating a discrimination as between professional people on the one hand and industrial workers on the other.

Mr. Abbott: No such thing.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to say a word in support of this amendment. I was interested to hear the minister's explanation this afternoon. In my judgment he did not make out a very good case for continuing his refusal to allow exemption of these union dues. It is difficult to see the difference between a young lawyer working for a salary for a law firm, and a young union man working for a salary for a company. The young lawyer does not have to pay his fees to the barristers' association because they are paid by the firm and allowed to it as expenses.

Mr. Abbott: The employer could pay the union dues.

Mr. Green: I suggest that is drawing the line much too fine. There has been a big increase in the number of Canadians who belong to unions. Unions are of first-rank importance in the national life of this country today. I believe the time has come when these men who belong to unions should be allowed to deduct their union dues. The minister has admitted that there would be no difficulty in calculating those deductions. He tried to tie it up with several other expenses for which claims for exemption might be made but we are dealing today with only one question, and the minister has admitted there would not be any difficulty in arriving at the amount of deduction for union dues.

There is one other feature which I believe is of great importance. The exchequer court of Canada decided this year that, under the section of the act as it stood before, these dues could be deducted. The old section 6 (1) read as follows:

> In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of
> (a) disbursements or expenses not wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income . . .

That was the way the law stood. The exchequer court decided that the last part of the clause entitled members of a union to claim this deduction; in other words, it decided that union dues were "wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income". This case was taken to the court by a union man in 1948; and it is a strange thing—

Mr. Knowles: April.

Mr. Green: In April, 1948; and in May, 1949, the government changed the law.

Mr. Knowles: May, 1948.

Mr. Green: In May, 1948, the government changed the law so that, regardless of whether or not that member of a union won his case, there could be no such claim for exemption in the future.

Mr. Abbott: The amendment was not made retroactive.

Mr. Knowles: It was made retroactive to the first of January of that year.

Mr. Abbott: 1949.

Mr. Green: I suggest that the matter should have been left with the courts.

Mr. Abbott: In our country the courts do not make the law. They interpret the law; they do not make it.

Mr. Green: A year later, in June of this year, the exchequer court decided that those dues were deductible. In the meantime the government had stepped in, in May 1948, and changed the law so that the dues were not deductible. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government might well have left the law as it stood. Personally, I propose to vote for the amendment.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this motion that you do now leave the chair permits me to say a word about the report of the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act on Canada's flour milling industry which has been tabled today by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). In my opinion the government cannot escape responsibility for any report that a minister of the government may table. The fact that the minister is required by law to table the report does not in my judgment alter the situation.

Damage to the industry concerned results from the publication of the report and, even if at a late date the courts may later absolve the industry from guilt, the damage is not undone. Therefore, in justice to the industry, I feel that my remarks should be made concurrently with the publication of the report.

I object to the contents of the report only as they apply to the period when the industry was under the control of an administrator of the wartime prices and trade board and the decontrol period immediately thereafter. I have no comment to make about the report of the commissioner on the conduct of the industry prior to that period, or subsequent to that period, since I have no knowledge of the facts.

I do know something about government policy as it related to the control of industries during the war and immediate post-war periods. As Minister of Munitions and Supply I was responsible for the control of a number of industries including timber, steel, coal, non-ferrous metals, rubber, petroleum products and others where supply was essential to the war effort. The control of the flour milling industry was the responsibility of the Minister of Finance through the wartime prices and trade board, but as the pattern of control was the same for all industries I have some knowledge of government policy as it applied during the period in question.

Some months ago the Minister of Justice asked me to look over the report on the flour milling industry prior to its being tabled. I did so and was amazed to find that the flour milling industry was being condemned for carrying out policies that were obviously those of the wartime prices and trade board and those common to all control administrations. To make sure that my impressions were correct I consulted my deputy minister, who was a member of the wartime prices and trade board, and found that my impressions were correct.

Therefore I called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the situation and urged him not to table the report without further investigation and suggested particularly that he consult Mr. Donald Gordon and Mr. Gordon's successor, Mr. K. W. Taylor, for confirmation of the inconsistencies in the report that I had pointed out to him.

The flour milling industry is one of Canada's major export industries. Its sales are made to some fifty-four countries and it furnishes an important outlet for Canada's wheat. It would seem to me a major calamity to Canada if this industry were to be damaged unfairly by action of a government agency. I am also aware that the industry gave the government the fullest co-operation throughout the war years and willingly accepted profit control more onerous than that applied to any other industry.

I was also confronted with the fact that when an industry has been asked to act as a unit in finding a solution of wartime supply problems and in holding down domestic prices, such industries were told that the Combines Investigation Act would not be invoked for acts performed during the period of control. Certain industries asked for this assurance in writing, which was given, but others were content to accept the word of a responsible minister. It was obvious to me that the report under discussion represented a violation of that government undertaking.

Mr. McGregor is, and has been since its inception, a member of the wartime prices and trade board, and responsible with other members of the board for formulating and carrying out price policies. Mr. McGregor was also enforcement officer for all control regulations, including those of the department of munitions and supply. In these two capacities it would seem to me that it would have been his duty to draw the attention of his colleagues on the board to administrative practices which would be objectionable under the combines act. It was a shock to me to discover that, having failed to take objection at the time, he subsequently would attack the industry for its practices during the control period in his other capacity as commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act.

Let us for a moment examine the position of the flour milling industry during the control period. In November, 1941, price control was instituted and prices of most commodities were frozen at their then level. The price of wheat was then about $1.18 per bushel, and the price of flour was consistent therewith. The price of flour was frozen, but the price of wheat was not frozen, and was allowed to continue to find its own level. The flour industry was asked to co-operate with the government to make this possible. Mr. C. H. G. Short was appointed flour administrator, and it was arranged that, if the price of wheat continued to rise, the government would subsidize the milling industry to the extent necessary to assure the industry of standard profits and no more. This meant that the industry must include all profits made from export sales of flour to reduce any subsidy paid by the government on account of losses on domestic sales. In short, the arrangement called for 100 per cent excess profits tax. I might point out that the peak excess profits tax required from other industries never exceeded 80 per cent.

The flour milling industry carried on its wartime operations as directed by the flour administrator. Ceiling prices were maintained on both flour and feed throughout the control period, although the wheat prices continued to rise. All flour mills were operated to full capacity and rendered splendid service in meeting the supply problems of Canada and her allies. When decontrol came, the industry accepted direction from the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board in returning to price levels for flour and feed that he considered reasonable. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance said in a public statement that, unless the industry established prices after decontrol that he considered reasonable, controls would be reimposed. It would appear that he was satisfied with the prices then established, although Mr. McGregor condemns the industry for acting as a unit in establishing prices proposed by the board. I would say that both the industry and the government could regard the period of flour control as a perfect example of co-operation between government and industry in the best interests of both the consumer and the public exchequer.

In his report the commissioner states that the industry committed a crime by not selling flour below the ceiling price in competition one unit of the industry with another. I point out that, had the industry done so, it could only have been at the expense of the public purse, since the profits of the industry would have been the same in any event. However, one unit could have dropped its price and enlarged its domestic market at the expense of its competitors had the wartime prices and trade board permitted it to do so, which I am sure they would not. The commissioner also points out the fact that the industry stopped giving away premiums with flour sales. This privilege was denied to all industries by order of the wartime prices and trade board. In other words, many of the actions of the industry complained of by the commissioner were actions directed by the wartime prices and trade board to this industry, and to all other industries.

An important legal action taken against the administration of controls has a bearing on the contention of the commissioner that a subsidized industry should continue to compete unit by unit through selling its product below the ceiling price. This was the case of Joy Oil Company which was carried to the Supreme Court of Canada. The supply situation in gasoline made it necessary to import gasoline at certain times, and where import was necessary the government paid a subsidy to meet the excess cost of such imports over the cost of gasoline supplied by Canadian refineries. The Joy Oil Company imported gasoline and sold it at less than the ceiling price, after which it claimed a subsidy from the government on the loss sustained through selling below its purchase price. The courts found that the government was not liable for subsidy in those circumstances, and that the gasoline should have been sold at the ceiling price. This would seem to dispose of the commissioner's contention that flour should have been sold below the ceiling price, as the circumstances are completely parallel.

So much for the circumstances of the flour industry within the period of control. Hon. members will note that the selling price of flour was fixed by a government agency, and that all actions of the industry were directed by a government administrator. Mr. McGregor was a member of the team that was responsible for administering price control, being a member of the wartime prices and trade board and its enforcement officer.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) accepted my advice and obtained the opinion of Mr. Donald Gordon which is summarized in Mr. Gordon's memorandum to the Minister of Justice, and which I think I should read at this time for the purpose of the record.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the date of it?

Mr. Howe: It was handed to me today. I am not sure when the Minister of Justice received it.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there not a date on it?

M. Howe: No date; the date on the transmitting letter is November 4.

Mr. Coldwell: That is 1949?

Mr. Howe: 1949. The memorandum reads:

It was impossible during the wartime price control period and the post-war decontrol period to distinguish when discussion and agreements could be regarded as "industry discussions" leading to a combine as defined on page 118 of the commissioner's report or when they formed part of the general wartime supervision and control of a particular industry. For this reason, with the full knowledge of the Minister of Finance and of Mr. McGregor, I gave, as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, orally and in writing, personal and repeated assurances that anything done in furtherance of the substance of the policy and administrative practices of the wartime prices and trade board would be held "privileged."

Such assurances were necessary to secure the active and willing co-operation which made the work of the board possible. It should be remembered that exhortation was the order of the day. The winning of the war justified any departure from the normal and, in any event, the public interest was protected by the fact that the wartime prices and trade board was in operation. All this was known to Mr. McGregor, who at his own request acted as enforcement administrator for wartime prices and trade board during the war period. Moreover, I had the advice of legal advisers that the wartime prices and trade board had the legal authority to give such an assurance under the powers granted to the board. In consultation with him on more than one occasion I thought I also had Mr. McGregor's positive agreement that the situation was as I have described. If Mr. McGregor had given me any reason to think otherwise I should have brought to the attention of the government that a wartime suspension of the Combines Investigation Act was necessary for the price and supply control period, and I have every reason to believe that such action would have been forthcoming. I should perhaps add that in the light of the flexibility of the board's administrative procedures the assurances to which I refer above were not in every case contained in formal documents, nor could they be found always in writing. All concerned, however, realized that there was no difference in principle between oral and written assurances on this particular point.

On the general point, therefore, while I cannot undertake in this summary to debate each and every detail, my view is that the report does not demonstrate improper actions by the flour milling industry during the period to which I make reference and while they were under direction and supervision of the flour administrator and other officials of the board.

2. Subsidies—The flour milling industry operated at the request of government for a lengthy period on the basis of a drawback or subsidy in respect of flour provided for domestic consumption. This subsidy was for the benefit of domestic consumers and was paid through the millers purely as a matter of administrative convenience. It did not benefit the millers. In fact, the subsidy was operated in such a way as to limit substantially the profits of the millers because of a "profit control" clause in the relative order in council. The special character of this subsidy meant that the full co-operation of the industry was needed to make it workable, and despite many difficulties that was readily forthcoming. It is of special importance to realize in this connection, however, that if sales to the domestic market had been made by the millers below established ceiling prices the amount of the subsidy payable out of public funds could have been increased by many millions of dollars. Consequently, the ceiling price in such circumstances would naturally become the fixed price and, such being the case, any "agreement" in respect of prices would have been meaningless. Indeed, if millers had attempted to make good fellows of themselves by reducing domestic prices habitually at the expense of the public treasury the board would have called them to account. Moreover, under such circumstances of subsidy and profit control there was no agreement in regard to price which could have yielded more profits to the millers unless they had violated price ceilings, and there is, of course, no claim that such was the case.

For the above-mentioned reasons, I am of the opinion that references throughout the report to "agreements" in respect of price during the entire period when subsidies were payable are not only incomplete but misleading unless the effect of the subsidy payment is taken into account. I suggest, therefore, that the reasoning of the commissioner is faulty as it appears in one of the sentences in the first paragraph of page 115, as follows:

> "Assuming that in some instances milling companies did choose to sell at less profitable levels, knowing that they could not retain profits above a fixed level, the benefit still accrued to the Canadian public in the form of lower prices."

I repeat that it was certainly not part of government policy that the subsidy be increased through millers offering prices still lower than the already heavily subsidized prices and that the millers were fully justified in preventing this happening. Indeed, I have no doubt whatever that the effect of the subsidy provision was repeatedly called to their attention by the flour administrator.

3. As already stated, it is not possible for me to attempt comment on all of the voluminous detail provided by the commissioner, particularly since I have not before me the complete documents from which so many extracts from context are submitted. Nevertheless, I call attention to a few points in regard to which I am in particular disagreement as to the facts.

The evidence provided here seems to be intended to suggest that improper discussions or agreements took place. The fact is, however, that during the period of price control the flour administrator and his advisory committee (which included C.N.M.A.) frequently discussed with officers of the board proposals for establishing uniform prices. In fact they were encouraged to do so because the board found the idea of uniform prices attractive as it offered simplicity in a very complex pricing field. The fact that such discussions took place in an effort to reach agreement is not to be adduced as evidence that some sort of a combine was intended. In my opinion the point which should have been pertinent to the commissioner is that, despite the encouragement of the board and despite its willingness to use wartime powers to accomplish this purpose, no practical system of uniform prices was ever discovered and it remained in the realm of wishful thinking throughout the period of control. Nevertheless, I have no doubt that the flour administrator in collaboration with the industry did his utmost to ensure orderly conditions in the industry in the interests of maintaining supply as well as price stability.

Pages 31-35—Agreements on Tenders:

This section of the report brings out evidence as to "agreements" covering tenders, with particular reference to supplies for wartime agencies such as the Department of Munitions and Supply. It should, however, be read with the following in mind.

"Supply" in wartime was often a responsibility rather than a privilege and very often suppliers had to be required to make offers. Therefore, the generalization that there was evidence of an agreement between various sections of this industry in respect to supply and price is not pertinent until it is ascertained whether or not such an agreement was as a result of a procedure required by government controllers. To take the example of ships stores mentioned in this section, my opinion is that the quotations given merely illustrate the plan agreed upon whereby each mill was given in rotation the responsibility of supply. Ships stores were of extreme importance during the war and much organization was required to provide for unexpected demands often made in great secrecy. It was essential that each mill take its turn in the supply line, and this was done with the agreement of all concerned, including not only the industry and the flour administrator, but as well the ships stores administrator and interested departments of government. The ships stores administrator had a great many special arrangements to ensure supplies and exercised wide authority in making sure that no delays were encountered. Not only in regard to flour but, as well, in such things as meat and other food supplies special supply arrangements were worked out and the question of price settled afterwards by mutual agreement. This kind of necessary wartime arrangement must be kept in mind in reading the particular extract quoted on page 35 from a letter by W. L. MacGregor to G. H. Booth, which when properly understood does no more than reveal the agreed wartime procedure.

Furthermore, it also has to be understood that when subsidies were paid the price paid by the Department of Munitions and Supply had a real meaning as to the cost of subsidies—alternatively, if subsidies were not paid the price paid by the department could have easily upset the board's efforts to maintain orderly conditions in respect of price control. It was in explanation of this procedure that the published report of the wartime prices and trade board covering the period April 1, 1943, to December 31, 1943, makes this comment on page 7:

"An interdepartmental committee on subsidies has been set up to clear problems concerning withholding or repayment of subsidies on goods supplied to the Department of Munitions and Supply and an agreement has been arrived at with the department as to its relation to the price ceiling and repayment of subsidies".

Pages 36 and 63; page 115 (second paragraph)—Decontrol:

The report of the commissioner under this heading does not agree with my understanding of what took place. This is of special importance because I believe the commissioner has stated that his investigation into this industry was commenced because of suspicions aroused by the fact that a uniform price increase took place in the price of mill feeds and flour on the date that price control was removed and subsidies discontinued, namely September 15, 1947. While I was not chairman of the board on that date, I had been responsible for outlining the pattern of decontrol and was closely in touch with the policy during that period. Furthermore, I have checked my recollection of events with Mr. K. W. Taylor, the present chairman of the board.

The situation was that following a long period of price control and subsidy payments everyone was apprehensive about the effect of a sudden release of the controls. Consequently, the flour administrator in collaboration with the chairman of the board reached an understanding with the industry that a flat over-all increase in price be held to an agreed amount when the controls were lifted and until such period as market conditions had settled somewhat and inventories became better balanced. It should be noted particularly that this agreement was at government request and that it dealt specifically with holding the expected increase to a maximum. It is obvious, therefore, that since this arrangement was worked out at the government's request and since it represented a limitation of an increase that would have otherwise taken place, prices would naturally rise to the maximum permitted by this agreement. It is not, however, an agreement of the kind which should excite the commissioner's attention.

On page 114 the following paragraph appears:

"The practice during the war years to which exception is taken in this report is the same practice to which exception is taken with respect to other times, that of agreements to remove competition in price. In the war years regulations established maximum levels beyond which prices could not be increased. In this period concerted efforts were made to prevent competition by securing agreement as to the prices which the members would follow. Such joint action was neither required nor sanctioned by the prices board or any other government agency. Board policy was definitely directed to the maintenance of competitive conditions with respect to prices."

For many reasons the statements made in this paragraph are too dogmatic. As I have already stated, the administration of price control was a highly flexible affair and all sorts of special circumstances had to be met and many qualifications were necessary and justifiable. My previous reference to the effect of subsidy payments and profit control is but an example. There were many other cases in which such things as "production directives", "equitable distribution controls", "allocations for special users", etc., etc., had an influence on price and where agreements were made in order to make them workable. Throughout the period of price control the board strove to maintain price ceilings against the upward thrust of wartime cost increases and severe wartime supply scarcities. This pressure was so severe that the possibility of selling prices below established ceilings was largely theoretical.

In connection with these and other matters I have not been able to understand why the commissioner did not discuss the facts with me so that I might have informed him of the many interlocking considerations which affected the wartime operations. He apparently did discuss aspects of the report with some officials of the wartime prices and trade board and also examined some board records. However, in view of the fact that during the price ceiling period I was responsible for the over-all co-ordination of all the activities of the board and therefore the person best equipped to inform him, I have been at a loss to understand why he did not invite me to discuss with him these points affecting wartime operations before he completed his report. Had he done so he could have formed a better judgment as to the validity of including any wartime period in his report or, alternatively, have pointed out whether or not the events described during that period were under direction of government officials with special wartime powers.

That is the end of Mr. Gordon's memorandum.

I understand that both Mr. Gordon and his successor as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. K. W. Taylor, expressed their views of the report to Mr. McGregor. Regardless of the views of those who have shared with Mr. McGregor responsibility for directing government policies having to do with price control, the report has now been tabled in its original form.

I claim no special morality, but I regard the carrying out of an undertaking, either oral or written, as a basic responsibility. In this case of the flour milling industry, the undertaking was not given by myself, but I had given the same undertaking to those industries which were under the control of my department. I understand that Donald Gordon had given the undertaking that actions of the flour milling industry during the control period would not be considered violations of the Combines Investigation Act. I am well aware that industries to which I gave that undertaking will consider that, if the undertaking can be violated in this case, it is likely to be violated in their case.

Were this report to be tabled without comment, I would hesitate to again call on industry for the same kind of co-operation that was given freely to the government in working out and administering our system of price control. Incidentally, I consider that governments should have at least as high a standard of morality as individual members of the government, and I know that my colleagues share that view.

Many hon. members will say that Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was not warranted in delaying publication of the report. I do not share that view. After having doubt cast upon the validity of certain conclusions contained in the report by some of his colleagues, of whom I was one, the report was held from publication with the full authority of the whole cabinet for further checking and consultation. This has now taken place and confirms the objections to the report which were taken when it was presented to the cabinet in the first place. The Minister of Justice took no steps in this matter whatever, except on the fullest disclosure to his colleagues and with full authority of cabinet, which assumes responsibility for the manner in which the report was dealt with.

While the report may damage the public relations of the flour milling industry, that industry can at least know that those, like myself, who shared responsibility for directing its affairs during the control period do not share the views expressed by the commissioner.

I hope hon. members will not draw from my remarks the conclusion that I do not take the view that Canada should have a Combines Investigation Act. On the contrary, I believe that the act is a necessary part of government machinery. Indeed, there is on the order paper at the present time a bill containing amendments which the Minister of Justice is submitting, upon recommendation of the Combines Investigation Act commissioner, to strengthen the enforcement provisions of the act. To be effective the act requires an administration that is both zealous and fair. I am sure that the Minister of Justice will take prompt steps to fill the present vacancies with that thought in mind.

I sincerely hope that those who read the report that has been tabled today will read it with the correspondence tabled by the Minister of Justice, and with the Hansard record of my remarks.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect this matter to be discussed today. It is a most unusual procedure, on a motion of one minister to go into supply, for another minister to place such a matter as this before the house and thereby prevent the motion being passed. I do not intend to deal at any length with the facts because it is impossible to refer to the evidence and to the findings on the flour milling industry, since the report was just tabled.

There are some circumstances that have not been explained by the minister. I shall read the first section of the Combines Investigation Act under which this report was made. After all, if we are to have in this country a government by laws and not men, then the laws passed by parliament should be observed, and above all by members of the cabinet. Section 27 of the Combines Investigation Act—it is a rather lengthy section, but I believe it is necessary to have it on the record—reads as follows:

(1) The commissioner at the conclusion of every investigation which he conducts shall make a report in writing and without delay transmit it to the minister. Such report shall set out fully the conclusions reached, the action, if any, taken, and any other material which may be required by regulation under this act.

(2) Within thirty days following the transmission of such report to the minister the commissioner shall cause to be delivered into the custody from which they came, if not already so delivered, all books, papers, records and other documents in his possession as evidence relating to the investigation, unless with respect to particular documents the Attorney General of Canada or the attorney general of any province within which an offence is reported to have been committed certifies that such documents shall be retained by the commissioner for purposes of prosecution.

The next is a subsection dealing with the admissibility in evidence of copies, to which I do not intend to make reference. Subsections 3 and 4 read as follows:

(3) Every special commissioner at the conclusion of the investigation which he conducts shall make a report in writing which he shall sign and transmit to the commissioner, together with the evidence taken at the investigation, certified by the special commissioner, and all documents and papers relating to the investigation remaining in his custody; and the commissioner shall without delay transmit the report to the minister.

(4) The minister may call for an interim report at any time, and it shall be the duty of the commissioner or special commissioner, as the case may be, whenever thereunto required by the minister, to render an interim report setting out the action taken, the evidence obtained and any conclusions reached at the date thereof.

(5) Any report of the commissioner or of a special commissioner,—

This is the particular section to which my attention will be directed.

—other than an interim report or a report of a preliminary inquiry under section thirteen of this act, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner states in writing to the minister that he believes the public interest would be better served by withholding publication, in which case the minister may decide whether the report, either in whole or in part, shall be made public.

Parliament has the right to expect that ministers of the crown shall live up to the provisions of statutes passed by parliament; for if these be not lived up to, parliamentary responsibility ends, and a contempt of parliament occurs which should not be permitted to pass uncensured.

The minister stated that the facts and conclusions in this report were, in his opinion, unjustified. That statement does not answer or justify the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) failing to discharge his obligatory responsibilities under the provisions of an act passed by parliament. Only three years ago in this house I was one of those who stated that in my opinion—and I know there were some who criticized me for this view—we should alter the provision with regard to publishing these reports in order that no one should be found guilty before the bar of public opinion without having the opportunity of answering in the courts.

The then Minister of Justice answered me and rather ridiculed that viewpoint. Let me ask this question. If this report had been tabled or had been published in February last, what harm would have been done to the milling companies that will not result today? The explanation made by the right hon. gentleman was to all intents and purposes a smokescreen in order to avoid responsibility for failing to perform a mandatory requirement in a statute. Could he not have done the same thing in February when, under law, the Minister of Justice was required—

Mr. Knowles: January.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In January, if you will. I make it February. Yes, it would be January.

Mr. Knowles: Fifteen days from December 29 would bring it to January 13.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. Would any greater harm have been done then than will be done today? Were there not available to the minister and to the government in the month of January the same answers and the same qualifications that are available now? This action on the part of the government, Mr. Speaker, is the most flagrant disregard of parliament that has ever been exhibited by a government that has never been too careful of parliamentary rules, regulations and proprieties. It is not a question of the guilt or innocence of these companies. There can be only one reason why that report was not published in January. That reason is that an election campaign was in the offing. There is no other.

The government's action in this matter cannot be laughed off. It strikes at the vitals of our democratic system; for if we cannot rely on ministers of the crown or on the government to do those things which, under law, they are required to do, we in the opposition, instead of being able to accept what ministers of the government say and to believe that they are carrying out their responsibilities under the law, are actually placed in a position where we must begin to wonder. I doubt whether we would have had the report yet if the commissioner had not resigned and brought the matter to a head.

I am not entering into the question raised by the right hon. gentleman as to whether or not a monopoly existed within the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I am not here to endeavour to try anyone. That is what the courts are for. I am here as a member of parliament to ask why the Minister of Justice, who stands as the embodiment of justice in our land—which means justice under law—has himself failed to carry out a provision that was placed in the law not by the opposition but by parliament. This is an extremely serious matter. I am not going into the record of this government with regard to combines prosecutions. I remember hearing the former prime minister, on election night in 1935, promising that all monopoly privilege would end. Some prosecutions have taken place since then. I think of the tobacco companies prosecution. Those interested in ascertaining what happened and how it happened should read the reports in connection with that prosecution in 1938.

Then there was the dental companies prosecution. That prosecution against eighteen defendants failed because the counsel for the government failed under instructions to prove the signatures on any of the 1,800 documents filed, or that any of the persons were authorized to write these letters. Anyone knows that when a limited company is prosecuted for a criminal offence knowledge must be brought to the directors. They failed to prove that the companies were even incorporated. Mr. Justice Barlow directed the jury to bring in a verdict of not guilty, and the jury acquitted all defendants. I asked the then Minister of Justice whether there had been a mistake in the prosecution and in effect he said that we were trying out this case to ascertain whether or not the combines act would cover such things as we failed to prove. Was it not a strange thing, Mr. Speaker, that they picked the greatest prosecution ever taken in this country to experiment with the law and with the law of evidence?

Mr. Rowe: Champions of the poor man.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not all. In 1946 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), then Minister of Justice, made a great speech on the subject of combines and monopoly privilege. He said, in effect, "What we have to do is to put teeth in the law". Mr. Speaker, there are enough teeth in the law; but if the teeth are not used they might just as well be false teeth. Teeth in the law! It was not a lack of teeth in the law that resulted in the outcome so far as the prosecution of the dental companies case was concerned. It is not for me to say that there would have been a verdict of guilty in any case, but at least there would have been a case to call on the defence if the ordinary rules of evidence had been followed.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker—and I cannot refer to the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act which are to be brought down, though they are merely minor matters—that a law is only as strong as the will of those who act for the crown. A law can be full of teeth, but if the teeth are not used to bite with the law becomes a mere sham on the statute books. Sir, believing, as I always have, that it is not for parliament to deal with the wrongdoings of anyone allegedly condemned in a report, I refrain from saying anything about the facts in this matter. I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) whether in the long history of the Canadian parliament, and in the longer history of British parliaments, he can point out a case where in the past any minister has ever failed to discharge the obligatory and mandatory provisions of a statute, unless it be under order in council under emergency legislation in which case the minister appears before parliament and advises parliament that he has taken that stand and stands or falls by what parliament decides.

Sir, I will not labour it, the statute provides what shall be done. Shall there be one in our country above the law? Shall the cabinet be above the law? Is there anyone who will answer me and say yes to my question? If so, we have indeed in this country a government of men, not of laws. I know something of the record of this government. I think of the case taken under law by Mr. Oatway against the wheat board. When he appealed, as was his right under our law, the government passed an order in council to deny him the right to proceed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, at the time of adjournment I was referring to the Oatway case as an example of arbitrary action on the part of the government against an individual citizen of this country. It would appear that that order in council was passed at the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Another matter to which I might refer is the amendment of the Aeronautics Act with regard to the operation of air lines by railroad companies. That passed parliament over the protests of the opposition and was to the effect that within one year after the end of the war in Europe all railroad companies would have to dissociate themselves from ownership of air lines. A period of a year passed. When asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) why this statute of parliament was changed or altered, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that it was done under order in council. Later on, finding that there was no order in council, he stated that it was changed under a minute of the cabinet. In those instances that I have placed before you is indicated a cavalier disregard of the rights of parliament and of law as passed by parliament. That is particularly so in so far as the amendment to the Aeronautics Act is concerned.

The minister comes before us and indicates that in a large measure he under the authority of his position was responsible for the non-publication of this report. I bring to your attention again the wording of the statute, which is as follows:

> Any report of the commissioner . . .

I am reading only the pertinent parts:

> . . . shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner states in writing to the minister that he believes the public interest would be better served by withholding publication.

There was no authority for doing what the government did in this case and their action constitutes a serious infringement of the rights of parliament. The minister gave as the reason for non-publication that injustice would be done to companies that had operated under certain arrangements between the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board and themselves. Parliament has never heard of those arrangements; parliament has never heard of the terms; parliament is entitled to more than an ex parte statement by the minister of what Mr. Gordon has said in this regard.

Apparently the ministers did not get together on their explanations. I do not blame the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) solely for the failure to publish the report. He was apparently pushed around in this matter. I am sure that he would not have done this as the custodian of justice in this country unless he had been ordered to do so. The Minister of Justice is the fountainhead of justice, and justice cannot be maintained except under law. Justice is not something administered according to the caprice of one cabinet minister or the cabinet as a whole. The minister had a somewhat different explanation the other day when he wrote to Mr. McGregor. In his letter of November 4 he said this:

> The government decided not to publish the report or act upon it until the doubts raised had been cleared up. Moreover, in view of these doubts and of substantial increases in the difficulties of prosecuting created by the judgment of the Ontario court of appeals in the dental supplies case, we felt that if we published the report and were challenged to prosecute upon it, we might not be able to make out a case—

How often were they challenged to prosecute in regard to the optical report? As the then minister of justice said in 1946, speaking in this house, the fact that a report is made does not mean that the government has to prosecute. The minister goes on to say in his letter:

—and that such a failure, coming on top of our loss of the dental case, would certainly not enhance the prestige of the combines investigation commission or of the government.

Summarized, the minister's explanation of the reason for his failure to carry out the law was: If we did publish and were challenged to prosecute; if we did prosecute and did not succeed; if there was another debacle as there was in the dental case, it might be hard to explain. The minister goes on:

The government therefore took the responsibility of withholding publication of your report pending the amendment of the Combines Investigation Act to cure the difficulties created by the dental supplies judgment.

That was not the explanation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The explanation of the Minister of Justice on November 4, in his letter to Mr. McGregor, for not going ahead was that the Combines Investigation Act was to be amended and the report should not be published until that was done. I give the minister the opportunity to reply to this question: If the Combines Investigation Act is amended to cover the shortcomings of the dental case, does the government intend to prosecute and to use those amendments, which I expect this parliament will pass, in connection with any prosecutions that might be taken as of this date under reports that have been made by the commissioner?

There can be no justification for hiding the report, and hidden it was against the provisions of the statute, a statute that the Minister of Justice is charged with administering and upon whose shoulders is placed a mandatory responsibility. Dare the minister say that statutes of parliament can be suspended by the government because it is not considered judicious to do what a statute says shall be done? Is a time limit in a statute to be made dependent upon the wish or caprice of a minister of the crown?

Surely the Minister of Justice will not stand in his place and say that the government, which for years has on so many occasions shown a tendency to act in this autocratic manner, has arrived at a state of mind where it believes that statutes passed by parliament are to be the playthings of the cabinet just because it is considered to be injudicious to act as the statute demands?

The reason given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was that certain representations were made to the companies by Mr. Gordon. We do not know what they were. We do not know what Mr. Gordon said or what he wrote although that has been asked for by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Everything that the minister has stated to have taken place could have been considered by the government in extenuation when it was determining whether or not prosecution should take place. None of the matters that he has raised, no excuse he may offer, can justify the government's departure from its bounden responsibilities under a statute.

During the days of war, by order in council the government amended and suspended statutes. It got the power to do certain things, first under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act and then latterly after the war under the Transitional Measures Act. But even under the Transitional Measures Act there is no longer power vested in the government, or in any minister of the cabinet or in the governor in council, to alter the operation of a statute in any way. I will not read what the minister of justice said in 1946 except to summarize it in this way. The publication of a report is a deterrent and warning.

In the optical case grave charges were made against the optical companies. I was one of those who felt, as I said when I began my remarks this afternoon, that possibly parliament should alter this portion of the statute providing for publication of the reports before trial. The law requiring publication was brought in after a Liberal government came into power following the election of 1935. Provision for publication of these reports was introduced by a Liberal government newly in power and inspired in its determination to remove monopoly privilege from this country. Yet the first government to introduce it is now the government that say, when its operation does not suit the wishes of the government, that the statute may be evaded in the manner that suits the government of the day.

I will not say any more on this occasion. More will be said; more must be said. Parliament and the people of Canada have a right to demand that the law be administered equally to all and that no minister or ministers of the government can by their own ipse dixit say that they are above the law, and that they will act as they choose irrespective of what a statute provides.

Freedom and the maintenance of freedom depend on the foundation stone of all law, namely that, whether it be a minister of the crown or a humble individual, all are equal before the law. The fact that a person is a minister of the crown, a position of power under our system, affords no excuse for such a person placing himself, his government, or the cabinet, above the responsibilities that parliament in its wisdom, and at the request of the government to which he belongs, placed upon the statute books of the country. The issue is far greater than any question as to whether or not there has been wrongdoing on the part of the flour milling companies. I will not now or at any time deal with the facts of a case which may come before the courts and endeavour to pick out excerpts from a report in order to make a case against anybody. Overshadowing the question as to whether or not there was guilt or innocence, or whether Mr. Gordon did or did not make representations, transcending everything, there is what I feel, and what I believe the country as a whole will feel, is a flagrant disregard of parliament. Indeed it is a perpetuation in the days of peace of the centralization of power and authority that was vested in the government. Although such emergency powers no longer exist they have been in this instance exercised by one or more ministers in cabinet council who in their wisdom have decided that an appointee of the people of Canada, carrying out a responsibility under the law, shall not have his recommendations brought before the people because the government has decided that the facts upon which he bases his conclusions are unjustified. My parting word is this. Would parliament even know now that there was a report against the flour milling companies last December if Mr. McGregor had not finally decided that his services could no longer be given to Canada?

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, today's debate has arisen in an unprecedented fashion. I have been in the house for fourteen years, and during that time I do not remember an occasion upon which, on a motion to go into supply, a minister of the crown has aired a government grievance, because that is what we have been subjected to. I do not propose to traverse the same ground as that which has been so ably covered by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I merely want to say that I agree with him wholeheartedly when he says that no government, no minister, has any right at any time to disregard a statute adopted by parliament, and the provision in that statute for the publication of a report within fifteen days for the information of the people of Canada.

This report was made to the government on December 29, 1948. That is over ten months ago. Today the report was brought into the house at three o'clock, and not one of us had an opportunity to see it until that time. Some of us were busily engaged in the house all afternoon, and the manner in which the report is now before the house and is being debated will preclude the possibility of its discussion at any time later this session. A debate having arisen on a particular matter, the same subject of debate cannot be raised subsequently in the same session. I know if I had the opportunity, and if it were possible to move another amendment on going into supply, I would be inclined to move a vote of censure on the government for concealing from the house and the people of Canada for ten months a report which they were obligated by statute to make public. Unfortunately, because of the procedure that has been followed, we are prevented from moving any motion whatsoever. I think this house would be justified in defeating the motion and denying the government supply, to show that the house does not intend the country and parliament to be treated in the way the government have treated us on this occasion. After all, when the Combines Investigation Act was before the house in years gone by the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, who was particularly interested in this legislation, and subsequently the minister of justice, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, told the house that the one great weapon upon which the government relied to deal with monopolistic practices, price fixing and combines in this country was publicity. Publicity was the weapon; publicity was almost all that was needed, and prosecution came after publicity. In this case publicity was prevented and, as has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), it is altogether likely that if Mr. McGregor had not submitted his resignation this report would not have been made public today.

Who is Mr. McGregor? He has been one of the outstanding civil servants in this country. Mr. McGregor served the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King years ago, when Mr. Mackenzie King was minister of labour, He served as Mr. Mackenzie King's secretary when he was engaged in the writing of "Industry and Humanity" at the time he was engaged with the Rockefeller Foundation. Mr. McGregor has made a notable contribution to the life and welfare of this country over many years, and I believe in this connection he felt that he would not be doing his public duty if he failed to bring this matter forcibly before the country by placing his resignation in the hands of the government. After all, let us bear in mind what his letter of resignation says. And let me say to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that although this afternoon a reply to Mr. McGregor's resignation was placed upon the records of this house, when we asked that Mr. McGregor's resignation also be placed upon the record, our request was denied. I like to see fair play in these matters, and I say that preventing the publication of Mr. McGregor's letter in Hansard while reading Mr. Donald Gordon's reply this afternoon was not fair play at all.

This inquiry was undertaken by Mr. McGregor, or so his letter indicates, with the authority and approval of the minister of justice of that day, Mr. Ilsley. Later on, according to Mr. McGregor, he understood the present minister's opinion to be that this investigation never should have been initiated, though I am prepared to believe that there may be some misunderstanding in that connection. However, it was initiated, and a report has been made. We have had no opportunity to study that report; but during the supper hour—that is, for most of the hon. members of this house; I did not go down to supper—I read this report as quickly as I could; and I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he cannot conceal the practices of these milling companies by talking about the contribution they made during the war. I admit that contribution, but the matters referred to in this report arose long before the war. In 1934 and 1936 these practices of combinations and price fixing were prevalent in this country among the milling interests, and I have no doubt that the same practices are continuing at the present time. I have taken some pages from the record which was produced in this house this afternoon. The report indicates that prior to the war—never mind the war years—by their own admission, by their own memoranda, by their own minutes, by their own communications and correspondence, the milling interests were engaged in price fixing, in maintaining high prices and in trying to destroy the small milling interests of this country. That is writ large in this report from the minutes and records of the milling companies themselves.

I have reason to know that during the war they also had the support of milling interests overseas in their attempt to prevent the development of competitive milling interests in this country. I know perfectly well that the farmers of western Canada established a small co-operative mill just before the war, and that mill found it very difficult to operate during the first year or two of the war because they could not get any overseas orders. They could not sell a barrel of their flour to the British ministry of food; and it was only when the position was drawn to the attention of members of the British parliament, and indeed to the attention of the members of the British government interested in the development of co-operatives, that the condition was righted and the co-operative mill in Saskatchewan began to receive orders for flour from overseas. I say I know what I am talking about; I know that is true.

Running all through the evidence submitted in this report by Mr. McGregor is an attempt on the part of the big milling interests not only to control prices, not only to continue their combination and their monopoly, but to destroy the small milling interests of this country. I have in my hand, from chapter 7 of the report, official records of price agreements and discussions. Hon. members will find this record at pages 75 and 76 of the report which was presented this afternoon. Meetings of the organizations to which reference is made were reported in the official minutes by the secretaries, but the principal admissions were found in the records obtained by Mr. McGregor after he obtained access to their memoranda relating to these meetings. Let us look at memorandum No. 28, "Report of sales managers."

> The secretary reported that two of the members were exacting only 40 cents per barrel for top patent over the basic grade, instead of 50 cents, in the province of Quebec.
> It was unanimously agreed to maintain the 50 cents differential throughout eastern Canada.

There is no record of that in the minutes. Then again:

> The following minimum prices were established—mills pledging themselves to adhere rigidly thereto:
> Quebec, $5.75 per barrel . . .
> Ontario, $5.65 per barrel . . .
> Maritime provinces, $6.75 per barrel . . .
> In connection with the maritime provinces, the secretary was instructed to circularize the members, calling attention to the fact that the $6.75 price is applicable only to large jobbers, as well as bakers in Halifax, Saint John and Dartmouth; smaller jobbers to be sold at the spreads indicated in the maritime jobbers' list. The price to dealers to be $7 net.

There is no reference to that in the minutes. That was in 1938; and on December 14 of the same year we have memorandum No. 33, "Small mill competition in western Canada."

> One of the members reported on the discussion which took place in Winnipeg, December 9, at which time it was thought that whatever line of action was deemed necessary should be confined to those areas in which small mills are particularly active, and the suggestions then offered were the making of a special price in those areas and, if necessary, the introduction of a special brand. The question to receive the further consideration of western managers in meeting early in the new year. The two members engaged in the sale of flour in western Canada and not represented at the meeting were requested to communicate with their western managers.

What did the minutes say? No record in the minutes of this vital decision.

> It was reported that a meeting would be held in the new year at which western sales managers would be present.

That is the statement in the minutes, but there is no reference to the attempt to establish a new brand to sell at a low price in order to undersell the small mills in western Canada and put them out of business. There you have at least one reason why this combination should be prosecuted by the government. Never mind the years of the war. What were they doing before the war and what have they been doing since? It is that question which hon. gentlemen should ask themselves.

In eastern Canada the same attempt was being made. Efforts were made to get the small mills to adhere to the price-fixing policy of the large mills. Those efforts are reflected in some extracts I shall read from letters passing between Mr. C. H. G. Short and Mr. J. J. Page, on August 31, 1938. We were not at war then and these companies were not performing any war service at that time. At page 91 of the report we find the following:

If McCarthy continues as he is continuing, and I think the point should be stressed strongly to him, it will be a very short while now before the big mills are meeting his competition right in his own bailiwick, which will mean that the rest of the small mills, and the big mills themselves, are in for a protracted period of unremunerative business. Surely he has sense enough to see that with a discretion below a maintained price of the large mills he is infinitely better off than he can possibly be by setting his own price levels—which will inevitably be met, countered and possibly bettered by some of the big mills within a very short time if he persists.

This should interest some of the Ontario members. The correspondence makes it clear that the competition from the Copeland Milling Company, whose plant is located at Midland, Ontario, was regarded as of particular importance to the milling combine. Here is an extract from a memorandum of decisions reached at an executive meeting on April 5, 1939.

It was unanimously agreed to institute special price reductions at irregular intervals on the following basis:

As a trial, the reduction shall be applicable to bakers in all towns located on or south of the branch line of the C.N.R. running from Belleville west to Midland, Ontario; and the price to be applicable to jobbers in this territory on their purchases of baker-flour requirements in jute.

It is understood that the reduction will be agreed upon at irregular intervals, at the discretion of the mills.

This is cat and mouse business. Lower and raise your prices at irregular intervals, then finally destroy the small miller.

The frequency and amount of the reduction in price shall be mutually agreed upon between the mills on a majority vote of four members. The reduction to be effected, and the time of its coming into effect, shall be made known to all members as soon after the market close on a Friday as is possible.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

The period of the reduction shall be from the market close on Friday agreed upon until the following Tuesday morning at the opening of the Winnipeg market, after which time no further business shall be accepted at the reduced price.

At the discretion of the mills, the reduction may apply to any or all classes of trade in any one or more of the eastern provinces.

So, we can go on with records of that kind of combination and that sort of attempt to destroy a competitor by underselling him.

Mr. J. J. Page (Western Canada) expressed himself as follows in a letter to Mr. Charles Ritz of the Robin Hood Company in Minneapolis. It is dated September 29, 1938, which is before the war.

There seems to be a sharp difference of opinion in the west as to how to combat the small mills . . .

It is true that the country mills are quite keen competitors of the larger mills, and have been giving us quite a bit of trouble, but I do not think we can do other than accept the recommendation of our western men who, with one exception, say we should maintain our present grades and our relative selling bases.

In this report you find evidence that before the war these things were being done. This afternoon the minister tried to brush off Mr. McGregor's criticism and his conclusions by talking about the war years and what Mr. McGregor learned during those war years. As a matter of fact this report is replete with references to the millers' combination and the millers' price-fixing trust in the years before the war.

Mr. McGregor said a careful examination had been made of all the evidence and memoranda. I think that is true because, after all, it is not in the minutes but in the memoranda existing in their offices that one finds the damning indictment which has been brought against these powerful milling interests. The small mills worried them all the time. We have a memorandum of an executive meeting on April 14, 1936, which reads as follows:

It was understood that the discretion of ten cents per barrel in the maritime provinces heretofore enjoyed by Messrs. Ogilvies, would be removed. Messrs. Ogilvies gave the above assurance on the understanding that their position in respect to small mill competition is quite clear, i.e., that they were not concerned here or there about the odd car of flour, but that they would take whatever steps were necessary to hold their old and established connections against the competition of small mills.

Throughout this report there is evidence of the attempt to cut out competition. I should like to ask my friends of the Liberal party how this fits with their allegiance to free competition or free enterprise, if you like. We find this government, which is pledged to maintain free enterprise in this country, has for ten months concealed a report which was a condemnation of big interests which were crushing out free competition. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre reminds me that the government was breaking the law in order to do just that.

Then there is a memorandum of the executive dated February 20, 1936, which suggests that an advance or decline in the price of feed would be governed by a vote of the majority. Then there is a memorandum, No. 5, reporting a somewhat similar meeting on June 9, 1936, just a few months later. It reads in part as follows:

It was resolved that the domestic price on feed shall be governed by the highest ruling price on the North American continent.

That is 1936, when the farmers were down and out and when their stock was almost worthless. These gentlemen get together and resolve that the domestic prices on feed shall be governed by the highest ruling price on the continent of North America.

The minutes of the meeting of Ontario sales managers dated December 14, 1938, was concerned with an understanding about much the same matter.

. . . that the secretary would consult the Montreal members each week to determine a minimum selling price for feeds, which minimum selling level would be based on export feed values.

Everywhere you look in this report—whether it be the war years or the years at which I have been looking, particularly, because I do not intend to deal with the war years tonight—you find the same thing: maintain the highest possible price, get rid of your competitors, and discipline any member of the milling interests that will not agree with you.

On July 21, 1939, they made some price changes: Exhibit 441.

"Price Changes:
Present prices are taken as being promulgated on No. 2 northern cash wheat 50 cents per bushel, and shall advance 15 cents per barrel for each 2 cents per bushel advance up to 60 cents; and shall be reduced 10 cents per barrel for each 3 cents per bushel decline in the market; always making allowance for millfeed changes."

The reason for this change is outlined in a letter of July 24, 1939, from C. H. G. Short (Lake of the Woods)—

I think he was mentioned this afternoon; I think he was the gentleman who was in charge of this particular field under the wartime prices and trade board during the war.

—to G. H. Booth of the Winnipeg office:

"I also managed to sneak a gentle suggestion over, which was adopted—that with every 2 cents upward movement until the No. 2 wheat reached the 60 cent price the price should be advanced 15 cents and that price should be reduced 10 cents per barrel only on decline of 3 cents per bushel. This arrangement, I hope, will mean that with movement in the market we will get in an even better position than the $3.30 price legislated."

Mr. Knowles: Quite a sneak.

Mr. Coldwell: There again you have the type of thing that was done by these powerful companies.

I cannot go into all the matters because there are several other things I want to say; but whether they were dealing with the bakers, with government institutions, or the Department of Justice purchasing for the penitentiaries before the war, or whether they were provisioning Canadian government ships, they all got together, and they decided what they would do about it together. In other words, they acted as a combination; they controlled prices; they set prices; and this report is replete with evidence in that regard. Then we are told that this report was unsatisfactory to the government, that it was not the kind of report which should be made public, and the commissioner resigned because he was determined that the people of Canada should know what was going on.

During the 1930's, when the province from which I come was the victim of the most unprecedented drought in our history, we find indeed the first letter which Mr. McGregor says is evidence of this price fixing, of September 15, 1936, from D. P. Noel to J. Sangster (Western Canada) Winnipeg. He says:

"I confirm my telephone conversation with you this afternoon during which I indicated I had received confirmation from all mills—

I would call attention to those words "all mills."

—that the municipality at Frontier would be quoted on the basis of $6.10 per barrel for a carlot of first patent flour in cottons, sight draft attached to bill of lading."

Those of us who know where Frontier is know that that flour went down into an area which was one of the worst drought-stricken areas in Saskatchewan.

The same thing applied to millfeeds. When millfeeds were being sent into British Columbia, evidently some of the people who sold millfeeds in that province were not maintaining the prices laid down. In 1944, as you will find throughout the war years, complaints were made that the price ceiling was not observed. Bear this in mind, and let us be clear about it. The price ceiling as laid down during the war was a ceiling, never a floor and was never intended to be a floor. This is the reference I am going to make to those war years. You will find that throughout the war years these milling interests insisted on maintaining the highest prices permitted by the government, with a few notable exceptions. They kept at the ceiling and all kept the same price; and when one of them broke away, then of course there was a good deal of criticism of that one by the rest of the combine.

A special system of quotation was adopted at Vancouver which illustrates exactly what I mean. The proposed procedure at Vancouver—and this is a wartime matter—was outlined in a letter of June 8, 1944, from Mr. J. Clark, Vancouver, secretary of the Vancouver group, to Mr. Noel in which he said this:

"Following receipt of the directive issued by you on the subject of tenders of the Department of Munitions and Supply, a meeting of the Vancouver members was held to discuss and draw up a plan to give effect to the suggestion therein contained. As a result the following was agreed upon,—

I may say that I am not going to read the story on the previous page, but they were having trouble with a Vancouver group, the name of which I have forgotten at the moment, which was offering flour and so on at a lower price than they had agreed upon. The letter continues:

That any special price should apply only to Vancouver, Nanaimo and Esquimalt tenders; that all members should complete tenders regardless of prices used, as it was felt that failure to do so might lead to some questioning. The members also agreed that a maximum price discretion of 20 cents per barrel would be enough to start with; this of course could be increased later if found necessary.

The procedure agreed upon was that each month three members should use price differentials of 10, 15 and 20 cents per barrel, that the balance of the members use the regular list. This would be alternated each month when three other members would follow the same procedure, the rest using the list.

The first three members authorized to use the special price basis were selected by lot and these were: The Brackman-Ker Milling Co. Ltd., Lake of the Woods Milling Co. Ltd., and Maple Leaf Milling Co. Ltd. It was understood that on the present tenders they would quote as follows:

B & K

Vancouver	20c
Nanaimo	15c
Esquimalt	20c

Lake of the Woods

Vancouver	15c
Esquimalt	20c

Maple Leaf

Vancouver	10c

the members to leave the flour prices open when sending their tenders to the secretary, who would then complete this portion of the tender.

Members agreed that the secretary be authorized to select the name of the three members using the price differential on all future tenders and the figures at which the tenders are to be priced. Members would be advised of the prices quoted only after all tenders had been completed and sent in to the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. MacInnis: Whom were they tendering for?

Mr. Coldwell: For the government.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. MacInnis: The Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. Coldwell: The letter continues:

"Our tenders for the month of July requirements do not have to be submitted until June 20 so if there are any criticisms or suggestions that you would like to make regarding the above arrangements will you kindly advise us in time so that these may be followed out."

There you have the story. I am not going to comment upon it—because I think comment is quite unnecessary—in order to draw the conclusion.

Before I conclude I wish to say that I have read very carefully the correspondence between the minister and Mr. McGregor. On page 2 of his letter Mr. McGregor points out:

There is greater need now for strong action under the combines act than there has been at any time in the past twenty-five years. To an alarming degree price-fixing activities such as we reported in the flour milling industry have been developing in the post-war years; some of them originated in the war period; and some were started, as in the flour milling industry, even in the pre-war years.

What I have sought to do tonight, Mr. Speaker, is to show to the house that no matter what may be said of what was done during the war by the milling companies, or under whose direction they were operating up to September 15, 1947, they were guilty of malpractices, guilty of breaking the spirit of the Combines Investigation Act, and they should be prosecuted, and the people of Canada should know what is in this report, and be able to read it for themselves.

Someone has said that Canada is probably the most monopoly-ridden country in the world. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I do know that there are great monopolies that have operated in this country prior to the war and subsequent to the war. I have not forgotten that in 1943 I rose in my place and exposed one of these great monopolies, namely, the aluminum monopoly. When the report was made on what I had to say regarding it, it was said that none of my statements had been proven by the facts, and yet two years later on substantially the same data, with exactly the same charges, the Supreme Court of the United States convicted the Aluminum Company of America, indeed in reality Aluminium Limited of Canada, of monopolistic practices of the type that I had reported to this house.

There is one thing more in the minister's letter to Mr. McGregor that I want to ask about, and it appears at the top of page 2, as follows:

What still worries me is why, in the preparation of your report, you did not ascertain these disputed facts from Mr. Gordon which could have been done quite simply by asking him about them. It appeared from the disclosures in my office the other morning that you couldn't get these facts from anyone else because they were not in the possession of anyone else.

Only Mr. Gordon had these facts. Not even the minister or the government had these facts, and not even the milling companies had them. As I say, I had given the most careful reading to this report that I could give in two short hours, and nowhere in it do I find that any member, speaking on behalf of the milling industry, at any time said that they were acting on the advice, or with the consent, of Mr. Gordon or Mr. Taylor. Nowhere in the report can I find it. Let me say that if they were acting on the advice of Mr. Gordon or of Mr. Taylor subsequent to September 15, 1947, they were not acting on the advice of Mr. Gordon prior to September, 1939, nor do I believe that they have been acting on the advice of Mr. Gordon or Mr. Taylor since 1947. If they were acting on the advice of Mr. Gordon or Mr. Taylor I would like to know under what authority either Mr. Gordon or Mr. Taylor was acting and giving them advice. I want to know what the authority was. Apparently not even the minister knew that there were certain facts that were known only to Mr. Gordon. Consequently I say, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that this debate was initiated in the way in which it was because it prevents this house from taking action on the report and on the government's neglect to place this report before the people of Canada as they were by statute obligated to do. Through the method that has been adopted today in bringing discussion of this report to the floor of the house, I will not say whether designedly or not, it in effect stifles this parliament and prevents any disciplinary action on its part.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house too long on this subject, although I might say that, if my own desires were to be realized, this report of the commissioner of combines on the flour milling industry would occupy the house for several hours in detailed discussion. On behalf of the group that I represent in this house I want to add my voice to the protests that have been made against the action of the government in what I consider to be the most reprehensible withholding of a report of a responsible officer so that people would not know what it contained.

We join in protesting against the clever way in which this debate was started today. If it was not designed it was certainly a very happy accident for the government.

An hon. Member: Providential.

Mr. Low: Providential is right. Certainly a matter of the first-rate importance of this report should have received the attention of this house in the fullest possible measure. On the basis of the facts that are known thus far, the only conclusion that hon. members can reach is that the government had something to hide. Either that, or the government had something to lose in the election that was imminent.

I was not able to be here this afternoon, but from what I could judge as a result of reading the correspondence, and my own experience covering a number of years back in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, I can reach only one conclusion, namely, that either the government had something to hide and cover up or they deliberately withheld this report because they were afraid to take action under it, or to make it public because they had something to lose in the ballot or in the support of the companies which are named in the report. If these things are not true, then I want some member of the government to rise in his place and say that they are not.

I have not had time to read the report. I just got it in my hands after eight o'clock tonight; but you can turn anywhere in it and find illustration after illustration of much the same kind of thing as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has drawn to the attention of the house. Let me refer briefly to pages 91 and 92 of the report to show how the C.N.M.A. dealt with competitors who did belong to their organization and had dropped out, and the way in which they dealt with bakers who were purchasing their supplies of baking flour from small mills. Mr. McGregor said:

> The correspondence makes it clear that the competition from the Copeland Milling Company, whose plant is located at Midland, Ontario, was regarded as of particular importance. The Copeland Company had severed its connection with the C.N.M.A. in 1934. Reference is made to Midland in the next quotation, which illustrates another method of dealing with such competition. It is an extract from a memorandum of decisions reached at an executive meeting on April 5, 1939.
> "It was unanimously agreed to institute special price reductions at irregular intervals on the following basis:
> As a trial, the reduction should be applicable to bakers in all towns located on or south of the branch line of the C.N.R. running from Belleville west to Midland, Ontario; and the price to be applicable to jobbers in this territory on their purchases of baker-flour requirements in jute.
> It is understood that the reduction will be agreed upon at irregular intervals, at the discretion of the mills."

That gave them the right to depart from their agreement reached as a result of their meetings.

> "The frequency and amount of the reduction in price shall be mutually agreed upon—"

PROVINCIAL LIBRARY
VICTORIA, B. C.

If that is not a combine in restraint of trade, then heaven knows what would be. I repeat:

"The frequency and amount of the reduction in price shall be mutually agreed upon between the mills on a majority vote of four (4) members. The reduction to be effected, and the time of its coming into effect, shall be made known to all members as soon after the market close on a Friday as is possible."

That memorandum was dated April 5, 1939. Then the report continues:

A few months later agreement was reached among members of C.N.M.A. that reduced or "open" prices could be quoted to particular accounts known to be customers of small mills. For instance, in memorandum No. 38 of executive meeting of July 21, 1939, the following is reported:

"To the following bakers in the province of Ontario, all mills shall quote 40 cents per barrel under the lowest Ontario bakers' basis:

Dempster
Weston
Henderson

To the following bakers in the province of Ontario, Robin Hood and Quaker shall quote 40 cents per barrel under the lowest Ontario bakers' basis, and all other mills shall quote 30 cents per barrel under the lowest Ontario bakers' basis:

Barker-Bredin
Wright
Dietrich
Hill
Atlantic and Pacific
McCutcheon
Parnell (London)
Mara
Christie-Brown
Phillpott
Frances"

When one reads things like that he is reminded of the committee on prices of this house. I distinctly recall certain investigations that were made of bakers' prices, but I do not recall any of this ever having been brought out in that investigation so that the public could see and understand and use their moral influence so that no combine for the restraint of trade might exist in this country. What good was that prices committee anyway? I think it was a washout and there is no one more responsible for it—

An hon. Member: Than the government.

Mr. Low: Certainly, the government, and some of the employees of the government. One could go on for some time to give different illustrations. I only wish we had time to digest this report more thoroughly so that it could be discussed fully.

This whole business revives in my mind the memory of the relationship which we in Alberta had with Mr. McGregor some years ago in connection with an alleged combine in restraint of the tobacco trade. I was a member of the Alberta government at the time and I recall a visit I made to Ottawa early in 1938 when I had a discussion with Mr. McGregor. He urged us in the strongest possible way to take action in the province of Alberta, we being one of the provinces where it was patently clear that a combine did exist, in order to bring the whole matter to the attention of the Canadian people.

I do not think I am breaking any confidence when I say that at that time Mr. McGregor told me how difficult it was to get any encouragement from high places to institute these prosecutions, even where inquiry showed that there was a combine. As a result of Mr. McGregor's report on the alleged combine in the distribution of tobacco products which was issued on August 31, 1938, the province of Alberta took action. They prepared well and long and spent over $50,000 in an effort to obtain convictions under the Combines Investigation Act. However, that act made it absolutely impossible to get convictions even though there was every evidence in the opinion of many legal persons in the province that it was an open and shut case.

We found Mr. McGregor to be, not only a faithful but a courageous public servant, a man who took his duties seriously. We respected him and his judgment and his advice. It seems too bad that his career should end in the way it has. Ever since the resignation of Mr. McGregor last week I have been wondering whether he has not been retained by this government since 1939 more as a gesture toward public opinion than for any other reason.

I think that this whole business raises the question whether or not the wartime prices and trade board practices during the war did lead to price-fixing arrangements between large companies that should have been competitors. I feel practically certain that if we were to have a full-dress debate on this report such a thing would be brought to light. I fully believe that that is the case.

I just want to join with what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said since I came into the house at eight o'clock, and also with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, and to protest in the strongest possible way against the manner in which the government has handled this whole business. I feel satisfied that the government stands to be condemned at the bar of public judgment.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is much that needs to be said in addition to what has been already said so well by the three hon. members on this side of the house who have taken part in this debate. I would not rise at this moment to speak, an action that might be considered an anticlimax following the magnificent speeches that have been made, if it were not for the fact that I feel that I have had one put over on me in connection with this matter. I do not like having something put over on me because I never try to put something over on someone else.

On September 21 I sent a note to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) stating that on the orders of the day that afternoon I intended to ask whether a report on the milling industry in Canada had been made and, if such a report had been made, would it be tabled? The Minister of Justice called me on the telephone just before three o'clock and said he would like to see me. I told him I would be in my room and he came up to my room. He said that he did not want to suggest that I should not ask the question, but that he wanted to give me some facts before I would ask it. The facts that he gave me were that the government had a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act ready and did not want to make any report public before that bill was passed.

I am not a member of the official opposition, but I am on the opposition side of the house. I never considered that it was my duty to use every opportunity I could get to embarrass the government. I considered that it was my duty, so far as possible, to help the government give good government to Canada. I did not want to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) anything in my office that I would not ask him on the floor of the house. Therefore I did not even ask him if there was a report. I asked him—and remember this was on the 21st of September—when the bill would be introduced. He said, in ten days or two weeks. I said, "All right; I will not ask my question today, nor will I ask it at any time without giving you notice."

The next time I brought up the matter was when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question about the flour milling report. I asked then when the bill would be introduced. I do not know what date that was, but it is about three weeks ago. The Minister of Justice said at that time that it would be introduced in a very few days. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the way the government has acted in this matter since the 29th of December last is positive proof to me that they arranged it in order to get Mr. McGregor's resignation. If that is the way the government regards faithful service, such as Mr. McGregor has given to the government and to the country, then it is not worth while for an honest man to enter into the service of the government. I just think it is something really funny to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) lecturing Mr. McGregor on moral values. After the way this faithful servant has been treated, I am amazed that any minister should come into the house and talk about moral values.

Mr. Knowles: After he has helped to break the law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Being dogmatic.

Mr. MacInnis: After he has helped to break the law, and perhaps, so far as I know, insisted that the law be broken. Remember that King Charles lost his head because he thought he was not bound by the laws of the country. The government took good care that they had a large majority in the house before they let the people of Canada know that there was a report of this kind. They have not only put something over on this house; they have also put something over on all the people of Canada.

For the last four years a great majority of the people of Canada have been striving to keep their heads above water, striving to get along in the face of the ever-increasing cost of living, and when a report is made by a man who is experienced in making such reports, who is experienced in taking evidence, it is kept under cover. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice this question. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce this question, since he appears to be running the Department of Justice as well as the Department of Trade and Commerce. If it was necessary to get Donald Gordon's advice before the report could be made public, why did you have to wait until October 22, 1949, to get his advice or permission to publish the report that was in your possession since December 29, 1948?

From what has been said in this connection, and from what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has already put on the record from the report, as to how these large companies not only controlled but manipulated prices, and shuffled them like cards in a poker game, I should like to know who was in charge of controls in this country, and who is in charge now. As it was refused last Friday, I am now going to put Mr. McGregor's letter of resignation on the record. May I say here that I never saw anything more shabby than the refusal of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to allow Mr. McGregor's letter of resignation and the statement accompanying it to go into Hansard last Friday, and then to read into the record—

Mr. Knowles: That is morality.

Mr. MacInnis: —Donald Gordon's statement, a statement that did not even carry a date. No one knows when it was made. My friend from Winnipeg North Centre says it is a brand of morality. It is a brand of morality to which we are unfortunately becoming too much accustomed in this house. Mr. McGregor's letter is dated October 29, 1949, and reads:

October 29, 1949

Hon. Stuart S. Garson, Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Garson:

I should appreciate it if I could be relieved of my duties as commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act at an early date. I hope my resignation can be effective not later than December 31 next, I hope that within the next few weeks I can complete the two reports which are now in draft form. But if an earlier date would be more satisfactory to you, I shall of course be prepared to retire at whatever time you say.

It is a keen disappointment to me to feel obliged to withdraw, before my time, from work which I am convinced can be made of great service to the public of Canada, work which has been my chief interest during the past twenty-four years and in which I have had the whole-hearted co-operation of a group of very competent and public-spirited associates.

The occasion for my taking this step is briefly indicated in the attached memorandum.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me the privilege of reading the memorandum, since it is a part of the case in the same way as the memorandum prepared by Mr. Donald Gordon which was read in the house this afternoon. The memorandum is dated October 29, 1949, and reads:

The Minister of Justice:

The principal circumstances which have led me to submit my resignation as commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act can be stated briefly.

First and foremost is my deep concern about certain tendencies that have been apparent in recent months which in my opinion seriously threaten the usefulness of this legislation.

One of the principal remedial measures provided by the Combines Investigation Act is the publication of reports of investigations. The withholding for so many months of publication of a report which the act requires shall be made public as soon as possible after its receipt (this is the only instance of the kind in my experience) is one illustration of the tendencies I have in mind.

Closely related to this are the differences of opinion on basic policy that have been revealed in our recent discussions relating to the flour investigation and report. I am not raising any question of your obvious right and the right of anyone to point out errors in any work I have done. The criticisms made, however, have not been directed particularly to any error of fact in my report but primarily to the policy that was followed. You have expressed the opinion that the inquiry should never have been started. I am satisfied in my own mind that the facts disclosed in the report more than justify the investigation.

May I just stop there to ask who, having listened even to the few facts placed on record this evening by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), will dare rise in his place in this house and say that the facts already disclosed do not justify the investigation and report.

It was instituted and conducted, as our other inquiries have been, in keeping with the letter and spirit of the act. The conclusions reached, I am convinced, are completely justified and are in keeping with the many judicial interpretations of the statute in other cases. The investigation was started with the knowledge and approval of the then Minister of Justice, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley. The action we took was in accord with the basic purposes of the act and with my understanding of the government's expressly stated policy of preventing restrictive practices which deprive the public of the benefit of reasonably free competitive conditions.

Just at this point may I refer to the letter of December 29, 1948, which accompanied the report, in which Mr. McGregor said:

Mr. John G. Ahern, K.C., of Montreal, who was appointed by the Minister of Justice to act as counsel in the investigation, conducted the examination of witnesses throughout the hearings, and I wish to acknowledge the able services which he has rendered.

Here is a government that helped the combines investigator make an investigation; then, after he presents his report, they bury it. Now I continue with the memorandum:

I recognize fully that the making of policy is not the responsibility of a civil servant, but as a civil servant I would prefer not to carry on under conditions of uncertainty and conflicting tendencies such as I have experienced recently.

Evidently he did not know under which minister he was supposed to be working.

There is greater need now for strong action under the combines act than there has been at any time in the past twenty-five years. To an alarming degree price fixing activities such as we reported in the flour milling industry have been developing in the post-war years; some of them originated in the war period; and some were started, as in the flour milling industry, even in the pre-war years. To meet the situation, to prevent these practices which are designed to limit or eliminate the public safeguard of price competition, there is every reason why the powers of the combines act should be strengthened. Council accepted in the present bill our proposals of three amendments, including a very important amendment designed to meet the difficulties of the dental judgment, but the only suggestions from council which you called on me to consider seriously were provisions which would have had the result of limiting the effectiveness of the legislation.

I wonder if there is any relation between that phrase and Mr. McGregor's resignation.

I have in mind such proposals as those to eliminate the commissioner's initiative in launching inquiries, to place serious limitations on the requirement that reports be made public, and to provide for exemption, after prior approval, of certain types of agreements to restrict production or eliminate price competition. These suggestions have not been included in the present bill, but my understanding from you is that consideration of them has been merely postponed pending a proposed "overhauling" of the act. Overhauling of the act could serve many useful purposes. I am apprehensive, however, particularly in view of the nature of the changes which have been suggested for consideration, of the ultimate result of any revision of the statute which would include changes along these or similar lines.

My hope is that my successor, in carrying out responsibilities which have many quasi-judicial aspects and call for a substantial measure of independent action and judgment, will have the support of an even stronger statute than the act in its present form, and a clear statement of government policy with respect to its enforcement.

I do not believe there is much more I can usefully add; but I want to tell members of this house, wherever they sit, that this is a matter which comes before loyalty to the government. It concerns loyalty to the people of Canada. If by your silence or otherwise you approve the policy the government followed in this instance, then I can tell the people of this country that their interests have very little safeguard if that safeguard lies with the present government.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, after the excellent and eloquent speeches to which we have listened by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) I feel that I have a very difficult task cut out for me in replying to all the arguments which have been advanced, within the period of forty minutes which is allowed to me by the rules. However, I shall take up the various points as rapidly as possible.

First I should like to deal with what I must regard as the rather extraordinary and unworthy argument put forth by the hon. member for Lake Centre in which he either stated or clearly implied that the government—and this would include the combines act administration itself—over the years had been guilty of not effectively using the teeth that were in the law; that if they had done so they would not be under the necessity of coming to the house at the present time to secure amendments to the act. In other words he suggested that in certain cases which he instanced, the dental supplies case and the tobacco case, to which I shall make further reference in a moment, the crown's case was presented in a rather bungling fashion with the idea, as I inferred, that under the show of a great amount of prosecuting zeal the case was handled in such a way that no conviction was obtained. I think I should reply to that, in fairness to Mr. McGregor and his associates, who in spite of differences of opinion which have arisen are clearly entitled, in many ways, to the admiration and respect of the government, which in fact they have. Mr. McGregor and we have differed on a matter of principle. I believe it is only fair that, during the course of this debate, there should be put upon the record a list of the successful prosecutions which have been launched by him and his associates, acting under the authority of the government which he has served—for the most part governments of the Liberal party.

I should like to list the cases that have been undertaken. First of all, there are the prosecutions by the provincial attorneys general under this act, based upon material supplied by the combines investigation branch. There is Rex v. A. B. C. Plumbers, conviction and fine; Rex v. Famous Players, an acquittal; Rex v. Alexander, the electrical contractors' case, a conviction and fine and the appeal dismissed; Rex v. Chapman, fruit basket case, a fine and no appeal; Rex v. Canadian Import, the Quebec anthracite coal case, a fine and the appeal dismissed; Rex v. Hartt and Adair, a fine and the appeal dismissed; Rex v. Staples, Western Fruit case, acquittal and no appeal taken. Then, there is Rex v. Imperial Tobacco Company, which my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre singled out for criticism as being one of the examples of this practice to which he was referring.

Now, sir, in that case prosecution was commenced by the provincial attorney general. It was a case taken under provincial auspices in which the crown case was handled by a prominent Calgary lawyer and his assistants, and in this case efforts were made to introduce documentary evidence. The trial judge refused to admit it, with the result that the prosecutor had no alternative, so I am advised by Mr. McGregor, but to ask for a stay of prosecution. There was, therefore, no conviction in those proceedings.

The provincial attorney general was not disposed to proceed further with the case. After a year, he was finally induced by the dominion government to institute new proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act. The first proceedings had been taken under the criminal code. We provided the services of eminent counsel, Mr. J. C. McRuer, K.C., now the chief justice of Ontario and H. M. Brown and I. M. MacKiegan of the combines investigation commission staff. Surely all of these gentlemen, including the Calgary counsel in the first case, should not be subjected to the criticism that in acting under their retainer they were going to go through the forms of prosecution but not with sufficient skill or zeal to produce any results.

At any rate, in the second proceedings, under counsel instructed by this government in 1941, the defendants were convicted. Fines were levied amounting to $221,500. An appeal was taken and the conviction was quashed upon the grounds that, since the accused had been placed in jeopardy in the first proceedings in which the stay was entered, they could not be placed in jeopardy a second time. I believe my hon. friend will search in vain in the record of those proceedings for any support for the argument he advanced. In that case, it was through the efforts of counsel appointed by this government that the accused were brought to justice. It was only because of the stay of proceedings having been entered in the previous case that they were able to successfully plead autrefois acquit.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did they plead autrefois acquit in that case?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, they did not. You have not read it.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend will not deny that there was a stay of proceedings entered in the first place?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member will not deny that there was a conviction in the second case and that there was a fine of $221,500? Then, after that, there was an appeal and the conviction was quashed.

There was Rex v. Simington, the Western Fruit case, a conviction and fine of $200,000. No appeal was taken. There was Rex v. Bennett-Wright, A.B.C. Plumbers, conviction and fine of $26,500; Rex v. Singer, A.B.C. Plumbers case, conviction and fine, appeal dismissed; Rex v. Belyea and Weinraub, A.B.C. Plumbers case, conviction and fine, conviction confirmed by Supreme Court of Canada; Rex v. Container Materials, the shipping container case, $156,500 in fines, appeal dismissed by court of appeal, and by Supreme Court of Canada; Rex v. Wilson Boxes Limited, the new trial of one accused in Rex v. Container Materials, conviction and no appeal taken; Rex v. Badden et al., shipping containers, fines and no appeal taken; finally Rex v. Ash-Temple, the dental supplies case, in which there was an acquittal, which has come under the criticism of my hon. friend from Lake Centre.

I believe that those cases I have recited indicate that, in matters of very great complexity and difficulty, the batting average of this department and of this government in connection with these prosecutions has been unusually high.

Mr. Coldwell: And of Mr. McGregor.

Mr. Garson: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Brooks: Why did you not go ahead with this case, then?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's interjection is fortunate in that it leads up to a point I wanted to make. My hon. friend, the member for Lake Centre, suggests that this government conspired to instruct counsel in such a way that the case would be bungled and the accused freed. I should like to place on record the fact that, in connection with the instructions to counsel in the Ash-Temple case, the dental supplies case, ever since I came into the department I have been under the impression—I confirmed it an hour ago with Mr. McGregor—that Mr. McGregor had a free hand in recommending the selection of counsel. This was true in most of these cases. As a matter of fact, the man who was selected was recommended to him, and through him to the government, by Mr. Peter White of Toronto, an eminent and able man himself. He suggested we should have as counsel Mr. D. L. McCarthy, K.C., one of the outstanding counsel in Canada.

I notice my hon. friend nods his head in agreement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit one question? In the other cases in which prosecution was successful, were the documents put in without proof of names and without proof of authority?

Mr. Garson: That is an extremely ingenious question. My hon. friend says, in relation to over fifteen cases I have listed, and the details of which neither he nor I have ever seen, could I tell him whether, in my opinion, this or that or the other was proven? I can tell him I have not the faintest idea.

That brings me to this dental supplies case which has an important bearing upon the matter which is now before this house. After having been sworn in on November 15, I was faced with the necessity of securing a seat in a by-election, so I did not come to Ottawa to carry on the duties of minister until the early part of January, this year. One of a number of matters which I found upon my desk at that time was the report of the combines investigation commissioner in connection with the flour milling industry. I should like to lay before you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, before the members of the house, the situation as I then found it. I took this report which was upon my desk—a report which had not been delivered to me in person because I was not here to receive it, upon a matter about which I had no more personal information than I have about the present state of affairs in Siam—I took this report to cabinet for discussion with my colleagues and I hope I can discuss this matter without breaking any cabinet secrets. When I took it in for discussion with my colleagues, I was at once confronted with the viewpoint that, with regard to the war years, the tenor of this report was quite contrary to the understanding upon which the wartime prices and trade board had operated. Not having been in the government during the period of price control, who was I to question that viewpoint of my colleagues? And I would never have questioned it in any event.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whom were you confronted by?

Mr. Knowles: You could have read the act.

Mr. Garson: But that was not all. We had this sincere difference of opinion, which has been so sincere upon the part of one of the parties that he has resigned his position as a result of it and which is just as sincere, may I say, on the part of those who hold the opposite view. But in the carrying out of my duties as Minister of Justice I was not only confronted with this basic difference of opinion on some of the most important facts with which the report dealt, but I was also confronted at the same time with a great state of uncertainty with regard to the law that was to be applicable to those facts.

The dental supplies case had been heard by Mr. Justice Barlow with a jury on March 18, 1948. In that case, upon the ground that the documents were alleged to have been found in the possession of the employees and agencies of the corporate accused and were tendered in evidence upon that basis, and upon the basis that incriminating documents found in the possession of the accused are binding on the accused, the trial judge in the early stages of the trial permitted these documents to be entered as evidence. Later he withdrew the case from the jury upon the ground that there was not sufficient evidence upon which a jury could render a verdict. That was in March, 1948.

This group of counsel whom my friend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) accuses of being derelict, fumbling and neglectful—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I never said that the counsel were derelict. I said that the government departed from the regular principles of proving ordinary documents in the ordinary way, and directed these counsel to act as they did.

Mr. Garson: Having a little while ago given me credit for being a mind-reader, the hon. member now shows great propensities in that direction himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never gave the minister credit for being a mind-reader or anything else.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend knows perfectly well, as a leading counsel himself, that counsel who is in charge of a case of this kind is the man who determines what evidence he is going to put in; and no clients, least of all experienced clients like Mr. McGregor and his associates in the combines investigation department, would ever think of instructing their lawyer as to the legal methods of proof. They take advice from him as to what evidence the lawyers wish them to adduce. What my hon. friend is doing, although he may want to take away from it now, is this—

Mr. Diefenbaker: He does not want to take away anything.

Mr. Garson: What it amounts to is this. He is accusing counsel in that case of gross neglect of duty and gross carelessness in the presentation of their case. I say on behalf of the government that we accepted, as we had in previous instances, the recommendation of the combines investigation department as to the identity of counsel. Unlike my hon. friend, we have no great complaint as regards counsel. Our complaint is with regard to the judgment which was given, and which we are now attempting to correct in the bill which is on the order paper.

At any rate, in March, 1948, the trial judge withdrew the case from the jury and said that there was no evidence to go before the jury. From that judgment our counsel appealed. The appeal came on and was discussed before the court of appeal from September 27 to October 13, 1948. The argument on the appeal took that length of time because of the fact that hundreds of exhibits were presented and complex legal issues were brought before the court by both sides of the argument on appeal. Following the hearing or argument, the court of appeal reserved judgment.

Thus in the early part of January, when I came here as Minister of Justice, I had on my desk a report in respect of which on some of the most basic facts there was a strong difference of opinion amongst highly intelligent and sincere people. I was also confronted with a state of the law which, if it was to be considered to be as it was held to be in the trial court judgment delivered in March, 1948, or as set out in the argument on behalf of the accused in the appeal court hearing in September and October, 1948, would leave us in an extremely difficult position in proving our case, quite regardless of this difference of opinion as to the facts.

It was not until February 28, the last day of February, 1949, that the appeal court of Ontario which had heard this case in September and October of 1948, delivered their judgment. We have never disguised—and certainly I have never disguised—or made any attempt to disguise the fact that that judgment is a body blow against the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. When the hon. member for Lake Centre says that the bill we are bringing forward now to undo the effects of that judgment just deals with a trifling little matter, he is showing a much smaller knowledge of the law than I should have thought he possessed.

While I do not want to anticipate my own legislation in any way, I think it is essential that I should say a few words about the issue which was raised in this case, because it is impossible to understand the position in which the government has been placed unless one understands the effect of the dental supplies judgment upon the very issue of the flour-milling report that we are discussing this evening.

We have two other sections in this bill, but the real necessity for introducing this amending legislation at the present time is because of the uncertainty of the law, a situation which has been created by this decision of the Ontario court of appeal of February, 1949. Following that decision the first thing we did —and this took considerable time—was to obtain the legal opinion from Mr. D. L. McCarthy, K.C., our leading counsel, concerning the judgment in question, so that we might on the basis of such opinion, and in further consultation with him, draft an amendment which would offset the effect of this judgment. I think the first draft of the amendment was made on April 7, 1949. As hon. members who were in the former parliament know that was at a time when there certainly was no prospect of securing any amendment to the Combines Investigation Act in that session of parliament. The amendment we are now submitting has been reached only after several drafts have been made since this first one. In the course of making those drafts we have dealt with a number of suggestions coming from Mr. McGregor and his associates. As he correctly enough says in his letter that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) read into the record tonight, we also dealt with certain suggestions which came from the cabinet. Under the act Mr. McGregor has extremely wide powers. I do not think there is any other civil servant in Canada who has much wider powers than Mr. McGregor has under the act. He has the power to initiate all inquiries without any reference to any minister at all. In most cases he carried on a preliminary investigation. I believe that the ratio of cases in which final report is made to the total of the preliminary investigations is about 10 per cent. In other words it is only in the more serious cases that he conducts a complete inquiry and files a report.

Mr. McGregor refers to my predecessor, the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, as having authorized these proceedings to go forward, but Mr. Ilsley's giving authority had nothing but academic significance, because his authority was not required. The commissioner himself has complete authority to go forward without authority from the minister. To charge the government that places in the hands of one of its civil servants that measure of authority with neglect in this matter seems to me to be somewhat unreasonable.

But, sir, notwithstanding this very great authority which the commissioner has, we in the cabinet like to feel that we have a small residue of responsibility, if I may speak jocularly, for matters of policy.

Mr. Coldwell: Get the authority from parliament then to have that responsibility.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Coldwell: You should do that.

Mr. Garson: What I meant was we have some responsibility to initiate ideas, to have ideas.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member may not like that.

Mr. Coldwell: I was talking about withholding the report.

Mr. Garson: No; I meant to have ideas.

Mr. Coldwell: We are glad to know you have them.

Mr. Garson: We had a number of ideas from Mr. McGregor and his associates, in respect to the formation of which he was under no restrictions whatever. Any good ideas that occurred to them they put down and sent to me and I took them into cabinet. There were no restrictions whatever. Well, we had a few ideas ourselves, and we, with some timidity in view of the great powers that the commissioner had, ventured to put these forward, and he turned every one of them down. These are the ones he refers to in his letter.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the legislation which is now before the house there is not one syllable but what came from Mr. McGregor and his associates.

Mr. Coldwell: He says so.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. But more than that, to every single one of those ideas that we had he said, "I object to them". We said, "All right, Mr. McGregor, we won't press them". And that is the way the matter stood.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Surely not.

Mr. Garson: The main section of the bill deals with this difficulty that had arisen in the dental supplies case. In that case, as in all of these cases, I think it requires no great amount of imagination on the part of hon. members to realize, if they stop to think about the matter at all, that when you send the mounted police into a man's business and pick up the documents that he might regard as having some potential embarrassment to him, and take them away and make them the basis of a prosecution, the prospect of getting him or his associates or employees to testify on behalf of the crown or to co-operate with any great amount of enthusiasm or zeal is not very great. Therefore when you get down to the practical job of proving your case you have to rely pretty heavily upon the principle of law which is known as the possessory principle which is that if a man is charged with conspiracy, any documents of an incriminating nature which may be found in his possession are evidence against him. We have applied that principle, which applies to individuals also, to accused corporations. I want to enter a reservation here, Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer. I am giving a very oversimplified application of the law in order to make myself more thoroughly understood. In all of these cases we have attempted, and in several of them successfully, to apply to corporations the possessory principle which certainly is not disputed at all as regards individuals. We did that in cases which I have here. Rex v. Simington, 1926, 43 C.C.C. 249 was one of them. Rex v. Container Materials Limited et al., 1940, 4 D.L.R. 293, was another. We were successful in these cases in producing the documents and filing them as exhibits and contending that because they were found in the corporate possession of the accused corporation therefore they were evidence against that corporation. It was in very large measure upon the basis of that evidence that we were able to secure a conviction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that case reported?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend. When we did the same thing in the dental supplies case the court, both the trial court and the court of appeal, rejected that evidence. They rejected it upon the basis of a principle which we contend is newly enunciated, and which we think should be cured by the amendments which we are now proposing if we are ever to have an enforceable act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did the minister not go to the Supreme Court of Canada with that case?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will just permit me to finish a rather complicated subject without interrupting me with questions I should appreciate it.

What Chief Justice Robertson of Ontario said in that case was this:

> The proof required, however, in the case of a company differs somewhat from that required in the case of an individual. If the act relied on is that of an officer, servant or agent of the company, there must be evidence that he had authority from the company to perform the act. Mere possession of a document by the company, in the sense that the document was on its premises, or even in the company's files, may not, without more, afford ground for an inference that its contents had come to the knowledge of its board of directors, or of someone having authority from the company to deal with the matters to which the document relates.

At a later point in the same judgment His Lordship said:

> There is, however, one objection common to all the letters. There is no evidence that the writing of any of them was authorized by any of the accused companies, nor is there evidence that anyone having authority to bind the company had any knowledge of the sending of any of the letters or of their receipt or of their contents.

These combines investigation cases usually are based largely upon documents picked up by the mounted police or by other agents of the combines investigation commission from the possession of the various alleged accused. One, two, three or a dozen of the documents in themselves may not spell out the nature of the offence; but all of a large number when put together like a complicated jigsaw puzzle so that they all fit in can build up a case. But if in relation to each one of the documents we had to prove that the board of directors had a meeting and authorized the document to be written, or that some person in the company having authority had authorized that to be done which was set out in the document, we would have an extremely difficult time to ever prove a case at all where offences of this nature had been committed.

Hon. members can understand that where you are dealing with a trade association made up of all the firms in one industry, you are dealing with an entity that is not incorporated and which cannot be joined as a party defendant. You may not want to prosecute the underlings who have the actual handling of association matters. Unless you can rely upon the possessory principle as regards the corporate accused it would be extremely difficult in some cases to secure a conviction.

That is why we are bringing forward this amendment. That is one reason why we wished not to act upon the flour report or to publish it until we had our legislation in shape.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) says that that is inconsistent with the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I suppose it is, but he is not the Minister of Justice; he has not my responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Garson: If mere consistency was our aim, it would be a simple matter, as the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree, he being a lawyer of some note, to have had all the evidence and all the witnesses agree exactly with mathematical certainty. But the fact is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had an opinion in relation to this matter based upon his viewpoint as Minister of Trade and Commerce and his experience during the war which I could not possibly share because I was in another activity altogether at that time. I have my own viewpoint in relation to this matter which largely centred around this question.

How were we going to deal with this report that was on my desk in a way that would bring a reasonable amount of credit to or how were we going to avoid bringing discredit to the combines investigation administration and the government? If with these differences of opinion as to the basic facts, with this uncertainty as to the condition of the law, we had published the report and if the counsel of the flour milling companies had shown one-quarter the capacity or had adopted one-quarter of the shrewd tactics of the defence lawyers in the dental supplies case, they would have said, "All right, go ahead and prosecute; we challenge you to prosecute." Then on the condition of the facts and on the condition of the law we would have had what the hon. member for Lake Centre referred to as another debacle on our hands. Then he would have got up and waggled his finger at us and denounced us for having—he did it today without any cause whatever—in effect conspired with counsel whom we had instructed to so conduct the prosecutions that we would never get convictions. We do not do business in that way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You just hide the report.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend asks whether this report would have ever seen the light of day if Mr. McGregor had not resigned. What kind of morons does he take us for in this house? Does he think that any government would have a report of this sort and attempt to stifle it permanently?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Surely not. Our position is a simple one. We had this report. I do not mind saying that a responsible journalist of this city came to me in a friendly way and told me that he did not know whether we had the report or not, but that if we had it and published it, from what he had heard the minute that was done we would be challenged to prosecute. I did not need to be told that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that that the minister was so informed?

Mr. Garson: That would be some time in the spring of 1949.

Mr. Knowles: Just before the election.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it was before; that is right. But not just before, and I do not know the political persuasion of that journalist.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We can suspect.

Mr. Fleming: Give us his name and we will tell you.

Mr. Garson: Looking at the matter in retrospect I do not think that the action taken has been contrary to the public interest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just the statute.

Mr. Garson: If we get our amendment we will certainly be in a far better position as regards this or any other report than we are in now. I am going to base my request for support of the amendment on the position that I would not take the responsibility of prosecuting on any report unless we have this amendment. It would be a matter of grave difficulty. When I say that, I hope the hon. member for Lake Centre will get up and give us some support and not describe this amendment as he did today as being a matter of no consequence, just a trifling matter we are dealing with.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the minister that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Garson: I have a number of arguments to meet, but I shall try to bring my remarks to a quick conclusion.

Mr. Knowles: Do not forget to answer the three speeches from down here.

Mr. Garson: I shall try to do that without offending too greatly against the rules of the house. I do not intend to deal with the report because I assume that all hon. members are literate and can read it themselves. The report speaks for itself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister goes on to deal with the other speeches may I ask him just one question?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will ask his question after I have dealt with the other matters, it would be better. If I am not careful I shall not have any time left.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is going on to other matters. My simple question is this: What justification in law or otherwise does the minister have for departing from the mandatory responsibility placed upon him by the statute?

Mr. Garson: I thought I had attempted during the course of the past few minutes to answer the very question my hon. friend has asked, but if I have not answered it to his satisfaction I shall not make any further effort to do so. As I say, I do not want to deal with the report because I think it speaks for itself, but there are one or two points that have not been brought out which I think deserve to be mentioned.

First of all, there is no allegation in the report of any breach of the act at all after decontrol came into effect. The evidence indicates that the occasion for the investigation being started in the first place was that upon decontrol Mr. McGregor, who is a very diligent and conscientious man in the discharging of his duty, saw that—it was in September, 1947, if I remember correctly—there was a uniform price rise in flour and mill feed put into effect at the same time by all the main milling companies. As I think is quite proper, he formed the hypothesis that this might be some indication of a breach of the act. He went to Mr. Taylor, who was then chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, to find out why these prices had gone up uniformly in this way. This is a rather condensed version, but what he was told was this. Mr. Taylor said that the government, greatly concerned with the large increase in the price of flour, and particularly in the price of mill feed, in the United States, was as anxious as they could be to avoid a similar increase in Canada. Although their legal powers under the wartime prices and trade board had expired with decontrol, Mr. Taylor was instructed to go to Mr. Short, the flour controller, and tell him that the government would look with extreme disfavour on any undue increase in the price of flour and mill feed upon decontrol, and that it was desired that the inevitable increase which would take place at that time should be kept to a minimum.

With that in view Mr. Taylor went to Mr. Short, and Mr. Short was prevailed upon to get his own company, the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, to increase the price of flour and of mill feed by a considerably smaller figure than he was disposed to, very much smaller than some of the other companies were disposed to, and to a very, very much smaller price than then prevailed in the United States. The suggestion was that, although the legal powers to enforce these arrangements had expired, if there were not reasonable co-operation in the matter the government would have to consider taking powers again to achieve that result.

This request was accepted under protest. Mr. Taylor told me that he even had a man call him up from Montreal and say, "What is the matter with you men? You are not satisfied with pushing us around all through the war; when the war is over and all your legal powers have expired you still have that zeal to push us around and threaten us with the renewal of controls you have just taken off." After considerable remonstrance and discussion the millers accepted $4.05 for flour and a price of $10 for mill feed, the desire being that the price of flour should not be held down at the cost of having mill feed rise too high. The reference in Mr. McGregor's letter to my having said that the inquiry should never have been started was based on that episode, and upon the information given to me by Mr. Taylor in the presence of Mr. McGregor and Mr. Gordon in my office. I said that what Mr. Taylor had told me, as he had told Mr. McGregor in September, 1947, seemed to me, in the absence of some other evidence of an improper agreement, a pretty reasonable explanation which would account for the uniform increase in the price of flour and mill feed. If it be taken, as I think it is reasonable that it should be, that this increase in price of September, 1947, was a price increase initiated and directed by the government through Mr. Taylor with a view to holding down the inevitable increase upon decontrol to a reasonable figure, then that was not an agreement at all let alone an improper one. Since that time, according to the report there has not been any evidence whatever of any breach of the act.

So far as the wartime period is concerned, I wonder whether there is a general understanding as to the nature of the arrangements that were made with the milling industry in connection with the operations of the wartime prices and trade board. At the risk of belabouring a point that has already been touched upon, perhaps I might be permitted to attempt to oversimplify it in these terms. When a price ceiling was put on all products there was one notable exception, and that was the price of wheat. The price of wheat was permitted to rise at the same time that the price of flour was under a price ceiling. Of course if you increase the cost of your raw material and do not increase the price of your finished product, the people engaged in turning out the finished product are bound to be squeezed against the ceiling. The millers' suggestion was a fine one. They said: We have no objection to the price of wheat rising, but let the price of flour go up along with it and we will be perfectly satisfied. Of course, apart from all other considerations, that could not be entertained for the reason that a break in the price of flour would have broken the whole price ceiling.

In order to deal with the situation created by a rising cost for wheat and a fixed ceiling for flour, the government stepped in and said: We will pay a subsidy in respect of the cost of wheat to the milling companies upon the condition, however, that the milling industry must accept a limitation of profit clause in this arrangement under which they will be permitted only their standard profits in the pre-war period which, as it happened, were rather low. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said this afternoon, the milling companies had a full 100 per cent excess profits tax under that arrangement. They did not even get the 20 per cent rebate as other industries did. The result of all that was, as long as that arrangement was in effect, if the milling companies sold their flour for less money to the consumer, say 50 cents a bag, the 50 cents came right out of the federal treasury.

Mr. Hatfield: No, no.

Mr. Garson: Yes, yes.

Mr. Hatfield: Out of the taxpayers' pockets.

Mr. Garson: That is right. I accept the correction with excellent grace. It is not a bad idea to remember the taxpayers once in a while. It came right out of the taxpayers' pockets. The iniquities charged against the milling companies during this period of control are that they did not sell at prices below the ceiling. If they had done so, every time they had sold below the ceiling price it would have meant an increase in the subsidy they got out of the public treasury or, as my hon. friend says, from the taxpayers. So while there may be accusations that the milling companies charged the ceiling price during that period, and so on, I have never been able to get through my head what purpose there would be behind such alleged irregularities. They could not make a five-cent piece by charging any more for their flour or feed, since the more they charged the less they received in subsidies. If they charged less they would get more subsidies paid by the taxpayers. The milling companies were just a conduit through which benefits flowed or did not flow to the consumer from the treasury or if you like, the taxpayers. The milling companies themselves could not make or lose anything at all under this arrangement made by the wartime prices and trade board.

My hon. friend asks, what about the period before the war. In that respect the report speaks for itself, but I would point out that this is now a matter of some ten years. If you look up the Criminal Code you will see that even a charge of treason against His Majesty is subject to a three-year limitation. In other words if a man has committed treason previous to that three-year period, nothing can be done about it. So I rather think it is going pretty far back to take proceedings in respect of something done ten years ago. That is quite apart from a point which all the lawyers present will appreciate, that the further back you go in a prosecution, the greater becomes the difficulty of securing evidence and proving your case. I think any person who has had any practical experience in prosecutions knows that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I have trespassed greatly upon the time of the house, but I should like to conclude my remarks by saying this. Notwithstanding the eloquent and able arguments that have been put up by members of the opposition I do not admit that the government has been guilty of an error of judgment in this matter. In the light of the facts and the position of the law, which position will remain until we cure it by the amendments now before the house, it seems to me that the course we followed was not by any means a wholly imprudent one. But if as our opponents argue it was an error in judgment it was a judgment which was reached after the most careful and heart-searching consideration, and on a perfectly honest basis.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister tell the house on what authority the government relied when it made the decision to violate the provisions of section 27(5) of the act?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Speaker, it relied upon the fact that any democratic government is answerable to the people of the country for its acts.

Mr. Knowles: And it kept its action from the people until after the election.

Mr. Garson: I am going to answer my hon. friend's question, if he will give me a chance. It is perfectly clear that if an election were held tomorrow, as there will be an election in due course, we would have to go before the free people of this country and answer for our actions. I have no doubt my hon. friend would get up and anathematize us.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear; more than that.

Mr. Garson: And we would have to answer; then the people would decide. As long as that condition exists I do not think we need worry very much.

Mr. Knowles: The violation was made before the last election, but it was kept secret from the people of Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is only fair to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that I should go a little further than he has gone. He has valiantly undertaken to accept full responsibility for what was done in this matter. I must say that at various times since the hon. gentleman became Minister of Justice he discussed with me the matters he has placed before the house this evening, the difficulties that arose out of the pending judgment of the Ontario court of appeals in the dental supply case, and the fact that if he published this report he would be challenged to institute prosecution at once. He also discussed with me the general terms of the report, and the fact that the matters which appeared to be most serious had occurred before the war period, before the establishment of controls.

I have had some experience in the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. I was connected with one case the Minister of Justice did not cite. That was the case against the coal industry, Rex v. Canadian Import Company. I conducted that prosecution for Mr. McGregor, and from my own experience in that case I can testify that I was the one who determined the evidence to be brought before the court, and that there was no attempt by Mr. McGregor or anyone else to direct me in the kind of case I should make before the court.

I was of opinion that unless there was a continuation of the facts which were more than two years old, section 1141 of the code would apply. I think that section is worthy of being quoted:

> No action, suit or information shall be brought or laid for any penalty or forfeiture under any act, except within two years after the cause of action arises or after the offence for which such penalty or forfeiture is imposed is committed, unless the time is otherwise limited by any act or by-law.

The time for prosecution under section 498 of the Criminal Code or under the Combines Investigation Act is not limited. In the case of corporations it is a prosecution for a penalty, because both the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act provide that in the case of a corporation there is nothing but a penalty.

This matter arose and was discussed in the coal cases. There it was proved that the series of facts upon which we relied had commenced more than two years before the prosecution, but had continued right up to the time of the prosecution. The objection was urged, nevertheless, that the prosecutions were outlawed, but that objection was dismissed on the ground stated in the headnote:

> It having been established that there was continuity in the acts charged of combining together with a view to unduly restricting the coal industry by lessening competition and fixing a common price, section 1141 of the Criminal Code does not apply to bar the action in question.

That is the headnote to the judgment of the Quebec court of appeals in the case of Rex v. Canadian Import Company and others, reported at 62 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 342. That followed a decision of the Ontario court of appeals in the case of Rex v. Elliott, reported at 9 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 505. Since 1906 it has become article 1141. Lawyers know this provision. It goes back to the time when the united Canada's statute was passed by the parliament of that province. The preamble stated that it was desirable to grant immunity to His Majesty's subjects being brought before the court to face allegations of long-past offences. It was stated that there should be a general limitation, which was enacted at that time and which has been continued. As I say, in 1906 it was article 930 of the Criminal Code but is now article 1141.

> Even if code section 930, which limits certain proceedings to two years after the offence could be held to apply to a prosecution by indictment,—

That is a prosecution of an individual by indictment where the individual was susceptible to punishment by imprisonment. Even if it could be held to apply to that, > —it did not apply to bar this prosecution for the offence was a continuing one.

The reason for the dismissal of this objection, and which was urged against me in the coal prosecution, was the continuity of the acts establishing the conspiracy. It was my view that the controls during the war period had put an end to what had gone on before, and that prices from that time onwards had been under the control of the flour controller, acting for the wartime prices and trade board. I had this advantage over the Minister of Justice, that I had some knowledge of what had taken place during the period when Canadian industries were under control. It was my opinion that, if the controllers had been satisfied at the time that their directions were being carried out during that period when, for the security of this country and for the security of this parliament we had to have the co-operation of Canadian industries, it would not be proper for us to say that what they had done under the impression that they were serving this Canadian nation in a patriotic fashion should afterward be made the subject of prosecution before the courts after the war was over.

For that reason, I concurred in this view that we should not attempt to prosecute for things that were more than two years old if we were not prepared to prosecute for what had happened during the period when those industries were under the constant direction of our controllers. Unless there were facts that were subsequent to the existence of the controls, it would not be in the public interest to have the prosecutions instituted. There were a whole series of things which interfered with the ordinary administration of the Combines Investigation Act. I was not convinced that the judgment in the dental supplies case should be pressed as far as Mr. McGregor felt it could be extended. Nevertheless, it was there and it said, in effect, that when dealing with corporations you had to prove not only that the officials of the corporation had those documents in their possession, but that the documents had been authorized by the board of directors or by someone in authority.

We were not in a position to make that proof or to meet the challenge, if the report had been published, that prosecutions be instituted. I felt that the officers and directors of those companies were entitled to the opinion that, during the period of control when they were carrying out the instructions of the controllers, they were acting in a manner that would not get them into trouble. And I now feel it is only fair to the Minister of Justice that I should inform the house that he had discussed these matters with me, and I had concurred in the line of conduct he was adopting. I should bear, therefore, a portion of the responsibility, if there is responsibility, for attempting to carry out the implied or expressed undertaking given to Canadian industry that if they did their best to help us win the war, they were not going to be pilloried afterwards under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Graydon: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

51. Departmental administration, $2,170,510.

Item stands.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, last Friday I announced that we would call the one department. National health and welfare has not yet been called, and since we are having difficulty getting the minister back from New York to attend in the house, this afternoon I spoke to the acting leader of the opposition who said they would not object if we brought in national health and welfare and allowed the item to stand. I hope we can secure the concurrence of the other groups.

Mr. Knowles: Are there any departments not yet opened?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There are three departments that have not been called, finance, the Prime Minister's office and legislation.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

252. Departmental administration, $806,605.

Item stands.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister if he is in a position to indicate to the house when we may expect the national health and welfare items to be called?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not give a definite answer tonight, but I shall inquire and let my hon. friend know when the minister can be here to deal with the general items. I shall have an answer within twenty-four hours.

Mr. Graydon: Is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate when we will deal with the administration item for external affairs?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I am not in a position to make a definite statement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is trying to arrange the work of the political committee of the United Nations in such a way as to allow him to be here for two or three days to deal with the debate in this house. I believe he hoped that could be arranged for the sixteenth and seventeenth of November, but I have not had confirmation from him. As soon as I receive that I shall inform the house.

Progress reported.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 147, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): It is plain now to all of us, Mr. Speaker, after reading this bill, that the government is not going to pay an increased compensation for all reactors but is simply going to pay beef price for reactors which go to the tank. The other night I said something about statements that had been made inside and outside the house with regard to the fact that the government was intending to pay an increased compensation for reactors. I should like to quote from page 2737 of Hansard of April 29, 1949, where that question was asked by Mr. Daniel of Oxford. I quote the question in order that the answer given by the parliamentary assistant (Mr. McCubbin) will be plain. It is as follows:

I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as reported on page 2239 of Hansard, concerning increases in the compensation paid farmers who have lost cattle under the area T.B. tests, is the minister's parliamentary assistant prepared to say that these payments will be made this year?

Here is the answer of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin):

I should like to thank the member for giving me notice of his question. In reply may I say that it might not be possible to reach some of the things we should like to reach before the end of this session, but I can assure the member that it is the intention of the government to increase the compensation paid to T.B. reactors, and also to make it retroactive. If it is not done before the end of this session, it will be one of the first things done by this government after the election.

If it was not the intention of the government to pay increased compensation for all reactors, the impression was most certainly left with delegations coming to Ottawa, with people outside the house, and with members within the house that this was to be done.

For a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something about reactors. In the true sense of the word all cattle that react to the tuberculin tests for T.B. are reactors. In the quotation I just read from Hansard it was quite plain that the compensation was to be increased for T.B. reactors. That is the parliamentary assistant's statement. Now the government come along and say that, by the fact that they pay an increased compensation for reactors which go to the tank, they are doing what they said they would do and are fulfilling the promises made to delegations and to people across the country. I think that is a narrow margin on which the government are basing the facts.

As reported at page 2239 of Hansard of April 1, 1949, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made this statement:

Mr. Gardiner: A final decision has not been made and for that reason I am not able to say exactly what it will be. I am able to state that those who are concerned with the matter have been in to see us and they did not ask for any more than we were considering giving, so I think it likely there will be satisfaction when an announcement is finally made.

I would direct attention to the words "they did not ask for any more than we were considering giving." They may have considered it, but they are certainly not doing it.

As I said on Friday night, the compensation paid back in 1903 was identical with the compensation which is being paid today. Does it sound reasonable to you, Mr. Speaker, or to any other hon. member of this House of Commons, that the compensation to be paid in 1949 should be the same as that which was paid in 1903? In 1918 it was thought advisable to increase the compensation by a considerable amount; and as I stated on Friday, the compensation was increased to $80 for grade cattle and to $250 for purebred cattle. That would mean that, if paid on the two-thirds basis, the farmers at that time would receive $53.33 for grades and $166.66 for purebreds. On September 23 the Minister of Agriculture, as reported at page 223 of Hansard, made this statement:

Mr. Chairman, the answer today is the same as it was a year ago. About ten per cent of the cattle that are reactors go into the tank. The increased price of cattle does not hurt the man who is being paid compensation unless there is a large proportion of the animal infected because it is only then that it goes into the tank. If an animal is worth $200 this year and it was worth only $50 ten years ago, the compensation is on the same basis, but the remainder of the animal is sold and the individual gets the return. If his return is based on the $200 price he may get the greater part of the $200 and he gets the compensation as well.

Then here is the particular sentence I wish to stress:

It is not correct to say that because the price had gone up on cattle the compensation ought to go up. The compensation is not the whole thing.

The compensation is not the whole thing, Mr. Speaker, but the compensation is the greater part of the thing for those people who lose cattle in the T.B. test. As I said on Friday night, nobody that I know of—and I have asked various people who should know—has kicked about the amount of money received for reactors that went to the tank. The farmers were satisfied to take their losses on those tankers. What they are kicking about is the amount of money they get for reactors that do not go to the tank; and there are a great many more of those than there are those which are tankers. The delegations asked for an increase in the compensation for all reactors, not just those which went to the tanks.

In that same statement the Minister of Agriculture said that he brought in this bill last year. I think probably he erred slightly there, because I do not remember its coming in last year. I have checked up the records and cannot find any place where it was brought in.

Mr. Gardiner: I agree with my hon. friend. I was mistaken in saying it was brought in last year. It was drafted but not brought in.

Mr. Charlton: I reiterate, Mr. Speaker, that what the people across the country expected, in view of the speeches made previous to the election, was that an increase would be made in the compensation paid for all reactors. I reiterate that statement. After taking a considerable beating in the 1940's, in view of the fact that cattle prices had increased considerably—I will say that they are probably three times what they were in 1903—it is not fair to expect people to accept now the same compensation that they accepted in 1903. I say that especially in view of the fact that the government of the day in 1918 thought it advisable to increase the compensation. If there was reason in 1918 to increase the compensation there is a far greater reason today to increase the compensation for T.B. reactors. I again ask the government and the Minister of Agriculture to reconsider the matter and increase the compensation to the value placed on the animal in the act, and not to take it down to two-thirds of the value. That would simply mean changing the figures in the act. That was what happened in 1922. The government of that day tried to reduce it from $250 to $150. There was such a strong case put up in the House of Commons that the figure was reduced only to $200.

I repeat that if there was just reason in 1918 to increase it, there is certainly a far greater reason to increase the compensation today. I hope the government will see fit to change their opinion and make the value as it is in the act today, namely, the total value, the compensation value without the two-thirds being taken off.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to say a word on this matter on second reading. This afternoon the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) mentioned national cheese week. If we are to have cheese to export to pay for other products that we wish to import we shall have to give some consideration to the men who produce it. Now is a good time and this is a good place for the government to exhibit that interest in the production of food and wealth which means so much to this country.

On Friday last I mentioned unemployment insurance, and similar things which were designed to tide people over difficult times. We are in perfect accord with unemployment insurance and with the assistance given to veterans. I could also mention the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. When they have difficult times and dried-out years in the west, Ontario farmers and others do not object to nor protest against the payments which are made to farmers in lieu of crops. When expropriation proceedings are taken the parties interested do not expect the arbitration boards to pay as little as they can get away with. They expect the arbitration boards to award a fair price for whatever real estate or property is expropriated. I could also mention the national health program. As far as national health is concerned, I think a lot more could be done to improve the nutritional value of certain foods that may be produced.

For a moment or two I am going to refer to some of the things that were said in days gone by by other people in dealing with this same measure. On April 16, 1918, the Hon. Mr. Crerar then minister of agriculture had this to say as reported at page 801 of Hansard:

> I think a word of explanation will suffice for this resolution. At the time this act was originally passed the values upon which compensation was based for the slaughter of condemned animals were fixed by statute, in the case of cattle $60 per head and for pigs and sheep $15 per head, and the compensation allowed when animals were condemned and slaughtered was two-thirds of the value set by statute. Owing to the increased value of these animals at the present time, the compensation allowed when they are ordered to be destroyed does not adequately compensate their owners. The intention of the act when originally drafted, as I understand it, was to encourage the reporting to the proper authorities of animals which might be affected by some contagious disease, so that they could be properly examined, and if found a menace, destroyed. I think it is only proper that now, when the value of these animals has increased, and in some cases doubled, beyond what it was at the time the act was originally passed, the limit upon which compensation can be fixed should be raised, and that is the purpose of the resolution.

Conditions in April, 1918, and today are comparable. All I can say with respect to the action of the government is that it is similar to many other actions taken during the war and after. I could sum it up in five words, "Too little and too late."

On April 20, 1923, the Hon. Mr. Motherwell, also speaking in this house as minister of agriculture, said, as reported at page 2047 of Hansard:

> This is the usual resolution which precedes a money bill and while it was discussed incidentally a few weeks ago I think it is well to go into it further at this time. The main feature of the resolution proposes to reduce the indemnity for slaughtered animals, that is purebreds, from $200 for each head to $150. Our reason for doing that is to conform to the general reduction of values in live stock, both commercial and purebred.

The government of that day was quite prone to reduce compensation when the prices of animals were down, but they are very hesitant today about bringing them up when prices are high. As I said on Friday last, the farmers are going to be bitterly disappointed. I hold in my hand a copy of a presentation which was made to the government earlier this year. I intend to quote two or three paragraphs from it.

Mr. Gardiner: What is the date of it?

On motion of Mr. White (Middlesex East) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will conclude Bill No. 147, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. Then we shall take up Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944; Bill No. 120, respecting the Incorporation of Pure-Bred Live Stock Record Associations; Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act; Bill No. 64, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; Bill No. 133, respecting the Application of a National Trade Mark to Commodities and respecting the True Description of Commodities.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To please my hon. friend, the housing bill will be the second order. After that I would not give a definite undertaking.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 8, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

Government House, Ottawa
November 8, 1949

Members of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament. I thank you sincerely for this address.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS IN DEBATE ON NOVEMBER 7

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to rise on a question of privilege. I should like to refer to the morning editions of the Ottawa Citizen and the Montreal Gazette, in which newspapers there is attributed to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) a statement to the effect that he recalled that he had been told "by Mr. Garson" last year that the government had used the dental case to test the Combines Investigation Act. I did not hear my hon. friend make any such statement, and if he did, it would be an incorrect one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no hesitation in saying that what my hon. friend says is correct. I referred to an answer made in the house by the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Ilsley, at page 2506 of Hansard of March 23, 1948. There was no reference to the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. O. Breithaupt (Waterloo North) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

First report of standing committee on marine and fisheries.—Mr. Ashbourne.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Joseph Celestin Nadon, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Gatineau, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. Alphonse Fournier.

William Malcolm Mott, Esquire, member for the electoral district of New Westminster, introduced by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Hon. R. W. Mayhew.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to table further correspondence with the premiers of the ten Canadian provinces with respect to the dominion-provincial conference on amendments to the British North America Act. All the provinces agree that the conference shall open at Ottawa on January 10.

As was done in previous instances, I take it to be the desire of hon. members to have this correspondence printed as an appendix to Hansard, if Your Honour will give that instruction.

Mr. Speaker: If it is the wish of the house, I shall give instructions accordingly.

(For text of further correspondence, see appendix, pages 1577-78.)

BANKRUPTCY ACT

GENERAL REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 149 (from the Senate), respecting bankruptcy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the action of the government in allowing a further and drastic increase in domestic rents, the effect of which will further increase the cost of living in this country, aggravate the housing shortage, and seriously impair the health and living standards of our people.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Speaker: A similar motion was moved yesterday, but was not proceeded with because the house had an opportunity of discussing the matter during the day on the motion to go into supply. However, the house decided to discuss another matter. It may be that the house wishes to discuss this matter today.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the motion is strictly in order, since the matter could be discussed in the debate on the budget; but in view of the general public interest in this matter, and because no hon. members object, I shall read the motion to the house:

> Mr. Coldwell asks leave to move, seconded by Mr. MacInnis, the adjournment of the house under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the action of the government in allowing a further and drastic increase in domestic rents, the effect of which will further increase the cost of living in this country, aggravate the housing shortage, and seriously impair the health and living standards of our people.

Has the hon. member the leave of the house to introduce this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member begins his remarks, may I say that I would not want the action I have taken today to be considered as a precedent, since it is contrary to other precedents in this house.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I think the house and the people generally will be glad that you have permitted this motion to be moved today.

There is great concern across the country following the announcement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) permitting another—and I emphasize the word "another"—and drastic increase in domestic rents—without, incidentally, any appeal to any body for the purpose of determining whether or not there is justice in that increase. I am glad, too, you did not hold that this question might be discussed in the budget debate, because I would remind hon. members that that debate is partly concluded, and some hon. members who might have liked to discuss this matter would be precluded from doing so because they have exhausted their right to speak.

Of course I readily admit that the policy announced by the Minister of Finance was in line with the general policy of decontrol instituted by the government after the war. We hold the view that the removal of beneficial controls and subsidies following the war has resulted in the cost of living in this country reaching unprecedented heights. The government may say that this was all done before the last general election, and that therefore this policy was approved by the electors of Canada on June 27 last, when they gave the government the green light to proceed with its policies. But I do not believe the people thought the government would allow drastic increases in domestic rents before something had been done to provide housing accommodation, which would be within the reach of great masses of the Canadian people. If the view is taken, as is sometimes put forward, that the people of Canada supported the policy laid down by the government in these particulars, then all I can say is that many of the people of Canada who are complaining today are getting precisely what they voted for. I am convinced, though, that had many thousands of Canadians realized that within five months of the election further increases of twenty and twenty-five per cent in rents would be announced, the government would not have had the huge following in this house which it has today. Hundreds of thousands of families are paying rents for inadequate accommodation far beyond their means. Overcrowding in every part of Canada, particularly in every large urban centre, is, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me, the order of the day. Low-income groups are paying rents far beyond their capacity.

No provision in the way of low rental accommodation has been made for hundreds of thousands of families who have no veteran under their roof. Let us not forget that. It was our obligation to make every possible provision for the veterans who served this country in the last war. But there are many thousands of men and women engaged in industry, who stayed in industry in order to serve their country during that great struggle, and for them no provision has been made. It has been estimated by the Community Planning Association of Canada that there are a half million tenant families in Canada who can afford no more, and many indeed much less, than $30 a month for shelter. This I presume is based on the government's own advice, given several years ago to our people, that no more than twenty per cent of the family income should be expended for shelter. Many families in Canada today are compelled to pay from forty to fifty per cent of the family income for shelter.

The shortage of houses is not a new thing in this country. For many years in every part of Canada thousands of families were awaiting housing accommodation, on a rental basis, which they could not get. There were more families than there was housing or shelter accommodation to provide for them. I recall an interesting debate in this house on February 17, 1936, in which the deplorable housing conditions revealed by the 1931 census were discussed. I participated in that debate, which was initiated by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I recall that I drew attention to the fact that there were thousands of members of the building trades idle at that time. It was a time, as hon. members will recall, of serious unemployment in this country. The lumbering industry was suffering from serious unemployment and a lack of markets. The manufacturers of building materials and other supplies required in the erection of homes were maintaining idle plants while there were many thousands of Canadians on relief.

In other words, we had the resources; we had the artisans; we had the lumber and the factories to produce all we needed in order to build houses. Nothing was done. Thousands of our young men were idling in relief camps at twenty cents a day. Had we had the policy this country should have had at that time under a Liberal administration, and the year before under a Conservative administration, we could have utilized the materials, resources and human labour forces in such a way as to make some provision for the houses that were lacking in 1931 and the years before.

During those depression years, Mr. Speaker, the governments of the day did nothing effective to promote the building of houses. In other countries, nation-wide projects were undertaken, notably by the newly-elected Labour government of New Zealand; by the government of Sweden; by the government of the United Kingdom, and by the governments of the other civilized countries. If hon. gentlemen will look at the census reports for 1941, particularly volume 9 at page 182, they will find that the census returns show that 18·1 per cent of the housing units were overcrowded, and that 978,227 Canadians were living under overcrowded conditions.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): How many were empty at that time?

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know how many were empty. There may have been some empty houses. If there were empty houses in 1941, Mr. Speaker, two years after the war broke out, it underlines the fact that in 1940 and 1941 thousands of persons were unemployed in this country. In the first year of war there were approximately 400,000 persons unemployed and on relief. These deplorable conditions continued until the destruction of war enabled employment to become widespread, improve Canadian farm prices, and pull us out of a depression we had not managed to get out of under a Liberal administration in all the years that went before. I should add that neither the labour nor the materials were available in 1941 and the war years that followed.

Rent Control

The government points, of course, with pride to what has been done since the war ended. A number of new housing units have been built. But let me point this out. Equally important is the kind of house that can be bought or rented by families—whether they are accessible to the wealthy few or the less wealthy many. Judged by this standard, the housing policy of the government since the war has failed. Judged by this standard, the consternation of many people who suffer from inflated rents, and those who view with misgivings the possibility of further wage demands and salary increases, cannot be ignored.

I have already said that overcrowding persists in this country. Let us remember that overcrowding, resulting in large measure from high rents and high prices, will ultimately have a serious effect upon the health of the people generally. With the greater proportion of the family income absorbed in payment for shelter, it will undoubtedly mean a lowering of food standards. When food standards are lowered and supplies of milk for the family have to be reduced, physical deterioration of many families follows.

Let us remember that tens of thousands of houses and apartments built since the war, with the exception of those made available to veterans—and I am glad that lower rental accommodation is available to veterans—are renting today at $50, $60, and $70 or more per month. Indeed, this is not only permitted but encouraged under the government's housing plans. The guarantees offered to private builders have resulted in the building of apartments to rent, in most cases at not less than $70 a month. When rentals as high as this are asked, invariably the landlords say that this figure has been approved by the government of Canada. The dominion bureau of statistics reported that in 1948 thousands of urban families in rented shelters were paying no more than $30 a month; but when we examine the kind of accommodation they had at that rate, we see that they were in overcrowded rooms, overcrowded housekeeping rooms, overcrowded small houses, and that overcrowded conditions prevailed generally among that group of people. For this important group of Canadian families, which, again according to the bureau of statistics, is about one in every four, little housing has been built since the beginning of the great depression in the 1930's.

A large proportion of the Canadian people have been left entirely out of the picture since the war, because the government's policy has not resulted in the building of housing units within their reach. Now, before making any provision for this group, the government announces a drastic increase in rents, twenty per cent for unheated units and twenty-five per cent for heated units. This is a substantial increase, following, as it does, three previous increases of five, ten and four per cent respectively. It should be remembered that those increases, together with the twenty per cent or twenty-five per cent now, will mean an increase of forty per cent or more since the end of world war II.

No doubt some landlords have been receiving rental returns that are inadequate; but had we continued a proper rent control system, these surely could have been adjusted. This cannot, however, justify the government's announcement of the large increases that were announced last week. There can be no excuse for permitting at this time increases as much as twenty and twenty-five per cent all round.

One has only to consult the advertising columns of the newspapers in any city—in Ottawa, if you will—to realize the heights to which lack of accommodation and competition for new-occupancy dwellings have forced rents. In one of the local papers a couple of weeks ago a two-bedroom bungalow was advertised for rent, unfurnished, at $125 a month. A census of overcrowding in the urban centres of Canada would indicate that thousands of families are living under conditions that are intolerable, and for inadequate accommodation, are paying rents that can only be described as extortionate. Yet now the government allows a further increase of twenty-five per cent or twenty per cent, which will only aggravate the intolerable conditions to which I have referred.

This house, Mr. Speaker, must say explicitly to the government that the recent announcement of the Minister of Finance must be reconsidered and that rental controls must remain until the provinces are prepared to step into the field and undertake the protection of the Canadian people, if it should prove to be their obligation to do so. Indeed, until the menace of high rentals has been removed, the government, in its reconsideration of this policy, at least should provide for appeals to rental control boards across the country before rent increases are put into effect, and indicate that they should apply not only with respect to houses that have been under rental control, but also to some of these new occupancy dwellings and apartments as well.

I know that this is a problem which affects the urban members of this house more directly than it affects the rural members, but I appeal to all hon. members to join in this protest. The announcement of the Minister of Finance shows an entire disregard of the welfare of the great masses of the Canadian people, and this should not be tolerated by the house. I only wish it were possible at this time to move an amendment to test the feeling of the house and that hon. members in all parts of the house would feel free to vote for such an amendment on the merits of the case.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, a motion was offered to you for the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing this subject. At that time your ruling was that the subject could be discussed during the course of the day, on the motion to go into committee of supply, and therefore you did not permit discussion of the subject. I had assumed that had the question arisen today, your ruling would have been that the subject might be discussed on the bill to amend the National Housing Act, which is to be considered at a later stage of today's proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: We could not take a chance on that.

Mr. Fleming: But, Mr. Speaker, you have permitted debate to proceed on this motion, and I should like to contribute some thoughts with reference to this subject of rent control, particularly in the light of the announcement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in this house on Thursday night last.

It seems to me to be a most anomalous situation that we have two ministers, one of whom, the Minister of Finance, is responsible for administration of all aspects of the housing problem that fall under the subject of rent control, or the controlling powers of the wartime prices and trade board, and another, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), who is supposed to be responsible for all matters in which the federal authority is interested that fall under the subject matter of housing. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is responsible for administration of the National Housing Act. Here we have a dual system, with one minister not in a position to announce policy in a field that falls within the province of the other, and creating confusion in debates in the house, and also in government policy and government administration. It seems to me that in the proceedings of this house yesterday and today, as well as last week, we have had clear evidence that this dual system should not be allowed to continue. It is high time that the government made up its mind to unify its program and policy, if any, with reference to housing. You cannot take out of the field of housing this question of rent control or freezing controls on tenant-occupied accommodation and treat that matter as though it were a problem separate and apart from the problem of the housing needs of the Canadian people.

Rent controls became necessary because of a critical scarcity of housing. A critical scarcity of housing came about partly because of wartime conditions and partly because of deliberate government policy. In this respect I do not dissociate government policy from the conduct of the war, but I say that this scarcity, which has existed for some years now, and still exists in critical proportions, is attributable to government policy, for it became government policy during the war to remove much of the productive capacity of the building and construction industry from its normal pursuits and to devote it to war production. Labour was siphoned off from the construction trades, and the scarcity of housing continued to accumulate. Because we had an abnormal situation it became the duty of the government to step into this field and to take measures to control rents and to impose certain freezing regulations, simply because these measures were necessary to cope with the scarcity, an abnormal situation itself directly attributable to government policy.

What is the background? What are the conditions from which this new statement of government policy made by the Minister of Finance stems? It certainly does not stem from a situation in which the problem of scarcity has been corrected. It does not stem from an abundance of housing in Canada. The conditions out of which, the background against which, this last announcement of government policy has been made are conditions as critical as at any time in the past. Sir, I am not going to repeat what I said on this subject in the house on October 31, but I do remind hon. members, every one of whom has a responsibility in the light of this new statement of government policy, to consider facts such as these: first, that Mr. Mansur, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, said last January:

> The number of household groups, including not only families but also individuals who maintain households, exceed the number of front doors by approximately 350,000.

And again, the statement of General Young, vice-president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, made on April 28:

> Canada's housing situation is getting worse instead of better.

And the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply of recent date:

> New housing, even at the present record rate of production, is barely keeping up with current needs and making no important inroads into the backlog.

That, sir, is the background. That, sir, is the state of affairs out of which the government has enunciated a new policy of permitting increases in controlled rents, extending up to twenty-five per cent across the board.

It needs to be said, and said most emphatically, that this announcement represents a government decision, and a decision by the government alone. Parliament has had no voice whatever in the new order that has been made. Parliament has not been consulted in any way. The Minister of Finance simply came into the house and announced a fait accompli. He merely acquainted the house with the fact that the government, by executive decree, had imposed these increases ranging up to twenty-five per cent.

Mr. Abbott: No landlord has to charge them.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, we had some enlightening comments from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a few days ago on the subject of naïveté. I think that the Minister of Finance has broken all records for naïveté in the statement he has just made.

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Fleming: And, sir, the position in which parliament is left in dealing with a subject of this kind is a most uncomfortable and inconvenient one, because all that parliament can do now is to discuss something that has already been decided. Of course, if it ever came to a question of voting on this, the Minister of Finance would be rising in his place, as he did only yesterday, and saying: Well, there may be something in this argument that has been made from various quarters of the house, but this motion comes from the opposition; therefore it becomes a test of confidence in the government, and therefore I reject the motion or the amendment. Then the government members are called upon to fall in line, because the Minister of Finance says it becomes a test of confidence in the government.

Well, sir, in the form in which this matter comes before the house today we have not even the opportunity of introducing an amendment or a motion. That is most unfortunate, and for that very reason it seems to me more incumbent upon any government supporters in the house, who are not prepared to swallow this government announcement whole, to rise in their places and say so, and not to follow along like driven sheep simply because the Minister of Finance says it is government policy.

Sir, nothing could have been more arbitrary than the way in which this increase has been brought about—no consultation with parliament, no opportunity on the part of parliament to investigate the matter; simply an executive order more far-reaching, I venture to say, in its effect on the homes of Canadians throughout this broad land than anything else that has been done or transacted or said in this parliament throughout the present session.

It is an amazing thing that while parliament is in session the thing which has affected the lives and homes of Canadians more than any other since this session began was something done outside parliament, and parliament is simply notified at quarter to eleven one evening that it has been done. Moreover, it will continue to be possible for the government, simply by such executive decrees, without consulting this parliament, to make sweeping changes that affect Canadian homes by the hundreds of thousands, if we permit the government to enjoy the powers that they possess today under the Transitional Measures Act. This points, as clearly as anything can possibly point, to the inherent error in the way in which parliament has clothed this government with powers in view of the alleged national emergency. I am not going to retrace the whole ground covered in the debate of the first 1949 session, when we of the official opposition pointed the way to the government as to the method which ought to be taken in laying a proper legislative groundwork for rent control. But, of course, the government were not accepting suggestions of that kind. Rather they insisted on arrogating to themselves those wide omnibus powers under the Transitional Measures Act, and then by executive decree making the sweeping orders under the powers conferred by that act.

I wish to place before the new members of the house one or two extracts from significant passages in the debate on that measure. I recall two important remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in the debate. First of all I shall quote his statement of March 14, 1949, when at page 1446 of Hansard he said:

> The time has come for the government to place before parliament a statute dealing with the housing problem, and to provide in that statute clear and unmistakable terms which can be understood by both landlords and tenants so the confusion which exists today may be brought to an end.

I would have thought that that was a very constructive suggestion, but the government rejected it. They wanted an omnibus bill giving them sweeping powers, and then under that measure to have the power by executive decree to make orders such as the one which was announced by the minister on Thursday night. Sir, can you imagine anything that contributes more to chaos and confusion, as well as to hardship, in Canadian homes today than this continued uncertainty as to when another executive order is to be made? People are simply at the mercy of executive orders; for these orders are made whether parliament is in session or parliament is not in session. Their elected representatives do not control the situation. Their elected representatives, by reason of the nature of the legislation under which these orders are made, have not had any voice whatever in the making of the decisions embodied in this order.

> I hope that no one will suggest that any hon. member who opposes the continuance of these wartime powers is opposing rent control or any other provision to meet the situation which has arisen very largely as a result of the activities of the government itself.

We Progressive Conservatives said that the measure embodying this omnibus power was an inherently wrong method, and asked the government to bring in a proper measure to embody the legislative provisions needed with respect to the relationship between landlord and tenant in this emergency situation.

At page 1484 I had some comments to make —and I mention these with diffidence and simply because it fell to my lot to follow my leader in the debate. Hansard of March 15, 1949, page 1484, contains my following words:

> It was made quite clear by my leader in his remarks yesterday that an adverse vote on this omnibus resolution by any member of this party—

The Progressive Conservative party.

> —is not to be considered as opposition to rent control, a proper statutory measure of rent control. That has been made abundantly clear by the observations of the leader of the opposition at pages 1446 and 1448 of Hansard yesterday, so let there be no misunderstanding of the attitude of the members of this official opposition, of which I think we had a veiled suggestion last evening in the question asked by a member to your right, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of rent control. It has to be a proper measure; it has to be a measure in proper statutory form, not something hidden in an omnibus resolution of this kind.

We followed that up; and when the bill to continue the Transitional Measures Act came before the house for second reading we offered an amendment which is to be found at page 1743 of Hansard for 1949.

This was the amendment introduced by the official opposition to the motion for second reading:

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to recommend a specific measure relating to rent control, and other specific measures relating respectively to other matters provided for in the said bill.

After some discussion, Mr. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order, the house dividing on our appeal from the ruling. The ruling was upheld, and the division is recorded at page 1766 of Hansard.

I now turn to some of the features of the statement of the Minister of Finance on Thursday night. He has announced that the government proposes a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine the constitutionality of federal rent control. If doubts have been raised, I suppose it is desirable that this matter be settled in that way. I think it might be asked, however, and with some justification, why that course was not followed earlier; because had there been a decision earlier on that question by the Supreme Court of Canada it certainly would have enabled us to know even at this stage the position with reference to the powers of parliament. Even if a favourable decision had been made as long ago as a year, it is reasonable to expect that the judges of the supreme court would have indicated the formula by which the emergency in this respect is to be tested, under which the dominion would derive its power. However, that aspect of the announcement will probably be generally approved.

I turn now to the specific increases made by executive order, and I ask members of the House of Commons what their position is in the light of these measures. It is not an answer for any member of the house—least of all, members supporting the government—to say: Oh, well; that was done by the government under special power, and did not come directly before the house in any manner which would have permitted action by the house. That would be turning our backs upon our responsibility; it would be an endeavour to escape responsibilities which the house must meet, in the face of this government's decisions.

Apparently parliament is not to be afforded any opportunity to review the evidence upon which the government proceeded to make its order. The government has refused to allow the house to appoint a select committee to review housing conditions in this country, or to consider such evidence as the rent control authorities have, and upon which they based their recommendations to the government now embodied in this cabinet decree.

Has there been any progress in decontrol? The house would like to know. We had a statement from the government on October 3, in reply to some questions asked with a view to eliciting information as to the progress which had been made under previous rent control amending orders. At page 442 of Hansard we see that the order of April 14, 1947, concerning landlords who suffered grievous hardship from their inability to recover possession of their own housing accommodation, permitted recovery of possession in a total of 8,388 cases up to August 31, 1949.

Then, under another rent control order effective November 1, 1948, the wartime prices and trade board permitted landlords who needed housing accommodation for their own personal residence, and who had owned it since November 1, 1947, to give to the tenant six months' notice to vacate. The government reported at page 442 of Hansard of the present session that up to August 31, 1948, such notices had been filed to a total of 9,900. I do not know whether that should be the year 1949; I daresay the "1948" is a mistake. The filing of notices does not signify that those landlords recovered possession of their houses.

That is about all the information given to the house on the subject. It is on that inadequate information that the members of the House of Commons will have to accept and swallow the government's decision, or say, as I hope they will say: We are not satisfied with this. As a matter of fact, more information came out in this morning's press than members of the House of Commons have been given in the house—and more than they would have had opportunity to obtain, I am sure, so long as we are to be denied any opportunity to appoint a committee of the house to consider these questions and to adduce firsthand evidence.

A Canadian Press dispatch appearing in this morning's press contains just about all the information available to us on the subject. It states:

> The boost in rental ceilings which comes into effect ten days before Christmas may hit some 4 million Canadians living in rented rooms, flats, apartments and houses, government officials estimated today.
> The official based this estimate on a rental survey which showed that approximately 1,500,000 flats, apartments and houses across the country could be the target for the twenty and twenty-five per cent increases in rents.
> Other government estimates:
> 1. That at least ninety per cent of leased accommodation in the large urban areas is rented on a month-to-month basis. Tenants in this category will be among the first to be hit by the authorized hikes.
> 2. Some of this type of accommodation is rented on a weekly and not a monthly basis, and that means that only a week's notice—not a month—need be given by the landlord. If the tenant doesn't pay he can be pushed out the day before Christmas, December 24.
> 3. In most cases, however, the rental increases will not go into effect before February 1, 1950. Tenants renting on a monthly basis will have to receive a month's notice as from December 31.
> 4. If the government had lifted the controls completely to meet the wishes of Canada's landlords, urban rentals in the big cities would have increased by approximately 100 per cent.
> 5. Taking into consideration both rural and urban areas, the new ceilings generally are considered to be about 25 per cent below the level which would prevail if the regulations had been removed completely.
> 6. In some areas landlords may not be able to get the tenants to pay the full 20 and 25 per cent hikes. In these areas, such as Kirkland Lake, Ontario, the supply is slightly higher than demand, and it appeared likely that the landlords in these areas "will have to be satisfied with whatever they can get."
> The officials emphasized that accommodation constructed since January 1, 1947, does not come under the government's controls, and therefore the increases do not apply. Rentals prices in these cases were beyond the edict of the government's rental administrator. Accommodations in this class are estimated at about 50,000 units. The same thing applies to accommodation vacated on or after November 1, 1948. No estimate was given of the number of units in this category. Tenants with long term leases would not be affected by the rental increases until the leases expire.

That is the end of the statement appearing in the Canadian Press dispatch today and which, as I have said, contains more information than the government has chosen to give the house. I think it leads inescapably to the conclusion that it is high time that the house took this question out of the hands of the government, and put it on a basis where parliament will be making the decisions, where parliament will assert its right to full consultation and to obtain all the information that is available and is required to make a proper decision on the question, and where we will not be compelled simply to accept a fait accompli delivered to us by the government.

Representations have been made to the government by responsible bodies such as the Canadian Legion, which put forward a very strong submission, which apparently has been completely ignored by the government in the decision it has made. Organizations which are close to the problem, such as the federation of mayors and municipalities, and other organizations which have made a firsthand study of the matter, have also made representations, but apparently they have received little or no consideration.

There were rumours going around the house last Thursday afternoon that an announcement was to be made that evening in regard to increases in controlled rents. Rumour had it that the increase might be 10 per cent, or in some cases 15 per cent. I venture to say there is not a member of the house, apart from members of the government, who dreamed for a moment that increases would be allowed to the extent of such figures as 20 and 25 per cent. It would be interesting if the supporters of the government were to come forward and offer their views specifically on the percentages of increase which the government has decided upon. Let us hear from some of the members of the house who support the government, who were very eloquent on this subject during the election campaign, and who said, for instance, that they were going to uphold rent control.

As a matter of fact, there is one hon. member of the house, a colleague of mine from the city of Toronto, who interested himself in this subject to the point where he wanted to give assistance to the government in a reference pending before the Ontario courts regarding the constitutionality of federal rent control. On October 20 he wrote a letter to every hon. member of the house pointing out that the lawsuit was coming up, and that the federal government was to be represented by counsel. He went on to say:

> It has occurred to me that your constituents may be interested in providing counsel for the government with evidence to assist the court at the trial. I have many constituents who wish to present evidence for consideration of counsel representing the government. Because of this, I shall be pleased to work with you or your constituents as to evidence which your constituents may want to present, all with the view to ensuring a full and proper trial of this case now before the courts.

The letter is signed "Charles Henry, member for Toronto-Rosedale".

I should be interested to know the views of the hon. member for Rosedale on these increases. I should be interested to hear the views of Liberal members from the city of Toronto who when at home in their ridings have not been silent on the subject of the difficulties of housing conditions. We will await with interest their contribution to the discussion, and their specific comments on the increases that have been promulgated by the government.

I mentioned that no one expected that the increases would reach the figures announced of 20 and 25 per cent. One would like to know what relationship these percentages bear to uncontrolled rents, or what the increases might be expected to be if rents were decontrolled. That is one of the things that I think a parliamentary committee, if it had the opportunity to go into the question, would like to know.

The minister has talked on previous occasions—and I think this is the expression he has used—of "cushioning the shock of complete decontrol." If the 25 per cent increase represents a cushioning of the shock, then I think that the tenants of Canada will plead with Providence to spare them any more of these government cushions. On what was the percentage based in each case? How did the government arrive at it? It takes one's mind back to the method, described by an hon. member of the house, by which the government arrived at the particular percentage of devaluation of the Canadian dollar. He described it as a case of putting some figures in a hat, and then somebody, presumably the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), put his hand in the hat and drew out a figure.

Mr. Cleaver: That was the Tory policy.

Mr. Fleming: That was the gist of government action in this case.

Mr. Cleaver: It was the announced Tory policy.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) knows where the government got the figures of 20 and 25 per cent, I will be happy to sit down and let him tell the house.

Mr. Cleaver: By using the best of good judgment.

Mr. Fleming: Isn't that informative?

Mr. Cleaver: Just as informative as your speech. You have not committed yourself on rent control.

Mr. Fleming: I infer that the hon. member for Halton has given his complete blessing and approval to these percentage increases. He says they represent good judgment. It will remain for other government supporters either to rise and applaud, as has the hon. member for Halton, this government cushioning of the shock by means of these increases, or to say that they have different opinions. It remains for hon. members of the house to say. If they are satisfied with these arbitrary percentages, very well; they may well say so. Certainly their silence, if they do not speak to the contrary, will properly be interpreted in the same way as the words of the hon. member for Halton who has said that these percentages are the result of good judgment. The house, the country at large, and tenants by the hundreds of thousands, are left in a state of continuing uncertainty. It is the tenants particularly who are going to suffer from the uncertainty because they are left in a position where, overnight, the government can announce more increases, and apply more of these measures that they call cushioning the shock.

Now, sir, here are some of the things which I say have not been considered by the government. In the first place the circumstances of the tenants have not been taken into account. There are great numbers of Canadian tenants to whom this measure is not going to be a cushion but a great shock. The government does not seem to be aware of the fact, as members of parliament should be aware from their personal relations with their constituents, that many Canadian tenants are just holding their heads above water today, with limited incomes and the high cost of living. This is one reason why from now on parliament should take over from the government responsibility in regard to this matter, and make laws to meet the need. Now, with an increase by such a large percentage, it simply means that great numbers of tenants are not going to be able to pay these rents. I am sure I do not need to quote figures in regard to the increase in the cost of living. As of October 1 that figure had reached 162·2, (1935-1939=100) and now the government decrees another substantial increase which will seriously affect those families whose economic affairs are in such delicate balance today. I do not think it was much of a contribution toward easing the fears of such people for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to make the announcement he made in Montreal on November 6, where he is quoted in a Canadian Press dispatch as follows:

> He expressed the opinion further wage demands would not be justified—"it must be understood that in recent years wage rates have gone up very much higher than rental costs."

Mr. Abbott: And that is true.

Mr. Fleming: The minister must be aware that already notice has been served by some labour organizations that increases in wages are going to be demanded in the light of these increased rentals.

On the other hand, and I want to emphasize this, the order is simply flat and arbitrary in its application, and does not take account of the fact that today many people who are occupying quite comfortable and in fact luxurious housing accommodation can well afford to pay uncontrolled rents. I have never been able to understand why wealthy people who choose to live in luxurious apartments or to rent luxurious homes must be protected by rent control. I wish to see rent control preserved now for the people who need it in order to keep their heads above water. I do not see any need to retain rent control for the benefit of people in comfortable circumstances.

In the next place this order, because it is flat and arbitrary, does not take account of the great variety of conditions existing across Canada. There is the greatest variety; yet this is an arbitrary order that applies right across the country without regard to geographical variations, or variations as between urban and rural municipalities.

In the next place it does not take account of those tenants who are subletting their properties at handsome profits. There is no provision in the order under which the owners may repossess such accommodation.

In the next place the timing of this announcement has been almost incredibly bad. Here we are with winter coming on and these increases are announced, some of them to take effect before Christmas and others in the middle of the winter. If this was in the mind of the government all along it would have been interesting if they had announced it before the by-elections were held a week or two ago, so the people in those constituencies would have had an opportunity to pass judgment.

In the next place, this order does not take account of any obligation on the part of landlords to repair the premises. There is nothing in this order providing that landlords who increase rents by these large percentages are required to carry out any repairs, which in many cases have been delayed for years.

In the next place the order does not relate itself specifically to the increased costs of the landlords. For instance, on August 22 the minister announced that in the city of Toronto a four per cent increase in rents would be allowed to take care of increased taxes accompanying re-assessment in that city. I should like to know whether in the case of my city the latest increase is in addition to that four per cent, or whether the four per cent is to be swallowed up in the increase of twenty or twenty-five per cent.

In the next place this order makes no attempt at all to deal with the discrimination that still exists in a great number of cases, even in the same locality and the same community. When the deadline was first established in 1941 in connection with rent control, many landlords missed it, and since that time they have not had an adequate opportunity to bring their rents into line with others in close proximity to them. These discriminations are continuing, and are being exaggerated by this flat percentage increase.

In conclusion, sir, in the face of arbitrary actions like these by this government I say it is high time this house stepped into the picture and undertook a review of the situation by a proper committee. We are not going to meet the need by sudden, drastic measures of this kind. In his statement, at page 1434 of Hansard, the minister said:

> . . . it is our policy to permit this adjustment to be made gradually rather than abruptly.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if this is a gradual adjustment I think the people of Canada had better learn how long and to what extent they must continue to be at the mercy of these arbitrary decisions on the part of the government. Let this house make it known to the government now that we want an end to the chaos and confusion caused by these sudden government decisions. Let us undertake in parliament now a proper review of this whole situation and write legislative measures with due regard for the needs of all Canadians, which will meet this situation.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this might be an appropriate time for me to say a few words on this question of rent control and the reasons which prompt the government to announce the measures of decontrol which I announced in the house last Thursday evening.

With respect to the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell), let me say at once that his position and that of his party is thoroughly consistent. As he said quite frankly, they advocated the continuation of all controls after the end of the war, including rental control. The stand they take today is no different from the stand they have taken right through the piece. The position of the Liberal party has been different. Before the election of 1945 we pledged ourselves to a gradual and orderly decontrol policy. In fact rental control is the last of the major wartime controls remaining. The attitude of the Progressive Conservative party is not nearly so consistent. Pretty steadily throughout the life of the last parliament they advocated the abolition of all controls.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend qualified that, of course, by saying they were not in favour of abolishing rent control.

Mr. Graydon: You are not right on that.

Mr. Abbott: I think my good friend the former member for Stanstead, Mr. John Hackett, was the only member of that party who openly said that he favoured the abolition of all controls. I do not want to impute motives to anyone, but I think there were a good many who were advocating that policy privately; but I repeat that between 1945 and 1949 they were generally advocating the removal of all controls.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has made a statement, which we have denied, and I ask him to point out where the Progressive Conservative party said it advocated the abolition of all controls. The same thing was said by another minister in the last house, and it was denied at that time. We never advocated the abolition of rent control.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, as I said, they did not dare to openly advocate the abolition of rent control. They pussyfooted on that as they did on a number of other things, but nevertheless the general policy of the Tory party was to abolish controls. They qualified it because they knew there were so many tenants in the country they would not dare to openly advocate the removal of those controls.

Mr. Graydon: What did you do in the by-elections? You did not dare to advocate it then.

Mr. Abbott: I was making this statement, Mr. Speaker, as a preface to what I have to say about rental controls as such, and about the circumstances which prompted the government to make this further decontrol move. I believe I hardly need say to the house that the government felt this would be an unpopular move. Nevertheless, it is sometimes necessary, even for governments, to do things which may not be universally popular but which may be the proper things to do. The government came to the conclusion that a modification of the rental control regulations, some eight years after they were first adopted, was a step which should be taken.

I have had a good deal of personal experience with the removal of controls of one sort or another, and I found that the more rigid and more successful the controls have been, the more difficult it is to remove them for reasons which I think will be fully understood by all members. These rental controls were part of a general wartime control program. At that time we controlled salaries, wages, prices; we controlled virtually everything which entered into the cost of living. These controls have now disappeared, leaving rental control as the sole survivor of these major wartime controls.

I think with the possible exception of my friends in the C.C.F. party, all members will agree that the federal government cannot and should not continue in the field of rental control. It does not lie within the field of federal jurisdiction under ordinary circumstances. I may say at this point that counsel for the dominion government will contend before the supreme court, on the reference which I announced the other evening, that the federal government has the right to taper off rent controls in a gradual manner; but they will not contend that we have the right to continue them indefinitely.

What is the history of this decontrol program so far as rentals are concerned? The house will recall that in October of last year, after the government had given a good deal of consideration to the constitutional policy of the dominion to continue in this field, I wrote a letter to all provincial premiers in which I stated that the right of the dominion to do so had been challenged in the courts. I offered to abandon rent control in any province if any provincial government desired to take it over, and offered to make the facilities of the rent control administration available as well as to pay the cost for a year.

I am free to confess it did not surprise me that none of the provinces accepted that offer. Some of the provinces talk a good deal about provincial autonomy, but when it comes to assuming an unpopular responsibility they are not nearly so ready to talk about it. Be that as it may, none of the provinces saw fit to take on that obligation. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I am not attaching any blame to them for failing so to do; I am merely stating the facts.

The other evening I announced I was writing to the provincial premiers stating that we now intended to refer to the supreme court the question of our right to continue in the rental control field until we taper off the control, and orderly decontrol has been established. I repeat my statement that if any province cares to enter the field and take over the responsibility, the dominion will suspend its rental regulations in that province.

It may well be that the people of some of the provinces would be prepared to see rent control in effect on a permanent or semi-permanent basis. If so, they must seek action from their provincial legislatures. We can do nothing about it and we should not mislead the public into thinking that we can. It was for this reason that I offered a year ago to vacate the field to the provinces, and that is why I repeated the same offer last Thursday night. As I say, no province has as yet come forward with a request that the dominion withdraw its rental controls in that province to permit the provincial legislature to assume that responsibility.

So far as the federal government is concerned, it has consistently followed a policy of orderly decontrol. It has proceeded step by step exempting certain classes of dwellings from controls, authorizing rent increases, and gradually returning to the owners the right to gain possession of their own homes. We could, of course, have decided to abandon rent control entirely on March 31 when the present legislation expires. That policy was considered, and seriously considered. We were strongly urged to do that. I do not think I am betraying cabinet secrets when I say that some of my colleagues thought that might be a desirable course to follow. The government decided, after the most careful and prolonged consideration, that it should proceed to relax controls rather than bring them to an end abruptly.

As I said before, the government recognized that an authorized increase in rental ceilings would be unpopular. We also had ample evidence that an abrupt ending of rental control would create a situation of extreme gravity. I am not going to burden the house with details, but I am sure that many of you are familiar with the rents being charged for houses and apartments that are no longer under control. I have been told that, in many cases and especially in the larger industrial centres, rents have doubled or gone up as much as fifty to seventy-five per cent after the removal of control.

In answer to the question put, I think, by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) or the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I am not sure which, I am told by the rentals administration people who have been studying this question throughout the years that it is impossible to tell what would happen if rental controls were suddenly removed. Our information from rentals officers in the field has convinced the government, however, that a most confused and disorderly situation would arise. Such a course of action should therefore be avoided. Consequently, we decided to take another step toward eventual decontrol.

This was a substantial step, and it was intended to be. In spite of the laughter which greeted my remark a moment ago, it does not mean that all rentals will go up by twenty or twenty-five per cent. My own estimation is, we will see whether it is borne out by events, that in a great many cases the increase will not be that much. In centres where the shortage of rental accommodation is most acute, probably the majority of the landlords will take advantage of the maximum ceiling allowed. My estimate is that it will not be an across-the-board increase. This merely gives tenants and landlords the right to bargain within that range. My opinion, which is supported by the rental authorities, is that there will not be a horizontal increase of either twenty or twenty-five per cent.

Be that as it may, I felt and the government felt that if a base could be fixed we could, through those who have been charged by the government with administering this admittedly difficult and onerous control, control the maximum increase to an over-all margin within which landlords and tenants might bargain.

I repeat that this move in the decontrol of rents was part and parcel of our decontrol program announced prior to the election of 1945; and the increases granted were not based on any estimate of the rise in costs or on the needs of the landlords or of the ability of the tenant to pay. Nevertheless, in view of some of the comments that have been made, I want to place before the house with regard to rentals some facts and figures that do not appear to have been sufficiently emphasized.

According to the dominion bureau of statistics, the rent index on September 1 of this year stood at 123·9. That index is based on the period 1935-39; so that, broadly speaking, there has been an increase of about 24 per cent in rents since pre-war years. I should point out that this index is based not only on houses that are under the ceiling but also on new dwellings which have never been under control and also on dwellings which for one reason or another have been exempted from the ceiling.

Mr. Coldwell: Do the figures include light housekeeping rooms?

Mr. Abbott: I could not answer my hon. friend offhand; but there has been no increase in the rentals of light housekeeping rooms.

I make this point that I have made because it means that, on the average, dwellings which are still under control have risen by even less than the 24 per cent increase shown by the index figure which I have just quoted. Since November, 1941, when the ceiling came into effect, the rent index has been raised by only 12·7 points; that is, from 111·2 to 123·9.

I think it is relevant in the circumstances to look at the figure for prices generally. The cost of living index, which includes rents, of course, has risen by 62·2 per cent since pre-war years as against 24 per cent for rents themselves. It is also relevant, I think, to make a comparison between wages and rents. According to the dominion bureau of statistics, average wage rates in non-agricultural industries and average weekly earnings in manufacturing are both up by over 90 per cent since 1939.

An even more striking comparison is that between November, 1941, when the wartime controls on prices, wages and rents came into effect, and the present time. In November, 1941, the rent index stood at 111·2. Today, as I have said, it stands at 123·9. The percentage increase in rents therefore is, as I said a moment ago, 12·7 points or 11·4 per cent, which I would repeat includes decontrolled as well as controlled dwellings.

What about prices and wages in the same period—that is, the period since rental controls first came into effect in November, 1941? The cost of living index since November, 1941, has risen from 116·3 to 162·2; that is, by 45·9 points or 39 per cent. Average wage rates in 1948, which is the latest data available, are up by 73 per cent since 1941, and average weekly earnings by 63 per cent between November, 1941, and the present time.

There is one other point I should like to clarify. In my statement last Thursday night I said:

> Landlords will be permitted to offer a term certain lease for not less than one year in consideration of a rental increase of not more than 20 per cent in the case of unheated self-contained dwellings and of not more than 25 per cent in the case of heated self-contained dwellings.

These increases will make a total of general over-all increases permitted since November, 1941—a period of eight years—of 30 per cent for unheated accommodation and 40 per cent for heated accommodation. While the present increases of 20 per cent and 25 per cent are in addition to the previous increases of 10 per cent and 15 per cent, the government has never intended to apply the one percentage increase to the other, which would, of course, have resulted in more than an over-all general increase of 30 per cent or 40 per cent. In other words, the increases are not cumulative. The mechanics to be employed by the rentals administration in carrying out this policy are now being worked out and they will appear in the relevant orders.

My hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. party said that this policy represented an entire disregard of the welfare of the majority of the people. I am aware, of course, that there are a great many more tenants than there are owners in the country. But I have never felt that mere numbers justified the perpetuation of unfairness or injustice, assuming that such unfairness or injustice exists.

In another debate yesterday some reference was made to matters of discrimination. In view of the figures which I have given to the house as to the increase in wages, salaries and other items, as compared with rentals, I ask any member who is honest with himself whether he believes that the owner of a property on which he has had his rent frozen since 1941 until the present day or who has had the moderate increase granted up to the present time, is being treated on a comparable basis with regard to other groups in the community. To me, Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is self-evident.

When one talks about ignoring the welfare of the majority of the people, if one accepts majority rule in matters of this kind, then of course my hon. friend is right. If one accepts the proposition that in matters of fairness and equity one should be governed by the number of heads that you count, then of course my hon. friend is absolutely right, and my friend the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), with his demagogic appeal, is absolutely right. But if you are talking about questions of fairness as between one group of the community and another, then it is perfectly clear that the existing structure of frozen rentals is unfair to the majority of people who are receiving them. It is in an attempt, first, to proceed with its program of orderly decontrol and, second, in an attempt to be fair to a group of Canadians in the community, that the government is putting forward this policy. It believes that it is a sound policy and it intends to back it up.

Rent Control

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to add some thoughts on this subject, Mr. Speaker, before the debate closes. I was greatly interested in the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the reasons for their decontrol policy and the method which they have outlined. I was particularly interested in noting what the minister had to say about the Progressive Conservative party and their attitude toward rental control, although I hold no brief for the Progressive Conservative party. The minister said that the Progressive Conservative party should have made their stand known to the public before the general election. At the time he made that statement I was wondering if there was any party in the house which was less considerate of public opinion in this regard than was the Liberal government; for certainly had the public of Canada been acquainted with the so-called decontrol methods of the government, as put forth now, they would have shown their position in no uncertain manner. But they were not permitted that opportunity. It was thought wise by the government—and politically it was probably good judgment—to save this rent policy until after the general election.

My mind goes back to other things which the public should have been informed upon before the general election. Had this rent control policy, along with the flour-milling report, been presented to the people of Canada before the general election, I am sure that the Liberal government would have found that the people of Canada were dissatisfied with some of the operations of this government.

In speaking of the stand that parties have taken with regard to decontrol, let me say that the Social Credit party has always taken the view that we should have controls where necessary, and on no other occasion. But this is not one of the times when controls on rent should be lifted, or indeed lifted to the extent that they have been under the new rent control order.

In regard to this subject the premier of Alberta said the other day that he believed in decontrol in normal times, but these are decidedly not normal times. The minister speaks about having a proper decontrol method, a decontrol method which would be less severe on the majority of people. He said that they have tried in their decontrol policy to cushion the shock. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether that is exactly true. Under the decontrol methods used by the government it seems to me that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction, discontent and hardship. I want to point out instances of this hardship and discontent. Today there are a great many people whose incomes will not warrant an increase in rent. Several organizations throughout the country have estimated that a man cannot pay more than 20 per cent, or one-fifth of his income, in rent. In Calgary not so long ago one large concern, not a provincial industry but a national one, was paying its employees $100 to $115 a month. If a man is receiving $100 to $115 a month how in the world can he stand an increase of twenty to twenty-five per cent? I know of some of these men who were paying $45 a month in rent. If you add an increase of twenty-five per cent on that, and it has to be paid out of an income of $100 or $115 a month, it can readily be seen that there is room for complaint and that there is decided hardship in these cases.

The minister may say, "Oh, a great many of these landlords will not take advantage of this increase." I think that is true. But can you leave such a major problem as this open to the possibility that some landlords will not take advantage of the increase? Probably the landlords who are already charging $140 to $150 a month for rent will not take advantage of it and increase their rates by twenty to twenty-five per cent; but there are a great many landlords who are charging $40 to $45 a month. These landlords who are dealing with people on a very moderate income will take advantage of this decontrol order. They will raise their rents to the people who can least afford it.

It has been stated, and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) pointed it out a while ago, that about four million people will be affected by this so-called decontrol of rent and over 50,000 housing accommodation units will be affected. There are a great many inequitable cases. Let me give the house some of them. New houses that were built prior to November 1, 1948—it used to be 1947, but this order carries it through to 1948—are entirely free from rent control. Then certain houses are vacated for some reason or other. They are free of rent control. Suppose a tenant decides to move out for some reason or other. That house immediately becomes free of rent control. There is another house of equal value in the same residential part of the city in which the tenant still remains. In one case the rent is frozen and in the other it is free. Show me what justice there is in a situation such as that. There are two houses of equal value in the same part of the city. The owner of one is absolutely free to charge any rent that he can get. I know some men who are charging $150 to $200 a month. The house right next to it is under control. There is just no equality in that. Surely this government could arrange a decontrol policy under which these unfair and inequitable conditions could be ironed out and a logical and decent decontrol policy put into effect.

There is no question about it, Mr. Speaker, that the action of the government at this time in raising the rents from twenty to twenty-five per cent will greatly affect those people who can least afford to pay any increase. Right off the bat I am going to agree with the minister that there are some instances where landlords need an adjustment in their rents. I pointed that out a few moments ago. But there are many instances where there is unfairness, and where there is no attempt to make a uniform policy in regard to these rents, and consequently a great deal of hardship will be felt throughout the country. How can people on these low incomes survive if their cost of living is going to be jumped twenty to twenty-five per cent on one item alone? It just is not reasonable to expect them to be able to survive. The people are entitled to some reasoning in the decontrolling of rents.

Let me give you one illustration, Mr. Speaker, to show that people cannot afford an increase in rent. Take old age pensioners, for instance. How are old age pensioners going to be able to pay an increase in rent? I do not care how small the increase may be. At this point I may say that it may be necessary for the government to subsidize some landlords, but in regard to the old age pensioners there is no justification for allowing an increase in rent. They just cannot pay it. All of the people on fixed incomes are going to be materially affected, and most of them are going to be unable to make any financial adjustments in this field.

The minister speaks about the government's policy of decontrol. He went so far as to say that it was questionable whether the legal position of the government was sound in continuing rent control. I can only say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the premier of Quebec was right when he said the other day, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen:

> Government Action "Remarkable"—Duplessis
> Premier Duplessis yesterday described as "remarkable" announcement of the federal government's intention to obtain a supreme court decision on the validity of rent controls.
> "Nine years after the federal government passed a law, they want to find out if they had a right to enact it," he said at a press conference.
> "It seems remarkable. It reminds me of stories about an ancient Scottish practice of hanging a man and afterward holding a trial to see if he is guilty."

That is just about the position in which the federal government finds itself now. Did they not know that their legal position might not have been any too sound prior to June 27? I think they would have known it then. Why did they not come out frankly and tell the people the intentions they had, the practices they were going to put into force right after the election? They were not much concerned about dealing fairly with the public at that time; in fact, I think it was just about the opposite.

Let me quote briefly from the Ottawa Journal of Monday, November 7, under the heading "Mr. Abbott Set With Long Lease But Colleagues Face Rent Hoists", just to show how utterly impossible it is going to be for people to pay the rents they are likely to be asked. It states:

> An official cited the following as an example for a heated self-contained dwelling if all relaxations were transformed into increased rent:
> Basic rent, 1947, $100 monthly.
> Ten per cent increase allowed April, 1947, making rent $110.
> Five per cent increase allowed for heated dwelling, October, 1948, making rent $115.50.
> Twenty-five per cent increase allowed September 15, 1949, making rent $144.37.
> Mr. Abbott and his officials told the Journal it was obvious that if rent controls were eliminated completely a chaotic situation would arise. They have had experience of rents being as much as doubled on houses free of rent controls because they were built since 1947 or had been released because the occupants under rent control had moved away. These experiences indicated that without control rents would skip sky-high in many cases.

That shows how rents can increase. There will be cases where it will be utterly impossible for the people of Canada to meet these conditions.

A moment ago I spoke about the increased cost of living. It has been indicated by the trade unions that they are going to demand increases in wages. The ones to whom I referred a short time ago, who are receiving $100 or $115 a month, are not under the large trade unions, and therefore they will not receive the benefits of trade union activities and protection to get increases in wages.

In the same article from which I quoted a moment ago we find this paragraph:

> Trades and labour congress unions are considering asking for higher wages as a result of the government's rent boost action, TLC President Percy Bengough said today.

There is no question about it that the action the government has taken upon itself to increase rents by 20 and 25 per cent is going to start another surge across the country for increased wages. We cannot blame the trade unions for asking increases in their wage scales when the government makes it absolutely impossible for wage earners to carry on at present wage rates. The government is creating this chaotic state. They are demanding that unions go out on strike in an endeavour to obtain increased wages. The government is creating the condition which is throwing thousands of people out of employment through the necessity of having to go on strike to obtain increased wages resulting from government action.

This is not the time when rent controls should be increased to the extent of 20 per cent. It is not the time to increase rents—a time when old age pensioners and others on fixed incomes cannot be expected to pay such rents. Surely it is not the time to increase rents by 20 and 25 per cent when the great majority of our working people are earning from $100 to $150 a month.

I could take hon. members to Calgary and show them hundreds upon hundreds of people, married men with families, who are living on $35 a week. They cannot afford these increased rentals. No matter what the minister may say with respect to some landlords who will not take full advantage of the increase, I venture to say that at least 75 per cent of them will take advantage of it to some extent, and raise their rents. Those increases will fall most heavily upon the people who can least afford it.

For that reason and for others which I have given, I am definitely of the opinion that this is not the time for the government so to increase rents.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the most significant thing which has come out of this debate so far is the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) deemed it advisable to speak before some of his own backbenchers had the opportunity. No doubt a good many members of the Liberal party feel a little bit uncomfortable today—and I do not blame them particularly.

Over the week end I happened to pick up one of the Montreal papers, which indicated that an energetic reporter had been talking with some of the Liberal members from Montreal regarding the recent Abbott announcement. I thought their answers were rather significant.

Mr. MacInnis: Grade 1 or grade 2 members?

Mr. Thatcher: I have before me the Montreal Standard of November 5, which quotes the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Healy) as follows:

> I am in favour of having rent controls continued. I do not want the controls taken off until housing conditions are improved.

The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Demers) stated:

> My personal opinion is that rent controls must not disappear until there are sufficient dwellings to satisfy the needs of the people.

Then the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Fournier):

> I am in favour of continuing rent controls as long as there is a shortage of housing.

[Mr. Johnston.]

The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux):

> I believe that the time has not yet arrived to give up rent control.

Next the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Hartt):

> My attitude is to continue rent control.

And the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Whitman):

> I believe rent controls are essential until the housing problem becomes solved.

I could quote some of the others.

Mr. Abbott: They are still on.

Mr. Thatcher: Only technically. A majority of the members from Montreal, with the exception of the Minister of Finance himself, seem to be in favour of rent control. I think there is room to argue that the residue of rent controls remaining is not, from a practical view, control at all.

I hope therefore that before the debate is concluded we may hear from some of the Liberal backbenchers. I hope they will not have been frightened by what the minister said today. I would hope, too, that when the Montreal members speak, they will speak as they did to the reporter last week. What is more, I hope after they have spoken in that manner, they will vote as they have talked—and not do as one Liberal member did yesterday, speak one way, and vote the other.

The reaction to these whopping rental increases across Canada can be described only as one of profound shock. In effect many landlords are going to be able to raise their rents from 20 to 25 per cent. The manner in which the minister introduced these rental increases last Thursday night is an affront to the authority of this parliament. As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said, the Minister of Finance presented us with a fait accompli. Members were given no opportunity to debate this basic issue. Even some of the Liberal backbenchers were shocked by the announcement. That is, they were shocked if we can believe what we read in the Ottawa Citizen, this morning.

I quote:

> Several rank-and-file Liberal members of parliament plan to ask the government to reconsider its announced intention of allowing 20 to 25 per cent boosts in domestic rental ceilings.
> A number of members are claiming the announced increases in rental ceilings came "as a complete surprise." They claim they had no idea before the announcement was made the increases would be as substantial as they were.

I do not blame my Liberal friends for being pretty peeved. Has parliament lost its right, Mr. Speaker, to even discuss a basic issue? Have we lost our right to debate a problem before a decision is announced? I am beginning to wonder if we have been sent down here—and I include Liberal members—simply to rubber-stamp decisions which the cabinet has already made. I hope that is not true, but if it is I want to say that there might be some danger in the future of our becoming as ineffective as the German Reichstag once was under Adolf Hitler. The way in which the cabinet has appeared to run things recently seems to me to be similar to the way the Cominform runs the Czechoslovakian government—by decree.

An hon. Member: Isn't that ridiculous.

Mr. Thatcher: Hon. members will not forget that the minister made his announcement last Thursday evening with only about five minutes left before the house adjourned. We did not even have time to ask questions let alone to debate the issue. Nor will hon. members forget either, that the minister who flouted the authority of parliament Thursday evening is the same minister who, a year and a half ago, introduced taxation by radio to Canada. As I understand these rental changes, they do not become effective until December 15.

Mr. Abbott: High class debate.

Mr. Thatcher: Why should not parliament have had the opportunity to debate the changes before they were actually introduced? Why were rent controls originally introduced? They were brought into being eight or nine years ago to prevent property owners, in face of the acute housing shortage, from taking undue advantage of the situation to charge excessive rents. In other words, they were introduced to help to keep the cost of living down to a reasonable figure. I will say at once that in my opinion rental control helped to do that but if rental control was desirable in 1941 why is it not desirable in 1949? Today the housing situation is infinitely worse than it was eight years ago. We can take the words of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) as proof of that fact because he said at page 118 of Hansard:

> New housing, even at the present record rate of production, is barely keeping up with current needs and making no important inroads into the backlog.

In the past eight or nine years our population has increased substantially, and as a consequence housing is in short supply. Landlords are in a better position today to charge unfair rent than they were in 1941. In my opinion the increases which the minister announced last Thursday night were so sharp that we can well question whether the residue of controls is of any practical value. The new regulations will render millions of Canadians vulnerable to the housing shortage and to the whims of their landlords. In many cases the last rental increases will mean a total increase of as much as 45 per cent since the first unfreezing order two years ago. Many Canadian tenants are going to be caught in the squeeze between higher rentals and the shortage of housing. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) admitted that much over the week end.

Mr. Sinclair: Will the hon. member permit a question? How does the hon. member calculate the figure of 45 per cent?

Mr. Thatcher: That is the total of the increases which have been made in the past 2 years. If the hon. member will check the regulations he will find I am correct.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member obviously did not listen to the minister when he made his statement.

Mr. Thatcher: I obviously did. I think you will find I am correct.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then you did not understand it.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh, yes, I did understand it. The over-all total increase in some cases is as much as 45 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: Forty per cent.

Mr. Thatcher: At the risk of arguing with a Rhodes scholar, I say almost 45 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, 40 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Do you support 40 per cent over there?

Mr. Thatcher: Over the week end the minister had a good many interviews—some of them rather unhappy. According to one reporter, the minister said he was sure that landlords would not take advantage of the full amount of increase allowed, but that they would be "kindly". I am sure some landlords will be reasonable and will not take all they can get, but I am equally sure there are many other landlords who will take every cent they can get, and who will not be kindly. I think the minister's admonition to some of these individuals will be about as effective as pleading with a weasel in a henhouse to be kindly.

Mr. Ferrie: What are you worrying about? Saskatchewan can do it. Saskatchewan can stop it.

Mr. Thatcher: Fortunately Saskatchewan has some stand-by legislation, but that is no fault of my hon. friend from wherever he comes from.

Mr. Cruickshank: Don't get excited.

Rent Control

Mr. Thatcher: In his speech last Thursday night the Minister of Finance made some very pious statements. I have heard a good many of his pious statements in the last few years, but I am beginning to take them with a grain of salt. At page 1433 of Hansard he said:

> The government intends to continue with its program of orderly decontrol as rapidly as conditions warrant . . .

Further on he said:

> We believe that gradual and orderly decontrol is the right policy.

Further on again he said:

> . . . it is our policy to permit this adjustment to be made gradually rather than abruptly.

Mr. Cruickshank: Don't you agree with that?

Mr. Thatcher: As he does so often, the minister talked one way and acted another, because as soon as he had said that the government believed in orderly decontrol, he announced drastic rental increases of 20 and 25 per cent. Where is there any consistency in that kind of action? I admit at once that there are cases of individual hardship so far as some landlords are concerned, and I think it is fair and reasonable, if that type of hardship exists, that those landlords should have been given some increase; but why give an increase right across the board regardless of whether or not there is hardship, and regardless of the type of property?

An hon. Member: Rough justice.

Mr. Thatcher: Surely if rental increases were needed at this time, surely if the minister was genuinely sincere in his statement that he wanted orderly decontrol, an increase of perhaps 5 per cent would have sufficed at this time. When rental control was introduced in 1941 the cost of living index stood at 111·7. Today the cost of living index is 162·2, an increase of almost 47 per cent. I say that Canadians are far more vulnerable today to rental increases than they would have been in 1941. Rental increases can only mean one thing. They will almost certainly mean that the cost of living index will reach an all-time high. That in turn will probably mean a new series of wage demands from the various unions which cannot help but have an inflationary effect. Many union leaders have already warned us of that fact. G. Russell Harvey, national organizer of the American Federation of Labor, had this to say on Saturday in Montreal:

> It is going to provide a dislocation of what was otherwise becoming a stabilized wage condition. Now, it has become necessary for labour to demand higher wages to meet the added cost of living forced by the increases in rents.

I believe that the government of Canada once again has sacrificed the obvious well-being of the majority of our citizens to a privileged group, this time the property owners. It is quite true that the minister is getting rid of a political headache, but by prematurely scrapping rental controls the government is indirectly causing extreme hardship, and unnecessarily so, to a great many people of Canada. Trade unions, consumer organizations, veteran groups and many other groups have been protesting. The views of one of the officers of the Canadian Legion are to be found in the Toronto Star of November 5 in an article reading as follows:

> Norman Gillespie, chairman of the housing committee of the Quebec command of the Canadian Legion, said the government, in allowing the increases, had broken faith with Canadian fighting men who died to make it possible for landlords to retain their properties. "Instead of families being protected, they are being exploited," he said.

May I say that the C.C.F. group dislikes controls as much as any other party in the house. We dislike controls for the sake of control. If there were adequate housing in Canada, and if there were any other way of keeping rents down, we would be quite happy to see rentals decontrolled; but that is not the case.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is it not true that Saskatchewan or any other province can take over rent control, if it wishes?

Mr. Thatcher: I am coming to that in a moment; I have a major point I want to make, but I thank the hon. member for his question.

Mr. Sinclair: You will never get to it.

Mr. Thatcher: I shall get there in a minute. In the minister's statement there was one significant sentence at page 1433 of Hansard:

> The government has therefore decided to refer the question of the validity of the rental regulations to the supreme court . . .

This means that nine years after the law was passed, nine years during which the government has been enforcing it, the minister suddenly decides to go to the courts to see whether or not it is valid. As Shakespeare might have said: There is something rotten in the state—not Denmark this time, but in Canada. Personally I believe this government is trying to get rid of its responsibility for maintaining rental controls in exactly the same way it dealt with the margarine issue. It is going to do everything in its power to have the supreme court throw out all rental controls, as far as the federal government is concerned. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has had the reputation in many parts of Canada of being the extreme right winger of the Liberal government. Perhaps he is proud of that reputation; I do not know. I want to tell him, however, that after his performance in the last few days, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is becoming a first-rate challenger for that very dubious honour.

I say the government betrayed the confidence of the electors of Canada, who supported them so strongly in the last election, in abandoning rent control; and I believe the government is shirking its responsibility in a very cold, very calculating way. Today the ten provincial governments are the last line of defence, one might say, to protect tenants from landlords who may wish to raise rents too high. Let us hope these provincial governments will act with a great deal more courage than has been shown by the Minister of Finance. I am happy to know that in Saskatchewan we have stand-by legislation. I believe ours is the only provincial government having legislation of that kind, and I am reasonably sure that our provincial government will retain rental controls there.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this matter, inasmuch as our city is very much interested in it. I do not intend to criticize what the government has done, or what anyone has done. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who moved the motion, referred to something I had forgotten about, a motion in connection with a national housing and reconstruction policy which I moved on February 17, 1936. The subheading reads:

> Proposed measures in respect of housing, land settlement, reforestation; youth in education, industry and employment.

The motion was in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, Canada should immediately adopt a comprehensive national housing, building, reconstruction, renovation, slum clearance, land settlement and reforestation policy adapted to its circumstances. . . .

In that connection I suggested that a committee should be appointed. This motion was moved in 1936, when conditions throughout the world were bad. People were out of work; large numbers of our youths were riding the rods; thousands of my constituents were on relief; skilled workers, carpenters, bricklayers, lathers, plasterers, men who had never known what it was to be without employment, were walking the streets. In the riding I represented at that time sixty-five per cent of the people owned their own homes, but because of the intolerable conditions which obtained many lost their properties. As I said at that time, the wealth of this country does not consist only of the natural resources of the sea, of the soil, of the forest, of the mine or of the lakes; it does not consist only of the grain in our great elevators or the shipping in our harbours. There is a more glorious treasure than that. It is the character of our people. This character, through unemployment and the lack of housing, has been gradually destroyed. The care of our young citizens is our most important duty. Several billion dollars have been spent on the construction of railways but only a few million have been spent on housing. Our school boards are doing the best they can, but they are having a hard time of it.

As I said, at that time we were in difficulty because of world conditions. Now we must realize that the housing question is very closely associated with public health. Unless you have proper housing you cannot have a healthy rising generation. What did they do over in the mother country, which has been criticized so much in late years? They led the whole civilized world at that time. Our former sovereign, King Edward VIII, was one of the pioneers in this connection. He visited the slums of London and Wales, and travelled all over Britain. In 1937 he awakened the whole country to the necessity of correcting the slum problem. What was the result of his campaign? Two million new homes were constructed under the auspices of various public and private bodies.

We have to look at the cause and effect of this whole problem. Canada was once a nation of property owners. Practically every man owned a property of some sort, but that is not the situation today. I have no doubt that our own city does more to provide for our city suburbs sewers, water service, roads, health services, cheap light and power and efficient transportation than any other city in Canada. As I say, in the old days practically everyone owned some property; a small farm, a market garden, a grocery store, a mill or something of the kind. We were all property owners, some small, some moderate, and some large; but this condition gradually changed. What caused that change? Canadians owned real estate; and that individual ownership, on the comparatively extensive scale on which it then existed, was the basis of Canada's national life. But the politics of big business has practically destroyed pastoral Canada, and it is the duty of parliament, the duty of members of all parties, to take this into consideration. We must dedicate our efforts to a solution to this problem of housing, and one of the most effective means of bringing that about is to restore the condition that existed when most people owned a little property, as in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and Whitney in Ontario.

Then Canada was indeed the land of the free; Canada was the home of artisans and farmers; Canada was a democratic country.

In nothing is the determined spirit of the mother country more evident than in her program of construction of new homes. People who have been in England in the past two or three years have returned to Canada enraptured with what they saw over there in the construction of new houses; the spirit of the mother country has been particularly evident in what she has done in that direction. Large apartment houses are going up all over the countryside. Houses have been built by government subsidy, and England has shown her determination properly to house as large a proportion as possible of the poorer classes of the population. One man remarked to me that low-cost housing there had ceased to be a political issue, and I submit that the same should be true in this country. Low-cost housing is a permanent government policy in England; long may it continue. And it should be here as well. There is great need for construction of houses, not only urban but suburban and rural as well, the last mentioned being the most needed of all. Let me quote something I came across in the reading room the other day. This newspaper item is typical of many; it refers to Windsor:

> Today is moving day in the historic and picturesque village of Coinbrook, on the Bath road, near Slough.

That is something that was done in England in the olden days.

Now, I shall conclude what I have to say in a few moments because there are several other members who wish to speak. So far as I can see, this country needs a housing program now.

As I say, this question has been related to public health. In last Sunday's Montreal Standard, I noticed that the fourteen members from the Montreal district stated a policy for Montreal island. If hon. members were consulted, I believe they would say the same thing, that is that a control system with some variations should be continued until the supply of houses is sufficient. Small prefabricated houses should be built. I remember that Mr. Churchill was responsible for the building of about 500,000 of those prefabricated houses in England during 1945 or 1946. The materials were secured in Canada. What have we been doing in this country? We have been doing very little.

I believe that the notice given by the government is too short. Nearly four million tenants will be affected by the new regulations which have been announced. I do not think the policy of the government commends itself to the country. There is no use in the government kicking the football over here because, as astute politicians, we would kick it right back to them. The government of the day is responsible for a proper housing policy, a proper reconstruction policy and a proper slum clearance policy. It is not for the opposition to do that. The opposition does not seek any political advantage from it.

As has been said in this debate, we gave the government fair warning of what would happen in 1936 or nearly 14 years ago. The policy of the government now is to pass the matter over and to criticize the provinces. If it had not been for the fine autumn weather, which was a blessing to the people of this country, people would have suffered severely from the lack of housing. It was very fortunate that all fall we had fair weather and it looks like the hand of Providence. I believe the first duty of a government is to look after the health, wealth, peace, happiness, prosperity and housing of its people. It should be a national program. One of the mistakes we made at confederation was that some of these matters were not transferred to federal jurisdiction. I believe that housing is really a national problem today.

In connection with my own city, I believe that nothing has contributed to the lack of housing as much as the lack within the city of cheap land. There is no cheap land in the city. I can tell you that land is now about $65 per foot, what little there is left of it in the city. The member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) may remember the time we built a civic carline on the Danforth from Broadview avenue to the east end. It was necessary to acquire from the north side from the township of York all the land for about two hundred and twenty feet on the north side of the street in order to widen the street. It cost little or no money to build that carline. Another streetcar line was the one on Gerrard street. The land was secured for $6 per foot, and that was true even down in the Greenwood riding. Six tickets for ten cents was the rate in those days.

The working people were encouraged by that car service, by the cheap tickets, by the cheap light and by the municipal services. Those services were extended away out into the county, into York township. Suppose this chamber were the city proper. There is the lake and the bay to the south. We extended these services to the east of the city proper, out into the county of York and away to the north beyond the city limits. All the people in this locality were given the same privileges, cheap light, sewers, water, and police protection. There were lots of good roads. I remember when we could not get milk into our city. We had to establish the first good roads in Canada, which extended for a radius of fifteen miles from the city. So, I say the government should not be so quick in turning this back to the provinces.

I do not believe the notice is any good; it is too short. The provinces should have been consulted before any move was made. I believe the members from the city of Toronto are of the same opinion as the Montreal members. Until such time as the supply of houses is sufficient, new regulations for rent control should not be passed. I may say that if the city of Toronto had a suburban service like Montreal, it could solve its own housing problem. There is no land in the city except at $65 per foot. Then there is the matter of these people being turned out of their houses. There are about four million tenants who are in fear of this in Canada.

What is more necessary than a house? If a person has not a home, he has not anything. The lack of a home interferes with family life and causes many other evils such as delinquency. Just look at the front page of the Ottawa Citizen today. According to it, four million tenants are to be evicted before Christmas. One of the Ottawa judges blames the lack of housing for crime in this city. I believe that something should be done to construct, as early as possible, half a million of these prefabricated small houses such as those that were constructed at Three Rivers, Oshawa and many other places.

Without a steam suburban service I believe that we can make little headway even if the program of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is adopted. Certainly with no cheap land in the city, and without a steam suburban service, there is no chance of our solving the housing program out in the county of York, and we need not look for any scheme to do it. Without transportation and the civic services, the new housing plans will not be worth anything.

In conclusion I want to say this. Many people have been burned to death in the ramshackle buildings that are being used. I have seen houses, occupied by soldiers who served in the second war, in which the windows had to be shut because of smoke; some of these houses are not fit for human habitation, in my opinion. A couple of people were burned in a fire on Church street. I notice that in a fire in the maritimes, five were burned last week end. Fires occur in these old condemned buildings which are not fit for human habitation, and many people have been burned.

As I say, I believe we should have some proper system. This housing problem follows every great war. The Addington administration had it; the two Pitts had it. The question of control and decontrol is one which should not be so suddenly turned over to the provinces. The number of eviction orders which the senior county court judge of the county of York has had runs into the thousands. I believe that something should be done along the lines I suggest.

As to the new way of doing this business, turning it over so suddenly, and passing a new order in council, is all wrong. I believe we should continue some controls. No doubt some soldiers should be allowed to get into their own homes. I believe there should be some variation in order to enable them to do that. People who fought for their country should have some relief accordingly. But I say that the time is too short for the government to take this action at the start of this winter, that the order is too hasty and that it is going to lead to untold hardships during the coming winter. I have in my hand a picture which shows 47 people in Montreal living on top of an old fire station, a place which is unfit for human habitation.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Chairman, the housing problem is surely one of the major issues stirring up public opinion at the present time. The housing shortage is all the more surprising in that it affects a country that prides itself, and rightly so, on its high industrial potential. There is a shortage throughout the country as a whole but for a long time it has been growing steadily worse in the larger cities. For a long time the situation has reached the critical stage and threatens to lead to consequences whose effects can hardly be foreseen or even exaggerated. This over-all breakdown of the housing industry seems the more irritating in that it affects a country that is privileged in the matter of space and raw materials, such as iron, lumber, etc., in a country where manpower, both plentiful and skilled, is already haunted in certain districts by the spectre of unemployment. Indeed, in some Canadian cities, the housing shortage is almost as acute as in some European countries, where density of population reaches 7,500 people per square mile, as in Belgium, or as in countries devastated by two world wars, in 1914 and in 1939.

Travellers returning from Europe all marvel at the way in which countries so badly damaged by bombing during the last war have managed to rebuild, under particularly difficult circumstances. It may be said, due allowances being made, that the housing situation in Belgium and in Europe is better than here in Canada. Great Britain, France and other countries stand as shining examples that should inspire our own government's policy in this connection.

It is not difficult to understand the reasons for those countries' desperate attempts to solve their housing problem. Housing is among the first concerns of any civilization. It may be said that material civilization consists in properly solving the threefold problem of food, clothing and shelter!

Is it not heart-breaking that our workers are still anxiously wondering where they will find a dwelling, and pay the rent at the end of each month?

I suggest that the matter has not been carefully considered by this government and was settled in a hasty, easy and haphazard way. No constructive, practical and final solution to this knotty problem was evolved by those who had undertaken to consider it. Did peace dry up the source of the energy we displayed throughout the war? How can such a great gap in the domestic economy of our national policy be explained and justified? Are war conditions the indispensable incentives to the vast building projects of which we gave so many examples for the benefit of our allies in Europe during the six years of the last war?

Yet this housing situation has been a feature of our policy many years before the war. This government itself has seen the premonitory signs of the ill we are now deploring. Has it taken any action with a view to preventing the threatening housing shortage? With the coming of war the government has enacted protective measures for the benefit of tenants, who form an overwhelming majority of the population. All citizens have welcomed such a manifestation of elementary prudence on its part during the war years. However, everyone was expecting a solution to this emergency; none has been forthcoming, and we are still awaiting one. The visionless, listless and neglectful policy of the government is responsible for that. To govern is to foresee. The government should have foreseen this emergency and devised means to meet it. It has seen the people accept with heroic patience rationing, as well as the restrictive and repressive measures of the sad period of the European tragedy. It has taken for granted that the patience of the victims of that period of sacrifices would last forever; it has relied on that to postpone the solving of the serious problem which is involved in providing housing for the middle and the working classes in Canada. The war is over. Victory is still floating in the folds of the future Canadian flag. Apparently we are in a period of full prosperity. How can we believe those Liberal prophets when hundreds of Canadian family heads are wondering if they will have tomorrow a lodging for their wives and children? Nothing can justify this uninterrupted standstill in the building industry. The sons of the most humble families are apprehensive; their eyes are troubled by the vision of furniture on the sidewalks. Yet they have contributed in no small measure to the victory of our armies. Many are proud to wear military medals which bear testimony to their gallantry. Still they are not sure that tomorrow they shall still have a home, a place to rest after their daily toil.

What miracle, what prodigy is the government awaiting before setting itself into action to find an efficient solution, an adequate remedy to the present crisis which has already lasted too long and worsens daily? The country was prosperous in wartime. The government did not hesitate to spend billions in order to build destructive weapons for our European allies. We rejoice that the sacrifices made by the Canadian people have brought timely relief to those unjustly oppressed populations who, alas, foresee once more the bloody spectre of a new, perhaps remote but more murderous adventure. But we are now living in time of peace. Our natural resources are still there, awaiting peaceful mobilization in favour of our closest allies, the Canadian population. Productively, our manpower is still strong. It is time to capitalize on the financial possibilities of a huge country whose government should be concerned chiefly with the housing of all its citizens.

Far from introducing encouraging and beneficial measures, the Minister of Finance has just taken the tenants by surprise in announcing very drastically a disappointing and substantial raise of 20 and 25 per cent in the present rental rates. The government have always been praised for their insinuating policy, for proceeding by stages before enacting. The undercover processes resorted to during the war had only confirmed this subtle and disturbing diplomacy. The sudden announcement by the Minister of Finance has left all our population worried, especially the tenants, who are nonplussed and distressed before a fact brought to them in such a sudden and disappointing manner. Why was that important announcement not made before the election or during the electoral campaign? Was it for fear of disastrous results at the polls?

Were landlords right in hoping, prior to the elections, that a few months after June 27 they would be able to obtain a generous increase in rents? It would surely be interesting to know the answers to all these questions. At any rate, the time has come to take heed of the legitimate requests of tenants. The government should avail itself of all the means at its disposal to end that lamentable and ridiculous situation in a country where there is no reason for such an internal calamity. It is praiseworthy to help the various nations of the world in times of emergency, but in peacetime it is the duty of the government to achieve prosperity for its citizens. A country cannot be prosperous as long as its workers are threatened with being thrown out in the street on the very eve of a hard winter. An increase such as the one which the Minister of Finance has just inflicted on tenants will not solve the problem. I therefore urge, on behalf not only of my constituency but of the low-income group, that is to say of tenants all over the country, immediate settlement of this intolerable condition.

Every conflict has found us ready to struggle, to co-operate, even at the cost of billions of dollars. Let the government now show the same concern, the same spirit of self-sacrifice—I ought to say a keener sense of justice and a greater interest in social security—so that our country may break this humiliating deadlock brought about by its internal policy.

Policies such as the Quebec farm loan should make the government aware of the goodwill and solvency of our country's little people; they appreciate the confidence and benefits bestowed upon them by public authorities.

No one can be unaware of the seriousness of the situation in which hundreds of thousands of householders find themselves. Their modest budgets will not allow them, no matter how hard they try, to meet the landlord's new demands. That capitalism will again lose a few feathers, soon to be picked up by the evil-boding bird of communism, is easily foreseen.

The government's decision to refer the rentals control act to the supreme court is not likely to allay a natural concern. This action can do nothing to help the tenant pay his rent. This astute legal device will only add to the irritation of the victims of the coming increase.

Who is it that has been legislating in this field for nine years? Who is it that has brought us to our present difficulties? Who is it that has steered the ship of Canada for nine years, heedless of the recriminations and protests of all and sundry? It is this government. They have no right to throw the helve after the hatchet in this matter of housing and to shift their responsibilities upon others. It is up to the present government to continue its task, as long as this acute shortage prevails, of bridging this gap for which it is responsible. It must find the means whereby a quick and satisfactory solution will be brought to the problem of exorbitant rentals and shortage of housing in this country! The present government has just taken an anti-social and anti-family stand which has created grave unrest among the working classes.

If the present administration uses its accidental and absolute majority to impose dilatory and vexatious measures, it will only succeed in further upsetting the lack of balance of our economic machinery. It is not normal that the government should hesitate in these days of peace and prosperity —a prosperity which has been extolled from every meeting hall—to treat with fairness the people of this country who, for too long now, have been worried and uncertain about the future.

The people do not want any special privilege but only claim for themselves an unequivocal and vital right, from the governments which are entrusted with their economic well-being. If every family cannot be suitably housed at a decent price whom shall the present administration convince that prosperity has been brought to this country by five years of peace after victory?

(Text):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wish to place myself on record as protesting, in the name of the population in my riding, against the new rental increases as announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last Thursday. It is a measure which will bring hardship to the majority of Canadians, and which has taken everyone by surprise. To date we have yet to be given some reason for the move. Nowhere have we seen proof that such a tremendous increase was necessary.

On the contrary, rentals have always been one of the major factors in the high cost of living. That is why it is so regrettable that the government has permitted an increase which will heavily load the budgets of the majority of Canadian families. Even before these latest increases many families have had to cut into their food budgets to pay their rent. The situation would be different if they could move to other homes offering rentals in accordance with their means. However at this time, five years after the war, the housing situation is so far from being solved that such a means must be disregarded completely.

I believe the government has shown a complete disregard for the welfare of the ordinary Canadian citizen. Everywhere since last Thursday, from all across Canada, and especially from Quebec and the island of Montreal, these new increases have brought discouraged protests from our people. In my own riding more than 75 per cent of the population is going to be hit by this Christmas present from the Liberal government.

Before taking my seat I should like to ask the minister for the last time to reconsider his decision. Our population really deserves better treatment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the other evening I addressed the house for a few minutes on the principle of the measure now under consideration and that involved in Bill No. 66, to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company. Tonight we are dealing with Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. I want to apologize to the hon. member, who is the sponsor of the bill now under discussion, for not having a copy of it at the time. As I see it, the principle of this bill, and that of the bill to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company, are the same. Shall we part with any more of our natural resources? I have always taken the position that it is almost impossible to part with any more of the natural wealth of Canada in the way we have been doing.

We had an illustration the other day in connection with forests. Hon. members on both sides of the house rose and wanted to preserve our forest resources and timber wealth, and all the other things that flow therefrom, for the people of Canada. We have the same situation as to pipe lines and the Pipe Lines Act. Will it develop Canada? That should be the first consideration. Is it right, just and proper that we should develop our natural resources for the benefit of other countries? As I said the other day, we had a similar situation with regard to power in the Niagara river. In 1905 the power resources of the Niagara river were under private ownership. Yesterday a return was made in the house—at the moment I have not a copy of it—which referred to the millions of kilowatt hours that were given away by private ownership to the people of the United States. I admit that we owe a great deal to the United States for their kindness and help in both world wars, but nevertheless they are our competitors in an economic way, in a financial way, in a military way. We are even following their social security program to a great extent. We have given first consideration to what is for the benefit of that great nation to the south of us which is more or less our friendly competitor for the wealth of Canada.

You have recently had to consider the question of power in the Niagara river. At the time Sir James Whitney became premier of Ontario, private ownership was giving away pretty nearly all the power in the Niagara river, but when Sir James Whitney came into office in 1905 he cancelled the remaining issues of power which were granted under the Ross-Hardy Liberal government. What did he then do? He instituted what is commonly known as the hydroelectric development, which was a blessing to the people of Canada. Yesterday a return was made in the house—again, I am sorry that I have not a copy at the moment, but I hope to get one shortly—showing the large number of kilowatt hours of power which have been exported from Canada. In Ontario it is a very large amount, and in Quebec it is about the same. I think Ontario has exported more than Quebec to develop industry across the border. The return also referred to the other provinces, and showed that a lesser amount of direct current is generated.

Are we going to continue this policy? I cannot refer to the various clauses of the present bill because it is a composite one. This measure and the bill to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company are the same in principle although the directors are different. This bill was considered in another place the other day, and you will notice that there was a four-line discussion there. That was all that was said on second and third readings. Is that fair? Is that the way to confer a franchise? I hope the house will notice what is being created by this particular bill. You are creating a franchise and giving away the physical assets and natural resources of Canada. To whom? To private ownership.

My contention is that these great natural resources should belong to the people of Canada so that they may be used for the development of Canada and not for the development of our competitor. While the United States is a friendly nation, and we owe a lot to them, nevertheless they are our friendly competitors. If I had the time I could show the direct saving that has been made in the power of the Niagara river. I should like to quote three or four paragraphs from a speech I made on June 15, 1925, on the export of power. Today the export of power is nearly ten times as great as it was then. The excerpt reads:

1. Every dollar of the $160 million hydro investment is earning interest and sinking fund.

2. Hydro investment saved Ontario from a coal famine that would have bankrupted the province in wartime.

That was in 1917.

3. Hydro investment saved 2,200,000 shareholders over $75 million in reduced coal, light and power bills.

4. Hydro investment saved Ontario over $100 million on coal prices, which would have gone to $30 per ton in wartime but for the hydro investment that gave Ontario the equivalent of 3,000,000 tons of United States coal per annum.

That is a short story of the development of power on the Niagara river and that value has increased by about ten times today. Now, are we going to give away this franchise? If this bill is sent to a committee I doubt if it will be given any study at all. We had an example of that in connection with another bill two years ago, concerning the Bell Telephone Company; and we saw what happened in that case. That bill was initiated in the other place, which is well named. They seem to consider these bills in a different way over there.

We represent the people of this country, and we have no right to confer a franchise like this. Look at the bill; what does it contain? I cannot refer to the various sections on second reading, but there seems to be a different principle in almost each section. You will see that one section confers power to construct and operate pipe lines for the transmission of gas, oil or any liquid product or by-product. The company is also given power to hold lands. Under various sections of the bill the company is given very wide powers. Then they take out various sections of the Companies Act; in other words, this franchise is conferred upon this private company without the protection afforded by some sections of the Companies Act. Other sections of that act are specifically mentioned; sections 12(7) 39, 40, 59, 62, 63, 64, 65 and 91 of part I of the Companies Act, 1934, are to apply to the company provided that wherever in subsection 7 of section 12 and in section 59 the words "letters patent" or "supplementary letters patent" appear, the words "special act" shall be substituted therefor. So this special act, considered by the Senate, exempts this company from the provisions of certain sections of that general act.

This company is asking a franchise to do what? Well, about the only things that are not covered by the bill are the heavens above, the earth below and the waters beneath the earth. How we can consider a thing like this? Then I call attention to another feature. We are asked to give this company certain privileges and rights which in my opinion should never be given to any company. No one knows just what is involved. This all follows the adoption of the Pipe Lines Act, which as I said the other evening I think should be called the pipe dream act; I believe that would be a far better title for it. Under that act they can give away anything they like, and now we are asked to confer a franchise upon this company for all time. One of the provisions with respect to the development of power in Ontario was that the people had to vote on all these matters. That protects them when a franchise is sought in the province of Ontario. We have a clause in the municipal act providing that no municipality may give away a franchise without the consent of the ratepayers, and that is good legislation. Many of the younger men in the house came up from the municipalities, the villages, towns and cities. I saw the other day that our honoured and respected Clerk was given a reception and thanked for what he had done for his town in Quebec, and rightly so. I was pleased to see the tribute he was paid in the town from which he comes. Protection such as I have mentioned is a wise step; without the consent of the ratepayers no franchise for the use of the public streets may be granted.

What are these people going to do under this special act? Are they going to rip up the streets? They can do anything they wish. They can transmit anything they like across the border, to help build up the economy of the United States. Our two countries are supposed to be friendly competitors in trade. Eaton's and Simpson's are friendly rivals for trade, but they are also good businessmen. So are these people in the United States who are our competitors. If this is the way business is done in the other place, I think some changes should be made. In connection with the bill to which I was referring the other evening, I had the report of proceedings in the Senate. The bill was introduced, sent to committee, reported back and put through, and the whole procedure only took up three or four lines in Hansard. If that is the way they confer franchises I am surprised at the high court of parliament, and I can only say that is not the way to part with the wealth of this country.

Years ago Houston's Annual used to be a textbook in all the stock exchanges across the country. Now they have a different book with a blue cover, listing all companies and showing their affiliations with each other. What does that book show? It shows the way these companies are interlocked. I looked up some of these points not long ago, and found that all our natural wealth along the Ottawa river is owned and financed in New York. The timber, the gold, the silver, the platinum, the zinc, the asbestos and all the other things are shipped out in raw form, and there manufactured into finished articles, providing employment for thousands of men and producing wealth amounting to millions of dollars. Is that the way for us to build up this country? How are we going to develop our natural resources under such a policy? Is that the way to create employment? Do not forget that we may run into a depression. Nobody can tell. It may come like a thief in the night. Is that the way to create employment? I say no. What we have to do is to veto these bills. There is no use talking about friendly competitors in these days.

The question is, are you going to give over the natural resources and the natural wealth of this country to private people to exploit for gain, or are you going to reserve the natural resources of our country—I have only mentioned a few of them—for the development of our country. I believe in a policy of Canada for Canadians, trade and industry and everything else. Our own work for our own workmen; our own markets for our own products; that is the policy in which I believe. I believe that policy has built up this country. For those reasons, I am going to vote against second reading of the bill. No one else is prepared to move a six months' hoist on the principle of the bill. If I can get a seconder, I shall be glad to move that this bill be read a second time on a date six months from today.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill merits the careful consideration of the members of the house. This evening I propose to say a few words about it. In the first place, a word about some terms of the bill which is, as all members know, a bill to incorporate a company known as the Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. The men who are applying for the incorporation are five in number, and are all solicitors, either of Toronto or of Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should discuss the principle of the bill at this time. The hon. member is now referring to a section of the bill, and on second reading the principle should be discussed.

Mr. Green: I mentioned the applicants for incorporation because I propose to bring that into my submission at a later stage. It is quite obvious that the applicants are merely acting for some other interests.

The bill gives this proposed company the power to construct and operate a pipe line, for both natural gas and oil. By virtue of a statute passed at the session of the house last spring, which was known as the Pipe Lines Act, if this company receives incorporation, it will have the very wide powers outlined in that foundation bill. For example, it will have wide power to enter on property to make surveys and construct a pipe line, and it will have extremely wide powers of expropriation. One other feature about the terms of the bill itself is that the company is given these powers within the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada.

Before continuing, I think something should be said about what happened in this house last spring. Those members who survived the holocaust of June 27 will remember that the Pipe Lines Act was brought into the house a day or two before prorogation. At the same time several of these private bills were brought in, under which approximately five different companies were eventually incorporated. At that stage in the session it was impossible to give careful consideration either to the foundation bill or to those private bills.

Members will recall that the private bills were referred to the standing committee on railways, canals, and telegraph lines. During one of the evenings of the last week of the session there was a meeting of the committee which lasted about half an hour. The men representing the various companies were present and gave brief explanations. I think the committee took an average of about five or ten minutes on each of those private bills. I do not believe anyone can dispute the fact that this house did not have an opportunity in April to give careful consideration either to the Pipe Lines Act or to any of those private bills. Everything was put through in great haste. We were told that the Imperial Oil had to commence laying the pipe line from Edmonton to Regina at once, and that if the bills were not put through western Canada would suffer.

The time has now come, Mr. Speaker, when it is the duty of this house to give more careful consideration to pipe line bills. I think it is our duty to insist that this bill, or any legislation that goes through the house from now on dealing with pipe lines, must be in the best form possible. It need not necessarily be in exactly the same form as the legislation which went through in such a hurry last April. I suggest to the house that there are several things that should be taken care of in legislation of this type.

In the first place, the general route that is to be followed by the pipe line should be set out in each of these bills. If we pass this bill in its present form, we are giving a blank cheque to the company. In the case of some of the bills, we are simply saying, "You can build a pipe line anywhere in Canada," and in the case of this particular bill we are saying, "You can instal a pipe line anywhere in Alberta or British Columbia". It certainly is the responsibility of parliament to go into the question in more detail than that, and to decide the approximate route the pipe line should take.

I should like to point out what happened in connection with this particular bill when it was before the other place. I do wish, Mr. Speaker, we were allowed to say the Senate; it would be more understandable. When this bill was before the other place, the sponsor explained the route of this particular pipe line. The members will find that on page 117 of the Senate Hansard.

> The sponsors of the bill are Canadians; they have completed their engineering studies for the construction of the pipe line, and propose to transport gas across a corner of British Columbia, up to Trail, and through to the coast at a point near Seattle,— > —and thence up to Vancouver.

Which is, of course, in the United States.

Now, that was the statement made in the Senate. But when the bill was introduced in this house the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) told a different story. As reported at page 1344 of Hansard, this is what he said:

> I wish to make it clear that the passing of this bill does not in any way establish routes for the transmission lines for this company.

Then on the next page he said:

> I should like to inform the house that the bill has nothing to do with routes. There is nothing in it that establishes a route.

If we turn back to the days when railway charters were being granted by parliament, we find that in the incorporating statute the routes were set out. I have here the statutes for 1902, containing an act known as chapter 62, an act to incorporate the Essex Terminal Railway Company. It constitutes certain men a corporation but it has a paragraph which sets out the line of railway authorized; that is section 8, which reads as follows:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway, of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches, from a point in or near the town of Walkerville, through the townships of Sandwich East and Sandwich West, and the city of Windsor, to some point in or near the town of Sandwich, and through the town of Sandwich, the townships of Sandwich West and Anderdon to a point in or near the town of Amherstburg.

Then I have here another act. This time the petitioner was the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is chapter 79 of the statutes of 1919. It gives the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the authority to build seven different lines of railway but in each case says approximately where that line is to go. Finally, I have here the statutes of 1924. In chapter 82 we find an act to incorporate Joliette and Northern Railway Company. It is the same type of act. It constitutes certain men a corporation. Then there is this section which sets out where the line of railway must go. Section 9 reads as follows:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point in or near the town of Joliette, in the county of Joliette, in the province of Quebec, in a north by northwesterly direction to a point in or near the village of St. Michel des Saints in the county of Berthier, and thence by the most feasible route to a point on the National Transcontinental Railway at or near Parent, a distance of about one hundred and sixty miles.

That has been the practice followed with railways, and I suggest that we should adopt the same practice with regard to these pipe lines. This house cannot decide on the merits of these applications for statutes incorporating a private company unless the members of the house know where the pipe line is to go. It is not good enough to have somebody read in the paper that it is going to be in such and such an area.

The same point was raised in the other place in a debate on October 4, that debate being on the other pipe line bill, incorporating the Alberta Natural Gas Company. There Hon. Mr. Hugessen raised this point. At page 81 of the debates of the Senate he is reported to have said:

> I was just wondering whether the bills we passed last year specifically stated the particular area in which the companies intended to build.

And he went on to say:

> I think in the future that parliament should take care to see that this is done.

I submit this evening therefore that we should take care to see that in each one of these private bills there is written in the area in which the pipe line is to be laid.

There is another provision which I suggest should be written into this legislation, and that is a provision to the effect that Canadian requirements must be met first by the companies before they export their product to the United States. There is a provision of that type in a statute known as the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which is chapter 54 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1927. There we find it written into the act:

Any such licence—

That is any licence for the export of fluid.

—may provide that the quantity of power or fluid—

Which fluid would include gas and oil.

—to be exported shall be limited to the surplus, after the licensee has supplied for distribution to customers for use in Canada power or fluid to the extent defined by such licence, at prices and in accordance with conditions, rules and regulations prescribed by the governor in council.

My submission is that some provision of that type should be written into each one of these private bills.

In the case of the bill we are now discussing there is of course no attempt whatever to meet the requirements of Canada before exporting to the United States. The statement made in the Senate shows that the pipe line is to go from southern Alberta through the Crowsnest pass into British Columbia, and then down into the United States at the first convenient place. Once it goes into the United States it will go to Spokane and eventually to Seattle and Portland.

In the Senate there was a suggestion that there would be a branch of this pipe line up into Trail in the valley of the Columbia river in Canada. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether that would be done. Certainly the main object is to get into Washington and Oregon. The suggestion is made that eventually this pipe line will reach Vancouver. It may or it may not. There may or may not be any gas left over by the time it gets to Vancouver, and the United States authorities may or may not permit that pipe line to come back into Canada once it has gone into the United States. I doubt very much whether they would give that permission.

In any event, the pipe line certainly will be of little value to any other part of British Columbia. Actually, in going through the Crowsnest pass it will put gas in competition with the coal industry in that pass. As hon. members from British Columbia know, the Crowsnest district depends largely on coal for employment. If this bill is passed, and if this company goes ahead as is suggested, the result will be the development of Washington and Oregon. I would point out that it is not only gas that is involved. They are also taking the power to pipe oil there. If they pipe oil, then we shall have refineries established down in Spokane or Seattle, giving employment to Americans, and Canada can just wait or possibly the west coast can continue indefinitely to import her oil from the United States. It would mean giving employment to Americans instead of to Canadians.

The situation is even worse than that because British Columbia is in direct competition with Washington and Oregon. Our lumbermen have to compete with lumbermen of Washington and Oregon. Our fishermen compete with the fishermen of Washington and Oregon. Our fruit growers are in competition with fruit growers down the same valleys in Washington. You may well have the position that the Americans in competition with us are getting Canadian gas and Canadian oil while the people in British Columbia cannot get these commodities.

The bill which was passed last session did not have that objection, because that company's line was to come from northern Alberta down through the province of British Columbia, serving practically every community in that province, and once it served Vancouver and New Westminster nobody could have any objection to the surplus being exported to the United States. There was a plan which I suggest was in the best interest of Canada. For that reason the bill passed last session without any opposition whatever.

I repeat, there should be written into these acts some provision that Canadian requirements are to be met first. The premier of Alberta has taken that stand. During previous debates letters from him have been read in the house. One of them will be found at page 1345 of Hansard. In that letter he pointed out the requirements of the government of Alberta before they would issue a licence. The third requirement was:

It will be a condition of any export permit that Canadian requirements must be given first priority.

I am asking that that condition be put in this bill, and that in every pipe-line bill there should be a condition that Canadian requirements must be given first priority. The suggestion will be made that that can be left to the board of transport commissioners. Mr. Speaker, it is not the job of the board of transport commissioners to lay down a policy of that kind. If that is the policy of the government it should be laid down in a statute by parliament and not just left to the board of transport commissioners.

May I mention something else in connection with these pipe-line bills. I believe that hon. members should be very careful to see that these bills are not merely in furtherance of a promotion scheme. There is big money involved in this business. In a few months or a year's time we may find that we have granted these charters to some solicitors and that they were acting for some promoters, and that these promotors have sold the charters for hundreds of thousands of dollars. That is a situation against which this house must guard. Let the people who are really behind these applications for private bills come into this house and ask for incorporation themselves so that we may know to whom we are giving these rights. If there are big oil companies involved let us know about them. When a company was incorporated last spring to build a pipe line from Edmonton to Regina we were told that the Imperial Oil Company was behind that company; that it was in effect a subsidiary of the Imperial Oil Company. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) may correct me if I am wrong in this, but there was another private bill incorporating a company known as the British American Pipe Line Company. We were told that that company was a subsidiary of several of the major oil companies. Hon. members had that information. But in the case of the bill now before us we have no idea whatever who is behind it.

Mr. Howe: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is not the proper place to get that information the committee of railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Green: No, I do not believe it is. I believe that we should establish a practice here of insisting on knowing who the men are who are asking for these great rights. Let us know their names. Certainly the sponsor of the bill could have told us who was behind this company. I suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the wise way for this house to handle these bills is to insist on being told such facts before approving the bill. These names should appear right in the bill itself. If that were done there could be no misunderstanding and there could be no fast footwork. We would know with whom we were dealing.

There is another thing we should remember about this bill. While the power is taken to carry oil, it is primarily a natural gas pipe line, and under the Pipe Lines Act, which was passed last session, the companies that carry natural gas are not common carriers. Companies that carry oil are common carriers, they have to carry oil produced by anybody who offers it for carriage, or however you describe the movement of oil. But that is not so with these natural gas pipes lines. They are not common carriers.

Mr. Howe: How could they be?

Mr. Green: It may be that they cannot be common carriers, although we did not have time last session to go into that question carefully. I point out to hon. members that if this company is incorporated and puts in a natural gas pipe line it will be under no obligation whatever to carry natural gas for any other company.

I know the suggestion will be made—in fact it has already been made—that we should give incorporation to anybody who wishes to come here and ask for a private bill, and let them compete. That would be a very unwise way to handle the situation. It would in effect mean that parliament acts purely as a rubber stamp, granting incorporation to anybody and then letting them fight it out. I do not believe that we can evade our responsibility in that way. I suggest that it is the duty of hon. members to go carefully into the facts in each of these applications for incorporation, and then to decide on the merits of the particular application.

Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the house should vote down this bill. It is a private bill. Government policy is not involved. All we are dealing with is the application of five solicitors to be made a company and to be given these tremendously wide powers. There can be no question of a vote against the bill being a vote of want of confidence in the government. I hope hon. members will vote against the bill. That would mean that in the months intervening between the end of this session and the beginning of the next one further consideration could be given to the points I have raised and those raised by other hon. members in these pipe line debates. There will be far more time next session also to consider these bills in committee. For these reasons therefore I do urge that this bill be voted down.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to attempt to shorten the debate by calling the attention of hon. members to the situation that faces parliament when dealing with these applications. This is not an application to build a pipe line; it is simply an application to incorporate a company that would like to build a pipe line. If the incorporation is granted the next step must be for the company to sign up sufficient production of natural gas or to acquire natural gas in some way, in quantity sufficient to justify the pipe line.

The third step is that the company must obtain from the province of Alberta a licence to export gas from that province. That step is really the key to the whole situation, since the company that receives the licence to export gas from Alberta will be the company that builds the pipe line for gas. And may I say in passing that I am very glad indeed, as a member of this government, that the province of Alberta has relieved this government of the responsibility of making a choice of pipe line companies to do this particular job.

The next step is this: the company, having sufficient gas to warrant a pipe line and having a licence from Alberta to export that gas, must come before the board of transport commissioners and satisfy the requirements of the Pipe Lines Act. It must prove to the board convenience and necessity. It must show that the project is properly financed. It must show that supplies of gas within the control of the company are sufficient to warrant a pipe line, and it must obtain the approval of the board of transport commissioners regarding a route.

But that is not all. The board of transport commissioners will, I assume, as they have in the past, require that the company produce a licence under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act which is administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The purpose of that act is to see that resources of Canada, such as power or fluids or gas, which depend upon continuous transport, are used primarily for the benefit of Canada. That act was passed by this parliament at a time when it was found that, in the past, electricity produced in Canada and needed in Canada had been alienated by long-term contracts made with users in the United States.

In my opinion the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act is one of the most important acts on our statute books. I believe the administration of the act has prevented alienation of Canada's natural resources, such as had been taking place before the act was placed on the statute books.

A good deal has been said about the route of these two pipe lines. All I know about the route is that one of the groups asking for incorporation visited me and asked what the attitude of the government would be regarding administration of the exportation act to which I have referred. I stated that the attitude of the government would be that the export of gas would be treated in exactly the same way that we treat the export of electricity, namely that the needs of Canada would be served first and would be protected in perpetuity for all export purposes.

Mr. Knowles: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

[Mr. Howe.]

HOUSING

INCREASED RENTALS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Coldwell for the adjournment of the house, under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the action of the government in allowing a further and drastic increase in domestic rents, the effect of which will further increase the cost of living in this country, aggravate the housing shortage and seriously impair the health and living standards of our people.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are back now to the consideration of the motion made this afternoon by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), protesting against the action of the government in allowing further drastic increases in domestic rents, the effect of which will further increase the cost of living in this country, aggravate the housing shortage and seriously impair the health and living standards of our people.

I do not see how anyone can apply the words "orderly decontrol" to a proposal to increase domestic rents by amounts running up to 20 and 25 per cent. Surely that is a misuse of the word—and I am sure every Liberal member in the house must agree with that statement.

It seems to me quite clear that the course followed by the government in allowing such drastic increases simply could not have taken place just before an election. Neither could it happen in a House of Commons more evenly divided between government and opposition members than is the present one. I suggest that points to the error in the decision made by the government, and also to the tragedy of this parliament. The tragedy of this parliament is that its overwhelming government majority is becoming more and more detached from the people of Canada whom it is supposed to represent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends are throwing in their little interjections as they did this afternoon. Every time anyone on this side of the house said anything they did not like they threw in interjections of one kind or another. And any time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said something that sounded as though it was time to applaud, as for instance when he said that the government was going to stand by its decision, they applauded. By their actions during this debate, and by their interjections right now, they are demonstrating the truth of what

I have just said, that having got into this House of Commons, with its overwhelming majority, they have become detached from the people they are supposed to represent back in their respective constituencies.

I suggest, particularly to hon. members on the government side, that they go back in their thinking to the months of May and June of this year, when they were campaigning in their constituencies and when, instead of hobnobbing with a great overflowing majority of Liberals in this House of Commons, they were with the people whom they were seeking to represent, feeling their problems and making promises to them.

An hon. Member: We are still.

Mr. Knowles: The way hon. members are acting in the house shows that they have completely forgotten the relationship with the people of their constituencies which they promised they would maintain. I suggest to hon. members that they do not even have to take their thinking back to the months of the campaign, May and June. Those who went home last week end will recall the protests they received from the people of their constituencies about the announced increases in rentals up to 20 and 25 per cent. Those hon. members who did not go home can go up to their offices and get out the letters they have been receiving in the last few days. Those things must surely impress upon Liberal members of the house that what the people back home want is that their representatives shall live up to their promises, and that parliament shall somehow represent the wishes and desires of the Canadian people.

It seems to me there ought not to be this difference between a House of Commons that is evenly divided and a house that has an overwhelming majority on one side. It is still the elected house in the parliament of Canada; and the job of hon. members, whether they are on the minority or the majority side, is to think of the wishes and desires of the people of their constituencies. What happens? Some hon. members went home for the week end, and they got the feeling of their constituents. They told newspaper writers either in their home towns or after they came back to Ottawa that this was a hot issue. The newspaper writers were able to put stories in the papers to the effect that there would be a real commotion within Liberal ranks, that Liberals would be calling upon the government to rescind the order, or certainly to make very drastic changes in it.

We understood today that once the debate was under way certain Liberals would take part in it, but such has not been the case. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) gets up and makes a very fine speech; Liberal members applaud, and somehow or other they are mesmerized into thinking the situation is not so bad after all. I ask any Liberal member to get a reprint of the speech made by the Minister of Finance this afternoon, send it to the people of his constituency who are complaining, and ask them to use it to pay the increased rent. Ask them to read that speech and see if it makes them feel as satisfied as some hon. members felt this afternoon, simply because the minister lulled them back into their accustomed complacency. I challenge hon. members again to get away from being mesmerized by the feeling they are in power with an overwhelming majority. They are not just members of a club of good fellows who are here to get along with each other. Every one of us in this house represents 30,000, 40,000, 50,000, 60,000, or possibly 100,000 people back home. It is the job not only of members in this corner of the house but of every individual Liberal member to remember his responsibility to his constituents who, as the motion before the house puts it, are going to have their health and living standards impaired by the action that the government has taken in increasing rents by 20 and 25 per cent.

In connection with the whole question of the overwhelming majority that the Liberals have in the house, may I remind them that does not mean that whatever they think or say, or whatever they decide to agree with because it is proposed by the government, necessarily represents the views of the majority of the people. As a matter of fact, the 193 or 194 Liberals in this house do not have behind them a majority of the votes of the people of the country. I have in my hand the Canadian Press election handbook for this year which gives figures of the percentages of the votes on June 27, that date that hon. members opposite are so fond of quoting. What do these figures show? They show that the Liberal vote on June 27 was only 49·54 per cent.

An hon. Member: What was the C.C.F.?

Mr. Knowles: Oh yes, the C.C.F. had only a minority vote.

An hon. Member: What was the result of the election? You are asking for it.

Mr. Knowles: My friends are boasting again that they got more votes than we did, but they are ignoring the fact that the people of Canada are looking to them tonight to speak for them here in this house.

Mr. Whitman: Don't be provocative.

Mr. Knowles: The people of their constituencies are looking to them to speak for them on the question of increased rentals. Let me finish my point: 49·54 per cent of the people of Canada—actually only a minority—voted Liberal on the 27th of June, and that 50·46 per cent voted against the government now in power.

Mr. Fleming: The Liberal percentage dropped in the by-elections.

Mr. Knowles: Lest anyone think I am overlooking any figures in this table let me say that in addition to the 49·54 per cent who voted Liberal there were ·49 per cent who voted Independent Liberal—I suppose that accounts for the grade A and grade B Liberals—

Mr. Sinclair: What about straight independents?

Mr. Knowles: I suppose that explains the two grades of Liberals—the kind who are introduced by cabinet ministers and the kind who are introduced by private members. When you add together the two figures I have quoted it shows that 50·03 per cent of the people of Canada voted Liberal or Independent Liberal, and 49·97 per cent voted for other parties and against the government.

Mr. Sinclair: Did you add the independent vote in Comox-Alberni?

Mr. Knowles: To which side of the house does the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) belong?

Mr. Whitman: Over on that side.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, he supported my amendment yesterday with respect to trade union dues, so I am prepared to welcome him down here. The point I am making is that I am asking hon. members to realize, and particularly members on the government side —

An hon. Member: That we are in power.

Mr. Knowles: There is the same thing again. The lecture I am trying to give to Liberal members apparently is in vain. All they can think of is that they are in power with over 190 of them here, but half of the people of Canada did not want a Liberal government on June 27, and a lot more feel that way now. These Liberal members promised their electors that they would protect their interests, and one protection that they said they would give was to see that the living standards of the people in their constituencies were protected. You cannot call it protection of living standards if you allow such an increase in rentals at the present time.

I hope it will be a lesson to the people of Canada, Mr. Speaker, and that they will realize that, no matter how good the party is they are putting in power, they should not give it too large a majority in the House of Commons. An overwhelming majority produces a totally different situation than you have when, as in the last parliament, the majority was fairly close. In fact I hope the people of Manitoba, where there is an election in a couple of days from now, will realize that they had better be careful as to the size of any majority they put in power.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends are laughing again. Some of them may even be thinking the reason I got up to speak is because that election is taking place on Thursday of this week. It might be.

An hon. Member: Surely.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate, in relation to this whole question, I read in today's Ottawa Journal a dispatch from my home city of Winnipeg dated November 8, which is as follows:

> The Manitoba government is loath to take over rental control, Premier D. L. Campbell said in a statement read by Educational Minister C. Rhodes Smith last night during a radio address.

Apparently they do things the same way there as in this government. One minister speaks for another and you never know where you are with them. At any rate, one minister made a statement on behalf of the premier of Manitoba indicating that the Manitoba provincial government has been put on the spot by the action of the Minister of Finance in announcing his rental increases last Thursday. I am amazed that the Minister of Finance was not a little more considerate of his friend and namesake Douglas Campbell of Manitoba, and did not postpone his announcement a week or so. The Journal dispatch goes on to say:

> The statement explained that "we believe that rental controls are more easily and efficiently administered by one national government than by ten provincial governments." It added the provincial government is loath to assume the jurisdiction now exercised by the dominion until convinced such a step is necessary in the public interest.

I do not blame the provincial government for being loath to enter the field of rental control. I think Premier Campbell is right when he says that rental controls are more easily and efficiently administered by one government rather than by ten provincial governments, but I hope the people of Manitoba realize they are now being handed the same kind of half assurances that they were given by the Liberals prior to the 27th of June. Once the 10th of November is past, any thought that the Manitoba government would take over rent control in that province is just as far down the drain as is the promise of the federal government that they would protect the health and the living standards of the Canadian people.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go much further, but there is one thing the minister has tried to say both ways to which I want to call attention. I do not know how long we are going to have to keep on telling the ministers that they cannot have it both ways; they try to do it continually. Last Thursday evening, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced increases in rents, he prefaced his statement as to the precise changes being made by asserting that in the view of the government you could not completely remove rent controls without creating chaos. This afternoon, when hon. members were complaining about these increases, which could go as high as 20 and 25 per cent, the minister said, "Oh, the increases are not going that high. That is just a permissive ceiling, but I am satisfied they will not go that high." In other words the minister has put the ceiling so high there is no pressure on it. Well, you cannot tell us on Thursday evening that the government feel they cannot take off rent controls altogether, and then tell us today that that is exactly what they have done. It seems to me there should be come consistency in this matter. I also think the government should realize this proposal that the provinces take over rent control, after they have put the ceiling so high that it no longer has any effect, is asking the provinces to take on something completely impossible.

I leave it at that. I come back in my closing sentence to the clearly-stated effect of the government's action as it was put by my leader when he moved the motion this afternoon. I submit that individual Liberal members of this house owe it as a duty to themselves and to their constituents to think of this matter not in terms of the feeling of power they have here, but in terms of what the people expect of them. I am sure the people back home want them to say with us—and to protest against it—that the action of the government in allowing a further and drastic increase in domestic rents will further increase the cost of living in this country, aggravate the housing shortage and seriously impair the health and living standards of our people. That is not what Canadians voted for on June 27. That is not what the Liberal members of this house promised to do for the people of Canada by Christmas this year. I suggest that they show some sense of responsibility to the people who elected them by rising in their places and protesting with us against the action the government has taken.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate with considerable interest, and I should like to preface my remarks by saying that this question is not a political issue. It is not a Liberal nor a Tory nor a C.C.F. issue. It boils down to cold, hard economic facts and a little bit of honesty. If we intend to relieve the people of this country who are going to be affected by this action—and around four million are affected—if we honestly want to do something for them and face the economic facts, then it is not good enough to follow party tactics. Nor is it good enough for the government, with their large majority, to sit back complacently and say, "Well, we are here for four more years. The memory of the people is short. Before the next election we will give them a few little palliatives and they will forget all about this." That seems to be the feeling. You know, Mr. Speaker, I do not like the truculent attitude of the members of the government in chucking their weight around. It pays to be humble in victory; when you stick up your head too far somebody is going to knock it off for you. If you keep it down and show a little honesty in your thinking on questions which come before you, in which there is merit, I think the people of Canada will have a great deal more respect for this institution.

There is a great deal of merit in this question. The whole matter is one of control, and we do not need to guess about the problem any longer. When this country faced a crisis in the early days of the war there was no quibbling about it. We then had a national objective, the winning of the war. It was a matter of survival, and neither the members of this house nor the cabinet sat back and said, "We are just going to let this thing go along in a haphazard way." It required a certain amount of planning. The first thing the government decided must be done was the holding of prices somewhere within reason; and they made a very good job of it. From the start of the war until about the end of 1941 prices were uncontrolled, and in that period they jumped about 15·8 points. So the government instituted controls. They fought the war; they allocated materials; they controlled prices; and up to the end of 1945, when the war was over, the price index had gone up only about 4·3 points.

In defending controls in this house Mr. Ilsley made the statement that by means of controls he had saved the people of this country some $12,500 million, or approximately $1,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. That was good business, was it not? No one was hurt; no one transacting business during that period suffered; their profits were within reason, and every person in this country benefited to the extent of a thousand dollars. Then came the end of the war and we wanted to get back to the things that caused the war; the unplanned, unrestricted economy, where greed and avarice are the motivating factors in society; and that is where we went.

The minister speaks of orderly decontrol. Beginning in 1946 controls were removed. Our opinion was that they were never more badly needed than during the transition from war to peace. We had an effective machinery administered by experienced men; and the worth of that machinery had been proved during the war. But in 1946 the minister said he was going to go ahead with it in an orderly fashion, so controls came off; and from early in 1946 until about the end of 1947 the price index jumped by some 25·9 points. In other words prices rose by only 4·3 points in the whole process of fighting the war; then in a little more than a year after the end of the war, when controls began to be removed, the index soared by 25·9 points. I believe that increase indicates to hon. members that price controls should have been maintained during that period. It must be remembered that industry in this country went through a great deal of upheaval, trouble, strikes and misery, because when prices began to skyrocket wages began to chase them. If controls had been maintained during the period I have just mentioned, and prices kept within reason, we would have avoided that disruption of industry. It would have been good business, and it should have been done.

An hon. Member: Including wage control?

Mr. Gillis: Wages were controlled. Certainly you must have a measure of wage control if you are going to have price control. We have never denied that. In fact we have advocated it, and it was accepted during the war. Today the cost of living index stands at around 160. I believe it was 160·1, but it dropped a little. There has been a terrific increase in the cost of living. The people that I have in mind in this particular instance are the people in the low-income brackets. A large percentage of our people do not pay income taxes, and those are the people who live in rented houses. Those are the people who are going to suffer most under this rent increase.

An estimate made by the Toronto welfare council reveals that the small-income groups in this country spend at least fifty-five per cent of their total income on food. In the matter of rents, the landlords received a rent increase of 10 per cent about a year ago. I believe that this last gesture on the part of the minister was ill-considered. I am not going to kick the minister around for it because I know him quite well. I know his background, and he came up the hard way. The minister may be on top of the heap today, but I believe he has some bad advisers in the background. I think he should look them over carefully. This move was badly timed, very badly timed.

I do not think the government should have made a move at this time. They have not exactly removed the control from rents but, in effect, they have told the landlords of this country they are justified in increasing rents by 20 or 25 per cent. I believe that was a wrong approach to the problem. If the minister was going to do anything about it, it would have been better for him to vacate the field completely and leave out of the picture that matter of instructing the landlords as to the percentage by which they could increase rents. The minister says they do not have to increase rents by that amount. The fact of the matter is that the landlords will charge it. Examples of that can be found in this house.

I know a person employed in the civil service who had an apartment for which he was paying $30 per month. When certain types of accommodation were decontrolled, he had to get out immediately. He went into an apartment which before the war rented for around $45 per month. The landlord split it up and made two apartments out of it. This man who was paying $30 per month rent, all he could afford, was forced to pay $85 per month for one end of that apartment. The other end was rented for $75 per month. That landlord was receiving $160 per month for accommodation which, in 1939, rented for $45 per month. That was under decontrol. You will find a large percentage of the landlords will take that attitude and say, "Well, Mr. Abbott said twenty-five per cent for this type of accommodation. Rents will be increased by twenty-five per cent. It would have been much better if the federal government had vacated the field and said nothing about the rent increase.

I believe that housing is this country's No. 1 problem in many respects. It is the No. 1 problem in the field of employment. The lumber industry is rather stagnant; the steel mills are not producing as they should; the fuel industry is down and the building trades are not all employed. I believe Canada should set up a low-rental housing program as a national objective. This would provide us with an incentive such as we had during the war. This country has no objective now. In this House of Commons we are roaming around like a ship without a rudder. Someone on the government benches should set a low-rental subsidized housing program as an objective to cure the housing problem of the low-income groups. Until such time as that is done, nothing will help our people. It would stimulate the lumber industry and the steel industry and put the building trades to work. It would create employment and new wealth for this country. I think that is an objective for which we could all work. It is not a Liberal or a C.C.F. objective; it is a common-sense approach to our No. 1 problem.

Then the question arises, where are you going to get the money? Before the war that question was heard quite often. There was no money for relief or anything else. Immediately upon the outbreak of war, instead of appropriating millions we were appropriating billions—we were even making gifts of billions. There is money. I am going to name one particular spot from which we could get some money. These figures were taken from the public accounts and concern subsidies that were paid up to 1945. The total subsidies amounted to $210,591,000. The administration of the wartime prices and trade board cost $14 million in 1945. That sounds like a lot of money.

Immediately after the war excess profits taxes were abolished. The yearly revenue from those taxes amounted to $465,805,356 per year. That is also a lot of money. If the government is in earnest about solving the low-rental housing problem of this country on a subsidized basis, I believe it would cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $120 million per year. Is it unreasonable to say that the excess profits tax should be reimposed in an amount sufficient to offset a subsidized housing program for this country?

Mr. Sinclair: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that the British Labour government removed the excess profits tax on industry one year before this government did, for reasons which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave at that time?

Mr. Gillis: The tax rate in the United Kingdom is much higher and they also have a capital gains tax which we have not got.

Mr. Sinclair: Is the hon. member aware that, when the Canadian government removed the excess profits tax, it followed the same procedure as the United Kingdom and increased the standard rate of corporation taxation from 18 per cent to 30 per cent?

Mr. Gillis: I was not aware of that.

Mr. Sinclair: I suggest you do a little research about your Labour government in Great Britain.

Mr. Gillis: I have done a little research, and it appears to be hurting. Your questions do not bother me at all.

Mr. Sinclair: The answers bother you.

Mr. Gillis: I have no objection to the hon. member asking those questions because he just gets his feet wet all the time. There is no comparison between Britain and Canada. I have heard the Prime Minister and other members in this house say that we are much better off than any other country in the world. I think that is childish and nonsensical. Britain was devastated by war. She came out with perhaps a million of her people in air-raid shelters. The United Kingdom imports practically everything the people eat or wear as well as all building materials. The same thing applies to the rest of Europe. You cannot compare this country, which covers half a continent, has unlimited resources, thirteen million people and never a scar of war, to a country like Britain. We built up our standards while they were tearing theirs down. There is no comparison at all. We are better off, certainly, but I would not want to go through what the people of Britain went through with the same kind of administration we have today, and expect it to drag us out of the ruins of war. I think the comparison is one which hon. members would not want to put on the record.

I was just pointing out, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the minister who just entered the chamber, that in this matter of removing controls—I have said a lot about it and I am not going to repeat it—I thought that the success of the whole control structure during the war, the benefits that the Canadian people derived from it and the excellent job that was done by the administration in that field, was attributable to the fact that this country at that time had a national objective, which was the winning of the war. It was not a Liberal war, a Tory war, or a C.C.F. war. We all got into it and helped to win it. You laid down certain mechanism that worked during the war.

I make this suggestion to the minister. He is a military man and knows that you have got to have objectives if you are going to go into a battle; you must choose a battle-ground, plan your attack and so forth. I think we now need another national objective, and that we shall have to reconstitute some of the machinery with which we were so successful in fighting the war. I made this suggestion. I am repeating this for the minister's benefit. I know he is receptive and sympathetic, and that if ideas are right he will perhaps put them into operation. I suggest that our housing problem in this country is our No. 1 problem and that we should all forget our party politics and should set as our objective the elimination of slums and the establishment of a good, low-rental, subsidized housing program as the only means of relieving the low-income groups and giving them housing. I think we should say that should be done. It would stimulate production. Your lumber industry would work on it. Your steel mills would work on it. Your building trades would go to work. It would create employment and solve our No. 1 problem.

Someone may ask where we are going to get the money for all this. I pointed out the amount of subsidies—according to the public accounts report of 1945, some $210 million was paid out; the administration of the war-time prices and trade board cost about $14 million, in round figures; but at the same time your excess profits tax that you had used during the war in order to finance the war was yielding the government some $465 million, in round figures again. According to figures I have seen, a subsidy of about $120 million a year would provide an adequate low-rental housing program in this country. I ask the members of the house if it is unreasonable to reimpose an excess profits tax to gather sufficient revenue to provide that subsidy. I do not think you would have hurt anyone because I think that normal profits, without extra profits, are sufficient. I think the balance sheets of companies and corporations throughout Canada during the war show that they were making a fair and reasonable profit as determined by the finance department. That huge amount of money that was handed back to them in excess profits is not being used. They do not need it. I suggest to the minister that he appeal to all members in this house to forget their party differences; let us tap that resource in order to get a sufficient amount of money to provide a low-rental subsidized housing program, make it a national objective at this time, and get behind it and push it.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) issue a challenge to this side of the house, Mr. Speaker. He inquired why more so-called Liberal backbenchers were not getting up to speak on this subject. As a rule, I do not like to allow a challenge to go unheeded. I am therefore taking this one up. To the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who mentioned the fact that he thought we were getting out of touch with the people, I should like to say that he should remember that not so long ago we were very much in touch with the people, and I think we still are. I believe that the right-thinking people of Canada—the people who do not, for instance, take advantage of a debate like this to practise demagoguery and to bring forward a program of "soak the rich"—are inclined to agree with this government which they elected not so long ago and in which I am sure they still have confidence.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member think that the people support these rental increases?

Mr. Cannon: I think that the majority of the people do. They are not rental increases, as a matter of fact, and I think that the majority of the people support the policy of the government which I will attempt to explain in a few minutes if my hon. friend will bear with me.

Mr. Abbott: We believe in a fair deal for all.

Mr. Cannon: One of the members on the other side of the house said that it was not a political issue. By no stretch of the imagination can this government be accused of playing politics with this issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cannon: They are certainly not taking the easy way and they are certainly not trying to take what they might have reason to believe would be the most popular course with the people—

An hon. Member: After the election.

Mr. Cannon: —or with the tenants, who after all are the majority in certain of our large cities. But I wish to say that, as the government is not playing politics, it is at the same time being consistent. The government is doing no more than carrying out the policy that was laid before the people in the last election, and that policy was supported. I see that my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre looks surprised.

Mr. Knowles: I am surprised.

Mr. Cannon: I will attempt to establish that fact. In the last election the government said that it was in favour of doing away with all wartime controls. It has been the policy of this government for some time to do away with all wartime controls. One of the wartime controls, and the only one remaining, was rent control. The government and the speakers who spoke for the government—and I was one—said that in due course the rental controls would be removed. Now the rental controls are being removed. Things are perhaps going a little bit faster than was expected. I will admit that; nevertheless the government is taking the courageous action it said it would take, and it is being even more courageous than it possibly had to be under all circumstances. As I said before, it cannot be accused of playing politics nor of taking the easy way. When one is governing, one must remember —and if my hon. friends on the other side of the house ever have to govern, which I hope will not happen in my time, they will realize it—that it is more difficult to do the right thing than to do the popular thing.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): It is hard to be a statesman.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member will never succeed.

Mr. Cannon: The government is carrying out this program of removing controls, and is also taking another method of doing away with the disadvantage that lessees suffered from because of high rents, with a housing program. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) talked about having a subsidized housing program. We have a housing program which has been explained to us by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) and it is going forward. Under it we have built more houses and have done more to relieve the shortage of dwellings than any other country has done since the war. That fact should not be forgotten.

Something was said about newspaper writers. I read the reports in the Standard also. I read all the declarations made by the members from Montreal, and I was particularly struck by the unanimity of those declarations. They all said one thing and one thing only, namely, that they were in favour of retaining rent controls for the present. Who is not? We are. We are retaining rent controls for the present. We have lifted the ceiling but we are retaining rent controls, and that is all the hon. members said. It cannot be said that one of these hon. members made any statement that was not in conformity with the policy of the government as it has been established by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). We must not lose our sense of proportion. After all, this is a decision that shocks some people, but it is not the end of the world. It is not the end of this parliament; it is not even the end of the Liberal party. Talking about not losing a sense of proportion, I should like to re-establish some figures that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) did not seem to quite understand this afternoon. I refer to the maximum increases which are authorized. As was explained by the Minister of Finance, to whom I listened this afternoon, the total is 40 per cent as the limit, not 45 per cent. First, 10 per cent, then 5 per cent and then 25 per cent, which makes 40 per cent.

Mr. Thatcher: You work it out.

Mr. Cannon: Forty per cent only. The minister said this afternoon that when you calculated the 10 per cent you calculated it on 100 per cent. When you added 5 per cent you did not add it on to 110 per cent, you added it on to 100 per cent. When you added 25 per cent you did not add it on to 115 per cent, you added it on to 100 per cent, and that makes 40 per cent. Let us consider this in a dispassionate manner. Let us take the figures as they are and let us not lose our sense of proportion. We are not losing our sense of proportion. The important thing to my mind is the proportion of rent to wages. I challenge any hon. members on the other side to prove that this is not true, even with the increase that is now going into effect, if it goes into effect and rents are increased to the maximum authorized. Even if rents are increased up to the limit authorized the proportion of rent to wages will not be any higher than it was in 1939. The proportion of rent paid by the working man on the average in proportion to his total wages is not any higher now than it was then. So, where is the great hardship? There is no great hardship there; it is just a matter of readjustment.

Mr. Gillis: You mean you want to get back to the 1939 conditions?

Mr. Cannon: I did not say I want to get back to the 1939 conditions. I am asking hon. members not to lose their sense of proportion.

Mr. Knowles: Like you have.

An hon. Member: He has not any.

Mr. Cannon: There is another angle to be considered in this. I take it, it will not be popular with hon. members on the other side, but one must consider that the government and the rent controls have to be fair to the land owners. After all, they are citizens of this country and like any others they are entitled to be fairly treated. Evidently hon. members on the other side do not want them to be fairly treated; but I believe it is the duty of this government to treat all classes of citizens in this country equally fairly. If the land owners are fairly treated they are getting only their due. If the ceiling were not raised we would be in this situation. We would be taxing illegally one section of the population of this country; we would be discriminating against one class whom we would be forcing to bear the burden of the benefits that the tenants are deriving from the fact that the rents are not allowed to go up. Who would have to pay for that? So far, the property owners. I say that is not fair. I say it is not fair to tax one class of the population in this country so as to benefit another class. That is the policy of the Liberal party. That is the policy they have had the courage to put into force by the regulations that have been made.

Another point that should not be lost sight of is that after all rent control is a provincial responsibility. There can be no doubt whatever about that. For the moment I am speaking as a lawyer. If anyone looks at the B.N.A. Act he can see that property and civil rights are a provincial responsibility.

An hon. Member: Why take it to court, then?

Mr. Cannon: I shall explain that in a minute. Property and civil rights are a provincial responsibility. There is no doubt about that. What can be more within the scope of property and civil rights than rent? Rents have to do with real estate, which is property, and the civil rights of the land owners who rent to the lessees, and the civil rights of the lessees who rent from the landlord. There is no doubt at all that that comes squarely within property and civil rights.

To answer my hon. friend's question, during the war, because of the emergency, the federal government assumed control with the consent of the provinces, if not the explicit consent, at least the tacit consent; and we still have their consent evidently because they will not take the responsibility themselves.

Another thing that we should consider when talking about the responsibility of the provinces is that not only is it a legal responsibility but in all fairness they should take it because conditions are different in different provinces. It is not a matter on which the federal government can legislate for the whole of Canada. It is a matter which should be legislated upon in the different provinces where conditions vary. Conditions in my province of Quebec are not the same as they are in Ontario. Conditions in British Columbia are not the same as they are in the prairies. Everybody knows that. From there it is easy to conclude that it is a matter that should be taken up by the provinces. I understand that the province of Saskatchewan has some stand-by legislation, and that it is ready to assume its responsibility. Evidently it is the only province in Canada that has done so. Since my hon. friend's party is in power there, I take the opportunity of congratulating them on having done that, but the other provinces ought to do it also. There is no doubt that it is a provincial responsibility.

It is an unfortunate situation. Everybody agrees that it is an unfortunate situation, but it is an unfortunate situation that had to come sooner or later. The policy of the government was decontrol.

Mr. Knowles: Orderly decontrol.

Mr. Cannon: The policy of the government is to give up the control of rents. They are giving it up. It is an unfortunate situation, but the government is not wholly responsible for it. As I pointed out before, those who are really responsible for this situation are the provinces who refuse to assume their responsibility.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I say that I think we ought to be thankful in place of criticizing the government, in place of trying to make things difficult for the government, which has taken on its responsibilities like a man. We should be thankful that we have a government which is taking its responsibilities—

Mr. Knowles: Shirking them.

Mr. Cannon: —that are not rightfully its under the British North America Act. I turn the word "shirking" back to my hon. friend. I will say to him that it is the provinces who are shirking their responsibilities.

Mr. Knowles: You will be sorry you made that speech.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, coming from the city of Vancouver, which is perhaps one of the most overcrowded cities in the Dominion of Canada, I cannot very well let this debate go by without saying something about the issues involved and how it is going to affect the people in my part of the country.

I believe the psychologists say that you can always know the environment in which people were brought up by their reactions to certain conditions or circumstances. People who live in isolated places will not understand the problems of congested cities where large numbers of people have to live in poverty. The member who just preceded me said that this was a very unfortunate situation. I agree with him, that it is an unfortunate situation, because it will affect people—as every other increase in the cost of living has affected people—who would find it difficult to get along even if there were no increase in the cost of living. It will affect the poor. It will not affect the members of this House of Commons. It will not affect people in Canada who are getting $6,000 a year or more. But, as I can show hon. members, it will affect mothers who are trying to bring up families of several children on incomes of less than $100 a month. Under circumstances such as that, any increase, no matter how small, means that those women and children will have less to eat.

That is why it is unfortunate. I am not going to belabour the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I will agree at once that some landlords have been getting a bad deal, and that some attempt should have been made to find a way to help them. But when the minister calls the removal of controls to the extent of 20 and 25 per cent orderly decontrol, he is just talking nonsense. I am not so sure it would not have been better to remove controls altogether. I am not saying that it would, but I am saying that —

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: Just a moment, now; that is no joke.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not.

Mr. MacInnis: I am saying the probability is that every landlord who raises his rent will raise it the full amount allowed by law. That is what is likely to happen. He will say "the government allows a 25 per cent increase, and I am going to take it."

It was refreshing to find one member of the Liberal party, apart from the minister, who had the hardihood, even if inexperienced, to rise in his place in defence of the government. Oh, I could name a good many members in the house whom I did not see rising to their feet with a rush to defend the action of the government. I look over at them, and I could name quite a number of them; but out of consideration for their feelings and the fact that I know them, and know they are good fellows, I shall not mention their constituencies.

Mr. Knowles: And they are very grateful to you.

Mr. MacInnis: But that is the picture. We have heard it said that he who runs may read. Well, you can run pretty darned fast during the past few days and read the protests from one end of this country to the other. When we have opponents of controls such as the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star writing long editorials on the folly of this decontrol, you can rest assured—

Mr. Abbott: Just the Montreal Gazette, I think.

Mr. MacInnis: No, the Montreal Star. I believe it was the Montreal Star reporter who drew my attention to it yesterday afternoon as I was walking along the corridor. I took occasion to have the page bring the paper in the chamber to me, and I read it here. It was the Montreal Star.

Mr. Abbott: The Montreal Standard raised its price the same day the changes were made in rent controls.

Mr. MacInnis: Why not? If the Minister of Finance considered the people of Canada to be in such good circumstances that he could allow the removal of rent controls, why should not the Montreal Standard increase the price of its product, as well?

I would draw the attention of the house and the minister to the situation in Vancouver. The Vancouver housing association made a submission to the government on rent control, of which I received a copy dated August 1949. I may say that the submission was made in view of reports circulated that it was the intention to end all controls on March 31, 1950. In part they say this:

> If rent controls were necessary at the time of their imposition, they are doubly necessary now in cities with housing shortage. In Vancouver, despite the high rate of building, the shortage estimated reliably at 20,000 dwellings at the end of the war has risen by a further 5,000 during the last three years.

So that today there is a shortage of 25,000 family units. Where there is a shortage of rental dwellings this allowed increase will amount to something very drastic to people who cannot afford any further increases in their cost of living.

I have said that I know from talking with some landlords, and knowing about their circumstances, that controls worked a hardship on some. But to say that all landlords are in that position is nonsense. Hon. members know that in most of the poorer dwellings, and perhaps in most of the middle class dwellings, no repairs have been made and no decorating done in the last eight or nine years. Tenants have been doing their own repairing and decorating. With the increases now allowed, in the event of a tenant not paying the amount asked and having to move out, the landlord will have the advantage of the repairing and decorating and will increase the rent to the next tenant.

I wonder if I might be permitted to draw the attention of the house to those who are going to be affected by this change. The Vancouver housing bulletin of September, 1949, contains some specimen cases.

> 1. A family of seven (five children and the two parents) have an income of $112 per month, and $25 family allowance, or $137 per month. Rent for a small, dark, two-room suite in a dingy, indescribably dirty house in the Chinese section—
> This is in Vancouver.
> —is $47.30 per month. This leaves them $90 per month for food, clothing, fuel, light and other expenses. The low cost adequate food allowance for a family of this size—
> Food allowance alone.
> —is $116.

Rent Control

The hon. member who preceded me can meet these increases with equanimity. He will not feel them, but if there is another rental increase in this case there will be another reduction in the amount of food available for the children. Canada cannot build a great nation on undernourished children. Case No. 2 is as follows:

A mother with two children has an income of $58.50 and $10 family allowance. Formerly they lived in a small housekeeping room on East Hastings, where rent was $42.50 per month. After eviction for non-payment of rent, they moved to a room on Cordova where they pay $12 per week or $51.60 per month. This leaves them $16.90 for food and all other expenses . . .

That is, $16.90 for a mother and two children. Does my hon. friend think that an increase in rent is not important to this woman and her two children? I could read dozens of these cases. We have on the order paper amendments to the National Housing Act. I am not going to discuss them. I was about to say a great majority of the people of Canada cannot afford to pay economic rent, but I will not say that. I do not know. It is agreed that a large number of Canadian families cannot pay economic rent, and it is proposed that the building of houses shall be subsidized to enable them to pay. If that is necessary for the building of new homes, it is equally necessary for rented premises where families are not able to provide the required rent. If we were willing to do so, there could have been some sort of reasonable provision made for a much smaller rent increase than the one that has been allowed.

Let me tell the minister and hon. members of the house that these rental increases are taking place when cold weather is coming on, and in the winter it is cold in every part of Canada. Additional amounts of money are required for clothing, food and fuel, and to have a rent increase besides makes the position of these people unbearable.

This is happening at a time when residential construction is falling off, when unemployment is increasing, and when production in various lines is decreasing. Where are we going to end? Among numerous letters received, I have one I took out of my mail box as I was coming into the house. It is from the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, British Columbia provincial command. The letter is addressed to me and reads:

Dear Mr. MacInnis:

This provincial command wishes to again go on record as being strongly opposed to the unjust rental increases as published recently in the press. Housing shortage and unemployment are two of our major problems, and any increase in rent at this time will work a great hardship on all our citizens, particularly pensioners, war veterans allowance recipients and widows. In this regard I would ask you to place our representations before the appropriate government department.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

The letter is signed "H. E. Warburton," secretary of the organization I have mentioned. I am drawing this letter to the attention not only of the department but also of the minister and hon. members of the house who know these conditions as well as I do, no matter how smugly they may sit and glower.

I said that housing construction was falling off. I have a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of October 5 giving figures as to the construction situation in the eight municipalities making up greater Montreal. The figure for last year was slightly over $10 million, and this year it is a little less than $5,900,000, a drop of nearly 50 per cent. The same situation is true in my own city.

Mr. Fleming: It is true across Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: It is true across Canada. More buildings have been finished so far this year than for the same period last year, but they are buildings that were started last year. There were fewer buildings begun this year than last year.

Mr. Fleming: Fewer starts.

Mr. MacInnis: Fewer starts; that is the proper word. Surely in the face of these circumstances this party is not doing a disservice to the house or to the people of Canada by bringing these matters to the attention of the house. I appreciate the difficulties associated with rent control, but there are difficulties associated with almost everything in life. I remember before coming to attend the 1948 session of the house I was asked, with a number of other men in public life including some members of parliament, to attend a meeting called by the two labour bodies of Vancouver, the Vancouver labour council and the Vancouver trades and labour council, to discuss the question of the high cost of living. I remember at that meeting one of the speakers who preceded me justifying the increases, and saying that what was required was greater production. When my turn came to speak I said that I fully agreed that what was required was greater production, but I said the moment we get greater production, overcome the present shortages and bring supply up to demand, then under our system of production for profit production will fall off. The people will be poorer than they are now, not because they did not produce enough but because they produced too much. That is the situation facing us across Canada: production increasing, poverty increasing, and the ability of the people to consume decreasing. That is the problem we have to solve, and we are not going to solve it by removing rent control. Neither are we going to solve it by imposing rent control. We can only solve it when, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, we make it a part of our national objective to see that people are properly housed and properly fed. Until we do that we shall be plagued with these problems.

I could give this house figures to show how production is falling off and how unemployment is increasing. In September of this year the number of people on the unemployment insurance roll was approximately twice what it was for the same month last year, while the amount paid out in benefits was more than twice the amount paid out last year. So let us not, as the saying is, kid ourselves that we are going to remedy this situation by removing rent control. We can do that and add to the accumulated misery of increasing numbers of people in this country. Or we can do something else; by the proper use of the natural resources of this country and the skill and ability of our workers and technicians, we can build a better life in Canada for all our people.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this very important motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and in a few words to voice the protests of my many constituents who have been seriously affected by the action of the government in permitting rent increases of from 20 to 25 per cent. This matter is causing serious concern in thousands of Canadian homes at the present time. It is causing concern to thousands of low income families, thousands of old age pensioners, thousands of people receiving small disability pensions and thousands of recipients of war veterans allowance. So I think we are fully justified in taking this time to bring to the attention of the house the plight of this large section of the Canadian people.

The arguments concerning this subject have been fully developed in this debate, so it is almost impossible for one to add a new thought; but in the few minutes I wish to speak I want to deal particularly with three points. My first point is that on this important issue, concerning which the country has been showing great anxiety for weeks and months and with which hon. members of the house have been concerned since coming to Ottawa, we are informed of government policy and government action through a statement in the house by the minister. I am of the opinion that if the government had brought this matter before the house and had permitted one day's debate on the issue before coming to a decision, and then had given effect to the opinion of a majority of hon. members, the result would have been very different from the policy announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

My second point is that in my view there is an evasion of responsibility on the part of the government in dealing with this question. I know that technically and from the constitutional point of view property and civil rights come under the provinces. But under the conditions existing in Canada today who can say there is not a national emergency as far as housing is concerned? More than that, the government could act on this matter with the full support of the Canadian people. The provinces are not anxious to take over this responsibility. They realize the difficulties and the magnitude of the problem. The federal government has been operating this machinery of rent control for some years now.

Mention has been made of a reference of the matter to the supreme court, and the wish has been expressed that the provinces would take responsibility in this field. I repeat that in this matter of rent control I believe the government is evading its responsibility, in view of the attitude of the Canadian people and their support for the continuation of this measure. To support that point of view I want to read briefly from a statement on rent control issued by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. Before doing so I want to point out that without question this body represents a large segment of the business interests of the country. Those who are elected as mayors and representatives of the municipalities in Canada are usually people in business, people with some assets, people who are quite level-headed and constructive in their approach to any given question. The Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities is composed of people of all political parties; and, as a previous speaker has said, this matter of rent control is not a political question. It embraces all of us; it is an economic question of serious concern to the Canadian people. To support my contention that in this matter the government is evading its responsibility I quote briefly from this statement:

> For the federal government to withdraw from the field of rent controls, on the understanding that the provincial governments may step in, if they wish, would not be a solution, but rather an evasion of responsibility. To be realistic in this matter it must be recognized that for reasons of their own the provinces are not likely to enter the rent control field, at any rate in time to prevent the serious situation which will undoubtedly arise should the federal government relinquish its present controls.

I think in allowing flat increases of from 20 to 25 per cent the government is getting very close to relinquishing rent control. That was my second point. Before sitting down I want to make a third point, that the increases permitted under the new order are far more drastic than were expected even by those who at times are considered to look at things from the point of view of the property owner. To support that statement, I want to quote again from this brief:

> While the retention of rent controls is imperative, no objection can be raised to permitting reasonable increases in rent levels, provided (a) they are carefully scaled and controlled and provided (b) it is recognized that the proper corollary to decontrol is a positive program of assisting low rent housing construction. Thus it might be reasonable to permit additional rent increases for residential property erected prior to 1945 of no more than 10 per cent, graduated downwards to a maximum of 5 per cent for rentals which are below $40 a month.

Before concluding that paragraph may I say that if the government had brought this question before the house and hon. members had been free to express their sincere beliefs, I believe these are possibly the increases which would have been endorsed by the House of Commons. They would have been a ten per cent increase on, shall I say, the middle class type of dwelling and a five per cent increase for the lower income group. Possibly that would have been considered and adopted by this house. I realize that in some cases landlords have been suffering an injustice. I know some people of very fine type who, out of generosity, had allowed people to live in certain quarters, during the depression and the years previous to the war, at a rental far less than economic. Then, because of their generosity, they have suffered for some years owing to these restrictions.

Continuing, Mr. Speaker, to read from the brief.

> It must be recognized that the great majority of tenants who need protection against exorbitant increases are in this group; and it is this group who have not been able to find any new accommodation within their means since the war. Because of these circumstances, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities most strongly urges upon the federal government that they reassure the people of Canada that it is not their intention to remove rent controls in March, 1950, as has been suggested by press reports.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there is no question about the attitude of the majority of the Canadian people. It is indicated by editorials in the newspapers throughout the country. It is indicated by resolutions passed by the veterans' organizations, the Canadian Legion, the army and navy veterans, all organizations of a non-political nature. They are composed of people representing all parties in Canada, but people who are living close to the problems we are discussing this evening. In addition to that, the trade unions of this country are seriously considering making further wage demands because of this increase in the cost of living. Various women's organizations, such as the women's institute of the province of British Columbia, are deeply concerned.

I would ask the members of this house, Mr. Speaker, when this matter comes to a vote to consider not the party point of view but the interests of the Canadian people as a whole, and for once do something the majority of the Canadian people wish them to do, that is, to support the protest my leader made this afternoon.

(Translation):

Mr. Gleason Belzile (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to convey my most sincere and heartfelt congratulations to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) for the interest they have shown in the study of this problem.

In fact, they lifted the debate to the level of a social question in dealing mostly with the possible social effects of the present removal of controls. I believe it proper to follow them on this ground and to consider not only the economic aspects of the problem, as dealt with so far, but also the social aspect.

Everyone knows that each of those measures is in itself of definite and distinct social import, involving repercussions that will be felt later not unlike the ripples expanding to the edge of a pond into which a stone has been cast.

The Liberal policy has always been a social policy in the highest sense of the word. It has even reached a high degree of Christian charity. The Liberal policy in the past has never sought immediate benefits and political advantage. It has been marked by foresight and when the time came, in 1940, to set up controls that ran counter to the wishes, the aspirations and the instinctive inclinations of the Canadian people the Liberal party did not fear, at that time, to establish control of salaries, wages, rentals, etc., at all levels of social life.

The Liberal policy adopted in 1940 upset all the notions we held till then with regard to housing. We thought that the right of ownership stood solely for the proprietor's personal and immediate benefit. The Liberal policy reversed that idea, so that the tenant could have the full and real use of the property. It considered property as a commodity which could be disposed of as ordinary chattels.

The measure adopted in 1940 was a courageous one, and this more recent action by the government is also courageous and will bear fruit in the future.

The government and all the members of this house should fully realize that our housing policy must be far-reaching, taking into account not only the present but also the future.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) has just made known the government's housing program. An adjustment is taking place in labour costs. Materials are becoming increasingly plentiful. Plumbing and heating fixtures are the only materials still in somewhat short supply. This would show that a readjustment is really taking place in the country's economy and that it will become easier to solve the housing problem.

An incentive is required. Interest is still a driving power. It is useless and ill-advised to lull tenants with the belief that the government will always provide for their housing needs. The incentive lies in the substantial 20 to 25 per cent increase decreed by the government. This is a sensible measure. It shows a good appreciation of the housing situation today.

Had we continued to please tenants by granting increases of 5 to 10 per cent, they never would have faced the need of becoming property owners. The construction program which the government wishes to undertake would have met with failure without this measure of decontrol, which is but the continuation of the same courageous decision taken in the past by the government.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, this measure is an act of justice and I would add of belated justice. Rentals have been frozen for nine years. For instance, in the city of Ottawa, the rent of some controlled dwellings is $25 to $30 per month, while similar decontrolled accommodation is being rented at $60, $75 and $80. There surely is disproportion and injustice, and there has been since 1940 or 1941.

I said a while ago that our understanding of what was meant by property rights has been changed. Such rights consist in using and disposing of one's assets at will. For nine years, the plight of the property owner has been such that he could neither use nor dispose of his assets. Our whole economy in the field of rent control was based solely on the principle that rents being considered essentially as chattels, the tenant alone was entitled to use them.

The remedy introduced in 1947 was practically useless. Before regaining possession of his property, the owner had to prove in court that his need was greater than the tenant's.

Again, I say that property rights had been disregarded. However, I do not wish to censure the government since rent control was providing for an emergency brought about by the war.

I believe that today the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) again deserves to be congratulated.

(Text):

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I want to speak for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, in support of the resolution. Some hon. members have criticized the minister for the timing of this particular order in council. For the tenants who will be affected by this order, I suppose the timing is bad. This increase comes at the time of the year when living expenses are at their highest. No time of the year could be chosen when this order would be more harmful to the millions who will be affected by it and who come within the low-income brackets.

But, I take it, that was not the consideration taken into account by the minister in timing this particular order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has shown astute political judgment in his choice of timing. I submit that he would not have gone on the hustings before June 27, nor would any member of the cabinet nor any Liberal candidate in this country, and announced the fact that they were going to "up" rents by 20 to 25 per cent. I submit that none of those same cabinet ministers or Liberal candidates would have dared to make that announcement on the eve of the recent by-elections. Coming as it does after a general election and after a series of by-elections, and four years away from the next general election, it is good political timing. That consideration, I submit, was the one uppermost in the minister's mind and in the government's mind at the time this order was issued.

The minister speaks of his orderly decontrol of rent. I can understand some of the difficulties in which the minister and his associates found themselves with regard to this matter of rent and rent control. This order in council is the culmination of a series of such orders which have made a complete hodgepodge of the whole business of rent control. The government had gotten themselves into such difficulties concerning rent control that no doubt something had to be done. It was becoming apparent that the job of rent control was getting just too big for the government. I suggest that the government policy of decontrol has been a disorderly rather than an orderly one. Here are some of the things that have been permitted to happen under rent control.

A few blocks from where I live, a house that was built for $8,000 in the middle thirties has, under government rent control, been sold and resold until a few days ago it sold for $22,000; and it is now rented for $175 a month whereas, prior to the war, it was renting for $55. That is the kind of thing that has been happening under the government rent control policy. There was no end of loopholes.

In the city of Toronto today there are any number of tenants who, under the government's rent control policy, are able to sublet single rooms and for those rooms collect rents that more than cover the entire rental they are paying for the house. That has been happening under the government's rent control policy.

It is true that there were some landlords who were "stuck". There were landlords who, during the depression years, were generous and conscientious enough to keep their rents down and who were caught by the government orders. Many of them have been stuck and have been obliged to rent their properties at a deflated value. Undoubtedly there are people who have suffered because they have been unable to get into some of the houses that they have purchased with the intention of moving into them. There has been a great deal of unfairness in the whole rent control business.

What was needed, I submit, was not a general lifting of rents by 20 per cent or 25 per cent, but an overhauling of the rent control regulations. There was ample room for improvement and for an overhauling. But the government did not receive from the country, on June 27, a mandate to raise rents by 20 or 25 per cent. I am going to ask this question of these Toronto Liberal members, most of whom have been in their seats all during this debate, and not one of whom has made any move to rise either to defend the government's position or to oppose it. Because the minister led off in this debate by stating the government's position, are we to believe of these Toronto Liberal members —who during the campaign were so loud in telling the people of their constituencies what the government would do about the housing situation—that they took a hint from the minister's speech? The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) during the election had a great deal to say about what this Liberal government would do with regard to the housing situation. I suppose no member in this house had more to say during that campaign than had the hon. member for Spadina about the wonderful things the Liberal government, if elected, would do to relieve the housing situation. I have not heard him protesting against these government orders.

As every Liberal and other member from Toronto knows, in the city of Toronto today the housing situation is desperate. I challenge any member elected from a Toronto or York riding to claim that he had any mandate from the people of those ridings to support a boosting of rents to 20 or 25 per cent. Just what has been the government's policy on decontrol? Let us look for a moment at how the government is gradually getting rid of control in this field. First of all, any accommodation built since January 1, 1947, is not subject to control. That lets out, I am told, about 50,000 units which have been provided since January 1, 1947, where builders and landlords have been free to squeeze out of the tenant every last dollar that the market would permit, and that has been followed pretty generally.

Then another group became decontrolled, namely, the accommodation that has been vacated for various reasons since November 1, 1948. That lets another considerable group of houses and landlords out from under control. Under this new regulation, as I understand it, any tenant who is unwilling to take a year's lease at the increased price which the landlord may charge, up to 20 or 25 per cent as the case may be, can be ousted from his house. That is going to remove another large group from control. That appears to be the policy which the government is deliberately following in its decontrol measures.

Today I read in the press that the case which was to come before the supreme court in Toronto to determine whether or not the federal government was within its jurisdiction in maintaining controls was indefinitely postponed because the government's solicitor was not present. If that is true I want to ask this question. Has the government's last move in this respect been so agreeable to the real estate interests who were pressing this case that they are now satisfied and are we going to have a test case? We were told by the minister that every effort would be made to have this test case brought on and judgment rendered in time for the provinces to take over control should the federal government find that it could no longer maintain rent control. It would seem to me that in a matter so vital the government would see to it that its solicitor was on the job when a case of this kind came before the courts.

I turn now to a discussion of the landlords. We saw this afternoon how the minister's heart bled for the landlords just as another minister's heart seemed to bleed yesterday afternoon for the poor milling interests of this country. Under the government's regulations there are unquestionably some landlords who have suffered, and unquestionably a modification should have been made in the rental regulations to take care of these cases of injustice and unfairness. But there is a large group of landlords who will derive high rentals under this order, not because of any investment or increased investment that they have made in their property, but because the value of their properties has risen along with the rising costs of other general commodities. I would say that by and large the landlords have not fared too badly, considering the large group which has been let out completely from underneath controls.

It is rather interesting to find the minister so concerned with the landlord's side of the question. I want to ask him whether he has considered other parties who will be affected. I submit that if the minister has given permission to landlords to raise the rents of those who are on old age pension, of veterans who are subsisting on their pensions and on veterans' allowances, then he is in duty bound, as far as these same people are concerned, to increase their pensions and their allowances by an equal amount.

The minister's action will be the beginning of a whole series of demands across this country for wage increases. Over the week end I had the privilege of meeting representatives of about thirty trade union locals. The meeting was called to discuss a certain subject. That whole meeting resolved itself spontaneously into a protest on the part of the trade unionists present against the government's action of raising rents. The one thing that was emphasized all through this meeting was the determination of those who were officers of trade union locals to press on the first opportunity for wage increases in order to compensate the workers for the increases in rent which they would be required to pay.

This evening the Ottawa Journal carries a heading that the increase in rent sparks a demand on the part of civil servants for increased salaries. This morning the Montreal Gazette carried the story of the president of the dominion civil servants association, claiming that that organization would be forced to seek higher salaries to offset the increases in rent which the civil servants would be required to pay. That is not a good thing for this country at this time. But the government could not have made any other one single move that would have sparked trade unions across this country, civil servants and others, to go out immediately to demand increased wages.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that this debate does not give every hon. member an opportunity to show by his vote just where he stands on this issue. I am sure that some of the good Liberals from the Toronto ridings would find it very difficult to cast a vote in this house in support of the measure. I want to ask them, in closing, what voice they had as members of the government party in determining or helping to determine this policy which the government has announced. I ask that because during the election campaign the Liberal condidates in Toronto were constantly telling us how much more beneficial it would be for the people of Toronto if they had members sitting on the government benches. I ask those member who are on the government benches tonight what they are doing for their constituents.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, much has been said about rent controls. I have very little to add, except a reply to an hon. member on the government side of the house who suggested that the country is behind the action taken by the government in increasing rents. Let me point out to him that the federation of mayors who met recently in Montreal were most emphatic in their views on rent control. I consider this one of the best bodies in Canada, from the standpoint of gauging public opinion. In it are the mayors of every town across this dominion. They are closely associated with the people in those towns, and their interests are closer to those of the people than the interests of members of parliament here in Ottawa.

Let me quote what they have to say with regard to controls. They say, in part:

> As such, it has no hesitation in saying that the removal of all rent controls, now or in the near future, would produce catastrophic effects for thousands of families throughout the country, and more particularly in those cities where there continues to be a demonstrably large housing shortage.

I would include in those towns both Ottawa and Montreal. Not a single member, to my knowledge, has risen in his place to protest against the condition which will arise in those cities when rents are increased. The statement from the mayors continues:

> It needs no argument to show that the inflation of prices since 1946, particularly affecting real estate, has shot the level of rents for new dwellings out of all comparison with the rents which prevailed over large areas of Canadian cities before the war.

Then, referring to the general shortage of homes they go on to say:

> Until this glaring weakness in the national housing program is rectified, a prospect which is not likely for the near future, it would be a dereliction of responsibility for the government to withdraw from the rental control field.

Then they go on to give an example. It continues:

> No less disturbing is the acute sense of insecurity already engendered in the minds of thousands of tenants by the mere rumour of decontrol, giving rise to the fear of evictions as well as that of having to pay rent beyond their means.

I suggest that those are the true views of the common people of Canada, and not the views as expressed by hon. members who would support the government in what it has done. The mayors are fair in the suggestion they make. They suggest, as did the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), that a fair increase is due and reasonable, and would be acceptable. Their suggestion is a general increase of 10 per cent and an increase of 5 per cent on low-rental housing, not exceeding $40 a month. With that I would agree. I feel the capital invested in many of the homes now increasing in rents has not been changed for twenty years. It is the original capital. I admit that capital has shown good returns for ten or twenty years; but the same capital today is showing greater returns than it ever did from the inception of the investments, because today the same homes and tenements are in full occupancy.

Already they have been given three increases in rents, and many of the services they formerly gave to tenants are not being given. They are cutting down on repairs, heating and in every way grasping that extra dollar which can be obtained from lowered services. I feel that, in protest against giving these people an added 20 per cent, the condemnation of the whole country has been voiced by the federation of mayors on behalf of the common people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will resume the debate on the budget, in the hope of concluding it and beginning with the budget resolutions.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENTS

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

Province of Newfoundland

St. John's, October 31, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, M.P., P.C., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Dear Prime Minister:

Tuesday, January 10, 1950, would be for us a suitable date on which to begin the sessions of the dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada.

J. R. Smallwood

Premier's Office
Prince Edward Island

Charlottetown, October 31, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

The date, January 10, 1950, as suggested in your letter of October 29, for a dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution of Canada, will be satisfactory to me.

Yours sincerely,

J. Walter Jones

Office of the Premier
Province of British Columbia

Victoria, October 31, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of October 29, regarding the dominion-provincial conference.

Please be advised that the date of January 10 will be most acceptable to the province of British Columbia.

With kindest personal regards,

Yours faithfully,

Byron I. Johnson
Premier

Premier's Office
Saskatchewan

Regina, October 31, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter of October 29, suggesting that a dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada begin its sessions on Tuesday, January 10. 1950.

This date is satisfactory to me, and we will make the necessary arrangements to have our representatives there for this conference. Personally I would have preferred an earlier date in order to give us more time to prepare any questions that might have to be submitted to the legislature when it meets early in the new year. However, I can appreciate the fact that your government will require some time to prepare for this conference, and if you feel that January 10 is the most convenient date, we will most heartily concur in this arrangement.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

Office of
The Prime Minister and President of the Council

Toronto, November 1, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of October 29 in which you suggest Tuesday, the 10th January, as the opening date for the dominion-provincial conference.

This date is satisfactory to me.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie M. Frost

Province of Manitoba
Office of the Premier

Winnipeg, November 1, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I am in receipt of your letter of October 29, 1949, suggesting that the dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada begin its sessions on Tuesday, January 10, 1950.

Although a week earlier would have better suited the Manitoba representatives, if the date of January 10 is preferred by the other provinces, we shall be quite agreeable to meeting at that time.

Yours sincerely,

Douglas Campbell

Office of the Premier
Alberta

Edmonton, November 1, 1949

Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

In reply to your letter of October 29, I would advise you that your suggested date of January 10 for the conference in respect to the constitution is quite satisfactory.

Appendix

May I, however, refer to the statement in your letter of September 14 to the effect that if the provincial governments desired a preparatory conference of constitutional experts, you would be ready to have federal officials participate. As I stated in my reply of October 12, the Alberta government favours such a meeting of constitutional experts being held in advance of the main conference.

In view of the many intricate aspects of the matter involved, we believe such a preliminary meeting to be most desirable. We would appreciate being advised as soon as possible in respect to this advance meeting.

Yours very truly,

Ernest C. Manning
Premier

Province of Quebec
Office of the Prime Minister

Quebec, November 2, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

The members of the provincial executive council have considered today your answer, dated October 29 last, which I received on the 31st of the same month, to my letter of October 26. In that communication I was reaffirming, as I am doing again today, for that matter, the "very clear" stand of the province of Quebec, and I was bringing to your attention the very important work of our provincial legislature.

Quite obviously, the postponement of our legislature's session involves some inconvenience. However, under the present circumstances we feel justified in putting off for some reasonable time the work of our legislature so that the province's delegates may go to Ottawa for the Canadian intergovernmental conference which you intend to convene for January 10 next.

The government of this province has a sincere desire to co-operate, on a fair and appropriate constitutional basis, in the settlement of the vital problems involved.

Sincerely yours,

M. L. Duplessis

The Premier
Nova Scotia

Halifax, November 5, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, M.P., P.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Prime Minister:

I should like to thank you for your letter of October 3, acknowledging my letter of September 27. Your letter arrived when I was absent from the city, and I did not return to my office until Monday of this week. On that day your further letter arrived, suggesting that the dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution in Canada should begin its sessions on Tuesday, January 10, 1950. That date will be convenient for the Nova Scotia delegation.

Yours sincerely,

Angus L. Macdonald

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 29, suggesting January 10 for the proposed conference on constitutional changes. If the proposed date meets the general convenience, we shall arrange to be represented at that time.

John B. McNair,
Premier of New Brunswick

THE FOLLOWING IS THE TEXT OF A LETTER SENT TO ALL PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, November 7, 1949

My dear Premier:

I wish to advise you that I have now heard from the premiers of all the provinces, and that Tuesday, January 10, 1950, appears to be generally acceptable as a date for the opening session of the dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution of Canada. It is therefore proposed to open the conference in Ottawa at 10.30 a.m. on that date.

As many of the premiers did not feel that a preliminary meeting of constitutional experts in advance of the main conference would serve any useful purpose, my colleagues and I feel we should not attempt to arrange such a meeting.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 9, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

James MacKerras Macdonnell, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Greenwood, introduced by Mr. George A. Drew and Mr. A. L. Smith.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOUSING—VETERANS IN GREATER WINNIPEG

Mr. Knowles:

In the allocation of houses to veterans in the Greater Winnipeg area, how many exceptions have there been, since January 1, 1947, to the rule that to qualify for such a house a veteran must have had overseas service, be married and have two children?

Mr. Winters: The rules governing the allocation of veterans' rental houses do not require that a veteran have overseas service and two or more children. Houses are allocated to suitable applicants in accordance with a point score. The grid rating by which applications are scored recognizes such factors as: Length of service in world war II both in Canada and overseas, a heavier weighting being given to service overseas, war service disability, number and age of children, other dependents, dispersed families, pending or actual eviction, condition and suitability of present accommodation, suitability as a tenant.

There is an overriding rule that houses will not be allocated to veterans with only one child while there are outstanding applications from qualified veterans with two or more children. In cases where the circumstances are very exceptional, however, as in the case of a disabled veteran with only one dependent, exceptions have been made to this two-children rule. Nineteen such exceptions were made in the greater Winnipeg area in the course of making 2,392 allocations since January 1, 1947.

NEWFOUNDLAND—PUBLIC WORKS—ARCHITECTURAL BRANCH STAFF

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What staff is now employed by the architectural branch of the Department of Public Works in Newfoundland?
2. What are the names of those employed?
3. What salary is paid to each?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1, 2 and 3.

Name—Position—Salary per annum.

Hopkins, L. W., district architect, grade 2, $4,740; Brown, D. R., typist, grade 1, $1,500; Lawlor, T., caretaker, grade 6, $2,400; King, S., caretaker, grade 3, $1,920; Martin, T., caretaker, grade 3, $1,920; Redmond, M. F., caretaker, grade 3, $1,920; Fowlow, W. T., caretaker, grade 3, $1,920; Clarke, H., caretaker, grade 2, $1,560; Poole, A., caretaker, grade 1, $1,500; Hiscock, G., caretaker, grade 1, $1,260; Boland, J., caretaker, grade 1, part-time, $680; Burke, A., caretaker, part-time, $480.

RADIO RECEIVING LICENCES

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How much money was collected for radio licences in 1946, 1947 and 1948?
2. What was the cost of collecting same?
3. What were the inspectors' salaries, including expenses?
4. What were law and court costs for delinquent radio taxpayers?

1948-49	$4,670,342.65

1946-47	$ 544,673.17 (including $307,169.20 commissions)
1948-49	$ 611,918.76 (including $341,982.00 commissions)

3. It is pointed out that inspectors are not private receiving station licence issuers. Commissions were paid to issuers as above indicated.

Legal fees payable by the department

1948-49	$1,538.49

Fines and court costs, payable by delinquents

	Fines	Court costs

Questions

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

1. When was the annuities branch of the Department of Labour established?
2. Have the rates of interest paid on deposits, in respect of annuity contracts, and the maximum amount of annuities purchasable, been changed since that date?
3. If so, in what years and to what extent?
4. What profit or loss was shown by the annuities branch (a) for the year previous to the last date of change of rate; (b) for the year following?
5. Do these profits or losses take into consideration office and administrative expenses?
6. What is the estimated total of office and administrative expenses annually?
7. Are government annuities considered to be a part of Canada's social security program?
8. How many government annuity contracts were in effect at the end of (a) 1938; (b) 1948?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-LaSalle):

1. The Government Annuities Act was passed in 1908, and came under the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In 1912 it was transferred to the Post Office Department, and in 1922 to the Department of Labour.

2. Yes, there have been changes since 1908.

3. Interest rate for new contracts changed from 4 per cent to 3 per cent in April, 1948. Maximum annuity purchasable originally was $600. Increased to $1,000 in 1913; increased to $5,000 in 1920; reduced to $1,200 in 1931.

4. *(a) Loss, fiscal year 1947-48, $331,857. (b) Loss, fiscal year 1948-49, $609,541.

Note: *The loss in 1947-48 resulted from the number of deaths during the year being less than anticipated under the rate structure. In 1948-49 the death rate was considerably lighter than in the previous year. Consequently, the loss was greater. It might be added that the losses shown apply to vested contracts under old rates.

Calculated on same basis as previous year. The actual amount transferred to maintain annuities reserve was $11,408,468, in order to value old business on same mortality basis as 1948 premiums.

Fiscal year	Total administrative expenses
1944-45	$353,556 72
1945-46	400,961 51
1946-47	566,968 04
1947-48	665,622 45
1948-49	754,606 00

7. Yes.

8. (a) 33,685; (b) 210,935.†

Note: †Includes 92,063 certificates under group plans.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

NORTHERN LABRADOR TRADING OPERATIONS

Mr. Higgins:

Has Canada assumed responsibility for the operation known as northern Labrador trading operations?

Mr. Maybank: No.

PAYMENTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND FOR RAILWAY EQUIPMENT, ETC.

Mr. Higgins:

What was the amount by which Newfoundland was reimbursed for payments made before March 31, 1949, for railway equipment not delivered until after March 31, 1949?

Mr. Higgins:

What was the amount by which Newfoundland was reimbursed for payments made by Newfoundland for buildings and R.C.A.F. equipment at Gander airport?

Mr. Higgins:

How much was paid to Newfoundland for (a) S.S. Bar Haven; (b) S.S. Springdale?

Mr. Higgins:

What was the amount paid to Newfoundland in respect to expenditures made by Newfoundland at Gander airport for conversion of buildings to civil use, runway improvements and the replacement or expansion of plant and equipment between April 1, 1945 and March 31, 1949?

Mr. Chevrier: The four preceding questions, standing in the name of the member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), are questions upon which the Department of Transport has not information available, nor can it have the information before the end of this year. Under the circumstances, would the hon. member drop the questions?

Mr. Speaker: Questions dropped.

ONTARIO HIGHWAYS—HEARST-GERALDTON-FORT WILLIAM

Mr. Bradette:

1. Did the federal government, during the years 1939 to 1945, spend money on or contribute money for construction on any portions of Ontario provincial highway No. 11, between Hearst, Geraldton and Fort William, of the province of Ontario?

2. If so, what amount was contributed?

3. Under what authority was such money paid?

4. If it was granted under the War Measures Act, was there any agreement with the province of Ontario and the federal government for the construction of that highway?

5. What was the ratio of expenditure of the two respective parties?

Mr. Maybank:

2.

Total	$787,273.77

3. Authority for 1938-39 payments was order in council P.C. 1661, of July 13, 1938, issued under the terms of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1938.

Authority for 1939-40 was order in council P.C. 1483, of June 15, 1939, issued under the terms of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1939.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Equal expenditures were made by the two respective parties.

R.C.A.F—CHATHAM, N.B., STATION—COAL

Mr. Brooks:

1. Were tenders called for the supplying of coal for the R.C.A.F station at Chatham, New Brunswick?

Questions

2. If so (a) what tenders were received, showing names and amount of each tender; (b) which tender was accepted; (c) what is the quality of coal provided under the tender; (d) what quantity of coal was required?

3. Is the price for coal under above contract f.o.b. cars Chatham or delivered in stock piles, or bins, to the R.C.A.F. station?

4. If f.o.b. cars, were tenders called for the trucking from railway station to R.C.A.F. station?

5. If tenders were called, what are the names of individuals who tendered, and the amount of each tender?

6. Who received the contract?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Twelve quotations were received from eight firms, as follows:

—	Type	Price per ton f.o.b. cars	Cost per M.B.T.U.	Price per ton f.o.b. stockpile, and/or bins	Cost per M.B.T.U.
Intercolonial Coal Co. Ltd., Westville, N.S.	Drummond	$9.55	$0.395
Indian Cove Coal Co. Ltd., Sydney Mines, N.S.	Indian Cove	9.75	0.479
S. Cunard & Co. Ltd., Halifax, N.S.	Bras D'Or	10.30	0.418	$12.30	$0.500
Rogers Montreal Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.	Franklin Bras D'Or	10.39	0.407	11.19	0.439
Dominion Coal Co. Ltd., Moncton, N.B.	Acadia	10.55	0.418
Dominion Coal Co. Ltd., Moncton, N.B.	Dominion	11.55	0.445
Rogers Montreal, Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.	Lumpstead Penn., U.S.A.	11.59	0.431	12.39	0.460
Eastern Coal Co. Ltd., Saint John, N.B.	Indian Cove	12.49	0.612	13.95	0.685
H. B. McDonald, Chatham, N.B.	Acadia			12.00 S.P. 12.50 bins	0.475 0.495
W. S. Loggie Co. Ltd., Chatham, N.B.	Acadia			12.50 S.P. 13.00 bins	0.495 0.515
H. B. McDonald, Chatham, N.B.	Sydney			13.00 S.P. 13.50 bins	0.501 0.520
W. S. Loggie Co. Ltd., Chatham, N.B.	Sydney			13.50 S.P. 14.00 bins	0.520 0.539

(b) The quotation submitted by Rogers Montreal Limited at $11.19 per ton, f.o.b. stockpile or bins was accepted. Calculated on a B.T.U. basis, this quotation was the second lowest received, f.o.b. cars. The lowest received, that submitted by Intercolonial Coal Company Limited, was for coal, the ash content of which was 18·4 per cent or 4·4 per cent in excess of the maximum allowable by the Department of National Defence. Having regard to the cost of storage by individual contractors, it was considered more economical to purchase on a f.o.b. stockpile or bins basis for which kind of delivery Rogers Montreal Limited submitted the lowest quotation calculated on a B.T.U. basis.

(c) Coal, bituminous, nut slack 1¼". The "as received" analysis given in the successful tender was as follows: Moisture, 3·50 per cent; Ash, 10·52 per cent; Volatile matter, 35·55 per cent; Fixed carbon, 53·93 per cent; Sulphur, 3·93 per cent; F.P.A., 2·040 degrees F.; B.T.U., 13,207.

(d) 3,000 tons.

3. 4, 5 and 6. Answered by 2(b) above.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CIVIL SERVICE—APPOINTMENTS SINCE JANUARY 1, 1949—VETERANS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many appointments, by provinces, have been made to temporary and permanent positions in the civil service since the 1st of January, 1949?
2. Of those, how many, by provinces, were veterans?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—STILLS

Mr. Fraser:

1. How many stills or photographs were taken, developed and printed by the national film board during the period January 1 to September 30, 1949?
2. What size were these stills?
3. How many were sold and at what prices were these different sizes sold?

Mr. Winters: Return tabled.

BENTINCK ISLAND, B.C., LEPER STATION

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many patients are cared for at the leper station, Bentinck island, British Columbia?
2. How many attendants and other persons are employed at Bentinck island, and what are their salaries?
3. What was the cost of maintaining Bentinck island, including heating, lighting, etc., during the past year?
4. What improvements have been made in the accommodation, lighting plant and landing stage during the last two years?
5. What was the cost of these improvements?

CERTIFICATES OF NATURALIZATION

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many certificates of naturalization have been issued under P.C. 5842, dated July 9, 1942, to (a) aliens serving outside Canada with the naval, military and air force services of Canada; (b) aliens residing in Canada?
2. What is the minimum time of residence in Canada required before the certificate of naturalization is issued to aliens residing in Canada, under P.C. 5842?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What was the price of flour and millfeed in Canada prior to the post-war decontrol of these products?
2. At what date was the investigation into the flour industry started with the approval of the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, then minister of justice?
3. What was the price of flour and millfeed on the date the above investigation was started?
4. Were reductions made in the price of flour and millfeed subsequent to this date?
5. If so, when, and of what amount were they?

HEALTH AND WELFARE—EXPENDITURES BY GOVERNMENT AND OTHER AGENCIES

Mr. Knowles:

1. What was the total amount expended in Canada on health and welfare by (a) the federal government; (b) the provincial governments; (c) municipal authorities; (d) voluntary and other organizations, in 1930, 1935, 1938, 1940, 1942, 1944, 1946 and 1948?
2. What is the anticipated expenditure on health and welfare by (a), (b), (c) and (d) as above, for 1949 and for 1950?
3. What main items are included, and what are the amounts for each such main item, in the answers to questions (1) and (2) above?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR SHIPMENT OF P.E.I POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Prince): In view of the fact that I have received many telephone calls and telegrams from Prince Edward Island concerning the acute shortage of refrigerator cars, will the Minister of Transport make a statement about that situation?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): There is not a great deal I can say, other than that the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) and the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I., (Mr. Douglas), both spoke to me and are apprehensive about the situation. The position at the moment is that from the first of September to the first of November, 1949, there were 621 refrigerator cars available for the movement of potatoes. These were shipped from Borden to Tormentine and handled on the car ferry. This compares favourably with 1948, when there were 592 such cars. This morning I was informed that 111 cars are now on the island; 238 have been earmarked for movement there from such points as Tormentine, Sackville, Moncton, Truro, Napadogan, Edmundston and Joffre. There are 70 more that are to be moved to the area. The Canadian National Railways are familiar with the position and have it in hand.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION—CANADA'S SECURITY FROM ATTACK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the Prime Minister the following questions: (1) Can he soon name part of a day to deal with external affairs? (2) No diplomacy can match the atomic menace; (3) Canada should know soon what security it has from attack, notwithstanding the United Nations organization.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member sent me notice of his questions, one of which is in the form of a question and the other two seem to be assertions. No. 1 is, "Can he soon name part of a day to deal with external affairs?" I am not yet in a position to say definitely that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will be here on the 16th and 17th of this month, but we are endeavouring to arrange that. Yesterday I promised to make an announcement in the house as soon as the arrangements in New York can be completed. No. 2 is, "No diplomacy can match the atomic menace". This is an assertion with which I am not going to quarrel. No. 3: "Canada should know soon what security it has from attack, notwithstanding the United Nations organization". I hope Canada will be able to ascertain what security it has, and that it will be satisfactory security, but it is not a question I can answer.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 3, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Rowe.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to deal with the subject which I propose to discuss today, I should like to state the Social Credit position on the Conservative amendment. We take no exception to the wording of it. We support the proposal for an early commonwealth conference for the purpose of working out an arrangement for expanding our markets in sterling countries.

The Conservative position on important matters of trade, as made apparent by their spokesmen, seems to be based upon two principles which to us are fallacies. The first of these is the convertibility of currency. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) demonstrated on November 1 how utterly unrealistic it is to talk about multilateral trade based upon the convertibility of currencies in a world in which there is an unbalance of no less than $6 billion between the sterling and dollar areas. The second fallacy appearing in the Conservative case is that all exchange controls should be abolished, and that money should be allowed to find its own value. This would mean that the value of money would be determined by speculation rather than by its real purchasing power.

Social Crediters have always felt that this Conservative proposal is based upon the false concept that money is a commodity that should be bought and sold like rice or beans. Social Crediters contend that such a concept lies at the root of human misery. We shall vote for the Conservative amendment. We support it for what it says, but we do not in any way subscribe to the technique which the Conservatives might propose at the commonwealth conference in question, if that technique is based upon the fallacies I have mentioned.

So much having been said about the Conservative amendment, may I turn to the discussion of the need for federal aid for education in the provinces of Canada. The other day I received from my constituency a letter which contains a passage which I believe will serve as a point of contact, so to speak, for what I have to say. It comes from Barnwell, Alberta. It is signed by the principal of the school there; part of it reads as follows:

> In Barnwell, where I am in a position to know as principal of the school, at least 33 per cent of the children attending our school come from families paying no taxes for education except a $4 annual poll tax (these people being beet labourers, not owning land). This places a tremendous burden on our taxpayers to maintain full school advantages. In fact they find it is almost impossible to do so. Governmental aid seems to be the only solution to our problem.

Before continuing with that, may I say that the schools in my constituency are overburdened because of the influx of people from two sources. One of these is the displaced persons, who seem to be dumped in my constituency rather generously; the other is the Japanese, who were brought in from British Columbia and dumped in that area. Both types of people, while I have complete respect for them, have kept the commandment of the Lord to multiply and replenish the earth. The result is that throngs of their children go to our schools. While they are quite welcome there, it does throw a heavy burden on our educational facilities.

May I point out that both these abnormal conditions are the result of federal control and federal policy over which the province has no power or control whatsoever.

As to federal aid for education, there are a number of considerations which in my judgment weigh with considerable importance in regard to this matter. There are widely varying economic conditions and financial circumstances prevailing in the provinces throughout Canada. Suppose that we assume that the people of any one province are just as eager to educate their children as are the people of any other province. Then we must gather a considerable amount of sobering information concerning the financial conditions and economic conditions in the various provinces from a contemplation of the figures which I shall read to the house and endeavour to have put on Hansard. These figures are drawn from a document which I look upon as being completely authentic. May I read them? They are from page 7 of a publication called "Wealth, Children and Education in Canada", by K. F. Argue, associate professor of education, university of Alberta, a document prepared for presentation to the national convention of the Canadian Teachers Federation at Vancouver, August 13-17, 1945. It is not completely up to date, but it is near enough to give us a fairly good picture of the situation confronting Canadians in various parts of Canada:

Financial provision per unit of educational need in the Canadian provinces.

1936 and 1941

(Stated in terms of dollar values August 1, 1939)

	1936	1941
Prince Edward Island	$16.87	$14.29
Nova Scotia	22.35	22.70
New Brunswick	18.58	19.74
Quebec	20.25	22.86
Year average—maritimes and Quebec	$20.26	$22.34
General average—maritimes and Quebec	Approximately	21.00
Manitoba	$31.43	$35.37
Saskatchewan	25.87	32.85
Alberta	38.98	39.41
Year average—prairie provinces	$31.05	$35.70
General average—prairie provinces	Approximately	33.00
Ontario	$45.43	$46.87
British Columbia	47.18	49.61
Year average—Ontario and B.C.	$45.70	$47.30
General average—Ontario and B.C.—	Approximately	46.50
Canada: Year averages	32.73	34.00
General average for dominion—	Approximately	33.00

Expenditure recommended by the C.N.E.A. survey committee for a very moderate and practicable advance in education	Approximately $67.00

May I just give a little attention to those figures. Hon. members will not be able to recall them readily, but I will mention one or two. They will notice that the report says that the amount which ought to be spent for a general average Canadian education is $67. The general average for the maritimes and Quebec is $21; for the prairie provinces, $33; for Ontario and British Columbia, $46.50. It cannot be seriously entertained—

Mr. Coldwell: Has the hon. member the figures broken down for Ontario and British Columbia?

Mr. Blackmore: No, I have not. Ontario is $45.43 and $46.87; and British Columbia is $47.18 and $49.61.

Mr. Coldwell: British Columbia is a little more.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes. It cannot be seriously entertained, or even pretended, that the people of Ontario are any more desirous of giving their children a good education than are the people of Quebec or Nova Scotia. I think every hon. member would be disgusted at the very thought of such a notion. Then we must conclude that the reason why the maritimes are able to provide so little for their children is simply that they lack the financial and economic set-up in their provinces with which to supply the needed support for education.

I quoted from the C.N.E.A. Hon. members will be entitled to know what this C.N.E.A. is. Dr. F. Cyril James, principal of McGill university and chairman of the advisory committee on reconstruction, requested the members to survey the Canadian educational scene in 1943. The members were:

1. The president of the Canada and Newfoundland Educational Association, who is also director of Protestant education for the province of Quebec.

2. The French secretary and deputy minister of education for the province of Quebec.

3. The director of education for the province of New Brunswick as representative of the maritime provinces.

4. The deputy minister of education for Ontario.

5. The deputy minister of education for Alberta as representative of the western provinces.

6. A representative of the Canadian Teachers Federation.

7. A representative of the Canadian National Federation of Home and School.

8. The director of the Canadian Association for Adult Education.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if those gentlemen were not able to discover the truth, it must be extremely difficult indeed to discover it.

There is a good deal to be said concerning the general inadequacy of Canadian educational provisions. It was found by this committee that Canada's typical teacher in 1941 was a single lady with a grade X, XI or XII education, plus a course of from six to eight months in normal school. About one Canadian teacher in six had a university education. Those who had such an education almost invariably taught in secondary schools. Canada had approximately 70,000 teachers in those days. In 1941 she paid each of the 35,000 of those teachers $782 a year, or less than $15.04 a week. She paid each of 17,500 of them less than $537 a year, or $10.05 a week. Just imagine a young girl or boy teaching school for that amount of money and hoping to repay a loan for education, or hoping to save up for higher education! Or just imagine a young man trying to save up to get married!

As a contrast to this state of affairs, Canadian Breweries in 1941 paid salaried employees an average income of $50 a week, as against $10.05 for the teacher. Canadian Breweries paid wage earners an average weekly wage of $29. That is almost three times as much per week as was paid to the 17,500 teachers whom I mentioned a moment ago.

Here are the median salaries of Canada's teachers in 1941 by provinces: Prince Edward Island, $422 a year. May I pause to explain that median, as hon. members know, means the average. It means that 49·9 per cent of the teachers received less than the figure which I just mentioned. Nova Scotia, $627 a year; New Brunswick, $588; Quebec, Protestant, $1,247; Quebec, Roman Catholic lay teachers, $318, religious orders, $479; Ontario, $1,055; Manitoba, $748; Saskatchewan, $710; Alberta, $881 and British Columbia, $1,321. The median for Canada was $782 a year. As I said before, 49·9 per cent of the Canadian teachers in these respective provinces received less than the amounts which I have mentioned.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the hon. member whether he is bringing these salaries up to date? I know that some have been increased by as much as three times the figures which he gave.

Mr. Blackmore: Probably I went a little too fast. I mentioned that this is the 1941 picture. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) put some figures on the record bringing them up nearer to date; but I think the disparity which exists between any two provinces in Canada will be just about comparable with the disparity which existed between any two provinces in 1941. What I am endeavouring to bring out is not so much the meagre income which is being paid our teachers as the fact that the amount which the people are able to give their teachers in the varying provinces differs very greatly as from one province to another.

The Canadian average per pupil in attendance was $59. The British Columbia average was $84. The Canadian average per pupil enrolled was $50. The British Columbia average was $73. The Canadian average per child between five and nineteen was $33. The British Columbia average was $46.50. I do not mention these figures just to show how much better British Columbia is doing than the other provinces. If the average British Columbian were asked if that province were paying enough to the teachers in that province he would say without hesitation: We undoubtedly are not; we should be able to pay our teachers far more than we are paying them. Nevertheless British Columbia has been able to pay more than the other provinces have been paying. Contrast that with what Prince Edward Island can pay, and you will see the truth of the general statement I have made that there is a wide range of economic and financial circumstances facing the people in the various provinces of Canada.

From an editorial in Maclean's magazine prior to November 1, 1944, entitled "Education in Canada needs more money," I quote the following words, which constitute a sad commentary on the figures which I have given:

> "In Ontario the average cost of keeping a person in jail is $536.55 per year."

In other words we are paying more to keep a man in jail than we are paying a large percentage of our teachers in Canada.

The financial responsibilities of the provinces are very heavy. I do not know that I have been very happy about the relative inability of some people to appreciate these facts. Let me mention that once more for the sake of hon. members and people throughout the country. The provinces of this dominion have many responsibilities placed upon them, and very little substantial provision for means of obtaining the money with which to discharge those responsibilities.

Here are some of the costly responsibilities which rest upon the provinces according to the British North America Act: They have to take care of roads, which entail a colossal expenditure, especially in these times of motor transport. They have to take care of the forests, irrigation,—at least that was the general idea until very recently—public welfare, old age and blind pensions. Of course we recognize that the dominion is contributing in relation to the last mentioned item. But the general argument I am advancing is that the dominion must contribute to education also.

The provinces must take care of indigent relief, mothers' allowances, child welfare and mental patients. For example, Alberta alone on December 31, 1947, had 3,201 mental patients. I would imagine that that is a figure comparable with what would be found in other provinces. The provinces are charged with assistance to municipalities. They are charged with public health and hospitalization.

To offset these great financial responsibilities the revenue sources of the provinces available to them are unstable and grossly inadequate; especially is this the case in the western provinces and in the maritimes.

May I turn to my own province, with which I am naturally more familiar than I am with other provinces, much as I am interested in the welfare of the other provinces. In the year 1947-48 we had a revenue of $57,692,728.60. Our total expenditures for that same year were $50,952,244.84. Here is the way that the Alberta government saw fit to apportion that expenditure: To education they gave $7,695,352.45, $9.58 per capita, 14·2 per cent of the revenue and 20·8 per cent of the expenditures. To public health and welfare they gave $13,298,299.97; to highways and bridges they gave $12,950,284.60; to public buildings and other public works, $1,901,643.02. To administration of justice they gave $938,673.69. Expenditures for agriculture amounted to $1,088,281.71. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it will require very careful study to show how any one of these expenditures could be decreased. There is a tremendous demand for public health and welfare services, and for highways and bridges. Public buildings must be taken care of, and also the administration of justice. Expenditures for agriculture are very important, because through them the increase in the production of the province is taken care of. Hon. members can see what the province of Alberta faced financially in the year 1947-48.

It will be argued that at the present time Alberta has additional revenue coming from the oil industry. We will all grant that, but it must be borne in mind that any sound administration caring for a province must look to the future. I think that any group of men taken from this house would act in the same way as do the people who are in charge in the province of Alberta so far as looking to the future is concerned. The province of Alberta will look back to the years that have passed. They will recall that during the years 1930 to 1935 the province was put into debt to the extent of $51 million. That was not because of any careless administration. That was because of the needs of the needy. If another depression comes along the province will probably be faced with a similar outlay and a similar debt. How many years could a province like Alberta survive under such a state of affairs? Surely it is the part of wisdom to provide for any such contingency as the onset of a depression, when the province knows so well the most precarious financial system under which we are operating!

In 1935 the province was under a very heavy debt. We owed something like $167 million gross. It was almost enough to destroy us. It was costing close to fifty cents out of every dollar of our taxation to service the debt alone. Will any group of intelligent men from any party whatsoever in any province of Canada reason that when we have the opportunity to pay off such a debt as that, we should not take the opportunity?

Alberta has wisely assumed that the proper thing to do is to lay by for a rainy day. They see a rainy day coming before very long. If the rainy day does not come, it will still be a fine thing to have a little reserve on hand to take care of what might be a painful situation. So we cannot really say that Alberta should appropriate any of the moneys she is taking in from the oil industry for the servicing of education at the present time. At the same time, however, even if it were proposed that she should spend money from her oil revenues for education, judging from articles appearing in the newspapers published in that province she ought to be spending a lot more money on roads and highways; she ought to be spending more money in helping to finance municipalities; she ought to be spending more money on irrigation, and ought to be spending more money on this, that and the other thing.

Hon. members will realize that in a democracy, the provincial government has to be susceptible to the influence of public opinion, just as does any other government. It becomes difficult for a province, from almost any angle, to appropriate a larger percentage of provincial revenues to the support of education.

Hon. members will be interested in what Alberta has done for education. These figures tend to show how the provinces are manfully standing up to the task. In Alberta the total expenditure for education in 1934-35, which was during the depression years, was $2,269,286.41; in 1939-40, it was $2,850,214.09 and in 1944-45, it was $4,072,402.65. In 1948-49 the estimated amount is $9,829,000.

It must be obvious to anyone that Alberta is endeavouring to do all it can for education. Then, grants to schools in 1934-35 amounted to $1,391,020, in 1939-40 they were $1,763,768; in 1944-45 they were $2,717,700, and the estimated amount for 1948-49 is $5,700,000. Once more the province is doing all that one could logically expect for education.

Grants per pupil in 1934-35 amounted to $8.28; in 1939-40, $10.76; in 1944-45, $17.81, and the estimated amount for 1948-49 is $36.65.

The total grant to the university of Alberta in 1934-35 was $386,250; in 1939-40 it was $425,000; in 1944-45, $602,500, and the estimated amount for 1948-49 is $1,170,900, plus a capital sum for new buildings amounting to $1,369,800.

The institute of technology and art received in 1934-35 the sum of $64,438.41; in 1939-40, $79,238.23; in 1944-45, $63,796.12, and the estimated amount for 1948-49 is $197,613.

I mention those figures from my own province to show that the provinces are doing the very best they can with the means at their disposal. Even at that they must fall far short of providing the support for education to which the average Canadian boy and girl is entitled.

I said a while ago that the province has only meagre and unstable sources of financial revenue. Let us turn from the provincial to the federal field. In the first place the federal government has access to the whole credit of Canada, through section 91 (3) of the British North America Act, which makes provision for the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation. No reservation is made; the dominion is free to take money wherever she wishes. Furthermore, the dominion is capable of borrowing money on the public credit of all Canada. Currency and coinage is in the hands of the dominion, as are banking, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.

There will be those who will argue that these are responsibilities rather than sources of revenue. I suggest that attitude is entirely false. Those sources of revenue—currency and coinage, banking, the incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money—constitute probably the most important single source of revenue available in Canada. But it is locked up with the federal government, because the British North America Act precludes the provinces from gaining access to money through use of those means.

I believe I have said sufficient to show that the only possible solution of the education problem facing us must be found through federal aid to education, in every province. It seems to me that the child growing up in Prince Edward Island has the right to as good an education as the child born in any other province. There is only one way in which we can guarantee to each child that he shall have those privileges of education which are his birthright, and that is through federal aid to education.

I shall be asked what I would do about education in provinces which may desire to have privately-owned schools. My answer would be that the money should be issued to the provinces as a definite grant, without any earmarks, and with no strings attached. A province as wise in the management of money in respect of those obligations placed upon her as Alberta has shown herself to be—as indicated by the figures I placed on Hansard a few moments ago—can safely be trusted with any moneys a federal government may think it appropriate and just to give that province. She will spend the money advanced by the federal government just as wisely as she spends the money derived from her own sources of revenue.

We need not endeavour to interfere with the way the provinces used the money put at their disposal. They will take care of that. I believe such money should be advanced on a per capita basis, regardless of the religious affiliation of the child concerned. The money would be granted for the education of a Canadian child, wherever that child may be, or in whatever circumstances it may live.

I urge once more that the federal government take into serious consideration the granting of generous allotments of money to each of the provinces not later than next year to support them in their endeavour to have a suitable educational system.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I feel it to be my bounden duty to take advantage of the latitude allowed by the budget debate to bring to the attention of the house a matter of vital interest and grave concern to hundreds of thousands of citizens in the Atlantic provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

It was at the historic city of Quebec in the year 1864 that the fathers of confederation met in solemn assembly to deliberate, among other things, upon the inducements for the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to unite with Canada in forming that which was later to become what we Canadians with some considerable justification hold out to be the mightiest unit in the British commonwealth of nations.

Although the deliberations of the Quebec conference were not open to the public, and although no completely official minutes of the proceedings of that body are in existence today, nevertheless it was later disclosed to the people along the Atlantic seaboard that there was a clear and distinct understanding among the delegates representing the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on the one hand and Canada on the other that the federal government to be set up as a result of the proposed confederation would take upon itself certain definite responsibilities. Not the least of those responsibilities was the construction of a canal through the isthmus of Chignecto, a narrow strip of land some eighteen miles in width at its narrowest point and connecting the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Despite the absence of an official record of the deliberations of the Quebec conference there is ample evidence on the unquestioned records of this house and of yet another place that the construction of what at that time was referred to as the proposed Baie Verte canal occupied a prominent role during those discussions. Although not a condition of confederation, it was nevertheless so clearly expected to be one of the first projects to be undertaken by the central government that the delegates from the easterly maritime provinces were completely satisfied that it formed an integral part of the considerations for their entering into the union contract.

On April 8, 1876, Mr. Burpee, the member for Sunbury in my own province, spoke on the floor of the House of Commons as follows:

> The two great improvements spoken of in New Brunswick before the union were the intercolonial railroad and the Baie Verte canal. The intercolonial was made a condition of confederation, and although the canal was not, it was understood it was also to be constructed.

Mr. Burpee did not hesitate to say that if the people of New Brunswick had not been satisfied that this point was settled and that the construction of the Baie Verte canal would be proceeded with, they would have never consented to the union.

Again on May 7, 1886, the late Senator Dickey, one of the fathers of confederation and the illustrious great-grandfather of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), who sits in front of me in this house, again raised the question of this same canal when he said:

> It was an undertaking which was agitated in the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island for half a century. It received the sanction of every governor and every military commander to whom it was referred during the whole of that period, and it became one of those things that had to be done. At all events the provinces very strongly urged it, and when the Quebec conference took place in 1864 it was then distinctly agreed and understood that this Baie Verte canal across the same isthmus dividing the two provinces should be constructed by the dominion, because, as the house will recall, these three small provinces, in their disunited state, could not grapple with a work of that magnitude.

I shall not at this time delve too deeply into the tragic details of the efforts put forward in promoting this project. Generations of maritimers have gone to their graves bewildered and disillusioned over the failure of the federal authorities to carry out this undertaking so necessary for the development of the Atlantic provinces. Down through the years since confederation this question has been raised and discussed on the floor of this House of Commons. Time after time parliament has been made conscious of its obligations in this regard. Commissions have been appointed; surveys have been conducted, and without exception they have determined the engineering feasibility of this canal.

On at least two occasions, when it seemed that its construction would most certainly be proceeded with, it was decided that the economic conditions of the times did not warrant the expenditures necessary to carry out the work. This despite the fact that during one of those periods, between 1930 and 1935, unemployment was rife in this country, and a project of this nature not only would have fed thousands of hungry mouths but would have assisted materially in the economic recovery of the Atlantic provinces. Surely such an excuse cannot be put forward today.

During the present century industrial development in the maritime provinces has lagged behind that of other sections of Canada. Although the investment of capital has increased in our provinces, and although production has reached a much higher level, we have nevertheless obvious geographic disadvantages. Because of transportation handicaps it is not possible for us to ship our products to the populous markets of our country so as to compete favourably with the products of the industries of central Canada. Should the building of a canal through the isthmus of Chignecto be proceeded with at this time, the Atlantic provinces would be placed in a much more favourable economic position, and their economic development, so long and so unnecessarily retarded, would be ensured. Old industries would be revived; new industries would spring into being, and coastwise trade in small vessels would flourish. The potatoes and fish products of Prince Edward Island could be shipped by small vessels to the east coast of the United States. The wood products of the north shore of our own province of New Brunswick could be similarly shipped to the port of Saint John for transshipment to the markets of the world in ocean-going vessels, as would also the various products from the north shore of Nova Scotia. At the present time it is necessary for those products either to be shipped by rail at prohibitive cost or to travel by water via a circuitous, costly and hazardous route in order to reach their destination.

With the advent of the grand province of Newfoundland into confederation, and the exploitation of the iron ore deposits in Labrador a distinct probability, it is easy to envision that part of this ore will be shipped to eastern United States ports. The water route from the St. Lawrence to the eastern coast of the United States would be shortened some 400 miles by the construction of the Chignecto canal, as it has now come to be known.

I shall leave to other occasions and to other hon. members of this house who intend to record their wholehearted support of this project a more detailed description of the advantages that the Chignecto canal will bring to constituencies other than my own and to the nation as a whole. The citizens of my constituency have long urged the building of this canal, because to them its advantages are obvious and manifold. The great seaport of Saint John—spelled S-a-i-n-t—through which is shipped each year millions of tons of freight destined for the markets of the world, would be made readily accessible to other regions of the Atlantic provinces via a short and less expensive water route. The several foundries in and about Saint John could import their pig iron and moulding sand from the great lakes region on a more economical basis. A saving could also be realized in the importation of coke from Montreal for these same industries. Our fertilizer could be shipped over a wider area at much lower cost. With the increased commerce going through our port and the revival of coastwise shipping, we feel that employment in our vital shipbuilding and ship repair industry would tend to reach a more stable level.

The Saint John area produces about one-quarter of all the crushed limestone quarried in Canada. This is distributed for agricultural purposes under a joint policy of the federal government and the governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and I believe Nova Scotia is also concerned. Those governments could save a great deal of money if this limestone were shipped by water through the Chignecto canal, and there is a distinct possibility that a market for this product would be opened up in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

There is now under construction in Albert county, in my constituency, in one of the most beautiful settings in Canada, the Fundy national park. It is anticipated that the thousands of pleasure craft which would normally pass through the Chignecto canal will find a haven in the village of Alma, in the same county, at the entrance to what promises to become a tourists' paradise.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record, as evidence of the mounting interest in the Chignecto canal in our Atlantic provinces, a resolution recently adopted by the maritime board of trade at a meeting held in Charlottetown on September 30 of this year.

> Whereas Chignecto canal committees are being organized in all important centres throughout the maritime provinces in support of the construction of the Chignecto canal;
> And whereas several royal commissions have declared its feasibility and its economic value to the maritime provinces as a whole;
> And whereas the Surveyer commission of 1931-33, while confirming the findings of previous investigations, could not recommend its construction at that time owing to existing economic conditions, but did recommend its further examination in the light of future development;
> And whereas there is now a widespread and ever-growing demand throughout the maritimes for its immediate construction;
> Therefore be it resolved that the Maritime Board of Trade go on record as supporting the Chignecto canal committee in urging definite action towards the construction of the Chignecto canal.

Before I conclude I should like to remind this parliament that it has before it a solemn obligation, in common with every parliament since confederation, to ensure for the people of my province and those of the other Atlantic provinces the construction of this most important project, which we deem to be so necessary for our future economic welfare.

Mr. J. R. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I think I am the first member to publicly welcome the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) back to this chamber. In connection with this welcome, I would hazard a guess, sir, that the $64 question in the minds of some has been answered. The question: Can you keep a good man down? The answer is no.

This is the first time in this session of the twenty-first parliament of Canada that I have taken any part in the discussions. I take this opportunity to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on having been the unanimous choice of hon. members of this house for the position which you hold. I wish to assure you that it will be a pleasure to co-operate with you in your duties, which I know you will carry out with distinction and which I trust will not be too arduous.

Before making any specific remarks on subjects which are of interest and importance to my constituents of Antigonish-Guysborough, on the east coast of Nova Scotia, I would like to say a word of welcome to the many new members who are this session making their debut, so to speak, in this chamber. It is encouraging to see so many young men interesting themselves in the affairs of the nation, and indicating their willingness to share in its responsibilities. I would like to welcome in a special manner the members from our newest sister province, the sea-girt province of Newfoundland. They will find that many of the interests and hopes of their constituents are similar to those of the residents of other maritime provinces, and this common bond will, I know, serve to weld closely together the people of our new province and their representatives with those of our other maritime provinces.

I should also like to extend congratulations to our genial Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the success which has attended upon his work, by no means easy, of keeping the financial situation of Canada on a pretty even keel, even while so many other countries are experiencing hardships and difficulties following the heavy toll of the war years. Rehabilitation has been pretty well completed in Canada now, and we Canadians have endured no hardships—certainly none comparable to what might have been expected in a country small in population but large in expanse, limited in financial capacity but unlimited in the will to share in obligations, a country which contributed so unstintingly during the war years in men and material, and towards the rehabilitation of the allies in the years following the war. I believe the reputation which Canada has established for itself within the last decade will increase with the years, and that renown, in no small measure, will be due to the masterly handling of our financial problems by the present Minister of Finance, and by his predecessor.

I am happy to learn of the plan recently outlined by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) for long-term housing development, based upon joint participation by the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. Housing remains one of our greatest national problems, and I think it only fit and proper that this problem should be handled jointly by these three units of government, working in collaboration. I am sure that the working out of this plan will mean great easing of the financial burden now being felt by homebuilders—most of them veterans and other young men—and I look forward to seeing this legislation put into effect at the earliest possible day. Knowing our Minister of Reconstruction and Supply as well as I do, I am satisfied that the carrying out of the plan is in good hands.

As all hon. members know, there are several things which the people living in our coastal provinces, whether on the Atlantic or the Pacific, or in constituencies bordering the great lakes, have in common, and these include the love of the sea and the dread of it. The sea is kind to them, because it affords them a means of livelihood by fishing, shipbuilding and other allied industries; it provides many opportunities for pleasant and health-giving recreation; it affords, too, an avenue of transportation, a pathway by which to reach the lands beyond the horizon. But often, too, in the sea lurks the danger of sudden death, and many a man, and many a ship, went down to instant destruction at its whim, or when its lashing waves hid from view the shoals and rocks which are all too numerous along our extensive coast lines.

For a number of years, I have voiced in this chamber the urgent need of providing improved aids to navigation, and especially a first-class coastguard marine service, to patrol our shores. I am not going to reiterate the statements made on previous occasions by other hon. members, as well as by myself, as to why and how this service should be instituted. However, I do hope that our government will give early consideration to the proposal. I would like to read into Hansard a clipping from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of September 29, 1949, which has the caption "Radar to be used by coastguard", and is datelined Boston, Massachusetts. It reads:

> The coastguard revealed today that it is planning to set up radar stations along the shore, to help find disabled vessels.
> Captain F. J. Sexton, commander of the first coastguard district, said the use of radar would enhance the value of the present lookout watch at lifeboat stations.
> Positions of ships in distress within the range of the equipment could be accurately determined, he said, and radio equipped coastguard boats could be directed to their assistance.
> Sexton said one station under consideration for the use of radar is Brant Point, Nantucket, and another is the station at Race Point on Cape Cod.

What the United States can do in this direction, we in Canada could do also.

With so many devices made available through the wonderful inventions of the past few years, we have at hand a real opportunity to give protection to our seafarers by co-ordinating the marine services now operated by government departments, such as fisheries, mines and resources, transport, and the R.C.M.P. I am sure all hon. members will support this request for a coastguard service in Canada, especially those who represent, as I do, a coastal constituency.

While on the subject of the sea and those who make a living thereby, I wish to refer also to a great need of our fishermen. It is commonly known that no item of food which man enjoys begins to lose its flavour as quickly as fish; from the moment they leave the water, their flavour begins to disappear. The fishermen have realized this for many a year, and this explains why, so early in the history of our country, the art of drying fish was known and practised. In fact, some of our earliest settlements were made by the people of Brittany, France, on the Nova Scotia coast. They came there to catch codfish and dry it on the sandy stretches of shore before returning home across the seas. From these Breton fisherfolk, the island of Cape Breton received its name. In time, other methods of processing fish came into use, and in recent years the "locking-in" of the flavour of the fish has been accomplished by the deep-freeze or quick-freeze method. The few larger units that have been established have proved a great boon to the fishing industry in the areas they serve; and I must say this government has been most helpful in giving needed assistance by way of financing such projects.

However, the fishermen along the coasts have been and still are at a disadvantage in this respect, being so far from the large freezer plants. Now a movement has spread along the coast whereby financial assistance is being sought for the erection of small mechanical cold storage and bait freezers. If our fishing industry is to flourish, it is becoming increasingly necessary for plants of this nature to be built along our shores. I do hope that the Department of Fisheries will give sympathetic attention to this question of assistance to fishermen's co-operatives and those who are anxious to erect these units, which will not only serve to retain the freshness of the fish but will also be a means of keeping on hand at all times sufficient bait—a very important item in the fishing industry. Last year it was necessary for this government to spend a considerable amount of money to transport bait from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast for the use of our fishermen. While this was a great help to the fishermen, it is an aid only and not a solution of the problem. But with their own bait freezers and deep-freeze units, the fishermen would be able to pursue their calling with considerably increased facility. With the coming into effect of the new Annecy trade agreements, the Canadian fishing industry will be given a new lease on life, so to speak, provided we can obtain and hold the markets for our fish which are being made available. Much will depend upon our ability during the next few years to ensure a steady, and an attractive, supply of seafood. If we can do this, with government assistance, it will bring prosperity to our fishermen.

I wish to touch once again upon a subject which has been dear to my heart ever since I first came to this house, and that is the construction or completion of the Guysborough railway.

In 1939 I first brought to the attention of hon. members of this house the urgent need of completing this Guysborough railway if the people of this area were to benefit from the agreements which were being arranged at that time. However, the war intervened and brought in its wake the need for other urgent and more necessary expenditures, which overshadowed for the time all other considerations.

In 1947 I again took the matter up in this house, and I think I cannot do better than quote from my remarks at that time, as recorded in Hansard of May 20, 1947, at page 3242. Speaking of the Guysborough railway project, I said:

> Now that the war is over, and a considerable part of the demobilization costs have been taken care of, the importance of post-war projects has become paramount. May I say, with the full endorsement of all people in that part of Nova Scotia, that the need for completion of this railway is every bit as great now as it was in 1929, if not more so. The present position of having the right of way purchased and paid for, the concrete abutments for bridges in place, of having ready all preliminary work, and allowing all this expenditure and preparation to come into disuse, is not what it should be; if I may use the word, the situation is intolerable. Remember that this is no mere temporary or unproductive enterprise. I can tell the house with full knowledge whereof I speak that the fishing, lumber, agriculture and tourist industries of Guysborough county are today suffering from neglect and lack of development because of the failure to complete the Guysborough railway. My constituents of Guysborough county, of every political persuasion are unanimous in their endorsement of my representations to the house today, and I take this opportunity to make the strongest appeal to the government for immediate action in this matter. The house may sometimes grow weary of the claims sponsored by members from the maritimes, of all political parties, but I feel sure that all members who have a knowledge of this subject will support the appeal which I make today. I hope that by the time another budget speech is being debated in this chamber I may be in a position to voice the thanks of my constituents for the government's authorization, for the completion of the Guysborough railway.

The above remarks are as applicable now as they were in 1929 or in 1947, and more so if possible; for with the efforts to bring into Canada immigrants from other lands who are, generally speaking, interested in industries such as agriculture, fishing, lumbering, the natural resources of Guysborough county have much to offer if transportation facilities were such as to make the county easy of access.

In 1948 I again referred to this proposed railway when addressing this house on March 4 on the budget debate on such kindred subjects as industries based on the natural resources of the eastern shore of Nova Scotia. At that time I said, as recorded on page 1869 of Hansard:

> The counties of Antigonish and Guysborough also contain fine stretches of timber, both hard and soft wood; but the lumber industry has been greatly handicapped by lack of suitable means of transportation.

As I have pointed out on various occasions, the whole county of Guysborough is practically without any railroad. The Guysborough railway has been used, by both old-line parties, as a political football ever since confederation. True, no government is bound by anything a candidate may say at election time or between elections; but this case is somewhat different, for the Liberal government has in effect promised the people of Guysborough a railway, inasmuch as a contract was let and construction work begun in 1929. Unfortunately before the contract was completed there was a change of government and the new Conservative administration, under the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, cancelled the contract, and from that day to this, nothing further has been done about it.

Naturally, during the war years, the good people of Guysborough county were satisfied to wait, believing that every available dollar should be expended in fighting the enemy. But now that the war is over, and we have gone through the transition period from war to peace, they do expect this government to fulfil the promise made to them, as I have said, away back in 1929.

The above remarks, made in 1948, apply no less pointedly at this time. Earlier this year, I received a resolution from the following organizations in Guysborough county: The Guysborough board of trade, the Sherbrooke board of trade; the Canso board of trade; the Goldboro, Isaacs Harbour and district board of trade; town of Mulgrave; Guysborough county farmers' association; Guysborough branch of the Canadian Legion; Canso branch of the Canadian Legion.

The resolution to which I have referred reads:

Whereas all county industry, fishing, agricultural and lumbering is hampered by the lack of transportation facilities, often promised but never provided, and plainly evidenced in the depopulated agricultural and fishing settlements,

Therefore resolved,

(1) That this organization requests the resumption to successful completion, for both economic and defence reasons, of the Guysborough railway, commenced in 1929, but on which no work has been done since 1931; and

(2) That copies of this resolution be sent to the Prime Minister, the premier, the federal and local members and the departments or ministries concerned.

I forwarded this resolution to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and last, but not least, our able minister from Nova Scotia, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). I also forwarded a copy to Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, and to his minister of lands and forests, who happens to be the local member for Guysborough county.

I received favourable acknowledgments from the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers previously referred to, and was particularly pleased with an interview which I had with the Prime Minister later, followed by a letter from him which reads as follows:

Ottawa, May 6, 1949

J. Ralph Kirk, Esq.,
Antigonish, N.S.

Dear Mr. Kirk:

I wish to refer to our conversation concerning the Guysborough railway.

I was pleased to have you explain to me both the historic background and the economic possibilities of this railway and, although I am, of course, not in a position to form any definite opinion about it, I do wish to assure you that I am one of those who believe in the future of our great country and who believe that it will be necessary to continue taking risks with development projects if we wish our progress to continue.

Of course, there were mistakes made in the building of some of our railway lines but if we had been too cautious about them, we would not have the Canada we have today.

I think it was a mistake to have stopped all venturesome pioneering when we got into the depression twenty years ago and then, of course, it had to be discontinued during the war. But we should now be able to look forward to a good, long era of peace and go ahead with the kind of projects that will be apt to stimulate healthy national development.

With kindest personal regards, believe me always,

Yours very truly,

Louis S. St. Laurent

I should like to thank the Prime Minister publicly for the letter which I have quoted, which indicates the broad vision and the wealth of thought which have in no small measure contributed to his own wonderful success and to his present position of prominence and trust. I believe that the spirit of confidence in the future of Canada, which is expressed in this letter, will serve to keep our country in the forefront of international affairs.

Recently two resolutions were introduced by the Minister of Transport for the consideration of this house. One is to provide for the purchase by the government of Canada of the Temiscouata railway and the other is to authorize the government of Canada to grant to the province of British Columbia a subsidy of $15,000 per mile toward the construction of a line of railway in that province. I thoroughly approve of these measures, and I am glad to see the residents of those sections of Canada given improved railway facilities. In fact, I am strongly in favour of any action which will serve outlying sections of the country, sections which are in need of improved means of transportation, in order to develop their natural resources and win for their people a fairer share of the amenities of life. Such a section exists in the county of Guysborough, which is part of the constituency which I have had the honour to represent in this house since 1936.

Commenting on the two resolutions to which I have just referred, an editorial appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of November 2 last, under the caption "An Intolerable Situation", from which I quote:

Proposals of this kind are, as we say, of peculiar interest to the people of this part of the country at this time when there are renewed demands for sorely needed railway facilities in sections of Nova Scotia. These proposals are not referred to here in any critical sense, but merely to indicate that railway facilities for other sections of the dominion are engaging the attention of the federal authorities.

Here in this province there are renewed efforts to have the Guysborough railway built—or completed. For long decades now, the Guysborough railway project has been both a political football and the butt of political jokes. But this project never should have been a political football; and certainly there is nothing "funny" about the position of an important part of Canada deprived of railway facilities.

J. Ralph Kirk, member for Antigonish-Guysborough, has stated the case well on a number of occasions in the federal parliament, insisting that "the need for completion of this railway is every bit as great now as it was in 1929, if not more so."

"The present position of having the right of way purchased and paid for, the concrete abutments for bridges in place, of having ready all preliminary work, and allowing all this expenditure and preparation to come into disuse, is not what it should be; if I may use the word, the situation is intolerable."

And the member for Antigonish-Guysborough did not exaggerate when he told the House of Commons that the fishing, lumbering, agricultural and tourist industries of Guysborough county "are today suffering from neglect and lack of development because of the failure to complete the Guysborough railway."

Now that the war is over, and we have gone through the transition period from war to peace, the people of Guysborough county, he added, "do expect this government to fulfil the promise made to them . . . away back in 1929."

It is the next thing to disgraceful to compel the people of important sections of the country to exist without reasonably adequate railway facilities. The Guysborough railway should have been completed—to tide water—long ago.

Another editorial appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of November 7, entitled "Let it be Finished—Right!" It reads as follows:

In a letter published within the year, Hon. Michael Dwyer, former minister of mines in the government of Nova Scotia, suggested that "no other item on a pro rata basis of potential value to the country at large would cost so little and mean so much as the Guysborough railway". The former minister gave these facts and figures:

"The road as laid out has practically no grades or sharp curves and therefore it would be much cheaper to operate when finished than the road presently in use—ton for ton.

"For example, a locomotive that could haul 1,500 tons from Sydney to the strait and 1,200 from the strait—

That is the strait of Canso.

—to Truro could haul 4,000 tons from the strait to Truro.

"It may not be generally known that had the Guysborough railway been finished, it would have justified its entire cost during the first year of world war II."

The people of that section of the province have been promised the Guysborough railway for a long time now—but the question cannot be permitted to rest on mere promises alone. It is essential public work, this project, and it should be completed—to tide water.

All governments, all political parties, have "played with" the Guysborough railway project. It has been a political football for generations. It should now be gone forward with. There is no justification for any further delay in this matter, which is of such profound concern to an important part of the dominion.

Let the Guysborough railway project be finished —and finished right!

These editorials which I have just read will indicate what the people of Nova Scotia are thinking with regard to the necessity of completing the Guysborough railway. Certainly, if the people of Guysborough county are to benefit at all from the construction of the strait of Canso bridge, it is really mandatory that this line of railway be completed.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I submit the observations in my remarks today for the earnest consideration and attention of the cabinet. Anticipating that the Minister of Transport will, as I hope, see fit to introduce a resolution dealing with the completion of the Guysborough railway, I ask all hon. members of this house for their support.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, it so happens that I am the first speaker of our party after the introduction today of our newest member, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). The applause which greeted his introduction today was more expressive than any words I can use. We all know that the hon. member resigned one of the most responsible positions held by any Canadian to accept a greater political responsibility. I am sure that all hon. members are really happy, at least they should be, that this house again has the presence of a man of such outstanding ability.

This also gives me the opportunity of saying—I may be criticized for saying it, but many hon. members from all parties will agree—that we could have many hon. members of whom we would be very proud if hon. members from far-away places were given air transportation privileges that we now enjoy by rail. This happens to be the first session in my experience in which I have been back to my riding only once in two months. I must say that I miss the association and the advice of my constituents. I say that because I can appreciate the position of those members who come from long distances and who are unable to return to their ridings, as they should, to represent them properly and to get the feeling and the opinions of the people of those ridings. It is not fair, Mr. Speaker, to expect hon. members from the west coast to spend four days to get home and four days to return in order to visit their constituents. As I said a moment ago, I do think that if hon. members who live four hundred miles or more from the capital were afforded the privilege of using air transportation the house and the country would benefit not only by the experience of those hon. members on their return two or three times during each session, but, most important of all, we would have a better type of member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: I hear some laughter in the chamber, Mr. Speaker. We are very fortunate indeed to have such a high type of member from these far-away places. The point I am making is that busy people, whether they are in a profession or in a business, cannot afford to come to these sessions and not have the opportunity of going back home. If we are to have these people here and have them accept their political responsibilities we should afford them the opportunity which could easily be made available to them.

Mr. Isnor: The hon. member would include the maritimes.

Mr. Murphy: Yes indeed; all residing over 400 miles away.

Mr. Wylie: Don't forget that rough railroad.

Mr. Murphy: The hon. member is talking about the Temiscouata Railway.

Since coming to this house I have not made a practice of advocating expenditure of sums of money where I did not think it was absolutely necessary. I make that statement because of what I am going to say. In the city of Sarnia we have what was at one time a boys' brigade hall, which is now an armouries. Every hon. member will agree that Sarnia has been mentioned in this particular session and in the last few days of the previous session probably more often than any other city in the dominion.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Except Fraser Valley.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, except Fraser Valley. I should mention these facts in view of what I intend to say. We have the largest oil refinery in the British empire, which is the Imperial Oil. We have the great Polymer Corporation, a $50 million corporation, a crown company. We have the Dow Chemical, a $9 million to $11 million chemical industry, with prospects of additions of some $5 million to $9 million. There are other new plants I could mention, including one about to come in, namely, the Sun Oil, a $20 million refinery. In fact, Sarnia has become known as the chemical valley of Canada because of these industries. The armoury that we have there is a disgrace. Because of the particular type of industry we have there I hope the urgency of this armoury will receive favourable government consideration. A few days ago I noticed that armouries were being proposed for the Sault. They may be under construction within a few days. I have no quarrel with that. I think that is a strategic place where one should be erected.

Hon. members should know something about the building which is now being used as an armoury and which houses in small numbers the 31st Field Regiment, R.C.A., and the 11th Field Squadron, R.C.E. This building was erected in 1892 as a boys' brigade hall. Then it was used as a theatre for a few years. It stood vacant for several years, and then was used as a theatre again, and today it is used as an armoury. An engineers' and architects' report has been made on this particular building. They consider it unsafe for drilling troops and even for the storage of military equipment. They are unable to go ahead with any recruiting campaign. There is no accommodation for vehicles, which accounts for the high cost of maintenance not only of the vehicles but of other armoured equipment. They did acquire a garage some two or three miles distant which means additional maintenance cost. They have no lecture rooms. The drilling needs and the training of the nine different courses cannot be carried on because there is no place to hold them. The floor is condemned. It is now limited to thirty pounds per square foot of weight. They have shoring in the basement to hold gun carriages. The only place they can handle them is immediately above the furnace. Considerable shoring is done around the furnace to hold these particular vehicles.

The department has a copy of the report of the engineers and architects. Some few weeks ago, an amount of $50,000, or thereabouts, was allocated for some repair work. As a matter of fact this money was returned by the engineers as it would serve no useful purpose. The building was beyond repair. The side walls are badly bulged from the pressure of the wood roof trusses, and the south wall is extremely bad, so that the rods would not hold back the walls in position. The brick buttress along the inside of the basement walls is cracked half way up, showing that the basement walls are shoving in owing to the pressure of the earth on the outside, and the eccentric load from the brick walls above, because they are not plumb.

There used to be a swimming pool in the basement, which has been filled in, and a concrete floor poured over it. But owing to the pressure of the basement wall and posts supporting the floor above, the concrete floor has sunk, as a matter of fact, under the posts, and buckled up about two feet from them. The wooden timbers supporting the floor joists are in very poor condition and show signs of dry rot. The drill hall floor is uneven, owing to the sagging of the beams. I could go on in detail regarding the condition of this particular building. However the department has full details and knows all the defects.

The point I make is that the area is a strategic one, where we should have an armoury which would be in keeping with the necessary protection of the various industries located there. Today, because of the atomic bomb, people are defence conscious. For the first time since I have been a member of the House of Commons I am urging the expenditure of public money on a most necessary defence building and I do hope the government will consider seriously taking advantage of the opportunity there of replacing the present armoury with a more modern one.

I mention the present opportunity because there has been some suggestion that the city of Sarnia make a trade with the department, permitting the department to move out into the country and to accept some small acreage in return for the site upon which the armoury is located. It may seem strange for the member from a riding to make this statement, but I must say that while this trade might have been all right fifteen or twenty years ago, at which time the property they would propose to give to the government would be worth an amount which would be within a very few thousand dollars of the then value of the armoury, today, due to the progress being made in that area, and the development of Sarnia and the surrounding districts, it so happens that the location of this armoury is a most valuable one. It is on the best street in the city, with a frontage of 221 feet on Christina street, running through to Front street, with a frontage of 130 feet, and with a depth of 249 feet.

This property is practically down town; and while some people say that even fifteen or twenty years ago it might not have been worth more than $15,000, and the property they would now propose to give to the government would not be worth more than that amount, I am here to say that today in my view a fair valuation of that property would be somewhere between $100,000 and $200,000. I believe the government could obtain that amount by offering this property for sale.

From my place in the House of Commons I am now suggesting that neither this government nor any other government should make a transfer of property which would not be fair to all concerned. This is a property held in trust for the people of Canada. If the transfer or trade were carried out on a fair basis, all well and good; but as the representative of that riding I have no hesitation in saying that such a trade would not be fair to the rest of the people in Canada. It would be my view that the government ought not to accept the idea of making the transfer on that basis.

I would repeat that a new armoury could be constructed at a lesser cost, because the sale price of this building would be an item of some extent. I do hope the government will take these facts into consideration when considering the requirements at Sarnia.

We hear it suggested from time to time that there should be an increase in the radio licence fee. Let me go on record emphatically as stating my opposition to any such increase. Every hon. member knows that it is the policy of the Progressive Conservative party to abolish entirely the radio licence fee. I have received many resolutions from organizations, including the city and some surrounding townships, as well as labour organizations, and I would not be fair to them if I did not express their disapproval of any increase in the licence fee. I do not intend to develop the argument further today.

I would hope that the policy announced a few days ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) whereby the sales tax is to be removed from fuel oil might be extended to other commodities. I am one who is firmly convinced—and I think many hon. members regardless of party must share this view—that the sales tax is the bugbear of the high cost of living today. If when introducing the next budget the government could see its way clear to decrease or to eliminate the sales tax I am sure it would be received favourably. We can think of various prices of different articles, and we can tell about increased prices we have noted, but I am satisfied there is no factor in our economy which has contributed so greatly to the high cost of living as has the sales tax.

It is my hope that since the minister has begun a reduction of this tax, perhaps as one of his post-war ideas, he may carry it further so that in the 1950 budget we will see either a reduction of the sales tax or its elimination altogether.

Another observation I should like to make relates to the statement made recently by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and supplemented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) concerning the taxation of crown companies. We expect that some time before the close of this session legislation will be introduced to provide some return in lieu of taxes to those municipalities in which crown companies or crown properties are located.

As the older members in the house will recall, on several occasions I have urged that crown companies be subject to municipal taxation, or that at least they should accept their share of the responsibility in municipal administration. In my constituency we have the Polymer Corporation, a $50 million enterprise, and one which has done a grand job. Had it not been for this corporation during the war we would have suffered from a shortage of raw rubber requirements. That corportation was a large factor in winning the war. Let there be no mistake about that. Since coming to this house I have given various reasons—I do not intend to repeat them—why this crown company should accept its municipal responsibilities.

I hope that when the proposed legislation is introduced provision will be made whereby the municipal assessments will be accepted so that there will be no further exemptions from taxation. I have mentioned that I think they should contribute to school taxes. The present population of the township in which this Polymer Corporation is situated is well over 10,000, whereas some few years ago it was only about 2,500. I shall not elaborate on the increased costs brought about by this company being located there. I was happy to hear the announcement and I think it will give a great deal of satisfaction to those municipalities where crown companies are located. We have several of them in our county.

I know it is on the record here that crown companies never pay taxes or anything in lieu of taxes, but this municipality does receive $5,000 or $6,000 a year. I understand that Eldorado in Port Hope continued to pay the municipal taxes that had been paid by the private corporation which it took over. I do not know whether retroactive provisions would be included but I would like to see something along this line because it would be only fair to these municipalities.

Just a few minutes before the house closed the other evening, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made an announcement with regard to rentals which was important to so many families in the Dominion of Canada. This happened to be the second announcement which had been made by the same minister without regard to parliament, the former one being—

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, I question whether it is admissible for the hon. member to refer to a debate which was concluded last evening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is out of order to refer to a debate that has occurred during the present session.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Murphy: I shall refer to it just briefly. I think that was an illustration of an utter disregard of parliament. These increased rentals are going to work great hardship on many people especially at this particular time of the year. In saying that, I think I am voicing the opinion of most hon. members of this house.

Mr. Sinclair: I repeat my point of order.

Mr. Murphy: It was an unwelcome announcement that had little regard for the people and for the rights of parliament.

Mr. Sinclair: I repeat my point of order for personal reasons. I was very anxious to enter the debate on rental control but I have been advised that because the matter was dealt with yesterday I cannot do it.

An hon. Member: Of course you can.

Mr. Fleming: On the point of order, I submit that nothing that happened yesterday on the motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance governs the subjects that may be discussed in later debates. Surely there was nothing closed about that debate yesterday. The debate yesterday was on a motion to adjourn the house. There was no vote and there was no opportunity to bring the matter to a conclusion or a decision. I submit that nothing that happened yesterday precludes any hon. member from referring to rental controls during this budget debate, if he chooses so to do.

Mr. Fauteux: On the point of order, I should like to direct the attention of the house to May, thirteenth edition, chapter 12, page 316, paragraph entitled, "Reference to prior debates". This reads:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded; and there would be little use in preventing the same question or bill from being offered in the same session, if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

I believe it has always been ruled in the past that it is against the rules of the house to refer to or to discuss a matter which has been considered in a preceding debate.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the citation that has just been read proves conclusively that there can be no objection to the hon. member who is now speaking proceeding to discuss what he proposed to discuss. There was no conclusion to the debate he has referred to. It is perfectly obvious that there are reasons why something which parliament has decided upon should not be reviewed over and over again, but on a substantive motion there happens to have been discussion in regard to a matter that undoubtedly will be discussed in this house a number of times during the remainder of this session. In this particular case the house has come to no conclusion in regard to the bungling of the government in connection with rental controls which would in any way preclude the hon. member from dealing with that matter in the present debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Up to the moment that the leader of the opposition spoke I thought that there was some doubt as to the position taken by the Speaker, but if hon. members will refer to citation 250 they will see that it reads:

> The debate on the urgent matter referred to in this rule cannot be adjourned as the motion actually before the chair is "that the house do now adjourn." Once the house rises, the motion is carried.

The motion yesterday was to adjourn the house so that a specific question could be discussed, the question of rental control. At eleven o'clock the house rose without question put and the motion carried. According to this rule, we have had a complete debate in the house on rental control. I am of the opinion that you cannot renew that debate at this stage. You can probably mention rental control, but you cannot refer to the debate or to what the minister said in the debate. The hon. member was mentioning what the Minister of Finance had said and I really think he is out of order.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say a word on the point of order. I have no particular reason to urge that the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) would have an opportunity to discuss rent control, but I do not think the point raised by the minister is well taken. The motion yesterday was that the house do adjourn in order to discuss a certain matter, and that matter was discussed. That did not dispose of the matter at all; it merely disposed of the adjourning of the house. If the minister's contention were upheld it would mean that the Minister of Finance would be debarred from bringing into this house during the present session any other legislation of any kind dealing with rent control. No decision was made on the question; and under our procedure all the references to such debates deal with debates on which a decision has been reached. So while that debate ended, no decision was arrived at with respect to rent control.

Mr. Sinclair: To make my position clear, I had hoped to speak on rent control myself, but I did not want to be immediately challenged by some of the legal experts of the opposition, so I thought it best to raise this point now and obtain a ruling.

Mr. Murphy: In a way this discussion can be compared to the announcement with respect to rentals, in that we as members of the House of Commons can discuss it only after a decision has been made. I shall be very brief, but I would like to express to this house the opposition to this enactment on the part of the municipalities I represent, the various labour organizations, and the Canadian Legion. I would not be fair to those people if I did not take advantage of this opportunity to express their disapproval of this action.

For a few minutes now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with housing in a more general way. A few days ago Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, suggested to the government that a royal commission be appointed to investigate home building costs. In that connection I want to quote from the Montreal Gazette; I have not the exact date, but it was within the last couple of weeks:

> Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, is campaigning "to get houses built at a cost which Canadians can afford." This looks like a plank which would take a high polish in any man's platform. Opening gun of the campaign was heard this week when Mr. Mosher made public a letter he had addressed to Hon. R. H. Winters, reconstruction minister, asking for a royal commission to investigate home building costs.

The next paragraph is the one which I think concerns most of us.

> Mr. Mosher wrote: "If contractors and supply houses are making excessive profits, if labour is not doing a job, if interest rates are too high, if decentralization of the building industry increases costs, or real estate practices unduly affect the final price, we believe that the investigation should be launched with a view to establishing the facts regarding these matters.

The minister, of course, announced that there would not be a royal commission. I have no hesitation in supporting this request; in fact it is hard for me to understand why the minister or the government turned it down. Had I been given any voice in government I would have accepted the suggestion gladly, because it might have enabled us to obtain valuable information which would have placed the responsibility for high costs where it belongs. Therefore I suggest to this government that a royal commission be appointed, as suggested by Mr. Mosher, and I would also suggest that Mr. Mosher be a member of that commission.

We have had in operation in Canada the National Housing Act, under which loans may be obtained for the construction of new homes. I have high regard for the minister, in which I think all other hon. members of this house share. We realize that he has a difficult job, that he has inherited a legacy with perhaps more liabilities than assets, and we do hope he will make a good job of it. We know it is not an easy task for anyone to carry out; let us be frank about that. I have some slight knowledge of what I am going to talk about, and I would like the minister to believe that my observations are made in the most sincere manner, so I hope he will take notice of them. In the past a percentage has been fixed beyond which loans could not be made, but I say to this house that as far as I know loans have never been made up to that percentage. The loans now being made to people who want to buy houses are far too low. They do not go anywhere near the maximum permitted, and I think perhaps the loaning companies are taking advantage of the situation and not permitting borrowers to obtain the loans they might otherwise get. I know of many young veterans building $10,000 or $11,000 homes during the last year or two, who have not been able to get their maximum loans. There is no reason why that situation should continue. It is true that the proposed housing legislation will be beneficial in many provinces, though not so much in Ontario because here we have had provincial legislation giving home owners an opportunity to obtain an additional loan of $1,250, which has been an important factor in enabling many young veterans and others to provide roofs over their heads. So I suggest that the minister indicate to the loaning companies that they should permit home owners to obtain greater loans than they have been obtaining in the past. After all is said and done, most of these homes are being built by private enterprise. If greater loans could be made more homes would be built, and that is what we want in this country.

I might offer a suggestion to the government which I believe would help overcome this housing mess we are in; and let us admit that it is a mess. The suggestion I would make is that the loans be made to the people at three per cent. I see you are about to rise and stop me, Mr. Speaker. I hope you took time out for that little Irish argument in which some members took part a few minutes ago. If we were able to get money at three per cent, or even less, I believe there would be a great increase in the number of homes being built. I know of no factor in house building which would contribute to more houses being built than a lowering of that amount. The records of the past years will show that most houses were built by individual owners, who also may have built one or two houses for rental purposes.

I should like to deal for a moment with the question of research in house construction. I do not think there is a member in this chamber who could tell me how many labour operations there are in the construction of a house. I should like to mention that to indicate the necessity of some research into construction methods. If I were to ask most members how many operations there are in the construction of an outside wall, the guesses would likely range from three, four or five to six. I shall tell hon. members how many there are.

Let us consider a frame house. This matter is important, in view of the fact that so many people are complaining about the cost of houses today. A house has to be built according to specifications and sometimes people complain about the fact it may require heavier timbers than they consider necessary. In the construction of an ordinary frame house, there is the studding and then the sheeting on the outside. There is paper on the outside of that and then the siding, over which three coats of paint are applied. On the inside, there is the insulation, whatever it may be, then the rock lath and two coats of plaster. If you want the inside of the house painted, then three coats of paint are applied. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the building of that house there are fifteen separate labour operations in the construction of the walls alone. If one constructs a cinder block house, there are just as many labour operations.

For several years, I have contended that the cost of construction could be considerably reduced if the walls were built with preframed sections. I am certainly convinced that houses of various sizes, and quite large houses, could be built on a sectional basis. Such houses will not be built by the industry, because up until now there has been a shortage of practically everything that goes into a house. We cannot expect the construction industry or those who supply the things that go into a house to initiate any research at any great expense.

In many localities, the building bylaws are outmoded, such as the bylaws requiring plastering and that sort of thing. In order to cut down the cost of houses, even those which are built under the National Housing Act, plaster could be eliminated and weldwood could be substituted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has exhausted his time, and may continue only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Murphy: I believe it is important for the municipalities to give more consideration to this housing problem. I referred a moment ago to the building bylaws as an illustration of that. Apparently it is necessary for some people to build in the cities where sewers and other facilities are available. I should like to suggest to the people of this country that they might be well advised to build outside the cities where they would not find such high taxation. It is true they would have to do without sewers, sidewalks, pavements and that sort of thing, but those are the factors which add to the cost of owning a house in the city.

In northern Ontario there are two townsites upon which fine houses have been built at surprisingly low cost. Approximately four or five thousand five-room houses have been built of aluminum. I cannot see why the cost could not be lowered if research were conducted into construction methods. There are plenty of capable engineers, and I believe research should be encouraged. If such research were conducted, it should be remembered that it must be conducted by the government. I believe there is an appropriation of approximately $5 million to be expended over a five-year period for that purpose. I understand the government has spent $1 million of that. This is one method by which the government could contribute a great deal to so many people. I believe it would be well advised to seriously consider further research work. This framing to which I referred a few moments ago could be done in the factories.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I hope some of the observations I have made will be considered by the government. I mention them because house building has been carried on mainly by private enterprise. If we look over the records of the cost of administration of government projects, I believe they will verify the fact that the government would like to be absolved of all responsibility for housing. For that reason, I hope some of the suggestions and comments I have made will be considered.

Mr. T. J. Kickham (Kings): Mr. Speaker, rising in this debate I should like to tell the new members of this house something of our province. Many of the new members have not visited Prince Edward Island, so I should like to extend an invitation to them to visit the province and learn for themselves about its scenic beauty.

As you know, Prince Edward Island is located in the gulf of St. Lawrence, with Northumberland strait dividing it from the mainland. There are two ferry services, one crossing from Port Borden, Prince Edward Island, to Tormentine, New Brunswick. The boat on this service is said to be the largest icebreaker in the world. It is capable of carrying approximately nineteen railway cars and about sixty automobiles and trucks. The second service is from Cariboo, Nova Scotia, to Wood Island, Prince Edward Island. This ferry service carries passengers and motor vehicles only. Last year a bus service was inaugurated from Moncton to Charlottetown, which greatly assists in speeding up passenger traffic from Moncton. Hon. members are probably aware of the fact that there is also an air service from the United States and Canadian points to Charlottetown.

The main interests in Prince Edward Island are farming, fishing and the tourist business. Potatoes are our main cash crop. Prince Edward Island seed potatoes are known the world over. We have shipped them to Argentina, British West Indies, Cuba, France, Mexico, Newfoundland, Palestine, Egypt, Panama, South Africa, and the United States. We supply over 55 per cent of the Canadian requirements for certified seed. Many of the markets I have named are not available to us now. These were markets emanating out of war conditions. We must now depend largely on the United States and Canada for our markets.

Two years ago our provincial government passed an act known as the Potato Act, compelling all growers to plant certified seed or better. The highest grade is known as foundation. So that our seed is practically disease-free, coming as it does from what we strive to make a disease-free area.

Our shipments to the United States are subject to a regular duty of 75 cents per hundredweight. This government, however, obtained for us from the United States government a quota for 3,500,000 bushels at the reduced rate of 37½ cents per hundredweight. While we appreciate this fact, we should like to see the quota increased by another 2 million bushels. If this could be arranged, it would assist in offsetting the adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States.

Last marketing season the government gave us a floor price of $1.15 per hundredweight; this action had a beneficial effect in stabilizing the marketing of the crop. We are faced again this year with the same conditions as those that obtained last season, and we hope and trust that this government will do for us what they did last season, thereby preventing serious financial loss to the growers. It could well be that no loss would be suffered by this government owing to the greatly reduced crop in the United States and Canada. The estimated production in the United States for 1949 is 378,805,000 bushels, which is 67,045,000 less than last year. The estimate for Canada in 1949 is 82,745,000 bushels, which is 9,355,000 bushels less than last year, making a total decrease in the United States and Canada of 76,400,000 bushels. The total consumption in Canada and the United States is approximately 480 million bushels, so that this year's production is 18,450,000 bushels under normal requirements. A great advantage would accrue from having the support price in effect as early as possible, thus preventing panicky marketing and assuring the growers of something near the cost of production.

The recently increased freight rate of 29 cents per hundredweight is a serious handicap to our potato industry. Before the first increase in 1948 of 21 per cent, our rate to Toronto, for example, was 39 cents per hundredweight; now it is 51 cents, or 30 cents per bushel. In all, it costs around $290 to ship a car of potatoes to Toronto, including freight, "reefer" charges and heat en route.

The provinces of Quebec and Ontario should be as much interested in the potato industry in our province as we are ourselves. Why is this so? The reason is that we buy from central Canada approximately $24 million worth of all commodities each year. Not only is the money which we receive from Quebec and Ontario returned to them for goods of every description that we need, but all the dollars that we receive from sales outside Canada, particularly from the United States, are spent by us in central Canada, thereby greatly assisting in keeping their wheels of industry revolving.

Furthermore, were it not for the fact that our potatoes receive a premium on those markets, earned because of their quality, we could not compete with Quebec and Ontario-grown potatoes, because of their nearness to the consuming centres in those provinces where, by rail and trucks, they can be delivered for a fraction of our costs.

Potatoes are our cash crop, in the same way as wheat is the cash crop for the western farmer. Our government provides the wheat grower with a support price; we feel that we are also entitled to a support price, and that it would be of as much advantage to central Canada as to our province. Again, if our potato industry is ruined by exorbitant freight rates that apply,—and that are as effective as high tariffs,—between the provinces, the Canadian National Railways will suffer equally. I cannot see why we should be penalized because of our geographical location in Canada in relation to other provinces with whom we must do business, and because of existing tariff regulations between Canada and the United States.

I wish to tender this solution of the problem to the government. Rather than increase our freight rates, should any loss be sustained by the government the loss should be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, thereby encouraging free exchange of commodities between the provinces.

Our second largest industry is fishing. The principal varieties of fish are lobsters, cod, hake, mackerel, herring, clams and oysters. Because of the quality of our lobsters, we have no difficulty in finding markets in Canada and the United States. Our big problem now is to find profitable markets for salted, dried fish. During and immediately following the war, our total catch of cod and hake was canned, purchased by UNRRA and shipped to Europe. This market is not now available.

In the discussion on the second reading of the Fish Inspection Act, I noticed that members stressed the importance of putting up a high grade and quality of fish. We have a problem in my constituency in this respect, as many of our harbours are too shoal for the boats to reach the dressing stands at low tide. As a result, the boats must wait outside until the tide rises, while the fisherman covers his catch from the hot sun. Nevertheless, the quicker the fish are split and salted, the better the grade that will be procured.

This is a matter for both the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Public Works. I bring this problem to the attention of both departments, trusting that those conditions I have mentioned will now be remedied. In the past the answer has been that no steel, cement or lumber were available to extend the work at those harbours and also that there was a shortage of dredging equipment. I do not think that those answers are good enough now.

Our third industry is our tourist business which brings in approximately $2,800,000 each year. I do not wish to take up too much time of the house but, before taking my seat, I want to say that having regard to the remuneration received by teachers in other provinces our teachers in Prince Edward Island receive the least. Why is this? Because of our people having the lowest income per capita of any province in Canada; and this is because of our geographical disadvantages, as I have tried to point out to this house. For example, the personal income per capita in Prince Edward Island is $548; Nova Scotia, $682; New Brunswick, $636; Quebec, $784; Ontario $1,075; Manitoba, $946; Alberta, $998 and British Columbia, $1,024. The other provinces of Canada receive the benefits of the education and of the talents of most of those who receive a good education in Prince Edward Island. Our population was 105,000 when we joined confederation in 1873; now I believe it is 93,000. As the smallest province of Canada we are entitled to greater consideration and to be given the measure of equality which is due to all Canadians.

Before taking my seat I wish to support what was said by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) endorsing the Chignecto canal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Amendment negatived.

Main motion (Mr. Abbott) agreed to on division.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the following excise taxes be repealed, namely, the excise taxes on: (a) soft drinks; (b) chocolate, candy, and confectionery; (c) chewing gum; (d) cable, telegraph, and telephone messages, and on telephone extensions; (e) transportation tickets or rights of transportation, and on seats, berths, or other sleeping accommodation; (f) motor buses; and (g) carbonic acid gas.

2. That the retail purchase tax be repealed and replaced by an excise tax of 10 per cent, payable by the manufacturer or importer, on all articles now subject to the retail purchase tax.

3. That the following excise taxes be reduced from 35 per cent to 10 per cent, namely, the excise taxes on: (a) trunks, suitcases, bags, and luggage of all kinds; (b) ash trays, tobacco pipes, and smokers' accessories; and (c) fountain pens, propelling pencils, and desk accessories.

4. That the following excise taxes be reduced from 25 per cent to 10 per cent, namely, the excise taxes on: (a) toilet articles; (b) devices commonly or commercially known as lighters; and (c) coin, disc, or token operated machines and vending machines.

5. That the sales tax on the following articles be repealed: lactose; malt syrup except when sold for beverage purposes; diesel powered self-propelled trucks, mounted on rubber tired wheels, for off highway use exclusively at mines and quarries, and complete parts thereof.

6. That the rates of excise tax on matches be amended from the present specific proportionate rate of tax on each package, to an ad valorem tax of 10 per cent.

7. That the present specific tax of 5 cents per pound on tires and tubes be amended to an ad valorem tax of 10 per cent.

8. That the sales tax on the following articles be repealed: liquid fuel for lighting or heating, but not including fuel when for use in internal combustion engines; crude oil to be used for the production of fuel.

9. That the excise tax on wines containing not more than 7 per cent of proof spirit be reduced from 50 cents per gallon to 25 cents per gallon.

10. That paragraphs 1 to 7 shall have effect on and after March 23, 1949, and paragraphs 8 and 9 shall have effect on and after October 21, 1949.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act is just one resolution but for the convenience of hon. members it is broken down into its various subheadings. For the benefit of the new members perhaps I should make just a brief explanation of the purpose of the tax reductions. For the most part, these tax reductions occurred in the budget which was presented in the spring by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and were repeated, with two extensions, in the budget delivered in October. While hon. members will welcome any tax reduction, this resolution, with its various parts, provides for actually more than tax reductions because there is a measure which may be called a tidying-up job done in the entire excise tax structure of Canada.

Our indirect tax structure now falls into four main groups. The first group is a large group of commodities on which there is no sales tax nor excise tax. They are the commodities which are covered in schedule III of the Excise Tax Act. I am quite sure that if hon. members would refer to that list they would be amazed at the number of commodities in this country on which neither sales tax nor excise tax is levied.

Mr. MacInnis: Federal sales tax.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member will appreciate that these excise taxes and sales taxes are federal taxes.

Mr. Low: Will the hon. member put them on the record?

Mr. Sinclair: They are already on record as schedule III of the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Low: I understand that.

Mr. Sinclair: If there is any desire to have schedule III placed on record that could be done.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: I think it would be very helpful to hon. members in the study of these questions to place them on Hansard.

The next group is a group on which sales tax is levied. That is actually schedule II of the Excise Tax Act. It also will be placed on Hansard.

Then the third group in the old Excise Tax Act was varied in taxation structure. We had a variety of taxes, namely, 15 per cent, 25 per cent, 35 per cent at various levels, the manufacturers' level and the retail level. I know it was confusing to the public and also difficult to administer as far as the department was concerned. Therefore the major tidying-up job which has been done is in this third group. The excise taxes have all been reduced to 10 per cent at the manufacturers' level.

Then, there is the fourth group, in which no change has been made, namely, the excise duties on which traditionally high taxes on tobacco and liquor, which are regarded in the luxury class, have been levied. Therefore we have four classes in our excise tax structure. The first class is foodstuffs and building materials, on which there is neither federal sales tax nor excise tax. Then there is the second group of quite essential commodities on which the 8 per cent sales tax is levied. Next is the third group on which in addition a 10 per cent excise tax is levied; and finally the fourth group, tobacco and liquor, on which our traditionally high excise duties are levied.

I would suggest that it would be best to have the committee study the various subheadings.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we adopt the resolution?

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. Sinclair: I think only resolution 1 has been carried.

Mr. MacInnis: May we take each section in turn?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. Section 1 of the resolution has been discussed and I understand that it has been agreed to. We shall now proceed with section 2.

2. That the retail purchase tax be repealed and replaced by an excise tax of 10 per cent, payable by the manufacturer or importer, on all articles now subject to the retail purchase tax.

Mr. Fraser: Watches would come under this resolution?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: This resolution deals with the luxury tax which used to be 25 per cent and has now been reduced to 10 per cent?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: I protest against the tax still being on watches and clocks because they are not luxuries. I feel the tax should be taken off watches and clocks because they are a necessity.

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution covers pretty well the 25 per cent tax which was placed on things handled by jewelers. It included watches and clocks over a certain price range. This is not a luxury tax. During wartime it was placed on the retail level not so much for its revenue-raising potential but rather to discourage the buying of what were regarded as articles not absolutely essential for war needs. As hon. members know, it was very successful in discouraging purchases from jewelers and this was one of the main reasons why the jewelers of Canada protested very strongly against the continuance of this tax. This improvement has been brought down by reducing the tax from 25 per cent at the retail level to 10 per cent on the wholesale value.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the value of the clock or watch which is not now taxed? What is the range?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: I must confess that it slips my mind at the moment. It is quite low, around $5. I shall bring that information in later.

Mr. Coldwell: The resolution should stand.

Mr. Low: In connection with this section 2, let me say I am definitely opposed to the principle of converting what was an ultimate purchasers' tax into what will now be a hidden sales tax imposed at the manufacturer's level. The main purpose, evidently, is to bring the taxes on the items covered by section 2 into line with the general sales tax provisions—

Mr. Sinclair: Excise tax.

Mr. Low: Excise tax or sales tax, it does not matter much; the principle is the same. It becomes a hidden tax added on at the manufacturer's level. We have pointed out repeatedly that we are opposed to this type of taxation, for the main reason that it sets in motion a vicious spiral of increased cost to the consumer. On the general principle, and with complete disregard for the items mentioned, we do wish to protest. We feel the people of this country are entitled to know what fraction or part of the cost of an article they are buying is in reality taxation and what fraction or part is in reality cost.

We feel that the responsibility for imposing taxes ought to rest with the government of the day. How else can the people of this country know what the taxes really are? I believe hon. members who have considered this matter carefully will agree that the best barometer by which to judge the efficiency of government is the level of taxation imposed upon the people. Until the people have a fair chance to see the barometer, and to keep it ever in front of them, so that they can measure the efficiency of the government, there can be no gauge or standard by which they can tell whether or not the government is efficient.

Under the circumstances we of the Social Credit party protest strongly against this move to add one more hidden tax to the great burden of taxation borne by the Canadian people today and, sir, which in the main is responsible for pushing up the cost of living by, I submit, fully 20 or 25 per cent.

Mr. Fraser: The parliamentary assistant has said that he would permit this provision to be set aside until he obtains further information.

Mr. MacInnis: Could the parliamentary assistant tell the committee what the amount of this tax was previously? What was the amount of the retail purchase tax? I notice this change went into effect on March 23, 1949. Could he tell the committee whether, on the basis on which it is now calculated, the tax is greater or smaller? Is there this pyramiding to which reference has been made, and if so is it more or less than it was before?

Mr. Sinclair: To answer the earlier questions of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Peterborough West, the Excise Tax Act makes provision that the tax shall not apply to railwaymen's watches, the purchase of which is authorized by the divisional superintendent of any railway; watches designed for the use of the blind; and alarm clocks sold at not more than $10 each.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, but the cheap watch which sells at $2 or $3 is taxed. They are good watches, made in Canada—the best watches money can buy. In many instances they will outlast a 17-jewel watch.

Mr. Coldwell: Where are they made?

Mr. Fraser: I do not hesitate for one moment to say that they are made in Peterborough by a firm the name of which I shall not mention. I can say however that more than 5,000 watches and clocks are turned out each day, the great majority of which are in the low-price field.

As the parliamentary assistant has said, the tax was first imposed at a 25 per cent rate, not for the purpose of collecting revenue, but only to stop the sale of these watches and clocks. We find however that the 10 per cent tax is retained. Why? People are now demanding these watches because the manufacture of them was held up during the war.

Mr. Sinclair: While the tax has not been removed, there has been a substantial reduction in taxation in this group from 25 per cent to 10 per cent. The main purpose of tax reduction is to afford a measure of tax relief across the entire scale. I imagine each hon. member could build up a special case for special consideration of a certain industry in his riding. But the government has to look at the broad picture.

Turning to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East, there will be a revenue loss of $8 million in this change from a 25 per cent retail tax to a 10 per cent excise tax at the manufacturers' level. I would point out that there will also be a very considerable saving in administrative cost, because it will be recalled that one of the difficulties of administering a retail sales tax arises from the great number of outlets which have to be supervised by the Department of National Revenue. In these jewelry shops there were some goods which were not taxable and others which were taxable at different rates. Now, if we have this tax tidied up and placed at 10 per cent at the manufacturers' level, the actual cost of administering the collection would be much less.

Mr. MacInnis: When the 10 per cent tax is placed at the manufacturers' level, and the sale is made to a jobber or wholesaler, how is the wholesaler's profit considered? Is not the tax taken into consideration, so that the wholesaler pays more than the 10 per cent? And when it comes to the retailer there is another addition. What tax does the retailer now pay?

Mr. Sinclair: Whether the jobber and wholesaler and retailer take today the same mark-up on the price they get from the manufacturer would depend upon their trade practice. But mathematically, even though they had, for example, a 50 per cent mark-up on the $1.10 they would now pay for an article now worth $1, still in the end when they take their usual mark-up there is only a 10 per cent increase in the actual retail price.

Mr. Fraser: No, no.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Sinclair: I can speak with some authority, because I remember when the former member for Beauce, who was a manufacturer, made this very argument. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will follow through he will find that the actual 10 per cent increase at the manufacturers' level, if passed on by a mark-up, is still at 10 per cent increase in the final retail price. And that, of course, is the reason for the $8 million loss in revenue.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Fraser: No. The tax was formerly 25 per cent when the purchase was made in a retail store. The retailer therefore paid 25 per cent on the retail price. But here we have a 10 per cent tax at the manufacturers' level. The manufacturer sells it to the jobber, the jobber has that 10 per cent; it is then pyramided, and he sells it—

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Coldwell: Absolutely.

Mr. Fraser: It jumps up; that is added to his price. He sells it to someone else—the wholesaler—and the wholesaler has to absorb the first 10 per cent, the write-up by the jobber. The wholesaler has it; he makes that addition, and it is sold to the retailer, and he has to add his profit with the pyramided 10 per cent, all the way up the line. The poor little fellow who has to buy the watch because he has not enough money to buy anything else has to pay it. He has to pay that pyramided price, which is not 10 per cent. The parliamentary assistant has the financial adviser and the deputy minister in front of him and I am sure they will tell him that the retailer is still paying close to 25 per cent.

Mr. Sinclair: Let me take an actual example and follow it through and then I think the hon. gentleman will see that the ten per cent tax is still ten per cent on the retail end. Take an article which sells for one dollar at the manufacturing end. Assume that there is a markup of 100 per cent between the manufacturer and the retailer. It would sell at retail for $2. The previous tax was 25 per cent, so in that case the selling price would be $2.50. Take this 10 per cent excise tax on the $1. That would make it $1.10 at the wholesale end. The jobber and the middleman would still take a total of 100 per cent markup, making the final selling price $2.20. The price of $2.20 is 10 per cent, which is 30 cents less than the old price of $2.50.

Mr. Coldwell: I think we are talking at cross purposes. We are talking about the 10 per cent on the original dollar which is carried through instead of collecting 10 per cent from the retailer. It makes a great deal of difference with the same markup. We are suggesting that if we are going to have this tax, it should not be a hidden tax. It should be collected from the final purchaser. When you have all the markups you get a much different result.

The government will now get 10 per cent on the dollar, but under the other plan the purchaser would be paying only the 10 per cent. With all the markups right through to the retailer it is quite different.

Mr. Sinclair: If the tax was added at the manufacturing level or at the retailing level, it would still be selling for $1 and the markup would still make it $2 at the retailing level. A 10 per cent retail tax on the $2 would still make it $2.20, which is exactly the same.

Mr. Coldwell: The purchaser is paying 20 per cent on the original dollar.

Mr. Sinclair: Ten per cent on the retail price of $2.

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest that all hon. members who desire to ask questions should ask them and then the parliamentary assistant could reply at one time.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps if the parliamentary assistant would wait a moment until we have completed our questions we could make more headway. I think there has been some confusion of thought and terms in this discussion.

It is quite true that, where a tax is pyramided as an article is passed on through various hands, you still have in the end only the original tax; there is no increase in the tax. But when the purchase takes place after the final change of hands the purchaser is paying at least a markup on the tax plus a markup on the markup on the tax. If there happen to be four hands through which the article passes he would be paying also a markup on the markup on the markup on the tax.

The same process applies in the case of the sales tax. I cited an actual case to the house two years ago of a pair of stockings, where the 8 per cent sales tax is levied on the manufacturer. The manufacturer sells the stockings to the wholesaler who applies his markup, not just on the selling price to him but on the eight per cent tax as well. Then the article is passed on to the retailer, or there may be a jobber in between. Each adds his markup, and when a purchaser buys the goods over the counter he is paying the original tax, plus the wholesaler's 10 per cent markup on the tax, plus the retailer's 50 per cent markup on the markup on the tax.

In that simple case the amount paid by the purchaser was not eight per cent, it was 14·8 per cent. That does not mean that the government got 14·8 per cent; the government got only the eight per cent on the manufacturer's price, but the purchaser was paying 14·8 per cent. As long as the government continues to levy these excise taxes at the manufacturer's level the final purchaser is going to be paying the tax plus the markup on the tax plus the markup on the markup on the tax, and in some cases also a markup on the markup on the markup on the tax.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue in committee of ways and means to discuss the budget resolutions. When those are concluded we will take up Bill No. 47, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act; then the second reading of Bill No. 133, respecting the application of a national trade mark to commodities and respecting the true description of commodities; then the second reading of Bill No. 64, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; then the second reading of Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act, 1946. If we still have time we will take up Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 10, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PENSION FUND SOCIETIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PROVISIONS TO SUBSIDIARY CORPORATIONS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved the first reading of Bill No. 174 (from the Senate), to amend the Pension Fund Societies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOSPITAL BEDS

Mr. Argue:

1. What was the increase in hospital beds, by provinces, for each of the years 1944 to 1948, inclusive?
2. What was the number of hospital beds per thousand of population, by provinces, as at January 1, of each year, 1944 to 1949, inclusive?

Mr. Claxton: The estimates shown below are derived from annual reports supplied to the dominion bureau of statistics either directly by hospitals or through the departments of health of the provinces. Adjustments have been made for hospitals which, though known to be operating, did not supply annual reports. The tables include general, maternity, convalescent, incurable, tuberculosis, mental, private, and other special hospitals. Federal hospitals are not included.

Decreases in bed capacity may be due to the closure of a hospital or hospitals, the closure of a ward or wards in an operating hospital, or the diversion of hospital bed space to other uses. There is a lack of uniformity in the reporting of bed capacity, due to the varying standards in use and to the difference in the interpretation of the term "bed capacity", in the various provinces and at different periods.

Data for the year ending December 31, 1948, and for 1949 is not yet available.

*TELEPHONE DIRECTORY—CHANGE FROM DOMINION OF CANADA TO GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Under whose authority was the name changed in the telephone directory from "Dominion of Canada" to "Government of Canada"

2. Why was this change made?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I may be permitted to answer these questions orally.

1. The change was authorized by the deputy minister of finance, as the Department of Finance is the department now responsible for the administration of government telephone services.

2. Following the issue of October 1, 1947, of the current letters patent constituting the office of governor general, the words "Dominion of" were omitted. The practice of omitting these words was adopted in all government documents from that time forward. This was in accordance with an opinion given by the Department of Justice that the word "dominion" does not form part of the name of this country, as is made clear in section 3 of the British North America Act.

Mr. Fulton: In the course of his oral answer to this question, the minister used the following expression: The Department of Finance is now responsible for the government telephone services.

Mr. Abbott: Is responsible for the administration of government telephone services.

Mr. Fulton: I was going to ask him to clear up that statement. My understanding was that the Department of Transport administered the government telephone services.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is misinformed.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister when the change was made?

Mr. Abbott: I could not answer that question offhand. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works could do so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is about a year ago that the duties were transferred from the Department of Public Works to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Fulton: I have been writing to the Minister of Transport on matters affecting these services and have been receiving answers from him.

Mr. Chevrier: In order to clarify the matter, may I say that the Department of Transport looks after government telephone services.

*HOUSING—ALBERTA—PELMO PARK

Mr. Johnston:

1. How many houses were in the Pelmo Park housing project?

2. What was the total value of this project?

3. What was the financial loss to the government and/or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation through the failure of this housing project?

4. What was the total amount of deposits made by the purchasers?

5. What was the total loss to the purchasers in this project?

6. What was the amount of the total assets of the Kershaw Construction Company as estimated by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation when the contract was let?

7. What actual building experience did this company possess when they received this contract?

8. What was the cause of the failure to complete this contract by the Kershaw Construction Company?

9. Was there any settlement made to the purchasers? If so, what were the terms of settlement?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, much of the information sought by these questions is not available to the government. I have spoken to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), giving him as much information as the government has, and I understand on that basis he has agreed to drop the question.

Mr. Johnston: Since I have the information that is available, I am prepared to drop the question.

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

Mr. Church:

1. How many cubic feet of water per second is now being used by the Chicago drainage canal works in connection with the diversion of that system?

2. Has there been any correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the United States or any of their commissions or officers with respect to such diversion?

3. Has a report been made in connection with such diversion?

Mr. Claxton:

1. Based on an annual average, 1,500 cubic feet per second, in addition to domestic pumpage. It is understood that the latter amounts to about 1,900 cubic feet per second, making a total of approximately 3,400 cubic feet per second.

2. Yes, although not for some years.

3. Reports of proceedings before the United States Supreme Court have been issued in the United States. So far as is known, there are no Canadian or joint international reports on this matter.

*NEWFOUNDLAND—JUDGE IN ADMIRALTY

Mr. Higgins:

What steps have been taken by the government to appoint a judge in admiralty in Newfoundland?

Mr. Garson: Perhaps I may be permitted to answer this question orally. Hon. Sir Brian Dunfield and Hon. H. A. Winters, judges of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, were appointed district judges in admiralty on May 16, 1949. Hon. Sir Albert Joseph Walsh, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, was appointed district judge in admiralty on September 13, 1949.

*WHEAT IN STORAGE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of wheat were in storage in Canada as on the first of October and on the first of November, 1949?

2. What is the total amount paid by the wheat board for storage of wheat between the first day of August, 1948, and the first day of October, 1949, with particulars as to the companies to whom payment was made and the amount paid to each?

1. On September 29, 1949, 162,961,023 bushels; on October 27, 1949, 179,080,499 bushels.

2. It is not the practice of the wheat board to give particulars of current transactions. I would ask that the second part of this question be dropped.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow the second part of the question to stand until I speak to him about it?

Mr. Howe: The first part of the question is answered, and the second part stands.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PAYMENTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND FOR CONSUMABLE STORES AND SUPPLIES

Mr. Higgins:

What was the amount paid to Newfoundland for consumable stores and supplies taken over by Canada in (a) postal services; (b) telegraph services; (c) Gander airport?

NEWFOUNDLAND—PUBLIC SERVANTS, EMPLOYMENT, ETC.

Mr. Higgins:

What is the result of the consultation that has taken place between the federal government and the provincial government of Newfoundland with respect to the detailed application of term 39 of the terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland?

VETERANS LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR MODIFICATION OF CURRENT AND FUTURE CONTRACTS, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942, for the following among other purposes:

To make the benefits of the act available to veterans in receipt of pensions for disabilities which are not the result of service but were incurred during service; to provide conditions under which modifications may be made at the request of veterans in current and future contracts made thereunder; to provide conditions under which adjustments may be made with veterans who have surrendered their contracts and for the absorption of past abnormal building costs.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY—PRESS REPORT AS TO ASSURANCES OF PRIVILEGE FOLLOWING DECONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? Can he answer the question I asked him on November 7 about certain correspondence between Mr. Donald Gordon, and his officers of the wartime prices and trade board, and the flour milling industry?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yes. Mr. Donald Gordon informs me that no communications giving assurance of privilege following decontrol measures were given by him to the milling industry, and the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board also advises me that no member of the staff of the board gave such assurances of privilege "following decontrol measures", which was the phrase used in my hon. friend's question. Moreover, the news item in the Ottawa Journal to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar called attention makes no statement such as the hon. member suggests. Instead, in that particular item it is stated several times that any assurances of privilege were confined to wartime activities.

ARMISTICE DAY

NOTICES TO CIVIL SERVANTS—QUESTION AS TO LEAVE TO ATTEND SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the proper minister—I think it is the Secretary of State—a question. Who has given authority for the putting up of notices in government buildings throughout the country stating that veterans and civil servants generally will not be given leave from their duties tomorrow to attend Armistice day memorial services? Can that order be changed so that they may be allowed to attend these services?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I have no knowledge of any such order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that tomorrow is a statutory holiday.

Mr. Fraser: The notices are up, anyway.

[Mr. Gregg.]

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Dion in the chair.

2. That the retail purchase tax be repealed and replaced by an excise tax of 10 per cent, payable by the manufacturer or importer, on all articles now subject to the retail purchase tax.

Mr. Fraser: We were on this item yesterday and there was quite a bit of misunderstanding about it. This was and still is a luxury tax, although the government call it something else; they call it an excise tax now. They have reduced it from 25 per cent to 10 per cent. When we were talking about this matter yesterday afternoon, before we adjourned for the day, we were mentioning only the 10 per cent tax. But at that time we forgot to take into consideration the fact that in this provision we should cover also the sales tax. On an article that costs say $100, you have the sales tax, and you have your 10 per cent excise tax on top of that, which makes the price $118. That is the price at which the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler. In most cases the wholesaler takes a markup of not more than about 25 per cent; therefore he adds to the $18 tax his 25 per cent, which brings it up to $22.50. The wholesaler in turn sells to the retailer, and most retailers take a margin of about 50 per cent. So the 50 per cent is added to the $22.50, and poor old John public has to pay $33.75 to enable the treasury to collect this $18 tax that the government has imposed on each $100 worth of goods. It is no wonder that the cost of living has gone up, with things of this kind happening. I feel this tax should be abolished.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to give one word of explanation, Mr. Chairman. Last night the committee agreed to have schedule III, which is the list of goods which are exempt from sales tax, incorporated in Hansard. Unfortunately that was not done, so I will give the schedule to Hansard now.

SCHEDULE III

(GOODS EXEMPT FROM SALES TAX)

Foodstuffs

Barley; bread; butter; cheese; cream; eggs; egg albumen and egg yolks; glucose; honey; ice; lard; rice; salt; soups; split peas; sugar; yeast; yogurt; bakers' cakes and pies including biscuits, cookies or other similar articles; cereal breakfast foods not including beverages; fish and edible products thereof; flour including pastry, cake, biscuit, and similar mixes; foods prepared and sold exclusively for feeding infants; fruit, fresh, canned, frozen, dried or evaporated; grain grits and meals; jams, jellies, marmalades, and preserves; maple syrup; corn syrup; table syrups, molasses, and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof; meats and poultry, fresh, cooked, canned, frozen, smoked or dried; milk, including buttermilk, condensed milk, evaporated milk, and powdered milk; peanut butter and shortening and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof; spaghetti, macaroni, and vermicelli; vegetables, fresh, canned frozen or dehydrated, not including pickles, relishes, catsup, sauces, olives, horseradish, mustard, and similar goods; vegetable juices; fruit juices which consist of at least ninety-five per cent of pure juice of the fruit.

Farm and Forest

Bees; casein; fertilizer; hay; hops; shorts; straw; alfalfa meal; animals, living; baling twine for baling farm produce, and articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in process of manufacture thereof; beet pulp, dried; draintiles for agricultural purposes; farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production, not to include flowers, flowering plants or bulbs, when the sales thereof exceed five hundred dollars per annum; feeds for fur-bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value; forest products when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer; furs, raw; gopher poison, and materials for use exclusively in its manufacture; grain or seed cleaning machines and complete parts therefor; grains and seeds in their natural state; harness for horses and complete parts therefor, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof; hides, raw and salted; logs and round unmanufactured timber; milk albumen, when for use exclusively in the production of animal or poultry feeds; nursery stock; oil cake, oil cake meal; peat moss when used for agricultural purposes, including poultry litter; poultry, cattle and other stock feeds; poultry, living; preparations or chemicals sold for disinfecting, dipping or spraying and so used in agriculture or horticulture, and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture of such preparations; sap spouts and sap buckets, evaporators and complete parts therefor, when for use exclusively for the production of maple syrup; sawdust and wood shavings; settlers' effects; vegetable plants; wool not further prepared than washed; woollen rolls or wool yarn milled for a producer of wool from wool supplied by him for his own use.

Engines

Internal combustion traction engines, and portable engines with boilers in combination, for farm purposes, or for use exclusively in the operation of logging, such operation to include the removal of the log from stump to skidway, log dump or common or other carrier, and complete parts of all the foregoing, and articles and materials, not to include plant equipment, to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture of the foregoing engines, boilers or parts thereof.

Mines and Quarries

Crushed stone or crushed gravel; gold and silver in ingots, blocks, bars, drops, sheets or plates unmanufactured; ores of metals of all kinds; sand, gravel, rubble, and field stone.

Marine and Fisheries

Boats bona fide purchased by fishermen for use in the fisheries, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats; carrageen or Irish moss; cotton duck and cotton sail twine to be used only in the manufacture of equipment for ships or vessels; rope and cordage of cotton, hemp, manilla or other vegetable fibre, not exceeding one and one-half inches in circumference, for the fisheries, not including these articles for sportsmen's purposes, and materials for use only in the manufacture thereof; materials for use only in the construction, equipment and repair of ships; materials used as ingredients in canned fish; ships licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade; sinkers, and floats including trawl kegs, when for use exclusively in the fisheries, not including these articles for sportsmen's purposes.

Religious, Charitable, Health, etc.

Insulin; radium; articles and materials for the sole use of any bona fide public hospital certified to be such by the Department of National Health and Welfare, when purchased in good faith for use exclusively by the said hospital and not for resale; artificial eyes; artificial limbs, and parts thereof; bibles, missals, prayer books, psalm and hymn books, religious tracts, Sunday school lesson pictures, books, bound and unbound, pamphlets, booklets, leaflets, scripture, prayer, hymn and mass cards and religious mottoes and pictures unframed, for the promotion of religion, and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof, but not including calendars, parish reports, forms, stationery or programs; donations of clothing and books for charitable purposes; liver extract for use exclusively in the treatment of anaemia; memorials or monuments erected in memory of members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the service of their country; war veterans' badges.

Printing and Educational

Manuscript; newspapers; books for the instruction of the deaf or dumb; magazines and literary papers unbound, regularly issued at stated intervals, not less frequently than four times yearly, and printing paper and printing ink for use exclusively in their production; photographs, paintings, pastels, drawings and other art work and illustrations of all kinds, whether originals, copies or proofs, and printing plates made to reproduce the same, for use exclusively as nonadvertising news pictures or for illustrating nonadvertising articles or stories in periodical publications enjoying second-class mailing privileges, the pages of which are regularly bound, wire stitched or otherwise fastened together; textbooks, printed, authorized by the Department of Education of any province in Canada and phonograph records so authorized for instruction in the English and the French language, and materials used exclusively in the manufacture thereof.

Diplomatic

Articles for the use of the governor general; articles imported for the personal or official use of the heads of diplomatic missions, high commissioners representing other of His Majesty's governments, counsellors, secretaries and attaches at embassies, legations, and offices of high commissioners in Canada, trade commissioners, representing other of His Majesty's governments, consuls general of foreign nations who are natives or citizens of the countries they represent and who are not engaged in any other business or profession; automobiles, cigars, cigarettes, manufactured tobacco, ale, beer, stout, wines, spirits, purchased in Canada by any of the foregoing.

Certain Building Materials

Bricks, building tile, building blocks, and building stone; plaster; lime, cement; lumber; sash; doors; shingles; lath, siding; stairways; plaster boards; fibreboard, building paper and materials, other than wallpaper, manufactured wholly or in part of vegetable or mineral fibre for wall coverings or building insulation; paints, varnishes, white lead and paint oil; prepared roofings; shower baths, bathtubs, basins, faucets, closets, lavatories, sinks and laundry tubs, not including repair parts therefor, nor pipes and pipe fittings; cast iron soil pipe and cast iron fittings therefor; glass for buildings; furnaces, hot water and steam radiators not to include fittings, for the heating of buildings; locks and lock sets; structural steel to be used exclusively for the framework and support of buildings; articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of the aforementioned building materials.

Coverings

Usual coverings to be used exclusively for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such coverings.

Firebrick, refractories, etc.

Firebrick, plastic refractories, high-temperature cement, fire clay and other refractory materials for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment, and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture of such firebrick or refractory materials.

Processing materials

Materials (not to include lubricating oils or fuel oils) consumed, otherwise than by waste or wear, in the process of manufacture or production of taxable goods.

Machinery and apparatus to be used in manufacture or production

Machinery and apparatus, as defined by the Minister of National Revenue, and complete parts thereof which, in the opinion of the minister, are to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods; provided that this exemption shall not apply to office equipment or motor vehicles.

Miscellaneous

British and Canadian coins and foreign gold coin; electricity; fuel other than in liquid form; natural gas and gas manufactured from coal, calcium carbide or oil for illuminating or heating purposes.

Goods enumerated in customs tariff items

173, 209b, 236b, 352a, 364, 406, 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409h, 409i and complete parts thereof, 409j, 409k, 409q, 439c, 440k, 460, 476, 476a, 480, 480a, 538, 663b, 666, 667, 682, 692, 692b, 693(i), 695a, 695b, 696, 696a, 698, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 708, 786, 848.

Articles and materials which enter into the cost of manufacture of the goods enumerated in tariff items 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409j, 409k, 409o and 439c, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture in their own factories of the goods enumerated in the aforesaid tariff items, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

Articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of goods enumerated in customs tariff items 173, 406, 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409h, 409i, 409j, 409k, 409q, 410b, 411, 411a, 411b, 439c, 440k, 476, 476a, 480, 480a, 538, 663, 663a, 663b, 666, 667, 696, 848.

Materials not to include plant equipment consumed in process of manufacture or production, which enter directly into the cost of goods enumerated in customs tariff items 406, 409, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409h, 409i, 409j, 409k, 409q, 410b, 411, 411a, 411b, 439c, 440k, 476, 476a, 480, 480a, 538, 663, 663a, 666, 667, 696.

There was also some discussion about incorporating the schedule referring to the old excise tax rates. It has been pointed out to me that since all those rates are now changed to a flat 10 per cent, there is not much point in incorporating the schedules in the old act—that is, schedules I, II and III. They will be found consolidated in the new bill when it is brought in after this resolution is carried.

One other point was brought to my attention. I described the four main groups of goods in this country now, so far as taxation is concerned: the first group, on which no sales tax was levied; the second group, everything else on which sales tax was levied; the third group, on which a 10 per cent excise tax was levied in addition, and finally, the liquor and tobacco group, which has always had a traditionally high tax. There is one other small group covered by schedule IV of the act, which provides that goods made by either the institute for the blind or by deaf and dumb schools are subject to only half the sales tax.

Mr. Fraser: To go a little further in this matter: as I said before, the manufacturer's price, let us say, is $100. He adds the 8 per cent sales tax, and the 10 per cent luxury tax brings the tax up to $18, which makes the wholesaler's price $118. The wholesaler's margin is 25 per cent; therefore to that $118 is added his $29.50, which brings up the retailer's cost to $147.50. The retailer makes a margin of 50 per cent, which adds another $73.75, which brings the price of a $100 article up to $221.25 to the public. That is why I say this tax should be done away with.

Mr. Isnor: I should like to say a word in reply to the hon. member who has just referred to the profits made by retailers. Evidently the hon. member, who has built up a case on the basis of an increase from $100 to $221.25, is not at all familiar with retail practice. I doubt very much whether any hon. member who has spoken on this question has dealt with it from a real knowledge of merchandising. I want to say definitely that it was a good move to change the 25 per cent excise tax to 10 per cent. It was a good move because it made possible the purchase of luggage and many other articles that do not come within the scope of luxury items. More than that, the 25 per cent profits tax never had a profit added to it. It meant nothing to the retailer except additional worry to collect the tax and pass it along. It also prevented the sale of luggage to many customers who required it.

When the hon. member takes $100 and adds an 8 per cent sales tax to it, he is doing what is right. The manufacturers charge and collect an 8 per cent sales tax for the government. In addition they collect a special 10 per cent excise tax for the government. The retailer does not make any profit or markup whatsoever on that $18.

Mr. Fraser: Certainly he does.

Mr. Isnor: It is all very well for the hon. member, who does not know what he is talking about, to say that he does. The fact remains that no reliable firm in Canada will put a markup on that 10 per cent. I venture to make that assertion here today.

In addition to that, the hon. member first adds $18 to the manufacturer's price; then he puts 25 per cent on that, which makes $29.50. I do not know where he gets the 25 per cent. Then he adds another 50 per cent. The average retailer adds to his first cost what is considered a reasonable markup to make it possible for him to pay his rent and overhead expenses, including help. That figure is anywhere from 23 per cent to 29 per cent, depending on the type of business. After he has paid all his expenses, the net profit remaining to him, roughly speaking, amounts to anywhere from 3½ per cent to 6 or 7 per cent. That is the story. That applies to most reliable retailers throughout Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is quite true that there is the odd case—the hon. member does not indicate a thing by shaking his head. He may shake it one way or the other. He may shake it up or down, but these are the facts. I wanted to say this word in fairness to the retailers throughout Canada.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member has been in business for a long time. I do not know what his practice is, but let us suppose he bought an article on which there was a hidden tax, and he paid $100 for that article. Suppose he asked the wholesaler how much tax was included in the price, and the answer was $18; he would not say: I will mark it down $18 and then take my profit on the figure thus arrived at. That is not the way business is done. The figures I gave are not my own figures. They are from retailers from coast to coast, from Halifax to Victoria. They are figures obtained from over 3,700 people.

Mr. Isnor: Would the hon. member be good enough not to quote a hundred or twenty-five or ten or eleven, but just one? Give us the figures of one retailer from Halifax. Give us the name of one firm. That is all I am asking.

Mr. Fraser: All right; any jewelry firm or hardware firm in the hon. member's city will tell him these are the facts.

Mr. Sinnott: The hon. member said he could give the names.

Some hon. Members: Give the name.

Mr. Warren: Give the name.

Mr. Hansell: I do not want to interfere with the little boxing bout that is going on between the senior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Peterborough West. It does seem to me that the hon. member for Peterborough West is one punch ahead, but I shall leave that for the referee to decide. I am interested in the people and what they pay in hidden taxes. The leader of this group had something to say on that yesterday afternoon, and I fully support him in what he said. I believe the people of Canada have a right to know what they are paying in taxes every time they buy an article or whenever they do business.

I do not smoke. I understand that those who do smoke pay a lot of taxes that they do not know they are paying. I understand that if they buy a package of cigarette papers the actual price of the papers may be three cents, and there is an additional ten cents which is a tax. I do not know whether they know that or not, but I contend that on every package of cigarette papers it should be indicated that the buyer is charged ten cents for the privilege of rolling his own, and that that ten cents goes to the government.

If I had my way I would insist that on every price tag the actual price of the goods should be marked, and, in addition, the amount of tax imposed. I believe that was done in some instances during the war. We in this corner of the house believe that it is not necessary to tax to the extent that governments do today. I am not going into that now. We have said that over the past fifteen years. We believe that a substantial proportion of the money that is used by governments today could be obtained by methods other than taxing or borrowing. Be that as it may, it does seem to me that the power of money manipulation works in the dark. There is no question about that; otherwise there would not be the ignorance that there is in the country concerning money.

I do not know whether I heard a hee-haw coming from the other side of the house, but even the type of creation that uses such an expression does not understand very much about money. Holy Writ warns us about the hidden things of darkness. I believe that some of these things should be brought to light. There may be some reason to suspect that those who operate this vicious and yet powerful system would want some things hidden. The idea is not to let people know too much about it, so the tax is hidden.

I have here an empty cigarette package. While I do not know much about cigarettes, I have been told by one who smokes that this little sticker on the package has something to do with the excise tax. Upon looking at it I find it has the appearance of a stamp —indeed it is so designed that it looks like a valuable piece of paper—

Mr. Sinclair: It is.

Mr. Hansell: —as though it might have been cut from the corner of a $20 bill. I read it and I find it bears the imprint: "20 cigarettes". I do not know whether a person buying cigarettes would insist every time he bought them upon being informed that he is buying twenty of them. Surely he would understand that. What he does not know is the amount of tax he is paying on that package of cigarettes.

My leader tells me that the man who buys cigarettes is paying 29 cents in taxes every time he buys a package. Instead of a small stamp bearing the imprint "20 cigarettes" I say it should bear the words: Your government is now taxing you 29 cents on this package of cigarettes. In this way the tax would not be hidden from the eyes of those who smoke the things within the package. The blame for the tax should be placed squarely on the shoulders of the government imposing it. People should not be left under the impression that it is the manufacturer who imposes the tax—and there may be some who have that impression.

I am serious in what I say. During the war it was provided by certain regulations of the wartime prices and trade board—and if in any details I am wrong, I shall stand corrected—that, in order to have fair business practice in the fur trade, any fur when advertised had to be properly described as to the type of fur used. It was not good enough to say, "This is muskrat"—because it may not have been muskrat; it may have been tomcat. In advertising the fur the advertiser had to state the type of fur being used; if it was dyed rabbit, it had to be so stated. Under that regulation which, in my view, was a good one, people knew what they were buying. No one will gainsay that.

The same should apply in connection with taxes. People should know how much they are paying in taxes and how much for the actual article. I urge therefore that we do away with hidden taxes. Believe me, if people knew every time they spent a dollar here or there how much of it went for taxes it would not be long before they would be aroused to the necessity of some type of monetary reform.

Mr. Blackmore: They would stop blaming private enterprise then.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, there is no specific item under which I could mention the commodity I should like to bring to the attention of the committee, because it is not one of the commodities from which the tax has been removed. I wish, however, to protest against the tax on ice cream.

Mr. Sinclair: Resolution No. 5 would be the proper one.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knight: No, the resolution is not carried.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is out of order if he attempts to discuss a sales tax on the excise tax item. I suggest that he wait until we reach resolution 5.

Mr. Knight: I am asking the Chairman for his ruling.

The Chairman: I suggest that the hon. member wait until we are discussing resolution 5.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with the hon. member for Peterborough West and disagree with the senior member for Halifax. After all, I believe I learned to disagree with the senior member for Halifax when some years ago I used to listen to the leaders of the party to which he belongs. In those days—and I argued the same way; I admit it—the imposition of a tariff was always alleged to be an imposition on the public, because it was not the tariff that the people paid but the pyramided price at the retail end, at which stage the cost price included the original cost and the tariff in the first instance, with at every stage the additional amount of profit added to both the original value and the tariff, and pyramided profits on both.

I think this is perfectly true with regard to the tax we are discussing today. Yesterday the parliamentary assistant referred to the dollar article with the 10 per cent tax on it, which, of course, amounted to ten cents. Then he used an extravagant markup, which is not generally used, but which I shall use because it makes a simple computation—and we reach the point where we have one dollar becoming two dollars. The 10 per cent, it is true, is 20 cents on the two dollars. But as a matter of fact when you compute the markup you are not paying 10 per cent on the two dollars, but rather 20 per cent on the original dollar—which is a different thing, indeed.

The only difference is that in one case the government gets the whole tax, and in the other case the public pays it and it is distributed to the wholesaler, the jobber, the retailer or whomever it may be. The difficulty is that the consumer pays and the government actually loses revenue in that way. I agree with the hon. member from the Social Credit group who has just spoken when he states that these things should be made known to the public.

I know that in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and other provinces where they have had sales taxes, there have been outcries against sales taxes to the extent of two or three per cent, forgetting all about the federal sales tax of 8 per cent and all the other hidden taxes. We never heard anything about that—and the strange feature of it all is that supporters of the Liberal party are the most violent critics of provincial sales taxes, when they are collected directly from the public in amounts of two or three per cent—despite the fact that the federal tax imposed by the government they support is many times that large.

I agree, therefore, that these taxes should be stated to the extent we can have them stated. I do not like the idea of changing the present tax at the retail end to one at the manufacturer's end.

Mr. Low: There is one suggestion I would pass on to the parliamentary assistant which might be followed up by his department. I believe all the discussions thus far on sales and excise taxes indicate that there ought to be some source from which members of the House of Commons can obtain authentic information as to the portion of the consumer price which in reality is taxation imposed by this or other governments, and that portion which is legitimate cost. A good many attempts have been made by associations such as the retail merchants' association to compute the effect of excise and sales taxes on consumer cost. I suspect that some of the figures given by the hon. member for Peterborough West came from such a source. If they are not correct—

Mr. Fraser: They are correct.

Mr. Low: I am only saying that if they are not correct, surely it is necessary that there should be placed at the disposal of agencies of that kind information that will make it possible for them to get the correct figures. I am aware of certain investigations that have been carried on in the United States, and calculations founded on fact indicate that up to 86 per cent of the consumer cost of a gallon of oil used in the transmission of an automobile consists of taxation imposed by either the state or the federal government, mainly the federal government. On a pair of denim overalls used by a farmer, up to 70 per cent of the consumer price consists of taxes imposed at various levels in manufacturing and distribution.

Mr. Blackmore: When they are pyramided.

Mr. Low: When they are pyramided. I think the parliamentary assistant could do this committee a service by making available these figures in connection with certain of the common articles used by the people of Canada from day to day, so that the consumer may know exactly what is tax and what is legitimate cost.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to bring up the matter of portable sprinkler irrigation systems. I referred to this in the debate on the address, and requested that when the budget resolutions were brought down provision be made for removing the tax on this type of farm equipment.

The Chairman: That would come under resolution 5.

Mr. Harkness: I will take it up under No. 5.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to protest against the continuance of the 10 per cent tax under 3 (a), on trunks, suitcases, bags and luggage of all kinds. We are thankful that this war tax is being reduced from 35 to 10 per cent, but these articles are not luxury items and there should be no tax at all. This industry was imposed upon during the war to a greater extent than any such industry in the country.

In my constituency there is a small industry which started from limited beginnings but has grown to a fair size. Of course, it cannot compare with the large industries in the country, because it does not manufacture a full range, its products being only staple items. During the war a tax of 35 per cent was imposed upon the products of this industry. I doubt if there is a member of the house or a household in the country without a trunk, a suitcase, a bag, or luggage of some kind. Therefore I submit these articles are a necessity. I cannot understand why they should be classed with ash trays, tobacco pipes, smokers' accessories, and luxuries.

This tax cannot be justified, particularly in view of the recent devaluation of the pound sterling, which creates serious competition for this industry. Has the department taken into consideration this additional competition which the industry in my constituency and other such industries throughout Canada will have to contend against? Articles are coming into this country under a 20 per cent preference and are taking business from industries of this kind.

I consider this an unfair, unreasonable and unjust tax, and I do not believe it should be continued. If it were in order I would move that this 10 per cent tax on trunks, suitcases, bags and luggage of all kinds be deleted from the resolution.

Mr. Isnor: I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Cumberland in the representations he has made for the elimination of the 10 per cent tax on luggage. I do not do this because I am a retailer selling luggage, but rather because I feel that this industry should not receive this treatment. I want to emphasize the point made by the hon. member, that this tax places the Canadian manufacturer of luggage in an unfavourable position owing to the devaluation of the pound. A large quantity of English leather goods is coming into Canada, and with the devaluation of the pound the competition is going to be that much keener and the Canadian manufacturer will be placed in an unfair position.

The firm to which the hon. member referred, Christie Trunk and Bag Company, Limited, is a fine company which is making a good article. They are in competition with the rest of Canada, and I am anxious to see them maintain their position and continue on a fair competitive basis.

May I say to the hon. member for Cumberland that I was one of those who went to the government last year to make representations to have the 35 per cent tax reduced to the present 10 per cent. Of course we asked for the complete elimination of the tax.

For the benefit of those who do not know how this business is handled, may I say that in the case of luggage the price ticket states the tax. There is no hidden tax such as has been referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Everything is distinctly marked on the price ticket, and prices are more or less set by the manufacturer.

Let me say in fairness to retailers, not just those in Halifax but in British Columbia and throughout the whole dominion—

Mr. Coldwell: We were not criticizing the retailer.

Mr. Isnor: The hon. member started out to criticize them.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fraser: No, we did not. We were criticizing the government.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Isnor: We can read what was said. I think I can follow an argument as well as the average person. Hon. members certainly tried to contend that the retailer was selling at an excessive profit, due largely to the pyramiding of the taxes. That is the position in which they try to place retailers. I want to defend the retailer and say that on the whole—and there are a great many of them throughout Canada—they are trying to carry on the same fine type of business that is carried on by other trades. I think it is safe to say that because of wartime restrictions the retailer today is making less profit than he ever made before. I do not know whether hon. members who criticize retailers, including the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—

Mr. Coldwell: I rise on a question of privilege. We have not criticized retailers.

Mr. Fraser: No one has.

Mr. Coldwell: No one has. If the retailer pays out $1.25 he is entitled under our present system to a profit on his investment based on $1.25. We are not complaining about that.

Mr. Graydon: You have a man of straw there.

Mr. Isnor: If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is withdrawing his argument, it is all right with me.

Mr. Fraser: No; he did not withdraw his argument.

Mr. Low: You just do not understand.

Mr. Isnor: The hon. member says the member for Rosetown-Biggar does not understand. I agree with him.

Mr. Coldwell: What is that?

Mr. Fraser: No; it was you who did not understand.

Mr. Low: The hon. member for Halifax did not understand.

Mr. Coldwell: I am sorry, but the hon. member for Halifax does not seem to understand anything.

Mr. Fulton: He does not even understand what he is saying himself.

Mr. Isnor: I am most willing to be taught at any time. I have done fairly well in the retail business and made a profit in a fair legitimate way.

Mr. Drew: At 25 per cent or 50 per cent?

Mr. Isnor: I was about to say that today retailers are carrying on with a closer margin than ever before.

Mr. McIvor: That is right.

Mr. Fraser: We all agree with that.

Mr. Isnor: You can criticize them as much as you wish—

Mr. Fraser: Nobody criticized them.

Mr. Isnor: You may also criticize the price setting plan, but there are a great many manufactured lines today in which the retail price is more or less suggested to the retailer. The retail price is closer to cost than it ever was before. I think I should set hon. members right as to that. That is all I care to say at this time.

Mr. Church: I wish to support what the hon. member for Cumberland has said about the excise tax. He forgets, however, that departmental officials throughout the country will interpret the word "accessories". Having certain powers, rights and privileges, they will notify the various excise collectors what to do. The resolution may be passed in the twinkling of an eye, but departmental officials will write something different into the resolution. They can make rules and regulations apart from it. I think we should be most careful about the language that is used. I have seen examples in the city of Toronto of what happens, and I have had many complaints from retail merchants and others engaged in this kind of business. They say that they have great difficulty, and that there are different interpretations made in various places. We should clarify the matter, because if the committee passes the resolution it means it will be enforced in some places and not in others. There will be different interpretations. The department will interpret the word "accessories" as meaning something that was never intended by the resolution.

Mr. Thomas: As to the statement made by the senior member for Halifax, I should like to say that I have been in business in one way or another for the past seventeen years. Some day I hope to have the privilege of going to Halifax and watching the hon. member work out his profit. During all the time I have been in business I have never been accused of nefarious practices. When an article costs me $1.25 I have always figured my profit on a cost of $1.25. There is no man in business in Canada today who has the time to check over all the statutes of Canada to figure out how much he has been charged in taxes, and take that off before he figures his profit.

Mr. Low: Not even the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. Thomas: Not even the hon. member for Halifax. If an article costs a man $1.25, he is entitled to his profit on that $1.25.

Mr. Murphy: Would this be the appropriate time to inquire from the parliamentary assistant what the excise taxes are on tobaccos in various forms?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member can find that in the Excise Act. None of these resolutions pertain to tobacco or spirits.

Mr. Church: You will tie up the Christmas trade. You will not be able to get your goods out of customs.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if under the old law the retail purchase tax was 25 per cent on the retail price. They have made a pretty smart move. They have removed the 25 per cent tax because the public demanded it, and now they are making the manufacturer and importer collect the tax, and are hiding it so that nobody will know anything about it. Like other hon. members, I think that the tax should be shown so that people will know exactly what they are paying. The same applies to the sales tax. If the amount of the sales tax had to be shown on each article purchased, there would not be any sales tax today because people would be so much annoyed. You would need so many votes over there that you would take the sales tax off.

Mr. Low: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant about the suggestion I made a few minutes ago. Does he not think that full information should be made available so that members of the house might know exactly what the situation is?

Mr. Sinclair: I was advised yesterday that I was too eager to answer questions, and I was waiting until each resolution was fairly well completed to answer the points which have been raised. As to the question of the hon. member for Peace River, whether it would be practicable to have the sum total of all taxes shown on every item—

Mr. Low: Not on every one—on a representative group.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member says "not on every one"; but where is he to draw the line?

Mr. Low: Take a representative group.

Mr. Sinclair: The principal taxes in Canada, on the federal level, are personal income tax, corporation tax, and excise tax.

Mr. Low: I am speaking of hidden taxes.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member accused me of being too eager yesterday; now he is somewhat eager himself. In the final tax fraction of the cost of an article these hidden taxes are embodied. Property tax is paid by the factory that made the article, also corporation taxes and provincial taxes on that level. All these are represented in the cost of the article. If you want to know where the federal taxes are to be found that the people of Canada pay, in the Excise Act there is specific information as to where taxes are levied.

The next point raised was about the matter of markups. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax that there has been a great change in opinion on the other side of the house between yesterday and this afternoon. We heard that when the government put the tax on the manufacturer's level, the wholesaler, the jobber and the retailer were able to pyramid it, and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that the retailer added these extra taxes on the retail level. There was a complete change when the hon. member for Halifax suggested there was an implication that retailers were taking advantage of these taxes.

Mr. Drew: When he misrepresented what had been said.

Mr. Sinclair: Let me say a few words about the actual form that these taxes take. If we had price control in Canada, and had definitely allotted markups, as we did under price control, then the arguments made would have been true, although even then we exempted taxes from these markups. Today we have not price control. The actual markups of the retail merchants of Canada today may be represented in terms of percentages. They are determined by the merchants on their experience of the actual cost of doing business. The same is true all the way up—the jobber, the wholesaler and the retailer. When these people receive an article from the manufacturer, they have to provide a place for selling it, employees, the cost of financing the transaction, bad debts, various social insurances such as workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance—all these things are part of the cost of doing business. Then comes the return on the investment. The actual cost of doing business also depends to some extent on the type of article produced. The member for Moose Jaw could probably give the house excellent examples of the difference in cost when one handles a very small article and a large article.

Mr. Thatcher: It made no difference on the articles I handled for the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to be the first to thank the member for Moose Jaw for the very low markup he took on the article he handled for me. I believe the hon. member could give a full explanation of all these things which are incorporated in the wholesalers' and retailers' cost of doing business.

Then, as a general rule of thumb, in order to obviate the necessity of making many calculations, the merchant adds a 10, 15, or 20 per cent markup as the cost of doing business. Let us return to the article costing a dollar, which I mentioned yesterday and which the member for Rosetown-Biggar took as a good example because the calculations involved are simple. This article cost a dollar, and after going through the jobber, the wholesaler and the retailer, it resulted in a 100 per cent increase, so that without sales tax the article would cost $2. Formerly, with the addition of the 25 per cent sales tax, the selling price to the consumer would have been $2.50. Those people have said, therefore, that according to their experience the cost of doing business on a one dollar article was $1.

We are now charging 10 per cent at the manufacturers' level. This means that after these three people calculate the cost of doing business, they add this extra 10 per cent. Ten cents in the case of a dollar item does not seem very large. However, when one considers that it is a thousand dollars on ten thousand dollars, and that the carrying charges on such a sum would be an extra charge on the business it begins to loom quite large. A manufacturer should be able to give a price of $1.10, then have the article go through these three stages and reach the consumer at $2.11. Whether it is sold for $2.11 or $2.20 will depend upon competition.

We are now returning to a position of abundant supply. You see evidence of competition every time you pick up your newspaper. Sales are advertised, and we realize that competition is returning. If there is no competition, the merchant may be able to get $2.20 instead of the $2.11 which I have used as an example. However, under our system there is an opportunity for a smart young retailer such as the member for Moose Jaw or the member for Halifax to say: There is a business in which a good profit is to be made, so I am going to enter that business. That is how this markup system functions in our economy.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is the justification for continuing a tax of 10 per cent on such necessities as are listed under resolution 3(a)—trunks, suitcases, bags, and luggage of all kinds?

The Chairman: We are still on resolution 2.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Are we to continue discussing item No. 3? We have been discussing it most of the time lately.

The Chairman: Shall resolution 2 carry?

Mr. Fraser: Resolution 2 has been carried.

Mr. Sinclair: Go ahead.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The parliamentary assistant kindly tells me to go ahead.

Mr. Carroll: On what item are we now?

The Chairman: Resolution 3.

Mr. Gillis: Resolution 2 has not carried yet, has it?

The Chairman: Shall resolution 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The parliamentary assistant has said that I may continue.

Mr. Gillis: On a point of order, are we considering resolution 2 or resolution 3? If we are considering No. 2, the member for Cumberland is out of order. There are many of us who wish to say something about No. 2, and we do not want to be told we are out of order, Mr. Chairman, if you permit the discussion on No. 3 to continue.

The Chairman: Shall resolution 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: We are considering No. 2.

Mr. Gillis: The parliamentary assistant's explanation of the sales tax and how it is applied is almost as clear as those radio broadcasts. It would take four or five radio broadcasts to clarify it, but I do not intend that to be any reflection on him.

According to resolution No. 2, you are repealing the purchase tax. Now, the general sales tax is a purchase tax. Most of the people outside of this chamber who read resolution No. 2 and the discussion on it will assume this government is repealing the general sales tax of 8 per cent, because that applies on practically everything one purchases.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is completely out of order, of course.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to get these taxes clarified. My impression of what is being done by resolution 2 is that the tax of 25 per cent which applied to certain luxuries during the war is being removed.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: I believe that none of the taxes which applied to luxury goods during the war should be retained. The way the section is worded makes it misleading. It speaks of the "retail purchase tax", and the sales tax is a retail purchase tax. The sales tax of 8 per cent is applied by the retailer on goods purchased by the consumer. If a person buys lumber, hardware, almost anything else, he is charged the 8 per cent sales tax. I paid it on lumber I purchased less than two months ago. Some of the retailers are honest enough to mark it in as an 8 per cent sales tax, and you know what you are paying.

I suggest to the parliamentary assistant—I know he is new at this job, but perhaps he will learn as he goes along—that his explanation of this retail purchase tax should be clear and precise. Someone should say that the government is removing the 25 per cent luxury tax charged on certain luxury goods during the war, but is applying a 10 per cent tax at the manufacturers' level. Then anyone who purchases an article within the field covered by this resolution will understand that no retailer or wholesaler has the right to a markup on the 10 per cent tax. It is being removed completely, and the manufacturer is going to absorb it. None of it can be passed on to the consuming public. Am I right?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is wrong in almost everything he has said so far. Resolution 2 very clearly says that the retail purchase tax, which, in order to distinguish it from the federal sales tax, is the legal name by which this tax has been known since it was brought in, is being repealed and will be replaced by an excise tax of 10 per cent. I do not know how much more simply it can be expressed. I do not know how much simpler the English language can be.

As to his second point, on the eight per cent federal sales tax, it was never levied at the retail level. It has always been levied at the manufacturer's level. As to lumber, the eight per cent federal sales tax on lumber was removed at least three if not four years ago. This schedule III which will be on Hansard today—that is schedule III of the present Excise Tax Act—gave a long list of items which in this country today carry no sales tax; that is, no federal sales tax. Foodstuffs and building materials led all the rest of the parade. If the hon. member says that he bought lumber just two weeks ago and paid an eight per cent retail sales tax on it, I would suggest to him that he should see his good friend the hon. member for Lake Centre and institute an action in the matter.

Mr. Gillis: Two months ago. That is just about as clear as was the first statement by the parliamentary assistant. You are repealing the luxury tax of 25 per cent that was imposed during the war and which was handed on to the public.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: You are repealing that tax and imposing a 10 per cent tax on the manufacturer.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: That is clear enough. That is exactly what I said in the first place. That is the kind of explanation I want on the record, so that people outside the chamber, in reading it, will understand it.

Mr. Sinclair: It is on the record.

Mr. Gillis: It was not on the record before; it is now. That is all I want to find out. I will reserve any questions I have on the general sales tax until we come to item 5.

Mr. Thatcher: I agree with the hon. member for Peterborough West in what he said about this pyramiding of taxes. I do not think there is any member in this committee, regardless of the party to which he belongs, who would suggest that these indirect taxes are not going to pyramid; and naturally, if they start at the manufacturer's level and go through the wholesaler and retailer, they will pyramid a great deal more. As I see this resolution No. 2, although it is not all we should like it to be, it is certainly a great improvement over the law we had before. I certainly do not see why the government cannot collect this tax much more easily and much more efficiently from, say, five or six manufacturers than from 50,000 or 100,000 retailers throughout the country.

Speaking from my own experience, I remember one instance in which we had an indirect tax; there was a tax on pitchers. If it was a pitcher that you put water in, the tax did not apply; but if it was a pitcher that you put on the mantelpiece, you had to pay the tax. I remember that our salesgirls always had a great deal of trouble; it was difficult for them to know when they had to charge tax and when they did not have to charge it. While this resolution is not what we should like it to be, I think it is a great improvement over what we have had.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for Halifax can see my correspondence at any time with regard to what I said previously. When he was speaking, he gave the house to understand that he alone was the one who had the 25 per cent luxury tax removed.

Mr. Isnor: No, I did not.

Mr. Fraser: He tried to imply that.

Mr. Isnor: I said that I was one of those who waited on the government. It was a fine delegation.

Mr. Fraser: I might say that the Minister of Finance received thousands and thousands of letters from every part of the country with respect to that tax. That is why it was removed. I waited on the minister not once but many times with regard to that tax. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I say to the hon. member for Halifax that no one today has criticized the retailers. In my experience I have found only one retailer who was not honest. I do not think it was fair of the hon. member for Halifax to even suggest that anybody criticized the retailers.

Mr. Isnor: Your whole criticism was based on that theme.

Mr. Fraser: I will say this to the hon. member for Halifax, who has criticized us for having given the retailer a markup of 50 per cent. Yesterday as reported at page 1603 of Hansard the parliamentary assistant said:

> But mathematically, even though they had, for example, a 50 per cent markup on the $1.10 they would now . . .

And so on. The parliamentary assistant mentioned 50 per cent. The average retailer does charge a 50 per cent markup. Some have to charge more. It depends on whether an article is slow moving and has to be carried in stock for months and months and perhaps years.

Mr. Isnor: Consult any of your grocers.

Mr. Fraser: I am not talking about grocers.

Mr. Isnor: You are talking about retailers.

Mr. Fraser: Because there is not this excise tax on the goods they handle.

Mr. Isnor: You are talking about retailers, though.

Mr. Fraser: I am talking about retailers that are interested in this tax. I am not talking about clothiers either. I agree with the hon. member who preceded me that this tax is better than the 25 per cent tax; but still it is a hidden tax and is one that should be done away with.

Mr. Hansell: I spoke a little while ago about this excise stamp on cigarette boxes. The parliamentary assistant did not say anything about it in reply. Perhaps it was too insignificant for him to bother about. I know that in my speeches I perhaps have a habit of injecting a little bit of levity once in a while, but I do not want any minister of the crown or any parliamentary assistant to think that, because I do that, I am any the less serious in what I say. Sometimes we need to loosen up a little bit in this chamber. Since I called the attention of the parliamentary assistant to this excise stamp, stating that there were twenty cigarettes in this box instead of saying what the tax on those cigarettes was, some public-spirited citizen has sent in to me a little package of matches. I want to compliment the House of Commons for getting these little things out with the crest on them. But there is also printed on the folder: "Excise tax, $\frac{1}{5}$ cent, paid." I should like to know why that "$\frac{1}{5}$ cent, paid" is printed on this folder but the amount paid for tax is not printed on the stamp on the cigarette boxes. Why is there that difference?

Mr. Gillis: They are ashamed to put it on.

Mr. Hansell: Either that, or some pressure from somewhere has been exerted to have "20 cigarettes" printed on there instead of the amount of tax. Will the parliamentary assistant explain why that is there? I am certain that the smoker knows already that there are twenty cigarettes in that package.

Mr. MacInnis: At what stage?

Mr. Hansell: Can the parliamentary assistant explain that situation to me? It is not something that is of small value at all. There is a principle involved, and there is some reason why the excise stamp states that there are twenty cigarettes in the package and yet does not state the amount of the tax.

Mr. Sinclair: The actual tax on the cigarettes, to which my hon. friend refers, is not an excise tax under this act but an excise duty. The reason that the number of cigarettes is mentioned is this. That tax has been in effect for at least fifty years as on that stamp form. As the tax on cigarettes and tobaccos has varied from budget to budget, if after each budget we had to withdraw all the stamps that were already issued and paid for by the cigarettes and tobacco companies, and bring them back, there would obviously be this extra needless expense at each change in the actual rate. All the stamp shows is that on twenty cigarettes the present excise duty has been paid.

As to the second point, I know he will be glad to know that under resolution No. 6 we are getting rid of that stamp tax on matches and are replacing it with a 10 per cent excise tax. I can answer that question further when we come to resolution No. 6.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask one question before we leave this matter. Did I understand the parliamentary assistant to put a schedule on record setting out the articles affected by this tax?

Mr. Sinclair: Yesterday afternoon, at the request of the committee, I asked Hansard to put on record schedule III of the Excise Act passed last session, which lists all the articles which are exempt from the payment of either sales or excise tax. It was not given to Hansard but it will be included in today's Hansard. Sections 1, 2 and 6 of our present Excise Act list all the excise taxes. Since most of these are being changed from a variety of rates, 15 per cent, 25 per cent and so on down to 10 per cent, there does not seem to be much point in including that. We should wait for the new bill which will be presented after these resolutions are disposed of, which will have a consolidation of the excise tax rates.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I agree with what the hon. member for Peterborough West said at the beginning of the discussion this afternoon. I do not think his argument has been answered by the parliamentary assistant who is piloting these resolutions through the committee. I refer to the pyramiding of the costs to the consumer. If an item costs $100 and there is a 10 per cent tax placed on it and a wholesale profit of 25 per cent added and then a retailer's profit of somewhere around 50 per cent, is it not correct, Mr. Chairman, that the consumer then has to pay an extra amount of profit, since percentages are added to the 10 per cent at the beginning? So far as the government is concerned the same result would be arrived at if approximately 6 per cent were put on at the retailer level. On an item costing one dollar it would mean a saving of about 9 cents to the consumer. Why should the consumer have to pay another 9 per cent more than would be necessary to collect the same amount of money for the government?

Mr. Sinclair: I tried to explain as best I could what happens on the actual build-up of what is called the markup. The position of the opposition is this. They are not criticizing the retailer. They agree that most retailers are working on a very low margin of profit; that is, dollars and cents profit, because that is the only sort of profit that pays bills, not percentages. Therefore if you say there is pyramiding certainly the government is not getting it. It means the retailer is getting it, and yet the assertion is made that the retailer is working on a low margin. It is obvious, whether the tax is put on at the wholesale or the retail level, the retailer is still going to have that amount of money in percentages, the amount of money necessary to market the goods. That is the argument. It is quite true that if the government levied the sales tax at the retail level instead of the manufacturers' level we could cut the rate in half, if the whole markup was a hundred per cent. The factor which gauges the tax rates that the government has is the amount of revenue we must raise to satisfy the needs of the Dominion of Canada. I have noticed that many hon. members are anxious to have taxes abolished, but I also notice that when the estimates are up for discussion many hon. members are most helpful to the ministers in suggesting bigger expenditures in their particular fields. I have not very much experience in the house of hon. members offering some new tax fields for the government to enter to raise more money, or alternatively where cuts may be made in some of the government departments. In the Department of Finance we are faced with the problem of raising the necessary money, through taxes, to meet the estimates of expenditures of the federal government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That does not answer the point. To be more explicit, suppose an article costs one dollar and the tax of 10 per cent is not put on in this fashion, and the wholesaler's profit, for argument's sake is the amount that the hon. member for Peterborough West suggested, namely, 25 per cent. That brings the price to $1.25 at that level. The retailer charges 50 per cent markup. That brings the price to $1.875. With a 6 per cent tax at the retail level the government could get more money than it would get with the 10 per cent tax at the manufacturer's level, and the total cost of the article would be $1.97.

Mr. Sinclair: Once again, these two factors enter into the picture. The government's tax program is first of all predicated on the amount of money we must raise, and we receive that amount of revenue through the 10 per cent excise tax. The second point is that hon. members on the other side have repeated that they do not think the retailer is taking advantage of it, that he is competitive, and that therefore it is not percentages, it is dollars and cents which are marked up, and which he needs to pay the cost of his business and other costs which he has to encounter. If the tax is levied at the manufacturer's level the cost of obtaining the money from the bank and the extra cost of servicing that money enters into it. Whether the tax is levied at that level or at the retail level he still has the cost of marketing his goods; that is, the jobber, the wholesaler and the retailer. So far as collection is concerned, the hon. member for Moose Jaw pointed out that from his own practical experience, and as the members of the Department of National Revenue can certainly certify, there is a tremendous improvement in that operation and in the cost of collections from a few manufacturers rather than from thousands of retailers across this country.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The consumer is paying for it.

Mr. Sinclair: The consumer of course pays for the cost of collection through the general taxes.

Mr. Stanfield: What the parliamentary assistant is trying to do is to make the manufacturer a tax collector for the dominion government. If you want to get away from pyramiding these taxes, put the sales tax and the purchase tax at the retail level, and you will soon get rid of pyramiding and you are also getting more money in that way. And if you do place these taxes at the retail level you will get so much political pressure brought to bear that we will soon be rid of these taxes altogether.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

An hon. Member: Where will we get the money?

Mr. Stanfield: You will get more from the retailer than you will from the wholesaler.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That the following excise taxes be reduced from 35 per cent to 10 per cent, namely the excise taxes on: (a) trunks, suitcases, bags, and luggage of all kinds; (b) ash trays, tobacco pipes, and smokers' accessories; and (c) fountain pens, propelling pencils, and desk accessories.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): In discussing this resolution, what explanation has the parliamentary assistant for the continuation of the excise tax of 10 per cent on necessities such as trunks, bags and luggage of all kinds? Is the ordinary sales tax imposed on these items and the 10 per cent excise tax superimposed? What consideration, if any, is being given to the extra competition of manufacturers of these articles because of the 20 per cent depreciation of sterling? I refer to goods from the sterling area, which are imposing unfair competition on manufacturers to whom I refer. I am pleased indeed that the senior member for Halifax agreed with my statement. He referred to the Christie Trunk and Bag Company in my constituency. They have been carrying on for many years, from small beginnings and have expanded to a considerable extent. They are producing stable commodities and have been able to compete with any like production in Canada. They are having imposed upon them this unfair tax of 10 per cent. I repeat that they are manufacturing a necessity to every person in this house and to every home in Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member's first question was why this tax is continued at all. I think I have already given the reason. We must secure the revenue necessary. It is quite true that luggage is not a luxury. It is a necessity to many people, but it is not as necessary as housing material and food. They are in the totally exempt class.

The second question was whether the sales tax is imposed. Yes, the sales tax is imposed on all articles carrying the excise tax. The excise tax is an extra tax but it is not superimposed. They are parallel taxes.

The third question was in regard to British competition. These luggage manufacturers have had—and they are the first to admit it—very substantial aid this year, in the reduction of this 35 per cent tax down to 10 per cent. This has given them a 25 per cent margin.

The second point, so far as British competition is concerned, is that to my memory every party in the house has given lip service at least to encouraging British imports and putting them on a more competitive basis. But the moment a British import is put on a more competitive basis we are then asked from certain quarters for a change in the tariff. Our Canadian manufacturers are getting a 25 per cent benefit because of the cut in the tax, and they should be able to compete with the British. We are giving the British entry, but we have at this time to give the British manufacturers better entry into Canada so we can sell our wheat, lumber and fish.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I object to this tax. As the parliamentary assistant has said, we are in favour of giving all the encouragement we can to importations from Great Britain. But, speaking for myself, and I believe for many members in the House of Commons, that must not be done at the cost of closing Canadian industries which have been in existence in Canada for many years.

This 35 per cent tax was a war tax, and we shall agree it was a necessity. The war tax should now be removed entirely. If the government is going to remove 25 of the 35 per cent tax, what justification is there for continuing the 10 per cent? Why should it not all be removed? If it was a war tax, then I say the time has long since passed when the entire tax should be removed.

With that in mind I am going to offer an amendment—and I am going to ask my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, to second it. I have not had the opportunity of seeing him. However he has expressed himself definitely in the house—and I presume this committee is sitting now to review the representations made by the parliamentary assistant to the minister. If our representations mean anything, then surely they mean that we have the right to express ourselves.

On that basis I am going to move:

That section 3 be amended by removing the excise tax on trunks, suit cases, bags and luggage of all kinds, and that subsections (b) and (c) be renumbered (a) and (b).

I have not had the consent of the senior member for Halifax, but—

Mr. Fulton: Ask the junior member, then.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Yes, perhaps the junior member—because they generally work together. His great-grandfather, one of the fathers of confederation, came from my constituency. I am sure he will have some interest in the welfare of the county of Cumberland, where his great-grandfather and his grandfather had such famous careers.

Mr. Sinclair: I would refer you, Mr. Chairman, to citation 556 in Beauchesne, which states that a committee has not the right to diminish taxation. The house has the right, provided the house at the time suggests an alternative source of revenue in the amount of the tax removed. Citation 556 at page 165 of the second edition very clearly sets out that there is no power in the committee to diminish taxation.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): According to the parliamentary assistant, we are impotent here. We might as well retire and allow the government in this country to be carried on by order in council. That is what we are reduced to.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member could vote down the entire resolution, if it does not please him and his party, or alternatively, when we are in the house, with Mr. Speaker in the chair, and considering the bill, he could vote out that particular section.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Notwithstanding what the parliamentary assistant has said, I believe every hon. member in the house is in agreement with the stand I have taken. I would like to see them given the opportunity to express themselves.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Well, they are subservient then, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of privilege, the hon. member must withdraw the remark that hon. members sitting to his right are subservient.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I withdraw it if there are some here going to object, but everyone knows what I mean.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I resent very much that remark, and I do not think the hon. member meant to say what he said. I am amazed that an hon. gentleman of his experience should rise in his place and continually suggest that this tax be reduced. He knows very well that we are paying an extra $35 million or $40 million in interest on our increased debt due to the war. When he suggests that we ought to abolish all these taxes surely he has not given the matter sufficient thought.

I have a very high regard for his intelligence. I should like to make it clear that there are manufacturers in my riding who have difficulties to contend with, and they would like to have excise taxes removed. I have never felt however that in a matter of this kind we should speak for any one individual manufacturer.

Mr. Carroll: Mr. Chairman, had the amendment offered by the hon. member for Cumberland been in order I should have had much pleasure in seconding it, for the purpose of striking out subsection (a) of section 3. While this tax is legal, and all that sort of thing, it is not a fair tax upon the consumers of this country. When the time comes I may attempt to find out from the government how they could strike out subsection (a) and also strike out or amend section 9, where the tax on wine is reduced from 50 cents to 25 cents per gallon. There is a luxury, Mr. Chairman, where I believe the extra tax might be obtained by leaving the excise tax on wine as it is at the present time.

Mr. Sinclair: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: I might tell the hon. member for Cumberland that he has not sent his motion to me, and that unless the motion is put from the Chair it is not before the committee.

Mr. Carroll: I did not second it because I understood it was out of order.

Mr. Sinclair: It is.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Then I would like to know if you will acept this amendment, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to have the support of the senior member for Halifax. I would ask him, in his absence, if he would second it—and I hope that he will.

An hon. Member: Is he subservient too?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): No, he is not subservient to the same extent as some of the others. However, I appreciate having the support of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond. I should like very much to have this motion submitted to the house by the Chairman. I shall ask the page boy to take it to him so that he may read it and rule upon it formally. If it is ruled out of order now, then I shall have to take an opportunity at some other stage during the passage of this legislation to make a motion deleting this tax.

Mr. Isnor: As the hon. member for Cumberland for some reason or other has brought my name into this matter—and I am sure that perhaps on the advice of his leader he was well advised in endeavouring to bring me into it—

An hon. Member: Suck you in.

Mr. Isnor: I quite appreciate the position in which the hon. member is endeavouring to place me, but I do not acknowledge it at all. I was called out of the chamber for a moment. However, if you, Mr. Chairman, would be good enough to allow me to read it I could then say whether I could support it.

Mr. Mutch: It is not yet before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: I would tell the hon. member that a seconder is not necessary in committee.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. Knight: If paragraph (a) is struck out will that not mean that the present tax remains?

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment reads:

That section 3 be amended by removing the excise tax on trunks, suitcases, bags, and luggage of all kinds, and that subsections (b) and (c) be renumbered (a) and (b).

Mr. Sinclair: I repeat my point, that this is clearly out of order. I would refer hon. members to citations 552 and 556 of Beauchesne's second edition, and also May's twelfth edition. I quote the pertinent part of citation 552 as follows:

Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government.

If an hon. member moves to reduce the tax revenue, then he must propose a tax that will bring in an equivalent revenue. Obviously the purpose of the rule is to prevent the opposition gleefully moving for the abolition of all taxes. Under the rules they must propose an alternative tax in order to give the government the same revenue.

The Deputy Chairman: I think citation 552 quoted by the parliamentary assistant is somewhat pertinent to the amendment before the house. As this is an interesting point which has come up for the first time since I have been in the chair, I should like to study it and would suggest that the resolution stand and I will rule upon this matter later on.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That is quite agreeable, but first I should like the parliamentary assistant to tell us what revenue is expected to accrue under paragraph (a).

Mr. Sinclair: The previous revenue was approximately $6 million; it is expected there will be a loss of revenue of $4 million; therefore, it is expected that the revenue under this item will be about $2 million.

Resolution stands.

Resolution 4 agreed to.

5. That the sales tax on the following articles be repealed: lactose; malt syrup except when sold for beverage purposes; diesel powered self-propelled trucks, mounted on rubber tired wheels, for off highway use exclusively at mines and quarries, and complete parts thereof.

Mr. Knight: I should like to protest against ice cream still being taxable. This is food, it is not a luxury item. This tax is directed at the nickels of the children. I think ice cream is a much more wholesome food for children than gum or candy, the tax on which has been removed. Ice cream is a by-product of the dairy industry and there is likely to be a surplus in this industry before very long, particularly in view of the increased rents that are to be charged under which people will not have as much money to spend for food. I protest this tax on ice cream and ask the parliamentary assistant to tell the committee what revenue he expects to derive from it and to make some general comments on the situation.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to supplement what has been said by the hon. member for Saskatoon. Ice cream is important as far as the dairy industry is concerned and it has always been classed as a food. It is used as a food in hospitals and by children and it seems to me that this tax is most unfair to the dairy industry which, as all hon. members know, has received some very hard knocks. Margarine is now in competition with butter, which places an added burden on the dairy farmers. I submit that this matter should be considered carefully by the committee.

As far as the farmers of my section of the country are concerned, they depend almost entirely on dairy products for their living. I have received a number of telegrams from the dairy interests in my constituency requesting that this tax be removed and I hope the parliamentary assistant will be able to give us some encouragement in this regard.

Mr. Sinclair: This matter has been referred to by many hon. members. As far as dairy products are concerned, milk and butter are classed as staple foods and they are not subject to either sales tax or excise tax.

Mr. Brooks: But not ice cream.

Mr. Sinclair: Forty-six per cent of the ice cream sold in Canada is sold in the form of cones. Another large but undetermined percentage is sold in the form of sundaes and dishes of ice cream, and a substantial percentage is sold in the form of bricks for use in the home as a dessert. As the hon. member has said, ice cream is in competition with candies and chocolates and chewing gum. Candy, chocolates and chewing gum used to be subject to a thirty per cent excise tax as well as the eight per cent sales tax. At that time ice cream sold in the form of cones enjoyed the protection of that thirty per cent. That thirty per cent tax has now been removed entirely and all these confections are now on the same level as ice cream, all being subject to the eight per cent sales tax.

I turn now to the comparatively small fraction of the ice cream production that is sold as a food to be used as a dessert. All foodstuffs are not exempt from the eight per cent sales tax. All staple foodstuffs are exempt from this tax, but desserts such as gelatine preparations commonly used in the Canadian household are not exempt. Therefore ice cream when used as a dessert is on exactly the same footing with these other forms of desserts.

The situation today with regard to ice cream sold in the form of ice cream cones and desserts is that it no longer enjoys the preferential position it used to have in relation to chocolates, pop, candy and chewing gum.

Mr. Graydon: May I move away from a subject of low temperature to one which I think hon. friends will find to be of a somewhat higher temperature, particularly among those who have from time to time discussed the conditions under which the weekly newspapers of Canada operate at the present time. No doubt the parliamentary assistant has before him, or should have before him, the brief of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association arising out of their annual meeting at Niagara Falls nearly a year ago, one of the resolutions of which found its way to the desk of the Minister of Finance some time earlier this year. Unfortunately it did not seem to carry as much weight with the minister as one would have expected when he was preparing his budget last spring and again this fall. I think therefore it is only fit and proper that the committee should know the position which the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, with its many members across Canada, is facing at the present time with regard to the sales tax on newsprint.

Perhaps I could not do better than to read to the committee parts of the brief because it is short, and one which I think ought to be commended because of its clarity and the convincing arguments that it contains. The members of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, which represents no less than 564 weekly newspapers in Canada, no small number as the parliamentary assistant will readily admit, decided that representations should be made to the federal government requesting that the 8 per cent tax on newsprint should be abolished. The basis for that request is set out in clear and concise fashion. I think the committee and the government would do well to ponder the matter because it seems to me the arguments in favour of their presentation are very powerful. The brief reads in part:

1. The tax does not apply to Canadian or American magazines, circulated in Canada, and competing with weekly newspapers in the national advertising field.

In other words, there is discrimination of a clear character there.

2. Comic books, certain week-end papers, pulp and fiction magazines printed in Canada (containing advertising) are exempt.

That is also discrimination.

3. Radio broadcasting facilities, also a powerful competitor in the advertising field, are exempt from this tax.

Still another instance of discrimination.

4. A survey of prices paid for newsprint by member publishers in various parts of Canada indicates an unjust inequality in the amount of taxes collected on a unit of one ton of newsprint.

5. In each of the foregoing there is an element of discrimination which this association feels can be eliminated only by exempting newsprint used in the publication of weekly newspapers from this tax.

The brief goes on to illustrate the inequality of tax paid by publishers in various parts of Canada. They point out that the basic price of $96 per ton, which was the price at the time the brief was prepared earlier this year, applies only to purchases of carload quantities in roll form. They go on to point out, I think with a good deal of accuracy, that:

Weekly newspaper publishers, except in rare instances, purchase their supplies in one- to five-ton quantities in flat sheets at a considerably higher price. The following scale of prices from different provinces indicates the variances—

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will be interested in all the examples, but perhaps particularly in two of them. They are:

	Cost per ton	Eight per cent tax per ton
Port Alberni, B.C.	$130.00	$10.40
Revelstoke, B.C.	149.00	11.92
High River, Alta.	183.00	14.64
Wolseley, Sask.	184.00	14.72
Grenfell, Sask.	196.00	15.68
St. James, Man.	180.00	14.40
Altona, Man.	170.00	13.60
Amherstburg, Ont.	111.50	8.92
Lachute, Que.	132.00	10.56
Granby, Que.	143.36	11.46
Sackville, N.B.	137.00	10.96
Springhill, N.S.	127.00	10.16

That gives a general picture across Canada as it affects those who attend from time to time the meetings of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association. The brief then goes on to say:

This wide range of price is caused in the main by the variety of page size used and the fact that costs, in addition to the basic roll ton rate, are created by the operations of cutting and packing and the cost of handling through paper wholesalers instead of direct from the mill. Nevertheless it does seem that the tax on a ton of newsprint should be the same whether purchased in rolls or sheets. The publisher cannot pass on the extra costs in the form of additional charges to his subscribers.

Because it was recognized that newspapers could not pass on this sales tax to the ultimate consumer the dominion government has given newspapers relief from the tax in previous years.

Up until 1931 an exemption of one-half the tax was allowed. In 1931 the full tax was imposed and accepted by Canadian newspapers because they recognized that such action was necessary to help correct a serious deficit in the federal budget.

In conclusion we would point out that Canada is the only country in the commonwealth in which a sales tax is charged on newsprint and that there are no federal taxes on Canadian newsprint sold in the United States.

Whatever in this may be unpalatable to the government, here is something they will enjoy. The brief continues:

We submit that the reasons for imposing the present tax in 1931 are completely invalid in 1949, at the peak of employment and prosperity—

I want the parliamentary assistant to seize upon that.

—and with a large surplus in the federal budget.

In view of the foregoing, the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association pray the government to remove the sales tax levied upon the paper on which newspapers are published.

I want to commend to the government favourable consideration of the brief that has been submitted by the weekly newspapers association. They have presented it in a concise and brief form. It has been put before the minister in a way that I think the government would like to have most briefs presented, concise and factual, and at the same time not in a vein particularly critical of the policy of the government.

I only rise at this time to place their position on the record so that the government may have an opportunity to consider favourably what I think is something that affects a most important section of the Canadian people, the men and women who publish week by week the important news which reaches the eyes of weekly subscribers from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to return to a subject upon which I started to speak a few moments ago, and that is the portable irrigation sprinkler systems now used extensively on farms in western Canada. When I attempted to raise this subject under section 2, the parliamentary assistant said it was entirely a sales tax that applied to them, but I still believe that is incorrect judging by the amount of tax which was collected. I know that two of these sprinkler systems were purchased by adjoining farmers. The cost was approximately $3,000. On that, they had to pay tariff charges of $300 and taxes of approximately $700, making a total of approximately $1,000 in taxes or tariff charges.

These sprinkler systems will be increasingly used, particularly in any of the dry areas of western Cananda in which water is available either in dugouts, deep wells, streams or such sources of supply. The use of them avoids a lot of the difficulties inherent in the regular irrigation systems. It avoids the necessity of levelling the land and putting in irrigation ditches. A lot of the land is too hilly for ordinary irrigation systems. By means of this sprinkler system, the water can be taken out of the ditch and put on any of the land that is fit for cultivation.

As I say, these systems have already been used in the last year or two to a considerable extent. In the future, they are likely to be used a great deal. For tariff purposes, excise and sales tax purposes, I believe these sprinkler systems should be considered as farm machinery. Since they have not been used extensively so far, they have not been included in the appropriate item as farm machinery. Instead of that these systems are classified along with pipe, pumps and things of that sort for tariff, excise and sales tax purposes. Some time ago I brought this matter up during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and requested that this type of equipment be considered when the budget resolutions were being drafted. I would ask again that that be done, and that the parliamentary assistant introduce an amendment under the appropriate item removing the tax on this type of equipment.

Looking over schedule III to which the parliamentary assistant referred yesterday, which sets up the materials exempt from sales tax or excise tax, I see items such as baling twine for baling farm produce, drain tiles for agricultural purposes, gopher poison, grain or seed cleaning machines and parts thereof. This type of equipment is going to be much more important so far as increasing the food production of this country is concerned. It will increase the production of grain and will be important to the livestock which is fed on that grain. It certainly seems to me that a change should be made and the tax removed from this equipment.

Although there are no tariff changes mentioned at this time, I believe the tariffs should be amended to admit these sprinkler systems duty free. These systems are not made in Canada now, but I hope they will be soon. It is true that the aluminum pipe which is used is made in Canada to some extent, but the supply has not been sufficient to enable people to equip themselves with it, and as a result most of it comes from the United States. I do hope the parliamentary assistant will make a statement about that.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Calgary East in his request for consideration of these sprinkler systems. One of the P.F.R.A. officials said in Regina some months ago that this new type of irrigation may revolutionize agriculture in western Canada. Not only do I believe the government should cease to tax it, but I believe the minister should, if at all possible, make it easier for the farmers to obtain that equipment from the United States. As I understand it, today there is more or less of an embargo upon it in order to save United States dollars. This makes it almost impossible to secure that equipment. I should like to give my heartiest support to what the member for Calgary East has said.

Mr. Wright: I should like to say a word about this matter. Really, it is more important than it may appear to many of the members in the house. Many of the irrigation projects in western Canada, especially those with small dams, make it very difficult to irrigate the land by gravity. If sprinkler systems were obtainable, it would mean that a larger portion of the land could be irrigated.

People who have not lived in the drought areas of western Canada will find it difficult to realize just what it means to a farmer in that area to be able to irrigate a small garden, or a field, to have fodder for his stock. This system might increase the areas that could be successfully irrigated by means of these small projects. I urge the government, therefore, to give serious consideration to trying to make cheaper sprinkling systems available.

Mr. Shaw: While I agree with the representations that have been made by the three previous speakers, it is about another matter that I should like to speak at this time. It is my understanding that, when provincial governments purchase articles which would normally bear this 8 per cent sales tax, the tax is paid by the provincial government but later remitted by the federal government. In my opinion, it is quite proper that one government should not tax another government. What is forgotten, evidently, is that there is a third level of government in Canada, namely the municipal government.

The municipal government, within its sphere of activity, is much more important to the Canadian people than any other level of government. In fact, this government is closer to the people and affects their daily activities to a greater extent. While provincial governments enjoy the remission of sales tax on commodities which are not to be resold, the municipality is not in the same position. Today, municipalities are building better roads, which necessitates the use of modern, heavy equipment. This equipment is costing a tremendous amount of money, and the sales tax, being based on the cost, is also running very high. My personal view is that it would be extremely difficult to advance a sound argument against extending to the municipalities the same consideration that is now extended to the provincial government, namely, the remission of the sales tax on equipment which must necessarily be bought and used in connection with their operations on the roads.

I urge upon the parliamentary assistant that he impress upon the minister the necessity of giving this matter early and serious consideration. I might add that these municipalities are penalized in a second way in that this road-building equipment is classed as industrial equipment for tariff purposes. I intended to bring that up when we were considering tariffs. I would urge the parliamentary assistant not to let this matter die because it is of extreme importance. It would eliminate a degree of discrimination between one level of government in Canada and another.

Mr. Fair: I should like to support the plea that has been made by the member for Red Deer. I may say that at the last session I brought the same difficulty to light, but was not successful in having the requests of two or three town councils in my constituency granted. Since the member for Red Deer has brought up the question, I should like to support the appeal he has made. As to the case that was made by the hon. member for Calgary East, supported by the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Melville, I also want to express my hope that the government will do something in that regard. As they have pointed out, up to the present time we have not enjoyed many of the benefits of irrigation, and for that reason have not needed the irrigation systems that have been spoken of. In the interests of Canadian agriculture and Canadian consumers as a whole, I believe the government would do well to grant the request made by those hon. members.

Mr. Sinclair: The observations made by the hon. members will be carefully considered by the government. The reason why they may not have been included up to now may be the one pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary East, that this is a new type of irrigation; although I recall seeing some of these sprinkler systems in the Okanagan valley in British Columbia. The schedule gives considerable concessions to farm equipment. I do not doubt that the representations of the hon. members will be carefully considered, and I am quite sure that the Minister of Agriculture will add his word to those already spoken.

Mr. Ferrie: On behalf of those in the north, in the areas that are just coming under cultivation, I wish to say a few words with regard to this big machinery for municipalities. This big machinery is something that the individual cannot very well take hold of. The municipalities are taking hold of this machinery and are clearing land and putting it under cultivation. When they buy this machinery worth from $9,000 up to $30,000 they have to pay the 8 per cent because the municipality buys it. I should like to see that sales tax taken off that machinery just as the sales tax is taken off farm machinery because it is for farm work.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to thank the parliamentary assistant for his remarks and for saying that the government will give consideration to removing the sales tax or whatever taxes there are—I think there are some excise taxes also—and the tariffs on this sprinkler irrigation equipment. I do not see, however, why there need be any delay in doing that. I should like to request that, before we finish with these resolutions, some consideration be given to the matter and that if at all possible the tax concession be brought in at this session. Before we get around to passing resolutions in the next session of parliament, there will probably be people who will have to be buying these things. It will possibly be well on in the spring or summer before we are back at this sort of business and when there will be any further opportunity to put into effect these tax concessions. As I say, it is likely to be too late for a considerable number of people. In many cases it would mean that the price of this equipment would be beyond their means and they would not be able to buy it whereas, if this tax were off, they would be able to do so. As I indicated in this one case, the tax and tariff combined amounted to more than 25 per cent of the total cost. That would mean that some people will not be able to buy this equipment and as a result would lose crops which they might otherwise save. Therefore I think it is urgent that consideration should be given to this matter at this session, and that these concessions should be made at this session, in the interests of dry-land farming and also in the interests of food production.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I understand that gasoline shovels are not manufactured in Canada. In our part of the country they are an essential implement in the building of roads and for the general development of the country. If these machines are not made in Canada, it seems unfair that a tariff should be levied on those that are brought in from outside. I understand that there is one factory in Canada which produces a certain gasoline shovel, but that it is not suitable for the work in our particular part of the country. Therefore a greatly added cost is placed upon road building and the development of the country.

Mr. Thatcher: Are hospitals, when they make purchases, at present exempted from sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: Hospitals which are approved by the various provincial governments are exempted.

Mr. Thatcher: That brings me to one point to which I should like to draw the minister's attention. In my constituency we have an old age home, in which there are about fifty people who ordinarily would be in the hospital owing to the fact that their health is so bad. But there is no room for them in the hospital. Therefore they have to be put in this home for the aged. The sisters there are having great financial difficulties in keeping those people there. They are obliged to make major purchases from time to time. Just recently they had to purchase an elevator in order to move these old age pensioners from the third floor down to the first floor; that elevator cost them $1,200 and they had to pay sales tax on it. On all their purchases they are having to pay this sales tax.

The point I should like to make is this. If the government is exempting hospitals from this sales tax, would it not be possible also to exempt from it institutions such as orphanages, homes for the aged and the like? Perhaps it is not feasible to do so, but it seems reasonable to me that, when they make a request of that kind, it should be considered; and I should greatly appreciate receiving an answer from the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Sinclair: I can assure the hon. member that careful consideration has been given to the matter. One reason why careful consideration has been given to it is that the minister himself has in the heart of his own riding one of the largest of these homes for the aged. The difficulty, of course, comes in drawing the line. There is no difficulty with regard to hospitals because they are certified as hospitals by the various provincial governments. But as to the institutions referred to, it is difficult to know where to draw the line between convalescent homes, nursing homes, orphanages, homes for old age pensioners and the like. At the moment it has been possible to give this concession only to hospitals. It was not given in this budget but rather in a previous one. I can assure the hon. member that active consideration is being given to the next groups; that is, those groups of charitable institutions.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I see that the sales tax is being repealed on diesel-powered trucks for use off the highway, if they are used at mines and quarries. Do I understand that the logging industry already enjoys this advantage with regard to diesel-powered trucks and that now we are just adding mines and quarries to the schedule?

Mr. Sinclair: It has been extended to mines and quarries if the trucks are not used on the public highway.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The logging industry already enjoys it.

Mr. Knight: I should like to bring the discussion back for one more moment to the subject which I had broached; that was the taxation on ice cream. The parliamentary assistant's reply was perhaps more ingenious than logical, and he omitted to answer the one question which I asked, namely, what revenue the tax on that particular commodity brought in. I do not know what he is going to tell me; but whatever it is, I do not think it will be justified having regard to the hardship that it will create for the children who buy the ice cream and for the dairy people around my city, for instance. A great many farmers in my constituency make their living, as a matter of fact, from the delivery of milk to the various dairies in Saskatoon, where the commodity is turned into ice cream and then shipped out. It is an important industry not only to the children in the community but to many of their parents as well. I hope the parliamentary assistant will give me that information.

Mr. Wright: Before the minister replies, I should like to say a word on this matter. According to all the reports we read in the press today, we are accumulating larger and larger surpluses of dairy products. Just yesterday in the local papers it was reported that some 73 million pounds of butter was being held in cold storage. We have large quantities of powdered and condensed milk and some 14 million pounds of cheese. Ice cream is an outlet for some of our dairy products which are accumulating in cold storage today. The government should give serious consideration to trying to provide a home market because we have lost our British market for powdered and condensed milk and many other dairy products. Surely we should be building up our home market.

To bring this thing to a head I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon:

> That section 5 be amended to add ice cream to the articles on which sales tax is removed and that an amount of sales tax be added to the present sales tax on wines and spirituous liquors that will equal any revenue loss to the government as a result of this amendment.

I believe it is necessary to provide some other revenue that will equal the loss of any revenue which the government may sustain.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this amendment is out of order for the same reason that the last one was. In my view an hon. member cannot just make a blanket suggestion that we increase the tax on wines and spirituous liquors. He will have to make a specific recommendation for an increase in the form of this resolution, an increase of so much on wine, so much on tobacco and so much on spirits. If he puts it in that form I am sure he will be in order.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the citation?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Citation 552.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should refer hon. members to citation 552 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, which is citation 500 of the third edition. It reads as follows:

> Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance,—

And so on. It seems to me that by this motion the hon. member is trying to do what is required by the citation I have just read. I agree with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance that it is not enough to make a blanket suggestion. The hon. member does not even know how much revenue may be yielded by the suggested amendment. To comply with the requirements of citation 552 he cannot simply say that this tax be removed and be replaced by another tax that will yield as much revenue. Therefore, in my opinion, the motion is out of order, and I so rule.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant—

Mr. Wright: On a matter of privilege, before you proceed—

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Who has the floor?

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the hon. member is raising a question of privilege.

Mr. Wright: Yes. The parliamentary assistant said that my amendment included tobacco. It does not. It mentions only wines and spirituous liquors.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Under resolution 9, what gallonage of wine is taxed and what revenue is produced? The resolution reads:

> That the excise tax on wines containing not more than 7 per cent of proof spirit be reduced from 50 cents per gallon to 25 cents per gallon.

The Chairman ruled my amendment to resolution 3 out of order, and allowed the resolution to stand. Just what increase would be required to produce $2 million of revenue which the parliamentary assistant said would accrue from the tax on trunks, suitcases, bags and luggage of all kinds?

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is perhaps quite right in referring to resolution 9 at this time. The actual loss in revenue through cutting the tax in half on wine of less than 7 per cent proof spirit is, according to the information, negligible, because almost all the domestic wines are of more than 7 per cent alcoholic content. They are under 40 per cent. I am sure the hon. member will be interested to know that this resolution is proposed expressly at the request of some apple growers of Nova Scotia to help to provide them with an outlet for their unsaleable apples. Be that as it may, the amount of revenue involved in resolution 9 is negligible.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should remind the committee that we are dealing with resolution 5. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, I should like to concur in many of the things that have been said by hon. members who have spoken on the repeal of the sales tax on heavy machinery used by the rural municipalities. The municipalities in western Canada have been using these big machines not only for breaking land and constructing roads but also to construct dugouts and small stock-watering dams for individual farmers. By so doing we are endeavouring to get them away from strictly grain growing and into more diversified farming. That is something that the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities have asked for, for a good many years. I hope that the government will give due consideration to the repeal of this tax on heavy machinery.

Mr. Fulton: At this point I should like to make an appeal for consideration to be given, in next year's budget, to the repeal of the sales tax on medical equipment. I appreciate that resolutions, once prepared and introduced in the house, are rarely if ever changed in the year of their introduction. Therefore I would direct my remarks in support of a request that this matter be given most earnest consideration to see if it cannot be contained in next year's budget. I have here a bulky file which comes from a gentleman who suffers from cancer. He uses equipment which can only be imported from the United States. It is specialized equipment and is made only in that country. Not only is a duty charged on that equipment but there is in addition the 8 per cent sales tax on top of the price, plus the duty. He has given me a sample of the way in which it works out. He had to buy specially made surgical dressings. The retail price was $11. The duty of 20 per cent added $2.20, making the price $13.20. On top of that was charged a sales tax of 8 per cent, not on the purchase price of $11, but on the purchase price, plus duty, of $13.20. The sales tax came to $1.06. Therefore the total price was $14.26 instead of $11. I suppose it is difficult to draw a distinction between medical equipment which must be used in serious cases and medical equipment on which it might be said it was proper to charge some form of revenue tax. I feel it is not a job beyond the potentialities of this department. Certainly people who are suffering from serious diseases such as cancer should not have to pay sales tax on the purchase of equipment without the use of which they could not exist.

Hon. members know what happens when cancer affects internal organs. In order to get about at all the sufferer has to have these expensive and complicated appliances. He virtually has to have them in order to go on living, and it seems to me that type of equipment should not be subject to sales tax.

While I am speaking about sales tax I would go further and ask that consideration be given in next year's budget to changing the tariff structure so that similar items which have to be imported from the United States, because they are not made in Canada, might not be subject to duty. I have had correspondence with the Department of National Revenue in the matter, and it is agreed that the type of equipment I have in mind is not made in Canada and can be secured only from the United States. As I have pointed out, it is subject to a tariff charge of 20 per cent.

In my correspondence with the Department of National Revenue it is pointed out by them that the tariff regulations now make it imperative that they charge the duty, that there is no alternative, and that the only way the situation can be adjusted is by a change in the tariff regulations through the budget resolutions. As no such action is contemplated in this year's budget, it is not open to me to move a resolution because there is no heading under which I could do so. I do take this opportunity however to urge the most sympathetic consideration of the plight of these people who have to obtain expensive medical appliances from the United States, without which they virtually could not live. I urge that this and similar types of equipment be relieved from duty and sales tax. Would the parliamentary assistant give us at least the undertaking that the matter will be seriously considered before the next budget is brought down.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the hon. member for Kamloops was just unfortunate in the item he chose to exemplify his point in his argument. However, I presume he is referring to a colostomy pad, an absorption pad used for a certain type of patient suffering from cancer of the lower bowel. I am sure there is no necessity of going to the United States to procure an absorption pad. There may be some other items the hon. member has in mind and to which he has not referred; but I do not think it is wise to rise in one's place and suggest the removal of duty from articles just because someone fancies that he receives a better article in the United States.

Let me give an example in this connection. I was called out on a very stormy day during the winter to see a patient who, it was reported, was very ill. I drove all day in a blizzard, and was stuck many times so that I had to get farm teams to pull me out. Finally I arrived, to find that the man had arthritis deformans. He was crippled, and lying in bed, but in addition he was dying from cancer of the larynx.

I advised them that the only thing they could do was to keep the poor patient comfortable under a sedative which his physician had already prescribed. However, I had no sooner left than an insurance salesman came along and said, "You should not have called that fellow in. My advice is much better. I had an uncle down in Iowa in just the same condition this man is in, and we got him an electric suit. Get one of those."

Those people were too poor to pay for my trip, but somehow or other they procured an electric suit at a cost of $125, upon which duty, taxes and everything else had to be paid. They put that poor patient in the electric suit—boots, hood and all—only to find that there was no electricity on the farm to plug it into.

I would submit that some of the suggestions we have heard today have been given just as much thought as was given to the condition of that patient and to the equipment for his treatment.

Mr. Fulton: With the details of the hon. member's medical practice I am of course not familiar; but I rather fancy that upon reflection he would not wish it to be understood, from any remarks he has made, that he has no sympathy for those in this country who, because no suitable apparatus is manufactured in Canada, are compelled to rely upon articles imported from the United States. I am sure he did not wish hon. members to draw that inference from his remarks. I am sure that one in his position, with his knowledge of the suffering of some of these people whose lives could be made more comfortable by the use of appliances made only in the United States, would support the request I had made—which was not for a general and sweeping removal of the tariff items on all articles, whether they are made in Canada or not, but was confined to the removal of tariff items on these surgical and other appliances which must be worn by sufferers from cancer, and which are not made in this country.

Correspondence I have received is to the effect that this particular type of equipment is not made in Canada, and in this particular case it is the only type which would bring relief to the sufferer.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, may I correct any false impression I may have left. I do not think I gave the impression that I was unsympathetic to sufferers. I am sure my young friend, who was with me overseas, knows that I am sympathetic to those who suffer, and that I looked after them to the best of my ability.

I think he also knows that the item he has cited is an unfortunate one, because it can easily be obtained in this country.— I will add that the treatment of cancer is just as advanced in this country as anywhere else, and that those who suffer from cancer are not being neglected. I want that clearly understood. We have in my city of Regina the most advanced cancer clinic on this continent, and the people there are not suffering from neglect.

If the hon. member would take the trouble to consult physicians and hospitals to find out from them what items would make the lives of these people easier, I would be the first to second a motion to have duty on such items removed. But I resent the implication that I am not sympathetic to the suffering.

The Deputy Chairman: May I express the hope that from now on the discussion may be more relevant to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Calgary East pointed out that certain equipment was necessary for purposes of irrigation in western Canada. My understanding was that this equipment might almost revolutionize agriculture. We spend large sums of money to subsidize western agriculture. The hon. member suggested that there was a shortage of this equipment which appears to be composed of aluminum pipe. We have in this country one of the greatest aluminum industries on the North American continent.

Inasmuch as this is a new field, and the manufacturing of this requirement would pave the way for a new industry, does the parliamentary assistant not feel that the government would effect a large saving in subsidies paid to agriculture by developing an industry of this kind which could meet these requirements in Canada? Instead of sending our raw aluminum to the United States where it is used for their purposes, with a dribble coming back here as they see fit, an industry should be established in this country to use our own raw materials. If that were done it would eliminate all this question of tariffs and taxes. Would the parliamentary assistant comment on that?

Mr. Sinclair: I do not think that this matter comes under the Department of Finance, but I am quite sure that if this new equipment, which apparently is being used so successfully in western Canada, reaches any real volume of sales it will not be very long before the industrialists of eastern Canada will be using Canadian aluminum to satisfy the demand. That is perhaps the only argument we have for the retention of such an item.

Mr. Wright: I do not believe the parliamentary assistant commented on the matter, which I raised a moment ago, of sales tax on heavy equipment used by municipalities. This is a rather important matter in western Canada where many of the municipalities are receiving grants under the P.F.R.A. to assist in the digging of dugouts, since they find that they require such equipment. Does the parliamentary assistant know whether the sales tax is rebated to the municipalities who buy this heavy equipment when it is used for P.F.R.A. purposes? A rebate is made to the provincial governments when they purchase this type of equipment and I should like to know if the municipalities receive a similar rebate.

Mr. Sinclair: The exemption of sales tax to the province is made to the crown in the right of the province. What is being asked now is a further concession to the provinces to be passed on to the municipalities, or perhaps a concession direct to the municipalities. At the present time no such concession is being granted in this budget. As far as any tariff changes are concerned, they would be considered when the tariff act is under discussion.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to go back to this matter of sales tax on surgical equipment. I am glad the hon. member for Regina City stated that there were no implications in his remarks such as I suggested there might have been.

Mr. McCusker: There was no implication in my remarks that I was not sympathetic to the patient and I want to ask the hon. member—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. McCusker: —to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the hon. member will permit me—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. When the Chairman is on his feet hon. members should resume their places. I understand that the hon. member for Kamloops indicated at the beginning of his remarks that he was glad to have it confirmed by the hon. member for Regina City that there was no doubt as to his being sympathetic toward sick people. I think the hon. member for Regina City should consider that as indicating that the hon. member for Kamloops is in complete agreement with him. That should settle the matter and I think we might go on now to discuss the resolution before the committee.

Mr. Fulton: There seems to be some conflict of opinion as to whether or not this equipment to which I referred was obtainable in Canada. Unfortunately I do not know anything about medical equipment, but my correspondent goes on to say:

> The apparatus which I have to use is, to the best of my knowledge, all manufactured in the States, and is all patented. The result is that I not only have to pay a very high price for it but must pay duty and sales tax as well.

I sent that letter to the Department of National Revenue with the particulars of the equipment concerned. In replying, the deputy minister did not state that this equipment or a suitable substitute was manufactured in Canada, which I should think would have been the first thing he would deal with. He concluded his letter as follows:

> As the department is required to collect duty on the various articles imported by your correspondent and possibly other persons in the same condition, in accordance with the regular provisions of the tariff, I can only suggest that any representations on the subject should be made to the commissioner of tariff, Department of Finance, Ottawa, that special provision be made in the tariff for free entry or lower rates of duty.

It is in accordance with that suggestion that I am making these representations. I submit that where an item can only be secured from outside Canada it should not be subject to duty or sales tax.

Mr. Sinclair: In the past the government has shown considerable sympathy toward the problem raised by the hon. member and I would refer him to items 476 to 480a of the tariff act which cover a great number of surgical and medical supplies which can be imported free of duty from the United States. Then there is a section in the Excise Act which exempts similar surgical and medical supplies from the sales tax. Then there are the further exemptions of sales tax on articles purchased for use in hospitals. As far as purchases by individuals are concerned, I think the hon. member will appreciate the difficulty there would be in deciding just what type of equipment should receive consideration. For example, I do not think he would suggest that patent medicines and nose drops and things like that should be exempt. I can only repeat that undoubtedly consideration will be given to the suggested changes in the tariff.

Mr. Ferrie: Would the item "diesel powered, self-propelled trucks" cover caterpillars?

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution applies to diesel powered self-propelled trucks, mounted on rubber tired wheels for off highway use exclusively at mines and quarries. I have never seen an ordinary mine truck equipped with rubber tires. This applies to the diesel trucks used in open mines and quarries.

Mr. Ferrie: I am referring to the caterpillar equipment that is used by municipalities for farm work.

Mr. Sinclair: That is exempted already under another item in the schedule which I have placed on Hansard. This is a new resolution extending the exemptions to the equipment used in mines and quarries.

Mr. Ferrie: By municipalities or farmers?

Mr. Sinclair: The answer is no.

Mr. Ferrie: We want this equipment exempted because the municipalities use it just the same as though it were used on a farm and they must pay the 8 per cent. Municipalities in northern Ontario, northern Saskatchewan, northern Manitoba and northern Alberta are breaking up thousands and thousands of acres of land with caterpillar trucks that never go off the land. That equipment wears out on the land and yet the municipalities must pay the 8 per cent sales tax. If you are going to take this off for the miner, it should be taken off for the farmer or the municipality.

Mr. Sinclair: If the equipment is for exclusive farm use it would be exempt under schedule III, but if the municipality uses the equipment for road building or other purposes, it is not exempt. The engine section of schedule III says that such tractors when used exclusively for farming are exempt.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman, because it is for a municipality they say we must pay on that machinery. That is the reason they will not allow us that deduction. We use it solely on the farm. The scrub cutter never goes off the farm, but it comes from the United States and we have to pay the 8 per cent sales tax on it. It cannot go on a road. It cannot be used anywhere else except on a farm. Because we are a municipality we have to pay that, and we should not have to pay it any more than the dominion government pays it.

Mr. Sinclair: The only answer I can give is the answer I have already given. If such equipment is used exclusively on a farm, irrespective of whether the owner is a farmer, municipality or corporation, it is exempt from sales tax.

Mr. Ferrie: No, not for a corporation.

Mr. Shaw: I believe we should have the matter cleared up. The parliamentary assistant to the minister asserts that on purchases for municipalities for use on farms the sales tax does not apply, but I can assure him that is not correct. If it is purchased by a municipality they pay the 8 per cent sales tax no matter what it is used for. What I am asking, what the hon. member who brought up the question is asking, and what hon. members in general are asking, is that the government take into consideration the removal of this tax, or at least that the municipality pay the tax and then have it remitted to it. That is now done for the provincial government. May I add that municipalities in my province, and I presume this is true of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and other provinces, are today taking over much of the work formerly done by the provincial government. That is a further reason why consideration should be extended to municipalities.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That the rates of excise tax on matches be amended from the present specific proportionate rate of tax on each package, to an ad valorem tax of 10 per cent.

7. That the present specific tax of 5 cents per pound on tires and tubes be amended to an ad valorem tax of 10 per cent.

8. That the sales tax on the following articles be repealed: liquid fuel for lighting or heating, but not including fuel when for use in internal combustion engines; crude oil to be used for the production of fuel.

9. That the excise tax on wines containing not more than 7 per cent of proof spirit reduced from 50 cents per gallon to 25 cents per gallon.

10. That paragraphs 1 to 7 shall have effect on and after March 23, 1949, and paragraphs 8 and 9 shall have effect on and after October 21, 1949.

Resolutions agreed to.

3. That the following excise taxes be reduced from 35 per cent to 10 per cent, namely, the excise taxes on: (a) trunks, suitcases, bags, and luggage of all kinds; (b) ash trays, tobacco pipes, and smokers' accessories; and (c) fountain pens, propelling pencils, and desk accessories.

The Deputy Chairman: We will now revert to section 3 which was allowed to stand. The hon. member for Cumberland moved an amendment which I shall read again. It reads as follows:

That section 3 be amended by removing the excise tax on trunks, suitcases, bags and luggage of all kinds, and that subsections (b) and (c) be renumbered (a) and (b).

[Mr. Ferrie.]

May I refer hon. members to citation 500 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition. I draw their attention to the last part of the citation which reads:

Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, . . .

The amendment does not propose another tax of equivalent amount, and therefore I declare it out of order.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Mayhew (for the Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT—INCOME TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:—

1. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the following shall be the exemptions from individual income tax:

(a) $2,000 in the case of a married person and persons allowed a deduction equivalent to that of a married person and $1,000 in the case of all other persons; and

(b) $400 in the case of dependents not eligible for family allowances, $150 in the case of children eligible for family allowances.

Mr. Fraser: Would the parliamentary assistant say what the loss to the government would have been if these exemptions had been raised to $2,400 for married persons and $1,400 for single?

Mr. Sinclair: I can give the figures for the exemptions at $1,250 and $2,500.

Mr. Fraser: That would be a help.

Mr. Sinclair: One hundred and forty million dollars.

Mr. Fraser: That is quite a lot of money.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the schedule of graduated rates for individual income tax be replaced by the following schedule:

On the first $1,000 of income or any portion thereof, 15 per cent per annum; or

$150 upon the income of $1,000; and 17 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $2,000; or

$16,160 upon the income of $40,000; and 55 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000; or

$67,910 upon the income of $125,000; and 70 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $125,000 and does not exceed $225,000; or

$137,910 upon the income of $225,000; and 75 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $225,000 and does not exceed $400,000; or

$269,160 upon the income of $400,000; and 80 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $400,000.

Mr. Fraser: I did want to ask if more consideration could not be given to parents who are putting boys and girls through university. During the summer these boys and girls work, but if their income amounts to $410 the parents are out of luck. It costs a lot of money to put a boy or a girl through college. Could some consideration be given to that?

Mr. Sinclair: The concession for boys or girls between the ages of 18 and 21, if attending university, is now set at $500. They are allowed extra income up to $500.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, there may be deducted from tax payable by an individual resident in Canada 10 per cent of the amount of his income that is from dividends on shares in a corporation resident in Canada that was liable to corporation tax in the taxation year: Provided that in the case of dividends deemed to have been received from a personal corporation the deduction shall only be 10 per cent of that part of the income deemed to have been received by the shareholder as a dividend that the income of the corporation derived from dividends is of the whole income of the corporation.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That, with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1949, the present rate of tax of 30 per cent shall be reduced to 10 per cent on the first $10,000 of income and increased to 33 per cent on income in excess of $10,000 with corresponding changes in the rates of consolidations.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That interest on unpaid taxes on incomes of the 1948 and subsequent taxation years for which no assessments have been issued will cease to accrue twelve months after the date for filing the return in place of twenty months.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That, for the year 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the business losses that may be deducted from income shall include losses sustained in the five years preceding and the year following the taxation year in the place of the three years preceding and the year following the taxation year.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That, for the purpose of computing income of the 1948 and subsequent taxation years of a member of the clergy or of a religious order or a regular minister of a religious denomination there may be deducted the value of the residence or other living accommodation enjoyed by him as such member or minister to the extent that it would otherwise be included in his income or the rent paid by him for or the fair rental value of such a residence or living accommodation.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to have some clarification of resolution No. 7 which has to do with computing the income for 1948 and subsequent taxation years for a member of the clergy or a religious order. I have received an inquiry from a minister of the United Church about this matter, and perhaps the parliamentary assistant could answer it. He asks whether it is the intention of the Minister of Finance that any ordained clergyman, irrespective of his duties in the church or outside the church, shall enjoy this exemption from taxation. In other words, do the words "a regular minister" mean any ordained minister or a minister in a charge? Some ministers are not in a charge, and that is one point this man raised.

There is another point I should like to raise. Provision is made for deduction of the value of the residence provided for the minister or rented by the minister, but what about a house that the minister owns? In many cities, ministers serving congregations own their own houses. This man suggests that such exemptions should be enlarged to include such cases.

Mr. Sinclair: The answer to the first question is that it is not necessary for the minister to have what is ordinarily referred to as a charge. He may be assisting a minister or doing general work, but so long as his full-time occupation is the ministry, then he is allowed this deduction. So far as the second point is concerned, a minister who owns his own home is allowed the equivalent of the rent he would have to pay if he were renting a house of that type.

Mr. Graydon: If a minister is in some work such as teaching in a college, or something which has to do with the religious denomination to which he is attached, does he come under the provisions the parliamentary assistant has just mentioned?

Mr. Sinclair: If, for example, he were secretary to a church council—is that what the hon. member is talking about? It would be full-time religious work, but not necessarily in charge of a congregation.

Mr. Graydon: I am thinking more particularly of a man who is teaching at the United Church college, who is a minister but is not engaged in ordinary ministerial work at the moment.

Mr. Sinclair: He would be regarded as a teacher rather than as a minister attending to full-time religious activities.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, on this specific question of exemptions for the clergy, I feel that these men who make a complete sacrifice of their entire lives should be taken from the income tax rolls entirely. They should not be taxed in any way, shape, or form. This brings up the question, however, of exemptions that are made for specific purposes. It is my contention that once a person falls within the income tax field, as I attempted to point out the other day, no exemptions whatever should be made because of his particular occupation or profession.

I feel that possibly my remarks on that subject were misconstrued the other day. Once we start making exemptions for any specific purpose, then we open up a vast field which would lead to difficulties in calculation that would render it almost impossible for the income tax department to carry out its function. Suppose exemptions were to be made, to cite a specific case, for professional fees or union dues. I might say that I have been in the labour movement for some time, and as a result of that I learned one very important principle; that no matter how much I differed with the principles that were involved in a particular matter, loyalty meant a great deal in obtaining things which I sought. Possibly that is something a good many of the members here have not had the opportunity of experiencing since they were not in the same happy position as I was.

I feel there should be no particular exemption made for a house or small expenses which may be incurred by members of the clergy, but my belief is these men should be removed entirely from the income tax roll.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, the members at this end could not hear whether or not you were passing certain items. There was quite a bit of noise. Would the minister answer a question relating to resolution No. 3, in regard to dividends which are in an estate. Do those dividends lose their identity?

Mr. Sinclair: I do not want to start the practice of reverting to items which have been carried. I point out that the member has one more opportunity of dealing with his point, and that is when the bill is before the house.

Mr. Fulton: I was on my feet; as a matter of fact, I was just coming through the curtain when resolution No. 5 was called and resolution No. 6 was called. When I got down to my seat, intending to speak on item No. 5, Mr. Chairman, you had called resolution No. 7. I do not know whether it would be permissible to revert to resolution No. 5, inasmuch as I was on my feet when resolution No. 5 was called, as I pointed out.

The Deputy Chairman: By leave of the committee, I think the hon. member should be granted permission to ask his question. But I should not like to have other members go back to resolutions which have been carried. It is now fifteen minutes past eight. If it is agreeable to the committee, I will permit the hon. member for Kamloops to ask his question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My question has to do with the practice, which came into effect this year for the first time, of the various income tax offices throughout the country issuing assessment notices under the heading "Assessment". Most hon. members and everyone throughout the country, I think, will recall that shortly after they sent in their payments on account of income tax this year they received a notice from their appropriate income tax office headed "Assessment". That fact gave rise to the impression that these were the final assessments of their taxes due for that year. It has now been drawn to our attention that these do not represent final assessments but, in effect, are no more than an acknowledgment of the receipt of the amount of tax paid with the taxpayer's own assessment form. My question therefore is this. If this is not a final assessment, does this not have a great bearing on the matter of interest penalty which a taxpayer may be called upon to pay if his own personal assessment, for any reason, happens to be incorrect? The impression given by the receipt of the notice is that the income tax office has assessed his return and has passed it as a final assessment. What is the position in that regard?

Mr. Sinclair: The actual assessment notice to which the hon. member refers is an assessment on the taxpayer's own return. If the taxpayer has calculated his return correctly, that is the last the taxpayer will hear of it. If, however, the return is incorrect, then at some later date he will receive a further assessment.

Mr. Fulton: May I request that the department go back to the former practice of simply sending out a receipt acknowledging receipt of that amount. When the taxpayer receives such an assessment notice he naturally concludes that it represents his final assessment; whereas, as it was before, he knew it was no more than a formal acknowledgment of receipt of the amount paid.

Mr. Sinclair: It has been pointed out to me that at least 90 per cent of the returns which are turned in are correct, and so that assessment notice is correct and is the end of the matter in 90 per cent of the cases. For the 10 per cent which are incorrect, there is of course a further assessment. I think the 90 per cent who are correct would prefer to receive such an assessment notice rather than a mere receipt, and then go on wondering whether or not they are going to be reassessed.

Mr. MacInnis: It is a receipt anyway, whether it is correct or not, and it is made final by your final receipt?

Mr. Sinclair: That is correct.

Mr. Church: Under resolution No. 5, I think the minister might very well tell us where all this income tax comes from. It comes largely under resolution No. 5. The rate of interest charged is altogether too high for the amount of money collected, $4 million or $5 million. It costs several millions to collect it. In the second place it comes very largely from the Toronto district. Under one of these resolutions I hope the minister will tell the committee where all this income tax comes from. About 30 per cent comes from our own city and we get little value for it in the way of expenditure. I hope the minister will tell us where all this income tax comes from, and the amount from different districts accordingly.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member can find that at his own convenience in the statistical report turned out by the Department of National Revenue, the 1949 issue, which is now available for distribution.

Mr. Church: It is a handsome book, no doubt; but it all largely comes from the Toronto district. It would take a Philadelphia lawyer to make out his income tax.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to this matter of assessment, I would point out that it has a definite bearing on the matter of interest penalties. It seems to me that if the notice sent out within a month or two of the receipt of the payment by the taxpayer is labelled "assessment", that procedure enables the department to charge interest from the date of the mailing of the notice; whereas if the notice were labelled, as in former years, "interim receipt only", then interest would not commence to run at the full rate until the date on which the department mailed its final assessment of the taxpayer's return. In other words, because they label this notice "assessment" they are entitled to charge interest at the full rate from the date of the mailing of that notice instead of being entitled to charge the full rate only from the date of the mailing of the final notice.

Mr. Sinclair: It is suggested to me that, if the hon. member will hold that question over until the bill is introduced, he will see that the particular point he mentions has been specifically taken care of. But in any event the taxpayer who at the time of the receipt of that notice still owes money on his return is of course going to pay interest now up to a period of only twelve months whereas before he paid it up to a period of twenty months.

Mr. Fulton: There is still the difference between 6 and 7 per cent.

Mr. Graydon: On resolution No. 5—

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I understood that the hon. member for Kamloops was granted a special concession because he walked into the house after eight o'clock and was allowed to revert to resolution No. 5. Is it the wish to revert to resolution 5?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not see how I could prevent other members from asking their questions if they find themselves in the same position as that in which the hon. member for Kamloops found himself. I think that the hon. member for Peel is one of those.

Mr. Fulton: We cannot hear you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cruickshank: What resolution are you on?

The Deputy Chairman: On resolution No. 5.

Mr. Graydon: I am sorry if I am contravening the rules, but I think this is a point that is deserving of some consideration by the department. There is a feeling among the taxpayers, and I think it is fairly general, that the government regards this question of interest as a sort of one-way street in its favour. If anybody overpays his taxes, the government conveniently forgets that it has had the use of the taxpayer's money for a year or so, as the case may be. On the other hand, if the taxpayer happens to underestimate his taxes, or happens to make some mistake in his return and is obliged to pay more, then of course the government comes along and exacts the full rate of interest from him. That in itself is bad enough. But there is another point which ought to be stressed. It may be that now the situation is being cured; I think perhaps to a large extent it may be. In the past, the department has been years behind in its assessments. That was not the taxpayer's fault; it was the government's fault. The result was that, because of the arrears of assessments and because of the fact that the government department itself had defaulted in bringing the assessments up to date, and which they should have brought up to date, taxpayers found that they had sometimes perhaps three years' interest to pay—I am not sure whether they went any further—which mounted up to quite a bit of money. Taxpayers complained about that, but so far as I know there never was any redress. The government ought not to put itself in a preferred position to those who have to pay the taxes. After all, if the taxpayer has to pay interest on the money that he owes to the government after the assessment has been made, then if he overpays he ought to be allowed interest on that overpayment. In addition, he should not be penalized because of the default of somebody in the department. Some explanation of the policy of the department ought to be given.

Mr. Sinclair: I can tell the hon. member for Peel that if the return of the taxpayer is accurate, which after all is the responsibility of the taxpayer, there is no overpayment or underpayment.

As far as underpayment is concerned, the interest charged is not only interest charged on money which is owing the government but also a penalty to encourage accurate returns of income tax. So far as the other matter is concerned, the hon. member will recall that last year legislation was passed allowing interest at the rate of two per cent on overpayment; but there again overpayment, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, is because—

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Graydon: Is that what the taxpayer in default is charged?

Mr. Sinclair: So far as the taxpayer in default is concerned it is not only a matter of interest on the money owed to the government but also a penalty to encourage in the first place accurate returns of the taxpayer's income.

Mr. Graydon: May I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that there ought to be some kind of penalty to encourage the government to bring their assessments up to date.

Mr. Sinclair: As I recall, the hon. member and his party have been the ones who in past years have urged great reductions in the civil service. The reason we got so far behind during the war was the lack of staff because we were holding down the civil service. We were twenty months behind. By April of next year the assessments will all be up to date. That is why we are able to close the gap from first of all no limit, then to twenty months and now to twelve months in this resolution.

Mr. Graydon: That does not help the man who has had to pay.

The Deputy Chairman: We will revert to resolution 7.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, this tax should be wiped off the slate not because ministers do not receive as large a salary as members of parliament but because they have calls that no member of parliament has to answer. I can give an illustration of some of the calls a minister has to make. Suppose he is downtown on a Saturday and sees an old friend whose legs do not seem to be able to carry him very well. He takes him home and puts him in the spare room and keeps him there a day, two days or a week and sobers him up with black coffee. The income tax department will not permit him to take that gift off his income tax. The department does not allow a minister any credit for gifts that he makes which other people do not make. The minister has continual calls on him. They are not made once in a while, but practically every day or at least every week. Because of these gifts I think this tax should be wiped off the slate. I am not speaking of one denomination only. It applies to anybody in religious work. A clergyman has those calls, and he is expected to practise what he preaches, feed the hungry and clothe the naked.

Mr. Church: I asked the predecessor of the present minister a question with regard to this particular resolution. I refer to the late minister who is now a judge in Nova Scotia. I asked him this question: Do all the clergy of the Christian churches pay income tax? His reply was that so far as he knew they did. I am glad that resolution 7 has been amended because clergymen have a great many important duties to perform. They should be all treated alike in this country. The Christian churches should not take precedence over the state. The state has to raise money by this method of income tax to enable the country to pay its debt. Some allowance should be made for all clergy of the Christian church and of other churches who are not of the Christian faith. There is this to be said about the clergy. During the depression and during the period of the late war the clergyman had to be judge, doctor and almost everything. I remember three or four clergymen coming one day to the bar of the house to visit. A few years ago I addressed a bartender's union. Because I was the head of a big city I had to treat them all alike. I said that a lawyer pleads from inside the bar. Today a minister has to use his car. He has to pay for the gasoline. He does not own a house. He has to go down to the police court to help his parishioners out.

In the Toronto district the scale of fines under this whole Income Tax Act, and particularly under this resolution, are heavier than they are in any other court in the country. They are almost five to one. This resolution should be liberally interpreted to include all the Christian clergy. There is one church that does a great deal of good work. I refer to a faith to which I do not belong. I know a great many of the clergy from their seminaries and others, and they do valuable work. That could be applied also to the other Christian denominations. In view of what the clergy are doing to help the people there should be a liberal interpretation of this resolution.

Mr. Higgins: I wish to say a few words on this resolution. We did not know it before in the province of Newfoundland, that is why I draw it particularly to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. Would it not be fairer to tax the minister on gifts or on, shall we say, a private income apart from the return on his direct ministerial duties, or else raise the exemption a little higher for clergymen alone? I presume this applies equally to all provinces but the clergymen in a number of districts in the province of Newfoundland are going to find this a real hardship. I submit that to exempt the direct earnings from the ministerial duties of a clergyman would be the fairer way, or to raise the exemption to $2,000 to $2,500 in this particular case.

Mr. Sinclair: First of all I would point out to the hon. member, as was indicated by the hon. member for Kootenay East, that it is difficult when one gets into this business of giving special exemptions to different groups. The present exemption can be justified in that a minister's home is, if I may use the expression, more or less his place of doing business, the place where during week days he ministers to his congregation and performs other functions in connection with his office.

This concession is an improvement in the taxation regulations, as applied to clergymen. There is one point, of course, that because of the incomes which most clergymen receive, a considerable number of them, especially if they are married with children, are now in the exempt class by reason of the increase in the basic deduction in respect of all taxpayers.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to say a word in respect of a further deduction which in my view clergymen should have. A complaint was registered with me about a year ago where it was pointed out that clergymen are not exempt for certain travelling expenses incurred in the discharge of their regular pastoral duties. There are some clergymen occupying charges in western Canada who must cover a considerable area of ground and have considerable travelling to do in that connection. Some even have several churches in different communities to which they must travel once or twice a week. Sometimes they have to travel long distances to conduct funerals for which, on occasion, they do not accept fees. I do not think that as a rule clergymen take fees for conducting funerals. Then there are a number of other reasons for travelling.

Some may have their own cars. In the case brought to my attention neither depreciation on the car nor the gasoline bill was taken into consideration. Most clergymen do not receive large salaries. It is all very well to say that they do not come within the income tax bracket—and we know that many of them do not. But those who do are not allowed travelling expenses. I do suggest to the parliamentary assistant that some consideration should be given to this matter.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant indicated a moment ago that it was difficult to set aside any particular occupation or profession for special consideration in the income tax structure. I fancy most members of the committee will agree with that general principle; because it is a national levy and for that reason one would expect the government at least in a general way to take that stand.

I think however that the parliamentary assistant would agree with hon. members who have spoken, that, after all, our ministry, our clergymen, regardless of the denominations to which they belong, make a great contribution to our national life for which compensation is never made in dollars and cents. Perhaps it is never intended that it should be, in the minister's mind—and very often, unfortunately, it is not in the congregation's mind either. I am inclined to think that our clergymen are in an entirely different position because, in a sense, they are in a class in which they render a service, rather than in a money-making class from the income of which is siphoned off a certain percentage.

As has been mentioned by one of my colleagues, clergymen's incomes are derived in different ways. It seems to me the government should give careful consideration to the pleas which have been made on behalf of the clergy in Canada. I do not think many taxpayers would find fault with or be even mildly critical of the government if our clergymen were taken right out of the income tax brackets altogether. There would be some technical objections from the department, but I believe the policy is one which would commend itself generally, because it would be an indication of just how this parliament and the people of Canada judge, appreciate and value the work of this important section of our population which ministers to our people. It would be the most practical way of saying a word of praise to them.

We would not have a nation worth the name if we did not have our churches. For that reason, what I have said should be a guiding factor and an important feature in the formulation of government policy. I know the clergymen would not ask for it, as I am now asking; but it seems to me it is the duty of laymen throughout Canada to speak on their behalf. After all, I believe the laymen of Canada would regard it as a privilege and an honour to bear any extra burden of taxation which would become necessary by exempting these men who render such signal service in the religious life of our nation.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not quite clear concerning this resolution. As I understand the hon. member for Peel, the legal profession receives exemptions for expenses; is that correct in respect of people who contribute so little to the welfare of Canada? Am I to understand that the ministerial group, of which I am sure my young friend from Coast-Capilano knows so much, are being taxed? If that is so, then I say through you, Mr. Chairman, and through my young friend to the Minister of Finance, that it is high time they changed their policy.

Resolution agreed to.

[Mr. Graydon.]

8. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the exemption from income of an individual in respect of a spouse supported by him shall not be reduced because of exempt income of the spouse.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the parliamentary assistant explain this resolution, and tell the committee whether it arises as the result of a court judgment?

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot say whether it arises as the result of a court judgment, but it does arise because of the need of one special group. Under the present terms of the Income Tax Act an individual is required to reduce his present exemption by the amount of income of his spouse in excess of $250. In calculating the amount of the spouse's income to be taken into consideration, the law now requires that receipts by her which are not in themselves taxable must be included. The most typical case is probably a wife supporting a husband who was a veteran in receipt of disability pension. Such pensions are not in themselves taxable but at the present time must be taken into consideration in the wife's income, and therefore they become taxable. That is the purpose of the resolution, and the class to which this resolution is intended to refer.

Mr. Adamson: It would include a wife's income as well from any source.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, from any source.

Resolution agreed to.

9. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, all amounts whether in the form of lump sums or otherwise, received by employees from their employers, whether before, during or after their employment, shall be included in computing income of the employee unless it is established that they cannot reasonably be regarded as consideration for entry into the employment, remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Would the parliamentary assistant explain this in language so simple that even I can understand it?

Mr. Sinclair: The purpose of this measure is to defeat practices resorted to by some taxpayers to avoid payment of income tax. These arrangements when found are usually between an employer and an employee of executive rank. In essence, they attempt to convert into a capital payment made in return for certain undertakings given by the employee a payment or series of payments that would otherwise be income of the employee. If such payments wear the guise of a capital payment they may escape income tax. It is only in very exceptional circumstances, however, that a payment made by an employer to an employee is not simply part of the terms of the employment, and it is only fair to the great majority of taxpayers that they be kept under close surveillance and governed by the most rigid restrictions.

The purpose of the amendment that will be based on this paragraph is to bring all such payments, whether paid in a lump sum or otherwise, under scrutiny by the tax authorities. In the first instance they will all be deemed taxable unless the taxpayer can prove they were not of the type of payment I have mentioned.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am grateful to the parliamentary assistant for that clear and lucid explanation in simple language, but would he mind telling me what it is all about? What is the evil you are seeking to correct? For instance the last three lines read:

—unless it is established that they cannot reasonably be regarded as consideration for entry into the employment, remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

I have read that over to myself half a dozen times and I am utterly unable to perceive any sense at all in it. I do not know what it means. Does it mean the payments that might be made to a hockey or baseball player where so much is paid for signing up?

Mr. Sinclair: It does.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then I need not wear the dunce's cap any longer. I think I am the only person in the committee apart from the parliamentary assistant who knew that. We have that one thing explained. Then the resolution goes on:

—remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

Would that be for a woman who would go out for coffee in the morning at ten o'clock or for tea in the afternoon? What does it mean?

Mr. Sinclair: I gave the departmental explanation; now I shall give my own. A great many attempts have been made in the United States and a few in this country by high executives of companies to get around the special rates of income tax which we have on high salaries by obtaining from the company a lump sum and hedging it around with some qualification in order to make it look like a capital gain rather than a payment for past services or present services or for entering the employ of the company or for agreeing to restrictions in the future. An employee may be asked to say that he will never leave the company and therefore the employer would have the use of that employee's services as long as he wanted them; the employee could not go over to one of his competitors.

Mr. Graydon: That might be a boomerang.

Mr. Sinclair: It might or might not be, I am not in position to say. The ordinary little taxpayer or employee of a company would not get things like this; it is only the top executives who are in positions of control who could arrange anything like this. It is to prevent that practice of regarding these things as though they were not actually payments for services.

Mr. Higgins: Would the normal gift of cash at Christmastime to an employee be included in the employee's income?

Mr. Sinclair: Christmas bonuses are regarded as income. After all, they are part of the emoluments received by the employee for services rendered.

Mr. Higgins: Could a gift be considered as something apart from a bonus?

Mr. Sinclair: The only reason an employer would make a gift at Christmas or any other time during the year to an employee would be as a return for faithful service, and after all that would be part of his income whether it was paid monthly or given as a gift.

Mr. Higgins: What if it were in kind rather than in cash?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that the value of the gift is regarded as income.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Supposing when we leave here at Christmas we give a pair of gloves or some flowers to the secretaries who work for us, would the departmental officials regard that for one moment as being income? Surely nothing so nonsensical could be suggested?

Mr. Sinclair: My hon. friend, who is a lawyer, will be able to give me the answer in Latin which I have been given.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What the parliamentary assistant is saying is that we are not their employers as individuals. Let us go back to the private companies and see if we can get a smart answer to that. The last line of the resolution reads:

—remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

I thought I understood the reply given a few moments ago, but I want to be sure. What this means is that any transfer of money or anything of value between an employer and employee is in fact income and the individual would be charged for that. Is that not the law now? I cannot see that this adds anything to the present law. I am working for somebody and he gives me so much money or so many potatoes or something else in kind. That is all regarded as income. It must be if Christmas bonuses are so regarded. I am utterly unable to see why we should have this conglomeration of words which will only confuse the simple law as it is today. Perhaps my judgment is wrong about that, but that is the way it appears to me.

Mr. Mutch: Carried.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): With great respect to another parliamentary assistant who does not understand it and who probably will not even though he keeps shouting "carried"—

Mr. Mutch: With great respect, I am not saying anything about the law.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The parliamentary assistant said "carried". I heard him and I want to congratulate him on being so bright.

Mr. Sinclair: The point I tried to make earlier was that attempts have been made here similar to those in the United States to treat these things as capital payments which are made, not for services rendered but for other reasons. A payment might be made for an employee agreeing never to work for another employer, to restrict his future activities, and it was challenged that such a payment was not income. To make it quite clear that these things would be regarded as income a clause will be inserted in the bill which perhaps my hon. friend will be able to follow much better.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am all right up to the beginning of the proviso, but I should like the parliamentary assistant to explain the proviso, which reads:

—unless it is established that they cannot reasonably be regarded as consideration for entry into the employment, remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

Could the parliamentary assistant give examples for each of these provisos? The first is that moneys paid cannot reasonably be regarded as consideration for entry into the employment. I should like an example of that. The second is remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee. I should also like an example of that. It is so involved that I doubt whether the appeal board would be able to interpret what it means. Possibly if examples are given we can understand it.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I should first point out that the legal draftsmanship is certainly not mine, nor am I competent to interpret it. As far as the grammar is concerned, I would point out there is a double negative, and I would take it that the double negative means that these things are going to be regarded as income. If they are anything else they are not income, but these things are. An example of the first one would be a person taking a bonus of $10,000 to begin employment with a company, in addition to his regular salary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would that be free of income tax?

Mr. Sinclair: No, that is income. Any one of these things which are mentioned is going to be regarded as income. I must confess that if I were a lawyer I would have used the direct approach, but the double negative means if any one of these things was the reason why the capital payment was made, then that capital payment is income. If, on the other hand, it should happen that an employer had to buy a piece of property belonging to an employee, that would be a perfectly normal transaction. It is not covered by the last two lines and therefore it is not income.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What would be an example of the second proviso?

Mr. Sinclair: A straight bonus for entering service at all. Perhaps a good example of the first one would be the case of hockey and football players who are given say $10,000 to begin with in return for entering into a contract for their services with one hockey or baseball club.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that what it is to cover?

Mr. Sinclair: That is one of the things.

Mr. MacInnis: In view of the explanation of the parliamentary assistant as to the drafting, would it be correct to say that in drafting a law of this kind when the lawyers want to say yes they say "no, no"?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one more question as a matter of information, because I often hear it referred to. Suppose a person were employed by a limited company with a salary of $10,000 a year, and collected no part of his salary for a period of three years. Suppose he then discharged his liability to the company, the amount of $30,000, by selling his contract of service back to the company for $20,000. Would that be subject to income tax?

Mr. Belzile: In this particular instance I think it would be considered as income. It discharges a debt for a salary, which salary would have been taxable in ordinary circumstances. Every year the salary of $10,000 would have been taxable. At the end of three years the amount due is $30,000. A settlement is made for $20,000. The $20,000, being in settlement of previously earned salary, is taxable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is taxable?

Mr. Belzile: It is.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Just one question, and I promise I will not rise again. I wonder if you should not have some restriction after the word "activities" as, for example, "activities in the interests of the employee". It seems to me you leave yourself wide open on the word "activities". Surely it is presumed it would be activities from which the employer benefits, or something of that kind. It occurred to me you might want to do something about that in the act. You might just look at that.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course this is only the resolution. When we come to the bill the language will be clear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I merely make the suggestion that when we come to the bill it might be advisable to restrict it.

Resolution agreed to.

10. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for a wheel chair may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

Mr. Fraser: On September 29 the hon. member for Macleod, I believe it was, asked a question whether payment for the services of an ambulance would be included in the exemptions, and the minister said that he did not think so. I said at that time that I thought if a doctor included in his bill the charge for the ambulance it could be deducted from the man's income tax. Will the parliamentary assistant say whether, if the ambulance charge is included in the doctor's account, it can be deducted from the individual's income tax?

Mr. Sinclair: Before I answer a hypothetical question, what reason would there be for a doctor to include an ambulance bill in his account?

Mr. Fraser: He might own an ambulance.

An hon. Member: He might be an undertaker, too.

Mr. Fraser: There are cases where some one party is unable to pay at the time. There are doctors who have themselves paid the charge for the ambulance, and perhaps six or seven months later have collected the amount from the individual.

Mr. Sinclair: I can only refer the hon. member to section 26 of the Income Tax Act which gives in detail the medical charges permitted as a deduction. I am told by the medical authorities around me that they know of no case where a doctor owns an ambulance.

Mr. Fraser: That was suggested on this side of the house. The doctor behind you likely told you that, but I know of two cases where the doctor has had to pay the ambulance charges, and six or seven months afterwards has collected it.

Mr. McCusker: I have heard of cases in Ireland where the doctor made his visits in a hearse so that if he was not successful or if he arrived too late he would save the family expense, but I have not heard of doctors in Canada assuming the responsibility for the ambulance charge.

Mr. Hansell: It is quite all right when a question is asked for the parliamentary assistant to read the act and say that is what is in the act. This afternoon, when we were talking about another tax, he said that people should know it is in the act. If the people should know certainly we should know. Therefore why does he say, "There is the act; it is in the act"? We know it is in the act. What we want is to have it taken out of the act. What we want is to have the act changed so that ambulance fees will be regarded as medical expenses. That is the point.

We should like to have some statement from him as to whether or not the government thinks it is reasonable to have ambulance fees included as a medical expense. The case I have in mind is that of a man who had to travel 200 miles in an ambulance to get special attention. His wife went with him. They had to put up at a hotel for a night before he could get a room in the hospital. He applied for exemption for those charges. I can understand if he had to go to a hotel perhaps that in itself would not involve a medical expense. I know the government would run into some difficulty and perhaps discover there were a lot of travellers who had been taken sick when they had to stay at a hotel. I can understand the hotel part not being included as medical expenses, but for the life of me I cannot understand why ambulance charges are not included in medical expenses. When one travels a couple of hundred miles by ambulance, the bill is considerable. I believe such charges should be included in medical expenses if the patient has to be transported to some place for medical attention. If the officials are doubtful about the charge, a statement from the doctor could be secured. I believe an ambulance charge is a legitimate claim for exemption, and I should like the department to tell us whether or not they think so; and if so, will they have it changed?

Mr. Sinclair: In answer to the initial remarks of the hon. member, may I say that the member for Peterborough West asked me whether there was a provision in the act, and I did give him the actual section of the act. So far as the question of the member for Macleod is concerned, consideration has been given to allowing other than medical expenses, but at this time it is not government policy to extend these concessions further.

Mr. Fraser: I asked the parliamentary assistant whether an ambulance charge could be included in the doctor's bill, and be exempted in that way.

Mr. Sinclair: No.

Mr. Applewhaite: I had no intention of entering the discussion on this resolution, but if the department gives favourable consideration to the request which has been put forward, and perhaps with justification, for those who are fortunate enough to be able to travel via ambulance, will they also kindly remember the transportation charges which have to be met in a district such as mine where a man has to hire a plane and travel 500 or 600 miles to reach a doctor. If he does not do that, he has to wait until the following spring. This is a major item of expense, and it is an item which may be argued at considerable length. I do not intend to hold up the committee for any length of time, but I do not intend to let the people who are fortunate enough to be able to ride in an ambulance at a cost of $5 or $10 go to the department with that request and have it granted, without some consideration being given to those people who have to hire an aeroplane, which is an item of real expense.

Mr. Hansell: My reply to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is that even though a patient had to take a train, upon the doctor's insistence in writing, then that expense should be allowed. It does not make any difference.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether it is not correct that the income tax department does allow ambulance charges now?

Mr. Sinclair: The answer is no.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I would suggest that the parliamentary assistant ask the Minister of National Revenue, because I know of cases where ambulance charges have been allowed.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, the answer is no. If they were allowed, they were allowed in error.

Mr. Herridge: Speaking about these ambulance charges, I should like to say that on numerous occasions in my district people have to hire ambulances to go from isolated points to the cities of Trail or Nelson. Sometimes it is necessary to travel one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles, and the ambulance charge is from $35 to $70. When people meet with sickness, that is a serious expense. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to bring this matter to the attention of the government in such a way as to bring out the special circumstances mentioned by the members. This is a necessary and often costly expenditure.

Mr. McCusker: If I might speak again, I should like to correct an impression which may have been caused by a facetious remark of mine concerning the doctor in Ireland, who always travelled in the hearse to save the family expense, because he always arrived too late. I have a certain amount of sympathy for the stand that has been taken by these gentlemen tonight concerning people who live in remote areas, and who have to hire transportation to convey them to the hospital. In Saskatchewan there is an ambulance system by means of which an aeroplane will go to any spot in the province and convey the patient to hospital for the sum of $25. If the patient can pay for that, there is a charge made. If he cannot, he travels at public expense.

I can understand the reluctance of the government to accept the responsibility for transporting patients by ambulance because we know of the abuses that inevitably follow. I am quite sure the privilege would be abused. In Saskatchewan there is prepaid hospitalization today. The biggest problem facing the doctors there is to decide who should be sent to the hospital and who should be kept out. If you are going to give patients free ambulance transportation, the privilege is going to be abused. The Saskatchewan government has had to put very stiff regulations in force to prevent the abuse of its ambulance service. It is still being abused, however.

If the gentlemen who plead for an ambulance service will put forward some means of regulating it, then I will support their plea. As it is, I think it would lead to too many abuses if granted.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to say a word about the remarks of the last speaker. During the last few years there has been an increase in polio cases. The newspapers have carried reports of cases in which children have had to be rushed to the Children's hospital in Toronto or to the Toronto General hospital. Just two weeks ago, I believe, there was a case at North Bay. Patients from 200 or 300 miles away have to go to Toronto for treatment and they have to get there in a hurry. At such a time the parents never think about the cost; the patient is their first thought. When income tax time arrives, the parents have to think of costs of that kind. I believe that where an ambulance or a car is used the expense should be allowed. This man in North Bay, a workingman, had to hire a taxi, and that is quite expensive.

Resolution agreed to.

11. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, $500 may be deducted from income for the purpose of computing taxable income of a taxpayer who, throughout the whole of the taxation year, was necessarily confined by reason of illness, injury or affliction to a bed or wheel chair.

Mr. Bater: In connection with resolution 11, I believe consideration should be given to amending this section. In order to qualify for the exemption under this section, a taxpayer must be ill and confined to his bed or wheelchair throughout the whole of a taxation year. Since the taxation year is the calendar year, a person could be confined to a wheelchair or to bed for a period of 22 months, being eleven months in 1949 and 11 months in 1950. Such a person could not qualify for any reduction under this clause.

Mr. Sinclair: Section 11 was intended primarily for people who are, shall I say, chronically bedridden, people who are in their beds year after year. The case which the hon. member mentions, of a person being in bed for 11 months extending through two taxation years is not covered by this section. He is allowed, in the taxation year in which his sickness ends, the cost of the attendants, a concession granted in last year's Income Tax Act.

Mr. Bater: The parliamentary assistant says he is allowed the cost of the attendant?

Mr. Sinclair: The cost of the attendant included in his medical expenses. That was allowed earlier as part of the medical expenses of somebody who was bedridden.

Mr. Bater: As the parliamentary assistant has mentioned attendants, I will mention something that I was not going to bring up under resolution No. 11. I happen to be familiar with a case in which the taxpayer appealed because he was not allowed the amount paid an attendant for eight consecutive months in one year. Because of the mere fact that it was not twelve months, he was not allowed his claim, and he lost the appeal for the attendant to whom he had paid a salary for the purpose of taking care of his spouse for eight months in one calendar year.

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member will wait until the bill comes down, he will see the actual details. It is difficult to talk back and forth in this committee about figures of percentages and exemptions and make them understandable. If hon. members wait until the bill is brought down they will have the details in front of them rather than just the general resolution.

Mr. Adamson: I have great sympathy with what the hon. member has just said, and I should like to support it by moving an amendment to this effect:

That the words "the whole" in the resolution be struck out and that "ten months" be substituted therefor.

I do this because I feel that in any taxation year, if a patient is bedridden for a period of ten months, which is about 80 per cent of the taxation year, he is virtually immobilized for the whole year and can be considered to be a chronically bedridden patient. I should like to move that amendment because I have sympathy with what the hon. gentleman has just said.

Mr. Sinclair: Two points arise here, Mr. Chairman. First of all, there is the point of order. This of course is exactly the same point as we had raised this afternoon under citation 552. The other point is broader than that. It is a matter of borderlines. The hon. member says "ten months". Another member may move an amendment specifying eight month, six months, or four months. Where are you going to draw the line? In this bill we have drawn the line at one year. In any event, I submit that the hon. member's amendment is out of order under citation 552.

Mr. Adamson: Speaking to the point of order, I gather that the parliamentary assistant is contending that this amendment is out of order because it reduces the revenue. As it does not increase the expenditures of the federal treasury and does not reduce the revenue in any way,—

Mr. Sinclair: But it does.

Mr. Adamson: —I feel that it is not out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: I may tell the hon. member that I have not his motion in writing before me.

Mr. Adamson: I thought I had given it to you, Mr. Chairman. I gave it to one of the clerks.

The Deputy Chairman: I have it now. I understand that the contention of the parliamentary assistant is that, if this motion were to carry, it would result in a loss of revenue by the treasury.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes. If it did not, there is no point in the hon. member moving it; because if there is no loss in revenue to the government then obviously there is no benefit to the taxpayer.

The Deputy Chairman: This afternoon two similar motions were made. I would refer the hon. member to citation 552 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, which I think applies in this case as well. I would draw his attention to the following words:

> Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government.

As this motion is similar to the ones made this afternoon and falls under this citation 552, in my opinion it is out of order and I so rule.

Resolution agreed to.

> 12. That special deductions from income to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for natural gas, oil or minerals be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1950, 1951 and 1952 operations on the same basis as for expenses in 1949 operations.

Mr. Harkness: I presume that the various deductions which are spoken of here and are all lumped together will be detailed in the bill when it comes in. Is that correct?

I notice that these various tax concessions which have been allowed in the last several years with regard to drilling for gas and oil will, in this particular case, be extended for the years 1950, 1951 and 1952. For the past three or four years I have personally been attempting to get the government to include these in the regular tax structure of the country on a permanent basis. It appears as though they are making a move in that direction by making them for three years in advance, and I am glad to see that. Having gone that far, I think it would be only logical and in the best interests of the oil and gas industry if they went the whole way and put them in the permanent tax structure rather than only for three years.

In that connection, and in order to save time, may I say that I notice that resolution No. 13, which provides for special tax concessions for deep-test wells, is only for 1950, I think; in other words, it is only for one year in advance. I would suggest that it be given the same treatment as the other tax concessions in the oil and gas field. I do not see any reason why it should not be. I would suggest that it be put in the same class and given the same treatment as the rest of these concessions which are dealt with in resolution No. 12, and that they be made effective for 1950, 1951, and 1952, unless, as I say, the government sees fit to go the whole way and make these things part of the regular tax structure so that the people in the oil and gas industry would know where they stand and can make their plans accordingly. This is going to help them considerably. They will know where they stand for three years in advance. As I say, I cannot see any reason why this deep-test well concession should be exempted. It should be included along with the others.

Mr. Sinclair: In reply to the hon. member, may I say that I was glad to have his opinion that this is a step forward in giving the industry a three-year period of further stability in their tax structure.

As to resolution No. 13—I imagine we are considering them together, because they are in some way related—it is a special concession given to a small number of wells. Actually, I believe, there are very few at the present time, not more than a dozen at the outside. Since the number is limited, it has not the general application that resolution No. 12 has. That is the reason why they are still keeping it on a year-to-year basis. If a great number of these deep-test wells should be drilled, no doubt amendments as in No. 12 will take place, first of all in the way of extension of the period and then perhaps, as the hon. member has mentioned, some such concession permanently included in the tax structure.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): What is the depth of a deep-test well?

Mr. Cruickshank: I had better talk first. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question in this connection. If this special privilege is to be given to these companies, will any provision be made to the effect that Canadians will be served first, prior to exportation of the gas or oil to any other country, before any permit is given?

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution relates only to taxation and does not relate to private bills which are now before the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, Mr. Chairman. I was asking the parliamentary assistant if the government would—and I presume he is speaking with authority as parliamentary assistant—prior to giving this concession, see that Canadian interests are served first.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman,—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary East.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, no. I want an answer to my question.

Mr. Harkness: As to deep-test wells, I think the parliamentary assistant probably has not the full information in the matter.

Mr. Cruickshank: Or knowledge of it either.

Mr. Harkness: This particular tax concession was put into effect during the war for the express purpose of encouraging people to drill wells in the foothills sections of Alberta where they had to drill to a depth of 8,000, 9,000, 10,000 or 12,000 feet in order to find an oil or gas-bearing structure. The parliamentary assistant says that only twelve or fourteen people are enjoying any advantage from it. That is because at the present time the amount of drilling in this fairly deep foothills section, where very deep drilling is required, has been pretty well suspended owing to the fact that large quantities of oil and gas have been found in the plains area in Alberta around Leduc, Redwater and so forth, where wells are only four or five thousand feet deep. The fact that oil and gas have been found in these shallower horizons does not take away the need of giving encouragement to people to drill in areas where they will have to go deeper. Therefore I cannot see the argument that the parliamentary assistant made that at the present time only twelve or fourteen people are taking advantage of this. That is no reason why they should not be placed in the same position as the other oil and gas tax concessions and extended for a period of three years.

If a company or an individual is going to drill a well in these areas where great depth is required, because the distance may be twice as great, the time taken to drill the well, instead of being twice as long, may be four or five times as long. The greater the difficulty in drilling the longer the time it takes. That makes it necessary to give the people who may be willing to drill in these areas where depth is required some assurance that they are going to have a certain amount of protection in the future so far as tax concessions are concerned. The necessity for that in deep wells is greater than in other wells, and in my opinion these deep wells should be included along with the others.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Has the department determined what constitutes the depth of a deep well?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that it is a matter of expense more than depth. The very expensive wells, some of which cost a quarter of a million dollars or more, and run to 9,000, 10,000, 11,000, 12,000 feet. As the hon. member for Calgary East said, an ordinary well is 3,000, 4,000, 5,000 feet deep. The actual concession is a very special one and is given to a small group. That is why at the present time this limit is placed on it.

Mr. Harkness: It was not given to a small group. It is open to anybody who will drill a well in these deep horizons. As I see it, it is necessary to afford some incentive to people to drill. Because only a few people have obtained it so far is no reason why it should not be continued and put on the same basis as other concessions so that people who may be willing to do that drilling may have greater incentive.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In view of the answer given by the parliamentary assistant to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, may I ask whether there is any geographical limitation as to where this deep-test assistance may be given? My memory is very hazy on this. I remember that when it was done it was done with a view to testing what we knew as marginal ground. I am not sure that I am right about that. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant can answer this simple question. Even on a yearly basis, is there any geographical limit to this assistance? Because, if that be so, what the hon. member for Calgary East has said has great force indeed. It may be that this applied only to what we called marginal areas.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that the consent of the Department of Mines and Resources must be obtained before this concession is given to a test well. Aside from that, when the bill is before the house, if it is necessary we can have one of the officers of the mines and resources department here to explain these details.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The parliamentary assistant is quite right. The consent of the department has to be given. As a matter of fact, the administrator was out there at one time to study the general application. If the parliamentary assistant cannot explain it now, perhaps he might look it up before we return to it again. If what I say is right, then I am very much in favour of what the hon. member for Calgary East said.

Mr. Adamson: I agree with what the two hon. members from Calgary have said. Does resolution 12 apply also to metalliferous mines? Resolution 14 refers to metalliferous mines coming into production. Resolution 12 mentions minerals only. I assume that it would also include all drilling for metals, drilling for such materials as cement, limestone, and all the non-metallic minerals and metallic minerals as well. Will the parliamentary assistant clear up that point? It is a little ambiguous. In resolution 14 metalliferous mines are definitely mentioned.

Mr. Sinclair: Resolutions 12 and 14. Resolution 12 mentions drilling not only for oil but for minerals. Resolution 13 gives special concessions to deep-test wells and is confined to drilling for oil.

Mr. Adamson: My point is this: Resolutions 12 and 13 are primarily oil resolutions. They also have application to the development of, shall we say, the non-metallic minerals such as cement, limestone and quarrying, gypsum and these other things which may be drilled for such as gypsum-bearing earth and other materials, which are non-metallic but it also includes metallics as well.

Mr. Sinclair: The principal word in resolution 12 is "exploring". It is of course a concession given to a company for the cost of off-property exploration; whereas resolution 14 is a different thing. It refers to income tax on a mine once it is in production.

Mr. Adamson: I realize that. That is just exactly the point I am trying to explain to the parliamentary assistant. Resolutions 12 and 13, which we are dealing with now, deal primarily with prospecting and drilling for oil.

Mr. Sinclair: No, minerals.

Mr. Adamson: There is a great deal of other prospecting and drilling going on. I want this clarified. Does it also include prospecting and drilling for metallic minerals, non-ferrous minerals and non-metallic minerals. I should like that point to be made abundantly clear to the country.

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite true. It does refer to off-property exploration for any type of mineral. It is an extension of the existing legislation, not annually as it has been in the past but for a three-year period.

Resolution agreed to.

13. That special deductions from taxes to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for oil for expenses incurred on deep-test oil wells be allowed for such expenses in 1950 operations on the same basis as for such expenses in 1949 operations.

14. That the provision for the exemption of income derived from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine that came into production during the calendar years 1946 to 1949 inclusive during the period of thirty-six months after the mine came into production be extended to exempt income from such mines that come into production during the calendar years 1950, 1951 and 1952.

Resolutions agreed to.

15. That tax concessions under statutes of Newfoundland shall not apply in respect of taxes imposed by any act of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to say a few words on this resolution. As I understand it, this resolution is aimed directly at some three or four Newfoundland corporations. Is that so?

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution is aimed at no corporation. It applies the taxation laws of Canada to Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: As I understand the position, there are some three or four—three, I believe —Newfoundland corporations which have tax concessions by agreement or by statute. I believe it is by statute, although I have not the statute here, nor have I the citation. The position is, however, that these companies have income tax concessions for a varying period of years.

By analogy, I suggest that, in connection with the sale and transfer of a house, if there is a tenant in the house at the time of the transfer when one buys the house one takes over the lease subject to the conditions of the lease. By the agreement under which we have come into confederation Canada has assumed whatever obligations were made by former Newfoundland governments. These three or four companies have tax concessions by statute; and now by this resolution the department is attempting to remove those concessions. Is that not correct?

Mr. Sinclair: The intent is the reverse. The intention is to see that the corporations in Newfoundland shall have exactly the same federal tax laws applied to them as the corporations in any of the other nine provinces—either corporations or individuals.

Mr. Higgins: Is it not a fact that the income tax of Canada will be applied to these corporations?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Higgins: Even though they are exempt from taxation by statute of Newfoundland.

Mr. Sinclair: They have never been exempted from taxation so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned. I would refer the hon. member to the terms of union, sections 18 (2), 27 (4) and 47, which set out the laws of Canada which should apply to Newfoundland. Not being a lawyer, I would say that, if there is a contractual relationship between these companies and the government of Newfoundland, then perhaps it still exists between them. But the Dominion of Canada was certainly no party to those contractual relations. In the terms of union it was clearly stated that when Newfoundland became a part of Canada the laws of Canada, and especially the taxation laws, would be applied in the new province as in the other nine provinces.

Mr. Higgins: I presume the parliamentary assistant knows that the agreements were legal agreements that had been made prior to confederation.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps the hon. member is more familiar with the terms of agreement than I am, but the sections to which I have referred do not make mention of that at all. The taxation sections apply the taxation laws of Canada to the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: I am aware of that. I want to bring to the attention of the minister and hon. members the position in this particular matter. I hold no particular brief for these corporations, but I do feel it is a great injustice which has been worked upon them. The situation is that by an agreement—I believe it was 1925, in respect of one corporation, in respect of another the agreement expires in 1951, and concerning the third I am not quite sure of the date it expires—these companies have been operating on the assumption that they were going to be tax exempt up to a certain figure for the particular period set forth in the statute. In one instance I believe the tax figure is $150,000 a year, no matter what the earnings are. In the case of that corporation an expansion in the plant has been made. I presume it has based its wage scale upon its taxation; and if that corporation is going to be faced with the income tax proposed by this resolution there may be serious repercussions.

I trust due consideration has been given to these corporations, and that they have had an opportunity to present their views in the matter. If not, it is grossly unfair in my opinion; and I submit that to impose this taxation at this particular time on these corporations is contrary to justice. In fact, in my opinion it is illegal. I should like to have the minister's comment in this regard.

Mr. Shaw: There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. I assume that correspondence going out from a regional office would go post-free?

Mr. McCann: No, it does not.

Mr. Shaw: I would suggest therefore that officials in some of the district offices be advised to stamp their letters. Scores of envelopes like these were handed to me during the election campaign. I did not object to its occurring at that time; but the recipients were obliged to pay eight cents on each of these. When upon opening them they learned they were letters from the income tax branch it did not help matters. Most of them came to my attention in May, and I did not object too loudly at that time because we were in the campaign. I do suggest to the minister however that it is unfair to have the recipients of these letters paying extra postage. The individual who handed me this one received five within a couple of weeks and had to pay double postage on each one. I suggest this matter might be brought to the attention of the Calgary district office.

Mr. McCann: I shall be glad to look into the matter. Our department pays postage, and it is usually done by meter. Is there any meter mark on the letter?

Mr. Shaw: No. It just says "Come to the circus"—on such-and-such a date.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Sinclair (for the Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION TO OWNERS OF SLAUGHTERED CATTLE

The house resumed, from Monday, November 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 147, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, when eleven o'clock came on Monday evening we were discussing this bill and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had asked me for the date of a certain presentation made to the minister last spring. I now find it was Tuesday, March 15, 1949. I had intended to refer only to a paragraph or two of the presentation that was made, but in view of some of the things that have happened it might be well to place the whole presentation on the record at this time. It reads:

> Representing cattle raisers in a group of western Ontario counties we desire to make certain representations to you and the government concerning compensation for reactors under the T.B. area test.
> With the broad principle of T.B. testing and the eradication of bovine tuberculosis we are in full accord. The altered economy of the nation makes the present compensation for reactors entirely inadequate and imposes upon the loser of cattle an unfair share of the costs.
> Obviously, compensation is a recognition of responsibility on the part of the state, or the public at large. The eradication of bovine tuberculosis is manifestly a public health enterprise and it is only fair that the state should share in the price that must be paid.
> Under health of animals regulations obtaining up to world war II, compensation and salvage values combined to reimburse the cattle raiser to a fair extent, clean-up costs were not excessive and herds could be replaced at or around the reimbursement figures.
> Then came the war. T.B. testing was discontinued and a group of counties in western Ontario which applied for the test in the late thirties are now being tested under altogether different conditions. The whole economy of the nation has changed. Cattle values have risen. All costs have multiplied and the compensation, always modest, but over long periods perhaps fair, now represents a much smaller portion of the loss.
> Under present conditions the cattle raiser is compelled to bear a much larger share of the cost of this great public health enterprise. The state, in other words the people whose health is safeguarded by this testing program, pay a much smaller share of the cost.

In view of the magnificent war record of Canadian agriculture we cannot be convinced that the people of Canada will demand that farmers in the newly tested areas, and in areas still to be tested, shall be classed as "war casualties" and made to bear this unfair share of a post-war public health project.

Net losses are ranging from a few hundred dollars up to three and four thousand dollars. There are cases of young farmers, just getting started who have lost their entire herds, and some of these young men borrowed money to purchase the animals that have now gone to the slaughter house. Not only have they lost their herds, but they must now bear the expense of a thorough clean-up; it will cost a great deal of money, at present values, to buy in a similar number of cattle of comparable quality and the monthly cheque for milk and dairy products is forfeited until the herd is replaced.

Young farmers exposed to such a set of circumstances have commendable courage and determination if they carry on.

Middle-aged farmers are in a similar position, except that their net losses are usually much greater because of larger herds built up over the years. They, too, have fortitude and determination if they proceed to rebuild.

The situation is indeed serious—in some cases tragic. The $38 received as compensation is a ridiculously small recognition, or reward, on the part of the state, when the cattle raiser is obliged to pay $250 or $300 for cattle as good as those sacrificed in this T.B. clean-up campaign.

The inadequacy of the compensation can be further emphasized by the fact that after compensation and salvage have been received many cattle raisers suffer a net loss of two and three thousand dollars. Surely the people of Canada are not demanding that sacrifice on the part of Canadian farmers.

We submit that the regulations are too rigid. Appraisal values are now far too low and the actual compensation is grossly inadequate in these times.

More flexible regulations, with an element of adaptability about them, might be found applicable even to the circumstances about which we complain.

Recommendations

We submit that the valuation on grade cows should be raised to $100 with a comparable increase in the valuation placed on other classes of cattle.

Perhaps the severest blow is suffered by farmers in the loss of cattle going to the tank and thus, under present regulations, producing no salvage revenue. We therefore strongly urge that market value at prevailing beef prices be paid the owner, as well as compensation, for all animals declared to be tankers.

And we recommend further that these increased payments be made retroactive to the beginning of post-war area testing.

Some time later the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his parliamentary assistant made certain statements. The parliamentary assistant is reported on page 2737 of Hansard of April 29, 1949, as having answered a question asked by Mr. Daniel, the former member for Oxford, as follows:

I can assure the member that it is the intention of the government to increase the compensation paid to T.B. reactors, and also to make it retroactive.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

The Minister of Agriculture is reported at page 2239 of Hansard of April 1, 1949, as having said:

I am able to state that those who are concerned with the matter have been in to see us and they did not ask for any more than we were considering giving, so I think it likely there will be satisfaction when an announcement is finally made.

A group of cattle raisers approached the department and following that the minister and his parliamentary assistant made the promises that I have referred to. This bill certainly does not live up to those promises; the promises and the practices are poles apart. In the statement made by the parliamentary assistant no reference whatever was made to tankers; the only reference was to reactors.

In legal matters a great deal of attention is paid to precedent and I should like to direct attention to the precedents that have been established by former ministers of agriculture under similar conditions, and I refer to the Hon. Mr. Burrell in 1913, the Hon. Mr. Crerar in 1918, and the Hon. Mr. Motherwell in 1923, as well as the Hon. Mr. Tolmie, who was minister of agriculture when the original motion was introduced to take care of the problems covered by this bill.

This being a money bill, I am not in position to introduce an amendment, but, as I have mentioned previously, many farmers in the counties of Oxford, Norfolk, Perth and others are disappointed. I should like to refer to one or two statements that have been made in the house on previous occasions. First I should like to quote a statement made by the late Harry Leader, former member for Portage la Prairie, as reported on page 2739 of Hansard of 1922. He said:

I wish to protest against the reduction of the indemnity paid for purebred cattle. I have received numerous letters and telegrams and I know if I stay here long enough I shall be beseiged by sheaves of letters and telegrams in regard to this matter.

Breeders are just waking up to the fact that there is going to be a reduction in the indemnity.

That was in 1922 when the government was trying to reduce the amount. If they thought it convenient to reduce it when cattle prices were going down, then surely they can find it convenient to increase it when cattle prices are much higher. Mr. Leader went on to say:

I protest against the reduction in the indemnifications for cattle . . . But what about the effect of the disease on human beings? The statistics show that one child, in every three under the age of ten who have tuberculosis, contacted the disease through a bovine origin.

It is my opinion that the work should be continued, and that farmers should not be discouraged but encouraged. Mr. Kellner, a member of the house in 1922, produced statistics to show that the average value of a grade cow in the province of Ontario was $59, and at the same time the valuation for compensation purposes was placed at $150 for purebreds and $60 for grades, the government paying two-thirds of those figures. Therefore I feel that the bill is not adequate and I should like to hear the parliamentary assistant explain why it is so inadequate.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Before the motion carries, Mr. Speaker, there is one matter I want to put before the parliamentary assistant. I have raised this question time after time in the house. I brought it up again during the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in the present session. It has to do with two of the most glaring cases that agriculture has experienced in the matter of compensation paid for reactors under the tuberculosis test regulations. I regret that it is necessary to raise the subject so often, but when I was on my feet on the last occasion I cautioned the minister in connection with it, and said that I thought there was a sufficiently outstanding injustice perpetrated upon these two particular farmers and dairymen for the matter to be repeated until some remedy was provided.

The reason I am raising it again is that the principle of Bill 147 seems to be aimed not at remedying the injustice but at preventing the government from remedying it. I am not going to refer to clauses of the bill because that normally takes place in committee. One of the major principles of the bill is in section 3, and as I see it it prevents any review, unless the parliamentary assistant can give an explanation in committee to the contrary, or any payment of compensation to these farmers whose cause I have tried to champion before.

In order that the parliamentary assistant may understand the point I am raising, in a year previous to 1947, prior to which the act is not retroactive, Donald McIntyre, a farmer and dairyman living a little to the east of Stayner in the county of Simcoe, had a herd of purebred Holstein cattle which had been tested for tuberculosis for years and years under the ordinary government regulations, and had always reacted favourably. In the year 1943 or 1944—I am not sure which it is, but it is on record so often that it is easy to ascertain—forty-three out of forty-four of his herd went down and were slaughtered. When they went to the abattoir there was not a single jot or tittle of evidence that any of them had tuberculosis anywhere in their carcasses.

In addition to that, a careful examination was made by the government veterinarians at the abattoir, and the closest they could come to any sign of tuberculosis was that there was evidence that at one time one cow had had pneumonia. To me that seemed to be stretching it pretty far, and the farmer took a similar view of it. I am told that at that particular time—and I do not think there is any doubt about the evidence in this case—there was a change in the type of serum used in the tuberculosis test. I know that changes have been made in the serum from time to time, and the department no doubt would readily explain that they were made because of certain United States regulations. Sometimes some of our cattle have been allowed to go there, and it was found when they got them there that the United States serum showed an unfavourable reaction, and that the cows were reactors.

Nevertheless, in the case to which I have referred a new serum was used, a serum that apparently was particularly severe on the system of the animal, and it caused the whole herd to go down with the exception of one cow. The veterinarians involved in the matter were not satisfied. I am satisfied also that the department was greatly concerned about what had happened. Not only did one herd go down but also another herd in the province of Nova Scotia reacted at the same time, and that farmer also lost his cattle. I think it can be established beyond any question that the serum used, severe as it was, caused these farmers to lose their herds, and to have to take a lower price by virtue thereof.

It seems to me that the act will be an insurmountable obstacle to any review or payment which might be made to these two badly used farmers. It is not as though there are hundreds of herds across Canada for which compensation will have to be paid because of the severity of this particular serum. So far as I know, and I think the records of the department will bear me out, there are only two herds. Time after time we have done things in this house to provide for special cases. Where the fault does not lie with the farmer but with the government, I think the government has a special obligation that ought to be met. I hope that the parliamentary assistant, when he comes to section 3 of the bill, will not say that the legislation rules out a review of these cases. I had hoped, from the rather favourable reaction of the minister when his estimates were before the house, that he was going to give favourable consideration to remedying this most outstanding injustice. It is a great disappointment and discouragement to me, as it is to the two farmers involved, that legislation such as this should be put on the statute books which will block the possibility of remedying an injustice. What we should be doing is passing statutes to remedy injustices, not putting on the statute books of Canada laws that will prevent injustices from being remedied. I do plead with the parliamentary assistant to see that, whatever happens with respect to this legislation, it does not bar the correcting of abuses such as I have outlined.

I said before, and I repeat, that neither of these two farmers is a constituent of mine. I have no axe to grind, but I have been impressed with the obvious injustice—I am not suggesting that the government was trying to get reactors among those herds, but wherever there may be some doubt the government ought to lean towards the farmer. I believe the government should pay the farmer for the loss that was occasioned through no fault of his, but owing to the fact that the serum used was too severe. As I understand, this serum was later withdrawn.

Now, that is the case in a nutshell. I regret having to raise this question time after time, but I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to raise it until such time as that injustice is remedied. If this bill is going to bar the remedying of that situation, then the minister ought to review it before it finally becomes law. It is not fair; it is not just; it is not equitable. Surely, if there is any class of people in Canada deserving of justice and equity, it is the people in our agricultural sections.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to register my protest in regard to the compensation offered in this bill. I believe the parliamentary assistant and the minister know quite well that it is not sufficient. The promises which were made before the election campaign are not being fulfilled. I believe the minister should listen to the protests that have been made. The test is being conducted in my county now, and many farmers are complaining about the amount they are receiving.

I might mention one woman in particular who, before the election, wrote to me complaining about the fact that her cattle were the only cattle that reacted in that particular section. She complained bitterly. I do not know why her cattle were the only ones. It might have been that they were the only affected cattle in the section because, certainly, I do not believe any difference would be made in the tests. Apparently, she thought she was being discriminated against, and it was rather difficult to talk her out of that position. In any event, the compensation being offered in this bill is not nearly sufficient to pay for the loss sustained when cattle react to the test.

Those members who know something about keeping a dairy herd are well aware of what it costs to replenish a herd. Many herds have reacted; in some sections worse than in others. My own herd has not yet been tested, so I am not talking about myself. I do plead with the parliamentary assistant to do everything he can to have this bill sent to a committee and re-worded, so that those who have suffered losses will receive fair compensation.

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty to inform the house that if the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture speaks for the minister he will close the debate.

Mr. A. C. Murray (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to the tests conducted in the county of Oxford. May I ask the parliamentary assistant how many reactors there were in Oxford county? How many cattle did go to the tank within the last two and one-half years?

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray), I should say that that question will be answered when the bill goes to the committee. It was not my intention to say very much about this bill at this time, but owing to what has been said I feel it is my duty, as parliamentary assistant, to say something about the matter.

This question has been under discussion since last fall. Last October or November, when the federation meetings were being held in the county of Middlesex, this matter was brought to the fore quite forcibly. The feeling at the township meetings in the county of Middlesex was that the farmers were not receiving fair compensation for the reactors. I attended many of those meetings and listened to the suggestions, both pro and con, about what should be done. I was questioned about it and I asked questions of those present. I obtained the views of the farmers of my own county as best I could. There were views put forward in favour of raising the compensation for reactors, and other views in favour of raising the compensation for the reactors that went to the tank.

I listened to all those views, and considered them for some time. I came to Ottawa in December of last year, at the time of the dominion-provincial conference on agriculture, and took this matter up with our departmental officials. I asked them if some assistance could not be given the farmers who lost cattle as a result of these T.B. tests. They asked me what I wanted to do, and I said I should like to have the Animal Contagious Diseases Act amended. As such an amendment would have to be brought before parliament and parliament was not meeting until January, nothing could be done until that time. I asked the departmental officials to consider the matter in the meantime.

As I said, the federation had met in Middlesex county. During the meeting, resolutions were passed and I have copies of those resolutions. Most of the resolutions did not request as much as we are now granting, but the resolutions differed from township to township. When parliament met in January of this year, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the officials of the department discussed this matter. We were all of the same opinion as to what should be done for those farmers who had lost cattle as a result of the T.B. tests. Everyone in this house understands that these T.B. tests are for health purposes.

Some of the farmers are opposed to the test, just as I was back in 1939. At that time a petition was circulated in the county of Middlesex for these T.B. tests, and I was one of those bitterly opposed to it. I am not opposed to it now. I feel it is a proper move to make. The sooner our herds are cleaned up, the better. We discussed what should be done, and various ideas were expressed. The departmental officials were requested to make a survey to ascertain how much it would cost if an amendment to the act were introduced to raise the compensation to the price mentioned in the act, $60 and $150, instead of two-thirds of that amount. The survey was made and we were told what the cost would be.

During that period of time, the federation of agriculture sent a deputation to Ottawa to interview the minister and departmental officials about raising the compensation. They did not come alone. They got in touch with the surrounding counties of Middlesex, Oxford, Elgin, Lambton, Kent, Perth and Huron; and on March 15 representatives came from all those counties I have just mentioned, except Oxford. Oxford did not send a representative down on that occasion. But the other men came down. Before they came, they had discussed this matter with me or our own men of Middlesex county; and they appointed two men to come down. These were level-headed young chaps who were interested in this T.B. testing, for they both had had their own herds tested and had lost quite a few cattle by it. They came down and interviewed the minister and myself with respect to this matter.

What the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) has read is the brief that they handed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on that occasion. The minister had discussed this matter at length with myself and with the officials. We had come to an agreement on it. I will take part of the responsibility for that. We felt that the best plan to follow was to pay the full price for the T.B. reactors that went to the tanks and leave the compensation what it was; that was $100 and $40. I am taking the actual amounts. I am not taking the two-thirds that is being paid. You understand that the amount was set at $60 for grades and $150 for purebreds; but we paid only two-thirds of that amount. We felt it was better to leave that amount of compensation at $40 for grade cattle and $100 for purebred cattle and to raise the amount that was paid for the T.B. reactors that went to the tank.

To the representatives of the federation who came to us on that occasion we told what we intended to do. I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker. The representatives of all those counties did not raise a dissenting voice. They said they were heartily in favour of the action we were taking. There was not much said. They asked that it be retroactive, but not much was said with respect to how far back it would go. But they went away perfectly satisfied. As I said before, I was sitting right there in the room and I did not hear one dissenting voice raised from among them.

Then we went ahead and prepared a bill in the early part of March, and our officials determined the amount of money that it would cost the dominion treasury if we followed out the policy that we had inaugurated; that was, leaving the compensation the way it was, $40 and $100, and paying the full cost of the T.B. reactors that went to the tank.

They came back with a bill prepared, and giving us the cost to the dominion treasury, saying that that act would go into effect on the first day of April of this year. You know full well that I would oppose that suggestion most strenuously. I felt that was unfair to the numerous counties and sections of the country across Canada. If we brought that bill into effect on the first of April, those that were tested before the first of April would not benefit by it, but only those that were tested after the first of April. We asked that they endeavour to make it retroactive to the time we struck upon, April 1, 1947, which was a time when we felt there was quite a bit of T.B. testing done after the war.

They then had to scrap that bill, and go ahead and make a survey of what it was going to cost to make it retroactive. You understand, Mr. Speaker, as does the house, that that would take a good deal of time. But nevertheless our officials went ahead and prepared that bill. They went ahead and told us approximately how much it was going to cost and how much money we would have to ask the dominion treasury for. As you know, our minister was in the west in the latter part of April, and on April 29 that bill was handed to me. As you know, we dissolved on the next day. I had the bill in my pocket when the question was asked by the then member for Oxford and the then member for Bruce, when they rose in their seats across the floor of the house and asked the question that has just been read from Hansard of April 29. I made the answer that the compensation would be raised. I was sincere in that answer. I was not asked to give an explanation of it. I only said what I knew was going to take place. The hon. member for Bruce put the question to me. It will be found in Hansard of that date. I do not need to look it up; I have it here on my desk. He asked me if that would be made retroactive to the fall of 1947 and my answer was that when the bill was brought down it would be satisfactory to the good people of Bruce on that occasion; for I knew that they had not started in testing before the first of April, 1947.

That was the condition up to that date. Of course, I felt worried about this bill. I was keenly interested in it because the farmers of Canada were interested in it; and anything that is of interest to the farmers of Canada, Mr. Speaker, is of interest to me.

As I felt that the house was going to dissolve the next day and that we were going to go to the country, and as I felt keenly about that bill, I went to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and asked him if there would be a chance for me to introduce it before the house dissolved. He said that there would not, but that he would give me his word that if we were returned to power he would see to it that the bill was introduced at the first session after the election. I made that answer across the floor of the house, and you know the answer that came back, Mr. Speaker. I was hooted for that statement; for hon. members opposite felt that neither the Prime Minister nor I would have the opportunity of introducing any bill after the election. But you know what took place on June 27.

That was the condition up to that time. I will say this, Mr. Speaker. That question was made a political football all during the election campaign. I have some of the advertisements of my worthy opponents at that time, and I know what they said. It has been stated that outside the house, with respect to this matter, I had made statements that were not true and not in accordance with the facts. I can read numerous reports, but I will read one which is from the London Free Press of May 7, when I was speaking in Seaforth at the convention that chose the present member for Huron-Perth, Mr. McLean. I was speaking at that convention. Here is my statement then. This was taken from the London Free Press of May 7:

> There had been some criticism, said Mr. McCubbin, that the compensation paid for T.B. reactors that went to the tank was insufficient. The Prime Minister had promised that if his government was returned that the cattle producers would get full value as if the animal had gone for beef.

That is exactly my statement on that occasion. I will take another statement that I made, addressing my own nomination meeting at Strathroy; and if there are any people that I would never fool, they are my own people. I made the same statement to them. I said that, if this government was returned, a bill would be introduced with respect to compensation for T.B. reactors, and that I would see that the full cost would be paid for the T.B. reactors that went to the tank. I made that quite clear. On every occasion on which I spoke at that time I mentioned T.B. reactors that went to the tank. Nevertheless, you know what took place.

Here are some of the advertisements of my opponents. Here is the picture of my friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and here is a whole page with respect to T.B. reactors, and with respect to what I said on that occasion. This advertisement appears in The Ledger of London, Ontario, and contains these words:

> The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture sought to whitewash this deliberate refusal to rule upon a matter so important to you, by promising to do better in the future.

What I have promised, I have just told you. In all the addresses I made in western Ontario I promised that the full beef prices would be paid for the T.B. reactors that went to the tank. I felt—and I have not changed my mind—that the fairest way to deal with this matter was as follows. The farmer has a cow, a heifer or a steer. The animal is sent to the abattoir and killed. He should get the beef value of that animal. The farmer needs to be careful with this. We know the farmers are shrewd and careful. If they send the beast to the abattoir they will get the full beef value. If the beast is infected and goes to the tank they get only the hide value. If it is not infected they will get the full beef value.

I know what the farmers in my district are receiving for these cattle that are sent to the abattoirs. These are not tankers. They get the beef value plus $38 or $40. They are well satisfied with this price. The farmer who has a T.B. reactor which goes to the tank is not satisfied now and has not been satisfied. He receives only the price of the hide, which is $6 or $8 or whatever it happens to be, plus $38 or $40. If that farmer should receive the full beef price for the T.B. reactor I can tell the house that he would be satisfied. In my contacts with the farmers of western Ontario I have never heard one say that he was not satisfied.

The hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) made the statement that he has not heard anyone who complained about the T.B. reactors that went to the tank. That has not been my experience. That is the man who has kicked very strongly. Hon. members will say to me: Why are you doing this? What precedent have you for this? I can tell them that there is no country in the world—and I am taking in the whole wide world—that does as much for T.B. reactors as Canada does. Take the United States. Hon. members understand the set-up there. The veterinary and a valuator come in and value the beef. Take a cow. The cow is worth $200. That is the valuation the valuator places upon it. He sends the T.B. reactor to the abattoir as a farmer in Canada would do. Say he receives $150 for the beef in that cow. Then he is paid one-third of the difference between the beef price and the valuator's price. That would be one-third of $50. Hon. members can figure that out for themselves. It will be $15 or $16. Hon. members may ask me, What about the T.B. reactor that goes to the tank? It is not worth anything as beef. The same thing takes place there. The valuation placed upon that cow or beef may be $200. He would receive $10 for the hide, and he would receive one-third of $190. Hon. members can figure that out for themselves. As a matter of fact it is $62 or $63. That is the amount of money that he would receive.

The over-all picture in the United States is as follows: The average amount that the federal Department of Agriculture pays across the whole country does not exceed $25 per head. I claim that we in Canada are doing the thing that is fairest to all the farmers, and that is the only way to act with them. I know that there will be the individual case as was mentioned by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I shall answer that when we get into committee. I feel that we are doing the fair thing by the farmers of Canada, and that is what we should do. If there is any class of people in this country who should receive due and honest consideration it is the farmers.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Compensation to owners.

Mr. Charlton: Was the brief presented by the delegation from western Ontario the only brief considered at that time? Was the brief sent in by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture not considered at all? I have read both of these briefs. I do know that they asked for an increase in the compensation to be paid. They did not simply ask that the compensation and beef price be paid for tankers.

Mr. McCubbin: The brief which I hold in my hand and which was read to the house by the hon. member for Middlesex East—

Mr. Charlton: That is not the one I mean. I refer to the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. McCubbin: I have no copy of that brief.

Mr. Charlton: The parliamentary assistant knows nothing of the brief presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture?

Mr. McCubbin: All I know about the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is that they said they were not satisfied with the compensation that the producers were receiving, and that came from our own district of western Ontario. What they said is contained in better form in the brief that was presented and read to the house by the hon. member for Middlesex East. The thing that they dwelt on in that brief is the thing that we are doing.

Mr. Charlton: I realize the thing they dwelt on in the brief, but what we are asking for now is an increase in the compensation to be paid. They may have emphasized the fact that they wanted the beef price for the reactors that go to the tank. I can understand that, if the minister stated bluntly to the delegation when they were in his office what he was prepared to do, the delegation would think there was no use fighting with him. Probably for that reason they did not say that they were not satisfied. Perhaps the minister told them what he intended to do, and they took for granted that that was as far as the thing would go.

The parliamentary assistant mentioned the testing in the United States. I should like to point out to him that the test that is being done now in Canada was completed many years ago in the United States. They are not taking the considerable losses over there at the present time that the farmers are here, because the test was done some years ago. What they are cleaning up now in that country is just the odd reactor. It does not mean a terrific loss to any one breeder. In this country the loss is considerable especially, as I said before, in a herd of purebred cattle that has been bred up over a period of twenty-five or thirty years, probably two generations. The value a farmer places on a purebred herd of cattle today is probably two or three times more than he can possibly get as compensation. He is the man who is taking the terrific loss. The test is being done for the first time. In many cases the test was promised as far back as 1938 and 1939 when the price of cattle was much lower than it is today. The test was not continued during the war. During the intervening years between then and the time the test was conducted the price of cattle more than doubled, and yet the farmers are asked to bear that burden themselves. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the parliamentary assistant to the minister is being very—

Mr. Weir: Sympathetic is the word you want.

Mr. Charlton: No, not sympathetic. He is being very—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is hard to say, isn't it?

Mr. Charlton: —very good to himself, probably, in thinking that these people are satisfied. I can tell him that they are not satisfied. I am sure he is kidding himself and the people when he says that they are going to be satisfied, because they certainly are not.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Are any payments received under this bill regarded as income for income tax purposes?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes. Any moneys received from the sale of cattle, or compensation of this kind, would certainly be considered income.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Where a farmer receives a total of $150 and the animal is worth $250, is any consideration given so far as income tax is concerned? He has already lost $100.

Mr. McCubbin: The hon. member will have to ask the Minister of National Revenue that question.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): He is not a farmer.

Mr. McCubbin: As I know farmers, if a farmer receives $150 as compensation it will be shown as income, so far as income tax is concerned. But most farmers will not stop there. They will go out and buy another beast for $175 or $200.

Mr. Charlton: Where can a farmer buy one for that?

[Mr. Charlton.]

Mr. Cardiff: If he receives only $150 for the beef on the test, he would certainly pay $250 for one as good. There is no question about that.

Mr. Charlton: How is the beef price established for the tanker cattle?

Mr. McCubbin: The hon. member is referring to section 1, is he?

Mr. Charlton: That is section 1.

Mr. McCubbin: No, that is section 3.

Mr. Charlton: It is paragraph (b) of section 1.

Mr. McCubbin: If I can either read or write, when my hon. friend asks how we are going to set the price the farmer is going to receive for these cattle, he is referring to section 3, and certainly not to any other section, because in no other section does the $40 arise.

Mr. Charlton: I can read, all right, and I find that paragraph (b) states—

> In the case of cattle, one hundred dollars for pure-bred animals and forty dollars for grade animals, and if the sale of the carcass is unlawful an additional amount for pure-bred and grade animals equal to the value the carcass would have if the sale were lawful, such value to be determined by the minister or by some person appointed by him for that purpose.

Mr. Cardiff: It is in black and white.

Mr. McCubbin: Well, it does not make much difference; it can be answered here as well as anywhere. But I would say that should come under section 3.

Mr. Charlton: Section 3 is the retroactive part of it.

Mr. McCubbin: That is what we are worrying about.

Mr. Charlton: I am not.

Mr. McCubbin: We do not need to worry about what is going to take place from here on; it is from here back that the trouble arises.

Mr. Graydon: Back to 1943?

Mr. Charlton: The parliamentary assistant is not worried, but I am worried about what will happen from here on.

Mr. McCubbin: After this bill goes through —and I hope it will—a farmer in Brant county may send two cows to Hamilton, or Toronto, or wherever they may happen to go. He knows the cow that goes in there is a good cow and he can get 13 or 14 cents for it on the hoof, or from 28 to 29 dressed. That is the one cow. Then, another cow goes to the tank, one which looks just the same. He will receive that same price of 13 or 14 cents for the animal, as if it had been sold for beef.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): One cow weighs 300 pounds more than the other.

Mr. McCubbin: It is on the weight of the beef. After all, two cows go to the slaughter house, and they are both weighed there. One goes to the tank and the other goes for beef. He will be paid the average price of that day on that cow that goes to the tank.

Mr. Cardiff: What I object to is the fact that these cows that go down are not beef cows. They are cows which have been producing milk for some time, and have very little beef on them.

An hon. Member: Some of them have.

Mr. Cardiff: But not many of them. If they were any good when milking, they have not much beef on them. I know something about beef and dairy cows. If they were beef cattle it would not be so bad; but cows which have been milking do not weigh very much when they go down on test. That is where these people lose out on their cows—because they do not weigh much.

Mr. McCubbin: A statement I have here indicates that canners and cutters are from $10 to $11.75—let us say it would be 11 cents a pound, if she is a canner or a cutter. One can figure out what he would get for her—plus the $40.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister going to say they are going to pay the full amount stated here in the bill? Will they pay the full amount of $40 for grade animals, for instance?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, approximately—$38 to $40.

Mr. Charlton: "Approximately"—yes. I will point out to the parliamentary assistant that until last year they were paying $38 or $39 for grade cattle. I wonder if $40 is to be set for all types of grade cattle?

Mr. McCubbin: It will be set for most types. One would not get $40, of course, for a calf. But for anything over two years old he would receive $38 or $40. We will admit that prior to six or eight months ago one would not receive that much. But during the last six or seven months he would have received somewhere around $38 or $39.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I referred earlier to the fact that practically all ministers of agriculture since the time Dr. Tolmie introduced the legislation have seen fit to adjust the payments either upward or downward according to the price of cattle. The price the bill now proposes to set is the price which was invoked when the average in Ontario for cows was $59. Is the government now going to set a precedent which is opposite to what has been done by former ministers of agriculture since the time this type of legislation was introduced? If so, I do not think it is right.

Mr. McCubbin: What the hon. member for Middlesex East has said may be true; but we are dealing now with 1949, and it will not be long until 1950. We have to bring in legislation which fits the time. We feel it is the best legislation for the present. I know in my own district farmers are receiving $175 to $200 for them, plus $40, and that is not a bad price. Some of the dairy cows do not bring that much—but you have obtained a lot of milk from them during the past summer to compensate.

Mr. Charlton: The parliamentary assistant is taking the present price. Is he now saying that the price of cattle is on the down trend and that therefore there is no need to increase the allowance at the present time? Is that the inference?

Mr. Weir: No.

Mr. Charlton: Is the government not considering the question I asked a moment ago regarding compensation at the figures in the old bill? That would be $150 for purebred and $60 for grade animals. Is the government not considering that at all?

Mr. McCubbin: We have considered this from every angle, and we feel that what we offer here is fair to everybody concerned. The farmer may be willing to bear part of the burden, but I do not think he should be asked to bear all of it. If he has a T.B. cow or steer he is willing to bear part of it—but there is no reason why he should bear all of it. We have felt that we have taken the fairest possible action in the bill before us now.

Mr. Charlton: The parliamentary assistant made the statement earlier that they had asked departmental officials for some idea as to what this would cost the department. I should like the parliamentary assistant to let me know what would be the cost under this bill and what would be the cost if the compensation had been increased to $150 for purebreds and $60 for grades? Has he obtained those figures from the departmental officials?

Mr. McCubbin: I have not those figures here, but I will state that the present plan will cost more than the other plan.

Mr. Charlton: I hate to disagree with the parliamentary assistant but I think he is considerably out with his figures. An average of nine per cent of the reacting animals go to the tank, and if they pay the full beef price for those animals it would cost no more than probably half what it would cost to pay the increased compensation on all types of reactors. Will the parliamentary assistant get me those figures?

Mr. Harkness: I should like to interject a somewhat different note into this discussion. Looking at section 1 it would appear that our old friend the horse, or at least his owner, is going to take a beating. The section to be repealed provided for the payment of $150 for each grade horse and $300 for each purebred, but under the proposed amendment the payments will be at the rate of $100 and $200 respectively, a considerable decrease.

I imagine that the reason that was done is that the ordinary work animal on the farm is fast disappearing and in a few years there will probably be none left except in the isolated areas. Perhaps that is the reason for the reduction in payments. At the present time the grade horse, or even the purebred draft horse, brings a small price in comparison to what was obtained ten, fifteen or twenty years ago. On the other hand, light horses have been increasing in price and as far as I can see the only horse that is going to be bred in this or other countries is the light type of thoroughbred, standard bred and saddle horse.

The number of people who are riding horses has increased in recent years rather than decreased and the demand for good saddle horses is better today than it has been for many years. The type of horse that we sold for $25 to $50 in 1920 in western Canada now brings from $100 to $300. In other words, while the price of draft horses has been coming down, the price of light horses has been going up. Therefore, it would seem to be a mistake to reduce the compensation to be paid for animals destroyed under this act.

I think the parliamentary assistant knows that the thoroughbred or standard bred horse is worth more than it was twenty years ago and is worth even more than the compensation provided in the old section. The same applies to animals which are not registered, such as saddle horses. In order to protect the light horse breeders the compensation provided in the old section should be continued.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Repeal.

Mr. Graydon: I do not like trying to pin the parliamentary assistant down to an answer with respect to this section, but I am afraid he is in for it this time. I have tried to get something from the department but all I have received is a very evasive answer with respect to the two cases I am interested in. Will this bill when passed create a bar or obstacle to the review of the McIntyre and Nova Scotia cases which I brought up before?

Mr. McCubbin: It does not prevent the review of any case and it will not prevent the review of the cases that have been mentioned.

Mr. Charlton: What is the reason for repealing this section which provided the only out the farmer had if there was a mistake by either the inspector or the department?

Mr. McCubbin: We felt that it was not necessary. As I told the hon. member for Peel, the farmer has a right to appeal any case if he wishes.

Mr. Charlton: He may have the right, but does he get redress? Apparently nothing has been done about the two cases mentioned by the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. McCubbin: I should like to ask the hon. member for Peel some questions. He and I will thresh this out between us.

An hon. Member: At the next election.

Mr. McCubbin: The next election is a long way off, four or five years. There are some questions I should like to ask the hon. member and I know he will ask me some, as he has a right to do. However, that will not be done on this occasion.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): How many herds have been paid for under the section that is to be repealed? Can the parliamentary assistant give me that information by provinces?

Mr. McCubbin: I cannot do that.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Has anything been paid at all?

Mr. McCubbin: If the hon. member wishes that information I shall try to get it for him, but I have not got it here tonight. The hon. member for Oxford asked me how many reactors there had been in his county and how many had gone to the tank. In the period April 1, 1947, to September 30, 1949, there were 13,969 reactors in that county, of which 1,633 went to the tank.

Mr. Cardiff: After a man has had a test he is given so many days in which to clean up; how many days is he given?

Mr. McCubbin: As soon as he can; there is no set day. He is asked to clean up.

Mr. Cardiff: He has an opportunity then of getting another test if he so wishes? If he is not satisfied with the test, has he an opportunity of having them tested by some other veterinarian?

Mr. McCubbin: No; once the government veterinarian comes in and tests the herd the farmer must abide by that.

Mr. Cardiff: I am afraid there are a lot of government veterinarians who are new at the job. I am not saying they are not efficient, but there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with some of them. If a man is not satisfied with the test, I think it is only right and proper that he should have the opportunity of having another veterinarian come in and make another test.

Mr. McCubbin: We would never get anywhere if we did that, but he certainly has a right to ask the head government veterinarian in the district to come. Does your head veterinarian come from Seaforth?

Mr. Cardiff: I think so.

Mr. McCubbin: The farmer has the right to call in the head veterinarian of the district along with the veterinarian who has made the test.

Mr. Ferrie: Provided that the veterinarian does not punch the ear; if he punches the ear then the animal cannot be touched.

Mr. Anderson: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question. Can he tell me how many cattle were tested in this period in the county of Norfolk, how many reactors there were, and how many were sent to the tank?

Mr. McCubbin: I cannot tell the hon. member how many cattle have been tested in Norfolk, but 111 reacted, and seven went to the tank in that period.

Mr. Charlton: On section 3 the parliamentary assistant can answer the question he was going to answer under section 1. Under the retroactive part of the legislation, how are they going to set the price of animals that have gone to the tank from the 31st March, 1947, up till the present time?

Mr. McCubbin: As the bill indicates, power is given to the minister to set a period, and the average price will be taken in that period. It is the intention of the department to take a three-month period. We will go back to April 1, 1947, and take the average price for April, May and June. They will take the average price of steers for that three-month period, the average price of cows, the average price of calves, and so on. That average price will be the price paid for tuberculosis reactors that went to the tank in that period.

Mr. Charlton: Has the department weight slips for every one of these tanker animals?

Mr. McCubbin: No, they have not got them all. I admit that. They will do it as fairly as possible. We know how many went, and we know what type they were, cows, calves or steers. They may not have the exact weights. In some cases they have and in some cases they have not. I admit that it will be a difficult job in some cases going back two years, but we will do the best we can in the interests of the farmers.

Mr. Charlton: As I understand, the department is going to figure out an average price for all animals that went to the tank during that three-month period.

Mr. McCubbin: Taking three months at a time. Do you understand?

Mr. Charlton: Yes, I think I do. They will take a period of three months starting from April 1, 1947, and running through April, May and June. Then they will take another three months following that and will work in three-month periods for the whole time.

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: It is possible that a calf might get the value of a cow if it is worked out on an average basis that way. It is an average price.

Mr. McCubbin: An average price for calves, cows and steers.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to explain the last three lines on that page, reading:

> . . . the owners of the slaughtered cattle shall be paid in respect of each carcass, the sale of which was unlawful at the time of slaughter . . .

What does it mean when it says, "unlawful at the time of slaughter"?

Mr. McCubbin: That means that the sale of the beast for human consumption was unlawful.

Mr. Major: Tests are now being carried on in my county, and I understand that from half to two-thirds of the cattle are already tested. Can the parliamentary assistant tell me what percentage is going down?

Mr. McCubbin: In the county of Glengarry it is practically nil. Only nineteen went down in two and a half years and only five went to the tank.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I am going to ask for leniency because I believe my question is out of order, but in the past where farmers have desired to have herds accredited it has been a requirement that there be ten cattle. The reason it was set at ten was the cost of going out to various places to do this. If it could be so arranged that the farmers of a township desiring to have herds accredited could have them all ready at a certain time, one trip to the township would do the whole thing, and the cost would not be so great. I think ten is too many. There are young farmers with herds of five, and with the present price of cattle I think ten is too many.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will go into supply and take up the estimates of the Department of National Defence. If we finish them we will take up the rest of the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. If more time is available, we will take up Bill 133 and Bill 143, two measures of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am authorized to say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be here on the 16th and 17th of November, next Wednesday and Thursday. We shall have to make a formal motion to go into supply in order to take up his estimates on Wednesday. We will not call any new department, hoping that there will not be a long discussion before we get into supply.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the minister one question as to the debate on external affairs. It is the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to come back for two days, the 16th and 17th. I understand that on the second day he intends to present himself for examination before the standing committee on external affairs. The 16th is a Wednesday. Is it the intention of the government to sit for only half a day on Wednesday? If so, there will not be much opportunity for a full-dress debate on external affairs in half a day.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will be sitting on Wednesday morning too. If the motion to be moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) tomorrow carries, we will sit next Wednesday from eleven to one and from three to six, and on the Thursday the estimates of the department would be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Herridge: On a question of privilege, tomorrow—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house is now adjourned.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. I should like to deal further with the question of the order of business. I believe it would be of great assistance to the members if an indication could be given as to the definite time when the bill amending the Combines Investigation Act will be brought up. I imagine that will be one of the most important debates of this session.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we wish to take up the bill concerning housing; that will be the first order of business on Monday at eleven o'clock. I do not know what time will be spent on that measure, but I see no objection to proceeding with the bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act after the housing bill.

Mr. Drew: On Monday.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday.

Mr. Herridge: Before the house adjourns I should like to point out that tomorrow is November 11, Remembrance day. It is a day which is very dear to the members of this house who are veterans. I believe it would be particularly fitting if the veteran members of the house were to meet here at 10:45 a.m. and parade to the national war memorial service. I suggest arrangements be made in this respect.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 11, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Third report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Winkler.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MORNING SITTINGS—FURTHER LEGISLATION—CREATION OF THREE NEW DEPARTMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, November 14, 1949, until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall be an intermission every day from 1 to 3 o'clock p.m.

He said: The reason for presenting this motion at this time is my understanding that it is the hope of a large number of members of the house that it will be possible to complete the work of this session not later than December 3. Of course no one would wish to slight the consideration that still must be given to the matters that remain to be dealt with. By going on the eight-hour day schedule at this time we feel that it will be possible to give due consideration not only to the matters which are already indicated on the order paper, but to some which are yet to be introduced.

As you will see, Mr. Speaker, there are twenty-three items under government orders at the present time, and some of them have several subdivisions. For instance, there are the estimates, which will provide the occasion for the debate on external affairs which the Minister of Public Works announced it was our hope to initiate next Wednesday. There are the estimates of other departments in which the general item of administration has not yet been considered, and these will give rise to some debate.

In addition to those measures and such others as are on the order paper of the other place, it is the intention of the government to introduce a certain number of additional bills, of which I have a list here.

There will be a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It is not a substantial amendment; it is designed to clarify and to make more readily workable certain of the provisions of the act. There will be a bill to fix the duration of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and another to fix the duration of the Fisheries Prices Support Act. A bill will be introduced to amend the Customs Tariff Act, in certain minor particulars having to do with articles which under the tariff are now prohibited entry. There will be a bill to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act, to enlarge the proportion of the available funds that can be used in what are classified under the act as the larger loans. Certain minor amendments are required to the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act to conform with the legislation and practices of certain of the provinces.

The Department of Trade and Commerce will have a bill to amend the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, and also a bill to provide assistance in the production of coal in the maritime region of Canada. The Department of Transport will have a bill to increase the amount of stores that may be kept as a bank to supply the requirements of the services. The present act has a limitation that is found to be insufficient to allow the department to have a bank of stores necessary for convenient administration.

There is also to be a bill dealing with the encouragement of construction of Canadian vessels. That will be brought down at an early day.

In addition to these, there will come from the Senate, or at least it is hoped that there will, the consolidated national defence act, which is now under consideration in that house; a bill to amend the Customs Act, and a bill to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act, clarifying the procedure for the disposal of surplus property of the various departments of government. These bills are being introduced in the Senate, probably at its next sitting.

Hon. members will recall that the speech from the throne refers to a bill to provide for the continuance of functions now vested in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. After careful consideration it is proposed to introduce, before the end of the session, legislation to provide for the redistribution of the functions of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply and the Department of Mines and Resources among three new departments, to come into effect upon proclamation. The departments are to be known respectively as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Department of Resources and Development, and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration; under the latter will be placed the administration of Indian affairs. Though this is really one subject three bills will be required, and a consequential amendment to the Salaries Act.

Within the next few days the Minister of Finance expects to make in the house the statement which he promised to make before the end of the session, in regard to the government's policy as to crown property in the municipalities. Consequential upon that statement, which will require for its implementation legislation that it is intended to introduce not this session but early in the next session, some legislation may be required, probably in the form of an additional supplementary estimate, to bridge over the period until the permanent legislation is enacted.

I would not like hon. members to feel that we were definitely committing ourselves that there will be nothing else. Nothing else is now foreseen, but additional legislation may be required because of unforeseen developments between now and the end of the session. But hon. members will realize that this is still quite an important program, particularly when added to the program we have before us on the order paper. If it is felt that the public interest is being properly served by our proceeding at the pace we have adopted since the beginning of the session, there will be opportunity for full and serious consideration of all these matters. But it would not be possible, or certainly not as easy, to feel that satisfaction about it if we did not add these two additional hours to each day's sitting between Monday and the time at which it is hoped prorogation can take place.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very natural desire to bring the second session of 1949 to an end at a reasonably early day, I think that there will be concurrence in every part of the house in the proposal to extend the hours of sitting. The possibility of achieving that result will depend very largely on the extent to which there is an indication in advance of the order of business for the day, so that the business can be considered with a knowledge of when the subjects under review will come up for discussion.

As an indication of the way in which business can be expedited, may I point out that a question was asked last night as to when we would be dealing with the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. The minister who was then speaking on behalf of the government indicated that the measure might be expected to come up on Monday, after we had dealt with the bill on housing. I believe the business of the house would be greatly facilitated if bills, which are to be the subject of major debate were called first on a particular day.

Every hon. member will recognize that a number of the bills we shall have to consider will not call for extended debate, but there can be no doubt that there is to be a major debate on the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, because of the implications that the presentation of such amendments now carries in this house. Therefore I suggest that the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act be called as the first bill on Tuesday, with other bills following. This would give the house an opportunity to consider carefully and fully on Monday the housing act, without any uncertainty as to when this other important bill will come up for consideration.

I do not intend to enlarge upon any recent events in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, but I do say that the orderly conduct of the business of this house depends upon a reasonable knowledge of when major debates are to take place. I gather from the indication given that the government would agree with this suggestion. I assure the Prime Minister that we shall be pleased to co-operate in every way we can, but we feel sure it would expedite the handling of the business of the house if resolutions or bills which obviously will be the subject of major debate are brought up at times that are known to hon. members. Not only the members of the government, but other hon. members as well, have calls upon their time that they would like to be able to adjust so that they may be present when these matters come up.

In supporting the motion I leave this suggestion with the government, and hope it may be agreed to.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the motion now before us should be supported by the house. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has outlined a very heavy program. There are twenty-three items already on the order paper, and some seventeen or eighteen more have been mentioned by the Prime Minister. If we sat tomorrow and the target were December 3, we would have only twenty sitting days for all the legislation we have ahead of us. Consequently I find it difficult to believe that the house will be able to prorogue on December 3.

With regard to the business of the house, I think what the leader of the opposition has said is something the house can support.

I was sorry to hear him suggest that the debate on the Combines Investigation Act might begin on Tuesday. I did not raise any objection to the order of business for Wednesday and Thursday of next week, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will be here. Unfortunately, however, a number of members on both sides of the house who are interested in external affairs are on the atomic energy committee, and, as is known, under present arrangements we shall be in Chalk River on Tuesday and Wednesday.

I have been particularly interested in the Combines Investigation Act, and I was hoping the bill containing the proposed amendments would be debated at a time when I would be able to participate in the discussion. I do not usually ask that special consideration be given to any hon. member, but since we are not able to be here I had hoped that, if there was a choice between Monday and Tuesday for the Combines Investigation Act amendment bill, it would be taken on Monday rather than Tuesday, if that would suit the convenience of the leader of the opposition.

Otherwise the suggestion that we sit in the mornings—and I presume Saturdays will soon be included—is acceptable to us.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I say that in the suggestion I made I was not indicating any preference as between Monday and Tuesday. What I was emphasizing was the desirability of having bills or resolutions calling for major debates taken up first on a particular day. Either day would be equally suitable.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will be happy to consider the suggestion that if possible the first order of business on a particular day be the initiation of the debate on any of these matters which appear to be likely to take some time. Hon. members may then know, for instance, that at eleven o'clock on Monday we propose to commence consideration of the bill dealing with housing. The debate may or may not require a considerable time. Perhaps it would make for greater certainty if we said right away that, whatever happens on Monday, at eleven o'clock on Tuesday we shall begin consideration of the Combines Investigation Act amendments.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: Did I understand the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to say he would be away on Tuesday?

Mr. Coldwell: Tuesday and Wednesday some of us will be at Chalk River; and the leader of the opposition has said he has no preference.

Mr. St. Laurent: The minister in charge of the bill with respect to housing is quite prepared to have consideration of the Combines Investigation Act amendment bill begun on Monday morning at eleven o'clock, and he would hope, if that debate is concluded in the course of the day, to proceed with housing; if it is not concluded, he would proceed with housing on Tuesday at eleven o'clock.

Hon. members have already been informed that the first order of business on Wednesday will be a motion to go into committee of supply for the purpose of initiating debate on external affairs. We will endeavour on the following day to fix as the first order of business some one of the measures which is apt to give rise to longer than average debate. We would hope that we would not be tied down too closely with respect to the matters taken up following a main debate, and that hon. members would be prepared to debate second readings of bills having to do with matters which are not regarded as likely to cause prolonged debate, and which may be taken most conveniently at an hour when a main debate comes to an end.

I am quite sure we can count on the good will of hon. members to see to it that in this way we may best use the eight hours of sitting each day.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Combines Investigation Act will be discussed on Monday, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, arising out of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other night that the period of limitation under that act would be two years.

Mr. St. Laurent: I gave that as my opinion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, based upon the legal authority of a case on which the right hon. gentleman had acted. The last alleged offence reported in the McGregor report was September 17, 1947. My question is this: Has any information been laid against any of the companies named in the McGregor report? If not, is it not a fact that by reason of withholding the report no action now lies?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is a question which can be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly I might ask one question: Have any proceedings been instituted?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is no.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH RESPECT TO PRICE FIXING AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Combines Investigation Act is to be discussed on Monday, may I draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to two notices of motions which I placed on Votes and Proceedings today? If when they are reached on Monday the information could be brought down, it would be appreciated.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, both these motions involve the compilation of a large number of documents, some of which have been gathered together. Others, however, are from other departments and will have to go through the Department of the Secretary of State. We will endeavour to have them ready for tabling on Monday, although in that connection I cannot make any promise.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

General services—
239. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $227,150.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, hon. members will have it in mind that today is Remembrance day, the thirty-first anniversary of the armistice which ended the great war of 1914-18. Today we remember reverently the service and the sacrifice of the men and women who gave their lives in the defence of their country and their freedom. The Memorial chamber in the peace tower lists their names and tells the story beginning with this inscription on the walls:

> Read how free men throughout this land kept faith in the hour of trial and in the day of battle, remembering the traditions they had been taught, counting life nothing without liberty.

Today we are reminded of the events that led up to the second world war, and of the effort in lives and money and materials that was needed before we could win the victory and continue free. We learned again that eternal vigilance is the price of freedom. Unfortunately the hope for peace and security with which we ended the second world war has not been fulfilled. The Soviet union has turned its back on the co-operation that helped to bring victory against the axis powers. Instead of world partnership for peace, in which all nations could work constructively to improve human relations and conditions, we have a limited partnership with the non-aggressive half of a divided world, and are forced to devote much of our energy to the negative but necessary task of preventing war.

While circumstances force us to take greater measures than we have ever taken before in peacetime in order to make our contribution toward the means of preventing an outbreak of war, we must remember that we have further objectives. We have no warlike intentions. Our objectives are peace and conditions of security in which we can work for the better life we know is possible, both for ourselves and for other nations. We seek the security of all, and of the good that this condition can bring. As a means to this end we must do our utmost to prevent war. Our defence activities are a means to prevent war. They are an essential means necessary to our preservation as a nation.

The ceremony that took place today and our thoughts at this time will strengthen us in the conviction that those we remember at this moment were right to "count life nothing without liberty", and that we are right in doing whatever is necessary to guard what they preserved.

To assist in understanding our defence needs, and to save the time of the house which an extended statement would take, I caused to be prepared and made available a statement on our national defence which I now table. This statement is intended to give:

(1) An account of the present international situation;

(2) An appreciation of the defence needs of Canada;

(3) An analysis of the department's estimates, and

(4) An account of the various aspects of the work of the department and services.

This should be read in conjunction with the annual report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1949. The annual report is in a new form, giving a much fuller account of activities. Usually it is made available only in February, at the commencement of each session, which means it is almost a year in arrears; but this year we tried to have it available at the commencement of this session, and it was tabled on October 19, some four months earlier than usual. This material is presented and made available to hon. members because of the importance of national defence.

The international situation makes defence a matter of major government policy. The estimate of $375 million, taken with the supplementary of $8 million, means that we are now spending on defence 16·4 per cent of the national budget, or $28.37 for each man, woman and child in Canada. At present exchange rates, this is considerably less per capita than is being spent in the United States or the United Kingdom, but it is more than is being spent by any other country in the British commonwealth except the United Kingdom, or by any party to the North Atlantic treaty except the United States, the United Kingdom and The Netherlands, all of which have world-wide or extensive colonial interests. The sum now sought represents what the government believes to be the right amount to be spent on defence by Canada in the present fiscal year.

The statement which has been issued deals at some length with the international situation, upon which our defence policy is based. This may be summarized as follows:

1. The only possible aggressor is the Soviet union.

2. Any war would be a world war involving all western peoples who would be fighting for their survival as nations and their freedom as men.

3. The best way to prevent such a war is to confront the forces of communism with such strength as to deter them from attack.

4. To provide such strength requires the co-operative efforts of the western nations, including the United States and Canada.

5. Consequently Canada welcomed the North Atlantic treaty as supplementing the United Nations, and, pending the strengthening of the United Nations, as an organization for world-wide security.

6. Since an attack on Canada could only be made by air or by sea, emphasis must be placed on defence forces; by air—radar stations and communications, backed by interceptors and a relatively small mobile brigade group; by sea—anti-submarine and anti-mine vessels for protection of shipping and coastal waters.

7. The best place to defeat the enemy is as far away from Canada as possible, and our forces should also serve as the nucleus for the development of our maximum potential.

In the statement you will see an explanation of the considerations which must enter into the preparation of any defence budget. There is also an indication of the costs of some of the equipment used by modern defence forces. I think hon. members will be astonished at the cost of some of the equipment which is mentioned on page 19 of the report. For instance, a Packet transport aircraft of the C-119 type would cost well over half a million dollars. A 5-25 anti-aircraft gun, equipped and installed, would cost in the neighbourhood of $600,000. An anti-submarine vessel of the type of which we have three now on order in Canada would cost $8 million. An airfield equipped with the necessary runways and construction to be used by interceptors would cost from $15 million to $20 million.

As the report emphasizes, the dollar spent on defence is just like every other dollar. It is not rubber; it cannot be stretched. If, as we can show, the amount of some $383 million is needed to meet the requirements of our defence forces this year, then it is perfectly obvious that we can only increase the size of the forces, the equipment or the amount of construction by taking more of the national budget. Planning defences in this country, as in every other country, becomes inevitably a question of assessment of risks and appraisal of priorities.

At the present time more than half of the defence appropriation is spent on personnel—officers, men and civilians—for pay, allowances, pensions, food, clothing, services, and other payments that vary directly with the size of the forces. This amount is as large as it is for two reasons. In the first place, we have tried to create conditions of service which would attract Canadians of ability and character as well as good physique. As to conditions of service, I am sure you will be glad to hear that Canada stands second only to the United States. There the new pay schedules are higher than ours, but other conditions, including pensions, clothing, food, and married quarters, are generally comparable to those in the United States.

The large proportion of the defence expenditure applicable to personnel reflects also the number of men in the armed forces. We have 45,000 in the active forces, another 45,000 in the reserve forces, and 24,000 civilians principally working in dockyards and shops at prevailing rates, making altogether a total of 114,000, of whom 69,000 are employed full time. This makes the department the largest in point of numbers in the government service, and it has, I am led to believe, the widest ramification and the greatest variety of problems.

In the statement and annual report there is a summary of recruiting results, giving figures of enlistments and discharges, and showing the net gain against the establishments fixed for each of the services. During the twelve months ending with September we have taken a total of 12,267 into the active forces, with 4,006 releases, making a net increase of 8,261, or 688 per month. At the present time the navy is up to strength in other ranks, and at the present rates it is estimated that the present ceilings for the army will be reached by September, 1950, and for the air force by December of the same year.

What is most satisfactory is that the rates of release are considerably less than estimated, and that on the termination of the first three years' engagement in the army more than ninety-seven per cent of men are re-engaging, and the three per cent who are not re-engaged includes a number who are released as not considered suitable.

During the same period we have taken in 1,523 with the reserve navy, making a net increase of 610. The twenty-one naval reserve divisions have a total strength of 3,468, and the ten air force auxiliary squadrons have a strength of 3,086, which is regarded as making satisfactory progress. The army reserve has a total strength of 38,572, and I feel that a desirable immediate target would be another 10,000. In addition there are 936 in the university naval training division, 2,619 in the university corps of the Canadian officers' training corps, and 679 in the air force university plans, as well as 282 at the Canadian service colleges. We are continuing campaigns to maintain the flow of recruits.

During this period there has been continuous progress in training with active and reserve forces, with emphasis on the training of officers, noncommissioned officers and tradesmen. There are now four plans in effect for the training of officers, with over 5,000 young men taking qualifying courses, a larger number in proportion to population than I believe will be found training to such standards in any other part of the world. We are obtaining good results form the service colleges, university plans, and the local command contingent arrangements. Further developments and changes will be made to meet needs as they arise. Consideration is being given to changing arrangements for the training of executive officers for the navy.

One of the greatest shortages in meeting an emergency would be skilled tradesmen, large numbers of whom are required in modern forces. Fortunately the ordinary young Canadian, whether he be bred on the farm or in the towns or cities, has great aptitude for work of this type. However, we are adopting various means of increasing trades training in the active and reserve forces, and also have developed an interesting plan for training cadets from vocational schools. We have been discussing with representatives of industry ways and means of adding to the numbers of men skilled in all essential trades.

The services today are large-scale educational institutions, running the gamut from post-graduate schools, such as the national defence college for senior officers and civilian officials, to nursery schools operated co-operatively by service personnel at isolated centres. The navy is operating specialist schools on both coasts in a total of twelve branches. The army has schools for each of the fourteen corps at nine different camps. The R.C.A.F. has eight schools at six different stations. We operate sixteen schools for over 2,000 children of service personnel at isolated centres. This year a total of over 1,200 senior officers are taking courses at command schools. Every active and reserve unit and camp has a number of classes.

In all this, as in everything else, there is close co-operation with the United States and with the United Kingdom. Indeed, our relations are closer than ever before—closer I believe than have ever existed between the forces of any other countries.

The figures before you will show that in 1948-49 a total of $145 million was spent on supplies, equipment, construction and the like, covered by over 65,000 contracts placed through Canadian Commercial Corporation. Major items of equipment purchased include aircraft, ships, electronic and electrical instruments, motor vehicles and construction. Let me say a word about each of these main items.

Aircraft: Good progress is being made with the development of the Canadian-designed XC-100 aircraft, which will be test-flown this year. The development of this aircraft was commenced in 1946, and in each of the last two years we have put in two years of work, which has enabled it to be brought to this stage of development several years sooner than is usually the case in the peacetime development of a new type. The aircraft was entirely designed in Canada to suit Canadian conditions, and if it flies according to its planned characteristics it will be a very useful jet aircraft. Under licence from the United States manufacturer we have placed an order for one hundred F-86 planes, to be manufactured by Canadair Limited. We are continuing to overhaul and modify other aircraft. During 1948-49 we spent $22 million on aircraft. This year I expect the figure will be $45 million.

Ships: The next largest single item in our planned program of development is ships for the navy, largely related to antisubmarine work. We have placed orders for a transport icebreaker, three new high speed anti-submarine vessels largely of Canadian design, four minesweepers, and a gate vessel, costing about $40 million.

Electronic and electrical equipment: All three services use large quantities of radar and other electronic and electrical equipment. We have a large scale program of production of the most modern and high-powered equipment by Canadian firms. The amount provided for electronic and communications equipment in this year's estimates is $19 million.

Motor vehicles: In the modern army there is one motor vehicle for every four men. The three services today have in use or in reserve in the neighbourhood of 20,000 personnel and load carrying vehicles. Many of these require replacement, and all require care and maintenance. For this purpose we are spending this year some $10 million.

Construction and maintenance of buildings: The largest single item on the material side of the activities of the services is for the construction and maintenance of buildings. Every building we have in good condition is being used, and we have under way a large-scale building program of married quarters. At the beginning of 1947 we had 1,100. When this year's construction program is completed we should have over 7,300, representing a very substantial contribution toward meeting the housing shortage. This year Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is constructing a large number of dwellings earmarked for the use of service personnel. Altogether this year there has been allocated for construction and maintenance of buildings for defence purposes in these estimates and by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation a total of $91 million, comparing with the peak figure on defence construction for 1942 of $219 million.

These figures are supplemented in the annual report and the statement, which have been made available. It occurred to me that in a brief enumeration I could best put before hon. members some of the other matters which may be of interest either by way of report or of program, and after doing this I shall be glad to answer any questions I can. By way of concise report, during the period under review I may mention that—

1. The ration scale has been improved as to quantity and variety, and also provides for supplementary cash payments in certain cases, thus bringing our ration scale up to anything there is anywhere.

2. Clothing has been greatly improved, both as to quantity and quality, as far as possible on a uniform basis for all three services.

3. We have made continued progress in the erection of married quarters, and commenced the construction of new barrack accommodation for single men.

4. A shipbuilding program has been set under way with an Arctic icebreaker and development orders for three new design antisubmarine vessels, four minesweepers and a gate vessel.

5. We have pressed on with continued progress on the all-weather fighter, the order for 100 F-86's, the modernization and overhaul of other planes; opened three new air force establishments, including interceptor squadrons at St. Hubert and Chatham, and the navigation school at Summerside.

6. We have a large electronic program.

7. We have reopened Royal Military College and established Royal Roads on a tri-service basis.

8. There has been an increased program of sea training for active and reserve naval forces, the first visit by Canadian naval vessels to Hudson bay, as well as the reactivation of H.M.C.S. Cornwallis for training new entries.

9. The training of the army brigade group has been pressed on, with extra attention to airborne and Arctic fighting and further improvements in summer and winter training arrangements.

10. The period under review has seen the continued development of co-operative arrangements with the United Kingdom and the United States, highlighted by the visits of the late Hon. James Forrestal and Hon. Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defence of the United States, Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, Secretary of State for Air of the United Kingdom, and numerous other distinguished visitors, and return visits by myself to Washington, with frequent exchanges of officers at every level.

11. Major General F. F. Worthington was appointed co-ordinator of civil defence.

12. The industrial defence board and the defence medical and dental advisory board have been set up.

13. The department has assumed responsibility for inspection, formerly vested in the inspection board.

14. Medical services were reorganized to take advantage of D.V.A. facilities.

15. Fire fighter services were established, and fire and accident prevention campaigns carried out.

16. We have continued the campaign for support in recruiting, with the desired results in every respect except for the reserve army.

17. The security arrangements have been strengthened.

18. The services have assisted in meeting civilian needs in fire fighting and search and rescue operations.

19. We have set up a system of tri-service communications across Canada.

These are some of the achievements. On the debit side we have:

1. Two regrettable losses of planes of the R.C.A.F., both apparently due to bad weather.

2. Regrettable losses of flyers and aircraft of H.M.C.S. Magnificent.

3. Disciplinary troubles in the R.C.N., due in part to the difficulties of post-war adjustment.

4. Adverse press reports on Exercise Eagle, which I believe were due principally to our failure to explain the nature, objects and possibilities of the exercise.

Looking toward the future, in addition to carrying on the program I have outlined I emphasize the need for—

1. Improved arrangements for training in Canada for naval executive officers, and further improved arrangements for qualifying officers for the R.C.N. from the universities.

2. Improved arrangements for in-service education and trades training.

3. Continuous examination of establishments, military and civil, to promote economy and efficiency.

4. Increased efforts to inform and enlist the support of the civilian community.

In these remarks I have necessarily only touched the highlights of a large scale combined operation. I say it is a combined operation, for I believe the officers and men of our three services are working loyally as a team in the service of their country. During the past two and a half years this has not been a particularly light task or an easy period. Though this particular job imposes heavy and exacting administrative responsibilities requiring continuous attention at headquarters, I have felt that it also required the knowledge and interest resulting from visits to the units across Canada, and I must say I have found these stimulating and inspiring. I have said before and repeat that there is nothing second-rate about the officers and men of our armed forces. It is a privilege I value highly to work with them.

The efforts of Canadians in two great wars have demonstrated our capacity to make a great contribution to the defence of our country and to the common cause of freedom. In proportion to population, no country contributed more to restore those peaceful conditions abroad on which our own prosperity so largely depends at home. Our representatives earned respect for Canada as a nation standing for justice in international dealings, just as our soldiers, sailors and airmen earned respect for Canada by their competence, their courage and their conduct. Today and in the future Canada's defence organization must ensure the integrity of our territory and meet any obligation we may assume under the North Atlantic treaty.

Towards this end I shall welcome informed and constructive criticism and every kind of assistance, and I believe in this we shall have the support of all hon. members and of all the people from end to end of Canada.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members of this house will appreciate the statement which has been tabled this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence, and which explains in considerable detail, as he said, the policy governing the organization, training and operation of our defence forces. But I find it difficult to reconcile with that action the last statement he made. Just before he sat down he said he would welcome informed criticism of the policy of his department in order to build better defence forces for Canada. Every hon. member in this committee wants to see our defence forces—the navy, the army and the air force—the finest that this country can possibly produce. But I suggest that the tabling at this time of a statement outlining that policy is of no help whatsoever to this committee. We have not had an opportunity to study the contents of the statement; therefore we cannot give that type of informed criticism which the minister has expressed a desire to receive by way of assistance in the development of our armed forces. I do not know how long this debate will go on, but I hope that it will go on long enough, or that it will be adjourned at some time during the discussion of these estimates, and resumed later in order that we may have an opportunity to read the statement that the minister has today tabled.

The minister referred to the fact that today is Remembrance day. I cannot help feeling that it is a strange, sad, ironical circumstance that we should be discussing estimates for national defence within a few hours of the time when members of this house and hundreds of thousands of people all across Canada were standing in reverent memory of the sacrifices which had been made by Canadians in past wars. I feel sure that it was the fervent prayer of all those who attended these ceremonies that the sacrifices made by Canadians in the past would not have to be repeated.

The extent of the attendance at these memorial services can perhaps be emphasized by recalling the fact of the differences in time throughout Canada. I look at the clock, and I realize that the parade in my own village on Vancouver island will just now be dispersing. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that, at every hour during the twenty-four, men in some part of the world, with their wives and children, will be standing in front of a cenotaph and praying that there may not be another repetition of the catastrophes of the past.

With vivid memories of the sacrifices that those men have made, I cannot but turn my thoughts back to the policies which have enabled Canada, during the past century and a half, to preserve herself and to help to maintain the freedom of this world.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century Canada was threatened by a series of international disturbances. It was then the settled policy of the United Kingdom government to station in Canada regular forces of the British army, equal in number to the regular forces then maintained by the only enemy which was anticipated at that moment, namely, the United States. Those British regular regiments were stationed in small garrisons at nodal points from the Atlantic to the great lakes. In some cases the garrisons were not strong, merely manning forts, but they were a deterrent or a stopgap which enabled the citizens of Canada, when the emergency developed, to rally behind those regular regiments and, after a period of training and equipping, to fight nobly in the defence of this country. The essential point I make here is that regular units were available in order to gain the time for the civilian soldiers to become ready.

As we pass over the years—we need not bother about the South African campaign, because we hardly took a great part in it—we find that in 1914, around those militia units which then existed, the citizens of Canada rallied, as they also did in 1939. In the winter of 1914 the units which had made the greatest progress in their development went over to England, and in the spring of 1915 they took part in some of the great battles of that campaign. But, remember, there had been other troops who had drawn to themselves the first onslaught of the enemy's attack. The British regular army should have been decimated and should have perished in gaining that time. That is immaterial, but it is a fact. Time was gained by their heroic withdrawal from Mons and the first battle of Ypres and so forth.

Then came 1939, and again around our non-permanent and permanent force units the citizens of Canada rallied. Again, after a period of training, those who had made the most progress in that respect were transported across to the United Kingdom, and there in the United Kingdom they underwent a further period of training, a further period of equipping. In the meantime other troops from other countries were holding off the enemy while that period of training went on. I remember very vividly how, in the spring of 1940, the first Canadian division moved out from Aldershot. It was a circus. It was a circus as we rattled our way with indentured vehicles up to Midlands, there to occupy another position. Our training went on, and as the battle of Britain was being fought after Dunkirk and the danger became greater in September, 1940, one year after the outbreak of war the first Canadian division was rehearsing at dawn day after day a counter-invasion role. As their commander I know that I stood up and said to battalion after battalion: "I know that you will fight gallantly but the cost will be heavy because you will not fight skilfully. You are not well trained".

We were fortunate that it was impossible for Hitler's armies to cross that small channel. The air force held them back. The air force attacked them while they were mustering in France in preparation for that invasion.

Again I want to emphasize the fact that while under the system which had held good and had proved itself worthy for the defence of Canada for a hundred and fifty years somebody else had gained the time before the militia of Canada were ready to carry out the magnificent role which brought the crowning victories in these campaigns. Are times changing now? Only a few days ago in this city a great statesman from the United Kingdom said that the card had been played for the last time. I refer to Mr. Bevin's statement in speaking to the Canadian Club here in Ottawa. The card had been played for the last time. What card? The card of gaining enough time to develop your forces for the outbreak of war.

General Crerar, who was in command of the Canadian army during the campaigns in this war, has repeatedly pointed out that if a country is not ready when war breaks out again it will never have a chance to save itself.

The policy which has just been enunciated by the minister, the policy which is described in the annual report of his department, and the policy, as far as I could gather which has been published in the statement that he has just tabled, indicates that this country is relying upon exactly the same policy which has stood this country in good stead for a hundred and fifty years, but which, according to men such as Mr. Bevin and General

Crerar, is now out of date. This is the policy as enunciated in the annual report for the Canadian navy:

> To provide a well-trained nucleus equipped with ships of the classes needed for coastal defence and the protection of trade, to train reserves and to provide the administration and training personnel and equipment to permit whatever expansion may be necessary.

I now turn to the policy as defined for the Canadian army:

> To have in active service a highly trained and mobile force, capable at the same time of defending our territory against any possible sudden attack and also of forming a compact framework around which reserve forces may quickly be built up in case of emergency.

So far as the air force is concerned the policy is as follows:

> . . . the R.C.A.F. is to build up and maintain an air strength adequate to meet any immediate attack and to form a nucleus for the formation of larger forces if necessary.

Hon. members will see that at the present time the emphasis is being placed continually on the small compact units. They are relying upon there being a period of time in which the reserve forces of the army, navy and air force may be built up.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there is much uncertainty, much consternation amongst the people of this country, particularly those people who have had service experience —and there is a very high percentage of our people who have had service experience. There is much uncertainty as to whether this course of relying upon the ability to build up reserve formations, the militia, call it by whatever name you like, when the emergency comes, and relying upon some other forces to gain that time, is a sound policy under present conditions.

In the last few days, or the last few months, an investigation has been carried out by three distinguished men. I refer to the commission set up under Admiral Mainguy to inquire into conditions in the navy. He stated quite frankly that his commission did not make an exhaustive inquiry into Canada's naval policy and the part our navy might be called upon to play in case this country were once again involved in war.

They would have had this annual report of the Department of National Defence before them; and he goes on to say that the knowledge they had did influence them in their inquiry and thought, and the recommendations they submitted. At page 52 of the report the commission states:

> There is a widespread feeling that the available manpower and material have been stretched too far and too thin to meet the requirements of a fighting, convoying and anti-submarine force.

The report goes on to say that they recommend that the naval complement should be reviewed. In other words, they recommend that we should cut our coat according to the cloth we have, that we should review the whole of our naval policy with regard to the number of ships and men we can maintain and the roles we should carry out.

The report continues at page 42 to state that the comparatively heavy commitments of the navy have required constant operation and hurried change, with the result that training has not gone ahead as fast or as systematically as it should have. The present actual complement of officers and men was stated by several witnesses to be inadequate for the existing commitment.

There are other references to the same question of naval policy. The report drives home the fact that our resources are too thin and have been stretched too far to do all the tasks they are being called upon to do. I do venture to suggest that the same sort of thing applies in respect of the other services —that our resources are being stretched too far and they are too thin to be able to provide these mobile forces and to provide the nucleus for expansion which it is suggested will have to take place under certain circumstances.

I think the expansion which is so essential will be most acutely felt in so far as the Royal Canadian Air Force is concerned. Hon. members will recollect that in the early days of the battle of Britain, in the first years of the war, appalling casualties were suffered among fighter pilots. Replacements were very heavy for fighter pilots, aircraftmen, bomber pilots, bomber gunners—in fact anyone who was in the air. That was where the heaviest strain came. That was where there was almost a breaking point in the battle of Britain. Everyone there at the time has spoken of the glorious action of those R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. pilots who, worn out and exhausted, returned to the attack time and time again against the Germans who were endeavouring to bring the United Kingdom to heel through action of their bombers.

What is the condition regarding the strength of our reserve forces in so far as the R.C.A.F. is concerned? I ask that because it was to the auxiliary squadrons that Canada and the other nations had to look for their supply of pilots. In this connection I take my figures as they appear in table 3 at page 82 of the report of the Department of National Defence. At this point the reserve strength as at March 31 of this year for the reserve army is 36,311. The strength of air crews and ground crews of the reserve auxiliary air force is only 1,427. I heard the figures the minister gave today, which indicated an increase from that number. I would point out that that increase consists of recruits, because on March 31 they were not there.

I turn next to the training section in the annual report, and at section 18 on page 10 I find that in the Canadian universities there is a enrolment of 2,040 cadet officers training with the officers training corps. In section 20 we see the number of university students training as cadet officers in the R.C.A.F. These would be the personnel who would be first called upon to replace casualties suffered in an air war. What do we find? As against 2,040 army officer cadets there are 366 students in the R.C.A.F. auxiliary.

Surely we are not putting the emphasis in the right place in providing reserves and the expansion which is so essential. Surely we must be realistic. As the minister said, if there is an attack against this country it must come by air or by water. If it comes by air or by water the policy he enunciated, that it must be met as far away from Canada as possible, is the correct policy. To do that we must have a strong air force. We must be able to bring to bear not a small active force supported merely by some 300 students now in training. I suggest that if we are again to rely upon the expansion of essential forces we have to place emphasis where it is most needed in order to carry out the policy announced by the minister of meeting the enemy as far away from Canada as possible. That is not what is being done under the present policy.

Looking at the estimates for this year I find that the details on page 198 show that $8,939,000 is being provided for army reserves. Then when I turn to see what is being provided for the auxiliary of the Royal Canadian Air Force I find that only $3,600,000 is in the estimates, a little more than one-third and less than one-half of the previous amount. The next junior branch is the Royal Canadian Air Cadets, those keen youngsters who are seen occasionally in the high schools across the country. They are allotted $363,000 as compared with $1,002,000 for the army cadets. Again I say that if we are relying upon the expansion of the essential arm, we are not giving encouragement where it should be given. The annual report shows that of the money allocated last year for the R.C.A.F. squadrons and training plan and R.C.A.F. reserves, only $1,067,000 was expended.

I do not want to labour that point any longer. In the light of the statements which have been made by Mr. Bevin, by General Crerar, in the Mainguy report and by many other government officials, I think that there is cause for anxiety and criticism as to whether the policy which has stood us so well over the last 150 years is the correct policy under the very changed conditions which exist in the world today.

I am not in position to say how that can be corrected.

The minister has suggested that he would like the co-operation of every hon. member in this house. We in this party have suggested from time to time a way in which we think he could get that co-operation. We have suggested that if a committee was set up to deal with questions of defence we would be better informed and therefore would be able to give him the advice which he has asked us today to supply. Whether that is the right course, whether that is the course the government is prepared to follow, only the minister can say. But he has asked us for co-operation and that is our suggestion.

I am quite certain that every hon. member shares his pride in the forces of Canada, particularly at seeing these young men come and stand around the cenotaph side by side with the veterans of two past wars. So many of these services remind me of the wonderful poem by Colonel McCrae, the theme of which was that with failing hands they passed on the torch to future generations. I do not believe that it was the meaning of Colonel McCrae, nor is it the interpretation placed upon that poem by the people of Canada, that they were passing on a fiery cross to call the clansmen on some foray. I think he meant that they were passing on a beacon which it was hoped would light the way to better conditions in the world of the future.

As we all know, and as the minister has said, the high hopes of San Francisco, where the United Nations was formed, have not been fulfilled in their entirety. However, I have confidence in the peoples of this world and I believe that ultimately we shall be able to find some other means of settling international difficulties. The time has not yet come when we do not have to maintain strong and adequate armed forces. We want to be able to grasp that torch with strong and firm hands, not with weak and faltering hands.

I believe the people of Canada are prepared to advance these immense sums of money in the hope that the armed forces of Canada will be able to prevent a third world war, in the hope that the armed forces of Canada will be designed to prevent a third world war rather than to win the victory during the later stages of that war, should it come. The people of Canada are making great sacrifices. I admire the minister for not mincing matters when he spoke about the amount of money he was asking the people of Canada to contribute for the maintenance of these forces.

The people of Canada want to know that that money is being spent in the right direction; that the policy the department is following will achieve the ends desired and that we are not merely providing this money to maintain old traditions; that we are not pouring that money into the Department of National Defence only to find that what is to be provided is a useless, futile type of defence if we are ever called upon to fight again. I have grave doubts as to whether the policy being followed by this government is going to achieve the results that Canada expects.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Chairman, it is rather significant that on Armistice day we are discussing the estimates for the Department of National Defence. We look back over the last thirty-one years and realize that on November 11, 1918, a sigh of relief went up from everyone in Canada, and indeed across the world, because one great war had ended; we look back and realize that now we have seen a second and even greater world war; and yet today we are forced by circumstances to discuss defence once again, and the possibilities of entering another world-wide struggle. I do not think any member of the house can do other than support the defence estimates that have been presented to us. Of course the tragedy is that after two great wars we are forced to consider anew methods of defence.

Let us not forget that defence lies not only in the strength of our armed forces and the instruments of war that we may build, but also in the condition of our people and the conditions of people all over the world. A short time ago we listened to a very great man speaking in this chamber, Prime Minister Nehru of India. If we followed his address closely we saw that the lesson to be gained from it was that, not in armed strength but in the removal of evil social and economic conditions, the peace of the world really lies. Until we have removed the economic and social conditions that cause unrest and make for war, we have to consider ways and means of national defence in another field. In the ultimate, the manner in which we can best serve our generation, and generations to come, the manner in which we can best bring universal peace to the world, is to seek the security of all mankind economically and socially as well as in every other way.

I hope we have learned another lesson since the last war ended. It is that we must press forward to bring about understanding among the nations of the world in order to prevent war. From what I have heard said by some of the greatest scientists engaged in the production of atomic energy and the atomic bomb, and from what I have read in their articles and those of military men as well, there is really no adequate defence against modern instruments of war. If we allow war to come upon the world again then the civilization that we know will fall in ruins.

It is not often I agree with spokesmen for the Soviet union at the United Nations or elsewhere, but I read a short time ago that, in the celebration of their national holiday commemorating the revolution of 1917, their national spokesman on that occasion predicted that if war came to the world, as he put it, the capitalist society would be destroyed utterly. I would go further than that and say that civilization of every sort, whether it be capitalist, socialist or communist, will be destroyed utterly in the event of another world war. There is really no defence against modern instruments of war, but of course some reliance can be placed, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat implied, upon negotiation among the nations based upon strength. Consequently if other nations are engaged in strengthening their defensive machinery, lacking collective security we also have to participate in a similar policy.

I am glad that the Minister of National Defence saw fit yesterday to place in the hands of at least some of the members of the house the document I have before me, "Canada's Defence Program". I am sorry that it was received rather late last evening, because I should like to have given closer study to it. As a matter of fact, except for the short time I was in the house last night, I spent the evening reading it, and a very interesting document it is. It indicates the tremendous amount of money that we are going to spend this year on the various projects the minister has enumerated this afternoon. There is the figure of $375 million in the main estimates plus $8 million in the supplementary estimates, a total of $383 million. If you add another $150 million to that you come pretty close to the amount of our total national budget for all purposes prior to the last war. As I say, if you add $150 million to the $383 million, you come close to the total national expenditure of Canada in 1939 and prior years. Sixteen per cent of our country's revenue, $38 per head of our population—

Mr. Claxton: $28.

Mr. Coldwell: I thought you said $38.

Mr. Claxton: $28.37.

Mr. Coldwell: Twenty-eight dollars per head of our population is an enormous expenditure in a country such as Canada which has so many resources awaiting development. In the autumn of 1946 I had the privilege of being one of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. Our delegation, through the mouth of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present Prime Minister, placed that point of view forcibly before the general assembly of the United Nations. He urged the necessity of carrying out the parts of the United Nations charter having to do with collective security of the nations in order, as he put it, that we might proceed in a country like Canada to raise the standards of life of the people. Today we have to face an expenditure of $28 per head of population, not for the development of our great resources, not for the raising of our standards of living and the improvement of the lot of our people, but for preparations for defence.

We supported the North Atlantic pact because we believe it is essential under the conditions that exist today, but let me point out that the North Atlantic agreement is a second best only, and that if we are going to have real world-wide security then we must have it on the basis of the United Nations. Consequently we believe that at this time the manner in which we co-operate with others will mitigate to some extent the obligation we have to assume for defence. The minister said in the course of his remarks that the best way to deter the forces of communism was to face them with overwhelming strength. Again may I say, as I said of the Atlantic treaty, in my opinion that is indeed a second best. Perhaps it is the alternative we must accept today, but in my opinion the best way to defeat communism, or what we call communism, is to raise the standards of living of people everywhere, and to see to it that nations are engaged in promoting social justice everywhere. That is the only real and effective weapon against communism; there is no other. Indeed, that was the lesson brought to us in this chamber a few short weeks ago by Nehru.

But since there is not social justice across the world, since there is grave danger of conflict among the nations, then we must guard our own country well; and that means we must consider proposals such as those which have been placed before us this afternoon. The minister told us Canada's forces were merely a nucleus in the event of war, a nucleus of army, a nucleus of navy and a nucleus of air force. While that was criticized by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), perhaps after all that is about as far as we can go if we are to maintain our national economy, and indeed it is as far as most other countries are going at the present time. That is so in the United States, though their forces are many times the size of ours and their expenditures much greater. In the United Kingdom, where they are closer to that part of the world where conflict might arise, the same policy is being followed. Because side by side with the arming of our forces and the organization of navies, armies and air forces, we must maintain our industrial and economic strength; for in the final analysis it is upon our industrial and economic strength that victory or defeat will depend.

And let me say in considering the arming of our forces, whether they be naval, military or air force, I believe that this should be done, as I have so often said in the house, without profit to any group or individual in this land. We of this movement have always stood for the nationalization of the main munition industry. It may be argued that many industries not recognized today as munition industries are of importance in wartime and that therefore a policy such as I have suggested could not be carried out. But there are certain vital industries manufacturing the equipment of war that should be in the hands of the Canadian people through public ownership. I regretted very much the sale of Canadair two or three years ago, because I foresaw that in the event of a program such as the minister has laid before us today this industry would be vital in the realm of national defence; and so it is proving to be. And if I may say so, while I believe the company is operating efficiently, I was disturbed to see that it was sold to the Electric Boat Company. Anyone who knows the story of that company between the two wars I think will agree with me; or anyone who has read the book on the munition industry, entitled "The Private Manufacture of Armaments", written a few years ago by a gentleman who was here within the last two or three weeks, Right Hon. Noel-Baker, will recall that in this book the exposure of the anti-social operations of that company is quite complete. So I say we believe that the main armament industry of the country should not be a matter of private profit for any corporation or any individual, but should be a national project under complete national ownership. During the last war we saw in our own country how great, nation-wide industries were strengthened and enabled to attain an even more monopolistic position in our society than they had previously: Aluminium Limited, Canadian Industries Limited, and now Canadair. That is one feature of the defence program with which we disagree, the manner in which the instruments of war are being provided for our army, navy and air force. We believe that should be undertaken as some of these projects were undertaken during the war with efficiency. We can point with great pride in this country, I think, to some of the industries which operated under the Department of Munitions and Supply as crown companies owned by this nation.

Then we agree that the conditions affecting the personnel of the armed forces should be the very best. I have read the naval report to which reference was made this afternoon, and one of the criticisms it expresses is the distance which was maintained between the officers and men. I think the authors of that report were quite correct when they said the average young man entering the Canadian navy was somewhat different to the average young man entering the British navy. In the past at least the officers of the British navy have been drawn from a different class than the men serving in the lower ranks. That is not the case in our own country, where officers and men have obtained their education often from the same schools, and have come from the same sort of homes with the same environment. Consequently the sort of discipline one finds in the British and some other navies should not be applied in the Canadian navy. So I congratulate the minister on having said, as he did, that steps would be taken to more particularly Canadianize our navy. That does not mean merely painting maple leaves on the funnels of the ships. It means much more than that: the organization of a navy based on Canadian conceptions and Canadian conditions, with a Canadian atmosphere among officers and men. Discipline there must be; but I have always believed, both in my own lifework and generally, that the best kind of discipline is one of confidence, rather than a discipline of remoteness or fear. So I am glad indeed to hear that the minister is proceeding with the Canadianization of our navy.

He said, too, that it was essential to attract men of good physique. Well, that is essential, but first of all we must raise the men of good physique, and in order to get them we must have a well-fed, well-housed and healthy population. I sat in this house on another November day in 1941 when the then Minister of National War Services, Hon. J. T. Thorson, speaking from a place not far from where the minister is sitting now, read a report of the experience during the first year of recruiting, 1939-40. The house was shocked to learn that some 46 per cent of the young men who had offered themselves for enlistment for overseas service were turned down because of physical defects of one sort or another.

That, it seems to me, was a commentary upon the conditions which had existed for a number of years and which were particularly acute between 1930 and 1939. If we are going to have defence and are going to rely on men and women for that defence, we must see to it that the children of this nation are well housed, well clothed, well fed and—if I may add one other requirement—well educated as well. I therefore say that our defence expenditures should be matched by expenditures for social services and for the well-being of the nation generally.

A moment ago I mentioned the fact that education was also an arm of defence, and that statement was never truer than it is today. During the last war we learned the importance of the scientist, the educated technologist and others who possessed above average educational attainments and abilities. Indeed, in spite of those terrible years—and in a way perhaps because of them—in the early days of the war Canada provided the Royal Air Force with a high percentage of pilots and navigators. This was possible because in this country we had a group of young men who had received a high-school education or better. Consequently, when we discuss defence, we cannot forget that it means more than the placing of men in uniform and the building of the machines of war. It means education, especially scientific education, preparation for research and technical activities.

A few moments ago I mentioned the Canadianization of the Canadian navy. In this document I was glad to see that attempts are being made to educate our young men along democratic lines so that in the days to come they may take their places in more responsible positions. One other thing I noticed was the large number of civilians now employed in armed forces activities; they are civilians who are skilled in various lines of endeavour, such as artisans and so on. Let me emphasize once again that just as we need skilled men in the armed services, so we need skilled men and women in industry. I think that most hon. members in this chamber—at least those who were here at the time—will recollect that we had great difficulty, in the first two years of the last war, in equipping the men who were in the armed forces; that we had great difficulty in getting the necessary plans and blueprints for the building of the necessary equipment; and that we had considerable difficulty in getting the necessary skilled labour to make the equipment according to the plans and specifications which we had secured. We should therefore be thinking not only in terms of army, navy and air force, but in terms of building up in our own country a civilian corps of men and women consisting of artisans, technologists as well as scientists, who are so skilled that, in the event of new machines of war being needed if war comes again, which God forbid, they will be able to provide us with those machines in a short time.

To some extent, of course, that objective is being accomplished through the re-education of our veterans, through our technical schools and the scientific research organizations in our universities, and through such projects as the one at Chalk River which some of us are looking forward to seeing next week.

If we look at a list of the scientific advances and changes that have been made since the last war ended, we realize that in a discussion of this sort we cannot think of a future war in terms of the last war or the war before. When we faced the last crisis in the world and in this country, one of the difficulties was that most of us had been thinking in terms of the war of 1914-18, when all of sudden we were faced with an entirely new set of circumstances. Then army, navy, air force and parliament had to unlearn much of what they had learned, between the two wars, out of the lessons of the first one. Because of these new instruments of war that the minister listed, the cost of national defence today is comparatively fabulous. When the minister was speaking, he mentioned "construction" in the estimates amounting to $91 million. That is something that is necessary, and I am not criticizing it; but I did a rough calculation. For the $91 million we could have built 18,000 houses at $5,000 each if we could have been relieved of expenditures of this description. As I say, I am not criticizing that expenditure of $91 million. But when the words "construction for the armed forces" were used, the thought flashed through my mind that if we had been able to use that $91 million for construction for domestic needs, this year we could have constructed 18,000 additional houses with a value of $5,000 each.

Once again I want to say that while we support the measures that the government consider necessary—and after all, the government must make this decision; they have information that we do not possess—and while we support these defence proposals, we believe that every effort must be made by our Department of External Affairs, supported by the people of this country, to endeavour to bring about international understanding so that such expenditures will be unnecessary in the days to come, and so that we may have real collective security through international organization. When we get that we, in common with other nations, shall be able to embark upon a program of international and national disarmament and shall be able to use the vast amounts of money nations now expend in this way for the benefit of the people of all countries.

The minister paid a tribute, as did the hon. member for Nanaimo, to the young men and women who served in the last war. Distinctly I remember really believing thirty-one years ago, as I did for some years, that the world had had a blood bath that it would not forget, and that the little children growing up in our homes in 1918, as my own son was, would not be called upon to face another such war. Well, they were called upon to face that war. It seems to me that one of the obligations that parliaments have, that the Department of External Affairs has and men and women of good will everywhere have, is to do our level best to see that the world is so organized, the standards of living are so raised and the causes of discontent so removed that the generation of little boys and girls growing up in our homes today, and in some instances our grandchildren, will not be called upon to do what our sons and daughters were called upon to do.

I admired the young men and women in the Canadian armed forces when I had the privilege of going overseas in 1941 and again in 1944. The hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Melfort and I were privileged in September 1944 to visit our armed forces in Belgium, which had just been occupied. Anyone who met Belgian citizens at that time and heard the tributes that were paid to the young Canadians who had occupied that country will never forget it. They were well liked because of their courtesy and of their general behaviour. We felt very proud of these young men and women, but I hope that we may never have to send overseas contingents of young men and women to do the same kind of job that they did.

While we have that hope we cannot neglect to do all we can to promote the defence of our own country, lest some calamity befall this nation and the world. Therefore, what I want to say is that while we support these defence expenditures made necessary by the uncertain international situation, we want to say to the house that we believe the best way to defeat subversive elements, communism, if you wish to call it that, in our own country and throughout the world, is to do everything in our power, both in our own country and in co-operation with all nations, to raise the standards of living and to remove the causes of poverty, misery and want, out of which future wars are likely to arise. With these words I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that we must support the estimates presented by the government.

Supply—National Defence

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Up to the present time the debate has been enlightening and in the main enjoyable. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has voiced the sentiments of almost everyone in this chamber as regards the ideals we are working for. With his expression of ideals I have no quarrel at all. To them I say, Amen. But when it comes to means whereby these ideals may be achieved then I take sharp issue with his proposals.

All during world war II it was declared by government spokesmen everywhere that what is physically possible shall be made financially possible. In the main during the war that promise was honoured. With the coming of the peace the same principle ought to have been applied in an effort to win the peace. I find myself completely amazed to discover that not one single spokesman for the government, or anyone from the opposition, has insisted that we should make what is physically possible financially possible in our endeavours to win the peace. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if these particular people whom I have mentioned had been as industrious, as determined, to make what is physically possible financially possible in their endeavours to win the peace, we should not now be in such necessity to prepare for the greatest war of all times. They apparently forgot the principle that what is physically possible can be made financially possible as regards the peace not only within the nation but among the nations.

Little attention indeed is given to Canada's physical possibilities by the members of the government's side of the house, and I fear by even the members of the Progressive Conservative party. Little attention is given Canada's physical possibilities when we confront problems such as the housing problem of Canada, the transportation problem of Canada, both as regards freight rates and the construction of highways, the price control problem of Canada, including the cost of living; old age pensions, and war veterans' allowances. It never seems to dawn on anyone in these august bodies that what we can do for old age pensioners depends in the last analysis on the food, clothing and shelter we can produce in Canada.

Today the minister has declared in effect that if we Canadians cannot financially afford a safely adequate program of defence, then we cannot have that adequate program of defence, regardless of what may or may not be Canada's physical possibilities. I suppose it will not dawn on the minister and his colleagues that what is physically possible can be made financially possible in preparation for war until we are again in war, when it is too late to make what we all would hope might have been a really adequate preparation.

The coming war, Mr. Chairman, will be characterized by lightning speed, transcendent military strategy, designed to paralyse us immediately, unscrupulous surprise, equal to that of Pearl Harbor, and dismaying fifth-column activities, co-operating with the foe.

Bearing this in mind, there are four questions that the minister ought to answer. I do not care whether he does it on the floor of the house or not. But he ought to answer them when he gets back in conference with the able assistants of his department and with his colleagues in cabinet. First: Could Canada fight successfully if the United States were paralysed by strikes or internal disorders? I do not know that I have heard this question even entertained. Second: Is our military industry decentralized appropriately? Third: Have we regional organization for the production and distribution of food, clothing and shelter in Canada in respect of both storing and producing, with respect to providing hospitalization, government, defence, aggression? Have we provision for guerrilla warfare?

I was over in Britain in 1941 with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I was a member of the delegation of the empire parliamentary association in that tragic year of Britain's history. I was impressed with the fact that they had organized Britain into twelve distinct regions. The general idea was that each of those regions was provided with all the equipment such as I have referred to that would enable it to carry on a successful fight against the foe alone. So that if eleven of the twelve regions of Britain were overrun, the twelfth could still shout defiance at the foe, and make good its defiance. I should think it would be the barest fundamental of wisdom in Canada for us to have at least several regions comparable with those in Britain. I doubt very much however that we have any such organization, although it would seem to me necessary.

I am afraid that if by successful manoeuvring a foe could gain control of certain parts of Ontario and Quebec, you could roll down the curtains on Canada. That would be something to be very sorry about, but something for which the Liberal government in Canada would have to assume responsibility, by reason of its policy of centralizing industry during the long years of its regime in Canada.

Fourth: Have we a nucleus and skeleton organization, in respect of personnel, buildings and equipment, for a British commonwealth air training scheme? I am a bit surprised we have not heard about such an air training scheme, especially in the light of the fact that this scheme played so potent a part in the ultimate victory of our arms in world war II.

Having said this much about the general situation, may I turn to the document called "Canada's Defence Program" which was distributed by the minister among the leaders of the parties, and from which document he quoted rather generously this afternoon. I am sorry it did not reach my hands until 11.15 last night, and that I have not been able to give it as much attention as I should like to have given to so important a document. Nevertheless, under the circumstances, we shall do what we can.

I turn to the second division of it which deals with the international situation, and should like to read into Hansard certain excerpts from that part of the document, commenting upon certain of them. In paragraph 5 on page 6 I find this:

> We appreciated that the road to peace was a long and arduous one and that with other members we should have to assume continuous responsibilities for the building and maintenance of peace.

"The building and maintenance of peace" —very well said; but not much done about it. Then, following that—

> The people of Canada, through their representatives in parliament, clearly indicated that they were prepared to accept these responsibilities.

They did; no blame on the people of Canada. And from the same paragraph:

> No substantial progress has so far been made through the institutions of the United Nations.

And the question ought to be asked, in capital letters of red, and underlined: Why? Everyone will blame the wrong person, just as nearly everyone blamed the wrong person for the outbreak of world war II.

Then I should like to quote from paragraph 7—and I shall not comment at great length, but shall reserve my comments for later. It states—and the reference is to the Atlantic pact—

> By the terms of the treaty—

> —the parties undertake "to settle any international dispute in which they may be involved by peaceful means," and "to contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions."

As I recall it, the United States signed that document and thus committed herself to the treaty. I should like to ask any citizen of the United States who by chance happened to come in contact with this speech, and I would ask any other person in Canada the same question: What would United States reaction be if the European nations asked for the privilege of introducing the imperial preference system in accordance with their opinion as to how far those preferences would help? I wonder if there would be on the part of the United States a willingness to confer with others in an effort to grant European nations their request? I go on:

> —to "encourage economic collaboration"—

I wonder what has been done to encourage economic collaboration, in the realistic sense. We are discussing the international situation. I quote again from paragraph 7:

> "The parties separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."

I wonder if they have gone as far as mutually helping to raise each other's standard of living, or if they all have fallen back into cutthroat competition—which everyone knows is commercial warfare and leads inevitably to military warfare. It continues:

> The parties agree to "consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened."

I wonder if Canada and the United States have really got right down to grass roots in the endeavour to find out how to raise their respective standards of living so as to prevent the inroads of communism from becoming greater? If they have not, it will not do much good for the minister to get up here and use unctuous phrases in Canada about peace.

Then turn to paragraph 8:

> The purpose of the North Atlantic treaty is to establish the joint strength of the democratic countries and, by making aggression clearly unprofitable, give the western nations the opportunity to combat communism, not in the field of war, but in the field of ideas, of practical living and of peace.

I should like to ask, for the benefit of the minister and his colleagues, and especially the Prime Minister, what greater opportunity Canada and the United States could possibly have than they have had given them in order to accomplish this laudable objective.

But we see no results from it. Vast numbers of the people of Canada are living right on the verge of poverty. When the announcement was made that rents would rise it was a calamity to most of them. They do not have much of a margin to go on, and to keep them away from communism, or cushion them against the wily arguments of communists, do they?

Then, turning to paragraph 12 on page 8:

> By pooling resources, the effect of the pact should be to reduce the total expenditures which each of the twelve countries would have found necessary for their security had there been no pact. However, that result is some distance off and in the meantime, Canada will have to make such modifications of her plans as may be found necessary to meet the situation.

I wonder if Canada is making modifications in her plans so as to meet her internal economic and financial situation? I have my doubts.

And then at paragraph 16 on page 9, quoting General Bradley:

"The more I work on our plans for defence, the more I am convinced that war is not inevitable—

I agree with the gentleman.

—and that our defence plans can be part of a strategy for a lasting peace."

And then on the following page:

War is not impossible . . . but I believe it is unlikely. I believe it can be made increasingly unlikely by our own behaviour—

I agree with that—"our own" behaviour.

—if only the American people can adhere to a wise and steadfast course of conduct through the years.

Change "American" to "Canadian" and I would agree with him there also.

There is no absolute security in the world today. But there is relative security, and a way to make that relative security stronger.

Especially in Canada and the United States.

Once we have established reasonable defensive forces, in combination with our friends of the Atlantic pact, the likelihood of an attack against us will be slight.

It surely will be.

I mean (by reasonable defensive forces) forces of such strength that any potential enemy must recognize (a) that it would be foolhardy for him to start a war against us, and (b) that it would be foolhardy for us to start a war against him. I believe that such an equilibrium of forces can be established, and held stable through the years until more civilized long-range solutions can be found.

Those words of General Bradley contain some jewels of wisdom, but I am afraid he did not have in mind the kind of thing that really needs to be done by both nations.

Are Canada and the United States really doing all they can to contribute to and encourage amicable collaboration? I immediately recall the United States' unconditional most-favoured-nations clause that forced Japan into world war II, and probably forced Germany to declare war in the beginning. What about the non-discrimination principle that has practically throttled every nation on the earth today? What about the convertibility of currency fallacy, that ghastly misconception brought about by the Bretton Woods agreement? What about the coerced reduction of imperial preferences which made the lot of Great Britain and the British commonwealth so much more difficult than it otherwise would have been? Those were all embodied or implied in the Bretton Woods agreement and the Minister of National Defence, along with all his colleagues, supported that agreement. I suppose he still supports it. That was one of the most pernicious documents ever perpetrated on earth by man. The Geneva and Havana trade agreements were built around the same fallacious principles, and those principles have never been disavowed. I maintain that until those principles are disavowed there is no hope for peace in the world.

May I refer to some of the things that are going on in the world and especially in our neighbouring nation where people are getting up and uttering high-sounding phrases just like those the minister has used. I do not want to be unkind to the minister because I know he is in the hands of a certain group of people who are working toward certain objectives. But he has been one of the leaders in that group, judging by his remarks in this house in times past.

We read in the Christian Science Monitor of November 7 that the government of the United States is limiting the production of many products at the very time when a billion people in the world lack the very things of which she is going to limit the production. Can we speak of that as being a measure designed to produce peace in the world? They are suggesting a reduction in the production of corn, wheat, cotton, rice, potatoes, peanuts, tobacco, citrus fruits and milk in some cities. That is being done at a time when there are tens of thousands of people in the United States not receiving the nourishment they ought to receive.

On November 2 the Christian Science Monitor speaks about the proposed reduction in the production of corn and says that the acreage will be reduced in 1950 to the lowest figure since 1892, that next year perhaps 10,000,000 acres less will be in production than in 1949. That brings up the question: How many commodities in Canada is the government limiting the production of? Not a few! In doing that I contend that their policy is directly contrary to all the high-sounding and pious phrases that appear in the Atlantic pact.

On November 3 Philip Noel-Baker, speaking before the Canadian Club in Quebec, said that one billion people in the world suffer from hunger but that with modern methods world food production could be doubled. Why is not the world doubling it? Until the modern world does that, particularly the United States and Canada, how can we stand here and say that Canada and the United States are doing all they can to prevent the coming of another war? If we cannot be honest, we should at least refrain from talking.

On the financial page of the Christian Science Monitor of October 24, 1949, there is reference to the Hirsch report. These are specialists in grain; they state that the world need for United States wheat is still vast.

Let us bear in mind something which is vital to this matter we are now discussing. In 1947 the United States sold $11 billion to $12 billion more goods to the world than she bought from the world, and a large proportion of those goods were rather forced on the world. That unbalance was just as great in 1948.

Can anyone maintain that the United States, which is refusing to distribute goods within her own borders so that her own people can buy them, which is refusing to distribute purchasing power, can anyone for a moment argue or even pretend that that nation—this applies equally to Canada—is endeavouring to remove the cause of a coming war? I have been arguing this kind of thing for a long time; hon. members cannot say that they have not been warned about this.

I do not want to be hard on hon. members but I can start and go in any direction and point out that all hon. members except Social Crediters almost broke their silly necks in a scramble to accept the Bretton Woods agreement. Apparently they thought that by accepting that pernicious thing all the evils of the world would be solved and the millennium introduced immediately. With the brilliant men that were in parliament in those days, one would think that they could have seen through the thing. The Social Crediters could.

In 1945 I stood here during the Bretton Woods debate and strove with all the force I had to get the Liberal party to realize the awful step they were taking. At that time a body of about 60 men who sat right over there kept up a noise like a stampede of bulls so that it was impossible for anyone to hear what I said. I hope the Liberal party has reformed since that time, because the day will come when those who took part in that booing, those who in those days were called "little Chicago", will bow their heads in shame. They just did not know; they just did not have sense enough to let themselves be told. There is no use talking any other way. If you are ever going to begin to remove the causes of war you must start at the causes of war.

On March 23, 1945, we were discussing the San Francisco conference in this house. I took part in that debate and I am reported on page 155 of Hansard of that day as saying:

> I have mentioned three conditions under which Social Crediters favour an international organization. Fourth, each member undertakes to prohibit its nationals from owning or controlling any property or economic undertaking in another sovereign country.

That is a rather new way to approach this problem, is it not? Believe me, if we are going to approach this problem on a realistic basis we shall have to start right there. I went on further to say:

> The significance of that measure for avoiding war will not be appreciated without a considerable amount of study and thought; but that is one of the most important measures, and if that stipulation is not embodied in the arrangements we make, all our attempts at attaining international peace will be futile.

Have my predictions been justified and warranted by what has occurred? Only too well; only too forcibly.

> Fifth: Each nation undertakes not to export goods to any other nation, except in payment for imports from that nation, without the consent of that nation's government. That sounds as though it were going to touch somebody's pocket; consequently that stipulation will not be very acceptable. But the embodiment of the last two undertakings will go further towards producing a peaceful condition in this world than all the achievements of several San Francisco conferences.
> Finally: Each state undertakes to receive payment in goods and services for any debt owing to its nationals.

What a difference there would be in the world today if the United States would agree to that.

> Do you need a Dumbarton Oaks, with an international police force, to enforce these regulations? All you need is good neighbourly sincere faith and honesty in approaching facts as they are in the world.

I said something more on that same page which I am going to quote if I have time. I am deeply concerned, along with all other members of the house, with removing the causes of war; but removing the causes of war does not have anything to do with building up a great international organization with a big police force to jam adverse policies down the throats of the nations and make them take it and like it. That is not finding a solution to their troubles.

I should like to turn to the document in question and consider it a little further. I shall refer to the section dealing with defence objectives of Canada, part III, and read from paragraph 18:

> The attitude of the communists has simplified for all countries the problem of adjusting national interests to international needs.

If the communists have done that I wonder why we do not see more evidence of it in Canada. We can still pass rent regulations that paralyse people from coast to coast and make them wonder if there is anyone in Canada they can trust. If that is not preparing fruitful ground for communist seeds, tell me how you would do it any better, after having made specific promises that such would not be done. In paragraph 19 I find these words:

The right way to preserve peace or to achieve victory is to work with others.

That is perfectly right. How skilful are these members of the government in telling us things which everybody knows are true, but how defective they are when it comes to proposing policies which will put into operation the general principles implied. I should like to turn now to part IV, page 15, paragraph 49, reading in part as follows:

Again in proportion to population the present strength of our navy reserve divisions, reserve army units and air force auxiliary squadrons are larger than the corresponding forces in Britain.

What does that mean? Here we are in Canada with the goods, resources human and material, to outdo, I imagine, ten to one what the British can do, and we are saying that we feel we have achieved something really big when our expenditure, in proportion to our population, is equal to Great Britain's. It is fantastic, is it not, when you look at it? It indicates a lack of a realistic approach to the whole matter.

I should like to turn now to part VI, page 25, paragraph 105, where, referring to the greatest bottleneck in meeting a future emergency, it says that:

. . . it would be in trained tradesmen. Steps are being taken to increase their numbers.

That is entirely laudable, but the minister has not told us how many trained tradesmen we have, whether or not the number we have is adequate for the needs of the times, and how many we have in reserve in case we are suddenly confronted with war. We shall have to be in operation producing munitions within two days after the next war commences. We shall not have fifteen or eighteen months to tinker around the way we did in the last war. I wonder if the minister can tell us exactly how many trained men he has, how many he has in training who would be ready, say, in three months, six months, one year, and so on, and why he thinks the number he has is adequate. This is the kind of thing I want to know. Some of my sons will be in the next war; I am concerned about the matter. My family will be in danger; I am concerned. I cannot just take nice smooth-sounding phrases and be lulled to sleep.

May I turn now to part VII, page 29, paragraph 127, which reads:

Contracts have been arranged with Canadair Limited for the purchase of 100 F86A's at a cost of $30,211,190, which does not include the cost of engines, armament and radios. The work has already begun on the construction of this aircraft.

Suppose Russia were to strike six weeks from today. How many of these aircraft would be available? I really would like to know that. I realize that probably the minister might be divulging secrets which it would be inadvisable to divulge, but that is the kind of thing I want to know when I approach the whole problem of preparation for war. When we start to fight we shall need munitions right away. At page 31, paragraph 136, I find the following:

It has been decided to produce new high-powered radar equipment in Canada, thereby giving to Canadian electronic manufacturers experience and capacity invaluable in the event of an emergency.

When do they intend to begin to make this high-powered radar equipment? That is what I want to know. It has been decided; probably it was decided five years ago.

Paragraph 139 reads in part:

In 1948-49 we let contracts for 2,160 married quarters and in addition there were 273 housing units under construction at the end of the year.

That sounds all right, but I should like to know what was the average cost to the government of constructing each of these houses. I should like to know where they are located.

In paragraph 140 we are told:

Although we have added 70 per cent to reserve army accommodation during the last ten years, there is still a great shortage.

How great? We really would like to know that.

Paragraph 141 reads:

For a good many years to come, expenditures on construction will constitute a major item in the defence program.

Bless my soul, we all knew that! It seems to me I knew that when I was fourteen. Paragraph 141 continues:

We have to accommodate seven or eight times the numbers we had before the war,—

I should think we would all know that.

—and have much larger requirements for operational units, stores, hangars, training establishments—indeed every type of construction in every part of the country.

Why on earth did the minister waste our time telling us that?

In the closing paragraph on page 32 I find these words:

This network, furnished with modern radio teletype equipment extends throughout Canada and connects Canada with other countries.

Well and good; but I want to know if it extends adequately to meet our needs in case of an attack in any particular area of Canada. There are a good many other things I want to say, particularly as to paragraphs 148, 149, 150, 151 and 152, but I will probably direct my questions concerning them to the minister some time later.

In conclusion, I advise the minister to advise the cabinet, while yet there is time, to go about discovering means of satisfactorily distributing the goods Canada is able to produce. Let them set to work to find out how to make what is physically possible actually financially possible in this country. As matters are going now we are approaching the time when our production will exceed our consumption, just as it did before the depression both in Canada and in the United States; then the more goods we have the poorer we shall be, just as we were at that time. Everyone must realize that this statement is sound.

What are we going to do about it? That is the question. Are we going to tinker along with the outmoded philosophies of finance that have filled the minds of the ministers up to the present time, or is it possible for them finally to grow some new wood? When they have learned how to distribute our surplus goods in Canada then let them tackle the problem of how to distribute Canada's surplus goods to the various nations which need them because they are starving, whether or not those needy nations are able to get our dollars with which to pay for them.

When they have finally discovered how to solve this problem let them send a delegation to the United States to talk to President Truman and other men there who are concerned with the same question. Let them inform those people what they have found, and they will make a genuine contribution toward the removal of the major cause of war, and will be putting themselves in line to reap the reward of that hope which General Bradley expressed as being a possibility in our time.

I shall say no more at the present time, Mr. Chairman, but shall probably have something else to say later on.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I should like to quote two short sentences from the Mainguy report, as follows:

> Although this report in the very nature of things is bound to be critical, it must not be assumed that there are not many reasons for great national pride in the achievements of the Canadian navy, past and present, and in the men who inherit and guard its traditions.

Then a little further on:

> If, therefore, we have stressed what is wrong, it should not be forgotten that a great deal also is overwhelmingly right.

If we substitute for "report" the word "remarks" or "criticism", and for "Canadian navy" substitute "defence forces," these two sentences I think will apply to what I have to say, and I think to most of what may be said by members of the opposition. My conception of our job is that we should point out to the government what we think is wrong with our defence policy and our defence forces, and offer suggestions as to improvements which may be made. This makes it necessary that our remarks be critical.

In going about the country, in railroad compartments, people's homes and so on, when any general discussion of the question of defence comes up I have found that ordinarily three questions are asked. First, what is our defence policy? Second, what commitments have we for defence under the Atlantic pact? Third, have we the forces we need to meet those commitments? The people of this country as a whole do not know what our defence policy is. I am not too sure that I know what it is. Certainly I do not know the answers to the other two questions, nor do I think they are known to any members of this house, except the members of the government. It seems to me one of the first things the government should do is announce to this country what our responsibilities are under the Atlantic pact. Having definitely outlined those responsibilities, then let them say what defence forces we have to meet those responsibilities. If that were done I am sure it would be much easier to get the men required for our defence forces, both permanent and reserve, and I think the government also would have the full support of all the people of Canada in the expenditures it might be necessary to make in order to meet those commitments. As it is, the general public do not know the answers to those questions. As a result there is a great lack of enthusiasm on the part of the young men of this country toward military service.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, November 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): To go on, Mr. Speaker, with my third and concluding speech of the current series on this Bill No. 66, last week I mentioned the fact that the life of the Turner valley oil field had been cut down considerably by the lack of foresight with respect to the conservation of the gas, and the fact that the life of the field is now estimated at approximately ten years. The requirements of the cities of southern Alberta have been jeopardized to such an extent that, in the very near future, they are going to be forced to pipe gas down from the newer oil fields in northern Alberta.

So much for the wastage of the gas itself. There is another and probably more important reason for the conservation of the natural gas. This gas is used for the bringing up of the oil to the surface; it is estimated that for every barrel of oil taken out of the older fields, nine remain in the ground because the pressure of the natural gas has been used up by the wastage. Contrary to common belief, the oil does not appear in pools or lakes under the surface; rather, it comes in a porous rock which looks much like honeycomb. When your well is drilled, the natural gas pressure which has been building up over a period of millions of years forces the oil up into the well. As the pressure diminishes, the pressure of the salt water forces it up in between the oil in the porous limestone of the well itself. As a result, you have nothing left except salt water in your well.

The gas pressure comes in two different ways. The first is in a pocket of gas above the oil-bearing rock. The second type is dissolved right in the oil as a result of pressure. When the well is drilled the pressure is relieved and the gas naturally forces the oil up into the well. In the case of a gas pocket, gas may be retrieved at the well head, forced back down by means of pressure pumps, and used again to create sufficient pressure for the bringing up of the oil.

A recent survey made by the Gulf Oil Company has placed the known reserves in Alberta at 2,000 billion cubic feet. That sounds like a large amount of gas, but actually when the needs of the oil industry are considered, it is not a great deal. What gas we have must be conserved until we are assured that we have sufficient for our own needs and for the proper oil production.

There are some members, Mr. Speaker, who possibly think that I have been attempting to talk this bill out, but that is not true. My main point in speaking on this bill is to show the need for proper conservation methods. As for the incorporation of this company or any other company like it, we have no objections. We are in favour of incorporating any number of these pipe line companies. We have full confidence in the Alberta government and in the Alberta conservation board, and in their ability to determine how much of the gas may be exported out of Alberta to other parts of Canada and, after the Canadian needs are assured, how much may be shipped outside Canada to consumers in the United States.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): In rising to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it perfectly clear at the outset that I do so in what, to my mind, is the best interest of British Columbia. I know that one member from British Columbia expressed fear that Vancouver would not get the gas if this bill did not go through. Unlike that member I feel that, if this bill goes through in its present form, Vancouver will not get the gas inasmuch as it would be at the tail end of any proposed pipe line. I am therefore speaking more as to the route through which this pipe line is to go to the coast than as to the product to be carried through the pipe line.

I could possibly rightly and properly take up the question of who owns the gas and whether it should be handed over to private enterprise or whether it should be distributed by the government of the province of Alberta or the government of the province of British Columbia; but I am not going to do that. I feel that the interests of British Columbia are paramount, and to my mind they definitely come before the interests of the states of Oregon and Washington. I am convinced that our best interests are not served if this line goes, as is proposed, through Kingsgate and through the states that I have mentioned. The location of this line is as important today as was the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway eighty or ninety years ago. I understand the minister made the statement that he wants the gas to go to the best available market. But I am satisfied that if the people who plotted out the route for the Canadian Pacific Railway in those days had sought a market instead of service, they too would have gone through the states of Oregon and Washington because the facilities and the type of terrain were far better suited to a cheaper line to the coast than the one through the Rockies. But that thought was far from their minds. They wanted to develop their own country. I feel that this pipe line today must be used to develop our own country, and particularly the province of British Columbia. The future development of that province depends on this line. I am selfish enough to feel that the industries that will follow in its wake should be developed in our own country rather than in the United States. I am also satisfied that the company could possibly save a few million dollars, but I believe that the few million dollars they would save would not be more than 10 or 15 per cent of the total cost of the line; and this amount, taken over the period of years during which it will operate, will be a mere nothing. Any profits that may be lost in the immediate present will be more than retrieved by the shorter line going through Canada compared with the one going through the states.

Then there is the question of maintenance and the cost of construction. These bring immediate valuable revenue to one country or the other. It will run into millions and millions of dollars. It will mean the pipes, the fittings, the labour in putting the pipes down, the labour in maintaining it and the labour in distributing it over a good many years. We can do with that labour in Canada, we can do with that outlet for labour, and we can do with the revenue that will be derived from the pipe line going through our own territory.

As I said, if the Canadian Pacific Railway had taken the same stand we would not have the flourishing valleys of the Kootenay, the Fraser and the Okanagan in the interior of British Columbia that we have today, and the country as a whole would have lost out. I am satisfied that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company in Trail, one of the biggest undertakings of its kind in the empire, would not have been established there, neither would it have flourished in British Columbia, if it had not been for the Canadian Pacific Railway giving it the necessary service.

Then we have the wealth that has been developed in the interior of British Columbia. That too can be directly attributed to the facilities offered by the railways in bringing in labour and machinery and taking out the raw material to be manufactured or processed as the case may be. The government of the day saw the possibility and their foresight has paid dividends ever since.

As I pointed out, I regard modern transportation as being streamlined by the use of the pipe line, and the route is just as important as the railway was. Along this route I can visualize many townships and developed municipalities bringing vast wealth to the interior of British Columbia, wealth that we know is possible through the actual presence there of fine lands, fine timber, fine mines and everything that goes to make a country prosperous. Surely that would be in the best interest of our own kith and kin in our own province.

A factory established in the Okanagan or in the Fraser valley would contribute far more to the welfare of this dominion, and particularly to British Columbia, than one established in Spokane or Wenatchee. That brings to my mind the saying that the city of Spokane was built on the wealth of British Columbia. That is practically true because that city was built on money invested to exploit our natural resources in the early days, both timber and mines. Today it is a flourishing city. Similar cities may well be duplicated by this pipe line. That is one reason why I am going to fight to have this pipe line go through our own country. It is a modern Aladdin's lamp that conjures up new industry and contributes to prosperity.

I am not opposed to the sale of this product to our friends across the line. Neither will an all-Canadian route prevent their purchasing it, but it would mean that the line would enter the main consuming points in the United States from Vancouver instead of ending at Vancouver. I do not have to go into detail on that point because I think it is fairly obvious that the dead end of a line—it does not matter whether it is gas or oil or anything else—usually gets what is left after all the other customers have been satisfied. In this instance the last customer would be the cities of Vancouver, New Westminster and possibly some of the Fraser valley towns.

It is quite possible that the supply of this gas may peter out. I was pleased to hear my hon. friends tell us of the vast resources particularly of gas that are known to be in Alberta. If a shortage did arise and the service had to be cut, the cut would take place toward the end where the greatest cost of transferring the gas arises. The obvious place to cut would be on the last place to be served. Therefore Canadian consumers would be cut off from supply first. That would be the cities of British Columbia. I do not blame the company. They may or may not have to do it. I am assuming that if such a condition did come about British Columbia would suffer.

The Canadian consumers have a stake in this. I feel that Canada, when she develops her own natural resources, should have the first chance to use them. We can be generous because we cannot possibly use more than one-third of it, and we would give two-thirds to our neighbours. But let our neighbours take their turn, as we have for many years taken our turn on fuel oil, gas and anything else that we get from them. They too have been generous. We can be just as generous, but they looked after the United States first of all.

This bill would have my full support if it was changed to contain a clause that the line will traverse Canadian territory all the way to Vancouver and then cross over from Vancouver to Tacoma, Seattle and the towns that they have in mind. I say that because of the added revenue that will be derived from the line going through our own dominion. I mentioned some of the added revenue that would come along from the pipes themselves, namely, the valves and fittings that would be manufactured in this country. Then there is the cost of maintenance which is an annual cost. But added to these is the potential increase in our actual income from definite industries that will be set up along this line.

So far as I am concerned it has not been made clear, if this pipe line goes through the state of Washington and the product re-enters British Columbia from a distributing point in Tacoma or Seattle or somewhere in between, whether the price to the Canadian consumer would be on the United States dollar basis, which would be to our detriment because we would have to meet that 10 per cent penalty; or whether it would be conveyed through in bond, as it were, to Vancouver and sold at the Canadian price. This point has never been made clear. But I would presume that logically the United States distributor at the point in Washington would redistribute to Vancouver, billing the Vancouver purchaser for the price of the gas plus the exchange value of the dollar. I believe it would be quite logical for them to do that because after all the United States businessman is in business for the profit there is in it. He is not going to sell at a loss to Canada if there is a difference of 10 per cent in the value of the money.

On the other hand, by delivering through Vancouver to the United States we would be charging the full cost of transportation from Alberta to Vancouver, and not only the full cost of transportation but all the other costs of handling at the distributing points. Then we would be distributing through a Canadian point rather than through a United States point.

Presumably there is a charge of so much per mile for conveying the gas, and that cost per mile would remain in Canada; otherwise it would be paid by Canadians to the United States part of the line.

In the Ottawa Citizen of November 2 an item appeared which was taken from the Medicine Hat News, which was obviously written by someone with a sound knowledge of the situation and a full appreciation of the potential value of our Alberta gas as an empire builder. Unfortunately this visionary empire is south of the border. I should like to quote from this item:

> It may be that a deal will eventually be arranged between Alberta, Ontario and the federal authority for a reciprocal export-import arrangement whereby Alberta gas will be sold to Oregon and Washington on an exchange basis for Texas gas to Ontario. This would be a scheme on a national basis which would ensure that Canada as a whole would obtain benefit from Alberta natural gas deposits.
> The same sort of exchange seems to be taking shape in the background of oil developments.

It suggests that Canada as a whole does not include British Columbia. Gas is going to the state of Washington, and in return the province of Ontario is to receive gas from Texas. They talk of Canada as a whole. That is the point I wish to make.

Time and again we have sacrificed the west for the benefit of the eastern provinces. Maybe we are in the backwoods. Maybe we lose contact with what is taking place. But here is a definite plan, outlined by someone who thinks he knows what he is talking about, to use British Columbia, to sidestep us by taking gas to the coast, ignoring our need and making a deal whereby the province of Ontario would benefit. The article mentions that it would serve specific populous markets. These markets, it points out, do not exist in western Canada.

This may be quite true. It was true when the railway tracks were first laid. I understand that when those tracks were first laid across the prairies there were just a few buffalo, some sagebrush and very little else. But they had vision. I know they had no markets when they started out; and if the markets had not come and the country had not developed there would have been millions upon millions of dollars wasted in a futile effort in taking transportation to the west. But we know that you have to start somewhere.

The same argument applies here. While at the present time we have not the necessary markets in the west, there is no doubt in my mind that those markets would spring to life immediately if given a lifeline and the wherewithal to come to life. The railways led the way then, and I think the pipe lines can very well lead the way today. From the company's point of view, they would still have the west coast market. They would still be able to serve the very market they now seek to serve, from Tacoma to Seattle.

All we are seeking is an all-Canadian route to give that service. Then, the second part of the article I mentioned deals with the suggestion of a deal which would give the final knock-out blow to our hopes in British Columbia. I cannot agree with the article when it refers to benefit to the whole of Canada. Neither can I be convinced that benefits to the states of Washington and Oregon are direct or indirect benefits to the Dominion of Canada.

Concentration of industry in the east has been a handicap in the development of the west. I am glad to hear and to see that certain firms are now opening up branches in the west, realizing that this handicap has been placed on our backs for too long. Not only that, I consider British Columbia has the greatest untapped reserve in this dominion; and we cannot tap that reserve and develop it until we have something like natural gas with which to do it. Climate, as we know, is good out there all the year round. Our industries can function all the year round without handicap in winter and summer.

I come to another point. The companies claim that the cost per mile would be much greater—I understand around 15 per cent. But I should like to point out that traversing the route suggested, through Kingsgate, through the northern part of the state of Washington and to the distributing point outside Seattle would be 1,331 miles, while the all-Canadian route, following the railway, would be 940 miles, or roughly 400 less. That would take care of a good deal of the extra cost per mile in laying down the pipe line. I am not qualified to say what that extra cost would be. I understand the pipe is to be placed underground.

Then there are certain difficulties in connection with pipe lines. For instance, it is a favourite sport of hunters to take a pot shot at a pipe line almost anywhere, whether it be in the United States or in Canada, or Iraq. Hunters will always take pot shots at pipe lines, with the result that there is a tremendous upkeep cost, and patrolling must be done. There would be fewer chances of such damage along the route in British Columbia than along the other route, and it is a shorter distance.

In conclusion let me make it perfectly clear, especially to those interested in the idea of having this pipe line, that I do not know the personnel, that I do not know where the capital is derived from, and that I am not very much interested in those points. All I am interested in is to fight for the province I represent—and I intend to do all I can in that way.

Here we are going to hand out a valuable asset, one which if properly handled can build up an empire. We are going to hand it, not to an enemy, true, but to a friendly competitive nation. But we have done this so often in the past—we are doing it with our pulp, with our concentrates and with our wealth in general—including our gold. The profits to be derived from the development of our raw materials and our natural products are thus turned over to a friendly nation, rather than retained in our own.

For this reason I am going to ask that this bill be held up until such time as the promoters of the scheme accept a provision whereby the line will go through dominion territory all the way to Vancouver. I should like to see this put to a vote. And if it is put to a vote, I should like to see it put to a democratic vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jones: I mean a free vote is not a vote starting from the leaders of the parties, but starting in the back row and going right around and finishing with the leaders of the parties, letting members vote as they wish. I am afraid most of us vote just as indicated.

If a free vote were given I am satisfied hon. members in this chamber would see the point I am trying to make, that we are either going to give away an asset to a friendly nation, or retain and develop one of the most prosperous, and potentially more prosperous, provinces in the whole of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak on this bill or any other pipe-line bill. I have no personal interest either in the five bills passed last spring or the two which have come before the house at this session. However, in view of events which have taken place in the house in connection with these bills, I do wish to express my personal opinion upon them.

I believe there has been an entire misconception of the purpose of the bill before us, and the others preceding it. If one were to incorporate a public company under a provincial or the dominion companies act, provided one were not asking for something unlawful, the charter would be automatically forthcoming. Then it would be up to the applicant to qualify his shares before the securities commission before he was allowed to sell them to the public. That is the normal procedure. There would be no reason to refuse a charter to anyone.

But in the case of a pipe line company under the Pipe Lines Act it is required that a company be incorporated by act of parliament. There is a direct reason why it should be incorporated by act of parliament, and it is that these companies are given very considerable power, particularly in the field of eminent domain. That is, they have power of expropriation under the Pipe Lines Act. Accordingly it was considered desirable that companies of this kind should be incorporated before parliament so that in each case they could be examined if necessary, and a decision could be made in order that the act might be passed. Five of these acts were passed at the last session and, although I have not compared them word for word, I think they are all identical with this bill. They were all passed pursuant to the Pipe Lines Act and the wording in the separate acts followed the wording in the Pipe Lines Act. However, when those bills came up before the house no opposition was raised to the incorporation of those companies.

If this bill is passed by parliament it merely means that a legal entity is established. It seems that certain members of this house have decided that this company shall remain stillborn, shall never be given a chance to mature and grow up. I ask those hon. members to reconsider their attitude. Surely if five companies have been incorporated pursuant to the Pipe Lines Act any other people applying for a similar charter should be entitled to enter into this competitive field. It does strike me as being most unfair and discriminatory that at this stage we should say that this bill should not be passed and that the five legal entities already in the field should have a complete monopoly.

I stress again that I have no personal interest, legal or otherwise, in any of these companies, but I do think it would be establishing a bad precedent to refuse incorporation to this or any other company. There are many things that must happen once the legal entity is established. The company would have to go to the relevant board and cabinet of the province in question to obtain the necessary authorization. Similarly it would have to go before the board of transport commissioners to obtain approval to construct the pipe line.

It was intended that the Pipe Lines Act should guide the lives of these companies and that that authority should be vested in the board of transport commissioners, not in this parliament. I should like to read the relevant parts of section 11, which are as follows:

> A company shall not, except as in this act otherwise provided, begin the construction of a section or part of a company pipe line, until,
> (a) the board has by order granted the company leave to construct the line;
> (b) the plan, profile and book of reference of the section or part of the proposed line have been approved by the board;

Obviously the board of transport commissioners has control over these companies, not parliament. It is quite clear that the purpose of the Pipe Lines Act was not to have parliament supervise every last detail of the incorporation of these companies, but to have parliament incorporate the companies and then leave the direction and control over the companies to the board of transport commissioners.

It would appear to me to be most unfair and discriminatory to attempt to talk out this bill at this stage. This is the normal procedure. The only difference between an incorporation under this bill and an incorporation under the Companies Act is that control over the company is given to the board of transport commissioners. I would not suggest for a single moment that hon. members of this house were interested in this or any other bill, but I do suggest that if they were interested parties to bills of this type their action would closely resemble the action we have witnessed in this house. I ask hon. members to reconsider the fundamentals of this thing and decide whether in fairmindedness and fair behaviour they should not say: If this bill is in proper form, it should have our approval.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking, but I should like him to name the five companies which were incorporated last year to transport oil and gas to the west coast.

Mr. Howe: Why not let him look it up.

Mr. Cruickshank: You make your speech and I will make mine.

Mr. Hunter: I would refer the hon. member to chapter 27 of the statutes of 1949, an act to incorporate the British American Pipe Line Company; to chapter 34, an act to incorporate Interprovincial Pipe Line Company; to chapter 36, an act to incorporate Trans-Northern Pipe Line Company; to chapter 37, an act to incorporate Westcoast Transmission Company Limited; and to chapter 38, an act to incorporate Western Pipe Lines.

Mr. Cruickshank: I hope I am not transgressing on the time that would be allotted to me to speak when I ask these questions.

Mr. Speaker: No more questions can be allowed at this time. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think there are some further observations which should be made before the question is put. As I understand it, the purpose of the bill before us is to incorporate a company whose objects do not appear clearly in the bill. When I say that I have in mind that the route proposed to be followed and the points from which the gas will be collected and delivered do not appear in the bill we are discussing. In this connection I should like to support what was said a few days ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), that before the house is called upon to approve or disapprove of the principle of this bill permitting the transportation of natural gas which originates in Canada we should know clearly where the gas is to be sold and the route by which it is to be transported.

I make these observations because I believe in the principle which has been stated by many hon. members in the past, that the natural resources of Canada should be made available to and preserved primarily for the people of Canada. It is on that principle that I base the remarks I intend to make tonight in connection with this bill.

Although it is not immediately apparent from the terms of the bill, we understand that this company will gather the gas in southern Alberta and take it by pipe line through the United States to be distributed to cities there; then if anything were left it would be taken to the Pacific coast city of Vancouver. Not only will the route by-pass the interior of British Columbia; the users in Vancouver and other cities in the province will have available only what gas is left over after the needs of the points in the United States have been fully supplied.

The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones), who preceded me in this debate, made what I think were pertinent references to the history of the development of the western part of Canada. One of the features which stand out in that history is that if the founders of Canada, the pioneers of the nation, had not had faith in its future, which faith was not justified by the previous development of the country but was founded upon their determination and belief that they could and should build a great nation north of the 49th parallel, this country would not have existed today as a separate entity. I think we would be somewhat untrue to the faith and determination of those who went before us, and who built the nation, if we did not hold true to the principles they laid down in the days when the tasks and difficulties of constructing the country were so much greater than those which we face today.

In taking the position that Canadian resources must be reserved primarily for the development of Canada, one is not necessarily adopting a selfish or unreasonable attitude, and it should not be regarded as a slight to the United States of America. In fact it is nothing more than taking a lesson from the history of the development of Canada. We know quite well that the Canadian Pacific Railway, to come down to cases, would not have been built if it had not been that the fathers of confederation, those who insisted that Canada should exist as a separate nation, said that the lines of communication in the northern half of this continent should run east and west rather than north and south. They took that stand in spite of most serious obstacles, and carried it out in building a railway through the barrier of the Rocky mountains on to the Pacific coast.

As a result of their vision this country came into being, and the dream of confederation was eventually completed by the addition of the Pacific coast province as a part of Canada. It is not necessary for us to go back into history to remind hon. members of the fact that at one time it was somewhat questionable whether that Pacific coast province, or the southern portion of it at any rate, should belong to Canada or by virtue of geography to the nation south of the 49th parallel. In the same way that the country was built up and came into being because of the determination to build a nation from Atlantic to Pacific, I think that we should insist upon developing that nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific and serving our people before we allow our resources to be diverted south of the border.

The hon. member for Yale has mentioned the potentialities of the province of British Columbia, climate, resources and people, affording a great natural market for industrial development. Such development has not taken place at the rate which we would desire to see, because of a combination of two factors. It is rather like the old question of which came first, the chicken or the egg. Must you have the population first in order to attract heavy industry, and after heavy industry power and other factors which will create an industrial economy, or must you have power and communications first in order to build up a population which will support the heavy industries that people have the vision to establish there? In my view, Mr. Speaker, the history of Canada shows that it is communications, power, transportation, which invariably come first in this country.

That has been the history of the development of the west. It was the history which followed upon the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was the history which followed upon the building of the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Northern Pacific, and the Grand Trunk Pacific railways. While it is certainly true to say, particularly of the last three railway systems, that they fell upon hard times and for many years did not pay, and that it was necessary eventually for the dominion government to take them over and amalgamate them into the one Canadian National system, is there anyone in the house who will say that the country was badly served by the vision, inspiration and determination of the men who built those railway lines in advance of the actual population requirements? I am quite certain that no one will say the country was badly served, although it is perfectly true that these railways did go through a most difficult period before they were amalgamated and made into a paying proposition.

Anyone who is familiar with the history of the western area of Canada knows full well the part the railways played in the development of the country, and that at the present time they are paying lines because population, industry, agriculture and the economy generally have been built up to a point where they support and make it possible for the railways to be a revenue producing proposition in the same areas where at first they were bankrupt.

We from the west coast province believe that it is capable of much greater development in the future than has taken place in the past. We know the resources of the area; we know its potentialities; we know the great untapped areas which have not yet been subject to any development at all. Because we have contributed in the past to the development of the rest of Canada, because we have paid our willing tribute as a part of Canada to the predominantly industrial sections of the central part of the country, Ontario and Quebec, we feel it is not unfair for us to request that these portions of Canada, which have benefited by the advantages we were able to contribute to the development of confederation, should bear their share in developing the undeveloped parts of our province.

Although, on the basis of strict economics, it may be somewhat less profitable to insist that these pipe lines should be constructed through Canadian territory, and should serve Canadian markets, I leave the thought with the house that the development of a nation, if one has a patriotic idea of that development, never proceeds upon a basis of straight economics. If we had proceeded upon such a basis in the past Canada would not be an independent nation today. We believe Canada can become a much greater, more powerful and more independent nation than she is today, standing on her own feet, if she follows her own course of development. Because we believe in that and because we insist upon that, as far as we in the west are concerned, at any rate—and in this respect I certainly believe I can speak for my constituency—we feel that these pipe lines should serve Canadian markets and Canadian consumers before our resources are made available to those south of the border. Not being satisfied upon that point, I must oppose this bill.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Nanaimo may not appear to be directly affected by this bill, because it is on Vancouver island and I do not know whether it would be possible or practicable to pipe this natural gas under the strait of Juan de Fuca to that island. However, I do know that the prosperity of Vancouver island depends very largely upon the prosperity of the city of Vancouver and the great hinterland of British Columbia. We are largely dependent upon the tourist trade, and that is not composed entirely of foreigners coming to our island. We are delighted to welcome people from other parts of British Columbia and other parts of Canada who come to enjoy our scenery and take advantage of our facilities for such sports as fishing, mountaineering and so on. Many people from the great cities of Vancouver and New Westminster spend their week ends and their holidays on Vancouver island, and particularly in my constituency. Their ability to come over to our island and enjoy the advantages we are able to offer depends entirely upon the prosperity of those two cities; and anything that will enhance that prosperity naturally reacts to the advantage of the people of Vancouver island.

So it seems to me that if in these somewhat difficult times we can make available to the people of the metropolitan area of Vancouver our natural resources, which can be transported there direct from another province, it will not only help the interior of British Columbia but will also benefit the pleasure resorts of Vancouver island. From the little I know about natural gas, I believe that when it is piped it can be tapped anywhere along the line and much of the gas can be diverted before it reaches its ultimate destination. Therefore I feel that we should route this pipe line direct from Alberta to the great cities of the Canadian Pacific coast instead of sending it through the friendly northwestern United States and allowing the huge cities of the states of Washington and Oregon to have first chance at this Canadian product which many of us believe should be developed for the benefit of Canadians rather than the benefit of those of another country, no matter how friendly that country may be.

I have travelled by motorcar, by train, by aeroplane and on foot over a great deal of the territory lying along the boundary between Canada and the United States, and I do not believe there are any insurmountable obstacles to a pipe line following the all-Canadian route. As has been pointed out already by previous speakers, that route is shorter than the United States route. It is not as well known or as well travelled, but that is largely because the roads are not so good.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business under consideration at six o'clock.

HOUSING

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): If I might have leave to revert to motions, Mr. Speaker, in conformity with an undertaking I gave the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) at page 1318 of Hansard to table correspondence with the provincial governments in respect to housing, I now table that correspondence with all provinces, going back to the Prime Minister's letter to all provincial premiers dated March 2, 1949.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

239. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $227,150.

Mr. Harkness: Before the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I had been saying something about the three questions I found being brought up most frequently by the general public as far as defence matters are concerned; that is to say, what is our defence policy, what are our defence commitments under the Atlantic pact, and have we the forces to meet those commitments. Now I should like to go on and say something in reference to our defence policy.

I suppose the seven points the minister gave us this afternoon summarize our defence policy and give it as clearly as it has yet been placed before this house or the public. I presume those seven points are included in the white paper the minister tabled today. I am sorry I have not yet had an opportunity to see that document, and I shall certainly be most interested in reading it. However, I jotted down those points as the minister gave them. The first five were what might be called more or less general; that is, that the only possible aggressor is Russia; that any war would be a world war; that the best way to prevent war is to have strong forces; that in order to have strong forces with which to prevent anything in the nature of Russian aggression we must have the co-operative strength of the western world; and that Canada welcomes the Atlantic pact as giving that co-operative strength definite form. Then the sixth and seventh points might be said to be those under which the practical details of our defence policy would fall. We have had statements in this connection at various times. Roughly it comes down to this; that what Canada requires is a small but highly trained and efficient navy, air force and army, the navy capable of doing convoy, anti-submarine and anti-mine work, and the air force and army capable of meeting any diversionary raid. In other words, as the Ottawa Journal has in its headlines, "Sneak Red Attack Canada's No. 1 Defence Worry." That headline pretty well sums up the situation. The question whether the army and the air force are in a situation to meet a sneak attack of that sort is one which I shall come to a little later on.

In addition to these permanent forces which I have been dealing with up to this time, however, there is also the question of the reserve forces. As to the navy and the air force, the reserve forces are comparatively small and, as far as I know, the plans do not envisage large reserve forces for those two arms of the service. But the plans do envisage fairly large reserve forces for the army, running to a strength of five or six divisions, and in the event of emergency capable of rapid expansion into a strong hitting force which could be used for fighting wherever the theatre of war happens to be—and which everybody hopes will be, as the minister said this afternoon, as far away from Canada as possible.

During past sessions, and particularly since the post-war defence force was brought into being, we have directed various questions to the government with the general object really of finding out to what extent this force, about which the minister was always talking and to which a great deal of publicity was given, was in being; in other words, whether we had a navy which could do its job and whether we had an army and air force which could do the job, or whether we had not. The general impression given was that we had those forces, that we were all right and that in the event of one of these sneak attacks it could be repelled, and so forth.

In speaking on defence in the budget debate, the minister said that he had answered all questions which had ever been asked in connection with these matters, except one which I happened to ask and about which there was some question last year. I do not want to get into any argument about the number of questions that were not answered. I can assure the minister that I could turn up a few others that were not answered. I must say that, as to questions which were asked by me and which were not answered orally here in the house or in writing in reply to the written questions on the order paper, the minister or his parliamentary assistant of that time would frequently come to see me or telephone me and say: We will not give this information in the house, we will not put it in the form of a written answer, but we will give it to you privately. I wanted to say that, in order to be completely fair in this matter. That happened frequently; but there were some cases in which it did not happen. In spite of what the minister has said to the effect that he had answered all questions, the fact remains that the answers given orally in this house, the written answers given, and the information given to a person privately when he wants to ask a question about some particular thing, such as the number of tanks we had or something else, are not sufficient to give any member of the house, and particularly the house as a whole, any complete, good, balanced picture of what the situation is with regard to our defence forces.

In this general committee of the house it is impossible to get sufficiently detailed information. For one thing, ordinarily we cannot take enough time to get it. Only today we were informed that it is hoped that the session will be over by December 3. We have some thirty or forty bills still on the order paper, and we have practically all the estimates yet to be dealt with. In this general committee it is impossible to get the detailed information which is necessary to give any member of this chamber the knowledge that he should have in order to be able to consider intelligently the situation with regard to our defence forces. This inability of members to get information is, I think, to a large extent the result of the set-up, the way our business is done here, and so forth. That is one reason why the members of this party for some three years now have been pressing for a defence committee of this house to be set up, in which we could see the heads of the services, could get the detailed information that many of us would like to have, and could find out what our situation is.

To leave that point, Mr. Chairman, the contention of several of us on this side of the house in the past has been that we did not have the defence forces which the general public and in fact the house had been led to expect that we possessed; and our contention is that in fact we still have not those forces.

As to the navy, in spite of the Mainguy report I think it is probably an exception from that point of view. As far as I know, I think the navy is a fighting force in being. In other words, it could go out tomorrow and fight. If it were given a week, ten days or a month, it could probably fight fairly efficiently. There might be some ships which were not in good shape; nevertheless so far as I know, it is a fighting force in being. In spite of certain deficiencies which have been shown up in this report, in the navy I think we probably have something like what we have paid for and what we should have.

When we come to the army and the air force, I do not think that situation has prevailed during the past three years, and I do not think it prevails at the present time. As far as I know, the fighting units in the army and air force are lacking in trained personnel, and are particularly lacking in equipment. They could not go out and fight tomorrow; they could not go out and fight in a week's time; and unless the equipment were forthcoming in fairly short order from the United States or some place else, they would not be able to go out and fight in several months' time.

In my opinion, that is not good enough. Under the defence policy as enunciated by the minister, we were supposed to have an army and an air force capable of meeting any diversionary raid on this country. Last session and the session before we were assured that we had a force designed to do that, and that we had an airborne brigade group. As a matter of actual fact, as I say, I do not think we have that. I think the members of the house should be able to get the information required in order to know whether we have a force or whether we have not, and to know just what is the situation.

I should like to say one or two things further in connection with this matter. From the casual information that I have been able to pick up—I have not sought it out or looked for it; it has just come to me because I know a large number of people who have served and are serving in the defence forces —I think considerable progress has been made in the last six or eight months with regard to the army. As far as I know, the number of men has increased considerably, and as a result their training has been considerably improved. I know that about a year ago most of the permanent force units of any size in this country were at half strength or less, as the result of which it was impossible for them to train efficiently; and of course it would have been hopeless for them to attempt to fight. I know also that at the present time at least some of those units are up to full strength; and from what I have been able to see of them, I think their training is fairly good. That is encouraging. As I say, that is just information that, as far as I am concerned, I have gained casually and so on. But on the basis of that I think a considerable amount of progress has been made in the army during the last eight months or so. I am glad of that, but so far as the situation in the air force is concerned I do not know whether there has been a similar improvement or not. One thing I do know is that their equipment situation is still not good.

I should now like to say something about the numbers of officers and other ranks who are employed in headquarters of various sorts. Last year a return was made to a question of mine which is now out of date, therefore I will not bother quoting it. But the number of officers and other ranks in the three services who were employed at National Defence headquarters or at command headquarters or at naval division headquarters was considerable. It was a big proportion of the total number of personnel in all three services. I was glad to see that the Mainguy report took some cognizance of that and made a recommendation in connection with it which appears on page 61 under "administration." It reads as follows:

> The needs of the modern navy, in general, and the mass of administrative detail, paper work and committee work involved, have placed upon valuable naval officers an undue burden of administrative detail. In Britain the navy commands the services of a number of high-ranking and competent civil servants. Although difficulty may be encountered in creating civilian positions of high enough level and salary to attract the most desirable entrants, we feel that there would be a considerable improvement in efficiency and a substantial saving both in money and in valuable manpower if the British system were followed.

Great benefits would flow to all three services through releasing from office desks here in Ottawa, and at command headquarters and at various other headquarters across the country, a large number of officers and other ranks who are held there at the present time doing administrative detail work. I trust that that is a move which will be made and made just as rapidly as possible.

I have talked to several people in the services about what I would call the top-heavy organization of the defence forces. We have far more people in headquarters, and in things of that sort, than we have in the actual fighting units. Most of them have said, "Yes, it is too bad that is the situation, but unfortunately we must have a headquarters set-up which, if a war broke out, could be rapidly converted to handle a large army of five or six divisions." How are we going to get away from this kind of thing? Since we have to cut our coat according to our cloth—our resources—I think that in the meantime it would be much better to use the manpower available, and the manpower which we can afford to pay for, mainly in actual fighting units rather than having this large administrative and command set-up which will really come into operation and be used only if we raise a large army.

I should now like to deal with the reserve force. To begin with, I should like to pay a tribute to the officers and other ranks who devote a considerable portion of their time to working in reserve units throughout the country. At very considerable sacrifice to themselves in most cases they are doing an extremely valuable work which all too often the general public in their own communities do not appreciate and do not thank them for. Without the counterparts of these men in 1939 I think everyone admits that we could not have mobilized the first and second divisions with the rapidity with which we did, and the subsequent divisions afterwards. They are the people upon whom any large mushrooming of the defence forces, particularly of the army, must be built, and they deserve all the encouragement that can be given them. One of the great difficulties, in fact the greatest difficulty so far as the reserve units are concerned—and it is of the army particularly that I am speaking—is the difficulty of getting men.

When the minister spoke this afternoon he said that the recruiting was satisfactory; that they had been getting all the men they wanted except in the reserve forces. I doubt whether they have been getting all the men they wanted in the last three years, otherwise we would have had the permanent defence force filled up far sooner. We have been trying for about three years now to get it filled up and it is still not filled up. However, I think everybody admits that there has been extreme difficulty in getting men into the reserve units. The recruiting campaigns which have been put on have been flops.

In Calgary we have had two or three army weeks that I remember, during which the various units came down town with pieces of their equipment. This equipment was put in prominent places such as busy street corners and so forth to be seen by the people. Posters were put up. Advertisements were put in the newspapers. Talks were given on the radio, and so on, all designed to draw in recruits for both the reserve forces and the permanent forces. So far as the reserve forces are concerned, these means were just hopeless. Very few recruits were secured as a result of them, in Calgary at any rate. I understand the same thing was true across most of the country.

One of the things I object to is that when questioned on this matter the minister has always said, and this has been going on for the last two or three years: "Our policy is to train officers and n.c.o.'s. We do not care about getting a lot of men in. What we want to do is to train a good solid corps of officers and n.c.o.'s; after that we shall go out and get the men; but that is what we have to do first." That has been a very convenient excuse, a very convenient story, but actually that is all it is. You cannot train officers and n.c.o.'s unless you have some men for them to work with.

It is just a hopeless business having a full strength of officers and n.c.o.'s in reserve force units and have them come down to the armouries once a week and find five or ten men to work with. They get discouraged. There is nothing for them to do in the way of training except to talk to one another. They get discouraged, and in many cases they quit or they come only infrequently. In order for an officer or an n.c.o. to get training he must have some men to work with. That has been one of the difficulties with the reserve units. They have not had the men. This story that they do not want the men until they get these people trained is just so much eye-wash. Actually a very large proportion of the officers and n.c.o.'s in our reserve force units are men who had years of service overseas during the war. In other words, they were trained men. It is true that the number of new officers taken in in the last year has been increasing, but some of the n.c.o.'s, actually the bulk of them, are men who had a good deal of actual training right on the battlefield. What they needed to keep the units going, to keep them interested, was some men to work with, and they have not had them. There must be some reason for this.

The recruiting campaigns put on have been unsuccessful. I think the basic reason is this. The young men of this country have not been joining the reserve force units in any numbers because they have no real belief that they are needed in these units. They have not been convinced that it is their duty to serve this country in a reserve force unit. I think a considerable number of them are convinced of that fact. They were convinced during the war when they enlisted in large numbers. I believe we are going to have great difficulty in getting any reasonable number of men in our reserve forces. I have one suggestion as to how in my view this could be corrected to some extent. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence might make very definite appeals to the young men of this country to joint the reserve force units, and then follow that up by enlisting the help of service clubs, newspaper editorialists, schools and the like. If this were done we would have much better response than we have had thus far.

The main thing is that these young men have to be convinced that they are wanted, that there is a duty for them to perform; and when they are convinced of that they will come forward to do it. That is one possible way of having the message put over. Certainly to date this has not been done.

I should like to say something next about certain defence deficiencies which were shown up by Exercise Eagle. The minister had something to say about this when he spoke a few days ago on matters of defence, as reported at page 1413 of Hansard. I shall not read all he said, but the point he made was that this exercise was designed to test stability and the state of training of officers and men of the P.P.C.L.I., the scale and state of training of the officers and men of the air force, and the work of the staffs which planned and carried out the exercise. He indicated that from that point of view it was a great success. I have no fault to find with that statement. From those points of view it was successful.

However, the minister goes on to say that it was those three things the exercise was designed to test——and the reports by my officers indicate that in these respects the exercise was very successful indeed.

What the minister does not say—and should have said, I think—is that whether the exercise was intended as a test of the fact or not, in actual fact it showed that we have not a properly equipped force to deal with a diversionary raid. In other words, it shows that we have not the very things that, as indicated by these newspaper headlines tonight, the minister himself says in his white paper we need—an integrated air force, and army airborne troops, properly equipped to meet a diversionary raid.

It was not intended that this exercise should show we did not have that; I have no doubt about that. Nevertheless it did show it, I suggest, and it is up to the minister's department to make good that deficiency, and to make it good very rapidly.

It also showed up another thing, namely equipment shortages. I am not going to go into the various details concerning aircraft, and so on. However, those equipment shortages were definitely thrown in the public eye. As a result they have disquieted the general public—and that is easily understood.

One of the reasons the country generally was disturbed over the report was as the result of the general impression which has been left during the past two years to the effect that we had an efficient force which could do this very job the exercise showed the force used could not do. Certainly we did not have any better force to use in place of the one used. We had no better infantry battalion and no battalion better trained than the P.P.C.L.I. for airborne operations.

In this connection I would say one further word about a matter mentioned in the Mainguy report, namely shortages of kit. At page 54 a paragraph deals with shortages of kit for those newly entering the navy. I do not know why there should have been such shortages. We had large quantities of naval clothing and the like during the war. There must have been a great deal of that on hand. And if we did not have it, surely there has been plenty of time in the period since, if stores were exhausted, to get new ones.

I find it difficult to understand why it was impossible to equip these people, or to re-equip them when their stuff was worn out—kit, clothing and so on. This should not have happened. What is the state of affairs in this connection so far as the air force and the army are concerned? Are they similarly short of kit? If so, why? Certainly if an emergency of any sort were to develop and there were a shortage of kit for permanent force personnel, it is easy to envisage the bad situation we would have.

I remember that when we were mobilized in 1939 the men of my unit went around without uniforms for a considerable length of time. There were no uniforms for them at all; and this condition was not corrected until the first issue of battledress came along in November, I believe it was, 1939. There should not be any repetition of that; there is no need for it, particularly with the large amounts spent for defence purposes at the present time.

I would also mention the provision of armouries. A considerable number of reserve force units have been badly handicapped in their training and recruiting because of lack of armouries. I know the construction of armouries has become difficult because housing and barracks accommodation have had prior claims. However, I would ask the minister to meet this need for armouries accommodation as rapidly as this can be done. Particularly would I recommend the provision of small or makeshift armouries in small places where there is considerable interest in reserve force units and where they have been carrying on under extreme difficulty. I believe it would be possible to give a considerable number of these places armoury accommodation without any great expenditure of either funds or materials. In many cases all that has been asked by these people is that huts on abandoned air force stations, and the like, should be moved over, rebuilt and adapted to their purposes.

I should like to make reference to some remarks of the minister concerning unification. At page 1415 of Hansard he took a good deal of credit to himself for the speed of unification, and stated:

> With regard to organization, I believe I can say without fear of successful contradiction that in the work of unification, co-ordination and the streamlining of our forces, navy, army and air forces, the Department of National Defence of Canada has made more progress than any other country in the world.

I do not doubt the truth of that statement. However, I suggest it is not a matter for great congratulation on the part of the minister. I do not know why we should not have made more progress than any country in the world: we had far less to unify. It is quite clear that the less by way of forces we have to unify, the more rapid progress we can make in that regard. If we have only one ship and one squadron of aircraft and one army battalion we can unify them in short order. The reason we have been able to make more rapid progress lies in the fact that we have had so little to unify.

In the same speech the minister dealt with a request made by the leader of this party, and many other members of it, for a defence committee of the house. As reported on page 1414 of Hansard the minister said:

> I would welcome a committee on defence or anything else, but I do not believe that is the proper method of conducting business in parliament or of running the defence forces of this country.

I should like to make it clear that in asking for a committee there was no thought that the committee would be running the defence forces of this country. No one ever had that in mind. The purpose of the committee would be to get information to enable hon. members of the house to see the full picture of the defence situation. Any idea that the minister or his officials may have that it is being suggested that the committee would take over the running of the defence forces is completely wrong.

Before I close I should like to say something about civilian defence, a matter about which I spoke at considerable length a year ago and more briefly during the throne speech debate. It is a matter on which this house has never had any information so far and I should like to ask the minister to make as full a statement as possible on what has been done and what is being done in this connection. I know that General Worthington was appointed civilian defence co-ordinator and has been travelling about the country as well as going to the United States and Europe to study civilian defence methods that are being followed. I know General Worthington, and I am sure he is doing a good job, but I should like to know how much support he has had and what else besides appointing him is being done in connection with this important matter.

I think the government has failed to realize that the people of the country are concerned over this. This is not merely a question for debate here among a few people who are interested in defence; it is something which affects everybody in this country, it is something in which a large number of people are interested. The possibility of an atomic bomb attack in another war has been more or less in the thoughts of a large number of people and most of them are wondering what measures, if any, are being taken for their protection and the protection of their families in the event of such a catastrophe.

This is something which should have the fullest publicity. Definite measures should be taken for the evacuation of people and for the stockpiling of tents and other materials which could be used in an emergency, of medical supplies, of foodstuffs and so on. My own view is that it is more important to carry out these civilian defence measures than it is to develop our defence forces. They should have first priority because the basic strength of this country is in the civilian population. As an indication of what people are thinking in connection with this matter I should like to read a letter which I received the other day, under date of November 3, as follows:

> I am sending you a cutting from the Calgary Herald which outlines my own view as to what could happen if the communists wanted to start a sudden coup in this country before war was declared, and it is to be hoped that matters similar to this are being taken care of by the defence authorities in charge.
> You can imagine what would happen in our fair city if the Calgary power dam, the Glenmore dam and other similar projects which supply our water were blown up. It would be too late to think about these things after and steps should be put into effect at all times to watch for and control such projects "while there is time."

To my knowledge, I have never seen the writer of that letter. The clipping which was enclosed dealt with the action taken at Denver, Colorado, by the national guard there to build up civilian cells, as it were, to counteract communist cells and to prevent any sabotage. That idea, I think, is well worth looking into. It certainly indicates a real interest by the people in civilian defence.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a report which reads as follows:

> Fire Dangers Dim A-Bombs, says Worthington
> The dangers of fire far overshadow those of atomic radiation in any potential enemy raid on a Canadian city, Major General F. F. Worthington told the engineering institute of Canada today.

The people right across Canada should be given information as to the best way of fighting fires which might develop as the result of an atomic bomb attack. I was glad to see that apparently the people of Toronto have taken this matter into their own hands to some extent and have formed a committee which is investigating this matter of civilian defence. Apparently they are making some progress in getting information out to the general population in Toronto and advising as to ways and means in which they can help themselves. I am wondering how much help these people have had from the Department of National Defence and how much interest is being shown by the department in having similar committees appointed in Canadian cities, particularly in the larger centres.

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the various speakers this afternoon and evening and one thing has struck me. Each of the opposition speakers has picked out a portion of the picture with which to deal. There was probably a certain amount of truth in what he had to say, but if the story of Nelson putting the telescope to his blind eye has any significance or symbolism, it is that he refused to be stampeded by what he saw of a portion of the picture. In his mind's eye he looked for the whole picture and went on to victory.

Naturally, for security reasons, the defence estimates cannot be discussed in the same way that the agriculture estimates could be; but hon. members have a responsibility to their constituents and there are many ways in which they can see the whole picture and thus carry out their responsibilities. We all read the newspapers and can see what goes on in other countries. We are able to make our own decisions as to whether this job is being well handled. I cannot understand anyone blocking unification, and we have all seen what has happened since the last war. One great lesson that was learned was the necessity for co-operation between the various services. That co-operation has continued and in this country it has reached a peak not equalled by any other country in the world.

We saw what happened in the naval inquiry and we know that something really came out of that. This afternoon the minister mentioned the conversion of Royal Roads and the reopening last year of R.M.C. as the Canadian services colleges. When the R.M.C. closed in 1942 the last number on the rolls was 2,828, and over 2,000 of those ex-cadets served their country on active service in all quarters of the world.

I feel that is one of the reasons why the minister made it a part of his policy to reopen the college. Six weeks ago I had the opportunity of visiting it on the occasion of the governor general unveiling a plaque in memory of those ex-cadets who are a part of those whom we commemorate today. At that time I had a chance to see just what had been done in the short space of a year, and I was most pleased with what I saw. At the annual dinner of the ex-cadet club the minister made a toast to the college, and it is from a person's words that you can see how he thinks. The words he spoke that night revealed to me why Canada's defence thinking is in the front rank of the world today, not excepting any country. At this time I want to commend the government for its defence program, and I also want to commend the minister for reopening that college. I want to read to you a portion of what he said. These are the words of the present Minister of National Defence:

> In conclusion there is one thing I would like to emphasize. In the years between the wars there was often a dividing line, a cleavage, between members of the permanent and reserve forces. There was also frequently a cleavage between graduates of R.M.C. and those who had not had that good fortune, as you would regard it. Then there was a division between the navy, the army and the air force. Finally there was the division between the services and civilians. All those divisions I want to see wiped out. At the services colleges I want to see the three services working as one team. Perhaps they might keep the habit. In summer training I want to see men from Royal Roads and R.M.C. mixed up with men from the universities and from the reserve units, in the ships, at the camps, and on the flying fields, doing the same work, learning to like each other because they know each other.

I want to see active and reserve forces working side by side, wearing the same clothes, getting the same pay, achieving the same standards . . . as citizens and service men. And because we shall have done these things, then we shall see no difference between members of the civilian and the service community—both are citizens—but the services will earn the respect and support they deserve because in addition to being citizens they serve their country all the time.

Fellow members, these are the words of the minister who is responsible to us for the program of Canadian defence. I have read between the lines as to what is taking place, and I am satisfied that the program is in good hands.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): There are a couple of points I want to raise. I think it is generally agreed in all parts of the house that we should have preparedness. The division of opinion seems to be as to just what constitutes preparedness having regard to another war. To my mind there are two points which I think are most important. The first one is the co-operation and co-ordination of our forces with the forces of other countries which think as we do. The minister has stated that if we have another war it will be a world war. In a world war the contribution of a country the size of Canada, even though we think we are pretty important, is small compared with the total contribution. Unless we have co-ordination between our forces and the forces of those who may be our allies, I do not think we can contribute as much as we could if such co-operation took place in time. Even though we have to sacrifice some of our national pride, it seems to me that, in the world as it is constituted today, any enemy we may have to face is going to be one who will drive from one central point with one central objective, and with complete co-ordination of their forces. Unless we can meet that by co-ordination and co-operation, we shall do just as we did in the last two wars. We shall sacrifice thousands of lives in getting to the point where we can meet a concentrated attack.

The other point I want to mention is that the next war, if there is one, will be won or lost on the technical advances made in the next few years, not on our skill in the use of the weapons with which we won the last war. Too often our objective between wars has seemed to be the training of people to use the weapons with which we won the previous war. No war is ever won by the use of the weapons with which the previous war was won. That is the lesson which we should have learned from history, and it seems to me that in spending money on our defence we should do so intelligently.

For instance, the distribution of our defence dollar, it seems to me, is something about which we should certainly make inquiries.

In 1948-49, 6 per cent of our defence dollar was spent for defence research, and in 1949-50, 5 per cent of our defence dollar is to be spent for that purpose. To me that is nonsense. If it is true, and it is, that wars are won by technical knowledge and development, then that is too small a proportion of our defence dollar to spend on the research which will be necessary to win the next war. I would say that three or four times that proportion would be well spent in technical research.

We know that probably our greatest single drawback in the first and second world wars was the fact that we lacked the necessary new equipment. We had plenty of Ross rifles and rifles of other makes in the first world war, but we lacked artillery. It was only when Lloyd George organized the economy of England, and reorganized the production of that country, thereby developing the artillery and shells that were necessary to win that war, that we were able to make advances. The same is true of the last war. It was two or three years before we developed the production of the materials necessary to win the war. Surely we will not allow ourselves to get into the same position in the event of another war. Surely we should have learned our lesson from the last two wars. Surely we should have learned that technical research and the development of a strong economy, in which we are producing the essential materials to win a war, is the best preparedness that we can have in Canada.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): It seems to me that there has been general agreement, as one would expect, with regard to the objectives of Canada's defence forces, and the necessity of spending large amounts of money in order that such forces may be adequate. I am sure that no one, least of all the minister and his supporters on the government side, wishes to spend money to no good purpose. Certainly members of the opposition regard it as their duty to see that every dollar spent is spent wisely and to good purpose. We are all agreed that heavy expenditures on defence requirements are necessary, and we are all prepared to support such expenditures if we are agreed that they are being spent wisely.

The point of difference between the minister and his supporters and those on this side of the house who are criticizing him is simply that we feel the money is not being spent wisely and that Canada is not getting value for her dollars in terms of defence. It should be made abundantly clear at this point that we feel the responsibility for this situation rests squarely upon the shoulders of the minister, the government and those at headquarters, and that it rests in no way upon the shoulders of the officers and men in the field and throughout the country who make up our defence forces. We know they are doing the very best job they possibly can under the defence system laid down for them, and with the resources and manpower at their command. For our part we feel that the inadequacy lies entirely in the framing of the defence policy which those officers and men are called upon to implement.

In his statement this afternoon, and in his statements during the period since he took over the department, the minister has consistently put forward the view that Canada's defence forces are adequate to Canada's needs and that they are well integrated with the defence requirements Canada may be called upon to meet under the Atlantic charter. Unfortunately we in this house are not in a position to comment on the latter point, because at no time has it been clearly stated—though we have frequently asked for this information—just what in fact is Canada's role in the Atlantic defence structure. So my remarks will be confined entirely to the question whether or not Canada's defence forces are adequately designed to meet our defence requirements, within the limited knowledge we have of our separate defence strategy; and my remarks and criticism will be based upon the minister's statements in that regard.

I should like to analyse a number of statements the minister has made over the past year or so, since February or March of 1948. In all those statements the emphasis has been upon the necessity for Canada to have defence forces able to defend our territory against attack from any quarter. I am sure all hon. members will appreciate that with our population it is going to be extremely difficult for us to defend our vast territory against attack from any quarter; but oddly enough that is the role the minister has laid upon our defence forces. Speaking in Montreal on February 10, 1948, and commenting upon the size and strength of the soviet armed forces, the Gazette of that date reports the minister as having used these words:

> Mr. Claxton stressed that he was not suggesting that Russia was poised on the brink of war, but merely that she and her satellites have shown that they are not ready to seek permanent security under law, and that as a consequence Canada "must ensure positive security under her own arms."

In his statement to the house this afternoon the minister supported that previous declaration, and also supported my contention that his emphasis is upon defence of our territory by our own forces. He said that our defence organization—referring entirely to Canada's domestic defence organization—must ensure the integrity of our territory. In other statements the minister has made he has given the impression that our recruiting policies and our armament and equipment policies all are proceeding satisfactorily and at a rate which will speedily ensure that our forces are of the size and nature, with sufficient equipment and armament, to fulfil the role he has laid upon them, namely that they should be capable of ensuring, virtually without outside support, the defence of our own territory from attack from any quarter.

That is the picture the minister has given; that is the role he has laid down and the impression he has left in the calculated statements he has made: that our defence forces are adequate for that role. Let us then examine the facts as they are disclosed in available returns, figures and information. When we examine the structure of our forces in the light of the minister's statements it becomes perfectly obvious that they are totally incapable of filling that role, if indeed they were ever designed or should ever be designed to do so, without some outside support or without being integrated into some defensive role within the structure of the North Atlantic alliance. Take the picture as to the strength of our services as shown in the annual report of the department. We find that the navy has an authorized strength of 10,375 all ranks, and that its present strength is 8,154. The army has an authorized strength of 26,329, and its present strength is 18,970. The air force has an authorized strength of 18,221 and a present strength of 14,552. So the total authorized strength of our permanent forces is 54,925. That is what is called the nucleus of our defence force, which is supposed to be adequate to defend our millions of square miles of territory, with thousands of miles of vulnerable sea coast and other thousands of miles of vulnerable northwestern approaches. This nucleus, which is supposed to be capable of defending all this territory, has an authorized strength of 54,925, and it falls short of even that pitiful authorized strength by more than 15 per cent, according to the last report issued by the department.

The whole picture the minister has given of our defence set-up is entirely misleading, in the first place because by ourselves, with our limited population—and here I take direct issue with his statements—we cannot hope to defend our millions of square miles of vulnerable territory. In the second place they are misleading because the authorized objective set for the forces is short of attainment by over one-quarter. In other words, we are 15,000 short of even the objective of 54,925. It may be remarked that the picture I have presented so far leaves entirely out of account the reserve forces. It does. The picture would be redeemed in large part if in fact our reserve forces were up to strength, or if they were trained and equipped in such a way as to enable them to be rapidly expanded into an effective striking force in support of the permanent force. But the picture in that respect is far from encouraging, and falls short of the glowing rosy pictures the minister has painted. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a country in Canada's position, with a small population and a vast territory to defend, in the first place must rely upon the Atlantic alliance to help defend our country.

But even then, as I have said, we have no clear picture of what our role is. We do not know. But taking the minister's statements as given to the house and to the members, even if we are fulfilling whatever role we are assigned in the Atlantic alliance, because of our limited population we must rely largely upon a reserve force which is capable of immediate expansion, of arming and equipping and of taking the field within the space of weeks or a month at the most from the outbreak of hostilities. The time factor was fully discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I do not need to go over that ground again in order to remind the committee or the minister that no longer in a future war, should a future war take place, shall we have time for a leisurely mobilization. If we are to play an effective role in defending our own territories, we must be able to put in the field an effective striking force within weeks or at the most a month of the time of the outbreak of hostilities. Is our reserve force capable of expansion in that way, to fill the role which that picture thrusts upon it? It certainly is not.

Mr. Ferrie: How do you know?

Mr. Fulton: Because I happen to have looked into this matter of the reserve forces. As given in the published report of the Department of National Defence, at page 82, the strength of the reserve forces at the present time is as follows: for the navy, 3,272; for the army, 36,311; for the air force 1,427; total reserve forces of all three services, 41,010. If my hon. friend who asked me the question, or any other hon. member who is interested, will take the trouble to consult with the commanding officers of any of our reserve units, he will find the answer to his question. Those officers are reluctantly compelled to say that their units would not be battleworthy for a period not of weeks or a month, but of months or a year. We therefore have not a reserve force capable of taking the field, under present conditions, within less than a year from the outbreak of hostilities.

Just as a matter of comparison, I should like to direct the attention of the committee to a few figures as to the size of the reserve army today as compared with what it was before the war. If you take any year from 1924-25 up to 1938-9, you will find that the size of the reserve army was substantially in excess of the reserve army of today. I give these figures by way of substantiating the statement that our reserve forces of today—and we know how long it took them to take the field in the last war and in the first world war—are even less prepared, less trained, less well equipped and less well manned, if I may use that expression, than they were at any period from 1925 to 1939.

Mr. Claxton: Who says that?

Mr. Fulton: The figures establish it.

Mr. Claxton: The figures do not indicate anything of the kind; they do not indicate anything except the number of men on the strength.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, but when one has knowledge of the state of training and equipment of the units in the years from 1925-1939, in comparison with what they are today,—

Mr. Claxton: It does not show that at all.

Mr. Fulton: —then the picture becomes clearer.

Mr. Claxton: If one has that knowledge, it does become clear.

Mr. Fulton: The minister's statements, which have been quoted in the chamber by others and by myself, as to the role of Canada's forces, as to the state of training, preparedness, equipment and recruitment, have been so misleading that I think this statement he has just made is equally misleading.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Winters: Nonsense.

Mr. Fulton: When one comes to the question of the other statements which have been made as to strengh and equipment, one sees an equally disturbing picture. Perhaps it would be interesting to the committee to have placed on the record some of the actual figures to which I refer, as to the strengths of the reserve forces in the period I have mentioned. To deal with the army, in 1924-25, 50,492. In 1930-31, 53,201; in 1935-36, 48,761; in 1938-39, 51,418. For the post-war period: in 1946-47, 37,657; in 1947-48, 33,591; and 1948-49, 36,311.

Then we come to some of the other statements of the minister with respect to the progress being made in bringing our forces up to strength; and we find that, when examined in the light of actuality, they have an equally disturbing effect. I have here the answer which the minister made in the house on March 16, 1948. He was replying to a question asked by the former member for York South, with regard to recruitment for the army. As reported at page 2253 of Hansard, the minister's answer was:

> . . . I can tell my hon. friend . . . that good progress is being made, and, in comparison with other countries where similar conditions obtain, the showing is encouraging. Men are being taken in at about the rates we want to have them for the army . . .

At that time the authorized strength of the army was 26,329; the actual strength was 15,409 or about 9,000 below the authorized strength. It will thus be seen that the minister's statements throughout, in the house and in the country, have been to the effect that Canada is well prepared, that her armed forces are well equipped, well trained and well manned to resist attack from whatever quarter it might come, and to defend our territory, of our own strength, against this attack.

Hon. members will recall that in March of last year the President of the United States made a very important and far-reaching statement on the subject of military preparedness, having to do with the personnel requirements of the United States armed forces in support of the efforts then being put forward to increase considerably the strength of those forces. In his speech before congress President Truman said—and I think this is the principle which should guide us in the design and equipping and manning of our forces—

> We must be prepared to pay the price of peace or assuredly we shall pay the price of war.

In commenting on these remarks when speaking in Montreal in March of last year the Minister of National Defence said that the President's remarks were:

> The beginning of the marshalling of force on the side of right which is essential if we are to preserve the way of life in which we believe.

On the basis of that statement, and the other statements which I have read, one would have assumed that Canada was playing a role comparable to that of the United States in proportion to our resources and to our population. But if we compare the figures on the basis of population, and on the basis of the actual strength of the United States forces at that time, we find that Canada should have a permanent force of 150,000 if we are to play a role in proportion to that of the United States, as the statement of the minister would indicate we should. But the figures that have been given already indicate that the total authorized strength of our forces is 54,925. It seems to me that this has a definite bearing upon the role which Canada is called upon to play within the North Atlantic alliance. It may well be that under that alliance we have obligations of a different nature, or of a lesser proportion, than the military obligations assumed by the United States or the other parties to the alliance. If that is so, the country should be told. But it is misleading if statements are made which indicate that we are expected to bear, and are prepared to bear, a military role proportionate to that of the United States when in fact the authorized limit of our armed forces is only one-third of the present strength of the United States forces.

Mr. Ferrie: Our boys are worth three to one anyway.

Mr. Fulton: I come next to the list of accomplishments given by the minister in the course of his remarks today. In many of those accomplishments there is cause for pride and satisfaction; but if they are analysed they are mainly with respect to improvements in the service standards, such things as the ration scale, the clothing, progress in provision of married quarters, and the start in aid of building quarters for single men. The minister referred with pride to the shipbuilding program. When one analyses the accomplishment one finds that we have built one icebreaker. Then there is the aircraft program. We have placed orders for up-to-date jet fighters, but according to his statement our main accomplishment is in overhauling and modernizing machines.

The minister said that the training of the armed brigade group has been pressed on. That training in accordance with the reports on Exercise Eagle, which has been analysed in the light of what actually went on, has not been pressed on to the stage where the brigade group, the mobile permanent force group, is able to fulfil the role which the minister himself has laid down for it. The minister then went on to refer to the training in civilian defence. But if one analyses the statement on the basis of that statement alone it does not appear to have got much farther than the appointment of General Worthington. That is the record which the minister gave us this afternoon.

With respect to recruiting, the minister said that the campaign has been continued with the desired result in every respect, with the exception of the reserve army. If the results fall so far short of the authorized ceiling desired by the minister—and these were his words: they would produce the desired results —I suggest that he should immediately inform the country that in fact the glowing statements he has made as to the preparedness and equipment of our armed forces should be substantially modified because they are not yet ready to fulfil the role which he himself has outlined for them.

On the basis of these statements, these facts and figures, it is dangerously likely that the whole present defence policy of the government is not geared to the needs or the capabilities of the Canadian nation, and that the minister appears to be living in a world of unreality, not even he being aware of how far short our defence forces come of the goal that he himself has set, and in his own lack of knowledge or unwillingness to recognize that situation the country as a whole is unfortunately being misled. There is substantiation of this picture to be found in the words of the Mainguy report. At page 41 the commissioners report:

> Several high authorities suggested that the navy is engaged in making too many bricks with too little straw. Most of the unsatisfactory conditions have been known to naval authorities for three years or more.

On page 42 they state:

> The present actual complement of officers and men was stated by several witnesses to be inadequate for the existing commitments and tasks of the navy, if it is to concentrate on training, as it must do.

The significance of these statements, Mr. Chairman, is in the fact that the commissioners find that these conditions have been known to naval authorities for three years or more; and yet in the light of the inadequacies set forth in this report, many of which were known to naval authorities, the Minister of National Defence has consistently presented a picture of the armed forces, including the navy, which has come up to every expectation and which are thoroughly ready now to fulfil the role which he has set for them, which picture is obviously not consistent with the facts as shown in the figures issued by the department itself when compared with the statements made by the minister. In the light of these conditions it seems to me that the need becomes perfectly obvious for the setting up of a permanent defence committee of the Canadian House of Commons. This is a matter which in my experience has been pressed for every year since 1945. It is not a happy thing for any hon. member to stand in the Canadian parliament and suggest, in fact state, that the Canadian services are not ready to fulfil the role which has been set for them as their task in defending this country. The statements I have made have been made on the basis of an analysis of the facts and figures given by the minister and his department, in comparison with the statements made by the same minister with respect to the role of those forces.

I realize that the inner details concerning these facts and figures are not fully known to me or any other member on this side of the house—and I doubt if they are fully known to any member on the other side, because we have not been given the opportunity to become fully acquainted with all the details and ramifications of the defence role of our forces. Particularly, we have not been told what is Canada's role within the structure of the North Atlantic treaty.

So that what I have been saying tonight has been said seriously, on the basis of the best information I have been able to acquire —the information given by the department itself. If there are gaps in it, if there are injustices or apparent injustices to Canada's armed forces, the reason for those injustices is the incomplete knowledge or the gaps in the knowledge available to myself and other members of the house.

The desire of all members is to assist the department in so far as we can in building forces equipped to fulfil the role set for them, and also in acquainting the country and our constituents with the needs of Canada's defence forces in order that we may encourage support for those services, in order that we may within the limits of our responsibility and our opportunities encourage even recruiting, if need be. But with the lack of information we are totally unqualified to fulfil that which I suggest with respect is the perfectly proper role for any member of parliament in face of the very serious world situation with which we are confronted today.

I make these few remarks in support of a renewed plea for the setting up of a national defence committee of the Canadian House of Commons, and conclude by reminding the committee that this request was made in 1945. The then minister of national defence said he entirely agreed that it was a reasonable request, and said the same thing again in 1946, when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and the hon. member for Nanaimo—supported on each occasion by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F.—made the request.

In 1946 the then prime minister said he felt, too, that it was a reasonable request, a desirable thing and in the best interests of the defence of the country that such a committee be set up. May I read the words of Mr. Mackenzie King as they appear in Hansard for March 29, 1946:

I think the suggestion of my hon. friend is a very good one—

Referring to the suggestion put forward on that occasion by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra—

—and, as the Minister of National Defence has just said, it is one that he is prepared to consider sympathetically.

Then, after pointing out that at that particular moment, when a number of special committees were being set up, it would be difficult to constitute such a committee on national defence, the Prime Minister concluded with these words, as they appear at page 406 of Hansard:

I think my hon. friend's suggestion of that particular committee is a very good one.

The then prime minister's remarks concerning the necessity for a committee, and the desirability of informing all members of the house and all citizens of the country as to the requirements of Canada's defence forces, and as to the way in which they can best serve to fulfil those requirements, have not lost force since that date. In fact, in view of the world situation of today—and even in spite of the misgivings we have as to the adequacy of the minister's policy—we are prepared to support these estimates amounting to $383 million. I believe the necessity for that committee is vastly greater today than it was in 1946 when the then prime minister said he considered it a very good idea. I hope the minister will give his consent finally to the setting up of such a committee.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, probably it would meet the convenience of the committee if I were to deal with some of the points raised by hon. members in their very helpful remarks. If the hon. member for Kamloops will pardon me, however, I shall not endeavour to correct every inaccuracy he has been uttering in the course of his remarks. But I should just like to say that his interpretation of the statements to which he has referred is so far away from any natural and proper interpretation that the words will bear, that I do not think it is necessary for me to follow him through that course.

However, I should like to deal with some of the express questions or points raised by hon. members and express appreciation to them of everything they have said of a helpful nature. First, turning to the question raised by the hon. member for Calgary East, and referred to again by the hon. member for Kamloops, as to our commitments in the North Atlantic treaty. It is perfectly clear that we have no commitments whatever under the North Atlantic treaty. The organization under the treaty has just been set up. The regional groups have been organized and the appropriate officers and representatives of the various governments concerned are considering what should be the various strategical plans and requirements.

This is expressly dealt with in paragraph 12 of the statement I gave, in which I said:

It is still too early to spell out the consequences of the pact in terms of men and dollars.

And that is said after I have described the organizational work up to this present time.

Mr. Green: When shall we know our commitments under that treaty?

Mr. Claxton: Well, first of all, there will be no commitments except with the consent of the government of Canada; and, secondly, there will be no commitments until the strategical considerations to which I have just now referred, and to which I referred in greater length before, have been given attention.

Mr. Green: About when would that be?

Mr. Claxton: I have no means of estimating a date. It depends largely upon the work of people outside the Canadian government and forces. For example, in the western European group, there are five nations as well as Canada and the United States as observers. They will be meeting and working things out. Then there will be consultations between the different groups, and ultimately clearance both by the standing group, the defence committee and the council. So that while this operation is being pressed forward with all speed, it will of necessity take some time.

With regard to another point raised by the hon. member for Calgary East, and referred to by others, I should like to make it perfectly plain again—and I want to state it as definitely as I can—that we have been getting recruits since January 1, 1948, and before that, at the rate we required, at the planned rate, for the active navy, the army and the air force, and for the navy reserve and the air force auxiliary. If we got recruits at a faster rate it would be necessary to have increased training establishments and increased capital equipment, neither of which would be justified by our concept of the strategical situation.

Mr. Green: What about the army reserve?

Mr. Claxton: I dealt with that before. We now have some 39,000 men in the army reserve, and I should like to see about another 10,000 there. We have been doing everything we can to support the commands and to give national direction to campaigns to that end. In that connection the hon. member for Calgary East paid a well merited tribute to the officers and men of the reserve who have done a magnificent job. However, he referred to the recruiting campaigns as being a flop. In January, 1948, we had in the reserve forces of Canada a strength of 36,173; in September, 1949, it was 45,123.

Again I do not like making comparisons with other countries because they are so liable to be inaccurate and misleading and one must take into account all factors; but with regard to the strength of our reserve forces, navy, army and air, I want to say that they are greater in proportion to population than any country in the British commonwealth and considerably greater than the corresponding forces in Great Britain. That is nothing to be thankful for, but it does indicate that we are tackling this problem and securing a response relative to the present situation within three or four years of the end of a war, at a time of full employment and when our young men are interested in other things, which I think is encouraging, all things being considered.

The situation is satisfactory with respect to everything except the reserve army and I think it is encouraging in that connection. I know the position of the commanding officers of the reserve army because I was in the reserve for a time myself. They do have a difficult time when there is not an adequate number of men. I have never suggested for one second, as was said by one hon. member, that we do not want men in the reserve army. Of course we do. The hon. member was good enough to suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and I should make an appeal for recruits, bringing home the need. We have both done that repeatedly. The Prime Minister has shown the utmost interest in the work of all the armed forces.

The suggestion made with regard to armouries is well founded. There is nothing I should like more than to be able to begin the construction of armouries wherever they are needed across Canada, but it is a question, first, of labour, then materials and then money. The hon. member suggested that we should try to procure temporary accommodation by the use of existing buildings. That is a most useful suggestion. In fact we are already doing it. Since 1939, in the last ten years, we have increased the floor space of armouries for the reserve army by 70 per cent. That is a substantial increase, being nearly double, but still more is needed because of the great quantities of equipment which modern reserve armies have.

We are continuing the practice of increasing accommodation wherever we can and we have let a contract for the construction of the first new armoury for a major unit at Sault Ste. Marie. The cost of this indicates that here again real money is required. The contract is for $850,000 for an armoury to accommodate a single unit.

The hon. member was good enough to say that training had been improved and there was a considerable increase in numbers, and of course it is most satisfactory to hear him say that, because he has been in both the reserve and the active forces. The hon. member said the air force equipment situation was not good, but here we must be realistic. We must understand what modern defence forces mean.

At the present time we are at work on the XC-100, a twin-jet all-weather fighter. If that plane is a success when it is tested it will be two or three years in advance of any plane of its type anywhere. We are at work on the construction of the F-86 which is as far as we know the fastest plane there is. I was asked by one hon. member how long it will take to produce these. We are working at a planned rate to produce these planes, not as fast as possible because we do not expect war within a year, but at a rate which will provide an economical flow from the factory where they are produced.

If I could show hon. members the schedules of production for planes in countries much larger than ours they would be astonished at how they differ from wartime rates. It is simply because countries have not the means to rearm at the rate they would like. It is interesting to note that in one of his fine statements on defence when speaking about the navy in the United States General Bradley said that the United States, with all its great wealth and resources, the richest country on earth, had to choose the things that would come first, had to work on priorities, because they did not have all the money they wanted for defence. Of course that is well known, and we are in the same position.

If any hon. member thinks that our armed forces are too small, that we should recruit faster, let him realize that that means $2,600 per year for each man taken on, and for each subsequent year until the man goes out of the army.

Mr. Green: Is that active or reserve?

Mr. Claxton: Active, and the figure is approximately the same for each of the three services. That does not include any overhead. If you want more in the way of equipment, it must be paid for. What is almost more important, new equipment involves continuing commitments for maintenance, repairs and modifications. Modifications are the bugbear of all defence planners, particularly at a time of rapid change and development. Almost every piece of equipment seems to be subject to modifications before it is even delivered.

The hon. member for Melfort remarked that this year we were spending only five per cent of the defence dollar on research whereas last year we spent six per cent. The percentages given in that table are in round figures. The actual amounts are given in vote 251 of the estimates. The figure for 1948-49 was $19,700,000 for defence research, and the figure for 1949-50 is $21 million. Therefore, while the actual percentage shows a decrease, the actual amount has increased because of the fact that the over-all defence appropriation, when granted by parliament, will be 50 per cent over what it was last year. There is an increase in every single item in the table. We are cognizant of the need for keeping up with defence research. It is an important aspect of defence policy. There again our work is closely related with that of friendly nations along the lines of the hon. member's suggestion. Our working arrangements with the United States and the United Kingdom are just as close as they could be in all aspects of the matter.

References were also made to the shortages of kit described in the Mainguy report. The shortages, as they have been reported to me, occurred between November, 1948, and June, 1949, and they applied to certain sizes of caps, collars, shirts, shoes, two types of trousers, underwear and vests. They did not extend to major items of clothing, and they were in certain sizes only. It is difficult to plan the purchase of clothing so as to keep on hand an adequate supply of all sizes at all times unless very large stocks are maintained.

Mr. Pearkes: Are the shortages you refer to at Esquimalt, or the alarming shortages which were referred to as existing at headquarters?

Mr. Claxton: The shortages at Esquimalt; the other is the same question.

Mr. Harkness: What about the situation in the army and the air force?

Mr. Claxton: If I may finish my answer on this matter, I will come to that. As to what caused the shortages, it was due, largely but not entirely, to the navy getting recruits faster than they had planned or expected. It was due largely to that, but also to the fact that their methods of stock-keeping, unlike those in effect in the army and air force, were not as modern and up to date as they should have been; consequently they did not provide for easy advance planning. That is being changed. The shortages have been overcome now and the matter has been cleared up.

As to the time that it takes to obtain clothing, where the cloth has to be woven as is usually the case with uniforms, delivery takes over a year from the time of placing the order. Therefore planning must be related to the flow of recruits and discharges, and if we get more recruits and have fewer discharges than we expect, we are likely to run short at a time of rapid build-up.

Dealing with the army and the air force, I am informed that apart from occasional shortages of certain sizes, particularly unusual ones, there is no shortage, and that further we are gradually building up some stocks to meet future needs. The new summer uniform is in general issue now, and the blue uniform will come into general issue towards the latter part of 1950.

The hon. member for Churchill was good enough to refer to the Royal Military College and our efforts to re-establish the college on a sound footing. As hon. members know, he is one of two men in the house—the Minister of Mines and Resources is the other—who are ex-cadets of that famous institution. I must say that the progress made in securing close co-operation with respect to the training of officers for the navy, army and air force is encouraging in view of the fact that the college was only opened again in September, 1948.

The hon. member for Calgary East referred to the question of civil defence. Here we have had a difficult decision of timing to make. We could very easily proceed to set up local civil defence organizations in every community right across Canada. There is no doubt that local communities would co-operate in that respect, and that work could be done. I may be wrong but my belief, based on such experience as I have had with organization, is that if local organizations were set up in every part of Canada and there was nothing for them to do except carry on for any considerable period the kind of training that civil defence groups would, then the men and women who would devote their spare time to this activity would soon cease to be interested in it, and would not be on hand should an emergency arise. The whole job of organization would have to be done over again. That is the view on which we have acted.

That does not mean, however, that that view is going to remain constant. With the progress in other directions which I expect there will be, we are working towards the organization of civil defence based first of all on all the government departments concerned with the question, and then the provinces, because almost all matters that have to do with civil defence have provincial aspects. Some of them are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and in many matters the municipalities are mainly concerned. General Worthington has studied what is now being done in other countries as well as what was done during the last war. He has also interviewed the provinces. We have had a planning committee at Ottawa with representatives of the government departments concerned, and the matter has reached the stage where we could very speedily set up a plan and put it into effect. It would be a matter of hours to do that. We can now move on to the next stage of getting it developed at various levels so that we shall have a skeleton organization on which to build a civil defence body in every part of the country to meet any need.

While I am on my feet I should like to say a word to make clear one thing I think is important. In paragraph 29 of my statement concerning Canada's defence program, I referred to the development of radar; and I should like to quote the passage:

> To meet attack by air requires jet interceptors and anti-aircraft guns with the necessary radar equipment and communications system, backed by a relatively small but highly trained, efficient and mobile force of ground troops. The territory of Canada is so vast that it is obviously impracticable to construct a chain or grid of radar warning stations similar in density and consequent effectiveness to the installations during the last war in the smaller areas of Britain or Germany; nevertheless an early warning system to cover certain vital approaches and areas is being developed.

That paragraph should be read as it appears. It would be beyond the economic and industrial resources of Canada to provide a radar defence system or an anti-aircraft defence system such as Britain had during the second world war. Moreover it would involve our country in static defence to a degree which would virtually paralyse any offensive effort; and even then it would not be one hundred per cent effective. Hon. members know, because many were there, that Britain was bombed despite radar and interceptor defences of the kind I have mentioned. In fact perhaps only ten per cent of the aircraft on bombing raids were knocked down. This is a field in which we must have knowledge of all developments and must be prepared to do what we can to defend vital and vulnerable points, and in which we must begin the development of what is considered a proper level of defence; but I hope no one will think for a second that we are going to put a string of radar stations over the North pole or anything of the sort. We are not. We could not do that, and it would not be the right way to spend our defence dollars.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that in this field it would be interesting indeed to hear suggestions that our forces are too small or too large, that the relative proportion as between the three services is not correct, or that we are spending too much on personnel or on equipment and properties. But such suggestions have not been made during this discussion, as far as I know. The fact is that we can only increase the strength of our armed forces today by spending more money. We can only increase the equipment or build more properties by spending more money. The question then is: How much money do the Canadian people feel that the risks involved require us to spend? Obviously if we believed that within a year there would be a war involving us and the whole world, this is not the kind of appropriation we would be seeking. We would not be spending time discussing hundreds of millions. I am afraid it would go into billions, and many of them. All defence planning depends of necessity upon the calculation of risk and the estimation of forces, both those of any prospective enemy and those of any prospective friends. The next step is to spend the money made available out of the national budget in the most intelligent way to meet the needs as economically as we can.

That is a task which I can assure the committee is proving difficult in every country, because there are so many uncertain factors in the whole situation. But it is a task in which we have had the advantage of good advice from very competent officers, and also of discussion and consultation with our friends in other countries.

As a final word, the hon. member referred to high overhead; and I must say I often feel that the overhead, the number of men we have on the staff, seems very large indeed. It is not much consolation, either, to find that my opposite numbers in Britain and the United States are similarly concerned; but the fact is that this has become an exceedingly complicated and technical business requiring very considerable numbers of experienced, highly trained and well educated staff, both officers and men. Then again in this field, which involves so much in the way of co-operation between the services and also between one country and another, we have a great many inter-service and international committees which require considerable groups of personnel. However, in making comparisons with the forces of other countries, I do not think we are in any respect worse off, with regard to either the overhead or the proportion of civilians. But it is a matter that requires constant attention and that I can assure you is receiving the attention of the chiefs of staff, the deputy minister and myself.

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, during the course of my remarks this afternoon I stressed as emphatically as I could that I did not think sufficient emphasis was being placed on the air force. Obviously, if I did not make it clear, the inference was that I thought a larger proportion of money was being spent on the other services. Therefore I was surprised to hear the statement made by the minister just now. My feeling that greater emphasis should be placed upon the air force was one of the main reasons why I asked for the setting up of a committee to investigate this whole question of defence policy.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to carry on with this discussion? It is now eleven o'clock.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as understood this afternoon, the first item of business on Monday will be Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. If we should conclude that matter there are some bills which, after listening to the discussion during the resolution stage, would not seem very contentious, and which we might take up. I would mention Bill No. 64, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata Railway; and Bill No. 146, to authorize the granting of a subsidy to the government of the province of British Columbia in aid of the construction of an extension to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 14, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Third report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

FEDERAL DISTRICT OF REGINA CITY—REPORT OF COMMISSION APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the chief electoral officer a copy of the report of Hon. James T. Brown, Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench for Saskatchewan, a commissioner appointed by the chief electoral officer under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, to inquire into certain alleged irregularities in connection with the election in the federal district of Regina City, in the province of Saskatchewan, in the dominion election of June 27, 1949; and covering letter from the chief electoral officer in connection therewith.

CROWN PROPERTIES

FEDERAL GRANTS IN LIEU OF MUNICIPAL TAXES—NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement with respect to certain proposals the government has concerning grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes. I must ask the indulgence of hon. members for the length of the statement, but the questions involved are important, and I think it is as well that hon. members should have a full statement of the reasons which prompted the government to make the proposals which it intends to make. Of course full opportunity will be afforded for discussing them when I ask for appropriate financial provisions to carry them into effect.

For some considerable time the government has had under review its policy in respect of the tax-exempt status of its real property in various municipalities throughout Canada. The present situation, which reflects the exemption from municipal taxation granted to crown property under the British North America Act, has given rise to increasing complaints as the number and variety of federal properties have multiplied during the past few years. These complaints have been embodied in representations from such bodies as the Canadian federation of mayors and the Ontario association of mayors and reeves, as well as from individual municipalities.

The government, aware of the problems faced by at least some municipalities in financing continuing growth and expanding services, has studied these complaints with sympathy and with the utmost care. Every effort has been made to gather together the relevant data and to examine these data in the light of conditions and needs in our own country and the experience of other countries.

One of the first steps in this study was to make a preliminary survey of all federal government property in Canada. This survey took a good deal of time to complete, but it was absolutely necessary to arrive at an appreciation of the nature and magnitude of the problem.

Another phase of the study was a review of the experience and practice, in this field, of other countries of the world, particularly the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, and the Scandinavian countries. This review was most illuminating. It revealed, in practically all countries, conditions and a course of development very much like our own. In practically every country, as a result of either legislation or custom, the practice is, or at least has been at some time, to exempt from local taxation the real property of the central government. However, there has been increasing recognition that this tax exemption gives rise to a problem for the municipalities, and a number of countries have found it advisable to have their central governments assume a measure of responsibility. Nevertheless, no consistent or uniform pattern has been evolved. The problem is still under consideration in most countries, and quite a few are looking with interest to any solution which may be proposed by Canada.

While this review of the practices followed elsewhere was most helpful, none of the various solutions adopted abroad was found to be wholly applicable to Canada. A solution suitable to a closely-knit unitary state, such as the United Kingdom, cannot be applied to a federal state, such as Canada, where governmental powers are divided and where the municipality is a creature of a provincial rather than the central government. The only two countries where the central government was found to pay full rates on all its properties were the United Kingdom and Eire, both unitary states where the local governments are subordinate to and integrated with the central government and where financial and administrative relationships are more a question of financial accounting then separate fiscal responsibility. It is significant that even in these two countries the central government has felt it necessary to maintain the right to assess its own property and thereby determine the total amount of taxes payable to municipalities. Unfortunately it was found that in the United States and the other federal states which were examined, where despite differences of size and historical development the basic ingredients of the problem are the same as in our case, no satisfactory solution has as yet been worked out.

Having obtained information on the nature and scope of the problem in Canada, and after studying the methods followed in other countries in dealing with a similar situation, the government came to the conclusion that if an acceptable solution were to be found it would have to be one that was based on consistent general principles, one that recognized the absence in Canada of any administrative connection between the central government and municipal governments, and one that would in its application be equitable to all municipalities as well as to the Canadian taxpayer.

As a first principle it was decided that the constitutional exemption of federal property from municipal taxation must be maintained. Consequently the federal grants in lieu of municipal taxes, which we propose to seek parliament's authority to make, are to be made solely as a matter of grace and are to be subject to discretionary determination by an agency of the federal government. It is proposed to set up under the treasury board a unit which will be staffed with competent men, preferably men who have had some experience in the field of municipal tax assessment or valuation of properties for tax and other purposes; and it will be the job of these officials to consult with municipal authorities and to apply as fairly as possible to the assessment of government property the same principles and practices as are being applied in the assessment of similar private properties.

I think hon. members will readily agree that we are under an obligation, in adopting a program of this sort, to avoid creating a situation whereby a few municipalities, by means of discriminatory assessment practices, could benefit at the expense of other municipalities and the taxpayer in general. I may add that our survey of the experience of other countries revealed a universal acceptance of this general principle.

In the second place, it was decided that, to be fair to all municipalities, any federal program of this sort should recognize that the presence of federal property within a municipality normally brings certain definite benefits to the municipality. These benefits include not only the increase in local incomes and business activity resulting from the presence of federal employees who work and live within the municipality, but also the greater degree of stability given to municipal revenues by the fact that a good proportion of municipal taxpayers are in the employ of the federal government. It is not difficult to demonstrate that these benefits do accrue to municipalities which have federal property within their boundaries. Such benefits are constantly reflected in the competition which, as all hon. members know, exists amongst municipalities for new federal buildings or new federal enterprises of one sort or another. I need only refer to a recent controversy highly publicized in this community, the controversy resulting from the decision to remove the government printing bureau from Ottawa to Hull.

It has indeed been argued by some that the benefits resulting to a municipality from the presence of federal real property within the municipality are more than sufficient to compensate for any added cost of municipal services which might be occasioned by the presence of this added property. I think this contention carries the benefit theory too far, if not in all cases, at least under certain circumstances to which I shall refer more fully in a moment. However, there is sufficient in the theory, I believe, to demonstrate that in any program of federal grants in lieu of municipal taxes, it would be unfair to municipalities generally to base the grants on acceptance by the central government of responsibility for a full equivalent of ordinary taxes.

The third general principle relates to the special circumstances I referred to a moment ago, the special cases where it clearly cannot be said that the benefits derived by a municipality from the presence of federal property within its limits are more than sufficient to compensate for the added costs resulting therefrom. This special type of case is where there is an abnormally large concentration of federal property within a municipality. The studies which have been made have convinced the government that where federal property is heavily concentrated, a problem is created for the municipality because our present municipal tax systems are not designed in such a way that they obtain for the municipal corporation as such all the benefits which accrue to the municipality at large from the presence of federal property. As everyone knows, municipal revenues are based primarily on real estate taxation and therefore may not fully reflect a substantial increase in personal incomes and business activity within the municipality which may flow from a heavy concentration of federal properties. We have therefore reached the conclusion that the key to any solution to the problem before us is the degree of concentration of federal property in a municipality; and the solution which I am about to propose is based primarily on this premise.

To be able to apply this solution, it is first of all necessary to establish a clear test of what constitutes abnormal concentration of federal property. The test which we are proposing is that anything in excess of the national average of all federal property to total municipal assessments in all municipalities in Canada shall be considered abnormal concentration. The preliminary figures we have obtained as a result of the survey of federal property I referred to at the outset of my remarks indicate that this national average is somewhere between four per cent and five per cent. For the purposes of the solution we are proposing, it has been decided to use the lower figure of four per cent, at least in the initial period. This, of course, is more favourable to the municipalities than adopting the higher figure. Later, when we have completed the work of applying the ordinary principles and practices of municipal assessment to all our federal property, we may have to revise that figure to some extent.

I am therefore glad to be able to announce that the government is prepared to seek the authority of parliament to pay annually to any municipality, as a matter of grace, a grant determined according to the following formula, namely, a grant equal to 75 per cent of the sum determined by taking that percentage of the general tax levy for municipal and school purposes—but excluding business taxes—which is equal to the percentage which total federal property assessments bear to total taxable assessments in the municipality, less four per cent.

The grant is to be equal to 75 per cent, rather than 100 per cent, of the sum determined by the above formula, for two reasons:

(a) to reflect in some degree the fact mentioned above that benefits do accrue to the municipality from the presence of federal property within its limits; and

(b) to take into account the further fact that there is always in any municipality a proportion of other than federal property which is granted exemption from municipal tax.

In this formula the term "federal property" is taken to mean all federal properties, except such types as parks, harbours and more or less self-contained defence establishments and property owned by crown corporations or agencies. I am presenting a detailed schedule of the excluded categories which, with the permission of the house, I would like to have tabled and printed as an appendix to this statement. Certain of these excluded categories may, however, be included in the calculations for any particular municipality if such municipality can demonstrate that special conditions exist which warrant such inclusion.

It will be noted that while school taxes are taken into account in determining the amount of a grant, the total amount will be paid to the municipal corporation, which will have the responsibility of applying the amount of such grant in the best interests of all taxpayers in the municipality. It is clear, of course, that any contribution to the cost of any local service eases the burden on taxpayers generally for the total cost of their local services.

Perhaps I might now be permitted to give an illustration of how the formula would work out in the case of a hypothetical municipality. Take a municipality which has total tax assessments of $100 million. Using the same assessment practice, the total assessment of federal properties would amount to $10 million, or 10 per cent of the total. The municipal tax levy for ordinary and school purposes is $4 million. Our first step is to deduct the national average of federal property assessments to total municipal assessments, assumed at 4 per cent, from the figure of 10 per cent, which represents the corresponding figure for the municipality in question, leaving a net of six per cent. Applying this percentage, six per cent, to the total tax levy of $4 million, we arrive at the figure of $240,000. The grant payable in the case of this municipality would therefore be 75 per cent of this sum, namely, $180,000.

It will thus be seen that under the program which we are now prepared to recommend, the federal government intends to assume a proportionate share of the cost of maintaining ordinary municipal services in any municipality where the concentration of federal property is in excess of the national average. In return, the federal government will seek treatment in the matter of municipal services not less favourable than that accorded to ordinary taxpayers.

Crown Properties

It is proposed, in addition, to pay in future to any municipality in receipt of this type of grant a further temporary adjustment grant whenever the crown acquires a new piece of property in that municipality. This grant will ensure that the municipality will receive full taxes for the year in which the property is acquired, either from the vendor or from the government, depending on the sales agreement, plus full taxes in the succeeding year, and one half of taxes in the next following year. At the end of this period the assessed value of such property will be included in the total of federal assessment of the municipality—with a commensurate effect on the regular grant.

For any municipality where no regular grant is made because total federal property in that municipality is below the national average, the government proposes in future to pay, in respect of any piece of property acquired by the crown, full taxes for the year of acquisition in the same way as above, plus full taxes for the succeeding year and in each of the next three years grants of respectively 75 per cent, 50 per cent and 25 per cent of the full taxes. At the end of this five-year period no further grants will be paid. These temporary grants are intended to permit the municipalities to adjust themselves to the loss of specific tax revenue upon the acquisition of property by the crown.

We will also propose the payment as soon as possible of all proper arrears and charges for local improvements against federal real property in any municipality, and the payment of all local improvement charges as they occur in the future.

In addition it is the intention of the government to pay for all charges for water received at government buildings on a meter basis.

Finally, I wish to say a word about the position of property held by crown corporations. With respect to such property the situation is complicated, but in general the policy of the government will be to authorize its crown corporations to work out fair and equitable agreements with the municipalities in which their properties are situated.

In the case of residential housing property owned or managed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, there are already agreements with municipalities providing for payments in lieu of taxes. Because agreements between Wartime Housing Limited and the municipalities in relation to war workers' houses provided for payments in lieu of taxes which were considered insufficient, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply on July 22, 1946, indicated that these agreements could be renegotiated with the corporation, with corresponding increases in rents to be paid by individuals to meet the adjusted payments in lieu of taxes. Most agreements of this kind have now been renegotiated, and the balance can be renegotiated if the municipalities so desire. In regard to housing properties completed since 1947 and under current programs, payments in lieu of taxes are being made in accordance with agreements negotiated with the municipalities which are believed to be equitable and will not be renegotiated.

In the case of the government-owned railways operated by the Canadian National Railways, agreements have been entered into with the cities of Halifax and Saint John for the payment of reasonable amounts in lieu of taxes. I understand that the Canadian National Railways will endeavour to work out similar arrangements with other municipalities through which the government-owned railway runs.

In general, as I have indicated, the policy will be to have crown corporations work out arrangements with municipalities which are fair and equitable under all circumstances.

It should be clear from what I have said that the government intends to pursue policies in respect to its federal real property which will assure fair and equitable compensation to those municipalities which have a genuine burden as the result of the presence of federal property within their boundaries, and will assure the payment of legitimate costs as they occur in connection with its properties.

The government proposes to make immediate arrangements to have its property assessed by its agents for the purpose of determining the grants to be paid. Preliminary information indicates that, in a number of cases at least, local assessments of federal property are considerably inflated. It should be borne in mind that such assessments have been made without contest or rebuttal by the federal government, because hitherto the assessment of federal property has been a matter of academic interest only.

While the procedure of assessment will probably require a couple of years to complete, it is proposed to institute the program I have outlined as of the 1st of January, 1950. Actual payments in some cases may be delayed, but they will be made retroactive. For obvious reasons it will not be possible to institute the system of grants for those municipalities having within their limits federal properties to an extent near the assumed national average of four per cent until the actual certification of the figures has been completed. However, for those municipalities which, according to our rough preliminary figures, would seem to be clearly within the ambit of the new scheme, we propose, if our recommendations are accepted by parliament, to commence payments as soon after January 1, 1950, as possible, withholding 25 per cent until the final determination of figures has been completed. Adjustments will be made retroactively.

Figures now available would indicate that there are something over one hundred municipalities where there is a concentration of federal property in excess of the national average. I hesitate at this time to make any estimate of what the total annual cost of the entire program will probably amount to but I believe it is likely to be in the vicinity of $5 million.

This new program will supersede any existing arrangements with certain municipalities, such as those which formerly existed with the city of Ottawa. This city, the capital of the dominion, is not only the most outstanding case amongst the municipalities affected by a substantial concentration of federal property, but the situation is rather more complicated here, because of the proposed development of the national capital plan. This has, I am afraid, led to some confusion, and we think it important to a clear understanding of the proposals we are making, and to a satisfactory solution of our relationships with the city, that it be clearly recognized that in the case of the city of Ottawa there are two distinct and separate problems: first, the problem arising from the presence of a large amount of tax-exempt federal property within the city limits; and second, the financial problem which may be faced by the city in fulfilling its part in its own development as the national capital of Canada, as envisaged in the Greber report.

We fear that confusion in regard to these two problems has made them seem a lot more difficult and complicated than they really are. The discussion of relative participations in some new capital planning project has been complicated by arguments based on inadequate compensation for abnormal concentration of federal property, and vice versa. At times also statements have been made which appear to overemphasize the burdens placed upon the city by the presence of federal property or fail to take into account the contribution which the federal government is already making. Perhaps it is well that all hon. members should first be clear about this latter point. At the present time the federal government does its own policing, paves and maintains a good part of Wellington street, the federal district highways, Clemow avenue and two bridges over the Ottawa river, with the approaches thereto; maintains the federal district parks system, including a few of the city's own parks; collects and disposes of garbage from its own buildings; pays for all the water it uses at the fair rate of 20·82 cents per thousand gallons, and pays to the city an annual grant of $300,000 in lieu of taxes. On the other hand, the city supplies light and water for the parks and parkways within the city limits to which I have referred.

I wish now to outline the new arrangements which we are proposing. In regard to Ottawa's first problem arising from concentration of federal property, the government believes that the city should be treated in this respect in exactly the same way as a great many other municipalities which are confronted with the same problem in greater or less degree. In other words, if parliament approves the general program of grants I have outlined, the city of Ottawa will receive as from January 1 next a grant in lieu of taxes determined on the basis of the same formula as that applicable to all other municipalities. However, the arrangement which has been in effect in the past lapsed on June 30 last, and it is therefore necessary to decide on a grant to the city for the rest of the current year. I am happy now to announce that the government has decided to recommend payment to Ottawa of an interim grant of $250,000 to cover this six-months period. For the present it is not proposed to disturb the existing arrangement whereby the government now provides certain services for itself in Ottawa, as I have indicated. However, in accordance with our intention of seeking equal treatment in future in the matter of municipal services, these arrangements will be reviewed with the municipality when the new plan of regular grants in lieu of municipal taxes comes into effect.

Having disposed of this first problem in the way suggested, we hope it will now be possible to deal with the second problem separately and on its own merits. This second problem arises, as I have already indicated, from the necessity of financing the development of the national capital. For some years past, as the house is aware, members of the federal district commission and others who are members of the national capital planning committee, including a number of experts, have been working on a plan for the development of the capital. A master plan is being prepared setting out on broad lines the developments which should be followed from year to year by the different authorities and organizations having to do with the development of the capital.

From the very outset it has been recognized that the implementation of any master plan befitting the requirements of a national capital would involve developments of a character beyond the municipal improvements ordinarily required in other cities. This was foreshadowed in the report, dated August 1, 1944, of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to review the special problems arising out of the location of the seat of government in the city of Ottawa. The resolution which was passed by this house in June, 1948, explicitly recognized that fact and its corollary that "the development of a national capital is at least in part a national responsibility." For that reason the resolution went on to recommend the creation of a special account in the consolidated revenue fund, to be known as the national capital fund, to which appropriations would be made annually by parliament over a period of years of the amounts required from time to time to meet the costs of such projects as might be recommended by the federal district commission and approved by the governor in council for the development of the national capital and the surrounding area in accordance with the developing master plan. As hon. members are aware, the sum of $2½ million was voted to be set aside in that national capital fund last year, and a similar item is included in the estimates for the current fiscal year.

On behalf of the government, therefore, I now wish to make it clear that we are prepared to see appropriate assistance given on the recommendation of the commission in the case of those individual projects which are considered essential in the development of the national capital plan, and yet would not be undertaken, at least not in the same form or to the same extent or at as early a date, if Ottawa were not the capital of our country and it were not necessary to have regard to the future development of the country as well as of the municipality. This would include, for example, part of the extra cost that might be necessary to make a new city hall comply with the architectural requirements of the national capital plan if the city should eventually decide to place it in a location where such additional standards would be required. Another example would include certain features of the Gore and Storrie report on sewage and water supply, and new Sussex street bridges over the Rideau river to complete the gap in the eastern end of the driveway system.

The federal district commission has power to discuss with the city participation in any one of these individual projects or developments. Any project will be considered on its own merits and on the degree of its relationship to the city as an ordinary municipality or to the national capital, as the case may be.

Furthermore, the government proposes, in addition to the regular grant to the city, to make additional funds available to the federal district commission to cover additional expense which it may be necessary for the city to incur in co-operation and agreement with the commission in carrying out its obligations under provincial planning statutes, such as zoning and laying out on the ground by surveys the necessary features of the national capital plan. The amount of funds so made available will not be a fixed grant, but it is likely to vary to some extent from time to time, depending on the projects likely to be undertaken during the period in question.

It is the hope of the government that by keeping our consideration of this national capital development problem separate and distinct from the other general problem to which I referred in the early part of my remarks, we shall be able to remove the confusions and misunderstandings that may have existed in the past and secure the effective co-operation of the city authorities in promoting the growth and development of this beautiful city in its role of the national capital.

In conclusion, may I say that we would propose to ask for parliamentary approval of the interim grant to Ottawa and the initiation of the program for the whole of Canada by a special estimates item to be introduced at this session of parliament. I believe only a modest appropriation of funds at this session, over and above the amount of the interim grant to Ottawa, will be necessary to make possible the setting up of the necessary establishment in the Department of Finance, work out details of procedure, begin the job of assessments of federal property and provide for such initial grants as may have to be made before the close of the present fiscal year. At the next session it would be our intention to introduce a bill to provide permanent statutory authorization of the program as a whole.

APPENDIX

Detailed Schedule of Categories Excluded From the Definition of Federal Property

Total federal property shall mean all federal property within municipal boundaries in organized territory, except:

(1) All military, naval and air force establishments which are self-contained or substantially so.

(2) All harbours, canals and other lands held in connection with the federal government's responsibility for navigable waters.

(3) All lands held in connection with land conservation, irrigation, rehabilitation and forestation.

(4) All penitentiaries and D.V.A. hospitals where they are outside of urban municipal boundaries and/or self-contained or substantially so.

(5) All parks and parklands and historical sites and other improvements of a like nature.

(6) All property held by crown corporations or agencies.

(7) Canadian government-owned railways.

(8) Property of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Any of the above types of property in classifications 1 to 4 inclusive may be included in whole or in part for the purpose of determining the principal grant if in the opinion of the minister a municipality has demonstrated a good case for its inclusion.

Mr. Green: Will the minister file a list of the municipalities which it is expected will become eligible for assistance?

Mr. Abbott: No, I am afraid that is not possible, because, as I indicated in the course of my statement, our survey of values of federal properties is still pretty rough. We know some, of course, that are clearly within the purview of the statement. Cities such as Ottawa, Halifax and Esquimalt are obviously within that sphere, but other than indicating one or two obvious cases, I would prefer at this stage not to attempt to give any list.

Mr. Church: Are there other cities in which bodies such as the Toronto transportation commission and the Toronto hydro pay full federal, provincial and municipal taxes, as private corporations do?

Mr. Abbott: In no municipality does any agency of government, so far as I know, pay full federal taxes, unless it be under the equitable tax agreements negotiated by certain crown corporations, such as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Church: Sir James Whitney went as far as that thirty-four years ago.

Mr. Graydon: Will there be any appeal from the assessment figure that is finally decided upon by the government?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Drew: There is one point I should like to have clarified. As I understand the minister's statement, the plan now put forward provides for a system of compensation for taxation, other than business taxes, only in those municipalities which are above the national average of concentration of dominion government property, and as to any other case the plan will not apply, other than to provide for certain adjustments of taxes in the first year after purchase.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. It will be only in those municipalities where there is an abnormal concentration of federal real property.

Mr. Graydon: That is the government's escape clause.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

1. What were the total sales of 2¾ per cent Canada savings bonds in each of the years 1946, 1947 and 1948?

2. What have been the cancellations or redemptions of each issue to date?

3. What was the cost of marketing each issue?

Mr. Abbott:

1, 2 and 3.

Series 1—October 15, 1946 to September 30, 1947, total sales, $535,285,550.00; redemptions to October 31, 1949, $235,287,150.00; costs of flotation, $4,457,649.87.

Series 2—October 15, 1947 to September 30, 1948, total sales, $287,733,100.00; redemptions to October 31, 1949, $121,681,200.00; costs of flotation, $2,094,146.07.

Series 3—October 15, 1948 to September 30, 1949, total sales, $260,476,100.00; redemptions to October 31, 1949, $53,339,450.00; costs of flotation, $2,120,605.59.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

Mr. Green:

1. How many veterans were in receipt of war veterans allowance as of October 31, 1949?

2. How many of such recipients have made application for assistance from the special assistance fund?

3. How many have been granted such assistance?

Mr. Mutch:

1. 25,918.
2. 3,174.
3. 2,444.

INTERNATIONAL SUGAR COUNCIL

Mr. Blackmore:

1. Was Canada represented at the international sugar council of representatives of seventeen governments, reported to have been held in London within the last two months?

2. If not, why was Canada not represented?

3. If so, who was the Canadian representative?

4. Did the Canadian representative request that before the international sugar council should consider any measures for limiting the sugar production in any country the council should make sure that adequate provision is made for production of enough sugar to supply the needs of the total population of the earth?

5. Does Canada aim to be represented at the next international sugar council, tentatively planned to be held not later than next July?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. A Canadian representative attends meetings of the international sugar council in the capacity of an observer only.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The Canadian commercial counsellor in the United Kingdom, Mr. A. E. Bryan.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. The nature of the Canadian representation will be determined in due course.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PROPERTY AT GRAND BEACH, MAN.

Mr. Sinnott:

1. Have any negotiations been carried on during the last year to dispose of Canadian National Railways property at Grand Beach, Manitoba? If so, with what result?

2. What arrangements have been made to carry on concessions at Grand Beach, Manitoba?

3. Has there been an offer made by an American firm to buy outright the property owned by the Canadian National Railways at Grand Beach, Manitoba?

4. If so, for how much and who was the party submitting the offer?

Mr. Chevrier:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. No.

2. None.

3. No.

4. See answer to No. 3.

WHEAT—PAYMENTS FOR STORAGE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What is the total amount paid by the wheat board for storage of wheat between the first day of August, 1948, and the first day of October, 1949, with particulars as to the companies to whom payment was made, and the amount paid to each?

By arrangement with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, this question will be dropped in order that it may be reworded.

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS—GUELPH CONFERENCE

Mr. Catherwood:

What action has been taken by the government with respect to the recommendations passed at the conference of the international federation of agricultural producers, held in Guelph in June of this year and subsequently approved by the food and agriculture organization of the united nations and presented to the governments of the fifty-eight countries, including Canada, for consideration?

Mr. McCubbin: The recommendations passed at the conference of the international federation of agricultural producers were referred to the council of FAO at its meeting in Paris last June. The council instructed the director-general of FAO to appoint a committee of experts to study them and to consider other proposals for facilitating the distribution of surplus commodities. The committee prepared a report which was forwarded to member governments of FAO for their consideration before the annual conference of FAO, at which the report will be dealt with by the representatives of member governments.

NICKEL AND NICKEL MATTE—SHIPMENTS TO EUROPE

Mr. Herridge:

1. What amount of nickel or nickel matte has been shipped to European countries during the years 1946, 1947, 1948 and to date in 1949?

2. What amount was shipped to each country during each of these years?

Mr. McIlraith:

NATIONAL ART GALLERY

Mr. Church:

1. What has been done since last session of the house to decide the question of a new national art gallery for Canada?

2. Has the president of the National Art Gallery, Dr. H. S. Southam, M.A., LL.D., resigned?

3. Will appropriate action be taken to thank him for this important national work herein?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. The government has given consideration to the question of a new building for the National Art Gallery of Canada and has authorized the board of trustees to proceed with the necessary preliminary inquiries regarding the most suitable type of construction.

2. Mr. Southam has resigned as chairman of the board of trustees, but he remains a member of the board.

3. On the occasion of Mr. Southam's resignation Mr. Mackenzie King, who was then prime minister, expressed to Mr. Southam, in a letter dated January 29, 1948, the appreciation of the government for the fine services which he had rendered. A copy of this letter appears below. It gives me much pleasure now to add my thanks and appreciation for what Mr. Southam has done and for the support which he continues to give to the national gallery.

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, January 29, 1948

H. S. Southam, Esq.,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Southam:

The government has acceded reluctantly to your request to be relieved of the responsibilities of the chairmanship of the board of trustees of the national gallery. I should, however, not like the occasion to pass without expression, on behalf of the government, a word of appreciation of the fine national service you have rendered in the nineteen years you have been chairman.

During that period the national gallery has made a steadily growing contribution to the cultural life of our country, and has become in increasing measure, not merely a repository of the art treasures of the nation, but also a centre of artistic inspiration. Under your chairmanship the board of trustees have guided and fostered this development and laid enduring foundations for the future of the national gallery.

It is a source of satisfaction to the government that you are to remain as a member of the board, in which capacity we know you will continue to render valuable service to the national gallery and to the appreciation of the arts in the country at large.

With kind personal regards,

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King

NATIONAL LIBRARY

Mr. Church:

1. What has been done since the last session of the house to decide the question of a new parliamentary library?

2. Have any plans been prepared for it?

3. What action will be or has been taken on it?

Mr. St. Laurent: I assume that the hon. member is referring to the proposed national library for Canada.

The royal commission on national development of the arts, letters and sciences has been asked to consider the "ultimate character and extent" of the national library, and no large-scale developments will take place until the report of the commission has been received. Meanwhile, however, much useful preliminary work can be done. The national library advisory committee, which the government appointed about a year ago, met in March last, and recommended that a bibliographic centre be established without delay. An appropriation of $18,950, included in the supplementary estimates submitted recently to the house, will enable a start to be made upon the organization of this centre within the next few months. The civil service commission will soon invite applications for the first four positions on the staff of the centre, and work on a national union catalogue should start immediately after the new year. To begin with, this catalogue will list the contents of the thirty-five or more libraries in Ottawa belonging to the various branches of the federal government. Later the contents of special collections elsewhere, such as the famous Canadiana collections in the Toronto public library and the Gagnon collection in the Bibliothèque Municipale in Montreal, will be included. The intention is that ultimately the union catalogue should list the contents of every important library in Canada.

PENITENTIARIES—FIRE INSPECTION

Mr. Church:

1. Did a fire take place recently at the Kingston penitentiary?

2. What fire inspection is there in these institutions?

3. Are they under the administration of crown officers of the justice department, such as the commissioner?

4. Was the said commissioner present when the fire happened, or did he learn of it from his officials who were present?

5. Has the minister visited any of the penal institutions since his appointment?

Mr. Garson:

1. Yes.

2. Under the warden the plant engineer is responsible for the fire protection service in the penitentiary. The plant engineer is the penitentiary fire chief. Fire inspections are held regularly and reports submitted to the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries every three months.

3. Yes.

4. The commissioner was not present. He learned of the fire from the warden.

5. No.

Combines Investigation Act

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NORTH SHORE CONSTRUCTION COMPANY—CONTRACTS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Have any contracts been granted to the North Shore Construction Company, Limited, 307 Castle building, Montreal, by departments of the federal government, since 1940?

2. If so, for what amounts and in what places?

3. What are the names and addresses of the officers of the said company?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—PRICE FIXING AGREEMENTS

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda and communications from Mr. Donald Gordon, or any member of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board to the flour milling industry or any flour milling company authorizing the making or maintenance of price agreements between December 1, 1941 and September 15, 1947, or subsequently. Also, for any communication giving the flour milling industry any assurance that price fixing agreements made during the control period would not make them liable to action under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all communications, memoranda, etc., from Mr. Donald Gordon to the Minister of Justice or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, reporting any assurances given by the wartime prices and trade board to the flour milling industry or companies that they would not be held liable under the Combines Investigation Act for price fixing and similar agreements or understandings reached among them between December 1, 1941 and September 15, 1947.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ELIGIBLE AREAS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, by reducing the area taken out of payment in an eligible area when contiguous to an ineligible area; by reducing the size of an eligible area within an ineligible township and contiguous to one that is eligible; and to bring into payment any half township outside areas already established on a legal township basis but not contiguous thereto.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Garson.]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INSTITUTION AND CONDUCT OF PROSECUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading I shall follow the usual practice of discussing only the principles of the bill. Those principles are two. The first is that of withdrawing from corporate accused in prosecutions under the act the option it now has of choosing whether it shall be tried by a jury or without a jury. The second is that in prosecutions under this act there shall be a rebuttable presumption that an employee acting in connection with his employer's business has authority so to act, and a rebuttable presumption that relevant documents in the business files of those involved in an alleged combine are authentic records from which a court or a jury may properly draw any reasonable inferences.

To begin with, may I say that the entire contents of this bill are made up of recommendations of the combines investigation administration, which have been approved by the government.

I shall deal with the principles of the bill in the order in which I stated them.

Under the present law, offences under the combines act and under section 498 of the Criminal Code can be tried only by a superior court judge with or without a jury, at the option of the accused. The proposed amendment provides that, not in the case of an individual but only in the case of a company, the company shall be tried by a supreme court judge without a jury, and shall not have the option of being tried with a jury. After the adoption of this amendment an individual, of course, can still elect jury or non-jury trial at his pleasure.

Jury trials are singularly inappropriate for the trial of combines cases, because of the complexity and volume of the evidence and the length of time required to present these cases to the courts. In that connection I might cite two fairly typical cases. First is Rex v. Container Materials Limited et al., where the number of pages of transcript was 5,111, the number of exhibits tendered 323, and the length of trial in days, 39. The second is Rex v. Imperial Tobacco Company of Canada and others, in which the number of pages of transcript was 8,798, the number of exhibits tendered 1,127, and the length of trial in days 56.

In these cases the accused invariably are companies or incorporated business firms or officials of such companies or firms or of trade associations made up of a number of these firms acting in an industry. Of necessity the evidence is largely documentary; and if a dozen or more companies and individuals are indicted, as is usually the case, very close study must be given to their corporate interrelationship one with the other and to the usually involved arrangements into which they enter in order, as alleged, to control prices or otherwise limit competition. Activities of all the accused and their principal employees must be traced in evidence over a considerable period, in some cases over many years, and also in many related aspects.

The presentation of evidence drawn from many different sources and relating to many different matters is extremely difficult in any jury trial, as I think any legal member of this house will agree; and it imposes a heavy burden upon the presiding judge and upon counsel in the submission of the evidence to the jury. An equally heavy burden—in my own view a greater one, as a matter of fact—is placed upon the jurymen, who in almost all cases are laymen in relation to the problems with which the case deals, in analysing and weighing the intricate evidence presented during the trial, which usually occupies several weeks, and ultimately arriving at a conclusion with respect to the involved agreements, arrangements and transactions which form the substance of the charge.

Non-jury trial of charges of this sort permits a much more orderly and concise presentation of evidence to the court and a better-ordered arrangement of the facts brought out in the documentary and other evidence. All documents do not have to be read aloud, as must be done in a jury trial; and when you have exhibits running into the thousands you can see what a tremendous burden is imposed upon counsel on both sides of the case in retaining the interest of a jury throughout the reading aloud of documents. If a judge is trying the case without a jury, he may dispense with the full reading of lengthy records of which only a few passages may be either important or relevant. The possibility of mistrial through death or illness of a juror in cases the trial of which extends over a long period, such as those I have mentioned, or through procedural errors or through misdirection by the trial judge, is avoided or reduced. The length and expense of the trial, both for the crown and for the accused, is also reduced.

Admittedly in some cases two trials may be necessary after this amendment passes, one for the companies and for the individuals who may elect non-jury trial, and one for those individuals who may choose to elect trial by jury. But such a split trial can occur even under the existing legislation. In both the A.B.C. plumbing case in 1931 and the tobacco case in 1941 there were split trials under the present legislation, one trial for those electing a jury and one for those electing non-jury.

In this connection I should like to draw a clear distinction between the principle of withdrawing the privilege of jury trial from a corporation, as we are proposing to do here, and that of withdrawing a jury trial from an individual, which we are not proposing to do. The arguments for a non-jury trial in combines cases could apply, perhaps not to the same extent but to some extent, to trials of individuals as well as trials of corporations, but we are not proposing to withdraw the right of an individual to trial by a jury of his peers, because of the strong British and Canadian tradition in favour of that principle.

We have it in mind that a distinction can be made between a natural person, who must appear in court himself to answer charges and is subject to both fine and imprisonment, and an artificial person such as a corporation, which appears in court only through counsel, and cannot, of course, be penalized by imprisonment. If the rights of the corporation are otherwise adequately protected, there is no unfairness in limiting the trial to a judge without a jury. The prime consideration, we submit, must be the ends of justice and the interests of the public. The public advantages in connection with this matter are many, and we affirm that the corporation is under no undue hardship by reason of the limitation which we propose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question at this point? He pointed to the distinction between a natural person and an artificial person. Is there any provision in either Great Britain or the United States for the denial to an artificial person of trial by jury?

Mr. Garson: I presume my hon. friend's question is intended to be relevant to the matter we are discussing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman spoke of the British tradition.

Mr. Garson: In Great Britain, as I understand it, an organization of the type which we have under the Combines Investigation Act has only recently been set up. Last spring the head of that body visited Canada to find out how we were carrying on under our act. The United Kingdom did not propose even to pass an act creating criminal offences until the matter had received careful consideration. I am sure therefore that the question of withholding from a corporate accused the privilege of being tried by a jury has not arisen in that country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They proceed under the criminal law.

Mr. Garson: I would not want my hon. friend to leave the implication by his question that we are suggesting a change in anything other than the prosecutions under this act or the related section of the Criminal Code. It merely applies to such proceedings. If the hon. member followed my remarks carefully, he must have seen that we were basing the reason for this change upon the nature of this particular type of prosecution.

As I was saying, in Great Britain they have not yet arrived at the point of passing criminal legislation which would correspond to our Combines Investigation Act. The question of their withdrawing this privilege, therefore, from a corporate accused has not yet arisen. I cannot answer my hon. friend's question relating to the United States practice, but in any event their approach to this whole matter is considerably different from our own, as I think he is well aware.

The second principle has to do with the establishment of the rebuttable presumptions to which I have already referred. The necessity for introducing amending legislation at this time, as I am sure all members are aware, has arisen by reason of the uncertainty in the law resulting from the decision of the Ontario court of appeal in February, 1949, in the dental supplies case. The problem created by this decision has been carefully studied, first of all, by the leading counsel in that case, and then by the legal advisers of the Department of Justice, as well as the combines investigation branch of that department. Section 3 of the proposed bill represents the results of that study.

Perhaps some considerable amount of light will be shed upon the provisions we have before us for consideration if I make some reference to the dental supplies judgment. The prosecution of members of the Canadian Dental Trade Association was undertaken by the Attorney General of Canada after a report had been made by the commissioner alleging that a combine existed amongst the various members of the association, which included both manufacturers and dealers. Eighteen corporations with head offices in various parts of Canada were tried at Toronto in March, 1948. At the end of the crown's case, the trial judge acquitted the accused, upon the ground that some five hundred documents presented as evidence during the three weeks of trial had not been sufficiently authenticated. This judgment was confirmed by the unanimous judgment of the court of appeal on February 28, 1949. The argument on appeal was heard in the fall of 1948, the latter part of September and October, but the judgment was reserved and was not delivered until 1949.

The documents on which the crown based its case had been introduced in evidence on proof that they came from the business offices of the accused companies and that, coming from those offices, they had evidentiary value. Crown counsel argued that the court should apply to the companies the principle, long established in conspiracy trials, that documents and other things found in the possession of the accused are evidence against him. The crown claimed that the contents of these documents fully established the interest of the companies in the alleged illegal agreements, and also established the authority of the officers and employees to enter into those agreements on behalf of their respective companies. The trial judge, although at the beginning of the trial he had admitted these documents in evidence, rejected the crown's argument and refused to let the documents go to the jury, on the ground that they had no probative value without further proof.

When the case came before the court of appeal, the court, in a unanimous decision delivered by the chief justice, confirmed the trial court judgment and established the principle that where companies are accused, the criminal acts which are charged against them must be brought home to the companies by more direct evidence than the filing of these seized documents. In this connection the chief justice stated:

> The proof required, however, in the case of a company, differs somewhat from that required in the case of an individual. If the act relied on is that of an officer, servant or agent of the company, there must be evidence that he had authority from the company to perform the act. Mere possession of a document by a company, in the sense that the document was on its premises, and even in the company's files, may not, without more, afford ground for an inference that its contents had come to the knowledge of its board of directors, or of someone having authority from the company to deal with the matters to which the document relates.

At a later point in his judgment his lordship said:

> There is, however, one objection common to all the letters. There is no evidence that the writing of any of them was authorized by any of the accused companies, nor is there evidence that anyone having authority to bind the company had any knowledge of the sending of any of the letters or of their receipt or of their contents.

Sir, most combines cases involve combination or conspiracy among a large number of companies, and usually over a considerable period of years. The basic agreement between the companies, if it exists, and if illegal, is normally secret and not contained in any formal documents. Ordinarily its existence, its nature and its effect must be deduced from the acts of company officials recorded in a vast amount of correspondence, memoranda, and other documents found on the files of the companies and their associates. Oral evidence of these facts is often not available or singularly unreliable. It requires no great amount of imagination to realize that, when you are seizing documents in the possession of the corporate accused, the securing of corroborative oral testimony from the officials or employees of the accused corporation is in the nature of things a difficult matter.

If no amendment such as we now propose in this instance were made, the crown, in most combines cases, would be required to prove by oral evidence the authority of company officials to bind their company, and in effect we would be required, directly or indirectly, to supply oral proof of virtually all the facts which are set forth in the documents.

In the trial of offences in conspiracy cases, this so-called possessory principle has been frequently applied. Its application in a case of this sort means that these incriminating documents would, without oral proof, have such probative force as the jury or the judge might be disposed to give to them. One of the effects of the decision in the dental supplies cases is that of making a distinction between individuals accused and corporations accused with regard to the possessory basis of proof.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not a new principle. It was not enunciated for the first time in that case.

Mr. Garson: Well, I am stating that it was enunciated in that case, and no more than that. When my hon. friend speaks he can show that it was not enunciated for the first time in that case.

Another practical result of the dental judgment is that if this amendment is not enacted the crown will have to prove by oral evidence the authority of company officials to bind their respective companies. This means that positive proof would have to be given by word of mouth, by having witnesses of virtually all the facts which, under the possessory rule in the case of individuals, can be inferred from mere possession.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is what made me wonder why the minister did not appeal the judgment. I think it is wrong.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend thinks that the judgment is wrong, I hope he will support this amendment.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is a different principle altogether.

Mr. Garson: If witnesses from the companies must be available to prove authority, they will usually be capable of proving by direct oral evidence the writing of the documents and the truth of the facts stated in them. Thus the dental judgment gravely limits the application of the possessory principle, and tends to establish one principle for companies which are accused and another principle for individual persons who are accused.

In considering this amendment one of the facts which must be realized is that these combines prosecutions are not by any means ordinary run-of-mine pieces of litigation. Because of the special nature and the extraordinary complexity of combines cases, in all instances except the most extremely simple ones an unnecessarily heavy burden is placed upon the crown by the decision in the dental supplies case.

The problem which the crown faces in a typical combines prosecution can be illustrated by the following paragraph from the memorandum of fact and law submitted by the crown to the court of appeal in the dental supplies case. This is an extract from our factum in that case:

> 24. In this case counsel for the crown were instructed that there were over 2,000 relevant documents in the possession of the accused extending over a period of eighteen years. The proving of all these documents by proof of handwriting or other execution was impossible in practice, and any substantial attempt to do so would have taken months of trial, required the attendance of witnesses from all parts of Canada and abroad and would have left unproven in that way, documents vital to the case.

That is to say, it would take months; it would involve the bringing of witnesses from all over Canada and abroad. Even then there would be vital documents which it would be impossible to prove by oral evidence because oral evidence in relation to them does not exist; although, if they had been tendered in respect of an individual case or a natural person, the mere fact that they had been taken from the possession of the accused would admit them as evidence for whatever probative value the jury or the judge might think they should have.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing I should like to emphasize strongly. We are not suggesting for a minute that the presumption which the tendering of these seized documents establishes against the accused is an irrebuttable and conclusive presumption. All we are saying is that we put them in for whatever value the court chooses to give to them, and the accused, if they be innocent, can then come forward with cogent evidence to the contrary and rebut the presumption which has been raised by the admission of these documents.

I hold in my hand the report on some leading cases of law relating to this possessory principle. I do not think I shall detain the house with them. Perhaps it would be preferable if I let the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) develop the legal proposition to which he referred a few minutes ago, and if necessary I can reply to him at the close of the debate.

But this much should be said. I think the hon. member will agree with me that, so far as natural persons are concerned, the possessory principle is well established. So far as the principle applies to the corporate accused, we have successfully invoked it in several of the prosecutions, in order to establish a case. The cases of Rex v. Simington and Rex v. Container Materials Limited, to give two of them, are in point.

One of the reasons this proposed change in the legislation is necessary is that it has been the experience of the combines investigation administration that where agreements, illegal under the Combines Investigation Act, are entered into, it is seldom indeed that the board of directors of an accused company goes to the trouble of formally authorizing the entering into of that agreement by their concern. It is also seldom that any person in an official capacity in a company does so. And if it be necessary in these cases, where the documents seized from a corporate accused, when they are pieced together in a very large jigsaw puzzle—if that is the appropriate figure of speech—show the establishment of the agreement, that we then have to show that the board of directors authorized it, or that the general manager authorized the agreement, I should think there would be very few occasions indeed where it would ever be possible to secure a conviction.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What officers does the minister think could give such authorization? Would a sales manager be sufficient?

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is any statement as to what particular officers could do so. The point, in reply to my hon. friend's interjection, is that the onus is upon the crown to show that the acts complained of were authorized by some person who had authority.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is a normal onus, in any case.

Mr. Garson: It is a normal onus in most cases where the agreements you are attempting to prove are legal ones upon which a company may be suing or depending to establish a defence. But where an agreement is an illegal one, a prudent company does not as a rule delegate to its responsible officers, or its people with authority, the forming of illegal agreement.

[Mr. Garson.]

I think it might be of service, and shed some light upon the matter, if I were to refer to some of the typical documents which have to be put in evidence in cases of this kind. Almost all evidence in a typical combines prosecution consists of informal documents such as minutes, memoranda and some letters. Only very rarely is the case based, either in whole or in part, upon any formal contracts or agreements between the parties. Usually the informal documentary evidence either specifically describes the agreements or contains statements which clearly warrant the inference that agreements were entered into.

Most of the evidence submitted consists of documents coming from the possession of or otherwise proved as originating from someone who has participated in the alleged combine. Again, the documents almost always come from members—usually incorporated companies—of the combines who are actually accused. They may thus come from the accused companies or firms, from their branches, or from the possession of officials of such companies or of such firms.

Another important body of evidence is usually found in the possession of the secretary of the trade association to which the accused belonged—a trade association which in some cases the crown alleges was formed for the purpose of achieving an illegal agreement of the firms in it. Occasionally evidence may be found in the files of companies which were originally in the combine but which have now discontinued business or have been taken over by accused companies.

As I have already indicated, documents adduced as necessary evidence sometimes number several thousand. In most cases, however, the most essential or primary evidence may be only a selection of some three or four hundred documents out of the thousands. These usually consist of memoranda purporting to record meetings at which agreements have been made or implemented, and also selected key letters which record or refer to arrangements between the accused. Usually much of such principal evidence is found in the possession of the trade association secretary, although in some cases, where the secretary has carefully avoided keeping incriminating evidence, the documents may be found scattered in the files of the various accused or their associates. Also usually essential are agreed price lists or agreed lists of customers which have been distributed among the members of the alleged combine.

The remaining documentary evidence in a typical case consists of minor memoranda of meetings, inter-office memoranda and a large body of miscellaneous letters. This remaining evidence is usually of a supplementary nature illustrating or corroborating the essential agreements, showing how they have been carried out through the relevant period and showing the participation of the various accused corporations.

It can be seen, I believe, from the examples I have indicated, that if the law were permitted to remain in the condition in which the judgment of the court of appeal in the dental supplies case has left it, a body blow would be struck at the administration of the Combines Investigation Act; and if this chamber desires that we should continue to have a Combines Investigation Act administration in this country, with powers that are effective, then the passage of the bill now before the house is indispensable and essential to the working of the act. It is upon this basis that we ask the support of hon. members for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal more involved in the motion now before the house than simply the second reading of a bill asking for certain amendments to the Combines Investigation Act.

We are asked to support Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. The motion is that the bill be now read the second time. In considering the effectiveness of any amendments and the desirability of now adopting second reading of this or any other bill, it is essential that the provisions of the proposed measure be considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances known to hon. members.

The question whether the bill should be read the second time in its present form is related to matters that have already been briefly under discussion in this house. It is true that if the bill receives second reading it will be referred to the committee of the whole house, at which time amendments may be moved to the bill as it stands, or other amendments to the act proposed.

But it goes a great deal further than that. It is now necessary for every hon. member of this house to ask himself whether the proposed amendments are necessary; whether they are adequate, and whether they will have any appreciable effect if the government continues to assert its right to disregard the laws passed by the parliament of Canada. Members of this house are not here merely for the purpose of hearing bills read and registering their votes. Their action here is intended to have some effect. More than that, the time has come for every hon. member to realize that parliament, not the government, is the supreme authority. Under our parliamentary system the government is merely the administrative body chosen from the members of the house by the leader of the government and nominated by the representative of His Majesty the King to form a government. That government at all times is responsible to the house. That government at all times must answer to the house. That government at all times is duty bound to observe in the strictest details the provisions which the parliament of Canada has seen fit to enact as the laws of this country.

The correspondence between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and Mr. F. A. McGregor, commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, tabled in this house a week ago, discloses that other amendments have been under consideration. Those amendments have been described by the commissioner, and it would appear that there is no doubt that they were discussed. Already there have been press reports, from what are commonly described as well-informed sources, to the effect that it is intended to review the whole act at the next session of parliament. Presumably the other amendments that were discussed and that are referred to in the correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act will be under consideration at that time. For this and other reasons it should be remembered that what is now before the house is only part of what the government obviously has in mind in regard to this act.

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent the government's position. What is now before the house represents the whole of what the government has in mind in relation to this act, and it is so submitted to this house.

Mr. Drew: Then we may take it that the government has no intention at the next session of the house of going beyond the amendments now put forward, so far as it can foresee?

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend's difficulty arises from the fact that in reading the letter of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act he saw there reference to points that were raised in discussion in the cabinet itself and which never got to the point of being government policy. Government policy which is involved today is the policy set out in this bill. With regard to what may or may not be done at some time in the future by this government, that is another matter entirely, but the government policy that is involved in this matter is set out in the bill.

Mr. Drew: Then we are left in the same difficulty in which we were before; we do not know what the government policy is in regard to this act.

Mr. Garson: It is right in the bill.

Mr. Drew: The minister has made it clear that he is not prepared to say that this bill at the moment represents the full statement made earlier in regard to this matter.

Mr. Garson: That is precisely what I do say, and in case there should be any misapprehension about it, let me repeat it. The bill which is before the house now was drafted on the basis of recommendations made by the combines investigation branch and considered in government council on more than one occasion; other provisions were considered and were, as forming part of this bill, rejected, and the bill now before the house does represent government policy.

An hon. Member: At the moment.

Mr. Drew: It is clear that this bill does represent government policy so far as it goes. Naturally we are not in position to know exactly what has taken place, and a great deal more has taken place than is disclosed by this correspondence. It is for that reason that I propose to introduce an amendment to this motion before the conclusion of my remarks.

Members of this house should know exactly what has taken place. The trouble is that we have had at least two different explanations for the government's action in not dealing with the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, which had so much to do with the recent resignation of that experienced official. It will be most helpful to the members of this house if they know what has been under discussion, because the explanations that have been given leave this house in great uncertainty as to what actually took place.

I submit that the motion to give this bill second reading now brings directly in issue in this house the circumstances which have brought the administration of the Combines Investigation Act so prominently to the attention of the people of Canada within these past few days.

In considering what changes, if any, should be made in the Combines Investigation Act, and in determining the procedure which should be followed in deciding what changes should be made, we must of necessity review the position taken by the government in regard to its responsibilities under the act. It is not enough that we examine the cold words of the act. It is also necessary that we examine the attitude of the government toward the enforcement of it, so that we may know how effective any amendment will be, or what further steps should be taken to prevent even this government from defying the law as passed by the parliament of Canada.

Any consideration of the act at this time would be meaningless unless the circumstances leading to the resignation of Mr. F. A. McGregor are carefully examined in every essential detail. A fundamentally important issue is raised by the action of the government following the delivery of Mr. McGregor's report which recommended the prosecution of a number of milling companies for what the commissioner regarded as breaches of the act. It does not seem to me that the question whether there was or was not a breach of the Combines Investigation Act, in the particular case to which I have referred, is really the fundamentally important issue before the house at the present time. The sequence of events is not disputed.

According to Mr. McGregor, the investigation of the alleged combine in the milling industry was started with the knowledge and approval of Mr. Ilsley, who was then minister of justice. So far as I am aware, that statement has not been challenged. If it is correct, then the investigation proceeded with the knowledge and approval of the minister to whom the commissioner is directly answerable. It is clear that the Department of Justice must have been aware at all times that the investigation was proceeding and approved what was being done so far as the conduct of the investigation was concerned.

Mr. McGregor completed his investigation and made his report to the Minister of Justice on December 29, 1948. Section 27 of the Combines Investigation Act leaves no doubt whatever as to what must then be done. It is not optional; it is mandatory. Subsection 5 of section 27 reads as follows:

> Any report of the commissioner or a special commissioner, other than an interim report or a report of a preliminary inquiry under section 13 of this act, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner states in writing to the minister that he believes the public interest would be better served by withholding publication, in which case the minister may decide whether the report, either in whole or in part, shall be made public.

There is no authority given to the minister to withhold publication of a report after fifteen days have elapsed unless the commissioner has expressed in writing to the minister his opinion that the interests of the public will best be served by withholding publication of it. Therefore, as of January 13 of this year, the Minister of Justice was in default as to a mandatory requirement of a law enacted by this parliament.

There may be a tendency on the part of some hon. members to think that the question of publication is a relatively unimportant detail. There may be a tendency on the part of some people to regard publication as merely a formality, and to think that the violation by the Minister of Justice of a law passed by this parliament, such violation being with the approval and decision of the government, is in itself a relatively unimportant matter. This is not the opinion that has been held by others; it is not the opinion that was held by the gentleman who preceded the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and whose opinions are so frequently cited with approval by members of the government. Publication was regarded as extremely important, and at all times it was emphasized that the publication of such reports was for the purpose of informing the public as to what had taken place, and of bringing to public attention those things which, by publication itself, might tend to prevent a repetition of the same events.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member has made it clear that it is his intention to revive the debate we had last Monday on this subject. It is a wholesome rule that there should not be two debates on the same subject during the same session. Most of what the hon. member has said so far was said last Monday by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and was followed by a lengthy and spirited debate which came to a conclusion just before eleven o'clock on that day. Under the rules of the house I take it that that concluded consideration of the matter for this session. I do not think it would be proper to allow a precedent to be set that the rule precluding repetition of the same debate in the same session should be disregarded.

Mr. McGregor: Just a little steam roller.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, this is not a revival of the debate introduced by a device employed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last Monday. This is a debate on a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act; and unless hon. members are free to discuss the only information they possess as to the way in which the government has administered this act, they will be called upon to decide this point without the opportunity of carrying on an effective debate at all. The introduction of a limited aspect of this subject, and the explanation given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce of his having imposed his views upon the Minister of Justice, in no way terminated the debate on the point now before us. I think it should be explained why it is so essential that we be free to examine the records that are before us. We have two distinctly different explanations.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I should like you to rule before the hon. member takes it for granted that what he says goes, without the necessity of any ruling from the chair.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to speak to the point of order raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), which I regard as one of the most serious points of order to have been raised during the time I have been in this house. Without quoting directly, the Prime Minister paraphrased the words found in May at page 316 of the thirteenth edition. Those words, of course, are quoted in various other volumes, but let us go back to May; he is the authority. The sentence the Prime Minister paraphrased reads:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded; and there would be little use in preventing the same question or bill from being offered twice in the same session, if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

Surely when one reads a sentence like that it is necessary to see it in its context. Please note that reference is made to the rule which prevents the same question or bill being offered twice in the same session. That rule is found in the same edition of May at page 292:

> It is a rule . . .

Please note that this is not a wholesome restraint; this is a rule, which is quite different.

> It is a rule, in both houses, which is essential to the due performance of their duties, that no question or bill shall be offered that is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

There is the rule. You cannot bring before the house again a question or a bill—and a question is a motion—on which the judgment of the house has been taken. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the question of the McGregor-Garson correspondence, the failure of the Minister of Justice to carry out the law, has not been officially before this house. Certainly the judgment of the house has not been taken on the matter. In support of my contention that the matter has not been before the house I remind you, sir, and members of the house, of the times without number we have been told that the official record of what goes on in this house is the Journals, not Hansard. Your Honour will remember making such rulings when you were chairman of the committee of the whole in the last parliament. As a matter of fact the ruling that has been given in that connection is well supported by citation 253 in Beauchesne, second edition:

> The Journals are prepared under the direction of the Clerk by an officer of experience called the clerk of journals. They are made up from the Clerk's scroll . . .

And please note these words:

> . . . and whenever any question arises as to any proceeding which has taken place, the Journals alone are held to be correct.

Reference has been made to the debate which, according to Hansard, took place in this house last Monday, November 7; but I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the Prime Minister to look at the Journals, in other words the Votes and Proceedings, for Monday, November 7. On page 211 you will find this entry:

> The order being read for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull): That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply, and on the proposed motion of Mr. Knowles in amendment thereto.

Then follow several paragraphs which constitute the ruling of Mr. Speaker, and the entry goes on:

> The house then resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull): That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of supply.
> And on the proposed motion of Mr. Knowles in amendment thereto: That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to make it possible for taxpayers to deduct trade union dues from income before computing the amount of income tax to be paid."
> And after still further debate, the question being put on the said proposed amendment, it was negatived on the following division:

Then appears the list of 48 yeas and 108 nays. The next entry is:

> And after further debate, the question being put on the main motion, it was agreed to, on division.

The main motion was that moved by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in the place of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for the house to go into committee of supply. I remind the Prime Minister and you, Mr. Speaker, of what I just read from citation 253 in Beauchesne, second edition, which is citation 169 in the third edition:

> . . . whenever any question arises as to any proceeding which has taken place, the Journals alone are held to be correct.

I have had an opportunity of discussing this matter from time to time with various officials of this house, both on the floor and outside; and we have been told time and time again—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is saying "hear, hear" because he was with me during one of those discussions. We have been told time and time again that what has happened in this house on any occasion is what is recorded in the Journals. Officially what was before us last Monday was, first, a motion to go into supply and, second, an amendment which I moved with respect to trade union dues. The judgment of the house was taken on those two propositions, first on my amendment and second on the motion to go into supply. The judgment of the house was not taken on the discussion initiated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the McGregor-Garson incident.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is not sufficient argument to indicate the complete impropriety of the point of order raised by the Prime Minister, I ask you to consider the precedents in the case. I confess I thought this question might be raised, and yet I could not believe it would be. Nevertheless, since one must be prepared for anything in this house, I thought it might be well to spend some time over the week end studying the whole question, and I did so. My study included looking up what has happened in the past, but before I cite precedents I would draw attention to citation 6 in Beauchesne, third edition:

> In the interpretation of the rules or standing orders the house is generally guided, not so much by the literal construction of the orders themselves as by the consideration of what has been the practice of the house with respect to them.

I point out that there is no rule or standing order supporting the contention put forward by the Prime Minister. Rather the rules and standing orders are the other way; but even if there were any citation on which the Prime Minister could draw, such as the first one I quoted from May, page 316, out of its context, you must apply to it the terms of citation 6, which I have just read, that the house is guided by consideration of what has been our practice in the past.

Hon. members will recall that, time and time again, grievances have been raised on the motion to go into supply. Usually they are raised by private members, but last Monday it was a minister. The important point is that permission to discuss these grievances again has been granted when the bill or resolution or the item in question was reached. Never in my experience has the discussion of a matter on a motion to go into supply, provided that no amendment was moved and the judgment of the house taken thereon, been the basis for preventing a discussion at a later stage. Just think for a moment of the significance of such a ruling if, by any chance, it were to be made. It would mean that from this moment forward, at any time that the government wanted to prevent discussion of a matter under difficult or embarrassing circumstances, a minister could discuss it briefly on the motion to go into supply, and the house would be prevented from discussing it thereafter; that would be the effect of such an unthinkable ruling.

May I now give some of the precedents which can be cited in support of my contention. If I am involved in some of them, it can be understood; because these are the ones of which I thought first when I started looking them up.

In the session of 1948, on the 19th of April, an order in council was passed which lowered the rate of interest and increased the cost of government annuities. The first opportunity of raising the question was on the motion to go into supply on April 27, 1948. There is a particular parallel between that case and this one, because on that occasion there was also before the house, on the motion to go into supply, an amendment moved by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with respect to freight rates. In order to raise the annuities question I had to wait until the judgment of the house had been taken on that amendment, even as last week the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had to wait until the judgment of the house had been taken on my amendment concerning trade union dues before he could discuss the McGregor report.

To go back to 1948, when the freight rates amendment had been disposed of, I raised the question of the government's action by order in council on April 19 which changed the rates on annuities, and I was followed by three or four other speakers, all protesting the action taken by order in council. This discussion appears in the 1948 Hansard at pages 3358 to 3371. Despite the fact that the question was raised on the motion to go into supply, and was discussed, but without taking the judgment of the house just as we discussed this matter on the motion to go into supply last Monday, when June 17 came and the government moved second reading of the bill to amend the annuities act—just as today the Minister of Justice is moving second reading of the bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act—after the motion was made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour I rose and once again protested the action of the government by order in council on April 19, even as I had done on the motion to go into supply on April 27. I was followed, on June 17, by Mr. Menary, then by our old friend Mr. MacNicol, the former member for Davenport, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member could shorten his remarks by merely giving the references, and I could then look them up.

Mr. Knowles: I am prepared to do that. May I emphasize the point that, on that day, approximately seven or eight members were permitted to speak on the second reading of the bill. The question discussed was not the subject of an amendment in the bill; it related to the administration of the act, and in particular the action taken by order in council on April 19. There was no question about this discussion being in order.

Another occasion was that of the change in government policy with respect to Trans-Canada Air Lines flying the Pacific. On May 10, 1948, I raised this question on the motion to go into supply, after asking several questions on the orders of the day. The discussion will be found on pages 3803 to 3805 of Hansard. That did not prevent us, however, from discussing the matter again on May 17, 1948, as appears from pages 4022 to 4025 of Hansard for that year, 1948.

May I remind hon. members of another well-remembered case which had to do with flood conditions in British Columbia a year and a half ago. On May 31 that matter was brought up by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on a motion to go into supply, as appears from page 4592 of Hansard. After the debate ended, the motion carried. On June 14 a new motion to go into supply was before the house, and the same question was raised by the member who now represents Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). This discussion is recorded at page 5203 of Hansard, and the motion was passed. On June 21 another new motion to go into supply was before the house, and on that occasion, as recorded at page 5586, the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) introduced the subject. At neither of these subsequent points was it ruled that the matter could not be discussed again because it was discussed on a previous motion to go into supply.

Another interesting case can be found back in 1941—I have not the page numbers of Hansard for the 1941 case, but it is recorded at the end of volume II and the beginning of volume III. The motion to go into supply was amended by the former member for Haldimand, Mr. Senn, and a lengthy debate ensued on the amendment. The amendment was proposed on March 26, and the debate was still in progress as late as April 7. It was the general desire of the house to get into committee of supply, so it was agreed that the member be permitted to withdraw his amendment. He withdrew the amendment on April 7 to permit the house to go into committee of supply, and on the next day, April 8, the member for Lake Centre was permitted to move the same amendment and reopen the question, on the theory that in the previous debate there had been no decision because the amendment had been withdrawn. In other words, the judgment of the house had not been taken.

Something of a precedent has already been set in this session. In the course of his remarks on the address, the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) had something to say about the pipe line which is going into Wisconsin instead of to the lakehead. Later, on October 4, as appears on page 519 of Hansard, on a motion to go into supply the member for Vancouver-Quadra raised the question again. But even though the question had thus been raised on the motion to go into supply, that did not prevent the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) from discussing the subject when he spoke on the budget on November 1, as recorded at page 1327 of Hansard.

Members of this house who have been here for some time know that repeatedly, on a motion to go into supply, members have raised such questions as veterans affairs, housing, old age pensions, Prairie Farm Assistance Act, Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, unemployment—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may complete his remarks, but I think he should just give his references.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that the point of order which the Prime Minister has raised is one of the most important that has been raised on the floor of this house, but since it is one o'clock—

Mr. Speaker: I should like to hear the conclusion of the hon. member's remarks so that I can give my ruling when the house resumes.

Mr. Knowles: All right. I am prepared to conclude my remarks.

I have no doubt that the references I have produced and my general statement will refresh the memory of members, and make it clear that there is no question as to the practice of parliament, and our rights in this matter. It would be a most serious abridgment of the rights of free speech in this parliament if this ancient doctrine of the right to raise grievances on the motion to go into supply were used as a means to prevent discussion at a later stage.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you are faced with one of the most important decisions since you have assumed the high office you now hold. I am sure you will make the right decision.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to make certain representations on this subject. Particularly, sir, I should like to draw your attention—

Some hon. Members: It is one o'clock.

Mr. Drew: If a ruling is to be made when we resume, the representations should be made now. I was going to make a brief representation myself. I said nothing about the rule, because, to be quite frank, I did not think the objection was being raised seriously. I do wish to make a reference to the rule itself, which answers the question. If a decision is to be made at three o'clock, I would hope that any representations that are to be made will be made before we rise.

Mr. Speaker: With the consent of the house I shall hear representations now from the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Some hon. Members: No. It is one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to give the hon. member the opportunity of making representations with regard to this matter. On the other hand I should like, if possible, to give the decision at three o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would not wish to have it suggested that I am now discussing the issue before you; but I should like to point out that I concur in what has already been said, that this is one of the most important issues in the matter of procedure that has come before the house. So far as a ruling is concerned, I do not think any hon. member should be curtailed in his discussion of the matter, because I agree that the effect would be most serious. You should have before you, sir, before a decision is made, all the representations that any hon. members may wish to make. From what has been indicated it would seem to me that these representations cannot be heard in a few minutes.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there are one or two references I should like to add to those already made in what I may be permitted to call the exceptionally able argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

He pointed out that Hansard is not an official report. That had already been dealt with by Your Honour in Hansard of March 18, 1949, page 1611. On that occasion you, sir, were Deputy Speaker, and as chairman in committee you mentioned Hansard and said, among other things:

> I happen to have before me a copy of the Hansard of the British house, dated February 16, 1949, where Mr. Speaker in making a ruling stated: "I think the right hon. and gallant gentleman said that it was a mistake in the official report. Hansard is not an official report."

Then you went on to quote from the report of what took place in the House of Commons on February 16, 1949, at page 1146. I am not going to read what was said on that occasion, except to point out and to summarize it by stating that the Speaker of the British House of Commons declared and decided that Hansard was not an official report. Of course Hansard is not an official report in the courts of law, either, where only the Journals are accepted.

There is further reference to the same point to be found in the parliamentary debates of the United Kingdom for August 3, 1944, page 1607, where the Speaker said as follows:

> Hansard is really unofficial as far as division lists are concerned.

In that instance someone had raised the objection that his name had been omitted from Hansard.

Now I come to the point tentatively suggested for your consideration Mr. Speaker, by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He advanced it without argument and more or less, as I saw it, as a question, without pressing too strongly the citation to which he referred. I would say this, that the Journals of the house show that no decision was made on November 7, except in so far as the motion to go into supply was concerned, and the amendment to that motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I think one way to find out whether or not what took place from the discussion on November 7 could be referred to would be to reduce the situation to its ultimate conclusion. Citation 345 in Beauchesne's third edition states:

> The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada by the provision of standing order 49 that the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair can be amended; and the amendments need not be relevant but may relate to every question connected with public administration.

Then a little later on it says this:

> Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair without any amendment being proposed; but once debate is stopped on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former.

In the event that a minister of the crown did not desire a discussion to take place on a matter of interest to the people of Canada, all he would have to do would be to rise in his place in the house when the motion was made that the Speaker do now leave the chair, and have an amendment and a subamendment proposed. That would deny any further amendment or subamendment. Having done that he would rise in his place and speak for one or two minutes on the matter in question; and after he had spoken, another member would rise and begin to deal with a different matter, which during that session would end the discussion of the matter raised by the first member.

Mr. St. Laurent: If an amendment or subamendment had been moved it would have to be disposed of by decision of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; once there is a motion, an amendment and a subamendment, there can be no further subamendment. When a subamendment is moved, a person who does not wish to have a discussion of any subject—and it could come from this side as well as the other—would simply rise in his place and for a moment make an explanation, and then he would have somebody immediately follow him, dealing with some other subject. That would end for that session any further discussion.

This would lead to a position wherein parliament would indeed be throttled and its voice be silenced at the wish of one or two members in the house. I submit that the very fact that that would be the result indicates why it is there are no authorities I can find that will support the view that, when a matter is merely raised and no motion or amendment is based thereupon, the fact that something is referred to denies further discussion.

During the noon recess I looked up the first reference to be found in May in this matter. It is to be found in Commons Journals, volume 113, 1857 and 1858, page 65. This motion arose under the following circumstances: There was a controversy at the time regarding foreign affairs, in which the government of the day was desirous of not having any discussion. A motion was made, and a bill to meet the particular facts of the case was introduced. There had been a discussion of the subject during the preceding week, as will be seen in British Hansard for February 11, 12 and 13. On February 19 a motion was made by the government, and an amendment moved covering matters that had been discussed but not decided upon during the preceding week. The question being proposed, no exception was taken to it, and it was an amendment that had the result of defeating the then government. That is how serious the amendment was on that occasion. Yet no question was raised that because some casual discussion had taken place the week before, without decision, that fact would deny further discussion.

Mr. Pouliot: Please do not be too technical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That admonition is aimed in the wrong direction. I suggest that when one realizes the effect in this and in any other case in parliament of a mere reference to a matter discussed by one or other members, without any motion or amendment based thereon denying further discussion, then it must be realized that so far as parliament is concerned many matters discussed regularly would be denied discussion by the simple expedient of casual reference by one or other members in the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone would suggest that casual reference to a subject arising during the course of the debate on the address, or the debate on the budget, or the debate on the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair, would preclude further discussion. It is always a question of substance. Has there been a substantive debate on the matter, or has there not been such a debate? It may very well be that, where the motion is for the Speaker to leave the chair, no subject introduced by a member of the government could be regarded as an introduction of a subject for decision, because the question for decision is whether the Speaker shall leave the chair or not.

Hon. members will realize it has frequently happened in this house—I think the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is a good reminder—that there have been repetitious debates on the same matter. I raised the question this morning, for the Speaker to decide, whether or not we are to have regard to the substantive rule that matters shall not be twice debated on their merits at the same session.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the rule to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has referred itself answers the argument whether or not this matter has been disposed of in such a way as to preclude further debate on the same subject. The relevant citation reads:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session, if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

In the first place, may I point out that no question has been presented to this house in regard to the Combines Investigation Act or the subject matter of the statement introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last Monday on the motion to go into supply. In the second place, there was no debate on the Combines Investigation Act, the circumstances related to Mr. McGregor's resignation, the violation of this law by the government, or any related subject, which was actually concluded.

The reason for this rule is so obvious that it needs little elaboration. If the members of this house deal with a motion which brings before the house arguments on both sides and then make their decision, it must certainly seem to be, not only a wholesome restraint but a very common-sense limitation upon the time to be taken in a particular debate to say that that same debate must not be revived. This debate was not on the Combines Investigation Act, on the administration of that act, or on the breach of the law by the government.

There was a motion to go into supply. There was an amendment to that motion. Availing himself of the opportunity to use such a motion to introduce the subject—I do not question the fact that that practice is established—the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt to a limited extent with a particular aspect of the problem now before the house. May I point out what the difficulty would be if a ruling were made that the debate is limited by what occurred on Monday. Reference was made to the Combines Investigation Act and to action taken under that act. Does this mean that we cannot discuss it at all? If so, the explanation of the Minister of Justice, and everything else that has been said, is out of order.

At what point does the knife fall? At what point does the iron curtain descend? Unless it is possible at the same time to say just how far this limitation goes, then the limitation extends over the whole field of discussion of the Combines Investigation Act. All that this house has had in regard to this matter is a statement, presented on a motion that had nothing directly to do with it, in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave his understanding of the action that had been taken, which incidentally is in conflict with the explanation given by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Rowe: He did as he was told.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes; he did as he was told. The point that I now raise is that if any such ruling as this were made, not only would it be an easy device for effectively preventing debate on what might be regarded as a subject that the government did not wish to discuss; there would also be a never-never land created in which no one could tell exactly at what point the debate would be permitted to extend and where it might not.

The statement to which reference has been made was simply a limited statement as to the broad point of view in regard to what had occurred. I fail to see how any hon. member of this house could possibly determine at what point he would be infringing upon the restriction suggested by citation 245 if it were ruled that what has taken place on the motion to go into supply can be regarded as a limitation upon further discussion of that subject although there was no conclusion.

Again I emphasize this point. The rule is that you cannot revive a debate already concluded, but no debate on any aspect of the Combines Investigation Act has been concluded, or upon the conduct of any minister or any official of this government. There is the provision that there shall not be a revival of a debate upon the same question. Subject is one thing; question is another. "Question" implies that there was an opportunity for the members to deal with the question before them. They did not have that opportunity in the motion before the house last Monday, and, therefore, within the actual wording of citation 245, I submit that nothing has occurred which limits full discussion of any aspect of what has already been mentioned in this house.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, before you rise to give your ruling may I draw your attention to a few facts which are not without importance.

In the first place, this is not a question of parliamentary procedure, because there is no standing order on the matter. This is purely a question of parliamentary practice. As there are no precedents that apply to this case, you will have to use your good sense, your experience and your sound judgment to give a ruling that will satisfy the mind of every one of my hon. colleagues.

The debate on the point of order has been on a high plane. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made a learned speech, but he spoke Greek, to me. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) made a scientific speech but he spoke Hebrew. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was too technical, and he spoke either Latin or Armenian. I do not know which. We must approach the matter from the point of view of reason in order that the Chair may give a ruling that will serve not only for this occasion but for the future. The main thing is to know what is meant by a revival of debate. No one has defined it. It is up to you, Mr. Speaker, to say what is a revival of debate. How often, when points of order are debated, do I realize that hon. members take definitions for granted. There is no standing order to cover what is a revival of debate. We have no precedent, and yet we talk about it as if we all knew what it is. Please tell us in your ruling, Mr. Speaker, what is a revival of debate.

The second point is that none of the opposition members who have spoken have shown the relation that exists between a debate on the McGregor report and a debate on the amending bill. If there is no relation, then there is no revival of debate. If there is some relation there might be a revival of debate, or the McGregor incident might be considered as an interlude between the first and second readings of the bill. I should like any member of the opposition, or any other member of the house, to tell me what the relation is, if any, existing between the McGregor report and the debate on the second reading of the amendments to the combines legislation. Relying on your sense of justice, experience, and fair play, Mr. Speaker, I leave it to you to make a decision that will be memorable in the annals of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard many representations. If there are any references which have not been given previously I will hear them, but I think any further remarks might be repetitious.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have a matter that has not been mentioned before.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member mention it briefly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Citation 488 of Beauchesne, second edition, 1927, reads:

> Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, the motion "that the Speaker do now leave the chair" must be proposed, except in cases provided by standing order 28. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance, and it is not necessary to move an amendment for that purpose; provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

The present bill was introduced on November 4, and I humbly submit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was out of order when he discussed the matter on Monday last.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I am suspicious of too many words because they are sometimes used to bury a subject. I think the question is a simple one, and it rests wholly on this point. Is a member or a supporter of the government, by the introduction of a subject on the motion to go into supply, going to prevent any further discussion on that subject during the same session? If that should be your ruling, it is the end of free debate in the house. That is the point I wish to make. I do not know whether, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) raised the question last Monday, he had that purpose in mind, but if your ruling today is that any discussion on this subject is out of order that will be the result.

Mr. Speaker: May I, at the outset, thank hon. members for the extended and helpful observations they have made on this important matter. I have allowed a full and unrestricted debate on the point of order because I realize it is a very important one, and I think the house is most anxious that I should have all the pertinent citations before me when giving my ruling.

After the order of the day has been read for the second reading of a bill or otherwise, the remarks of members must be "strictly relevant to the business under consideration." (Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, citation 140).

The "business under consideration" on the second reading of a bill is the principle of the bill. Members must accordingly confine themselves to a discussion of that principle and must refrain from introducing or referring to extraneous matters. (Bourinot, Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 509). The words which I am about to utter refer directly to this bill.

On the second reading of an amending bill —hon. members will notice that this is an amending bill—it is the principle of the amending bill, and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration." The discussion must therefore relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill. If, for example, a bill were introduced to amend a certain section of the Criminal Code of Canada, the discussion would have to relate to the principle of the particular amendment. It would be irregular to enter upon a general discussion of the Criminal Code as a whole. See Blackmore's Speakers' (Denison's and Brand's) Decisions, 1857-84, at page 70.

The principle of the present bill, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, is that it is desirable to facilitate the enforcement of that act by providing for the institution of proceedings by the Attorney General of Canada, by eliminating jury trials where corporations are charged with offences under the act, and by modifying and clarifying the applicable rules of evidence. The present discussion should accordingly relate exclusively to this principle. It is not in order to discuss the principle of the Combines Investigation Act itself, or to discuss clauses of that act, or other matters, not clearly related to the principle of the amending bill.

It seems clear that a renewed general discussion of the McGregor report, a debate on which took place on November 7 on the motion to go into supply, is not in order on the motion for the second reading of this bill, because the discussion must relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill.

Most of the discussion on the point of order has turned on citation 245, Beauchesne, third edition, which restates a passage from May's fourteenth edition, and reads as follows:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

I am of the opinion that this citation would not preclude all reference to matters dealt with during the earlier debate on the motion to go into supply so long as the reference can be shown to relate clearly to the principle of the amending bill now before the house. In reaching this conclusion I have also been conscious of the fact that the matter of the McGregor report was raised on the motion to go into supply as the result of a ministerial statement, and not by a private member raising a grievance or speaking in opposition to the motion. This being so it would seem inequitable to rule out of order all reference to the matters dealt with at that time.

On the other hand, it seems to me there are many aspects of the McGregor report which bear no relation to the bill before the house, and the discussion of which would not be in order on the motion for second reading. Nevertheless, in view of all the circumstances connected with the present debate, I think some reasonable leeway should be allowed. I refer to May, 14th edition, at page 497:

> Debate on the stages of a bill should be confined to the bill, and should not be extended to a criticism of administration . . . but the Speaker remarked, when called upon to enforce this rule, that on many such occasions some licence was conceded to hon. members who addressed the house; and the rule is occasionally relaxed.

Accordingly I am inclined to think that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) should be permitted to proceed. In saying this, however, I should like to express the hope that all hon. members will bear in mind the necessity of discussing the principle of the bill, so that it may not be necessary for the Chair to qualify the indulgence which has been granted.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, at the time the discussion arose in regard to the point of order I was referring to the views which have been expressed by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King in regard to the importance of publicity and its effect in dealing with this subject. Because of the fact that during the greater part of the time the present act has been in force he was Prime Minister of Canada, I should like to read into the record his remarks appearing at page 746 of Hansard for February 2, 1948, to indicate what he had to say as to the importance of the publication of reports. In doing so I recognize that this subject also has been discussed in a more limited way in the exchange of correspondence which was tabled here last Monday. This is what Mr. Mackenzie King had to say:

> May I say that this desire to find the facts, making that the basic duty of the committee, is founded upon the very sound philosophy that in the cure of what one might call social wrongs or anti-social evils, those anti-social acts which adversely affect the great masses of the people in their individual lives and homes, publicity in regard to the facts is a much more effective remedy than penalty.
> Whatever men may be in their individual lives, there is nothing they abhor more, if they have been guilty of any meanness or taken any undue advantage of their fellowmen, than to have that meanness exposed in public. In regard to this class of social wrong I believe that if there are people to-day in Canada who are hoarding where they should be selling, and if there are others who are profiteering where they should be glad to do what is fair, such people will quickly take notice of the fact that this House of Commons has appointed a committee which can go into any single phase of this problem and bring individuals from any part of the country to answer for situations in which they may be involved.
> I for one firmly believe in the power of publicity when based on facts. Public opinion plays a very large part in determining the course of events and the conduct of human beings. However, if public opinion is to be effective and to be of national service, it is very important that opinion be fully and clearly informed. The trouble with the situation to-day is that there is not sufficient knowledge of the facts to enable public opinion to be formed intelligently.

I end the quotation there because I believe what was said on that occasion has a very direct bearing on the view that has been expressed here, that there should be more information in regard to certain facts. As far as the present bill is concerned, it makes certain limited proposals. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has given his reasons for the amendments he is proposing. He has suggested that those constitute only part of what had been discussed as a result of the recommendations of the combines investigation branch.

The reason for emphasizing what has taken place is this. In deciding what course should now be followed, it is essential that we recognize exactly what has been done already under the act as it stands. In order that there may be no suggestion that a review of this point will not be relevant to the subject matter in question, I indicated that I proposed to move an amendment that this whole matter be referred to an appropriate committee in order that further information might be obtained. If hon. members are to form an accurate judgment as to whether or not there is reason to place this question before a committee, it is essential that they examine what actually took place. Whether or not the report was correct in its conclusions, whether the commissioner may have overlooked some facts which should have been taken into consideration, or whether the report itself failed to show what the government regarded as adequate reasons for proceeding under the act, all have no bearing whatever upon the mandatory requirement that the report shall be published by the minister. In his letter of November 4 to Mr. McGregor the Minister of Justice gave this explanation for his failure to publish the report:

> The government therefore took the responsibility of withholding publication of your report pending the amendment of the Combines Investigation Act to cure the difficulties created by the dental supplies judgment.

That reference can only be to the amendments now before us; therefore these very amendments bring directly into consideration the withholding of this report and the reasons for doing so. The government, through the Minister of Justice, was asked upon what authority it relied when it made its decision not to act under section 27, subsection 5, of the Combines Investigation Act. To this direct question the Minister of Justice is reported at page 1524 of Hansard as saying:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, it relied upon the fact that any democratic government is answerable to the people of the country for its acts.

That statement, Mr. Speaker, is a challenge to our whole system of responsible government. It implies that the government has the right to make its decisions and then withhold any knowledge of those decisions as long as it sees fit. Then, at some future date, the government can let the public decide what they think about the limited information they have in regard to what took place. That is not our system. Our system is clear. The members are responsible to the people and the government is responsible to parliament. It is essential that we bear that in mind in reviewing what has taken place.

This report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act was delivered to the Department of Justice on December 29, 1948. The act required that the minister publish that report within fifteen days. It should have been published, therefore, by January 13. This house met on January 26. Assuming that the minister felt there might be good reasons for withholding publication, and that he thought he was justified in doing so, then at least it was his bounden duty to explain to the house as soon as it met that he had taken this course. This would have enabled parliament, to which the government is answerable, to express its opinion on that decision without delay. That was not done. There was no hint that this report was being suppressed. On the contrary the fact that the government continued to withhold any action, and that it did withhold this report until more than two years after the alleged offences had been committed, has perhaps resulted in the further fact that, no matter what case may be made by the report, no action can be taken. However, that is another subject.

Once again, might I emphasize that we are not called upon to pass upon the findings of the commissioner in determining the correctness or otherwise of the actions of the government in this case. What every member of this house should be concerned about is the unquestioned violation of the act by the Minister of Justice, and his unexplained failure to place this whole subject before the House of Commons after it met last January. If the facts were so clear, why was this whole question not placed before parliament at that time? Could there be the slightest doubt in the mind of any hon. member as to the real reason for suppressing this information? In explaining the violation of the act last Monday, the Minister of Justice said the government relied, as I have said before, upon the fact that it is answerable to the people. The government took extremely effective steps to see that the people had no knowledge of this matter when the people did have a chance to express their opinion.

These words of the Minister of Justice disclose a state of mind which makes this incident more serious than it already appeared to be. The government broke the law; there can be no dispute about that. Asked for an explanation, the Minister of Justice blandly replies, in effect, that the government is answerable, not to parliament but to the people at such time as they have a chance of expressing their opinion. This raises a far more serious issue than the violation of the Combines Investigation Act by the government, serious though that is. It is doubtful whether hon. members have been confronted with so serious a fundamental issue since confederation. The law which has been violated by the government was a law passed by parliament. It is all very well for the Minister of Justice to smile, but the very fact that he smiles indicates how careless some members of the government have become about the constitutional practices upon which the survival of our system will ultimately depend.

One of the suggestions put forward in regard to this act and to the problems raised is that the act itself would be the basis upon which companies that had been doing a public service might be pilloried. In view of the fact that certain amendments are under discussion, necessarily the whole act is under consideration at the same time. It would be well to go back to the speech with which the present act was introduced in 1923. On May 7, 1923, the then Prime Minister emphasized something that seems to be overlooked by those who feel that the terms of the act may be unduly harsh. At page 2520 of Hansard of that date, Mr. Mackenzie King is reported as follows:

> I notice that many of the newspapers of the country have reported that the government is endeavouring by this legislation to legislate against combines as such, to legislate against the right of manufacturers or merchants to fix a resale price. There is nothing of the kind in the legislation. As a matter of fact, it proceeds from a diametrically opposite point of view. I explained that, I think, pretty fully at the time of introducing the bill. It proceeds broadly on the theory that in this age of commercial and industrial competition, not merely between industry and industry and locality and locality, between the industries of one province and those of another, but between the industries of one country and those of another, the industries, one might almost say, of one continent and those of another, large combinations of capital, organizations of business in a large way, are an absolute essential if the business of our country is to hold its own in competition with the business of other countries. But just because it is recognized that it is necessary to have these large organizations of business, so the government recognizes that some restraint must be placed on the possible abuse of great power which may come into their hands.

It was for the purpose of restraining such possible abuses that this act was introduced. The act does not make every combine a law breaker, but the act prohibits only such combinations as are likely to operate to the detriment or against the interests of the public. Section 498 of the Criminal Code, which has been referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), deals with the same subject, and also contains a similar limitation upon its effect because it provides that there is an offence only if there is an undue limitation of competition. What is undue or what is contrary to the public interest is for the courts to determine.

This matter is one which has been brought before the house by the exchange of correspondence. One of the things which hon. members should bear in mind is what was said by Mr. McGregor in his memorandum accompanying his letter to the Minister of Justice. I quote from the second page of his memorandum:

> There is greater need now for strong action under the combines act than there has been at any time in the past twenty-five years. To an alarming degree price fixing activities such as we reported in the flour milling industry have been developing in the post-war years; some of them originated in the war period; and some were started, as in the flour milling industry, even in the pre-war years. To meet the situation, to prevent these practices which are designed to limit or eliminate the public safeguard of price competition, there is every reason why the powers of the combines act should be strengthened. Council accepted in the present bill our proposals of three amendments, including a very important amendment designed to meet the difficulties of the dental judgment; but the only suggestions from the council which you called on me to consider seriously were provisions which would have had the result of limiting the effectiveness of the legislation.
> I have in mind such proposals as those to eliminate the commissioner's initiative in launching inquiries, to place serious limitations on the requirement that reports be made public, and to provide for exemption, after prior approval, of certain types of agreements to restrict production or eliminate price competition. These suggestions have not been included in the present bill, but my understanding from you is that consideration of them has been merely postponed pending a proposed "overhauling" of the act. Overhauling of the act could serve many useful purposes. I am apprehensive, however, particularly in view of the nature of the changes which have been suggested for consideration, of the ultimate result of any revision of the statute which would include changes along these or similar lines.

Since this is a statement of the commissioner under the combines act it is of the utmost importance that hon. members know whether it does correctly interpret the situation which exists, because an understanding of that is essential if a sound decision is to be made in regard to the issue which is now before the house.

One thing, of course, that is always in the minds of hon. members when a matter of this kind is under discussion is what the position of the government is in regard to the numbers of hon. members who support it. The challenge that is now before the house is not merely as great a challenge to members of the opposition as it is a challenge to every member of the party who supports the government to reassert the responsibility of parliament on this occasion. After all, if the members of any party are simply to vote in accordance with the place where their names are included in the list of members of this house then it will be quite unnecessary to attend. The government could introduce its legislation and the vote could be taken on the basis of the numbers of members here, and the result would be in accordance with practice of that kind.

Our whole system has been based upon the assertion of members of every party of the basic principles of our parliamentary system. Certainly the government has a great majority, but let us remember that there has hardly been a time in the history of parliaments when the government was not reasonably assured of a majority in the house when it presented legislation. That is not the basis upon which debate proceeds. Debate proceeds on the assumption that hon. members will give it their consideration and vote in accordance with the reasons that are put forward and with the needs of the people of this country and the best interests of Canada as a whole. If our parliamentary system is in jeopardy, then those who have the greatest responsibility are those who constitute the majority. The greater the power the greater the responsibility, and in this case that responsibility is very heavy indeed.

I propose to move an amendment, Mr. Speaker, which will make it possible for hon. members to deal with it with the kind of information which they should have. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to send for persons, papers and records and that in addition to other recommendations with respect to the subject matter of the said bill they shall also have power to report upon the extent to which the effective administration of legislation relating to restrictive trade practices has been, or is being, prejudiced by the action of the government in failing to carry out the mandatory requirements of the existing law.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): This is an important debate from a number of points of view, not the least being the situation under which this matter was brought into the House of Commons. May I just summarize. Less than two weeks ago I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) a question as to whether a report had been made on the flour milling industry. He said that he would answer the question the next day. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), asked whether the commissioner under the act had resigned. The same answer was given. The next day we learned that a report had been made and that the commissioner had resigned. It was then we were told that this particular bill would be introduced to amend the Combines Investigation Act. It is safe to say that at least the introduction of this amending bill was expedited by the questions that were asked in the house, and that brought to light both the resignation of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act and the fact that the report had been suppressed.

I want to say to the government and to hon. members that when the government took upon itself—and let us remember that the minister acted after having received advice from the government regarding this matter—to suppress the report it violated one of the fundamental principles of our parliamentary democracy. I have no recollection of anything of the kind being done in the course of our parliamentary history in Canada; but I would remind hon. members that in 1649 an English king was beheaded because he did exactly what the government has done in this connection. I would remind hon. gentlemen that in 1688-89 another king, James II, was compelled to vacate the British throne for doing precisely what the government has done in this connection.

While there are several of them, there are at least two basic documents upon which not only our own parliamentary democracy but the democracies of the United States and of all other English-speaking democracies are based—Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights.

The Bill of Rights was introduced into the British House of Commons in 1689. After reciting their grievances this is what it sets out in the very first two clauses:

> And thereupon the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, pursuant to their respective letters and elections, being now assembled in a full and free representation of this nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid, do in the first place (as their ancestors in like case have usually done) for the vindicating and asserting their ancient right and liberties, declare:
> 1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament is illegal.
> 2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.

I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that that is precisely what happened in connection with this report, namely that the government exercised a pretended power of dispensing with the execution of a law, a statute, passed by this parliament. And, having assumed that power, it exercised the power illegally.

Then, in our own parliamentary history, in 1873 in the House of Commons the Hon. Edward Blake, who I believe in those days was a member of the Liberal party, said this:

> It makes no difference to a free people whether their rights are invaded by the crown—

That is, by regal authority—

> —or by the cabinet; what is material is to secure that they shall not be invaded at all.

I say in this connection that while we will support the amendment offered by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) I regret that it is in the terms in which it is. I think what we should be doing in this house in the discussion this afternoon is moving a vote of censure of the government, and asserting our right as a parliament to discipline the government for the breaking of the law of this land.

However, we will support the amendment offered by the leader of the official opposition. As I have said, this matter is much more grave than appears on the surface, if we allow what has happened to go without complaint. If we allow the cabinet to usurp the rights of this parliament, to set aside acts of parliament and to neglect to fulfil and to execute the statutes of this parliament, we are jeopardizing the whole parliamentary system as we have known it throughout the years.

Let me say at the very outset that to my mind this is the fundamental issue in the debate. It is true that we are discussing amendments to an act on our statute books. But what use is it to discuss amendments to any act of parliament if the government arrogates to itself the right to set aside acts of parliament? What guarantee have we that these amendments now before the house will not be treated lightly by the government of this country? And I say to the Liberal majority in the house that if they are true to the principles of Liberalism they should be repeating what we have been saying in the house today, and what we said on that former occasion a short time ago when the matter was before the house.

And so, while we welcome these amendments, we feel the house should have had an opportunity of expressing itself with regard to the suppression of the report, to which reference has been made this afternoon. And I say this, that whether it was deliberate or not, the manner in which the previous debate was instituted the other afternoon precluded the possibility of the opposition—or indeed any member in the house—calling upon the house to make an effective protest by way of a vote. That prevented a discussion—and I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling today was such that it does not rule out entirely references to the grave matters to which I have just referred.

This also I wish to say, that the party I have the privilege of leading in the house has always been keenly interested in this particular type of legislation. From time to time we have raised the question of the growing trustification of this country, of the participation of powerful interests in Canada in international cartels. Sometimes we have felt that very little attention was being paid by some hon. members to these matters, and that very little care was being exercised in connection with them.

I say I am glad this legislation has been introduced, because two years ago within a couple of weeks, after a conversation with the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who was then secretary of state for external affairs, I wrote him a letter which I wish now to bring to the attention of the house to indicate how interested we have been over the years in these matters. I shall quote the material part of this letter dated at Ottawa December 4, 1947, as follows:

As far as I have been able to find out, there appear to be both price agreements and monopolies, which I readily admit are rather difficult to detect, but which, from all appearances, certainly exist and should be investigated.

My fear is that our legislation regarding the control of monopolies, is inadequate, and the needs of the present situation far beyond the scope of our present staff, which is much too small.

However, my opinion is that monopolies, in various degrees, exist in aluminum, cement, our principal chemicals, in rayon yarn, in the production of steel rails, and, of course, in nickel, lead, some iron and steel products, and some non-ferrous metal products.

As to price agreements, I think it is pretty well known that, where there is any competition in fertilizers, price agreements exist. It was well established—although an appeal, owing to the death of the judge, was not made—that the tobacco products are subject to price agreements and price fixing; also it was established that rubber footwear and the principal leather industries have agreements regarding prices, and that there are large areas of plumbing and heating equipment and hardware products in which there are price agreements.

You will recollect too, that the moving picture industry was acquitted on technical grounds of combination in 1931.

Price spreads investigation made some disclosures regarding the manner in which live stock prices appeared to be agreed upon each day, by Canada Packers and Swift Canadian. In the opinion of persons who have had personal experience with these two companies, and whom I know well, these practices continued after the investigation, and may still continue. In any event, these seem to be operations into which investigation is warranted.

Early in the 1920's, the fruit wholesale monopoly was investigated by, I believe, the Duncan commission, and certain disturbing facts were established. As lately as 1939, a combine was reported by the commissioner, in the wholesaling of fruits and vegetables in western Canada. Again, the action failed on—what appeared to be—highly technical grounds, and there was no appeal.

In view, however, of the recent increases in prices, I should think that immediate fields for an investigation might be fertilizers, canned goods, textiles, rubber footwear, and, I would include, farm implements—about which a parliamentary committee made a report in 1937.

I realize that this is a pretty formidable list, but I do not think that, even then, it is exhaustive. In my opinion, Canadian industry has become more and more under the domination of monopolies, and more and more guilty of price fixing; in other words, I believe that competition in many major lines of endeavour is non-existent.

I thought I would read that letter lest it be said that we are taking advantage of the introduction of this legislation to talk about combines without having suggested anything in regard to meeting this situation from time to time. As I said in that letter two years ago, the legislation we have had on the statute books has been inadequate and we welcome the amendments that have been introduced. However, in voting, as I expect we shall do, to refer the subject matter to a committee of this house, we are not in any way trying to delay the passage of this measure. Arising out of the meetings of that committee might conceivably come recommendations for the further strengthening of the Combines Investigation Act. However, much as I welcome these amendments, I do not think they are exhaustive by any means.

As I have said for years, Canadian industries have been subject to the control of powerful nation-wide monopolies and combinations. The competitive system upon which the free enterprise system, as my hon. friends like to call the present system, relies has been quite largely destroyed in our country. If we accept the definition that competition involves primarily competition in price among manufacturers and producers, then I submit that there is no competition at all in major sectors of our national economy.

I learned from the classical economists, which I used to study years ago and which I occasionally read from time to time, that the very basis of regulation in an unplanned or free enterprise system, such as was defended and indeed visualized in the early years of this and the last century by the economists of the capitalist era, is that each manufacturer or producer decides independently of all other manufacturers or producers of the same class what the selling price of his article shall be. That was a classical definition.

The fact that we have manufacturers producing the same type of article competing and advertising for sales does not involve real competition in price which, as I have said, must be present if we accept the classical position as the basis for competition in a free enterprise or capitalist system. The feature of the Canadian economy today which has been developed since the early days of the present century is that few producers or manufacturers of basic commodities have survived. The number has been whittled down until it can be said that just a handful of manufacturers dealing with a particular commodity—this is illustrated in the report of the flour milling industry that has been placed before the house—have succeeded in occupying a monopoly position where they get together and decide that there will be no competition in prices.

This is particularly true in certain of our great industries. For example, in oil we have Imperial Oil. In the chemical industry we have Canadian Industries Limited. The same applies to the iron and steel industry. In the case of farm implements it was shown conclusively before the parliamentary committee which sat in 1936 and 1937, as it was shown before the Saskatchewan legislative committee and before a committee of the congress of the United States, that the farm implement business was dominated by two great companies, International Harvester and John Deere. We all should know the story of cement in this country where Canada Cement has a complete monopoly. The brewing and hard liquor industries are in the same position. The hard liquor industry is monopolized by one, two or three firms. While there may be more than two or three firms in the brewing industry, price levels are maintained.

The reports by the investigators under the Combines Investigation Act have shown conclusively that price agreements eliminating price competition have been arrived at. We have reports before us dealing with dental supplies, bread baking, optical goods, tobacco, fruits and so on, while parliamentary and legislative committees, as I have pointed out, have shown that the same sort of thing is to be found in the field of farm implements. The situation revealed in western Canada in connection with the bread baking industry is such that prosecutions should be proceeded with by the federal authorities.

As has already been indicated, we have the report on the flour milling industry which the government concealed and now states its refusal to act upon.

In addition to the amendments being introduced at this time, I think amendments should be introduced to the Criminal Code whereby combinations of this sort extending over long periods of years can be prosecuted, not only for what may have been done in the last two years but for what may have been done throughout their entire history as a combination. The alleged limitation in the Criminal Code in connection with this particular type of combination and price fixing should be removed and any companies involved should be held accountable for anything done over a reasonable period of years.

The facts are self-evident and there is no question in my mind that under the act as it now stands the flour milling industry could have been attacked successfully earlier this year had the report of its operations been made public and had the government proceeded to take action against them.

I say that the flour milling interests could have been attacked successfully for their operations during the war period. Not one tittle of evidence has been produced to show that the government, the wartime prices and trade board, or any of its officers, authorized the stifling of competition between December, 1941, and September 15, 1947, when I understand these investigations were started, and commenced incidentally, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said today and as I said the other day, with the knowledge and the approval of the then minister of justice, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley. From having studied the report I say that I believe, under the unamended terms of the act, there was an excellent chance of succeeding with the prosecution of the flour milling industry for its activities during the war period.

As the minister knows, I have asked for documentary evidence to support the contention that what the flour milling industry did in the war years was done with the authority of the wartime prices and trade board. I have been told that considerable research is necessary in order to produce any such documents. Consequently I think it is pretty safe to assume that up to the present time neither Mr. Gordon, nor any of his wartime officers, nor the minister, are aware of any documentary evidence or any authority given directly or indirectly, under which the milling industry maintained high prices and endeavoured to eliminate price competition in their industry in the war years.

For a moment I want to refer to one or two parts of the report to substantiate what I say. For, while the amendment is designed to strengthen the act, and we welcome it, have we any assurance that when we pass the legislation and the act is strengthened this matter will be proceeded with and these great interests prosecuted? On June 12, 1942, we find this:

> . . . now that the export business has been so drastically reduced, higher prices in the domestic market are inevitable. Unless export business picks up, it will certainly be necessary for the mills to come to some agreement to maintain ceiling prices and we believe efforts will be made along this line shortly.

Let me point out that ceiling prices were authorized but minimum prices were never authorized. The other day—I thought rather unfairly—the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), or was it Mr. Gordon in the document which the minister read, compared the milling interests with the gasoline interests. I believe it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is an entirely different situation. The wartime prices and trade board set a fixed price on gasoline. It could not go up; it could not go down. They set a ceiling not a floor on cereal products, including flour. One gentleman, Mr. Soward, wrote to the officers of his company, the Maple Leaf Milling Company, and on October 5, 1942, an informal meeting of the executive committee was held and the following recommendations were made for submission at the next executive meeting:

> It was realized that the first step to be taken in respect of correcting certain conditions within the industry, in so far as our members are concerned, was to petition the flour administrator to establish uniform ceilings on flour for the different categories of trade, based on the highest ceilings which any mill could establish, and which would constitute a uniform price. The next step considered necessary was a guarantee by all mills to advance to, and maintain their prices at, the ceilings established.

In this respect, however, the view was expressed that perhaps all mills could not sell at the same price in all sections of eastern Canada, and as a means of overcoming that difficulty it was suggested that any mill would have the privilege of declaring, in meeting, its intention to sell (in territories designated by the mill) at a discretionary price of 10 cents per barrel under the uniform prices set by the flour administrator.

While such a submission was subsequently made to the flour administrator, uniform prices were never established by the wartime prices and trade board. Indeed, the establishment of a uniform structure and prices was finally agreed upon by the industry for the province of Quebec, and at a meeting of the Quebec sales managers on November 2 a proposed new selling structure and prices were set up. I bring that to the attention of the house because that was wartime, 1942. Wherever we look in the report we find that, while the wartime prices and trade board set ceilings, they did not set floors. Whatever the association may have tried to do, reading the report I can find no evidence to support the suggestion that they did so by authority of the wartime prices and trade board. I could go on reading extract after extract from their minutes to bear out what I say. For example, there are the minutes of the meeting of the association of the 21st of April, 1942, reading:

Arising out of a long discussion of recent developments in certain centres (Kamloops, Calgary and Trail were cited as cases in point), the following resolution was unanimously adopted.

"There shall be no reduction in the dealer structure by any kind of independent action to meet any local price situation. Each situation as it arises shall be reported to the secretary as the means to obtain complete executive action."

Then I find this in the minutes of October 21, 1943:

The dealer list is to be maintained without deviation in all classes and categories of the trade.

It is the association's decision, not that of the wartime prices and trade board. Who was the controller? The controller was the manager of one of the great milling companies. Again I emphasize that, in my opinion, without strengthening the act—and I am glad it is being strengthened—a prosecution could have been undertaken under the old act with at least some chance of success. Again I want to emphasize that the wartime prices and trade board set maximum prices, and as far as I can find anywhere in the report they gave no authority which would justify the actions of the association. I look forward to seeing what the minister can produce in the course of the next day or two. So far as I can see the board gave no authority to sellers to combine to prevent price reductions below the ceiling level; indeed, quite the opposite.

On May 26, 1947, just before controls were removed, we find documentary evidence to show conclusively that the association was endeavouring to force some companies to maintain prices which those companies did not think they needed to maintain. It is the same with mill feed, a very important item to our farmers. In the minutes of an executive meeting of August 18, 1944, I find the following:

Members of the Alberta group shall take immediate steps to examine the basis of sales of coarse grains and mill feed, interior British Columbia, and so be prepared to resolve the common problem at the next executive meeting.

Therefore I say that this matter is of paramount importance from two points of view. The first point of view which I mentioned was the importance to the life of this parliament, the preservation of our democratic institutions in Canada, of our adherence to parliamentary practice, and indeed more than that, of our adherence to the basic principles of the Bill of Rights and the rule of law. I say, further, that as far as the evidence goes, in the report we have read during the last few days no suggestion can be found anywhere that at any time Mr. Donald Gordon or Mr. Ken Taylor gave any assurance to the milling industry or encouraged them to maintain prices at the maximum ceiling level. No action was taken by the wartime prices and trade board to set a floor price, nor was any encouragement given the milling industry to prevent reductions in domestic prices.

Now let us take a look at a paragraph on page 115 of the report which I am going to read because it has a bearing on the discussion we have heard in this house:

Simultaneous and uniform price increases were put into effect on September 15, 1947, when the wheat subsidy was withdrawn and flour prices were decontrolled. Flour was increased by $4.05 per barrel and mill feeds by $10 per ton. While the investigation which followed disclosed little documentary proof of agreement on these particular price increases . . .

Indeed, if I may say so, the people who were investigated denied that there was any agreement.

. . . examination of company and association records disclosed a series of price fixing agreements over a period of years. In the oral hearings association members contended that the uniform price increases in September had not been determined by agreement. . . .

Yet last week we were told that on September 15, when the controls were coming off, Mr. Ken Taylor got in touch with the flour controller and together they agreed on an increase of $4.05 per barrel.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coldwell: I am quoting from the report.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says we were told that Mr. Ken Taylor and Mr. McGregor got together and reached this agreement.

Mr. Coldwell: No; I said Mr. Taylor and the flour interests.

Mr. Garson: The house was not told that by me, and I think I was the only one on this side who dealt with that subject matter in the debate. However, I shall be glad to deal with the point later on. That certainly was not the case.

Mr. Coldwell: Then I shall put it in this way: that it was indicated in this house that Mr. Ken Taylor informed the millers that the government thought a price increase of $3.95 would be about right; that they wanted a higher price, I think $4.25 or $4.45; and that there was a sort of understanding that $4.05 would be all right. That, I think, is a statement of fact.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection to my hon. friend using any figures he wishes as long as he does not put them in the mouth of any person on this side of the house. I do not know where he got those figures, but certainly I never used them. What I said was that Mr. Ken Taylor, under the instructions of the government, had dictated a certain figure of $4.05 for flour and $10 for mill feed, and the direction went through on that basis.

Mr. Coldwell: One or other of the ministers if I am not mistaken referred to this matter of the price discussion between Mr. Taylor and the millers, and I was under the impression those figures were given. In any event there was a discussion.

Mr. Garson: Whatever discussion there may have been, the point was that in the end Mr. Ken Taylor, under the instructions of the government, directed the industry that a certain level was to be maintained.

Mr. Coldwell: He directed the industry after controls had come off? What authority had the government to direct Mr. Ken Taylor or the industry to set a price, when controls were coming off?

Mr. Garson: What he did was this. He intimated to the industry that in spite of the fact that controls had come off it was the desire of the government that there should not be an excessive increase in the prices of flour and mill feed, and that a specified increase of $4.05 and $10 would be acceptable, but that if this were not adhered to the government would have to consider the reimposition of controls.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, I am going to continue reading the paragraph I was quoting when interrupted:

> In the oral hearings association members contended that the uniform price increases in September had not been determined by agreement, although some members admitted that prior to decontrol they had discussed their increased costs. The only discussion of the subject recorded in the confidential memoranda in the east was at a meeting on March 21, 1947, when agreement was reached to convene the eastern sales managers "for the purpose of arriving at proper selling structures in preparation for decontrol: the combined views to be considered by the general sales managers in meeting."

My hon. friend has just drawn to my attention that in his speech on November 7 the Minister of Justice said:

> After considerable remonstrance and discussion the millers accepted $4.05 for flour and a price of $10 for mill feed, the desire being that the price of flour should not be held down at the cost of having mill feed rise too high.

I thought the other figures were given at that time also.

Mr. Garson: Not at all; and they accepted the figure which had been determined by Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, we need not quarrel over that; but when they say there was no agreement among themselves, from what the minister says and from what this report says it is obvious that they must have reached agreement among themselves to accept a suggestion made by Mr. Ken Taylor on behalf of the government at that time.

Mr. Garson: Is my hon. friend implying that such an agreement is contrary to the act?

Mr. Coldwell: I suggest that such an agreement was contrary to the act.

Mr. Garson: In other words, if the director came along and instructed them as to a certain price they were to take by way of an increase and they all agreed to conform to that ceiling, that would be contrary to the act?

Mr. Coldwell: That would be contrary to the act. That is price fixing. As a matter of fact price control was a matter of ceilings, not floors, and there was no reason in the world why the flour millers should all raise their prices by $4.05 a barrel. That is the point.

So, Mr. Speaker, one could go on quoting from this report to show that throughout the wartime period the milling interests got together, disciplined one another if there were any inclination to sell below the ceiling price, and did everything they could to maintain a price that was high. In fact in one place they say they wanted the ceiling fixed at the very highest level that could be attained by any one of them. So I think the evidence before us is of such a nature as to bring them within the meaning of combination and price fixing under the act we are proposing to amend today. Let me quote further from page 114 of Mr. McGregor's report:

The practice during the war years to which exception is taken in this report is the same practice to which exception is taken with respect to other times, that of agreements to remove competition in price. In the war years regulations established maximum levels beyond which prices could not be increased. In this period concerted efforts were made to prevent competition by securing agreement as to the prices which the members would follow. Such joint action was neither required nor sanctioned by the prices board or any other government agency. Board policy was definitely directed to the maintenance of competitive conditions with respect to prices.

That is what the public of Canada understood throughout the entire period of the war. It is all very well for the milling interests to say that they were authorized to do these things when no authority can be found. Indeed, in Mr. Gordon's own statement, which was read into the record at page 1502 of Hansard of this year, Mr. Donald Gordon said —I am omitting some words which do not alter the meaning:

—the ceiling price—would naturally become the fixed price and, such being the case, any "agreement" in respect of prices would have been meaningless.

If you look across at the next column on the same page, about the middle of the column, you will find Mr. Gordon says this:

—no practical system of uniform prices was ever discovered and it remained in the realm of wishful thinking throughout the period of control.

In order to be fair, perhaps I should read the next sentence:

Nevertheless, I have no doubt that the flour administrator in collaboration with the industry did his utmost to insure orderly conditions in the industry in the interests of maintaining supply as well as price stability.

Mr. Garson: Price stability.

Mr. Coldwell: But price stability at the ceiling, you see; that is the criticism. It was always the highest price, not the lowest brought about by competition within the milling industry.

Mr. Garson: I should like the house to have a correct impression of that. It was price stability at the ceiling because, to the extent that it went below the ceiling, it had to come out of the public treasury.

Mr. Coldwell: We shall see about that. What does the report say about that? I quote from page 114:

Certain industries, including the flour milling industry, which were paid subsidies in order to provide for increased costs which they could not absorb, were asked by the government to forego any claim to the refundable portion of the tax, except on any profits which exceeded the amount of the subsidy. In the case of the flour milling industry these subsidies were paid to permit the sale in Canada of hard wheat flour at prices within the ceiling. The arrangement with that industry regarding limitation of profits extended from August 1943 to July 1947. Since it was obviously undesirable to permit any part of such subsidy payments to be added to profits, the arrangement provided that no part of the tax would be refundable. That is, all profits in excess of 116⅔ per cent of standard profits, to the extent that subsidies contributed to such profits, were to be paid to the government. Had this arrangement not been made, however, some alternative would have been necessary, as the Wartime Prices and Trade Board pointed out in its annual report for the period ended March 31, 1943, in referring to similar arrangements which had been made with other industries. The report said:

"This arrangement, although it has the effect of cancelling the 20 per cent rebate on subsidies contributing to profits taxable at 100 per cent, nevertheless is not one-sided, as the alternative would be a much more drastic subsidy formula which might, with changed business conditions and a restricted volume of operations, result in the industry making no profits at all."

There is the answer to the minister's interjection.

Mr. Garson: On what page is that?

Mr. Coldwell: Page 114 of the report.

On page 36 of the report we find the following:

On September 15, Lake of the Woods, Maple Leaf, McDonald and Robb, Ogilvie, Purity, Quaker, Robin Hood and St. Lawrence all increased the price of hard wheat flour by $4.05 per barrel and mill feeds by $10 per ton.

Now, what about this? The report says:

In the course of the oral examination of representatives of the member companies of C.N.M.A., it was contended that the amount of the advances had not been reached by agreement, although it was admitted by some that prior to decontrol they had discussed with others the increased costs with which they were faced. It was also contended that the amount of the flour increase was not in fact sufficient to cover all increases in costs which had arisen since the basic period in 1941.

Again and again in this report the milling representatives deny that there were agreements. Yet, running all through this report—I am speaking of the war years now because the other evening I dealt with the years prior to the war—in the correspondence, the memoranda and the minutes there are indications that every attempt was made to secure price agreements.

On May 16, 1943, a discussion ensued with respect to the recent notification to mills that the price of flour in respect of ships' stores business, or at least in respect of quotations to the Department of Munitions and Supply had been decontrolled. The report says:

Finally it was agreed that in connection with the Department of Munitions and Supply, quotations in so far as Halifax is concerned, shall be made in behalf of all members by Mr. A. G.

Watson, and by Mr. J. P. Whitney in so far as Saint John is concerned—the orders so received to be distributed in turn to each of the members by Mr. Watson and/or Mr. Whitney in a manner to be determined by them.

There is to be no competition. The millers decided, in spite of the fact that the Department of Munitions and Supply was to buy decontrolled supplies, there would be no competition.

On May 18, 1943, the agreement was explained by D. A. Campbell, the St. Lawrence Company, to A. G. Watson, sales manager at Halifax, as follows:

At a meeting of the executive of the Millers' Association today, the perennial question of prices for ship's stores came up for discussion, and it was the unanimous opinion that you should take over the selling of ship's stores for all of the mills (in Halifax), and that Whitney would perform the same service in Saint John. By "ship's stores" was meant the quotations to the Department of Munitions and Supply, and did not refer to the supplies for ocean-going vessels, for which there does not seem to be a great deal of difficulty.

When the Department of Munitions and Supply called for tenders, expecting some competition in prices, the millers took steps to see that there was no competition in prices. They had one person setting the prices. In the debate a week ago I drew attention to the fact that in Vancouver they had a formula whereby the various prices were changed around to meet the demand for competitive prices, which defeated that objective altogether.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member he has exhausted his time. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Coldwell: With the consent of the house, I shall conclude in a moment. On page 34, the report says:

During the oral examination of representatives of the various companies it was stated by some that this system was introduced to meet existing emergency conditions.

I could continue quoting from the report, but I shall not do so because my time has expired. I shall conclude with these remarks. While I believe the McGregor report was amply justified by the conditions that existed prior to the war, it was equally justified by the conditions he discovered existed during the war. Those of us who know the careful manner in which Mr. McGregor, who admittedly is one of our most highly respected public servants—the Minister of Justice nods his head, so I think we are all agreed about that—would not question his motives in the making of the report. I believe we all regret that he has seen fit to relinquish that position. I am sure that had the millers said, at any time subsequent to the commencement of this examination, "Here are the facts. We were authorized to do this by the wartime prices and trade board; we were authorized to do it by the government", at that point the investigation would have stopped and this report would never have been made. But evidently that defence was never made. Apparently there was conversation between Mr. McGregor and Mr. Ken Taylor even before October 22 last; and apparently nothing of this sort was brought to light. It does seem to me, rightly or wrongly—and I believe rightly—that this business of saying that there was authority from the wartime prices and trade board for the mills to endeavour in this country to maintain cereal prices at the ceiling level throughout the war was more or less an afterthought and has no validity in fact.

It is a pretty lame excuse that the government is making, as lame an excuse, may I say, as the excuse for withholding the report which, in my opinion, is an illegal act under the traditional statutes and concepts of democratic government in this Canadian parliament.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to repeat the things which have been said in this debate today, but I do feel that there are two things which should be emphasized before the vote is taken. The first is one that cannot be emphasized too often and too strongly. The second is a proposal which I am going to make for the consideration of hon. members.

In the debate thus far, and in the one which took place last week, some very harsh words were spoken, and I suppose one of the most direct censures which a government has ever received, at least in my experience, was expressed. I would very much dislike to see the Minister of Justice's head roll off the block; I would not like to see him taken to the place of execution. But while I say that, and express my friendship for him, having known the hon. gentleman for more years than he has been in the house, I must emphasize our position with regard to the impunity with which the government appears to have broken the law. I must say that I feel sorry for my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He came down here from one of the western provinces early in the fall of last year, not long before this report that had been the subject of a good deal of discussion was presented.

Mr. Garson: Some time afterwards.

Mr. Low: Afterwards. I stand corrected. That is all the more reason why I should say what I am saying. For that reason I think he has been made the goat in a very nasty situation. He has inherited, shall we say, a very bad situation. There is no doubt that this whole question should not rest on his shoulders; but, as a responsible minister, he has been a party to breaking the law, and in doing so has contravened the very important principle of the responsibility of the executive to this body, the House of Commons, and has also denied what should guide us all in this country, namely, the rule of law.

I made our position quite clear the other day on this very important principle. I repeat that no excuse under the sun is sufficient to warrant that, not even the excuse given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in another debate, an excuse which seemed to turn on the fact that certain companies in Canada had rendered good service during wartime. I do not care whether they gave good service during wartime or not. So did all the Canadian people. Whether they were small or large I say, Mr. Speaker, that the companies had no right to any consideration that would not be given and could not be given to the general public, to individuals, who constitute the Canadian public. It is because I feel so keenly about that that I shall support the amendment. I am speaking on behalf of my group. We shall support the amendment moved by the official opposition. In supporting it, Mr. Speaker, I should like it to be known that the Social Credit group look upon it not just as a convenience or something that might produce new ideas with respect to the Combines Investigation Act. We look upon it as a vote of censure of the government. It may be productive of good. I hope so. It does seem strange to us that it has taken twenty-two or twenty-three years for the government to discover that convictions under the Combines Investigation Act could not be obtained or were very difficult. That is the admission; otherwise this bill would not be before us today.

I wonder who has been derelict in his duty in this respect. I am wondering how many times, if at all, the commissioner of combines during those twenty-two or twenty-three years presented requests to the government for amendments to the act so that it could be strengthened and made an instrument for the protection of the Canadian people. If he did not make requests for amendments during those years to put teeth into the act, then of course some of the responsibility must rest upon the commissioner of combines. If he did make requests, then of course the government has been guilty of dereliction.

We of this group welcome the amendments which are now before us. We think that they will strengthen the act in a good many ways. I am quite in agreement with the principles outlined by the minister in his introductory speech this morning. However, we do not think that the amendments now before us are sufficient to make the act do what it originally was designed to do. To us the Combines Investigation Act should be so strengthened as to ensure two important things for the Canadian people. The first is the establishment in our country of a condition of free enterprise, of free competition. I want to emphasize a condition of free competition. There cannot be freedom in any sense of the word for the average run of Canadian people if we have not freedom of competition in Canadian business.

We do not want to see large accumulations of capital wielding such power as to be a danger to the Canadian people. We do not want to see small companies destroyed, driven out of business through larger companies and combines exercising undue influence either with governments or under law. We have been fighting as strongly as it has been possible for us to fight for a condition of competition, because we feel that therein lie the seeds of success of the private enterprise system. Deny the right of real competition and you deny private enterprise, and you play into the hands of those people who constantly say, "There is an example of private enterprise for you",—the people who declare that one of the reasons why this act is being amended today is that we are admitting that private enterprise has failed.

I deny that. Private enterprise has not failed. We have to admit honestly that there are abuses of private enterprise, and it is those abuses we are trying now to obviate, to make impossible. I say now that that is the true function of government, to lay down such conditions as will regulate and make possible a system of private enterprise in the interests of all the people.

The second thing we believe a strong and effective Combines Investigation Act should do is protect the people of the country from the power that is often wielded by the accumulation of capital, for the purpose of establishing monopoly control in their interests. We have no truck or traffic with such breaches of decency. We condemn it in the strongest possible way; and when I say that we condemn it, we condemn the irresponsible use of power in the hands of people who have accumulated vast wealth and use it for their own selfish ends.

But happily that has not been the rule in this country. Though we have frequent examples of combines, and attempts at combines, I am happy to stand here and say that from my observation it has been the exception and not the rule. But the combines act ought to provide protection for the people of Canada against those exceptional cases. It is that sort of thing which we plead with the minister to establish.

There are some who will say that some new method ought to be found of protecting the interests of parliament as well as of the people. I am one of them. Section 27 (5) of the Combines Investigation Act provides for the rendering of a report by the commissioner. As I understand, when a report is ready the commissioner presents it to the appropriate minister—in this instance the Minister of Justice—and unless at the same time he makes a request in writing to the minister that the report be withheld from publication, it is clearly the duty of the Minister of Justice to see to it that the report is published, in the interests of the Canadian people.

In at least one case we know of, that was not done. I am wondering if, in order to prevent a repetition of the sort of irresponsibility we have witnessed, it would not be wise to insert an amendment to section 27 to the effect that, at the time the commissioner under the act renders his report to the Minister of Justice, he shall at the same time lay on the table of the House of Commons or deposit with the Clerk thereof another copy; so that if within fifteen days the commissioner has not presented to the minister a written request to withhold the report the Clerk of the House would be free to see that it is published.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is to prevent the minister from hiding it in that case as in the present one?

Mr. Low: Nothing, of course, except the watchfulness of members of the House of Commons.

It is patently clear that there is a growing disregard for parliament on the part of the executive. In the four years I have been in parliament I have certainly witnessed case after case of that kind. It seems to me however that if such a change were made in the act the commissioner might feel that he is responsible directly to the House of Commons —which is, I think, as it should be. And because he would be responsible directly to the house in that measure, the Clerk of the House would be in duty bound to publish the report, and the desired effect would be obtained through investigation, even though the Minister of Justice were inclined to hide it, as has been done in this instance.

Mr. Coldwell: Only the minister is responsible to parliament.

Mr. Low: I understand that is so under the act. But the effect of my suggestion would be that the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act would become responsible to this body, and not only to the Minister of Justice.

That principle is followed in the provinces in connection with auditors, and has worked well. It has been a wonderful protection enjoyed by the people against irresponsible expenditures on the part of provincial governments. It is recognized quite universally, I think, that that is a good provision. The federal auditor general is in a similar position.

In all cases where the protection of the public against insidious powers exists, that principle is sound and good. I would ask hon. members, particularly the Minister of Justice, to weigh the suggestion. I know what his reply would be, of course. He would say, "Well, if I admit any such principle is a good one, I am condemning myself." I realize that, and I would not ask him to rise in his place and agree to it. But when the present amendment is out of the way it might just be possible that someone else would offer an amendment to section 27 which would incorporate the suggestion I have just made.

I have spoken longer that I had intended. I do wish to register however my complete abhorrence of the attitude of executive government in this country which overrules and overrides law that has been laid down to guide that government as well as individuals throughout the country.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part briefly in the debate this afternoon. In doing so might I point out that as head of a municipality for many years, particularly after the first great war, I noticed marked increases and spreads in prices. I saw the effect of those conditions upon the working classes in my city, and upon the small farmers.

I rise to support the amendment of my leader, which states—

> That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that they have power to send for persons, papers and records and that in addition to other recommendations with respect to the subject matter of the said bill they shall also have power to report upon the extent to which the effective administration of legislation relating to restrictive trade practices has been, or is being, prejudiced by the action of the government in failing to carry out the mandatory requirements of the existing law.

That is a good motion, and a lifesaving motion for the government, as well. Speaking as a private member, may I say that the government often forgets that the private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electors. Where he ceases to function and permits himself to become a yes-man or a nodder, parliamentary government is at an end.

The people back in the constituencies do not expect hon. members in any part of the house to act as yes-men or nodders in days like these. Those who have sent us here are the ones who suffer from sky-high prices.

I remember in 1917 when there was a serious coal famine in our city, but at that time the price of Pennsylvania hard coal was only about $6 per ton. Today the price has skyrocketed until it is up to $23.50, and when you allow $1.50 to the retail man for delivering, it totals $25 per ton. It is fortunate that owing to Providence we have had a mild fall so that little coal has been used.

As far as I can see, the government has dealt with this report as a matter of policy rather than as a matter of law. The government apparently does not acknowledge what it owes to the opposition for the support they are being given in this amendment. This amendment will act as a lifesaver. I remember back in the thirties when we had the Stevens committee and it is most regrettable that we lost the services of Mr. Stevens, who had the support of the white-collar workers in Ontario. The work of that committee in connection with price spreads was one of the most important tasks ever done by a committee of this house.

Governments begin to die the moment they are born. I am not a bigoted party man. I submit that as a House of Commons we should seek to carry one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ. I referred to St. Luke the 11th chapter the other day and to what He had said about lawyers. A few years ago we had a select committee of the house, the Stevens committee, which went into the whole question of prices and spreads. It will be noticed that the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) would give the committee power to send for persons, papers and records. The committee would be entitled to send for crown officers and examine them as to why the law was not carried out. They could deal with the decision of Mr. Justice Barlow who ruled that there had been no proof that the directors of the companies charged had a guilty mind, which must be proved in the case of corporations.

I followed the work of Mr. McGregor in connection with the electrical combines case and other matters like that where it was found that they were interlocked and there was no way of attacking them. As I said the other day in connection with this matter, combines have flourished in Canada like the green bay tree. That is something which cannot be contradicted. We had an example the other day in connection with coal, and we have another example in connection with telephones where one company has jurisdiction over the two central provinces and is interlocked with Northern Electric. They are now proposing to increase the rates which will mean that a telephone is just a luxury. That is just one other industry that I can mention.

This committee will have the power to send for the law officers of the crown and find out why this is going on. The Stevens committee on prices and spreads found out in 1934. They represented the white-collar workers all over Ontario, the small mill man and so on.

In the days of Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier nearly everyone in Canada owned some property in the form of a small farm, a small mill, a blacksmith shop, a grocery store, a team and wagon, a country general store and things like that. In those days Canada was a nation of property owners. In the city from which I come sixty-five per cent of the people owned their own homes. Land was cheap and they could buy for as low as $6 per foot, the civic car lines gave them service, and they were able to build houses all over the city. Now that has all passed away and we are no longer a city of home owners because many have lost their homes because of high taxes and the high cost of living.

This committee should be established and it should follow the practices followed by the Stevens committee. It should go over this report and send for the crown officers. Last spring I contended that these trusts and combines in restraint of trade were flourishing like the green bay tree. At that time I gave a list of them extending from the Ottawa river to the Nipigon, the companies that controlled coal, copper, tin, zinc, platinum, asbestos, aluminum and many other commodities. All these companies are controlled from New York. I believe in the policy of Canada for Canadians.

I referred to the work of Lord Hewart on the new despotism in which he complained about the rules and regulations which permitted the restraint of trade and all that kind of thing. I hope when this committee meets it will tackle this problem in the right way. If they do they will find that what I say is correct. No doubt the report on the milling industry will be before the committee and they can send for Mr. McGregor or any others who have anything to do with it. The government policy has been all wrong. As I say, they have dealt with this whole problem as a question of policy, rather than as a question of law. The government had the power to act, but they did not go ahead. The report speaks for itself and I am not going to repeat what was said the other day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

We have now reached a position where the cabinet have ruled the roost long enough, and it is the duty of private members to regain some control over administration. The actions of the cabinet put me in mind of the days of the Family Compact when the executive tried to usurp the powers of the crown. You know what happened then. The actions of the government resemble those in a star chamber proceeding. We are back in the days when governments assumed liabilities and responsibilities beyond their powers, and usurped the functions of the House of Commons. If the executive want to rule the roost that way, then we might as well all go home. The duties of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate have been automatically abolished by such procedure. When did that happen? Fifteen days after the 29th of December, 1948, when the report should have been tabled. It should have been made available then to every member of the house, instead of being withheld until after the election. It was just pigeonholed. It was the duty of the proper minister of the crown to lay it on the table of the house, thus making it available to the house and to the country.

After all, who is paying for the report? No member of the cabinet is paying for it. It is paid for by the working classes, the large and small taxpayers. By way of income tax, sales tax and other taxes, the city of Toronto contributes almost one-third of the cash taxes of the whole dominion. It is not the cabinet's money; it belongs to the people who pay taxes. In the city of Toronto, a constituency of which I represent, they are paying almost one-third of it. It is an industrial city, and yet it has no member of the cabinet at the present time. That is one feature of the new despotism which is referred to in Lord Hewart's work, namely, where cabinets usurp the functions of parliament.

I believe the day has come when no minister of the crown should act in such a way. I appeal to the younger private members on the government benches. After all is said and done, the motion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will act as a lifesaver for them when they go back to their constituencies because it will afford a proper investigation of the whole question of monopolies and restraint of trade. So far as municipalities are concerned, it has been a dead letter for a long time. Nothing was done about the coal famine in Toronto and many other monopolies which we have had. The records would also be before the house.

I do not wish to refer particularly to Mr. McGregor's report because it may not be quite in order to do so. His conclusions are as clear as crystal. The leader of the opposition referred to them. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) also referred to them and read certain extracts from the report. The report shows that the large milling companies sought to drive the smaller companies out of business. It shows that the larger companies were interlocked. There is no doubt about it, if you have a committee the officials can be summoned before it. I wish we had had this report at the time of the Stevens inquiry. That preceded this report, and I should like to quote what some of the members said about the Stevens report and the good work that was done. You will have an opportunity to go into these matters at the proper time if the measure is referred to a committee. In the section of the report dealing with Mr. McGregor's conclusions I find the following:

> This report follows another report on a related subject, an alleged combine in the bread baking industry in western Canada. Both reports disclose developments of much the same character—control of the industry concentrated in a few very large corporations and the efforts made under the leadership of the dominant groups to control competitive activity. They describe measures which have been taken to link the two industries by means of the financial control of some chain bakery companies by some flour milling companies and how this limiting of competitive purchases by the baking industry has had its impact on the flour milling industry. Each group within its own field has sought in its own way to attain the objective of eliminating price competition as a factor in business enterprise. This report is concerned with the measures taken by the principal flour milling companies which have been associated in the Canadian National Millers Association and C.N.M.A. (western division).

And also to some extent in the eastern division. There is no doubt that there was collusion. The report shows it, and the evidence shows it. Mr. McGregor winds up his report—and this is all I shall have to say about the report—by directing the attention of the minister to certain facts. I find these words in Mr. McGregor's conclusions:

> The disruption of the restrictive agreements which infrequently did occur as a result of such market conditions cannot be regarded as a substitute for the safeguard of freedom of competition which should prevail as a general characteristic of business enterprise.

In another place I find these words:

> The potential and actual operations of small mills and the presence of surplus capacity in the large mills, it was argued, would operate to prevent any effective agreement by the larger mills to curtail their competition in price in any substantial degree. The argument advanced was that each company with surplus capacity would actively compete with the others to get that volume of business which would enable it to keep its mills operating at the highest capacity possible.

That did not work out as shown by the definition of a combine in the Combines Investigation Act. The report goes on:

> The definition of a "combine" in the Combines Investigation Act includes a combination carried on by agreements having or designed to have certain effects, such as the fixing of common prices and the lessening of competition, which has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public.

The report goes on to quote from the decision of Mr. Justice Raney in Rex. v. Alexander, 1932, 2 Dominion Law Reports, page 123. The commissioner decided that the language used by Mr. Justice Raney would be applicable to this case. The quotation given in the report reads:

But the system adopted by the Electrical Estimators Association is not to be judged by its accidents, but by its tendency—not by the circumstance that sometimes the members of the association made no profit, or sometimes made too much, but by what the thing was in essence that the defendants were seeking to accomplish. That thing was the prevention or lessening of competition.

There is no doubt that the western and eastern divisions of the milling association tried to control their prices. You will notice that the prices in the eastern and western divisions were all top prices. They were up at the ceiling all the time, not the floor. All the business they did with the government was at ceiling prices. There was no floor price at all. The evidence shows that they interfered with the small millers, such as at Midland and others, and if a committee is set up that evidence will be before it in restraint of trade.

As far as I can see, in this case we have the cabinet on the one hand and the House of Commons on the other; and for all this house knows about these matters we might just as well all go home and let the executive rule the roost and run the show, assuming the functions of both houses of parliament. Within fourteen days after December 29 of last year the public were entitled to learn about the report made by this government official. It was not a secret report; it was an open report made under the act. The cabinet were not entitled to see that report first; far from it. The people who paid for the report were entitled to learn the gist of it, as they have been told about other reports. Every department of the government is doing this sort of thing, keeping information from the public who pay for it.

Publicity has been the greatest deterrent in preventing monopolies and restraint of trade in this country. Away back in 1934 the Stevens committee did more to call attention to monopolies and the way restraint of trade was flourishing in Canada than has been done since confederation. That committee electrified the public by the way it conducted its business, and did a great work for the people of this country. I am a party man, I suppose, because I am a Conservative. I may be the only one left, I do not know; but I have supported certain definite principles ever since I have been a member of the house. Sometimes I think it would be far better if we made this a national party, and not something like what they have in Manitoba and British Columbia. When our late leader, Lord Bennett, was with us we were a national party. He was a supporter of a wide open inquiry. It was not the case, as Saturday Night says, that nothing was done. More was done by the Stevens committee on price spreads and their regulation than by all the Saturday Nights I ever read, so they are not correct in that statement. That committee had the complete support of the government of that day.

So I wish to record my protest against the way this matter has been handled. I have never had any confidence in these monopolies in restraint of trade. They seem to go on forever; and they will continue in Canada until we have a House of Commons composed of members who will cease to be yes-men and in restraint of trade. They seem to go on nodders.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment. I would have preferred a motion that would amount to a vote of censure upon the government but I think perhaps the amendment is more realistic, for I cannot imagine anything this government might do that would induce its overwhelming number of supporters to endorse a vote of censure against it.

I am quite sure there is justification for sending the bill to a committee. For a moment I want to touch upon the withholding of the McGregor report, and the attitude of the minister and the cabinet toward that action. I doubt if there has been another instance of this kind in all Canadian history. Here we had a cabinet minister, with the approval of his associates, deliberately violating a statute passed by parliament, going through months when parliament was in session and hiding that information from parliament. Then we had the government going through a general election, still withholding that information from the electorate; we had them going through a miniature election, in a whole series of by-elections, still withholding that information, and not until those by-elections were out of the way was it possible to drag this information from the cabinet. As I have said, I doubt whether there has been another instance of this kind in the history of the Canadian parliament.

I want to emphasize, as did the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and other speakers, the seriousness of that situation as it affects our parliamentary system. If we are going to accept the principle that a cabinet minister or a cabinet may with impunity disregard legislation passed by parliament; that a ministry can meet parliament without divulging such information; that a government can go to the country in a general election and withhold it, and go through a series of by-elections still without divulging it, where are we? What becomes of our parliamentary system? If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the cabinet are above the law, what is the use of having laws enacted by this parliament? That is the situation which must be faced, and because it is so serious I regret it is not possible at this time to bring in a motion of censure on the government.

The minister has referred to his responsibility and that of the cabinet to the country. As has been pointed out already, he has entirely overlooked the fact that all through Canadian parliamentary history it has been an accepted principle that the cabinet is responsible to the House of Commons. Cabinet ministers are elected, as all other hon. members are elected, as representatives of constituencies. They are appointed to the cabinet by the Prime Minister. The cabinet is directly responsible to the elected representatives of the people. If we accept the suggestion of the minister that they are directly responsible to the country, what becomes of their responsibility to this house? Here they withhold information from the electorate, and rely upon the fact that the public has a short memory and probably will be induced to forget this incident within the next four years, before the government must go to the country again. To properly describe this action I would have to use language which would not be parliamentary, so I shall content myself with saying that this whole matter produces a very unpleasant odour.

An hon. Member: It stinks.

Mr. Noseworthy: That is what I mean. There are good reasons, Mr. Speaker, why a committee should be set up. There are some things this house should know. We have received from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) one reason for the withholding of this report. In the daily press we have read a report, published with the approval of the combines commissioner, which is completely at variance with the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house. Both these statements cannot be right. One or the other is wrong. I submit that before the members can vote intelligently on the second reading of this bill, there should be an opportunity to bring Mr. McGregor before a committee of this house to get his side of the story. Then we could attempt to find out, if possible, which of these two statements is the correct one.

There are other things we should know. It has already been pointed out that this act has been in force for approximately twenty years. It is only now that the government has discovered that the act cannot be enforced. I believe the house should have the opportunity of ascertaining whether recommendations have been made to the government during those years for amendments to this act. The members should have the opportunity of ascertaining whether the commissioner, who was responsible for the enforcement of this act, or the government has been at fault for leaving the act on the statute books for twenty years and only now discovering that it cannot be enforced.

Furthermore, there has been a suggestion that the proposed amendments to the act will not do the job the act was designed to do. I submit this house should have an opportunity of finding out whether those amendments will provide the necessary machinery to secure convictions or whether there should be other amendments than those which are proposed. These are some of the questions which I believe should be discussed and to which some answers should be found. These answers can be found only in a committee.

I should like to go one step further. While we are overhauling this Combines Investigation Act, I think it is about time this parliament set up a select committee on small business. There is ample evidence in this report that the particular industry under investigation attempted, apparently with success, to squeeze the small concerns out of business. It is no secret that that is happening all across the country. Numerous reports have been submitted indicating that chain stores and large industries deliberately force small businesses out of existence. I would think that this government, which prides itself on maintaining the free enterprise system, would show some concern for the small businessman at this time in our history. I believe there are approximately 120,000 to 125,000 small businessmen in Ontario alone. I would think such a government would show some concern for the protection of these men.

I suggest that consideration be given to the establishment of a select committee of this house on small businesses. I know the minister's answer. I know the attitude other cabinet ministers have taken when members have suggested that other committees, such as the veterans committee, be set up. Their attitude has been that the cabinet is responsible for these things. I know there is a difference between our system of cabinet government and the United States system. Accepting the principle that the cabinet is responsible to parliament, then we suggest there is a place for these committees to advise, to investigate, to acquire data and to enable the members of the house to serve a more useful purpose than merely being rubber stamps for a Liberal cabinet. If the cabinet is prepared to restore to this House of Commons a vestige of the authority that is historically its right instead of attempting to assume full control in its own hands, then these committees could be set up.

Therefore I would ask the minister, when he is overhauling this Combines Investigation Act, to give consideration to setting up a select committee of the house on small businesses, similar to that which is functioning in Washington. I have reports of the meetings, investigations and recommendations of that committee. In so far as there exist in the business world of this country situations that are similar to those in the United States, I would urge that my suggestion be taken into consideration.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to traverse the ground I covered the other day in reference to the minister's suppression of the McGregor report. There are additional phases in connection with it that I believe deserve to be mentioned. The minister has introduced a bill asking for changes in the Combines Investigation Act. Naturally, the question that occurs to one is this: If that same minister would not carry out the law as it was, is there going to be any assurance that with the law changed there will be any greater desire or zeal to carry out the specific provisions of that law than has been shown by the minister since January last?

As I listened to the minister the other evening, I awaited with interest the explanation he was giving to this house when he explained the reason why a mandatory act, by him to be performed under that statute, had been deliberately held up, had been deliberately spurned. One does not have to go back to 1649, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) did; but that was the first example, and it had a salutary result for approximately a hundred years. Not since 1763—

Mr. Knowles: That Stuart did not do it again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —during the days of George III has any minister dared to contravene a statute passed by parliament and deliberately refuse and neglect to carry out that statute. I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) smiling.

Mr. Howe: May I ask my hon. friend one question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Howe: Does he remember the flour milling report made by the same commissioners in 1933? Does he remember what became of it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a very good question. The provision for publication was brought in by this government in order to prevent any minister, of whatever persuasion he might be, from refusing to carry out the recommendation of the men in charge of the administration of the combines act.

Mr. Howe: Do what R. B. Bennett did. He dropped it in the wastepaper basket.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1937 terms were put in the act in order to prevent publication being avoided. What may have happened in 1932 or 1933 did not happen under a statute that imposed upon a minister a mandatory responsibility.

The explanation given by the minister may be found on page 1521 of Hansard. He said:

> Unless you can rely upon the possessory principle as regards the corporate accused it would be extremely difficult in some cases to secure a conviction. That is why we are bringing forward this amendment. That is one reason why we wished not to act upon the flour report or to publish it until we had our legislation in shape.

On page 1522 he said:

> If we get our amendment we will certainly be in a far better position as regards this—

That is the flour report.

> —or any other report than we are in now.

Sir, that explanation has no basis in fact. My hon. friend went through a labyrinth of excuses in order to arrive at that conclusion. He states that one of the reasons why he did not carry out the law requiring publication was to assure that within fifteen days the law would be amended to enable him to proceed, and no doubt proceed with a degree of hope of success. I did not see through that the other night until the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself spoke, and then I began to realize exactly the significance of what had transpired in this case. The Prime Minister explained that under a section of the Criminal Code—and the section would be applicable to the Combines Investigation Act—the period of limitation for taking action is two years. What actually has happened is that the government hid the report. The minister hid the report. He kept it under lock and key as far as parliament and the Canadian public were concerned until any right of action had been outlawed. He said in effect on November 7: "When I get these amendments I intend to proceed against these corporations." I ask him to tell us when he replies whether he is going to proceed. If he does, he will not get as far as the government of this country got in the dental supplies case.

The report implies that there were offences committed after the wartime prices and trade board ceased to operate. According to Mr. McGregor, on September 15, 1947, there were uniform increases that were beyond anything that was justified. That means that any action to be taken, even on the alleged offences after the operations of the wartime prices and trade board, had to be taken sometime before October 15, 1949. I ask the minister; did he hide the report so that he would be certain that action would be outlawed in any proceedings taken?—because that is the result. It is even more serious than a deliberate flouting of parliament. In one of the Letters of Junius a case of dictated autocratic action is dealt with in these words:

> Is he only the Punch of the puppet show to speak as he is prompted by the chief juggler behind the curtain?

Mr. Pouliot: Who is he?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friends on the other side can answer that. The Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would not call him a juggler, but he was the one who determined what the Minister of Justice should do. No Minister of Justice, or any other minister, much less the Minister of Justice, should have allowed himself to be the instrument whereby a report that should have been brought before parliament, or at least published within fifteen days, was kept away from the people of Canada so that no one now can take action regardless of the guilt of those mentioned in the report—and I am not saying that there is guilt; it is not for me to say.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, at recess I had just mentioned the fact that the effect of holding up the report until the month of November had the result of actually preventing any prosecution taking place.

It was some three years ago, when the amendments were before the house, that I suggested that certain changes be made. One of them, accepted by the then minister of justice, the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), had the effect of allowing any person in this country to take proceedings for alleged infractions of the Combines Investigation Act. Up to that time it was impossible for a private person so to do.

The result of holding up the report, therefore, has been that the right of every or any person in this country enjoyed under that amendment to take proceedings has in fact been entirely denied.

One other matter to which I should like to refer has to do with the question of publicity. There are some who feel that publicity in advance of a trial is a denial of the principles of British common law and our own traditions, and that while a report may be made to the minister, it ought not to be published. I raised that point myself in 1948 in connection with the optical case.

As an answer to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) I should like to read the reply of the then minister of justice, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, as it appears at page 4919 of Hansard for June 8, 1948, where he stated:

> As I said the other day when the hon. member raised this question on the orders of the day, that section or a similar section has been in the act from 1910 down to the present time. Of course, from 1923 until 1935, I think, the registrar was the important man; the general course was that the registrar made an investigation and a report, and the act was silent as to whether that report should be published or not. But if he reported that there was a prima facie evidence of a combine, a special commissioner was appointed; and the special commissioner's report was subject to exactly these provisions. From 1937 on, those provisions have been in the act.

That is, provisions for mandatory publication. Then he continues:

> I submit that it is necessary that there be publicity. At least, it is my contention or submission that there should be publicity. This offence is not at all like an offence that speaks for itself. It is all a mystery. The public has no way of knowing whether there is any combine or not. It is not like theft, bank robbery, or any of those other overt or open acts where it is clear that there has been an offence. Here there is just a dark surmise and that is all. If the public is to know anything at all about this, it must be explained to them by the report of somebody who has made an investigation. If you have no provision that that report is to be made public, there is no possibility of an opportunity for public opinion to operate on governments, attorneys general or ministers of justice. There is no possibility of that; and you have to make a strong assumption that public officials will be fully alive to their responsibilities.

At that time Mr. Ilsley made it clear that he regarded the necessity of publication of the report as of first importance in connection with revealing trading activities that contravene the Combines Investigation Act. That, I suggest, is the answer to both the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and to the Prime Minister, all of whom indicated that the reason there had been no publicity was that if publicity had been given there would have been a challenge to the government to prosecute, and that it would apparently put them into a difficult position.

On the same occasion, as reported at page 4920 of Hansard, I asked Mr. Ilsley this question:

I am not going to pursue the subject further, except to say that apparently the Attorney General of Canada, on receiving a report from one of the officials, under the Minister of Justice, in which definite findings are made of a combine, still has to be satisfied that the report which so indicates has a foundation for the conclusion reached by the commissioner.

Mr. Ilsley replied:

Absolutely; certainly he does. The Attorney General of Canada is not bound to do what the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act tells him. He is not obliged to take his facts, and he is not obliged to take his law. Presumably he will take his facts.

Those two excerpts from the words of the then minister of justice answer government spokesmen who say that the reason they did not give publicity to the report, and failed to carry out the mandatory provision, was one of two reasons—either that it would have given publicity that should not be given or, secondly, that the government would have been placed in a position where it would have to prosecute.

I do not think I am guilty of overstatement when I say that I know of no action by any government giving its support to private enterprise that will do more to undermine public belief in free and private enterprise than the fact that the publication of this report had been stifled until action can no longer be taken. If after producing the report according to law the explanation had been then made which has now been made, public opinion would have reacted either as against or in favour of the course pursued by the government.

I realize that, when discussing the question of combines, all too often it becomes a witch-hunt wherein any wrongdoing on the part of private enterprise becomes the subject of bitter attacks. I believe in private enterprise. I want to see it preserved. Over the years, and particularly during recent years, it has been and still is being diminished almost everywhere in the world.

During two wars there has been regimentation in the economic world that has left the feeling that there is need for regimentation in the days of peace, and that by the simple exercise of state control all our economic problems can be solved. The result of control by the executive during two wars has been that people believe that the state can and does create wealth.

In discussing the need to amend the Combines Investigation Act, I believe that there is a happy medium between the British and American attitudes. The British attitude, so far as monopoly is concerned, is that unless such monopoly interferes with the rights of other producers, competitors or consumers, the bigness of a business should not of itself alone be ground for prosecution. The attitude of the United States during recent years has been that the bigness of business in itself is an offence. In the last two years in the United States many prosecutions have been launched by the attorney general against great corporations whose paramount offence has been the size of the industries that have been proceeded against. All business is big as compared with what it was 20, 30 or 40 years ago.

The purpose in mind under combines legislation should be to provide equality of opportunity under the law so that every individual or number of individuals in our country may have the opportunity of risking capital in which the state is neither the insurer nor a partner. In other words, what a combines act should do is to provide equality under the law so that big and small businesses have equal access to markets and whereby the individual is protected against exploitation. Not only should the consumer be protected; the business competitor also should be protected. The purpose of anti-combines legislation should be to assure that degree of fair dealing as between business and citizens of the state as will guarantee the greatest benefit for the greatest number.

One of the great criticisms of our system is that it lives by returning profit. Business requires profit. Profit is of prime importance to the maintenance of our way of life. The profit system spells our prosperity. Having said that, I believe that when any business or group of businesses operate in concert so as to injuriously affect either the consumer or other producers or prejudice the state, then the state has a responsibility to step under law to punish and prevent.

When amendments to the combines act were introduced three years ago the then minister of justice, now the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), indicated the need for something being done in order to improve the act, and amendments were introduced and passed. There have been several attempts to improve the combines act, one in 1937, one in 1923 and on one or two other occasions. However, no matter what amendments are made to the combines act, if the government of the day charged with the responsibility of carrying out the law regards political expediency as a justification to not follow the rule of law, then the law is meaningless.

In 1946 I believed that as a result of the changes made there would be protection of the Canadian people against what Mr. McGregor referred to in his recommendations regarding cartels as an illegal monopolistic trend that had grown up during the war, the result of which was to deny Canadian citizens that freedom from unjust trade practices that they should enjoy if private enterprise is to perform its function. In 1920 the former prime minister of this country used to refer to the "hidden hand of plutocracy".

He came to power in 1921. The exploitation by certain monopolies during the time the present government has been in power since 1921—there were five years during which they were out of power—has been such that every indication is given that the law has not been enforced. And I mean no reflection on Mr. McGregor. The law can be enforced only if those charged with the administration of justice carry out the recommendations of the commissioner.

The Minister of Justice is not bound by what the commissioner finds. He must examine what he says but he must publish the commissioner's findings. I do not want to appear to place it all on the shoulders of the Minister of Justice. Far be it from me to do that. The minister was merely the instrument whereby the government of this country acted in a manner that has not been duplicated since the days of King George III in 1763. Never since has any minister or any government dared to depart from the rule of law. Some there are who wrongly contend that there is one law for the powerful and another law for the weak, and the fires of such criticism are kindled when a thing like that is permitted to occur and when parliament views it with almost dispassionate disinterest.

Now we have another bill. The hidden hand of plutocracy which was spoken against in 1919 and 1920 must have been so hidden that it has not been discovered by the present government or its predecessors in office. I return to the tobacco prosecution, and I refer to that case, as I did to another, as a debacle. These companies had been convicted and an appeal allowed on a technical objection. I asked in 1946 why the government did not go ahead and prosecute again as the prosecutions had failed on technical grounds. The answer was that the war had come and at all events the companies had reduced their prices by ten per cent.

That was no excuse for not prosecuting. A law on the statute books unenforced is simply an invitation to wrongdoing. When there is a law on the statute books that requires a mandatory act to be done by the minister of any government and when the ministers of that government associate themselves with him in transgressing that law, then they encourage wrongdoing by prospective wrongdoers.

The support of this party has been indicated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on the principles of the bill. I am not so sure that the doing away with the jury is a good principle. It is all very well to talk about the difficulty of making a jury understand; the fact is that juries can and do understand when there is wrongdoing that affects them under combines legislation. In Great Britain the company being tried has a right to trial by jury and in the United States it is mandatory. Why trial by jury is being taken away has not yet been explained by the minister to the satisfaction of all hon. members and it should be dealt with at greater length when in committee.

An amendment has been moved which I should like to summarize. It calls for the subject matter of the bill to be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce with instructions that the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and that it have power to report upon the extent to which effective administration of legislation relating to restrictive trade practices has been, or is being, prejudiced by the action of the government in failing to carry out the mandatory requirements of the existing law.

The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) said that he would have liked a motion of censure. A motion of censure would have been a specific motion against one or more members of the cabinet, or the whole cabinet. What we are trying to get in connection with this legislation is the power to assure that the mistakes that have been made in enforcement in recent years, and the failure of the government to carry out the law, shall not be permitted to become the practice in this country. Let us submit the bill to a committee. What can we do there? We can get answers to certain questions that we cannot get in the house. We can bring Mr. Gordon before that committee and find out from him what minister gave him authority to place any industry above the law.

The leader of the C.C.F. group has asked for the production of some documents. One would think those documents would be right at hand. The cabinet has been able to consider the McGregor report since January. By this time they should have gathered the documents together, if there were any documents. Then we could have Mr. McGregor appear before the committee. The government says that it wants to put teeth in the law. Mr. McGregor wants teeth in the law. He is the one we should bring before this committee because, according to an outstanding member of the press, Mr. Austin Cross, in an article this morning, we cannot get

Mr. McGregor's side of the question until the end of the year because he is a civil servant, and therefore regards it as part of his bounden duty, and properly so, not to speak out. The newspaper report to which I have referred states:

1. McGregor cannot talk directly to the press, but only to his minister.

Let us give him a chance to talk to members of parliament in a committee of parliament so that we shall get to the bottom of the controversy. The article continues:

2. The minister cannot put forward McGregor's views since they are in conflict with the government's views which the minister must express.

Surely we want to relieve the minister of a difficulty such as that. One way to do that is to set up this committee, and the house will thereby relieve the minister of any responsibility for having to say things that cabinet solidarity denies him the right to say.

Mr. Pearkes: That he is told to say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The article continues:

3. The flour millers were never forced or encouraged or authorized to fix their own minimum prices.

That is an important allegation. Let us summon representatives of the flour millers before the committee. We cannot punish them now; therefore they are in no jeopardy, the two year period of limitation having already run. The next point in the article is:

4. Board chairman Kenneth Taylor, examined in September, 1947, disclosed no authorization to price fixing.

That refers to the time when he gave evidence before a committee of parliament or the royal commission on prices. Let us bring Mr. Taylor before this committee and find out the facts. The committee could ascertain as well what possible excuse other than political expediency caused the minister, supported by a government that approves of what he has done, to hide a report for a period of nine months during which time there was an election when, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) recently said, "we held all the trumps." Was this one of the trumps that the government held? Was this one of the trumps during the election campaign? If it was one of the trumps, none of us ever saw it. It was kept out of view. The next paragraph in the article is:

5. Flour millers in evidence showed they were unaware of any exemption for them.

Surely, having given evidence before a committee of parliament or a royal commission, if there had been any such exemption they would have been the first to mention it. There are various other matters mentioned in the article by Mr. Cross summing up some of Mr. McGregor's views which could be inquired into. These are things that the people of Canada have a right to know. These are things that parliament has the right to know. It is not a question any more of there being any danger for any of the companies in having their officials come before a committee of parliament and testifying as to the facts. Parliament has the right to know what minister instructed Mr. Gordon in the days of war to advise any industry in Canada that during that period it was or could be above the law. These are a few of the matters that would be brought out.

No longer would we have ex parte statements such as that of Mr. Gordon which was read into the record the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). We would have Mr. Gordon before us. After all, he should be given an opportunity to explain, instead of being placed in the position of having a statement read regarding his views.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I confess that I cannot follow the hon. gentleman who has reached the heights of eloquence once more in debating this important matter. I should like to see the cat come out of the bag. There have been so many insinuations about different people that I should like to know who the guilty party is. My hon. friend was wrong in using general terms for his accusations. He complains of Donald Gordon, and he makes a saint of Mr. McGregor. How is it that McGregor became a saint as soon as he wrote this report? How long has he been there? When I first entered the house he was private secretary to Mackenzie King. When Mackenzie King was prime minister, McGregor was mute and dumb, and the only thing that he did was to make an investigation into the coal combine in which case a noted Tory, the crutch of Arthur Meighen, Senator Webster, was the guilty party.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Nonsense.

Mr. Pouliot: Who will deny that Senator Webster was the crutch of Arthur Meighen? He was a Tory.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): More nonsense.

Mr. Pouliot: McGregor made a report and action was taken. The Webster interests were sued for $25,000. Webster amalgamated his company and it was left there. Who is the Tory who complained against Webster? Where is he? There is not one to say a word. I admit that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has a gold and silver tongue as a speaker for his party, but he was not in the house at that time. There were other celebrities of the Tory party, and they were mute and dumb. Not a word was said about Webster. Everybody who bought coal suffered from that combine, and not a word was said about Webster by members of the Tory party. Webster was a Tory and he was a saint. My hon. friend is one of those Tories who have a gift of making saints of civil servants when their actions suit the policies of the Tory party. Every time there is a leak in regard to public business that should remain private until told the house by the responsible minister, that civil servant becomes a saint, a holy man.

An hon. Member: Ten months!

Mr. Pouliot: What is the matter? I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is jealous of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who thinks so much of the civil servants who speak through their hats most of the time. Not long ago the hon. gentleman was vituperating civil servants who had not spoken through their hats. He said, "Let us bring Mr. Taylor; let us bring Mr. So-and-So; let us bring those who have said nothing. We will make them talk". I know he is one of the most brilliant lawyers in the country; I know his clients will not be disappointed when he appears in court to defend their interests; but he reminds me of an old politician who was a successful candidate on one occasion thirty years ago but was never successful again. He was one of the best lawyers in the district, but he could not succeed in being elected. My hon. friend has succeeded in being elected, but he will not help his political fortunes by continuing to discuss matters as he has done tonight; and he knows I have great admiration for him.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it being established that the Tory party had some culprits in combines, I must come back to McGregor for a minute. A moment ago I said I knew him when he was the secretary of Mr. Mackenzie King. He was there for a time when Mr. Mackenzie King was prime minister. He said very little; he conducted the coal investigation and made other reports which few people ever read. He never complained that no action was taken on his reports. He waited until Mr. Mackenzie King had gone and then began to make a fuss, to the great enjoyment of the Tory party and the C.C.F., and perhaps the Social Credit group; I do not know yet. Then he was consecrated as a great man, one upon whom we could rely.

McGregor! Does the hon. member for Lake Centre really know what was the trouble and what was the combine? Would he dare mention the name of Mr. Morrow, of Toronto, one of the directors of the flour companies mentioned by McGregor in his report, together with many other Tories? Would he mention the president of a Toronto bank, the president of Canada Bread and of Strachan? In other words, does my hon. friend really know what was the combine? He gave us a long dissertation tonight, as others have done, including the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He said, "It is awful," but what was wrong? What was wrong was that during the war the millers made the price lower and lower in order to destroy the small bakeries, to their own advantage. They were able to succeed in that because of their subsidiaries, which were making cake as well as bread. There was no ceiling on cake, or the ceiling was higher, and the greater profit they made on cake allowed them to reduce the price of bread to rock bottom, in order to destroy the small bakeries and get more power for themselves later on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had better tell that to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Pouliot: I say that to you, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of all my colleagues. I know it is true, and if the hon. member for Lake Centre has never heard about it I tell him now, so that he may know what was the combine. That was it. Who was responsible for it? Those responsible were the directors of the big milling companies that had subsidiaries producing both bread and cake, and who were selling cake at higher prices in order that they might sell bread more cheaply, not for the convenience of the Canadian people but in order to ruin the small bakeries. Representations were made about this situation by individual bakers at the time Mackenzie King was here, but no action was taken. No complaints came from the Tories, who never knew about it until they were told this evening.

That having been said—without offence, I hope—let me take up these companies. The first is Purity Flour Mills Limited. The directors are: D. I. Walker, president and manager, Toronto; R. H. B. Ker, vice-president, Victoria, B.C. Then follows a list of tycoons living in Toronto, whose names I shall read: H. D. Egly; J. H. Gundy; F. G. Lawson; I. C. Hall; Colonel K. R. Marshall; C. F. B. Tippet; M. W. McCutcheon; J. A. McDougald. The subsidiaries are the Brackman-Ker Milling Company Limited and the Purity Baking Company Limited, both wholly owned.

That is the first one; now I come to the Lake of the Woods Milling Company Limited. Mr. C. H. G. Short is president and managing director; and I can tell my hon. friend that this same Mr. Short is in the grain business.

You know Mr. Short? He is president of the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, a great man, a great miller.

Mr. Coldwell: And he was the flour controller.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, he is. The vice-president is Mr. Walter Molson; the assistant general manager is W. L. MacGregor; and the other directors from Montreal are R. W. Reford, P. F. Sise, Alphonse Raymond and N. J. Dawes. There are also Mr. Isaac Pitblado of Winnipeg, Mr. J. W. Hobbs of Toronto, and Mr. J. H. Pillman of London, England.

The subsidiary is Inter-City Bakeries Limited. The president is Mr. C. H. G. Short, the flour controller. The vice-president and general manager is R. R. Hutchison; R. W. Reford, P. G. Robertson, Walter Molson, W. L. MacGregor, and C. W. Cotter, Ottawa, directors. They also control the Keewatin Flour Mills Company, the Medicine Hat Milling Company and the Sunset Manufacturing Company which operates a jute and cotton bag factory at Winnipeg. These subsidiaries are wholly owned. There is also Browns Bread Limited, Toronto and Hamilton; Standard Bread Limited, Ottawa; Standard Bread Limited, Montreal; and A. and L. Strachan, Limited, Montreal. Those all belong to the Lake of the Woods Milling Company.

Then there is Robin Hood Flour Mills Limited, operating the business of the International Milling Company. The head office is located at 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Delaware. F. A. Bean is the chairman. Charles Ritz, president; Atherton Bean, executive vice-president; J. M. Bruzek, P. B. Hicks, and A. B. Dygert, vice-presidents, Minneapolis. They have funny names. There is Mr. John Tatam, W. G. McLaughlin and G. H. Clark on the board of directors. Let us go once more to Toronto, and I shall ask my hon. friends from Toronto: whose is the hidden hand in Toronto? All these people are respectable people. There are some funny names, but that is not important. I shall ask my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre to tell us whose is the hidden hand behind the curtain? I do not mean civil servants, I mean the big businessmen, powerful men.

An hon. Member: Mr. C. D. Howe.

Mr. Pouliot: Well no, his name is not on this list.

Mr. Knowles: His name is on a boat.

Mr. Pouliot: No, it is Tatam or Pillman, or one of the other funny names.

Let us go to Toronto to the Maple Leaf Milling Company Limited. There is D. C. MacLachlan, president, and K. F. Wadsworth, vice-president and general manager. G. W. Stepan is the vice-president at Montreal. Are they the guilty men? Where is the leader of the opposition? He should listen to this and tell us about his friends from Toronto. The board of directors consists of Everett Bristol, G. C. Leitch, J. G. Singer, P. G. Kingsburgh, all of Toronto; E. E. Buckerfield of Vancouver and H. E. Sellers of Winnipeg. My hon. friend the member for Lake Centre should come down to earth from that high altitude at which he was flying and listen to this.

The subsidiaries of the Maple Leaf Milling Company Limited are the Canada Bread Company Limited, Canadian Bakeries Limited, Hedley Shaw Milling Company Limited and the Campbell Flour Mills Limited. The latter two are wholly owned. One of the other milling companies mentioned owns a manufacturing plant for jute bags and this company owns a line of steamers, the Port Colborne and St. Lawrence Navigation Company Limited, which is wholly owned. The Maple Leaf Milling Company also has a subsidiary, Eastern Bakeries Limited, which operates a chain of bakeries in the maritimes.

With regard to the Canada Bread Company, I should say it operates 21 bread and cake plants and 29 distributing depots.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On page 10 of the report, it says 59.

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps my hon. friend is more up to date than the member for Lake Centre or my humble self.

Now, let us look at Canada Bread. A. V. Loftus is the president and general manager —that is a new man; A. W. Holmested, vice-president; K F. Wadsworth, H. N. Bawden, Frank Hannibal, D. C. MacLachlan, our friend, and G. C. Leitch, our other friend from Toronto. They are the directors of Canada Bread. If my hon. friend desires to have some information, I shall give it to him.

Mr. Church: Do not blame Toronto for all those directors; they do not belong there.

Mr. Pouliot: The Canadian Bakeries Limited of Calgary, makers of bread and cake, operate 17 bakeries in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan and are controlled by Maple Leaf Milling Company Limited. K. W. Ward is the director and general manager, Calgary; D. C. MacLachlan, our friend, vice-president; K. F. Wadsworth, another friend; D. A. Ross, secretary-treasurer and general manager, Calgary; E. Buckworth, another friend; and H. Evans of Edmonton.

I have read some of these names, but I am not through yet. There is the St. Lawrence Flour Mills Company Limited. The directors are, D. A. Campbell, president and managing director; G. W. Grier, vice-president, C. E. Gravel, J. H. Labelle and R. E. Chadwick, of Montreal. Then there is W. A. Murphy of Winnipeg; A. G. Watson, Halifax, and G. C. Deeks of Toronto.

Next there is the Ogilvie Flour Mills Limited which is one of the largest. Let us look at Ogilvie. The chairman is the Hon. C. A. Dunning, and the president Mr. G. A. Morris. The directors are Sir Montagu Allan, R. H. McMaster, Beaudry Leman, A. M. Vaughan and L. J. Belnap, of Montreal. Then we have F. K. Morrow of Toronto. I shall ask my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre if that old friend of Bennett's is a bad man.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How did he get in with Dunning?

Mr. Pouliot: Just the same as we do together, but under different circumstances, naturally. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, I say nothing against these men, but I ask questions. I name all the directors of the milling companies mentioned by Mr. McGregor in his report. All the so-called culprits referred to anonymously by the member for Lake Centre and by the leader of the opposition are before the bar of the house. I should like the member for Lake Centre, who is the only member I have named who is present, to name them. Along with Mr. Morrow, there is A. Earwaker, Hamilton; Robert McKee of Vancouver; H. N. Davis, vice president; H. Groom, in charge of sales; E. B. Frost, western division; A. Atkins, in charge of operations.

The subsidiaries are the Ogilvie Grain Company Limited, the Seaforth Milling Company Limited, and Glenora Securities Limited. If the Tories are as brave as they should be they should name the guilty people. They have made accusations against the government; they have denounced the government; they have used generic terms condemning everything. I mentioned these names one after the other in an intelligible way.

Mr. Brooks: That is understood.

Mr. Pouliot: I mentioned Mr. Earwaker in an audible voice in the House of Commons. Let us page Mr. Earwaker. I mentioned these names. I have my personal views about it. This is not the time for me to say what I think about it. I said enough at the beginning. I noticed that what I said was new to those who were supposed to know. It is true; it is a fact. I went through these names of company directors at the last moment. I did not have time to check the number of cake bakeries, of bread bakeries throughout Canada controlled by the millers themselves. Would the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), would any members of the C.C.F. group, would any Conservative, any member of the loyal opposition of His Majesty, Conservatives, Socialists, or Social Crediters mention one name among those whom I have enumerated one after the other? They are all directors of the companies. They are those who made the policies of the companies, the policies denounced only after Mackenzie King has gone home. I am most surprised that my hon. friend who complained so much of Mr. Mackenzie King when he was the prime minister and leader of this party now canonizes him. They canonized Mr. Justice Ilsley and they canonized McGregor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When did that happen?

Mr. Pouliot: Just a moment ago. I believe that when someone is quoted by my hon. friend he pays a great tribute to him, and he must pay attention to what he said if he is going to quote him in the House of Commons. Perhaps the word "canonized" is pretty strong. He has canonized McGregor. One a day is enough. But nevertheless he spoke in more eulogistic terms of the former prime minister of Canada than he did when he was the leader of this party.

Now, sir, I have said enough. I could say much more but I am anxious to hear who is behind the curtain, who is responsible for the errors made by the government. Let my hon. friend pick out any one of the names I have mentioned. After he has done that he will be qualified to make another fine speech, to repeat some sonorous sentences and make gestures which are much more graceful than mine, and thrill the House of Commons with his eloquence. I am expecting that, but I hope that before that takes place the hon. member for Lake Centre will prove to the House of Commons that he is enough of a man to select those whom he has in mind out of the names I mentioned a moment ago. I expect him to do that, and I am sure he will do it.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest today to the previous speakers who have taken part in this debate on the bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act. It appears to me that we have listened to a good deal of crack oratory and the matching of nimble wits.

An hon. Member: Crack or cracked?

Mr. Hansell: I wanted to be polite and I said "crack". I trust that my speaking at this time will not be a case of a fool rushing in where angels fear to tread; for I do not claim to be a crack orator, neither have I much knowledge such as becomes the legal profession. But I have been doing a little reading lately in respect to monopolies and combines and business in general, as well as reading the explanations that have been given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the correspondence that went on between Mr. McGregor and the Minister of Justice.

I believe the bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act is worthy of support. I favour it. But I cannot quite convince myself that it goes far enough. It seems to me that the amendments are pretty well confined to the strengthening of the hands of the government for the purpose of prosecutions. That is all well and good as far as it goes. Whether or not it will take care of what sometimes happens in monopolies and combines in respect to unfair business practices I do not know, and perhaps it remains to be seen.

I once heard a speaker say something to this effect, that there was nothing wrong with a monopoly as such if it put on the market its production at cheaper consumer prices. I do not know that I altogether agree with that, but I have thought of the statement a good many times. All people are consumers and all would benefit even though it were a monopoly which put on the market production at a lower price to consumers. Perhaps there might be some confusion in respect of monopolies and combines.

I am not satisfied in my own mind that a monopoly and a combine are exactly the same thing. To all intents and purposes for argumentation I suppose we could put them together, but I think we should distinguish between them. I trust that I may not be accused of splitting hairs, but there may be a difference between a monopoly and a combine in this respect, that a monopoly, which term stems from another word, the Greek word "monos" which means first, all in one, or alone or single, put it whichever way you like, applies to a company which is the only one in that particular business.

That could constitute a monopoly. But a combine is just a little broader than that. A combine could consist of several business concerns in the same industry conniving and combining their efforts for a particular purpose. It seems to me that is the thing we are dealing with in the Combines Investigation Act.

We in this corner of the house believe in free competition. I believe that generally speaking the Canadian people believe in free competition, provided that free competition is also fair. We have been told over and over again that competition is the life of trade. I believe that we must maintain in Canada that same free competition, provided it is fair. For if we lose out here, then I am afraid we are losing the one great principle of freedom that has made democracies, and particularly the western free enterprise countries, the powerful nations that they are today.

However, perhaps it is not just as easy as that. Some interesting information came out from Washington the other day, where a house judiciary committee of congress is sitting investigating monopolies in the United States. A few days ago Mr. T. K. Quinn appeared before that subcommittee. Mr. Quinn was a former vice-president of the General Electric Company. A man of that status knows something about business. I should like to quote from a press dispatch one or two of the statements Mr. Quinn made to that committee. The press dispatch from Washington, November 3, states:

> An excess of concentrated private economic power has fostered big government and big unions, and is driving this country towards socialism, T. K. Quinn, president of the T. K. Quinn Company, New York, told a house judiciary committee today.

I want hon. members to take note of what he said there, because it seems to me that if big business is not regulated in a fashion so as to see that it is fair in its competition, perhaps we shall be driven into state socialism. Another expression from this article is:

> Mr. Quinn told the subcommittee, which is investigating monopolies, that the system of concentrated power in relatively few hands was "inconsistent and opposed to democratic objectives."

Then later on it states:

> The ultimate safe solution to the problem of "bigness in business is physical and financial decentralization," Mr. Quinn advised the subcommittee.

Before Mr. Quinn had finished giving his evidence he made several proposals which he thought might help to deal with that situation. I place these proposals on Hansard only by way of passing them along to the appropriate authorities for consideration. I do not do so because I necessarily agree with all of them; in fact with one or two of them I do not agree. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) may take them for what they are worth. Mr. Quinn's proposals included the following:

> 1. Banks and insurance companies would not be permitted resources in excess of—

—and the sum of a billion dollars is mentioned here. But of course that would be applicable to the United States.

> 2. Officers and directors would not be permitted to serve for more than one private corporation for gain.

That is one proposal with which I agree, because it would put an end to that vicious thing known as interlocutory directorates.

An hon. Member: Interlocking.

Mr. Hansell: I must have thought I was in that other debate.

Mr. Knowles: It sounds more like a minstrel show to me.

Mr. Hansell: Probably I was suffering from stare decisis when I used that term. Then it continues:

3. Corporations would be required to report annually, or oftener, complete profit and loss and financial statements by department, and subsidiary lines of business, and totals.

4. No corporation would be permitted to buy the stock or assets of any other corporation or individual without the approval of a governing commission.

It seems to me that is a good suggestion.

5. They would not be permitted to raise or decrease prices without specific approval of the federal trade commission.

Some adjustments might have to be made in that last one. Mr. Quinn however is only making suggestions which will help to stay the growing tendency toward centralization of business power in the hands of monopolies and combines.

There is another side to the picture, just the same, and I should like to offer some suggestions on that side. I now refer to an article headed "What Chance Has Small Business", appearing in the Reader's Digest. The writer is Samuel T. Williamson, formerly an editor of Newsweek and a staff writer of the New York Times. Mr. Williamson goes on to say that small business, to a very large extent, is the life of business in a nation. He does indicate that many small businesses at first go under, but he does not necessarily blame big business for putting them under, and states:

Sometimes a half million firms, most of them small, disappear in a year—sold, merged or just abandoned. Only one of two retail stores survives its first three years under the same management. Less than one store in three lasts more than seven years.

Then he goes on to say:

On the other hand, studies of retailing in—

Certain industrial states—

—show that the same mortality rates existed twenty and thirty years back.

Then he goes on to say that three economists who had analysed certain industrial districts discovered that stores did not last any longer a hundred years ago than they do now. Those facts are rather interesting. He goes on to say this:

In 1900 there were 21 firms for every 1,000 people. Today there are 26. And despite trends toward bigness, the average business firm has the same number of employees as at the beginning of the century.

Then he goes on to point out another rather interesting thing, that big business is sometimes dependent upon smaller business. He refers to one automobile company that buys from nearly 1,100 different firms. One speedometer maker, one of those 1,100 firms, buys from 200 independent suppliers. That is an interesting thing to learn. Then he goes on to say:

Even when large concerns do a big proportion of the business in their line they encounter smaller firms' competition.

I know that that is not always true, but that is what he says. He continues:

When U.S. Steel was formed it controlled 65 per cent of steel production. Just before world war II its share was 38 per cent. Today it is 33 per cent.

I should like to read into Hansard two more paragraphs which I believe are important. He says:

Almost every big business one can think of started small. Small business is the hope and beneficiary of competitive enterprise. As long as there are people who would rather work for themselves even if it means working harder, and as long as small units can do some things better and cheaper than big ones, small business has a future. As long as competition is free and fair it need not fear big business.

Business freedom may be measured by these questions: Are people free to invent new devices, to bring out new products, to organize new services? Can people buy what they need from more than one producer or seller? And are the producers and sellers operating on a competitive basis? If so, small business—any business—is free.

I would point out to the Minister of Justice, who has the responsibility of administering this act, that I believe what Mr. Williams says there is true. It is the responsibility of the government through its Combines Investigation Act to see that competition is fair. I once heard President Roosevelt say something which has stuck with me throughout the years; he said that big business is not always bad business. I believe that, but I believe also that if big business becomes bad business, it is bad indeed. We cannot permit big business to become so powerful that it is above the government or above the law.

I do not want to be uncharitable, but it does seem to me that in the discussion that has taken place, in the report that has been submitted, in the correspondence and memoranda that have been exchanged, it is indicated that the milling industry of Canada had become so powerful that it could influence Mr. Gordon to offer it protection if it behaved itself. Perhaps that is putting it rather crudely. I am not making any criticism of Mr. Gordon because I believe he was the man for the job.

We know that he came in for considerable criticism during the war because many people regarded him as a dictator. I am not saying that he was because I never ran into conflict with him, but I do know that that was the opinion of some people. We do know that he was armed with all the power that a man needed in order to prevent inflation and bring prices into a reasonable position in respect to trade and business. In that respect he was all-powerful, and yet it appears to me that we have a glaring example that he was not powerful enough to deal with a great industry without saying: If you will help me here, then you will be privileged.

I mention that in passing because unquestionably the evidence would indicate that that one big business was indeed a powerful business. I submit that the teeth of the Combines Investigation Act should be so sharp that big business that attempts to manipulate prices and distribute its product in such a way as to squeeze out small business can be dealt with. That is when big business becomes bad business, when it is able to so manipulate prices and so distribute its products as to squeeze out its weaker competitors. That sort of thing is inconsistent with our democratic way of life, a way of life which should grant to every man an equal opportunity to make good in business without fear of being destroyed by unfair business practices on the part of giant competitors.

We do know that there is a strong feeling among people that the big shot can get away with anything while the little man can get away with nothing. I do not think any business should be getting away with anything. Fair business is fair business. There is a feeling among people—I do not know whether it exists generally—that if a poor man steals a loaf of bread he is put in jail, but if the big shot steals a million dollars he is looked upon as being a rather brilliant and smart man.

I do not know that that would hold true in the administration of justice in Canada, but just the same that is what people think. A few years ago I met a man who had the experience of running for a seat in this House of Commons. He was waging his election campaign in the old days when he was on relief. He was a poor man, and during his campaign he wanted to get from one place to another, and he had to hitch-hike. Just as he was crossing a railroad track he saw a handcar sitting there and he said to himself, "I have no money, and there is a handcar. What does that add up to?" He got on the handcar and pumped his way for several miles to his destination, the next town.

The fact of the matter was that he was arrested and sent to jail. When he was running his election campaign a man in one of his audiences jumped up and said, "Are you bidding for our votes to enter the House of Commons?" He said, "Yes." The man in the audience said, "Is it not true you have been to jail?" That stumped him for a moment. Was he a jailbird? The way he answered was to say: "Yes, I have been to jail and I want to tell you the reason why I went to jail. I went to jail because I stole a handcar. That was my fatal mistake. Do you know what I should have done? What I should have done was to steal the whole railroad. I stole a handcar and was put in jail, but if I had stolen the whole railroad I would not be here asking you to vote for me because I might have been put in the Senate." In telling that story I cast no reflection on that august body, but that actually happened. You will want to know whether the man was elected. Believe it or not he was, and he sat in the house for a number of years.

What I am getting at is that the Combines Investigation Act must deal with business in such a way that it will guard the fairness of competition at all times. If there are any amendments needed to the Combines Investigation Act, I believe they must be made in order to strengthen the hands of the government in the administration of the act and in prosecutions under it. Believe me, unless there are prescribed penalties that will teach the powerful business tycoons that they must be fair, there is no use fooling around with the Combines Investigation Act at all. When I say they have to be taught and punishment must be meted out, I mean exactly that. There is little use in imposing on big business a fine of several thousand dollars or even $100,000. To my mind that is not punishment. I know that the minister may say that it is pretty hard to prescribe the particular punishment for an infraction of this law, but I believe it can be done.

I am not prepared now to say how it could be done, but I believe it could be done in such a way as to expose these men so that they will not get away with the attitude that, because they are business and financial tycoons, big shots, therefore they can do what they like. Their misdemeanours should be advertised high, wide and handsome. I do not know why their businesses should not immediately be put temporarily under the control of an administrator. Let the government step in with an administrator and advertise the actions of these men. They could advertise what they had done in newspapers and on the labels of the products if they wanted to do so. Let them advertise that the business is temporarily operated under a government administrator by reason of the fact that Mr. So-and-So, Mr. So-and-So, Mr. So-and-So, director So-and-So, President So-and-So have been guilty of unfair business practices. If there were teeth of that nature in the law then I think they would be pretty careful what they did.

I think I have said enough about the matter. I am in favour of the amendments to the bill, and I am saying that generally I think business in Canada is fair. I believe we can say that. I believe that the businessmen of Canada have a desire to be fair and to do business legitimately, but if it is discovered that they are unfair in their business practices then let us call them to account for their actions and teach them in no uncertain way.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of supporting the amendment proposed by my leader, and I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that the proposal made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is a reasonable one. The debate has disclosed that the matter is of a very grave, serious and fundamental nature. It affects the lives of everyone in the country and some outside of it.

A few days ago, speaking in another debate, I expressed the opinion that Canada was fortunate in that it had enjoyed good government. The events of the past few days compel me to modify that opinion, not only because of the revelation that a report, which by statute had to be made public within a fortnight, was kept secret from the public who are entitled to see it and also from the present session of the house and the session of the house held last spring, but also because of the contents of this report, and the contents of other reports that have preceded it, especially the one on the bread-baking industry in western Canada. I took the trouble to read a report of a committee of this house that was appointed in 1948 to investigate the rise in the cost of living. It is called the House of Commons committee report on prices.

In that report they drew attention to many practices they strongly condemned, and urged that the combines investigation commissioner should have greater funds at his disposal so that his department might be able to do greater work. Subsequently, on the recommendation of that committee, a royal commission was appointed which also approved of the work being done by the combines investigation commissioner and condemned certain practices which it learned were going on in this country and which were responsible for the rise in the cost of living.

Everyone in this country, rich or poor, no matter what his occupation, professional or layman, whether lawyer, doctor, fisherman, labourer, clerk or mechanic, is affected if there is a one point increase in the cost of flour. By every cent that flour rises everybody in Canada is affected. In my country we had no combines investigation act, and I was not familiar with the workings of this legislation. I do know, unfortunately, that some of the practices condemned in these reports, and which are illegal under the Combines Investigation Act, were carried on in Newfoundland. I know, too, that during the war these flour companies which were selling at the ceiling price here in Canada under subsidies from the federal government were not selling at any ceiling prices in Newfoundland. Hon. members will be surprised to learn that we were paying from $17 to $20 a barrel for flour. There was no limit to the profits these flour companies could make in export trade. I know the combines investigation commissioner has attended international conferences whose aim was to prevent corporations such as these taking advantage of the public not only in their own country but in other countries as well, and I wish his attention had been directed to the prices being asked for flour in Newfoundland.

Mr. Stick: He would have had no jurisdiction in Newfoundland; we did not have confederation then.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) says he would have had no jurisdiction in Newfoundland. Well, he would have jurisdiction now, and it would not be too late for him to come and make that investigation. Whether or not any investigation is made, we know now what they were being paid for wheat and flour in this country, and we know the profit that was being made in Newfoundland.

There are several things to which I take exception in these revelations, and which I think every hon. member, no matter what his party affiliations, must find reprehensible. The first is the suppression of the report. No justification has been presented to this house for withholding the report. It was a statutory obligation upon the Minister of Justice and the best that can be said in that connection is that he was prevailed upon by other, more influential members of the cabinet to withhold it. But then what about the interview described by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who had a question on the order paper asking if a report had been filed. The Minister of Justice went to his room in September and asked if he would mind withdrawing his question because the minister had some legislation to bring down and he would like to have the legislation ready at the same time the report was presented.

Who will deny that this is important legislation? Considering the seriousness with which hon. members regard this question, will anyone in this house deny that it is an important matter? Look at the publicity it has received across the country. Was there any mention of the amendment of the Combines Investigation Act in the speech from the throne this session? Was there any mention of it in the speech from the throne last session? There was not; and why? It is evident that the government did not intend to do anything about the Combines Investigation Act until they were forced into it by the combines investigation commissioner, Mr. McGregor. The Minister of Justice tabled the memorandum and letter of Mr. McGregor and was willing to have them appear in Hansard. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) rose in his place and said, "No, I am not going to have it," and as acting leader of the government his will prevailed again. But when the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke here on Monday last he took advantage of the opportunity to read a contrary opinion into the records of this house. If the government were sincere and honest and earnest about these things, why should they resort to such subterfuges as I have just described?

During the discussion there was some crossfire, and some heated words were exchanged across the floor. How many hon. members remember the remark by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell)? He said, "What is all the fuss about? I had twelve officials of my department resign in one day. Why all this fuss about one official?" There is present this evening one hon. member who may remember back to 1910; I am referring to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll). In January of that year another minister of labour rose in his place to introduce the very act we are discussing this evening. That minister of labour was none other than Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, who introduced the first Combines Investigation Act. Some hon. members, perhaps even some Liberal members, may not be familiar with the early history of Mackenzie King. He was especially chosen by the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier to attend every university at which he could acquire erudition—some knowledge on the subject of labour. Sir Wilfrid Laurier looked to the future, and he chose this man and sent him to Toronto, to Chicago, to Harvard, to Cambridge, so that he might acquire every possible bit of knowledge. Then Mackenzie King rose in his place in this house in 1910 and introduced the first Combines Investigation Act. At that time he said, "In this country and in the United States the people are noticing two phenomena, first a rise in the cost of living, and second an increase in the number of mergers and combines; and the people associate the two things. As the combines increase in number and in strength the cost of living goes up". Then he went on to give an elaborate account of the increase in the cost of living, together with an account of similar legislation in the United States and Europe.

That was the first Combines Investigation Act. It was to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies and trusts which might enhance prices or restrict competition to the detriment of purchasers. At that time Mr. Mackenzie King said the people had a right to look to the government for protection of their liberties. And despite what is sometimes said by my friends of the C.C.F., as in the days of old the people looked to the king to protect them against the strong, rich men, the "combine" men of those days, so today the people have a right to look to the government to protect their liberties. If the government should choose to protect the privileges of the rich men, then they do an injustice to the great majority of the people of this country.

The matter of the cost of living needs no elaboration today. There is no need to give any analysis of it, as Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King did in 1910. There is no need to doubt about combines and mergers today because we know they exist in greater number than ever. Mr. Mackenzie King said that, "unfortunately, human nature being what it is, we cannot believe that management considers primarily the good of a nation as a whole as opposed to those whose capital rests in their hands". Is that not an effectual answer to the statement of the Prime Minister when he referred to the patriotism of these great industrial magnates? In the course of my remarks, I shall have something to say which will cause hon. members to question whether or not those gentlemen were so patriotic as they have been represented to be.

Mr. Mackenzie King also suggested it was "the business of the government to see that no private interests are allowed to operate against the public good". Thirty-nine years have gone by since then, and many changes have occurred. There have been two world wars, kingdoms have fallen, and Mackenzie King is no longer active in the political life of this country. There is also the question of small businesses to consider. In 1924, there were 437 small mills operating in this country, and by small mills the combines commissioner means a mill producing less than 1,000 barrels of flour per day. In 1931, there were 372. In 1934, there was an increase to 435; but in 1947, the figures stood at 181. I say that is a serious indication that small businesses are gradually being absorbed by these great combines.

Now, what of Mr. McGregor? Who was he? Some bitter reflections were cast upon that gentleman by the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I do not know what personal rancour exists between these two men. Perhaps hon. members are not aware of the fact that Mr. McGregor was a citizen of Ottawa, the son of a grocer in this city. He left school at the age of thirteen, and went to work in a newspaper office. After returning to school for some time, he worked in the post office and then for several years acted as private secretary to Mackenzie King. For six years, he acted in that capacity when Mr. Mackenzie King had become prime minister. When Mr. Mackenzie King needed a man to act as combines investigation commissioner, therefore, whom should he choose but Mr. McGregor, the man who had been trained under his eyes? For twenty-four years, Mr. McGregor has carried on his duties, as I understand, fearlessly, honourably and honestly. He is capable, efficient, and incorruptible. Men like that are few in any government. Shame on the government that did not make some effort to retain in its employ a man of that calibre. They allowed him to be sacrificed to the interests of these flour magnates, who are not the friends of this party but the friends of the government in power.

Is there a need for such legislation? The report of the commissioner is the answer. He says there is a greater need than ever. The report of the committee of this house on prices and the report of the royal commission all indicate the need for strengthening the power of the commissioner against these combines. In the last twenty-five years, there has been an enormous growth of these corporations. I know of one institution that has two business houses in this city, and since 1921 it has multiplied until it now has 121 in Ontario. Last year, it turned over $73 million. What small businessman could open a shop within half a mile of such a giant corporation? These are financial and commercial octopi that swallow every competitor coming within their reach. These chain stores and multiple stores are injurious to the economic health of this nation, and so are the combines.

To whom was it good news when the government suppressed this report, if not to the corporations named in this report? Do you not think the directors of these companies, the men whose names have been mentioned, shouted "Hurrah for the Liberal government that has stood by us; they are our friends"? Can anyone be blamed for believing that these men acted in that manner? Why did the government suppress this report? Does the Minister of Justice tell the prosecuting officers that they must not take action against other people accused of offences? Eleven companies operating flour mills across Canada had intentionally assisted in the formation and operation of a combine, and yet they are not to be prosecuted. They cannot be prosecuted, in fact, because the report was suppressed until the two years prior of limitation had expired. Under the Criminal Code no prosecution can be launched two years after the alleged offence. I agree with the hon. member on my left who remarked that that provision of the Criminal Code should be amended to give greater latitude in the prosecution of combines.

Here is legislation which we are told has been recommended by Mr. McGregor, the man in whom the government no longer has confidence. The government must have been aware of the need of this legislation for some time. They must have been aware of the growing number of great corporations and the growing power of those corporations. No matter what amendments are passed at this session, those corporations will not fear such legislation when they realize that the government has practically ruled out the commissioner and suppressed his report condemning them.

An examination of this act raises two questions in my mind. Does it go far enough or does it go too far? Does it go too far against corporations who are so patriotic as to co-operate with the government in time of war? The member for Temiscouata, in his amusing speech, read out the names of the directors of some of the companies that were condemned. I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the report on the bread-baking industry in western Canada by Mr. Goldenberg, a special commissioner under the combines act. If hon. members have not read it, I recommend that they read it. If they will turn to page 100 of that report, they will find that two directors of the Ogilvie Company were conspiring on October 22, 1947, to put a man in northern Saskatchewan out of business. They bought him out for $100,000 and, if they had not done it, the Maple Leaf Company would have. Both these companies were in cahoots; they were combining to get that man out of business because he was an independent baker who was selling his goods at a price lower than the bakeries which these two giant corporations controlled.

If any honest man from Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, or British Columbia will read that report, he cannot help but condemn those two corporations. At least, he will then be able to understand why Mr. McGregor had reason for bringing in a report against this flour milling industry. For these are the same men who Mr. McGregor says have committed offences, and whom the government have chosen to exonerate.

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked whether we could name a man. Well, there are two men. Their names are right in the book on page 100. They are Mr. E. B. Frost and H. N. Davis, vice-presidents of Ogilvie Flour Mills. I do not care, Mr. Speaker, whether they are Tory or Liberal. Men who put up the price of flour or put up the price of bread and steal money from the poor, the poorest of this land, deserve no consideration whether they are Liberal or Tory or whatever they call themselves. They are not interested in the welfare of either party. They are interested only in themselves. They are selfish men. They want simply to have no competitors. They do not want to see anybody exist but themselves.

I think all hon. members, and especially the members of the government, must ask themselves this question: What is the state of this country? One would think sometimes that Canada is the only country in the world. One would think that there was no such place as Russia, where there are twenty million people who are slaves. One would think that there was no such place as China, where four hundred million people are being put under the control of the czar of Russia. It does not seem realistic sometimes to listen to the debates. All over the world there is a fear of the spread of communism. Have we no fear that communism will arise amongst us?

Czechoslovakia voted the communist government into power, and look at the condition of that country today. The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced to the country, through this house, that he was permitting landlords to raise rents. Look at the furore that he raised at the same time all over this country. There were protests. Why were there so many protests? There were so many protests, Mr. Speaker, because, as he said himself, the majority of the people of this country were living in rented homes. I think he was wrong. I hope he was wrong because if that is the state of Canada then I fear for it, unless some influence is brought to bear to change the tide and help to get the people in their own homes. I know of small places in the district that I represent, and probably hon. members who represent rural ridings know the same thing, where every man owns his own home. Not a person is worried about whether the rents go up or down because there is nobody paying rent. They all own their own homes. They are independent men. They do not care what happens. But the men who live in the cities, the men who live in rented rooms, men and women who live in lodgings, are the people who are fearful. These people who are drawing their weekly or monthly salaries and who live on fixed incomes are the ones who are fearful. If the price goes up there may be penury or poverty for them.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member is speaking on housing he is out of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I am not. On the point of order, may I say this. What I am drawing attention to is that we have to look at the people of this country as a whole, not as to the amount of money they are paying for their bread or for their rent. We want to see the people own their own homes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Mutch: Why don't you read the bill just once?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I cannot see who is speaking but I know the remark is not a very intelligent one. What I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, is this. What we want to see is a stop to this growth of combines, and a stop to this growth of chain stores and multiple stores. We want to see small businesses increase all over the country so that there will be a greater number of small businesses and people will become more independent. Then the country would be a better country. There is a way to do it. It should be done through this committee or it may be done in some other way. But I would make a suggestion, as the hon. member who spoke before me suggested a number of methods. This is a suggestion for the Minister of Finance. There should be a tax according to the number of businesses that a man or a company has. If a company has one business it pays a small tax; with two businesses a little higher tax; with three a little higher, and so on. When they get into hundreds of businesses then they should pay a million dollars a year in taxes for having that privilege. That is the sort of thing I recommend. It may be a novel idea to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) but I ask him to think it over. Think it over, and see if there is not something in it. Some positive legislation must be enacted. The combines investigation commissioner admits that the act is not enough. The Minister of Justice knows that the act is not enough, and that is the reason he has brought in this legislation. But I will tell him now that he will not succeed even with this legislation. The cases take too long, and the owners of these businesses are watching. They are watching when the investigator comes around, and they report it to one another.

As the commissioner said himself, the flour mills did not put up their prices after September 15. They knew he was conducting an investigation and they were minding their p's and q's after that date. The individual is becoming more powerless every day. Before it is too late, before socialism or even communism should come to this country I ask the government to give serious consideration to some of the ideas that I have mentioned. Let us stop this strangling growth of giant corporations. If we do not we shall have socialism or we shall have the welfare state, the servile state it was once called, and it would mean the same thing. We may have security but we shall have no freedom. In this country we want to restore freedom of trade, freedom of competition, because there can be no liberty without economic liberty. That, Mr. Speaker, is a thesis for another speech and I do not think I should go on with it at the present time.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, big business has so few friends here tonight that my usual sympathy for the underdog almost convinces me that I should come to its defence, but since big business is not the question before us I shall have to leave my defence of it until some other time.

We are supposed to be debating the second reading of a bill that was moved this morning by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). While I have not found myself in general agreement with the minister in regard to the flour-milling report, I am bound to say that he made such a good job of explaining the amendments proposed in the bill that there is really nothing much left for me to do. The amendments proposed are three in number, and they are fairly simple. Indeed, so simple that I am puzzled why it took the Minister of Justice so long to introduce them into the house.

Having said that, I may as well go on with the discussion that has been in progress here since early this afternoon, namely, why the report made by the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act was not tabled in the house nor published. It did not have to be tabled in the house, but why was it not published within the requisite time provided by law.

I read the speech made by the minister last Monday, and really as a defence for not making the report public it is about the weakest thing that I ever read. I heard it as well as read it. But coming back to the proposed amendments he said—

> If we get our amendment we will certainly be in a far better position as regards this or any other report than we are in now. I am going to base my request for support of the amendment on the position that I would not take the responsibility of prosecuting on any report unless we have this amendment.

I do not know what effect the amendments may have in regard to future reports, but if there is any validity in the opinion expressed last Monday night by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the amendments are certainly of no value so far as this report is concerned. Knowing what I do and, as I mentioned last Monday, that I was told that the draft of this bill was ready on September 21, I am inclined to the opinion that if Mr. McGregor had not resigned and forced the issue this bill would not be before us even now.

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend wishes to be fair and to state the facts, and that he will accept my interjection to the effect that the statement he has just made is quite incorrect. This amendment would have come down in any event; and so far as the commissioner's resignation is concerned, I may say that it was quite unexpected.

Mr. MacInnis: I shall have to take the minister's word for it. But that rather confirms my suspicion, that it was not until the minister had received the resignation that the notice was put in Votes and Proceedings. If it was the intention of the minister to introduce the bill in any case, then why was the introduction of the bill being held up? Surely it was ready quite a long time ago.

Speaking on Monday night the minister said:

> One of a number of matters which I found upon my desk at that time was the report of the combines investigation commissioner in connection with the flour milling industry. I should like to lay before you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, before the members of the house, the situation as I then found it. I took this report which was upon my desk—a report which had not been delivered to me in person because I was not here to receive it, upon a matter about which I had no more personal information than I have about the present state of affairs in Siam—

Then he mentioned that he took the report to cabinet, and found that there was objection in cabinet to the report; and that objection arose, according to the information we have heard in the house, because Donald Gordon had made a statement, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had made a statement, that certain undertakings or instructions had been given to the milling companies during the war years.

But is it not strange that apparently between the time the minister came into his office after his election in January, 1949, up until October 22, there was no effort made to bring together those people, Mr. McGregor, Mr. Gordon, and others, who could explain what it was all about? If the minister did not know anything more about the report than he knew about the state of affairs in Siam, surely there was a man in his department who knew something about the report. Surely Mr. McGregor knew something about the report—and Mr. McGregor would have been glad to explain the report to him. As a matter of fact I rather think Mr. McGregor knew more about the report than the Minister of Trade and Commerce did; and if Mr. McGregor had been consulted perhaps he could have told the minister that there was no reason in the world why the report should not be made public. If there was a reason, perhaps the minister could have induced the commissioner to give him a written statement to the effect that the report should not be published at that time.

We come to another point. If the minister did not know what to do with the report in January, 1949, he did know that the law required him to make the report public. He knew that parliament was meeting on January 26, and he could have come to parliament at that time saying that he had this report and that for certain reasons he did not want to make it public until he could amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Surely that would have been the logical and reasonable thing to do. Parliament had neither to prorogue nor to be dissolved on April 30. We could have stayed here until we had amended the Combines Investigation Act so that, as the minister has said——we will certainly be in a far better position as regards this or any other report than we are in now.

Had the minister done that, the milling companies could have been taken into court, because I understand that was prior to the expiration of the two years' time limit in which prosecutions could be started. There does not seem to me to be a single out for the minister—not a single out. It has been said that he has been hiding the report. I do not say he was hiding it, but he certainly did nothing to bring it to light.

Then we come to the replies he gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) at the conclusion of his speech. At page 1524 of Hansard we find this:

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister tell the house on what authority the government relied when it made the decision to violate the provisions of section 27(5) of the act?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Speaker, it relied upon the fact that any democratic government is answerable to the people of the country for its acts.

That would be a splendid answer if it were not for one fact, that the people did not know anything about the act of the government. So he hides behind the fact that the government is responsible to the people; but the people can carry out their responsibilities only when they know what the government is doing. And this government was very careful not to let the people know what it was doing.

The Combines Investigation Act was set up to protect the people of Canada. The provisions in that act were binding not only upon the commissioner but also upon the government. I am going to draw the attention of the house to something else the minister said. I really did not think the minister would stoop to this sort of thing. His genial, open countenance is such that one would not believe anything like this of him. He said, as reported on page 1520 of Hansard of November 7, 1949:

Mr. McGregor refers to my predecessor, the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, as having authorized these proceedings to go forward, but Mr. Ilsley's giving authority had nothing but academic significance, because his authority was not required. The commissioner himself has complete authority to go forward without authority from the minister. To charge the government that places in the hands of one of its civil servants that measure of authority with neglect in this matter seems to me to be somewhat unreasonable.

I did not understand that Mr. McGregor was charging the government with neglect.

Mr. Garson: I was not suggesting for a minute that Mr. McGregor was.

Mr. MacInnis: Whom has the minister in mind?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friends and his colleagues.

Mr. MacInnis: That is fine.

Mr. Garson: I am very glad my hon. friend brought that up because there was not the slightest suggestion that Mr. McGregor had anything to do with it at all.

Mr. MacInnis: All right, my mind is clear on that now.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend will admit that he has been making a slight charge of neglect.

Mr. MacInnis: I am still charging the government with worse than neglect. Indeed, what the minister has done would have been a cause for impeachment at one stage in British history. I do not think the minister really understands the enormity of his offence. What in the world is the use of putting laws on the statute books if the government takes the position that they will carry them out, or be governed by them, just as they see fit. That is the position to which the minister has brought our laws. The minister went on:

But, sir, notwithstanding this very great authority which the commissioner has, we in the cabinet like to feel that we have a small residue of responsibility, if I may speak jocularly, for matters of policy.

Is not the responsibility and the authority of the combines commissioner outlined in the act? Did the combines commissioner go beyond the provisions of the act? He did not.

Mr. Garson: I am reluctant to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think he is taking that last sentence completely out of its context. If he will look down the column of Hansard just about an inch he will see where it is stated that we had had a number of suggestions with regard to matters of policy in the way of suggested amendments to the act. If my hon. friend will just connect up the matters he is complaining about with the context to which it refers, I think it will all be self-explanatory.

Mr. Knowles: You hope.

An hon. Member: Read it all.

Mr. MacInnis: I have no objection to reading it all. There were a number of interjections similar to those the minister is making tonight. After leaving out the remarks of minor individuals, we find this:

Mr. Garson: We had a number of ideas from Mr. McGregor and his associates, in respect to the formation of which he was under no restrictions whatever. Any good ideas that occurred to them they put down and sent to me and I took them into cabinet. There were no restrictions whatever. Well, we had a few ideas ourselves—

Mr. Garson: That is the point; now you are getting to the point.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister continued:

—and we, with some timidity in view of the great powers that the commissioner had, ventured to put these forward, and he turned every one of them down. These are the ones he refers to in his letter.

I do not think there is anything wrong with that. Here is the minister putting certain ideas before the commissioner in connection with something about which he knows no more than he does about the affairs of Siam, and then the minister objects because the commissioner does not accept them.

Mr. Graydon: He should have seen C. D. Howe first.

Mr. MacInnis: My opinion is that he saw C. D. Howe too often. He should have gone into his own office, locked the door and told his office boy not to let C. D. Howe in. Then perhaps he would not be in the jam in which he is today. Mr. McGregor has had long experience in combines investigation. He made suggestions to his minister and the minister brought them to the cabinet. Surely Mr. McGregor's responsibility was completed at that point. The cabinet was not compelled to take his suggestions. The minister was not compelled to take his suggestions. If that is so, why bring them up, why refer to them here?

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend is asking a question I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. MacInnis: It was just a manner of speaking, but I have no objection to the minister answering it because I have seen his other answers and I do not think much of them.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps this is the type of question the hon. member likes to ask and not have answered. My answer is this: Everything that was done was quite proper. It was quite proper for Mr. McGregor to make his suggestions and for those suggestions to go to cabinet. I think it was equally proper for cabinet to have some responsibility about matters of policy and to make certain suggestions and to get Mr. McGregor's opinion on them, as my hon. friend has just been suggesting we should do. The point in this excerpt which seems to have escaped my hon. friend is that I was referring to the complaint in Mr. McGregor's letter of resignation that the council had had the great temerity to make some suggestions on its own behalf. The point that I was making was that we had had the temerity to make suggestions and he had turned them down, and that closed the matter. That is the significance of that excerpt.

Mr. MacInnis: I read Mr. McGregor's memorandum several times and I do not find any great complaint by Mr. McGregor that the minister or the cabinet did not accept his suggestions. He merely mentions that they did not.

Mr. Garson: He complains that we have had the temerity to send back suggestions to him.

Mr. MacInnis: The word "temerity" is not used in his letter at all; there is no such word in his letter. From the time Mr. McGregor's letter of resignation was tabled in the house there has been an attempt by the government to make Mr. McGregor's position as untenable as it possibly could be made.

Mr. Knowles: It is the minister who is really in the impossible position.

Mr. MacInnis: There have been several references tonight to free enterprise. I do not know whether those who made those references realized that the purpose of the Combines Investigation Act is to keep enterprise free. What is wrong today with free enterprise is that those who are advocating free enterprise do not believe in free enterprise. They believe in monopolies and combines. That is why I have a file of reports so thick that it is a burden to carry downstairs, all of them showing how certain industries combine for one purpose or another.

We had an investigation a little while ago into the bread-baking industry and I should like to read a little bit of the evidence from that report to show how fond free enterprisers are of free enterprise. This evidence was taken in Winnipeg. The witness was Mr. Conrad, and in the report I find the following:

Q. The Commissioner: Did Mr. Addems have authority to cut off supplies from Safeways, if they did not maintain the price?

A. I don't think he would do it.

Q. Did any such incident arise in connection with any retailer who didn't maintain your price?

A. There was one instance, if I remember correctly. That was with Safeways. They wished to sell our bread at one cent less than the other stores sold it for. We couldn't agree to that, we were price minded, and we lost business because we couldn't agree to it.

They lost business because they would not sell to Safeways. It continues:

Q. They were prepared to pay you the wholesale price and they wanted to sell it at a lower price than your other customers?

A. Yes.

Q. That being contrary to policy, you refused to sell them unless they were prepared to do as the others did?

A. Yes, that is right.

I wonder if that is free enterprise. The next item of evidence to which I wish to refer was taken in Vancouver, and is found on page 302 of the evidence:

The policy was also confirmed in evidence by Mr. Colwell, of Canadian Bakeries, as follows:

Q. What does bread retail at in the stores in Vancouver?

A. Eleven cents.

Q. What would you do if one of the retail stores should sell at 10 cents?

A. We would refuse to serve him.

Q. That would be your policy?

A. Yes. As a matter of fact I might add that has been the policy of the company ever since I have been with them. I started with them in 1912. Shellys first and then Canadian Bakeries, since 1912. I don't know of any single day we have not maintained the retail sale of our bread.

Q. That has been the policy of the company all the way through?

A. Yes it has.

Q. You have never weakened?

A. We could have held Safeways if we had let them sell at ten when the price was advanced; we told them we wouldn't do that and we didn't serve them.

The above quotations are to be found on page 81 of the report on the bread-baking industry in western Canada. Turning to the next page, and again in British Columbia, under the heading of "Agreements on tenders", the report reads:

As in Alberta and Saskatchewan, the bakers in British Columbia discussed and agreed upon uniform tenders for the provision of bread to the armed services.

The Minister of National Defence, whoever he was at that time, would ask for tenders for bread. They would go to great pains to advertise, and the particular bakeries would get together and decide on the price at which they would sell bread to the army, or sell bread to the people of Canada. The report goes on:

On December 17, 1941, Mr. G. R. Law, manager of Weston's, Victoria, wrote to Mr. Conrad:

"We have sent in the army tender for the contract January 1 to March 31 at 5 cents. Our last contract was for 5¼ cents. You will remember we discussed this on your last visit. Mr. Land of Canadian Bakeries and myself discussed this very carefully before submitting the tender and decided that with so much cheap bread around and with Vancouver bakers dropping their price we would be better to go to the five cent price. Our tender had to be in before I could get anything definite on what the Vancouver bakers were going to do although I had been advised that they were going to 4·90 at least. The tender, by the way, has been accepted."

That letter was exhibit 405 in the inquiry. Then we come to July 2, 1943, when Mr. Conrad of Weston's wrote to Mr. B. M. Colwell, manager of Canadian Bakeries, Vancouver. I think this quotation will show whether the prices board was making agreements to keep up prices. It reads:

The food administrator at Ottawa is complaining and has complained to officers of our parent organization that there is in Vancouver in effect a combine to regulate and keep up the price of bread to the army. Furthermore, he is sending Mr. Malkin to Vancouver to investigate the situation. I believe it would be a good idea if all the members of the association would get together and work out their ingredient, factory, administrative and shipping container costs, etc., so that they will be in a position to have time to discuss their own costs and be able to prove when the time comes—

That is, when Mr. Malkin arrives in Vancouver.

—that the price of 4·75 cents per pound is justified. To my mind there will be no difficulty about this whatsoever. One point which I believe to be very important is that since the bakeries have enjoyed a higher volume of business by their own right, the army volume of business is baked in overtime which would have effect of increasing labour costs. In my own mind and as far as our organization is concerned, there is nothing wrong with the price quoted to the army, considering the local conditions in effect at both Vancouver and Victoria.

Surely with all the information on the flour milling case that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) could have had by requesting it, and with experts to explain it to him, there was no necessity for him to take the advice of people who did not know anything about it. If he had only read the letter that accompanied the report from Mr. McGregor he would have found that the investigation was begun in September, 1947, that hearings were held in Winnipeg in October and November, 1947, and in Toronto and Montreal in January, February and March, 1948. The second last paragraph of the letter reads:

At my request counsel for the commission prepared a detailed summary of and commentary on the evidence which I then sent to the companies and persons involved as notice of the matters alleged. At the same time they were invited to supplement in any way they wished the representations and evidence already given during the hearings in regard to the same matters. Full opportunity was then given for those involved to present such further representations and evidence. Written or oral argument was then presented by or on behalf of all to whom notice had been given. In some instances the argument was directed primarily to a claim that the commissioner had acted without jurisdiction and without giving them adequate notice. On June 4, 1948, further hearings were held before me in Ottawa during which argument was heard from an officer of one company and its counsel.

In no case did these companies claim or bring forward proof that there were any understandings or instructions from the wartime prices and trade board or from any officer thereof. I suggest to the minister and to the government that they accept the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and allow the matter to go to a committee where we can bring all those together who have different ideas on these matters, where we can get their evidence under oath, if necessary. Then we can come to our own conclusion as to who is right and who is wrong. Until that is done we shall not know who is right and who is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): The only applause I get when I rise to speak is the word "question" from my good friends across the way. This debate has taken a course which greatly interests me. One of the most interesting things I have heard, I think, is the story of a friend of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) stealing a handcar. I know something about handcars; I earned my living pushing one all one summer when I was seventeen. The hon. member's friend must be a powerful man, because one man cannot push a handcar if there is the slightest bit of grade. So I think probably his friend preferred jail to pushing the handcar; in any event he would if he were smart.

There is something I am very anxious the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) should answer when he comes to close this debate. The thing that is bothering me is why we need the Combines Investigation Act at all. I refer hon. members to sections 498 and 498A of the Criminal Code, and I think perhaps the minister will admit that I should have some knowledge of this because in a case which has been much discussed here, known as the tobacco case, I was prosecutor until I was fired by the premier of Alberta, who at that time was also attorney general. I was not fired for knowing nothing about it; nevertheless I was fired. Then the gentleman who is now chief justice of Ontario, whose name I believe is McRuer, was paid by this government to prosecute the case; and he was thrown out of court on a much simpler problem than arose in the dental case. The dominion government, having taken over at least payment of the prosecutor, perhaps did not have the right to lay an information, so that ended in something of a tragedy. However, at that time I did pick up a little knowledge with respect to prosecutions. This is the section under which I prosecuted:

498. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and not less than one thousand dollars, who conspires, combines, agrees and arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company—

I shall just read the side notes, not the subsections:

To limit transportation facilities; or
To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or lessen manufacturing; or lessen competition.

The saving clause is:

Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

By virtue of that saving clause our organized unions were freed from any charge of conspiracy. Not much attention is paid to that now, but the point I am making is that at one time this government of Canada did pass this legislation in favour of labour unions, though we get very little thanks from some of them at this time. Then I come to section 498A:

Discrimination in Trade

Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars or to one month's imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, who

(a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates, to his knowledge, against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance available at the time of such transaction to the aforesaid competitors in respect of a sale of goods of like quality and quantity;

Then there is an exception, and it goes on:

(b) engages in a policy of selling goods in any area of Canada at prices lower than those exacted by such seller elsewhere in Canada, for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor in such part of Canada;

(c) engages in a policy of selling goods at prices unreasonably low for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

The point I am making is that in its wisdom parliament put these provisions in the Criminal Code, enforceable by anyone. Informations may be laid by anyone against a combine, against any discrimination, against pricing things at a level designed to destroy a competitor; and it seems to me that in the Criminal Code itself we have everything they have in the Combines Investigation Act, as far as I know, except the special machinery set up for doing these things. So as far as I was concerned I laid my charge under section 498. Then, as I say, I was fired and a great counsel came into the picture. He decided the charge should be laid under this pet Combines Investigation Act. I quit in this way. I put in evidence which I thought, and still think, was admissible; then I entered a stay. Following that, this new charge was laid by this great man; but the appeal court told him what every law student knows, that a stay is not the end of a prosecution, and you cannot prosecute a man twice for the same thing and at the same time. So the tobacco case was lost. That is the simple story; it is in the judgment of the appellate court.

The point I am trying to make generally with respect to these prosecutions is this. Obviously I have not had the opportunity, nor would I accept it if I had, of reading the many documents and exhibits filed in the dental case; but I have read the judgment. I wonder just how far that judgment goes. In the tobacco case, for example, they had written agreements signed by the president and secretary of the company. In that case the allegation was—and it was quite true—that these tobacco companies, all of whose headquarters were in Montreal, had these agreements signed with every wholesale tobacconist and every wholesale grocer throughout the country. They really did a job. They left no loose ends to be gathered up; it was a printed form which these people signed. In one instance I have particularly in mind, because the wholesale house was in my own city of Calgary, I put in the agreement signed by the president and secretary of the company.

Perhaps I rudely interrupted the minister this morning when he was introducing this bill in stating that, when a document is signed by the president, the responsible officer of the company in the ordinary method of carrying on business, no court in this world has a right to say that further proof is needed. I shall go further. Supposing you do need more than that. Let me exaggerate the decision of the appeal court of Ontario, as I feel sure the minister is exaggerating it. I am not suggesting any bad faith; let us have no doubt about that. I do say this: Even carrying it to its limit, the officers of the company could be called, as was done in the tobacco case, and asked "Whose signature is that?" Who is he? What is he in your business?

You do not need to worry. Your witnesses are unsympathetic, of course. Any time you go in, as we did, back a truck up against the head office and start shovelling the evidence into the truck, you do not need to worry. We had a mounted policeman and a couple of chartered accountants. Not only did we do that, but we took the filing cabinets the files were in and put them in the truck. This was done to avoid transshipment. The member who said I knew nothing about transportation is not here tonight, but I can tell him that is to avoid transshipment. That is the way the Combines Investigation Act operates. Although I laid the charge under section 498 of the Criminal Code, remember that all the preliminary work had been done by the combines investigator. They had lots of them. They stood a fellow up against the wall and said, "Is that your signature?" "Yes, that is mine". It is the only criminal prosecution of which I know, except those in the republic of France, in which the accused man is stood up against a wall and cross-examined by one occupying the position of a magistrate. The accused is without counsel and has no right to withhold what he has in his mind. That is the method of operation under this act, and I do not think anyone would deny that.

I went down to Montreal and helped myself to what I thought were the rather interesting files in the Imperial Tobacco Company, Macdonald Tobacco Company and Benson and Hedges. Then, I changed my pasture and operated in Edmonton. I dared not do it in Calgary, sir, or they would have run me out of town, as they should have; that is no way to undertake a prosecution.

What is our particular problem? I am going to attempt to strip this amendment to its bare essentials to see what it means. The amendment is that we should have a committee before whom we shall be privileged to call witnesses. At law, our position is this: The other day the Minister of Justice read to us the results of certain prosecutions. Tremendous fines had been imposed upon corporations. Perhaps they were not enough; I do not know. I cannot discuss that. These corporations were convicted of a breach of the Combines Investigation Act and they paid their penalties. Now we have the Minister of Justice forced into the position of a breach of the same act which cost these men all this money. He has pleaded guilty to a breach of the same act under which these corporations were charged; that is the simple position. The minister pleads guilty. He does not deny he failed to file that report within fifteen days after it was delivered. I do not know that I have ever felt more sorry for a man in my life than I do for him. The minister has been ill-advised, and at law what is he doing now? He is pleading guilty, and then calling the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to give evidence of character and extenuating circumstances. That is the simple position in which this house finds itself at the moment.

What is all this difficulty about? The ministers frankly disagree with one another, then drive one another home to dinner and that ends that. They laugh it off in this house. They are not the people who are really at cross-purposes. Their difficulty was a simple one; shall be publish it or shall we not? Shall we break the law or shall we not? Let us break the law because we will bring in some amendments and morally we shall be free. Legally, they are in breach of a mandatory statute. The two men who are really interested are McGregor and Gordon. McGregor says, I do so and so, and he puts it in writing to the minister. He leaves it on the minister's desk, which is all he is entitled to do.

Mr. McGregor was entitled to say that, in his judgment, this report should not be made public. Apparently, without any cloudiness in his eyes or in his brain, he decided not to so recommend. His failure to do that put the minister in a spot, Mr. Speaker; there is no doubt about that. The minister had only recently arrived from a little place called Winnipeg, which is neither east nor west, and never the twain shall meet until earth and sky stand presently, and all that sort of thing. The minister was faced with this difficult problem. He was the junior member of the cabinet. These big boss boys who have been here for some time said, "Stuart, do not do it; we might get into difficulty". The minister said "Where do I go from here?" Ten months later these bosses said, "Publish the thing because McGregor has resigned". No one knows how I get these secrets from the cabinet but, really, that is about what took place.

The difference is really between Mr. McGregor and Mr. Gordon. Let us get McGregor and Gordon before a committee, leaving out the sin of omission which at law, as the Minister of Justice knows, is often worse than a sin of commission. Who are the people who meet head on over this whole business? It is Donald Gordon and Fred McGregor, that is who they are. One said so-and-so and the other said something quite to the contrary. One says the whole thing is excusable because he told these companies, both verbally and in writing, that they were free of the Combines Investigation Act for as long as the wartime prices and trade board was in existence—not for the period of the war, but as long as prices were under the control of that board.

A request has been made for that correspondence. It has not been produced. A memorandum from Donald Gordon has been produced. I am not criticizing anybody. I do not do that until I get the facts. I will admit that Donald Gordon is perhaps the best Scotch singer of whom I know in Ottawa. When it comes to his judgment of the Combines Investigation Act, however, I want to know what he knows about it. I should like to know whether he was accurate in the memorandum which he gave to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and which the Minister of Trade and Commerce, through the great kindness of his heart and nothing else, read to the little children of this house. We are to accept the crumbs that fall from our master's table and we are supposed to be well satisfied.

I have outlined what the amendment requests, that we might have a committee in which we humble members of parliament might be able to ask these great civil servants a few simple questions. Is that unreasonable? Is there anybody on the Liberal side who would suggest to me that that is unreasonable? Remember, I know that in the back of your minds you all have the idea that the man who is talking is seeking to do some terrible thing politically, or something of that sort. But there are limits in these committees. We have good chairmen of these committees. I would suggest that the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), who I think is one of the fairest chairmen of committees that I have ever known—and that is no reflection on anyone else, but he is tops—be made chairman of the committee. Then, let us get Fred McGregor; let us get Donald Gordon. They differ in this thing and in various things. And let us, the members of the House of Commons, find out what the true situation is. There can be no ministerial difficulty about it, because either of these men is right or he is wrong. The story we get from them is this. First, Gordon says that in a limited period he gave these undertakings verbally and in writing. Well, he can tell us to whom he gave them. If they are in writing he can produce the letters that he wrote. If they are oral he can tell us. In the meantime, little McGregor, little wee McGregor as he is now, not what he was just a few weeks ago, can give us the reasons in some detail for his resignation. That is all the amendment means. Is there anybody who will suggest that that is unreasonable in any way?

What is the other side? We won't grant a committee. We won't permit these questions to be asked. We won't have these men meet one another—I trust face to face. I believe they are very good friends even now, but one of them can be mistaken. Let us put it on the best ground we can. Let us find out which one is mistaken or which one perhaps is being even more than mistaken. And then let the members of the House of Commons form a judgment on the whole matter.

I turn now to another aspect of the amendment itself. I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will correct me if I have misinterpreted the meaning of the section dealing with evidence. As I remember it, the old law of the scoop shovel method, which was backing a truck up and throwing everything up on the judge's desk, came from a case about twenty or twenty-five years ago from the same court of appeal in Ontario. It was Rex v. Clark or some such short name. I am not sure of it, but it was an appeal court case, and that is where we got into this habit of trying to prove things in that way.

May I say to the lay members of the House of Commons that you do not need to have conspirators all in one place or have them together. You may convict people of conspiracy who have never seen one another or have never heard of one another. That is part of it. You first show that there is a conspiracy and then here we go gathering nuts in May, and you pick them in Siam or in London or in any other place. They have never seen each other, and yet under our law they may be guilty of conspiracy.

I am going to say this to the Minister of Justice. We should exercise the greatest care in finding a man guilty before trial. Let me say at once I agree with him that the amendment to the statute says that what the government seeks is the rebuttal presumption. That of course means that I am guilty but I may have a chance to prove myself innocent. That is exactly what the rebuttal presumption is. I often think that perhaps the further we wander from the great rule of English law that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty the more we incur grave, perhaps not consequences but, I fear, consequences which may arise from something like that. Under the Criminal Code the only one that I remember at the moment is one that I am in hearty agreement with, namely, in connection with drugs. I am in hearty agreement with the principle that in the case of any person found in possession of drugs we should say to him, you are guilty unless you prove yourself innocent. But with great respect, Mr. Speaker, I cannot—perhaps it is my training in law—say other than that I find it difficult to accept the idea which is inherent in this bill that we need to depart from the old idea of innocence until guilt is proven. I repeat what I said a moment ago.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes.

Mr. Garson: In his prosecution of the tobacco combines in Edmonton did he not himself as prosecutor invoke this possessory principle in getting admitted as evidence these truckloads of documents which he brought to that trial?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh I did, yes, but I failed to have them admitted as evidence. They were all marked for identification; and when I explained to His Lordship and asked him, which was quite nervy for counsel, why they were not marked in evidence, he told me that I had a lot of experience at the bar and that I should know. I then went to the attorney general of Alberta and suggested that we have a stay, that I could not get any further with the rulings I was getting from the judge. I was relying on that Ontario case of which I spoke.

Mr. Garson: I am not implying any criticism of my hon. friend as counsel. I was just asking for information as to whether in that case he did not invoke the same possessory principle which he now decries in this bill.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No. May I make myself very plain about this. At the moment I was not discussing that. I was discussing the rebuttal presumption. I had finished dealing with the evidence. The minister will remember I did say that I could call and did call officers of these various corporations who explained whose signature that was, what his job was, what an executive was, what his position was, what his authority was; in fact, the difficulty that the minister ran up against in the dental case. I still say that the officers of these corporations are available. If they are dead they have successors who are quite capable of telling whose signature this is and the other is, what his position was and the authority he had to carry on the corporation's business. When I was interrupted by the minister—and I welcomed it because I am trying to be helpful; I hope the minister will interrupt me if I make any mistakes—I was turning back to the old principle of the rebuttal presumption which is contained in the bill. As I say, under the Criminal Code the only one that I remember—there may be others—is that of people being charged with possession of dope.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Smith (Calgary West) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up first Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944; then second reading of Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway; then Bill No. 146, to authorize the granting of a subsidy to the government of the province of British Columbia in aid of the construction of an extension to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway; and lastly the house in committee of the whole on Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 15, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

STRAIT OF CANSO

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, of which, because of morning sittings, he has not had notice. At some time before prorogation would he be in a position to make a report to the house as to the progress which is being made in the matter of the construction of a bridge over the strait of Canso?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): When the estimates of the Department of Transport are under discussion I shall be glad to make a statement on the matter referred to by the hon. member.

CITY OF OTTAWA

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF SHELTERS AT BUS STOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Would the government consider erecting a shelter for the large number of people who wait for buses next to the Chateau Laurier hotel in the cold and wintry weather? It is largely crown property. Would he confer with the civic authorities in the matter, and act accordingly? I raised the same question last session, and he said he would.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I cannot recall what I said on the previous occasion, but I know these crown lands are close to certain of our buildings. The policy of the government in the past has been to keep such lands free. I believe they have changed twice in the last three years the stopping places of these buses, and we do not know whether the city would wish to make any further changes. However, I have taken note of the hon. member's question, and I shall ask my officials to consider the matter.

Mr. Church: The fact that the city recently became the owners of the street railway might make some difference in the matter of their willingness to erect a temporary shelter.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR JOINT OPERATION OF HOUSING PROJECTS AND LOANS TO HOME OWNERS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before commenting upon the proposed legislation I should like to make some general remarks, including a few references to what has been achieved in the field of housing by the aggregate efforts of all who have concerned themselves with this important activity.

Housing accomplishments in the years before 1949 have been reviewed on a number of occasions in this house. Factual information will be found in the annual report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which was tabled on March 22, 1949, and in "Housing in Canada", a quarterly publication of the corporation. I will therefore confine my remarks to the housing situation as it has developed in the course of this year.

On September 21 I said that new housing, even at the present record rate of production, was barely keeping up with current needs, and making no important inroads into the backlog. In degree this is less true in 1949 than in any previous post-war year. Our housing completions this year are likely to be about twenty per cent higher than in 1948, and net family formation is likely to be about ten per cent below that of last year. On this basis new housing would exceed net family formation by about 20,000 units. Two years ago net family formation exceeded the number of new housing units by a large margin. Last year new housing was just about in balance with net family formation. This is the first year that some progress will have been made to reduce the backlog of housing need accumulated both during the war years and the depressed thirties. It is not an important inroad, considering the magnitude of the backlog; nevertheless it is a significant reduction of the over-all housing need.

A favourable feature of the housing situation is a distinct levelling-off of building costs during 1949. During the first nine months of 1949 the weighted index of residential building costs changed very little. Hon. members will recall that in the years 1946, 1947 and 1948, construction costs, as represented by this index, rose 11 per cent, 22 per cent and 11 per cent respectively. The weighted index of materials is approximately one per cent under that of January 1, 1949. This is offset by a weighted wage increase of approximately 3 per cent, so that the index is now only fractionally higher than it was at the first of the year.

Furthermore, a more regular and adequate supply of materials, together with increased productivity of the house building labour force, has had the effect of reducing costs. I am not suggesting that the price of new houses has decreased appreciably, because under present market conditions it is the sale price of a house rather than the cost of construction that is the governing factor. A year ago Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was having difficulty in securing contractors to build veterans' rental units. They were able only to secure prices subject to an escalator clause. This year there has been keen competition in bidding for jobs in all parts of the country, with the result that comparable houses are costing about three per cent less this year than last. These reductions are not large, but they do represent a cessation of the continuous upward cost trend experienced since the end of the war. In 1950 we may expect further improvement in the supply situation. As a result there is reasonable prospect that building costs will not be higher than in 1949.

There is general complaint about high building costs in the post-war period. High prices of building materials, high wage rates, high profits, and inefficiency of the building industry, are the reasons usually ascribed. We would all like to see construction costs lower than they are today. But it might be helpful to consider a few facts which provide us with a perspective in this matter.

It is true that it costs about twice as much today to build a house as it did before the war. But it is also true that the income of the average person in 1949 is more than twice as great as it was in 1939. In that year, in per capita terms, the average Canadian had a net income of $371 after taxes. But in 1948, the year for which the latest figures are available, the corresponding income was $859, or about two and one-third times as high as it was ten years ago. The relationship between prices of housing and incomes is probably more important than the absolute level of construction costs. It is true that there are a number of families who cannot afford new houses at present prices and costs, but the fact remains that more new houses are being built and more existing properties are being sold when both costs and incomes are up than was the case before the war when costs and incomes were much lower.

The outstanding feature of the housing program this year has been the continuation of the large volume of new starts and completions. During the early months of the year, new residential starts ran far ahead of the corresponding months of 1948. In June, July and August the starts dropped sharply in comparison to a year ago, and it was thought by some that perhaps the experience of these three months indicated a trend. However, starts in September were buoyant and somewhat in excess of the corresponding figures for 1948.

Completions have been at new record levels. The heavy carryover of partly completed units at the beginning of the year, together with the high level of new starts, has resulted in completions far above 1948.

Complete figures up to the end of August and partial figures during September indicate that 62,500 new housing units were completed in the first nine months of 1949. This is an increase of 24 per cent over the corresponding period of 1948. If the last quarter of 1949 follows the pattern of the last quarter of 1948, completions of new units will amount to approximately 92,000. Adding conversions to new units, total completions of all kinds for 1949 would under these conditions be of the order of 96,000.

Starts in the first nine months of 1949 were about 71,000, almost the same as in 1948. Units under construction at the end of September, 1949, amount to 65,800, as compared with 63,700 a year ago. Projecting new starts for the remainder of the year on the same basis, a total of 86,000 starts might be expected.

There are, however, two important qualifications to the projection of the figures for the first nine months of 1949 as an estimate for figures for the full year. The effect of the steel strike in the United States may reduce the number of completions during the last quarter. In respect to starts, a repetition of last year's pattern requires weather as favourable as it was in the last quarter of 1948.

Speaking in this house on July 22, 1946, my predecessor, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), estimated that some 480,000 units should be built during the five years ending March, 1952. He set a target of 80,000 units for 1947-48, and 100,000 in each of the following years. Up to the end of September, 1949—the first two and a half years—his estimate was 230,000 units. During that period completions have amounted to 212,134 units. This is substantial accomplishment of the target of completions, and full accomplishment if allowance is made for the increased number of houses presently under construction.

The greatest part of housing completions in 1949 will be by private endeavour. Housing on direct government account, such as veterans' rental units, married quarters for the Department of National Defence, and other activities resulting in government ownership, will account for about 14 per cent of all completions. Another 25 per cent is financed under the National Housing Act. The remaining 61 per cent of completions will be without government sponsorship of any kind.

I would call the attention of the hon. members to the fact that this unprecedented amount of housing has been built during a time when capital investment of other forms also has been at a record level. With the exception of a few areas, the construction industry is fully employed. Nor is there indication of an immediate decrease in the aggregate volume of non-residential construction. This is probably a good thing, because most of the current non-residential construction program is necessary for the growth and welfare of the nation. If there were a lessening in non-residential construction, it might be possible to increase residential construction by a moderate amount. I say a moderate amount, because the limitation upon our house building program is not only because the construction industry is fully employed, but also because of the shortage of serviced land.

Much has been said about steps which the dominion government might take to promote the building of many more thousands of housing units each year. I need hardly remind those familiar with housing problems that the first and foremost need is for land upon which to place houses. Municipalities have definite ideas as to the manner of development of their communities. Services of all kinds must be provided—not only those immediately adjacent to the houses, but also basic services such as pumping stations, schools, sewage disposal and facilities of the kind. Some municipalities are having trouble in financing these services for the current residential construction program; other municipalities have no undeveloped land within their boundaries. This is an important limitation upon the volume of new housing which can be built. The bill now before the house contemplates a co-operative arrangement between the provinces and the dominion to assist the municipalities in this respect.

Quite naturally, a great many people are talking about housing these days. Some people believe that the only solution is a subsidized public housing program to look after those who cannot afford to pay economic rentals. Others believe that the only way is for the governments to sponsor large quantities of modest dwellings to be sold to potential home owners on a rent-purchase plan with little or no down payment. Others believe that, if enough houses are built for those who can afford them, in due course the filtering process will work so that everybody will be comfortably housed. It seems to me that there is nothing mutually exclusive in various methods of making progress. There is great merit in—and certainly it is the policy of the government to encourage as much as possible—new housing by private enterprise. A good case can be made to widen the band of potential home owners by terms of financing. Hon. members will notice that we have taken steps along these lines in the bill now before the house, and I doubt if there are many who will object too strenuously to the proposition that there is a group of families in this country which is financially unable to improve its housing condition and for whom public housing with subsidized rentals is necessary. It seems to me that the problem is so large and so important that every reasonable approach must be used.

Perhaps the most important principle of the legislation which we are now considering is the new structure being created for dominion-provincial co-operation. Years of experience of the federal government in the housing field on its own account have indicated very clearly the impracticability of the dominion being the sole participant in a long range national housing program. The provinces have authority and facilities in the real property field. Moreover they, with the municipalities, are better judges of local housing needs than is the federal government. Any good plan must contemplate close and continuous co-operation between all three levels of government. I hope that the pattern we are now proposing, which has received a measure of informal support from some of the provinces, will provide a long-term method of operation whereby the three levels of government can assist the orderly development of housing throughout the country.

In the immediate future, this pattern will be useful toward making good the housing shortage. A further consideration is that the day may come when the building of a large volume of new housing will be welcomed as well for the employment it will provide. All hon. members will remember evidences of this during the thirties. Construction then was, and perhaps still is, one of our most volatile industries.

The policy of the dominion government, and we presume most provincial governments, will be directed towards an even flow of new residential construction by private enterprise. However, the pattern which we are now suggesting will provide an opportunity for public investment in this field should it be considered desirable. To illustrate my point, I can think of no better example than slum clearance and redevelopment of the site. If for no other reason than inability to rehouse families, slum clearance and redevelopment projects are not appropriate everywhere today. However, the time may come when effective demand for new housing will have dropped to a point where redevelopment of areas containing substandard housing will have not only social but economic benefit. The pattern of this legislation provides the machinery by which such steps can be taken.

I should like now to make some comments upon the bill itself. It contains four major changes, as well as a number of minor amendments. The major changes are:

(a) The reduction of the down payment required from people who wish to own their houses.

(b) Enabling the federal government to join with the provinces in desirable housing developments of all forms, including the assembly of land.

(c) An increase in the maximum amounts which may be made available for home improvement and home extension purposes.

(d) Changes in the co-operative section of the National Housing Act so that its facilities will be more readily available.

The bill changes the definition of a builder so as not to exclude a builder who holds a long-term lease or other satisfactory interest in the land. The previous limitation of ownership has caused difficulty in areas where long-term leases are customary. A continuation of the limitation of ownership would be inappropriate for Newfoundland, where ground leases are more general than land held in fee simple.

The bill provides that a basic loan of 80 per cent of the lending value shall be made available to a builder or to a home owner. The amortization may be for a period as long as thirty years. Provided that the purchase price to the home owner is a fair and reasonable one, provision is made for an additional advance in amount of one-sixth of the basic loan. This change provides considerably higher mortgage financing than the act in its present form. Depending upon the price at which the house is sold by the builder to the home owner, the down payment requirements will range between one-sixth and one-tenth of the purchase price.

The fair and reasonable price provision is included because previous experience under the National Housing Act, as well as our understanding of experience under the Ontario second mortgage legislation, indicate that increased mortgage financing tends to increase sale prices. Little purpose would be served if, by providing an extra mortgage loan of $1,000, the sale price of the house went up a part or all of this amount. The majority of present houses under the National Housing Act will, within the present range of sale prices, qualify under the fair and reasonable provision. Houses upon which the builder is taking a very long profit will not qualify.

I should like to make it perfectly clear that the fair and reasonable provision is not a limitation upon the sale price of houses to be financed under the National Housing Act. A house with a lending value of $6,000 will qualify for a basic loan of $4,800, and for a further advance of $800 to a home owner who has purchased the house at a price not exceeding $6,720, which is the total loan of $5,600 plus 20 per cent, and would be considered the fair and reasonable price. The builder may sell the house at any price he desires. If, however, the price is above the fair and reasonable price, the basic loan of 80 per cent will be made, but the additional advance to the home owner is not available. During the last few weeks I have had a number of representations that the fair and reasonable price requirement is unreasonable, and that the legislation should be brought down without this provision. I can only say that these representations in many ways point up the very reason for the limitation.

The bill also provides for revisions to the co-operative section of the act. During the past year or two there have been a number of representations from co-operatives that the act, in its present form, is unsuitable. With this we agree. Representations have been made that the rate of interest payable by co-operatives or by individuals who have built their houses under co-operative schemes should be less than the rate of interest available to home owners. As will be clear to hon. members, this point of view cannot be accepted. Therefore amendments are now being proposed to improve the mechanics, and indeed the terms, of loans to co-operatives, but no change is being made in the interest rate.

It has been suggested to us that there is a similarity between the purpose of section 9 and the co-operative part of the act. This, of course, is far from being the case, because section 9 contemplates rental housing with no proprietary interest by the occupant. It is also definite in its provision that continued occupancy is dependent upon family income being below a certain level. An examination of section 9 will show clearly the reasons why a co-operative is not a limited dividend rental housing project.

It does not seem reasonable to us that individuals with a proprietary interest in the house in which they live should be afforded better terms under a co-operative than if they arranged the financing of their houses on an individual basis. The government deems it unwise to create such differential.

In our experience we find that there are two kinds of co-operatives. There is the genuine co-operative formed by a group of people interested in producing houses for their mutual benefit. The legislation is being revised to suit their needs.

The other type of co-operative is one developed by a promoter for the purpose of finding a lucrative method by which to market his construction. This is the type of co-operative in which we believe Canadians would not wish the government to be interested. It will be noticed than an application will not be approved from a co-operative unless the corporation is satisfied that 80 per cent of the family housing units will be occupied by co-operators. In other words the genuine nature of the co-operative must be evident at the time of the application. I may say that this limitation carries the judgment of several officials experienced in the co-operative movement as it relates to house building. They are as anxious as we to avoid the use of the co-operative principle for purposes for which it was not intended.

There are two distinct kinds of housing projects for which the legislation makes provision. In the province of Quebec, especially, co-operative housing maintains the co-operative principle until the completion of the unit, at which time full ownership is transferred to the individual. Hon. members will notice that the legislation contemplates loans to such a co-operative in amount of 80 per cent of the lending value, and an additional advance of one-sixth of the joint loan at the time the member of the co-operative takes title to his home. The arrangements give advantage of blanket loans to the co-operative, together with the full advantages of the home ownership provision of the act to the co-operator after he has full ownership of his house.

The other form of co-operative contemplates the co-operative principle continuing after the completion and occupancy of the housing unit. Of necessity this must be the condition in the case of a multi-family unit. But where a multi-family unit or a group of houses maintain the co-operative principle after completion, provision is made for the additional advance comparable to that afforded to a home owner.

Under the present co-operative legislation, where the co-operative principles extend beyond completion, there is a requirement of joint and several covenants. During the past few years a number of genuine and worthy co-operatives have been unable to finance under the National Housing Act because the solicitors of the co-operators have recommended to their clients that they do not participate in a joint and several covenant. In order to meet this difficulty the legislation before the house now provides for a several covenant only. In other words, if the co-operative gets into trouble and the mortgagee must realize on his security, each co-operator is personally liable only for his share of the loss suffered by the mortgagee. Although this removes one of the main limitations of the legislation as it now exists, there is no manner in which the equity of the non-defaulting co-operator can be protected against the default of a large enough number of co-operators to occasion default and foreclosure of the mortgage. This is an unfavourable but inherent feature of co-operative ownership.

There is provision for an increase in the maximum amount of loans for home improvement and home extension purposes. The present maximum limits were established in 1944. Since then building costs have increased, and the limits are being increased by 25 per cent.

Authority is being sought so that the corporation shall have the power to deal with properties acquired by it. The present act limits such powers to housing projects. Because the corporation now manages properties such as Ajax near Oshawa and Laurentian Terrace in Ottawa, like powers are needed to deal with all classes of property.

On September 21, and again on October 28, I outlined the nature of the proposed dominion-provincial arrangements and the general reasons why enabling legislation is being sought. During the last ten years, in the construction of both war workers' and veterans' rental units, experience has shown that governmental operations in the housing field require participation by the provinces. Neither the provinces nor the dominion are happy with arrangements whereby the dominion enters directly into agreements with municipalities. It is quite true that most of the provinces passed enabling legislation to allow their municipalities to enter into such contracts. However, in my conversations with the provinces there was general agreement in principle that long-term arrangements and contracts between the dominion and the municipalities were not desirable.

The provincial governments are familiar with local conditions, and their direct participation is required to develop housing projects, particularly in view of the jurisdictional aspects of the various phases of the problem. For instance, new housing in a number of our larger municipalities is dependent upon land being made available. In many cases this land is not within the present boundaries of the municipality. The main municipality is reluctant to extend its civic services into the adjoining municipality. The adjoining municipality in some cases is reluctant to add new small residential units built within its area, because, even with full taxes, small residential units are a deficit item in the accounts of the municipality. This is the type of problem which the provinces can do much to resolve.

It will be noticed that the legislation is general in form and enabling in character. In order to join with the dominion in such projects, the provinces will in most cases require authority from their legislatures. Procedures in operation have not yet been established. The bill contemplates regulations by the governor in council which will prescribe the type of projects and the conditions under which they may be arranged.

I will now suggest a few types of arrangements which might be undertaken by the dominion and a province.

In certain areas of the country there are builders and other individuals who are anxious to build houses but who cannot do so because serviced land is not available. The municipalities are pressed in financing other services within their boundaries, and do not feel that at this time they can undertake the capital financing of servicing new areas of land. Therefore authority is being sought to enable the dominion and the provinces to take ownership of tracts of land in fringe areas, and with the co-operation of the municipality, see to the installation of services. The land will be purchased jointly by the dominion and the province. Services, when installed, will be paid for by the dominion and the province. Builders and other individuals will be able to purchase these lots. In some cases the value of the fully serviced lot will be included in the lending value for National Housing Act purposes so that the cost of the land and the improvements will be paid off over the period of the mortgage. In other cases, it may be preferable for the municipality to assume the improvements, with the new owner paying off the costs of the improvements on a local improvement basis. Under this latter arrangement the municipality issues debentures secured by the annual local improvement taxes.

Another type of dominion-provincial project might be the assembling of land as just described, together with the erection of houses for sale. There are certain localities in the country where such an arrangement by the two senior governments would be helpful. Land would be assembled and a contract would be awarded for the building of houses. Houses would be sold from the project to individual home owners. To the extent that these home owners financed their purchases under the National Housing Act, the unpaid balance of purchase price would be recovered by the dominion-provincial project, and the long-term mortgage risk would be assumed under the National Housing Act.

Transactions such as this might give the appearance that the governments were taking the place of house builders. To the extent of a managerial position, this would be true. However, in practically every municipality in Canada the same men are going to build the houses, whether they are being built on the home owner's account, on their own account as a speculative builder, or for the account of the dominion-provincial project. We wish to avoid reducing the supply of houses which will be built by individuals for themselves, or by builders on a speculative basis. This is important, but it is even more important that the needs of prospective home owners be met. It is our opinion that in certain areas a sufficient volume of housing for prospective home owners can be achieved only by direct support of a dominion-provincial project.

As a modification of this arrangement, the dominion and the province might assemble serviced land and arrange for builders to build houses on a speculative basis with the proviso, borrowed from the integrated plan, that in the event of non-sale the dominion-provincial project will take the houses over at a price somewhat less than their regular sale price, but rather more than the out-of-pocket costs of the builder.

Another type of project would be the development or redevelopment of centrally located land to provide new rental housing, either on an economic or a subsidized basis. The procedure would be very much the same as in the other examples which I have mentioned. The province, with the co-operation of the municipality, would see to the acquisition of the land, to be paid for 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province. It may be that slum clearance provisions of section 12 of the National Housing Act would be used. After the land had been acquired for redevelopment, the dominion and the province, with the co-operation of the municipality, would determine the type of rental housing which is needed. In certain parts of the country it may be that rental housing can bear economic rents. In other localities an element of subsidy may be necessary. After the rental scale, allowing for the element of subsidy, has been determined, Central Mortgage will proceed with the construction of the buildings. When complete, the dominion and the province will seek local management in the form of a local housing authority, or such other method as may be mutually agreeable. The matter of local management is emphasized. The policy of the dominion is to reduce, not increase, its direct landlord position. The project, however, will remain in ownership of the dominion and the province. The operating profit or loss will be borne 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province. The annual subsidy will be the amount by which rentals received are less than operating costs of all kinds, including depreciation. These operating losses will be met on an annual basis 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province.

Under our arrangements with the province, provision will be made that the municipality shall receive a payment in lieu of taxes so that houses in the project will provide tax revenue equivalent to taxes received on like houses in the municipality. We feel—and some of the provinces agree with us—that a suitable way to determine these payments in lieu of taxes is to have the municipal board of the province establish a fair level of payment.

Although the costs of these projects will be borne 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province, it may be that the province will feel that some share of the capital costs should be borne by the municipality. This is a matter for determination by the province. Our arrangement will be directly with the province; the municipalities will not be party to the agreement. Any agreement providing for the municipality to assume financial responsibilities will be independent of our arrangements with the provinces.

Dominion-provincial rental projects may take the form of houses in fringe area locations. The principles will be the same as those described for rental projects in central locations.

Our main purpose is to increase the volume of housing. We wish to stimulate, and where necessary, supplement, the supply of housing from present sources. Care will be exercised to ensure that we are not replacing the normal activities of builders. The provinces which have shown an interest in the proposal feel that the joint efforts of both senior governments, in co-operation with the municipalities, will increase the volume of new houses.

Hon. members may wonder how much housing can be expected as a result of this legislation. I can give them no satisfactory answer. It will depend upon the number of provinces participating. It will also depend upon the attitude of the provincial governments toward proposals which they may receive from municipalities and other interested groups. For our part, the federal government will require that the projects be sound, in that they fill a need at a reasonable cost. I am sure that the provinces will adopt the same attitude. As I mentioned in one of my earlier statements, each project must be satisfactory to both the dominion and the province. If a province is of the opinion that projects of the various forms I have described earlier are desirable, the federal government is likely to participate unless very obvious difficulties or deficiencies are present.

We are entering a new field. Techniques have not yet been established. After a few projects have been considered, methods of operation will be more definite than they are at the present time. Techniques and methods will be found to implement the purpose and intent of the arrangement—a co-operative effort by the dominion and the province to improve housing conditions within that province. In this as in all other housing legislation the existence of the legislation and appropriations does not ensure new housing in itself. It is the energy and ingenuity of private endeavour and of federal, provincial and municipal governments working together which will achieve successful results.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has listened with great interest to the statement made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). I believe the house will be glad indeed to concur in his concluding statement, in which he laid emphasis upon the necessity for co-operation on the part of all governments in Canada in their approach to governmental responsibility in respect to housing. One of the criticisms many of us have had to make of this government in times past is that it has not shown that spirit of co-operation; consequently the co-operation between the dominion and the provinces which was so necessary has not previously been available.

I should like in all frankness to say to the minister who has assumed responsibility for this department and the very important subject of housing that he seems to have shown a co-operative attitude in his approach to the other governments in Canada. I believe that approach will be productive of results.

We on this side of the house have said, and we said it times without number in the last parliament, that this problem was so great and had so many aspects to it—I am not now speaking simply of the constitutional and legal aspects—that co-operation between the dominion government and the provincial governments was an absolute essential. The present minister—and this is a reversal of the previous attitude—has demonstrated a willingness to co-operate. The house will be quick to note the change and to commend the minister.

The house will always be on its guard against a note of complacency in any statement from the government on the subject of housing. We have had so much experience in the last five years with statements made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in which it was evident that he was gazing at housing conditions in Canada through rose-coloured glasses, that the house is naturally sceptical, and quite properly so, with regard to any ministerial statements in the matter which sound that note of optimism.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that on the whole I think the minister has been fair in his factual approach to the provisions of the bill and the needs that the government hopes it will meet. There are, however, one or two considerations that are worthy of comment and supplement.

At the outset may I say that I do not intend to repeat or to cover again the ground that I sought to cover in speaking on the housing question at the resolution stage of the measure on October 31. At that time we had an extended discussion of housing conditions in general; today I hope to confine myself to some of the aspects of the minister's statement and of the bill itself which I think ought properly to be commented upon in the debate on second reading. In committee stage later we can expect extended discussion on some of the features of the bill, because hon. members undoubtedly will be seeking much more information with regard to some of its provisions.

The position in which the house finds itself today, as compared with that in which it found itself on October 31 on the resolution stage of the measure, is improved by reason of two factors. In the first place, the minister has tabled the correspondence between the dominion government and the governments of the provinces in the course of their negotiations since last spring with regard to a joint approach to this question. In the second place we have had from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a statement of government policy with reference to rent control. The house would be in no position to review the adequacy of this present measure without at least knowing the contents of that correspondence with the provinces, and what the policy of the government is with reference to rent control.

As to rent control—and again I do not intend to repeat what I said on that subject in the house last Tuesday—and the relationship that the statement of the Minister of Finance on that subject bears directly to this question of housing, I shall simply say that the statement will not help in the slightest the efforts that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is making to meet the housing problem. I think one is justified in offering a word of sympathy to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in having his efforts to improve housing conditions in Canada hamstrung by a statement of policy on rent control of the kind made by the Minister of Finance.

Here you have a most amazing situation—and I am sure it could not exist under any other government than this. One minister is making efforts to improve housing conditions, and another is making declarations of policy which unquestionably will confuse and retard the efforts of the first minister. Surely the time has come, sir, when this government must at least make an attempt to unify its policy with regard to housing in Canada. Surely we have had enough of this situation—of the government speaking with one voice through one minister on one occasion and with another voice through another minister on another occasion, and saying things that are frequently diametrically opposed in result and in policy.

In 1945 we started off with housing responsibilities divided not between two ministers of the crown but among three. Under insistent pressure from the official opposition, the government got round to concentrating housing principally under the then minister of reconstruction, with jurisdiction in respect of the wartime prices and trade board and its orders still residing in the Minister of Finance. When the functions of the wartime prices and trade board today are so greatly concentrated on the subject of rent control, surely the time has come when the simple step must be taken by the government of unifying under one minister all government policy and administration with respect to housing. Surely then we might hopefully look for an end of these contradictory statements and policies.

On the other aspect, as to the information now available to the house through the correspondence between this government and the provincial governments, which has since been tabled, I shall hope at a later stage in my remarks to make some comments.

I made mention of the factual information given by the minister today. He looks for encouragement to construction through the fact that building costs seem to have levelled off. He properly drew attention to the fact that new housing starts in Canada have shown a reduction—which I will not say is critical but which certainly is disturbing—in the months of June, July and August, the season of the year when the volume of starts should be at its maximum.

While there has been some improvement in the situation in September, I think it is too late in the season now to expect that it will be possible to overcome this diminution in housing starts that occurred in June, July and August. This situation cannot be viewed without great concern. We are glad to see a record of completions, and we shall bear in mind at the same time that many have contributed to that number of completions, among them the government of the province of Ontario through beneficial legislation which became necessary because the dominion government—this government—was so tardy in measuring up to its responsibility. Why did this government not see its responsibility in 1947, as it professes to see its responsibility today, late in 1949?—and so late in 1949, sir, that it is unlikely that any measurable benefit will be available in 1949 from this legislation; the most we can hope for is that it will produce some benefit in the building season of 1950. Think of all the precious time that has been lost, when the way was being pointed out to the government!

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in its last quarterly-issued report, has some comments that may well be considered at this time. I refer to "Housing in Canada", and the last available quarterly report is the one bearing the date of July. The report opens on page 9 with this statement:

> During the first six months of 1949, for the first time since the end of the war the rate of new families formed in Canada showed a significant decline. This is indicated by a drop of 10 per cent in the number of marriages, from 50,000 during the first six months of 1948 to 45,000 during the corresponding period of 1949. Immigration of married families, births and deaths changed little as compared with the same period of 1948. The reduction in the number of new families formed will tend to lessen the added pressure exerted on the housing market from this source.

I comment upon that to urge that the government ought not to lay too much stress upon that factor, because it would be highly dangerous at this stage of the development of housing programs for any thought to creep into the minds of those responsible for government administration in the field of housing that the pressure has diminished. I believe the minister was frank in his statement this morning when he intimated that no appreciable reduction is yet being made in this tremendous backlog of housing needs in Canada. This is no time for relaxation. If there is any evidence of a reduction in the family formation rate; if there is a reduction in immigration this year, as there has been, then certainly this is the time for the government, in association with other agencies interested in the building of houses, to put forward all pressure toward making a substantial dent in that formidable backlog, which represents a great burden of hardship to hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

The report lays further emphasis upon the decline in starts, which I have already noted. A significant sentence appears at page 9 of the report:

> If the trend of decline in starts apparent for June and July of 1949 continues it may mean that an immediate post-war peak in starts has been reached in the second quarter of 1949.

In the face of the critical conditions still prevailing in Canada, we dare not accept a situation in which we look back and see, in the condition that obtained some five months ago, the peak in housing construction in Canada since the war. That would be an intolerable situation. Surely this is the time when every effort should be made to build toward new peaks in housing construction. If the minister will dedicate his considerable talents and his commendable good will in that direction, I am sure the house will applaud his efforts and will give him credit when credit is due.

Looking at other fields of government endeavour, I believe it would be well to offer a word of caution in respect to some of the statements which have fallen so freely in recent days from ministers of the crown. On the subject of veterans' rental housing, one reads at page 11 of the same report:

> Starts of rental housing units for veterans under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation dropped from 2,300 during the first half of 1948 to 1,500 in the same period of 1949.

And, sir, to those who listened to the statement made in recent days by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) as to the way in which his department has been mustering its forces behind the provision of housing for married men in the services, one notes with considerable interest another sentence appearing at page 11 of the report. It has reference to construction operations in 1949 under the armed services housing program of the Department of National Defence. As hon. members are aware, that program was carried on through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The sentence is:

> No starts were made in the first half of 1949.

How does this measure up alongside the statements made by the government in recent days about the tremendous efforts they have been putting behind the housing construction program for the benefit of married personnel in the armed forces?

Then, sir, as having a bearing on the question as to the principal source of effort behind the house-building program in Canada—and I affirm it still must be the private builders—the house will be interested in a statistical table appearing at page 27 of the report. There are three figures dealing with the first six months in each of the three past years, and these figures have a direct bearing on the subject.

The first deals with direct government housing, that is to say, housing built and owned by the government or a government agency. In the first six months of 1947 the figure was 1,800; for the same period in 1948 it was 3,240, and for the first six months of 1949 it was 1,626—not a formidable figure indeed, and one which shows a substantial reduction from the first six months of 1948.

Turning to the broader subject of total government-assisted housing, which includes not only the figures I have already mentioned but also all forms of government assistance to housing, including loans under part I of the National Housing Act, we find that in the whole of 1947 the figure was 20,540; in 1948 the figure for the whole year was 29,348, while in the first half of 1949 it was 11,768. The figure for the first six months of 1949 is approximately the same as that for the first six months of 1948. Therefore we do not see any appreciable advance being made in the total number of units constructed with government assistance this year, as compared with last year.

I believe a percentage comparison would be of interest. The total of government-assisted housing in the whole of 1947 as compared with the total housing constructed in Canada gives a figure of 28 per cent. In the whole of 1948 it was 33 per cent, and in the first half of 1949 the figure is 29 per cent. This shows a slight reduction in percentage, for the first half of this year as compared with the first half of last year, in housing to which the government has contributed in any form compared with the total of housing constructed.

If one compares the total of government-built housing, or direct government housing, with the total of houses built we find that in 1947 the total of government-built housing was only 9½ per cent of the total number of houses built in Canada. In 1948 it was 11 per cent, and in the first half of 1949 had dropped to 4 per cent.

One other figure which has great statistical importance is the number of houses in the construction of which the Ontario government has assisted by means of second mortgages. I shall have a word to say about that in a moment.

The minister has indicated that this bill has four major provisions. The first is the reduction in the down payment. The house will be glad to see this provision introduced into the legislation, regretting at the same time that the government has been so slow to follow the good example of the government of the province of Ontario.

Here is the other statistical figure that I wish to give the house. Since the Ontario government in 1948, one and a half years ago, instituted the plan of government second mortgages to bridge the gap between the cost of construction and the available loan on first mortgage under the National Housing Act, or by straight private loan, the number of houses that have been so assisted now totals 10,000. That, sir, is a formidable accomplishment on the part of the government of the province of Ontario. I hope that the minister and the house will be fair enough to acknowledge that, having regard to the figures which were quoted this morning, showing completions of houses in Canada, the efforts of the government of the province of Ontario in this field ought to be recognized. Not only that, sir, but the fact that in the province in one and one half years those who are constructing houses needed this form of assistance to the number of 10,000 establishes conclusively the great need that exists throughout the whole of Canada today for legislation of this kind. The house welcomes it at long last, but regrets that one and a half precious years were lost while this government was sleeping soundly and blinding itself to a useful and constructive example that was offered to it by the government of the province of Ontario.

I pass over, for the moment, the second main provision of the legislation, and take the third, which is an increase in the maximum available for home improvement and home extension. The house will be glad to provide anything in this sphere that will be put to work by the government to improve housing conditions in Canada. The house has never been niggardly or penny-pinching in its approach to this question. It has pleaded with the government for action, and it has furnished the government at all times in this critical post-war period with every tool and weapon that the government asked for to meet the needs of Canadians who lack housing and who have been living under substandard conditions. If the government will use additional money in this way for improving housing conditions, there will be no cavilling on the part of any hon. member about making sums available for these purposes if the government will put them to work.

The fourth provision relates to changes made in the co-operative housing sections of the act to meet particular needs in this field, as the government sees them, in three provinces in which co-operative housing is a factor. Again I say this: While there will be something to be said in committee, on this part of the bill in general I am sure the house will grant any request the government makes that will have in it any promise of bringing about an increase in the construction of houses in Canada, or an improvement in housing conditions, but will wish to be sure that the legislation will be put to work.

I come now, sir, to the second principle that the minister emphasized. It has to do with the joint efforts on the part of the dominion and the provinces in several fields of endeavour.

When the minister visited and conferred with the governments of the provinces during the late summer and early fall, there were three subjects that came particularly to the fore. They are referred to in the minister's letter of September 13. I have in mind now particularly his letter to the premier of the province of Ontario, although a letter in almost identical terms was written by the minister on that same day to the premiers of all the provinces. In the second paragraph of the letter the minister said:

> In general, I believe the provinces feel that the proposals already discussed with you are reasonable, and the dominion is prepared to proceed along these lines. Therefore on or about the 20th September I propose to make a statement in the House of Commons that the government intends to introduce legislation—

We come now, sir to the three features of the proposals:

> —to enable the dominion to enter into agreements with the provinces for publicly assisted housing projects. These projects may take the form of the assembly of land and services to enable an increased volume of housing by private builders. They may take the form of the dominion and province proceeding with moderate priced houses for sale to home owners. They may also take the form of rental projects, in which event the dominion and the province will seek local management for the project after it is completed.

The minister goes on to comment on these three features. May I, in the hope of clarification, sir, emphasize what these three proposals are, the three projects that were discussed? The first is assistance in the assembly of land and services to enable an increased volume of housing by private builders. The second is assistance for home owners to proceed with moderately priced houses—that is, house construction; and the third, rental projects with local management.

This is the observation that the minister made on the reactions of the governments of the ten provinces after his personal consultation with them:

> We found that the other provinces agreed with you in favouring the first two forms of project.

Now, sir, as to the second, namely, the assistance in the construction of moderately priced houses for sale to home owners, I take it that the first feature of the bill is the one that is designed to carry out that undertaking by increasing by one-sixth the loans at present available under part I of the National Housing Act. The area, therefore, within which the second feature of the present bill will have operation, I assume, will be with respect to projects of the other two kinds mentioned by the minister in his letter—first, the assembly of land and services to enable an increased volume of housing by private builders, and the second, the rental projects.

I take it, sir, there will be no quarrel—

Mr. Winters: Just by way of clarification, I may say that part of the agreement between the provinces envisages the building of houses which may be put into sales position as well.

Mr. Fleming: I assume there will be further clarification of that subject, perhaps when in committee we come to the particular section of the bill in which the enabling powers are proposed to be vested in the government.

The features that I have been referring to particularly, sir, are worthy of one or two further comments. I think the minister still needs to give the house further clarification of government policy with respect to rental projects, because in times past there has been the greatest variety of government statements on this subject. For years we have seen the government imposing upon municipalities the obligation to contribute subsidies. Those that wanted housing constructed by Wartime Housing Limited or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation were called upon to contribute subsidies in the form of serviced land and the acceptance, in lieu of taxes, of grants that usually were only a fraction of the taxes that the same property would have borne had it been in private hands. Let me remind the house of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on October 27, 1947, when he said in Montreal:

> No government of which I am a part will ever pass legislation for subsidized housing.

I cannot square the statement made by the Prime Minister at that time with the statements which the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has been making in the house during the present session. If the government has abandoned the position taken by the Prime Minister; if the Prime Minister has now changed his mind and is prepared not only to be a member of but to lead a government that will pass legislation for subsidized housing, then in the name of common sense let him come forward and say so. Let him not continue to leave the house in a condition of perplexity as to just what the government's position is with reference to subsidized housing.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is chary about using the word "subsidized", possibly because of remarks such as those made in the past by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply talks about low rental housing. To most people low rental housing carries with it the connotation of assistance, subsidy. A subsidy may take various forms; nevertheless it is a form of assistance. I ask the government to come clean on this subject; I ask the minister really to tell the house where the government stands on the subject of subsidized housing. When they talk of assistance for low rental projects, do they mean subsidized housing? Let us have some clarification of that point.

The minister initiated his approach to this subject, and the negotiations and consultations with the governments of the provinces, by the writing of a letter to the Prime Minister on February 23, in which he dealt with statements made by the Prime Minister on the occasion of his then recent visit to Toronto. At that time the Prime Minister had had the instructive experience of seeing under construction in Toronto what is known as the Regent Park housing project, a project that was made possible by action on the part of the municipal, provincial and federal governments. On that occasion the Prime Minister was good enough to commend it in the most generous terms. His description of it was that it was a landmark in housing in Canada. This project was made possible by reason of the leadership given by the municipal government and citizens of the city of Toronto, together with the effective co-operation of the provincial government. The contribution of the dominion government was confined to a contribution toward the acquisition of land under section 12 of the act.

I take it that such measures have the approval of the government. I wish to know how far the government is prepared to go in encouraging other municipalities to adopt similar measures. I wish to know whether the federal government is prepared to use the powers that it seeks in this bill to put drive and vigour behind measures of that kind in order to give assistance to municipalities which in many cases are ready to proceed with needed projects if they are not going to be left holding the bag.

The Prime Minister is quoted by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in his letter as making such statements as these in his speech in Toronto:

> While we hope that as much of our new housing as possible can be provided through private and local enterprise, we recognize that privately initiated housing may have to be supplemented and stimulated by even further government support for low rental housing.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, commenting on that statement of the Prime Minister, says in his letter to him:

> Moreover there is likely to be a falling off in the demand for houses for purchase and an increase in the demand for rental units, both for veterans and civilians. There is ample indication of this already, and it is anticipated the trend will increase as the growth of economic activity levels off.

That was a word of warning to the Prime Minister by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Then there is a further quotation from the Prime Minister's speech as follows:

> We realize that the magnitude of the problem of providing low rental housing is such that it will be solved only as a result of active co-operation of all governments.

Active co-operation on the part of all provincial governments is plainly assured. There can be no question left in the mind of anyone reading the correspondence exchanged between the minister and the governments of the provinces that all the provincial governments are prepared to co-operate to the limit in measures of joint government concern to meet Canada's still critical housing needs. I hope the minister will be utterly and completely frank with the house on this subject. Again I ask, what does the government mean when it talks about low rental housing projects? Does it mean subsidized housing? If so, will the minister indicate whether there are any limits to the type of the subsidy that the government proposes to make available?

I think the minister is deserving of commendation for his emphasis upon the need for local management. From the outset of studies of housing needs in Canada, it has been apparent all through the years that wherever measures of government-assisted housing require to be instituted, the emphasis must always be laid upon management at the local level, and I think the house will undoubtedly approve that proposal. By vigilant local management I hope we shall avoid some of the mistakes that were made in times past. We do not wish to see a repetition of the kind of tragic fiasco that was perpetrated by the government in some of the housing projects that were exposed in the public accounts committee of 1947; tragic housing fiascos under the Veterans Land Act, which were directly the responsibility of the government, in regard to such projects as those at Sarnia and elsewhere which were investigated by the committee that year. We want no more of that. We want to see management, at every turn, kept as close as possible to the local level. Then we shall be sure that local public opinion will be so mustered and marshalled that tragic fiascos of that kind will not be repeated, and it will be possible to see to it that the buildings that have been constructed receive proper upkeep.

We do not want to see housing, such as was constructed by Wartime Housing during the war, fall into disrepair. We do not want to see such housing become a blot on local municipalities which are trying to improve their appearance and their local conditions through planning their development. There must be co-operation, and, in my humble submission, management at the local level will do more than anything else to bring about that vigilance which will prevent similar situations in the future.

I am sure the house welcomed the statement made by the minister this morning for its reassurance on one point, after the disappointing statement of the Minister of Finance yesterday in regard to federal assistance to municipalities. Following that statement yesterday, many of us wondered if it represented the extent to which the government was prepared to accept a tax liability, or to make payments in lieu of taxes, on housing constructed by the federal government or any of its agencies under programs such as the minister has described today. If the statement of the Minister of Finance, a statement as lengthy as it was confusing and disappointing, had been taken at its face value, we could have assumed that only some municipalities would receive payments in lieu of taxes on government housing. But the minister seems to have made it reasonably clear, by the statement he made at page 1318 of Hansard, that with respect to all housing built under this program the government will pay taxes equivalent to those the houses would bear if they were in private hands.

The statement by the minister at page 1318 of Hansard was as follows:

> As I stated on September 21, we will pay grants in lieu of taxes on the basis of the normal level of taxes in the particular municipality, subject to approval by the provincial department of municipal affairs or the equivalent department.

I take it that what the minister has said today reinforces that statement, because that is a question of prime importance in this whole matter. It would be of little help to these municipalities, many of whom are in no position to undertake the expenditures required to service further blocks of land for house construction, to say to them: We and the provincial government will contribute to the cost of servicing, but we are not going to improve the basis of payments in lieu of taxes made hitherto by government agencies. In the past such government agencies as Wartime Housing Limited and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have not been making payments equivalent to the taxes these properties would have borne had they been in private hands. In some cases in the larger cities the payments made by these dominion government agencies have been little more than one-third. In other municipalities the percentage may have worked out at a higher proportion; but in general one may say that those payments in lieu of taxes have not even approached the taxes those properties would have borne had they been in private hands.

It is quite clear in the correspondence that the provinces have interpreted the views of the government as I, for one, am interpreting the statement of the minister; that is, that the policy which has prevailed hitherto will not hereafter be followed but that a new policy will be instituted under which payments will be made by these government agencies in lieu of taxes which will be equivalent to the tax payments the same houses would bear if they were in private hands. If there is any thought on the part of the government of withdrawing in any degree from that position, I ask the minister in all frankness to declare it before this debate concludes, because it is a matter of fundamental importance to the success of this whole project.

The statement of the minister was lacking in one respect. I think most hon. members looked for something to be said in regard to plans for pressing research. Today the minister did not say anything about the very important subject of research. I hope that before the debate concludes the minister will take it upon himself to give the house some wholesome assurance that effort will not be spared in pressing on with enterprises of research.

The minister made reference to the importance of at least stabilizing house construction costs, and lowering them if possible. Certainly a lowering in the cost of construction, if it did not mean sacrifices in other respects, such as economic activity in different quarters, undoubtedly would be of great assistance in stimulating the construction of houses in Canada. In the face of certain existing factors, with the continued scarcity of many building materials, it may be unreasonable to expect any noticeable reduction in building costs in the near future.

It seems to me this points up the necessity of taking advantage of every opportunity, through research, of developing improved methods of construction and lowering those costs, and I hope the minister will give the house some reassurance on this question, because of its great importance.

Now, sir, I come to my concluding thought. The minister has quite properly said that this bill is general in form and enabling in character. In one respect that can be a strength; in other respects it can be a great weakness. So far as the strength is concerned, I think the house will wish to see a flexible approach to this question. The house will not quarrel with the minister's insistence upon flexibility, and will endorse every syllable the minister uttered when he said he thought we should use every approach; those were his words, and they are commendable. There can be no thought of forcing any province to embark upon a particular type of approach to a solution to the housing problem. There must be co-operation; there must be no attempt at compulsion. It may be that projects in different parts of the country will assume different forms. It is more than likely, it seems to me, that projects in our large urban centres, where housing conditions are so acute today, will not take the same form as those initiated under this dominion-provincial co-operative effort in other areas. So much for the desirability of flexibility.

But, sir, when the minister says that this bill is enabling in character, it brings directly before this house two points of the highest importance. The first is this: What is to be the responsibility of parliament in this respect? Is it enough for parliament simply to clothe the government with very wide powers? I submit that this is not enough. Parliament does not discharge its responsibility simply by giving the government wide powers. Parliament must accept its responsibility to see that the powers given to the government are used for purposes that parliament will approve. How does parliament satisfy itself that these measures will be used resolutely, effectively, vigorously and insistently in coping with housing conditions in Canada? At this stage we simply have the assurance of the minister. Again I do not wish to embarrass him, but I think he has a very high standing among all parties in this house. I think all parties in this house will give him every assistance within their power, both in writing legislation and in putting forward proposals as to ways in which this legislation can be used for the purposes for which parliament intends it. But sir, at the moment, we have only a statement from the minister. The house will have to assume the serious responsibility of maintaining vigilance to ensure that these powers are used effectively as parliament intends them to be used.

In times past, this house has clothed the government with powers which the government sought. It is fair to say there never has been any disposition on the part of the house to deny this government any power it requested which promised any contribution whatever to an improvement in housing conditions in any part of Canada. The attitude of the house has always been to push the government forward, not to hold it back. I believe that is the position of the house today, sir—that we are pressing the government to go forward. We will never hold the government back.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he recall that on May 20, 1948, when there was a proposal before the house in the form of a motion requesting the government to consider subsidized low rental housing, the hon. member and his party voted against it? Surely that is not pushing the government forward; that is holding it back.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member seems to be directing that question to me. If he will look up what I said on that occasion before the vote was taken, he will see the reason I gave was that no party could undertake to commit itself to a bald statement of that kind without knowing what was involved in it. A party would have to know what were to be the responsibilities of the governments at various levels; what was to be the nature of the various forms of construction that may be undertaken. Anyone who has made a study of public housing measures in various countries knows that there has been a variety of approaches. To take one of these socialist tidbits dangled in front of the house and say you must swallow it whole is something that no self-respecting party, apart from our socialist friends, is going to do.

Mr. Knowles: You took the same position as the Prime Minister took, and yet you condemn him.

Mr. Fleming: The Prime Minister will have to answer for himself.

Mr. Knowles: And you, too.

Mr. Fleming: I have answered for myself, and my statement is on the record. I am quite prepared to repeat that statement and take the same position today. If the hon. member wants information on the subject, and the house will recognize his need of it, certainly that information is available to him in an official statement this party made during the election campaign. Our position has been made clear before the whole of the people of Canada.

What is more, this party does not simply ask the people of Canada to accept statements. We point to the record of the government of the province of Ontario, which has done more in the field of housing than any other government in Canada. If one desires a signpost to point the way to effective measures to grapple with housing conditions in Canada, then I commend to him the legislation adopted by the legislature of the province of Ontario under the leadership of my leader.

Mr. Gillis: Why is Ontario so short of housing today?

Mr. Fleming: Because of conditions for which the federal government is principally responsible. During those years the government controlled all forms of construction materials, and those controls are still in effect in some form or other. In the face of all these powers, with unlimited resources, huge budget surpluses and revenue flowing into the treasury, Ottawa's policy created these substantial influxes of population into the populated centres of Ontario, where so many of the factories engaged in war production were concentrated. It is quite clear that the shortage of housing was the result of conditions arising out of the policies of the federal government. I do not condemn all those policies; nevertheless it was the policies of the federal government that were principally responsible for the creation of those conditions in Ontario.

It was the government of the province of Ontario, and action on the part of municipalities in the province of Ontario, that were largely responsible for the effective measures taken to meet the conditions in that province. For the information of my friend, I repeat that since the enactments of 1948 in the legislature of Ontario, under the government then headed by my leader, 10,000 houses have been constructed. Their construction was made possible by one feature of that legislation, and that is the provision of money on second mortgage. The government of the province of Ontario led the way and showed an example to this government which it has been slow to follow.

Mr. Gillis: Has not the legislation which the hon. member refers to been withdrawn?

Mr. Fleming: The legislation has not been withdrawn; it is still on the statute book. My friend is referring to a statement made yesterday by the premier of Ontario, which was fully expected, that when this bill comes into effect to provide, as it will, an increase of one-sixth in the present loans, there will be no occasion to continue after December 31 that one feature in the legislation of the province of Ontario. But sir, that was one feature out of four leading features of the housing legislation introduced in Ontario, and the other three remain.

At the commencement of my remarks I promised I was not going to repeat the speech I made in this house on October 31. Since my friend has asked me a question I shall, modestly and respectfully, refer him to the speech I made on that occasion, in which I reviewed in detail those beneficial measures. By the enactment of that legislation in Ontario, leadership was given in helping to solve this problem. We have been waiting a long time for leadership from the government benches opposite. If we can see any sign of leadership now, we will applaud it and back it up. If the leadership is not forthcoming, then the government can expect everything that opposition members can do by way of exposing the shortcomings of the administration.

I would have completed my remarks sooner, sir, but for these last few questions. I am not suggesting for a moment that I disliked the questions.

Mr. Knowles: They made your speech interesting.

Mr. Fleming: They may have accomplished something new in that respect.

I laid stress upon the nature of the bill, that it was enabling legislation. I was emphasizing the importance of the responsibility resting upon this house to see to it that that enabling legislation is used for the purposes for which parliament considers it is enacting it. Effective supervision cannot be undertaken under the procedures available in the house today. No machinery exists that will enable the house to give effective supervision to the government's administration of measures of this kind. I urge again, therefore, that provision be made for the establishment of a committee of this house that will concern itself with frequent review of housing conditions in Canada. Through that means this house could ensure that the government is giving the vigorous prosecution to the efforts which the house is making possible under this legislation and which the house will insist be made.

There is no use in saying that these questions can be discussed on the estimates. Discussion on the estimates is the clumsiest vehicle imaginable for reviewing housing conditions. The house has to be on top of this housing situation, and it cannot be unless there is machinery available, such as a committee, before which witnesses, such as the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, can be called, thus enabling the house to keep a constant check upon the government's efforts and the needed progress. It is a reasonable request.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. member a question? What percentage of material did you get in Ontario last year?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. gentleman flatters me if he thinks that I carry in my head figures such as that. I shall be glad to assist him in getting the information, if he wants it. The information is available. I do not profess to be able to give the answer offhand. I will tell him this, however: If he will review some of the reports of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation he will find that, while progress has been made in the production of some building materials, there is still reason for much concern over the shortage of other building materials. I wish the hon. member had been in this house to see the fight that we in the official opposition have had to make against apathy, inertia and lack of information on the part of the government with reference to such a simple building need as nails.

Mr. Ferrie: I should like to ask the hon. member—

Mr. Fleming: We were given assurances about the great profusion of nails in the country at a time when you could not lay your hand on a new steel nail anywhere. To hear the present Minister of Trade and Commerce talk at that time, you would think that the country was full of nails. That was just how far this government was removed from reality.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. member this question? How did you build 10,000 houses if you could not get nails? We could not get nails in western Canada for love or money, but you could get them in Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: I can assure the hon. member that those 10,000 houses were built as a result of diligent effort on the part of builders who used their opportunities under the free enterprise system,—

Mr. Ferrie: Everything for Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: —to the extent that their efforts were not hamstrung by government red tape. Moreover, if the hon. member thinks that Ontario was relatively better supplied than other provinces with nails and other building materials, then he has been misinformed; because the point where the critical shortage of nails and other building commodities was most acutely felt, relatively —and when I say relatively, I mean in relation to the need—was in Ontario.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Ferrie: You did not answer the question. How did you build 10,000 houses if you could not get nails?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: They were built in Ontario; and more houses would have been built if more building materials had been available, and if the efforts of those who were engaged in producing building materials, in distributing them and using them in construction, had not been hamstrung and hampered by the government that the hon. member was elected to support.

Mr. Knowles: And if you had not voted against subsidized low rental housing.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: I am willing to stay with this, Mr. Speaker, as long as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) continues to contribute such utterly foolish and inane remarks.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that upon reflection, the hon. gentleman would not like to have that remark stay to his credit. He will remember that on that occasion to which I referred—

Mr. Fleming: Is this a question?

Mr. Knowles: A question of privilege. He will remember that on the occasion to which I referred, the former member for Parkdale, Mr. Timmins, and others asked for subsidized low rental housing; and it was after we moved the amendment, calling for the very thing that he had asked for, that my hon. friend and his friends were embarrassed and then voted against the very thing they had asked for.

Mr. Fleming: Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a more spurious point of privilege? The hon. member did not have any point of privilege at all. He just wanted to get up and contribute his two cents' worth by way of interjection—not that his two cents' worth is worth answering. If he is open to be told anything, I will tell him this.

Mr. Knowles: Come on. I am all ears.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: On that occasion I had no intention, nor have I today, nor, I am quite sure, has the responsible party to which I am proud to belong, of swallowing, hook, line and sinker, one of these coy little formulas of about six words such as was dangled before the house by the socialists in that amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Such as you asked for.

Mr. Fleming: Had we been foolish enough to fall into their trap, they could have put any interpretation whatsoever that pleased them upon our adherence to their amendment. We are a responsible party. We do not put forward irresponsible amendments, and we do not subscribe to irresponsible amendments put forward by parties that perhaps do not view their responsibilities in quite the same light as we do.

Mr. Knowles: I hope not.

Mr. Fleming: We are not going to be taking jumps in the dark simply to satisfy the egotism of our socialist friends in drafting these cute amendments with tidbits hung on the end of them. If the hon. member wishes to be fair in giving the house information, he will read to the house the amendment put forward by the Progressive Conservative party in that same debate, on the same motion, and he will see there a constructive proposal for joint action on the part of the various governments in this country, at their respective levels, and especially with a view to providing government-assisted housing for those who have first claim upon it, namely, the veterans of Canada. If the hon. member wishes to treat the house with frankness instead of interjecting spurious points of privilege, and lop-sided and unfair interpretations, I think it is high time for him to change his tactics and give the house the whole story, not his carefully selected portion of it.

Mr. Knowles: He will.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: If hon. members will permit me, I should like to conclude my remarks. I had hoped to finish before this.

Mr. Knowles: You were finished long ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: There is more of it, Mr. Speaker. You can see who is responsible for the length of these remarks.

This is my concluding plea. I hope that the government will agree to let the house establish workable machinery under which parliament will have an opportunity of seeing that the government does carry forward this housing program with such drive, vigour and energy as the house certainly will demand of it.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, in order that the readers of Hansard may be able to appreciate more fully the consistency of my good friends of the Progressive Conservative party, I should like for a moment to refer back to a little argument that developed in the house just before one o'clock between the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

That argument arose over a vote in the house on a C.C.F. amendment to a bill amending the National Housing Act in May of 1948. At some length this morning the hon. member for Eglinton gave his explanation for the action taken by his party in the vote on that amendment. Incidentally he described the amendment as tricky, and a socialistic tidbit. What are the facts as recorded in Hansard?

They are these. During the course of the debate several members on the Progressive Conservative benches, along with a number of C.C.F. members, argued that the government should make provision in that bill for subsidized low-rental housing. I have read a number of those speeches, and so far as I can discover both Progressive Conservative and C.C.F. members in that debate spoke almost the same language on the subject, and discussed subsidized low-rental housing in almost the same terms.

After the Progressive Conservative amendment to the bill had been ruled out of order, the C.C.F. moved an amendment on May 5, 1948, as recorded at page 3644 of Hansard—no, I should say it was moved on May 19 and is recorded at page 4164 of Hansard.

Mr. Fraser: We can see who wrote the speech for him.

Mr. Noseworthy: The amendment stated:

> That Bill No. 280 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give consideration to providing subsidized low-rental housing.

I should like to read into the record a statement made during that debate by a member of the Progressive Conservative party who, among others, spoke in favour of subsidized housing. This is the quotation from a speech delivered on May 5 by the then member for Vancouver-Burrard, Mr. Merritt, as recorded at page 3644 of Hansard:

> I believe that the basic reason for the change in the government's attitude is that it has refused to enter the field of subsidized low-rental housing for those in the low-income group. The minister knows it is not possible to provide rental housing at rents which those in the low-income group can afford to pay, unless this type of housing is subsidized.

And a little later he said:

> I say to him—

—and he was speaking to the minister—

> —that this is the time to face up to the problem of subsidized low-rental housing.

And a little later:

> There is nothing necessarily socialistic about subsidizing housing for the low-income groups. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and no other minister need ever worry about that. Subsidized housing for those with low incomes was introduced in Great Britain in 1920 by a Conservative government, and it has been in operation, and in useful operation, in the United States of America since 1938 or thereabouts.

Those sentiments are expressed in language very similar to that used by C.C.F. members and others in the house over the years. Then came the vote on the amendment, and every Progressive Conservative member who remained in the house for the vote, including the hon. member for Eglinton, voted against it—I presume on the ground set forth this morning by the hon. member.

I submit that was not a tricky amendment. It was not a socialistic tidbit. It was as straightforward as any amendment moved by a private member on that particular bill could possibly have been. It was surprising therefore to find Progressive Conservative members voting as they did. Readers of Hansard will have to judge for themselves and reach their own conclusions. I submit however that Progressive Conservatives are in favour of subsidized low-rental housing, provided the measure is brought in by their own party. They appear to be so befuddled by their capitalistic free-enterprise thinking that they cannot even recognize something for which they themselves have asked when it is introduced by a member of the C.C.F.

I should like to make one further comment, since the hon. member for Eglinton chose to introduce provincial politics into the debate, just in case other hon. members from other provinces may gather from his grandiloquent expression of achievements of the Conservative government of Ontario that we have no housing problem in Ontario. Let me assure the house that, notwithstanding the fact that since 1943 we have had a Conservative government in Ontario, the housing situation in that province is just as acute as it is anywhere else in Canada. I believe I can say that the sole effective step taken by that government from 1943 to the present time to relieve the housing situation there has been the provision of second mortgage money to the purchasers of homes where the security was not sufficient to warrant their friends, the mortgage bankers and trust companies, to risk their money.

I will admit that householders who otherwise would not have been able to purchase homes have been placed in a position where they could purchase them—but those purchases have been made by tying around their necks another millstone in the form of second mortgages, a condition which may well lead in the near future to a repetition of what happened in the thirties, when tens of thousands of home owners lost their homes and their investments, and when those same mortgage bankers and trust companies reaped a bonanza in the form of repossessed housing.

We have before us today the 1949 edition of the Liberal government's housing plan. As you know, sir, there was also the 1945 edition. That is the edition which was publicized during the election campaign in the spring of 1945. Hon. members opposite will undoubtedly recognize this little pamphlet which was prepared under the auspices of the national Liberal federation, Ottawa, and printed in Winnipeg. It is called, "New Housing Plan of the Liberal Government". It was new in the spring of 1945. It calls for the building of a new social order in Canada. A fine new building plan for Canada is pictured. On the front page is depicted a man holding a model of a house that was to be built for $3,000, and was to be purchased at $13.82 a month, plus municipal taxes. There was a cheaper house as well, one at $2,000, which was to be available at $9.58 a month. On the inside we are told how it works and what it means. We find this choice bit:

> This plan means more and better homes for hundreds of thousands of families. It means closing the present gap between our housing needs and the number of homes available.

On page 3 we are told that the low-cost home ownership is just part of the housing plan. It says:

> Legislation—

I do not know where the legislation was. This pamphlet told the electors in 1945:

> Legislation also provides for low-rental housing.

There were to be houses for rent. There was to be slum clearance. There was to be a large-scale housing development. There were to be houses for farm families, houses for returned men, and there was to be a department of the government set up for development and research, and all this for $9.58 a month, and yet some people talk about the C.C.F. making promises and talking about pie-in-the-sky. I suggest that no Canadian citizen has ever been able to eat pie under the roof of any of these houses that had been built by the Liberal government since 1945 at either $9.58 or $13.82 a month.

When we begin to come to grips with this housing problem, sir, the first fact that confronts us is the shortage of houses. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) says the Conservative government in Ontario has done, notwithstanding all the glowing promises of the Liberal party in 1945 and again in 1949 there is still a tragic shortage of houses. The 100,000 units which it is expected will be built this year will barely take care of this year's new requirements.

A report on the housing problem by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities estimates that today throughout Canada there are 300,000 more household groups than there are individual residential units. They go on to say that there is another 300,000 units still being occupied which, by modern standards of what constitutes good housing, should long since have been demolished.

Our present rate of housing, high as it may be compared with past years, is just not catching up on that backlog of 300,000 houses needed if our people are to find any kind of house, apart from providing replacements for the 300,000 no longer fit for human habitation. That is the first fact confronting us. At the present time we need 300,000 houses to provide any kind of homes for our people and another 300,000 to replace dilapidated houses that are now occupied.

The second fact is that the policy we have been following has, in effect, resulted in over-building for certain economic groups and under-building for others, and these others are those whose need is most acute, and who are unable to afford the rent or purchase price at the prevailing high construction costs. For this class, notwithstanding all the lavish promises we have had from the Liberal party since 1945, we are as yet building no houses at all. That is the second fact to be considered.

The third fact to be considered is that with the demand for housing at the prevailing high cost already beginning to fall off it is not reasonable to expect private building to go on creating a surplus big enough to provide any housing for low-income families. There again the federation of mayors points out in their report that lending institutions will no longer keep on financing projects for which there is no ready market. With these facts in mind it becomes self-evident that any housing bill which will adequately meet the need must do one or both of two things. First, it must provide for the building of houses at a price where the monthly purchase price or the economic rent comes within the ability of middle- and low-income groups to purchase or rent.

Second, it must provide a rental subsidy of at least $20 a month and build a minimum of 12,000 houses a year on that monthly rental subsidy basis for the next ten years.

I chose the figure 12,000 because the Canadian construction association says that available labour and building material are sufficient at the present time for the building of 12,000 low-rental dwellings a year for ten years, presumably without interfering in any way with our present policy of building high priced houses, as many of them as can be sold, and without interfering with the present policy of permitting the building of theatres, hotels, gasoline stations, beverage rooms, cocktail bars, factories, stores and so forth, that the market can absorb.

Or, third, such a bill must provide for a combination of lower costs and rental subsidies.

Now, sir, let us examine the principles of the bill before us with these points in mind. The bill does contain five provisions that are helpful—helpful to the extent that half a loaf is better than no bread. The first of these provisions is for a second loan which will reduce the down payment. Second, the extension of the amortization period from 25 to 30 years; third, a vague sort of control over the price, since the second mortgage is to be made contingent upon the selling price being reasonable, whatever that may mean.

Then there is a provision for building houses for rent in conjunction with the provinces; and lastly, the extension of national housing assistance to the co-operatives on a more generous scale.

The first and second provisions of the bill are designed to make it easier for the purchaser to make his down payment, and it spreads his payment out over an additional five years because of the increased mortgage. It does nothing whatever to reduce the cost of housing. As I have pointed out already, I fear that the result of the measure may well be, as in the case of Ontario, a repetition in the near future of the situation that faced us in the thirties when home owners, carrying mortgages larger than they were able to pay, lost their homes when they were repossessed by mortgage companies and banks.

One of the major factors in the cost of houses today is the interest charge, and the bill does nothing whatever to reduce it. We hear a great deal about feather bedding by certain groups of people. We hear that bricklayers are feather bedding, that they should lay more bricks, and that the building trade workers are getting too much wages. We do not hear about the feather bedding being done by real estate speculators and mortgage bankers. The biggest feather bed in Canada today is that on which the mortgage bankers are sleeping, and the bill does nothing to reduce the size of that bed.

To illustrate how interest enters into the cost of a house, I want to take the example of a $10,000 dwelling. I take that figure because it represents about the lowest priced house that can be bought in Toronto or the Yorks at the present time. Today $10,000 is the market price of a bungalow with two bedrooms downstairs, and two unfinished attic rooms. If we take a $10,000 house carrying two mortgages, as provided for in the bill, and I presume bearing interest on both mortgages at 4½ per cent over a period of thirty years, such a house, with a first mortgage to the extent of 80 per cent of the cost, $8,000, and a second mortgage which is one-sixth of $8,000, or roughly about $1,300, or a total mortgage of $9,300, will cost $15,900 when paid for, $5,900 more than the original cost. I suggest that if the same house were built with money bearing interest at 2½ per cent amortized over thirty years, it could be purchased for $36.73 per month exclusive of taxes instead of $46.96, and would eventually cost the purchaser $13,222 or a saving of $2,700. If the same money were amortized at 2½ per cent over forty years, compounded half yearly as I suggest in all these calculations, a $10,000 house could then be purchased for $30.60 per month exclusive of taxes, and would still cost the purchaser over $1,000 less on his forty-year payments than it would cost on the thirty-year payment plan at 4½ per cent.

I am talking now about the middle income group, that percentage of our population now in receipt of incomes from $2,000 to $3,000 a year, and I submit that the government in any measure which attempts to provide for that class should reduce the interest payments to 2½ per cent and extend amortization to forty years. As evidence that I am not being unrealistic, I want to call the following facts to the attention of the house. A labour press release from Washington dated November 4 indicates that members of the United States senate housing subcommittee, who have just returned from a tour of European housing, report that in Scandinavia government loans for co-operative housing are made at 2½ per cent, about the cost of the money to the government, and that payments are spread over one hundred years on houses of brick and stone construction, and over sixty years on houses of wood construction. That is the report of the United States senate housing subcommittee.

The United States co-operative housing bill now before their senate calls for government loans at 3 per cent and amortization over a period of fifty years. In the United States public housing on a large scale has been built in the past with government money loaned at less than 2 per cent. In New Zealand 30,000 rental homes have been built with money loaned by the New Zealand government at from 1 to 1½ per cent. As has been pointed out here, even the Conservative government of Ontario has been advancing government money at 3 per cent. The federal government advances money to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at 2 per cent, and money to limited dividend companies at 3½ per cent. Yet it insists on charging co-operative builders and others 4½ per cent. Surely there is no justification for a government charging 4½ per cent if it wants to bring housing even within the reach of the middle income group.

A noted United States authority, Nathan Strauss, writing in his book "Seven Myths of Housing", has this to say:

> A reduction in financial charges, that is, interest and amortization, by half would effect a greater reduction in annual costs than cutting in half both the cost of labour and materials.

A Canadian authority, Leonard Marsh, writing in Public Affairs of October, 1947, says:

> If the interest rate should be cut by one-third, say from 3 to 2 per cent, operation costs would be reduced 12 to 15 per cent.

The government proposes to place some check on the selling prices of houses on which there is a second loan. May I point out that in the bill the government appears to be making no attempt whatever to check profiteering on building materials, real estate speculation, or excessive profits by contractors. There is a widespread belief in Canada that building costs are unwarrantably high. I most strongly recommend to the government that they give heed to the request of Mr. A. R. Mosher of the Canadian Congress of Labour for a royal commission to go into the whole question of building costs. I submit that such a commission should investigate whether or not contractors are making excessive profits, whether or not the cost of building materials is unduly high, whether labour costs are unduly high, whether real estate interests are profiteering, whether interest rates can be reduced, and also whether the decentralization of the industry is making for higher unit costs than are necessary.

If the government is serious in its desire to provide homes for those people in the middle income bracket, receiving from $2,000 to $3,000 income, who can afford only $30 or $40 a month in payments or rental for housing, then I have three suggestions to offer. First is the extension of the amortization period to forty years; second, the provision of government money to builders, co-operatives, municipalities, and home purchasers at two and a half per cent. I can see no good reason why, in its effort to protect private enterprise, this government should refuse to lend money to people building in a metropolitan area, and lend only to those in outlying districts where loans have been refused by insurance companies. That seems to me to imply that this government is much more concerned with protecting private interests who lend money than in having houses built for the people who need them. In the third place I suggest an acceptance of Mr. Mosher's suggestion for an investigation into the whole question of building costs.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the question of providing homes for the one-third of our people who cannot afford to pay more than $20 per month. According to an investigation by Dr. Leonard Marsh, as reported in a Star editorial some little time ago, 33·4 per cent of our people today are receiving less than $2,000 per year, even though their income is twice what it was in the pre-war years. Under instructions given by the government to those who borrow under the National Housing Act, one should not be required to pay more than twenty per cent of his gross income for housing, including rental or mortgage payments, taxes and so on. On that basis some 33·4 per cent of our people cannot afford to pay more than from $15 to $30 per month, and there simply are no houses available at those prices. I have here pages of advertisements from the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star taken last week end. Here are the rents being charged in Toronto today: five-room bungalow, one year lease, $150 per month; brand new five-room bungalow, $150 monthly to reliable tenants; fine large brick house, sixteen rooms, $200 a month; house on a quiet street near shopping, eight rooms, $125; four unfurnished rooms, new home, $100; five-room upper suite, $115; four and a half room upper duplex, $150. And so on. Those are about the only houses available in Toronto for rent today.

In view of what I have said in reference to the price of houses and the need for them I would ask the minister to indicate clearly to this house whether or not this bill provides for subsidized housing in the sense that a rental reduction fund will be established and a subsidy will be paid on rent for people in the lower income group. Does the bill provide for a subsidy on rent, or does it provide only for a subsidy on the cost of construction? In view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said about subsidized housing, in view of the vagueness of this bill, I think the minister owes it to this country to state in a forthright manner whether or not this legislation envisages a subsidized housing plan under which the difference between the economic rent and the rent people can afford to pay will be met by a monthly subsidy from a rent reduction fund. I think that is the most important question before us today. If the government does not visualize the construction of houses on that basis, I submit that by its recent action in connection with rentals the government is merely adding more confusion and more hardship to a housing situation that is driving hundreds of thousands of people to the point of despair. If the government were half as interested in building houses for people as they were in building an iron curtain around the McGregor report concerning flour, we would have houses available today for these people.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I want to submit that in view of the fact that rentals are invariably tied up with the whole question of housing, and in view of the fact that the federal government may soon pass out of the picture as far as rent control is concerned, consideration should be given by the government to rescinding the order concerning rentals which was made public a few days ago. At this point, with your permission, I desire to move the following amendment:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate and prior consideration to rescinding the order announced on November 3 providing for increases in domestic rents.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I wish to say a very few words on this occasion. The last time this matter was before the house I spoke at some length, but there are many points which I desire to discuss in detail when the bill is before the committee. I should like to take this opportunity of saying to the minister that I think the bill he proposes is an improvement on anything we have had up to date. There are a great many ways in which I believe the bill could be improved, but at least the government has taken one small step in that direction. There is necessity for a decided improvement in housing conditions in Canada.

It seems to me that now there is a greater need for housing than ever. If the effort were put forth that this problem deserves, I believe great strides could be taken in solving it. Whether or not the bill which is before the house will solve the problem remains to be seen. I notice that when the minister was speaking he gave figures to show that the housing condition was improving. In that connection, I should like to read an article published in the Ottawa Citizen which quotes the dominion bureau of statistics on the housing problem. The article is dated October 13 and reads as follows:

This was reported by the bureau of statistics yesterday in its monthly housing bulletin. It showed, however, that fewer new houses were started this year than last.

That is not in accord with the minister's statement. The article continues:

Starts during the seven months of 1949 totalled 49,285 compared with 49,452 in the first seven months of 1948.

According to these figures released by the dominion bureau of statistics, there were less houses started this year than last year. I understood the minister to say that more houses were started this year than last year, so there must be something wrong. The figures I have quoted were released by the dominion bureau of statistics. Certainly, it is evident that the rate at which houses are being built is not meeting our requirements. Some different measures, therefore, will have to be taken if we are to overcome that lag.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I think one of the most urgent needs in Canada today is a program which will supply low-rental housing. No matter how many houses we may build for those who have sufficient money to construct them under private enterprise, no matter how many of those houses we may build for those who can take advantage of the National Housing Act, it still will not meet the requirements of people who have not the money to build a house. This is particularly true of the labouring class. These people just have not enough money to lay aside a portion of their monthly income to make the required down payment. It does not matter how small that down payment is.

As the member who preceded me said, people cannot afford to spend more than one-fifth of their income for rent. That being so, the greatest need is for low-rental housing. Labouring people, and many so-called white collar employees, are in positions which do not lend themselves to the owing of a house. Some of these people are apt to be transferred from one position to another, yet they have not a sufficient income to pay the exorbitant rents which are being asked today. The other day I pointed out that there are thousands of people in this country, and in my own city particularly, that are receiving from $100 to $135 per month. It is exceedingly difficult to lay aside sufficient from that salary to pay rentals of anywhere from $40 to $70 per month. Many of these people cannot afford to pay anything in excess of $20 per month for rent.

This is the problem with which we are faced today, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me inevitable that this government will have to have a program of subsidized low-rental housing. The problem cannot be solved through any financial corporation. It must be done through the government, if we are to give the people who so urgently need it low-rental housing.

Let me speak for a moment about the cost of housing. When it comes to dealing with those people who are taking advantage of the National Housing Act, then of course the cost of the house is a material consideration. One of the factors which contribute to the high cost of building a house under the national housing plan is the rate of interest that must be paid. I have always maintained that 4½ per cent or 5 per cent is entirely too much. As I said on one other occasion last year, it seems to me that the government is now endeavouring to provide a field of investment for financial institutions instead of building low-cost houses. During the war and since that time I have oftened wondered where the mortgage companies would have received anything approaching 4½ per cent for their money if the government had not initiated this housing program. There is no other field in which these loan companies could have invested their money so safely.

This is particularly true when one considers that the government guarantees their losses to the extent of 25 per cent. It seems to me a safe investment for the mortgage companies, because they take absolutely no risk that I can see. They take no responsibility for the construction of the house. The onus is entirely on the purchaser, and it is so stated in the contract. If the purchaser fails to make one payment on time, his whole equity may be entirely washed out.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on another occasion I had the contracts here in the house. When I raised the question at that time, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. He pointed out to me how absurd it was for me to suggest that these loan companies would be so inhuman as to throw people out of their homes and destroy their equity. At that time I said that it was not whether they would or would not do it, but there was a provision in the contract which enabled the loan companies to wipe out every cent the purchaser had put into the house. That very thing did come to pass. Veterans in Calgary who built under the N.H.A. lost every cent they had put in those houses, owing entirely to the mortgage company's foreclosing on them because they had not made payments, and for other reasons. I believe that one of the greatest contributions the minister could make to prospective builders would be to see that these contracts are redrawn so that the man who purchases a house under the National Housing Act will be guaranteed his equity in that property.

One large item of cost which enters into the building of a house is the interest charges. I am entirely in accord with those who suggest that the interest rates under the National Housing Act should be cut down. Surely, an insurance company should not be given any greater interest rate on its investment than the ordinary person who is trying to provide for comfort in his old age by buying an annuity. The government saw fit to reduce the rates on annuities from 4 per cent to 3 per cent. If it was fair to do that, surely it is just as fair to reduce these interest rates from 4½ per cent to 3 per cent.

The minister said, I think—though I am just speaking from recollection now—that the cost of materials was down about 1 per cent and that wages were up about 3 per cent. I do not know where he got his information in that regard. The cost of building a house today definitely is 50 per cent higher than it was right after the war. I know that from an actual experience of my own. For the house that I built four years ago, the lumber alone would cost me $3,500 more now; or rather, a year ago it would have cost me that; it would cost even more than that now. The lumberman who supplied the lumber gave me that quotation. That is a tremendous increase in the cost of lumber alone. I have yet to see any lumber yards with which I have ever done business going broke.

But that cost is not nearly so bad as the tremendous interest rates which these people are asked to pay on their loans. It may be true that wages have increased; in fact, it is true. There is no doubt about that. That too would add to the costs. But I believe the government could render a service to the people of Canada if they would take such steps as are necessary to see to it that the costs of building materials are reduced.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, when I was going through the United States on my way home—we have not a Canadian highway on which we can travel; we must go through the United States; when he gets the houses built, perhaps the minister will give us a highway—I made it my business to check on the cost of some of the building materials. I found that, even on the west coast, where prices are higher than they are in the central part of the United States, lumber was cheaper there than it was in western Canada. I found that plumbing equipment was cheaper there than it is here, as was hardware. It seems to me that there is quite a field there which might be advantageously investigated, and that the result might be worth-while savings in the construction of these houses.

Let me speak of one other thing which the minister mentioned, namely, the price of these houses, and particularly the end price. When the minister was speaking on September 21, as reported at page 119 of Hansard, he had this to say:

> It is proposed that the present level of loans to house builders would be little changed.

Then on a little further:

> There would be no restrictions upon the builder as to the price at which he may sell the house.

In my view that is wrong. The minister of course will say to me: If we are going to give a loan on a house, then the price must be fair and reasonable; and this morning I think he gave the formula on which that fair and reasonable price would be determined. But in my judgment that is not enough. I do not see how this government can loan money to contractors building houses and then permit them to sell those houses at any price they like. To me that just does not seem to be good business. But I take it that is exactly what will happen under this plan. I believe that there should be some control on the selling price of the house.

The government of course may be trying to get out from under something which they have experienced in the past.

In answer to one of the questions put to him, the minister repeated what he had said on many other occasions, namely that there was no contract between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the lending institution and the builder. I disagree with that statement, and I hope that some of the courts will disagree with it. Without question, there is an agreement. You can call it an agreement, a contract or anything you like. There is an agreement between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the lending institution and the builder. Whether you call it an agreement or a contract is a matter of quibbling, I think. Under that agreement certain standards of buildings are set up. Specifications must be submitted, and a plan must be submitted for the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If that does not constitute a contract, I do not know what does. There you have the type of house determined, and you have the plans and specifications submitted. They must meet the approval of the institution. If that is so—and I take it that it is so, because I have seen the agreement—surely the government must have some say as to the selling price of that house.

The minister went on to say a while ago that it was not the cost that mattered but that it was the selling price. Then we must take into consideration the selling price; and if the government, through the lending institution, is going to make building loans to these builders building for sale, then certainly there must be some control on the selling price of that house. Suppose that a fair and reasonable price for a house is, we will say, $8,000. Are we going to allow them to sell that house for $12,000 or $14,000 to people who are desirous of buying it and who of necessity must buy a house? If we are trying to solve our housing problem, are we going to allow these men whom the government finances through the lending institutions to hold up the public who are in such great need of these houses? It just does not sound sensible. My view therefore is that there must be some control over the selling prices of these houses of the type of which I was just speaking.

In my remarks today I am endeavouring to give the house some suggestions whereby I think our building program can be improved. I want to say something about the qualifications of the builder. I do so because experience has taught us that the greatest difficulty the housing program has ever got into was because of some of the things I am about to mention now, and have mentioned in the past. One of them is the soundness of the construction. I have told the minister this privately, I tell it to him here, and I have mentioned it in the house before. I think one of the greatest difficulties the government has found itself in was not through their building program exactly but rather through the inefficiency and incompetence of the inspectors employed by them. On almost every occasion I can think of I could trace the difficulty back to inefficient inspection. In the little pamphlet which the government puts out, it is true that they speak about sound standards of construction, and about the specifications and so on. An outline is given in the book which the government sends out, or which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation sends out to the public, called "The Integrated Housing Plan", which is distributed all over the country. The people who get that book have confidence that the houses that are going to be built will be of sound construction.

That is not just so. They are fooled again, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat points out. Certainly if the buildings were constructed according to plans and specifications they would be of sound construction. The point arises however that the man whom the government has as its inspector has never seen to it that the plans and specifications were followed. In a great number of cases the specifications of the house have changed entirely without the knowledge of the purchaser, although such purchaser must assume all the responsibility together with the mortgage; that is, according to the government. There should be some different arrangement in that regard.

When the government is letting these agreements they should investigate the contractor to see whether or not he has had building experience sufficient to carry on an enterprise of that kind. Then they should review his financial position to see whether or not he is financially capable of carrying on that portion of the construction for which he is responsible, until he receives his progress payments.

There again the government has failed. These are things upon which the minister might check so as to save the government and the people who purchase these houses thousands upon thousands of dollars. Right now I can point to at least four large companies which have failed because they did not have sufficient financial backing to carry on construction to the point where they were entitled to progress payments, and for that reason had to fall down on their contracts.

In almost all those cases, however, the government reports—and I could read the statements if I were asked to do so—stated in effect that the financial standing was to the satisfaction of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the lending institution, which is just so much bunk. In the case of the Pelmo construction company at Toronto this fact was evident, as it was also in connection with the Bow River Construction Company at Calgary, where it was even more evident. These companies did not have the financial backing sufficient to carry them up to that stage where they would receive progress payments.

This condition could be easily overcome. One hon. member said to me the other day that if I got too strict in this connection I would have no one building. Well, I would rather not have that type of man building for me. Surely we do not want that kind of contractor building houses for the government or for anyone else. The government has fallen down most miserably in checking the financial condition of some of these people who have been building houses. This is a condition that could be overcome.

In almost every one of the cases concerning which I have had correspondence with the government on the point as to whether the contractors had the contracting ability and the building experience necessary, the same old answer was given, that it has been found to the satisfaction of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that they had that ability. In some of the cases where Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had given approval the organizations concerned had absolutely no building experience.

I believe it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), when he was minister of reconstruction and supply, who said it was the practice that these fellows could sublet to others who did know something about the business. What a lot of silliness! One might as well say he would let a contract to anyone who comes along, so that that person could sublet it to somebody with the necessary building qualifications who would complete the job. Here again is a place where the government could save the country hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I hope this matter will be taken into consideration.

There have been so many building failures involving such large amounts that it seems to me the request I made the other day for a royal commission to investigate such failures is now more warranted than ever. I am not saying this in any spirit of bitterness toward the government. I do say however that when a government crown corporation is handling millions upon millions of dollars there should be some check upon the way in which that money is spent. There should be a check by the House of Commons, if not by a royal commission. A committee of the house should be set up, if the minister is opposed to the appointment of the royal commission I have suggested, before which members of the house could satisfy themselves as to the methods employed in the building and financing of these housing projects.

I do not intend to speak longer. I have many other points in mind, but I believe they may be more properly discussed when the bill is in committee.

Mr. Speaker: Before the debate proceeds further I feel I should make a ruling on the amendment now proposed. In accordance with the custom established, perhaps I should first hear representations either for or against the amendment—and in doing so I suggest that such representations be as brief as possible.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word in support of the contention that the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) is in order. I shall heed your admonition to be brief, but before proceeding with what I have to say concerning the amendment I believe it would be in order for me to say, on behalf of members on all sides of the house, that we deeply appreciate the manner in which Your Honour is handling these points of order. This offer to hear representations before you rule is really something for which we are most grateful, and in my view it is one of the highlights of this parliament.

The fundamental basis for an amendment of this kind is found in citation 657, Beauchesne's third edition, which states:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress—

I shall stop there, because the rest does not apply. My contention is that this is an amendment drafted according to the terms of that citation which, for reasons stated in the resolution and for reasons stated in my colleague's speech, expresses opposition to the further progress of this measure until something else has been done. That "something else" is a request that the government consider rescinding the order of November 3 which made provision for an increase in domestic rents.

The form as set out in Beauchesne's third edition for this kind of amendment is form No. 93 at page 337. There are in fact several variations of it. They have been more or less put together in the present amendment, but I draw Your Honour's attention particularly to the form which says that:

> The further consideration of this bill be deferred until . . .

Such and such had been done.

My colleague asks that second reading of this bill should not now be given. He asks instead that there be prior consideration to the rescinding of the order with respect to rent control. Therefore I suggest that it is carrying out what is provided for in citation 657, and also what is provided for in form 93, which indicates that one can ask that second reading be deferred until something else has been done.

Incidentally the passing of this motion would not kill the bill. It would merely delay its progress, as is clearly set out in May's thirteenth edition. I will not take the time to read it to the house because I do not think there is any doubt on that point so far as Your Honour is concerned. I refer to pages 390, 391 and 392 of May's thirteenth edition.

It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the only question that might be raised would be whether or not the question in this amendment is relevant to the question involved in the bill before the house. The bill deals with housing, and surely rents are germane to housing. Surely no one can say that rents are foreign to housing, to use a word that appears in one citation. In fact, in introducing the bill the minister had to speak of rents repeatedly. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) did likewise. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) did the same and so did the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) who has just spoken.

The bill proposes to deal with the rental situation in a certain way. My hon. friend and colleague contends that before it is dealt with in that way it should be dealt with in this way, namely by rescinding the order increasing rents.

I also draw your attention to the heading of a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Sutherland on December 10, 1906. It is found on page 576 of Beauchesne's third edition, and reads as follows:

> An amendment is relevant when it deals with the same subject-matter as the main motion.

Certainly part of the subject matter of the main motion has to do with rents. The amendment deals with that part of the main question, and I submit for Your Honour's consideration that it is relevant.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I wish to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his reference to the way in which I have been giving my rulings and on the custom that has been adopted whereby I am prepared to hear hon. members before I make my rulings. I must say that I intend to continue to do that and I hope that other hon. members will be as brief as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was in this instance.

The amendment before the house at this time proposes to amend the motion that the bill under consideration be now read a second time. The form of the amendment is that the bill be not now read a second time but that the government should give immediate and prior consideration to a certain rentals order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred me to citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution;

I do not think the amendment would come within the provisions of the section of that citation as far as I have read them. The citation goes on:

> —or otherwise opposed to its progress.

The amendment, being in the proper form, might possibly come within these words. However, I would point out to hon. members that the amendment must be relevant to the question which is under consideration. This amendment suggests that the government give immediate and prior consideration to rescinding an order announced on November 3, providing for increases in domestic rents. May I inform the hon. member that that increase in no way affects any houses that are to be built under this bill. The order with regard to rents affected houses which were in existence in 1941 and probably some time subsequent to that date; but in no way can it be considered that the order affects anything that might be done under this bill. I would refer hon. members to citation 354 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads as follows:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved. (Can. C. J. Vol. LX, p. 122.)

[Mr. Knowles.]

In my opinion this amendment deals with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the motion which is now before the house, and is therefore not relevant, and I must accordingly rule it out of order.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my first words are words of congratulation and commendation to the minister on the most heartening statement of government policy which he made early today. In the course of his remarks I was particularly impressed when he pointed out that in 1946 we set before us housing objectives, and that in 1949 we had fully achieved them and realized them. That for me holds out considerable hope for the bill we have now before us.

In 1946 we said that we would do certain things. We come back here in 1949 and we say that we did them. Now we set ourselves an entirely new objective in this bill, and I am satisfied that once again we shall be able to come back to this house and to the country and say that we accomplished exactly what we set out to do.

Some time ago an hon. member informed this house that during the last campaign I had more to say about housing, as he put it, than any other hon. member. Let me just read what I did say about housing during the campaign. I think the house will be interested in that. I shall quote from the Toronto Star of May 4:

> David Croll, Liberal M.P. for Spadina, predicted last night that, shortly after the federal election, the Liberal government will announce a sweeping program of low-rental housing, because experience has shown private enterprise has failed to solve the problem of housing, which the speaker described as "a social problem, a great national emergency."

According to the Toronto Star of June 13, I said:

> In the light of present conditions, the government must undertake, in co-operation with the provincial and municipal authorities, to build low-cost rental and subsidized housing.

On July 6, at a meeting held in the office of the mayor of Toronto, at which I was present, along with other hon. members of parliament, I had this to say, as reported in the Globe and Mail of that date:

> Let there be no question as to the government's position in this respect.

I was dealing with housing.

> We intend to carry out our campaign promises in connection with low-rental housing.

While I am on the subject, I think it presents me with a good opportunity to set the record straight as to what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said about housing. I do so in order to give the house the benefit of his remarks, and the opportunity to appreciate the evolution of a Liberal mind. In October of 1947 he was quoted as having said:

> No government of which I am a member would ever pass legislation for subsidized housing.

This statement has been quoted in the house time and time again by members of the opposition to the point where I firmly believe that they would have preferred him not to change his mind. That is the way they would have liked to have his mind remain. Later on, when he became Prime Minister, he came to Toronto, and he is quoted in the Toronto Star of February 19, 1948, as having said, speaking of housing:

> That does not mean that we do not recognize the need for housing units at low rents. With today's costs, it must be obvious that low-rental housing cannot be provided without some kind of financial assistance. Our legislation provides for slum clearance grants, and also for loans to limited dividend companies for the construction of low-rental housing. It may be that experience will show that other forms of federal assistance will be desirable.

Then we have the Liberal manifesto issued in Moncton on May 20, in which he said:

> We are not going to be satisfied until decent housing is provided for every family. All levels of government must combine to promote low-rental housing projects, slum clearance and community planning.

Then we come to what the Prime Minister said at Stratford, Ontario, on June 4. The report in the Toronto Star of that date reads in part as follows:

> "We should not rest until every Canadian has a decent home to live in." He stressed that housing is not a federal responsibility. "But we have said that if any province or any other governing body will come to us with a proposition, it will find that the federal government is ready to share with it the responsibility and expense of providing houses."

Then on June 8 at the city of Quebec the Prime Minister said:

> For many people low-rental housing is essential... Municipal and provincial authorities obviously have to decide what is feasible and desirable before we can give effective help. But I certainly feel strongly that we in Canada should push ahead vigorously with our housing policy because more and better housing raises the standard of living; low-rental housing promotes improved health and greater social and family security for those with low incomes; and an active housing program helps to keep up employment in the construction industry which, as you know so well, is one of our least stable industries. A successful housing program depends upon good town and community planning. Increased cost, and complexity of governmental action in the development of towns and cities, emphasizes the importance of careful long term planning to avoid needless expenditure.

Today we have this bill before us, to amend the National Housing Act, and naturally I am happy to endorse it because the National Housing Act has become a landmark in Canadian history. Over the years it has made it possible for many people to become home owners who otherwise might not have been able to do so. At the present time we find that the country from Halifax to Vancouver is dotted with N.H.A. homes. To that extent it has become a part of our Canadian way of life. The proposal today is to broaden the application of the act and when the amendments before us are adopted it will make it a truly national housing act. The present amendments make it more than ever a bill with a purpose, and the purpose is to create more and better housing for all the people of Canada.

If this bill means anything at all, it means public housing; it means low-rental housing; it means subsidized housing. I should like to quote now from the Ottawa Journal of November 12. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) addressed the Dominion United Church men's association, and the newspaper report reads in part:

> He said that the principle had been admitted that homes in low economy areas must be subsidized, and added that the work of clearing slum sections was important.

Furthermore, for the information of those who may not have caught the full import of the statement he made today, I should like to point out that he said:

> The project, however,—

Speaking of dominion-provincial house building.

> —will remain in ownership of the dominion and the province. The operating profit or loss will be borne 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province.

These are important words.

> The annual subsidy will be the amount by which rentals received are less than operating costs of all kinds, including depreciation. These operating losses will be met on an annual basis 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province.

How much clearer could anyone be than in that particular statement? I think we have sufficient background so that we can now discuss the bill and the principle involved in it. The amendments bring to the act a principle that, in my opinion, is of the greatest social significance. I think the house and the country should recognize it exactly for what it is. Today for the first time we are asked to accept the proposition that housing is a social as well as an economic problem. I gladly accept it as do my fellow members on this side of the house. I call upon the rest of the house to join me in hailing this as another forward step in our political and social maturity.

I think the amendment does something even more than that. Here for the first time we have an admission by this or any other government of responsibility for housing the nation. We have now taken the initiative, and we must see that we keep it. I need not recall to the house that under our constitution housing is normally a provincial and municipal matter. That has been largely the reason why there has been a failure to solve the housing problem decisively. Each government authority looked to the other two governmental authorities to do something about it with the result that nothing very much was done. As a result housing, because of the differences of opinion, was lost in the zone of non-co-operation which lay between the governmental authorities. The present amendments end an era of indecisiveness. There is no longer a twilight zone. The field has been completely covered, 75 per cent by the dominion government and 25 per cent by the provincial government.

The amendments also do something else. They end once and for all, I hope, the "after you" philosophy which has dogged Canadian housing for many years. They show clearly that the dominion is now prepared to act co-operatively, according to the terms laid down, with all levels of government to provide housing for Canadians who need it. This seems to me to be a great challenge to the people of Canada, and I am sure it is a challenge that they will take up. It is a challenge that gives comfort to all those of us who believe in public housing. One of the important features of the bill is that in order for it to be a success the people will have to interest themselves in the problem. This is a public level project.

I think it should be admitted to begin with that this is not a perfect bill. It is a new field, and inevitably deficiencies will become apparent which we will have to remedy in the light of experience and with the passing of time. But I want to recall to hon. members that all our social legislation, from old age pensions to family allowances, has been amended and improved with the passing of time and the gaining of experience; and this housing legislation will prove to be no exception. Imperfect it may be, though I do not suggest that at all; yet it is a very fine beginning. It is important, too, that the government has not placed a price tag on housing, and has not attempted to deal with this question in pennies. At the present time under this legislation we are allocating some $50 million. That is a nice beginning. It will cost more, and hon. members must expect that, as I am sure the country will. Today we are making a capital investment in human welfare; and when a government does that it is money well spent.

This government is saying to the provinces and municipalities: this is what we propose to do. We are partners, and we will share the load on the basis of 75 per cent for the dominion and 25 per cent for the province. We will increase our assistance to the builders, subject to one special safeguard, that of a fair and reasonable selling price. That point has occasioned some comment by other hon. members. It may not appear important to some, but those of us who had some intimate association with wartime housing following the first war will know that it is a guarantee of protection for the home owner. Certainly we could not be forgiven if twice in one generation we made the same mistake, and this provision is an attempt to prevent that happening.

Finally the dominion is saying this: we will enter into agreements with provinces to build publicly assisted housing, including low rental housing on an economic or subsidized basis. There, Mr. Speaker, you have it. For the first time, in speaking of housing, it is safe to use the word "subsidized" without being considered a wild-eyed radical. It has taken a long time; but when the need was fairly placed before the government they did not hesitate to take action. So at long last the government, to its everlasting credit, has taken a direct stand in the field of subsidized housing, something that will be hailed from one end of this country to the other as one of the most progressive and far-reaching measures ever introduced in this house, in my opinion comparable to the family allowance legislation. This 21st parliament has much to commend it. So far it has dealt with two constitutional problems of great importance; yet I venture to predict that long after those have come to be taken for granted this parliament will be remembered for this legislation which at last recognizes housing as a matter of social welfare and a problem of national concern.

I know our opponents are criticizing this legislation. That is the function of an opposition. Already from the right we have suggestions that we are giving too much, while on the left they are saying we are not giving enough. Well, that was ever the way, as we well know. However, I prefer to welcome this bill for what it is, a very long step forward in government thinking. And believe me, the step was not taken any too soon. Today, as has been pointed out, the need for housing is immediate and urgent, and in some instances almost tragic. We cannot deny that lately it has become aggravated. That is particularly true in the low-income groups, whose rate of family increase is greatest and whose ability to pay is the smallest. We have now reached the point where we cannot let any more grass grow under our feet. We need action, and we need it quickly. We need to pass, proclaim, plan and put up houses, even before spring is here, because time is working against us. We have a backlog now of nearly 500,000 units which are badly needed; and the need increases daily as our population increases and our present housing units become more obsolete.

This amendment, of course, is not aimed primarily at the upper bracket Canadians. They have always been able to look after themselves. They have always been able to build or buy houses. No doubt this legislation will help them, but the amendment is not intended for their specific benefit. They do not constitute the real social problem with which we have to deal in this country. The problem is posed to us by that one-third of our nation who cannot afford to buy or rent homes constructed by private builders at present costs. The latest figures I can find from the taxation department, which I believe are for 1947, show that one and a quarter million taxpayers in Canada had incomes of $2,000 or less. Well, from there on it is a matter of simple arithmetic, the kind every head of a family sits up nights working out but hardly ever solves. The top figure of $2,000 a year means an income of $166 per month. We are told that an economic rent is somewhere between 20 and 23 per cent of the monthly income. This means that our Canadian earning that top income of $2,000 a year can afford to pay only $38 a month in rent; and it must be remembered that $2,000 a year is the ceiling. Some of the one and a quarter million taxpayers earn much less than that. So it has long been clear that those earning $25 to $40 a week cannot possibly obtain adequate housing accommodation at today's costs. They must be helped.

The answer is subsidized housing. In this bill the government has recognized a very important principle. The real issue in housing is no longer materials or manpower; it is cost. No housing plan is going to relieve the present shortage unless something is done to reduce the cost to the occupant, whether he be owner or tenant. Over the years the National Housing Act has helped thousands of Canadians to own their own homes. In the first seven months of 1948 more than 11,000 Canadians took advantage of that legislation. It is true that by lowering the down payment the act increases the number of potential owners, and by extending the amortization period it makes it easier for others to obtain houses at a more reasonable rental. But neither of these affects the cost. The longer amortization, good as it is, merely spreads today's inflated building costs over a longer period of years. It is true that it makes housing more easily available to those who can afford it, but what about the one-third of the nation which cannot afford to pay even the smallest down payment, or which cannot afford to carry even the present generous amortization plan. These are the people who need assistance immediately. These are the people who need subsidized housing now. It is for that reason I say to the minister, we have no time to lose.

Now that we have taken the wraps off this terrible and terrifying word "subsidized", we look around and notice some rather surprising things. One is that we have been in the subsidizing business for some considerable length of time. Fourteen per cent of the building completed in 1949 was subsidized by this government. This government has already built 50,000 subsidized houses for veterans, both low-cost and low-rental houses. No one will say that veterans housing has not been a tremendous success. We have already proven to the country that subsidized housing is workable and beneficial.

Under the principle contained in this bill, it will be possible to do something for the rest of the Canadian people who need homes in the very same way. If we can build 50,000 subsidized homes, we can build 100,000 subsidized homes. We can build as many as this country needs, as many as this country asks for, or as many as this country can digest. One thing we must not forget, the initial drive must now come from the municipalities. Low-rental and subsidized housing must have grass roots enthusiasm emanating from the cities and towns in which the houses will be built. What we are setting up by this act is the machinery for housing the nation.

Writing a cheque, in itself, is not good enough and the minister fully recognizes that. It is not enough for us to write a cheque and say to the provinces or municipalities, "There you are, you have the money, it is your baby; you bring it up." By this act housing becomes our baby from this time forward. We have to see to it that it becomes a full grown, healthy adult. The dominion is providing for 75 per cent of the cost and 25 per cent will be borne by the province. Profits and losses are to be divided on the same basis. In a broad scheme such as this, there will be losses. They are inevitable if we are to have the full benefit of subsidized houses.

In addition to that, the dominion government provides the research knowledge, technical and administrative experience, and the provincial government provides the local knowledge and considerable experience. The municipalities provide two things which will cost them nothing. They provide the initiative and the local services. The services are to be paid for by normal taxes. There will be no cost to the municipalities. The subsidy which in the past the municipalities gave to wartime housing now comes to an end. It is expected that the municipalities will provide serviced land, either immediately or whenever it is required of them. They will be repaid every cent of the cost for providing the land, in the same way that any taxpayer pays his taxes.

We only ask one more thing from the municipalities, and that is that they do some intelligent planning. Public housing cannot be like Topsy, it cannot just grow. It must be planned systematically, carefully and intelligently. I believe the importance of planning becomes all too evident when one looks around and sees the result of unplanned private building. I am thinking of areas around the city of Toronto, but it is applicable to Ottawa, Windsor and practically every municipality across this country. One finds row upon row of homes, identical bungalows. It must be a nightmare for someone coming home on Saturday night. They are crowded together as closely as possible with a minimum of air, light and recreational space. Many private builders, and the government to some extent, seem to forget that houses are meant to be lived in by human beings. There is more to housing than four walls and a roof.

The public housing which this act envisages must be built intelligently and with great imagination. There must be planning. Little communities will be growing up here and there. They must have lots of green spaces, schools, stores and recreational facilities. The aim cannot be to squeeze in as many low cost houses as possible into a given area of land. It must be to provide a pattern of living by means of which people may lead happier, healthier lives. That is what I meant, Mr. Speaker, when I said that housing is now a social as well as economic problem.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Croll: Not just now, no.

Mr. Fleming: Will you permit a question later?

I am convinced that we can house this nation, provided we obtain the co-operation of the provinces and the municipalities. I commend the minister now for the trip he took across this country earlier this year, when he visited the premiers and the men responsible for housing in the various provinces. He came back with an agreement. I am suggesting to the minister that he take another one of those Winters travels across this country immediately after the passage of this bill, for the purpose of implementing the intention of the house.

This act provides the means, but the real drive must now come from the people in the municipalities. If the people of this country are alive to the unlimited possibilities of this act for human good, if they are vigorous and concerted in their approach, and if the provinces will do their part by co-ordinating and co-operating, this country will have housing as it never had it before. This problem is vital today. The need will, I hope, never be greater and our ability to finance the program is beyond question.

Bad and inadequate housing has been the worst blemish on our generation. Crime, social unrest, lowered health standards and human waste, have all stemmed from bad housing conditions. To some extent all these conditions can be ameliorated, if not eliminated, by an adequate level of housing. We come down to this: that adequate housing is an integral part of the welfare state we are building in Canada. This is a great contribution to it. Like education and good health, it must not be reserved for the few who can afford to pay for it. Like education and good health, it must be made available to all people who need it.

I believe that the Canadian people are solidly behind this venture. Already there is a wide cross-section of public opinion which has fully endorsed subsidized housing. Let me relate a few.

It has been endorsed by the Canadian Legion, by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, by welfare and social councils across Canada, by the Canadian Congress of Labour, by the American Federation of Labor, and by church groups, by the Canadian Construction Association and by socially minded people across this country. But they must do something more than merely endorse. They must actively press their municipal authorities to take full advantage of this act. It is impossible, and it would be undesirable, for us here to impose housing on the Canadian people. There must be a desire and a demand, which I am certain are there, which will make themselves not only heard but felt at the municipal and provincial levels. The Canadian people can rest assured of one thing, that the dominion will do its part.

Such, then, is our new housing act which is reaching out to new horizons. The only people who stand to lose by this act are the slum owners and shelter profiteers. The country stands to gain. This act will assist many Canadians to own their own homes and will assist others to rent decent, adequate housing at prices that they can afford to pay. I think this act, if fully implemented will eliminate soft spots in our economy and will keep our way of life secure. I know that this will cost money; but no matter what it costs, it will be cheap in comparison with the good that it will do. I think that this is an excellent beginning.

Just one more word of urgency. In the light of other decisions which we have made, this act at the present time should have the highest priority with the minister. We must hurry, hurry, hurry and get building done as quickly as we possibly can. I do not expect the minister to go out and lay bricks; but anything short of that I am prepared to accept. We must not forget this fact. When we endorse the principle of this bill, we accept responsibility, and then we must follow through. We have already paid too high a price for slowness in this country.

I heartily endorse the principle of this bill, Mr. Speaker. I congratulate the minister and the government, and I am happy to find myself in support of a government that sponsors a bill such as this.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. gentleman permit my question now?

Mr. Croll: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: In view of what he said about the social benefits of housing, how does he square what he has said today with his acquiescence in the recent 25 per cent increase in rents authorized by the government?

Mr. Croll: My hon. friend should merely ask the question, not make a statement on something that is not a fact, as far as he knows.

Mr. Fleming: Did you acquiesce or did you not?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have ruled that—

Mr. Croll: In any event, let me say to the hon. member that I was not in favour of doing away with rent control in 1945, as he was and as was his party.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not comment now on the fact that my friend did not answer my question, but on the fact that he has just finished up with a statement that I and my party advocated the abolition of rent controls in 1945, a statement that is totally, absolutely and completely without one word of truth in it.

Mr. Speaker: I might say to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that I have ruled that the recent rental order does not affect houses which are to be built under this bill, and is therefore foreign to it.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): My brief remarks this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, will I believe reflect in the main the opinions held by the majority of the people of the riding that I represent in this house.

First, I should like to compliment the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) and the government for realizing that, in spite of the extensive housing program across the nation, the need for housing with all its accompanying difficulties continues to be one of Canada's most serious problems. In fact, in many of our larger centres the need for housing seems as great as ever.

While I realize our responsibility in this most urgent matter, however, I feel obliged to offer a word of caution in respect of the rental phase of our assistance as proposed by this bill. As all hon. members know, the most acute need for housing exists in those areas in which we have a density of population caused by industrial expansion. Does it not seem reasonable that the industries and the municipalities causing this influx of population and, of course, benefiting from it, should share the costs and the responsibility in this regard? To me it does not seem fair that, in this country in which so many of our people live on farms and in small towns, this section of our people should be penalized and forced to subsidize certain urban dwellers. Furthermore, such action can only accelerate the movement of our people from the farm and the small towns and cities and further defeat the plans and hopes of those of us who believe, for various reasons, that industry should be decentralized across this nation.

As I said at the beginning, I am glad our government realizes the need for housing and is doing something about it; but I urge that we proceed cautiously in this rental phase of our proposed assistance. As for the rest of the bill—that is, with the portion of the bill to assist home ownership—I am thoroughly in accord with it. I have the good fortune to live in North Bay where we boast a high percentage of home owners; in fact, 75 per cent of our homes are owner-occupied. This home ownership, I believe, is the greatest single factor in the general well-being and stability of our people. The urge to own one's own home is strong in the hearts of Canadians; and this portion of the bill is designed further to develop and stimulate this urge to the end that it may become a reality.

I do not believe many Canadians want to live in subsidized homes with another section of our population being penalized. What the majority of Canadians want is an opportunity to own their own homes. I urge the minister to make this section of the bill as workable as possible. Let us cut those down payments to a minimum, so that they will be within reach of all our people. When I say "all our people" I mean just that. I do not subscribe to the theory that a large portion of the Canadian people are incapable of owning their own property, nor do I share the view that certain people are doomed to live in subsidized rental accommodation for the rest of their days.

Further, when this legislation becomes effective, I would urge that special attention be given to publicizing these amendments to the National Housing Act through every possible means—in other words, let us popularize this N.H.A. plan—so that we may hasten the day when as many of our people as possible may own their own homes.

I have just one further observation to make. I would urge on the minister, in the application of these new amendments, that everything possible be done to encourage the building of small low-cost homes. I know the minister has this in mind, but I think it warrants serious consideration; because the low-cost home of today in terms of our present-day thinking is, in fact, the high-priced home of a few years ago. I need scarcely remind hon. members of the days when our economy was not so buoyant, of the days when our people who had purchased high-priced homes during a previous period of economic buoyancy were being hard pressed to meet their obligations and when, as you know, thousands of homes were lost, along with every dollar the owner had invested.

I am not suggesting that we are headed for another period like the early 30's; but at the same time, one would be foolish to plan his future on the assumption that our present high level of prosperity will continue to climb unabated. The point I want to make, sir, is this. As I move around this country today I see young inexperienced people buying high-priced homes, little realizing the seriousness of their obligations, of the crushing burden of interest payments, instalments on principal, local taxes, insurance, maintenance. Let us not be responsible for saddling our people with homes that in the future will be monuments to debt and misery, but rather let us especially encourage low-priced small homes where our young people can meet their obligations and still enjoy at least some of the luxuries of life.

If and when these small homes are partially or fully paid for, they can be resold to other young people starting out in life and the former owner with his increased equity can then step into a higher-priced home that will be more in keeping with his more mature requirements and capabilities.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the hon. member who has just taken his seat upon calling attention to one blind spot in the government's housing program, namely that concerning rural housing. The amendment now before us contains nothing, so far as rural housing is concerned. I am sure any hon. member who has driven through rural Canada, including many parts of northern Ontario, northern New Brunswick, the northern sections of the prairie provinces and Quebec must realize the tremendous need for rural housing. If there were gathered together in one of the larger urban centres homes which one finds in what might be described as slum areas in rural Canada, there would be such a protest that this or any other government in Canada would have to take notice of it. However, because these people are scattered throughout the rural areas, with no welfare organizations to bring their plight to the attention of the government, they are neglected. It is the case of the squeaky wheel getting the grease.

While I compliment the minister upon the program introduced today, nevertheless I bring his attention to the fact that it provides nothing for rural housing. The original housing act passed in 1944 contained in part III a provision for rural housing, to the effect that some loans should be available through section 14. In section 15 it was provided that the government could make grants or subsidies to manufacturers up to an amount of $5 million for the production of units to provide running water, bathroom facilities and the like in rural homes. Although that act was passed, the section in question was not implemented until 1947. In that year the section of the act dealing with loans for rural homes was implemented; but here again the conditions under which it was implemented made it almost impossible to obtain loans.

As a matter of fact the report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for 1948 states—

> The annual report for 1947 referred to the proclamation during that year of section 14 of the act which provides for loans to farmers to assist in construction of new houses. During the latter part of 1947, following the proclamation of the section, facilities were established in regional and branch offices—

—to make such loans. And then later it says:

Only four farm loans were approved during 1948. Of these, three were in Alberta and one in Nova Scotia. The total amount of the four loans was $20,100. It is interesting to note that in the case of each of the four loans the farm houses being constructed were to include wiring for electricity and modern plumbing facilities.

Nothing has been done. I have checked to see what other government organizations there are under which farm loans could be obtained for housing purposes. I find that in "Housing in Canada", a factual summary published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, loans are made under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It states here that—

Loans having a total value of $52,000 for the construction of thirty-one new farm houses were approved during the first half of 1949. Thirty-nine loans to a value of $34,000 were approved for the alteration and improvement of existing farm homes. In the first half of 1948 loans were approved with a value of $18,000 for sixteen new farm houses, and forty-one loans with a value of $17,000 were approved for residential improvements and alterations.

Guarantees under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944—

And this is the other act under which loans may be obtained for building purposes so far as farm homes are concerned—

—were made in respect of 176 loans for new farm houses, and 385 loans for the improvement and alteration of existing farm residential property in the first half of 1949. The loans for the new units had a total value of $283,000 and for the improvements and alterations $347,000. In the first half of 1948, loans were lower both for new farm houses, 162 valued at $211,000 and for improvements and alterations, 213 valued at $194,000.

These totals mean nothing when compared with the need for better homes in rural Canada. The failure of the government to interest any large corporation or manufacturer in the production of suitable bathroom units and toilet facilities for rural homes is deplorable. From 1944 to the present time we find the government has been able to interest only one manufacturer, and him only in a tentative way—he has not yet even made an application—for the production of these facilities. Goodness knows they are needed in rural Canada.

I have not the statistics with me, but I did place on record during the last parliament figures which showed that approximately 90 per cent of homes in urban areas have running water and bathroom facilities whereas 90 per cent of rural homes have neither. Surely there is something lacking in a country like Canada where in rural districts the homes of the greatest single wealth-producing group in the country are of this kind.

That is the one blind spot in the minister's legislation. Something should be done to rectify the condition and to meet the need for better homes in rural Canada. I hope some other members representing rural areas will add their voices in urging the government to meet this need.

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton): My first word is one of congratulation of our new minister on the very interesting ministerial appointment with which he has been honoured. I also want to congratulate him on the wonderful progress he has already made after being in office for so short a time.

May I, Mr. Speaker, have the leave of the house to put on record two short tables, one dealing with all building construction in Canada—the information was obtained from the bureau of statistics—for the years 1939 to 1947 inclusive. It consists of two columns, the first column showing the total building construction in Canada and the second column the residential construction only. The second table shows the number of housing units built in Canada in the years 1937 to 1949 inclusive but excluding the war years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Has the hon. member leave of the house to put these tables on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cleaver: The tables follow:

Building Construction

Year	All types, including industrial, commercial, institutional, residential, etc.	Residential
1939	$159,041,080	$ 53,926,429
1940	257,800,560	59,925,197
1941	439,095,000	119,576,000
1942	418,371,000	109,346,000
1943	368,899,000	97,184,000

Wherever you go in Canada today you find the strongest possible evidence of the fact that we are enjoying the greatest building boom that this country has ever had. You do not need to go to the bureau of statistics to satisfy yourself as to that. Your own eyes are sufficient evidence of the fact. All types of building, not only homes but all types of construction, factories, stores, churches, schools and so forth, all types of building that you can think of are being erected. In my own community I have never seen anything like the building activity which we have today. If hon. members will glance at the statement that I have put on record they will notice that the total of all building construction in Canada in the year 1939 was $159 million odd. By 1947 our total building construction had moved up to $838 million. Complete figures are not yet available for 1948 and 1949, but I am reliably informed that our total building construction this year will run well over a billion dollars. Compare that figure with $159 million in 1939.

Coming to residential construction, the total value of house building in 1939 was just over $53 million. By 1947 we had moved up to $320 million, and this year we shall go well over $400 million. There will be that many dollars' worth of houses built in the one year. If hon. members will check over the housing units they will find that in the years prior to the war our peak year was 1939 when we built 42,000 new houses. By the end of this year the minister estimates we shall have built 96,000 new housing units. Expressed in other words, we have geared up the building trades of this country, so far as house building is concerned, to over double the number of houses which we built in 1939, which was our normal production of houses prior to the war.

I should like to remind the house that this remarkable achievement in house building has been accomplished notwithstanding the heaviest competition, competition in other branches of building. If hon. members will check over the table again they will see that in this year, in addition to the tremendous house building program, we shall have built over $600 million worth of stores, factories, schools, institutions and the like. We all know that the change-over from wartime production to peacetime production is a difficult one. Because of that, in the early years after the war we ran into many bottlenecks in the building trades. Plumbing fixtures, soil pipe, electrical supplies, seasoned lumber, doors, hardwood flooring, nails, cement, brick, gyproc, fibreboard and countless other items I could mention were all in short supply. Most of them are becoming easier today, but cement, bricks and nails are still in short supply.

Since the war, and certainly in 1947 and the early part of 1948, the builders of this country spent well over one-third of their time searching for building materials and chasing up the delivery of those materials. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this tremendous expansion in our building trades, this tremendous expansion in house building, did not come about by mere accident. It came about by good planning and able leadership. Too much credit cannot be paid to the house building trades of this country for the persevering way in which they carried on in 1946, 1947 and 1948 under these constantly recurring bottlenecks of one type of building supplies and the other. They cannot be given too much credit for their ingenuity in improvising and substituting one type of material for another that was in short supply.

Another branch to which some credit is due is our lending institutions. We should express appreciation of our lending institutions for the wonderful way in which they have co-operated and made the finances available for the tremendous program which we have had. I am proud to say that this country owes a deep debt of gratitude to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who was responsible for the organization of this program, and also to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Much of the credit for what we have done in house building today should be given to the officers and staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the different programs and schemes that they have devised to assist in and to stimulate the construction of houses. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any department of government where men have worked any harder or any more efficiently than the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing during the trying years of 1946, 1947 and 1948. Many times it has been my experience to call these men who were making such a wonderful effort, and very often I found them in their offices working in the evening. This goes for the branch offices as well as at head office at Ottawa I do not think that happened very often in many of the other departments.

I think too that a measure of appreciation should be expressed to the Ontario government for the assistance which they have given to home owners in buying their own homes. When the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) suggested that Ontario's contribution meant that we got 10,000 more houses than we would have had without that contribution, perhaps he was overplaying the point a little; but Ontario is deserving of credit for their forward move in assisting something over 10,000 purchasers who did not have the necessary down payment. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that that department of government at Toronto is very efficiently managed, and these down payments in the way of assistance to purchasers have come through to the different home owners as promptly as one could hope that they would.

I can only speak of my own community because I know it well, and while I travel to some extent I do not pretend to speak for the rest of Canada. In my own community, so far as housing is concerned, one part of the problem is well under control. I refer to the part that has to do with home ownership. With the assistance which I have mentioned, so far as the private home owner is concerned the problem is well under control and we are making quite good progress.

The remaining hard core of the problem, as I should like to term it, is the need for low-rental housing. In view of the achievements, and in view of all the surrounding circumstances, I was hopeful that there would be some helpful suggestions from the opposition as to how the low-rental problem should be tackled. I also fully expected that we would have some expression of appreciation from the official opposition for what has been accomplished. I was both surprised and disappointed with the speech delivered by the opposition's official housing critic when the bill was up for first reading. On re-reading his speech carefully and going over it from beginning to end, I fail to find any helpful suggestion for the solution of the problem. In addition to that, about the only thing that one can find is a long list of misleading grumbling complaints. May I read a few of them to the house. At page 1297 of Hansard the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said:

> When we look back on these post-war years from 1945 to 1949 inclusive, we can say that so far as housing is concerned they will go down as the wasted years.

Further down on the same page there are these words:

> The record during the past five years has been a record of failure . . .

Over on the next page I find these words:

> Progress by this government in three precious years in spite of all this boasting and these promises—absolutely nil!

No progress. I wondered, when I re-read these statements, what on earth the hon. member for Eglinton has been doing with himself. Has he been going around blindfold, or what is the matter with him? In the same speech at page 1302 of Hansard there are more complaints, and I find these words:

> I have said before that there has been far too rigid and unsympathetic administration of the National Housing Act.

Again on the same page are these words:

> . . . but I do not intend to spare the feelings of the supporters of the government any more than I have been.

Of course he has never done that. Further down there are these words:

> Of course they were smug, they were satisfied just as they are today, and they followed the course of just letting the people who were faced with the housing problem worry about it.

I have a suggestion to make to the hon. member for Eglinton. If he will not believe what he sees himself, if he will not believe his own eyes, if he will not believe the material that is available to him in the dominion bureau of statistics and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, then I would ask him to be good enough to go and talk with the son of a former Conservative minister of finance, a lifelong Tory, who will not lead him astray politically. I refer to Mr. Rhodes. I believe at the present time he is president or past president of the Ottawa real estate board. He is a man who has made a wonderful contribution in Ottawa towards the solution of Canada's housing problem. I invite members of the house to go and inspect Mr. Rhodes' Manor Park suburban development. I ask the hon. member for Eglinton to inquire of Mr. Rhodes whether progress in house building since the end of the war has been nil, if they have been wasted years, if it is a record of failure. I also ask him particularly to ask Mr. Rhodes if the administration of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been unsympathetic or smug, and whether the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and this government have let people who were in distress for housing do their own worrying.

Mr. Fraser: They certainly have.

Mr. Cleaver: Enough of that. My object in speaking today is to try to sell an idea to the private members of the house. The first thing I wish to do is to urge as strongly as I can that our housing problem is much too vital for anyone to play politics with it.

Mr. Fraser: Page the government.

Mr. Cleaver: In the first place I do not think it is good enough for private members, whether on the government or opposition sides of the house, to content themselves with simply grumbling about it. I suggest to all private members of the house that we should go to work and help in the effort to solve the housing problem in our own ridings. I hope I shall be pardoned if I make a personal reference. As I view it, as I said a moment ago, the remaining hard core of our housing problem is one of rentals. I think there are two distinct groups requiring rental accommodation, and I think they should be kept in two separate compartments as to their needs and the remedy to be applied. The first group comprises a limited number, and every community has them. It consists of a few folk who, on account of old age, ill health, or some misfortune of one kind or another, find themselves in a position where they cannot afford to pay the economic rent for decent housing accommodation. Their number is relatively small but their need is most urgent. In Burlington we have these people.

The mayor of the town, Major Leather, and I organized a housing plan for these unfortunates under the existing National Housing Act. You will find under that act that 90 per cent of the cost at 3 per cent interest is available for this purpose in any municipality, but there are two restrictions. In the first place the sponsors of the scheme, who put up the 10 per cent equity, must be content with a 5 per cent interest return on their money. The other restriction is that the housing units constructed under the plan must not be rented to anyone except the needy folk to whom I have referred. The major and I organized such a scheme in my home town. It was sponsored by the Lions Club, the Legion and the town of Burlington. We raised the 10 per cent owner equity as a gift. We did not pay any interest on it. We built the most modern type of units that we could. They are of fireproof masonry construction, and are attractive in appearance. We rent the nicest little housing suites you ever saw at $16 and $21 a month. They have white-tile bathrooms, and nicely equipped kitchens with everything that the heart could desire. The rentals of $16 and $21 a month pay all of the operating costs. By the way, we were able to get an amortization period of forty-seven years on the mortgage, because the buildings were well constructed. Those rentals pay the expenses of the caretaker, the cost of fuel, and all operating costs. What we have done in Burlington has been repeated in one or two other municipalities in Canada, but in far too few; and I suggest to the private members of this house, especially to our critical friends in the opposition, that they get busy in their own ridings and help solve Canada's housing problem in so far as it concerns these unfortunate people.

As to the other part of the problem, the provision of low-rental housing for the workmen of this country, I do not know how many units we need. My guess would be somewhere between one hundred and two hundred thousand housing units. I am pleased indeed that this amendment to the National Housing Act provides for co-operation between governments at all three levels, municipal, provincial and federal, for the solution of this problem. On a question as important as housing it is not surprising that we should find differences of opinion. I am quite free to admit that I do not find myself in agreement with all hon. members of my own party on this point; nevertheless I want to express my personal views as to how I believe the problem should be tackled. Today in Canada a large percentage of our workmen already own their own homes or are well on the way to ownership. The national advantages which flow from private ownership of homes simply cannot be overestimated. The home owner who has to struggle to pay for his own home has a real stake in the country; and I would very much dislike to see Canada, through a large-scale subsidy program, degenerate into a country of tenants. I do not think we should allow that to happen. I am not unmindful of the fact that a limited amount of rental housing accommodation is essential. Folk move from one community to another; their jobs change, and we must have rental accommodation to take care of that small floating part of our population, if I may so term it.

I was pleased indeed to hear the minister say today that nothing will be done to dull private initiative with respect to home building. I may be reading more into those words than I should, but I hope they mean what I think they do. I hope the minister plans that whatever is done to help solve this housing problem will be done right across the board and that savings in cost effected through land assembly, or savings made in other ways, will be made available not only for the benefit of the man who needs rental accommodation but also for the benefit of the man who wants to and should buy his own home. I would urge that never in this country should we have a subsidy scheme going so far that it would be to the advantage of folk to rent rather than buy, or which would be carried to the point where Canada would eventually become a land of tenants.

Proper planning and financing of the servicing of new land can do much to lower costs; and on this point I have a suggestion to offer the minister. Since the early thirties, when many municipalities in Ontario got into difficulties, our municipal board has been insisting on the repayment of debentures for both water works and sewers over a short period of time. I think fifteen or twenty years is the maximum period for which a debenture issue covering either water or sewers may be approved. We all know that a cast-iron water main in the ground is good for at least sixty to eighty years in most parts of Canada, while a well-laid sanitary sewer has an indefinite life. It would greatly help in bringing down local improvement payments in taxes if the minister could effect some arrangement under which the payments to defray the cost of sewers and water mains would be spread over a long period of years, rather than the short period which now prevails.

Then, too, I entirely agree with the suggestions that have come from all sides of the house that money spent in research is money well spent, and I include in that money spent in improving the design of housing accommodation. Much has been accomplished already in that regard by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Prior to the National Housing Act, home building standards in Canada were nothing like what they are today. The advent of the National Housing Act brought about a distinct improvement in the construction standards of our homes. The same thing has happened in regard to the planning of homes. While perhaps it is true that not more than one-quarter of the homes being built today come directly under the National Housing Act, it is equally true that many private home builders are using the well designed plans which anyone can get from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at nominal cost.

In addition to the saving that can be effected by reducing the annual payments required to service land, I think a distinct saving can be effected in the actual purchase of land. In many of these fringe land developments I believe land can be provided at a cost which would permit lots to be sold for not more than $200 or $300 each, instead of the present going rate, which I believe is $500 or $600.

So I urge the minister to do everything he can to get low-rental housing for the needy workmen of this country, and at the same time go as far as he can to make all those advantages also available to people who want to own their own homes. And before I reach the concluding portion of my address let me urge once more that private members can make a real contribution to the solution of this problem. I live in the district between Hamilton and Toronto; my riding fronts on lake Ontario. That district has participated perhaps as largely as any district in Canada in the tremendous development going on today. The builders in my riding are on their toes. I have tried in every way to help them and today in Halton we have our building problem well under control. Under the integrated housing program something over 11,000 homes have been built for veterans.

I should like to comment for a moment on that feature of the National Housing Act. Under that scheme the builder is restricted on the resale price to an extremely modest profit. Under that scheme he must give priority in the sale of those homes to veterans, but in return for that the builder is given priority for all building materials. The government also gives the builder an undertaking that any unsold houses will be taken off his hands. In two short years, as a result of that, approximately 11,000 housing units were produced.

Then there was the unfortunate experience with the Bow River construction out west. This scheme involved approximately 40 houses. As a result of the failure of that scheme, what do we find? The member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) urged that certain safeguards and restrictions should be imposed to protect the purchaser. Those restrictions were imposed and they are rather onerous. What has been the result of that? The number of houses built under the integrated plan this year is approximately 2,300. The member for Bow River got his restrictions, and we got the results. I wish to urge the minister to revise those restrictions. I do not believe the whole integrated plan should fall into disuse simply because of one incident that happened in Bow River. I should like to urge also, as a control against builders taking unreasonable profits, that it might be wise to introduce a ceiling price on houses built under the National Housing Act. Perhaps this should not be a rigid ceiling price in that it should allow a little more profit than is allowed under the integrated plan, but I think that is a good way of guarding against excessive prices.

I shall turn now to another plan of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I refer to the rental insurance plan which came into force a year ago last July. Under this plan loans up to 85 per cent of the cost of the project are available to owners. The interest rate is four and one-quarter per cent. The rental insurance premium costs, in round figures, another quarter per cent of the face of the mortgage, for which the owner is insured up to 85 per cent of the agreed rentals. The insurance is for a period of twenty or thirty years, whichever period the owner chooses. This is a safe investment and it is a profitable investment for a builder who is interested in that type of building. The only string on that is that if depressed times return and the owner has to draw on the rental insurance to a greater amount than the total of one year's rental, then the government reserves the right to buy back the building at the agreed price less the yearly principal payments that have been paid off the mortgage. Under this rental insurance plan, two and a half per cent of the principal is retired annually and, of course, the rental guarantee drops correspondingly each year. I would say that the premium which is being paid would go a long way towards meeting any liability which will occur under this insurance scheme. In other words, there is very little of the subsidy feature in this scheme.

Under this scheme in slightly more than a year, 7,900 rental accommodation units have been built. On checking the records, I find that Quebec leads all other provinces in Canada by a substantial amount. In Quebec approximately 5,400 of these rental insurance units were built in slightly over a year. Ontario lags behind in this field. Whereas the province of Quebec built approximately 5,400 units, there were less than 1,900 units built in the whole of the province of Ontario. Once again, I should like to ask my hon. friend the member for Eglinton to get busy in the city of Toronto. Practically none of these units have been built in that city. The hon. member would be doing a good turn to the people in Toronto who want decent rental accommodation. He would be doing a good turn to the builder whom he interests in this scheme, and I think he would be doing himself a good turn because, after he has done some work of that sort, I do not think he will feel so frustrated as he obviously does today.

I turn now to co-operative housing. This is one field in which the members of the house could get busy. I trust the house will pardon another personal reference, but I helped to organize eleven of these schemes in the last two years involving something over 400 housing units. Two such schemes are in progress in Oakville at the moment. I shall tell you about one of them. A group of about fifteen chaps, most of them veterans, came to see me five or six months ago and talked over the project. I helped them get it started. These veterans are building fine modern homes with three bedrooms, all fully equipped and modern in every respect, at a cost of approximately $6,700 each. The men are turning in $300 worth of work on each of the homes and are doing some general over-all work as well. The carrying charges including the mortgage, taxes, fire insurance, water rates and so on will add up to just under $45 per month. That is the way I like to see Canadian boys behave. I would far rather see that type of construction, that type of home occupancy, where a man has a real stake in the welfare of the country.

I should like to say just a word about the over-all operation of the National Housing Act. In the past some members have commented on the small amount of housing in Canada built under Central Mortgage and Housing. I believe these remarks are largely the result of misunderstanding and misinformation. I should like to put a few of the general figures on the record. Since its inception and up to July 31, 1949, 67,000 N.H.A. housing units have been built in this country. The total of the outstanding loans as of the same date is approximately $340 million. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that is a stupendous contribution. In addition to that, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation manages something over 40,000 government-owned homes.

There is one feature which I think has not been recognized. It is that the Central Mortgage and Housing funds or N.H.A. funds are largely responsible for practically all the speculative building undertaken in Canada. Funds for that type of building in sufficient amounts were not available from private institutions. We would not have had these speculatively built houses if it were not for N.H.A. funds and, as a result, we would not have had the large quantity of houses which we have. In looking over the whole picture, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we have every right to be proud, and that the private members should go to work.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bills Nos. 104 to 115, inclusive, 121 to 132 inclusive and 134 to 141 inclusive:

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Edith Cohen.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 105, for the relief of Ida Lindy Angel Katzman.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Marian Latora Glendening Joncas.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 107, for the relief of Eva Nerenberg Anger.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 108, for the relief of Josephine Teweson Paul Bero.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 109, for the relief of Phyllis Elizabeth Ross Erskine.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 110, for the relief of Jeannette Mathilda Seymour Oswald.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 111, for the relief of George Bennett Gagnon.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 112, for the relief of Bertha Rudolph Holzberg.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 113, for the relief of Lillian Elizabeth Moore Bowen.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 114, for the relief of Laurence Bouchard Pappini.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 115, for the relief of Nana Rosenberg Taube.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 121, for the relief of Cecile de Mers Asheim.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 122, for the relief of Elsie Margaret Harding Lewin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 123, for the relief of Raymond Webster Elliott.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 124, for the relief of Hazel Wilma Drysdale Warnecke.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 125, for the relief of Ruby Rabinovitch Friedgut, otherwise known as Ruby Rabinovitch Freygood.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 126, for the relief of Mildred Carmen Mitchell James.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 127, for the relief of Bessie Birenbaum Abrams.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 128, for the relief of Grace Elsie Mills Johnson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 129, for the relief of Robert Ewen Stewart.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 130, for the relief of Mary Cecilia Helliwell Glassco.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 131, for the relief of Betty Malca Stillman Shugar.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 132, for the relief of Tessie Charow Hersh.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 134, for the relief of Cicely Manley Sampson.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 135, for the relief of Paul Paquette. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 136, for the relief of Joseph Simon Adelard Barrette.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 137, for the relief of Edith Daisy Steer Catto.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 138, for the relief of Gwen Pollock Harris.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 139, for the relief of Sonia Eagle Davies.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 140, for the relief of Evelyne Louis Steinwold.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 141, for the relief of John Gilbert Speak.—Mr. Winkler.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on Bills Nos. 104 to 115 inclusive, 121 to 132 inclusive and 134 to 141 inclusive, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Bills reported, read the third time and passed, on division.

SECOND READINGS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved the second reading of Bills Nos. 150 to 173 inclusive:

Bill No. 150, for the relief of Chesna Laing Shapiro.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 151, for the relief of Edith Turcotte. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 152, for the relief of Irene Brodwin Miller.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 153, for the relief of Jean Ruth Montgomery Loiselle.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 154, for the relief of Joseph Charles Michel Emery.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 155, for the relief of Lyla Almina Wharry Johnston.—Mr. Weir.

Bill No. 156, for the relief of Marjorie Helen Glass Nixon.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 157, for the relief of Olga Hetmanchuk Dorval.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 158, for the relief of Grace Melina Cotton Crawford.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 159, for the relief of Thomas Gillespie Shields.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 160, for the relief of Czerna Berger Borodow.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 161, for the relief of Freda Tippett Hart.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 162, for the relief of Rebecca Rosa Jacobs Bershadsky.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 163, for the relief of Etta Valerie Sherwin Sperber.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 164, for the relief of Sandy Douglas Carbone.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 165, for the relief of Hellen Isabel Dawson Parlee.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 166, for the relief of Violet Emma Woodhall Brownridge.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 167, for the relief of James Samuel Hatton.—Mr. Weir.

Bill No. 168, for the relief of Anne Denburg Hershcovich.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 169, for the relief of Ruth Baranoff Clark.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 170, for the relief of Viateur Longpre.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 171, for the relief of Evalina May Carter O'Connell.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 172, for the relief of Borys Zaryn.— Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 173, for the relief of Alice Dorothy Rolison Cransky.—Mr. Winkler.

Motion agreed to on division, bills read the second time, and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the last sitting when this bill was discussed I pointed out the steps necessary to be taken by any company which desires to build a pipe line in Canada. I said that the first requirement under the Pipe Lines Act is that the company shall be incorporated by act of this parliament. I pointed out that the company must next acquire the gas sufficient to justify a pipe line, by contract with producing companies or by other means. I then pointed out that the company must obtain an export licence from the province of Alberta which, through its own legislation, has retained jurisdiction over the export of gas from that province. I then pointed out that the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada must be satisfied with the route of the pipe line and satisfied with all particulars regarding the construction of the pipe line.

I stated that one requirement of the board of transport commissioners would be the assurance that an export licence under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act would be forthcoming. That act is administered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and its function is to make sure that electricity or fluids are not exported until the present and future requirements of Canada are satisfied. It is therefore seen that there are ample safeguards for the public interest of Canada.

A good deal has been said about possible routes of the pipe line. A good many uninformed assertions have been made in the house in that regard. I know nothing about the pipe line company which is asking for incorporation under this bill; but I do know something about the interests that are asking for incorporation under another bill now before the house. I know that that company has surveyed five routes from Alberta to the Pacific coast, and that one of them at least is an all-Canadian route. There is no difference whatever between my opinion and opinions expressed here that Vancouver must not be on the end of the pipe line. Vancouver must be served before any considerable service is taken off for supply to the United States. Under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act that requirement would have to be complied with before any export permit will be given by the department of which I am the minister.

However, I do think that these acts should be studied, and studied very carefully. I should like to know much more about the incorporation asked for in the bill about which I am speaking than I know at the present time. But the place to obtain that information is in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to which this bill will be referred, and before which the sponsors of the bill will appear to make their case for incorporation.

I will say this, however, that since incorporation by act of parliament is a requirement of the Pipe Lines Act, that incorporation should not be refused on trivial grounds. It seems obvious to me that if a responsible group of men, be they Canadians or Americans, properly financed and having the proper background of experience, apply to this parliament for incorporation, they are entitled to incorporate.

I should like also to say a word about what seems obviously to be a filibuster in connection with these bills. The government will not permit any small number of members to prevent this house as a whole from voting on a private bill. If these bills continue to be talked out in the limited time permitted for private bills, the government will ask the house to suspend the rules and provide whatever time is required to finish the discussion and to obtain a vote on such bills.

I might say the house has granted one franchise for a pipe line for gas in a western direction and a pipe line for gas in an eastern direction. As the situation stands today, the incorporators of each of those two bills have a monopoly, so far as gas moving in either direction is concerned. My hon. friends of the C.C.F. party have a good deal to say about monopolies, and yet we find them very busy filibustering so that the monopoly on the pipe line situation can be maintained.

The province of Alberta will, in the end, decide with which incorporated company it wishes to do business. That province has expressed the desire that it shall have the choice as between several companies, and there are obvious advantages in that procedure as far as Alberta is concerned. Therefore, I hope that these pipe line bills will be examined and if they are properly sponsored I hope that this house will grant the incorporations.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken yet on any of these bills and I had no intention of speaking tonight. As far as I know only one member of this group has spoken in the debates on these bills. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) knows of any more let him state their names.

Mr. Knowles: He is wrong again.

Mr. MacInnis: It is not the first time the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been wrong and I hope people will discontinue taking his advice.

Mr. Knowles: Including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. MacInnis: Including the Minister of Justice and any other ministers who might get into the habit of being intimidated by him. We are opposed to monopoly and the mere fact that half a dozen pipe-line bills are passed here is no proof that there will not ultimately be a monopoly. Is there any law, once this bill is passed, to prevent them getting together and forming a monopoly or to prevent those with larger financial backing from getting together to squeeze out those who have the least money?

From the way the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke tonight it would seem that these bills are not private bills at all. The fact that they are introduced as private bills is merely subterfuge. It would appear that after all these are government bills and if we are not going to pass them as private bills—well, we are going to pass them as government bills.

Mr. Howe: Nonsense; I did not say that.

Mr. MacInnis: It seems to me that the government is getting rather high-handed of late.

Mr. Knowles: If you do not get your way under the rules, change the rules.

Mr. MacInnis: If you do not get your way under the rules, stretch them. The rules have been stretched during the last ten months to a point approaching a scandal. I have no objection to the Minister of Trade and Commerce supporting in this house any interests he likes, but I do not want him accusing this party of doing something we have not done. I am going to go this far and say that we have been told that we had better "lay off" these bills or something might happen to us.

Mr. Howe: Having said that, my hon. friend had better say who told him that.

Mr. MacInnis: That is what we have been told.

An hon. Member: Name them.

An hon. Member: By whom?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not have to name them. The stories you see in the papers concerning the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the action he has taken in connection with certain bills and the stories you see in the papers about the C.C.F. are part of the campaign to intimidate hon. members of this house. Whether all the parties are a party to that action or not, I do not know, but that is what is going on. Here is one person who will not be intimidated, no matter who tries it.

I have nothing further to say on this bill and I would not have said what I have said tonight if the minister had not spoken as he did. But now that the question has been brought out in the open we shall see who is behind these bills.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, as the one member of this party who spoke on the previous bill, not on this one, I want to make it quite clear that what I said on that occasion expressed exactly what I felt, that these pipe lines going through the United States are not going to serve the best interests of the province from which I come. I felt that there should be included in that bill a clause containing a promise that the pipe lines would go through the dominion to Vancouver. I gave my reasons for objecting and I think they are sincere. I resent the minister's suggestion that we are filibustering when we put these claims before the house. Now that the minister has full knowledge of the conditions under which I spoke, now that he knows that I was the only speaker, I think he should retract the suggestion he made.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as one of the two members from southern British Columbia whose constituents are greatly concerned with this bill I should like to express the opinion of those constituents. I was surprised to hear the minister suggest that this group was conducting a filibuster. Originally it was intended that only the two members primarily concerned, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) and myself, would speak on this or the related bill. I was fully aware that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) did not intend to speak. I am sure if the records of this house are read it will be proved that the hon. member for Yale and I rise to speak only when we feel we have occasion to say something and it is our duty to do so.

I am going to deal for a few minutes with this bill to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited and express the opinions of the people whom I represent. It is strange that this bill and the related bill to incorporate the Alberta Natural Gas Company are sponsored by Manitoba members. Apparently there was no British Columbia member who was ready to stand up and sponsor either of these bills.

An hon. Member: Manitoba and Ontario members.

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me, Manitoba and Ontario members. I think that is rather significant. In speaking at this time I feel I am doing my duty in expressing the opinions of the great majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent. I am quite certain that if a plebiscite were taken on these bills 95 per cent of the people of Alberta and British Columbia would vote in support of the action taken by those opposing the bills in this house.

There has been an indication of united action by members of the Conservative, the C.C.F., the Social Credit and the Liberal parties. Hon. members of those parties have considered it their duty to express their opinions with regard to the protection of Canadian natural resources and Canadian interests. We have a perfect right to do that as representatives of the people.

Strangely enough, just yesterday I was talking to a person who had recently come to Ottawa from Washington state. These pipe line bills are of considerable interest to the people of Idaho and Washington because the introduction of gas and oil from Canada will mean a great deal to the development of industry in those states. I am speaking only from information given to me, but I think what I have been told indicates that we should be careful in giving these wide powers to these companies.

The newspapers in Idaho and Washington have published maps which show the wide distribution that is to be made of these natural resources to the cities, towns and small communities in those states. Not one of those maps I am informed shows the pipe line returning to Canada to serve Vancouver and our coastal cities. This bill is most important to the people of the interior of British Columbia as it provides for the transportation and exportation of natural resources in the form of oil and gas. In addition you will find on examining the bill that it confers very wide powers on the company concerned, the holding of lands, the building of pipe lines, the operation of air services, and telephone and other communications. In fact the privileges granted to this company, if the bill is adopted by the house, are so wide that they are causing some of the members from British Columbia serious concern.

Before proceeding to deal briefly with my argument—and I am not speaking for the sake of holding up the bill—I must say that I think we made a mistake when we passed the general pipe lines bill last session, and the other bills associated with it. They were introduced during the latter part of the session and did not receive sufficient attention. I am quite sure that many of the members who supported the pipe lines bill did not visualize for a moment the export of gas into United States territory before serving Canadian requirements fully. I am quite sure that aspect of the situation was not given consideration when that measure was passed.

I think the time has come for us to give earnest and careful consideration, as the minister mentioned, to these pipe line bills. What we do at this time may mean much in the future to the advantage or disadvantage of Canada. At this time I wish to emphasize the point of view of members of the C.C.F. group with respect to a measure of this type. We favour the operation of pipe lines as a public utility. We believe they should be owned by a crown company, and operated by the crown in order to ensure the fair distribution of gas for industrial and community development and domestic use. This is a new development which will be considerable in the future, and I think the profits will be large in the days to come. We should therefore ensure that the profits made in the distribution and transportation of these products will be returned to the public exchequer.

We are often told that the capital cannot be found in Canada to develop such huge undertakings. I understand these projects will cost from $100 million to $125 million. In my opinion that is not a large sum of money for the Dominion of Canada to invest if the pipe lines were organized under a crown company. I think we would be protecting Canadian consumers. We would have complete control over the transportation and fair distribution of the commodity, and the state would reap the profits. That is not the policy of the government. Their policy is free enterprise. They do not believe in the public ownership of pipe lines through crown companies. Therefore, not finding it possible to have our ideas given effect to by this parliament, we feel it is our duty to do the best we can to protect Canadian interests under the existing situation.

First we are opposing the bill—and I am speaking particularly of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) and myself—because we believe the route to be followed should be stated therein. If the sponsor of the measure wishes to see it passed readily by the house, all he has to do is to rise in his place and assure members of the house that an all-Canadian route will be followed before the entry of the pipe line into the United States. I realize that under the Pipe Lines Act parliament has given authority to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to decide such questions, but it is my contention that in such an important matter, and in view of public opinion as expressed by the people at the head of the lakes, parliament should at least decide the approximate route that the pipe lines should follow. I believe we should follow the procedure adopted in granting charters to railways when we grant incorporation to companies which are going to transport gas or oil. The routes which it is intended the pipe lines should follow should be designated and approved by the house.

Second, I believe Canadian needs should be met first before any export of oil or gas from Canadian soil is permitted. There is no guarantee to that effect in the bill. Third, I believe the house should be fully informed as to the persons who are financing this company. We see mentioned in the bill various solicitors and persons of the city of Toronto and other places, but that does not give to the house real information as to the individuals who are financing the company. I am opposing the bill at the present time, and I am supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) until I am assured that an all-Canadian route via the Kettle valley, Hope, and then down the Fraser valley to Vancouver will be followed so that the coastal cities and the interior of British Columbia will be assured of service first.

If the proposed United States route is adopted it will mean that the pipe line will, from our present information, traverse only a short distance in the eastern portion of British Columbia before entering the United States at Kingsgate and give first service to United States industries and communities. Large sections of the southern interior of British Columbia would, if that were the case, be denied the advantages of this gas and oil. As I said before, in my opinion Canada's natural resources should be used to develop Canadian industries and Canadian communities first. There is great need for the development of secondary industry in the interior of British Columbia. In fact it is the primary need to bring our economy into a proper balance. I am sure the minister will agree with me on that. The boards of trade of Trail, Nelson, Penticton, Kelowna and all the smaller interior communities, the farmers' organizations and co-operatives, in fact all public-spirited bodies, are most anxious to see the development of secondary industry in the interior of British Columbia.

For that reason members from British Columbia intend to do all they can to assure the availability of these natural resources to the interior towns and communities for the development of the necessary secondary industries in the Kootenay, Okanagan and Fraser valleys. Then again, if the pipe line is routed through the United States it will mean that the greater part of it will be under foreign control. There is no question about it. Once it enters the United States they can determine the destination of the line. A branch line from the United States to Vancouver and other Canadian coastal points will mean the possibility that they may not receive all the gas they eventually will require for industrial expansion and domestic use. I think that is a very undesirable feature of any proposal that these pipe lines should first enter the United States and then return to Canada. I think it also stands to reason that, as Vancouver and the other coastal cities will be at the end of the pipe line, the cost will be higher to them on that account.

Before concluding I wish to deal briefly with what I consider are the advantages to Canadians and to the people of British Columbia of an all-Canadian route. If the pipe line follows the valleys of the Kettle and the Fraser to the coast, the gas or oil exported therefrom will include charges for transportation. Therefore I am of the opinion that a very much larger amount of United States funds would be payable in Canada than if the gas and oil were exported to the United States at some point before the line went far into British Columbia. Again, the construction of nearly 900 miles of pipe line in my province, if an all-Canadian route were followed, would mean the employment of a large number of Canadians; and I believe we in this house should consider that point. It would also mean immense markets for Canadian materials, for Canadian steel, pipe, valves, fittings, compressors, cement and lumber; and a large market, while the line was being built, for Canadian farm commodities. I believe those facts have to be considered seriously. All those expenditures would be lost to Canada if this line did not follow an all-Canadian route. Later on the maintenance of 900 miles of pipe line would mean a continuous and large expenditure which would provide permanent employment for many Canadians and an assured market for large quantities of materials. The construction of nearly 900 miles of pipe line on Canadian soil would return large revenues to the province of British Columbia in the form of sales tax during construction and by way of other taxes after the line was completed. Speaking as a British Columbia member I believe we certainly must give consideration to that fact.

In view of my firm belief that Canadian natural resources should be used first to develop Canadian communities and Canadian industries; in view of the fact that we must first consider employment for Canadians, markets for Canadian products and revenue for the Canadian exchequer, all of which will flow from the development of Canadian natural resources within Canada, it is my intention to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have had anything at all to say on these bills incorporating companies to construct pipe lines. I must say I support the view just expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). That is quite a concession, because I seldom support a socialist in anything he proposes. However, the hon. gentleman and I are good friends, and since he has thrown in the sponge with respect to pipe lines being socialized, I can support him now.

I support what he has said with respect to an all-Canadian route. I do so not because I particularly want to speak on the matter but because on the train on my way to Ottawa I had quite an extended conversation with an Alberta oil executive, who expressed the view that the pipe line should go through the Kettle valley, following an all-Canadian route. His position was that there was no reason why the larger cities in the north-western United States should not be supplied by the same pipe line. He went on to explain, though it really does not require much explanation, that if the pipe line ran through the Crowsnest pass, Kettle valley and the Fraser valley, it would provide oil and gas to many small communities along the way. Some of them are not so small; some are growing rapidly. There is the city of Nelson, which is a growing community. I was there this summer; I am not quite sure what the population is, but it is quite a nice little community. It is not far from Nelson to Spokane, which is a large city in the state of Washington, and it would not be difficult to construct a feeder line from the all-Canadian pipe line to Spokane, the largest city until you get to Seattle. Then it would not be so very far from the pipe line running through the Fraser valley down to Seattle. So it would be quite reasonable to have the pipe line follow an all-Canadian route to supply our own communities with oil and gas, and at the same time construct feeder lines to these larger cities to the south.

I certainly support the very reasonable request that has been made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, that the sponsor of this bill should say now what route it is intended to have this pipe line follow. Of course that does not mean very much, either, even if we have the assurance of the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill. Unless there is something in the bill itself, any assurance that may be given is not worth a great deal. I do not mean to cast any reflection upon anyone who may give an assurance, but business is business; and after the assurance is given, if it is considered wise to have the pipe line follow some other route, that will be done.

Before I resume my seat I want to say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that I do not think he scares anyone when he accuses any group or any individuals of creating a filibuster. I am rather charmed with the word, and I do not mind a bit being party to a filibuster. I have been in this house long enough to know that, even on a measure of this kind, if a minister of the crown can gather enough support through the party machinery there is not a ghost of a chance of that measure being defeated unless we want to exercise the only prerogative left to us in that case, and talk it out. To some that may appear not altogether ethical; but if we are so convinced that the thing is wrong and we do not want it to be done, no minister of the crown is going to scare any of the members by saying they are creating a filibuster.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have had a little publicity out of this. I have been accused of organizing a filibuster, according to some newspapers. I did not know I had sufficient influence to control such independent members as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and a few others. I am rather flattered to be accused of organizing a so-called filibuster. That seems rather peculiar to me when I recall that the sponsor of one of these very bills spoke for forty-one minutes to talk out a certain bill. You can check that in Hansard; I remember because I have now become one of the old-timers in this house. I did not know until tonight that the government was interested in this bill. I am going to tell you the reason why I am interested in it. Last year I sponsored a bill on behalf of the Westcoast Transmission Company whose directors are the wealthiest and most responsible and reliable men in the province of British Columbia. These men did not try to influence me in my stand on the matter. Two of the directors of that company were in Ottawa last week, and neither of them saw me.

The people of the province of British Columbia are interested in the matter, at least some of us, and I am glad some of the C.C.F. members have spoken on the subject, first as Canadians and secondly as inhabitants of British Columbia. We have no desire to start dissension between the east and west. We want no favours or concessions from the east, nor do we want, and particularly through you, any concessions to certain members from the east at our expense. We are trying to build up British Columbia. Apparently some members have never heard of that attempt. Within the last week, natural gas wells have been brought into existence. Some members have apparently never heard of that, but they should keep abreast of what is happening in Canada. Never mind the United States. I was born in the United States; I have every pride in that country; but I am a Canadian first, last and always.

I was glad to hear the minister say tonight, and I want to be corrected in this if I am wrong in my understanding, that no matter what company has the charter gas will not be exported until after it goes to Vancouver. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Howe: That is correct. I said Canada's present and future needs would be provided for before any export is permitted.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am glad to hear the minister say that. From that it is obvious that, no matter which company gets the charter, the route will be an all-Canadian route.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Cruickshank: Some of my friends who are not experienced in the law should study it. Once gas or oil is exported to the United States, it becomes an international matter. Neither Canada nor British Columbia has any say whether the surplus will be allowed back into Canada from Seattle. Hon. members can check on that point if they wish. The power situation in Ontario is a case in point, as I believe the leader of the opposition knows. Once these products get over to the United States they become matters of international concern, and Canada cannot say whether the surplus will be returned. The question has to be decided on an international basis.

The United States is a growing country. How do we know there will be any brought back? I should like to repeat what the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said; if you took a vote in the province of British Columbia today you could not get 18 people to vote for the route through the United States. Here are two companies, and I have no doubt one is a good company and the other is backed by pure promoters. I have no doubt one company is bona fide. There are 18 members from the province of British Columbia now, and for the first time British Columbia has the proper representation. There are at least 12 Liberals out of the 18 members. Neither of these companies could get a sponsor for these bills from amongst the 18 members. One had to be sponsored by a member from Ontario and the other by a member from Manitoba. Is it not quite obvious from that what the people of British Columbia think of those companies?

In my riding, I do not have to curry favour or make threats. The people of my riding will tell George Cruickshank what they think of him when the next election comes. I am not worried half as much as some people here should be about the results in their ridings. I know what the people of British Columbia think.

I should like to point out a few facts in connection with this matter. I pointed out that the Westcoast Transmission Company has invested hundreds of thousands of dollars of their own money, not any promotional money, in exploring routes and developing the natural resources of Canada. That company has deposited with the government of Alberta approximately $600,000. To some people in the east $600,000 means nothing, but to the people from the land of the Stampeders $600,000 is a lot of money. I sponsored this company simply because it proposes to build an all-Canadian route. The company has $3 million in reserve to develop and exploit the oil and gas resources of the Dominion of Canada. They are not fly-by-night promoters by any manner or means. The company has the money available to build these lines.

It has been estimated that it will probably cost $170 million to build the pipe line no matter which company builds it. The money will be raised in Canada and the United States. It will be raised by any one of the incorporated companies in exactly the same way. Someone has said something about forty minutes, and I hope it was not a member from British Columbia. I will take my stand right now and vote on the matter as a British Columbia member. Just to show who these people are who are in the Westcoast Transmission Company, may I give you the names of some of the companies in the group. There is the Pacific Petroleums Limited, Calgary, which is a subsidiary. The Peace River Natural Gas Company Limited; Sunray Oil Corporation of Tulsa and Los Angeles—I wish some of my friends would check on these companies. There is the Pacific Western Oil Corporation of Los Angeles and the Tide Water Associated Oil Company of San Francisco. All of these companies have several hundred million dollars behind them. They are the companies through which the Westcoast Transmission Company will finance the undertaking.

Then, there is Eastman, Dillon and Company of New York. Even some of the junior members from Ontario should know whom that company represents. Some of them may have heard of the Morgans of New York. I am not trying to talk this bill out, but I could easily do so if I wished, since there is only ten minutes left. I do want to put on the record what the attorney general of the province of British Columbia said about these pipe lines when he appeared before the board of transport commissioners. Surely the attorney general of British Columbia should have some standing. He said:

> Mr. Chief Commissioner and Mr. Assistant Chief Commissioner and commissioners of the board: The government of British Columbia is very, very strongly supporting the proposal to export gas from northern Alberta through British Columbia to Vancouver.

We feel that it would be a great step forward in the development of northern British Columbia,—

I am surprised now that we have not heard something from northern British Columbia.

—and we are in duty bound of course to make the representations because we enjoy a franchise from the people of British Columbia in the last election to start a survey for gas.

Now, I had hoped before making any special submission that I would have had an opportunity of listening to the evidence that will be presented on behalf of this applicant as to their financial possibilities and as to their plans and so on. All I can say now is that we generally support the proposal to export gas in this manner.

If I may make a few observations as to the points I consider should be mentioned,—

Do not forget this is the attorney general of the province of British Columbia speaking. His government was just returned with the strongest mandate that any government has had for many years. This is the attorney general's submission to the board of transport commissioners.

—if you first have a permit to operate, I am afraid if that decision is taken it will be a very, very long time before we will ever carry out the proposal which our government had in mind, that is to export through this particular territory. That had the advantage of not only opening up the northern part of British Columbia, it comes down through some sixteen I think very important constituencies in that province, but it also had the advantage that it would lead to the development of our own oil reserves in the north,—

I want to repeat that: "our own oil reserves in the north". We have every reason to believe, and I am quoting the premier of my own province, that we have in northern British Columbia oil resources equal to those in Alberta; we have every reason to believe that in our own northern British Columbia we have coal resources unequalled anywhere else in Canada. Should we not develop those resources? To continue the quotation:

—because we feel we have a great potential oil and gas field in northern British Columbia as they have in Alberta. We have very sound reasons for that. We had the report of geologists and our own investigation. We felt that if this pipe line was built in the manner that is suggested that we could look for the development of gas lands in northern British Columbia, the gas to be picked up on the way. So that this is very—

The Chief Commissioner: Is there some development there now?

Hon. Mr. Wismer: There is some development going on, some slight development going on. But we feel that would be accelerated.

I want to point out to the board this, that you have an entirely different situation in northern British Columbia and northern Alberta than you have in southern Alberta. There you have towns, you have a market for your gas, and that undoubtedly has been a factor which influenced companies in spending their money for the production of gas. But in the north if you must wait to find the amount of gas which will comply with the requirements of the Alberta government I am afraid we will wait a very long time, because what company or what individual is going to spend money exploring to find out if the gas is there unless there is a market? I mean we have the same situation in regard to oil. The first thing any company would ask, or any investor, would be to say "What are we going to do with it after we find it?"

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word to the house about all these various little settlements that are mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), before I go on with what the attorney general had to say. We have heard it said, and we presume that it was meant seriously, that it was the desire of our great leaders to decentralize industry and to build up the smaller communities where the labour situation is easier and the living costs are less. As I understand it, we have today a committee of this house visiting a certain plant. If war should come it is a most essential thing to Canada that we should have our industry decentralized. How can we do it if we are to place in the hands of what has been called a monopoly greater difficulties in bringing this about?

The best speech made on this subject certainly was not made by any member of the government. It was made last year by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) who said—and I am speaking from memory now—that he was surprised that the directors of the Canadian National Railways had not taken more interest in this matter, and that they should have developed this resource, not any private company. But it was obvious to everyone that you cannot have some five or six companies operating. It would not be possible to finance them; and to finance the operation, it could not be possible for them to construct five or six lines across Canada.

Just to surprise some of my junior friends, let me say that I am not going to talk until nine o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: There are other members who can go on talking until then. I am speaking on the amendment. I have plenty of chances to speak on the two main bills.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

An hon. Member: Go on and finish.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am getting a little bit of assistance from some of my friends who apparently have never seen the west, let alone taken any interest in it. I am disappointed that there are not more of my friends from the province of British Columbia here tonight. If there were, I would be delighted to have a vote on this matter right now. It is exactly nine o'clock now, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Mitchell: It is not nine o'clock.

Mr. Fraser: There is one minute more.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR JOINT OPERATION OF HOUSING PROJECTS AND LOANS TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. George Prudham (Edmonton West): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) on a most constructive speech. In my opinion, housing is the greatest national problem we have in Canada today. We have other national problems such as social security, full employment and national health but in one way or another they are all related to the housing problem. A man might have a steady job, adequate insurance and pension for old age, but if he has not a decent place in which to live and raise his family, he has not social security.

Inadequate and overcrowded housing is the breeding ground of physical disease, mental disease and social disease in that it has a bearing on juvenile delinquency and crime. A housing program of sufficient volume to meet the needs of the Canadian people is and always will be a stabilizing influence in the over-all economy of the nation. While the wages paid in the construction industry are not large, they are largely spent for the necessities of life and almost immediately find their way into local trade channels. The present housing crisis is partly the aftermath of the war, but it had its beginning, in my opinion, as far back as twenty-five years ago. Following the first great war the radio and the automobile were developed, accompanied by instalment buying, or pay-as-you-go financing.

We needed more and better housing in the 1920's, but this was not considered to be a social problem; it was one for the individuals concerned. We had not yet learned to blame our troubles on the government. The automobile and the radio captured the imagination of the buying public, and the result was that a large percentage of the purchasing of that generation was diverted to channels other than housing. The buying public always call the tune and get what they want. The result was that there was little technical improvement or advance in housing methods or in the planning of housing during the 1920's. With the economic breakdown and depression, the housing industry practically went out of existence. The government of the day told us to tighten our belts and to go back to the farm. A large-scale housing program at that time not only would have provided a great deal of employment but would have created a great national asset in the form of housing, from the lack of which we are still suffering today. The government of the day preferred to pay direct relief which had no lasting result but to increase the national debt.

I do not think that progress in housing stopped entirely during the 1930's. It was during that period that insulation, improved plumbing, improved electrical equipment and many other technical advances were developed. But in so far as the general public was concerned, it meant little because they could not afford to buy. The automobile, which is always an expensive luxury, and a fast depreciating asset, became the Bennett buggy. With the change of government in Ottawa there was a change for the better, and with the passing of the Dominion Housing Act, and later the National Housing Act and the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, the industry began to improve, especially in the provinces where local governments were willing to co-operate.

In my own province of Alberta the National Housing Act did not become fully operative until 1944. At the beginning of the war the building industry was mobilized for the war effort. Supply industries and all available manpower were conscripted to build ships, barracks, factories and houses for war workers. For obvious reasons there was very little civilian housing built during the war.

At the end of the war the government felt obliged to provide shelter for returning veterans, a large number of whom had married. Large sums were spent and in some localities every available building was converted to temporary shelter. The operations of Wartime Housing Limited, which was incorporated in the first place to provide housing for war workers, were extended into peacetime. This same agency has operated to provide emergency shelter for veterans in areas where the need was most acute; and I believe it has done much to relieve the pressure which might otherwise have become explosive.

At the end of the war the building industry and the lumber industry were still geared for war production. Like other industries they took some time to reconvert to peacetime needs. That time lag, together with the unprecedented demand for materials, has caused serious shortages which have plagued the industry ever since the war. It is only in recent months that the supply of materials has anywhere nearly met the demand.

In spite of the shortage of materials the house building industry has made a remarkable recovery. We in Canada have built more houses, on a per capita basis, than any other nation in the world for which we have statistics, including Great Britain and the United States. Our standard of housing has greatly improved. The houses of today are planned for convenience and use rather than for appearance. A modern house is insulated, kitchens are modern, electrical installations are elaborate, and plumbing has been greatly improved.

The saving in interest rates alone, the 4½ per cent under a National Housing Act loan today, as compared with 7 per cent which was common before the war, accounts for a saving of approximately $10 a month on the purchase of a $6,000 house over a twenty-five-year period.

Our national income is at an all-time high. It has more than doubled. Employment is more universal than ever before. Today's construction costs are high; but considering the improvements in housing, the saving in interest rates and the high level of employment and income, I believe the average Canadian is better able to pay for housing at today's costs than ever before.

The housing industry in my opinion is just as efficient as any other industry or profession. The costs have not risen any more, comparatively, than they have for food, or any other costs of living. We are suffering from the war, and the depression which preceded the war. During the depression few if any young men entered the building trades for the simple reason that there was no work for them. Also the trades did not pay enough to warrant young men making it their life work. Even today a lot of people think that building workers are overpaid, but I contend they are not. Owing to the seasonal nature of the work the average building worker does not make much more than $200 a month. If that is too high a salary, then they are overpaid. The average weekly wage rate in the construction industry as at the end of July, 1949, was $43.23 per week.

Soon after the war many young men entered the building trades, and as they acquire skill the over-all efficiency of the industry is improving. The availability of labour-saving power tools and the introduction of new materials and techniques will from now on be a factor in increased production as well as in the reduction of costs.

Many who criticize today's increased costs are prone to forget the great improvement that has taken place in housing. Also they forget that pre-war housing was produced at very low wages, and if we are to revert to 1930 prices we will also have 1930 wages, with the accompanying unemployment and breadlines.

Home ownership has a stabilizing influence in the family life which is reflected in the community and in the national life. In my opinion it is the best hedge we have against communism. This is evidenced by the fact that in countries where communistic governments gain control the first thing they do is to liquidate property holders. Food, clothing and shelter are the three necessities of life which we cannot escape. We must pay for them. Food and clothing are completely expendable, but not necessarily shelter.

We pay for our landlord's house, or we pay for our own. If we live in a subsidized house we pay for it partly by taxes. Home ownership has the added advantage that every monthly payment adds to one's estate. By wise purchase rather than renting the cost of shelter becomes a profitable investment. All the purchase of a house actually costs is the down payment. Monthly payments for principal, interest and taxes under the National Housing Act are in most cases less than rent for similar accommodation. Added advantages are the building of an estate, security of tenure, and the other satisfactions including pride of ownership.

There are those who advocate subsidized housing and government-owned rentals. Subsidized housing is a negative approach to the problem. It is in effect subsidizing low wages. I believe Canada can provide an income for all able-bodied persons who are willing to work, an income sufficient to provide the necessities of life, to raise and educate a family and to provide shelter for that family.

Subsidies must come from taxes. Taxes come from the working population, directly and indirectly. If the majority in the country are in need of subsidy, as hon. members of the C.C.F. would have us believe, then it is only a matter of time until we would all be pulled down to the same level. I do not believe that the young people of this country want subsidies; all they want is a chance to help themselves.

In my opinion it should be made possible for young people to begin the purchase of their homes when they first form their families. In my experience as a builder for years I have found that the average person buying a house was in middle age. The reason for that was that it took him that long to save the money necessary to finance the down payment. Children of these people were usually in high school. The result was that they had the maximum use of their new homes for only six to ten years, until the children left home. The children went out to support their own families and had to go through the same process of living in undesirable quarters. The net result then, and the same applies to some extent today, was that the average citizen spent his early childhood and married life under unsatisfactory housing conditions.

There are those who say that the financial risk of a home-ownership scheme is too great, but I say it is very small. The loans will be secured, first by the building, and second by the credit of the young people of this country. If those two securities are not good, then there is nothing of value in this country. The urge for home ownership is fundamental. It is natural and instinctive to all creation. Even in England under a socialist government, where only one house in five is produced by private enterprise for private ownership, the desire for home ownership is once more becoming very evident. I should like to quote from the Overseas Daily Mail, a London newspaper, of October 8, 1949, as follows:

> Britons prefer to own their own homes.
> The building societies year book for 1949 just published shows that during 1948 building society membership increased by 53,000 and now more than totals 4,196,000. Borrowers increased by 23,000 and investors by 42,386. The sum advanced to borrowers during the year, largely for buying homes, was 264,000 pounds, the highest on record.
> Commenting on this the book says. The facts lead to the inescapable conclusion that in spite of the lavish sums lavished on public authority housing, the average citizen of this country prefers to own his house and is willing to pay for it if he is given a chance.
> Building societies have been most successful for the last 100 years in England enabling hundreds of private citizens to purchase their homes built by private contractors and through private enterprise.

I would say to those who defend the system of government-owned rental housing that that also has many evils. In the final analysis it is the same system as that used in Russia and other communistically inclined countries. I think it should be used here only in cases of emergency. To my hon. friends of the C.C.F. and others who advocate subsidized housing I should like to tell an old story. A certain farmer was very thrifty. In the fall of the year he and his family gathered vegetables and fruit and brought them into the basement for use by the family during the winter months. Being thrifty they gathered up all the cull and windfall apples and the family were instructed to use those first. They did this and the cull apples lasted during the fall. Then when they opened the barrels of good apples they found that the top layers showed signs of decay. Being thrifty the farmer instructed them to use the decayed apples because they could not afford to waste them. Being obedient the family did so, but by the time they reached the next lot of apples they found more signs of decay. The final result was that while the family had apples all winter, they used only decayed apples.

Subsidies work in the same way. If you subsidize the lower strata at the expense of the other taxpayers, it is only a matter of time until they will all need subsidies, and then what do we do? I recognize of course that there are those who because of extreme misfortune, physical disability or old age are unable to help themselves and therefore must receive assistance from the state. But as a general policy, and considering the fact that the production of houses is limited by the capacity of the industry to produce, I believe we should concentrate first on the great middle band who are able and anxious to help themselves. If and when we satisfy the needs of this great middle group it will be time enough to consider subsidies and slum clearance, except in cases of extreme emergency. I believe there are still some emergency areas in Canada where government action will probably have to be taken.

By concentrating first on the middle band, a large number in the lower income strata can be lifted and assisted to help themselves. If we concentrate first on those in the lower income band and assist them by means of subsidies, which must be paid by the taxpaying public, there is every danger that a large percentage of those in the middle band will be discouraged and forced into the lower group and will themselves become eligible for subsidies.

I believe we have only two alternatives. First, there is the positive approach to the problem which places the emphasis on home ownership, even with small down payments, and which will enable people to help themselves, with the government assuming the risk of having to subsidize such a scheme only if and when we run into a major depression and purchasers are forced into default. The other alternative, which is the negative approach, is to provide subsidies now rather than take a chance on the future.

Let us review the situation as it exists today. Employment and income are at an all-time high, but wartime savings and gratuities are largely spent. Because of the high level of prosperity we have an unprecedented demand for separate housing accommodation. People are no longer contented to live in shared quarters. Because of the high level of prosperity the marriage rate is at an all-time high and the new family formations alone almost equal our present production of houses. There is a decided trend and desire on the part of young people to marry young and raise a family. The first thought now seems to be a home rather than an automobile.

The mechanization of farms and the prosperity of the agricultural industry have caused a large exodus from the farms to urban centres. We have a large backlog of need as a legacy from the war and pre-war years. We are becoming socially conscious and greater attention is now being paid to public health. Because housing is a social as well as a physical problem, all levels of government have a responsibility. Our building supply industry will soon be normal and competitive and many new materials are being introduced. Our labour force is greatly improved in skill and numbers since the veterans have become re-established in civilian life. Also many new labour-saving tools and techniques have been introduced in recent years.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has compiled much data on housing and is conducting research on materials and methods and planning. Research is one activity of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that I should like to see expanded. Research has paid off in agriculture and I am convinced that it would pay off in housing. At this time I should like to pay a tribute to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They started from scratch not many years ago and they now have a most efficient organization. There has been a good deal of criticism by hon. members to my left about certain housing projects that went bankrupt. I think we ought to review the record. Only one per cent of the builders operating under the integrated housing scheme have gone bankrupt. Only eight builders out of six hundred have got into trouble and only 120 houses out of 14,000 units are involved. The 120 purchasers involved all have their houses completed or have received back their down payments.

As I mentioned before, the building industry practically went out of existence during the thirties and it did not have a chance to get back on its feet during the war.

When Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was given the job of administering the National Housing Act they did not have much of an industry to deal with at the start. I know for a fact that they have encouraged many people to enter the industry and have given them technical advice and help in planning. In my opinion we would not have been able to produce the number of houses we have without the well organized efforts of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation were not the only people who were fooled by some of these builders who started in without sufficient experience or finances. The particular housing project in Calgary, which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) spent a great deal of time talking about the other night, received a loan of $13,000 from the Alberta government credit house just one month before they ceased operations.

The only way to meet the need is to build more houses. Talking does not help very much. The production and processing of materials and the necessary financial arrangements to get the finished product into use is the only solution. The industry must co-operate and respond to the challenge to produce houses for people of moderate means under the threat that if they do not do so the government has the option of participating in construction for sale or rent. Labour plays an important part in industry, and it is my opinion that labour unions should consider working a forty-four hour week while the housing emergency exists rather than the forty hour week which is common today. Now that materials are becoming more readily available, the additional four hours of work per week by the building workers could boost the over-all production of houses by as much as 10 per cent, and no one would be hurt. The workers themselves would benefit from the additional wages, and they would also benefit from the more adequate supply of housing. Tradesmen and the working classes are suffering as much as anyone else today because of the lack of housing.

The policy of the government was stated by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) on September 21, and is found in Hansard at pages 120 and 121:

> Care would be exercised to see that the operations of the senior governments in this field supplement rather than replace the activity of private endeavour upon which we place the greatest reliance for large volume of house building . . . There is no desire by the dominion to enter the direct construction field.

Again I quote:

> . . . the creation of conditions favourable to a large housing program by private individuals and companies. Only to the extent that housing needs are not being met, is it proposed that the dominion and the provinces will enter the field. It seems to me that only by the co-operative efforts of all levels of government and the house building industry can we maintain our high volume of new residential construction and increase it beyond its present level.

In my opinion this policy is the most practical and sane approach to the problem that we have had. The minister and his assistants are to be congratulated. The amendments are designed to implement that policy, and to make the act broad enough and flexible enough to meet the needs of any province or municipality. The new legislation is in effect enabling legislation. It enables the municipalities and the provinces to provide utilities and services for new housing developments with the dominion assisting by bearing a large proportion of the cost. The amendments also provide for assistance to public housing projects for sale or rent with the dominion contributing a larger proportion of the costs. The responsibility is on the provinces and the municipalities to decide whether publicly sponsored projects are necessary.

The new legislation is a challenge to the industry and, in my opinion, will provide the necessary machinery for a constructive approach to the solution of the problem. The problem is too urgent and too complex for industry or government to solve alone. Only by co-operative action on the part of everyone concerned can we hope to provide adequate housing for the Canadian people. The reduction in the down payments will bring new housing within the reach of thousands of people, especially the young.

I should like to close my remarks by saying once again that the only solution to the problem is the production of more houses. To ensure this, conditions must be made favourable by the creation of serviced land and improved financial arrangements through the co-operation of all levels of government and the industry. To the members of the C.C.F. group may I say that they are probably sincere in wanting better housing conditions, but I think they lack a practical approach to the problem. Their arguments are largely based on humanitarian considerations, and they forget that the only way to build houses is by the practical application of common sense and skill. To the members of the Social Credit party I suggest that, if they are sincere in wanting better housing conditions, their efforts should be directed towards influencing the government of Alberta to co-operate under this scheme to provide serviced land so that the industry can provide the houses that are needed.

To my hon. friends of the official opposition, who have had so much to say about what the so-called enlightened government of Ontario has done, I would say that housing is constitutionally a provincial responsibility. What the Ontario government has done is but their duty, and I would suggest that if you want to promote more housing, especially in the province of Ontario, you should prevail upon the Ontario government to continue and increase their assistance. The new legislation is intended to supplement rather than replace provincial efforts. Hon. members of the official opposition have spent a great deal of time during the last few weeks supposedly defending provincial rights. It sounds rather strange to hear them finding fault now with the federal government for not doing more in the field of housing, which is a provincial responsibility. In my opinion housing is too important a problem to be tossed around for political reasons.

Mr. Fraser: Page the Liberal government.

Mr. Prudham: What we need is genuine Canadian co-operation regardless of party and constitutional responsibilities. The new amendments to the National Housing Act now before us will provide the necessary machinery for such co-operation.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house is a piece of legislation which can be very useful if it is carried forward in a spirit of co-operation, and if a wholehearted effort is made to bring together the three levels of government that can produce the results that are desired. I simply want to say in passing, in relation to the remarks that have just been made, that obviously the hon. member has not been following the discussion on this subject because the fact is that, in so far as the activities of the Ontario government are concerned, the present legislation merely replaces one part of the existing Ontario legislation, and has been welcomed by the premier of Ontario for that purpose.

I wish to say at the outset that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) has shown a commendable spirit in dealing with the provincial premiers, which is a change, and offers some hope that there will be a real spirit of co-operation under the bill now before the house. The responsibility in connection with housing is the responsibility of all the people of Canada through their representatives at the three levels of government. As far as the type of housing is concerned and the rules that apply to the actual standards of construction, such matters in the ordinary course of events come within provincial jurisdiction because of the exclusive responsibility of the provincial governments for the municipal laws of the provinces. Nevertheless the bill now before the house does offer the possibility of agreement among the three levels of government which undoubtedly will bring to any consideration of the type of housing the joint judgment and experience of those who have been associated with this work.

By virtue of the fact that a very considerable undertaking has been carried out by the national government and that in the carrying out of that program great experience has been gained, this government will be able to make a substantial contribution, not merely in the financial support that is offered but in the experience gained in the mass building that has been done under that program. In addition valuable experience will be at the disposal of the provincial governments through their municipal and other departments, such as public works, which in various ways have been associated with this activity. Above all there will be a vast store of experience, knowledge and good judgment in the possession of the municipal authorities, who during the whole development of Canada have been exercising supervision over the types of homes constructed in the urban areas where there is a concentration of building.

This is a challenge to each level of government. It is not only a challenge to bring forward constructive ideas; it is a challenge to act in the common interests of all the people of Canada. Hon. members do not need to be told from any part of the house that this is not a matter with which to play politics. That remark might well be underlined, and not necessarily directed to the official opposition, the socialists or the social credit party, because this afternoon we heard one speech that sounded as though it had reference to some bill this house has not yet seen or heard of. In that speech was drawn a picture of a new heaven and a new earth which certainly is not expressed within the four corners of this bill, and certainly was not in any way prophesied by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) in his explanation of what this act really contemplates. It may be, of course, that the hon. member was preaching for a call or trying to do a little personal prodding. The fact remains, however, that it would be very unfortunate if any attempt should be made, for political reasons, to create in the minds of the public the impression that this bill contains more than it really does.

This legislation can be the basis for effective, long-term co-operation among these three levels of government which collectively represent our people in all their many activities. That objective will be best attained if no attempt is made to create the impression that this act goes beyond what it really states. As has been very frankly explained by the minister, this is enabling legislation and nothing more, and by itself can achieve nothing except to the extent that, in the spirit of co-operation, the joint action of government at three levels brings together the experience of those who have had to do with these questions, with the common objective of giving the people not only the number of homes they need but the type of homes they need to form a foundation for a healthy, good society.

[Mr. Drew.]

I do not want to stir up the feelings of any hon. members who may not wish to hear what was done in the province of Ontario, but in view of the fact that certain statements have been made I should like to keep the record clear on one point. This is not the first day in the history of Canada that there has been recognition on the part of those in positions of responsibility of the fact that housing is a social need. It is not the first day in the history of Canada that the necessity of giving to the people of this country an opportunity to build their own homes with a small down payment has been recognized by those in authority. I welcome, as I am sure every hon. member welcomes, the possibility of encouraging the construction of homes by reducing the amount required as a down payment; but I do want to remind some hon. members who have seen fit to be rather critical, in a friendly way, of the suggestion that there is any other wisdom or experience than that now embodied in the ranks of the present government, that other efforts have been made, and that there is very good and positive reason why in the case of Ontario, which has been mentioned, as in the case of other governments, vigorous co-operation will be forthcoming. In order that certain statements which have been made today will not remain unchallenged on the record I should like to read an editorial that appeared in The Legionary of May 1, 1948, which reviews one earlier attempt—and a not inconsiderable attempt—to deal with this subject. That attempt also dealt with certain aspects of this problem I want to place before the government and the members of the house in my later remarks. The editorial reads:

> Veterans everywhere will acclaim the new housing legislation recently enacted in the province of Ontario to:
> 1. Promote the building of more rental accommodation for veterans, by the provincial government undertaking to share with municipalities (within specified limits) costs incurred in providing serviced lots for further "wartime housing" developments.
> 2. Encourage the purchase of small homes, by the provincial government undertaking to guarantee approximately $1,000 of the cash equity or down payment required of the purchaser beyond the first mortgage loan, thus eliminating one of the greatest obstacles now standing in the way of home ownership—the inability of the average would-be purchaser to finance a very high initial cash equity payment.
> 3. Encourage more efficient building methods, and
> 4. Provide assistance for municipalities in slum clearance projects.
> Provided municipalities and lending institutions co-operate to the maximum in making this new legislation fulfil its intended purposes, Ontario will in all probability now see a house-building boom of unprecedented proportions, bringing renewed hope for every home-seeking veteran in that province.

In this new housing legislation, the Ontario government is blazing new trails out of which might materialize the long-awaited over-all plan for the successful solution of the housing problem in every part of the dominion which the Legion has been pressing for so hard ever since the war ended.

Now, that editorial in The Legionary briefly reviewed the attempt made by the government of that province to deal with the subject. I only mention this now to point out that this is a subject which has been engaging the thought and the concern, not only of the government of Ontario, but of every government in Canada. I feel sure that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply would be the first in this house to say that he had found nothing but a desire on the part of the provincial premiers to further any effort seeking the effective co-operation of all levels of government to advance the development of housing in Canada.

There is one feature of the Ontario provision which I should like to mention. I have said that the attempt by that provincial government was not inconsiderable, and I think that is a fair statement. The commitment made under this bill in regard to the co-operative plan is approximately $50 million. The Ontario government committed itself to a program involving $35 million, so that it took rather extensive steps to enter this field as far as it could at that time. This bill, of course, goes beyond that in other ways and offers wider opportunities of co-operation which will, undoubtedly, expand as time goes on.

One of the things mentioned in this editorial, and which I should like to put before the house and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, is the importance of encouraging the employment of new types of building. I believe that has already been mentioned by the hon. member who spoke immediately before me, and who, I understand, has had practical building experience. He mentioned the fact that new types of construction provide new opportunities for building homes. I imagine that nearly every member has already seen some of the new types of homes that have been constructed but which, for one reason or another, have not been generally employed in these programs. I can think of many of them. I feel sure that the minister has seen a most interesting development on the north shore of lake Superior at Terrace. Within the last three years a new community has grown up out of the virgin forest and today it is a beautiful town with homes that would attract attention anywhere. The cost of those houses was much lower than would have been the case in any urban or suburban development elsewhere, because they were built under one plan with special types of construction and with the actual prefabrication done on the site.

The figures for the cost of construction suggested that those houses were being built and could be sold at less than two-thirds of the price of similar homes in many cities and towns in Canada. I have seen other developments. There is one not far away at Marathon, and I have no doubt there are others in other parts of Canada. With the possibility of radiant heating, with the possibility of metal frames, with new opportunities for insulation and for prefabrication of mass-produced houses, there are great opportunities for lowering the cost and improving the standards of the houses themselves. I would hope that the plans which are made will provide for the encouragement of new developments of that kind.

As the minister of reconstruction doubtless knows, one of the features of the plan to which I have referred was the financial support of new types of construction which demonstrated their practical possibilities. It would be unfortunate if, at this stage, we did not make every possible use of what the builders have learned from the experience of these past years.

There is one feature of this bill which I believe might well be given consideration, and that is the interest rate. Again, I am not putting it forward as a basis of unfavourable comparison, but nevertheless I would remind the minister that under the Ontario provision for reducing the down payment, the loan guaranteed under the Ontario plan was provided at 3½ per cent. As that was on a second mortgage, I do think that the government might give consideration to the possibility of an interest rate lower than the 4½ per cent on the amount that is advanced. It is true that this figure might contemplate the desirability of having a certain safety margin for those cases in which the rental will not be collected.

As I understand, it is the intention of the government to take a calculated risk in accepting losses in construction, and it is for that very reason that provision is made for the joint responsibility of the dominion and provincial governments. Under this plan, therefore, I do not think the interest rate should be fixed at a level which will provide anything in the nature of an insurance fund against the possibility of loss on any of the other payments. I would urge that consideration be given to the lowering of that figure. I point out that, under the other plan to which I have referred, a lower interest rate was charged and is now being paid on some 11,000 second mortgages which were arranged.

I do wish to emphasize this feature of the bill that is before the house. I do not intend to embark on the discussion of a subject which can be discussed on another occasion, but rentals have a bearing on this subject that cannot possibly be overlooked in examining the effectiveness of any plan of this kind. First of all, there is the question as to whether rentals will themselves be at a level that will make the purchase of homes seem relatively attractive.

There is also the fact that a considerable part of the building of homes in Canada in the past has been done for the purpose of investment. Undoubtedly there are landlords whose conduct is open to the most severe criticism. But let us also remember that there are many landlords who, in relation to their tenants, have acted in a manner which the tenants themselves would be the first to say has been fair. Let us also remember who some of these landlords are. Many of them are widows who have been left with homes which are larger than they can use and which perhaps represent their largest evidence of personal security. There are other landlords who have built their own homes while they were younger and then as their family has grown or they have felt that they wanted another home, they have built another house; they have kept the first one and have rented it. These are investments which, under our system, should not be discouraged if that system is to continue.

I hope no one will seek to interpret what I have said as any defence of or excuse for those who have abused the opportunity that has existed on many occasions during the present critical demand for housing. I think it is time, however, that we were all fair enough to recognize that every landlord is not a man or woman of evil design nor is every tenant a saint. In the balance of human experience, in every relationship there are those who present their problems in any of these tasks that must be undertaken. The needs of the tenants must be respected. The right of tenants not to have improper rentals charged under the compelling demand of necessity and the shortage of houses, and also the right of fair landlords to have some assurance of what their rights are as well, should be recognized in dealing with any of these plans. Anything else produces bad results for tenants as well as for landlords.

One of the objections that are expressed to what has recently happened with regard to rents is the uncertainty and confusion which will have its impact on this whole question of housing as well. I am not going to enlarge on that matter at this point, because this subject can be discussed in complete detail on another occasion; but I suggest that it will be well for the government to remember that, in approaching the provincial authorities and the municipal authorities, they are going to be asked what the situation is with regard to rentals. I hope they will be in a position to give a much more satisfactory answer than can be given today, because all over this country now tenants are disturbed and are naturally resentful of what they regard as the complete repudiation of undertakings to protect their rights. Others who thought that they were benefiting in some way are equally confused as to the extent to which their rights are being recognized.

These day-by-day clarifications, which I believe is the official word used to describe them, and which represent new efforts to cure the incurable, are in themselves only contributing difficulties in the way of that necessary measure of co-operation. While on this occasion we cannot go further in reaching any positive conclusion on the matter, may I say that the government would be well advised to start all over again on these rental measures that they have so recently undertaken and to seek to follow a course that can be understood and that recognizes the general obligation, under circumstances of this kind, to treat fairly all those with whom they deal. Then one of the questions that will be raised can be answered, because undoubtedly that question will be asked.

In some remarks that were made today, it was stated that the number of houses will depend upon the attitude of the provincial governments in relation to the municipalities in working out these plans. It is going to depend on the attitude of the dominion government, not only in regard to this particular bill but in regard to the wider field of dominion-provincial co-operation.

The question was raised tonight as to the constant emphasis that is placed upon provincial rights. That comment was based upon an obvious misunderstanding of the arguments which have really been presented. Those who have emphasized the need for dominion-provincial understanding on the widest possible basis have been doing so in the belief that it is essential that the three levels of government in this country ought to know what their responsibilities are, what their ability is to carry out those responsibilities as well. The argument has been based upon the contention that a government cannot carry out those legislative and administrative responsibilities which it thinks it should carry out unless it also knows whether, and to what extent, it can raise the revenue necessary for that purpose. One of the things that have been emphasized over and over again in this house and outside of it is the need for clarification of the relationship between the dominion government and the provincial governments. Let no hon. member of this house be under any illusion that the tax agreements that have been signed between the dominion government and the—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are out of order.

Mr. Drew: I am not out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, you are out of order.

Mr. Fraser: No, he is not out of order.

Mr. Drew: I am not out of order, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members do not realize that the provincial governments—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, these are amendments to the housing act, and I thought on second reading of a bill one had to speak to the principle of it. There is no question here at all of taxation as between the provincial and federal governments. I hope the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will confine his remarks to the principle of the bill—if I am right in my point of order.

Mr. Drew: If necessary, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask for your ruling. I will point out that this bill has a direct bearing on taxation, because this bill is premised on the requirement that the provincial governments will raise substantial sums which are not provided for now under the tax agreement to which I have referred.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is going too far afield.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the housing problem.

Mr. Drew: I am doing that.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: And, Mr. Speaker, I say now that I do not intend to use any carbon copy of any statement handed to me by any member of the government, no matter what any other hon. member in the house may be prepared to do.

The provinces of this country will wish to have an opportunity to carry out this general proposal. But if they are to do so there must also be some way in which they can meet the added obligation that would be incurred by agreements contemplated by this bill. And it is for that reason that it is essential, if these agreements are to become effective, that there be an understanding on a wider field in regard to the taxing powers of the provinces, and their ability to raise the funds that are necessary to assume their part under the agreements contemplated in this bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Still out of order.

Mr. Drew: Well, if I am out of order at least my speech is on Hansard.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On another point of order; I think if the remarks made by the leader of the opposition are out of order it should be ordered that they be struck out of Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Always the same speech, anyway.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, after the humorous interjection of the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), I now wish to mention another point which was introduced earlier. It is this, that emphasis was placed in some remarks made today on the objective being set. I believe these were the words, "We set an objective; we reached that objective."

Let us keep this in a clear sense of proportion: This is enabling legislation. This is legislation which will best be advanced in the interests of the people of Canada if it does not start with attempts being made to create the impression that the building being done under it will be done by agencies of the dominion government, entirely, or even in a major degree.

The remarks to which I am referring were not those of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), who has made it clear that he believes that the major building program should be carried out by the building contractors of this country, operating under the broad provisions of agreements that can be made.

The reason I mention this lies in the fact that, if the impression is created that this is a bill only to provide buildings or mainly to provide buildings which will be built by a government agency, it will not receive the support it should receive. Because what the people of this country want is encouragement to those who can buy their homes to build those homes according to their own desires. And it is the duty of the government—and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has indicated a full recognition of this—to join in meeting the need for homes facing all our people.

There are too many people in Canada who are still badly housed. There are too many people who even yet can find no homes. There are still too many people who are badly clothed, and there are too many who are badly fed. But that condition is not going to be met by any single bill or by any simple device. That represents a problem that reaches into the wider field of education, of social services and of all these other things.

Let us be sure that in this particular case the words of the minister are remembered, and that it is recognized that, except for the special plans indicated in his remarks, this mainly contemplates encouragement to private contractors to build homes to be purchased by the people of Canada. And as was pointed out by one hon. member in his remarks today, by the fact that in the very nature of their activities many people move from place to place, it is required that there shall always be a certain number of homes available for rental, quite apart from what we may describe under the over-all expression of low-rental housing.

Having said that, however, I feel sure there is not a single member in the house who does not agree the hope should be that as many of our people as possible are able to buy their homes, and in that way to establish the sound foundation of their family life, with that measure of personal association, personal interest and personal pride in the home that has so much to do with the life that is the basis of our society.

In all this, the success or otherwise of this bill when it becomes law will depend upon wholehearted co-operation among the three levels of government. Let us remember that this government can pass only enabling legislation. But it can contribute experience, and so can the provincial governments; and in the end it will be the municipal governments which, with their services and their various municipal bylaws, will have most to do with any homes that are built.

Above all, in the planning of these projects which will emerge from this legislation, let us do all we can to make sure that in this great and vast country of ours we do assure as much land as is possible for every one of these homes, that we make them as attractive as possible, and that we encourage the very highest and most permanent type of building consistent with the availability of supplies and the money available. Let us do this so that not only may we be providing shelter for today but that we may be providing homes for the years ahead, homes that will really be homes in the very finest sense of the word.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I shall not trespass long upon the time of the house. However in my riding of Parkdale the housing situation is of a critical nature, and I feel I should make some remarks not only about the amendment but about certain things which in my view the amendment fails to accomplish.

We all know that not so very long ago the matter of buying a house was entirely a man's private business. If he could afford to buy a house, he bought one; if he could not afford to buy one, he did not buy one. No one cared what he did. However, in recent years, as has been stated so repeatedly, it has become clear that housing has become a distinctly social problem. It is realized that poor housing can contribute to overcrowded conditions which bring about disease and ills of that nature. It can create poor marital relations, cause the breaking up of homes and contribute to juvenile delinquency.

The original Dominion Housing Act was passed in 1935. The National Housing Act was first passed in 1938. That act provided for a reduction in the down payment on houses and permitted amortized payments at lower rates of interest. That act proved most helpful and a great deal of housing was built under it. It is interesting to note the tremendous progression in social security trends and thinking that we have witnessed in our own day. With your permission I should like to review briefly the act and the amendments to see just what we have accomplished.

It will be noted that the act is divided into six parts. Part I deals largely with housing for home owners and provides for the usual 80 per cent loan with interest at four and a half per cent and 30 year amortization. The housing corporation's share is not to exceed 25 per cent and the corporation may guarantee to the lending institution up to 15 per cent of their share. Under that home owners part we now have provision for additional loans of one-sixth more if the price is fair and reasonable, and I shall have something to say on that later on.

Under part I provision is made for the integrated housing plan with which I think most hon. members are familiar. As far as I have personally witnessed the operation of this plan, it appears to be available only to veterans, but I would hope that this will soon be extended right across the board. I feel that if the many restrictions which have been placed on integrated housing were withdrawn this would be greatly appreciated by the building industry.

The third part of part I deals with co-operative building. This is an intricate, detailed matter and I do not propose to go into it at all. The terms are set forth in the amendment.

Part II of the act deals with rental housing and some seven different plans are provided. The first is the ordinary joint loan made to the builder who erects housing units for rent. The second is the guaranteed rental plan with which most hon. members are familiar. The rents are agreed upon between the corporation and the builder for a period of three years and are guaranteed for the term of the loan, not exceeding thirty years. The guarantee is not to exceed 85 per cent of the rents which are determined for the first three years.

The third plan provides for the setting up of limited dividend housing companies. Under that plan the rents are agreed upon and there is the usual ratio between rents and the income of the people who are to occupy the housing units. A 90 per cent loan is provided for with interest at three per cent, the term being for the useful life of the buildings or not more than 50 years. This plan is usually carried out by a corporation especially incorporated for that purpose. I have seen this in operation and I believe it is a most useful feature of the act.

The next plan provides for housing for special industries. I have not been in a position to witness the operation of any of these plans by mining, lumbering, logging or fishing companies. The act provides for an 80 per cent loan at four per cent, not exceeding a 15-year term. The fifth part provides for institutional housing corporations and institutional holding companies. This is the scheme whereby the lending institution as designated by the act can set up a low-rental scheme.

The sixth part provides for institutional land improvement schemes. An institution may take over a block of land, thoroughly service it and then offer it for sale to builders. The only advantage to the lending institution which has a guarantee for five years from the government of a return of two per cent is the hope and probability that it will sell land to builders who will obtain loans from the institution. This scheme has been quite successful and I have no doubt it will be used more as time goes on.

The seventh scheme under this part provides for slum clearance, the clearance of what is sometimes called blighted or substandard areas. We have seen this scheme worked out in certain cases. There are not many ridings where slums are a problem and therefore this scheme would be applicable only to a limited number of ridings in Canada. Under this scheme the municipality acquires the land and after clearing it sells it to a limited dividend housing corporation. The dominion government makes grants not exceeding one-half of the difference between the cost of acquiring and clearing and the sale price to the limited dividend housing corporation.

Under part III of the act provision is made for rural housing. The provisions here are similar to those in part I. Under part IV provision is made for home improvement and home extension loans. Provision is made for loans up to $2,500 for single units, and $2,500 for the first and $1,250 for each subsequent unit in a multiple unit scheme. This part has not yet been proclaimed.

Under part V provision is made for housing research and community planning. This provides for the expenditure of up to $5 million on research and community planning. This provision somewhat overlaps the $5 million which can be provided under part III which deals with rural housing. Under this part experiments in plumbing, heating and other component parts of housing could be carried on.

Part VI is the general part which gives very broad powers to supplement the more specific powers set out in the other sections. The amendment section 35 will give additional powers.

I have some suggestions to make which possibly are of a critical nature, but I do feel that some of the provisions of this act will have to be extended. There are many things which are not perfect at the present time. Section 5, subsection 2, provides that the corporation may for the purposes of part III of the act prescribe the manner in which the cost of construction of a house or of a housing project shall be estimated, and by whom and in what manner the appraisal of the value of the house shall be made.

The definition section states that lending value means the estimated cost of construction or cost of conversion, or the appraised value, whichever is less, of a house or housing project. Anyone familiar with the working of the National Housing Act is only too well aware that there is a great distinction between lending value as defined in the act and the sale price or market value. Therefore when one speaks of an 80 per cent loan it will be obvious to every member of the house that it is most important and vital that there be some close relationship between the lending value and the market value. Otherwise the 80 per cent advance may not be of any great assistance in helping people to purchase homes.

I think the act has been administered with great fairness in the past, but I suggest that it will have to be administered with a greater breadth of vision. I do not for one moment criticize the attitude which has been adopted by the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He has been in the position where he was given an act to administer. He has been told the money is available for loans, and accordingly he has made them. He is a sound businessman and does not care to lose money. If the government fails to provide more housing they must to a certain minor extent subsidize housing in this manner. I feel it has been unfair to put the whole burden on the president of the housing corporation. I think the government might well take this matter under advisement, as they have under part III, and that the government should lay down the policy from time to time in that connection instead of leaving it to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the officials thereof. I make this suggestion, and I think it might be desirable that a further amendment to the act be passed in the near future to bring this matter directly under the government rather than having it handled by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We must administer the act in such a way that the distinction between lending value and market value will be very slight. Otherwise we are not going to give the help to the purchasers of homes that we obviously hope to give. Turning to the additional one-sixth loan which is now being provided under the bill, it will be recalled by all members of the house that this loan can only be made if the purchase price is considered to be fair and reasonable. I am afraid I must take exception to an amendment worded in that fashion. It is my personal belief that to say that the one-sixth loan will only be advanced if the purchase price is fair and reasonable has no relevancy. I cannot see how the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the purchase price has any relation to the loan. If it will make it any easier for a person to buy a house, I do not see that it matters whether the corporation considers the price reasonable or unreasonable. Surely if the purchaser has sufficient money to pay the unreasonable price the government will help him to the extent of extending the extra one-sixth loan and making the house that much more easily obtainable. At the same time the government is not taking any more risk than they would with a normal house.

I have always felt that the important thing to any purchaser of a house is the down payment. I think most members will agree, if they have had any experience in real estate, that it is the down payment that is interesting to the average young married couple, and to many older people. I have always felt that, instead of having the present system, surely the loan should be calculated to help the person to buy the house, and that it would be better to have a graduated down payment in relation to the purchase price. I throw out that suggestion. I have talked to many people about it. Provided that the down payment is made reasonably sufficient to ensure an adequate stake in the house, I think that is something that could well be put into effect. In that case I would agree it might well be advisable to add that the price must be fair and reasonable. For instance, if you say that a $500 down payment is needed for a $6,000 house, a $750 down payment for a $7,500 house, and so on, I think you are getting closer to the root of the problem because it is the down payment that is the killer to the average young married couple trying to buy a house.

I can assure anyone who feels that $500 is a small stake in a $6,000 house, that to any young married couple who are just getting started $500 is a lot of money and a big stake, and that they are going to fight very hard to keep that house.

There is one other suggestion I should like to make. It is something that is coming eventually. I do not think there is any great urgency at the moment, but eventually we will have to amortize houses over a longer period of time. The reason I do not think it is so urgent at the moment is that I have not much doubt that in the next six months or a year all the available labour forces and supplies will be poured into housing in any event, and those houses will be sold. The market will readily absorb them, but I think eventually we will have to amortize these loans over a longer period. It is not only important that the down payment be small; it is equally important that the carrying charges be small. Provided the house is of adequate construction to stand longer amortization, I think it will be entirely desirable. As I said before, however, I feel in the next year all the available men and materials will be used, and that there will be no slackening of the market for houses.

It may be that at the end of another year it will be desirable to re-examine the act to see how it is working and readjust our viewpoint towards it. I can assure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) that the amendments have my most enthusiastic support. I think they are decidedly a great step in the right direction. I think we will probably find there are some inadequacies, but I have no doubt they will be corrected.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the matter we are discussing this evening, and indeed we have discussed it all day, is not something in the nature of the principle of stare decisis nor even the question of the Combines Investigation Act. It is a matter which is known and understood and is of the greatest importance, I may say, to all Canadians. The question of housing is one which people from all over Canada not only know, but know to their great cost these days from the point of view of the necessity existing for increased housing units.

I do not think that we can emphasize the matter of housing too much because, if I may use outworn words, housing is of the greatest importance in the making of good citizens not only in Canada but all over the world. Home environment to a very great measure molds the future children of the world. The last outworn remark I might make is that criminal tendencies may very well be developed as a result of poor housing conditions. I think that is realized by all hon. members of the house, and the interest they have displayed in the legislation is sufficient proof of the importance with which they view it.

The bill that we are discussing is, as the minister said when he first introduced the resolution, an enabling act. It gives the dominion government power to discuss with provincial governments, and through them with municipalities and, as he said on September 21, with other public bodies. I take it that "other public bodies" would be bodies other than provincial governments and municipalities such as housing corporations. I hope to refer to that later.

I must say that the bill appears to be a very sensible approach to the problem. Its provisions, read with the act as it stands today, seem pretty conclusive. The only question I have in my own mind is whether it goes far enough. I am not trying to criticize the government in this regard; in fact I disagree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham), who referred to hon. members to his left who were criticizing. I considered that what I heard of this discussion was constructive criticism. I do not believe anything destructive was uttered by an hon. member. As far as I could judge anything said even by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who spoke at length on this subject, was purely constructive.

The hon. member for Edmonton West referred to one other matter. He said that constitutionally housing was a provincial matter. I must say I entirely agree with the statement by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) a few moments ago that housing is the responsibility of the whole Canadian people. It is not the responsibility of the provinces, of the municipalities or even of the dominion government; it can be solved only by all the people working together. That, I am sure, will be one of the important results of the tour made by the minister before this legislation was introduced. I am quite certain he has put a great deal of work into that tour. He paid Newfoundland a very real tribute by making our province one of his first visits. Incidentally, in respect to the timing of his visit—I am sure it was pure coincidence—he came just before the election, and I can assure you that the Liberal party lost no votes as a result. Nevertheless his visit was very welcome, and from his correspondence with the premier of my province I can see the minister is really getting his teeth into our problem in Newfoundland, and of course the problem of Canada as a whole. I should like to join other hon. members in saying that as far as I can see the minister really is trying to do a job to the best of his ability. We realize, of course, that he has had a hard row to hoe in this matter. I would not go so far as to say, as an hon. member said some time ago, that the minister has been handed a lemon, but his has been a hard job because housing legislation has been before many parliaments. The problem is not new, but as far as we can judge he is really getting down and tackling it manfashion.

I do not want to delay the house too long this evening, but there are a few points on which I should like some enlightenment. There is the matter of slum clearance. On October 31 my confrere the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) asked whether slum clearance came within the purview of the act, and I believe the answer was that it was provided for in the general act. But then I saw in Hansard of September 21 a question asked by the hon. member for Eglinton:

> In the first place, is any specific assistance contemplated in connection with slum clearance?

The answer by the minister at that time was:

> The sections now in the act with respect to slum clearance are quite clear. I do not believe the statement I have just made is debatable at the moment, but there will be a resolution before the house relatively soon, upon which occasion I should be glad to discuss all these matters.

That question has not been discussed since, and I do not know whether it is dealt with in the act. So when the minister speaks I hope he will refer to this point. I am particularly anxious about it because we have a great problem in connection with slum clearance in St. John's and in fact throughout many towns in Newfoundland. I understand an announcement has been made that construction of some five hundred houses is to be undertaken within the next few months in St. John's. I shall be glad to hear that this is so.

The other matter I am particularly interested in is what is to become of the St. John's Housing Corporation. When the minister was in Newfoundland he visited the corporation and saw something of its work and what is needed. I might just tell hon. members that something like $6 million has been invested by the provincial government and the municipality, and that the corporation now owes some $1 million to the municipality and $5 million to the provincial government. That project includes the most modern housing; it is located on some 800 acres of expropriated land, with a modern sewage system and modern roads. As of October 1 some 240 houses had been constructed and under construction and ten apartment buildings containing 92 apartments, making a total of 332 housing units. Without money that corporation is not going to be able to carry on. This matter was discussed by the original delegation that came here in 1947, at which time a committee was appointed consisting of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), Mr. D. B. Mansur of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the premier of Newfoundland and myself. Since I had been connected with the housing corporation I presented a brief on the matter to the committee of cabinet, outlining the work of the corporation since its formation in 1944 and the need for more financial assistance. If I might read from the volume tabled in parliament in December 1947, containing the report of the meeting between the delegation and the cabinet, this reference appears:

> Would it be possible to receive a grant for this purpose . . .

That is, the purpose of the corporation.

> . . . or, if not, could any form of financial assistance be made available to the corporation in the event of union?

The answer at that time was:

> In reply, it was pointed out that under present facilities available there was no manner in which the dominion could take over the position now held by Newfoundland and the city of St. John's in respect to the St. John's Housing Corporation. It falls within the category of a provincial-municipal housing project for which no assistance by way of loans, subsidies or rent reduction funds are presently available from the dominion to a province and/or a municipality.

On that point, as the minister stated, this bill deals with public bodies apart from municipalities and provinces; and I would submit that public bodies might very well include this housing corporation. So I wonder if under this legislation any financial assistance might be given the St. John's Housing Corporation, or what is the plan for the future in that connection. From reading the bill I am not very clear whether or not funds can be obtained under it by the corporation.

The only other matter I wish to stress at this time is the question of providing low-rental housing, not only for all of Canada but particularly for St. John's, because that is the only place I can use as an example. I realize that if the necessity for low-rental housing is great in the place that I know best, it must be even greater in other parts of Canada. I believe provision is made for that in the bill. It strikes me, however, that with the relaxation of rent controls so recently announced there should be an even more intensive effort put into effect a low-rental housing scheme. I shall not transgress the Speaker's ruling by talking about rentals, but if rents are going to have the lid taken off then something in the nature of a low-rental housing scheme must be put into operation at the earliest possible moment.

I should like to mention that I was quite taken with the remarks of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) about rural housing and the fact that no provision had been made in this bill for the promotion of rural housing. It strikes me that is one of the most important phases of the housing situation. If it has been overlooked, it should certainly be included in this bill or a suitable bill covering that matter should be presented. You remember that the old song asked the question "How are you going to keep them down on the farm?" There is only one way you can keep people on the farm and that is by providing rural communities with the facilities that are usually associated with living in a city. It should not be too difficult to provide those facilities. Certainly, I think it is the direct responsibility of the government to provide proper facilities for rural dwellers, just as it is to provide houses for urban dwellers.

I do not see any mention in the bill of veterans' preference. It strikes me rather forcibly that this has always been to the forefront and I do not know why it has been dropped. It would appear to be worthy of consideration, because from the discussions I have had with people in Ottawa the need for veterans houses is just as great as it ever was. I shall conclude with these remarks, Mr. Speaker, so that it will be possible for the minister to close the debate, as he is anxious that the bill go into committee tonight.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before the minister closes the debate, I wish to take a moment to say a few words. I shall be brief so that the minister will have time to close the debate tonight. In what I shall say I may not be adding to what has been said during the course of this debate, but it does seem to me that it is worth while in part to sum up what has been said, and in part to place before the house the objectives with respect to this housing problem.

As I see it, there are three. First of all, and perhaps the most important problem facing us, is the need for subsidized low-rental housing. It is important not just to get the phrase into the minister's statement, but to get large-scale subsidized low-rental housing projects under way at the earliest possible moment.

The second objective which I feel we must not overlook is, to use the words of my colleague the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), to realize that getting the down payment reduced to a smaller amount is not enough. The fact of the matter is that a great many of our people could not afford to buy houses today even if there were no down payment. Steps have to be taken to bring down the cost of good homes and to improve the living standards of our people so that they can own good homes.

The third objective which I think should be kept before us, even though it may be a long-range one, is to realize that we have not solved the problem of housing just because we reach a point where every Canadian is under a roof of some kind. For example, I think of the trip that I make when I go to and from the place where I live in this city. When I do not get a ride with one of my friends, I take the 'R' streetcar which goes out Albert street and down Preston street. A good many people live along those streets and I see those houses every morning as I come down here. Those people have a roof over their heads, but it is not satisfactory housing in which at least half of them are living. That is the case all over this country. A tremendous job lies ahead of us. This is a social as well as an economic problem.

We must not think we have solved the problem merely because people have a roof over their head. This is a field in which research can be undertaken and in which new types of home construction are long overdue. I feel that it is one of the most important problems to which we must give our attention. I hope that this parliament, and whatever government is in power during the next few years, will accept it as a major objective to provide good and adequate housing for all the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to inform the house that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, at this stage I wish to be very brief. I am most anxious that the legislation should pass this house as quickly as possible because, among other things, it will be necessary for most of the provincial governments to pass legislation which will enable them to participate in the dominion-provincial program embodied in this bill. I wish, therefore, to commend all members who have taken part in this debate for the high order of their remarks.

After talking to all the provincial governments I was able to say that, without exception, they realized the gravity of the problem and showed a real desire to come to grips with it. I now can say that all members who participated in the debate fully reflected the attitude of all members in the house in their view of the importance of this problem of housing to all Canadians. I thought we had a very good cross-section of the general attitude towards the problem. It ranged all the way from those who opposed any element of subsidization to those who felt that a full program of subsidization was the important approach to this question.

I should like, of course, to deal in detail with the points raised by the various members, but that would take too long. There was some putting straight of the record tonight with respect to the contribution made to the housing problem by the province of Ontario, especially by the leader of the opposition. Let me be among the first to say that Ontario is to be highly commended for what it has done. There is no doubt about the contribution that province has made. I think it must be said that the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) perhaps somewhat overstated the achievement when he said that the 10,000 houses on which second mortgages were applied were built only because second mortgages were made available. I do not wish in any way to detract, however, and I wish to make that clear. As one example, though, I would refer to the 100 houses that were built in Manor Park, which were completed and fully occupied before the home owners applied for the second mortgage. And he referred to the fact that this government was two and a half years behind the Ontario government in introducing the second mortgage practice of reducing down payment. As I understand it, the act in Ontario was passed in May, 1948, and the first loan was made in August, 1948, which is considerably less than two and half years ago.

I wish to commend especially the vigorous speeches made by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) who, I thought, pointed the way to what can be done by all members of this house and a great many people in this country with regard to a solution of the housing problem. He gave me an opportunity I have sought for some time. I thank him for the remarks he made about the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and would add my own to them, for the splendid service they have given in working on this problem and in adding so greatly to the stock of housing units in Canada today.

One other word I would say is in connection with rural housing. I think the point was raised by the hon. members for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) and Melfort (Mr. Wright) and their point was well taken. They were a bit apprehensive that perhaps existing legislation might not do what it should do for the rural segment of our economy, and one might easily get that impression. I understand there are some 700,000 farms in Canada and, roughly speaking, there is one house on each farm. By and large, new housing is not the problem facing the farmers today; it is a matter of improvements and, in some cases, extensions. Where there is a demand for loans for new farmhouses, those loans, other things being equal, are forthcoming under section 14 of the act. Where improvements are necessary, facilities for borrowing are available under the Farm Improvement Loans Act administered by the Department of Finance. We of course agree with the hon. member for Melfort about the quality of farmhouses which, in many instances, could well be improved. But the fact is that supplies have not been available to promote large improvement programs. That is the very reason why the home improvement section of the act has not been proclaimed so far.

Since the hon. member comes from Saskatchewan, one of the prairie provinces, I will tell him that there is a prairie farm research committee to which the federal government contributes 55 per cent of the finances required and to which each of the three prairie governments contribute 15 per cent. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the three provincial governments and the three provincial universities have seven major projects under way now for research and development, on problems relating to rural housing. I will tell him also that there is much more on that subject in the annual report of the corporation, and if he wishes additional information I shall be pleased to see that he gets it.

Just before I resume my seat—and I do not wish to dwell any longer on speeches made by hon. members—I would say just one word to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) who in making his maiden speech dealt with a subject about which he knows so much from his own practical experience. I want to say to him, and to all hon. members who took part in the debate, how highly constructive I have found their words. I appreciate the attitude they have reflected towards the bill for which we are seeking the approval of the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As was announced some days ago, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will be here tomorrow and the first order of business will be a motion by him that votes numbers 51 to 70 inclusive in the main estimates, 1949-50, and numbers 766 to 779 inclusive in the further supplementary estimates, 1949-50, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys. If the debate on this motion be concluded before six o'clock, we will move one step forward with Bill No. 149, respecting bankruptcy. I understand this bill has no political significance. It is a technical bill and a long one. I am furthermore informed that it will take quite a long time before the committee on banking and commerce. We should therefore like to have it advanced one stage tomorrow, if possible.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if it is the government's intention to press this bill to adoption at this session? The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated that we were aiming at prorogation by December 3. This is a long and involved bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand that most of the work on this bill will be done in the committee on banking and commerce. If we can get it before that committee, we shall then have to wait for the report of the committee. If it came back, perhaps we would have a chance to have it adopted. It has been in the Senate for two or three sessions, I believe. It has been modified. Expert witnesses have been heard. If the bill did not pass this session, it would have to go back to the Senate again. We shall therefore do our utmost to have it back from the committee on banking and commerce during this session.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 16, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WHEAT

WINNING OF WORLD TITLE BY MRS. AMY GRACE KELSEY, OF ERICKSON, B.C.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to note for the records of Hansard the achievement announced yesterday of Mrs. Amy Grace Kelsey, of Erickson, British Columbia, in once again winning the world wheat title.

I know all hon. members will be glad that this title has again come to Canada, and some of us will be delighted that it has returned to British Columbia. Mrs. Kelsey, a resident of my riding, deserves special praise, because this is the second occasion on which this great honour has come to her. It is a pleasure for me to record the congratulations of this house to her upon maintaining our pre-eminence in the production of this our Canadian farm crop of first importance.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTERS' PORTRAITS ON SIXTH FLOOR—MR. ATTLEE

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the house, in connection with the matter brought up by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), that in accordance with the wish of the house a picture of the present Prime Minister of the United Kingdom is being hung in our halls today. I might point out that this picture was taken by Karsh, and when he sent it he also presented to the house a new picture of Mr. Churchill, which is also being placed among the others on the sixth floor.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 182, for the relief of John Albert Roberts.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 183, for the relief of Leslie Ernest Tulett.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

NEWFOUNDLAND—NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Higgins:

Has any application been made by Newfoundland for the establishment of a national park?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No. There have been preliminary discussions with officials of the provincial government. One area has been suggested as being suitable for a national park; however, no formal application has been received from the province.

DUNDAS, ONT., POST OFFICE—ALTERATIONS

Mr. Lennard:

1. Are the alterations for the Dundas, Ontario, post office being done on a cost plus arrangement or by contract?
2. If by contract, what is the amount of the contract for the completed job?
3. When will this job be completed?
4. How much money has been spent to date?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. By contract.
2. $36,457 plus additional work amounting to $2,734.
3. About January 1, 1950.
4. No payment to date.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—SERVICES MADE AVAILABLE TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

What services of the Department of Agriculture have been made available to Newfoundland?

Mr. McCubbin:

Division of entomology: research and advice on control of insect pests.

Division of plant protection: inspection of import shipments.

Health of animals division: inspection of import shipments and outbreaks of animal contagious diseases.

Plant products division: inspection of interprovincial and import shipments of seed, feed, and fertilizers.

Livestock and poultry division: record of performance inspection of dairy cattle.

Fruit and vegetable division: inspection of interprovincial and import shipments.

Livestock and livestock products division: inspection of interprovincial and import shipments of poultry and eggs.

Grants and subventions: During the period April 1 to September 30, 1949, the sum of $66,591.51 was paid by the dominion government on freight assistance for shipments of feed grain to Newfoundland.

Newfoundland is also entitled to a subvention of $1.25 per ton for all limestone distributed by the province during the current fiscal year.

Miscellaneous: during the past six months, at the request of the Newfoundland government, officers of the dominion Department of Agriculture have visited Newfoundland to conduct surveys and give advice on soil surveys, experimental fur farming, growing of cranberries, and the prevalence of plant diseases.

All services given in other provinces are being and will be extended to Newfoundland in so far as they are applicable.

S.S. "LADY LAURIER"

Mr. Isnor:

1. Has the Department of Transport a ship called the Lady Laurier?
2. If so, when was this ship constructed?
3. Is it still in continuous service?
4. When laid up for necessary repairs, what is the name of ship used to replace this ship?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes.
2. Built in 1902—Paisley, G.B.
3. Yes.
4. None.

S.S. "SAUREL"

Mr. Isnor:

1. Has the Department of Transport a ship called the Saurel?
2. If so, how many officers and men comprise the crew?
3. Where is this ship based at present?
4. Is any change being contemplated in respect to changing the home base of this ship?
5. Will this ship continue to be based as at present?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes.
2. 37.
3. Charlottetown during the season of navigation; North Sydney during the winter months.
4. No, not at present.
5. It is planned to return the Saurel to Quebec when sufficient icebreaking service is available for the maritimes.

S.S. "C. D. HOWE"

Mr. Isnor:

1. Is the Department of Transport having a ship constructed, called the C. D. Howe?
2. If so, where will this ship be based?
3. What is the type of this ship and what is the nature of its work or operations?
4. How many officers and men will comprise the crew?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes.
2. Quebec.
3. Twin screw passenger and cargo vessel. This vessel is to be used to deliver material and supplies to the various stations in the eastern Arctic and to supplement the work now done by the N. B. McLean and other vessels chartered in the past to deliver shipments for departments of National Health and Welfare, Mines and Resources, R.C.M.P. and Transport. All shipments from these various departments are assembled at the marine agency in Quebec. The C. D. Howe, when not occupied on its eastern Arctic patrol, will be used as a stand-by vessel on the Atlantic coast.
4. The crew will consist of approximately 58 persons.

BAGOTVILLE, QUE., AIRPORT—CONTRACT FOR WORK ON RUNWAYS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Is any expansion work in progress on runways at the Saguenay airport, Bagotville, in the county of Chicoutimi, Quebec?
2. If so, who is the contractor?
3. What is the amount of the contract?
4. Were tenders invited for this work? If so, when?
5. What are the names of those who tendered and what was the amount of each tender?

Mr. Howe: In so far as Canadian Commercial Corporation is concerned:

1. Yes.
2. North Shore Construction Co. Ltd., 307 Castle Building, Montreal, Que.
3. $206,938.25.
4. Yes. Tenders closed 4 p.m., E.D.S.T. July 25, 1949.
5. Provincial Paving Co. Ltd., 416 Jean Talon West, Montreal, P.Q., $206,700; [1]North Shore Construction Co. Ltd., 307 Castle Building, Montreal, P.Q., $206,938.25; Charles Edouard Boivan, Co. Lake St. John, Metabetchoun, P.Q., $216,970; Arthur Laberge, 369 St. Dominique St., Jonquiere, P.Q., $267,050; J. R. Theberge Ltd., St. Ignace Blvd., Chicoutimi, P.Q., $291,927.50; Saguenay Construction Ltd., Bagotville, P.Q., $349,972.50; Chicoutimi & Saguenay Construction Ltd., 81 Ste. Anne St., Chicoutimi, P.Q., $374,294.50; Jobbing Construction Co. Ltd., Chicoutimi, P.Q., $412,500.

[1]Having regard to the fact that this contractor had equipment in the immediate vicinity and was in a position to commence work immediately, he was awarded the contract.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PENSIONS—EMPLOYEES OF BUSINESS AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many approved pension schemes designed to provide pensions at retirement age for employees of business and industry are currently in force in Canada?
2. How many of these are (a) placed with the government annuities office; (b) placed with private assurance companies?

3. What is the total number of persons participating in, or covered by, these plans (a) in 1939; (b) in 1947; (c) the most recent figure and the date?

MOTOR COACH INDUSTRIES—WESTERN AUTO AND TRUCK BODY WORKS—CONTRACTS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have any contracts been let by any government departments, government agencies or crown corporations to (a) Motor Coach Industries Limited of Winnipeg; and/or (b) Western Auto and Truck Body Works Limited, of Winnipeg, since January 1, 1947?

2. If so, by what departments, agencies or corporations and what is the nature and value of such contracts?

3. Have any contracts let to either of the above firms been cancelled? If so, for what reason?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all letters and memoranda exchanged between the Minister of Justice and the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, since January 1, 1946, regarding changes in the Combines Investigation Act and/or in the administration and/or enforcement thereof, suggested in any letter or other communication received by any minister of the government, or by the said commissioner or his deputies, from any labour or farm organization, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, or any flour milling company, or from any persons on behalf of such organizations or companies, dated at any time since January 1, 1946.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE—STATEMENT OF MR. PEARSON

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That votes Nos. 51 to 70 inclusive, of the main estimates 1949-50, and Nos. 766 to 779 inclusive, of the further supplementary estimates 1949-50, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to object to the estimates of the Department of External Affairs being referred to a standing committee on motion of the government. I do so because I think the house and the country are entitled to know what is taking place.

I noticed that when the minister's deputy, Mr. Arnold Heeney, was in the city last Monday he made an address, as did the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last spring, to the effect that we were depending for defence and security on the United Nations as the cornerstone. In view of the estimates being referred to a standing committee, I think it is the function and duty of the government to let the people of the country know what the situation is. In two long wars we found that we had to look for our defence and security to our own dominions and crown colonies and the mother country. Now you are seeking to change all that by referring the estimates to a committee. I am opposed to such action. I think if some of these delegates came home from New York and the United Nations we would have some chance for peace. We had to carry on all alone for two and a half years in both world wars, and we should look first to the dominion and the mother country for our security and defence.

The United States has a different economy. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir John A. Macdonald held that view. They believed we should look east and west, rather than north and south, that we should look to the mother country. We went into two great world wars. It is the function and the duty of the minister to tell us this morning what security we have in the face of the coming conflict—because one is coming; there is no doubt about that.

I have here a picture of the millions of slaves in western Europe today. It is taken from Everybody's Weekly, the issue of October 29. There are pictures of the slaves who are being deported to Russia to work in the mines, in camps, in soviet prisons, and so on. It may please some people to refer these estimates to a committee, but I am opposed to that policy because the committee will do nothing about them. They will learn nothing, and the proceedings will be held in secret. A great man, Mr. Poke, is the editor of Everybody's Weekly. There are pictures in it of the present slave camps with millions of prisoners. This may not be pleasant for a great many of our new members. They are entitled to something better than the referring of these estimates to a committee. If you do that you will postpone dealing with the question of our future security. I believe our defence should start where it was after two and a half years of war when we stood alone; it should start with the mother country and the dominions. In the magazine to which I have referred there is a list of countries in which there are slave camps, indicating that they are all over western Europe.

I am opposed to the present policy, for the reasons I have given. I believe the minister should give details of our defence policy. It is the duty of the government to let the country know, in the event of a third war taking place. We had a great man here the other day, Lord Wavell, and he expressed concern about Germany. We are not secure there; we all know that. Instead of carrying on and capturing Berlin, the United States prevented our allies from doing that at a time when we could have made ourselves secure. Germany is a hostile nation. I hope the minister will tell us where the trouble lies. Russia lost twelve million men in the last war, and Russia and her satellites also fear Germany.

I regret to have to take this stand, but I repeat that our defence and security should start with the mother country and the dominions. They gave us security in two long wars. If the motion is automatically adopted the House of Commons will have heard the last word in this session about foreign affairs, defence and security. Besides, some of the items to be referred to the committee deal with local matters, such as passports, and so on.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion, I should like to say in the first place how greatly I welcome the reference of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the standing committee where in the past such helpful and constructive consideration has been given to them, and to the work of the department. I am also glad to have the opportunity to give the house a general review of world affairs as seen by my department, a review which I hope will be of some interest and possibly of some value to the hon. member (Mr. Church) who has just spoken. I gather he thinks that should be done on this motion.

I am glad of the opportunity for two main reasons. The first is that the discussion will enable the government to secure the advice of members of all parties in the house on the important international questions and problems confronting our country at this time. I know I speak for all my colleagues in the government in saying we will welcome such advice because we know, from the record of the house in matters concerning external affairs, that it will not only be informed but also constructive and helpful.

The second reason why I welcome this discussion is that it finds me where I wish I could have been throughout the whole session, in my seat in the house. I had hoped when I was appointed head of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations assembly—a normal appointment for a person holding my office—that I could combine that post with fairly regular attendance in the house at least for a part of every week. But to the duties of chairman of the Canadian delegation have been added, through no fault of my own, those of chairman of the political committee of the assembly. These duties have meant that I have been absent from the house almost continuously since its opening. I feel sure, however, that hon. members will agree that Canadians must be prepared to accept their full share of the burden of helping to make the United Nations work as best it can under the present difficult conditions. For this reason, just as I think Canada could not justifiably refuse membership on the economic and social council to which we have been elected, we could not appropriately refuse to accept, on behalf of the chairman of its delegation, the chairmanship of the political committee of the assembly. Normally, of course, the meetings of the United Nations assembly do not coincide with the sessions of this house, so that no problem of being in two places at one time arises. The situation in this regard this year is exceptional, and I certainly hope it will remain exceptional.

I can assure you that the chairmanship of the political committee of the United Nations assembly is not an office that one would seek, or one to be relished, charged as the committee is with preparing for the consideration of the plenary sessions of the assembly many of the most difficult and controversial problems coming before it. The chairmen of assembly committees of the United Nations, especially of the political committee, I think, are not always given as much courtesy, consideration and authority as you, Mr. Speaker, enjoy in this house. The violence of the general discussions and the heated, complicated arguments on procedural questions are things which, happily, are not often encountered here.

Today I hope to give a review of some aspects of the international situation as I see them. I know that in a review of this kind, though I am afraid it may be longer than it should be, there will be omissions; but if I should leave out important matters, or if questions occur to hon. members during my remarks, I hope I may have an opportunity to deal with them in winding up this discussion.

In the very beginning, Mr. Speaker, I should like to turn to certain international economic matters which I shall touch upon very briefly only in their political implications and aspects. It would not be appropriate for me to touch upon them in any other way.

In April, 1948, when the last comprehensive survey of world affairs was given in this house, the Marshall plan had just been accepted in principle by the United States congress and was beginning to be put into effect. Over the next twelve months the world made rapid progress. Production climbed; prices levelled off, and inflation was brought largely under control. Everywhere overseas the financial balance was being restored, though it proved to be rather precarious. Meanwhile United States prosperity and United States imports continued to climb.

Canada, of course, is always influenced by what happens abroad, and naturally we shared in the general revival, to which I think our own policies made a modest contribution. Our reserves of gold and United States dollars were at a very low ebb, as hon. members know, at the beginning of 1948; but during that year the tide turned, and by the end of the year our reserves were approximately twice as high as they had been at the beginning. Therefore our emergency import restrictions, introduced in November, 1947, could be slightly relaxed. During the same period we began to benefit from the new tariff rates agreed to at Geneva. These came into force on January 1, 1948, and our exports to the United States rose to new heights.

Unfortunately the financial balance overseas proved to be pretty precarious, as I have suggested; and it was upset. In April of this year the trading position of the sterling area began to get worse for a variety of reasons which I need not go into here, though one of them was the generally disturbed international political situation. The central reserves of gold and dollars in London began to drop sharply, and by the end of June the losses in such reserves had become very serious. So three international conferences were called in quick succession to check the recession and to make advances toward recovery and prosperity.

Canada was invited to all three conferences, the only country to attend them all apart from the United Kingdom, which of course was at the very centre of the crisis. My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was at all these conferences. First was the preliminary tripartite discussions in London during July between the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves; second was the conference of commonwealth finance ministers held in London later in the same month, and third was the tripartite conference held in Washington in September. The United Kingdom crisis was, of course, financial, and has been described as the sterling crisis or the sterling-dollar crisis, although it had very grave international political and economic implications. The commonwealth countries other than Canada found themselves so short of dollars that they felt they had to cut down further their imports from Canada and the United States. At the London commonwealth meeting late in July they agreed to aim at a cut of 25 per cent, which came on top of substantial reductions previously made. There was a real danger that the commonwealth countries other than Canada might end up by virtually cutting off their trade with North America; and if this had happened, or if it were to happen now, then the trading world would be split in two economically and commercially. That in its turn—and this is what I wish to emphasize as Secretary of State for External Affairs—would obviously entail severe political strain. So I feel sure the three countries concerned will do everything possible in their trade and financial policies to avoid such strain. No one can gain from it except those who wish to break up the unity and stability of the whole democratic world.

If a definite split ever took place—and I am not suggesting for a moment that it will take place—it would be disastrous for Canada and for all that we have worked for since the war. We depend on trade with the sterling as well as the dollar area. Wide sections of this country have been largely developed to serve the United Kingdom market, and those sections of Canada would have great difficulty in finding another outlet for many of their products. They would face grave difficulties if the sterling area and the dollar area were cut off from each other. Equally disastrous would be the results in the field of defence. The North Atlantic treaty would be quickly undermined if the United States and the United Kingdom were steering divergent economic courses, each pulling a large part of the trading world with it.

Possibly the most important achievement of the tripartite conference in Washington, it seems to me, was the united front presented to these problems by the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The crisis was not regarded as a United Kingdom crisis or a sterling area crisis; it was regarded as a common crisis in which all three countries were concerned and which could be solved only by common action. There were no recriminations. We worked together as a team and agreed on the general direction in which we should all move.

So much, then, Mr. Speaker, for international economic questions at this time. Next, if I may, I should like to give a review of some of the areas of the world as far as our international relations with those areas are concerned; a review of the policies of some countries as far as they affect our own country; and in these days most of them do affect our country.

It is proper, I think, that I should first turn to our greatly valued association, as close and friendly as ever, with the nations of our commonwealth. In an uneasy and uncertain world that association remains firm and enduring, a model for free states to follow. Economic and financial difficulties on which I have touched, which at times threaten—but only threaten—to divide us are the only shadows over the commonwealth relationship at this time. During the last two months we have had the pleasure of welcoming in Ottawa the Prime Minister of India, the foreign ministers of Great Britain and Pakistan, and the secretary of state for commonwealth relations in the United Kingdom. It has been a great honour for us to have had with us Pandit Nehru, Mr. Bevin, Sir Mohammed Zafrullah Khan, and Mr. Noel-Baker. In a little more than a year there have been three important meetings of the commonwealth ministers and two of the commonwealth prime ministers, one in October, 1948, and in April of this year. There has been the one meeting of commonwealth finance ministers which I have already mentioned. At those meetings, the three new independent member nations of the commonwealth, India, Pakistan and Ceylon have been represented for the first time, an event of historical importance not only for the commonwealth but for the world.

The meeting of prime ministers this April was solely concerned with the important constitutional issues arising from India's decision to adopt a republican form of constitution, and its desire to continue membership in the commonwealth. These two issues were important and were difficult. But I feel sure all members of this house and the great majority of the Canadian people will be glad to learn they were satisfactorily resolved in London by the adoption of that kind of compromise which, on more than one occasion, has not only prevented the commonwealth from dissolving but has actually strengthened it. I hope that this will prove to be true in this case also.

In the new commonwealth those of us who wish to retain allegiance to His Majesty can do so with such allegiance unimpaired. At the same time it has proved possible for a republic to remain within the group by the acceptance of the King as the symbol of the free association of the members of our commonwealth of nations, and as such the head of the commonwealth. In this connection, possibly it would not be inappropriate to refer to a former member of the commonwealth which has adopted the republican form of government and which has followed a course opposite to that chosen by India. I refer, of course, to Ireland, a country which gave the ultimate proof of the independence and freedom which exists in the commonwealth by exercising its right to leave it.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Inasmuch as the members of the commonwealth recognize the full sovereignty of each other and the authority of each to conduct its policy in both its domestic and external affairs in the manner of any other foreign state, no member of the commonwealth would, I think, seek to criticize in any way the action taken by the government of the republic of Ireland. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I think most Canadians were disappointed at the decision that the Irish government found it necessary to take to break those special formal ties which Ireland had with Canada and with the other members of the commonwealth. There is, of course, no need for us to assure the Irish people of the continuing warmth of the friendship the Canadian people have for them or to assure the Irish government of the desire of the government of Canada to co-operate with it in any useful manner.

The changes that have now taken place within the commonwealth naturally give rise to questions concerning their effect on its future. To the citizens of other countries, Mr. Speaker, it must often seem difficult to appreciate the organization or what might more accurately be called the lack of formal organization of the commonwealth. Certainly, the commonwealth of today is vastly different from the British empire of not so many years ago. I believe most people feel the difference is an improvement. Political and economic factors have produced many changes which, in my own opinion, have not only been to the advantage of the individual members but of the commonwealth as a whole. For example, no longer can there be any suggestion that the public opinion of the vast subcontinent of India is denied full expression in our commonwealth. Now, each Asian member of the commonwealth, and there are three, speaks through its own independent, democratically chosen government. In this way alone, not only has the composition of the commonwealth changed, but so has the nature, if you will, of its institutions, and the very nature of its being in a sense. But the change has provided a bridge between the east and the west and has given us an opportunity of being of great service to the world.

Once again, the commonwealth has proven its ability to adapt itself to these changing conditions, something I venture to think—there may be disagreement over this—it could not have done if it had, in earlier times, decided to organize its activities in a fixed, formal and centralized manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may leave the commonwealth and say a word or two about our relations with the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow just one question? The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been referring to the commonwealth of nations, and I noticed the same expression was used when Premier Nehru was here. Under the Statute of Westminster the nations within the British family of nations are known as the British commonwealth of nations. Has that name been changed as a result of India and Pakistan finding themselves in their peculiar position?

Mr. Pearson: On that point, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any change by formal legislative enactment in any part of the commonwealth. If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has looked, and I am sure he has, at the communiqué which was issued from the conference last April, he will find in that communiqué a reference to both the British commonwealth of nations and the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I noticed that the reference had been only to the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Pearson: Up to now, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is true I have been referring to the commonwealth of nations.

In so far as our relations with the United States are concerned, it is, of course, Mr. Speaker, obvious that two great and active nations like Canada and the United States cannot live together without being confronted each year with new problems in their relationship. The way and the spirit in which we set about the solution of our mutual problems must continue to stand as an example of the way in which relations should be conducted between free states. That example would be spoiled if we were to admit failure to find mutually acceptable solutions to our own problems. To avoid such failure, careful and constant attention, respect, and informed understanding on both sides are necessary. Relations between states, like marriages and friendships, do not thrive on neglect.

Canada and the United States, I suggest, cannot take their relations with each other too much for granted. Both must continue to direct intelligence and good will towards the solution of any problem. We in Canada must not, I think, be oversensitive in our relations with the United States. We must also recognize her great preponderance of responsibilities and her tremendous exertion as the leader of the western democratic powers in a struggle against forces which, if they prevailed, would end the Canadian as well as the American free way of life. The United States, on its part, must I think recognize that we wish to play our own part in international development, make our own contribution, and that we can do this effectively as a co-operating partner but not as a camp follower.

I mention these principles, Mr. Speaker, not because they are being ignored but because if we did not keep them in mind they might be ignored. One example of a difficult Canadian-United States question which can only be solved in a co-operative way is the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. It has been made abundantly clear that the two countries are able through their joint efforts to undertake this vast international project on their common frontier. Because of recent work the project itself will be enabled to get under way quickly as soon as the necessary legislative approval has been secured. I am sure all of us hope that the congress in Washington will be in a position to deal with it shortly. Viewed against the background of the present international situation, the St. Lawrence seaway and power project assumes increasing importance. It would have great defensive, strategic implications and would simplify the logistical problem of supplying Europe with arms and food. By removing any doubts anyone might still have as to the economic feasibility of the Labrador iron ore development, the seaway project would ensure the peaceful development of a dependable source of iron ore, capable of rapid expansion in time of war or emergency. It would thus fulfil one of the main requirements of continental defence. That is why I venture to express the hope that the necessary legislative and congressional action on this matter can be taken without much further delay.

Another example of United States-Canadian relations is the record of the international joint commission which continues its long-established record of dealing successfully with boundary water questions. There is no doubt that all the projects which the joint commission is now considering, and it is considering several, when carried out will add greatly to our economic strength.

Among the bilateral air agreements Canada signed last year was one with the United States which gave us a number of rights which we have been seeking for some time. In return—and this seems at times to be forgotten by some of our friends below the border—Canada granted such reciprocal concessions as full traffic rights at Gander airport in Newfoundland, an important international stage post taken over by Canada, along with other aviation facilities, when Newfoundland and Canada became one. The grant to Canada of one of the new routes, the route between Montreal and New York, was delayed by certain legal proceedings in the United States. It is because of these unresolved difficulties that we have not granted permanent licences to United States carriers to exercise certain traffic rights in Newfoundland but have issued only temporary permits. It will be appreciated of course that temporary arrangements of this nature cannot be continued indefinitely. The United States government has been co-operating to the best of its ability to help bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion, and we hope and expect that the treaty may shortly become fully effective on both sides.

I want to turn now for a moment to another specific problem in our relations with the United States. Negotiations with the government of that country have been in progress for some time regarding the rights and privileges at present enjoyed by United States forces in Newfoundland, a matter which has attained a considerable amount of public attention in this country. The Canadian government does not of course for one moment challenge the rights established with respect to areas in Newfoundland leased to the United States under the bases agreement of 1941, but it considers that they should be brought more closely into line with the principles enunciated by Mr. King and President Truman in their joint declaration of February 12, 1947. This calls for co-operative arrangements to be made, and I quote from it, "without impairment of the control of either country over all activities in its territory". I need not say any more on this subject at this time. I am confident that a way will shortly be found to reconcile United States treaty rights, and strategic requirements which we understand, with Canada's real concern about jurisdiction exercised by even the most friendly country over civilian and military activities on Canadian soil.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, there have also been some difficulties over that unguarded boundary which is the delight of every after-dinner speaker on Canadian-United States relations. Last year our joint border was crossed by new record crowds of United States tourists, and many Canadians went to the United States though the number was restricted by foreign exchange conditions. A few Canadians, however, did not manage to get across. We can understand, Mr. Speaker, our neighbour's legitimate desire to strengthen its border regulations in order to hinder the tourist and convention activities of communist agents. We accept of course its complete right to admit or refuse to admit persons into its country. That is a right which we ourselves maintain. But we consider it unfortunate when innocent citizens are inconvenienced and embarrassed by security delays, and when others are prevented from visiting the United States because of alleged activities which could, even if true, hardly constitute a threat to the security of that great and powerful state. We are at present discussing this whole question on a very friendly basis, as we always do, with the competent United States officials and we hope soon to arrange a solution for a problem which has understandably aroused anxiety in this country, lest it cast a shadow, even a small one, over the easy and friendly intercourse between our two peoples.

Our relations with the United States are more complex and continuous than with any other nation in the world, both between governments and between private organizations and individuals in our two countries. All of us in Canada of course attach enormous importance to these relations. It is our great good fortune that the power and influence of the United States is wielded by a friendly and peaceful people through a friendly and peaceful government of their choosing. In a world where some states stand in daily fear of a great neighbour, we appreciate the fact that our border marches with that of a powerful state that shares our ideals of freedom and our abhorrence of war, and that conducts its relations with smaller states on a basis of friendly understanding. Conversely, and I hope I will not be thought immodest in saying this, we consider it is the good fortune of the United States to have in us a neighbour which, though much less powerful, has shown itself competent in the management of its own affairs, united in the face of external danger, and strong in the resources and the will necessary to meet danger when it arises. We share a common political background and our social and ethical ideals spring from similar origins. There is therefore a solid basis for the co-operative effort which characterizes our relations and enriches the life we lead together on this continent.

May I say just a word about our relations with Latin America. Since the exchange of diplomatic missions with several of these Latin American republics and also through our increasingly friendly contacts with their representatives at United Nations meetings, there has been a welcome growth in our knowledge of each other's affairs. Broadly speaking, we have found, as we have come to know each other better, that we have a similar point of view on most, if not all, important international questions and a common desire to promote the security and welfare of our peoples. The cordial nature of our relations with the twenty Latin American republics has been given tangible expression in a variety of ways. In the face of present world economic difficulties, there has been since 1939 a tenfold increase in the total value of our trade with the nations of this area of the world. Not only do we continue to export to Latin America commodities such as wheat and newsprint which have always been of importance to our foreign trade in that part of the world, but we have extended the list to include other items such as, for example, ships and machinery. We have also co-operated on matters of mutual interest and concern in the United Nations and its specialized agencies.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, at the current meeting of the general assembly we were associated with Bolivia and the United States in presenting a resolution concerning human rights in the Balkan countries. In addition, we have continued to participate in the work of certain inter-American organizations dealing with technical matters which are of interest to us. The government—and I am sure all hon. members—feel that whatever our formal relationship may be with any particular inter-American agency we should broaden and deepen our association with the Latin republics of this hemisphere, and that such a process will be of great material advantage to our economic and political development.

If I may, I should like to take a long jump across the Pacific and say a few words about the situation in the Far East. Because of the historical and continuing intermingling of the North American and western European societies there has been a natural tendency for Canada to be particularly preoccupied with finding solutions to the critical economic, political and security problems with which the destruction of the second world war confronted the European and north Atlantic communities. We have made some progress in dealing with these problems. Meanwhile, on the other side of our country scant progress has been made in coping with the great post-war problems of the Pacific area.

Failure to reach an agreement on procedure for drawing up the Japanese peace treaty is merely one indication of the underlying tensions in East Asia today. Unloosed amid the social and political turmoil and economic dislocation attending the collapse of Japanese power on the continent of Asia, communist forces have overrun virtually all of northeast Asia, that part nearest to Canada. They menace now the United Nations sponsored government in south Korea. They have seized the greater part of China. Farther to the south in the countries of southeast Asia the situation is even more confused. There the communists have tried to ride to power on the nationalist movements which have been struggling for independence from colonial powers, all of which have been prepared in varying degree to assist the indigenous populations to secure that independence. Unless the great political problems of this area are resolved there can be no real peace and stability in Asia. Without such stability there can be no economic reconstruction and development, to give the 750 million people of this area a better way of living, which would contribute so largely to an expansion of international commerce and the preservation of world peace.

Canada, a country which borders on the Pacific ocean, would be foolish to try to isolate itself from the political and economic problems of Asia. That continent is now close to us. The vast expanses of the Pacific have shrunk as the result of air transport. You can now travel from Vancouver to Tokyo and Hong Kong by air in less time than it takes to travel from Vancouver to Ottawa by rail. Edmonton and Vancouver now rival San Francisco as North American air gateways to Asia. In fact in this air age the Far East is neither far nor east. Therefore Canadians must learn to look, as they are of course learning to look, northwest to Asia. I think that the economic development in western Canada would certainly be greatly stimulated by the restoration and development of trans-pacific trade. That trade will increase proportionately with the rise in the standard of living in the countries of the Far East, which cannot take place under disturbed and confused international political conditions.

In the Pacific, then, serious problems continue to exist, and I should like to mention just one or two of them in detail. First, the Japanese peace treaty; a peace treaty with Japan will not of course automatically adjust Japanese relations with its Pacific neighbours. It will, in fact, at the beginning introduce new and uncertain factors into Far Eastern international relations. Nevertheless the absence of such a treaty is one of the causes of uncertainty in the Far East. Much as the United States occupation of Japan has done for that country, I myself am inclined to think that military occupations as a rule quickly reach a point of diminishing returns, and if suitable arrangements can be made should be terminated as quickly as possible.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), then Secretary of State for External Affairs, stated in this house on December 19, 1947, and again on April 29, 1948, the views of the Canadian government in respect of the procedure that should be followed in negotiating a peace treaty with Japan. Our views remain essentially unaltered since that time. The Japanese have to make their peace with the neighbours, the people they wronged and with whom they will have to live in the future. The Canadian government believes that the settlement with Japan, which must inevitably be of great consequence to all Pacific and Asian nations, should be one that embodies the views of all the countries particularly interested, which includes Canada, and should be the product of the work of a representative conference.

There are of course very great difficulties to be overcome in convening such a conference, and one of the greatest of them is the emergence of a communist government in China and the effect of this on Japan. We also recognize of course the heavy responsibility that the United States bears in this matter. Nevertheless I think there may be greater dangers in an indefinite postponement of this peace conference than in making another effort to push forward with it.

This brings me to the present situation in China, a matter which is of course of very great interest, I am sure, to all hon. members. I do not try to minimize the gravity or the magnitude of the recent events in China. A small revolutionary party there, espousing an alien philosophy, looking to the Soviet union as the author and interpreter of that philosophy and as a guide in international relations, has seized military and governmental power throughout the greater part of China. It has done so, I believe, by riding in on the crest of a wave of a peasant revolt begun more than a hundred years ago in the great Taiping rebellion; by building a tough peasant army during the war of resistance to Japan; by exploiting the failures of the national government and by shrewd political manoeuvring in the Chinese manner. The "Central Government of the People's Republic of China", as it is called, was proclaimed in Peking on October 1, 1949. Other co-operating parties and individuals are represented in that government, but effective control is held by the Chinese communist party. The new regime has invited recognition from foreign governments on a basis of equality, friendship, respect for territorial integrity and withdrawal of recognition from the national government. The Soviet government and its satellites promptly accorded recognition on this basis. No other state has yet done so.

What should be our attitude in the face of these profound changes in China? Well, it is not an easy matter to talk about. One must speak of it with a certain amount of hesitation and with I think reservation, as conditions change, and may change again, quickly in that part of the world. But I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the first thing we should do is to try to understand what has happened. We must understand that today China is under the control of a communist party, which professes Marxist-Leninism as its social philosophy, and which has patterned its government on that of the new "popular democracies" of eastern Europe. It will set about, I assume, the introduction in China, as soon as it can, of what it will call socialism. This kind of socialism will not be, however, the liberal democratic socialism of western tradition, but the kind called for in communist doctrine.

China, as the greatest eastern country to come under communist control, has become significant as a testing ground for the adaptation of Marxist-Leninist principles to the Asian scene and as a base for further pressures against the rest of Asia. Of course we in Canada reject completely the Marxist-Leninist principles espoused by the Chinese communists, but we cannot reject the fact of China and its 450 million people. For seventy-five years Canadians have been in direct contact with the Chinese people. We respect their ancient and humanitarian culture. We admire the cheerful industry of the Chinese peasant. We accept the Chinese as good neighbours across the Pacific with whom we would live on terms of friendship and respect. We are interested in the welfare of the Chinese people as an end in itself and not as a means to somebody else's end. We know that the problems and sorrows of China cannot be confined within the borders of that ancient land.

There is also the continuing friendship by the people of Canada for the people of China which has been expressed in a variety of ways for so many years. We have been asked to recognize the new communist government in Peking which does in fact control a large part of that country. Recognition, of course, does not imply or signify moral approval, it is simply an acknowledgment of a state of affairs that exists. If the fact of communist control of China is demonstrated and an independent—I stress the word "independent"—Chinese government, able to discharge its international obligations, is established there, which is accepted by the Chinese people, then in due course and after consultation with other friendly governments—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently the minister, who has the floor, does not wish that questions should be asked.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to answer questions if they can be asked at the end of any particular section and if they bear on that particular section. It is a little difficult when I am asked a question in the middle of a paragraph or sentence.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that in the face of circumstances and the position as I tried to outline it, we will in due course and after consultation with other friendly governments have to recognize the facts which confront us. If we indicate, in the future, recognition of the Chinese government, that will not indicate approval of communism in China any more than our recognition of the communist states of eastern Europe indicated approval of their form of government. It should, however, safeguard the maintenance of contact between the Canadian and Chinese people, of which I have spoken already.

I think it would be inappropriate to leave this subject without saying something about the national government of China, sometimes called the nationalist government—although I hope that all Chinese governments will continue to be nationalist in the broadest and best sense of that word. It is a fact of political life, either domestic or international, that the loser is often made the scapegoat. Whatever the shortcomings of the national government of China may have been, whatever were the inadequacies of individual officials to shoulder the grave burdens, and they were grave, that were thrust upon them, we would be wanting in common decency if we did not acknowledge that that government stood strongly by us as allies in the last war and that they have professed and proclaimed the ideals of our own democratic way of life.

If I may I should like to come back across the Pacific in this rather mixed-up geographical tour and say a few words about the situation in Europe. During the past few months we have been delighted to welcome to this country the foreign ministers of Great Britain and of three continental powers. The visits of Mr. Bevin, Mr. van Zeeland of Belgium, Mr. Schuman of France and Count Sforza of Italy have been in some degree a measure of the greater external responsibilities of this country. They also gave us a pleasant opportunity to introduce these distinguished guests to at least a part of Canada and to allow them to renew their acquaintance with our people.

It seems to me that there are two potent forces at work in Europe in which we in this country are or should be profoundly interested. The first is the tremendous thrust in every country in Europe toward economic revival and social betterment of every kind, and the second is the equally compelling drive by Soviet Russia to assert its supremacy or potential domination.

We welcome for our own sake as much as for any other reason the efforts of the people of the countries of Europe to rebuild, not only their homes and their cities but their businesses, their commercial and industrial contacts abroad, their welfare, their self respect and their pride. Our Canadian way of life is so closely linked to the great civilization of western Europe that any change in this area, whether for better or for worse, cannot help but affect us.

Therefore we are greatly encouraged by the fact that in recent months there have been changes for the better. The economic union of Belgium, Luxembourg and The Netherlands is making steady progress and is a forceful example for the rest of the world. France and Italy have put away old grievances and have negotiated a trade treaty which it is intended in due course will lead to a customs union between those two great countries. There has also been a fuller realization of the necessity for greater economic co-operation among members of the OEEC, the organization for european economic co-operation. The signatories to the treaty of Brussels in March, 1948 have moved rapidly toward the co-ordination of their political, economic and military plans. Finally, in August of this year the council of Europe met for the first time at Strasbourg and made a good beginning in carrying out a difficult task.

Membership in the council of Europe is open to all democratic European states. If this council is to play its part in the preservation of peace and the advancement of material prosperity in Europe, the admission of German representatives is I think acknowledged as necessary. It only remains to be seen whether the German government can satisfy the people of Europe of its ability to qualify for such membership, to satisfy them that it will cooperate in a democratic and responsible manner and that it will renounce the national aspirations and ideas which in recent years have been in conflict with the interests of Europe, and for that matter with the interests of the world as a whole.

The outside judges of Germany's fitness to enter European society must be primarily Germany's European neighbours who have suffered so much in the past from German aggression. Nevertheless I think it is clear that before this judgment can be given Germany must have a democratic and responsible government composed of representatives of the German people qualified to speak for them in the council of Europe. The Canadian government welcomes the establishment of a democratic federal republic of Germany whose mandate we hope will soon run over a united Germany. The participation of such a democratic republic in the European community I think is fundamental to the rehabilitation of that community.

In both France and Italy the large communist parties have suffered very serious setbacks in recent months in political prestige. Among the workers the use of the strike as primarily a political weapon for the furtherance of soviet aims was demonstrated in the attempt a year ago to bring down the French government in Paris. The strikes failed, as did similar strikes attempting to upset the government of Italy.

In Finland the communists have also attempted to use strikes as a weapon to bring down the Finnish government, but that government has refused to be provoked or intimidated. The result was a complete defeat of the communists after a great deal of economic damage had been done to the country. We can only admire and respect the firm equanimity with which the government and the people of Finland have dealt with this threat to their institutions.

In Norway the communists have recently received a severe defeat in the elections of that country. In Greece conciliation with its northern neighbours has so far failed. Having sat in on a conciliation group of four for twenty-six meetings recently at Lake Success, I have some understanding of the reasons why that conciliation of Greece with its northern neighbours has failed and I can assure the house that it was not due to the Greek government or its representatives at the United Nations. Nevertheless, in spite of that failure, the national army of Greece has, in a period far shorter than we would have expected even a few months ago, driven out the guerrilla bands and brought a new instalment of peace to that unhappy land so long split by civil strife. We sincerely hope that this improvement in the situation will make possible the strengthening of stable and progressive democracy in Greece, and the improvement of economic conditions there.

The mere recital of these events indicates, I think, that the nations of western Europe are exerting good will and energy in their own reconstruction and in co-operative relations with their neighbours. But they are democracies in which the conditions of freedom must be respected. Each of them has its own traditional methods of thought, and its own established way of life. Therefore, in the arduous search for a basis of international agreement on economic, political and strategic European problems, they must, I assume, remain free to put forward their own claims and free to accept the necessary compromises. Democracy in international as in national affairs is government by agreement, not by verdict, and agreement between nations, however well disposed towards one another, must always take time. I venture to suggest therefore that we should not be unduly impatient if they have not made greater progress towards the consolidation of Europe than has in fact been the case in the last year.

There are still many obstacles in the way of further progress towards western European unity. Fear and uncertainty are probably the most conspicuous, fear of war and uncertainty about the economic future. These disintegrating elements lie at the root of most of the conflicts and stubborn differences of policy that retard progress towards European unity, but nevertheless a very real advance has been made in that direction. There is another difficulty which is retarding the essential advance towards European unity. When Prime Minister Nehru spoke in New York in October last on the causes of war he named as one of these the desire of one nation to dominate another. Nowhere are his words more clearly to be tested and proven than in Europe itself. For some time now it has been quite obvious that Soviet Russia is inflexibly set upon imposing its will by force and fear upon a wider and wider area totally regardless of the sovereign rights, the religious traditions or the social organization of the peoples involved. This unswerving purpose poisons and distorts the aspirations of those who seek for a peaceful way of life everywhere.

In Yugoslavia, for instance, it has been made quite clear by recent exchanges of notes between that government and the government of the U.S.S.R. that Russia is exerting every effort, short of actual war, to bring the government of Yugoslavia to heel, and to extract from it the kind of unquestioning and slavish obedience that the Kremlin demands. In Bulgaria, Hungary and Czechoslovakia and in Poland, where a Russian marshal has recently been made minister of national defence, communist pressure to liquidate every element of national independence and every trace of opinion or feeling which is not abjectly subordinate to Soviet Russia has, during recent months, been much accelerated.

Finally in the Russian zone of Germany the Soviet military authority in October last brought into being by a sort of ukase a state and government whose only claim to popular support was the carefully managed election of last May when, however, the communists, in spite of careful management, did not do very well. The constitution of this puppet regime was submitted for ratification not to the German people but to the Soviet government.

From all this the only conclusion we can draw is that the purpose of Soviet Russia is to expand its power by increasing the number of Soviet republics, and this evolution of policy since the days of Yalta now seems quite clear. At the Yalta conference Russia insisted merely that, to use the words of the declaration, "friendly governments" should be established on her frontiers. Two years later, when the new democracies were renamed peoples' democracies, all non-communist parties were rooted out or placed under communist leaders.

In the latest phase of this development the emphasis has now changed from the creation of "socialist" or communist regimes, in which there may still linger tendencies to independent or nationalist thought, to complete identification of these states with the Soviet union. As a Moscow journal has recently pointed out, and it is a significant quotation:

"Deep devotion to the cause of socialism and communism is inseparable from an equally profound devotion to the Soviet union."

These systematic measures for installing completely servile governments in the satellite states have been accompanied by less tangible but an insidious and menacing trespass on the sanctity of human rights. A regular feature of Russian totalitarianism is the purge, collective and individual, by which society is reminded of the ruthlessness and power of its government from which there is no appeal. Innocent and guilty alike live in fear of the informer, of the knock on the door in the small hours, of the sudden unexplained accusation of some alleged political crime.

Then there is another stage in the subjugation of states by soviet communism. Not only must their party rulers, their constitution and their legislation conform to the ways of Moscow, but even the minds and thoughts and actions of their individual citizens, their humble men and women, must be harshly disciplined into the narrow groove from which no deviation is permitted.

As one of their spokesmen has warned:

"Anyone who has deviated, however slightly, from Marxism-Leninism is bound to be dragged into the capitalist camp."

This camp of course is the hellfire of communist theology.

I do not believe that in the long run this dark practice of government through tyranny and ignorance can prevail even within the shadow of the iron curtain. I am confident that the resources of the human spirit, which for a thousand years have made western and eastern Europe the fountainhead of light and progress, are strong enough to withstand this seige. In one after another of the intellectual and cultural centres of Europe, the light of freedom has temporarily disappeared, and now it shows only in the western lands which are beyond the reach of the Russian soldier. But even though we cannot see it I know that that light still burns, and that eventually it will help lift the darkness that now surrounds it.

May I now turn for a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, to a subject which has been of very immediate interest to me in recent weeks; that is, the United Nations. If we take a round view of the United Nations I think there is reason to believe that it has been strengthened rather than weakened during the past year; and in spite of some discouragements and difficulties my experience with this United Nations assembly confirms me in that view. There is no need for me to point out here that it has failed to solve all major problems that confront us. It has not healed the breach between east and west. It has not produced a solution for the control of atomic energy, nor an agreed plan for disarmament. Because it has not provided us with world wide security we have had to have recourse to supplementary and, if you like, "second best" arrangements, such as the North Atlantic treaty. Nevertheless the United Nations has important accomplishments to its credit in political, economic and social matters.

These, I think, have at least helped to reduce international tension. I think we ought not to exaggerate what has been accomplished, and we must look squarely at the problems that remain to be faced; nevertheless I think we should recognize what has been achieved because it is on this that we must build, and we must go on building.

First let us examine the successes the United Nations has had in the political field. I think we can look back with some pride upon the accomplishments of the security council during the two years Canada has been a member of that council, because Canada has made a very respectable contribution to those accomplishments. The work of the security council of course has been uneven and imperfect. No one knows that better than I; but it has I think prevented serious disorders in many places from spreading into wars which could have involved the whole world. Furthermore, and this is something that should be understood if we are trying to assess the value of the security council, the responsibility for dealing with these situations has fallen upon it during three most difficult and dangerous years, when the problems of the world have been complicated by the unrest which always follows in the wake of a major war.

I should like to mention just three of those achievements. The first was Kashmir, where the situation might very well have exploded into tragic events, but where at least it has been contained. The United Nations commission is on the spot helping bring about a peaceful solution. Then Palestine, where of course the United Nations was not able to prevent an unhappy conflict, but where I think the United Nations actually did limit that conflict and help prevent it from spreading over a much wider area. The United Nations is still labouring there to bring about a final solution, I think with great hope of success. Even more important was the success of the security council in the Indonesian matter, a particularly difficult and complicated problem which at one time seemed as though it could not be solved by international action. In this case I think we have some reason to be proud in Canada. To a very considerable extent it was as the result of a Canadian resolution, which was attacked from both sides, that the machinery finally was set up by the security council which now, happily, in a conference at The Hague has brought about a peaceful and satisfactory solution, one which I think will stick, in respect of this complicated and dangerous Indonesian problem.

Though I have been talking about political matters, partly because we have been on the security council for the last two years, I do not want to overlook the economic and social achievements of the United Nations. We shall be more concerned with the economic and social side for the next three years, because we have now been elected to the economic and social council. I hope that during our term of service on that council we may play a respectable part in furthering the activities of the United Nations in that field. In the long run, of course, international political activity in maintaining peaceful conditions and removing causes of war will not succeed unless it can be founded on good economic and social conditions. That is where we can make a contribution in the economic and social council.

So we are glad to note that the post-war specialized agencies of the United Nations—in none of which the U.S.S.R., that apostle of international co-operation, participates—are developing their activities along highly constructive lines. A very important development took place a few weeks ago in the present assembly when it adopted a resolution supporting a program of technical assistance in the economic development of under-developed countries. This action grew out of what is called point four of Mr. Truman's statement to congress nearly a year ago. A sound scheme of this kind appears to us to be an effective method of helping the less fortunate peoples of the world to help themselves. It is, I think, of particular importance at a time when the peoples of Asia and Africa are stirring and should be encouraged to help themselves along the lines of sound economic development. It is also very important, I think, that the initiative shown by the United States in this matter, followed by support from so many governments, has been taken in and through the United Nations.

As one of the countries of the world with highly developed technical skill and facilities for training technicians, I believe we in Canada should play our part in this development. It is a long-range investment which may turn out to be very valuable to us.

However, if the United Nations has important accomplishments to its credit, it has, as I have said—for reasons I need not go into now but which I think are familiar to all hon. members of this house—been unable to solve the paramount question of collective security. So we have had to fall back on the North Atlantic treaty, and I should like to say a few words about that.

It was the hope of the western democratic powers that such a treaty would not be necessary, but it turned out to be necessary and I believe that in the future the signing of that treaty—which does not by-pass the United Nations or evade the spirit of the charter—will turn out to be the cornerstone in the structure of general collective security we are still trying to erect.

In meeting the obvious aggressive intentions of Soviet Russia, the western world up to the present time has been faced with two difficulties. In the first place there was the difficulty created by the failure of the U.S.S.R. to disarm after the war, which put the forces of that country proportionately in a so much stronger position than those of the western European democracies which were in particular opposed to it. The second difficulty was the lack of any specific assurance that in the event of aggression the north Atlantic nations would be willing to act together. Well, Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the North Atlantic pact we now have that assurance. Since the signing of that pact we have made encouraging progress in setting up the necessary organizations for the purpose of carrying out its provisions. I believe the various agencies that have been set up as a result of the meetings we have held have been explained to hon. members, and I do not think I need go further into that matter at this time. We have now, I think we can say, completed the second stage in the organization of our common defence. The first was working out the text of the treaty; the second was the establishment of the working organizations under that text. But I would not wish to leave the impression, of course, that our task under the North Atlantic arrangement is completed. In fact, it has only begun. The nations of the north Atlantic now face the problem of implementing their pledges. The parties to the treaty have undertaken to strengthen their individual and common defence by integrating their defence forces and resources. That means that each nation taking part will be expected to furnish to the common pool that which it can most suitably and effectively contribute. We may then anticipate, I think, some division of responsibility in the military field and some division of labour in production and supply.

In broad terms, we are committed to provide such aid as we can reasonably be expected to contribute, in the form in which we can most effectively furnish it. Until, however, plans are worked out and problems of co-ordination investigated—we will be working out plans before long—it is impossible at this particular moment to predict what our proper contribution will be.

We know, of course, that Canada can produce economically much greater quantities of certain types of arms and ammunition than we need ourselves either in peace or in war. Some of our military requirements, on the other hand, can be produced most economically in other countries. Our ability to purchase in those countries must depend to a very large extent on the willingness and ability of our partners in the north Atlantic defence system to purchase in Canada those items which we are able to produce economically. This principle of integration in military production and supply will, we trust, be considered as an essential governing factor in planning our common defence under the North Atlantic treaty.

As far as Canada is concerned, the implementation of this principle, and with it our ability to make the maximum contribution to the achievement of collective security, will depend to a considerable extent on our financial and exchange position vis-à-vis our neighbour. One way of improving that position—and it needs improvement—would be for the United States to remove some of the obstacles which now prevent the purchase of military supplies in this country.

There is another aspect of the Atlantic pact, the social and economic, which should not be forgotten in our anxiety over defence considerations. That point was emphasized as you will remember, Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne. The principle is embodied in article 2 of the pact itself which I need not read again at this time.

The North Atlantic council is given powers under the treaty to consider matters concerning the implementation of this article 2. During the course of the discussions which led up to the signing of the treaty, the Canadian delegation consistently urged that that article should be included in the pact. Now that it has been included, we urge that as soon as possible steps should be taken towards its implementation. For it is not only true that the north Atlantic nations cannot be strong militarily unless they are strong economically; it is also true that the whole basis of confidence and mutual trust, the sense of community, on which the alliance is founded would be undermined if the members of the alliance should, as the result of failure to proceed with the implementation of article 2, become divided into two groups with the European members attempting to build up trade among themselves behind a barrier of restrictions against the North American members of the alliance.

We have taken, I think, the first steps towards the widest possible military integration of the north Atlantic community. What we must do now, I suggest, is to take as many steps as possible, as quickly as possible, towards the widest possible economic collaboration between the north Atlantic nations. In article 2 of our pact we have the means for doing that.

Just as Canada and the United States cannot solve their defence problems in isolation from the United Kingdom and the other countries of western Europe, so also we in North America cannot solve our economic problems in isolation from western Europe. The same is true of the United Kingdom and of the other European members of the north Atlantic alliance; they cannot solve their economic problems or their defence problems apart from us in North America.

There is much to be said, in establishing a new institution such as the north Atlantic alliance, for a policy of going slowly to begin with. In ordinary times that certainly would be good advice. But these are not ordinary times. Events are moving fast today and our international economic and political institutions should not lag too far behind.

The house will, I know, not expect me to be more specific today. The first thing is for the North Atlantic council at its next meeting to consider what machinery should be set up for study and discussion and negotiation on this whole question of how best to implement the obligations of all members of the community under the treaty to promote conditions of stability and well-being, to seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and to encourage economic collaboration between them. The important thing is to get the machinery going so that we can get a better idea of just what is involved in a process of increasing social and economic collaboration amongst the north Atlantic nations, how fast we are likely to be able to go in the course of the next few years, and what difficulties we are likely to meet.

We have before us a task which will call forth all our reserves of intelligence, good will and imagination. It is not the negative, though vitally important, task of containing Russian imperialism. It is the positive task of creating a free community of free states, strong not only in its military resources, but in the prosperity of its people and the power of its free, progressive institutions.

Before coming to my final paragraphs, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize for trespassing on the patience of the house for so long, I should like to say a few words in closing this survey on a subject upon which I have already touched. I believe, however, that it is so important it needs further mention. It colours all these specific problems about which I have talked. It is the subject of communism and Russian imperialism and its relationship to these problems. I think it is important to understand what we are fighting against in the cold war. We of the free democracies are not fighting progress or social reform; we are not seeking to restore or to perpetuate feudal regimes or outworn dogmas. We recognize the need for change in Asia, Africa, and other parts of the world. We do not, however, want the underprivileged of the world to follow the paths which the unhappy people of Russia and of the satellite states have been forced to follow by their masters in the Kremlin.

It is the Russian state, under the control of these masters, which practises at home and exports abroad the reactionary system of society which I have attempted to describe, while pretending at "peace congresses" and in the United Nations that it alone is ready to disarm, it alone is ready to prohibit the atomic bomb and that it alone is the true champion of world peace. The record does not support any such pretension.

I should like for a few moments to point to one very important chapter in that record which will show how far Russia's pretensions depart from Russia's performance. I am referring to the efforts which we are now making to control the use of atomic energy so it will never be used for anything but peaceful purposes. There is no question before the world today in any way comparable with this one in its importance. The Russians admit this. They talk loudly, especially at Lake Success—and I have had to listen to their talks a great deal in the last six weeks—about immediate and unqualified outlawing of the atom bomb, but they refuse to participate in any scheme in which international control and inspection would be effective and adequate for that purpose. Without such control, pledges and protocols would, in the present atmosphere of international suspicion and mistrust, be worse than useless. They would be dangerous, by providing a false facade of security behind which the aggressor could develop his evil plans. We had some experience of this in the 1930's.

The Russian delegates at the United Nations meetings keep on saying: we accept international inspection and adequate control; we agree that international inspectors should be able to visit declared Russian production facilities "periodically" and be granted permission to make "special" searches if the inspectors could show that there were grounds for suspecting either the presence of an undeclared plant in their territories or the diversion from one of the declared plants of clandestine production while the inspectors were away. But what they did not say and what they would not explain to us in answer to specific questions was how the rest of the world was to find out anything more about atomic plants inside Russia than the Russians chose to tell us, or how inspectors were to have grounds for suspicion if they did not have access to vast areas of the Soviet hinterland.

But, it may be said, all this is very fine; we know about the hypocrisy of Russia, both in its use of international communism and in its toying with the hopes of all peoples for peace, security, justice and freedom—but all the same, we must somehow reach agreement with the Russians on the international control of atomic energy before we are all blown to bits by it.

I agree that we must never give up trying. We must not get into an atomic groove or refuse to examine any proposal from any quarter which may be put forward. However, it takes two to make an agreement and two to make the necessary compromises on which agreement can be based. Until the Russians give some indication of their readiness to accept genuine, not spurious, international control and inspection, it is hard to see at the moment where progress can be made.

The basic difficulty is, of course, the Soviet fear of any contact with the west—a fear which is almost pathological. The Soviet leaders also stubbornly maintain that they cannot possibly accept any limitations of their sovereignty. We maintain, on the contrary, that we cannot afford to cling to an ancient concept of sovereignty when what we are seeking is a chance for survival. We shall never get anywhere, in our view, if we insist on talking about national sovereignty as if, in atomic matters, it were more important than national and international security, or if we consider that, by using our national sovereignty for joint action, we are losing it.

Whether we are talking about atomic or conventional weapons, we must have some means of knowing, not in any absolute sense, because that is quite impossible, but within reasonable limits of certainty that no country is in a position to bamboozle the rest of the world as to the number of atom bombs or battleships or bombers or battalions that it possesses. If we cannot agree on a system for controlling the vast and conspicuous facilities necessary for the production of nuclear fuels, then we shall not reach agreement on the rest of our armaments industries which can more readily be camouflaged as factories for peaceful production or indeed may be hidden underground.

The cold fact in the cold war is that we do not trust the Russians enough to agree to destroy our atomic weapons and facilities for making them until we are in a position to satisfy ourselves, by international inspection and control of their facilities, that they do not secretly stockpile atomic bombs. The Russians, for their part, are not willing to entrust to an international atomic development authority, which they claim would be under Anglo-American domination, adequate functions of control, agreed beforehand and embodied in a treaty. This is merely another way of saying, Mr. Speaker, that the problem of peace is much broader than the problem of agreeing on the clauses of a tready to prohibit the use of the atom bomb. It is the problem of establishing sufficient mutual confidence to tackle not only disarmament and the bomb but the whole range of major friction points—political, strategic and economic—which are witnesses today of the tragic division between the two worlds.

In conclusion, I come back to what our Prime Minister, then secretary of state of external affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), said eighteen months ago in this house. He spoke then of the "tragic inability of the western democracies and the eastern totalitarian states, led by the U.S.S.R., to establish any basis for co-operation or even any basis for mutual toleration." He went on to say: "We had hoped for mutual toleration founded on a genuine desire to live and let live. It seems now that we shall have to be content with toleration based on what I hope will be a healthy respect for the determination of each of us to prevent encroachment and resist domination by the others."

Since that statement of the Prime Minister, the democratic world has made good progress toward the limited but practicable goal which he outlined. For that progress along the road to at least limited collective security, we can be thankful.

Much, however, remains to be done, and no one can be very optimistic about the future. I say that without intending to be unduly panicky about the future. But no one can be unreasonably optimistic about the future as long as the free democratic and the Russian communist worlds face each other in fear, misunderstanding and mistrust.

In these international questions which I have been surveying, I fear, in a haphazard and inadequate way, Canada has made a good and effective contribution to the cause of good international relations and the achievement of real peace. Our prestige stands high among the nations; and I know that all Canadians will do their best to keep that position high.

At the same time, no Canadian government is ever likely to forget that the roots of a successful foreign policy must be deep in the knowledge and understanding of the people, in an enlightened awareness of what is in the best interests of our people. As I say, there should be no contradiction between our international and our national interests. In the difficult days ahead, while Canadian foreign policy must stand on its own feet, it must also march, whenever possible, in step with those who are or who will become our friends. It must be based on the true interest of Canada but of a Canada which could not, even if it desired to do so, remain isolated or insulated from the community of all peoples which now inhabit our small atomic world.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes or less which are left before the noon recess intervenes, I have no intention of launching into the main points which I think are worthy of discussion following the comprehensive review of world affairs given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). However, I do want to point up one or two matters to which he referred.

In his closing sentences the minister intimated that the people of Canada must have a deep knowledge of external affairs. I heartily agree with that statement, because we cannot hope to have the informed and intelligent support of the people of Canada in our foreign policies unless the people are informed constantly, continuously and fully as to the facts and conditions upon which the government bases those policies.

I should like to suggest that when an important debate on external affairs is to take place—and it is a matter of infrequency—it would only be fair for the government to inform the representatives in Ottawa of other countries—we must have something like thirty of them—so that they may have an opportunity of sitting in the galleries to listen. I counted only four of such representatives in the galleries this morning to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs make his speech, which was the first major one on this subject by a government minister since the session of 1948.

If there was one thing more than another which the minister's speech conveyed to all parts of the house, it was the impossibility of covering world issues in an hour and three-quarters and doing it in such a way as to give full information to parliament and the public. The public deserves something more than a sporadic bit of information, such as we have been getting prior to this morning. I know the minister has been away on important public duties. We are all proud to share in the reflected glory which came to him as chairman of the main committee of the United Nations. I am not directing any adversely critical remarks to him on that score. But the government has to change its policy, I think, so that more than four per cent of the time of the house—the percentage given to external affairs in the last three sessions—may be given to what I think is the most important of all the issues before the people of Canada, namely, the issue of peace or war.

If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it one o'clock.

Mr. Church: May I have two or three minutes to call the minister's attention to a matter—

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member should be informed that he has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. Church: The committee is just a whitewashing committee. That is all it is.

Mr. Speaker: There is no doubt that the hon. member for Broadview has already spoken in this debate. I would refer him to standing order 43.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Graydon.]

The house resumed at three o'clock.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO MEETINGS OF DEFENCE AND MILITARY COMMITTEES

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to revert to motions in order to make a brief announcement.

Since the house met at eleven o'clock this morning an invitation has been received from Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defence of the United States of America and chairman of the defence committee under the North Atlantic treaty, to attend a meeting of that committee to be held at Paris on December 1. We have sent an acceptance of that invitation, and I shall attend the meeting.

We also received word that General Omar Bradley, the chairman of the military committee under the North Atlantic treaty, has summoned a meeting of that committee to be held also at Paris on November 29. Canada will be represented at that meeting by Lieutenant General Charles Foulkes, chairman of the chiefs of staff committee and chief of the general staff of Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED ON STATEMENT OF MR. PEARSON

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson that certain estimates of the Department of External Affairs be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, before the noon recess I had addressed my remarks largely to the minister's observations with respect to a fuller measure of information being made available to parliament and the people with regard to international relations and world issues generally. I think there is an urgent need to build up a constructive and intelligent Canadian opinion on world affairs from one end of Canada to the other. In my opinion Canadians are hungry for a knowledge of world affairs.

As I look from one end of this chamber to the other I see a great number of hon. members who from time to time have taken it upon themselves to speak in various parts of Canada with respect to foreign relations. I think it might properly be said that many of us have spoken more on that subject than perhaps we have on any domestic issue. I think most of us who have done so have found that there is a great interest on the part of the citizenry of this country in the problems which this parliament and government face. The Department of External Affairs ought to see to it that in the days that lie ahead the conditions which have existed in the days gone by shall not be perpetuated and that the government and the department take the people of Canada more fully into their confidence with respect to world affairs generally.

We should know what is going on outside this nation through information coming from governmental sources. We should know further what the government may decide from time to time they are going to do about it. On that score I am impelled to refer the house to the penetrating and constructive criticism of Mr. I. Norman Smith of the Ottawa Journal, an experienced observer in the field of international relations. Mr. Smith had something to say on this point only two weeks ago when he was writing from Lake Success. After taking the minister and his department to task in a friendly way for refusing to take the public of Canada into their confidence on the vital happenings in the world from day to day, and expressing the conviction that there is a great deal of news about what is going on in the world that Canadians do not get, he declared that while the Department of External Affairs gets that news and shapes its policies upon it, it only comes to the Canadian people in the form of the final decision.

One observation he made was that it is no answer to say that diplomatic information must not be let out. The British let out much more and so do the United States. Mr. Smith goes on to say:

> We lack informed controversy. And informed controversy makes for enthusiastic public support of intelligent foreign policy.
> The end effect of our present policy of secrecy is that we are told virtually nothing about the situation until suddenly we are told we are breaking diplomatic relations or refusing trade or even going to war.

Mr. Smith is not a man who thus speaks out without some provocation, and were it not for my limited time today I should like to quote him more fully. What he said has been emphasized lately in this chamber when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was asked in the house just a short time ago what Canada was going to do at the United Nations when the vote came for the Czechoslovakian or Yugoslavian candidature for a non-permanent seat on the security council. The Prime Minister indicated very clearly that in his opinion the question ought not to have been asked because it was the practice of the administration not to tell anybody what the government of Canada was going to do.

Not only were we not told what instructions were given on that occasion to the Canadian delegation; nobody has found out yet which way we voted. One would almost imagine that the Canadian people had no right to know what side they were being put on in New York and that the decision must remain locked up with only the government and its senior officials holding the key. We in Canada know how the United States and Britain voted, but apparently we are not to be informed of our own stand. I think we in this parliament and the people generally are entitled to that sort of information so long as the safety and security of the nation is not at stake.

Recently the United States government announced its intention to appoint a separate assistant secretary of state who would be charged with the specific responsibility of assisting the people in that nation to keep pace with the foreign policies of the government and its growing influence in world affairs. Such a move apparently seemed commendable to the United States government, not only on the ground that it helps its citizens to understand the foreign policies of the government, but for the more important reason that it recognizes that a foreign policy without public support could very easily become no foreign policy at all.

I am not suggesting that we should follow that move in all the details I have described. I think we have the machinery in our own Department of External Affairs which would make a drastic move of that kind unnecessary. There is in the Department of External Affairs an information division which in the main does a satisfactory job, but its activities must necessarily follow and not precede government decisions on policy. The result is that little information becomes available as to the various backgrounds upon which our foreign policies are based. I submit that full information is much more essential now that the government has retreated from its former policy of having multiple-party representation at the United Nations, although I am not suggesting that the government should go back to that practice at the moment.

When the government gets away from the people, whether on domestic issues or in the international field, there is always a tendency for a department to form itself into a little clique that thinks it knows better than the people the amount of information and the details thereof that should be given. We had a good example just before the house rose for the noon recess. A question arose which I think is of vast concern and interest to the people of Canada generally. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) spoke about the commonwealth of nations rather than the British commonwealth of nations. I am quite sure I have been guilty of doing so myself, and I imagine that other members on all sides of the house have also done so from time to time. For purposes of abbreviation the expression "commonwealth of nations" may sometimes be used inadvertently without the adjective "British", but I certainly think that we who have been guilty of that abbreviation from time to time would not want it understood that because we used the abbreviated form we meant something other than the British commonwealth of nations.

I want to say to the minister and the government that I think the services and contribution of Great Britain in the two world wars, which proved the bastion and bulwark of democracy, are enough to make the Canadian people proud to put the word "British" before the words "commonwealth of nations". I think no one has any need to apologize for that. I have no particular objection to people abbreviating, but I suggest that when they do so they ought to make it clear in the abbreviation that they mean the British commonwealth of nations.

It seems strange to me that an issue which is so important to the people should be casually put before parliament on an occasion such as this, and that we should learn officially for the first time in an introductory message from the minister that in some respects this country has turned its back upon the designation, "British commonwealth of nations", and has now adopted "commonwealth of nations". I think that only emphasizes what I have been trying to say, that we are not getting enough of the background and information whereby an intelligent opinion can be formed. That is a good example of the kind of surprise to which the parliament of Canada should not be subjected in this enlightened age.

I wish now to deal with the activities of the department and the minister. With the steady invasion of Canada into the field of foreign relations, accelerated greatly by our magnificent contribution, if I may say so, in two world wars, which gave us a prominent place at the San Francisco conference and has given us a prominent place in all international gatherings since that time, it is only natural that the department should have grown with great rapidity. As a matter of fact, it has grown to a high level of importance among the units of governmental administration at Ottawa. I think it is only fair to say that the department has attached to its personnel some of the ablest public servants of whom Canada can boast, and many of them young veterans of the last world war. It is a well-known fact that in the councils of the world—and those of us who have served with some of these officials overseas and in other places can bear testimony to what I am saying—our external affairs representatives have played a leading part. I desire to pay tribute to those who have played so important a role for Canada in its relations with other countries at global gatherings.

As far as possible, in my opinion, the issue of determining peace and war should not be subject to thoughtless or synthetic criticism. Nevertheless it is the duty of the opposition, by way of stimulating suggestions and careful examination, to make sure that the new department operates efficiently. Perhaps I should not use the word "new" because it is not new except in its recent development. The Department of External Affairs has mushroomed from a personnel of 392 in 1941 to a present total of 1,248. I think it is important that the opposition and parliament make sure that, by reason of inadequate constructive criticism, we do not allow the department to be the spoiled child of either the government or parliament.

I should like to say further that I am not particularly critical of the expenditure of money on our external affairs. I think of course that the opposition must always be on the alert to see that the taxpayer gets the best value for every dollar that is spent. I merely want to point out to the minister and to the department generally that in certain respects I think we ought carefully to scrutinize their expenditures. Canada's population constitutes only one out of every 188 of the entire world's population, and has a relatively small national income compared to some of those with which we have to compete. It is hard to avoid the human weakness of trying to keep up with the international Joneses. Sometimes the international Joneses have a much deeper purse from which to draw than we have. I am not pointing to any special detail of the department except to indicate that, although Canada's foreign affairs have largely been lifted out of the realm of narrow controversy from a party point of view, at the same time we must watch that the department does not in the future—and I am not saying it has done so in the past—run wild so far as its expenditures and these other matters are concerned.

I come now to another point, and I do so without reflection upon any of our present diplomatic representatives abroad. I think it can properly be said that, as far as possible, we should have representing us at the capitals of the nations of the world Canadians who are truly representative of some of the great sections of our population. They are our show windows. More often than not Canada is judged in a foreign country by the one man who goes from this dominion to represent us at that nation's capital. I think it will be at once seen how important it is today to choose the right man for the job, because of the increased importance of our international relations generally. We should be training for our senior diplomatic posts men whose backgrounds are solidly rooted in some of the main occupations of our people. At once it will come to the minds of hon. members that the Canadian farmer, the Canadian workman, the Canadian businessman, and Canadian women are four sections of the population out of the many that could be mentioned, but I think it is time we set out to formulate a policy whereby we shall ensure that our representatives in other countries will be truly representative of the Canadian people, their occupations, their ideals and so forth.

We draw men for diplomatic posts from some of the professions, but so far as I know we have pretty well neglected the agricultural colleges of our nation when we seek material for diplomatic representation abroad. We have not gone to the trade unions for material either, and in my opinion this shows a lack of practical vision which is rather essential for our future success in the diplomatic field. Therefore, I say it is time to pause, take inventory and construct a virile practical policy in so far as our foreign representation is concerned.

Before I leave the subject of the department itself I want to suggest to the government an amendment to the legislation creating the Department of External Affairs. I fancy the minister himself may find this suggestion rather welcome, as I hope other members of the house will. We should not have to continue to go through the agony of referring to the minister as the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Worse than that, we have to refer to the under-secretary of state for external affairs, and I believe there is still the further title of associate under-secretary of state for external affairs. If for no other reason than economy in printing, my suggestion ought to meet with favour. The terminology is clumsy, cumbersome and confusing. I suggest that the head of the department should be known, as he is practically always called now, as the Minister of External Affairs and his deputy as the deputy minister of external affairs. I have made this suggestion previously, but I want to press home upon the government the desirability of making this change in the interests not only of the minister and his deputy but of parliament and the people, and particularly the press.

Now for a moment I should like to deal with Canada's cardinal foreign policy. In all the speeches that are made and the discussions that take place from time to time I believe we must never lose sight of the fact that the cardinal policy for Canada must be the maintenance of permanent peace and security for our people. Around this desirable and essential objective we must range our diplomatic moves. This nation has a key part to play in peace, for no nation has a greater stake in international harmony than Canada. We have nothing to gain from war; we never did have anything to gain from war. We have everything to gain from peace. Our national objectives here at home, looking to the development of a heritage that no other people in the world have been privileged to enjoy, are predicated upon the nations of the world remaining at peace with each other. So I say, in the interests of ourselves and of others, our cardinal policy must never be lost sight of in the many diplomatic discussions that take place dealing with foreign affairs. We must never depart from the objective of international co-operation, understanding and peace.

It is easy to belittle the work of the United Nations; and I was pleased to hear what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had to say just a few hours ago in that regard. In many quarters it is fashionable to decry the work of that organization. I believe we as a nation should refuse to join the hue and cry against a well intentioned, if perhaps at times rather futile, instrument for collective security and world peace. When the shortcomings of the United Nations are being carefully inventoried and told in colourful language, it is well to remember that a perfect organization for peace is impossible in a yet imperfect world. We should not lay all the blame on the doorstep of the United Nations organization. It is frequently forgotten—I do not think the minister mentioned this in his hurried review this morning, but I want to mention it now—that when the United Nations organization was formed at San Francisco it was predicated upon what the world felt was a proper assumption; that is, that before it undertook any major operations we would have peace treaties between the nations that took part in the last war. Instead of that, however, the United Nations has been forced to operate on a basis which was never contemplated. Peace treaties have not been signed, except with minor countries in Europe. The major peace treaties are outstanding, and perhaps that is one of the principal reasons why there is so much confusion, despair and discouragement with respect to the work of the organization.

Some of us in this house who were present when the organization was born at San Francisco are perhaps more discouraged and disappointed than anyone else. It was natural that we should have glorious hopes with respect to what that great organization might do. But to those who are enemies of the United Nations, those who are perhaps thoughtless opponents of that organization, I say we should pause and just think back as to what kind of world this would have been if there had been no positive and organized plan for permanent peace as the last armed holocaust drew to a close. Had that happened, in effect the nations of the world would have been admitting bankruptcy in ideals and objectives, and indeed in the field of world peace itself.

I do not think I want to go as far as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) went some time ago, when he referred to one of the main organs of the United Nations as being "frozen in futility and divided by dissension", though I have no doubt that at times he must have felt that this description fitted it. I am not so sure I would go that far, however, and I do not think parliament generally wants to go that far. Nevertheless I think that as a nation we must realize that no matter how determined our country may be to preserve world peace, we cannot hope to bring about that peace, security and prosperity by our own efforts alone. Let us start with that assumption, no matter what party we may belong to in this House of Commons, because it is a stark, naked fact in this very uncertain world of today. Out of this realization was born the United Nations, a world-wide effort to organize peace-loving countries in a search for peace and progress on a universal scale. Unfortunately the effort to achieve collective security through this medium has not been as successful as had been hoped by the founders at San Francisco, because of the obstruction of a minority small to begin with but which has been increasing in numbers and power for a considerable time.

When we speak of that minority we might as well mention those to whom we refer. It is Soviet Russia and her satellite states who have been endeavouring to create chaos and confusion in the very organization that was set up to preserve peace and harmony in the world. As a result freedom-loving nations have proceeded with a search for collective security on another broad basis, yet within the charter of the United Nations itself. Our government, with the full endorsation of the people, have followed such a foreign policy and I believe are determined to continue to follow it. That policy is set out in the North Atlantic treaty.

Therefore I want to sound a note of warning against any tendency to underestimate or undervalue the work of the United Nations. There is a very definite and important job for this organization to do through its various agencies. In some respects it is doing that job. I believe it must still be given a chance to slowly but effectively knit and weave the pattern of international unity on a universal scale. We in Canada must never flag nor fail in our resolute quest for a just and lasting peace.

Before I leave the subject of the United Nations, I should like to mention that, after the first general assembly of 1946 in London, I took occasion to warn this parliament that the United Nations might easily become a glorified debating forum if certain circumstances prevailed for any length of time. My statement was made at a time when I was calling upon President Truman, Prime Minister Attlee and Premier Stalin. I called upon them not to boycott the United Nations but to come themselves and meet on common ground annually to clear away the fog of global differences. My fear was that with secondary representatives rather than the primary chiefs in command, issues might be dodged, decisions delayed and talk might replace action. Many of my fears have proven justified. I repeat the call. If the nations of the world desire peace, then I think it is up to the chiefs of the main nations of the world to go to the United Nations. If they think it is the important body they have told the rest of the world it is, then there is some responsibility on those chiefs to go to that organization, put their feet under a table and solve some of the problems the common people of the world want them to solve.

I should like to deal with a subject which was stressed by the minister when he made his speech, but I wish to deal with an aspect of it which he did not discuss. When the international atomic energy commission was set up at the first meeting of the general assembly of the United Nations in 1946, we were pleased to see the signal role of Canada recognized. She was appointed as one of the permanent members of that commission. The strong and constant pressure exerted by Canadian representatives from time to time down to the present crisis, urging effective international control and inspection, has in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, carried the unanimous approval of the Canadian people. It would be a tragedy of the first magnitude, I submit, if such a destructive force as the atom should be allowed to run wild in time of war. Our very civilization may well be at stake in the issues now up for decision. I cannot emphasize too strongly the argument put forward by the minister on that point this morning when he spoke of atomic energy for peaceful use—yes; atomic energy for war—no. That is the Canadian policy in a nutshell. We must proceed to try to find agreement to control the use of atomic energy.

Evidence was given before the House of Commons committee on atomic energy which points up another issue which may well involve our external relations with the great republic to the south of us. Everyone who has spoken on behalf of this government has said that, so far as Canada is concerned, our part in the development of atomic energy is the development of it for peaceful purposes and industrial use. That is what we should be doing; that is our job and the government says that is our policy.

The chairman of the Canadian atomic energy control board, in giving testimony before the committee the other day, stated that a United States law passed in 1946 prohibits Canada having with that country the same close contact she has with the United Kingdom. In a press dispatch reporting the proceedings of the committee the chairman is quoted as follows:

> Internally Chalk River's heavy water radioactive pile lets Canada do research that can't be done elsewhere, that eight universities on their own initiative are doing research of large value with state aid on capital outlays, and that it is "a tragedy"—

These are the chairman's own words:

> —it is "a tragedy" that secrecy requirements prevent industry from playing the role it could play in the atom's early era.

Since this appears to enter into the field of our external relations with the United States, we should be told what agreement or understanding on the international level these facts are predicated upon. As compared with the partnership between government and industry which characterizes the development of atomic energy on a peacetime basis in the United States, industry in Canada seems to be completely hobbled. More than that, it is said that fifty per cent of the United States atomic energy commission spending goes directly into industry and appears to indicate that the United States policy, in vivid contrast to ours, is to make available to industry such information as is possible within the limits of national safety and security. This enables industry to acquire the know-how of atomic energy and its direct application to industrial uses. No doubt the significance of that will come to the mind of every member of the house.

No one doubts the immense possibilities of this form of power in the domain of medicine, biology, agriculture and industry. Its future use may usher in an era of change of as vital importance to the people of this country and the world as did steam and electricity in the days long past. Its future use may be revolutionary in character and it may open up an era of which we have never even dreamed. Yet, the head of our atomic energy control board in Canada says it is a tragedy that industry is not participating in atomic research. The reason given is secrecy.

This policy adopted by one nation and not another might easily put Canadian industry and labour behind the "eight ball", to use a street term, in the competitive field of power and other atomic uses in the future. The people should be told whether this difference in policy in Canada is a domestic governmental decision or whether it is founded on some arrangement between the two countries on the international level. If it is the latter then this house should know what that understanding or agreement is.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to another matter which is of paramount importance in the discussion of our foreign affairs today. When the Canadian signature was placed upon the North Atlantic treaty, it marked a major departure from Canada's previously expounded anti-commitment policy in the field of world relations. It meant that this nation had caught the spirit of reality in the realm of collective security and was prepared to say what this country would do in a given set of circumstances. So determined are our people that the world's war dogs shall be kept behind doors barred and locked forever, the treaty passed parliament without a dissenting vote and was endorsed by the people generally. The scant disapproval given to it was given by those who have the mistaken idea that the communist system of government is better than our own democracy. As an instrument for peace rather than an instrument for war, as an instrument within rather than without the framework of the United Nations, it became necessary when the veto-ridden security council became nearly impotent as an enforcement body. The security council lacked teeth. This was to provide the teeth required to see that peace is kept on an international scale. On September 19, 1947, Prime Minister St. Laurent, speaking as Canadian secretary of state for external affairs, told the general assembly of the United Nations meeting at that time:

> . . . that the nations, if forced, may seek greater safety in an association of democratic and peace-loving states, willing to accept more specific international obligations in return for a greater measure of national security.

On October 25, 1948, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in a speech before the United Nations association in Toronto, announced that Canada's defence program was planned after consultation with others, so that what Canada might do in the way of defence would fit into any subsequent plan that might be arrived at after parliament had given approval to the Atlantic pact.

On November 26, 1948, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), in a press conference at The Hague, is reported to have said:

> . . . that Canada will commit herself freely to military measures specific enough for security.

Since these statements of Canadian foreign policy were announced, Canada and eleven other countries have signed the Atlantic pact. Although the Atlantic pact was ratified at the last session of parliament, the specific obligations of that pact have not yet been made public. I am convinced that the time has come for parliament and the country to be given more facts as to our obligations under the Atlantic pact.

I read the report of the debate on Friday, in which the Minister of National Defence had something to say with respect to Canada's defence policy. If any reading of his words bears out what his intentions were, then it would seem to me that it was delightfully vague with respect to the relationship of Canada's specific commitments under the North Atlantic treaty and Canada's defence plan and policy at home. It was a delightfully vague disposal of the whole problem. More than that, I listened this morning to the Secretary of State for External Affairs speaking in excellent language, conveying his thoughts to the house in an eloquent way, but still not getting to the point as to just what were our commitments of a specific character in the way of national defence as related to the North Atlantic treaty. I suggest that the Secretary of State for External Affairs can hardly say that he is not yet ready to divulge such information, in view of his statement in the House of Commons on September 16 last. In reply to a question he said:

> The report has been considered by the government, and we think it provides a suitable basis for the organization required under the Atlantic pact, so that it can become an effective instrument for the carrying out of its primary purpose, that of assisting the United Nations in preserving peace and preventing aggression.

After all, if the Secretary of State for External Affairs can, in effect, announce to the nation on September 16 that the Atlantic defence structure, as drafted, is satisfactory to Canada, surely at this date, many weeks later, either he or the Minister of National Defence should be able to give a much clearer, much more definite and much more constructive answer than has already been given.

The Canadian people are entitled to know what it is that we are committed to under the North Atlantic treaty. Once they know what we are committed to under that treaty, there will be no doubt as to the kind of full support the Canadian people will be prepared to give to the government. When they are going to give that support, I think they are entitled to have the government take them into their confidence in connection with it. I do not think it is proper to have too many of these things kept in the exclusive preserve of the government. There are a great many things that ought to be in the exclusive preserve of the people. I cannot think that the minister will allow this present discussion to terminate without presenting to the Canadian people what it has meant in terms of commitments and present and future plans of defence for this nation to sign the Atlantic pact. Parliament and the people gave ungrudging support to the government on the principle of the Atlantic pact. I think the government ought now to give ungrudgingly the information to which the people of Canada are entitled —always, of course, within the limits of national safety and security.

Now I come to another point and that is Canada's relations with Britain and the United States. This nation's foreign policy and her very position in international affairs are influenced very materially by Anglo-American relations. More than all others there are three great powers whose friendship with us, and with each other, has made our diplomatic path easier in the past. Upon the continuance of this relationship will be founded much of our security in the future. Britain, France and the United States, without reflecting upon any other group of nations, have been singularly close to us in geography, ideals, objectives and sentiment. In two great wars all four of those nations fought side by side. May there never come a time when our relations with any of them suffer decline.

I was interested in a reference made this morning by the minister. It was a characteristic reference of his. He said that, in our relations with the United States, after all perhaps we should not take too much for granted—and I agree with that sentiment—and that in the case of diplomacy with the United States, just as in marriage and friendship, we should not allow those relations to be weakened by neglect.

I can readily recall the foreign secretary of Britain answering a question on the floor of the United Kingdom parliament in 1945, when someone asked him at that time—and I think it was an opposition question—whether the minister did not think it would be a good thing if Britain had more meetings with the Russians as the diplomatic relations between the countries were somewhat deteriorating. I can quite well remember Mr. Bevin standing up. I can see him to this day. I wondered what kind of answer he would give. He said something to this effect: My hon. friend must surely know that many close friendships are made very much closer the less often some of these friends see each other. I could not help repeating that story today, but I do not think it applies to a relationship which is as close and intimate as that between Canada and the United States; closeness and intimacy must always remain characteristics of our relations with our great neighbour to the south.

In view of the fact that Britain is a member nation with us in the great commonwealth family—and when I say "commonwealth family", I want to say that the connotation there is the British commonwealth family, so there will be no excuse for anyone questioning me in that regard if I happen to abbreviate in the future—and that we and they enjoy the privilege and honour of the same crowned head, and in consequence of the further fact that sentiment plays such an important role in our family relations, it would seem to me that an effort should be made to bring our royal family in closer contact with the people of Canada. The year 1939 was the first time that a governing monarch of Britain or Canada ever set foot upon Canadian soil.

That always seemed to me unfortunate and particularly when the unifying results which attended Their Majesties' visit at that time were so apparent and real. In my opinion, our Canadian children should not have to leave Canada to be able to see their own King and Queen. At more frequent intervals, subject to the health of Their Majesties, we should have them with us in our own land. This would constitute a first step towards the laudable objective of having an itinerant crowned head residing for appropriate periods among his several groups of subjects. Only those who have been privileged to travel outside our borders have seen Their Royal Highnesses, the popular and idolized Princesses Elizabeth and Margaret. In my humble opinion, the government should exert every possible effort to have Princess Margaret visit Canada next year, as has been hinted in other quarters of recent days. Her beauty, charm and youth would go far to establish firmly in the hearts of the Canadian people the love and affection in which the royal family is held in every corner of this land. We can assure the princess of a welcome, the warmth of which will be matched only by that tendered to her royal father and mother a decade before, and which will be later tendered to her illustrious sister and the Duke of Edinburgh, and last but not least bonnie Prince Charlie himself.

I want to turn for a moment, if I may, to the continent of Europe, which for a long time has seen the seeds of war planted beneath her soil. I think it can be said that the establishment of the western union, the signing of the North Atlantic treaty, which brought in the power of the new world as a factor in the stabilization of Europe, the institution of the so-called parliament of Europe and the success of the west in the Berlin impasse, all played a vital part in re-establishing the position of the western democracies in the troubled European scene.

The Berlin blockade, which has since been lifted, was a turning point in the cold war for prestige in the neurotic continent of Europe. Before the Berlin impasse occurred, the prestige of the western democratic powers had reached the lowest ebb since the second world war came to a close. The shattered continent wondered what the future had in store for it; would it be democracy or communism? The western powers seemed so far away. No matter what their will was, were they able to carry it out? And at the same time the hot breath of the nearby Russian bear was blowing down their necks.

When the allied powers made a decisive stand on the Berlin blockade and organized the world's most successful airlift, it brought democracy back into the running again so far as the continent of Europe was concerned. It turned the tide. Since that time the Russian foreign ministry has changed hands. Yugoslavia seems to have mutinied, Italy has strengthened its democratic position and France shows definite signs of recovery and consequent attachment to the democratic cause. The cold war has not gone so well for Russia in Europe as she had hoped, but we shall do well not to underestimate the dangers which still are so apparent there when we hear that Malenkov, one of the top members of the politburo, said in Moscow only a few days ago that Russia had the atomic bomb; that a third world war would destroy capitalism; that the United States was plotting armed intervention in countries bordering the Soviet union, but that the Soviet union of course sought nothing except peace.

We should not be lulled into a sense of false security by honeyed phrases and sweet nothings. We should realize that the threat of Russian aggression is no less because of this apparent shift in strategy.

It is now evident to Russia that the communist policy of threats and name-calling displayed in the cold war failed to shake the democracies or their policies. This new approach is merely a shift from cold war to cold diplomacy. This new peace-talk diplomacy of Russia is not a shift of goals but merely a shift of methods designed to lead us down the primrose path of complacency along which democracies are so vulnerable.

I should like to have time this afternoon to deal with some of the things that are reported to be happening within the Soviet-controlled part of the continent, but time is fleeting. I do want however to make reference to one thing before I leave Europe. There are important current developments on the west German diplomatic front today. The minister dealt with them as best he could in the limited time at his disposal this morning. The government should furnish such facts to parliament and to the people as can safely be given so that public opinion can crystallize with respect to the pros and cons of the proposal to bring gradually this part of Germany into the western democratic orb. It will at once be seen that this is essential in a nation like Canada which lost so many of the flower of its manhood in two wars. Keeping that in mind one will readily see how important it is; and I emphasize this upon the government with every bit of earnestness that I have at my command. I suggest to the government that they ought to give the public sufficient facts so that public opinion may be crystallized upon this particular point, because it is a matter of major importance to this nation that we have a supporting public behind any move of that kind that may be made. A confused opinion based on sketchy and inadequate facts may be a serious matter. The house should be told whether the newspaper reports hinting at an exchange of diplomats between Ottawa and the west German capital of Bonn have any foundation in fact. We should be told, too, whether in fact the western democracies are extending their frontiers, as the Secretary of State of the United States, Dean Acheson, said only a few days ago; whether they are extending them to the banks of the Elbe. The interest of the average Canadian in the stirringly vital movements in Europe is both keen and urgent. He knows that in this war-shattered continent may well be found the answer of peace or war in the critical days of tomorrow.

I now have a word to say with respect to the Far East. With four hundred millions of people added to the vast population previously within the orb of communism it can well be said that the danger spot for democracy is shifting to the Far East. China, a permanent member of the security council and former friend of the democracies, now has by armed revolution reversed her world allegiances. This change has far-reaching consequences for us as well as the other western powers. In a sense—I want hon. members to give some thought to this, if they will—China is today in a more inferior position as a former ally than if she had been our enemy in world war II. Today she has been abandoned to imperialistic aggression by Russian communism while Japan is occupied by democratic forces striving to restore her economy and establish a free government. Such are the puzzling situations that sometimes come to our attention in world affairs.

The Canadian ambassador is back from China. He should be called before the external affairs committee to testify upon the present conditions in that war-torn land. The hearts of Canadians are sad over the plight of China, for those of her people who have come to this country have been conscientious, honest and industrious citizens and have created a most favourable impression by their conduct among us.

Therefore, Canadians would like to know whether the new pro-Russian regime in China is likely to be more communist than Chinese or more Chinese than communist. Something may depend upon that, and we should be kept abreast of the information on that crucial point. We should know what information exists on the possibilities of further communist aggression in the strategic Far East. In short, the puzzled and confusing Chinese picture should be unveiled in the interests of a more intelligent and informed Canadian public opinion.

Coming to the close of my remarks I should like to deal now with a matter which I think is of paramount importance to this house and this country, and I refer to India. Many times it has been said with effect that the British commonwealth of nations can never be a static thing. Recent world developments have proved beyond question the soundness of that statement. For years the movement for liberation and independence was guided, fostered and promoted by Mahatma Gandhi and his devoted followers in that heavily populated land. Independence finally came, but with its birth came painful internal struggles and wide divergences of opinion between followers of different religious beliefs. But out of it came Pakistan and India, out of it came a great Indian leader and prime minister.

Pandit Nehru, the many-times-imprisoned disciple of Gandhi, assumed an even more important place in the sun with the assassination of the great Gandhi himself. In the confused and puzzled picture of the Far East, Nehru stands out as the beacon light of democracy against totalitarianism. His role is a difficult one to play in the internal and international field. With China temporarily mastered by communist forces, with many obstacles to reforms existing within the Indian nation itself, Nehru's task is a herculean one. I could not help thinking as he stood in this chamber a few short weeks ago, charged with the responsibility of governing over three hundred millions of people, that for both India and Canada a new era was breaking and that a new dawn had come in commonwealth change and development. Here was a man who had spent thirteen of his most productive years in British jails. It is a testimony to his tolerance, his greatness and his common sense that, despite all that he has gone through, he prefers to leave his nation, though a republic, still within the family of the British commonwealth. It is a tribute to the United Kingdom, it is a tribute to Nehru, it is a tribute to India, it is a tribute to the British commonwealth of nations.

As he was addressing us the thought must have occurred time after time to his listeners that there stood a great commonwealth statesman upon whose shoulders was being laid perhaps the main burden of defending the Far East and its teeming millions from the invasion of atheistic communism. Nehru's visit to Canada was more than an accident; it was a symbol of a coming understanding between east and west. It provided an opportunity for closer relationship between this great dominion and India as well as her sister dominions of Pakistan and Ceylon. In the light of all this I should like at this time to make what I hope will be a constructive and far-reaching suggestion. I know it will be breaking new ground.

If the Prime Minister of Canada has not already received an invitation from the Indian government to pay a visit to India, and I rather fancy he has, then I think it should be made known to the Indian government and its Prime Minister that the Canadian Prime Minister would welcome an invitation to visit India at a convenient time, some time after the close of the next session of this parliament, and that he should institute for the first time in diplomatic history and provide personal leadership to a goodwill trek of representative Canadians to the new Indian nation and to our other commonwealth sisters in the east.

In the years that lie ahead, many Canadians will be going to India and other Far Eastern areas for business, diplomatic and other reasons. Such a good will visit by our own Prime Minister and by leading representative people from both our urban and our rural Canada, not confined to diplomats, not confined to men in politics, not confined to men in business, but broadly speaking a small but significant cross-section of the Canadian people, would be heralded the world over as a visit which broke new ground in a new era of international good will, co-operation and understanding. It would show the Indian people that Canada is interested in them, that Canada wants to be a co-operative sister with her in the great British commonwealth family, and that Canada is anxious that we shall establish as soon as possible a good trading relationship, because very often friendship flows with trade. And when that good will party, led by the Prime Minister, comes back to Canada, its very representative personnel would be able to take into the corners of Canada the story of India and her possibilities and the homes of Canada would be made more familiar with India, her problems, her people and her possibilities. This nation should not let this opportunity pass. We should be the first to extend a personal word of greeting through our own Canadian folk to the Indian people at large. It would be the major move in uniting east and west in a closer and more co-operative British commonwealth family.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my first word in taking part in this debate can be one of congratulation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the thoughtful and comprehensive review of Canadian external relations which he has given to this house. I hope it will not prove an embarrassment to the minister if I say that the members of the C.C.F. liked his speech, not only because of the way in which it was delivered and the information it supplied but more so because of the moral and social philosophy which we felt was so much a part of it. I am sure the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) will pardon me if I do not follow him in the very forceful speech he made, but I do want to touch on one point which he raised at the beginning of his speech. It may not be an important point, but I think it is desirable that it should be settled and I think it is one of those points in our foreign relations that can be settled.

The hon. member objected to the term "commonwealth of nations," and maintained it should be "British commonwealth of nations." I had the feeling that that term was settled upon when the prime ministers met in London last April. I understood that it was not really a matter of choice, it was a question of whether there would be a British commonwealth of nations with two or more of the most important nations outside of it just because of its name, or whether we should have a commonwealth of nations in which the countries of India and Pakistan would be partners. That was my understanding and I notice that in British literature the term "commonwealth of nations" is used and not "British commonwealth of nations." As far as I am concerned the name is not important; what is important is the spirit of commonwealth. I am sure it will be there regardless of what name may be used.

I take part in the debate today with great hesitation. My hesitation is not because I have not arrived at conclusions about many of the problems discussed today. It arises from the fact that the issues involved in our international affairs are so varied and complex that the layman with his limited knowledge is not always sure if the conclusions arrived at are the right ones.

This afternoon I shall deal with a phase of our relations with other countries which I believe to be of paramount importance, and about which I have some understanding. I have in mind our economic relations. I am aware that economics and politics, nationally and internationally, are closely related. I am convinced that if the economic relations of the nations of the world do not run smoothly it is most unlikely that political relations will be satisfactory. I am also convinced that good economic relations among the nations of the world are necessary if we are to have progress, prosperity and peace.

Like the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), and indeed, all parties in the house, I accept the United Nations as the basis for our external relations. Nevertheless Canada's external affairs involve a great deal more than the United Nations because what can be done in that body is limited. Even if there were not the opposition of the Soviet union, I think that the limits imposed by the unwieldly character of the organization would make it impossible for the nations of the world to carry on all their efforts through that body.

We know that the United Nations is a divided institution. It is not divided into a government and an opposition as this house is, but is divided into a majority and an opposition. May I say that Andrei Vishinsky is the opposition leader par excellence to anyone who wants to take lessons in what a leader of an opposition should be. He knows exactly what he is going to say in every debate before he leaves Moscow for Lake Success. Every debate is a violent accusation of the motives and intentions of the other members, and at the end of it he will always say no.

It was my good fortune to attend the second session of the United Nations assembly in 1947 as one of the parliamentary advisers to the Canadian delegation. In the six weeks that I had the opportunity of watching the proceedings of the assembly or its committees, never once did Mr. Vishinsky say that he agreed with anything that was proposed unless it was proposed by the Soviet bloc. That is what makes one almost despair of the United Nations. Indeed, I felt most pessimistic about its value during the time I spent there. I think the farther one is away from it the more hopeful one is that it may be of some use in settling world problems. That does not mean, however, that the Soviet union may not change its mind some day.

I have mentioned Mr. Vishinsky. I should also like to say that I am indeed pleased to note that the Canadian delegation to the United Nations assembly has begun to talk to Mr. Vishinsky in the only language that he understands. They are talking back to him. When I was there in 1947 I thought the only delegate who talked back to Mr. Vishinsky was Hector McNeil of Great Britain. I am glad indeed to see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and only yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) made speeches in which they talked to Mr. Vishinsky in the only terms that he understands.

I have had long experience in debating with communists, and I learned early that the only way to reply to them when they become belligerent is to become more belligerent.

Mr. Knowles: The same way you talk to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. MacInnis: The way I talk to anyone who starts to get nasty. I likened the United Nations organization to a parliament, but of course there is a vital difference. In a parliament when the opposition has done its best or its worst, whichever way you look at it and I imagine the way you look at it depends on what side of the house you are on, the majority settles the question, and that finishes it. In the United Nations the minority makes the decisions, and the minority in this instance decides that nothing shall be done about things that matter. That is the real result of the veto in the security council.

I come now to the next point I wish to make. If we cannot do through the United Nations everything that we would like to do about our international affairs, then we must decide to do these things in other ways. We have already adopted that procedure. Less than a year ago the countries on both sides of the Atlantic ocean decided to enter into a treaty for collective defence. I was glad that the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to that treaty today, and that he referred to a phase of it in regard to which I am to say a few words. I am firmly convinced that, while the treaty provides for economic as well as military co-operation, we have not done as much to promote and co-ordinate economic co-operation amongst the nations signatory to the Atlantic pact as we have on the military side. The minister referred to article 2 this forenoon, but he did not read it. I think I will read it so hon. members may see that it is quite explicit with respect to the matter of economic co-operation:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

I agree that there has been some co-operation; but in my opinion the efforts at co-operation in the economic field have been half-hearted and not very successful. That is all-important, in my view, because if the nations of the North Atlantic pact are not economically strong they cannot be militarily strong, because our military strength will depend upon our economic strength. So it seems to me, and I have been thinking about this for some considerable time, that the most disturbing aspect of our external relations, apart from the refusal of the soviet bloc to co-operate with other countries in the United Nations, is the fact that the western nations themselves do not accept co-operation as being good in itself. What has been done through Marshall aid was not done so much to help the countries of Europe build up their economies and improve their standards of living because that was desirable in itself. It was done more as a means of fighting communism, which at the time was becoming a threat to the peace, and not only the peace but the political stability, of several of the countries of Europe.

Yet co-operation has justified itself in times so recent as to be still within the memory of all. I refer, of course, to the co-operation among the countries opposed to Germany and Japan in the last war. So I would urge this government and its representatives to stress to other countries, and to practise as its own policy, economic co-operation with all the countries of the world who are willing to co-operate with us. In my opinion economic co-operation is absolutely essential if we are to lay the foundation for an enduring peace. I agree that where possible co-operation should be carried on within the United Nations, but where that is not possible it must be carried on outside that organization. We must always remember that when economic relations between nations are one-sided and unstable it is impossible for them to maintain mutual confidence and co-operation in other phases of their economic relationships, no matter how great or important may be those other phases of mutual interest.

In the present economic crisis of the free nations, any attempts to justify a given form of settlement largely upon the grounds of overriding political and military expediency are, therefore, in my opinion, based upon a fallacy. Unless economic settlements are both equitable and workable, the political and military efforts will be rendered not only impotent in themselves but will become provocative of friction. It is in the field of trade and commercial relationships that we encounter our greatest difficulties in this regard. I do not believe that cutthroat competition or indeed any other competition and co-operation can be carried on at one and the same time. I feel that the old concept of economic competition is impossible in the new world situation confronting us. In our economic dealings with other countries we shall have to keep in mind their welfare as well as our own. Any dealings not based upon that principle will not get us very far.

Today almost everyone believes that co-operation is good; that is, they believe in it in the abstract, or that it is good for the other fellow. A good example of that attitude appears in the conditions proposed by the United States when Marshall aid was first suggested to the countries of Europe. While believing in free enterprise itself, the United States virtually compelled the European nations to plan their economies, or in other words to co-operate in their economic activities. I want to make it clear that I am not finding fault with the United States for making planning and co-operation a condition of receiving aid. It was essential that this be done. The idea I wish to convey is that international planning and co-operation cannot stop with the countries of Europe. It must also include, at least among the Atlantic pact countries, the United States and Canada.

In his speeches both here and in Europe Paul G. Hoffman, economic administrator, never wearies of insisting that the people of Europe plan and co-operate. I do not know whether he realizes that planning and co-operation will not produce the results desired, that is progress and stability in Europe, if the largest and strongest nation in the western group does not participate fully in that co-operative effort. Mr. Hoffman spoke to the Canadian chamber of commerce in Montreal on October 27. His speech was reported in the Montreal Gazette of the following morning, and I should like to read a few words from that report because I believe they support the point I am trying to stress. Speaking of the attitude of the American people toward foreign aid and European affairs he said there was "sleepiness, apathy and wishful thinking" on the part of the people. Then he continued:

> One would suppose that after two world wars and the threat of another, there would be little apathy about what was going on in the community of our neighbours. How much does it take to make us realize that we are living in an inescapably interdependent world? How long will it be before we understand that if we, the free nations of the world, want to avoid world war III we must stick together and work together?

It is not that we must fight together, but we must work together if we are going to avoid another world war. That, Mr. Speaker, is the point I wish to make in this debate, that we must work together for the good of each other and not each one for himself. That is as true of nations as it is of individuals.

Mr. Hoffman is only one of a great many prominent men who have recently made statements stressing the urgent necessity for economic co-operation among the nations if we are to get through this crisis, and if we are to eliminate poverty and put our economic order on a stable basis. All these men do not use the same words, but they did stress the interdependence of the nations of the world and the necessity of co-operation.

As my next witness in this case, I should like to bring Canada's Minister of Finance. I am sure that members opposite and the members on my far right will be glad to listen to what the Minister of Finance has to say. I am reading from the "External Affairs Bulletin" for October, which contains a report of the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) at the sterling-dollar meeting in Washington at which representatives of Canada, the United States and Great Britain were present.

Referring to the origins of the crisis the Minister of Finance said:
